Senator McClellan. And, the only issue here is, as stated in the most recent Supreme Court decision, that it offends against a section of the Federal Communications Act.

Mr. Cahn. That is correct, Senator.

Senator McClellan. You may proceed.

Mr. Cahn. Notwithstanding these decisions, the case law of the highest court of my home State, the State of New York, has approved New York's permissive scheme of official wiretapping pursuant to court order and use of such wiretap evidence in criminal trials.

Senator McClellan. They only authorize it for use in criminal trial, it could not be used in a civil suit, could it?

Mr. Cahn. No, sir. Thus, we have the unhappy situation where a law-enforcement official who is executing the wiretap policy of his State, as approved in the State constitution and in statutes and judicial decisions, technically may be guilty of violating section 605. This seriously weakens law enforcement.

As I have previously indicated, it is my urgent recommendation that the Congress enact, as soon as possible, legislation permitting court approved and controlled official wiretapping. Since Senate bill S. 675 is now before this subcommittee for consideration, I should like to address my attention to the provisions of that bill.

I believe that this bill could constitute a serviceable remedy for the problem which I have just discussed, if it were changed in certain respects.

The bill should be revised so as to strike subdivision (c) (3) of section 8, which provides that the applying authority, as a condition of obtaining a wiretap interception order, must show that "no other means are readily available for obtaining that information . . ."

If this clause is permitted to remain in the bill, it could seriously undermine its effective operation. It would be difficult to make the demonstration required by this provision, or, it might require weeks of surveillance to show, e.g., that a person involved in felony gambling, only conducts business over the phone and does not carry or keep evidence of illegal transactions taken over the phone. At the very least, this subdivision furnishes another ground for challenging the validity of wiretap evidence at a suppression hearing and would undoubtedly result in lengthy and complicated hearings of uncertain outcome.

Senator McCLELLAN. Your point may be well taken. Of course, in drafting this bill we were trying to give every concession to other means, in the hope that wiretapping would be used only where it is difficult to secure evidence otherwise. When it is going to take 5 months, 6 months or even 2 months to get evidence by other means, I would not regard that as "readily available." I do not know, of course, how the words would be interpreted.

Mr. CAHN. That is the very point I bring out, it is most difficult to determine how the courts would determine the word "readily".

Senator McCLELLAN. It might be by lengthy litigation.

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Section 8 provides in subdivision (d) (2) that each order authorizing a wiretap interception shall specify "each offense as to which information is to be sought . . ." A provision should be added to the bill providing that if the wiretap interception discloses evidence of other offenses not specified in the order, this evidence may be used to the same extent as evidence of crimes which are described in the order.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think under the bill as now written, let us say, if you were trying to convict someone for interstate gambling, and in the course of the detection you discovered that they were using narcotics, then that information and evidence could not be used, and you feel the bill ought to be amended so as to cover any crime specified in the act?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir, so long as the basic original order is granted and proper, then I believe that any crime that comes across that telephone should be used. And, I think it important that the act should make this clear.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. CAHN. Finally, it is my view that State judges should be relieved of the requirement of section 9(a) that judges granting wiretap orders should transmit copies of them to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. It seems to me that such a provision establishes an administrative relationship between the Federal and State judicial establishments, which is inconsistent with the spirit and rationale of the Supreme Court's holding in Stefanelli v. Minardi (342 U.S. 117) and incompatible with the constitutional scheme which constitutes the State judiciary, a coordinate judicial apparatus of equal standing and dignity. Moreover, the administrative burden which this provision would cast upon the State judicial system is more extensive than might appear on a casual reading of this section. If statistics on State wiretap orders are required, they would certainly be furnished to any committee of Congress upon request by any administering authority in a State judicial system. I respectfully submit that such a procedure is to be preferred over one which establishes a status of administrative accountability between the State and Federal judicial systems.

Senator McCLELLAN. You would have no objection to it as to Federal wiretapping?

Mr. CAHN. No, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. But, you would draw the line, that if it is authorized by the State, it is primarily under State jurisdiction, and it is a State function?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. And, such reports would be made and administrative records kept as the State law would require?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. CAHN. In any event, I emphatically urge the Congress to enact legislation permitting official wiretapping by State officers under some such scheme of safeguards as that which I have previously discussed.

Many types of criminal cases can rarely be proved except by wiretap evidence. Among these are organized gambling offenses, governmental corruption, labor racketeering and indeed, all of the types of wrongdoing which may be described under the heading of organized crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. In regard to the contention that we do not need any wiretapping; that it is too expensive and costs more than the results produced; and we do not want to adopt a procedure that might invade the privacy of people's homes even in seeking evidence in serious criminal cases. I ask, do you agree with that?

Mr. CAHN. No, sir. And, I discuss that more fully later on.

The failure of law enforcement to control these types of organized wrongdoing will have profound implications for the welfare of our society. Ever since the Kefauver committee of the U.S. Senate released its report in the early 1950's. It has been known that organized crime, through the investment of funds obtained from illegal gambling is increasing its operations in other criminal areas like narcotics. It is using its vast criminal profits to infiltrate virtually every phase of legitimate business and is threatening to gain control of the economy of the country. The McClellan committee of the U.S. Senate has warned of this alarming tendency, and New York State Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz. has told of the activities of hoodlum elements in the banking, lending, and securities fields and of the control which such activities has given them over lawful enterprises.

It has been estimated by the U.S. Department of Justice that illegal gambling reaches an annual volume of $7 billion. Other experts have given estimates up to $50 billion. No matter what the amount, however, there is no question that organized gambling is the life's blood of organized crime, and one of the greatest menaces to the health of free institutions is this vast, corrupting economic power of organized crime.

The value of wiretapping and electronic surveillance in the investigation and prosecution of organized crime, and its leaders, is acknowledged by District Attorney Frank S. Hogan, whose office has been most successful in this field. He stated that it is the single most valuable weapon in law enforcement's fight against organized crime. It has permitted us to undertake major investigations of organized crime. Without it, and I confine myself to top figures in the underworld, my own office could not have convicted Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Jimmy Hines, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, Joseph "Socks" Lanza, George Scalise, Frank Erickson, John "Dio" Dioguardi, and Frank Carbo.

A majority of the members of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, believe that legislation should be enacted granting carefully circumscribed authority for electronic surveillance to law-enforcement officers.

Despite this recommendation, the President of the United States has advised the Congress to enact the Right to Privacy Act of 1967 to outlaw all official and private wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping except in matters involving national security. I believe it would be a grave mistake to pass this measure. Its harmful effect on law enforcement would be enormous in every area of the country. The consequence of this bill would be to deprive local law enforcement of by far its most effective investigative devices, wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping. These devices are often used to procure leads in areas where wiretaps and eavesdrops are not themselves introduced in court, but the information to which it leads is most vital and clear.

It is clear that we must put a stop to gambling and the other practices of organized gangsterism which provide the funds for the domination of our business and economic life. But how shall we stop them? Experience shows that it cannot be done without wiretapping and that big-time hoodlums continued to do business on the telephone even in States permitting official wiretapping, since it is an indispensible aid to wide-ranging illegality. Unless we permit official wiretapping, we will seriously compromise law enforcement at a time when the crime rate is rising alarmingly and well-organized interstate crime is outdistancing our efforts to control it.

Indeed, crime in the contemporary age has become a social problem of such vast dimensions and such overpowering urgency that it challenges the very foundations of organized society and raises the profound question whether free government is competent to preserve itself against this pervasive, virulent challenge of sinister private power.

This is a crucial period in our national history. Failure to curb large-scale lawlessness within the next 10 years may bring about a fundamental change in our social order, and may permit the disease of corruption so thoroughly to pervade our common life that all later efforts to reverse the trend may be unavailing. The extent of hoodlum infiltration and dominion is already so considerable that law enforcement's efforts in some sectors take on an aura of futility—especially when viewed against the progressively accelerating growth of venal private power responsible only to extra legal objectives.

Indeed, it is not an exaggeration to say that unless we permit wiretapping, organized crime will more effectively consolidate its hold over the American economic establishment. From this base of economic power, as well as from the position of dominance which is derived from its influence over highly strategic local and national unions, it may achieve a stranglehold over our economy amounting to a power of veto over whether it shall stop or go, which industries or business firms will be allowed to stay in operation and which shall be destroyed. It is hardly necessary to add that when men of such caliber possess dictatorial power, they will use it to their own advantage and to the community's detriment.

While the overwhelming majority of unions are led by reputable people, a small minority with disproportionate power are amenable to the control of hoodlum forces. Wiretapping is an indispensable tool in the investigation and prosecution of labor racketeering.

My office was successful in preventing Vincent Squillante and other underworld racketeers from gaining control of the garbage industry in our community. This was costing the people of Nassau County hundreds of thousands of dollars a year in added costs for garbage collection. We successfully prosecuted underworld racketeers who set up illegal unions for the control of the jukebox industry in Nassau County. This operation extorted from the honest jukebox dealer and the tavern owner, many thousands of dollars each and every year by the use of an illegal union operation. We were successful in breaking monopolistic control in the milk industry which cost the consumer of Nassau County 2 cents more on every quart purchased. We successfully prosecuted underworld infiltration into the barbering industry and prevented a holocaust in Nassau County when 30 sticks of dynamite were seized. This dynamite was to be used against recalcitrant barbershops who would not bow to the demands of the underworld racketeers. We were also successful in breaking a counterfeit phonograph record ring which not only deprived the artist of royalty but the Federal Government of the proper taxes due. On many occasions we were successful in preventing organized racketeers from corrupting our police officials in order to set up gambling operations in Nassau County. In one case we successfully prosecuted a group who had offered the head of the district attorney's vice squad $1,500 per month, per phone, to set up operations. Without wiretapping and electronic surveillance, these cases could not have been brought to a successful conclusion.

Indeed, virtually every single rackets prosecution initiated by my office has depended on wiretap evidence and could not have been conducted——

Senator McCLELLAN. May I interrupt. Are you saying that in all of these cases you have referred to—the prosecutions, and results that you relate—were achieved as a result of wiretapping?

Mr. CAHN. The successes which we achieved were due to wiretapping itself, or the information which was received as a result of wiretapping or electronic surveillance, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I mean.

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir; no question about it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You could not have gotten the evidence, you could not have prosecuted the suspects, you could not have combatted this organized crime in these areas to corrupt the business community and the official life, without the use of surveillance techniques?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir; no question about it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. This all happened since you have been in office?

Mr. CAHN. This all happened since I took control over the rackets bureau of the Nassau County district attorney's office, and since I myself became district attorney.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think the Attorney General said he would like to be cited some instances where good has come from it. I have a newspaper clipping quoting the Attorney General in this respect.

This is from an editorial in the Milwaukee-Wisconsin Journal:

> Security is to be found in excellence in law enforcement in courts and in corrections. That excellence has not been demonstrated to include wiretapping.

Mr. CAHN. I cannot agree. As I go on to say, Senator, virtually every single rackets prosecution initiated by my office has depended on wiretap evidence and could not have been conducted without it. And I stand behind that statement 100 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Will you document these cases from the files in your office?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Had you not been permitted to use wiretapping, what would have been the difference in the present situation of respect for law enforcement and racketeering control in your jurisdiction?

Mr. CAHN. There is no question in my mind that many of these rackets and much of this control would still be going on in Nassau County.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right, proceed.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I interject a question, Mr. Chairman?

I am wondering if you are generally familiar with the network of organized crime around the country, not in a specific way, but in a general way.

Mr. CAHN. Yes, I believe I am, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. I am wondering if you feel that in your county, and generally in New York there is one of the most conscientious efforts being made to attack the problems of organized crime?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Are there similar efforts in other parts of the country?

Mr. CAHN. There is no question about that, too.

Senator KENNEDY. I think the material you presented here demonstrates that the nature and the threat of organized crime is extremely compelling. But many of us are trying to determine whether there is a correlation between the control of the threat and the use of wiretapping. For example, in parts of California, where they do not permit wiretapping, they still have, as I understand, a rather successful attack in this organized crime field. So, what I am trying to find out is whether it is not really possible to confront the problem of organized crime without bugging and wiretapping. This is what they are doing, apparently, out in California, and they do not have many of the advantages, or what you would certainly consider the advantages, of wiretapping that you have described today. I am wondering if you can help me in figuring out why this is so.

Mr. CAHN. Senator, I will have to just in very general terms, refer to a specific case, because it is still under investigation. But, my office, the Nassau County district attorney's office in Nassau County a small—not too small—community in Long Island, as a result of wiretapping, has come across an international organized gambling syndicate with tentacles throughout our entire country, including California, Senator Kennedy. And, I submit to you that it would be entirely impossible, it is entirely impossible for any law enforcement agency to effectively deal with this type organized gambling problem without the use of wiretapping. I submit to you that the State of California, anywhere in the State of California, could not have come across the evidence which we came across as a result of wiretapping, without the use of this most effective weapon.

I have been to jurisdictions now throughout the United States with the evidence which I have come across. But, I would like to bring this to your attention, sir, that there is no question in my mind that the agency which most effectively could deal with this particular problem is probably the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Senator Kennedy, I cannot even go to them with the information which I have because my evidence, insofar as the Federal procedure is concerned, is tainted. And, if it were at all brought out that the results of an investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation came as the result of my wiretap evidence, all of the evidence, all of the so-called poisonous fruits would be thrown out completely.

And, I submit again, and I repeat, as successful as it may be believed that the State of California is in dealing with organized gambling, I cannot get myself to believe that they can come across and effectively deal with an organized gambling problem without the use of wiretapping, because the most effective weapon in the use of organized gambling has to be, of necessity, the telephone.

Senator KENNEDY. I respect the very useful work that you are performing in law enforcement. Of course, on the other hand, the Attorney General of the United States, who has prime responsibility for Federal efforts in the field of law enforcement, and has made an extensive study of the effectiveness of bugging and tapping, has come up with some rather dramatically different conclusions than you have. So, it is a temptation for us, who do not have the familiarity that you and the Attorney General and the Organized Crime Section of the Justice Department have, to conclude that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to try to assess the adequacy of the empirical evidence in regard to the relationship between convictions and wiretapping.

Mr. CAHN. Senator Kennedy——

Senator KENNEDY. You present a good deal of evidence for one side, and I am sure it is very helpful to the members of the committee.

Mr. CAHN. I hope so, sir. And I may say that I have nothing but the utmost respect for Attorney General Clark. But, as I told the committee right at the beginning, I started and headed the Nassau County District Attorney's Rackets Bureau in 1954. And, since that time my major responsibility in that office has been the investigation and prosecution of organized crime, and, therefore, I have developed a familiarity with organized crime throughout the country.

I am not the last word, certainly. But, I must tell you of my own particular experience, and of the failure that I believe would have resulted if I had not had the information to which wiretapping led, or the evidence itself.

In one particular instance we had the prosecution of an illegal labor union trying to infiltrate the juke box industry. Because for the first time, in my experience, that wiretapping was not permitted by a judge, one particular defendant was lost. And, we had all ready to submit to the court for evidence the exact telephonic communication, which, in my opinion, was conclusive evidence of the implication of this particular individual.

Senator KENNEDY. Just a final question, because I know the committee wants to continue with your testimony. Could you give us some idea of the range of taps being conducted by your department? Are you getting to that now?

Mr. CAHN. I am getting to it right now.

In 1965, Senator, 35 court orders involving 45 telephones were requested by the Nassau County District Attorney's Rackets Bureau. These wiretaps were successfully used to break up a $20 million a year policy operation involving organized racketeers and as a result of these wiretaps convictions were obtained in an attempted extortion and coercion case and in a shylocking case.

In 1966, 13 court orders involving 19 telephones were requested and used in a $20 million a year felony bookmaking operation involving some of the top syndicated bookmakers in the country. The taps were also used to successfully prosecute a criminal usury case. Success in these cases would not have been at all possible had we not had the weapons of wiretapping and electronic surveillance.

I repeat, gambling, shylocking, usury, extortion, provide the funds, giving vast economic power to organized crime. Such power enables the holders to wield enormous political power as well. This staggering fusion of political and economic power would give to organized crime, a hold on American life such as no private interest has ever before exercised in our history. This condition once attained will be difficult to reverse since its containment will then require the kind of sustained, long-range, far-reaching corrective action which American society has never been able to initiate and maintain except in time of war or depression.

Government's inadequate efforts to control crime cause our citizens to lose faith in the law and law enforcement, indeed, in the process of free politics itself. Ineffectual government leads to cynicism, a resort to unofficial remedies, and a willingness to do business with evil and when it appears futile to cooperate with good, and the only feasible solution seems to lie in making one's peace with triumphantly ascendant antisocial forces. This perhaps explains the willingness of certain business firms to deal with hoodlums and the reluctance of some citizens to discharge civic duty by coming forward to testify against racketeers.

Indeed, no society can long survive once its individual members are deeply persuaded that their vital self-interest lies solely in a course subversive of the legal order and the public interest it secures.

Despite a political system which guarantees men their liberty, how can we call them free when gangster elements can prevent them from entering a business of their choosing or from freely competing with others in any lawful area of activity? For there is no true substance to liberty if it can be asserted only at the tr. sient pleasure of private despotism, and its exercise subjected to the heavy exactions of a terrorism which brutalizes and plunders and suspends a coercive omnipresence over the works of men.

Gentlemen, does this not affect our national security? To think otherwise is profound naivete.

Opponents of wiretapping often fail to realize that the invasion of privacy for good cause shown is an ancient prerogative of law enforcement in a free society and well within the permission of our constitutional tradition. Indeed, "search and seizure" pursuant to court order is a procedure specifically approved by the U.S. Constitution——

Senator ERVIN. I would like to ask you if under the fourth amendment of the U.S. Constitution and comparable provisions of State constitutions it has not been, since the foundation of the Republic, and still is, the practice for law enforcement officers acting upon order of the court to invade the private homes of individuals for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is any contraband or illegal material there, and for the purpose of obtaining evidence for use in criminal cases?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And, that practice is as old as the Republic, is it not?

Mr. CAHN. That is exactly the matter to which I refer, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now, is there any greater invasion of privacy in the case of an officer going into a private home under a search warrant, under those circumstances, than in the use of wiretaps on the telephone?

Mr. CAHN. I think not, Senator Ervin. And, I refer in a few seconds to that particular point.

Senator ERVIN. And, certainly, if the officer obtains no information by wiretapping that is used, and it is not exposed, there is less invasion of privacy than when he goes into a private home, is there not?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir. That is my opinion.

Senator ERVIN. So as you see, the principle of a reasonable search and seizure under article 4 of the Constitution and similar provisions of the State constitutions is the same as the principle which would underlie wiretapping?

Mr. CAHN. That is exactly the point to which I am now referring.

I say indeed, search and seizure pursuant to court order is a procedure specifically approved by the U.S. Constitution and the constitution of several States, and the most intimate correspondence in files so seized may be read and publicly divulged.

If one carries the antiwiretap thesis toward its ultimate bounds, then such invasions of privacy should also be abolished. And, it is but a step from this conclusion to its logical consequence that the subpena duces tecum should also be eliminated since it involves a persisting intervention in private affairs and private correspondence and letter communication which sometimes approaches formidable dimensions. By the same reasoning, the policeman ought not to be allowed to do any privacy-invading things which he may now do legally, for example, to eavesdrop without electronic devices; or to shadow suspects; or to employ the "stakeout" tactic which involves intensive surveillance of intimate details of private life over long periods of time and without geographic limit; or to use binoculars or telescopes; conversing with suspect who is not aware of his identity and position; or to receive information from informers since these practices too, involve some interference with privacy. Also, what can one say of the U.S. Census and its inquiry into the minute details of personal life? The fact is that "search and seizure" and subpenas duces tecum are much more frequently granted than wiretaps and often involve a greater penetration into private life as do the various types of surveillance.

When the argument in opposition to the doctrine of unlimited privacy is stated plainly, the unsoundness of that doctrine becomes apparent.

If a crime were taking place in a man's bedroom, few people would object to the invasion of that bedroom by police to stop a criminal act in progress or to arrest the criminal. Regulated wiretapping in New York is limited to this type of situation by the statutory requirement contained in section 813(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that the applicant for a wiretap order "show reasonable ground to believe" that evidence of crime may be obtained by tapping the phone in question. If a bedroom may be invaded, on a judgment of reasonable ground or probable cause to believe that a crime is being committed within it, it is difficult to understand why the less sacred telephone wire cannot be invaded on a similar showing.

The police officer is not interested in infringing upon the privacy of law-abiding citizens. The police officer is not interested in private conversations. The police officer monitoring interceptions is interested only in those conversations which deal with crime. I do not know of one single case where it was claimed that a law officer had published some item of information learned from wiretapping outside the course of his official duties.

As the President's Commission has noted, the telephone is enormously effective as an aid to crime. If we immunize it from devices of crime detection, we surrender to criminals a whole technology for their unimpeded use. Civil libertarians opposed to official wiretapping under proper safeguards are advocating a philosophy of privacy appropriate to a sparsely populated society.

Even if official wiretapping entails some small interception of embarrassing conversations, even if in some instances a slight invasion of privacy results, this would not be sufficient to disqualify it from acceptance, for we must ask ourselves whether the small increment in added privacy in respect to telephone conversation is worth the terrible cost in added crime and in the increasing power of organized crime which would result from a policy of banning wiretapping and other electronic eavesdropping.

I think it is fair to say that neither in functional nor social value terms can the case for the right of privacy be asserted with any rational force to have greater weight than the argument in favor of a policy which permits wiretapping only by law enforcement officials upon proof to an authorizing court amounting to reasonable ground that evidence of crime will be obtained from the prospective wiretap sought to be authorized.

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that those who oppose all official wiretapping have not really undertaken the hard effort at thought required in weighing the competing social and individual interest involved. They reject wiretapping out of hand as though it imposed great burdens on the structure of freedom while conferring only trivial benefits. Actually, the reverse is true. Relatively few wires are tapped by the law enforcement authorities in any given jurisdiction during the course of a year and comparatively few persons suffer an invasion of privacy: moreover, those whose privacy is invaded are mostly criminals or those dealing with them. (In fact, former District Attorney Edward Silver, of Kings County, esitmated in the late 1950's that his office procured convictions from about 80 percent of the wiretaps it conducted). Furthermore, the contents of such conversations are never disclosed to the public, except for those portions evidencing criminal acts which are used in criminal trials. Moreover, the right to be safe from criminals is as important as the right to privacy.

Senator McCLELLAN. May I ask just one question. From your experience in this—you have the wiretapping law and have operated under it for a number of years—in the case of a wiretap where irrelevant conversation takes place, even thought the one monitoring may hear it, if this conversation or any part of it is irrelevant, that is not admitted?

Mr. CAHN. It is not admissible, it is not relevant, and it is not material, and it is not made at all public. And Senator, law enforcement cannot be less interested in it.

Senator McCLELLAN. I understand. The point I want to emphasize is, if you make the tap and hear conversations and even record it, that part of it having no relevancy to the issue of the crime with which the accused may be charged is not admitted and not made public?

Mr. CAHN. It is not admitted and not made public.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you give us some idea as to the number of phone conversations that have been tapped and the number of conversations that have actually been productive, so at least we get some idea of the relationship between those that are productive and those that are not?

Mr. CAHN. I am coming to the figures now, Senator Kennedy, provided me by the Nassau County Police Department. In my own particular figures to which I referred, it is difficult to say the exact number of conversations on each tap which proved productive. Suffice it to say that the individuals whose phones were tapped provided the information which led to successful conclusions of the prosecution.

Senator KENNEDY. But we do not know, for example, how many innocent conversations they listened in to to get a certain lead, do we?

Mr. CAHN. No, sir. It would be almost impossible to give you those figures.

Let me give you an example——

Senator KENNEDY. For example, in that milk case which you were talking about——

Mr. CAHN. This milk case was rather peculiar, Senator Kennedy, because the phone itself was being used only by the individual in whom we were interested, and the family, for instance, never bothered to use the phone. And, he used the phone primarily for his business. And I can say to you that practically every telephone conversation he had, this particular individual was calling milk firms who were engaged in this monopolistic practice. So, practically every phone call he had gave us information which was most useful. In other areas families may be using the phone. In other particular instances the individual in whom we are interested may not use the phone each and every time to conduct his business, there may be some social use of the phone, too. After all, it is most difficult—and we as law enforcement officers have to be quite patient in filtering out the proper phone conversations which will lead to successful conclusion of prosecution. And we completely disregard all other materials.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you transcribe it?

Mr. CAHN. We do not transcribe it.

Senator KENNEDY. Who makes the decision? Does the person listening on the other end make the decision on the spot as to whether certain conversation is relevant or not.

Mr. CAHN. Yes, it has to be done that way. The transcription, of course, the recording goes on. We do not necessarily have men constantly on the machine listening to the telephone.

Senator KENNEDY Do you take everything down on the tape?

Mr. CAHN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. And, that includes all private conversations?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. Every conversation?

Mr. CAHN. But, the individual who listens and monitors the tape eventually must make his own decision, and he has to have knowledge about the case, as to which particular conversations are relevant and important. Those are transcribed. The others are not, sir. And eventually they are dstroyed.

In 1965, because of an unusual amount of bookmaking activity in Nassau County, 147 wiretap orders were requested. One hundred and one in bookmaking cases; 11 in policy cases; nine in prostitution cases; eight in burglary cases; one in a pornography case; five in grand larceny cases; two in rape cases; two in narcotic cases; two in forgery cases and one in an arson case.

Because of these wiretap orders 127 bookmaking arrests resulted. Thirty-seven police arrests; 12 prostitution arrests; two pornography arrests; 30 burglary arrests; six robbery arrests; four grand larcency arrests; one rape arrest; and four narcotics arrests.

As a result of the information obtained from these wiretap orders, 11 arrests were made for other crimes.

In 1966, 78 wiretap orders were requested: 49 for bookmaking, six for policy, two for prostitution, four for pornography, three for burglary, four for robbery, two for narcotics, two for forgery, two for homicide, two for felonious assault, one for illegal gambling, and one for criminally receiving.

Because of these arrests, 120 bookmaking arrests resulted: 29 policy arrests, 11 prostitution arrests, seven pornography arrests, 19 burglary arrests, two robbery arrests, three narcotics arrests, four forgery arrests, and two felonious assaults arrests. As a result of the information obtained from these wiretap orders, 16 arrests were made for other crimes.

At this particular time, gentlemen, I have requested the police department to continue their work and see if they can provide for this committee the number of convictions that resulted.

Senator McClellan. I was going to ask if you could give us the number of convictions that have resulted from this.

Mr. Cahn. I would not have had these figures at all if I insisted that that be done at this particular time. And so, if you will bear with me, gentlemen, I will have them sent to you as soon as they are available.

Senator McClellan. All right. Will you give a statement along with them explaning them so that we will understand their relationship to wiretapping?

Mr. Cahn. Yes, sir.

Senator Ervin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question I think is relevant to this.

In 1965 you applied for 147 wiretap orders?

Mr. Cahn. The police department did.

Senator Ervin. That is what I mean. And if my arithmetic is correct, there were 223 arrests.

Mr. Cahn. That is correct, sir.

Senator Ervin. Then, in 1966 the police department applied for 78 wiretap orders, which resulted in 179 arrests.

Mr. Cahn. That is correct, sir.

Senator Ervin. What was the total population of your district; that is, Nassau County?

Mr. Cahn. The population is now approximately a million and a half people, sir.

Sentor Ervin. Now, the overwhelming majority of all of the arrests which were made as a result of these wiretaps were for crimes which were largely commercial in nature; that is, entered into illegally for the purpose of getting a monetary gain?

Mr. Cahn. That is correct, sir.

Senator Ervin. And, these wiretaps are not wiretaps that had anything to do with the home or the offices of people who were merely ordinary citizens who may commit crimes on the spur of the moment as a result of some sudden provocation?

Mr. Cahn. No, sir. We could not obtain a court order if that were the case, sir. These wiretap orders—and Nassau County has insisted now that when the police seek a court order, since it is the district attorney that has to sustain that court order in court, that we have the cooperation of the police department in coming to the district attorney first and getting our approval. And the standard that we have set is rather high. We try not to promiscuously wiretap. We use it as an effective weapon and not just as a weapon, a sort of gunshot device where we are just shooting and not knowing what we are shooting at.

Senator ERVIN. And, the police were acting under New York law?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. It used to be thought to be one of the geniuses of our system of government that the State could enforce their criminal laws according to their own laws, and that that gave us as many laboratories as there were States to make experiments with respect to laws, which experiments could be adopted by other States if they were successful, and which would not hurt any but the particular State where the experiment was carried on if they were not successful. Do you not believe that this is a better system for the enforcement of criminal justice than to try to standardize everything and make it uniform under directions from Congress?

Mr. CAHN. I am inclined to agree with you, Senator; yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not have quite a different field to deal with, where you have a heavier urban population, for example, than a rural population?

Mr. CAHN. There is no question but that what you say is slightly true.

And now, it is time for us to decide whether the relatively few wiretaps made in the course of a year on the phones, mostly of criminals or their associates, represent such an intolerable evil that we would prefer to let organized crime flourish out of control rather than to permit such tapping to continue.

Senator KENNEDY. May I ask you a question on this material which you just commented on?

I am interested in the nature of these offenses because I am trying to relate these offenses to the attack on organized crime. I wonder whether the arrests for prostitution, pornography, and some of the others really are related to what we normally think of as organized crime.

Mr. CAHN. The prostitution cases may very well have, Senator Kennedy, because this is also a tool of organized crime. The pornography case is obviously not.

Senator KENNEDY. The rape cases?

Mr. CAHN. No, the rape cases are definitely not. I know, for instance——

Senator KENNEDY. Arson?

I was just wondering because you talked in the most dramatic terms earlier in your testimony about the nature of organized crime and how its tentacles were reaching all over the country. And you said that wiretapping is one of the effective means of combating it. But then looking at the types of wiretaps that were requested, and which have been installed, I am not sure I would be completely satisfied that that relationship is as close as might be suggested by your earlier testimony.

Mr. CAHN. Senator Kennedy, there is no question in my mind——

Senator KENNEDY. I think it would be very helpful since I have not had a chance to review the rest of your testimony, to know how you could say of th ese local bookmaking cases that arrests and even fines for these local bookies could have any significant effect on organized crime that existed in California or anywhere else. And the same goes for the prostitution and arson and rape cases. I am hopeful that you will spell that out, because if these taps are just secured to get at individual local gamblers and prostitutes, then as important as it may be, to stop these particular acts, I fail to see the close correlation between those cases and combating the threat of organized crime on a national level, which you mentioned in your very effective earlier testimony.

The thrust of the information you have just given us is to contradict your prior statement.

Mr. CAHN. Let me say this, that I urge once again that the bookmaking and policy cases in which the district attorney's office obtained wiretap orders had direct relationship with organized crime, with organized bookmakers, syndicated bookmakers throughout the entire United States. As I just informed you, the one case we are dealing with now is international in scope, bookmaking, bookmaking on sporting events only, they do not even bother with horseracing. These bookmaking cases, Senator Kennedy, may involve organized bookmaking, organized crime within the city and State of New York, and may not necessarily involve an organized syndicate throughout the country. But if these funds were traced to the individual syndicate at the local level, I am sure from my own experience you will eventually be able to trace the use of those funds to a national syndicate, and a national organization.

As I said——

Senator KENNEDY. I think that your point would be more dramatically and effectively made, if I may say so, if you could show some such close correlation between the various tap orders which are granted for the specific minor local offenses and the higher echelons of organized crime, and if you could prove that taps are the only way to control such local offenses. You are here to tell about Nassau County, and we have to respect your qualifications on this subject as it affects that county. But to the extent that organized crime is coordinated in this national syndicate that you have spoken of earlier it is hard to see how the arguments you make provide any justification for wiretapping for local crimes, and especially local misdemeanors. I think that there is a difference.

Mr. CAHN. Yes, Senator Kennedy. The wiretap orders to which I previously referred that were requested by the district attorney's office, these are within my own personal knowledge. And I know that these wiretap orders dealt with organized crime throughout the entire country. Having just the approval of the wiretap orders, I know with what they deal, and I know that in most instances they deal with syndicated crime within the local area.

But I want to make it clear that I am in favor of wiretapping for the use against the criminal, and for use in crime detection. And, I would prefer to see very little restriction on that. It would be very difficult for me to tell the mother and father of a kidnaped child, well, it is entirely possible that we may have the return of your child if we use wiretapping, but since it does not involve national security, and since the one who is suspected of taking the child is not part of any criminal syndicate, we cannot use it. I would not want to be placed in that position, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. No, sir. But we also do not want to be wrapped up in polemics. Could you give me any instance where wiretapping has been effective in kidnapping?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir. In People against Angelo John Lemarca in 1956 in Nassau County where I was coprosecutor, one of the effective pieces of information was obtained as the result of a tap on Mrs. Weinberger's phone, the mother of the kidnaped baby, a most effective piece of information.

Senator KENNEDY. But actually, that is a consentual interruption; that is, the owner of the phone consented to someone's listening in—I do not know the facts, but is that not the case?

Mr. CAHN. It was an important, vital piece of evidence that led to the eventual conviction of Angelo John Lamarca——

Senator KENNEDY. That was with the consent of the one who occupied the home and took part in the conversation; was it not?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, that is a monitor.

Senator KENNEDY. There is quite a bit of difference between listening with the consent of the user of the phone and having a tap on some place else where there is not consent.

Mr. CAHN. Angelo John Lemara did not know he was being tapped on the other side.

Senator KENNEDY. But obviously that is a consented to overhearing. You were given the subscriber's permission to listen in; were you not?

Mr. CAHN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. What we are talking about here are instances where such permission is not granted. I think there is an important distinction in that; is there not?

Mr. CAHN. I agree.

Senator KENNEDY. Can you give me another case?

Mr. CAHN. Thank heavens, Senator Kennedy, Nassau County does not have too many kidnap cases.

Senator KENNEDY. I am thankful, too.

Mr. CAHN. And, I could not give you any others. This was one that was successfully prosecuted. Unfortunately, however, the return of the baby was not effected.

Senator KENNEDY. I assume, of course, that the taps that you mentioned on page 20 of your testimony were not also consent agreements.

Mr. CAHN. No, by no means. These are all strictly known as wiretap orders with the approval of the court, not monitors.

Senator KENNEDY. After a showing of probable cause?

Mr. CAHN. After the probable cause.

Senator ERVIN. May I ask this. Whether the wiretap is placed with the consent of one of the parties or not, the objective of the wiretap is exactly the same, is it not, to ascertain largely whether the crime has been committed and the identity of the criminal?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. Are you not under the impression from reading about kidnaping cases, and the reports about them, that kidnapers very frequently use the telephone as a means of contacting the families of persons kidnaped for ransom?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir; that is correct, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now, are not pornography cases largely commercial? In other words, that is, the sale and distribution of obscene materials. And are not these materials printed and circulated and sold as an organized business, in effect?

Mr. CAHN. That is why I said, it is possible. I do not believe, if I remember correctly—I do not want to create a false impression—I do not believe that in this instance organized crime was involved. There was a peculiar reason why we even used wiretapping in this particular case.

Senator ERVIN. But, as a general rule is it not true that pornography is a very extensive business throughout the United States?

Mr. CAHN. Oh, yes; Senator.

Senator ERVIN. And narcotics cases and prostitution cases are very frequently cases which involve the major source by which organized crime obtains its rewards?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And regardless of whether organized crime can be organized within one district or one State, and even though it has no interstate implications, it is just as bad for that district or that State, is it not?

Mr. CAHN. That is correct.

Absolute freedom of privacy is an impossible ideal on which to found an orderly society. The Supreme Court of the United States has already recognized this obvious fact as evidenced by the development of the "clear and present danger" doctrine. The U.S. Supreme Court has not hesitated to affirm the social interest even at considerable cost to individual freedom when the social interest was seriously threatened. Every policy championed as a means of increasing individual freedom, privacy or security should be carefully evaluated to determine the freedom or privacy that would be lost as well as the freedom or privacy that would be gained from its implementation where the process of law enforcement, therefore, is rendered more difficult and is weakened, relatively fewer criminals will be arrested, convicted and incarcerated and thus relatively more criminals will be given the freedom to act out their antisocial inclinations. As a consequence, our streets and parks will be rendered relatively less safe and the privacy of our homes subject to invasion by burglars and thieves. Thus, the freedom of action of law abiding citizens will, accordingly, be constricted to a greater extent than would otherwise be the case if a policy of telephonic privacy is selected which forbids even those interceptions which are justified by proof of criminal activities.

In New York State, where wiretapping and electronic surveillance under court control and court order is permitted, here in New York State where this so-called invasion of privacy is possible, there has been no hue and cry by our citizens that this process involved serious abuse of the freedom of privacy. Quite the contrary, our success in criminal prosecution as a result of wiretapping and electronic surveillance has constantly been praised.

Today the telephone is as much an instrument of crime as the gun. It is a weapon of crime. It is a weapon of the racketeer. It has had and will continue to have a devastating effect upon the economy of our country. The public interest requires the adoption of a Federal program permitting judicially ordered and controlled wiretapping by State law enforcement officers. It is an important and vital investigative technique, the only effective weapon against the use of the telephone as an instrument of crime.

I do not mean to suggest that wiretapping is an automatic cure for all that ails us, nor a guarantee of success, nor that its use alone will bring to a state of social perfection. After all, many of our local and State police agencies have been using wiretaps in evidence for some time now. But, I do believe that it would be a tragic policy to deprive us of an extremely effective and helpful crime-fighting weapon at a time when crime is increasing and organized crime is challenging the forces of law and order as never before. At such a time of crisis there is no sense in making things easier for lawbreakers and conceding victory without a struggle. When one is engaged in a war for survival, the niceties of a quieter age must give way to a more vigorous regime of practice (see Korematsu v. U.S., 303 U.S. 217; Hirabayashi v. U.S., 320 U.S. 81)

I believe it is vital that Congress pass a law permitting wiretapping by State officials under restrictions such as those contained in the laws of New York with little limit on the type of crime in which it may be employed. The New York legislative program on wiretapping includes well-designed curbs on private wiretapping and carefully controls tapping by public officers. It strikes a reasonable balance between individual privacy and the individual right to life free of criminal molestation.

The fact is that a significant percentage of the most important criminal convictions in New York State in recent years have been based upon wiretap evidence or information. Without it hundreds of hardened thugs and dangerous enemies of society would be roaming the streets instead of reposing safely in jail, as they now are.

Law enforcement will not preserve our country as a healthy and decent place in which to live if it is not given tools with which to ply its trade effectively. Wiretapping is only one of those tools, but it is one of the most effective in the armament of crime control. Unless we can free ourselves from dogmatic emotionalism and rigid, ritualistic doctrinairism, unless we can look at our situation realistically and effect a more careful and thoughtful balance of interests, unless we can shake off political inertia and move quickly and energetically in the direction that reason counsels, our way of life as we have known it for two centuries, may be nearing its end.

Thank you very much for your attention, gentlemen. And once again, let me express my sincere appreciation for this very kind invitation to come and speak before you this morning.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Mr. Cahn.

I do not know that we have received a more forcible and persuasive statement before this committee in the course of these hearings. I have not regarded wiretapping as the most important legislation before the committee, although I regard it as important and essential to law enforcement in some areas. If we do not authorize wiretapping, law enforcement is being deprived of a tool, just as you have illustrated. Law enforcement is also being deprived of the right of interrogation of a suspect. It is being deprived of the use of confessions of a suspect. It is being denied these tools that I feel are vital to carry out effective law enforcement in some areas of crime.

It seems to me that we are giving more and more advantages to the criminal. And crime continues to rise.

Some say that the fact that a guilty person escapes punishment, that a self-confessed murderer or rapist is not punished, has not necessarily increased the crime rate, or has not contributed to an increase in the crime rate. What is your view about that?

Mr. CAHN. There is no question in my mind, Senator, that changes have to be effected in the area of criminal law. It is my personal opinion that some of these changes have gone a bit too far, to the detriment of law enforcement. In some cases it may be a bit early to determine the full and complete effect of judicial decision. I certainly believe that the decisions were made in sincerity and dedication. I do believe, however, that insofar as the law enforcement officer on the street is concerned, that he believes at the present time he is being handcuffed. To some extent I must of necessity, agree.

Insofar as confessions are concerned, my experience has taught me that it is perhaps one of the most important pieces of evidence insofar as a prosecutor is concerned. And, where one has to sit and beg an individual not to talk to you, it must of necessity result in fewer statements, fewer confessions. In my opinion, fewer statements and fewer confessions are going to result in fewer convictions.

Let me repeat, it is not that the decision was not made with sincerity or dedication. But, I do believe that it must eventually prove itself to be detrimental to effective law enforcement. And, I do not believe that voluntary confessions should be restricted by some unreal and unwanted fear that exists. Because if we continue to place the mantle of disrespect around the police officer by certain judicial decisions, I think we are in danger. We must continue to recognize, and we should hope that the people continue to recognize, that the policeman on the beat is there as a friend, and not as some ogre or monster, to be distrusted, and to be whipped and to be discredited.

I am hoping that sooner or later an eventual meeting ground will be set up which will provide for the law enforcement officer, his proper tools, and which will provide the fullest range of guarantees for those who are charged with crimes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The question I asked you—I made reference to some of these tools being taken away, but the thrust of the question I asked was, does the guilty escaping punishment, escaping detection, apprehension and punishment, does that contribute to the increase in crime?

Mr. CAHN. In my opinion, there is no question about that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. When a self-confessed, guilty person has been convicted, and then the case is reversed under circumstances where it has to be dismissed, and this sets a precedent where others equally guilty in the same circumstances have to be dismissed, irrespective of whether the decision is right or wrong, legal or otherwise, does it have any effect upon the increase in crime?

Mr. CAHN. I think so. Because, Senator, I am old fashionsd. I believe that if there are no law or punishment prescribed for the violation of a law, crime would increase 100 fold. And, I believe that if there is a laxity in law enforcement, whether it be through judicial decision, whether it be for technical reason or not, crime is going to increase because the criminal himself will feel safer and freer to ply his illegal trade.

Senator McCLELLAN. If it has the result of making those inclined to commit crimes and disobey the law feel more free and bold to commit crime, then the whole theory of punishment is wrong?

Mr. CAHN. That is right, there is no need for it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Just call them all sick and put them in the hospital until they want to walk out and commit another crime.

I have here a wire dated April 17 for Mr. William Raggio, the executive vice president of the National District Attorney's Association.

You say you represent this association?

Mr. CAHN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection, I will put his wire in the record at this point.

(The wire referred to follows:)

RENO, NEV., April 17, 1967.

Hon. WILLIAM PAISLEY, Chief Counsel,
Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

Regret my schedule will not permit my attendance before Senator McClellan's subcommittee April 20. I am firmly convinced that legislation to control wiretapping and eavesdropping is essential, but that permissive legislation should be enacted authorizing use of such devices by law enforcement officials under court control in matters of serious crime. I refer you to the resolution adopted by National District Attorney Association at midwinter conference in Los Angeles in March 1967 copy of this resolution being airmailed to you by executive secretary. I am advised that William Cahn of New York and Charles Moylan, Jr., will appear before your committee on April 20.

WILLIAM J. RAGGIO,
District Attorney, Washoe County, Nev., and President-elect National District Attorneys Association.

Senator McCLELLAN. We have a resolution concerning wiretapping from the National District Attorney's Association which was adopted at the mid-winter conference, March 18, 1967.

Mr. CAHN. That is correct, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection, the resolution will be printed in the record at this point.

(The resolution referred to follows:)

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY NATIONAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS ASSOCIATION, CHICAGO, ILL., AT THE MID-WINTER CONFERENCE IN LOS ANGELES, CALIF., APRIL 18, 1967

RESOLUTION

Whereas, great concern is being expressed about the increasing use of electronic surveillance devices, involving both the interception of wire and radio communications and the monitoring of private conversations; and

Whereas the Association initially recognizes that privacy of communication is essential if individuals are to think and act creatively and constructively; and

Whereas, on the other hand, the controlled usage of such electronic and mechanical devices can be most effective in the prevention and solution of serious crimes and in the protection of individuals who might be victims of crime; and

Whereas, such usage is often necessary and the sole means of affording such prevention, detection and protection; and

Whereas, some measures are clearly necessary to prevent the indiscriminate use of such electronic devices, especially by those individuals and groups engaged in illegal activities or activities not primarily in the public interest; and

Whereas, there presently exists lack of uniformity and resultant confusion in the existing laws dealing with this subject and the interpretation of such laws; and

Whereas, a majority of the members of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice have recognized this situation and have recommended that legislation be enacted granting carefully circumscribed authority for electronic surveillance to law enforcement officers;

Now Therefore, Be It Resolved that the National District Attorneys Association urges the enactment of appropriate federal and state legislation which would grant authority, on application of district attorneys, attorneys general and the Attorney General of the United States, on behalf of law enforcement agencies, and under court control, for electronic surveillance in connection with the prevetion and solution of serious criminal offenses, as well as in matters involving state and national security.

Be It Further Resolved that such legislation be in form so as to not preclude the right of an individual to preserve a record of his own conversations and transactions; and

Be It Further Resolved that effort be made to make such legislation uniform throughout the various jurisdictions, insofar as procedures and controls are concerned and that this be accomplished, if necessary, by the enactment of permissive legislation on the part of the Congress.

Done at Los Angeles, California, this 18th day of March, 1967.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Ervin?

Senator ERVIN. I practiced law very actively and for many years, always on the side of the defense. And, as the result of my experience in trying, I think I could say, thousands of cases, I have the opinion that virtually all, or the overwhelming majority of men who are arrested for crime, and particularly those who are arrested for serious crimes, already know that they do not have to confess, and they already know that anything they say derogatory to their case can be used against them, and they already know that they have a right to a lawyer, and have a right to remain silent until they got a lawyer, and then have a right to act on his advice.

I would like to ask you what your observation and experience has been with respect to most persons charged with crime already knowing the things the Supreme Court majority held in Miranda have to be stated to them.

Mr. CAHN. I think the majority of the people do know that, Senator Ervin. And, I am sure that your experience as a defense lawyer has proven to be correct. Certainly, it has been my experience that this is true.

Very frankly, I do not remember any case, except perhaps dealing with a very young child, and then we as prosecutors have nothing to do with the case. But, even the teenager today is going to be more familiar with his own particular individual rights than the police officer.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As far as adults are concerned, as a practical matter about the only one who does not know these things is the man who has a complete defense on the ground of insanity, is that not true?

Mr. CAHN. That may be, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So that the result, as a practical matter, is that Federal and State courts throughout the United States are every day being compelled to free self-confessed criminals simply because the police officer did not tell them something they already knew?

Mr. CAHN. But in all fairness, Senator—I do not know how long this will continue—this comes as the result of a decision and its applicability, and its retroactive applicability. The question now comes, will the new rules and regulations as set down by these decisions act as a handcuff on law enforcement. I believe it will. But, I certainly feel that in all fairness more time should be given.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As a matter of fact, when the average lawyer is summoned, as he has to be under these rules, he has to come virtually to the stationhouse, to advise the client. He has no opportunity to investigate the circumstances of the case before he gets there, and every lawyer that has enough intelligence to have a license to practice law will tell his client not to say anything.

Mr. CAHN. If he did not, I think the case would probably be subject to reversal for lack of proper counsel.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Just one thing. I take it, you agree with me in that Daniel Webster spoke a truth when he said:

> Every unpunished murderer contributes to the insecurity of every man's life.

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator KENNEDY. Are you familiar with the Crime Commission report?

Mr. CAHN. I am in the midst of reading it now, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. Particularly the part of it that talks about wiretapping.

Mr. CAHN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. As I remember—and any comments that you want to make on this will certainly be welcome—the thrust of that report is that really in dealing with organized crime what would be most helpful, if we are to have the wiretap, is to be able to obtain strategic information about the complexities and the nature of the organized crime. They seriously questioned whether using wiretaps was justified in the smaller problems that might be considered insignificant in comparison with the larger problems—they questioned the real need for it in this area.

But as to major organized crime figures, some observers have suggested that it might be extremely difficult to get a court order based on probable cause, because it would be so difficult to show probable cause as to specific crime for these people who are the important and significant organized crime figures in this country.

This is one of the problems that we have to wrestle with. I think all of us are generally sympathetic to the good of eliminating the scourge of organized crime.

But, in your own experience would you not agree that the most helpful kind of information a law-enforcement official might receive from a tap is not specific evidence of a specific crime as to which there is already probable cause but this kind of strategic information for the purpose of getting a general view of what certain people are saying and doing?

Mr. CAHN. Senator Kennedy, there is no question that the information which is received as a result of wiretaps can be most helpful even though the evidence of wiretapping itself may not be introduced in court. There is no question that it can lead to other information, and sometimes provides the basis of another wiretap order which will result in some conviction for a very serious crime, or crimes involving organized racketeers. There is no question about that.

Senator KENNEDY. Of course, you really just come about that information casually, do you not?

Mr. CAHN. No, sir. I cannot submit to the characterization of casual.

Senator KENNEDY. You must, however, admit the enormity of the problem of getting probable cause.

Mr. CAHN. But, unless we get the probable cause we cannot get the wiretap.

Senator KENNEDY. That is exactly the point I am trying to make. I would think in the attack on organized crime what would be most effective is to find out who the kingpins are rather than the local bookies. It would appear to me—I only spent a year in the DA's office—but it would appear to be easy to pick up the bookies' boys. Those are not the real problems. The problems are how you get the bigshots. It seems to me that if there could be any legitimate reason for wiretapping in organized crime, it is how to get the bigshots. And the problem you have is how to get probable cause as to the bigshots because you have very little to go on in trying to reach them without listening in on an inordinate number of calls of little shots and innocent people.

Mr. CAHN. The probable cause comes from the little shot and it is through the wiretapping of his telephone. And, I think sometimes we give them credit for more brains than they actually have. Very often, Senator Kennedy, we will hear the little man on the totem pole say, "look, I think my wire is being tapped, and go right on talking, with information that is eventually going to lead to his conviction. And, sometimes mistakes are made and the bigshot gets on that phone. And, that is all we need, in many, many instances.

Sometimes I believe that they think that there are no police officers who speak a foreign language, because suddenly when they want to become very secretive they go into a foreign language. And we have policemen who speak practically every language spoken in the United States. And this is absolutely correct, it is an effective weapon to get Mr. Kingpin, because Mr. Kingpin finds it most difficult or almost impossible to operate without the use of the telephone. Even if he knows there is the possibility of his or the telephone to which he is calling being tapped, he has to use it sometimes. And, maybe more knowledge is the one piece of evidence that we are looking for, and it may—certainly I think you will agree, if he cannot use the phone, it is going to impede his operation. And if we are successful in doing that, I think we have done a great service to the people of our great country.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I notice on page 201 in the President's Crime Commission report, speaking of New York, it says—

> Over the years New York has faced one of the Nation's most aggravated organized crime problems. Only in New York have law enforcement officials achieved some level of continuous success in bringing prosecutions against organized crime. For over 20 years New York has authorized wiretapping on court order. Since 1957, bugging had been similarly authorized. Wiretapping was the mainstay of the New York attack against organized crime until Federal court decisions intervened.

That is from the section on organized crime.

Mr. CAHN. I think it is a significant statement and an indication of the powerful use to which wiretapping can be used.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Moylan.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES E. MOYLAN, JR., STATE'S ATTORNEY FOR THE CITY OF BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. MOYLAN. Senators, my name is Charles E. Moylan, Jr., and I am here in really three capacities. Along with Mr. Cahn of Nassau County, I am here as a representative from and a member of the Board of Directors of the National District Attorney's Association.

I am also here in a second capacity as the president of the Maryland State's Attorney's Association. In Maryland we call it States attorney instead of district attorney.

And finally, I am here in my own most direct capacity as the State's attorney for the city of Baltimore, a city of 950,000 people in which occurs 65 percent of the crime in the State of Maryland.

I am here, Senator, to testify with respect to both Senate bills 674 and 675. I share the feeling that I thought you, Mr. Chairman, indicated by implication a few moments ago, that if I had to establish a priority in importance between the two bills, as important as I think S. 675 is with respect to wiretapping, I think that S. 674 with respect to confessions is even more pressing on law enforcement today.

And first of all, I believe you have already received from the Chicago office of the National District Attorney's Association the copy of the resolution with respect to Miranda v. Arizona. It was adopted on March 18 in Los Angeles at the midwinter meeting. I happened to be the author of that resolution. The effect was that we recommended to the Senate, and indeed to the entire Congress, the passage of legislation such as Senate bill 674, not simply for the salutary effect that it would have upon Federal law enforcement itself, but because we also feel that it is a very valuable and very articulate expression of what we, the National District Attorney's Association, feels is the national consensus of feeling on just what fundamental fairness is.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am going to direct that this resolution be placed in the record at this point.

(The resolution referred to follows:)

RESOLUTION

Where the Miranda vs. Arizona case introduced new principles of law dealing with the use of confessions and admissions in the prosecution of criminal cases,

Whereas for many years the law of our nation had applied a test of voluntariness to the admissibility of admissions and confessions, and

Whereas these new principles enunciated in Miranda vs. Arizona are very restrictive and have had serious impact on the prosecution of criminal cases and on law enforcement throughout the nation, and

Whereas, Legislation is needed to restore the voluntary test in the federal and state court, and

Whereas, such legislation is in the best interest of the law-abiding citizens and reflects the national consensus on what constitutes fundamental fairness as envisioned by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and would, therefore, beneficially affect state actions.

Therefore be it resolved that the National District Attorneys Association at its Midwinter Meeting in Los Angeles, California, on March 16, 1967, unanimously urges appropriate legislation to accomplish the purpose herein stated.

Mr. MOYLAN. I might point out one of the reasons that the national district attorneys felt that 674 was so important to us was because, even though it directly deals only with the Federal law enforcement problem, it very definitely has a profound effect upon law enforcement in all of the States. Because of the rationale behind the hopefully temporary five-man majority of the Supreme Court in so revolutionary a fashion changing the law since 1961—with Mapp v. Ohio with respect to the fourth amendment in 1961 overruling Wolf v. Colorado in 1942; on the sixth amendment right to counsel Gideon v. Wainwright in 1963 directly overruling Betts v. Brady in 1946; with the self-incrimination case of Malloy v. Hogan in 1964 directly overruling the time-honored case of Twining v. New Jersey in 1908—that the rationale employed by the Court in changing these time-honored decisions is that of Mr. Justice Frankfurter; that the due-process clause of the 14th amendment is a flexible concept, and, indeed, can change as the national consensus of ideas and ideals change on what is fundamental fairness. I think that an expression in enacting this law by the Congress of the United States would speak to the Court very loudly as to just what the national consensus is on fundamental fairness. Even though the direct impact of the bill would be simply on the Federal law enforcement function, it would have to have a profound bearing on the Court's thinking as to what those minimal constitutional standards are which should apply to the States. I think it might well lead to a rethinking of Miranda v. Arizona and Escobedo v. Illinois, and a return to the voluntariness standard that preceded these recent decisions.

The effect I see, the detrimental effect—and I might say, Senators, I believe sincerely it is a devastating effect—on local law enforcement of Miranda v. Arizona. I can speak only of my own jurisdiction. I know that several months ago I had my own staff of 33 survey the important felony cases that they had lost in the courts of Baltimore City, the criminal courts of Baltimore City, where we had a confession that clearly, under the old voluntariness standard, could have been admitted and would probably have led to conviction, but where, not being able to offer that confession into evidence, the case was lost, and the man, whom we feel was guilty, walked free.

We found, in a very conservative estimate, 72 cases out of a survey of roughly 500. It is a limited number that we can survey, because we are simply speculating when we talk about the effect of Miranda, since the only time when we really had the police taking the confession, and suddenly we could not use it in court, was in the transition period, where the case, the interrogation started shortly before Miranda and the case came up for trial after Miranda, in June of 1966.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What has happened to those 72 cases?

Mr. MOYLAN. There have been adjudications of not guilty, Senator, rape cases, murder cases, the entire gamut.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Were they actually tried, or did they have to be dismissed?

Mr. MOYLAN. Most were tried. A large number were tried. And, the State lost by directed verdict. In a number of them we had so little to go on without the confession that we were forced to enter a "nolle posses," or "stet," as we called it in Maryland, in the case, and another the State dropped the case, or we attempted with some flimsy vestigial piece of evidence to take it to the court, and it was thrown out of court.

Senator McCLELLAN. Whereas you feel reasonably confident that had the use of the confession been available to you the result might have been quite different?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely, I think we would have obtained convictions, these were all felonies, many of these were murder cases and rape cases, and the estimate was a very conservative estimate, I am confident that it affected many hundreds of cases in this period. But, the individual assistants searching their recollections for cases they recalled would recall the more serious rape and murder cases to mind.

I will give, if I might, three illustrations, because I think they are illustrative of the problem.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you this, and then you can give your illustrations.

What you have just testified to conveys the information that of the number of cases you surveyed, some 70 self-confessed murderers, rapists, and people who have committed other serious crimes are now loose on society by reason of the Miranda decision.

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes, Senator, 72 in the city of Baltimore alone in a period of several months.

Senator McCLELLAN. I mean, just in your jurisdiction?

Mr. MOYLAN. That is correct, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. You are confident from your experience, and from the evidence you have, and the nature of the confessions, that most of them or all of them would have been convicted?

Mr. MOYLAN. I am Senator. And I am going to give one example that typifies many of these, and I think really illustrates the point.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. MOYLAN. An individual by the name of George McChan was convicted. As an assistant in Baltimore City I convicted him myself in 1963 of a series of shotgun robberies. He was sentenced to 40 years in the penitentiary. Two years later, by virtue of one of the fourth amendment Mapp v. Ohio considerations, he was granted a new trial.

He came back a second time in the courts of Baltimore, was convicted a second time, and again sentenced to 40 years in the penitentiary.

That second conviction was affirmed by the Maryland Court of Appeals. It was within the 90-day period in which he might have applied for certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States when another Maryland decision applying a first amendment freedom-from-religion case to Maryland threw out all of our earlier cases not yet final, where a grand jury had been required, or a petit jury, before applying for service, to indicate whether they did or did not believe in God.

But at any rate, the individual who had been twice convicted was sent back for a third trial. And at the third trial, though the evidence was clear in the first two, Miranda v. Arizona had intervened before our third trial of McChan. Without the confessions, which met the old voluntariness test, we had nothing with which to convict him. He was found not guilty.

He was released on a Friday night. And by Tuesday night, 72 hours later, one person was shot in Baltimore City and another individual was shot and killed in the course of an armed robbery of a tavern at 1 o'clock in the morning and McChan is the man—I have to say allegedly guilty, because he has not yet been tried formally—who has been indicted for that murder, 72 hours after being released on a third trial where the evidence under Miranda was not admissible in a third trial, whereas it had been clearly admissible and led to convictions in the first two trials.

Senator McCLELLAN. You could give other examples; could you not?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

The David Jenkins case is before us. He was sentenced to death for first-degree murder, a horrible robbery-murder, hacking a man to death with a meat cleaver. He got a new trial on technical grounds. And on the next trial we were not able to use a confession against him. But through a compromise we were able to get a plea of second-degree murder. And he is serving 18 years.

Senator McCLELLAN. What did he get the first time?

Mr. MOYLAN. A death sentence. And if we had not been lucky enough to get the compromise the second time around he probably would be walking free today.

Rather than going into Senate bill 675—I know the committee has to adjourn—I will just summarize my feelings on S. 674, confessions.

We have seen in Baltimore and throughout Maryland the virtual elimination of the confession. We very occasionally—we used to get it in 20 to 25 percent of our cases, and now we are getting it in 2 percent of our cases. The confession as a law-enforcement instrument has been virtually eliminated. And I think this is ironic. But one thing the Federal courts do not take into account, they say you don't have to use the search and seizure of physical goods, you don't have to use the confession, that law enforcement should become more sophisticated and should apply the technological sciences such as do the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Internal Revenue Service, Scotland Yard, or what have you. And what I think the Federal courts have failed to grasp is that in the cases they deal with involving the FBI and the Treasury Department they are dealing with ongoing crimes, where there is a counterfeit ring, or a Mafia, or a Communist Party, or a Ku Klux Klan, where it is going to continue, and you may be able to employ the long-range Scotland Yard-FBI techniques of penetration and surveillance over a period of weeks or months. And yet to pick cities such as Baltimore, dealing with tens of thousands of spontaneous crimes, burglaries, rapes, yokings, where a man walks up a street and the crime is over in 5 minutes, and then he is gone, and there is not available, even if we could afford the price, the metropolitan police departments the techniques that are available to an FBI or a Scotland Yard. And without the confession we are handicapped to an extent that is absolutely frustrating law enforcement.

Senator McCLELLAN. Have you failed to secure indictments of prosecutions for crimes that have occurred since the Miranda decision, simply because the decision handicaps your policeman in trying to pursue an inquiry and interrogation to elicit information that would be useful in the trial of the case?

Mr. MOYLAN. I know, Senator, that we have failed even to take cases to grand juries in many, many cases. It is a large volume of cases. It is impossible to give a precise estimate. It is purely speculative in this area, because once the police do not obtain the confession, the case goes no further, and as a result there is no way to record the number of cases quantitatively in which we are frustrated. But it represents many, many percentage points. I am confident that 15 to 20 percent of those cases that would have gone to the grand jury pre-Miranda are not even reaching that stage today.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You wrote me as chairman of the committee on the 7th of March this year citing a number of cases. Do you have any objection to your letter being made a part of your testimony?

Mr. MOYLAN. None whatever, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It may be printed in the record.

(The letter referred to follows:)

STATE'S ATTORNEY OF BALTIMORE CITY,
Baltimore, Md., March 7, 1967.

Re effect of Miranda ruling on criminal prosecutions in the city of Baltimore.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am writing in response to your letter of November 21, 1966, requesting information on the effect which the Supreme Court decision in the case of Miranda v. Arizona has had on criminal prosecutions in the City of Baltimore.

The information I am about to give to you is, at best, a rough approximation and is only partial in nature. The State's Attorney's Office of Baltimore City handles only those criminal prosecutions serious enough to be tried at the Circuit Court level, which, in Baltimore, is known as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore City. Literally, tens of thousands of minor offenses are tried daily in our nine Municipal Courts, which, in many jurisdictions, would be referred to as Magistrates' Courts. Prosecutors to not participate regularly in those trials. Although the Maryland distinction between felony and misdemeanor is extremely confused, those cases heard by our higher Circuit level Courts would be the cases which, in most states, would be classed as felonies, and those cases heard by our Municipal Court would be classified in most states as misdemeanors.

A second factor which makes this estimate, at best, an approximation is that we have not kept any running statistics on the effect which Miranda v. Arizona has had on our cases. After receiving your letter, I requested my Executive Assistant State's Attorney to survey all members of the staff and to take from each of these Assistant State's Attorneys his recollection as to what, if any, cases had been affected by Miranda. As each of approximately thirty men looked back over well over one hundred cases per man over the past six months, it follows that though the more significant cases may have stuck in memory, the details of the more minor cases may have dimmed into oblivion. I must also point out that since the early fall of 1966, at least four regular trial Assistants have left this office. They were not included in our informal survey, and they almost certainly had some cases which were affected by Miranda.

The very best recollection, however, of our existing staff of Assistant State's Attorneys would indicate that at least 72 indictments have been adversely affected by Miranda. 64 of those indictments are now closed, with the State either entering a stet or a nolle prosequi in the case because of insufficient evidence with a confession rendered inadmissible by Miranda or a verdict of not guilty being entered against the State with the inadmissibility of a confession being a very significant factor in that verdict. 8 other indictments are still open, but the Assistant State's Attorney assigned to the case has indicated to me that because of Miranda there is no hope whatsoever of the State winning the case.

I must point out that there are many more cases which unquestionably will be affected but of which no Assistant as yet has knowledge. With the backlog of 3,200 cases awaiting trial and most of which will arise in a routine assignment rather than being already assigned to an Assistant State's Attorney as a special case, it is inevitable that Miranda will be a factor in many of these cases.

I will give a very brief résumé of some of the significant cases adversely affected by Miranda:

Peterson et al. robbery series

The State was forced to enter Nolle Prosequi's against four defendants—Ronald Peterson, Willie C. Robinson, Nimrod Davis, Jr., and Joseph Johnson—who were involved in ten separate indictments. These various indictments charged eight robberies, four burglaries, ten larcenies, and one mayhem against a large number of victims. The crimes covered a time period that ranged from January 28, 1965, through December 27, 1965, and involved property in a total amount of $12,200. Confessions had been given to the police in all of these cases, but without the confessions being admissible, there was no other evidence legally sufficient to hold any of the defendants.

George McChan

The George McChan case is particularly significant. McChan was initially convicted in 1963 for a series of shotgun robberies and was sentenced to 40 years in the Maryland Penitentiary. Because of a search and seizure question growing out of the Supreme Court decision of Fahey v. Connecticut, the Court of Appeals of Maryland reversed McChan's convictions and sent him back for retrial. In 1965, he was retried and reconvicted and again sentenced to 40 years. While his second appeal was pending, the Maryland Court of Appeals announced its decision in the case of Schowgurow v. State which threw out our old Grand Jury system for First Amendment reasons and entitled everyone whose conviction had begun under an old Grand Jury indictment but which was not yet final to come back and obtain a new trial under a new indictment. McChan, whose second appeal was then pending, took advantage of this situation; and when he was brought before the lower court for what would have been his third trial for a series of armed robberies, the State was forced to enter a Nolle Prosequi, because the decision of Miranda v. Arizona had intervened and prevented the use of a confession against him at the third trial which had been indispensable to the earlier two convictions, McChan remained in the penitentiary temporarily, however, because of his alleged involvement in a riot at the penitentiary in the summer of 1966. He was ultimately acquitted of the riot charges and was released. He was re-arrested within four days of that release and charged with robbery and murder, which charges are currently pending.

Edwards murder case

On October 11, 1966, an Assistant State's Attorney had to enter a Nolle Prosequi against one John Edwards who was charged with the murder on March 5, 1966, of one Arthur Bowman. The reason for the Nolle Prosequi was that a statement which was clearly inadmissible under Miranda was the only substantial evidence against the defendant.

Ritter murder case

On October 4, 1966, an Assistant State's Attorney had to enter a Stet in the murder indictment against Ritter, because the confession, clearly inadmissible under Miranda, was the only substantial evidence against the defendant.

Cooper robbery and burglary case

On November 7, 1966, one Robert Wayne Cooper, who was charged with robbery and burglary, was acquitted in the opinion of the Assistant State's Attorney who handled the case, because the confession, which was the only significant evidence against the defendant, was, under Miranda, ruled inadmissible.

Aldridge burglary series

In this case, the State was forced to enter a Nolle Prosequi against three defendants for a series of 16 burglaries, because a confession was inadmissible under Miranda.

Hamilton burglaries

In this case tried on January 26, 1967, a motion to suppress a confession under Miranda was granted. This led to verdicts of not guilty in six burglary indictments.

Hopkins burglary case

On January 24, 1967, verdicts of not guilty were entered in three burglary indictments against the defendant, because a confession was ruled inadmissible under Miranda.

Gantt murder case

On August 6, 1966, the defendant, Gantt, was found not guilty of murder after his confession was ruled inadmissible under Miranda.

Maddox murder case

In this case, a defendant, on January 16, 1967, was found guilty of murder in the second degree. A statement was ruled inadmissible under Miranda. The Assistant State's Attorney who tried the case feels that had the statement been admitted the verdict would have been for first-degree rather than second-degree murder.

Robinson arson case

On October 11, 1966, the State entered a Nolle Prosequi in the arson indictment against the defendant, because without the confession, clearly inadmissible under Miranda, there was not sufficient evidence to prosecute.

Predictions as to two other murder cases

Because these two cases are still pending, I hesitate to release the names of the defandants or the indictment numbers. In one of these, however, a conviction for first-degree murder and armed robbery was obtained in 1964, and the death penalty was handed down. Under the Schowgurow ruling, already mentioned, the case, which had already been affirmed by the Maryland Court of Appeals but for which the time for applying for certiorari to the Supreme Court was still running, was remanded for a new indictment and new trial. It is our considered judgment that without the confession, which would appear to be inadmissible under Miranda, the chances of reconvicting this defendant are less than fifty-fifty. In a second case involving murder and rape, not yet tried for the first time, it is the firm feeling of the Assistant State's Attorney assigned to that case that if the confession under Miranda is ruled out, there will be no alternative to a verdict of not guilty.

I hope this brief summary of a few of the cases in Baltimore City which were affected by the Miranda decision will be of some help to your committee. The area is certainly worthy of further study.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES E. MOYLAN, Jr.,
State's Attorney.

Mr. MOYLAN. I cite 20 or 25 cases that may have failed as a result of Miranda.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You don't mean that the cases you list in the letter constitute all the cases?

Mr. MOYLAN. By no means. Those are the more outrageous examples that come immediately to mind, that more graphically illustrate the point.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What impact would you say that this has upon crime, the increase in crime? Has this caused frustration because of the shackling of what has heretofore been legitimate and constitutional techniques?

Mr. MOYLAN. I think first, we know there is a significant quantitative effect on the crime rate itself, because of the type of persons we are dealing with in crimes such as robbery and burglary, the statistics show us are recidivists and even after serving a 20-year sentence go out and repeat, and if found not guilty, as opposed to serving their 10-year sentence, the possibility of their repeating crimes again in a much shorter period of time is obviously enhanced.

We know that there has been a quantitative increase in time. But I don't think this is all the detrimental effect. We feel—and this is a palpable thing, you can reach and touch it—that in dealing with your police departments, your law enforcement officials, there is this feeling of incredible frustration as to whose side the courts are on; are they with the criminal or are they with us? And it is almost impossible to rationalize to the man on the beat when it appears that suddenly it is he himself who is being attacked in judicial decisions rather than the criminal, as to why he cannot use those techniques that he has been using for years that he thinks meet the demands of fairness and which accord with just the commonsense approach of any citizen.

And I think the third and perhaps the detrimental effect has been on the public itself. The public is certainly looking upon the judiciary, the law enforcement, the legal procedures, and indeed the government, as being somehow off on some philosopher's cloud, in some other world, and not tuned in to the reality of law enforcement. There is no way that the individual citizen who knows that a person—and feels that a person has committed a crime—when he sees that person acquitted on a purely technical ground of very recent origin, that member of the public looks upon all of us with a jaundiced eye.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you feel that this has some impact upon the morale of the policeman?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

Senator McCLELLAN. Not that they don't want to do their duty, but to the extent that they are frustrated in knowing how to do their duty without making themselves vulnerable to judicial criticism.

Mr. MOYLAN. I think that very definitely is true, Senator. There is a great deal of truth to the current axiom that we are demanding that the policeman make the split decision at 3 o'clock in the morning in some alley that the courts may debate for the following 5 years, and even at the end of 5 years debate is split by a 5 to 4 vote.

Senator McCLELLAN. You expect the policeman on the beat, under circumstances surrounded with danger, to act, as you say, on the spur of the moment, in a split decision. But then if he makes a wrong decision, why the case involved may go to the Supreme Court. And there, after months of deliberation, they also make a split decision but instead of in a split second, they deliberate for months and make a split decision. Is that correct?

Mr. MOYLAN. That is very definitely the feeling of our policemen.

Senator McCLELLAN. So that it is frustrating. Now, I would like for you, if you will, to supplement what you have testified to on this issue by giving us, if you can, if a survey has been made, or if you can make one, how many of the 72 have since been arrested and charged with crime.

I don't know whether any of them have been convicted or not in the short time. But you mentioned one that is back in the throes of the law, and there may be some others. If it is not too much trouble, just take this 72 as kind of a criterion as to what is happening throughout the country. I don't know that it would be exactly representative, but it gives us some indication of the impact these decisions have on crime and the increase in crime. If these people who are released are committing crime again or are back in prison, they obviously wouldn't be committing these crimes today. Therefore to that extent the rate of crime would be decreased. And to the extent that they do commit crime again, to that extent the rate of crime is increasing, isn't that correct?

Mr. MOYLAN. I can have that checked into. And I am sure it would be a significant figure even over a 9-month period.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I would like for you to submit that for the record, if you will.

Go ahead.

Mr. MOYLAN. I know that the time of the committee is short. So very briefly, in all three capacities, again I simply indicate my support of Senate bill 675, the wiretapping bill.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You heard Mr. Cahn testify, did you not?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may go ahead.

Mr. MOYLAN. Maryland is one of the roughly half a dozen States around the country, along with Oregon and New York, that does have a limited wiretap or electronics surveillance now available to us. I don't think that we or the others use it quantitatively to the extent that New York does. But we do have available to us the right, if the State's attorney himself applies to a judge and takes in sworn witnesses and makes out an application for the court order, with all of the probable cause that normally goes into an application for a search-and-seizure order, if he can point out that this is the only reasonably accessible means by which we can ascertain the crime, in those circumstances, and pointing out a very definite phone with a very definite purpose in mind, he can obtain a court order.

In Maryland we have found that despite the fact that the Maryland law permits us to do this, the lack of a Federal law such as Senate bill 675 has operated effectively to frustrate us. The Baltimore Metropolitan Police Department does not have wiretap operators. Even when we are operating with the court's permission, we or any other law-enforcement officer must depend upon the cooperation of the local telephone company. Our experience with the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. in Maryland is that they will not honor the local judge's order for fear that they would be violating the law of Congress and would get themselves into trouble with the Federal Communications Commission. So even though we can obtain the court order, we cannot utilize that order, because without the cooperation of the telephone company there is no effective way with personnel available that we can place a wiretap.

As an indication that it does not lead to any great quantitative abuse in the two and a half years that I have been State's attorney, and the year and a half before that deputy State's attorney, in the 4-year period we have in Baltimore City had cause to utilize either an order for a wiretap or an electronics surveillance, the eavesdropping device, only on six occasions, but in four of those occasions it has very definitely led to convictions that would not otherwise have been obtained without it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In what area of crime?

Mr. MOYLAN. It does not, as in Senator Kennedy's question, get to the massive cartel of organized crime. In one it dealt with some members of the State legislature who were also attorneys attempting to shake down a defendant in a Baltimore City courtroom by promising to get a witness out of town so that he would not testify against that defendant for the sum of something in the neighborhood of $5,000.

Senator McCLELLAN. That involved corruption of officials?

Mr. MOYLAN. Corruption of officials.

We obtained convictions against both, and would not have but for the wiretap which we had in that particular case.

In another case an individual from New Jersey had come into Maryland representing one of the black-market pharmaceutical houses, and was distributing the amphetamines and barbiturates, the pep pills and goofballs to teenagers all over the north Baltimore area. We obtained an electronics eavesdrop order in that particular case, and obtained a conviction against them, and actually recovered contraband which he had which was in the neighborhood of 200,000 of pep pills and amphetamine.

Senator McCLELLAN. That number of pills, or that number of dollars?

Mr. MOYLAN. That number of pills. And in this and several other areas we find that the lack of the real ability to utilize our Maryland law because the phone company is fearful of the congressional law prevents us from really getting into the organized crime area.

Senator McCLELLAN. You say it is a useful tool, though, and needed?

Mr. MOYLAN. It is a useful tool, very definitely needed.

The frustrating thing when we deal with the lottery industry and with the bookmaking is that we get the small operator on the street where the policeman can make direct surveillance and can observe the operation. But we can never trace it to the man higher up, to Mr. Big, the banker, and higher up, with techniques such as this. We find that in the bookmaking area, at least, in the Baltimore area today the telephone is used almost exclusively. A bettor may call in from a phone in Baltimore City, but will not even call the bookie in the city, he will call to an adjoining county. The money might be delivered that afternoon to Anne Arundel County. So that one simple placing of a bet may involve three different jurisdictions. And without the ability to find out what is going on on the phone we are virtually powerless. And today we are seeing in the bookmaking area, at least, a device that I am sure this committee is familiar with by the name of a cheesebox. I don't want to retread old ground if the committee is familiar with this.

Senator McCLELLAN. Just briefly.

Mr. MOYLAN. The cheesebox is a device—we will find a bookie coming into Baltimore, renting a room in a low-rental area of town, an empty room, and calling the telephone company and saying, "I am going to be in town for a period of months, I am a salesman, and I want to rent two phones."

The phone company will come and install two telephones right here in this room on the floor. He says his furniture is coming a week later.

He will then take a cheesebox, a rather simple electronic device—it took a genius to come up with it, and it only costs $16 to reproduce.

He disconnects the two phones and connects them with each other through this cheesebox. Then he can lock the door and leave that apartment and never come back. He could never be found on the scene of the crime. He will continue to pay his phone bill by money order or cash, and he will pay the rental of that room by money order or by cash, and he will never return to that vacant room. But between 11 and 1 o'clock every morning he will, from California, 3,000 miles away, or from a public phone booth 100 yards away, or his home, or any other place, shifting around, call in to the one phone, and it will activate it. And all the people wishing to place the bets have the number of the second phone. So they during that 2-hour period can keep calling in to the second phone. There is no recording made or no record in the phone company by which they could check this phone being used. It is transferred over immediately, it comes in one phone and goes out the second back to this man either a hundred yards away or 3,000 miles away. And there is no way that the phone records, even if they could be subpenaed, would show any record of this conversation.

Senator McCLELLAN. The only way that you could catch that kind of an operation is by wiretapping?

Mr. MOYLAN. We would have to get into the wires themselves. The people can go and break into the room, and all they will find is an empty room with two phones sitting on the floor with a $16 box sitting halfway in between.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that the device frequently used?

Mr. MOYLAN. We are finding it more and more in the area. The phone people tell us that some of the sophisticated devices that are being used in this area today are incredible. This was the primitive early model, like the Hiroshima bomb.

Senator McCLELLAN. There are more sophisticated ones now?

Mr. MOYLAN. There are blue boxes and black boxes that can be carried in an ordinary businessman's attaché case that can enable you to pick up your phone in Baltimore, and if you want to call somebody in Las Vegas and pay off big money, you don't call Las Vegas, because there would be a record of that, you call Washington, D.C., information, and you get six of the digits out, and just before the last digit comes out a high frequency beep goes into this phone, and it suddenly hooks you into the Washington system, and you start dialing again, and call Los Angeles. And the record of that is that it was Washington information that called Los Angeles rather than a particular phone in Baltimore.

The technological sophistication of these people today—you could repeat the process, your phone call from Baltimore to Los Angeles could go by way of Miami to Los Angeles, to Portland, Oreg.—there is no limit to the number of different systems you can connect into.

Senator McCLELLAN. What kind of surveillance, aside from the wiretap electronic device, could possibly detect and discover that sort of an operation?

Mr. MOYLAN. Unless there were a penetration agent, which takes literally years, who worked himself up into the criminal organization, short of that there would be no way to detect anything like this.

Senator McCLELLAN. You can't always do that; can you?

Mr. MOYLAN. And you cannot always do that. And frequently those penetration agents end up themselves——

Senator McCLELLAN. And that risks the life of the man who penetrates; doesn't it?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely. And local police departments just don't have the personnel available for that FBI-Scotland Yard-CIA type of penetration effort.

I think that if I could sum it up, the frustrating thing is that the court on the one hand is telling us to abandon the time-honored devices—now, under Mapp v. Ohio you apply an exclusionary rule and don't use the physical evidence which you have used in the past, and now under Miranda you get rid of confessions—but when they are telling us that on the one hand, they are saying, use instead more sophisticated, scientific techniques. And yet when we listen to an admonition on the one hand and turn around and attempt to use a more sophisticated technological technique, we find that we are absolutely frustrated by not being permitted to go into this area either.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They tell you to use them and they deny you the use of them.

Mr. MOYLAN. That really is the case. It is a case of damned if you do and damned if you don't. We cannot use the old method or the only available alternative which we are aware of.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Any questions, Senator Ervin?

Senator ERVIN. When the Government, whether it be the State or Federal Government, prosecutes a man for crime, the prosecution has to prove two things beyond a reasonable doubt; does it not? First, that a crime has actually been committed; second, that the accused is the person who committed the crime?

Mr. MOYLAN. That used to be all we had to prove.

Senator ERVIN. That was the fundamental law prior to some of these legal jungles we have wandered into lately?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Now, a confession, even voluntarily made, is not admissible under the law to establish the fact that a crime has actually been committed?

Mr. MOYLAN. Basically that is true. We have to prove the corpus delicti, the fact that the crime is committed. We may use a confession to help, but we have got to have some independent corroborating evidence. We essentially do that without a confession.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, a prosecution would totally fail if there were not independent evidence of the corpus delicti itself?

Mr. MOYLAN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. So as a practical matter, a voluntary confession is ordinarily used as a method of identifying the perpetrator of the crime rather than showing the crime itself?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

Senator ERVIN. Now, is it not true that in many cases the confession was a decisive factor which convinced the jury of the guilt of the accused?

Mr. MOYLAN. In many, many cases. And particularly do we find this true in those crimes where there simply is not an eyewitness to the murders, to the rapes, particularly if the rape victim died or was not able to identify the assailant in the dark, or the confession was the single decisive factor in establishing the identity of the assailant.

Senator ERVIN. And is it not true, especially in urban centers, that in a high percentage of crimes the crime was committed under circumstances where the victim does not have a reasonable opportunity to identify the perpetrator of the crime?

Mr. MOYLAN. Absolutely. The yokings, the rapes, all of these were at night. And we are finding more and more even in armed robberies the use of the stocking mask, the mask over the face, to frustrate eyewitness identification.

Senator ERVIN. So for that reason it is highly important to the enforcement of the law that a voluntary confession should be admissible to establish the identification of the perpetrator of a crime which has been established by independent evidence?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely, in these areas, at least. If we were talking about embezzlement, larceny, to just confessions, the lack of them wouldn't hurt us very much.

But when you are talking about murder, rape, robbery, burglary, the typical felon is violent, those are the areas where we are dependent upon the confession.

Senator ERVIN. And it handicaps you in a most crucial aspect of law enforcement; that is, identifying the perpetrator of a crime established by independent evidence?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

Senator ERVIN. Now, can you imagine, either from the standpoint of theory or from the standpoint of practicality, any more convincing evidence of the guilt of a party than his voluntary confession that he committed the crime with which he stands charged?

Mr. MOYLAN. The most convincing of all. That is why the juries are convinced by it. And juries always have that lingering doubt if they do not give that confession.

Senator ERVIN. Now, as a matter of fact, except in cases of what you might—you might call repeated and hardened criminals, the average man talks about the things he is thinking about. And where he has committed a crime he thinks about the crime, and it is very natural for him to talk about it, isn't it?

Mr. MOYLAN. It comes out.

Senator ERVIN. So from the standpoint of rehabilitation of those who violate the law, a confession is a desirable thing, in that you can't do much to rehabilitate a man unless he is willing to confess that he has been wrong, can you?

Mr. MOYLAN. Absolutely. I think a man who beats the rap is not one who is anxious for rehabilitation. He is simply enforced in his belief that crime does pay.

Senator ERVIN. Now, if I recall correctly, the Uniform Crime Report for 1965 states in substance that of those persons who are sentenced for crime, for serious offenses, 46 percent of them repeat their crime or some similar crime within 2 years of their release from serving a former sentence. What has your experience been in prosecuting criminals in Maryland in respect to crimes of this type?

Mr. MOYLAN. I know subjectively from my own personal prosecution of roughly 4,000 cases, and the experience of our office, and indeed in talking to the warden of the State penitentiary, that probably our recidivist rate runs even a little bit worse than the national rate.

By the time we get a 28- or 30- or 32-year-old burglar, robber, we find that he has been in six or eight penal institutions dating all the way back to the time when he was 16 or 17 years old. We find a terrible rate of recidivism.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to ask you a few questions to educate laymen as to exactly what is involved in a random case. Is it not the case, as general rule of law, that an appellate court can make its decision in a case on appeal on the basis of the record made in the trial court?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Now, I will ask you, if the record in the trial court doesn't indicate that the Miranda case this man Miranda was charged with kidnapping and criminal assault on a woman?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes; in Arizona.

Senator ERVIN. And he was arrested by the officer, and detained in custody, and no coercion was practiced upon him, and there was no inducement held out to him to confess, and no third degree methods were employed. And then after a lapse of 1, 2, or 3 hours he voluntarily told the police who had him in custody that he had committed these crimes. And he was convicted of those crimes, wasn't he?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And that is the record on which the case was tried in the courts of Arizona?

Mr. MOYLAN. And affirmed in Arizona.

Senator ERVIN. And then it came here to the Supreme Court. And the majority opinion, instead of dealing with the facts, or making their decisions based on the facts in the Miranda case, contains page after page of quotations from the citations of various persons who were not witnesses in the court of Arizona and who were not subject to cross-examination either.

Mr. MOYLAN. Going all the way back to the Magna Carta, I believe, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. You don't have to comment on this, but when I read that I came to the conclusion that the majority thought that perhaps society didn't need too much protection from criminals, but that criminals needed protection from law enforcement officers.

So the decision of the majority was based, as far as facts were concerned, not on the facts adduced in the trial court in Arizona, but on the writings of persons who were not witnesses in Arizona, and whose qualifications were not revealed, and who were not subjected to cross-examination.

Mr. MOYLAN. That is right. And I believe the justices themselves, at least in the three-man majority, occasionally used the phrase "policing the police" instead of judging the individual case on its merits, but seizing the occasion, rather, to propound the general formula for law enforcement all over the country.

Senator ERVIN. Chief Justice Marshall said that when a court undertook to interpret the Constitution it should do it on the basis that the people who drafted and ratified the Constiution meant what they said. Is that not a good rule for interpretation?

Mr. MOYLAN. I think an excellent rule.

Senator ERVIN. Now, is it not the function of the Court to interpret the Constitution for the purpose of ascertaining what the Constitution means and give an effective— —

Mr. MOYLAN. I think so, within limits. I might differ just a little bit there. But I don't differ with the major thrust of your argument. What the Court is doing in this whole revolution since 1961 is bringing into the due process clause of the 14th amendment various provisions of the first 10 amendments which prior thereto had limited only the Federal Government. And the reason it is doing it, and reversing some of its old decisions, is because they hold, as I think is best expressed by Mr. Justice Frankfurter some years ago, that the due process clause is an elastic clause, and can change with changing times, that in this enlightened society, we might do something contrary to fundamental fairness while this would not have been so regarded back in 1850 or 1789. However, even though I think they have that right to be flexible, at least judicial restraint is called for, that the States ought to be out in front of the Supreme Court rather than the Supreme Court in front of the States, that they are propounding simply those minimal standards, not setting up an ideal that they hope law enforcement will aspire to 100 years from now, but setting up simply the minimal standards. And this is the reason I think they have misread the national consensus on fundamental fairness. And I think that is why Senate bill 674 has a profound importance far beyond what it would do directly for the Federal law enforcement system, because it is the most effective Gallup poll or Harris poll of what the national concensus is in this area.

Senator ERVIN. Of course, there are differences of opinion among the bar now. But I think that anyone who reads the original Constitution with the provision for amendment will have to come to the conclusion that James Madison and others who drew that instrument thought that the meaning could not be changed except by an amendment made in the manner prescribed by article 5. They didn't intend to vest the judges with constitutional amending capacity or lawmaking capacity.

But the due-process clause might be described legally as a clause that is general in its terms, as contrasted with such specific things as some other provisions of the Bill of Rights, such as the self incrimination clause of the fifth amendment.

Now, has it not always been a rule of construction of documents and laws and the Constitution that where you have a general clause and a specific clause, that the one which is entitled to be given the superior power is the specific clause rather than the general?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely, that is good common law statutory interpretation.

Senator ERVIN. Now, the Miranda case attempts to justify the new requirements laid down in that case by what we ordinarily call the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment, does it not?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Aren't these the words of the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment: "No person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case"?

Mr. MOYLAN. Those are the precise words.

Senator ERVIN. Now, those words became a part of the Constitution in 1791. And I would ask you, from the time they became a part of the Constitution in 1791 down to the 13th day of June 1966 when the Miranda decision was handed down, was it not held that they had no possible application to voluntary confessions?

Mr. MOYLAN. None whatsoever.

It simply meant that a man is not required to take the witness stand at the trial. And that is the reason that, even beginning in 1937, when a more conservative court began to overrule certain confession cases, it utilized not the self-incrimination clause, but just the more general due-process clause of the 14th amendment.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, they held that under the due process clause a voluntary confession was admissible, and an involuntary confession was not admissible; and until the Miranda case they hold that a person charged with a crime could not even invoke the self-incrimination provision of the fifth amendment as a basis for excluding his confession.

Mr. MOYLAN. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. The question was decided in the first instance, was it not, by the trial judge who heard the evidence and saw the witnesses and was best able to decide whether the confession was prima facie voluntary or not?

Mr. MOYLAN. The trial judge in Phoenix held that it was not involuntary. The Arizona Court of Appeals, Arizona's highest court, affirmed his decision. And then it was for the first time at the Supreme Court level that the fifth amendment was brought into the discussion.

Senator ERVIN. Now, you have undoubtedly had many cases prior to the Miranda case in which objection was offered to evidence upon the ground that it was involuntary and therefore inadmissible under the due-process clause or a comparable provision of the State constitution. That is the question which is a question of fact in the first instance by the trial judge, is it not?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to ask you, it is not a difficult decision in the great majority of cases for the judge to make, is it?

Mr. MOYLAN. Certainly they have made it in all cases. Sometimes it is more involved than others. But basically with all of the guidelines that the Supreme Court gave us in 1937 through 1965, trial judges and jurists did make that decision, the totality of circumstances, weighing all of the factors, they finally decided whether John Jones' confession was voluntary or was not voluntary.

Senator ERVIN. You needn't comment on this, but in my opinion the judge who is not competent and can't be safely trusted to make the decision after seeing the witnesses and hearing the testimony as to whether the confession is voluntary or not cannot be safely trusted to make any other decisions as a judge. And that would apply to every other function that he has to fulfill as a judge. I have to pass in voluntary confessions many times as a judge. And as a result I would say they are not very difficult one way or the other. Some of them, as you say, are more complicated than others. But most of the time it is a rather simple question.

Mr. MOYLAN. Rather simple, generally.

Senator ERVIN. Now, if you give the words of the Constitution which I quoted, the self-incrimination clause, literal meaning, they can't possibly have any other reference whatever to a voluntary confession, can they, in the first place, because they only apply to compelled testimony, and a voluntary confession is voluntarily made?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes, it would not be compelled.

Senator ERVIN. And in the second place, as you observed a while ago, they cannot apply to a confession made by a person in the custody of an arresting officer because he is not a witness in that capacity, is he?

Mr. MOYLAN. It would never apply to antecedent to the actual courtroom appearance in its original meaning.

Senator ERVIN. It would only require a witness to testify under the rule of court, something of that kind?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

Senator ERVIN. And in the third case it cannot apply, because a conversation between an arresting officer and a suspect is not testimony in any case of this kind? In other words, the third reason that it cannot possibly apply according to the English language is because it can only apply where it is a judicial decision?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely.

Senator ERVIN. So it is really difficult to me—you needn't comment on this—I am incapable of comprehending how any man who believes in attributing to simple words their plain and obvious meaning could ever reach the conclusion that the self-incrimination clause has any possible application to a voluntary confession.

I won't ask you to comment on that.

Mr. MOYLAN. I know it troubles most lawyers.

Senator ERVIN. I just can't follow the mental process of understanding how anyone who believes the Constitution ought to be interpreted according to what it says can reach the conclusion.

Now, doesn't the Court itself recognize that it was changing the meaning of the Constitution because the majority opinion refers in several instances to the requirements we enumerate today?

Mr. MOYLAN. Yes. And that is the reason it did not make it retroactive.

Senator ERVIN. By making it appear as part of their own confession—I will say according to their own confession—they were making a new law on that basis?

Mr. MOYLAN. And they acknowledged as much.

Senator ERVIN. That knowledge existed among them at that time.

And I will ask you, whether the very next week they were not confronted by the question in Johnson v. New Jersey, whether they would make these new requirements which they said were justified by a provision of the Constitution that had been there for 175 years applicable to cases which arose before the Miranda case?

Mr. MOYLAN. They were confronted with it.

Senator ERVIN. And they held in the Johnson case that it would not be retroactive?

Mr. MOYLAN. Because they acknowledged that the case had been relying upon their earlier pronouncements.

Senator ERVIN. So thereby they rule that the confession as it has been for 175 years under the Constitution had changed its meaning on the 13th day of June 1966.

Now, can you think of any rules that could be better drawn to prevent anybody from ever making a voluntary confession than the requirements laid down in the Miranda case?

Mr. MOYLAN. The four rules laid down there are intended to cover the waterfront. The whole purpose is to keep the defendant from confessing.

Senator ERVIN. And under the rule in the Miranda case if you had a very highly educated dean of a law school in the United States who was arrested for speeding, and he made a confession without being warned of these constitutional rights, it wouldn't be admissible evidence?

Mr. MOYLAN. It wouldn't be admissible under Miranda.

Senator ERVIN. What percentage of criminals charged with serious crimes do you think there is who do not already know that they don't have to say anything, and who do not already know that anything that they say can be used against them, and who do not already know that they have a right to a lawyer?

Mr. MOYLAN. The bulk of them, if they are over 21 years of age and have been in court before, know their rights. And under the old rule that the bill would return to, this is one of the factors that you would look at. Perhaps not warning a man who is 17 who has never been in trouble, would render a confession involuntary. But if it is the 30-year-old repeated offender, then it is deemed that he is courtwise enough to know his rights. And that is why I think the old standard was an immeasurably superior one to the one we have today.

Senator ERVIN. So under Miranda, as a practical matter, courts are compelled to dismiss cases in which serious crimes are charged because in many of those cases a police officer doesn't tell the accused something which the accused already knows?

Mr. MOYLAN. Absolutely. There is no discretion left. The rule is absolute under Miranda.

Senator ERVIN. And the tragedy, is it not, is that this decision tilts the scales of justice in favor of the criminals against society and the victims of crime, overlooking the fact that society and the victims of crime are just as much entitled to justice as the accused?

Mr. MOYLAN. Very definitely, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

If I had time I would ask a few more questions. But time is short.

We appreciate your appearance very much. The material that we asked you to supply, please do so at your convenience. And anything you want to add to your statement you may do so in a supplemental statement which we will place in the record.

Mr. MOYLAN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will stand in recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:40 p.m., a recess was taken until 2 p.m. this same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Martin.

Mr. Martin, will you identify yourself for the record, please sir.

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. MARTIN, CHAIRMAN OF THE MICHIGAN COMMISSION ON CRIME, DELINQUENCY, AND CRIMINAL ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MARTIN. Senator McClellan, I am John B. Martin, the chairman of the Michigan Commission on Crime, Delinquency, and Criminal Administration, which was recently appointed by Governor Romney at the request of former Attorney General Katzenbach to complete the work on State level of the National Crime Commission.

I have come down here today to testify with respect both to the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act and your bill on wiretapping.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. We welcome you. We appreciate your interest and your assistance.

You have a prepared statement, I note.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may read that if you like, and we can discuss it.

Mr. MARTIN. Thank you.

I appreciate the opportunity to come before this committee to testify with respect to the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 (S. 917). This bill, based upon the extensive research of the National Crime Commission as set forth in its report, "The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society," is the first comprehensive effort to put the strength of the Federal Government behind law enforcement at State and local levels.

The Michigan Crime Commission, recently established by Governor Romney and containing in its membership some 56 representatives from all areas of public and private life having an interest in or responsibility for the control of crime in the State of Michigan, has studied carefully the provisions of S. 917.

Based upon this examination the Michigan Crime Commission strongly supports the objectives set forth in the bill in the belief that assistance from the Federal level is necessary if State and local crime control efforts are to be fully effective. We believe that the approach to this problem taken by S. 917 is a sound one in that it relies upon State and local initiative to develop adequate plans for law enforcement and criminal justice, specifies the standards by which such plans shall be judged, and provides a source of grants for the carrying out of such plans when approved.

Such grants may provide for the preparation and adoption of comprehensive plans of law enforcement and criminal justice, for the carrying out of such plans when made and approved, and for research and demonstration projects which give promise of providing significant new information or of testing new approaches to the control of crime.

Our approval of the general objectives of the bill, however, is qualified in two ways. First, it is our feeling that Federal, State, and local governments would benefit from coordination of planning at the State level. We believe, therefore, that the failure of the bill to make provision for some such coordinated effort is a real defect. We are not suggesting that every local plan should be subject to a veto at the State level. We are, however, urging that every local plan be submitted to a coordinating agency of the State designated by the Governor of each State on or before the date of submission of such plan to the Attorney General of the United States, for such analysis and comment as the State may wish to make upon the proposal being submitted.

The purpose of this is threefold:

1. To enable the State, with its knowledge of other plans being submitted and of the general crime control situation within the State, to make suggestions both to the local unit or agency submitting a plan and to the U.S. Attorney General with respect to possible improvements which could be made in the plan prior to its final approval.

2. To thus enable the local unit of government to have the benefit of knowledge as to other and possibly related plans and projects within the State particularly where these are geographically related.

3. To enable the U.S. Attorney General to have the benefit of the overall knowledge of the crime control situation within the State which is not available to the local agency submitting its plan.

If the above procedure were to be followed, it would not in any way delay the submission of local plans. It would, however, enable the U.S. Attorney General to be more fully advised as to each plan and its impact on State and local law enforcement and to suggest possible modifications as a condition of approval in connection with the adoption of each plan. It would bring about a far more carefully thought out development in the field of crime control for each State than will be the case without such coordinated thinking.

We had had some experience with this in other Federal programs where the local unit is authorized or directed to submit proposals to a Federal agency, but without any notice of any kind to the State government, and the result is that the State government is proceeding without any knowledge of what is going on at the local level at all, and we think that there ought to be some coordinating force working there which is not an impeding force, but it gives an opportunity for the State to make suggestions both down and up, to develop a more comprehensive and effective crime control operation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Someone has suggested that the Governor be given the veto power. Would you favor that? Or do you think that goes too far?

Mr. MARTIN. No, I think perhaps that goes too far—goes farther than necessary.

We simply want the opportunity to comment and to discuss the proposals that are made.

Senator McCLELLAN. What you are saying is that you think the Governor or some authority appointed by him should screen the plans, thus giving them the opportunity to make comments and suggestions before submission to the Attorney General.

Mr. MARTIN. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Not give the Governor the power to veto, but authority to examine and make an effort to coordinate a plan, with other plans in the State. That is what you are driving at?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, it is.

The second qualification to our approval of S. 917 should be that the bill should specifically authorize the Governor of each State to designate the office, agency, department, or combination thereof, responsible for the preparation of the State law enforcement and criminal justice plan. Now I am just talking about the State plan.

Senator McCLELLAN. Can't they do that now? Won't this bill authorize them to do that?

Mr. MARTIN. No. This bill just simply says the State shall prepare a plan, but it doesn't indicate who in the State prepares the plan.

I want to make the same suggestion that the same procedure be set up as is in the Older Americans Act, which allows the Governor to designate the agency to draw up the plan. That is all.

Senator McCLELLAN. I understand. Do you think it is necessary to spell it out here? Doesn't the Governor have the authority to say the State may submit a plan?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, there can be various agencies. You see, some States have Governors with more authority than others. And there are States where the Governor is just an elected official along with other elected officials.

Senator McCLELLAN. What you want it to do is say the State under the direction of the Governor or any authority designated by him may submit a plan?

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see no objection to it. I think it would be done anyhow.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, it doesn't always work that way. We think it would work more smoothly.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, you may be correct.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, the rest of my statement simply says about what I have been saying—that the simple designation of the "State" as the agency for the preparation of such a plan does not indicate who within State government is responsible for its preparation. This may need to vary from State to State but to avoid confusion or conflict it is certainly necessary to authorize the Governor, as chief executive of the State, to designate the office, agency, or department which he deems best fitted to prepare such a plan for the State as a whole. This is the more true since any comprehensive plan must cover all aspects of crime control including prevention, apprehension, and arrest, preparation for trial, trial, conviction, and disposition upon conviction, whether prison, probation, or parole.

As President Johnson said in his message transmitting the National Crime Commission report:

> Treating each reform as an isolated matter will create conflicts and loss of effectiveness throughout the system. Thus, the grants under this provision will require that comprehensive plans be developed that take into account the interrelationship among all aspect of law enforcement, courts, and corrections, as well as closely related social programs.

Senator McCLELLAN. Any entity of 50,000 or more might submit a plan. But what can it deal with other than maybe the training of police, and buying equipment? It can have nothing to do with the State penitentiary or correctional institutions.

Mr. MARTIN. Actually this is what this bill contemplates, Senator. It contemplates a plan that is much broader than just how do you enforce the law.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think this has to be studied. I would like to see coordinated plans to cover a whole State. The municipalities submit plans to the State authority and let them relate the plans to a statewide program. I would grant exceptions, certainly, where exceptions could be made by the Attorney General, for example, if he found a State was not acting, not interested, not aggressive in trying to submit a plan. I would not deny a municipality or other entity from securing the benefits of this act. But if we could get them coordinated on a statewide basis as a rule that would be far better.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, the point I was making is a little bit different than that, and that is that a comprehensive State plan ought to include some thinking on the questions, for example, of prevention, and of what do you do on the other end in the treatment of prisoners, to rehabilitate them or make sure they don't keep coming back all the time. It ought to be across the board.

Senator McCLELLAN. Some of those areas a municipality itself cannot cover in its plan.

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is why I say I would like to see an overall plan if we could get it.

Mr. MARTIN. We are in agreeement on that, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am sure we are.

Mr. MARTIN. Just to finish my statement here. The provisions of S. 917 are designed to meet an urgent situation. We believe that it should be passed with the amendments suggested at the earliest possible opportunity and that work should commence without delay for the preparation of State and local law enforcement and criminal justice plans. Such work cannot begin too soon.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, very much.

Mr. MARTIN. Now I would like to comment on 675, if I may.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is the wiretap bill?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. I have a stronger statement which you have in your hand, but I don't want to read all of this.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let the statement be printed in the record in full, and you highlight it if you like.

Have you been present today and heard the testimony of preceding witnesses?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, I heard the testimony this morning, and I was very much impressed with the testimony of both of the witnesses this morning as to the importance of having wiretapping available, particularly in the area of organized crime. And that is really the area that we have directed our thinking to on the commission.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you have some problem with organized crime in Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN. We do. We have a situation in Detroit, so that Detroit gets mentioned usually when this subject is under discussion.

I am sure that you will recall then Police Commissioner George Edwards appearing before your committee at one time and testifying as to the situation on organized crime in Detroit. He is now on the Federal bench, and as a matter of fact is a member of our commission, as is also Judge Edward Piggins, who is also a former Detroit police commissioner, and a man who testified very recently before your committee, Ray Girardin, who I know took the position that wiretapping should not be permitted.

Senator McCLELLAN. He felt there wasn't any benefit from its use.

Mr. MARTIN. He is the only dissent on our 56-man commission.

Senator McCLELLAN. You mean out of 56 members of your commission, he is the only one that dissents?

Mr. MARTIN. This statement that I have here has been submitted to all the members of the commission, and he asked me particularly to make it clear that since he had testified before on this, that——

Senator McCLELLAN. This statement you are submitting now on S. 675, represents the views of the other 55 members of the commission.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Including your own.

Mr. MARTIN. There are slight variations on individual points, but basically this is accepted by all members.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well. We are glad to have this supporting evidence.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to move to about page 5—by saying first of all that the earlier pages deal with the problem of organized crime as we see it, and the need for some use of wiretapping or electronic surveillance to deal with it.

The principal problem in this field is the difficulty of getting witnesses, as you know. And the reason that you cannot get witnesses—I mean live witnesses in many cases—is because of the fear which organized crime injects into this whole picture.

Since you cannot get live witnesses in many cases, you have to have the opportunity to conduct electronic surveillance in order to obtain whatever evidence you can get to link the people on the bottom with the people on the top. This is where the difficulty is. The difficulty is not in convicting the ordinary pusher of narcotics or the ordinary prostitute. The difficulty is in linking that kind of an operation up through two or three levels of leadership, to the people at the very top. And unless you can use electronic surveillance, or whatever term you want to use, you simply don't get at these people at the top. They just go scot free.

At the same time we recognize the vital importance of not unduly infringing the rights of citizens to privacy. And the problem, it seems to us, is the problem of balancing the interests, balancing the interests of society to protection against the interests of the ordinary citizen to privacy.

So I would say that we start from the position that the willful use of devices to overhear and record communications between others without their consent, unless otherwise authorized by law because of an overriding public consideration, should be prohibited. A violation of this provision should bring criminal punishment, leaving the option of private lawsuit to the private parties.

Then, because we believe that organized crime presents such overriding public considerations, the use of electronic surveillance should be permitted as the principal exception—not the sole exception—to the general prohibition against the "willful overhear," but only where certain clearly defined restrictions operate upon its use.

In other words, we would eliminate the use of these devices for things like domestic investigations, and commercial espionage, private uses of that kind.

We don't see any reason why those should be encouraged. In fact, we think they should be barred.

We see no reason to treat electronic surveillance not directly involving wiretapping differently from wiretapping. Modern technology is amazingly adaptive, and will in time make available an array of scientific "overhearers" some of which can be adapted to other innocuous instruments just as happened with the telephone. The need for timely treatment of both under one head is upon us.

We believe that each authorization of surveillance must be so restricted as to have a minimum impact upon innocent speech. By imposing the limitations upon surveillance which are listed below, our objective is to create an opportunity for surveillance but require its use to be so discriminating as to hold to the judicial standards of reasonableness as defined within due process. We recognize, I should say, that we have a sword hanging over us in the Berger case which is now in the Supreme Court, and which has been argued. Depending upon the outcome in that case, our discussions here may not be of much consequence, because if the Court goes far enough, it won't be any use to talk about court-ordered overhearers, or court-ordered electronic surveillance. It just won't be possible to do it at all. But I don't want to prejudge that case.

In that connection, I would call the attention of the committee to a very fine brief, the amicus brief, prepared by Dr. Robert Blakey for the National District Attorneys' Association, which is an extremely useful document dealing with the constitutional aspects of one of the State laws—the New York law, permitting electronic surveillance.

Senator McCLELLAN. I believe we have this as a part of the subcommittee files.

Mr. MARTIN. I would also call attention to the draft statute which Dr. Blakey attaches to some testimony. I don't think he gave this before this committee, but it is a draft statute similar to 675, to your bill, but I would say a more refined or a more thoroughly worked-over bill.

Senator McCLELLAN. We would be glad to have that. Let us have a copy of that as an exhibit.

Mr. MARTIN. I think you would find that useful.

These are the suggestions we would make for limiting use of electronic surveillance:

(1) The application for an ex parte order of authorization for an "overhear" [1] shall be in writing upon oath, stating facts which give rise to reasonable grounds to believe that "fruits and instrumentalities" of the specific crime may be thus obtained. That is the usual provision with respect to warrants for search and seizure.

(2) Those who may apply for use of the "overhear" should be limited to the prosecuting officer of the jurisdiction upon his own signature or that of his assistant in charge in the event of his absence from the jurisdiction. We would not let this be in the hands of just anybody.

(3) We believe the overriding need to supervise "overhears" does not permit exceptions even under the "emergency situation." Consequently, the court should expect the personal appearance of the applicant with sworn testimony to justify the grant of this discretionary judicial power.

[1] The term "overhear" used as a noun is interchangeable with the term "eavesdrop" or "electronic surveillance" use in the broad sense to include wiretapping.

(4) Only a limited number of "overhear orders" could be in use in a jurisdiction at any one time. The number of orders should be severely limited and certainly not greater than is clearly required to detect major crime, particularly organized crime. With a severe limitation upon the number of orders it would appear that the investigating agency will be compelled to select its surveillance cases with maximum care.

(5) The order should set out the particular telephone line or the particular physical location to be within surveillance and the method to be used.

(6) The order should limit the surveillance to 30 days from the date of the order. A renewal for the same duration should be granted only on a showing of productivity or an explanation of nonproductivity. For example, it may take better than a week to install the surveillance device. On the day following installation, the individual may take a 2-month vacation.

(7) The statute should designate the judicial officers by whom authorization may be granted. We suggest the power be limited to judges of the U.S. district courts and judges of the several States' courts of general trial jurisdiction. A copy of each order shall be filed forthwith with the administrative officer of the supreme court of the jurisdiction.

(8) Affidavits should attach to the application which set out that "normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried."

Senator McCLELLAN. What about a time element—where it would not work because of a time element?

Mr. MARTIN. I am sorry, I didn't quite understand that.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, law-enforcement officials may get information that something is going to happen at a certain place, and if they can get in there and get that telephone tapped, they would be able to get evidence of the crime. You say that other procedures have been tried, all procedures have been tried, or appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried.

Mr. MARTIN. I think the second phrase takes care of the time element—appears unlikely to succeed, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. It might be argued.

Mr. MARTIN. Right.

(9) A statutory list of investigations to which an "overhear" order might apply could expand or contract with the changing social situation of another generation. Today, however, certain Federal crimes are of such danger to the public welfare that they should be specified by the legislation. These are: Murder, kidnaping, extortion, bribery and corruption of government officials, the transmission of wagering information, the interstate and foreign travel or transportation in aid of racketeering enterprises, fraudulent counterfeiting, uttering and dealing in counterfeit obligations and securities of the United States, espionage, sabotage, treason and sedition, and the communication, receipt, tampering with and disclosure of restricted data pertinent to the operation of the Atomic Energy Commission and the national defense establishment, organized forms of gambling, prostitution, shylocking, arson, fraudulent bankruptcy, labor racketeering, and traffic in drugs or any conspiracy involving the above offenses. And I stress the words "organized forms of gambling," et cetera, because mere gambling or mere prostitution we don't think ordinarily requires this kind of surveillance.

On the State level the list should be limited to murder, kidnaping, extortion, bribery and corruption of public officers, organized forms of gambling, prostitutiaon, shylocking, arson, fraudulent bankruptcy, labor racketeering, and traffic in drugs or any conspiracy involving the above offenses.

(10) To guarantee the accuracy of the "overhear" the preservation of tapes made should be required. These should be presented to the authorizing court at the time of expiration of the grant or at the time of renewal. The tapes should then be given the court's seal and retained by the court. Introduction into evidence should be limited to those sealed.

(11) Notice to the party named in the "overhear" order that the order was issued and conversation recorded should occur within 1 year after the termination of the grant. This would give the individual an opportunity to challenge the propriety of the order's issuance. While it would come too late for him to do anything about the search itself, he would have an opportunity to limit the use of this information and to strike it from the court's possession. This provision could be expected to go a long way toward guaranteeing that the surveillance device would be carefully used. This would do much to dispel the fear of all citizens that "overhear" orders had been issued as to them at some time in the past.

Because there may be situations particularly in organized crime where a disclosure of surveillance would not yet be in the public interest, a judicial officer should be empowered to postpone for cause for such period of time as necessary the filing of the inventory.

(12) Opportunity by the defense to challenge the legality of the "overhear" should be preserved by requirement of a disclosure by the government at the time of indictment that it intends to use evidence directly or indirectly obtained through electronic surveillance. The defense, thereupon, would bring its motion to suppress. The court decision on the motion should be appealable by either side.

(13) The statute should require the court administrator to report to the legislature annually the number of applications, grants, and prosecutory results.

(14) A comprehensive study should occur during the next few years of the manner, problems, and results of this limited legitimization of "overhear" surveillance. We suggest the limiting of a statute to 8 years' operation so that its workings, accomplishments, and validity can be reviewed before any long-term renewal.

The deliberations which will occur in reaching a decision of such broad impact obviously test basic concepts of social order. While it is probable that organized crime will never disappear entirely nor that justice will be complete in all respects, we recall a comment of the Wickersham Commission made over 30 years ago:

> Because these things are not absolutely attainable, it does not follow that we should not strive for them, nor that they may not be attained to a high degree.

Many of the recommendations in the foregoing statements are contained in S. 675. It provides a carefully specified procedure for obtaining judicial approval for electronic surveillance in both Federal and State courts. Such approval under State law may apply with respect to all crime covered by State statute. It is the burden of our statement that such authority should be restricted primarily to organized crime.

We do not believe that such surveillance need ordinarily be extended beyond this point. We urge that S. 675 be revised to include those matters contained in our statement and not now included in the bill. So revised we believed the bill will provide protection for society without undue interference with rights of privacy.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are going to study your recommendations with respect to the legislative provisions.

We like to have these proposals analyzed and studied by others, and have them come in with their suggestions, because as busy as we are we cannot necessarily discover our own errors or omissions sometimes, and we appreciate help from others who look at these proposals from a detached point of view, and have time to analyze them.

Mr. MARTIN. We appreciate that. And, Senator, we are vitally concerned in Michigan to be of maximum help to you in developing a statute that will meet all the constitutional requirements, and still do what society needs.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you have any comments on 674, the confessions bill?

Mr. MARTIN. No, I don't sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have not studied that one.

Mr. MARTIN. I have looked at it but not sufficiently.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have no doubt about the need for wiretapping as an instrument, a weapon in combating particularly organized crime?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. Wiretapping under court order, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. You wholeheartedly endorse it. As I understand, only one man out of the 56 on your Commission doesn't endorse it?

Mr. MARTIN. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. We appreciate your presence and your assistance.

Mr. LOUIS DAMIANI. Will you come around, please.

Gentlemen, each of you identify yourself for the record, please.

STATEMENT OF CAPT. JOHN KELLY, FORMER DETECTIVE, NEW ORLEANS POLICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I am John M. Kelly, Jr., former detective, homicide division, New Orleans Police Department.

I appear here today in your committee to present to you my statement for passage of Senate bill 798, Local Law Enforcement Survivors Compensation, for officers killed while apprehending or attempting to apprehend persons for committing Federal crimes.

I am deeply grateful and humble to those of you who give my thoughts your consideration.

I fully realize too that I accepted a great repsonsibility to appear here in behalf of so many thousands of law enforcement officers throughout the United States and the District of Columbia. I sincerely hope that I am capable and meet this challenge for them and their loved ones.

The Louisiana State Legislature has recognized the need to supplement a police officers pay, in recognition for enforcing State laws, to a maximum of $50 per month, in addition to their salaries from cities and municipalities.

We feel that this recognition by the State of Louisiana has helped greatly in the recruitment of young men to enter the field of law enforcement, and helped to retain experienced police officers on the job. However, with the constant turmoil and increased dangers in Louisiana as well as all other sections of the United States to police officers—departments remain far below their required strength.

We further feel that recognition by the Federal Government of the dangers faced today by police officers in enforcing Federal laws will help considerably not only in recruitment but retaining of the experienced offiers who otherwise are retiring on pensions at the earliest possible date.

The enforcement of Federal laws by local enforcement agencies cannot be overlooked since the enforcement of the laws by local agencies is essential to the Federal Government, because of the need of immediate action on the part of the local agencies and the inadequate number of Federal law enforcement officers.

The cost to the Federal Government to implement Senate bill 798 would be negligible, in comparison to the services already rendered and expected of local law enforcement officers in the future.

I might add to this statement, Mr. Chairman, if I can. The burden that is being placed on the police officer throughout the United States today, because of the recent decisions and demonstrations that we have throughout the United States has been a terrific impact on the rank and file officers who must face these tasks constantly throughout the day, night, and be first on th scene of any of these crimes that may be committed.

I hope that you will consider this bill further and pass it.

Senator McClellan. We shall certainly consider it further. I don't have the power to pass it. But I am very much in sympathy with what it would do. From news stories we see every day I am sure the policeman begins to wonder who is his friend.

Mr. Kelly. That is true, sir.

Senator McClellan. You have my sympathies, sir, and the very depths of my appreciation, for the willingness and labor the police undertake to perform their duties with the crime situation that confronts them today. They are harassed not only by the demonstrators and the marchers and people who are indifferent to law and order, the hardened criminals, but now are having trouble and cannot do their duty properly because of restrictive rules—anything they do is suspect, it would appear, in the courts. And I can sympathize with them very much. They are our first line of defense, the barrier that gives the protection to our home, to our safety. And if we permit that barrier to be broken down, no one is going to be safe. When they go out and risk their lives under conditions today, I feel they ought to be fully compensated, well compensated. They ought to be well trained first. We are not giving them the training. We should do that. And they should be well compensated. And they should be respected and given a position of recognition. If one of them goes crooked, he ought to be severely punished—severely punished. I have no sympathy for that. If he is getting good pay, and in a position of honor, a position of distinction, trying to serve his community and represent it—if he then goes crooked, I think there ought to be a very severe penalty. But until he does, as long as he does his duty, not only should he be respected and highly compensated, but we should take a little different attitude toward him today than what we are taking.

I am on the side of the law enforcement official. I will tell you that. I make no apology for it. I say that for the record. I am today, I will be tomorrow.

Mr. KELLY. God bless you, sir.

STATEMENT OF LOUIS R. DAMIANI, CHAIRMAN OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, FRATERNAL ORDER OF POLICE

Mr. DAMIANI. Senator McClellan, I would like to thank you for the opportunity of appearing before you in behalf of Senate bill 798. I am Louis R. Damiani. I am the national legislative charman for the Fraternal Order of Police.

Mr. Chairman, the Fraternal Order of Police is an organization of full-time police officers, organized over 50 years ago. We represent the policemen, sir, for the good of the policemen legislation. I am a policeman myself. I work the streets. I have been a policeman for 17 years, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In New Orleans?

Mr. DAMIANI. In Philadelphia.

We represent policemen all over the country.

The idea for the formation of the police survivorship bill originated at a seminar attended by policemen of all ranks and from all parts of the country in December of 1965. Over 100 law enforcement officers came to Chicago at their own expense or sponsored by their organizations. This was an informal seminar allowing for any topic to be discussed bearing on the plight of the policeman in these troubled days. Policemen are especially aware of the low morale experienced by their fellow officers. At this time they were troubled by the effect of the civil rights bill and civil disturbances causing an ever-increasing workload on them.

We are not against civil rights for anyone, sir, but all the burden fell on local law enforcement officers, with demonstrations, riots, and what-have-you.

During the course of the sessions, it was decided that the two most important features they would like to see come out of Washington in the form of legislation would be a tax break bill and a police survivorship bill.

The police survivorship bill covers any policeman killed in the line of duty involving a Federal crime only. The estate would receive $250 a month for 99 months, or a grand total of $25,000 per family. If the wife should remarry and is childless, the payments would automatically stop. If the children reach the age of 18, complete high school and do not wish to continue their education, the payments would stop. However, if the children decide to continue their education, the payments would continue until they reach 21 years of age. In no event would the total payments exceed $25,000.

The police in their daily routine are asked to perform many different services for the Federal Government for which they receive no compensation. In some small towns they are asked to accompany the postmaster to the bank when large sums of money are to be deposited. The Federal Bureau of Investigation, Secret Service, postal inspectors, immigration officials, Interstate Commerce, and practically every other agency of the Federal Government at some time have requested assistance of the police departments in the various cities, towns or boroughs. When a policeman takes his oath of office, he swears allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, the State government and the municipality for which he works. The Federal Government makes no contribution toward his salary or fringe benefits. The State, in some cases, contributes toward his pension. The local authorities must support him in every way.

We often speak of the hazards of a policeman, but rarely think about the extra expenses incurred by a policeman because of his occupation. A good case in point is the acquisition of life insurance. A family life insurance policy for average workers covering the insured for $5,000 and $1,000 for wife and each child would cost $19.80 per month. However, a policeman's benefits would be lowered to only $3,000 coverage, with the same monthly payments, because of his hazardous occupation. A policeman's family would stand to lose $2,000 because of the career that he has chosen to safeguard other families.

The Department of Labor and Statistics admits that police vacancies are the hardest to fill in these troubled days with the crime rate at its highest level. The President is well aware of this condition and has so stated in his State of the Union mesesage to Congress.

We feel this bill would bring about much closer and more harmonious cooperation with all Federal agencies and local law enforcement officers at a very small cost to the Government. Needless to say, the morale boost that it would give policemen throughout the country could not be measured in dollars and cents.

Several bills were put in to cover policemen that are totally disabled in the same circumstances. We feel that the two features together would make a much more attractive piece of legislation and yet amount to little more expense to the Government. FBI statistics show that 13 policemen were killed in the line of duty in federally connected offenses during the years 1960 to 1965, inclusive. If the survivors of these men were all collecting checks at this time the Government would be paying a total cost of $39,000 at the present time. This figure can be used as a scale for the next 6 years. A life insurance company in Philadelphia has advised me, since the FBI has no available statistics concerning policemen totally disabled in performance of duty involving commission of a Federal crime, that we could multiply this number by six and arrive at a fair estimate. This would mean we could anticipate a need for $18,000 for policemen totally disabled and $6,000 for those killed in the line of duty, or a total of approximately $25,000 per year.

I would recommend that the first appropriation be put in for $75,000 as there are no statistics available for those injured. However, if the consensus of opinion should be that the bill should not only apply to those killed in action and extending it to those injured might jeopardize the bill, I would rather delete the section relating to those disabled and keep it in its original form.

Our prime purpose in presenting this bill and its passage is to raise the morale of the policemen presently employed and to offer an incentive for future applicants. The policeman is much more aware of the difficulties involved in recruiting prospective applicants than the public. He is most anxious and eager to obtain the best future coworker possible as this could one day amount to another form of insurance to him.

The breakdown as far as the cost would be—the FBI statistics show in the last 13 years 13 policemen were killed. The total would be $5,500. The last 6 years, $500 a month. Seventy-eight disabilities would cost $25,000, grand total of 6 years, $150,000.

Policemen know the morale problems of his fellow workers. This is the only reason this bill was put in.

We are not looking for utopia, or a windfall. All we want to do is show with all these demonstrations and what is going on today, and everything else coming out of Washington, we are looking for something from Washington to show the men that Washington is thinking of the policemen on the street, not just give him an ever-increasing workload. It is easy to tell a man do this, do this, do this. But we must be able to tell the man—this is your compensation for doing this.

For the 13 policemen killed ——

Senator McCLELLAN. Do their widows get nothing at all?

Mr. DAMIANI. I could show you this right here, Mr. Chairman. On Friday, April 7, in suburban Lancaster County, a chief of police was killed—these were the headlines in the papers. "Police Chief in Gun Fight in Maytown Bank." "Police Chief Shot to Death in Bank Holdup." This is a typical case. A one-man police department, a bank holdup. The officer would have been covered had this bill been law.

The only coverage this police chief's wife will get, and I have a letter from the solicitor, is what any other person would get, whether it be a garbage collector, truck driver. This is the workman's compensation insurance. His wife and one daughter will receive $34 a week for 500 weeks and $750 to go directly to the mortician.

This is almost a uniform scale throughout the country. In some of the larger cities it is a little different. But very often the men that are killed are from the small areas. The rural areas, with one- to four-man police departments. This man gave his life in the performance of his duty. He wounded two of the men in the bank robbery. He did everything he could have done as a policeman.

Senator McCLELLAN. What did his family get?

Mr. DAMIANI. $34 a week for 500 weeks, for his wife and child.

Senator McCLELLAN. You propose to give them more than that.

But $250 a month is not a lot.

Mr. DAMIANI. That is not a whole lot.

Senator McCLELLAN. $250 a month is about $60 a week. There they got how much a week?

Mr. DAMIANI. There they got $34 a week.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is about double what they get. Do you want any of that material in the record?

Mr. DAMIANI. Yes, sir; I would like this letter in the record.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right. The letter may be received and printed in the record.

(The letter referred to follows:)

LAW OFFICES,
ZIMMERMAN, ZIMMERMAN, MYERS & GIBBEL,
Lancaster, Pa., April 17, 1967.

Re Marvin E. Foltz, East Donegal Township.

Officer GEORGE J. SCHREDER, Lancaster Police Department,
Lancaster, Pa.

DEAR OFFICER SCHREDER: I am Solicitor for the Board of Supervisors of East Donegal Township, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, and you have requested me to advise you of the benefits, if any, accruing to the widow of Chief Carvin Foltz, who was killed preventing a bank robbery in Maytown, East Donegal Township, on April 7, 1967. The bank involved was a branch of the Union National Mount Joy Bank.

Chief Foltz was covered by workmen's compensation insurance issued by the Maryland Casualty Company, of Baltimore, Maryland. He left to survive him a widow and a daughter, nineteen years of age. Under the law of Pennsylvania relating thereto, the widow will be entitled to receive, by reason of the death of Chief Foltz in the course of his employment, the sum of $34.00 a week for a period of five hundred weeks and a funeral allowance not to exceed $750.00, which latter is payable directly to the mortician.

Inasmuch as the Township had just started a regular police force, there was no provision for pension nor was there any life insurance or insurance of any kind other than the workmen's compensation above-noted.

Very truly yours,

B. M. ZIMMERMAN.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think the Attorney General has made some suggestions for amendments which we will consider. I have a letter from Hon. Santiago Polanco-Abreu, Resident Commissioner, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, with a statement for the record. The bill does not include Puerto Rico. The Commissioner asks that Puerto Rico be included. Let the letter and attachment to it be filed as a part of the record.

Mr. DAMIANI. I think it would be a wonderful thing to include Puerto Rico.

(The letter and statement referred to follow:)

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVE,
Washington, D.C. March 1, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedure, Senate Judiciary Committee,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have read in the Congressional Record that your Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedure will be having hearings commencing on March 7 with respect to a number of crime bills.

I would like to call your attention to what is probably a drafting error in S. 798, your bill to provide compensation to survivors of local law enforcement officers killed while apprehending persons for committing federal crimes. As the bill is presently drafted, it applies only to policemen employed by the States or the District of Columbia. I am sure you are aware that Puerto Rico has a police force which is entrusted with the responsibility of enforcing both the local criminal laws and the federal criminal laws. Needless to say, it would be unjust to exclude these law enforcement officers from the benefits of these bills.

I hope that you will agree that an amendment is in order, and I would appreciate knowing if you will be willing to support such an amendment on my behalf.

Cordially yours,

SANTIAGO POLANCO-ABREU.

TESTIMONY OF SANTIAGO POLANCO-ABREU, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to point out that S. 798 and many of the companion measures would not, as presently drafted, provide compensation to the survivors of local law enforcement officers in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico who are killed while apprehending persons for committing Federal crimes.

I am confident that this omission is simply an oversight which this Committee will see fit to correct. In making its determination on this issue, the Committee may find helpful the following information about law enforcement operations in Puerto Rico.

In no substantial way does law enforcement in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico differ from that in the States. The federal criminal laws extend to Puerto Rico (see 18 U.S.C. Secs. 5, 10), and the Police of Puerto Rico are obligated to enforce these laws as well as the criminal laws of Puerto Rico. (Laws of P. R. Ann., Title 25, Sec. 221b). The two agencies in Puerto Rico entrusted with law enforcement, the Police of Puerto Rico and the Criminal Investigation Corps, are both non-federal in nature, having been created by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico (P.R. Law No. 77, June 22, 1956; P.R. Law No. 107, June 29, 1965). Both are under the ultimate control of the Governor of Puerto Rico and are supervised and directed by Superintendent of Police, who is appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Puerto Rico Senate. And, of course, both are supported and maintained by Commonwealth funds.

Thus, the police system in Puerto Rico is fundamentally the same as those in the States and there is no good reason for excluding law enforcement officers in Puerto Rico from the benefits contemplated by the bills under consideration. In fact, I suggest that since the police of Puerto Rico have been given the responsibility of enforcing federal criminal laws, they must also be given any correlative benefits.

I respectfully request that the Committee insert in the bill a definition of the term "State" which includes the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much, gentlemen.

We have some matters here for the record.

Mr. DAMIANI. Mr. Chairman, if I may, Major Duling from Richmond could not be here. He asked if I could submit his report.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It may be printed in the record.

(The statement of Major Duling referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF MAJOR FRANK S. DULING, COMMANDER, INVESTIGATIVE OPERATIONS, BUREAU OF POLICE, RICHMOND, VA.

In 1965, 83 police officers lost their lives in the performance of their duty. These men laid down their lives in order to make their communities safe for the citizens. But what is to become of the families of such officers?

In most cases these families must face the future with little or no recompense for the husband and father that give his life for the community. The family is forgotten and left only with words of sympathy, which won't help to raise a child.

As police officers we realize that our lives are on the line everyday. We know that we might have to give our life in order to save someone from danger or to prevent a crime. We know all of this; but we also know that most of us are ill prepared to face the ultimate consequence.

The lack of preparedness comes not from our atttude, because we recognize this as a necessary element of our profession; but, the lack of preparedness comes from low salaries, restricted pensions, and the inevitable result of low salaries—little or no insurance.

Today in most communities there is no fund to provide any survivor benefits for the families of men who lose their lives in the performance of their duty.

Localities and other jurisdictions, for varous reasons, have failed to set up such benefits.

In Richmond, for example, should an officer lose his life in the line of duty his survivors would receive the sum of $75.00 per month from the Police Benevolent Association for one year. No other funds are available except for survivor benefits under Social Security and, of course, whatever insurance the man might have set up for this eventuality.

No one ever thinks that he will be the one—and after it happens, it is too late.

Several professional police organizations offer low cost group insurance but many of the men are financially unable to invest even in low cost insurance.

Certainly this is a strong moral factor when the men see the family of a fallen comrade, deprived of husband and father, condemned to a future of insecurity and shattered dreams.

Some law enforcement agencies have taken steps to provide for the survivors of such gallant men. Notable among these in the Federal Bureau of Investigation which provides a lump sum payment of $1500.00 to the family from the Ross Memorial Fund. In addition there is a contributory agent's fund that also pays a lump sum. The Civil Service death benefit and annuity which are paid are also contributory.

Some state agencies provide for insurance payments under state retirement plans; but these are also contributory.

We, as working police officers, are concerned over this seeming lack. Throughout our working society provisions are made for employees including fringe benefits that would be of assistance in this case. After all a member of our armed services who loses his life in defense of our nation knows that certain benefits will be available to his survivors. On the other hand the Police Officer who is the front line assault in society's war for personal safety and protection from crime is often forgotten.

At this time it might be well to point out an excerpt from "The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society", the report by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice:

"In the field of law enforcement and administration of justice the Federal contribution is still quite small, particularly in respect to the support it gives the States and cities, which bear most of the load of criminal administration. The present level of Federal support provides only a tiny portion of the resources the Sates and cities need to put into effect the changes this report recommends".

This quotation was in reference to the various Federal Programs instituted to combat juvenile delinquency, such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps, the Job Corps, the Youth Opportunity Centers, etc., but the Commission might well have been referring to the Federal Contribution toward the law enforcement officers whose job it is to police the States and cities. President Johnson stated in his 1966 Crime message to Congress:

"Crime does not observe neat, jurisdictional lines between city, State and Federal Governments * * *. To improve in one field we must improve in all. To improve in one part of the country, we must improve in all parts".

Those of us who have chosen law enforcement as a career are very happy and pleased that the Congress is considering such legislation as S. 798. Certainly this is a move in the right direction. A move which will, we hope, encourage more young men to enter the honored profession of law enforcement.

It is also hoped that through the enactment of such legislation as S. 798 the states might take the charge and help to remember these gallent men rather than forget them. I know that the families of police officers everywhere would welcome this element of security and the officer himself might well do a better job knowing that provisions have been made for his loved ones should he be called on to surrender life or limb in the performance of his duty. After all, we must remember that a man does his best work when he knows that all is right with the world.

Senator McCLELLAN. We had here this morning Mr. Allen E. Pritchard Jr., Assistant Executive Director, National League of Cities, who was to testify this afternoon, but he had to catch a plane and was unable to stay over for the afternoon session. Therefore, the Chair directs that his prepared statement be printed in the record at this point.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Pritchard referred to follows:)

STATEMENT IN BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES BY ALLEN E. PRITCHARD, JR., ASSISTANT EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Allen E. Pritchard, Jr., Assistant Executive Director of the National League of Cities. The National League of Cities is a nationwide organization representing 14,300 member municipal governments, large and small. Through a representative process, delegates representing these municipalities convene annually in a national Congress of Cities to formulate our National Municipal Policy. This Policy sets forth the aims and purposes of municipalities. It suggests broad areas of responsibility for municipal, state and Federal authorities on a variety of matters affecting local governments. I will refer to this policy at several points in my statement.

Crime is a problem of major concern to all cities. Its product is a climate of tension and fear which stagnates urban growth and makes implementation of programs to improve urban conditions immeasurably more difficult.

Cooperation among all segments of the urban community is absolutely necessary to find lasting solutions to our urban problems. Crime and the community's reaction to it discourage this cooperation.

Trust in community leadership by those whom development programs are designed to help is needed for these programs to succeed. Crime and the community's reaction to it erode this trust.

Freedom of movement without fear is essential to life in an urban community, but society can not be assured freedom from fear of crime solely by the activities of the policeman on the street. Increasing the efficiency of the policing agencies is only a reaction to the existence of other conditions which breed and support crime. Increased police activity alone can not solve the crime problem. The National Municipal Policy of the National League of Cities notes that—

"The preservation of law and order is fundamental to the maintenance and extension of our constitutional freedoms * * * It is essential * * * that the delicate balance between the maximum degree of public safety and the greatest degree of individual liberty be maintained. We can neither afford the anarchy of uncontrolled liberty nor the impressive destruction of individual freedom found in the totalitarian state."

The reduction in the current tension which exists as a result of the conflicts between vigorous law enforcement and prized individual rights will not be found in the courts alone. Our ultimate goal of reduced tension and crime will be the product of a wide range of social, economic, and environmental programs—a balanced attack on all elements which contribute to crime, including a comprehensive program of criminal justice.

An important phase of the total attack on crime in urban America involves the utilization of Federally aided urban renewal and poverty programs, the new Model Cities Act, manpower training, and other important programs in which the Federal, state, and local governments have joined to correct conditions which lie at the roots of the crime problem. This phase—the attack on poverty, unemployment, inadequate training and education, poor housing and urban blight—will not produce dramatic changes in the present crime picture, but ultimately such programs will result in a permanent reduction of crime by eliminating some of its basic causes. It is not the purpose of these hearings to discuss these programs, but they can not be ignored since they do relate directly to the objectives of this legislation.

The rising crime rate poses a serious challenge to us all. We have all read the statistics on crime, and we recognize that there were over three million serious crimes reported in our country last year, directly involving approximately six million Americans as offenders or victims; and we know that there are many unreported crimes which would greatly increase this figure.

A national commitment is needed if we are to control and reverse the rising tide of crime. The purpose of the Safe Streets Act is to encourage state and local governments to improve their law enforcement and criminal justice systems as part of this national commitment. The National League of Cities views the Act as another opportunity to demonstrate the effectiveness of creative Federalism in solving a serious national problem. We urge its speedy approval by the Congress.

The President's Crime Commission report makes many helpful recommendations as to how local law enforcement and criminal justice agencies can improve their capability to control crime. Some recommendations, such as those relating to modification of police recruitment standards or changing police procedures for taking juveniles into custody, can be implemented by administrative changes without significant cost implications. These will find broad support and speedy implementation in many cities.

The great majority of the recommendations and other improvements yet to be devised will require increased expenditures by those jurisdictions who must implement them. Local governments will be hard pressed to implement such improvements and thus reduce crime quickly without a new source of financing, as existing local revenue sources are already severely strained. The Safe Streets Act provides the essential, albeit minimal, financial aid to assist local jurisdictions in establishing comprehensive criminal justice programs.

Turning to the specific provisions of the Act, I want to identify some specific features of concern.

We believe increased planning and coordination among the various agencies of local government is necessary to successfully reduce crime. Our National Municipal Policy recognizes this need when it states:

"The days when a municipality can delegate crime control to its police department alone have long past. While police departments still serve as the frontline of law enforcement, all local government offices and departments concerned with criminal justice—from prevention through detection, apprehension, prosecution and rehabilitation—must be marshalled to take action in the area of controlling criminal activity. In addition, every relevant public agency must be enlisted into this effort. Whether it be street planning, lighting, parks, licenses and inspections or the multitude of other services provided by each municipality, the activities of those civil employees who perform such functions should be carried out with full consideration of crime factors in mind."

The Demonstration Cities Program and its requirement for comprehensive planning and broad community involvement has greatly hastened the process of coalescing community and local agency interest, abilities, and resources to produce constructive results. A recent report on the achievements of the Demonstration Cities Program to date by Arthur D. Little & Co. points to how it has stimulated coordinated planning. It states: "Officials of several cities have indicated to us that the problem of planning a program application has brought together city agencies, that have never before met in the same room, to discuss means for achieving common objectives. In this process, new lines of communication and understanding have already been established." We believe that the planning requirements of the Safe Streets Act can achieve similar beneficial results, where comprehensive planning has not already been initiated.

The National League of Cities does have some reservations about possible ways in which the planning requirements may be administered. We have discussed these problems with officials of the Justice Department, and, while we have been advised that these problems will not arise in implementation of the Act, we wish to note them for the record.

First, we believe that a major emphasis on planning at the state level, as suggested by the Attorney General in earlier testimony, might retard urgently needed urban programs to control crime. Many states do not now have sufficient experience in urban law enforcement problems. Crucial time will be lost while the States develop expertise in these fields to make effective plans.

Second, we hope that the 50,000 population limit in the planning requirements will be used to encourage coordination of planning. It should not be used to require consolidation of law enforcement efforts in small jurisdictions, although that may be the eventual result.

Third, we believe that cities which have already engaged in comprehensive law enforcement planning should not be required to duplicate these efforts under any new formalities to be required by the Act. Further, we urge that, in the first year, funds be made available under Title II of the Act to help those cities implement their plans. If there are no funds for action programs during the first year, the effect of the Act will be to encourage delay in implementing presently planned programs. To provide adequate funds for action programs in those communities which have already done comprehensive planning and also to provide the funds required for planning programs under Title I and demonstration program under Title III, we feel that more money will be needed for fiscal 1968 and the $50 million presently contemplated.

The National League of Cities endorses multi-jurdisdictional planning where it is feasible. Because the functional relationships between various units of local government vary widely throughout the country, the Act can not be wedded to a specific planning structure, though a minimum population for a planning unit may be prescribed. In many instances, a city will be the logical local planning unit. In other cases, it may be a county. In some areas, including metropolitan areas with populations far is excess of the 50,000 population minimum, planning may be the function of a council of governments, representing a number of units of general government. There should be assurance, however, that the planning will be the function of a unit of general local government or a unit representative of general local government, such as a council of governments.

Section 204 of the Act requires a plan to be on file with the Attorney General if a community is to secure a grant under Title II. We believe that a means should be devised to encourage review and revision of these plans to keep them up to date. Programs under the Safe Streets Act will stimulate may new ideas in law enforcement; provision should exist to encourage incorporation of these new ideas into previously existing law enforcement plans. Also, communities getting their funds from the Safe Streets Act may find new problems in the area of law enforcement or view problems, which they have already discovered, in a new light; and provision should be made to incorporate these new views into the existing plan. Whether provision for review of plans is made by statute or administrative regulation, we believe that such review is necessary.

Turning to Title II of the Safe Streets Act, I call attention to Section 202–a–2. This section imposes some unnecessary restrictions on the effectiveness of the Act. This section provides "Not more than one-third of any grant under this section shall be expended for the compensation of personnel, except that this limitation shall not apply to the compensation of personnel for time engaged in conducting or undergoing training programs and specialized personnel performing innovative functions."

It is generally recognized that salary structure is an important element in improving law enforcement. Application of the one-third limit on salaries from grant funds might present a stumbling block to the payment of realistic salaries as part of a plan to improve law enforcement. A National League of Cities survey, conducted in February 1960, found that 65.5% of those police departments surveyed were being operated below authorized strength and 80% of those operating at authorized strength believed that more officers were needed. The major use of a grant might logically be for salaries to initiate a new program to improve personnel, one which, with local acceptance, could later be financed from local funds. A lateral entry system or a program to increase clerical staff and free professional staff for law enforcement duties, both recommended by the President's Crime Commission and endorsed by the National League of Cities, would not involve any new classes of personnel whose salaries would be exempt under 202–a–2 but grants to aid such a program might greatly improve law enforcement by enabling police departments to obtain better personnel at higher levels in the department. We believe that the comprenhensive planning requirements, which must be complied with for a city to qualify under Title II, would provide sufficient protection so that grant funds would not be applied to salaries that were not part of a general law enforcement improvement programs. Further, the salary limit may encourage police departments to substitute equipment improvements for more essential changes in personnel structure to maximize aid potential. We know of no other similar salary limitation in Federal grant-in-aid programs and recommend that the one-third salary limit not be included in this Act.

Also under Title II, we seriously object to the 5% annual improvement formula with a single base year. It is unrealistic to insist that cities commit themselves to an endless upward cost spiral in order to maintain program eligibility. Local communities face a variety of serious problems, not only in law enforcement, but also in housing, education, and transportation, to name some others. Because of limited revenues, cities must establish a scale of priorities to attack these programs, and, because of differing economic, social and political conditions, these priorities will necessarily be different. No Federal program should attempt to mandate a uniform cost priority for all cities, as the 5% improvement requirement does. Each local government must be encouraged to decide, according to its particular circumstances, which of its various functions most immediately merits the assignment of resources. Many cities have serious law enforcement problems that clearly warrant Federal financial aid of the kind available under the Safe Streets Act, but some of these same cities will have other problems that demand the priority on their resources. These communities should not be told that they must forego attacking other serious problems—some even related to crime—in order to maintain eligibility under the Safe Streets Act, particularly when they can not be sure that a grant will ever be forthcoming. Crime presents a serious problem for most cities, but to say unequivocally that it is so serious a problem that all cities should increase expenditures if they want help at some undetermined time, regardless of the gravity of other local problems, is unrealistic.

The 5% improvement requirement must be considered as part of the total grant formula. When so considered, it means that local governments must make a substantial commitment of local funds before any Federal funds may be forthcoming under this Act. A community which has not maintained eligibility during the first years of the program will be confronted with a 15 or 20% improvement expenditure to re-establish eligibility. This will deter participation in the program even if help is badly needed. Like most Americans, local governments wish to apply their scarce dollars in places where they will earn the greatest return. The urban renewal program provides a return of at least two dollars to the community for every one dollar invested, and the Model Cities and poverty programs provide varying degrees of return, generally averaging nine Federal dollars for each local dollar. It is doubtful that the Act's current formula will be considered competitively attractive.

Under these circumstances, a local government might very reasonably determine that the most productive method to reduce its crime problems would be to resort to the environmental programs attacking the roots of crime, referred to earlier in my statement. These programs would not have the immediate positive effect contemplated within the Safe Streets Act, but, because of their greater investment return, the community could logically conclude that other programs with more favorable matching formulas would better serve long-range needs.

We recognize that there is an escape clause, Section 202–d, but we can not be sure how such a clause will be applied. A city which has an exceptionally high expenditure in the base year might have real difficulty in maintaining its eligibility for a grant, particularly since it would not be determined until its application for a grant was well into the processing stage, whether it would qualify under 202–d for the exemption from the eligibility requirements. There may also be serious administrative and accounting problems in determining what is an expenditure for law enforcement and what is not. This would be a particular problem in the field of crime prevention, community relations and rehabilitation of offenders.

The Act seeks to stimulate innovative approaches to law enforcement problems. If a city has a new approach to one aspect of the law enforcement problem which is consistent with its comprehensive plans, matching formulas should encourage development of this idea without regard to whether the community has increased its total expenditures. Failure to develop such an innovative program, because of the burden of the improvement requirement, would be contrary to the purposes of the Act.

The Act has the laudable purpose of encouraging area-wide planning. The grant program will stimulate this often difficult planning process. The improvement formula will discourage this process. If each party to the plan must commit itself to an annual increase of 5% in its law enforcement expenditures, with no assurance that each jurisdiction increasing its expenditures to remain eligible will eventually receive a Title II grant, the ultimate effect of this improvement requirement will be that only those communities that feel they can meet the improvement requirement will join in such a plan, and the area-wide quality of such plans will be lost.

The National League of Cities firmly believes that the positive attack on crime called for by the President and contemplated in this Act should ultimately result in a reduction of the costs of law enforcement, though the effectiveness of the law enforcement process will constantly improve.

Cities are proceeding with many other city and city-Federal programs with the firm hope that, among their real products, will be counted reduced crime. Many of these programs are extremely expensive and place severe demands upon local revenue and leadership. To be successfully initiated in a city, there must be some assurance of future cost reductions stemming from high initial investments. City leadership faces added difficulties with such programs if there is no hope of reduced public safety expenditures.

Federal programs should not insist that local units constantly increase expenditures; instead, they should encourage the search for new techniques to produce desired results with a reduced financial burden. Emphasis should be on development of innovative programs in a reduction of crime—not upon increased expenditures.

With adequate financing, flexible planning, and some needed administrative changes in local police departments, the rising tide of crime can be reversed. The National League of Cities enthusiastically supports the concept of the Safe Streets Act of 1967 and believes that, with a few minor modifications which we have suggested, it can, in combination with other Federal-local attacks on crucial urban needs, be a very effective instrument in reversing our rising tide of crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. We have also received a statement from Mr. C. Beverly Briley, mayor, Nashville, Tenn., Vice Chairman of the NLC Committee on Public Safety—a statement that he made to the House Judiciary Committee on March 23, commenting on the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. He has requested that his statement be made a part of our record.

Without objection, it is accordingly done, and it will be printed in the record at this point.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Briley referred to, follows:)

STATEMENT IN BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES BY C. BEVERLY BRILEY, MAYOR, NASHVILLE, TENN., VICE CHAIRMAN, NLC COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC SAFETY

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is C. Beverly Briley, Mayor of Nashville, Tennessee, and Vice-Chairman of the Public Safety Committee of the National League of Cities, I appear here today in behalf of the National League of Cities, a nationwide organization representing 14,300 member municipal governments, large and small. Through a representative process by which delegates representing the cities of each state come together annually in a national Congress of Cities, this organization determines its National Municipal Policy. This Policy sets forth the aims and purposes of municipalities. It suggests broad areas of responsibility for municipal, state and federal authorities on a variety of matters affecting localities. I will refer to this policy at several points in my statement.

Crime is a matter of particular importance to the cities of America because of its growing incidence in cities and the climate of fear it creates. When we think of increases in crime or the words "crime in the streets", we have a tendency to think of the major cities in America, but interestingly enough, the greatest percentage increase in reported serious crimes last year occurred in communities of less than 10,000 population. Growing crime is therefore a problem of cities of all sizes.

Law enforcement is basically a local responsibility. As such it imposes grave responsibilities upon cities, their public officials and their citizens. The Natonal Municipal Policy of the National League of Cities spotlights the dilemma we face.

It states:

"The Preservation of law and order is fundamental to the maintenance and extension of our Constitutional freedoms. Every municipality is responsible for the protection of life and property within its jurisdictional boundaries and must develop and maintain an efficient law enforcement agency within the limits of its resources * * * It is essential, however, that the delicate balance between the maximum degree of public safety and the greatest degree of individual liberty be maintained. We can neither afford the anarchy of uncontrolled liberty nor the repressive destruction of individual freedom found in the totalitarian state."

Public safety, particularly freedom of movement without fear, is essential to life in an urban community. But society cannot be assured freedom from crime solely by the activities of the policeman on the street. The goal we seek will be the product of a wide range of social, economic and environmental programs coupled with a comprehensive program of criminal justice. Our need is for a balanced attack on all elements if we are to win the war on crime.

Through the urban renewal and poverty programs, the new model cities act, manpower training and a number of other critical programs, Federal, state and local governments have joined to attack conditions which are at the roots of the crime problem. This phase of the attack on poverty, unemployment, inadequate training and education, poor housing and urban blight will not immediately produce dramatic changes in the present crime picture, but ultimately such programs will result in a permanent reduction in crime by eliminating some of its basic causes. The purpose of these hearings is not to discuss these programs, but we cannot ignore them. I will refer to them again because they are directly related to this legislation.

The National League of Cities supports the concept of the Safe Streets Act of 1967. It will certainly stimulate state and local governments to make improvements in their law enforcement and criminal justice systems which they could not make without the commitment of the Federal government to help them. We see it as another opportunity to demonstrate the effectiveness of Creative Federalism.

We all know that crime problems in the United States have made headlines not only here at home but throughout the world. These reports of our growing crime problem hamper not only our domestic progress but also our attempts to win friends abroad.

To put the gravity of the problem in its proper perspective, twice as many Americans died last year as a result of criminal acts in their own country as died fighting the war in Viet Nam. Last year there were approximately 3,060,000 serious crimes reported. This means that even allowing for some duplication of offenders and victims, approximately 6 million Americans were directly involved in serious crime either as offenders or victims, and the larger estimated number of unreported crimes would greatly increase this figure.

Crime is a grave national problem and only by a national commitment to eliminate the factors which contribute to crime and by positive programs to control crime, as called for in the President's Message on Crime, which the Safe Streets Act seeks to implement, can we ever hope to reverse the trend and provide a safer climate for all members of our free society.

The report of the President's Crime Commission, a thorough analysis of the problems of law enforcement and criminal justice facing the country today, makes numerous helpful recommendations on how local law enforcement agencies can improve their capability to combat crime. Some of the recommendations, such as those relating to modification of recruitment standards or changing police procedures for taking juveniles into custody would involve principally administrative changes without significant cost implications. The great majority of the recommendations will require increased expenditures by those jurisdictions who must implement them. Local revenue sources are already severly strained. If local governments are to develop truly comprehensive programs, including efficient law enforcement agencies utilizing advanced scientific equipment and techniques for patrol, communications, record keeping and information retrieval, as advocated by the Crime Commission Report and our National Municipal Policy, new sources of financing must be found.

Looking at the specific provisions of the Act, we believe increased planning and coordination among the various governmental units and their agencies is necessary to improve our attack on crime. Our National Municipal Policy recognizes this need when it states:

"The days when a municipality can delegate crime control to its police department alone have long past. While police departments still serve as the front-line of law enforcement, all local governments offices and departments concerned with criminal justice—from prevention through detection, apprehension, prosecution and rehabilitation—must be marshalled to take action in the area of controlling criminal activity. In addition, every relevant public agency must be enlisted into this effort. Whether it be street planning, lighting, parks, licenses and inspections or the multitude of other services provided by each municipality, the activities of those civil employees who perform such functions should be carried out with full consideration of crime factors in mind."

The Demonstration Cities program and its requirement for comprehensive planning and broad community involvement has greatly hastened the process of combining community and local agency interest and abilities and resources, to produce constructive results. A report prepared by Arthur D. Little and Company and released just last week notes:

"Although none of the money Congress appropriated has yet been spent, there is good reason to believe that one of the major contributions of the model cities program may well have already been made.

"Officials in several cities have indicated to us that the problem of planning a program application has brought together city agencies that have never before met in the same room to discuss means for achieving common objectives. In this process new lines of communication and understanding have already been established. For the first time in a few cities real efforts are under way to establish working relationships between line city agencies and independent school boards. In some places, this has led to the establishment of more long-range working relationships, involving efforts at sharing information and coordinating activities.

"The application planning process has also brought new groups into the general urban development effort. The program has provided an opportunity for citizens' groups and private firms, as well as other private agencies, to analyze the role they might play in attacking urban problems, and for the city government to consider the area in which the contributions of these groups is vital to effective programs."

We believe that the planning requirements of the Safe Streets Act can achieve similar beneficial results, where comprehensive planning has not already been initiated.

The proposed planning requirements of Title I do have some drawbacks however. We question giving priority in the allocation of planning funds to state-wide planning if the Act is to be implemented as proposed by the Attorney General in testimony before this Committee last week.

A number of states have restricted their law enforcement activity to highway patrol and other traffic control work, and rarely do states become deeply involved in urban law enforcement problems. For this reason, many states do not have the historical interest, the personnel, the appropriations or the expertise to cope with the complex problems of urban law enforcement. Perhaps the states should be more deeply concerned but it would be unfortunate if planning so urgently needed for a total attack on crime in our cities was delayed while the states expanded their personnel and developed the expertise necessary to deal in the areas in which they have not been previously involved.

The Legislation before you would authorize a $50 million appropriation for fiscal 1968, and a $300 million appropriation is proposed for fiscal 1969. The Attorney General, in his testimony before you, stated that 1968 appropriations would be assigned to planning efforts under Title I and the continuation of the law enforcement assistance program under Title III. No money would be available for action programs under Title II during the first year of the Act. This assumes that no planning of the type envisioned by the Act is currently being done, but this is not so. Some communities have been, or are currently, engaged in comparable planning activity. With perhaps small modifications in their plans, such cities could be ready to move ahead with action programs soon after passage of the Act. These communities which have done, or are doing, extensive planning in connection with their law enforcement processes, should not be required to make new plans under Title I requirements in order to be eligible for Title II aid. Such requirements would cause a wasteful duplication of effort and result in a penalty for those communities which entered the planning process before passage of the Act.

Further, cities which are prepared to implement sound programs should not be required to wait a year to obtain Title II grants but should be eligible immediately upon passage of the Act for grants to carry out the programs they have planned on their own and without the benefit of Title I assistance. Unless such cities—cities otherwise eligible under the program—can expect Title II grants during the first year, the effect of the Act will be to encourage delay in implementing presently planned programs.

The National League of Cities endorses inter-jurisdictional planning on a broad scale where it is feasible. We are not wedded to a specific planning structure. In many instances a city will be the local planning unit. In other cases it may be a county. In some areas, including metropolitan areas with populations far in excess of the 50,000 population minimum, planning may be the function of a Council of Governments representing a number of units of general government. We do not believe the Act should dictate the specific planning unit even though a minimum population for a planning unit may be prescribed. There should be assurance, however, that the planning will be the function of a unit of general local government or a unit representative of general local government such as a Council of Governments.

The 50,000 population limit for qualification for planning and action grants is intended to encourage coordination. Such grants should not be used to require consolidation of law enforcement efforts in jurisdictions of less than 50,000 population, although consolidation may eventually result. The grant provisions of this Act would not provide sufficient motivation to alter the historical concept that police activities must be responsible to representative governing bodies. To secure consolidation of police functions short of consolidation of governments in metropolitan areas would, in our opinion, further delay the attack on critical local crime problems. The crime problem is much too urgent to tolerate such delay in the attack on it. While in my jurisdiction we have been successful in consolidating the units of government in the metropolitan area, this was a long and tedious process and one which, though I believe desirable, has not been repeated throughout the country.

Planning activity should be coordinated on a broad area-wide basis, but the implementation of such planning can be the responsibility of local jurisdictions. Title II grants should only be available to such jurisdictions if their programs are consistent with the plan. Congress has already adopted a similar device under Title II of the Demonstration Cities act.

Under Title II of the Safe Streets Act, I call your attention to Section 202–a–2. This section imposes some unnecessary restrictions on the effectiveness of the Act. This section provides "not more that one-third of any grant under this section shall be expended for the compensation of personnel, except that this limitation shall not apply to the compensation of personnel for time engaged in conducting or undergoing training programs and specialized personnel performing in innovative functions.

It is generally recognized that salary structure is an important element in improving the law enforcement. Application of the one-third limit on salaries from grants funds might present a stumbling block to the payment of realistic salaries as part of a plan to improve law enforcement. A National League of Cities survey conducted in February, 1966 shows that 65.5 percent of those police departments surveyed were operating below authorized strength and 80 percent of those operating at authorized strength believed that more officers were needed. A lateral entry system, recommended by the President's Crime Commission and endorsed by the National League of Cities, would not involve hiring of any new classes of personnel whose salaries would be exempt under 202–a–2, but grants to aid such a program might greatly improve law enforcement by enabling police departments to obtain better personnel at higher levels in the department. Thus the major use of a grant might logically be for salaries to initiate a new program, one which, with local acceptance, could be later financed from local funds.

We know of no other similar salary limitations in Federal grant in aid programs and recommend that the one-third salary limit not be included in this Act.

Also under Title II we question whether the 5% annual improvement formula with a single base year is realistic. The proposed formula presents several problems:

First: Expenditures for crime control represent about one-fifth of the total expenditures of local governments. The Crime Commission Report documents that local governments spent more than $2.7 billion for the prevention and control of crime in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1965. We estimate that this expenditure will easily exceed $3 billion in fiscal 1967, the proposed base year for the improvement requirements. Even if all the money requested by the bill is authorized and appropriated, local governments will be required to spend an additional $150 million for crime control in fiscal 1968 for a $50 million Federal commitment and an additonal $300 million over the base year to maintain eligibility plus 40% of any matching grant or as much as 500 million for a proposed Federal commitment of $300 million in fiscal 1969. When one remembers the Attorney General has said that priority consideration will be given to state programs, the improvement requirements become even less palatable for local governments.

Second: Like most Americans, local governments wish to put their scarce dollars in places where they will earn the greatest return. The annual improvement requirement goes even beyond the maintenance of effort provisions of other Federal grant programs and will put this program at a serious disadvantage in local determinations as to which Federal grant programs scarce local funds should be allocated. Making highly unlikely assumptions, most favorable to local governments, that $300 million will be appropriated for fiscal 1969, that all of it will be apportioned to Title II programs and that no funds will be apportioned to the states, the program still does not compare favorably with other Federal programs. To utilize the full $300 million for action programs in fiscal 1969 local governments would be required, as I have already stated, to spend an additional $150 million in fiscal 1968 and $300 million in fiscal 1969 to maintain eligibility plus $200 million as their share of the Federal matching grant. A total of $650 million for a $300 million return or a $2 return for every $6.5 required to be spent.

No other grant program listed in the National League of Cities comprehensive Federal Aids Manual requires so many local dollars to be spent for so few federal dollars to be returned. The Urban Renewal Program provides a return of at least $14 to the community for every $7 invested and the Model Cities and Poverty Programs provide varying degree of return, generally averaging $9 federal dollars for each local dollar.

Under these circumstances a local government might very reasonably determine that the most productive method to reduce its crime problems would be to resort to the environmental programs attacking the roots of crime referred to earlier in my statement. These programs would not have the desired immediate effect of the Safe Streets Act, but because of their greater investment return, a community could logically conclude that they would better serve its long-range needs.

Third: Different communities face different problem situations. Determining which of its functions most immediately merits any increase in expenditures should be left to each local government to decide according to its particular circumstances. Most communities may have a serious problem with law enforcement that clearly warrants Federal financial aid of the kind available under the Safe Streets Act. Some other communities may have other problems that are more serious and demand the priority on their resources. These communities should not be enticed to forego attacking other serious problems—some even related to crime—in order to maintain eligibility under the Safe Streets Act when they do not wish to use it immediately or when they cannot be sure they will ever use it.

Finally: We recognize that there is an escape clause, Section 202–d, but we cannot be sure how such a clause will be applied. A city which has an exceptionally high expenditure in the base year might have real difficulty in maintaining its eligibility for a grant, particularly since it would not be determined until its application for a grant was well into the processing stage whether it would qualify under 202–d for the exemption from eligibility requirements. There may also be serious administrative and accounting problems in determining what is an expenditure for law enforcement and what is not. This is a particular problem in the field of pre-crime prevention, community relations and rehabilitation of offenders.

The goals of the Safe Streets Act can best be achieved by a matching formula without the improvement requirement. The Act seeks to stimulate innovative approaches to law enforcement problems. If a city has a new approach to one aspect of the law enforcement problem which is consistent with its comprehensive plans, matching formulas should encourage development of this idea without regard to whether the community has increased its total expenditures. The burden of the annual improvement requirement could well be so great on a particular community that it would not be able to institute a new program even with Federal funds. Failure to develop such an innovative program because of the burden of the improvement requirement would be contrary to the purposes of the act.

The act has the laudible purpose of encouraging area-wide planning. The grant program will stimulate this often difficult planning process. The improvement formula will discourage this process. If each party to the plan must commit itself to an annual increase of 5% in its law enforcement expenditures, with no assurance that each jurisdiction increasing its expenditures to remain eligible will eventually use Title II grant, the ultimate effect of this improvement requirement will be that only those communities that feel they can meet the improvement requirement will join in such a plan, and the area-wide quality of such plans will be lost.

The National League of Cities firmly believes that a positive attack on crime as called for by the President should ultimately result in a reduction of the costs of law enforcement, though the effectiveness of the law enforcement process will constantly improve.

We are proceeding with many other city and city-federal programs with the firm hope that among their real products will be counted reduced crime. Many of these programs, to be successfully initiated in a city, must provide some assurance of future benefits from high initial costs. We face added difficulties with such programs if there is no hope of reduced public safety expenditures.

We should not insist that local units constantly increase expenditures, instead we should strive for new techniques to produce desired results with a reduced financial burden. Emphasis should be on development of innovative programs and a reduction in crime—not upon increased expenditures.

The National League of Cities strongly supports the concept of the Safe Streets Act of 1967. We believe, however, that this act can better achieve its goals with the few minor modifications we suggest.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection, the Chair will direct that additional statements, resolutions and a select number of letters that the committee has received from citizens, public officials, and others interested in the legislation pending before the committee which we have under consideration, be printed in the record at the conclusion of the hearings today.

I may say the first group of correspondence contain letters that we have received from judges, attorneys general, prosecutors, county attorneys, and professors of law. The second group of letters are from chiefs of police from all over the country. The third set of letters is a representative sampling of letters we have received from the general public.

I think the record would not be complete without showing the public interest in these bills, and also recording the views as contained in the letters to us from policemen and prosecuting attorneys, and judges who could not spare the time or expense to come and testify personally. We are very glad to have their views and their support of legislation that we are considering and hope will be enacted into law.

(The correspondence referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF RANDEL SHAKE, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL CHILD WELFARE COMMISSION, THE AMERICAN LEGION, IN CONNECTION WITH HEARINGS ON S. 917 BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES, SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, MAY 10, 1967.

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, The American Legion appreciates the opportunity to present its views on legislation aimed at reducing the incidence of crime and the strengthening of local enforcement and criminal justice systems.

Our interest in this legislation stems from our long activity in the area of prevention and control of juvenile delinquency. For over 40 years The American Legion has conducted a child welfare program which has had as its purpose assuring care and protection for veterans' children and improving conditions for all children. During this period, The American Legion and its affiliated organizations have expended in excess of $200 million for children and youth. One of the principal activities of our child welfare program, historically, has been our effort to reduce juvenile crime.

Our position is and has been that the prevention of crime is essentially a local responsibility. We have on numerous occasions, through our child welfare program, initiated or supported state legislation related to the establishment or improvement of juvenile court service, detention facilities for juveniles and the improvement of standards for juvenile training schools.

Without relinquishing our traditional position that prevention of crime is basically a community responsibility, we recognize that there are some functions in this area which can be best performed at the national level. These are continuing functions and include stimulation of research, assistance for training personnel, compilation of national statistics and establishment of standards.

We wish to register our support particularly for those parts of Title II and Title III of S. 917 which would provide federal assistance to the states and local communities for training of law enforcement personnel and for the encouragement of research and the development of demonstration projects. The American Legion has encouraged such federal support for a number of years and the current policy of our organization on this matter is stated in Resolution No. 5 adopted at our National Convention in Miami Beach, Florida, October 18–20, 1960, which reads as follows:

Whereas, Juvenile Delinquency rates have continued to increase each year since 1949 and have reached a point of national concern; and

Whereas, Our traditional methods of prevention and control of juvenile delinquency apparently are not sufficiently effective to reduce delinquency and specialized research activities are indicated; and

Whereas, one of the most serious hindrances to the control and treatment of juvenile delinquency is the lack of trained workers in this area; and

Whereas, The American Legion recognizes that the control and treatment of juvenile delinquency is essentially a responsibility of parents and the local community but has reached a point that warrants leadership and assistance by the national government; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That The American Legion, in national convention assembled in Miami Beach, Florida, October 17–20, 1960, urges the Congress to enact legislation which would provide federal matching funds to the states to assist with the financing of demonstration projects and research activities in the area of juvenile delinquency and the training of personnel in methods more effective to its prevention and control.

Although this resolution was adopted in 1960, much the same situation prevails today. Juvenile delinquency rates continue to climb and the most serious barrier today to progress in the corrections field is the critical shortage of trained personnel.

The American Legion, in recognition of the problem of insufficient numbers of qualified personnel, has taken steps, although limited in scope, to alleviate this problem. For a number of years The American Legion Child Welfare Foundation has assisted a number of police officers by furnishing them with a part of their maintenance expenses while attending the Delinquency Control Institute at the University of Southern California. Upon completion of a 12 weeks training course, the officers return to their home communities where they are assigned to work with juveniles. Such training has paid real dividends to those communities which have sent representatives to this Institute.

Funds from our Foundation have been used to finance a training institute at Rutgers University for juvenile training shcool personnel and a summer training program at Tulane University for individuals working in the corrections field who had received no previous specialized training.

Our organization is aware of the tremendous responsibility resting upon the members of the Congress, particularly at this point in history. We are also conscious of the need for establishment of priorities in the appropriation of funds at this time in order to balance the needs of the nation with its ability to pay.

We consider the problem of increased crime to be our leading domestic issue at this time and a problem that has been too long overlooked—a problem that threatens the vitals of our country.

In conclusion, it is our belief that the training, research and demonstration projects features of S. 917 provide an excellent opportunity for effective efforts to reduce crime and juvenile delinquency in this country and we earnestly urge the enactment of this legislation.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Harrisburg, Pa., April 14, 1967.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Recently Governor Shafer wrote to Senator Edward V. Long with reference to a bill which he introduced (S. 928). I believe that the Governor's comments are appropriate, and I am enclosing a copy of that letter for your information.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. SENNETT,
Attorney General.

Enclosure.

APRIL 13, 1967.

HON. EDWARD V. LONG,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LONG: I have before me your recent letter asking my views on S. 928 which you introduced in the Congress. I understand this bill would completely outlaw the use of wiretapping and other electronic listening devices, except in situations involving national security.

My views, in summary, are:

I oppose S. 928.

I wholeheartedly endorse the legitimate use of any technological instrument as a weapon against crime, including the use of both "wiretapping" and any "electronic listening device," provided such use is under the strict control of courts of competent jurisdiction, and is restricted to use by legitimate law enforcement officers to ferret out specific onerous crimes and criminal conspiracies.

The national security is today being threatened by crime more so than ever before in our history, as evidenced by the recent report of the President's Commission. We must not limit an effective war on crime just as we would not restrict a total effort against any foreign aggression.

If we allow the use of electronic devices to prevent an enemy nation from endangering our national security, why should we prohibit the use of such devices to prevent or help eliminate a present domestic danger? If necessary, we would rely upon our Armed Forces to overcome subversion either from within or without. Crime today in the United States presents a clear and present danger which must be overcome.

The effects upon the community of narcotics, gambling, prostitution and other criminal activity, the interstate character of such activity, and the use of modern technology by criminals are well-known and well-documented.

In my view, we must utilize every weapon to eliminate crime from our society, preserving, of course, those ancient rights guaranteeing due process to all citizens. Therefore, I urge the adoption of such measures as will allow the use of these devices under appropriate order of courts of competent jurisdiction.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND P. SHAFER.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have just read the statement of J. Edward Lumbard, Chief Judge of the Second Circuit, before your committee on March 8, 1967, and I take this opportunity to put myself on record as to approving in toto his presentation.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The excellent and logical statement of the Honorable J. Edward Lumbard, before your Committee on March 8, 1967, voices my opinions, and is fully approved of by me.

Respectfully,

FRED KUNZEL,
U.S. District Judge.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
40TH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Indiana, Pa., April 13, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate Building, Washington, D.C.:

I notice by the Legislative Bulletin published by the Pennsylvania Bar Association that you are Chairman of the Senate Crime Laws and Procedure Sub-Committee. I further note that you are holding a hearing on a series of anti-crime bills including Senate Bill No. 674, which is designed to assure the admissibility of voluntary confessions.

I was a Prosecuting Attorney for twelve years and am now on my twelfth year as a Judge. I am deeply concerned about the crime situation in United States.

It is my opinion that a voluntary confession and the information gathered by the police as a result of a voluntary confession should be admitted in evidence in the trial of a case.

In the trial of cases today of course I am bound by late decisions of the United States Supreme Court and we try all cases in the light of those decisions. I think, however, I have the right to say that I believe that these decisions are based upon some rather fuzzy, mental, sob-sister gymnastics. I am very much interested in the rights of the individual but I am also interested in the rights of society generally.

Incidentally I enjoyed hearing you speak when you were at Indiana University.

Very truly yours,

EDWIN M. CLARK.

STATE OF ALABAMA,
OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Montgomery, Ala., January 24, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have your letter under date of January 17, 1967.

In reply to your inquiry dated November 21, 1966, you are advised that Alabama has not yet enacted legislation as a result of Miranda. The State Legislature has not yet considered legislation apparently required by Miranda. However, an Alabama Bar Committee will recommend to the Bar the sponsorship of legislation to make it possible to comply with Miranda.

This proposed legislation, amending Alabama statutes already providing for State payment of counsel in indigent criminal cases, will, according to current thinking in the Bar Committee, provide for temporary appointment of counsel on request of police authorities by circuit judges at the preliminary stages of interrogation of indigents. Provision must also be made for payment of private appointed counsel fees. I expect such legislation to be introduced early in the next regular session of the Alabama Legislature with Bar approval. As stated, such legislation will make it possible to supply counsel at the interrogation stage as required by Miranda at a time that such was and is yet impossible.

Neither the attorneys or judges to whom I have talked are so naive as to believe that such legislation will be effective. The attorney appointed for interrogation will simply send word to his client to remain silent and no statements will be forthcoming.

While this legislation will probably be adopted in order to make it possible according to the book to comply with Miranda, it will be a futile and empty gesture because of the impossible situation created by the Supreme Court of the United States in Miranda. The Alabama Legislature may be of the opinion that it is useless to levy a tax and appoint and pay counsel to advise indigents to remain silent during interrogation, but I believe with Bar approval the legislation will pass.

Miranda is simply a law passed by the United States Supreme Court, which in effect prohibits the introduction into evidence of admissions or confessions or the fruits of uncounseled interrogation. This law, according to five justices, is in the Constitution. I doubt if Congress or the Alabama Legislature can by mere statute effectively amend what the present majority call the Constitution.

I respectfully suggest that you may begin thinking in terms of a constitutional amendment or amendments and hope that, if adopted, the terms thereof will be reasonably construed by the United States Supreme Court.

The excerpt from Miranda quoted in your inquiry may be thought by some to hold out some hope for an alternative method for complying with Miranda.

However, I can conceive of no State or Federal legislation that could as a practical matter soften the blow that Miranda has struck at law enforcement. If confessions, shown to be voluntary, are again to be recognized, the strait jacket, denied by the justices in the opinion, but in fact locked on by them, can only be removed by a law enacted into the Federal constitution. Such an amendment would simply make confessions or admissions, shown to be voluntary, admissible.

I would certainly favor legislation punishing those who would coerce confessions, but I believe that reasonable persuasion by police interrogators before counsel is expressly demanded is essential to proper law enforcement.

Very truly yours,

MACDONALD GALLION,
Attorney General.
By BERNARD F. SYKES,
Assistant Attorney General.

GEORGE VAN HOOMISSEN,
DISTRICT ATTORNEY FOR MULTNOMAH COUNTY,
Portland, Oreg., January 3, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In answer to your letter of November 21, 1966, since we have been operating such a short period of time under the Miranda decision, it is impossible to give you a definitive answer regarding the effect of the decision.

However, after Escobedo and before Miranda, the Oregon Supreme Court handed down State v. Neely, 239 Or 487, 395 P2d 557 (1964), 398 P2d 482 (1965), wherein the Oregon court adopted what was then understood to be among state courts the minority Escobedo rule regarding advice to defendants. Because of the Neely case we here in Oregon had a transition period during which most of our major police agencies modified their procedures. Unfortunately, for purposes of analysis we did not maintain any statistical data regarding the effect of Neely on admissions, statements and confessions; and to date we have not maintained statistical data on Miranda. Although I am able to say that Miranda has caused dismissal of several felony matters and resulted in the inadmissibility of some statements, I cannot demonstrate it. I assume that both Neely and Miranda have prevented our police departments from solving a certain number of cases, and I am referring your request for information to the City of Portland Police Bureau and the Sheriff's Office of Multnomah County with the request that they send any additonal data they may have.

No legislation has been proposed at the local level. We do have a statute which is very similar to the McNabb-Mallory rule. Although to date our court has not adpoted McNabb-Mallory, and the statute has not been interpreted to require exclusion because the statement is taken between arrest and prior to the time defendant appears before the magistrate, our court indicates such a ruling is in the offing.

I regret we are unable to present data for you, and hope the police departments mentioned will be able to assist.

Respectfully,

GEORGE VAN HOOMISSEN,
District Attorney.
By DESMOND D. CONNALL,
Chief Deputy, Criminal Department.

OFFICE OF THE PROSECUTING ATTORNEY,
MAHONING COUNTY,
Youngstown, Ohio, January 10, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Please accept my most sincere apologies for the belated answer to your letter dated November 21, 1966. In some manner it became mixed up with other papers and was mislaid.

I am familiar, of course, with the Miranda decision as well as with other recent Supreme Court decisions involving criminal law.

It goes without saying, I think, that this case will make the obtaining of confessions and admissions much more difficult for law enforcement officers. As of this writing I know of only one case in which we feel not be able to use a confessions because it was not obtained in accordance with Miranda. The local police officers would probably be in a better position to develop statistics than this office.

I feel it safe to assume that cases where Miranda had stopped an investigation have not been bound over to the Grand Jury in accordance with the Ohio practice. I also feel that it will be extremely difficult for anyone to draft Federal Legislation which can circumvent the very positive finding of the majority in the Miranda case, but I certainly wish you well.

If this office can be of assistance, please let us know.

Very truly yours,

CLYDE W. OSBORNE,

DISTRICT ATTORNEY GENERAL,
FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT OF TENNESSEE,
Memphis, Tenn., February 15, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Committee on Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Thank you very much for your letter of February 10 regarding your proposed legislation on the admissibility of voluntary confessions, wire tapping, and the outlawing of the Mafia and similar crime syndicates. It makes me feel a lot better, in fighting the day-to-day battle against crime, to know that we have someone of your stature and capabilities working to protect the law abiding people of this country, and the victims of crime.

I feel that it is most appropriate for the United States Congress to take the lead in passing this much needed legislation because, and I say this with no bitterness but in an objective manner, I feel there is no doubt but what some of our overzealous Federal courts have placed all law enforcement agencies and the public in the present sea of confusion in which we now find ourselves.

With regard to your proposed Federal bill on wire tapping, I am enclosing herewith a bill which I drafted in 1963, to present to the Tennessee State Legislature. I did present this bill but was not successful in getting it passed. I plan to again attempt during the 1967 Tennessee Legislature to get this same bill passed. I believe that the provisions of this bill which I drafted substantially meet the requirements set out in your proposed Federal legislation as far as allowing state law enforcement officials to wire tap. In any event, if the bill you are sponsoring is passed, we would on a local level scrupulously abide by the provisions of your act.

You will also note in the bill which I have drafted that it would be unlawful to eavesdrop by electronic and other devices. I put this provision in my bill because of the insidious nature of some of our present electronic devices, and the effect the use of such devices could have if used by unscrupulous and unauthorized persons.

If I can be of any further assistance to you in your efforts to get your bills passed, I would be most happy to do so.

Respectfully yours,

PHIL M. CANALE, Jr.,
District Attorney General.

DIVISION 2, CIRCUIT COURT,
Springfield, Mo., March 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have your letter of March 20th, together with copies of S. 674 and S. 675, together with excerpts of your remarks which you made to the Senate. I am heartily in accord with your thoughts in this matter.

We have been spending a great deal of time in Southwest Missouri with our law enforcement officers in an effort to try to help them understand the import of some of the recent Supreme Court decisions. I do not believe that the decisions have had any effect on the over-zealous or dishonest officer. In other words, the policeman who would subject a suspect to third degree methods in order to obtain a confession and who would then lie about it on the witness stand, will still lie under the present rules and will state that the suspect waived his rights when in reality he did not. On the other hand, the law abiding policeman, who in my opinion comprises the great majority of our officers today, has been handcuffed and hamstrung by these decisions to a point where he is confused, embittered, and despondent. In the last analysis, it is the duty of Congress to rectify the situation, and I applaud your efforts to date.

I would be glad to add my voice to other judges and prosecutors across the land who see in the present rulings a clear-cut danger to our society if you think my testimony would be useful. However, as our County has no budget for a trip of this magnitude and as I am unable to finance it at this time out of my personal funds, coupled with the fact that our Supreme Court discourages the appearance of judges before legislative bodies unless subpoenaed, I would not be able to come unless this procedure was followed.

Best wishes in your endeavor. I know you are on the right track.

Very truly yours,

DOUGLAS W. GREENE.

DIVISION 2, CIRCUIT COURT,
Springfield Mo., March 10, 1967.

Hon. JOHN MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have recently read, with great interest, your comments concerning your intention to hold hearings for the purpose of determining what legislation is necessary to correct the intolerable situation in law enforcement which has been caused by the Supreme Court of the United States by virtue of its interpretation of the meaning of the Fifth Amendment in recent decisions such as Miranda vs. Arizona.

I have been a practicing attorney for twenty years; I have been the Prosecuting Attorney of my home county, which contains over 150,000 people; and I have had considerable experience in the trial and defense of criminal cases. I am the senior Circuit Judge of this circuit and have been in office as judge more than six years. Felony convictions, which used to be almost routine in cases where confessions which had been voluntarily given were used in evidence, have become almost a thing of the past. Prosecutors today are reducing felony charges to misdemeanors to which defendants will plead in order to obtain a conviction at all. It would be funny if it wasn't so serious. As you know, most judges are effectively muzzled by Canons of Judicial Ethics which have been promulgated and adopted by Supreme Courts without even consulting the trial bench and which state, among other things, that a judge should not criticize or comment on the actions of judges. However, I do not believe such sanctions would have any force or effect in regards to testimony given under subpoena before your committee.

I urge you to make the broadest use of your subpoena power and to call witnesses from the police, prosecuting and district attorneys, and trial judges who are, through no fault of their own, castigated and criticized for the Supreme Courts action in this field so that your Committee and the Country can get a true picture of what is going on in the field of law enforcement in America today.

Although I have never met you personally, I have a very high regard for you by reason of the work you have done in the past in this very important phase of American life.

With best personal regards, I remain,

Very truly yours,

DOUGLAS W. GREENE, Judge.

CRIMINAL DISTRICT COURT,
PARISH OF ORLEANS, SECTION F,
New Orleans, La., March 17, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Having read in the attached article, "Fencing in Supreme Court" that you are Chairman of the Senate's subcommittee on criminals and judicial procedures, I am taking the liberty of enclosing a copy of reasons for Judgment which I rendered in a narcotics case wherein, under my oath and at considerable violence to my sense of justice, I maintained a defense motion to supress evidence.

May I ask Senator, that you take a couple of minutes from your day to read the enclosed opinion. You may use it in any way desired.

I am sending a copy of this letter to my Senators, Ellender and Long inasmuch as I have previously given them a copy of the opinion. I had the honor of being Senator Long's classmate at Louisiana State University Law School and I believe he feels basically the way we do.

I applaud you for your speech in the Senate wherein you are quoted as having stated:

"We must stop, and stop now, the release upon society of self-confessed, vicious criminals because of the trivial technicalities invoked in recent decisions which were vigorously denounced by the other four Justices as unsound and harmful to the administration of justice."

I trust that your efforts will prove fruitful and I hope that I may have the pleasure of meeting you in person.

Sincerely,

OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP,
Criminal District Judge.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT OF ALABAMA,
Montgomery, Ala., March 16, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I apologize for not answering your letters of November 24, 1966, and February 10, 1967, until this time but I do want to congratulate you and express my appreciation for the work you are doing in trying to help maintain law and order throughout the country.

In my opinion, the U.S. Supreme Court by its rulings in Giddeon, Escobedo, Mapp and Miranda are responsible in a large part for the increase in the crime rate. I say this because its decisions, and especially the Miranda decision, have lowered the morale of the law enforcement agencies and at the same time, have encouraged the criminal by letting him believe that he can get by with most anything.

In my circuit, after Miranda was handed down, the police adopted the attitude of "What's the use?" However, by schooling, lectures and instruction, I believe that we have changed their thinking and have showed them that there is still hope even though in many instances we cannot get a conviction because of the lack of a statement for the defendant. Most of the defendants, even though caught redhanded in the act, immediately ask for a lawyer and refuse to give any statement whatsoever.

The following cases are cited which may be of help in your work.

In the case of State vs. Wilson and Whitt, the defendants committed five armed robberies. Whitt confessed to all five charges but Wilson refused to make any statement whatsoever. Whitt stated that Wilson was with him and was the one who planned the crimes. In four cases, we were unable to corroborate the testimony of Whitt and so could not proceed against Wilson. However, we were able to corroborate Wilson's testimony in one case and succeeded in getting a conviction in that.

In State vs. Gunther and Stalker, both defendants were charged with robbery on October 11, 1962, in that they got in an automobile of a man who was waiting for his wife to finish teaching school, took him out in the country, severely beat him, robbed him and left him for dead. Stalker was arrested, tried and convicted a few months after the robbery took place. Gunther, being a juvenile, was certified to the Circuit Court for trial as being incorrigible, which decision he appealed to our State Court, thereby preventing us from trying him until the present time. Both defendants at the time of arrest talked freely about the robbery, going into the most minute details but, of course, were not warned in accordance with the Miranda decision. The victim is at this time not positive in his identification of Gunther and, of course, we cannot use his statement when we try him next month.

In State vs. Isom, the defendant killed a man and the patrol car arrived within two minutes after the shooting. Isom walked up to the patrolman with a pistol in his hand and the patrolman asked him "Did you do it?" Isom was convicted and he appealed to the State Court. Our Court of Appeals reversed the case, citing Miranda and we have now brought it to the State Supreme Court on certiorari. I cite this case to show the effect the Miranda decision has had on even State Appellate Judges. Sometimes it would appear that the lower federal courts as well as the state courts try to out do and get further out than the five judges on the U.S. Supreme Court.

In the case of State vs. Asberry, Floyd, Ivery and James, the defendants were charged with four burglaries. All defendants except Floyd gave statements which implicated Floyd, who demanded a lawyer and refused to make a statement. We were only able to corroborate the accomplices' statements in one case and so could not proceed against Floyd in the other three.

The decision worked to the disadvantage of the defendant in one case in which the defendant had killed her husband. There were no eye witnesses, the defendant called a lawyer and refused to make a statement. She waived preliminary hearing and was bound over to the Grand Jury. The day her case was to be presented to the Grand Jury, her lawyer talked to me and told her side of the story, which clearly proved self-defense. If she had told us this in the beginning, no case would ever have been made against her.

I have read the bills that you have introduced and believe that their passage will help the law abiding citizens of the nation and will go a long way towards maintaining law and order.

Sincerely yours,

D. W. CROSLAND.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
TENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I appreciate so much your letter of April 6, 1967, with enclosures, including excerpts from your very fine and forceful speech released January 25, 1967, on the urgent situation occasioned by the high rate of crime in this country. I have also read the enclosed proposed bills and hope it will be the pleasure of your Committee to approve same and for the Congress to enact them.

I appreciate very much your invitation to me to testify before your Committee regarding the desirability of this legislation, but regret that due to my heavy trial schedule I will be unable to do so.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely,

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
TENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT,
Richmond, March 10, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I was delighted to see that you recently stated for the news media your concern about the nations rising crime rate, partly due to the Supreme Court's decision rigidly limiting the admission of voluntary confessions.

After four years as Commonwealth's (Prosecuting) Attorney and ten years as Judge of this Circuit having criminal jurisdiction, I firmly believe that the Miranda Case and others have placed too many safeguards around the criminals to the point that innocent people are no longer properly protected.

I hope that you will continue to work for balancing the Scales of Justice in favor of innocent members of the public.

Respectfully yours,

EDMUND W. HENING, Jr., Judge.

RESOLUTION OF THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF VIRGINIA, ANNUAL MEETING, MAY 12, 1967.

Whereas, the President of the United States has expressed his concern over the increase in the rate of crime in this country; and

Whereas, various government agencies have likewise expressed the necessity for corrective measures to reduce criminal activity and for the prosecution of crime; and

Whereas, the recent 5 to 4 decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have substituted a limiting test for the admissibility of confessions into evidence in place of the long-standing and traditional test of the voluntariness of any such confessions; and

Whereas, among various bills introduced at the current session of the 90th Congress aimed at eradication of crime and the prosecution and punishment therefor, there are included several bills purporting to re-establish the test of "voluntariness" as the rule to govern the admissibility of confessions into evidence,

Now therefore, be it resolved by the 1967 Annual Meeting of The Judicial Conference of Virginia, this 12th day of May, 1967, as follows:

1. That Congress is hereby urged to enact Senate Bill 1194 and Senate Joint Resolution 22; and

2. That copies of this Resolution be sent to all members of Congress representing the Commonwealth of Virginia, and to all Senators whose names appear as co-patrons on the Foregoing Bill and Resolution.

CRIMINAL COURT, FIFTH CIRCUIT,
Cookeville, Tenn., March 7, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I was very much pleased to read a UPI Washington dispatch in last Sunday's Nashville Tennesseean that you plan to investigate some of the aspects of recent decisions of the Supreme Court, especially those which have "unduly restricted legitimate law enforcement practices."

I am sure that many people who are engaged in the administration of justice will look forward anxiously to some remedial legislation along this line.

In more than 30 years in the circuit and criminal courts of this Circuit, which is composed of 11 counties in the rural section of Middle Tennessee, I do not remember any instance where an innocent man has ever confessed that he was guilty of committing a crime.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN A. MITCHELL, Judge.

U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: As suggested by Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, a review of the experience of our corps of investigators was made on the above subject. The results thereof and comments follow.

In one area, five court hearings have been conducted under the Miranda ruling in what we refer to as the Rasmussen-type hearings in Minnesota whereby the activities of the officers regarding the securing of evidence and the taking of statements are scrutinized, and often thereafter they are thrown out before the case ever gets into court. In one of these cases, the original charge of auto theft was dismissed and an agreement was made to plead to a lesser offense of tampering with a motor vehicle brought about by the exclusion of some of the evidence.

Comments by one of our old and experienced investigators is as follows:

"Also it has been my experience that when called to a Rasmussen hearing, the defense attorney is not only concerned about the Miranda ruling, but is conducting a fishing expedition to determine how much evidence we have against the defendant, he will also imply that the suspect was interviewed, threatened, pressured and beaten, and then advised of his rights, and that a statement is then taken which the defense attorney claims was taken without the defendant understanding what his rights were.

"It is the opinions of some Juvenile Court judges in this area that juveniles cannot waive their rights unless their attorney is present."

In the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, one of our men was involved in seven cases where this type hearing was held. In one, a burglary, a defendant was dismissed, the facts therein being that an accomplice admitted his guilt and testified against the defendant. Our Laboratory expert testified in reference to ballistics, and the evidence suppression was granted on the basis, first, that there could have been a million to one chance of a ballistics duplication; and, also, the Probate Court which heard this matter held that the defendant's rights were violated because he was being implicated by an admitted accomplice.

One of the investigators remarked that there has even been an active move afoot to bring this type of hearing into Municipal Court so that the lower courts are being restricted in their ability to bind a case over to District Court, based on the fear of being overruled. Judges of the lower courts, upon receiving a move for suppression of evidence, both written and material evidence, are apt to go along with the defendant's request assuming the police were illegal in their actions.

Further comment by this investigator was the fact that due to the Miranda ruling, investigative techniques have been forced to change, and investigations are now definitely restricted to what witnesses say (if there are any witnesses) and physical evidence (if any is found). The Miranda ruling practically prohibits questioning and restricts police officers' activities in numerous ways.

In a recent case (within the past month) employees of the Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company were suspected of carrying out an amount of silver nitrate. In questioning employees for information, it was necessary to be very cautious and restricted in the presentation of questions because no suspects were developed until after a least 30 persons were questioned. The two who turned out to be definite suspects were questioned routinely, along with the others, and did not become definite suspects until later. This investigator said that in order to develop a case of this nature, in order to be within the scope of the Miranda ruling, he would have to warn each person he talked to before starting the interview. It is his opinion that this warning approach, if used in questioning everyone, would result in little, if any, cooperation. A willing witness frequently has taken the attitude that he doesn't want to get involved, that the police are only interested in pinning the crime on someone and, therefore, by the warning of Miranda, a willing witness will clam up, remain silent and be uncooperative. Miranda prohibits interviewing that in the past has allowed one to fill in the vacant or void areas. This investigator felt that also this encouraged the allowing of immunity for one individual in exchange for his testimony against others, thereby allowing him to go free. As in the one case mentioned above, this might not work either, since in the case mentioned the court held that the defendant's rights were violated because he was implicated by an accomplice.

This investigator said he had heard two defense lawyers recently comment about their clients written admissions in such a way that when these hearings take place, motions to suppress would be granted because confessions are becoming a thing of the past and not admissible unless the defendant's lawyers are present at the time the statement or confession is taken. This investigator felt that when questioning has to be restricted, guarded, and not of a probing nature for fear of assuming an accusatory nature prematurely, one can easily recognize that Miranda is restricting police investigations. The Miranda case fails to provide a time lapse needed by police officers to cover situations that might arise, an example of which is that when an arrest is made and other circumstances arise of an emergency nature such as a search of the premises or the observance of another suspect in the area that requires attention, either way the officer acts is wrong.

A case arose in the last year under similar circumstances where a man called the sheriff up by telephone. The sheriff answered in a routine manner, and the man making the call said he had shot and killed his neighbor. While this case did not come up for hearing because the man was committed to a mental institution, it was thought that possibly under the Miranda case this man might have exonerated himself by virtue of his confession before receiving any warning. It is my belief, however, that such a confession would be upheld, but I can easily see that under the present trend it might not be.

Another investigator ran into this situation in a case known as State of Minnesota vs. Anton Olson. The matter involved the shooting and killing of two police officers in Morrison County, Minnesota. The hearing was held in Ramsey County as a result of change of venue requested by the defense attorney. District Judge Marsden in this case ruled inadmissible a statement of admission made by the defendant. In addition, the sawed-off shotgun allegedly used in the shooting was ruled out as evidence, although the gun was located in the Mississippi River on information supplied by the defendant. The judge applied the Miranda ruling in this case. The offense occurred before the Miranda decision was delivered, and the ruling of Judge Marsden occurred in August 1966. In this case, the State, in order to obtain a confession, changed the two first degree murder charges to murder in the third degree. I might add in this connection that the statement taken from Olson in this case was after all warnings were given except that the State would furnish an attorney if he could not afford one. In this case, the defendant was a farmer with all the usual resources, tractors, machinery, barn, house and crops, and the belief he had funds for legal services seemed most reasonable. In this case the defendant had come into the police station and said he killed an officer before anyone had even asked him a question, and on this basis he was not released. This was the only saving feature and, had this man been released, I feel sure some vigilante action would have been taken, and I feel that will come to pass in the future unless the trend is reversed.

I am enclosing articles from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of August 4 and August 5, 1966 commenting on Judge Marsden's rulings, which I feel you will find interesting.

We have another case in this area at Hibbing, Minnesota in April or May 1966 where one Ronald Keiser was charged with stabbing a girl to death. He gave a signed statement admitting this, and later demanded a hearing which was held before the Supreme Court, and the confession was thrown out. This caused a tremendous furor in that part of the country. I do not have complete details in my possession, but perhaps Powell Majerle, Chief of Police, Hibbing, Minnesota, who is also an IACP member, will furnish the facts in this case.

I am enclosing comments in the St. Paul Dispatch of Thursday, March 2, 1967 of William B. Randall who is Vice President of the National District Attorneys Association, and former President of the Minnesota County Attorneys Association.

We find that the hearings resulting from recent Supreme Court decisions are most time consuming. Most every such case takes from one to three days, and we had one take five days. Even our Laboratory personnel have been called in several times, thus disrupting their work on other matters. With these one or two hearings in each case, plus the actual trial, if it gets that far, the police officer finds much of his time thereby taken up. Police departments are almost universally handicapped by a shortage of personnel, and these present procedures only add to the problem.

Furthermore, the tendency today of the courts seems to be to over-emphasize the right of the criminal at the expense of the rights of the public or the individual or the victim of the crime.

Sincerely yours,

ROY T. NOONAN, Superintendent.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In reply to your letter of February 10, 1967, concerning various bills presently before the Senate, I submit the following:

Bill S. 674—The bill as written is workable and acceptable. The only suggestion I would make is that some thought be given to that portion of the Miranda decision dealing with exculpatory or inculpatory statements. Perhaps some word should be inserted so that if an accused makes an exculpatory statement, which later turns out to be false, this false exculpatory statement could be used to impeach the accused.

Bill S. 678—I would suggest a change on page 4, line 15, after the words "dedicated to" insert "violate criminal laws of the United States or any State, or commit unlawful acts" etc.

Bill S. 675—This bill is acceptable in its present form.

You recognize, of course, that Bill S. 678 does not generally apply to state law enforcement.

I feel that if the three Bills you have suggested were passed they would provide additional necessary armament for law enforcement.

I have been a member of the Prosecuting Attorney's staff for twenty years, and during that twenty years this office has enjoyed an excellent reputation in the community for its manner of administering justice. It is difficult for me to understand why so many people (many in high office) seem to fear law enforcement and that which it represents. This statement applies to those in the legislative branch of government. They seem to be apprehensive and unsure of those of us who are not seeking to harm or hurt anyone, but trying to protect society from those who would abuse society. It seems to me this theme must be sold.

I wish you a great deal of success in the handling of these important pieces of legislation.

Yours very truly,

MELVIN G. RUEGER,
Prosecuting Attorney.

OFFICE OF THE MARICOPA COUNTY ATTORNEY,
Phoenix, Ariz., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U. S. Senator,
Chairman, Committee of the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I apologize for having taken so long to answer your letter of Februry 1, 1967, concerning Senate Bills 674, 675 and 678. Thank you for sending them.

The reason for the delay; I was re-trying the Ernesto A. Miranda case for the crimes of Rape and Kidnapping. As you probably know by now, we were successful through the use of his confession to a lay person. Without the confession Mr. Miranda would be a free man on these charges, since this was the only evidence we had to convict on. Even the Judge trying the case stated, after it was over, that he would have had to direct a verdict of acquittal if we had not had this confession. We were lucky to find out that he had made the confession since, as I previously stated, without it we had nothing. Of course his attorney intends to appeal to the Supreme Court on the basis that since the first confession (to the police) was no good, neither was this one.

After reading the three Bills you plan to introduce, I can only say I found all three excellent and sincerely hope they will be enacted into Law. I have read where a wiretap bill may be introduced limiting its use to the scope of national security. I think this is too much of a limitation.

I believe as your Bill states, that wire tapping should be allowed at all times when a judge has heard the evidence and has determined there is probable cause for said wire tapping. We need everything we can get to search out the criminal and obtain evidence to convict him. I believe your Wiretap Bill goes to this end.

The Mafia Bill would also be a big step forward in the elimination of organized crime in the United States.

I want to thank you very much for asking my views. I hope they will be helpful to you and that you will be successful in getting the Bills passed during the present session of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT K. CORBIN,
County Attorney, Maricopa County.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
Subcommittee on the Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: This will acknowledge receipt and thank you for your letter of February 10, 1967 enclosing a copy of Senate Bill 674.

A return to the rule of "Totality of Circumstances" in determining the admissibility of confessions is conceded by experienced prosecutors to be the proper answer. Such, as we understand, is the purpose of Senate Bill 674. The awesome examples of miscarriage of justice contained in the copy of your "Excerpts" are decidedly verified in the courts here in Louisville, Kentucky.

The only objection to your Bill, as we see it, is constitutionality. The constitutional concepts proscribed by Miranda apparently will not be changed by the present Court. Would not a direct attack by Constitutional Amendment be more expedient and certain? We believe the entire country would back you on such a proposal.

If your aides have prepared memorandums on the constitutionality of proposed Senate Bill 674, we would greatly appreciate a copy of same.

Respectfully,

EDWIN A. SCHOERING, Jr.,
Commonwealth's Attorney.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I received your letter of February 10 with the enclosures. Let me congratulate you on your address you gave before the Senate on the crime situation.

The bills you enclose will certainly help law enforcement. I find no fault with them. If there should be a fault, it would be that they are not strong enough in favor of law enforcement. However, I fully realize that the thinking nowadays of Legislatures and Congress it would be difficult to get through that which aids law enforcement to any great extent.

I sincerely hope that Congress appropriates the three hundred and fifty million dollars to aid law enforcement and there will be enough members of Congress who will insist that the money do just that and not let it be just another deal where the government spends the money to, in effect, bribe and beg people not to break the law.

Under the guise of spending the money to prevent crime it seems that the ten million dollars heretofore appropriated and placed in the hands of a Department of Justice official was being used not to aid local law enforcement in the least. It seems that they wanted a program that was "imaginative" and unusual to prevent crime and that they specifically told us that it could not be used for any ongoing activities of law enforcement. What the local police needs is up to date equipment, more policemen, and better pay. I know of nothing that will prevent crime better than to have enough patrol cars to properly patrol the areas where crime flourishes. Oklahoma City is like a lot of other cities that cannot hire even the quota of police allowed. This because of the low pay and the ridicule which policemen are subjected to constantly.

I am unalterably convinced that the best deterrent to crime is sure swift detection and prosecution with sure, swift, adequate punishment.

Respectfully,

CURTIS P. HARRIS,

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Thank you very much for your letter and enclosures of February 10, 1967.

I am heartily in accord with your remarks in the United States Senate and with your views of the very real need for legislation such as proposed by Senate Bills 674, 675, and 678, as well as legislation which will deny Federal courts, including the Supreme Court, jurisdiction to reverse judgments of convictions in State courts which are based in whole or in part upon confessions voluntarily given.

You and the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures and the Committee on the Judiciary are performing a truly great service to our country and to the law-abiding citizens by your efforts to provide the weapons and the means by which law enforcement can carry out its duty of protecting our people and combatting the tremendous menace of crime rampant across the nation.

You have my every wish and prayer for complete success in your legislative program.

Thank you for requesting my views.

Sincerely,

JAMES DON KELLER,
District Attorney.

STATEMENT OF FRED E. INBAU, PROFESSOR OF LAW, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

S. 675—FEDERAL WIRE INTERCEPTION ACT

Wiretapping is an indispensable investigation technique for many types of serious crimes and particularly those involving organized or syndicated criminals. It should be legally authorized although, to be sure, only upon court controlled conditions.

S. 675 is a commendable step in this direction but in my opinion it does not encompass a sufficient number of criminal activities. Wiretapping should be allowable in the investigation of any offense as long as its usage is subject to the types of controls set forth in S. 675. Some critics of wiretapping practices allow only for its use in national security cases; what these critics overlook, it seems to me, is that we are faced with a great internal threat to our security and particularly from organized, syndicated crime. To bar wiretapping except in national security matters is to ignore the threat posed by society's internal enemies.

Rather than repeat much of what has already been presented to you and your colleagues I would like to endorse wholeheartedly the statement of the Honorable J. Edward Lumbard, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit presented before your Committee on March 8, 1967. Among his various recommendations was one that Congress authorize appeals by the Government from Court orders suppressing wiretap evidence once a bill, such as S. 675, has been enacted. Here in Illinois our experience has been that the authorization of prosecution appeals from pre-trial orders suppressing evidence has had a very salutary effect. Although we have not had experience with wiretap suppression orders, since wiretapping is not permissible in this jurisdiction, a similar salutary effect would prevail with respect to wiretap situations.

S. 674—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE OF CONFESSIONS

I am in thorough sympathy with the objectives of this bill and hope Congress will enact it although much doubt remains as to its constitutionality in view of the Supreme Court's decision in Miranda vs. Arizona. If enacted into law S. 674 would at least afford an opportunity for the Supreme Court reconsideration of its 5 to 4 decision in the Miranda case. It is not inconceivable that a change in the composition of the Court in the next few years may result in a reexamination of the Miranda doctrine and perhaps in an overruling of that decision—just as Miranda itself overruled the earlier decisions in Crooker and Cicenia.

S. 1194—JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT CONFESSION CASES

I do not favor this Bill because I think there should be Appellate Court review in confession cases. The principal objective underlying this Bill (an avoidance of such decisions as Miranda) may well be accomplishd by the Senate's insistence upon future Supreme Court appointments from the ranks of Federal Estate Court Judges who have in their prior decisions and opinions evidenced a viewpoint of moderation with respect to the confession issue as well as other issues in the criminal law area.

S.J. 22—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT REGARDING CONFESSIONS

As already indicated, I favor the voluntary test of confession admissibility but I do not approve of the restriction contained in S.J. Res. 22 regarding Appellate Court review.

Another constitutional amendment that should be given serious consideration is one proposed by Illinois Supreme Court Judge Walter V. Schaefer which would permit comment at the trial upon the accused's failure to submit to a pre-trial judicial investigating officer's interrogation into the accusation. This proposal is set forth in a recent book by Judge Schaefer entitled "The Suspect and Society" published by Northwestern University Press, Evanston, Illinois.

If constitutional amendments are sought to correct the present confession situation, I think consideration should be given at the same time to the abolition of the present exclusionary rule with respect to improperly obtained physical evidence.

In view of all the efforts that will be exerted in the near future by way of the training and improvement of the police, we should be able to control improper police procedures other than by the currently favored method of turning guilty persons loose in order to teach the police a lesson. It just simply does not make sense to me that we should be spending the millions of dollars required to rehabilitate drug addicts while at the same time turning loose drug peddlers selling or possessing narcotics because a court finds that the police acted improperly in seizing the evidence. If a complete abolition of the exclusionary rule may be unobtainable we could at least hope for a modification of it along the lines developed by the State of Michigan in its constitutional conventions. In Michigan the exclusionary rule applies in general principle but exceptions are made in cases where narcotics or dangerous weapons are seized on a person outside of his home.

Perhaps what I am suggesting in these present comments is that consideration be given in constitutional convention to several of these basic fundamental constitutional road blocks now confronting the police of this country.

[From the Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science]

THE NEXT SUPREME COURT APPOINTMENT

Several commissions have been appointed by the President of the United States to make studies and recommendations regarding the crime problem. At the President's urging, substantial federal funds have been appropriated to improve enforcement and diminish the causes of crime.

As commendable as these measures are, there remains another necessary Presidential step to be taken, when the occasion arises, and that is with respect to the next vacancy, or vacancies, on the Supreme Court of the United States. At least one such vacancy, due to resignation, is expected in the very near future.

To replace any one of the present members of the Court—and particularly one of the "conservatives"—with someone who is an adherent of the ultra-liberal philosophy currently embraced by some of the Justices would be a grave mistake.

The next appointee to the Supreme Court—and, indeed, any future appointee—should be an able, experienced federal or state court judge who, by his judicial decisions and opinions, has evidenced a viewpoint of moderation with respect to the issue of individual civil liberties and public safety.

Although a judge's prior decisions and opinions constitute no guarantee against future deviations, they do afford a rational basis for selection.

A selection from within the Judiciary itself would serve as an inspiration to the Bench at large. It would also enhance the stature of the Court.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SIXTH CIRCUIT, Detroit, Mich., May 12, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: As a member of the Michigan Crime Commission, I have served with the Honorable John B. Martin as a member of the Committee on Organized Crime of that Commission.

Our committee has had occasion to consider the problem of legislative action in the field of electronic surveillance and has had occasion to review the statement previously made to your Committee by Mr. Martin.

Both as an appellate court judge and as a former Police Commissioner, I believe that federal legislation prohibiting wiretapping and eavesdropping is a must. There should, in my judgment, be no general exemptions, even for law enforcement, except when based on search warrants issued in a court of law. Such search warrants should issue only on probable cause and should be required to be specific as to time, place, object and method of search. They should, in my opinion, be restricted to crimes against national security, kidnapping, murder, and the most important activities of organized crime.

Over and above this brief comment, I associate myself generally with the careful statement on this problem previously made to your Committee by Mr. Martin.

Trusting this will be of assistance in your Committee's deliberations, I am

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE EDWARDS.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Member of Congress, Chairman, Legal and Monetary Affairs Subcommittee, House Judiciary Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: We wish to join other Judges, District Attorneys, Law Enforcement Officers and Law Abiding Citizens in expressing our disapproval of the Mapp, Gideon, Escobedo, Miranda and other recent Supreme Court decisions destroying our criminal laws. We also disapprove of the Supreme Court amending our Constitution as they have done on many occasions in recent years. Frankly, we believe it is past time for Congress to do something about these things.

Unless something is done to nullify the effect of recent Supreme Court decisions crime will continue to increase regardless of what else is done. The President's proposed crime prevention program is only a waste of billions of dollars and giving him more absolute control of our state and local affairs.

Your kind and prompt attention to these serious matters is urged because of the great importance to all of us.

Respectfully yours,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Thank you very much for your letter of February 10, 1967, supplementing your Miranda decision letter.

The Wichita Police Department has done a considerable amount of work looking towards supplying the information requested in the last letter, and on behalf of law enforcement in this community may I please state that we appreciate what you are doing to attempt to pass legislation which will effectively combat the growing law enforcement problem which we are facing.

I am most interested in your Bill No. S. 674 as it will have a derivative value to us if passed, because it will be directly calling to the court's attention the fact that the Congress of the United States is not content to have law enforcement completely hamstrung.

Thank you very much and you may be sure we are assemblying the data and we will give you further information such as we have at our disposal after having examined the contents of your latest communication.

Yours truly,

OFFICE OF THE COUNTY ATTORNEY,
Wichita, Kans., April 20, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Enclosed is a copy of a letter from our Wichita Police Chief which is an analysis of a number of matters which have occurred within our department since the Miranda ruling. It appears to me that one of the most serious problems created is the uncertainty where certainty should exist. This permeates law enforcement and it has percolated into the District Courts in the uncertainty as to the application of what heretofore had been considered settled rules of law.

I do not believe that all of this springs from the Miranda case by any means. I believe it is the general upheaval and reevaluation in the field of criminal law. I sincerely believe that the most cogent reasoning which could be brought to bear on this problem consists in the opinions of the learned Justices who dissented.

It is not my function as a lawyer to criticize the courts. It is my function as a lawyer to apply the decisions of the courts without reservation or purpose of evasion. However, candor compels me to say that our observation thus far is that preparation and prosecution has been made substantially more difficult and that imbalance exists wherever any rule is enacted which prevents the search for the truth by civilized means. Equally serious problems with the new confession rule are the derivative evidence rule and the poison fruits dilemma presented to the officers every time they must make a decision as to whether to proceed with interviews of persons who may have been involved in the commission of crimes.

Thank you for writing and I am sorry that your answer has been so long in forthcoming, but as you are well aware, everybody connected with law enforcement has had substantially increased duties to perform without a requisite increase in persons with whom to accomplish these new duties. I appreciate receiving the letters on these important matters to law enforcement.

Sincerely yours,

KEITH SANBORN,
County Attorney of Sedgwick County, Kans.

THE CITY OF WICHITA,
POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Wichita, Kans., March 30, 1967.

Mr. KEITH SANBORN,
County Attorney, Sedgwick County,
Care of Sedgwick County Courthouse, Wichita, Kans.

DEAR MR. SANBORN: Your interest in the controversy about the effects of Supreme Court rulings on law enforcement processes is very encouraging. Those of us in the police field are seriously affected by the resulting chain reactions. These have developed in all Courts as a result of Judges being so concerned that their decisions may be over-turned by higher Courts. We are struggling to find some hope to the solution of this dilemma.

There follows a few typical cases in point. These case histories were submitted by Detectives.

1. In April, 1966, a defendant shot and killed a man and shot his wife twice in an attempt to kill her. Officers arrived moments after the offense had occurred. The gun was turned over to the officers. The man at this time was advised in detail of his rights by more than one officer, including the Station Captain. The defendant waived his rights at that time and told the officers about the incident. Within 2½ hours of the time of the incident, he had given detectives a one hour detailed statement of events, his plans, his preparation, his thoughts and as to the time he made the decision to do what he had done. The planning was quite detailed, as were all of his actions quite detailed. The detectives prior to talking with the defendant again advised him in detail of his rights and to the use of the telephone. He declined use of the phone and waived all rights. The defendant was intelligent and wanted to talk. As a result of the statement, he waived rights of search by signing waiver of search forms for his automobile and his residence. Evidence was obtained as a result of these searches. The case was reviewed by higher echelon, along with members of the County Attorney's staff, and it was believed it was an excellent first degree murder charge along with an attempt first degree murder charge, predominately on the basis of the man's statement concerning his plans, premeditation and attempt and actions. Defendant was charged first degree murder and attempt first degree murder. The day before the case was tried in preliminary court, the Miranda decision was handed down. After hours of deliberation the court decided that although we had met all of the standards necessary at the time of the incident for admitting the tape into evidence into this case, that it now no longer met the standards required under Miranda. The reason being we had not informed him if he could not hire an attorney one would be furnished for him. As the result of the confession not being admitted into evidence, it was decided that the waivers of search which had been signed were not admissible. Therefore, all of the evidence obtained as result of the confession and as result of the waivers of search was not admissible. The end result was that a case which appeared to be a good first degree murder, first degree attempt murder charge, was that the jury came back with the decision of third degree manslaughter and attempt third degree manslaughter.

2. There were several robbery-assaults, predominately in the downtown area. The victims of these assaults were drunks who were unable to furnish us with much information or make any identification. Information was eventually developed that there was about twelve juveniles ranging from age 16 to 17 involved in these robbery-assaults. The information was not suitable for the obtaining of a warrant. Normal procedure would have been to bring these young juveniles in and talk to them, confront one with the other in an attempt to build a case for prosecution. The Miranda decision has defined this practice as coercion. We realized that due to the age of the juveniles and the type crime, that if we could build a case it would undoubtedly or most likely be referred to the District Court and therefore Miranda would apply. It was decided to go ahead and round up the juveniles rather than wait to build a case for fear that if they continued someone could be badly hurt. These juveniles were rounded up. We did apply Miranda. Due to no identification and lack of evidence, we were able to charge only one as a delinquent, getting him referred to the District Court. The others were charged as miscreants and turned over to the Juvenile Court. The significance of this particular investigation is that although our information was proved to be good, Miranda prevented us from properly investigating the case. Time element made it necessary to get these young juveniles stopped before somebody got hurt. Therefore, instead of being able to build first degree robbery charges on more than one, we had no choice but to take them out of circulation and let them know that we knew what they were doing and charge them as miscreants as above stated. It might be added that some of the County Attorney's Staff was contacted before the above action was taken and concurred that this was the best procedure to use in this particular case due mainly to the restrictions of the Miranda decision.

3. Under H–97848 one Kenneth R. McKibben was charged along with four other co-defendants on second degree burglary and grand larceny. At the time of the complaint and warrant being drawn, McKibben was serving a sentence on a different charge in KSIR. Prior to Miranda and Escobedo the four co-defendants were tried and received sentences. However, due to McKibbens' incarceration, he did not become available for trial on this case until after the two above Supreme Court decisions. One of the most important items of evidence was a written confession taken from McKibben prior to Miranda, which contained all the admonitions except the appointment of counsel for indigents. Therefore, when this case came to trial after Miranda, it was discovered that the confession taken prior did not meet the qualifications of the new policy. This case was dismissed without trial and the man went free.

4. Just recently in the series of high school and junior high school burglaries which have occurred the latter two months of 1966 and the first month of 1967, four juveniles were apprehended in one school. As a result of questioning the four juveniles we were able to get the name of two adults who had been involved with them, in most of the school burglaries where vaults were entered. We were able to secure search warrants for houses and automobiles belonging to the two adult suspects and were successful in obtaining enough evidence against one of the adults to charge him with one or more of the burglaries. However, the second adult suspect who we have reasonable grounds to believe in talking with the 17 year old juvenile and the 22 year old adult defendant, is totally involved with these subjects in all the burglaries where safes and vaults were entered in the city as well as Sedgwick County. However, on reading the Miranda warning to this one adult suspect, he immediately stated that he did not want to talk further about the matter and wanted to talk with his attorney, and with the interview ending there we have been unsuccessful in building a solid burglary case against him although on 1-24-67 a warrant was issued by the County Attorney's office charging him with one burglary of a high school in the county and we think that we might be able to get one or more warrants on burglaries in schools in the city, however, we have some question as to whether these cases will ever get through Court of Common Pleas and this defendant will be bound over to District Court. This is a good example, however, had we not been confronted with the Miranda decision, the 17 year old juvenile and the 22 year old defendant were both willing to repeat their stories in the presence of this second adult defendant or suspect and no doubt would have admitted his involvement when he realized that these individuals had told their portion of participating in all of these burglaries which may amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of 25 to 30 cases.

5. On January 4, 1967 Sgt. Mead had occasion to run a polygraph test on Paul D. Wood, 19wm, in connection with application for employment. On this test the question was asked if Mr. Wood had ever stolen anything. At this time Sgt. Mead received a reaction on his machine. At the conclusion of the running of this test and upon reviewing the chart with Mr. Wood, he admitted to Sgt. Mead several thefts which he was involved in. Due to the fact that Mr. Wood was not in the Police Station being questioned in connection with any crimes, he had not been advised of the Miranda warning and because of this and because of the fact that he admitted these thefts to Sgt. Mead without this warning, there was no prosecution concerning these thefts since it was a voluntary thing on this man's part and he had not been advised of his rights.

6. Under J-19419 Harry D. McClain, 24cm, was charged with forgery and uttering, along with a Frank M. Brown, 35cm. McClain admitted this crime but Brown would not, therefore the two defendants were placed together and after McClain told his story Brown stated he was also involved. He admitted writing this check for McClain to cash and received $20.00 for his share. The case originated before the new rulings; however, they were in effect at the time we went to trial and the judge dismissed the case on Brown because of using one defendant against the other to secure the confession.

7. No doubt the Miranda warning has also affected the investigation results under the Crestview Bowl, J-32943, Oklahoma Tire & Supply, J-50291, Pickering Sales, J-50290 and Wolf Retail Liquor Store, J-48808, because after reading the warning to them, the defendants under all of these cases refused to talk to me at all. In all, six subjects were charged under these cases; however, in the burglary of the Wolf Retail Liquor Store, although three subjects have been bound over in the Court of Common Pleas, we have never recovered the safe hauled out in this case because not any one of the three defendants will discuss the case with me.

The following remarks made by Detective Sergeant:

"In addition to these instances pointed out by the detectives previously mentioned, some of the things that I would like to relate as far as to how the Miranda and Escobedo Decisions have affected law enforcement by this Department are as follows:

At the present time there is no provision for providing an attorney or attorney fees until such time as the defendant has been formally charged and arraigned in the Court of Common Pleas. After reading that portion of the Miranda warning, "if you cannot hire a lawyer the Court will appoint one for you", following the previous warning, "you have the right to talk to a lawyer and have him present with you while you are being questioned", and then followed up with the admonition about the Court appointing one in the event the suspect is without funds to hire a lawyer, they then want an attorney present for the questioning. There is no provision for this, nor funds or provision for having one appointed prior to the formal arraignment of the suspect or defendant.

The widespread publicity on the Miranda Decision has resulted in many of those individuals even presently in the juvenile age groups that they can quote you the Miranda warning almost verbatim. Recently a 16 year old was picked up who had never been in trouble and the first thing he stated was that he would not say anything until he had an attorney and that we had to provide him one and have one present while he was being questioned and that when he wasn't able to pay for an attorney, one would have to be appointed for him.

Another fact where Miranda has definitely hampered clearances of cases and building a case against another defendant, is that previous to Miranda we were able to confront a co-defendant with the oral statement of one, and in many instances obtain an oral statement, as well as a written and taped statement, from the second defendant or even a third or fourth. And as a result of this we could pyramid the cases and many more cases were cleared and many more defendants were named in warrants along with the defendant who gave the first statement. It is now ruled in Miranda that the second defendant's statement is not considered voluntary.

I feel that there are a lot of inequities in the justice now being meted out inasmuch as we have one defendant who wants to clear his conscience in regards to his wrong-doings, but he is the only one then that is charged as having a conscience and wanting to get these things off his chest and will go ahead and talk even though he's being given the Miranda warning. I feel these are definitely inequities and double standards as far as this Miranda Decision is concerned."

A Detective Captain says:

"Many times in the past months we have been called upon to describe how the Miranda decision is affecting us in law enforcement. We are only able to cite a few instances where there has been a direct bearing; however, the cause and effects of this decision are much deeper and more expanded than we are able to prove. My reason for saying this is due to the way we in law enforcement have always operated in the past on information. In this day and age, information is becoming worthless to us as we are unable to use this without physical evidence to back it up. I will try to outline an example for you as to what I mean.

A few years back if we would pick up John Brown on burglary charges and he would give us a full statement admitting burglaries that he was involved in and then would tell us that on so many of these burglaries a Robert Smith was with him, we could then pick up Robert Smith, confront him with Mr. Brown's testimony in the presence of all parties, and then could take a statement from him in regard to his activities. This would be in those days a free and voluntary statement and admissible in Court. Then this system would work with him, telling us the ones he was involved in and would also pyramid on to other people who were with him on other burglaries. Therefore, you can see we would be able to clear an unknown number of burglaries. Therefore we cannot say the Miranda Decision has kept us from clearing 10 burglaries or 100 burglaries a month as it is an unknown number.

We are told that we cannot use one person against another to force a statement as this takes the statement out of the realm of free and voluntary. We have lost one felony case in Court on this exact operation.

I hope this report clarifies to you why I say we cannot measure the damage that the Miranda Decision has done in law enforcement.

As you can see, the new rulings do have very serious effects on the success in our work in crime control. After recent conferences in Honolulu with the American Academy of Forensic Science and in Chicago with the First National Symposium on Law Enforcement, Science and Technology, sponsored by the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance, U.S. Department of Justice, we are firmly convinced science alone cannot ever fill the gap. Science in based on truth and fact. We would that all Courts could base judicial proceedings on truth and fact of guilt or innocence rather than imaginary violations of criminals rights.

The theory that crime can be controlled by spending fantastic amounts of tax payers money to enlarge, train, and better equip Police Departments is very unrealistic. The facts are that no Police Department can possibly have not been seriously affected in obtaining confessions. Consequently it is obvious that additional police alone is not the answer, as long as the Courts will not admit reasonable and proper confessions or statements.

Doctor Kenneth McFarland of Topeka, Kansas, has developed a very realistic plan for law enforcement. A brochure of his statements on this subject is enclosed. We agree one hundred per cent with his point of view. If sufficient number of Americans could understand the truth of the matter as presented by Dr. McFarland the dilemma would be well on the way to elimination.

Thank you once again for your serious interest.

Respectfully,

E. M. POND,
Chief of Police.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Trenton, May 10, 1967.

Hon. JOHN J. MCCLELLAN,
New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is my sincere belief that S. 917, "The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967," is one of the most important measures before this session of the United States Congress.

As you are aware, the National Crime Commission depicted in great detail the needs of law enforcement and correctional agencies at the State and local levels. Attorney General Arthur J. Sills and Commissoner of Institutions and Agencies, Dr. Lloyd W. McCorkle, have impressed upon me the need for extensive federal financial aid if the many progressive programs they, and others in their fields, consider essential are to be realized. Advanced facilities for the treatment of offenders, the establishment of regional police training schools, and the creation of a statewide communications network are but a few of the more significant advances which we anticipate as a result of increased federal aid.

On behalf of all law enforcement and correctional officials, and indeed the people of this State, I am appealing to you to lend your wholehearted support to the enactment of "The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967."

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD J. HUGHES,
Governor.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS,
TWELFTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Dauphin County, Pa., May 19, 1967.

Hon. JOHN J. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, U.S. Senate Judiciary Subcommittee,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have your letter concerning my Law Day address before the Harrisburg Rotary and other service Clubs with the Dauphin County Bar Association. Due to the pressure of my work, I was unable to reduce my address to writing. Nevertheless, I appreciate your inquiry.

I read recently a statement in the press attributed to Attorney General Clark that a check of some 2,000 cases in New York City revealed that only twenty suspects requested a lawyer after having received the Miranda warning at incustody proceedings in the Police Station. I do not recall that any explanation was given as to the method employed to arrive at these statistics which are almost, if not altogether, incredible.

If you have any background material as to the method by which these statistics were obtained, I certainly will be glad to learn of it. Even if they are reliable, which I doubt very much, there is still an urgent need for the passage of Senate Bill No. 674. As long as the MIRANDA doctrine remains as the last word of the Supreme Court, a most formidable stumbling block to law enforcement still exists.

Last evening Mrs. Kreider and I attended a small dinner party at which some Harrisburg business men and their wives were present. All expressed amazement and anguish in regard to recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions. The ladies, though not conversant with the tortuous process of reasoning by which these decisions were reached, feel very keenly that the safety of their persons and property has been endangered thereby. In fact, this was the topic of conversation which interested them the most. I find, as I am sure you do, that this sentiment prevails in all walks of life. All present expressed their admiration for the valiant struggle you and your fellow committee members are making for the safety of all of us.

Kind regards.

Sincerely,

HOMER L. KREIDER,
President Judge.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
BOARD OF PAROLE,
Harrisburg, May 17, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Replying to your letter of May 11, 1967, in reference to Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association Bulletin and soliciting my views on Senate Bills 674, 675 and 917, I herewith submit my views.

I have devoted thirty-five (35) years in my chosen profession, Prisons, Probation and Parole. This service started as a guard, advancing to Warden. It covers a ten (10) year tour of duty in post-war Germany as Chief of Prisons and Parole (German) and directing the parole system for war criminals. I have been in my native State (Pennsylvania) directing the State parole system, since 1956.

During this period of service, I have interviewed and interrogated well over 100,000 individuals who were convicted by duly established Courts. Although the general philosophy of a criminal (recidivist) is that they want to believe everyone is doing the same thing they were convicted of, but they were not apprehended. To this end, they consider themselves unlucky that they were caught. A recent parole applicant, convicted of larceny (shoplifting) had only one complaint. He felt unlucky that he was caught and convicted once for an average of fifty such criminal acts and bemoaned the fact that his mentor was convicted only once in five hundred shoplifting acts.

His criminal history indicated a thirty-year pattern of shoplifting, during which period he maintained a respectable family life in his community, in which his wife and children maintained a comfortable existence all on funds derived from his pattern of criminal acts—shoplifting. This is an exceptional case, but many others fall into this pattern to a lesser degree.

This fits the parisitic criminal. However, the murderer or even the rapist, when apprehended, is relieved of inner emotions and will, at this time, volunteer a confession. This confession is highly important, in that in both rape and murder, usually only two (2) persons are present; the offender and the victim. Unless there are methods to learn the facts, details are available only when the accused offender reveals it. Confessions are not unusual. Religious training by many denominations encourages confessions, even for simple or minor acts against religious vows and principles. Why should a confession of a criminal act be treated otherwise?

Senate Bill 674 is necessary, if for no other reason, to permit the accused a chance to express his remorse. In many cases, this is a mental relief. The Bill incorporates sufficient safeguards to keep confessing voluntary. Without the use of voluntary confessions, we are indirectly encouraging criminal acts and the offender never fully realizes he did any wrong.

I have never experienced a true rehabilitation of the offender, without the offender realizing the motivation for his acts and with some remorse in his makeup. The Alcoholic Anonymous Program is successful because the first step in AA is to acknowledge the alcoholic addiction, i.e., "I am an alcoholic."

Some of our present programs for rechanging the criminal are based on excuses for his or her acts. This the criminal absorbs like a duck to water, fits his ego and his thinking. There is no excuse for crime or criminals. There is motivation for their acts. We know that there are parents unworthy of that label. Also, poor economic conditions, but that is no excuse for committing crime. I was born at a time when my folks were struggling economically, but crime was not our way of solving our hardships.

The use of electronic devices are available to the criminal and certainly the police should not have the restriction for their use. In Pennsylvania, we have a gun law—no one is permitted to carry a side arm without a special permit. The law's restrictions have no effect on those who are engaged in crime. They get them and they use them. Why then, restrict law enforcement?

I am familiar with the contents in Senate Bill 917. This, I believe, is a step in the right direction. States and urban areas with major crime problems cannot finance the type of crime controls necessary for an effective program. In the past, our State and local crime control budgets increased by an average of five percent (5%) annually. This did not keep pace with the increase in population growth or crime increase.

Therefore, before we stress new programs and innovations, let us review why some present programs were not effective. Take Parole Services. The President's Crime Commission advocates caseloads of thirty-five (35) when our present services are averaging close to one hundred (100) cases per agent.

We had a series of innovations under LEA and other Federal subsidized or supported programs. For the funds spent, you did not receive as much in return as would have been possible in subsidizing existing services, thus providing the workable caseload as is now advocated. I am not opposed to innovations, but I feel we should first determine what programs are effective and then financially support such programs, even if they are existing ones. My only concern is Title III and I caution that the emphasis on innovations will not be the major goal.

Senate Bill 917 is necessary and only with Federal funds subsidizing State and urban budgets can we meet the challenge.

The part of the crime problem that disturbs me most is why are ninety percent (90%) of crimes committed unreported. This issue needs a closer study than that covered in the President's Crime Commission Report. If the unreported crimes are ninety percent (90%), then our crime rate must be increasing at a rate greater than six percent (6%) of population growth, a rate of increase based on reported crimes. But, more important, have our citizens lost faith in our Administration of Justice? If so, why? If my reading of public sentiment is correct, then I believe that the citizen has little faith in our Judicial process, including the U. S. Supreme Court. This is an important issue and in our democratic process will be reflected at the ballot box. The years ahead will verify my observations and it will be an issue in State and Federal elections.

The Courts set the tone for our entire criminal justice system. This begins with law enforcement agencies and runs through the process to probation and parole. It is for this reason that the judicial process becomes the important factor.

Long delays and postponements in Court trials, frequently requiring victims, witnesses and others to appear again and again until the trial is ended. This factor alone discourages citizens to appear as witnesses or even the victim, in many cases. The drawn-out delays favor the accused and not the victim. It is this very factor that brings the judicial process under public scrutiny.

I have followed your hearings and believe that you are realistic in your approach to finding the facts. It is for this reason I have made this a lengthy reply to your request for my views.

You have the respect of law-abiding citizens and when you speak on a subject, you instill confidence and the majority of our citizens will follow you. Law enforcement is grateful that we have in our Congress a friend in Court.

Warmest regards.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL J. GERNERT,
Chairman.

JENKINS & JENKINS,
Knoxville, Tenn., April 28, 1967.

Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Remember me?

Well, I am as active as ever, feel like a spring colt, living life with the usual zest and pursuing my "trade" with the old-time vigor—four murder cases set during the month of May.

With more interest than I can possibly tell you I have read of your proposed legislation to counteract some of the decisions of the Supreme Court and which in my opinion as a criminal lawyer have resulted and will result in a traumatic effect on the administration of justice. As a criminal lawyer I would be expected to agree with some of the Court's decisions because they have afforded so many loopholes for the escape of the hardened criminal from the punishment he deserves. The reverse of this is true. As I look back over an experience of 47 years in trying cases in many Courts (now around 700 murder cases) I can think of so many cases that could have been thrown out of Court by the application of the present day rules of the Supreme Court and yet in all those cases I can't think of a single one in which there was a miscarriage of justice.

The rigid rules now in effect and especially those pertaining to the questioning of suspects, their confessions and the publicity given such cases by the news media have made it impossible to secure convictions in many cases of obvious guilt, with the result that society stands aghast, confused and bewildered and suspicious of the integrity of the Courts, and the hardened criminals glory in the Champions of their cause, that is the Supreme Court of the United States. Certain members of that Court—at least five of them—apparently have their heads in the clouds. Would that they would come back to earth and give some consideration to the lives and safety of society in general.

I close by saying, "God save the United States from the Supreme Court of the United States."

I glory in the stand you are taking. Go to it.

Sincerely your friend,

RAY H. JENKINS.

SUPERIOR COURT OF RHODE ISLAND,
Providence, May 18, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: My attention has been called by the Council of Judges of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency, of which I am a member, to H. R. 5037 (Senate S 917) being a bill "To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes."

I urge its adoption by the Congress as I believe it to be in the best interests of our Country.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN E. MULLEN,
Presiding Justice.

OFFICE OF THE PROSECUTING ATTORNEY,
Charleston, W. Va., May 26, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator from Arkansas, Senate Judiciary Committee—Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am extremely interested in the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, which I understand is now being considered by the Senate and House Judiciary Subcommittees.

Recent Supreme Courts decisions and the report of the President's Crime Commission underline the necessity of legislation designed to achieve new plans and programs in the criminal law field. I have examined the Act and note its concern with a wide range of criminal justice, including police, courts, corrections and delinquency.

I am a member of Governor Smith's State Crime Commission and a member of the Executive Committee of the National District Attorneys Association in addition to my official capacity as prosecuting attorney.

I, wholeheartedly, endorse the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 and would appreciate any activity upon your part to get this legislation passed as early as possible.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES M. WALKER,
Prosecuting Attorney.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT DISTRICT,
Decatur, Miss., May 22, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Please allow me to express my appreciation for the very fine work you are doing in Congress in seeking to enact legislation that will give some relief to law enforcement officers and prosecutors. I am convinced that the President's commission on law enforcement and administration of justice has not found the answer to our problem as shown by the February report and supplements thereto.

I have had numerous cases thrown out of Court, or otherwise dismissed, because of recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Throwing cases out because of slight technicalities is not good for the morale of law enforcement officers, who in general are doing a very fine job.

I am convinced that the coddling of known criminals is not the answer to our problem. The President's commission has missed the boat as far as I am concerned.

Please be assured that your efforts are appreciated.

With kind personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. H. JOHNSON, Jr.

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.
JUSTICES' CHAMBERS,
Brooklyn, N.Y., May 31, 1967.

WILLIAM A. PAISLEY,
Chief Counsel, U.S. Senate,
Committee on the Judiciary, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PAISLEY: Please accept my sincere thanks for your letter of May 17th, which I have been endeavoring to answer since its receipt. The pressure of work has been so great that this is the first opportunity I have had to furnish you with the information you desire.

With reference to the question of importance of confessions in criminal cases, and specifically in regard to Judge Sobel's statistical survey, I must inform you as follows: After 25 years of active participation in the enforcement of the criminal law, as Assistant District Attorney, District Attorney, and a judge presiding at criminal trials, I am convinced that confessions are by far the most reliable evidence in criminal cases. Frequently one has doubts with regard to eye-witness indentifications, and this, I believe, is an area which causes great concern to prosecutors who, like every other citizen, are most anxious not to convict an innocent person. With respect to confessions, however, a false confession is almost always easily detected, and while there are false confessions from time to time, they are usually readily recognized and disregarded.

As far as Judge Sobel's figures are concerned, these figures are, in my opinion, most unreliable, as they were based upon a very small cross-section of the actual cases pending in this court during the period which Judge Sobel used as the basis for his investigation, the reasons being as follows:

Shortly after the decision in the U.S. Supreme Court case of Jackson v. Denno (378 U.S. 368), which arose in this court and in this state, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York laid down certain specific rules in a decision entitled People v. Huntley (15 NY 2d 78). This decision laid down certain rules which were later incorporated in the Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of New York (Sec. 813(f), (g), (h) and (i)). The statute and the decision required that in a case in which the People intended to offer a confession, they must serve notice thereof on the defendant prior to the trial. Defendant thereafter had an opportunity to demand a hearing to contest the voluntariness or the confession. This hearing had to be conducted prior to the trial.

After the decision in Escobedo and Miranda, any objections to the confession, based upon either of these decisions, were similarly to be determined in the course of this hearing. The District Attorney of this County adopted the practice of serving the required notice upon the defendant at the time the case was assigned to a trial part—usually two weeks to a month in advance of the trial. All that was required of the defendant was that he serve a notice on the District Attorney that he desired a hearing with respect to the issue of voluntariness of the alleged confession.

Judge Sobel, in the computation, used as the basis for his estimates only the cases in which the District Attorney served a notice that he intended to use the confession at the time of the trial. He failed to realize that prior to this time all of these cases had at least two preliminary conferences before the court for the purpose of disposing of the case by a plea to a lesser degree of the crime. My experience during these pre-trial discussions (I sit in a pre-trial part a great percentage of the time) has been that approximately 40% of all indictments filed result in a disposition in the pre-trial part. From my experience in these parts, I have ascertained that at least 75 to 80 percent of the cases disposed of in the pre-trial parts were cases in which there was a confession by the defendant; and by far in the greatest percentage of the confession cases, the defendant was willing to plead to a lesser degree. The greatest majority of the cases, in which confessions had been obtained, were disposed of by a plea of guilty before the case reached the stage of being noticed for trial, and for that reason Judge Sobel's figures have no validity regarding the importance of the confessions, and he has eliminated a large number of cases in which the defendants had confessed and already pleaded guilty before the necessity for the service of the notice upon the defendant ever arose.

I pointed this out to Judge Sobel but as far as I have been able to ascertain he has never rechecked his figures or conducted any further survey, either to validate the existing figures or to disprove my assertion with respect thereto.

I am extremely interested in the Bill introduced by Senator McClellan to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and jurisdiction of other Federal courts. I am afraid, however, of what the Supreme Court would do if it were offered the opportunity of passing upon the constitutionality of the Bill. I am include to believe it would hold that the Bill was unconstitutional and that only a constitutional amendment would remove the effect of the Miranda decision.

I am grateful to you for your thoughtfulness in forwarding to me the various legislative documents and Senator McClellan's speech. If I can be of further assistance, I shall be only too glad to cooperate, as I am convinced that we have gone much too far in protecting the accused. I have always been of the opinion that the first 10 Amendments were a limitation on the Government of the United States and were never intended to convey to the Federal government the right to limit the activities of the states in their enforcement of their penal laws. The colonists who adopted the Constitution were afraid of the Federal government, not of the state governments. That fact that for over 150 years the Constitution was so interpreted seems to me to bear out this point of view.

Sincerely,

MILES F. MCDONALD, Justice.

MARCH 1, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Members of every law enforcement agency, as well as the law abiding public, I think, owe you their everlasting gratitude for your concern and activity in behalf of good law enforcement. Your understanding and that of other members of Congress regarding the admissibility of voluntary confessions, gives hope that something will be done about the crime problem.

Many of the Crime Commission recommendations would no doubt improve conditions, some only on a long term basis, but to fail to regain a proper balance between the rights of the public and that of the individual engaged in crime, insofar as the authority of law enforcement officers to investigate and use confessions voluntarily given is concerned, would be like building a strong baseball team and then attempt to play the game without the centerfielder.

There are as you know many causes of crime. Among them, the breaking down of law enforcement for political expediency, or other selfish gain and the exploitation of minority groups whose good members have not stood up strong enough for law enforcement because they have not realized that the majority of the crimes against the person have been committed against their people. Also the advocacy by some of the violation of the law that individuals or groups may think is unjust, and the philosophy of excuse whereby a person who does not have everything he would like to have, may be expected to resort to lawlessness, or because of a considered wrong in some other part of our society may be excused.

There is, another thing that we might well be concerned about and that is that some public appointed officials who should be taking a positive position on the type of legislation you propose, are not doing so. They say that we haven't had proof yet that such rulings as Mallory and Miranda have adversely affected the crime rate. One reason for this might be that reports from prosecutors, etc., cover only cases where there have been indictments. This does not cover what police officials across the country know from experience. It does not cover multiple crimes, nor multiple defendants that can't be detected.

In 1957, when testifying before the Senate Committee on Constitutional rights and the House Judiciary Sub-Committee we said that the Mallory ruling and others, would cause a rise in crime, and a lowering of clearance in the District of Columbia. Though crime had been reduced 35% in the five years before 1957, it has increased every year since. I believe the full increase has been about 200%.

I will not burden you here with a volume of cases but let us look at the case of James Killough, who made three voluntary confessions to the murder of his wife, was twice convicted but was freed under the law. I am sure that this case could not have been cleared under Miranda because we would never have gotten to the point where he would have shown the police where he threw her body. Without this there would have been probable cause to arrest but not probable cause to charge, because the evidence was circumstantial.

Apparently the only thing left under these rulings in this type of case, would be a law of chance. The chance that maybe the criminal will tell a friend of the crime who by some chance might report to police. Or by chance maybe he might be caught in the act the next time he commits a crime. There is no doubt that these rulings have gone too far, toward the criminal and have encouraged crime.

There are many other cases that I can remember which could not likely have been successfully prosecuted at all under present law. For instance when the Puerto Ricans shot up the House of Representatives and one escaped from the scene.

Having served in the Metropolitan Police Dept., Wash., D.C., for about 32 years, the last 12 as Chief of Detectives, retiring in 1963, I watch with interest your untiring work along with your committee, on behalf of good law enforcement and hope that you can get your recommendations through.

If at any time I can be of assistance to you please advise.

With best wishes to you, I am,

Yours very truly,

EDGAR E. SCOTT,
Deputy Chief of Police, Chief of Detectives (Retired),

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of a memorandum from Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, relative to Bill #S. 674, which is a Bill to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

Senator, I have looked at several major cases which were committed recently in our city. Frankly, I could cite many, many cases of this nature. We've found that the Supreme Court rulings have caused us considerable hardship in preparing cases for Court. They have, not only tied our hands in readying a case for Court, but burdened us in that three or four days are now required to prepare a case. In many instances, the suspects have gone free, when we knew they were guilty.

It is my personal feeling as a veteran law officer with 37 years service, 26 as Chief of Police, that the Supreme Court rulings have hindered law enforcement far more than anything that I can recall during my long career. The demonstrations by the youth on the Civil Rights issues were the beginning of crime increase in our nation. In addition to this, the Supreme Court rulings have added a "stumbling block" to the enforcement of law and order in our present day society.

Very truly yours,

L. J. CAMPBELL,
Chief of Police.

RECENT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS AFFECTING LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT

It is our opinion that the recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions in the "Miranda Case" have hindered law enforcement. The Supreme Court should give thought to the rights of law-abiding citizens as well as the undesirables. Under presently-existing conditions, the law-abiding citizens, who are victims of rape, murder, and other type crimes, have no rights. The Supreme Court has leaned over so far that they have fallen off the cliff in favor of the criminals, in guaranteeing them of their personal rights.

CASE ILLUSTRATION NO. 1

A subject was apprehended running from a resident yard at 2:00 a.m. The residence had been burglarized. This subject was warned of his rights, that anything he said could be used against him in Court, that he had the right to engage an attorney before answering questions, and, if he could not financially afford one, the Court would appoint one, without cost. This hardened criminal was allowed to go free as he refused to answer any questions. The owner of this residence was unable to identify subject.

The Crystal Linen Service, 803 Main Street, this City, was entered on Christmas Day, 1966. The owner came by his business at which time two burglars ran out the back door. The owner could only describe them as two white males. The police apprenhended two men, one fleeing approximately two blocks from the business, who was later identified as one Kenneth Chapman. He refused to answer any question, giving only the name of Bill Spivey, which was false. During his incarceration (bond was set, but he was unable to make it), a report on his fingerprints was received, indicating that he was an escaped prisoner from the State of Georgia, where he was serving twelve years for bank robbery.

Subject # 2 in this case, one Walter Turner, refused to make any statement and demanded an attorney. After getting his prints off to the Bureau in Washington and a report there from, he had been released on bond, and it was learned that he was wanted for parole violation. As of this date, the subject is still at large. His car was found less than a block from the Crystal Linen Service with a complete set of burglary tools in it. The car was properly registered to Walter Turner of Georgia. He was indicted in this city for possession of burglary tools. These two subjects had entered this business establishment, moved the safe to the rear of the building where they were performing a "peel" job, and was surprised by the owner. They did not enter the safe.

"This case was marked "cleared" by the arrest of Chapman. His attorney advised him that, through the Police Department returning him to Georgia with no prosecution on this end, we were able to clear this case. Through advise of his attorney, he re-enacted the crime for us, so there is no doubt concerning this crime.

A man died and an autopsy was performed to ascertain the cause of death. Findings revealed poisoning. During the investigation, it was revealed that his wife had taken out a $5,000 life insurance policy on subject several months prior to death. The wife was brought to headquarters for questioning, but prior to leaving home she called her attorney who met her at headquarters. On the very first question, in the presence of her attorney, she was asked, "can you tell us about your husband having been poisoned; and this concluded the interrogation. The case is still unsolved.

I could, without any difficulty, cite many other cases where the "Miranda Case" has hindered law enforcement. Since this decision by the U. S. Supreme Court, cases that usually took one day to investigate, now take three to four days.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
BUREAU OF POLICE,
St. Paul, Minn., February 24, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: On Friday, February 17, 1967, I appeared before your Subcommittee in the City of Milwaukee and at that time expressed to your Committee my views on the effects which the Miranda and other Supreme Court Decisions have on our police endeavors. To reiterate these views and suggestions to you would be superfluous.

However, I feel that it is my responsibility, as a representative of local law enforcement, to bring to your attention the fact that without immediate legislation which will return to the police officer some of the tools that have been removed by the Supreme Court in the past six years, we cannot hope to stop crime, or even maintain the present holding action.

Certainly I have no quarrel with the President's Committee on Crime, nor with the proposals for the solution of crime in these United States. Since theirs is a sociological approach to the problem it is obvious that we will face many years before there is noticeable return on their endeavors.

Since crime will not wait and attitudes cannot be changed over night, it is only through direct action by concerned legislators, such as you and your committee, which will provide the law abiding members of our society some reasonable degree of assurance.

Sincerely,

L. E. McAULIFFE,
Chief of Police.

CITY OF MOUNTLAKE TERRACE, WASH.,
February 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. McCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

SIR: I would take this opportunity, relative to your Committee hearings on March 7-8-9, to offer what support I can—and echo, I am sure, the sincere appreciation of all law enforcement officials, for your recognition of the situation now existing. The current trend of thinking in the area of 'civil rights' has obviously not included the one which the basic and most important—that right to own property and to live—both in peace and secure from attack.

The intent of the Constitution was to provide this to the society and, originally, from tyrannical acts of the Government. We have heard several prominent persons observe that the Supreme Court has been amending the Constitution, not interpreting it. Since you are interested in the results of the "Miranda" decision, it will be most interesting to see what will happen now that he has been again convicted in Arizona of those charges. It is the opinion of many law enforcement people and much of society that the Court should limit its interest to its basic responsibility; its service to the Congress, matters of corporate law, monopolies, anti-trust, etc., and terminate the right of appeal of individuals involved in crimes at the State Supreme Court level.

In the event you do not see a copy prior to your Committee hearing, I am enclosing a copy of Senate Joint Memorial # 10, State of Washington, 40th Session, which urges action in this area.

Peace officers are not an individual segment of our society—they are the representatives of society appointed to protect the masses against the individuals who elect to violate the rules by which we must all live. We must, first, take steps to properly select and train people for this work, but more important, 'weed' out the ones who are not capable of professional attitudes—regardless of their present position or length of experience and particularily those in command and administrative positions where their undesirable philosophy continue to infect the recruit officers. We may then refer to it as a profession and—with reforms in Courts and social conditions which contribute to crime, the Peace officer will become again a respected member of the community.

If the present trend is not stopped immediately, it will lead to more and more problem in securing men to fill positions as peace officers. Almost every City has budgeted positions which cannot be filled—not because of salary alone, although this is a factor in many cases, but because of a lack of interest in becoming part of what appears to be another case of the 'vanishing American'.

If it were not for the public support demonstrated in many of our Cities, such as ours, many officers would probably leave their positions. Some are waiting—most of them—for the "pendulum to swing back again." On this comment, one of our County attorneys has commented, "The time may come when the pendulum may start its swing, but we may find that the clock has been stolen and it will be impossible to ask who was the thief."

I have been advised that you are interested in possible witnesses to call for the hearings. I would suggest that any administrative official in law enforcement might be used and in addition, I would recommend Chief Frank Ramon, Seattle Police Department; Professor James Thompson, School of Law, Northwestern University (States Att'y for the State of Illinois at the time of the Escobedo trial and who represented the State in the appeal); Dr. Max Raffererty, Sup't of the California State Department of Education, the nation's largest school system, who has published many articles on this subject. Locally, in Washington, D.C., Columnist James J. Kilpatrick has some interesting comment on the Crime Commission report which he describes as "pedantic, professorial, antiseptic." He notes there is little perception in the report, of the link between crimes and punishment and that the area of punishment is very lightly treated in the whole of the 340-page report.

We wish you all possible success in the job your Committee is about to do—and, one which must be done.

Respectfully,

ROBERT C. FOX, Chief of Police.

THE DOORS ARE NOW OPEN, THE ENEMY CAN WALK IN

(By Dr. Max Rafferty [1])

> "The great object of my fear is the federal judiciary. That body, like gravity, ever acting with noiseless foot and alarming advance * * * is engulfing insidiously the special governments into the jaws of that which feeds them. It is a very dangerous doctrine to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional matters. It is one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy."—Jefferson

Yes, boys and girls, it was old Tom who said this. Not Barry Goldwater. Not even Robert Welch. It was Mr. Democracy himself. And if this be treason, make the most of it.

I wanted to point this out right off the bat, just in case someone felt called upon to brand me a "Let's Impeach Earl Warren" member of the you-know-what. The author of the Declaration of Independence, the third President of these United States, the founder and patron saint of the Democratic Party is, I hope, above such suspicion, even in this murky era of guilt by association and rebuttal by labeling.

What brought about the quotation from the sage of Monticello was the recent United States Supreme Court decision opening the doors of New York classrooms to avowed Communists as teachers and counselors. Justice Tom Clark, in his scathing minority opinion, pointed out almost wistfully that his black-robed brethren had, "by this broadside, swept away one of our most precious rights—namely, the right of self-preservation."

It's true, you know.

When Uncle Sam goes, everything goes. The courts which protect us. The schools which educate us. The homes which nurture us.

As Justice Clark has said, the doors are open now. Open to the tamperer, to the burglar, to the wild-eyed fanatic with the torch. We seem to have the pretty dubious prospect of being the only great nation in all history to commit deliberate suicide.

But I guess this self-preservation stuff is stuffy and old-fashioned nowadays. After all, how important is a nation's right to defend itself as compared to a Communist's right to subvert it?

Not very, according to the court majority. "Academic freedom"—that's the important thing today, even though there are as many definitions of this highly subjective phrase as there are professors in our colleges. The high-court judges have formally given us notice that, in their own words, they "will not tolerate laws which cast a pall of orthodoxy over the classroom."

For "orthodoxy" read "patriotism"—Or even "simple decency."

O, brave new world that hath such judges in it!

Make way now for Prof. Timothy Leary and his glassy-eyed cult of LSD. And for the beatnik mouthers of the Filthy Speech Movement. And for the Mafia and Murder, Inc., for that matter. Nothing orthodox about them.

[1] Dr. Max Rafferty is superintendent of public instruction and director of education in California, which has the nation's largest school system. He is the author of best-selling books on education.

Why not?

Good manners are orthodox. So are virtuous morals. So is clean speech. So is the ability to keep one's hands out of one's neighbor's pockets. If orthodoxy now casts a legal pall, it is not too farfetched to envisage the classroom of the future as a cross between a Communist cell and a burlesque runway where, in the immortal words of Cole Porter, "anything goes!"

If academic freedom now is more important than morality and love of country and sheer survival, then in its name literally anything goes. The lit is definitely off, and with it the traditional right of American parents ever since the founding of the Republic and long before to determine through their elected representatives just who should teach their children what.

Once, long ago, the Supreme Court in its arrogance trampled upon the conscience of the country. The Dred Scott decision legalized slavery in the North and presumably riveted it upon the nation for all time to come. Within a single decade, slavery was dead on this continent to the obbligato of great guns and to the outraged thunder of a betrayed and indignant populace.

So much for the infallibility of the court. Jefferson was right.

So was Lincoln, who once remarked wryly, "A judge is as apt to be honest as any other man. And no more so."

WASHINGTON STATE SENATE,

To: Law enforcement personnel.

Re: SJM 10—Respect for law and order.

The deterioration in respect for law and order and law enforcement authorities greatly concerns some of us here in Olympia.

The causes are many and varied but a contributing factor has been the misinterpretation of our federal constitution by the Supreme Court of the United States. They have read into this document ideas which are not written there and which have hampered law enforcement and the protection of the public.

We have introduced SJM 10 which is a small step toward the solution of this major problem. I hope it will bring encouragement to you in the performance of your duties to know that action is being undertaken in this vital area.

I have the highest regard for the job being done under difficult circumstances by our law enforcement personnel.

Sincerely,

SENATOR JACK METCALF,
21st Legislative District.

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL NO. 10 OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON, FEBRUARY 1, 1967

To the Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson, President of the United States, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress Assembled, and to the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare:

We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, respectively represent and petition as follows:

Whereas, It is self-evident in a nation dedicated to preserving the rights of all individuals that liberty and justice are not separate and distinct concepts; and

Whereas, It is also evident that if either concept is weakened both are in danger; and

Whereas, The concept of equal justice has been jeopardized by recent supreme court decisions which make conviction of criminals difficult or impossible because of technicalities even where the evidence is incontrovertible, or guilt is admitted.

Now, therefore, Your Memorialists respectfully pray that the Congress begin immediate action to amend the United States Constitution to clarify the relationship between the accused and the law enforcement authorities with a view toward both safeguarding the rights of the accused and, at the same time, making absolutely certain that the public is protected and that justice is upheld.

Be it resolved, That copies of this memorial be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson, President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each member of Congress from the State of Washington.

DUPAGE COUNTY CHIEFS OF POLICE ASSOCIATION,
Woodbridge, Ill., March 7, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As legal counsel for the DuPage County Chiefs of Police Association, they have requested that I write to you expressing their views and suggestions regarding Supreme Court Decisions, specific examples of such decisions as Miranda.

I would say that the general feeling among these law enforcement people is that the Miranda decision and decisions of this nature have removed one of their most valuable tools in law enforcement investigation, and has substantially impaired their ability to be of service to the public at large. Also, the County of DuPage being a County represented by people of higher than average income, educational background, this overlaps also into the field of law enforcement, and the abuse of law enforcement officials as so eloquently recognized by the opinion in the Miranda decision is all but unknown in this jurisdiction. In the eighteen or more years of my own experience I only have on rare occasions witnessed or had reported incidents of questionable police behavior. As long as this constitutes no problem, the men in this jurisdiction feel a tremendous loss in effectiveness merely because possibly that in some jurisdiction there is a problem constituted and they failed to see why this cannot be handled on a case to case basis as to the individual rights rather than make a blanket preclusion of certain police procedures.

There have been certain cases wherein the Miranda decision confronts a problem. As a matter of fact my office is presently in collaboration with one of the local departments for investigating a possible homicide involving husband to wife. The Miranda decision is so very very explicit in police relying upon scientific evidence. In this instant case all of the scentific evidence, which type of evidence on careful review of all criminology would be glaring with its limitations, has been exhausted. After all Dick Tracy is the only one with a space coupe. The only hopeful solution to this possible homicide would be if the errant husband would acknowledge it. If all of the scientific evidence that we have would point toward this defendant, it still would not be sufficient as it is all corroborative to even commence a prosecution.

We have another case which we have just brought to a conclusion which uniquely brings forth a problem I am sure was farthest from the jurists minds, and that is a case which was solved akin to the old time bounty theory. Factually it is this: two young men were very much suspected in a major crime in this County, the Chief of the local department investigating being very cognizant of the Miranda decision was fearful of approaching the young men, fully admonished their fathers that they were suspected and that if he gained more evidence would return. He was hopeful that the father could prevail upon these young men. Within a day a reward of substantial proportion was posted for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible. Immediately this local Chief of Police was awaited upon by two characters, each more evil probably than those involved, who immediately made statements interrogating these two lads, and thereby demanding their reward. Of course we commenced a prosecution. I give you this as a rather unique example of the pitfalls of this decision.

In discussing this generally with law enforcement officers many of them have various stories to relate wherein they have been advised by those subject to interrogation as to what all these rights are and that they the subject of the inquiry are somewhat so called immune.

As to my own view, I note that the biggest problem has been that the law enforcement officer's confidence in his own status has been all but destroyed and this is a feeling that runs rampant among law enforcement officials that they are almost hesitant to talk to anyone. This carries over to a point where they are placed in an actual position of fear being afraid during the course of an investigation that they will in some way make a mistake and thereby endure grave embarrassment. This has a very bad effect upon their activities. The dangers of this is something we cannot measure as it would be impossible to determine how many law enforcement officials are not making proper inquiry, due to this fear. This fear itself is a very natural thing with a conscientious officer trying to do his job and trying to do it right. He is in a position where he doesn't know what is right any more.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM V. HOPF,
State's Attorney.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I want to go on record against the deplorable conditions created by the Miranda decision and its adverse effect on responsible law enforcement.

The Miranda decision makes it extremely difficult to obtain convictions against known criminals. Law enforcement officers are reluctant to pursue the questioning of suspects with the uncertainty of their position which could lead to a possible false arrest charge being lodged against the arresting officer.

There is no question that the Miranda decision is responsible for criminals being returned to society to prey again on the community without fear of paying their rightful debt for their criminal acts.

New technological advances in communications are being used by the modern day criminal element. Adversely, the small local law enforcement bodies have not been able to keep pace with the new advances made in communications because of the cost to the community.

The old bug-a-boo about back room interrogation is a thing of the past. Todays law enforcement officer is a highly educated and skilled professional, who is not only interested in his profession but is usually an active member of his church and community, taking part in many civic activities.

Morale, which is the crux of good law enforcement efforts is dwindling as a direct result of the Miranda decision.

In conclusion, let us reverse the trend in law enforcement and get back on the right road with the reversal of the Miranda decision.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE E. GRIECO,
Chief of Police.

CITY OF FRESNO,
POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Fresno, Calif., March 1, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: This correspondence is directed to you in response to your request, through the International Association of Chiefs of Police, for information relative to recent Supreme Court decisions affecting the admissibility of confessions into evidence in criminal matters.

It appears to be well established that the Escobedo and Miranda decisions have had a decidedly adverse effect upon law enforcement. Examining the fact that law enforcement officers are not thoroughly schooled in constituional law, may shed some light on the situation. Contributing to the overall problem, however, is the difficulty with which lower courts apply the Escobedo and Miranda principles. In many instances they are arriving at decisions which are poles apart under very similar circumstances.

The number of convictions and guilty pleas have declined drastically since the pre-Escobedo days of 1963. This is in spite of the fact that felony arrests have increased 75% since 1963. The following table is included for reference.

City of Fresno, Calif.

	Felony arrests	Convictions or pleas	Percent
1963	1,475	546	37
1964	1,635	539	32
1965	1,539	379	24
1966 (+72%)	2,042	461	23

Figures such as those shown make a travesty of the efforts of dedicated law enforcement officers. In previous years and through 1963, there had been a gradual increase in the number of felony arrests and the percentage of those arrests which terminated in a conviction or plea of guilty. This trend, which I attributed to better police methods, was drastically reversed after Escobedo and the California decision in Dorado.

Fresno County Court records show that the fiscal year 1965–66 experienced a new high in the number of felony cases in which criminal informations were filed. In spite of this new high, the percentage of guilty pleas as compared to complaints filed, dropped to a new low. The percentage drop in guilty pleas amounts to 24% since the pre-Escobedo and pre-Miranda era. One of the most disturbing facts, however, is that for the first six months after the 1966 Miranda decision, dismissals before trial are already higher than for the entire preceding year.

It may appear rather trite to reiterate that the Supreme Court has contributed immeasurably to the above facts, but I am compelled to do so. Advancements in training police personnel and the utilization of more science in crime detection methods are no doubt partial solutions to the mounting crime toll, but they certainly are not the complete answer. There are too many crimes in which no psysical evidence of value may be found and well trained investigators are definitely thwarted when they must tell a suspect that he has a right to say nothing to them.

I hope that the above comments may be of value to you and wish you success in your attempt to remedy this situation. Certainly, as the dissenting opinion Miranda expressed, not other country in the world has ever had such restrictions nor are such restrictions founded on a constitutional basis.

In closing, I respectfully request a copy of your Bill S. 674 and, if possible, an abstract of the hearing to be held by your committee on March 7 through 9.

Sincerely,

H. R. MORTON,
Chief of Police.

CITY OF YONKERS,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
Yonkers, N.Y., April 11, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I know of your inquiry into the effects of the Miranda decisions on law enforcement agencies at all levels, and I am transmitting herewith some views for your consideration.

Immediately following the Miranda decisions, our community experienced a sharp rise in crime in most of the categories of the F.B.I. crime statistics. This trend is continuing. The areas most affected are burglaries and larcenies. There is usually a dearth of physical evidence and lack of eye witnesses for crimes of this type, hence if confessions and admissions are drastically reduced, the number of clearances of these crimes will diminish, and the burglar and thief will be permitted to pursue his course of crime.

Our experience has been, before Miranda, it was not uncommon for us to obtain voluntary confessions and admissions, which have been instrumental in many instances for convicting a suspect and gaining valuable, necessary information pertaining to other crimes. This vital and productive area of criminal investigation has disappeared since Miranda.

The figures from our records are illustrative of this point. In 1964 we had 129 burglary arrests, in 1965 we had 165 burglary arrests, but in 1966 there were only 126 burglary arrests. The Miranda decision was a definite factor affecting these figures. Since June 13, 1966 our Detective Division has conducted 4,183 investigations (with 573 arrests in 1966) and has not received one written waiver of rights and written admissions of past crimes. Our combined burglary and unlawful entry figures (as the F.B.I. requires them) disclose that we had a total of 157 arrests for these two categories with 95 occurring for the first half of 1966 and the balance of 62 for the second half of 1966.

I believe there are also intangible factors flowing from Miranda which cannot be pinpointed by statistics. The resourceful dedicated police officer, engaged in pursuing crimes, particularly against property, of necessity feels a sense of frustration and demoralization. On the other hand, the criminal must be elated by Miranda, encouraging him to greater and more brazen efforts.

I have followed closely the efforts at the federal level to thwart spiraling crime against our nation, read with interest the efforts of the President of the Crime Commission. I have also read with great interest proposals forwarded to Congress by the President for making our streets safe. I believe many of these proposals to elevate the status of police officers to a professional basis are excellent.

However, the President's proposals, in my humble judgment, fail to provide the most indispensable tool, namely legalized wire tapping and eavesdropping. I would strongly urge the Congress to clarify and authorize wire tapping and eavesdropping for law enforcement officials. In appealing for this power, I am not unmindful of abuses that could arise, and I would also strongly recommend stringent safeguards, such as we have provided in our New York State Constitution for such procedures.

Finally, I would urge the Senate carefully review the qualifications and background of Federal Judges, whose confirmations they provide.

Respectfully,

DANIEL F. MCMAHON,
Commissioner of Public Safety.

SIR: Multnomah County District Attorney George VanHoomissen, through his Chief Criminal Deputy Desmond D. Connall replied to your recent request for experience regarding the Miranda decision. This office has been furnished a copy of this reply with a request for comment.

We are in the same position as the District Attorney's Office in that we are sure substantial damage to law enforcement has resulted from this decision. However, we find it most difficult to statistically substantiate this damage. In fact, the police are probably in a better position than others to evaluate the results of the decision as we are not only cognizant of cases lost in court, but are also acutely aware that many cases including homicides have not been solved as a direct result.

This office is particularly disappointed that the Oregon legislature is opening its biennial session this week without legislation on this subject to be considered. This is probably true because neither we on the local level nor the office of the State Attorney General can visualize legislation that would not be struck down by the United States Supreme Court.

Be assured we will watch your activities in the Congress with great interest and will forward any information coming to our attention that would be helpful.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR MR. MCCLELLAN: Since Miranda, we have had a great many discussions here among us on the Indian Hill Rangers force, and in the Hamilton County Police Association of which this Village is a member. We have had the benefit of speakers at Asociation meetings who have been both pro and con Miranda. As an isolated case, we conclude that Miranda made some sense, but as a general rule of law, it has crippled law enforcement agencies. Consequently, we have come to a conclusion which I feel I should like to have before the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,

Prior to Miranda, the Courts always investigated confessions to ascertain whether or not they were voluntarily given. Certainly there is no reason why a confession voluntarily given should not be used against a person whether he has had counsel present or not. So my conclusion is that while the Courts might examine confessions with a greater degree of particularity and care than they did before with respect to whether they are voluntary or coerced, it seems to me that we ought to get back on the pre-Miranda situation, where a confession voluntarily given, and without coercion, is admisible into evidence.

Kindest regards and with good wishes for your endeavors on behalf of the law.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. DIEKMEYER,
Chief of Police.

Hon. Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Democratic Senator from Arkansas,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing this letter in support of your protest against the Supreme Court decisions and giving you my backing in this matter.

Speaking for myself and my fellow officers of this department, we would like to see a move towards a constitutional amendment to help the police of this great country, rather than laws that hinder the police from doing their job.

I know that in the past, it probably has been the stupid police officers causing "the infraction of the rules" by violating some criminal's rights has brought about these decisions of the Supreme Court. It seems to me that the Supreme Court has worried too much about the criminal's rights and has forgotten that there are quite a few million honest people in this great country that have rights too, against lawlessness and crime.

Crime, as you know, Senator, is climbing at an alarming rate and the only way to curb it is to give the police officer some tools to work with, such as good laws. The police officer can't be a miracle man in trying to solve a crime without the help of the law. He can only do so much.

Again, I say to you, Senator, I am backing you. We, the police, need help if we are to stop the rise in crime. I wish we could have met in person in order to discuss our views, but this being impossible, I am writing this letter and hope it meets with your approval.

If I can be of any more assistance in this matter, please feel free to call upon me. Thank you, Senator, for your time in reading this letter.

Sincerely,

EDWARD G. KEMERAIT, Chief of Police.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing a clipping which appeared in the Springfield Union issue of March 16, 1967.

This clipping will indicate one of the many instances in which police are hampered by the recent Supreme Court decisions. In this case a gang fight between young people with knives and razors ended with the murder of one young lad nineteen years of age.

Because of the decisions this group of young people could have gotten away with murder. Also because of the liberalized parole laws one of these youths who received a sentence of five years and a day in the state prison can be released on parole in fourteen months.

Everybody talks about the increasing crime situation but as yet it has not been attacked from the proper angle.

The report of the President's Crime Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice does not seem to have touched the real reasons for the crime situation as it exists today.

There is much talk about what to do to correct these conditions, but most of what has been done to date seems only to take the props away from the law enforcement officers who are charged with their duty of investigating crimes, apprehending criminals and bringing them before the courts.

It appears that in many of these decisions the Supreme Court in its deliberations has gone far beyond the intent or meaning set forth in the Constitution.

I hope that this clipping will indicate to you what we are up against, and this condition exists nationwide.

If there has to be an amendment to the Constitution or guidelines set down to control the Supreme Court or to reverse or circumvent their recent decisions I hope that your committee and Congress will effect what has to be done.

Very truly yours,

MALCOLM DONALD,
Chief of Police.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE OF POLICE ASSOCIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., March 18, 1967.

Re S. 674, 90th Congress, First Session.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The International Conference of Police Associations representing over a quarter of a million police officers in the United States and Canada, wishes to be included in those who endorse your efforts to get legislation thru Congress to remove the handcuffs from policemen placed there by Supreme Court decisions.

We have in mind the fact that murderers and rapists are being released daily throughout this Nation because of the recent Supreme Court decisions that say their rights have been violated. What about the innocent people who were murdered or raped? What concern is there for the protection of the law-abiding citizen who is afraid to walk our streets?

Computers will not decrease crime. A well-paid, well-trained police officer walking the beat will decrease crime; he is the front line soldier in the war against crime. The same is true in the Army—expensive planes are fine but we still need the foot soldier.

The I.C.P.A., represents the soldier in the war against crime, however, without the help by Congress, the courts and an aroused citizen, we are going to lose the war against crime.

We endorse S. 674 on which you have been holding hearings. Give us the tools to work with and you will see tide turn in our favor and the war will be won.

Respectfully yours,

ROYCE L. GIVENS,
Executive Director.

POLICE DEPARTMENT, VILLAGE OF MAPLEWOOD,
Maplewood, Minn., March 14, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is with a great deal of interest and appreciation that I learn of your efforts to alleviate the effect of recent Supreme Court decisions and your support of law enforcement. The apathy of dedicated career law enforcement people as the result of recent restrictive Supreme Court decisions is very alarming.

I would like to relate an incident which I personally experienced in our police station recently. An office equipment salesman, a long time friend and solid citizen, came into the station and handed me a newspaper clipping from a Sunday edition of the St. Paul paper which I am enclosing a copy of. He said in a facicious manner, "Is this you?" I proceeded to relate examples of similar cases we have been exposed to and how we have to stop people from willingly and voluntarily telling us the truth, to advise them they have the right to remain silent, to have an attorney, and anything they tell us may be used against them in court. Incidentally, on more than one occasion, after telling them this, they become alarmed and apprehensive and refuse to say more. Once they refuse we are prohibited from any further questioning or discussion of the case with them.

After I completed pointing out these problems to my friend, he took out his order book and inquired of our Policewoman if we desired to order any supplies. At this point I challenged him as to whether he had pointed out her rights in our competitive, free enterprise society to know he has good competitors and to get other prices before she placed any orders. It readily was obvious to him he wouldn't make many sales nor would any other salesman if he were required, to advise each of their customers of this before they made a sale. This anology, I believe, more than explains our problems of "no sale" in interrogation of suspects after we are obliged to tell them of their rights.

More and more we are faced with the sad fact that the search for truth is secondary in today's law enforcement and courts and instead it has become a great battle of technicalities. The honest citizen is the loser as well as the dedicated policemen when admitted criminals are turned loose to terrorize and prey on the public.

Again, I commend your efforts in behalf of law enforcement and urge and solicit your continued support.

Sincerely yours,

R. W. SCHALLER,
Chief, Maplewood Police Department.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: This replies to the memorandum from the International Association of Chiefs of Police, with regard to recent Supreme Court decisions effecting law inforcement.

The Miranda decision has had far-reaching effects on law enforcement particularly in the field of interogation, confessions and detention.

While our city is comparatively small at around 13,000 population, it can be assumed that the problems are much more pronounced in the larger metropolitan areas.

Very truly yours,

MORRIS MICHAELSON,
Chief of Police.

CHARLOTTE, N.C., March 14, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: So much has been written and said on both sides of the issue of Supreme Court restrictions on police practices, that I am hard put to reveal anything novel. I feel that the effort to do so would only add to the quantity and not the substance of the debate.

I feel the need to have all reasonable tools at hand to do my job. Interrogation under most conditions is a very valuable and reasonable tool. Our investigative efforts are suffering because this method is available to us under only the most limited conditions. As a realist, I know the technique has been abused at times. But punishing all the police for the transgressions of a few (assuming transgressions did occur), in the final analysis harms the public, not just that segment it employs for protection. It would seem equally logical to indict all Americans because some commit crimes. The restoration of more liberal interrogation practices is not something to be done for the police—it is of benefit to the American people!

Needless to say, I endorse efforts that will help restore a bit of public peace of mind and confidence in government to maintain order. If the residents of this area of North Carolina qualify as valid indicia of national public sentiment, I think the people want to give their police proper means to gain control of the crime problem. Specifically, they wonder why it is "wrong" to question persons suspected of crime. They wonder if it is really true that the police cannot be trusted to observe the rights of citizens. They want the police to discharge their duties positively and with authority. I think they resent the intrusion of the court, distinguished and lettered as it may be, into matters affecting their safety and freedom from fear.

Sincerely,

JOHN E. INGERSOLL,
Chief of Police.

COLORADO STATE PATROL,
Denver, Colo., March 9, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In recent years the law enforceemnt profession has been confronted with problems stemming from decisions handed down by all court jurisdictions from the lowest to the highest, but no case decision has had such a pronounced effect as the recent decisions handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Miranda and Escobeda cases, along with other case decisions based upon the same general conceptions.

I am certain that every well informed police administrator will agree that more training is necessary to equip the officer with greater knowledge in the area of proper procedures in arrest, investigation and court preparation and presentation to more efficiently and effectively carry out his duties as a police officer. Furthermore, all law enforcement agencies and their personnel believe that their primary duty is to safeguard the rights of all the people, and to insure that this first responsibility of law enforcement is carried out. Many departments, including my own, have instituted instructions by the judiciary of the state to properly inform the officer in procedures which best accomplish this requirement.

Certainly no law enforcement agency seeks to deprive any person of his rights in any way and it is equally certain that the courts do not seek to deny any person of his rights afforded by the law of the land. However under the recent decisions in the cases in question here, the rights and actual safety of the majority are being undermined by the intense eagerness of the courts to assure the accused that all technicalities, language loop holes, procedural evasion routes, etc., are afforded him even at the expense of the real reason for a trial in the first place—that of establishing whether or not the person actually did commit the crime for which he is being tried.

Law enforcement agencies are being forced by court decisions to become justices themeselves to determine, not whether a crime has been committed and whether they have the person who committed it, but whether or not they have plugged all the quasi-legal and legal loop holes involved in order that the courts may be presented with the basic factual evidence to decide whether the person is in fact guilty of the offense for which he has been charged. Because of the trend of the courts for leaning over backward in favor of an accused person in all types of crimes, the law enforcement agency must base the decision to arrest, to investigate, to present evidence on previous court decisions and not on the facts of the case: Was there a crime committed and is this the person by whom it was committed?

Although the decisions in question here were handed down in crimes classified as felonies, the effects of these decisions are permeating the entire gamut of law enforcement from simple misdemeanors to murder. In the area of traffic law enforcement, wherein the Colorado State Patrol has its most important responsibility, the decisions have had an adverse effect not only on the personnel within the agency but the general administrative policies of the department as well. The decisions have created a disrespectful attitude on the part of the public toward the enforcement profession, as well as a dangerous attitude of distrust of the judiciary at all levels. Law enforcement has no answer for the injured innocent party in a court case who asks: "How can a person who has admitted his guilt have action against him dismissed on a procedural or language technicality that has nothing whatsoever to do with the facts of the case?"

The best interests of the majority are not being served when a person apprehended and charged with any type of crime is at liberty to say anything he chooses or to say nothing at all, can refuse to cooperate in any way with law enforcement officers or the prosecution, then admit his guilt in court and still be acquited because the exact letter of the information and instructions given him by any one of the agencies involved was in error, the error itself having nothing whatsoever to do with the facts of the case.

Recently the Supreme Court of Ohio ruled in the case of a part time enforcement officer that, because of his part time affiliation with law enforcement, he should know his rights. Therefore, even though he was not made aware of his rights, his conviction in a manslaughter case was upheld. This example is included to point up the lack of uniformity in the highest courts in the land and serves to further complicate the complex problem of the police in attempting to carry out their sworn duties.

The attitude trend of persons involved in traffic cases has meant a steady decrease of respect for the right and wrong of the incident in relation to the safety of persons and property and the laws which were passed to insure these, and a steady increase toward the conception that the worst thing about a traffic accident is the civil claims portion rather than the legal and moral aspects.

If there is a continuation of the present trend of the courts of protecting the lawbreaker to the extent that the law-abiding citizen, who is still in the overwhelming majority, can no longer feel that he is protected from the free roaming of any and all kinds of criminally inclined persons, the incidence of traffic accidents for example will rise to enormous proportions without any foreseeable way to solve the problem.

The decisions in fact and in effect penalize the law-abiding citizen by increasing the cost of adjudication of all types of cases which he the taxpayer must assume. His confidence in those to whom he entrusts his safety and rights as a citizen is undermined and his respect and support toward the police and the courts is declining to a point of distrust and antagonism.

Changes have been made in nearly all functions of government to keep pace with the ever-increasing problems caused by war population explosion and increased mobility of a nation on wheels. Certainly it is now evident that the safeguards which have been instrumental in the swift progress of this country must now be altered and improved to take care of today's problems today. The laws must be improved in every way it is possible to do so to safeguard the rights and well-being of the majority of the people in this nation who do not break the law, as well as to guarantee that swift, impartial justice will be dealt the lawbreaker.

If the court decisions continue to free the criminal on technicalities to the ultimate detriment to society as a whole, it is suggested that the constitution be changed to insure the rights of the majority of the people instead of the criminal element who presently find very little deterrent toward crime in the courts today.

Very truly yours,

G. R. CARREL,
Colonel, CSP, Chief.

CITY OF EATON,
Eaton, Ohio, March 13, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I recently received a memorandum from my professional association, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, indicating your particular interest in hearing additional views and suggestions regarding Supreme Court decisions concerning law enforcement. It is certainly a pleasure to know of your interest in this matter because the decisions have created serious problems for law enforcement and we need distinguished persons such as yourself to lead an effort to correct the situation.

Your statement about tenuous technicalities giving freedom to criminals is so true—turning criminals loose because of minor technicalities or an insignificant error in procedure surely is not justice. Invariably society pays dearly for such actions.

Our major concern arises from situations in which we have a good suspect regarding a crime, yet lack sufficient information to formally charge him. We advise hm of his rights and this raises the first problem. Being a small city, and being short of funds like most cities, we cannot afford a television taping system or the like to provide proof that we have properly advised the suspect of his rights. Therefore, we must rely on persons to witness our explanation of rights. Finding persons having absolutely no involvement in the case or with the police (no friends, relatives or acquaintances, for instance) is difficult at best and virtually impossible at 3:00 A.M. some morning when the questioning is not to be delayed.

Once we cross that hurdle the next one is often immediately in front of us. The suspect wants counsel and says he can't afford it. Since we don't have sufficient information to formally charge him and, therefore, give the court the responsibility for appointing counsel we are quickly stymied. And in Ohio appointed counselors are not paid unless the case actually goes to court. The problem is obvious.

So, somehow, counsel is obtained and we are ready to question. Likely as not we are pitting a $5,500 a year patrolman with a high school diploma against the suspect and his well-educated attorney. Such patrolmen make honest, and usually very insignificant, mistakes—the suspect and his counsel sit back, say nothing useful and yell "foul" at an opportune time in court.

Police morale is at an all-time low. Law enforcement is losing (and never obtaining) good men. We are working hard to improve training, salaries and working conditions, and stand ready to do whatever can be done to eliminate the above-described dilemma, but we need your help.

Sincerely,

HOWARD STOTTLEMIRE,
Chief of Police.

PENNSYLVANIA CHIEFS OF POLICE ASSOCIATION,
March 6, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This letter is written in my capacity as Chief Counsel for the Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association, and pursuant to a conversation held this date between myself and the Honorable Homer L. Kreider, President Judge of the Courts of the County of Dauphin, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

My friend, Judge Kreider, has advised me that he expects to appear before your Committee on Thursday, March 9, 1967, at your invitation, to offer testimony on behalf of U.S. Senate Bills 674, 675, 678, and 917.

The Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association is heartily in favor of the enactment of all of them.

We are of the opinion that there is no one that is as well qualified to pass upon the admissibility of confessions, the subject of Bill 674, as the Judge who presides over a trial and the jury who will hear the testimony of the witnesses and determine the credibility to be placed thereon.

I was, for sixteen years, a member of the Board of Pardons of this Commonwealth. During this time, I heard more than 17,000 appeals for executive clemency. I am firmly of the opinion, as the result of this experience, that the cause of justice will be harmed if the present pronouncement of the Supreme Court, relative to confessions, should stand. In my professional experience and in my public life, I am convinced that the safeguards presently invoked by the Courts of Pennsylvania are adequate in protecting the rights of those who may confess to criminal wrongdoing.

At the last Annual Convention of our Association, we unanimously adopted a resolution urging the use of wiretapping when, and only when, the same is subject to the strict control of the courts. I understand that this is the purpose which is sought to be achieved by U.S. Senate Bill 675, known as the Federal Wire Interception Act.

We are also in favor of both Senate Bills 678 and 917. We believe that those charged with the duty of law enforcement need all the assistance they can get in the war against such as the Mafia.

The results sought under Senate Bill 917, can be best achieved by keeping federal intervention to a minimum in its administration. We are wholeheartedly opposed to using such a Bill as a means to establish a federal police force.

I shall be pleased to have duplicate copies of all four of the above numbered Bills and copies of your addresses made on January 25 and February 23 of this year, forwarded to myself and to Francis J. Schafer, Executive Director of the Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association.

We are delighted that in Judge Kreider we will have a most eloquent spokesman on behalf of the citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. We trust that you will heed his words, spoken out of a wealth of experience, both as a practitioner of the law and as a tested and humane jurist.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM S. LIVENGOOD, Jr.,
Chief Counsel.

COMMISSION GOVERNMENT,
Memphis, Tenn., March 13, 1967.

Hon. JOHN MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Having been in law enforcement for over 25 years, and vitally interested in the crime picture, and trend, may I take this opportunity to urge you to keep up the fine work you are doing to assist law enforcement.

We urgently need support, and new laws of search and seizure, and something definite on defining rules on confessions, and the admissability of confessions. This is also true on interrogations.

I admire you, and your efforts in this direction, and if I can assist you, or your efforts, please call on me.

Yours truly,

CLAUDE A. ARMOUR,
Commissioner of Fire & Police.

CALIFORNIA POLICE CHIEFS ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Monterey Park, Calif., March 3, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As the Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures. I earnestly request that you give serious consideration to legislation or even Constitutional Amendment to overcome the effect of some of the recent Supreme Court Decisions in the field of criminal laws.

The Miranda Decision has created many technical problems within the ranks of law enforcement. Arrests are being made by policemen but complaints are not issued by District Attorneys because of some purely technical errors.

In the field of search and seizure, narcotics cases in jurisdictions as small as ours are being lost for the same reason.

It is hard for me to imagine how this country grew as great as it has over the last 190 years while, at the same time, depriving the people of the rights enumerated in such landmark cases as Mapp, Escobedo, Miranda, and others.

I'm sure that Chief of Police Thomas Reddin of Los Angeles would make an excellent witness for your Committee and could document factual illustrations.

Many good wishes to you on this hearing. You have been fighting this battle for many years. Law Enforcement is behind you.

Very sincerely,

ALLEN SILL, President.

MARYLAND CHIEFS OF POLICE ASSOCIATION,
Baltimore, Md., March 10, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The Maryland Chiefs of Police Association would like to go on record supporting S 674 intended to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to admissibility evidence of confessions. We feel very strongly in support of any legislation lessening the restrictions placed upon law enforcement officers in their efforts to perform their duties within the framework of our Constitution.

Please accept the commendation of this organization for the work performed by yourself and your subcommittee in respect to assisting the law enforcement officer to correctly and honorably perform his job.

Your very truly,

WILLIAM F. REYNOLDS, President.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,
Buffalo, N.Y., March 7, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is the writer's feeling the United States Supreme Court, as presently staffed, is embarked on a course ultimately destined to exclude confessions from evidence in criminal trials.

My experience has been a confession can be as reliable and competent as any parol evidence provided trial courts remain alert to assure an offered confession was voluntarily given. The experience in Buffalo has been most persons will not make any statement in the course of investigation of a crime when advised they are entitled to the presence of an attorney, and, if unable to afford an attorney, one will be supplied them.

I have reservations about amending our Federal Constitution, but it does seem possible Congress can enact legislation (without Constitutional Amendment) to give law enforcement officers, as part of their investigatory duties, some time to interview and interrogate a suspect and to provide for court admissibility of a confession obtained without force or duress.

I have enclosed herewith some specific examples of the effects of the Miranda decision on prosecutions in our local criminal courts.

Our Chief of Detectives, Mr. Ralph V. Degenhart, could provide your Committee relevant data. However, my opinion is Mr. Fred Inbau, Professor, Northwestern University Law School, is most able to present your Committee the views herein expressed.

Thank you for the opportunity given me to communicate with you.

Sincerely,

FRANK N. FELICETTA,
Commissioner of Police.

MARCH 6, 1967.

To: Frank N. Felicetta, Commissioner of Police.
From: Leo J. Donovan, Lieutenant Commanding Homicide Bureau.

SIR: The following is submitted pursuant to your direction to forward examples of the effect of recent United States Supreme Court decisions affecting the obtaining and admission in evidence of statements and confessions in criminal cases:

1. In this case, a crime that happened in the midsummer of 1965, a man was brutally beaten and robbed on Jefferson Avenue in the City of Buffalo. He died as a result of the beating and stabbings he received at the hands of two assailants. The assailants took a considerable amount of money from him and made their escape. They did everything they could to protect themselves from detection by wiping walls of their fingerprints, wiping their hands free of blood, taking a back route to leave the scence without being observed, changing their clothes, trying to destroy blood-soaked clothes, going downtown and purchasing new clothing, and later in the day, making arrangements to leave the city. They hired a third individual to drive them to New York. Information was gained by the Police Department as to the method they were going to use to leave the city, the make of the car, the name of the owner of the car, the license number of the car, and the intended route they were taking. This information was put over the Buffalo Police radio station, also over the State teletype, and a telephone call was made to the State Police on the Thruway. These individuals, enroute to New York City, were apprehended by the State Police near Syracuse. They were taken into custody, searched, a large amount of money was found underneath the seat of the car and personal property and money were taken from their possession.

The Buffalo Police Department dispatched two police officers to Liverpool, New York, to return the three to Buffalo. The two officers who were sent down there were not connected with the Homicide Squad, nor with the Robbery Squad. They were sent down there for the sole purpose of transporting the suspects back to Buffalo. When they reached the State Police substation in Liverpool, New York, they were told by the State Police that the individuals had been searched, the car had been searched, and the property taken from the individuals and the car were turned over to the Buffalo Policemen to return with the suspects to Buffalo. On the way back to Buffalo, one of the suspects decided he wanted to say something and tell his part of the crime, to "get it off his chest", so to speak. He said he had to tell somebody. The officer in charge of the escort back to Buffalo told him they were not assigned to the case, that they were not representatives of the Homicide Squad or the Robbery Squad, and that when they got back to Buffalo, the suspects could tell their story to the Homicide Squad if they so desired. The one suspect said, "Well, I've got to tell somebody." He then blurted forth certain admissions that he and his partner were involved in the crime. The suspects were repeatedly told by the officer in charge of the detail returning them that they (the officers) weren't assigned to the case. Nevertheless, the suspects did make admissions which seemed at the time to be spontaneous.

On their arrival here in Buffalo, I was told by the officer in charge of the return detail that the suspects wished to make a statement to me and tell me what had happened. Before any questions were asked of them, the suspects were apprised of their rights by my telling them they were entitled to have counsel, that they were entitled to a lawyer now, at this time, before any questions were asked. They were also told they had a right to remain silent, that they didn't have to answer any questions, and that if they desired a lawyer, the Court would appoint one for them. They were not told that if they could not afford a lawyer, one would be appointed for them or provided for them. They were also told that anything they said would be taken down and used against them in Court. They seemed more than willing, especially the one defendant, to get it off his chest. He told me that if it hadn't been for the man dying we would never have gotten anything out of him, but, he said, "The man is dead; I feel as though I'm half responsible for it, and I want to tell my side of it." He said, "I want to get if off my chest." He was asked if he wanted a lawyer, and he said, "What for? I'll get a lawyer when I go to Court. A lawyer can't help me now." In other words, apparently he wanted to confess. A statement was taken from him. The suspects were arraigned in Court, a preliminary hearing was held in City Court, a Grand Jury indictment followed, and, before the Grand Jury, the suspects statements were read and two witnesses were presented, the wife of the deceased, and a friend of the deceased who was an eye witness to the suspects' escape from the scene of the crime.

The suspects were each indicted on five counts of Murder in the First Degree. Trial was set for early last April, but was adjourned because one of the lawyers appointed by the Court withdrew and another lawyer was appointed and was given time by the Court to familiarize himself with the case. Before the case was ready to go to trial, June 13th arrived and the Supreme Court handed down their rulings in the Miranda case. The Miranda rule affected this particular case in the following manner: The attorneys naturally seized upon the opportunity to ask for a suppression hearing to suppress not only the statements taken from the defendants, but also the admissons made by them to the Police Officers on the return trip to Buffalo. This case had to be resubmitted to the Grand Jury and an indictment sought without the use of the statements.

A date was set for a suppression hearing, to be followed by a Huntley hearing. In the suppression hearing, the officers testified, both State Police and Buffalo Police officers, as to exactly what happened. The Buffalo officers testified they were unwilling listeners or witnesses to the admissions made by these defendants of their way back to Buffalo, but they had to listen because they were in the same car with the defendants and the defendants insisted upon telling someone of their crime, they were full of remorse, they wanted to get it off their chests, and, upon their return to Buffalo, I was informed by the officer in charge of the return detail that these defendants wished to talk to me and tell me everything that happened; that before a single question was put to these defendants, they were fully advised by me as to the admonitions handed down by the Supreme Court up to this date (August 1965). They were told they had a right to have an attorney; they had a right to have him then, at the time of the questioning; they had a right to remain silent; they didn't have to answer any questions; they didn't have to say anything. They were also told that anything they did say would be taken down in writing and could be used against them in a Court of Law.

In the statement of one defendant, Brown, that was the extent of the advice given him as to his rights. In the statement of the second defendant, Selwyn Lemon, he was told that if he wanted an attorney, one would be obtained for him. It came very close to fulfilling the admonition set forth under the Miranda rule.

The supression hearing before Judge Marshall was quite lengthy, and Judge Marshall ruled that the admissions made to the police officers on their trip back would be inadmissible. He called a conference with the District Attorney and myself, with regard to the statement of Lemon, and his advice to us was that it's very possible this statement could be admitted into evidence at the trial. He also said that if the defendants were convicted, there was a fifty-fifty chance of the decision being reversed on appeal.

A conference was held with the District Attorney, the Judge and myself, and the District Attorney said that if the statements were suppressed, it would weaken our case considerably.

At a conference between the defendants, their attorneys, the District Attorney, the Judge and myself, it was decided that the defendants would be permitted to plead to the lesser charge of Manslaughter in the First Degree. The facts warranted a prosecution for murder, but without the statements voluntarily made to the police officers it was doubtful the murder charge could be substantiated beyond a reasonable doubt. Had we been able to go to trial with the statements in effect, there is no doubt in my mind that these defendants would have been convicted of Murder in the First Degree. Their confessions were complete. They told everything about the crime, step by step, including the killing of the victim of their crime.

2. In this case, a fifteen-year-old boy stabbed to death a twelve-year-old boy during an argument one evening out on Chester Street. I first came in contact with this boy over at No. 6 Police Station. He was accompanied by his mother. I introduced myself to the boy and his mother, and told them I was there to talk to them about the events that had happened earlier in the evening. I said to them, "Before I ask you any questions, or before you give me any answers, I want to inform you that you are entitled to an attorney; you can have a lawyer present at this questioning; you don't have to answer any questions, and by that I mean you have a right to remain silent. Also, anything you say will be taken down in writing and may be used against you in a Court of Law. I further want you to understand that if you cannot afford a lawyer, one will be provided for you." With this, the mother of the boy spoke up and said, "I think that we should have a lawyer. We can't afford one, but if you say that you will give us one, I think we should have one." Thereupon, no questions were asked of her son with regard to his apparent participation in the killing.

This case went to Family Court. The boy was adjudged a Juvenile Delinquent, based on the allegations set forth in the petition that if he were an adult, he would have been convicted of Manslaughter in the First Degree.

I know that in my conversation with this boy and his mother, a voluntary statement would have been given had I been able to ask him questions. He wanted to tell the police what happened. If a statement had been taken from him, based on knowledge that I had of the facts of the case, it probably would have been exculpatory, and the boy not adjudged a delinquent.

3. In this case, still in litigation, a man was stabbed during an argument on the East Side. He was pronounced dead upon arrival at Emergency Hospital. A suspect was taken into custody about two and a half to three blocks from the scene of the crime, approximately ten minutes after the crime had occurred. I had instructed the officers who apprehended the suspect not to ask him any questions in any way. He was returned to the scene of the crime, and there was identified by witnesses who had been present at the time the stabbing took place. The suspect was taken to Police Headquarters, where I told him I wanted to ask him some questions with regard to his activities that day. I informed him he did not have to answer any questions, that he was entitled to a lawyer before he answered any questions, that he had a right to remain silent, that anything he said would be taken down and could be used against him in a Court of Law. At that time, he interrupted and said, "I can't afford a lawyer. I don't know any lawyers." I told him that if he could not afford a lawyer, one would be provided for him. He, in turn, said to me, "I think I'd better talk to a lawyer before I say anything." There were no further questions asked of this man, and a lawyer was provided for him.

4. In the case of Henry Scott, age 25, defendant, charged with Murder in the First Degree, Scott was arrested by the Homicide Bureau on January 31, 1966, for the slaying of Walter Alexander, age 37. Scott was indicted by a Grand Jury of Erie County on April 6th, 1966. The indictment was based on a statement given by Scott at the time of arrest, confessing to the acts constituting the crime of Murder in the First Degree and the indictment was set down on the trial calendar.

On June 13th, 1966, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down, on Writ of Certiorari, a decision in the case of Ernesto A. Miranda, Petitioner, State of Arizona, that affected the standing of several lawsuits, pending, by the Homicide Bureau and the District Attorney's Office, for trial. The defendant Scott was fully apprised of his rights at the time of his arrest, before the taking of any statement, oral or written. This conformed with the rules set down under Escobedo, but failed to set forth the indigency rule. In November 1966, Attorney Walentynowicz, for the Defendant Scott, was granted a suppression hearing before Judge Gaughn, to take place in the month of December 1966—but, an order had been signed by Judge Gaughn for an examination by Doctors Jennie D. Klein and Murray A. Yost of Meyer Hospital Staff, pursuant to Section 658 of the Cade of Criminal Procedure. It was the opinion of examiners that Henry Scott does not understand the charges against him and would not be able to participate in his defense. Had it not been thus, the defendant, Henry Scott, would have been freed, because his statement would have been suppressed as evidence at trial, under Miranda, and there was not enough other evidence to convict.

5. The case of Alberta Golivitzer, age 25, arrested February 3rd 1966, charged with Manslaughter in the First Degree, in the death of her son, Brian, 2 months old. A statement was taken from her at the time of her arrest, that conformed with Escobedo (U.S.), Gunner (N.Y.), Donovan (N.Y.), etc. She was indicted by the Grand Jury on 2/8/66, as charged and indictment was set down on the trial calender. On November 27, 1966, a suppression hearing was ordered and on appearance before Judge King of Supreme Court, in the County of Erie, a decision was handed down by him, suppressing the statement of the defendant and because the indictment was unsupported by independent evidence against the defendant, the indictment was dismissed because the statement revealed that the defendant Golivitzer was not advised that if she could not afford a lawyer that one would be provided for her, and that, if she so desired a lawyer, no further questions would be asked of her. The statement taken from her, at the time of her arrest, was good; it was only because of the admonitions set down under Miranda that it became fatal.

6. The case of Lowell Claxton, arrested November 11, 1965, age 40, charged with 483–B of the Penal Law (Carnal abuse of child over 10 and under 16 years of age) : Case tried in City Court of Buffalo on January 6th, 1966, before Judge Zimmer and defendant was convicted. At the time of his arrest, Claxton was advised of his rights under the then existing Escobedo rulings and he made oral admissions to the investigators of the Homicide Bureau. He refused to make a written statement. Claxton's conviction before Judge Zimmer of City Court of Buffalo was appealed by Attorney Peter Parino before Judge Marshall of the County Court of Erie, and due to errors made by the trial Judge of City Court, the conviction was set aside and a new trial was ordered and the case sent back to City Court. Attorney Parino applied for, and was granted, a hearing to suppress any statements or admissions made by Claxton at the time of his arrest. On February 28, 1967, in City Court of Buffalo, Judge Bellomo presided over the hearing to suppress. Attorney Parino invoked the Miranda rule, after questioning the arresting officers and bringing out before the Court the fact that his client had not been advised that, if he could not afford a lawyer, one would be provided for him, free of charge. Judge Bellomo suppressed any admissions or statements of Claxton, made to officers at the time of his arrest, and on motion by Attorney Parino the charge against the defendant was dismissed.

In my opinion, the recent admonitions set down by the Supreme Court in the Miranda ver. Arizona ruling, and the Escobedo case, have definitely adversely affected the workings of the police in the apprehension and questioning of suspects.

Respectfully,

LEO J. DONOVAN,
Chief, Homocide Bureau, Buffalo Police Department.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIRS: As a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, I was more than interested in your remarks to the Senate regarding recent Supreme Court Decisions, and your Senate Bill 674.

Law Enforcement officers are not only confused by some of the language of the Miranda Decision, but are further hampered by its application in our lower courts. As an example, a police officer recently contacted me regarding a police matter wherein two officers were interrogating a suspect. One of the officers carefully advised the suspect of his rights in the presence of the second officer. The accused was willing to talk. The second officer directed a question to the accused without personally (a second time) advising the accused of his rights. The Judge, in his wisdom, dismissed the case. I am sure that more specific examples could, if space permitted, be supplied.

Pertinent and valuable testimony during the hearing could be provided by Mr. Lewis B. Ambler, District Attorney, Bartlesville, Oklahoma.

Sincerely,

K. O. RAYBURN,
Director, Southwest Center for Law Enforcement Education.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: We would like to take this means to express our support of the legislation you have introduced with respect to the admissibility of evidence of confessions.

We feel that the judicial branch of government has, in many ways, taken over a legislative function when it sets forth specific rules for arrest procedure. It will, then, require legislation in order to correct the situation and to place this authority back into the hands of the legislative branch. This is not to say that there has been no abuse, and we understand that when a confession has been received as the result of coercion that the courts should invalidate the evidence. On the other hand, we feel that when the statement has been given freely and voluntarily, and when the evidence of guilt is unmistakable, the criminal should not be released due to a minor technicality.

We wish you every success in your endeavors in this regard, and we stand ready to assist in any way possible.

Very truly yours,

H. A. ELLSWORTH,
Chief of Police.

POLICE DEPARTMENT,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Your proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" has been well received by informed and concerned persons, both inside and outside of law enforcement. It must be agreed, as stated in the purpose of the bill, "Crime is essentially a local problem that must be dealt with by State and local governments." Many police agencies have achieved remarkable results in some of the areas of concern in your bill. Their efforts have pointed the way and indicate that with proper support, progress can be made. It is indeed heartening to know that legislation committing the power and resources of the Federal Government is proposed.

Your bill is of particular interest to the Newark Police Department at this time. Newark has consented to host the 1967 Northeast Grad Seminar of the Traffic Institute. The area involved encompasses eleven (11) states from Maryland north. As you probably know, the Traffic Institute is one of the leading police administration schools in the country.

Seminar sessions will be held on May 10th, 11th and 12th at the Military Park Hotel, Park Place, Newark. On the afternoon of May 11th we hope to schedule a panel discussion on "The Impact of the President's Crime Commission Report." Our hope is to obtain a highly qualified panel and panel chairman to discuss the import of this document.

We are attempting to enlist Fred Inbau of Northwestern University Law School as a panel member. William H. Franey of the International Association of Chiefs of Police is expected to represent that organization. The Office of Law Enforcement Assistance of the Justice Department is expected to participate. We expect that an outstanding law professor from a university in this area will participate.

This occasion presents a fine opportunity to obtain regional support for a measure which is urgently needed. We cordially invite your personal participation. If your busy schedule precludes your attendance, we request that one of the sponsors of the bill, or a qualified employee of the Committee on the Judiciary attend.

Sincerely yours,

OLIVER KELLY,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am in receipt of a Memorandum from Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the IACP regarding the proposed hearings of your Subcommittee scheduled for March 7th, 8th, and 9th, 1967. Atfer a careful review of Senate Bill 675, I am pleased to advise you that I support its enactment by Congress. This Bill if enacted as presently drafted, should make the McNabb-Mallory Rule more flexible.

There are certainly many learned men outside the law enforcement profession who subscribe to your recent comments before the U.S. Senate that:

"The U.S. Supreme Court—five members—a one man majority—are committed to the illogical pursuit of tenuous technicalities which it recklessly invokes to nullify the convictions of and to set free confirmed criminal to prey again on a victimized society."

Among them, Professor Fred E. Inbau, Northwestern University School of Law recently said:

"The Court's one man majority was going to continue to 'Play God' and 'Play God' it did in its June 1966 decision in Miranda vs Arizona (384 U.S. 436)."

How unfortunate that the architects of the National Crime Commission in its report "The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society" did not see fit to explore areas which were not considered explicitly in the report itself. These relate to the difficult and perplexing problems arising from certain of the constitutional limitations upon our system of criminal justice. This in the face of the fact that in some of the recent notorious decisions, the subjects were released to be again arrested for the commission of a second crime. As Chief Thomas Cahill of San Francisco, a member of the Commission, said on a recent television program,:

"I think that in some cases we have forgotten the victim of crime and the victim is also a member of society."

Most recently in New York, State Supreme Court Justice Michael Kern, in freeing one, Jose Suarez, a confessed murderer of six people, his wife and his five small children, said: "even an animal such as this one—and I think it would be insulting the animal kingdom—must be clothed with all these safeguards. This is a very sad thing. It is repulsive; it makes any human being's blood run cold and his stomach turn to let a thing like this out on the streets."

According to the World Journal Tribune of February 21st, 1967, Brooklyn District Attorney Aaron Koota said that ten (10) criminals have been freed as a result of the Miranda decision. He also said that 130 out of 316 suspects questioned refused to make any statements as a result of the Miranda ruling and were released.

Unfortunately, I am unable at this time to provide you with specific examples of cases affected by these recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in this jurisdiction.

I would suggest that following officials from this area as most qualified to provide valuable testimony during your hearings:

1. New Jersey Attorney General Arthur J. Sills
   State House
   Trenton, New Jersey
2. Essex County Prosecutor Brendan T. Byrne
   Essex County Court House
   Newark, New Jersey.

Please be assured that you have my continued support in your efforts to combat crime and improve law enforcement in this Country.

Very truly yours,

OLIVER KELLY,
Chief of Police.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In reading over the President's Challenge of Crime in a Free Society I find some recommendations that are rather disturbing.

Number one is the disarming of the Police officers in traffic control, also the initiation of community service officers who cannot qualify for strict Police qualifications, the use of federal funds, the suggestion of a national pension system, the deletion of civil service work, employment of non-police personnel without Police training, the encouragement of lateral movement of Police personnel, a nationwide retirement system being devised that permits the transferring of retirement credits.

Acting Attorney General Ramsey Clark has notified the House Rules Committee that the Federal Government feels it has complete power to order the reassignment of teachers, professors, or members of the staff of any educational institutions receiving Federal assistance if there is any reason to believe that "racial allocation of faculty" denies to students "equally of educational opportunity."

I think it would be advisable if you would investigate this matter, for I, for one, feel that once law enforcement begins to accept Federal subsidies, then the local government and the people have lost control. The same people who were involved in the writing and recommendations of this crime report were also strong for the Civilian Review Boards. The Police won this battle, let us not lose it by seeking these funds. If necessary, a campaign on the local levels should be made to inform the citizens. The best way to support your Police Department is to do it through local funds, because they are going to pay for these programs by paying to the Federal Government who will, in turn, disburse these funds back to local governments, except this time you play ball in their ball park and their type of ball game.

I would appreciate hearing from you regarding my comments and particularly if you are able to evaluate the statement by Ramsey Clark pertaining to the educational field.

This Department is ordering twenty-five copies of the report by the President's Commission on law enforcement and administration of justice.

Yours very truly,

DANA L. HUMMER,

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: This Department is in receipt of a letter from Quinn Tamm, Executive Director, International Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc., requesting information be forwarded to your office relative to the views of Police Chiefs throughout the country on the controversial Miranda case.

It is my opinion that the recent Supreme Court rulings have had an overly sharp, adverse effect in our efforts to clear felony cases, charge subjects implicated in such cases and to convict them in our courts after they have been charged.

We have noted a marked decline in the area of interrogation of suspects of felony cases. Many, many cases are lost because the investigating officers are unable to come up with the very necessary reasonable grounds required to arrest the suspect, and as a result all interrogation of the suspect must be done in surroundings that are adverse and often impossible for the investigating officers. Interrogation in the past, handled in a civil and humane manner, was responsible for the clearance of at least seventy-five per cent of our felony cases. At the present time, operating strictly under the new rulings, interrogation has been responsible for probably twenty-five per cent of our clearances and this is only with the grace of the courts in accepting our statements. We find more and more subjects refusing to talk, even to the extent of refusing to give their names to our investigators,

As a result of this needless and extreme granting of so-called "rights" to the individual, which in our case is mainly the criminal, our investigators are forced to rely on physical evidence, witnesses, and circumstantial evidence to make a chargeable case. This is often impossible as such evidence and witnesses are more often than not, not present.

While our County Attorney has been very good in the issuance of complaints, he too is bound by present rulings as to when and where complaints can be issued.

In our preliminary court we find we are getting repeated dismissals of cases upon grounds that would indicate decisions far beyond the mandate of our Supreme Court and its new rulings.

Not only does this Department feel that this is true as all four of our District Court judges have stated that such rulings are not reasonable and are not included in any manner in the meaning or text of the new rulings by our U.S. Supreme Court.

We find that in all of our courts the case is now tried on technicalities of the violation of the subject's rights rather than the evidence submitted in the case.

There is no question that the rulings have curtailed the efforts of all police officers in their efforts against crime to a very great degree. This is basically because of fear for themselves for false arrest, lack of a clear set of rules of operation by any court or judge. This is the result of a complex new set of rules by our Supreme Court that even the higher judges in our country cannot agree on as to their true intent or meaning.

The only suggestion I can make in regard to this confused situation is that the public, our Police Departments, courts, etc., protest to the U.S. Congress until this body takes action to limit our Supreme Court to the reasonable rulings in individual cases rather than the creating of new laws without the authority by our same constitution to do so.

Law enforcement people throughout the country will be watching very closely the appointment of a new Supreme Court justice. I, personally, feel that the President's greatest liability in his quest for re-election will be his appointment of Justice Fortas, which has swung the balance of power to the liberal majority. If the President picks another Liberal, who in his thinking is as far afield in his quest for individual rights, then we are certainly not going to have a free society.

Yours very truly,

DANA L. HUMMER,
Chief of Police.

TORRANCE, CALIF., March 4, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

SIR: I welome this opportunity to express our views and experiences in dealing with the various Supreme Court decisions and their effects on the apprehension, prosecution, and conviction of criminals. To say that these decisions have not greatly affected the efforts of law enforcement officers in the battle against the rising crime rate would be to indulge in a costly form of vanity. These decisions, particularly the Miranda, have caused a great deal of confusion not only among law enforcement officers but among the Judiciary, each Judge in many cases having his own interpretation of its meaning and intent.

We have, as have other law enforcement agencies, experienced instances where self-confessed persons have gone free due to an interpretation as to when suspicion had focused on those persons. In the field of narcotic enforcement this has been particularly evident with such problems as Search and Seizure, Probable Cause, and Divulging the Identity of Informants.

The following are cases in point that exemplify some of the problems we are experiencing:

Suspects

Bazer, Billy Ray (Case number D.R. 2215–67) Douglas, Donald Jack.

Charge

Grand Theft Auto.

Date of arrest

Feb. 67.

Facts

Officers, while on routine patrol, received radio dispatch that a certain vehicle located at a service station was possibly stolen and being stripped. Officers responded to the call, at which time Billy Ray Bazer was contacted. At this point, officers made inquiries into the allegations. The defendant at this time told officers that he had removed certain parts from a vehicle which he described as a 1949 Oldsmobile. The defendant then made statements involving Donald Jack Douglas' knowledge of the vehicle in question. When both defendants were confronted with each others stories, both admitted knowledge of the vehicle in question and of having parts of that vehicle in their possession, but they denied that that vehicle was stolen. An arrest was not effected at this point due to the officers not having information that the vehicle in question was in fact stolen. The officers then left the location and returned a short while later, at which time Billy Ray Bazer stated that the vehicle was stolen and gave the location of the vehicle. The vehicle was then located a short time later, and the victim verified its being stolen. Officers then effected the arrest of both defendants and advised them of their rights as prescribed by Miranda.

Case Disposition

(Preliminary Trial.) Case dismissed. Court ruled that both defendants should have been advised of their rights upon the original conversation with officers.

Suspects

Rivera, Rudy Ralph (Case number D.R. 11696–66), Chavez, Jesus Perol (Case number D.R. 11921–66).

Charge

Illegal use of Heroin (11721 H&S).

Dates of arrest

4 Aug. 66, 8 Aug. 66, respectively.

Facts

Both defendants were arrested for Traffic Warrants. Both defendants were advised of their rights as per Miranda upon arrest for above warrants. Subsequent to the arrests, physical evidence of the illegal use of heroin was observed by Narcotic Officers. The additional narcotic violation was added to both defendants' bookings. In both cases admissions were obtained subsequent to the defendants being advised of their rights, establishing their usage and the venue of the crime.

Case Disposition

Case dismissed. Court ruled that arresting officers did not use proper terminology during that portion regarding the defendants' right to have an attorney present during any questioning. According to the Court the officer erred when he stated that, "You have the right to the services of an attorney during all stages of the proceedings against you." Court ruled that the officer should have said, "You have the right to the services of an attorney prior to any questioning."

I hope this information will be of assistance in your efforts to clarify many of these problems; and if this agency can be of any further assistance, do not hesitate to call upon us.

Respectfully,

WALTER R. KOENIG,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have been advised by the International Association of Chiefs of Police of the forthcoming U.S. Senate Subcommittee hearings regarding recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of local law enforcement agencies.

I appreciate your great interest in law enforcement problems and applaud your courage in standing up to the "illogical pursuit of tenuous technicalities" imposed upon local law enforcement by the Supreme Court.

While time has not permitted me to submit a detailed recommendation regarding changes in criminal laws and procedures, I urge you to include in your proposals a law permitting the controlled use of wire tapping by legitimate law enforcement agencies and a stiff penalty for unauthorized use of wiretapping.

As research is completed, I will submit more detailed recommendations to your committee regarding other phases of law enforcement.

Again, thank you for your interest in our problems.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The Lake County, Indiana Law Enforcement Council, composed of all Chiefs of Police, the County Prosecutor, and the Sheriff, has been heartened by your recent speech before the Senate of the United States.

It is felt that the recent Supreme Court decisions in many cases, have rendered the police ineffective in dealing with problems confronting them daily.

It is quite obvious that many local crimes such as aggravated assaults, vehicle taking, purse snatching, strong arm robbery, rapes and burglaries, will go unsolved unless the suspected perpetators can be questioned concerning these matters.

It is further believed that a cruel hoax is being played upon the local police of the nation, by permitting many youths to engage and continue to engage in criminal activities until "court room" evidence can be gathered for successful prosecution.

We appeal to you, Senator, to continue your efforts in this direction, and bring to an end the chaotic and demoralizing conditions, which exist in every police station of the nation.

You have my whole-hearted support. It is gratifying to know that positive action is being taken at the Legislative level on behalf of Law Enforcement.

It behooves Law Enforcement to improve and refine their investigative ability. Law enforcement should not try to hide behind permissive legislation. But, if the present dangerous trend of Supreme Court decisions is not stopped, and if possible, reversed, Law Enforcement will be dealt a crippling blow from which it may never recover.

I'm very much impressed with your decision of bringing up this hearing by U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure, March 7, 8 and 9, regarding U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement. I think this is the best news I've heard since this decision of the Miranda case was handed down.

This decision has handcuffed Police Officers throughout the U.S., in fulfilling their obligations to the citizens in protecting their property, rights and person against lawlessness which has become the number one topic in society today.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In reply to your letter of February 21st I am happy to enclose a statement in support of bills S. 674 and S. 675 which you sponsored. By nature I am not a verbose individual, but on subjects about which I harbor strong feelings it is difficult to contain myself, although I did try to keep the statement within reasonable bounds.

It was most pleasant hearing from you, Sir. Writing to you has been my first experience of this nature, and while I am not a resident of your state, nor a member of your political party, I have long been one of your admirers and felt impelled to contact you. This has helped convince me that people should take a more direct interest in their elected representatives in the halls of government at all levels, other than faithfully exercising my franchise at the polls.

I am taking the liberty of enclosing two clippings from the Los Angeles Times, one by an editorial page writer and the other a news item regarding some pending legislation on a state level at Sacramento, which you may find interesting. While not in agreement with all the opinions expressed in the editorial article, I do heartily concur with those of new Los Angeles Police Chief Thomas Reddin on the role of the police, and those propounded by Dean Lohman of the School of Criminology, University of California, Berkeley. As to the news item about seeking state funds to increase police pay—this may be construed as very liberal and idealistic by many, but in my opinion is a far-reaching proposal with merit. While my career as a law enforcement officer may be over before these proposals are enacted into law, the need here and now. Law enforcement is striving for professional status and how better can educated and dedicated men and women be recruited into our ranks by upgrading of salaries and raising of standards?

U.S. Senate,
Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: Speaking as a long time law enforcement officer, I wish to state that I am heartily in favor of S. 674, a bill with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions in criminal cases; and of S. 675, a bill which would outlaw all wiretapping except in cases involving the national security and in investigations of organized crime by law enforcement officers, under proper court supervision. America needs legislation such as this, and more, in this era of space age crime, to remove some of the shackles binding law enforcement in the proper performance of its duties.

Crime is a national disgrace making deeper inroads each year, and costing many billions of dollars which could be better spent in other endeavors. Public apathy and indifference have long aided the cause of the criminal, and unless there comes an awakening to this problem, civilization as we know it will cease to be. Perhaps this is what our enemies from within and without are waiting for! I am truly thankful that we have men of character and high principles in our Senate who are willing to face this and other problems, by offering leadership on a national level which others may follow, in efforts to preserve our great American heritage.

My career in law enforcement spans a period of 28½ years on a police department which has grown to employ 780 personnel, in a city of 375,000, and the second largest city in the great megalopolis that makes up Los Angeles County, California. In progressing through the ranks via promotion examinations my experience has covered the many facets of a police officer's service, both in supervisory and administrative capacities, and for the past six years I have served as Captain of Detectives, with 78 personnel in my division.

With the foregoing in mind, I feel qualified to express my opinions on this pending legislation, and wish to commend Senator John L. McClellan for the firm stand he has taken in this regard. Obviously, much thought and consideration went into the preparation of bills S. 674 and S. 675, and merit no amending or changing on my part.

Yours very truly,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: As a U. S. citizen and resident of the state of California I wish to commend you for the forthright stand you have chosen to take regarding the crime situation in this country of ours. It will take concerted effort on the part of national leaders such as yourself to awaken the American public from the apathy afflicting it, before it is too late.

For the past 28½ years I have been engaged in law enforcement work, and can readily see, as you do, the losing battle being fought by police and prosecutor alike. Granted that there have been abuses by law enforcement in the past and that some court decisions were necessary to correct them, but by the same token, a balance should be struck between the rights of society and those of the accused—something which is sadly lacking now. It seems as long as we have a 5–4 ultra liberal majority on the U.S. Supreme Court that the pendulum will continue to swing away from that necessary balance. I cannot find it within myself to believe that our founding fathers who wrote our Constitution would ever condone some of the interpretations put upon its passages.

When the makeup of the President's Commission on Crime was first released, I was disappointed to note that only one professional policeman, the chief of police of San Francisco, was a member. Now one wonders how much impact the Commission's findings will have on the crime scene as a whole, and what will be done to implement them.

With the strong voice you exert in the Senate and the Congress, Senator McClellan, I feel sure that definite progress will be made, and hope and pray that right thinking people in this country will rally 'round you and others like you

With best wishes for your good health and well being, I remain

DEAR SIR: Law abiding citizens have every right to be concerned over the rapid rise in the crime rate. Each day there is an increase in the citizen's chance of becoming a victim of crime. Even if they are not involved they are exposed to the higher cost of crime, inadequate police protection, lessening of their personal liberties, and the ever present fear for their life and property.

The plight of the law enforcement officer whose duty it is to protect life and property is becoming more and more difficult. The law enforcement effectiveness is being curtailed by some recent U. S. Supreme Court rulings.

The citizens in many parts of the United States are now paying because of some of the recent Supreme Court rulings that seem to serve the purpose of throwing protection around the criminal. Those who think that the police officer can cope with crime under these conditions should try to question a criminal. The police depend a great deal on their ability to interview and interrogate. Approximately seventy per cent (70%) of the major crimes are solved by interviews and confessions.

Locally in the City of Huntington, West Virginia, our criminal judge will not allow a confession or statement entered as evidence in his court even if the officer has obtained a waiver.

The responsibility of a police officer is great. The police officer's daily task is not one of research, nor are his decisions made in the quiet of the Judge's Chambers with time to arrive at a decision with all the rules and guidelines to study. Instead, his decision is made hurriedly and most often amidst disorder and confusion. Not only must the officer protect the innocent, find the guilty, but he must also protect the public. Ours is a government of laws—not men. Woodrow Wilson once said. "The first duty of the law is to keep sound the society it serves."

The law enforcement officer today already has a greater responsibility than he can fully understand and is capable of discharging. We feel the Scales of Justice have been dipped too far in favor of the criminal. You are in the position of possibly bringing the scales more in balance and giving the officer an equal chance. You can be assured of our one hundred percent (100%) cooperation in this mutual effort.

Sincerely,

G. H. KLEINKNECHT,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I would like to take this opportunity to express some of my views on the current recent actions of the U.S. Supreme Court. I feel as I believe do most police officers, that the Supreme Court is going far beyond the bounds within which it was intended to operate as established originally.

It has always been my understanding that there were 3 distinct divisions within our field, those being, legislative, judicial and enforcement. Under present conditions it certainly appears to me that the Supreme Court has gone far beyond the bounds of judicial restraint and that it's decisions in recent times have been and are being accepted as legislation.

There is certainly something wrong when a court, such as that, after considering all evidence and technicalities for several months, then renders a decision and usually by a majority of one, that completely reverses the findings of lower courts and refutes the intelligence and abilities of all police officers in the United States.

There is no question that the recent decisions handed down by the Supreme Court have made our work much more difficult. Confessions are almost a thing of the past on major crimes today. Too many admitted criminals are now being released back into the public even though there has been no questions of their guilt at any time during their trial or subsequent appeals. These persons are being released back into the public even though there has been no question of their guilt what to expect when he makes an arrest even though he may follow all the guide lines now established by the Supreme Court and safeguard as completely as possible all of the rights of the accused person. The Supreme Court may, while that person is waiting trial, render a new decision that makes that officer's actions at the time of arrest inadequate.

At a time when crime is increasing more rapidly than ever and at a time when we are trying to attract more police applicants with a college education, these decisions make our work just that much harder. No well educated man is going to enter into the police service bearing the handicaps of low pay, poor working conditions and in addition to that the extreme restrictions under which they are now expected to operate as established by the Supreme Court.

It is certainly my feeling that any legislation that would tend to narrow some of the operations of the U.S. Supreme Court or to strengthen in any way the position of the police officers in criminal matters would be invaluable.

I would like to enclose a copy of the forms we must use within my county in Oregon when we begin to question a suspect or a person arrested for any reason. I only ask if you believe that anyone in his right mind would agree to answer any questions after having had these forms read to him, after reading the forms himself and then after signing the forms in all of the different required places.

I certainly agree that there must be restrictions in the law to protect fully the rights of all persons, but I do believe that under present circumstances and within the near future it is going to be necessary to introduce legislation to protect more fully the rights of the victims of these criminals that are now being returned to society.

Very truly yours,

HUGH H. WILKINSON,
Chief of Police.

We are police officers. We wish to talk to you about a crime. These are your constitutional rights. Read them carefully. You will be asked if you understand them. You will be given a copy to keep.

1. You have the right to remain silent. You do not have to say anything, write any statement or answer any questions.
2. Anything you say and any statement you write can be used against you in court to prove that you have committed a crime. This is true even if you are a minor.

4. Any conversation with us is under your control. If you choose to talk to us, you can answer some questions, not answer others, and end the conversation whenever you wish.

Re: Psychology.

Hon. JOHN. L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The hearings will be followed with much interest by the public. Your committees command much respect.

Time will not permit me to elaborate at length, so I will confine my remarks to the Miranda Decision, and in brief:

Miranda, in all of its aspects, if followed to the letter of intent, will have the effect of stripping the Police Service of its most effective tool. (Psychological Inquiry).

Interrogations are responsible for the successful conclusion of crime investigation. Contrary to what has been said, interrogation plays an important roll in every police operation.

In the Miranda Decision, it was pointed out that the illiterate and uneducated would be the most helped by the decision.

This is not quite the situation. Such persons, along with the first offender, are usually anxious to clear the conscience by revealing their guilt.

The profssional criminal is quick to exercise his right of silence, but was vulnerable to reasonable police inquiry.

I feel sure that our records will verify these statements, based on 30 years of experience, 14 years in the rank, 16 years as Chief of Police.

Respectfully,

K. C. ALVAREZ,
Chief of Police.

MARIPOSA, CALIF., March 1, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director, IACP, has informed me that you are considering changes that will redirect the effects of the Miranda decision and others like it, to a more sane approach toward criminal justice throughout the United States, and presently seek whatever evidence or testimony that will assist your committee toward that end.

May I suggest that your committee initiate the ratification of an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that will include procedures along the lines of those parts of the California Constitution that read:

Art. I, Sec. 13, California Const.: "in any criminal case, whether the defendant testifies or not, his failure to explain or to deny by his testimony any evidence or facts in the case against him may be commented upon by the court and by counsel, and may be considered by the court or the jury" (Nov. 6, 1934).

Art. VI, Sec. 4½, California Const.: "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any errors to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice" (adopted November 3, 1914).

Note: Art. I, Sec. 13, as quoted above was decided violative of the Fifth Amendment by the U.S. Supreme Court in Griffin v. California as made applicable by the Fourteenth in Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 Pp. 610-615.

I suggest an amendment to the U.S. Constitution because the current line of decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court is contrary to what has long been thought to be an accurate interpretation of the Bill of Rights, namely that the Bill of Rights applied to the United States, and that the exercise of police power rested exclusively with the several States.

That thinking is found in the Federalist Papers. Obviously, Madison and Hamilton were familiar with the tradition that the English Parliament legislated and the English courts decided, it being unthinkable that the English courts would decide an Act of Parliament as unconstitutional, so "Congress shall make no law" as we find that quote in the Bill of Rights applied to the United States government.

Now, as matters stand, the Tenth Amendment is a dead thing, and if the present tendency of the U.S. Supreme Court continues, the several States will soon be mere administrative districts of the United States, contrary to the original concept of those who wrote the U.S. Constitution.

Since the U.S. Supreme Court regularly undertakes to decide Acts of Congress as unconstitutional, I hope for an amendment to the U.S. Constitution that will stay the hand of that court in matters of criminal law that are as just as our compatriots can make them, just to see how ingenious the U.S. Supreme Court can be in an effort to declare such an amendment unconstitutional.

May every success attend your efforts in this matter.

Cordially,

ARTHUR C. HOHMANN,
Deputy Chief of Police,
Los Angeles Police Department (Retired).

CITY OF SAN BUENAVENTURA,
Ventura, Calif., March 3, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing in support of your efforts to broaden the admissibility of evidence in court cases where confessions are considered. Recognizing that you have limited time to read communications such as this, I will briefly state the following:

(1) I recognize the need to have courts conduct an intensive search for truth in considering the merit of evidence to be allowed in a particular court case. However, the trial of a given matter and the attendant search for truth should not be so technical that obviously valuable evidence is excluded from consideration by those seeking the truth in a disputed case.

(2) The attached newspaper clipping is typical evidence of the damage that is being done by an over-technical approach to the law at the expense of the search for truth.

I wholeheartedly endorse your efforts to increase the protection afforded citizens by updating our laws.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID PATRICK GEARY,
Chief of Police.

OKLAHOMA CITY POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Oklahoma City, Okla., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I join with, I am certain, the overwhelming majority of law enforcement officers in wishing success for your efforts to improve the condition under which officers must operate. While there is an abundance of groups and individuals arguing the cause of the criminal, there is a dearth of such advocates on the side of law and order.

For too many years, the psyche of social welfare has been allowed to supplant social responsibility and one of the results is reflected in a growth of lawlessness that threatens the roots of this nation in a way exceeding the wildest dreams of the international communist conspiracy. The most recent example of this philosophy was evidenced in the Miranda decision, but despite the notoriety of Miranda, it would be inaccurate to blame much of what is now history on that or indeed, any single ruling of the Court.

Too often, in fact ordinarily, the concern of society has been with protecting the rights of accused, including analyzing his subconscious, without regard for the rights of society or the victim of crime. If, as some say, the criminal is the produce of his environment, then what of the other and much larger public that is of this same environment but respects the law? Responsibility, or the absence thereof, is the difference between orderly and lawless society.

A second element appears in the recent decision of the Supreme Court: that is the obvious and announced intent to "control" the police. Repeated reference is made to the Wickersham Crime Report of the early 1930s as though law enforcement had not had enough sense to change one whit in over thirty years.

The Court has confused the undestandable desire of the framers of this Constitution to escape oppression at the hands of a foreign king with the right of a housewife to escape assault in the parking lot of a supermarket.

Consider the "police" that were known to colonial times and imagine their effectiveness in any matter of more consequence that discovering a fire. The power was then and is now in the military establishment. The police are neither capable nor desirous of overthrowing the government. They are capable of enforcing the criminal laws but are not allowed to do so. The early distrust of the Crown has been transferred to the police operating in a field foreign to that which gave rise to the historical distrust. To this mania to control the police has been added the psyche of social welfare so that now a man is not even responsible for what he says, much less what he does, and especially so if he says he did it and can show that he is of humble origin or is a member of a minority.

The "blameless" philosophy is exemplified in the bit of doggerel by the unknown author who paraphrased the story of Tom the Piper's Son to show the current thinking of those who say the criminal is the misunderstood product of physiological trauma, as follows:

"The pig has hissed, but Tom was kissed
And sent to see a psychiatrist."

This sounds extreme and even silly, but really is this not the case when automobile owners are told that they are to blame for car thefts by virtue of leaving their vehicles unattended? Such thinking zeros in with deadly accuracy on the entire system of property rights as known in this nation. It is but a matter of degree to shift the blame for bank robbery to those wicked bankers who have all that money lying around . . . and besides, it's all insured so nobody really gets hurt!

The insurance is a story by itself. It has advanced to such a degree that it would come as no surprise if a professional thief's policy were placed on the market with low monthly premium, providing a policy to cushion the impact of arrest with its attendant inconvenience and expenses. (Ultimately, I suppose the "Company" would provide a substitute to serve the "insured's" time if all legal appeals failed.)

This department has noticed, as I am sure have others, a growing trend by victims of crime, especially national chain stores, to provide only sketchy details of crimes which appear to have their base in some sort of company policy related to the concept that whether solved or unsolved, the loss is insured and if solved, there could be repercussions in the form of law suit, producing of records, witness time away from the job, intimidation of witnesses, and other related phenomena. If the police feel that they are in some way being "used" it is because they know that the insurance companies uniformly require that crime be reported before a settlement can be made. We receive daily numerous reports of crimes that were discovered days and sometimes weeks earlier. The delay is explained by the victim when he reports that his company required that the incident be reported to the police. The age of insurance and irresponsibility seems to be upon and a part of us. There is hope though that a distinction can be made that will distinguish between asocial acts and anti-social acts.

Whether a man pay his bills, support his children, work for a living or not do these things should have no bearing on his personal responsibility if he decides to steal, rob, rape or murder. There is a difference between flunking school and stealing cars. There is a difference between assembly and petition and looting and burning. Illiteracy should not be confused with burglary. Surely, the United States of America and the several states have the ability and the sovereign right to make such distinctions that will prevent establishment, on an all-encompassing front, of a police state but will assure responsibility for those acts which have, since recorded time, been crimes. It is perfectly reasonable to set all sorts of technical rules around technical crimes. It is an absurdity to so surround crimes at common-law.

Sincerely yours,

HILTON GEER,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: Thank you for your request asking for my views and suggestions regarding the decisions of the Supreme Court. Although many of the decisions of the Supreme Court have affected the Police Service, I doubt whether all of them collectively have caused an impact such as the Miranda decision.

It seems to me that the Supreme Court has attempted to right the wrongs of a few policemen by penalizing all of us. There is no denying that many citizens were denied their constitutional rights before we started to train our men; there is no denying that many policemen guarded the citizen's constitutional rights and obtained convictions through the practice of proper investigation techniques, thus giving society proper protection and service—these officers have been slapped down for doing a good job for the actions of a few.

It seems inconceivable that we, as police officers, are not allowed to question a suspect without the suspect's counsel present. Are we allowed to be present when the suspect confers with his attorney?

I do not advocate an unreasonable period of time for questioning, however, it seems that we should be allowed a sufficient period of time to question a suspect in proper surroundings, without interference from outside sources. Proper questioning will many times eliminate suspicions from a subject completely. Proper questioning will many times solve a case in a very short time. Thus, with proper questioning, under proper conditions, without interference or outside influences, we would be able to serve the citizens of our City in the manner they demand.

How are crimes to be solved when the required evidence is non existent?

We are not asking for complete freedom in our investigations; we are asking for realistic procedures that we can follow with the knowledge that our properly conducted investigations will be accepted and not thrown out of court by a technicality.

Yours very truly,

HAROLD W. MILLER,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have been informed of your introduction of Senate Bill 674 seeking to amend Title 18 of the United States Code.

May I join the thousands of other law enforcement officers in this country in giving you every possible support in this endeavor. We feel strongly that Supreme Court decisions in the area of Escobedo, Miranda, and other unnecessarily restrict the best efforts of law enforcement nationwide.

For your information, I am also writing to the Senate representatives from from California.

DEAR SIR: May I take this brief moment to express my appreciation to you and your committee for the sincere efforts and expenditures of so much time and energy in behalf of the community welfare and promotion of better law enforcement for this nation. I would heartily encourage you not to become dispaired in the face of so many vociferous defenders of criminal liberties. As usual, those who are in favor of and desire quiet justice do not often speak loudly until pushed over the brink of disaster.

Now we are being faced with imminent disaster unless the courts recognize the predominant desire of a human being to issue confession to clear his own mind. I believe the original intention of the courts were to insure justice to all parties and to seek the truth. Unless the truth in total evaluation and merit is accepted and acknowledged by the courts, our form of freedom for the pursuit of happiness for the law abiding citizen will perish.

E. A. CARLSON,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have just received a communique from Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the IACP, regarding your Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, which is scheduled to begin hearings on March 7, 8, and 9, 1967, concerning U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement.

It is indeed gratifying to know that such an outstanding and respected legislature as yourself, is interested in the law enforcement officer's plight to rectify the recent Court decisions.

I want to compliment you and the members of your committee on this undertaking, and you may be assured that I stand willing to do whatever I can to assist you in this endeavor.

I have instructed the members of my staff to conduct a survey of all of our recent cases which have been affected by these decisions, and the report is to be forwarded to you prior to March 3, 1967.

As Chairman of the New England State Police Administrators, I am also bringing this correspondence to each Administrator's attention so that we may, as a body, go on record as supporting your committee.

Assuring you of my desire to cooperate at all times in matters of mutual interest, I am

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As a Chief of Police I can attest to the effect on law enforcement of the late U.S. Supreme Court in general, and the Miranda Decision in particular.

I would certainly support any review of these late findings of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The releasing of confirmed criminals is much more of a threat than any crimes which these individuals could commit. It has already done serious damage to any deterrent effect the punishment of criminals might have had.

I will not join with those who are blindly criticizing the U.S. Supreme Court. I have too much respect for our judicial system. Neither do I share the panic shown by some over the direct effect these rulings have had on integration and other standard police procedures and techniques.

The thing that frightens me is, I feel that the U.S. Supreme Court has more support from the American citizen than anyone dares admit. I welcome and support any and every objective inquiry, study or appraisal of these rulings in question. I feel strongly that such inquiries, studies or appraisals should be as public as possible.

We are faced with much more than the reckoning with the illogical pursuit of a five member—one man majority court. We must contend with the illogical pursuit of many American citizens who can see the need for good effective law enforcement only when they themselves are the victims of some criminal act.

I am certain that adjustments at the U.S. Supreme Court level will help with immediate problems of law enforcement as it relates to daily public protection. However, I am just as certain that in the long run, without a basic change in trust of the average American citizen toward local law enforcement, adjustments on the Supreme Court level will serve only to pacify the situation.

I see more future with the programs aimed at directly upgrading local law enforcement. You can not demand respect by a court ruling, you must gain it. Hopefully, these programs will assist local law enforcement to a new level. A level of respect and trust by the American citizen. Until such time that a policeman is looked upon in the same light as a doctor, a lawyer or a teacher, I am afraid that our present day situation will continue.

Respectfully,

JAMES POLLARD,
Chief of Police.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,
Beverly Hills, Calif., March 1, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Wish to commend you for your efforts in trying to restore common-sense and reason in Court actions regarding criminals. It is, indeed, disturbing for Law Enforcement Officers to see guilty persons released on minor technicalities.

Despite the criticism of Law Enforcement Officers, they are doing their best under extreme handicaps, and criminal statistics show that crime is increasing much faster than the population and in the average metropolitan cities, persons do not attempt to walk on the street at night time. No one seems to be concerned about the rights of law abiding citizens and some reasonable laws will have to be made to allow Police Officers to interrogate suspects and a reasonable time limit placed on keeping suspects in custody.

When a person wilfully violates the laws of the nation or the states, he certainly is not entitled to a protective cloth during this period of time. I am certain that our founding fathers never intended it that way. They are entitled to the due process of law and in impartial trial but the constitution was never intended to be used by unscrupulous lawyers to inject suspicion or accusations in order to cover up the guilt of the defendant.

Wishing you success in your program, I remain

Sincerely,

CHIEF C. H. ANDERSON,
Past President, California Police Chiefs' Association.

AUSTIN, TEX., March 3, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The following information is respectfully submitted in response to your request that the members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police state their views concerning the effect of recent Supreme Court rulings such as Miranda v. Arizona on their efforts to effectively enforce the criminal statutes in their respective communities.

Your introduction of S.674 to amend Title 18, USC with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions strikes at the very heart of the major problem of all law enforcement agencies in protecting the life and property of their citizens.

May I direct your attention to my letter to you of December 17, 1965 which was in response to your inquiry of December 3, 1965 concerning the bill that you had pending in the Senate at that time, S.2578, Standardizing the Admissibility of Voluntary Confessions? At that time I mentioned that our Texas Legislature, just six months prior to that date had enacted a new Code of Criminal Procedure. This new Code, under Article 15.17, established the requirement that before any arrested person could be questioned by an officer he must be taken "immediately" before a magistrate who would warn him of his rights to an attorney and, in fact, if he had no attorney one would be appointed for him without charge.

An amendment to this statute is now pending in the current session of our Legislature which will emphasize even further the advisability of such person having an attorney appointed for him before he discloses information of any kind to a police officer. As a matter of fact, we are today experiencing difficulties with court appointed attorneys who endeavor to refuse to even allow their clients to be properly identified and booked before obtaining their release on bond.

Such statutes and amendments are sponsored by members of our legislature who specialized in the practice of criminal law. Many of these parties have openly admitted that they are anticipating future rulings of the Supreme Court and purposely intend that our State statutes in these matters shall extend beyond the requirements now contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

I am sure that you are already well aware that, in the State of Texas only the written confessions of a defendant are admissible in evidence against him. No oral statements are admissible unless made in the presence of a magistrate and are properly recorded and witnessed.

The instances where criminals are now walking the streets as free men after having committed the crime of murder without witnesses exist in virtually every section of the Nation. In all of these cases the only available evidence against them would be their confession if it would be admissible under our existing rules of evidence.

Crimes of this nature are relatively insignificant, however, when we consider the restrictive effect of these rules of evidence on various other types of crime which effect a much larger segment of our citizenry. I refer to the crimes of theft and burglary.

It has always been one of the most basic principles of police procedure to endeavor to clear up as many of these crimes as possible by interrogation of the arrested person and, particularly, to recover the stolen property and return it to its rightful owners. Further, this practice has had a salutary effect on the potential rehabilitation of the criminal by enabling him to confess all of his crimes and plead guilty to only one of the many offenses he has committed.

Under our present system, however, only a very strong-willed person can withstand the repeated warnings and urgings of a magistrate to not disclose any information to the arresting officer until an attorney has been appointed to represent him. It goes without saying, of course, that no attorney worth his salt will permit his client to make any admissions whatever to a police officer.

Further, it is a well accepted fact throughout our Nation that all of our law enforcement agencies are woefully undermanned. In the past when it has been possible to obtain clearance of a large number of offenses of this type the amount of time spent on continuing investigations of the unsolved cases has been materially reduced. Today, this is no longer the case.

May I cite, for your consideration, the following factual comparison offenses of this type taken from the records my department, both prior and subsequent to the Escobedo and Miranda rulings:

	Offenses	Offenses cleared	Percentage	Property losses	Property recovered	Percentage
Larceny, all grades:
1963	4,653	1,061	22.8	$102,084	$23,461	23.0
1964	5,453	1,110	20.4	112,060	27,479	24.5
1965	5,830	1,121	19.2	119,529	20,985	17.6
1966	6,640	1,085	16.3	176,323	30,210	17.1
Burglaries:
1963	1,519	482	31.7	51,730	12,745	24.6
1964	1,904	503	26.4	79,868	17,227	21.5
1965	1,860	370	19.8	97,971	15,644	15.9
1966	2,564	403	15.7	119,247	15,784	13.2

I think these figures tell the story much more effectively than I could state it in words. The number of offenses and property losses have constantly increased, since the advent of the Supreme Court Rulings and the restrictive measures passed by our Texas Legislature, based upon those rulings. In contrast, the percentage of cases solved and property recovered has consistently declined.

Our professional criminals are well aware of these court rulings and laws which pertain to their alleged rights and govern the manner in which their cases must be handled by the arresting officers. In fact, it is common practice to have these persons, following their arrest, quote the law and remind the officer of his limitations when he attempts to interrogate them and clear up the offenses which they have committed.

As contrasted to these adult, professional criminals there is however, another group which is a matter of grave concern to me, my associates in the law enforcement profession and the adult law-abiding citizens of our community.

This concerns the youthful offenders who have, thus far, been guilty of only petty thefts of automobile hub-caps, parts and occasionally automobiles which have been taken merely for a "joy-ride".

In the past when these youngsters were apprehended it was not usually too difficult to nip a budding career of crime in the bud through a quick moving investigation by the officers assigned to our Juvenile Bureau. Immediately following their arrest these boys could be readily interviewed at which time they would admit their guilt, identify other youths who were also involved and, finally, assist in the recovery of the stolen property.

In such instances, these boys were placed under closer supervision by their parents and made aware of the seriousness of their acts through our local courts and juvenile correctional facilities.

Today, however, after having been admonished by the magistrate concerning their rights and the offer of a court appointed attorney it is relatively rare that these procedures are possible. Their attorney will almost invariably instruct them to furnish no information whatsoever to the officers. As a consequence, any punitive action against them for their offenses is seldom possible.

Their associates in these offenses, being unidentified, are then enabled to continue their criminal activities until they gradually become involved in crimes of a more serious nature. By that time the possibilities of rehabilitation are relatively remote and, in the meantime, the crime problem in the community continues to increase in volume and magnitude.

In referring to the rulings of the Supreme Court in recent years I have been concerned with the fact that in virtually every decision which has, in effect, interpreted the Constitutional rights of the criminal the decision has been by a five to four majority. In virtually all of such rulings the court has completely reversed its position of long standing on such matters.

I am totally unable to reconcile this situation wherein one member of the court is able, in effect, to amend our Constitution by his interpretation on these questions whereas the Constitution itself can be amended only through ratification by three-fourths of the States in the Union.

I sincerely hope that these observations may be of some value to you in your splendid effort to aid the law-abiding citizens of our Nation through your support of their duly constituted law enforcement agencies. You may be assured that I shall deem it a privilege to provide any assistance possible to assist you in obtaining passage of this vitally important legislation.

Respectfully

R. A. MILES,
Chief of Police.

PROVIDENCE POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Providence, R.I., March 3, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In complying with the request of the I.A.C.P. in its recent memorandum concerning the forthcoming hearings before your committee regarding the adverse effect U.S. Supreme Court decisions are having on efficient law enforcement, I consider it high privilege to offer you my views on this subject which are in support of S. 674, the bill by which you seek to amend the law with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

As you well know, the members of any profession or occupation responsible for the discharge of specific duties are very often biased in their point of view on matters which have a direct effect on their profession. I think that all of us in the police profession will have to admit that within certain extended limits there exists a conservative viewpoint which is somewhat characteristic of policemen and which we feel we must have in order to carry out our responsibilities.

Basically it is the duty of every law enforcement officer to administer the enforcement of law and to protect the public from law violators. Therefore, in a strict sense only those factors which either add or detract from this objective, directly or indirectly, are of legitimate concern to police officers. It is with this presupposition that I agree with the I.A.C.P. which feels that policemen ought to have the chance to express their views concerning this vital matter.

I am in complete favor with the provision of S. 674. I think that everyone needs to show more concern about the rising crime rate and the importance of the role of the police in maintaining social order in this country. Unfortunately, not all citizens realize the threats that can accrue to the safety of their person and property if police authority continues to be cut back by judicial or legislative incursion of the police function.

Many police officers feel that they have been shorn of some of their essential authority by the impact of the Miranda decision. Policemen believe they face an enigma: What can be done about the public clamor for more effective police protection in the light of this decision of the Supreme Court, and at the same time observe the procedural safeguards favoring the accused? One federal judge unerringly pinpointed the present dilemma of the police when se said, "Pressures of society and of public opinion in one breadth demand that crime be promptly solved, and in the next seem to condemn any interrogation of suspects by the police."

In effect, to date, the majority opinions of the Supreme Court have placed emphatic weight upon the political ideals which hold in esteem human rights and human dignity. Please understand that, in my opinion, no policeman anywhere questions this ideology for these conceptualisms are held sacred by every good American. The problem today is their application to the work-a-day world of law enforcement.

It seems to me that what is needed now from the judiciary or legislature are rules of law making more clear the extensions and limitations of human freedom as they relate to the society of law enforcement. Such clarification is not only important for the police function, but also that of criminal courts. All levels of courts are faced with the problem of interpreting the "exclusionary rule" implication in relationship to extensions of the "right to counsel" represented in the Escobedo and Miranda decisions. Court justices and policemen are having to make hairline decisions in the absence of firm guidelines in the new rules as they exist now.

In their zeal to protect a defendant's constitutional guarantees in accordance with their measure of these rules, justices, particularly in the lowest municipal courts, are handing down decisions that are virtually crippling the traditional investigative procedures of the police. I'm sure you are familiar with some of these decisions in important cases throughout the country, and I shall not burden you with more of the same. However, I would like to single out two local cases of minor nature as examples of what is happening in the police field, and how frustrating it is for dedicated police officers to do their job.

Case History No. 1

A traffic officer of this department was dispatched to the scene of an accident at an intersection controlled by a traffic signal light. Arriving at the scene, the officers was met by the two motorists involved. One of the motorists immediately said to the policemen, "This fellow went through a red light and ran into me." Turning to the second motorist, the officer said simply "Is that so?", whereupon this motorist admitted that he had failed to stop at the red light.

When the case was presented in our municipal court the judge immediately dismissed the charge against the offending motorist on the grounds that the policeman failed to notify the defendant of his rights before he asked his question "Is that so?"

Incident No. 2

An off-duty officer of this department was operating his own private car along a local freeway during a heavy traffic period when he witnessed a car ahead of him side-swipe another vehicle and then continue on without stopping. This officer, together with the operator of the car that was struck, both obtained the registration number of the offending car but were unable to identify the operator who sped off. The registered owner of the car was subsequently notified by the police to have the person operating that car report to our traffic division. A short time later, the registered owner appeared at the police station with his attorney. He stated his name and address and then refused to give any other information or answer any questions.

Obviously, under these circumstances no action could be taken leading to the prosecution of the person responsible for this violation of the law.

I am enclosing a copy of a recent newspaper story which is self-explanatory and emphasizes the concern of other public officials in this community.

Very truly yours,

HOWARD A. FRANKLIN,
Colonel,
Chief of Police.

RULINGS ALARM CHAFEE, GOLDSTEIN

CRIME RULINGS ALARM CHAFEE, SAFETY CHIEF

The results of some cases decided on the basis of recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions were viewed with dismay yesterday by Governor Chafee and attacked vigorously by Harry Goldstein, Providence police commissioner.

Governor Chafee, during his press conference, said he shares what he called the public's "incredulousness" about recent acquittals of defendants whose confessions were disallowed on grounds they were obtained in violation of constitutional rights.

He was directing his comments specifically at a Rhode Island case involving an escapee from the Adult Correctional Institutions, and another in New York, where a man accused of stabbing his wife and five children to death was freed.

In both cases the defendants' confessions were thrown out. The judges ruled they had not been properly informed of their right to counsel.

"We are making this all-out attempt to stop crime and some of these decisions seem incredible," the governor said. Mr. Chafee, an attorney, said he is not challenging the judge's verdicts, if they are "based on the proper Supreme Court holding."

"But something is out of whack," he said.

Commissioner Goldstein debated the issue with Aram A. Arabian, a former public defender, before the Pawtucket Rotary Club.

Warning of "serious social consequences" unless the trend is reversed, Mr. Goldstein said thousands of cases in the lower courts have been thrown out because the court changed the rules.

The people "are not going to sit back and be inundated by escalating crime," he said.

"The court doesn't worry, but I have to worry about the impact on the community, and so do you," the top Providence law enforcement official said. The luncheon meeting was held in St. Paul's Parish house.

Mr. Arabian countered with the contention the court has only told police, "Do it the right way."

He said the court did not change the rules. It just defined the basic rights that have been in the Constitution since it was written, he said.

He predicted that the day will come when no confessions will be admissable under any circumstances. He said new scientific ways of presecuting crime will make confessions unnecessary.

Mr. Goldstein disagreed on both points.

"Those who talk of solving crimes scientifically haven't been inside a police station, and that includes most judges," he said.

Disputing the statement that the court had not changed the rules, he said, "These are rights created by the court and nothing else." He said the Miranda decision should not have been retroactive.

Mr. Goldstein said it is becoming almost impossible to convict narcotics and gambling offenders. He said they "come down the corridor of the police station laughing" and making such remarks as, "Just keep your mouth shut and we'll be all right."

Referring to the New York man mentioned by Governor Chafee, Mr. Goldstein said, "As a result of a subsequent change in the rules a man who committed six murders was allowed to walk out free." He said there was no Supreme Court ruling at the time of the murders.

Mr. Goldstein said the man's lawyer attempted to reassure the people of New York by saying, "Don't worry. He's going back to Puerto Rico."

The real concern in the controversy should be the impact of crime upon the victims, Mr. Goldstein said.

Mr. Arabian had compared the role of the U.S. Supreme Court with that of an umpire at a baseball game.

"Without the umpire, it would be riot and chaos," he said. "It would be the same with our government."

Another former public defender, Leo Patrick McGowan, who was also at the meeting, said a defendant is outnumbered five to one by police who are "jabbing" him in the ribs at the police station. "It is the defendant's word against five policemen," he said later.

"I have found most policemen more reliable than many of the people you have defended," Commissioner Goldstein replied.

MEMORANDUM

FEBRUARY 28, 1967.

To: Peter J. Gannon, Chief, Bureau of Navigation.
From: William H. Fennecken, D/Chief, Marine Patrol.
Subject: Memorandum 2/21/67.

It is common knowledge today that a police officer's lot is not a happy one. Pressures from all sides, particularly in the field of civil rights and recent Supreme Court decisions has lowered the police image to below that of the local garbage collector. With the bombardment of his image, his morale has also tumbled. The average Cop today is a disgruntled individual, who is doing only what is necessary in the performance of his duties; to have a spark and be energetic is to look for trouble and further criticism.

The picture was not always thus. When I first entered the police field thirteen years ago, it was on the way to becoming an honorable profession. I can recall how proud I was when I first donned the uniform. Walking my post as the local symbol of justice, I felt more like a knight in shining armor, ready to protect the proverbial damsel in distress. No apprehension entered my mind. All peoples from all walks of life were treated with equal candor.

As a police officer, I soon learned that in Rome you do as the Romans do. As I gained experience I learned to size people up. Basic philosophy began to take hold. I found that all people desire to be treated as individuals, to be accepted for their own sake regardless of their position in life. Everyone wants to be understood and in their own way to be important. The wise guy had his underlying motive, the recidivist his.

Today the task of getting to the underlying motive has all but vanished. The police officer's approach to people has, by mandate, radically changed. The violator of public trust seeks no help because he expects none from the man in blue. The once human bond, the old avenue to justice is as cold as a weather front from Canada.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have heaped coals upon the relationship between the law enforcement officer and the accused. The policeman, must of necessity, change his entire outlook bringing into enforcement a different approach. An approach that is cold and calculating. For an officer with years of experience, this becomes a bitter pill to swallow and is not easily comprehended.

Most police officers today are disillusioned men, fighting frustration at every turn. Nothing to an officer can be more heartbreaking than to see weeks of work for naught, because of some court technicality. When the criminal is turned loose to ply again on the public, the officers wonders why he ever pinned a badge on in the first place.

Something must be done in the immediate future to restore the policeman to the symbol of old; the pillar of the community; respected as the protector of every citizen's rights, and a very present help in time of trouble.

WILLIAM H. FENNECKEN.

MEMORANDUM

FEBRUARY 28, 1967.

To: Peter J. Gannon, Chief, Bureau of Navigation.
From: Alvin M. Walsh, D/Chief, Marine Patrol, Dist. II.
Subject: Bureau Chief's memo of February 27, 1967, Re International Association of Chiefs of Police.

The undersigned officer feels very strongly about the recent Supreme Court decisions. However, in way of an opinion: Both the recent Escobedo and Miranda decisions were decided by the Supreme Court on 5–4 votes. In each case the minority justices accused the majority of writing laws, a function of our legislators as defined in the Constitution of the United States. It appears Chief Justice Warren is attempting to re-write all criminal laws.

Apparently the Supreme Court, in considering the rights of the accused, have forgotten the rights of the victims. A case in point: Recently, in New York City, a factory worker who had admitted killing his wife and five small children was released from prison. His confession, the only evidence against him, was set aside "because he had not been informed of his rights" as outlined in the historic Supreme Court Decision under Miranda.

When this individual was released, Brooklyn District Attorney Aaron A. Koota made a comment with which I agree as, I am sure will most law enforcement officers. He said: "The United States Supreme Court has weighed the scales of justice heavily in favor of the criminal suspect. I am not a prophet, but the handwriting on the wall indicates a trend on the part of the court to outlaw all confessions made to police.

If and when that melancholy day comes, the death knell of effective criminal law enforcement will have been sounded."

Miranda has cut at the very foundations of law enforcement and of the legal system—by weakening the right of the police to search for the truth by oral questioning of a suspect before trial.

In Escobedo and Miranda the decisions state that a suspect can waive his rights to remain silent or waive his right to counsel. The waiver concept is and will continue to come under close scrutiny by lawyers and I doubt that law enforcement has heard the last of the criticism when an officer advises, in court, that the defendant waived his right to remain silent.

Further, some of the New Jersey Magistrates have added Miranda to both Motor Vehicle and Juvenile cases.

Last summer, Sgt. Newman at a juvenile court hearing was asked; even though he had previously stated questioning was conducted in the presence of the juveniles parents, whether the boys (aged 14 and 15; charged with Larceny), were apprized of their constitutional rights before they were questioned.

This officer would strongly recommend that our unit, the Marine Police, go on record as endorsing the stand of Senator McClellan and of the Sub Committee on Criminal Laws and Procedures and urge the passage of his legislation with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

Respectfully,

ALVIN M. WALSH,
D/Chief, Marine Patrol, Dist. II.

MEMORANDUM

FEBRUARY 28, 1967.

To: Mr. Peter J. Gannon, Chief, Bureau of Naviagtion.
From: Steven Zwarych, Jr., Dep. Chief, Marine Patrol.
Subject: Memorandum—I.A.C.P., Bureau Chief's Memo of 2/27/67.

With reference to the above subject, the following comments are submitted for your use in complying with the I.A.C.P. Memorandum.

At the present time, neither the Mapp's nor the Miranda decisions have affected the enforcement procedures of our Marine Patrol Organization.

To the writers knowledge, our authority to stop and board a vessel underway as outlined under 12:6-6, has never been challenged by any court of law. Should a vessel be docked or moored and the necessity to board arise, a proper search warrant would be obtained by one of our senior men after first clearing such action with the District Headquarters.

The Miranda decision would have no bearing on our normal accident investigation procedures with the recent decision of the New Jersey Superior Court in the case of "State v. Zucconi" bearing this out, stating that this Supreme Court decision, "did not apply because defendant was not under arrest, in custody, or otherwise deprived of his freedom when he made the admission."

By Departmental Policy all officers of the New Jersey Marine Patrol are restricted to the enforcement of our Boating Laws and Regulations with instructions that if any other violations or crimes are detected, they be turned over to the appropriate municipal, county or State authorities.

Should this policy change whereby their enforcement responsibilities would be expanded then potentially the Mapps and Miranda decisions would directly hinder their capabilities as far as the investigation of larcenies, breaking and entries and death caused by boat.

Occasionally when an out of state boater or disorderly person is placed under arrest for transportation to a local court or police headquarters for the purpose of posting bond, the Miranda decision would affect questioning of the defendant until he was apprised of his rights; however, this should not pose any problem as a Deputy Attorney General could be obtained for any later court proceedings if the defendant is represented by counsel.

Respectfully submitted.

STEVEN ZWARYCH, JR.,
Dep. Chief, Marine Patrol.

RECENT OPINION

(NOTE: The following opinion, which will shortly appear in the advance sheets, is presently available, without cost, by writing to the Clerk of the Supreme Court, State House Annex, Trenton.)

State v. Zucconi,—N.J. Super.—, (App. Div., A-786-65, decided January 13, 1967.)

Defendant was convicted in the municipal court and in the county court after a trial de novo of careless driving (R.S. 39:4-97). Twelve days following the accident which led to the charge, the defendant was interviewed at the hospital by a State Trooper who was investigating the accident. The defendant stated he was driving the car and later in his home repeated his statement to the Trooper and signed a typed statement in the presence of members of his family. At the trial defendant testified another person, who died as a result of the accident, drove the car. Defendant's statement was admitted in evidence and he alleges this was error because he had no counsel when he made the admission; that he was not told that he had a right to counsel or offered one; and that he was not warned that what he said might be offered in evidence against him. The Appellate Division affirmed the conviction and held that Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, did not apply since the defendant was tried before the Miranda decision and in any event it did not apply because defendant was not under arrest, in custody, or otherwise deprived of his freedom when he made the admission. The court also held that Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, did not apply because defendant was not in custody and did not ask for counsel.

The State additionally argued that, in any event, Miranda and Escobedo did not apply to motor vehicle violations. The Appellate Division held that in a prosecution for a motor vehicle violation resulting in a fine Miranda does not apply.

It is conceivable that a boating violation would be likened to a MV violation.

Very sincerely yours,

FEBRUARY 9, 1967.

Administrative Director of the Courts.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of a memorandum from Mr. Quinn Tamm which announces the hearings which are to be held by your committee on March 7, 8, 9, 1967, regarding the United States Supreme Court Decisions Affecting Local Law Enforcement. I am pleased that your Honorable Committee is looking into this most serious matter for, in my opinion, law enforcement must get some relief if it is to be effective.

The present requirements which are imposed upon law enforcement by the Miranda Decision have created an impossible situation for law enforcement. The admonition which we must give to suspects in criminal matters is, in effect, a plea to the individual that he do nothing that would help the police in their investigation of the incident. If the suspect says, "I don't want to talk about it now", all questioning must immediately cease and I submit that this restriction goes too far to the detriment of society. This aspect of the Miranda Decision is crippling law enforcement.

We had an excellent example of the crippling effects of this rule only last week. This case involves a 19-year old California Youth Authority parolee who was accused of the statutory rape of a 14-year old girl. The girl alleges that this young man had relations with her on two separate occasions. There are no witnesses and there is no evidence. The suspect has stated that he does not wish to discuss the case with us and our officers are powerless to resolve the matter. Our officers feel that they could get enough information out of this individual to make a case if they could spend a short time discussing it with him, however, under Miranda, anything he might say to them would be inadmissible in a court of law.

I am not suggesting that the police be permitted to resort to the old third degree methods of yesterday, however, if we are to be able to do our jobs, we must be given the right to interrogate suspects concerning their involvement. Having informed a man that he has a right to remain silent and that anything he says may be used against him in a court of law, the police must be given the right to interrogate him whether he wants to talk to them or not and we must have the right to introduce what he had to say if the case goes to trial. I submit that local judges are competent, educated and fair. Let them weigh the facts after listening to both sides. The majority opinion in the Miranda Decision said that the police are suspect; I would hope that the judges in our lower courts are not. If they are, the real problem may lie with the Supreme Court?

Finally, the one man majority on the Supreme Court has developed a lot of "bad" law. It is bad in the sense that we cannot depend on it for it was decided on the basis of one vote. If only one justice out of the nine were to change his mind, the whole concept of criminal justice would change. It is my opinion that society would get a better break if a reversal in a criminal matter required a two-thirds majority of the Supreme Court. I wish you would give this suggestion some serious thought.

Please be assured of my support and cooperation in all matters of mutual interest.

Yours very truly,

JAMES L. CHAMBERS,
Chief of Police.

Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I would like to take a few minutes of your time and discuss the problem of Supreme Court Decisions.

As a career police officer and a Chief of Police, I feel that the United States Supreme Court has committed a great injustice to law enforcement. It appears that their decisions with regard to Civil Liberties have gone beyond the scope of their limits. While we all believe in the civil rights and liberties of mankind we do not believe that the court should pick up and blow up every small technicality.

As a Police Administrator, I do not object to good clean decisions which would affect the whole of the American people, but I STRENUOUSLY object to the decisions which hamper law enforcement.

I have though about these decisions with an open mind, trying to put myself in the place of the Justices and I still come up with the same answers.

Apparently the only way that law enforcement can make their position clear is to unite through men such as you, who are willing to take a stand, and who are willing to help law enforcement be the power, to protect life and property that it should be.

You can count on me and this department to support your views.

Respectfully yours,

R. A. HARRIS,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Fairfield County is a focal point for "House Breaks"; hundreds of homes have been broken into and thousands of dollars of belongings taken.

As Captain of Detectives and a veteran police officer, it is my opinion that certain decisions made by the Supreme Court have given the criminal an unwarranted "Supreme Court Robe of Protection."

Unless a perpetrator is apprehended in the commission of a crime it is almost impossible to convict him because of the Mapp and Miranda decisions. For example: an automobile is mobile; can be rented or have stolen marker plates; thus making it almost impossible to check it at a later date. A search warrant may be obtained hours later.

The Harlis Miller case was retried in the State of Connecticut because of the Mapp decision. The Grimes case (narcotics) requested two retrials because of the Miranda decision.

I have been a police officer since 1938; have attended many police schools, including the F.B.I. National Academy and the New York Police Academy; and because of my experience and training, I know what a great help your bill can be to law enforcement and the honest public. I hope, therefore, that your amendment will be passed.

Sincerely,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your Memorandum to the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Incorporated, the following information is submitted:

Miranda has produced two definite problems in law enforcement. In the first instance, the day of the suspect admitting his criminal action is almost gone. At the completion of the warning as prescribed by the Decision, the suspect, finding that an attorney will be furnished, immediately will request one. At this point all questioning must cease and we can only await the arrival of the attorney and the inevitable, "Don't tell the police anything." We all realize that there are cases where no physical evidence exists and the only solution is by an admission.

Our hands were tied recently in a Shooting to Kill case. The complainant was taken to the hospital and placed in intensive care. (No questioning possible.) The only witness was fleeing and not in custody. The suspect demanded an attorney and was advised by him to say nothing. The attorney also demanded that we file an affidavit on the man or release him immediately. How could we possiby do our job under these circumstances?

Since the advent of the Miranda Decision, our Detective Section has compiled records as relates to prisoners being processed. This record shows that of the 688 prisoners processed since Miranda up to and including February 1967, 477 signed a waiver and 170 refused. The detectives feel that the Miranda Decision definitely caused lack of prosecution in 128 cases.

Miranda has hurt in a second instance as to the clearing of complaints. Prior to this Decision, we could question a suspect as to related offenses, thus clearing more complaints. Today we are fortunate to clear one offense with the reflecting decrease in Part I crimes cleared.

We feel that the rights of the individual are important, however, the community also must be protected. At present 2% of the community are being protected at the expense of the other 98 percent.

CITY OF LAKE OSWEGO,
POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Lake Oswego, Oreg., March 2, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures set for March 7, 8, and 9, 1967, I would like to express my feelings in relation to the recent Supreme Court Decisions.

First, let me begin by saying I have been in law enforcement twenty one years. I was Chief of Detectives for fifteen years prior to becoming Chief of Police. I have been involved in making many arrests and conducting hundreds of interviews and interrogations.

I strongly believe that every person is entitled to his rights, including police officers. Recent rulings of the Supreme Court have gone overboard in protecting the rights of the criminal; however, they have failed to recognize the rights of the law enforcement officers who are endangering their lives to apprehend the vicious criminal. I, and I'm sure many, many other officers, have taken guns and knives off criminals in dark alleys and, like all officers, made decisions in seconds where it takes the courts years to determine if these decisions were proper. It is quite easy for others to be a "Monday Morning Quarterback," but how many of our justices have availed themselves to actual police officer's duties. It is my understanding that only one of the justices has had the experience of trying a criminal case in our courts.

When our forefathers drew up our Constitution they did not have minority groups such as there are today. If these groups had existed we would have seen a much larger document then now exists. Amendments or additions to the Constitution should be left to the legislative body.

In my grade school days, I was taught there were three branches of government; executive, judicial and legislative. It is the thought of many that the Supreme Court has taken it upon themselves to be all three. The court does not decide cases on facts, but upon technicalities. They do not decide the case on what the law is, but what they think it should be. I have heard it voiced many times in police circles that the court has the knack of changing the rules after the game has been played.

We, as police officers, find it difficult trying to abide by the court's decisions. We can't act on what the law is today, but we must anticipate what it will be in the future. The Supreme Court is quick to tell us what we can't do, but I have yet to hear one decision telling us what we can do.

Recruiting for police departments is far more difficult today than ever before. The reason being that no person wants to be wrong in the public view, nor do they want to be liable in a civil suit. An officer remarked in a somewhat cynical statement, "If you haven't been arrested, you have no rights." Unfortunately, this situation now exists.

I am of the belief that a Supreme Court is very necessary. It appears to me that they should base their decisions on the law as it is written and the facts of each and every case. I do not feel that they should legislate and decide cases on technicalities.

Very truly yours,

LYLE C. PERKINS,
Chief of Police.

BREA, CALIF., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I received information from the International Association of Chiefs of Police indicating that you would be interested in the views and suggestions of its members regarding the United States Supreme Court decisions and its effect on crime in the United States.

It has been reported that in ruling on the Miranda decision, Chief Justice Warren stated that "this procedure has been used by the Federal Bureau of Investigation for many years, and it has not hurt their operation." Chief Justice Warren apparently has failed to take into consideration the different types of police work being done by these bodies. In the main, the FBI as its name implies, investigates. With the exception of bank robberies and kidnapping, the FBI is seldom called upon to proceed to the scene of an emergency and to make split-second decisions. In local law enforcement, it is the exception rather than the rule that the police officer has the time to build up a case before taking action.

The FBI agents carry a case load from twenty to thirty cases per months per agent. It is not at all uncommon for a detective with a metropolitan police department to carry fifty, sixty, or more cases per month.

Miranda was just again convicted for kidnapping and rape on the same charge as before, without the use of the confession. Under the rationale of punishing law enforcement, the Supreme Court has it reality, failed in its obligation to protect the citizens of our great country. Nothing was accomplished by releasing Miranda. He has been found guilty by two injuries. Society's rights were not protected by the shallow thinking of the majority on the Supreme Court, and in my humble opinion, Miranda will be a better person by paying a penalty for the crime he has committed rather than have been allowed to go free.

Danny Escobieto in all probability fits into the same category as Miranda. When a criminal is allowed to roam the streets free after having committed an act against society because of some legal technicality, then our country has failed. It may be that crime is bred in the slums, it may well be that crime is caused by unemployment, and by the many other social injustices that are so often cited. If this is true, and I am not completely convinced that it is, it would be many years before these conditions are corrected and the United States can be safe from the criminal. In the interim, society must be protected. Society has the right to be protected, and society should not be hampered by unwarranted restrictions placed upon the law enforcement officer.

It is my opinion that if the Chicago Police Department abused its authority in the Escobieto case then the Chicago Police Department, the involved detectives, and the Chief of Police should have brought out for public censor. But Escobieto should not have been freed on that technicality, or should a law enforcement officer in some other jurisdiction be hampered.

It would appear to me that the Supreme Court will not face up to reality either due to overpowering loyalty to the legal profession, shallow thinking, or a gutless approach to "reality." The true problems in the United States dealing with criminal justice is the use of the worn-out, out-moded, fallacious, Adversary System of criminal justice.

This system which is based on hypocrisy, professional theatrics, bribery, and so many other odious practices should be replaced by a system of jutice that is seeking the truth in an impartial, fact-finding atmosphere. Then justice will be served.

I do not consider myself an authority on the Adversary System, nor do I consider myself as a proponent of any system to replace it, however, in the sixteen plus years of my experience in law enforcement, I am convinced that this system is sadly lacking in the performance of its fundamental duty, and that "Lady Justice" sitting on her pedestal, drapped in flowing white robes, is being prostituted daily in every criminal court in the country by the use of this system.

Sincerely yours,

R. O. BAUGH,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As a veteran Police Officer with 32years experience, I can attest to the fact that the recent decisions of the Supreme Court are resulting in the further handcuffing of the police officer and at the expense of the law abiding citizen.

The question of "Whose rights are being defended" is a logical question to ask in view of the Miranda decision of June 13, 1966, which virtually eliminates police station interrogation of suspects, and further hinders the police in their fight against crime. The dismay with which we in law enforcement regard this additional roadblock in our ability to perform our duty was admirably summed up by Justice White in his dissenting remarks "Nor can this decision do other than have a corrosive effect on the criminal law as an effective device to prevent crime. A major component in its effectiveness in this regard is its swift and sure enforcement. The easier it is to get away with rape and murder, the less the deterrent effect on those who are inclined to attempt it. This is still good common sense. If it were not, we should posthaste liquidate the whole law enforcement establishment as a useless, misguided effort to control human conduct."

Further emphasis was added to this view by Justice Clark in his dissenting opinion: "The Court further holds that failure to follow the new procedures requires inexorably the exclusion of any statement by the accused, as well as the fruits thereof. Such a strict constitutional specific inserted at the nerve center of crime detection may well kill the patient."

After reading the Court's opinion as delivered by Chief Justice Warren, it is difficult to avoid concluding that it is the police who are on trial in the prisoner's dock. Some solace can be derived from the fact that this view of the police was definitely not a unamimous one. In Justice Harlan's dissenting opinion he makes it clear that he does not at all subscribe to "the generally black picture of police conduct painted by the Court."

It is not within the purview of the police to question the legal soundness of the Court's decision, nor is this necessary. This was done with detailed thoroughness by the dissenting Justices.

It is within the purview of the Police, however, to pose the following highly pertinent questions, not to Justice Warren and his four cohorts, regrettably, but to the citizens whom they serve:

1. Why are we indicted for performing our duty to enforce the law?
2. Why are we, in effect, denied a vital tool of law enforcement—interrogation of suspects—when the crime rate is already increasing at five times the population increase?
3. With our departments already undermanned and underfinanced, how are we expected to cope with the increased demands for protection that can be expected to result from this Court decision?

Noting that "under this new version of the Fifth Amendment" many criminal defendants who might previously have been convicted may now either not be tried at all, or acquitted, Justice White stated: "I have no desire whatsoever to share responsibility for any such impact on the present criminal process."

We in law enforcement suggest to those of the Supreme Court whose concern appears to center on the rights of the probable lawbreaker that the time is long overdue for equal concern for society—and its protectors, the police.

I am enclosing a copy of an address given by Justice Walter J. Fourt of the California District Court of Appeals, concerning his opinion of the recent Supreme Court decisions.

Your subcommittee is to be commended for your interest in this manifold problem, and trust your studies will result in recommendations of a factual nature to the Congress of the United States. Law Enforcement and the public, which they serve, deserve no less.

Respectfully yours,

P. R. SMITH,
Service Division.

"TODAY'S COURTS SEARCHING FOR ERRORS, NOT TRUTHS"

(By Judge W. J. Fourt)

(The following address of Justice Walter J. Fourt of the California District Court of Appeals was made to the North Area Police Association. It contains a studied diagnosis of the current crime problems. It is a subject of concern for many police officers; and is considered by them worthy of wide public dissemination—The Editor.)

We are today, in my opinion, in a complete state of confusion as to what the law is with reference to investigating and prosecuting criminal cases.

Until the present class of appellate justices graduated and took over, there was, in the legal world, a doctrine or rule known as "stare decisis." Those words translated mean to adhere to precedent, and not to unsettle things which have been satisfactorily settled for many, many years. In other words, it is a rule of common sense that rules of conduct should be settled to the end that society, the people of the community, including police officers, would know what to do in the future in a given type of case.

No one argues that any rule which is absurd, ridiculous or unjust on its face ought to be continued in effect—yet, we should give due consideration to the judgments of those persons who have gone before us and successfully conducted the affairs of this country for 150 years. One of the reasons we have grown great, and have the country we have, is because of what those people of substance did and said.

SUPER LEGISLATURE

And in speaking of the founders, they did not provide any statement, inference, or otherwise, to the effect that an appellate court shall be a superlegislature and entitled to enact into law that which the people do not want, or to legislate judicially into the law that which the people, sooner or later will not accept.

As one Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States stated some years ago, with reference to this matter, "The viewpoint in question indicates an intolerance for what those who have composed this court in the past conscientiously and deliberately concluded, and involves an assumption that knowledge and wisdom resides in us which was denied to our predecessors."

Law to be obeyed or enforced must necessarily be known by all who have to do with it—the members of a community, the law enforcement agencies and the judges and others engaged in the administration of justice. Law to be known, must be fixed and substantially or reasonably constant.

In other words, the rule "stare decisis" gave balance, stability and symmetry to our law and to society. It took out the capricious element in the administering of justice. It kept the scales of justice even and steady and not liable to wavering with every new judge's opinion—that matter would be disposed of, not in accord with whim or caprice of any individual judge, but according to established, known laws and customs of the country. In other words, judges ought to expound the law as it is and not take upon themselves the responsibility of pronouncing new law.

We have witnessed, literally, in the last few years a veritable tearing up by the roots of the fundamentals, the old cornerstones of the administration of justice—and, strange as it may seem, in many if not in most, of the cases of recent date where this has been done, the courts have stated in part and given as one reason for their opinions, that the police must be taught a lesson.

All of this, in my opinion, has led to a breakdown in law and order—respect for the courts in many areas has diminished—vicious and violent criminals run rampant and many are turned loose to prey again on innocent victims.

PUBLIC AWARE

I am certain that the American people want a written constitution as we had for the first 150 years of this country's existence—they want no part of a constitution which is made up, altered, modified and changed from case to case, term to term, or year to year to suit the personal or ideological whims of an everchanging majority of any Supreme Court. I am confident that the thinking of the great majority of decent people in this country is that they do not want the constitution amended by judicial fiat from day to day and they are not favorably impressed with much of the judicial legislation.

In other words, it is my opinion that the power of the appellate court to interpret is not synonymous with the power to amend. The power to interpret the constitution is the power to ascertain its meaning. The power to amend the constitution is the power to change its meaning.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Defiance of the law receives encouragement from many publicly paid employees. Disrespect for law and order has for intents and purposes taken on an aura of respectability in many areas. Civil disobedience seemingly now travels under the guise of academic freedom in many of our public institutions. Many segments of our society are thoroughly imbued with the belief that it is wholly fitting and proper to violate any law with which it disagrees.

CITIZENS MUST CHOOSE

Citizens must ultimately choose between lawlessness and regulated order. I know that presently there is the widespread attitude, "Oh, well I don't want to get involved"—and, as a consequence, many crimes go unpunished—but that attitude will ultimately lead to destruction. Crimes are increasing at least five to six times faster than our population.

In fact, no one can legitimately argue that a trial in California is a genuine search for truth—the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Seemingly a trial becomes a game between the state on one hand and the defendant on the other.

The judge is for practical purposes an umpire, there to see to it that each side observes the rules of the game (the latter which are handed down to him from above day to day).

FOUNDING FATHERS

The founding fathers of the Constitution—George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison—and others were not visionaries toying with speculations and theories, but were practical men, dealing with the facts of political life.

They wanted a written Constitution—all to the end that there would be "equal justice under law," and not justice according to the personal notions of the temporary occupants of the appellate courts.

It would seem that the court puts a "police lineup" in the same category as a "third degree' which has long since, and properly so, been outlawed. I predict that in the distant future the court will declare "line-ups" out of bounds, and down the drain will go another very important investigative tool of law enforce-

POLICE LINE-UPS

If a simple police line-up is in the mind of a court comparable to and in the same category with the "third degree," I suggest that perhaps the day is not too far distant when someone may do more than hint that the taking of fingerprints is degrading and brings the suspect by his own act into disrepute and tends to convict him of a crime—and, therefore, the fingerprints should not be used against a suspect.

COURTS LOSE SIGHT

The courts however, I think unfortunately, seem to have lost sight of the fact that a criminal prosecution is brought for the purpose of convicting the guilty. Necessarily, that includes the protection of the innocent. But in no event should an appellate court procedure be turned into a search for error to the end that the obviously and many times self-confessed, guilty criminal be turned loose into society to murder or rob again.

I close with this observation—we cannot and will not have unbridled individual liberties and at the same time a safe and stable society. Individual liberties and rights cannot and do not exist in a vacuum. We have to have a decent and reasonably safe place in which to live and work—otherwise there is no place within which to exercise our individual rights such as the right of privacy.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

SIR: The members of the Springfield Missouri Police Department would like to add their support in your efforts to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility and evidence of confessions. We are finding it increasingly difficult to protect our citizens from the minority criminal violator due to recent Supreme Court decisions. We feel that it can only be through the efforts of individuals such as you that we will be able to satisfy the obligation placed upon us by our citizens.

It is an accepted fact in law enforcement that interrogation is our most valuable tool. Without interrogation and the subsequent confession we might obtain to collaborate circumstantial evidence, we can not maintain our efficiency.

We would like to recommend for your consideration Mr. Fred Inbau, Professor of Law, Northwestern University, as an individual who can give valuable testimony during the forthcoming hearings. He is recognized nationally as an authority on criminal interrogation and is well aware of our problems.

If our department can assist you in any way in your endeavor, please call on us.

Very truly yours,

SAM L. ROBARDS,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request, as conveyed to me through the medium of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, I wish to also express my dismay at many of the recent close Supreme Court decisions which are so adversely affecting local law enforcement.

The Miranda decision, of course, is the most recent and also most restrictive and we find our efforts severely restricted by it.

Others restrictive in nature to a lesser degree are Escobedo V Illinois, Mapp V Ohio and numerous others. Perhaps the decisions in some of these were brought on by over zealousness on the part of particular police officers, however it does not appear reasonable that the entire law enforcement structure, particularly at such perilous times, should be shackled for the indiscretions of a small minority.

Your efforts on the behalf of Local Law Enforcement are greatly appreciated by this Department.

Very truly yours,

LESTER F. CLARK,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The admissibility of evidence, particularly statements against interest, is of major concern to law enforcement administrators in the United States. The interpretations of law as enunciated by the United States Supreme Court in the rationale beginning with United States versus McNabb in 1943 and culminating in Arizona versus Miranda has had two impacts on municipal law enforcement. The first one is the obvious—that the restrictions upon interrogation deny the courts information about the crime from the person who knows most about it—the one who committed it. Secondly, the demonstrating at every stage of criminal investigation and criminal procedures that the directives of the Supreme Court were followed in every respect has added an additional time element to the preparation of criminal cases. This latter may not sound significant, but when from twenty minutes to an hour is added to the case preparation and court presentation for each offense resulting in a criminal trial and the number of offenses is multiplied by the thousands, it has the effect of actually reducing the size of the police department.

In this jurisdiction, we had an incident of first degree murder which was settled by an arrest, the taking of a confession in compliance with Escobeda, the recovery of the murder weapon, and the suspect held without bail for trial. This entire case was completed and ready for prosecution two months before the Miranda decision was announced. When it came up for trial, the trial judge dismissed the case because the police had not, two months prior to their being announced, followed the rules outlined in Miranda. The general public reacted very strongly to the release of this confessed murderer.

There was no suggestion that there had been any impropriety in any of the actions of the police or the prosecutor, but still the case was dismissed on a technical construction and an artificial date.

I strongly support realistic legislation which will protect the rights of the accused person and will also protect the public. In far too many crimes, the only method of determining the culprit and preparing a case which will result in successful prosecution depends upon the "interrogation" of the suspect does in my opinion include physical or mental abuse or mistreatment of any kind. I would doubt very much if any police department in 1967 would resort to such tactics under any circumstances.

Very truly yours,

F. C. RAMON,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The recent decisions of the Supreme Court have done little to create respect for the Court and its opinions.

It is my belief that a police agency should be able to confine a felony suspect for a reasonable period of time. During this period, the officers should be able to interrogate him without interference from attorneys or other sources. The questioning should be reasonable, with breaks or rest periods. I also feel a person so confined but not charged with a crime should be paid a fee for for his confinement by the State. This would tend to curtail unreasonable confinements.

I do not believe an officer should have to advise a person he does not have to say anything, but do believe he should be advised that anything he says may be used in a court of law. That a copy of his statements should be given to him or his attorney.

The crime should not be dismissed on errors of testimony or procedure. Every effort should be made to curtail crime and criminal activities.

Thanking you for your interest in problems of the law enforcement people.

Yours truly,

HARRY KOCHANEK,
Chief of Police.

POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Endicott, N.Y.

To: Senator John L. McClellan.
From: Delbert E. Pembridge, Chief of Police, Endicott, New York.
Subject: Hearings by United States Senate Subcommittee regarding United States Supreme Court Decisions.

Following receipt of the February 21st memo from Executive Director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Quinn Tamm, I would like to inform you of my very strong feeling concerning subject hearings:

My protest is that the Miranda decision of the United States Supreme Court has seriously affected the ability of law enforcement agencies to fulfill their obligation to serve in the protection of lives and property. In an effort to insure all persons of their rights, the courts have moved to the other extreme and handed down decisions rewarding to the criminal element at the increasing expense of the law abiding citizen.

A particular situation presently of primary concern here is that of investigations in relation to traffic accidents. Many lower court judges have misinterpreted the decision as to "in custody", and are applying it to all questioning and investigation before custody or arrest has taken place. An example of such later misinterpretation for instance would commence to arise at the scene of an accident to which an officer has been called.

During the course of his investigation, the officer having concluded that one of the operators of the vehicles involved is in violation of any of one or more vehicle and traffic laws or regulations (intoxication, ignoring a stop sign, etc.), advises the violator of his rights, as required by the Miranda decision. We are finding ourselves in the position of having cases later dismissed because the officer failed to give such advice prior to commencing his investigation. If persons involved are not required to answer questions pertaining to the incident, the conduct of any investigation is impossible. The protection of the individual wronged has in effect been sabotaged.

It would seem that President Johnson's War on Crime would accomplish more for the non-criminal were a more realistic appraisal of law enforcement be the subject of executive and legislative action. There were no trained police or organized crime when the fourth and fifth amendments concerning these problems were written.

I strongly urge that the Supreme Court of the United States take a more realistic 20th century look at these cases; and that the legislature make a complete reform in criminal law and procedure.

Respectfully submitted.

CITY OF LEXINGTON, KY.,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been informed by reliable sources that you are Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures and that you have introduced legislation, S. 674, which is a bill to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

As a police officer of thirty-five years continuous service and experience in one department and as Chief of that department for the past fourteen years, I have experienced practically every facet and problem that a municipal police officer will have to face.

Reference is made to recent Supreme Court decisions in the Miranda case and others, and most recently the case in New York where Jose Suarez murdered his wife and five children and after the heinous crime was perpetrated admitted to police officers that he had committed this horrible act. He was tried on February 21, 1967, and acquitted due to the fact that the only incriminating evidence against the subject was his statement that he had committed the crime, but there was no corroborative evidence of any kind and no witnesses, and, under the recent Supreme Court decisions, Judge Michael Kern, of the New York Supreme Court, had to turn him loose and, in so doing, remarked: "It makes one's blood run cold to realize such as this has come to pass." He also went on to say: "I am not a prophet, but the handwriting on the wall indicates a trend for the Supreme Court to outlaw all confessions made to police. If and when that melancholy day comes, the death knell to effective criminal law enforcement has been sounded."

However, in researching old English Common Law there was found a particular case in which a man thought he had killed another man in a fight at a fair. Leaving the injured man for dead, he went to the Sheriff and confessed that he had killed a man. The supposed victim, who had not been mortally wounded, regained consciousness, arose, joined a band of gypsies and was gone from this locality for quite a few years. In the meantime, the self-accused, supposed murderer was tried and hanged.

This was a classic object lesson on the necessity for res gestae and corpus delicti. In the case of Jose Suarez apparently, from newspaper reports, there existed five corpus delicti, but there was an absence of any res gestae or supporting evidence and most experienced investigators and police officers realize that the corroborative evidence is most essential and necessary in nearly all cases and the absence of same apparently influenced the courts to harken to the old Anglo Saxon concept in common law of reluctance to incriminate on inadequate evidence. However, in most cases that have occurred in this country since the recent revolutionary decisions for corroborative evidence, the indiscriminate relasing of felons on technicalities is extremely hazardous to organized society.

It has been my personal observation in recent months after these damaging decisions that the police throughout the nation are in a state of deep confusion, inasmuch as we full well realize that we were delegated and sworn in to protect society against the criminal rather than the criminal against society, which is the case at the present time it seems.

The general idea about police using great duress and brutality—sand bags and rubber hoses—ordinarily, in my experience, does not exist in law enforcement today. The law enforcement agencies fully realize that they must continue to improve their techniques and adopt effective and modern scientific aids in determining guilt in criminal cases. We should have legislation authorizing and allowing such aids as lie detectors, truth serum, blood tests and other scientific aids to assist in the proper investigation of criminal cases.

The problem facing society at the present time here in the City of Lexington, in the State of Kentucky and in the United States of America is not only that of legal technicalities, it is a problem of educating the people to realize that all criminals, from the "Mr. Bigs" of Cosa Nostra to the lowest petty pickpocket and sneak-thief, are predators on those of organized society who are producing wealth and things of value and making an honest living. We must raise bulwarks against the underworld for our personal and financial protection.

Our Honorable President, Lyndon B. Johnson, is justly and rightfully alarmed at the criminal situation in the United States at the present time. He has recommended the allocation of fifty million dollars for training police officers so that they can more adequately cope with crime, and he has allocated the use of better than three hundred million dollars to combat crime.

However, all of this will be for naught if proper steps are not taken first to overhaul the courts by appointing more judges to eliminate and dissipate the enormous backlog of untried cases. One very important weakness in our system is the inadequate penal facilities in which to quarantine away from society criminals who are serving sentences. Rehabilitation by proper techniques may be effected in some types of criminals and should be promoted, but, at the present time, due to inadequate housing facilities in the penitentiaries and jails, the courts, in a way, have been forced to parole felons who should be removed from society for a time for proper rehabilitation and sometimes psychiatric treatment. As a result, sad to say, organized society is being beleaguered on all sides by the predatory criminals.

There is a current case in Detroit where a groceryman has been robbed and held up so often that he has decided to sell his two groceries and emigrate to Canada. This is no reflection on Detroit, but is symptomatic of the conditions that exist all over the United States at the present time.

I would like to bring another problem to your attention. It is the dilution of police strength in many areas where police are being allocated responsibilities that are not directly connected with crime control and the suppression of criminality. These must be kept to a very minimum.

In closing, I urge you to do everything in your power to make it possible for a police officer to legally interrogate, as we have in the past, a suspect who has, in most cases, a long criminal record, advising him of his constitutional rights and informing him that anything that he shall say may be used against him in a court of law, and let's give the criminal the right of free will. If he wishes to cooperate with the investigating police officers, let's not make it illegal for him to do so.

Sincerely,

E. C. HALE,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR: Reference being made to your position as Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures.

I am sure you will agree one could write volumes on the subject—should suffice to say allowing the guilty to go free because of recent procedures prescribed by our Supreme Court is contrary to the peace-loving principles on which our forefathers founded this country of ours.

Changes in procedure are certainly in order for the protection of the innocent. You have my support in your endeavors to make it possible for peace officers to again be able to perform their duties in a reasonable and prudent manner, without fear of legal embarrassment.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate,
New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It is most fortunate that the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedures has in my opinion a most able chairman, statesman and law maker as yourself to head this most important committee in this day and age when our most learned jurist have conflicting opinions as to the interpretation of the constitution effecting the administration of justice with the respect to the admissability in evidence of confessions.

It appears in my opinion as a law officer for the past twenty-six years that the Supreme Court has read into the constitution in their majority decisions, opinions that were never meant to be, more recently the Miranda opinion.

First let me say that I agree that as many safeguards should be afforded the accused after an arrest but be limited to the following—He/She has a right to remain Silent—Anything said can and will be used against him/her in a court of law—He/She is not only privileged to contact an attorney or if he/she is indegent and cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed by the court.

I have always believed and practiced that duress of any kind is never warranted under no conditions, but I also believe that a confession voluntarily made without threats, force, coersion or promises of immunity should always be admissible even though it be made without an attorney being present. It is my opinion the admissibility of voluntariness rest with the court as it should be. The mere fact that an attorney was not present during the interrogation and all the guide line were met as to the suspect being warned of his right and the statement being a voluntary statement does not make confessed criminal innocent and made to be set free to prey on society.

It is my honest conviction that the rights of a suspect/defendant is protected by the police from self incrimination on arrest when he is advised of his rights, he again is advised of his rights by his attorney if engaged by the court or himself—his rights are protected in court against self incrimination in that he does not have to bear witness against himself in taking the stand and all other rights under law but nowhere do I read in the constitution that an attorney must be present during an interrogation between police & suspect. To bring any lawyer in the interrogation is a real peril to the solution of the crime, because under our adversary system, he deems that his sole duty is to protect his client, guilty or innocent and in such a capacity, he owes no duty whatever to help society 338 US at 59.

It has got to be remembered that in many cases the only weapon law enforcement has is a voluntary statement and admission from which other physical evidence is developed. Through skillful interrogation many cases are solved. It is a law enforcement officers duty to develop himself in all phases of law enforcement, skillful interrogation is one of them to serve his community better. If in the opinion of the court that council has to be present it appears instead there seems to be a factual presumption that all confessions are a product of coercion through interrogation and there is no rational basis for that presentation. Since the state is responsible for establishing the isolated circumstances under which the interrogation takes place and has the only means of making available corroborated evidence of warnings given during incommunicado interrogation during questioning. The true function of any court is to find out where the truth lies. The most basic function of any government is to provide for the security of the individual and of his property.

The courts interpretation of a voluntary statement is one that is made without threats, force, coersion or promises of immunity, here again it contradicts its interpretation and says that in the event one would come into a police station and confess to a crime he had committed without any interruption from the desk officer, this would be a voluntary statement—then where does the obligation on the part of a police officer and his duty to do so to advise the individual of his rights—it appears there are no guidelines whatsoever for the police to follow and it appears that the court is so far out in their interpretations of the Fifth Amendment that it will never get back until definite guidelines are established can properly operate within the law whereby those guilty of violating the law will be prosecuted and not released on an interpretation of the Fifth Amendment where there is no basis for such a conclusion, for if this is to continue then all confessions and statements no longer be part and a most important tool will be taken from law enforcement hands. I may add that the British Courts have found a middle way; they have given police a set of "Judges Rules" which are few and understandable—They must warn the suspect only of his right to remain silent; and that he may consult with a lawyer—but the lawyer is not allowed to be present during questioning.

Sincerely,

Chief FRED D. GARCELINE.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: As a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, I strongly urge the passage of Senate Bill No. 674 ammending Title 18 of the United States Code with respect to the admissibility of confessions. It has been my experience since the pronouncement in the Miranda case by the United States Supreme Court, the work of this office has met with considerable difficulty in the investigation endeavors of the personnel. Although we have never relied solely on a confession for the purpose of prosecution, the information obtained from a confession has very often been the foundation of criminal prosecution. The status of the law presently has I believe increased the difficulties in solving criminal cases and bringing the accused before the court. It is my suggestion that Legislation be passed to allow voluntary confessions to be admitted in evidence, not withstanding the fact that the defendant was not apprised of his constitutional rights. In the majority of cases, once an accused is informed of the fact that he is entitled to an attorney before arraignment, no more information of any kind has been forthcoming.

I believe what the Miranda decision has done is to place the Supreme Court in a position of telling the police how to conduct a criminal investigation. This I believe is usurpation of the United States Constitution of the powers of Executive by the Judiciary which is prohibited by the United States Constitution.

It has become evident that it would be impractical for the Court which as no practical experience in police matters to direct the law enforcement agencies in criminal procedure.

Very truly yours,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of a memorandum dated February 21st, 1967 from the International Association of Chiefs of Police of which I am a member and it is my understanding in this letter that you have introduced Bill #S.674 which is to amend Title 18, U.S. Code with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

Senator, as a career man in law enforcement and Chief of Police for the past thirty-four years, I am whole heartedly in favor of your bill to try to give the police officers part of the rights back that rightfully belong to them. We are operating under conditions now where the criminal is the most respected person and the law enforcement officer is the out-cast. Unless the law enforcement men of this country get some relief from some of the Supreme Court decision rendered, then I feel that in a matter of a few years true law enforcement will become a thing of the past and the criminal element will take charge. I am sure you aware of what this will mean to society and our way of life.

I would like to relate a case we recently had in our County: There was a sailor at the McCain Air Force Base who beat his two year old son to death and threw his body into a nearby lake. The Navy personnel handled this case. He was indicted at the last term of the Grand Jury and the District Attorney, Mr. George Warner felt under the "Miranda" decision that he had no alternative but to noll-process this case and send it to file.

This case was an unusual one and when this happened the public became highly indignant. Nevertheless, the man was set free.

It is time for true Americans who love their country more than anything else stand up and be counted and you can put me down as one of these. It is my prayer and my earnest hope that you will meet with unanimous approval and favorable consideration in the passage of your bill which will enable us to start back on the long road of forcing the criminals of our country to respect and fear the laws of the land.

Sincerely, your friend,

C. L. GUNN,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is with deep interest and satisfaction to myself in learning of your concern over the present status of law enforcement as a result of recent U.S. Supreme Court Rulings (such as Miranda 6-13-66).

I know this feeling is shared by all conscientious law enforcement people nation wide. The effects of these rulings are only starting to be noticed in all branches of enforcement. As time goes on, I am certain, that the results will become disastrous to society. It bothers me to hear the high courts say that the police must be punished, as it is not us that are suffering. We all know Society is paying the price in the end.

Interrogation of suspects always has been and always will be most vital in criminal investigations. The existing restrictions on interrogation have an emasculating effect on investigation and law enforcement in general.

Therefore, be assured that we appreciate no end, your efforts in this direction and are with you all the way.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD A. ELLISON,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: A letter from the International Association of Chiefs of Police was sent to all members of that organization concerning the hearing scheduled March 7, 8 & 9, 1967, regarding U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement. It suggested all members write expressing their views regarding such decisions as the Miranda case and name any specific cases or other pertinent testimony that would assist your hearings.

I have been a Police Officer in this city of approximately 12,000 for seventeen years. I became Chief of Police shortly after attending the FBI Academy in 1958. We are not a large city but have a reputation in the State of Oregon as being one of the worst delinquency-wise. We had two murders the latter part of 1966 and were successful in getting convictions only because our District Attorney is insistent that all cases be handled with the proper preliminary warnings and chances to call an attorney.

The letter mentioned in the first paragraph asked for persons who could give pertinent and valuable testimony for your hearings. I sincerely hope your committee can contact Lt. Myron Warren of the Portland, Oregon Police Bureau. He is an officer of many, many years experience known to most of the law enforcement agencies on the West Coast and respected by all. He recently had an article in the Portland papers on the same things your committee is studying. I am positive this officer could assist you with his brilliant memory and experiences.

May I express my thanks for your stand on the matter that is probably one of the most important in our present day.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT W. BROWER,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR: We agree wholeheartedly with your efforts to enact legislation as proposed in your Senate Bill 674. The executive board of the Southeastern Pennsylvania Police Chiefs Association and the officers jointly agree, with our 600 members, that such legislation is greatly needed.

DEAR SIR: As one who has been in law enforcement work for seventeen years, I wish to protest the U.S. Supreme Decisions affecting local law enforcement.

The Miranda decision has practically paralyzed the Police Departments efforts to make an honest investigation and is an insult to American intelligence.

Anything that can be done to relieve this situation and allow the Police Departments to help make our Country a safer place for honest God-fearing citizens, will be appreciated.

Yours very truly,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Our Association wishes to advise that we are entirely in accord with your expressions and actions relative to the hearings to be held by the United States Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, March 7, 8 and 9, 1967 regarding U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement.

We forward this communication to you for use at said hearings as we would like our position noted on the record. We greatly respect all laws of our country but feel that recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions have adversely affected the ability of local law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities, to the greatest degree possible.

We respect and protect the rights of all citizens but do not feel that the public's welfare should be jeopardized by unreasonable legislation or judicial interpretation that unreasonably hampers law enforcement activities.

We feel that the degree of limitation as to the obtaining of confessions should be specifically delineated in legislation so that investigating procedures by law enforcement agencies would grant unto such agencies the ability to interrogate suspects in such latitude to protect everyone's interest and to still have justice preserved.

The broad spectrum of recent court decisions, including the Miranda case goes, we feel, beyond reasonable limitations and does in many instances create situations which are adverse to the public's best interests.

We trust that our experience and our views based thereon, will be of aid concerning this vital issue.

Respectfully yours,

CHIEF FRANCIS M. SCALLY,
President.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: We, in law enforcement, are sincerely interested in the recent Supreme Court decisions affecting law enforcement over the nation. Most people fail to realize that law enforcement is the first line of defense of our nation and unless we are able to do the task assigned, then, certainly we all must fail.

Today's youngsters are losing their respect for law enforcement and the courts because of the conditions imposed upon law enforcement and on the ability to handle juveniles with dispatch and clarity.

In the past few days we have arrested one-eighteen year old and two-sixteen year old boys involved in approximately fifteen burglaries. The eighteen year old was treated as an adult and placed in jail. The two-sixteen year olds had to be turned loose to go on their way and supposedly in charge of their parents. Equal treatment is not for all this day and age.

Changes must be made to protect the citizen for he is the forgotten person in the United States today.

Yours for equal law enforcement with justice,

S. D. KNUTSON, N.A.,
Chief of Police.

POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Rockford, Ill., March 1, 1967.

Hon. SENATOR JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In reply to a request from Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police Inc., I will cite a recent homicide case that occurred here in Rockford, Illinois. The investigation conducted by our department into this homicide was, I feel, greatly hampered by our inability to talk to and question the only known living witness to this crime. The following are the facts as we have found them to be.

On the afternoon of October 5th, 1966 our department received a telephone call in regards to a possible homicide at a local residence here in Rockford, and that the caller, himself, was also injured. An emergency first aid unit was dispatched to the scene and upon arrival they were met by the complainant, Mr. Charles Adams, who was apparently in a state of shock and incoherent. He had visible injuries to his neck, chest, hands and head, and there was some indication of blood around his mouth. The injuries were later determined to be severe second and third degree burns. In the bedroom the officers found Mrs. Virginia Adams, wife of Charles Adams, lying on a bed obviously dead. First aid was administered to Mr. Adams, pictures were taken of his injuries, and he was transferred by police ambulance to one of our local hospitals.

Detectives were immediately called to the scene, and under the supervision of a detective sergeant a thorough investigation was made. A close examination of Mrs. Adams revealed that she had suffered head injuries to the back of her skull. Autopsy later revealed that she died of a skull fracture. The bedroom in which Mrs. Adams was found revealed no signs of any struggle. An examination of the bathroom indicated a struggle had taken place there.

After a complete investigation and gathering of all evidence at the scene an attempt was made to question Mr. Adams at the hospital, as to the circumstances surrounding the death of his wife and his injuries. At this time the officers talked to Mr. Adams for a few brief minutes. He indicated that he was in the bathroom to take a shower and the next thing he remembered he woke up in the bathtub. Upon gaining his senses and going into the bedroom he found his wife lying on the bed.

This was the extent of the questioning of Mr. Adams as his lawyers arrived at the hospital and told his client not to answer any further questions. From that time until the present we have not been able to question Mr. Adams in regards to any of the circumstances. The investigation revealed there was no forced entry to the home, and the physical evidence that was gathered was submitted to the FBI laboratory in Washington for analysis. None of the physical evidence was of the nature to indicate who might have committed the crime.

The coroner conducted an investigation and held a coroner's inquest. Mr. Adams was subpoenaed, and other than giving his name and address, refused to answer any questions on the advice of his attorney.

At the onset of the investigation the States Attorney's office was contacted and an assistant was assigned to the case and was present at the scene of the investigation. After studying all the information and evidence gathered the States Attorney's office did not feel there was sufficient evidence at that time to o.k. the issuance of a warrant for any particular person. Several weeks later all of the information was presented to the Grand Jury for their consideration. They did not return an indictment against any person for this crime.

Since the original investigation began on October 5, 1966 we have been unable to gather sufficient evidence to charge any one with this crime. It is my personal belief that we have been greatly hampered in the investigation of this crime by the failure of the one living witness, and perhaps a victim himself, to answer any of our questions or to supply us with any information. His attorney in this case has repeatedly advised him not to answer any questions of the police, and has based this on the Miranda decision. He has said he was doing the only thing any good lawyer would do, tell his client not to say anything.

We do not know who committed this crime but we do know that in order to successfully solve a crime such as this the police must have the opportunity to question witnesses and suspects in a reasonable and prudent manner.

I submit this letter to you for what value it may be in the development of the necessary legislation to permit the reasonable questioning of witnesses and interrogation of suspects in regards to serious criminal activity.

I have not gone into the details of the investigation, and if you need any further information please contact myself. Please be assured of this department's cooperation at all times.

Very truly yours,

DELBERT E. PETERSON,
Chief of Police.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I wish to congratulate you for the fine speech that you delivered before the Senate recently. As a member of the IACP and as a professional police officer since 1932, I too have expressed dismay with regard to recent United States Supreme Court Decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of local police officers to fulfill their responsibilities in combatting the ever mounting acceleration of crime.

The Court seems to prey on the victims of crime instead of safeguarding society against the vicious confirmed criminals. The Court is not even certain of its own findings in giving 5 to 4 decisions and is committed to the illogical pursuit of tenuous technicalities which it recklessly invokes to nullify the convictions of confirmed criminals. These decisions affect every city, village and hamlet.

As Inspector of Police in Mount Vernon, New York Police Department in 1953, I investigated the apprehension and conviction for murder of one Chester Lee. Thirteen years later, in 1966, as a result of the Miranda decision, a retrial disputing the statement taken by a District Attorney, resulted in the release of the defendant. I enclose a newspaper article from the New York Daily News which illustrates the case in point.

I exhort your Senate Colleagues to vote favorably on your Bill S.674 to amend Title 18, U. S, Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of Confessions.

I also recommend the national legal use of wiretapping and eavesdropping to curb the accelerating rise of the sale of narcotics, the violation of gambling laws, the vicious felonies that terrorize our residents and homeowners and the destruction of crime syndicates.

It is time that the people support and the Legislators enact laws that favor police investigation and police action to deter the rise of crime.

Rest assured of our cooperation in all matters of mutual concern.

Very truly yours

GEORGE F. KUMMERLE.
Commissioner of Public Safety.

ST. CLOUD, MINN., March 2, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Criminal Law and Procedure, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: We have recently received a letter from the Executive Director of the Internation Association of Chiefs of Police, which indicates that your committee will hold hearings on proposed changes in the laws of admissibility of confessions in criminal procedures. In the letter, it was indicated that you requested correspondence from members of the IACP regarding Supreme Court decisions, with emphasis on the recent Miranda decision. I would presume that you have received replies from Police Administrators throughout the country, and that some of them will be heard before your committee. As a police officer I am vitally interested in the outcome of the hearings, and more important, the possibility of remedial legislation.

We in the police profession have been plagued in recent years with adverse decisions which have allowed criminals to go free, even though guilty, and in many cases being set free before any criminal prosecution is started, simply because of a narrow Supreme Court decision. I think it is important to point out that police officers generally agree that the rights of the accused are important, but they do not agree with the methods of the court in setting up guidelines in how these rights should be protected.

The reason for my writing to you is that I sincerely hope that not all of your witnesses are Police Chiefs or Police Commissioners of large cities. I would hope that you would talk to the Police Officer who is out doing the work. The detective or Police patrolman is much nearer the problem in many instances, than the Police administrator. The administrator will bring out statistics on the number of cases htat have been lost because of the court decision, but the Police officer will be able to testify to the actual dlifficulties involved in attempting to remain within the law in clearing a case.

St. Cloud is not a large city, population is about 40,000, but our problems in this area are the same as those in Chicago, New York City & Los Angeles. Our crime rate is probably not as high, but when we come in contact with a suspected criminal, our procedure is the same as that in any other part of the country. You have requested specific examples of cases involving the Miranda decision. In the past week our department recovered a stolen car under circumstances that if the Miranda decision had not been made, a charge of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle would certainly been made. Due to a recent snow our officers tracked an individual to his home. He was a known car thief, but was not contacted on the night in question. The following day he was picked up on a warrant on another charge and lodged in the County Jail. When one of our Detectives attempted to question him regarding the car theft he first advised him of his rights and the person in custody refused to talk to him. An auto theft may not seem too important in an isolated instance of this nature, but multiplied nationally it becomes a very grave problem.

A case I was involved in may, or may not be affected by the Miranda decision, even though the Miranda warning was given. I was assigned to investigate a possible violation of the National Firearms Act at a local manufacturing plant. The case involved the possession of a sawed-off shotgun by one of the employees. I entered the office of the personnel manager and he, his assistant and another man were present. The personnel manager was examining the gun in question and stated that the foreman had informed him that one of the employees had the gun in the plant. Since this was a violation of the company rules, the manager explained that he had gone to the work area in question and had confiscated the gun. I questioned him for several minutes and then turned to the third man in the room, presuming him to be the foreman and asked him about the situation. It turned out that this individual was the owner of the gun and he stated that it was his and that he had modified it himself. He stated that he had brought it to the plant with the intention of showing it to another employee with the possibility of selling it to him. It was at this point that I informed him of his rights based on the Miranda decision. There is the possibility that the Government may not prosecute this individual under the National Firearms Act, but merely content themselves with collecting the tax due on the weapon. However, if the Federal District Attorney should decide to prosecute on the charge, I suppose that the possibility exists that the admissibility of the man's statements might be successfully argued by a defense attorney. This of course involves a greate deal of speculation, and I am quite sure that you would be able to secure much better cases to illustate the effects of the Miranda decision, but I did want to point out that all Police officers are bound by the same rules.

In closing I would like to make one more plea to have at least some of the working force of Police departments testify before your committee. Only by talking to the men directly involved, and hearing from them the number of times that they have had to abandon a sure case merely because they have not been able to question a suspect, will your committee have an opportunity to assess the real impact of these decisions.

I would like to add that the Supreme Court has had one good effect on the Police Profession. Because of the increasing demands on law enforcement, it has become incumbent on police administrators to attempt to attract highly qualified people to the careers in the Police service. Our department has become aware of the need of careful selection of qualified persons for the department. We have had a difficult time in the last few years to fill vacancies, but our Chief would rather run a man or two short, rather than hire an unqualified person for the mere sake of being at full strength.

I would like to thank you for the interest you and your committee have shown in the problems of the Police Profession. I sincerely hope that some remedial legislation will be forthcoming as a result of recommendations of your committee.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES J. MOLINE,
Sergeant, St. Cloud Police Department.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: This is in response to the memorandum forwarded to members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc. by Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director regarding Supreme Court decisions concerning the function.

I will restrict myself to one consideration only which to my knowledge I have never heard come under discussion. This is the necessity for police officers to give, what has come to be called "The Miranda Warning" to suspects.

Specifically, that this places an unfair burden on a policeman in that he is required to "educate" citizens as to their constitutions contents. Were the suspect an alien I could understand and appreciate this warning but I feel that all citizens should know the U.S. Constitution forward and backwards.

But, my main thought on this matter is that this requirement places another opportunity for corruption in an enforcement officer's hands in that he could effect the release of a defendant by failing or stating he failed to comply with this requirement.

If for no other reason I oppose this requirement.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN V. GILLEN,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am in receipt of a letter from the International Association of Chiefs of Police in regard to your work on the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures.

I wish to commend you in your efforts to restore some logic in the handling of statements taken from defendants and evidence obtained during investigation through interrogation. A typical case of injustice through the recent supreme court decision was in the City of Douglas, Wyoming, in 1965.

On December 27, 1965, Lynette Powell, age 16, disappeared from a home where she was babysitting. The following morning her body was found in the river and she had been stabbed twice in the chest. A short time later Richard Rogers was arrested, advised of his rights, and confessed to the murder. He showed the law enforcement officers where he had hidden the knife he had used in the stabbing of the girl and told them where he had thrown the body in the river. This case was not taken to trial because the judge ruled under the supreme court decision that no evidence could be allowed through interrogation. Richard Rogers was turned loose and never tried for the crime.

I hope through your efforts that at least common sense can be used in the handling of prisoners, and again, I want to commend you for all the work you have done to help the law enforcement profession.

Respectfully,

PAUL V. DANIGAN,
Chief.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY,
Knoxville, Tenn., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As Chief of Police of Knoxville, Tennessee, I should like to express our sincere appreciation for your introduction of Senate Bill 678, and to assure you of our support of any legislation designed to free Law Enforcement from the shackles of recent Supreme Court decisions.

Every person with any knowledge of Law Enforcement realizes that interrogation is a necessary part of Police investigative procedure, and that, in many cases, it is the only key to the solution of the crime. If we apprehend a known criminal in the vicinity of a burglary, with the loot therefrom in his possession, must we have his attorney present before we ask him how he came by that stolen property? If, because of the overwhelming circumstantial evidence against him, he confesses his guilt to the Officers bringing him to Police Headquarters, shall the court rule out his subsequent confession because his attorney was not present when he made his original admission of guilt?

We make no attempt to justify the isolated instances of abuse of Police powers in the past. In common with Law Enforcement Agencies everywhere, we guard zealously against even the appearance of such abuse. We have no "third degree"; officers interrogating suspects are very careful to offer neither threats nor promises. For many years, our State Courts have provided counsel if the defendant in a criminal trial is unable to afford an attorney.

With these policies, we are in whole-hearted agreement. However, to arrest a criminal under suspicious circumstances and to be unable to even question him regarding his guilt; or to be unable to use as evidence his voluntary statement regarding that guilt is an illogical overemphasis on the constantly-increasing rights of the criminal, while totally ignoring the declining rights of his victims—the right of society as a whole to protection under the law. It is emasculation of Law Enforcement, to the point where Police and the Courts are well-nigh impotent in the performance of our sacred trust as guardians of the public safety.

We offer you the whole-hearted cooperation of this Office and of this Department, in your commendable efforts to remedy this situation.

Sincerely yours,

H.C. HUSKISSON,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: As a representative of law enforcement, I strongly support a change in the law regarding the admissibility of confessions. The quagmire produced by recent court decisions is affecting police operations because of the lack of operational guidelines.

In many circumstances, a confession is readily available from a suspect when he is confronted with facts relating to the case. The restrictions set forth in the Miranda rulings and the various interpretations given in the news media confuse everyone involved.

I am certain that no one who lives in this country wants to lose any of his rights granted under the Constitution. By the same token, a truly professional enforcement officer does not want to violate those rights.

The rights of law enforcement should also be considered and liberalized, and such legislation is long overdue.

Very truly yours,

LESTER D. CLARK,
Chief.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I was requested by Quinn Tamm, executive Director, of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc., of which I am a member, to contact you regarding the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures. I would like to express my opinion as follows:

The lack of statements from accused criminals has forced the police to pursue a more painstaking and expensive type of investigation than was formerly necessary prior to the Supreme Court Decisions which re-defined the rights of the accused.

Formerly the police interrogated a subject and in most cases there was no reluctance on the part of the suspect to give a statement. This eliminated the painstaking technical search of each and every crime scene for physical evidence necessary to connect the suspect with the crime.

This time consuming police work coupled with the expensive laboratory work necessary to process evidence obtained has posed the problem of obtaining more personnel, more laboratory space and equipment. Personnel, time, laboratory expense, all run into vast amount of money of which is absolutely uncalled for in this writer's opinion. The accused was never mistreated by any enlightened enforcement officer and in most cases was always willing to admit a crime in which he was involved. The scientific crime scene search and laboratory evaluation has merely replaced scientific interrogation with no advantage to the criminal, but adding a great burden on the taxpayer.

We in law enforcement certainly feel that the recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions are adversely affecting the ability of local law enforcement agencies to fulfill our responsibilities.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have just received a memorandum from Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director, International Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc., regarding hearings by the U.S. Senate subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures scheduled March 7, 8 and 9, 1967.

Law enforcement agencies join you and the other Senators and Representatives in your concern with regard to recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of those agencies to fulfill their responsibilities.

This will advise you that the under-signed strongly favors legislation such as S. 674, which I understand is a bill to amend Title 18, U.S. Code with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions. Such legislation, I believe will do much to relieve the almost impossible situation law enforcement agencies have been faced with since the Miranda decision.

With best wishes for success in this matter, I am

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I would like to add my support to your bill (S. 674). It is my opinion, related on my personal experience, that the Supreme Court has gone past a reasonable man's interpretation of the Constitution. I think it is time the rights of the victims of crimes be considered and society's right to be protected against violence and crime be brought to the forefront.

Guilt or innocence no longer seems to be a factor in our courts. The contest now is to see if the defense can find any minute detail that may have been overlooked by the police to free a guilty person and return him to prey on society.

DAVID WALSH,

Wausau, Wis., February 27, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I wish to take this opportunity to express my views and objections to the problems fostered on the police by the Supreme Court Decisions in the Escobeda and Miranda decisions.

We have experienced a great deal of difficulty in clearing cases involving criminals with previous records. These persons, when apprehended, are hiding behind their so called rights and refuse to answer questions, consequently only cases with physical evidence and witnesses are being cleared. We are not having any problems with the first offenders. These persons willingly waive their rights and confess to their crimes.

The retroactive order of the Miranda Decision suppressed evidence secured by a statement in a vicious sex murder case in Wausau in July 1966. The statement was suppressed in its entirety due to the ruling. Included in the statement was an account of happenings leading to the crime which were not witnessed by anyone except the victim and the murderer. As a result the Murderer pleaded insanity and was found insane which would not have been possible had the statement been allowed as evidence.

Other points that I wish to make and feel are important are: the many man hours needed to secure evidence enough for conviction of the criminal and the great lack of available laboratory facilities to examine the evidence secured.

Then also the image of Law Enforcement has been harmed. The feeling of the man on the street is that the police have "goofed" and had to be put in their place by the Court. There has been relatively no feeling exhibited for the victims of crime.

These are only a few of the views and as time goes by the real damage will be noted. As a policeman for the past thirty years I wish God's speed in correcting a bad situation.

Sincerely,

EVERETT GLEASON,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am convinced that recent United States Supreme Court decisions have put a burden on police in the nation and have affected every law abiding citizen of this country.

These decisions, in effect, have not caused less respect for law and order by criminals and hoodlums because they have none to begin with. It has caused a lack of respect for the police, being unable to enforce the law, and a lessening of fear for the consequences, if caught.

The police can adjust to the interpretations of the Court but the law abiding citizen will never be able to understand why we cannot protect his rights from the criminal and hoodlum.

It is my opinion that Mr. Average Citizen does not appreciate nor understand the release of admitted murderers, sex criminals, etc., merely because the accused had not conferred with an attorney before the admission.

Sincerely,

PAUL A. SHAVER,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your request to the members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, I am enclosing a photocopy of the article in which I expressed my opinions to a reporter for the Ridgewood News Incorporated, Ridgeway, New Jersey.

I hope that as a result of your hearings that some changes will be made with respect to the admissibility of evidence of confessions.

Yours truly,

SHELDON T. MCWILLIAMS,
Chief of Police.

POLICEMAN'S LOT NOW UNHAPPIER

(By Suzanne Barrett, of Ridgewood News)

While emphasizing that he did not wish to take a negative approach to the recent Supreme Court ruling on the procedure for questioning upon accusation, arrest or taking into custody of persons suspected of crime or criminal activity, Police Chief Sheldon T. McWilliams of Saddle River made the following observations in an interview with this reporter: "With time an essential element in criminal investigation and the subsequent apprehension of the criminal the recent Supreme Court decisions tend to tie the hands of the police even when making an ordinary, on the spot, arrest where circumstantial evidence points to the guilt of the party involved and where, in the past a simple interrogation could produce, what was once considered by the righ courts, a bona fide confession or a release. Now we must advise the suspected law breaker of what the constitution says about his rights, delaying in some cases and preventing in others a confession of wrong doing. This hampers the work of the police which is, mainly, the protection of law-abiding citizens and their property.

"What is not publicized is that the people who perform police interrogation are trained for this specialized work. There are hundreds of volumes written by eminent professors on the subject of criminology and the psychology of verbal methods of obtaining information. Given too much time, even the nonprofessional criminal can manufacture a story, convince his attorney of its truth and end up by going away free. Where I once could pick up a suspect and casually question him, perhaps leading him into telling me what I want to know, now I must begin by advising him he is under suspicion, putting him immediately on the defensive and I must further inform him of his right to remain silent and his right to an attorney—which, incidently, if he cannot afford I will provide him—caution him against saying anything that can be used against him . . . then, if he waives these precious rights, I must attempt to get information from this man. This procedure can introvert even the innocent man with nothing to fear.

"There was a situation here where a man thought to have stolen a sum of money from his employer, was interrogated by that employer and restitution made, after the man admitted the theft, by withholding the amount from the man's pay check. The man was fired, of course, and the employer now satisfied . . . refused to prosecute the individual. He felt that if the police had been called into this matter chances were that the man might have gotten off without restitution being made. A subsequent check by the police revealed that the subject had a long record of crimes. The function of the police is to apprehend and prosecute criminals. When private citizens feel they have to handle matters themselves in order for justice to be done, something is not quite right with the system.

"It would be interesting to observe what kind of on the spot, split second and without deliberation decisions members of the United States Supreme Court and other learned legal counselors would make when confronted with many of the situations that the police officer encounters during the course of his duty. The Supreme Court has ruled that the police officer must not err in his procedure of arrest because if he does, not only will his case against the guilty person be dismissed but the officer can be held for liable infringement of this person's constitutional rights. The dismissal would not be based upon whether the person is guilty or not, but rather upon the procedure used to ascertain his guilt. Isn't this rather ridiculous when you realize that the great learned men of the Supreme Court take hours and even days to render a decision on a course of action?

"People have always had the rights that are now spelled out, but why delay the work of the police or render it impossible by rolling stones into the already difficult road-way of investigations?

"It seems to be a situation where behavior on the part of a minority and the ensuing arousal of public opinion has brought about a decision detrimental to the majority of law enforcement agencies. We will have to adjust it, but it will in time prove itself to be wrong. Dust off the red carpet for the criminal, educate the young to their rights, never mind the responsibilities, and watch the crime rate, already on the increase rise."

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In compliance with your request that members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police write to you expressing their views and offering suggestions regarding the Supreme Court decisions, I am writing to you to give you an example of one instance in which the efforts of this department were thwarted in the prosecution of complaints of larceny against two adults and one juvenile. The matter was dismissed upon the mere allegation that the defendants had not been advised of their rights.

I realize that the instance I cite is indeed minor compared to the many perpetrators of heinous crimes who have gone scot-free because of the effect of recent Supreme Court decisions. Not only have these culprits gone unpunished for the crimes they have committed but also are free to prey upon society with what amounts to immunity from the law.

The last thing that those of us in law enforcement desire to do is to deprive any individual of his rights. It is part of our duty to protect the rights of the citizenry. It is also part of our duty to protect life, limb and property and to apprehend those people who have violated the laws of the land so that they may be brought to the bar of justice.

We do not want to judge the guilt or innocence of any defendant but we do want to have the tools with which to gather the true facts of a case and present the evidence found as the result of a good and honest investigation, made in good faith and taking every reasonable means to protect the rights of the accused. It cannot be expressed too emphatically that to lose the right to interrogate a suspect is tantamount to losing the ability to fight crime at all.

The seasoned criminal does not have any need for advice as to what his rights are, because he knows them better than anyone else. He is hoping for the police to make that one mistake which will enable him to claim a violation of his rights so that any physical evidence which may be used against him will be barred from being introduced into the proceedings. This is not an individual viewpoint it is an actual fact.

I cannot express too emphatically the disastrous effect that recent decisions have had upon the morale of the police. This effect is even being felt by the dedicated policeman who, in the past, has risen above the obstacle placed in his path in his fight against crime. How much longer can he be expected to dedicate himself to his job if he is thwarted and frustrated in his every effort?

We, in law enforcement, hope that men such as you will take up this fight and return to the police those tools which are necessary for them to do an honest job of protecting all of the Citizenry.

With thanks for anything you may be able to do in aiding the fight for law enforcement against crime, I am,

Respectfully yours,

EVERETT M. CRANDELL,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As Chief of Police, I find law enforcement headed for a "law-bound chopping block". I am in full accord with your statements regarding criminal laws and procedures.

I never did believe that anyone's constitutional right were ever violated through law enforcement officers. The only tool that any law enforcement agency, employs, is the tool of information, and to obtain information we must ask questions.

I can truthfully say that every man, under my command, is well experienced and informed. Any case that is investigated, is for a purpose. None of my officers have ever "picked" on any person in the community, or any transient that has had police contact.

This era reveals, that a person is not allowed, to unburden his troubles or cleanse his soul and conscience, without being accompanied by a lawyer. Is this the way of life? I think that a person is being deprived of his "Freedom of Speech", when he wants to confess, and the court rules out the confession, for the fact that he was without counsel.

Present day society is being victimized by tenious technicalities, such as law procedures, taking precidence over the crime involved.

Where do law enforcement agencies stand in this day and age? Why is the police and their departments on trial? The citizenry and the governments, Federal, State and Local, employ law men to do a job and then when they do, they are put on a witness stand and crucified. Is this the trend today? Once again Sir, I will support you, if needed.

I agree with you and all of your policies, take the shackle off the police and let them perform their duties, to reduce the country's criminal population.

You can count on me!

Respectfully,

CHARLES W. GRAY,
Chief of Police.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have been informed that you, as Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, have scheduled hearings on March 7, 8 and 9, 1967, regarding the United States Supreme Court decisions which have so much affected local law enforcement.

The most recent decisions have placed a severe hardship on the local enforcement officer and his supporting taxpayers, as an example; this department was bothered by a rash of break, entry and larcenies in one section of our municipality where there are new homes being erected. At 3:00 AM one morning, one of our patrol cars found a man coming out of a woods in the midst of this housing development. This person is well known to the department because of his prior criminal record. When the officer stopped to question the man and informed him of his rights under the recent Supreme Court decision, the suspect stated that he did not wish to be questioned and our man could go no further because if he were detained and brought to headquarters, we would be violating his constitutional rights by questioning him in a "custodial atmosphere."

I am sure you are well aware of the recent bitter dismissal, in New York State, of murder convictions against a man who very frankly admitted killing six people. It is horrible to think that this person is free to roam the streets and commit his atrocities again.

I don't believe any police department is seeking a completely free hand in the apprehension of criminals or would deny anyone the due process of law, but we do very strongly feel that the Supreme Court has overstepped its bounds, especially in the Miranda et al. case.

I realize you are fighting a tremendous uphill battle in attempting to lessen the burden placed on police officials, and I wish you the very best in your endeavors.

Very truly yours,

DIX R. M. FETZER,
Chief.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police have been asked to express to your distinguished subcommittee their views and suggestions regarding recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement. Unfortunately, up to this time, almost all of the comments presented by law enforcement people have been in the nature of opinion and rhetoric. Facts and well-documented conclusions are very scarce.

There are, I think, three reasons for this state of affairs:

First, the full impact of the recent decisions is just now being felt at the level of police, prosecuting attorneys and lower courts, as the man in the street becomes aware of the new interpretations of constitutional rights.

Second, police departments generally have not kept records in such a way that specific data are available on the results of interrogation as an investigative tool.

Third, the recent decisions on police interrogation have raised secondary questions which are still unanswered by the Courts. Among these questions are—

(1) Does the Miranda doctrine apply to juveniles who, by statute in some states, are not subject to criminal process?

(2) Do the Escobedo and Miranda doctrines apply to traffic offenses?

(3) Do these doctrines cover cases charged in Muncipal Justice Courts, where proceedings are, in some jurisdictions, considered civil rather than criminal, even though "criminal" type misdemeanors are processed in these courts?

Based on our own experience, I will venture a few empirical observations of the way the new doctrines are affecting police operations. Like some other departments we have begun to gather data on the use of standard "Miranda Warnings" on the investigative process. The value of such data will, of course, be severely restricted by the fact that we had no data before Miranda against which a comparison can be made.

1. The Miranda and Escobedo rulings are severely curtailing interrogation of arrested persons about crimes other than the ones for which they have been arrested. This effect is most felt in connection with burglary. Until recently the arrest of a gang of burglars in the act would often result in the clearance of many other burglaries—sometimes 30 or 40. Attorneys now rarely allow their clients to admit other crimes. The clearance of a series of thefts, even without prosecution on most of them, together with the return to the victim of at least a part of the loot, is a vital part of the law enforcement process.

2. The restrictions on search and seizure have proved to be more of a handicap to police work than the pre-trial interrogation doctrines. District attorneys seem to have developed a tendency to refuse warrants where the search appears to them in any way questionable. The machinery of criminal justice is simply not geared to the prompt issuance of the search warrants which the Federal Courts keep telling us to use more extensively. Moreover, until some more realistic interpretation of the terms probable cause and reasonable search is forthcoming, or until specific legislation is enacted, giving the police officer at least the search powers of a game warden, much of the "scientific evidence" which the higher courts encourage can not be discovered at all.

3. Law enforcement at the municipal level is, to say the least, in a state of flux. The differences of interpretation of various constitutional guarantees manifested by the split decisions of the Federal Courts on many cases seem also to confuse the prosecuting attorneys and some lower court judges. On the same set of facts in a given case one magistrate may refuse a warrant while the next one will issue it.

No doubt your committee will hear testimony to the effect that "the federal agencies have always followed the Mapp, Mallory, Escobedo and Miranda doctrines and they have had a high percentage of convictions". This statement while generally true is also irrelevant to the work of local police. The federal enforcement agencies work in comparatively restricted classes of offenses, very few of which present an active, immediate threat to life and public order. For many of the crimes within its jurisdiction, each agency is armed with a powerful weapon—compulsory disclosure. Business accounts, tax records, bank assets, drug inventories, etc., are made available for lengthy and thorough pre-arrest investigation. The local police begin most of their cases with information obtained "on the street" often in a fluid and rapidly-developing situation. The evidence, especially if on a person or in a motor vehicle, is available usually for only a fleeting moment. For these reasons we need specific legislation giving us reasonable as well as realistic powers if we are to continue to fulfill the expectations of the citizens. Suggestions for such legislation can be found in the American Law Institute's model code of pre-arrangement procedure, the so-called stop-and-frisk laws of some states and the search and seizure powers given to conservation officers in some states.

JOHN P. HOWARD,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is indeed gratifying to learn that you have introduced legislation with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

At no time in our history has the need been greater than it now is for an awakening to the fact that the "Pendulum" has swung too far in favor of the criminal, and too far from the rights of society.

Of the multitude of cases handled today by Law Enforcement Officers, a great many depend entirely upon the obtaining of confessions in order that proper convictions may result.

I am quite sure you will receive specific examples from various parts of our country from well known and recognized Law Enforcement Officials with examples of the effect of the "Miranda" decision on law enforcement.

Your interest and efforts for Law Enforcement and Society, I am sure, will be greatly appreciated and welcomed by all of our good law abiding citizens.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: If law and order are to prevail in the United States of America, something must be done to stem the phenomenal increase in criminal offenses.

In the five year period 1960–1965, crime in America increased 48%.

This Nation cannot long survive this trend. We can no longer effectively come to grips with criminals. We have become the laughing stock of all nations.

Remedial measures of a drastic nature are imperative or some future historian will write of the rapid rise and fall of the United States of America.

Mr. Quinn Tamm, Executive Director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, 1319 Eighteenth Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, should be the spokesman for all police departments in America.

The recent decision handed down by the Supreme Court in the Miranda case has certainly interfered in investigating work as far as the admissibility in evidence of confessions is concerned, certainly needs to be amended. DEAR SIR: I, as President of the Southeastern Massachusetts Police Chiefs Association which comprises fifty-three cities and towns, am writing to you as the representative of this organization.

We are all very disturbed about the many recent one-man decisions made by the Supreme Court of this country.

There is no doubt in my mind that something should be done about this, and I as the representative of the association, am requesting that your committee record us as being very strongly opposed to some of the decisions.

We cannot see why if a man is suspected of having committed a crime and he is questioned and he admits he is the guilty one, that this confession cannot be used against him. I do not believe that there is a criminal in this country who doesn't know that he has the right to an attorney. They know this better than the police themselves.

As far as we are concerned, a confession is usually made as a result of guilt or remorse for his crime, and he freely gives out with his own words. We also know that hardened criminal wouldn't give anyone the right time of day, let alone give out with a confession. We also know that a hardened criminal will lie through his teeth to gain his freedom, but yet the police officer has to tell the truth and is made to look like he is the criminal on the witness stand in a court room.

We would like to see your committee go all the way to push legislature to admit confessions in evidence and not so many criminals go free, such as the one in New York the week of February 18th, wherein the subject had confessed to killing his wife and children and was allowed to go free because his confession was not allowed as evidence.

This, we all feel, is out and out foolishness and something should be done about it before this whole country of ours is turned over to the criminal.

Very truly yours,

ALFRED WEHR, Chief.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: With regard to the rulings of the Supreme Court on statements and confessions, I feel that it should be the responsibility of the people of such an advanced country to know their constitutional rights.

There are not too many people in the United States who do not have the opportunity to obtain an education. Even a person who has had only a grade school education should know what his rights are. I know that I learned mine when I was in the fourth or fifth grade.

If something is not done our country will be in great trouble as it will be overrun by thieves and cutthroats and it will not be possible for decent people to walk the streets without fear.

Let us place this responsibility just where it should be, upon the people, not upon the law enforcement officer.

SIR: The International Association of Chiefs of Police has called to my attention the hearing scheduled before your Committee on March 7, 8 and 9, 1967, relative to S. 674 intended to amend Title 18, U.S. Code with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

Without commenting in any way as to the correctness of recent Supreme Court decisions dealing with the conduct of law enforcement in the course of criminal investigation, I cannot help but express my sympathy with any legislation having as its object the lessening of such restrictions placed upon law enforcement. I am completely mindful of the necessity for zealously protecting the rights of individuals, which rights have been granted to them by the Constitution of the United States. I cannot help but wonder, however, at the necessity of some decisions, particularly where there has been a close division in opinion on the part of Justices when such decisions obviously favor the rights of an individual over the seemingly more important rights of society, particularly with respect to the protection of society against the actions of criminal and subversive elements.

Accordingly I should like to commend your Subcommittee for its concern in this respect and its efforts within the framework of the Constitution to make easier the role of law enforcement in the protection of society.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I join with you in expressing dismay at the recent Supreme Court decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities. In our own Department (sixty-six men) we have had several cases wherein we were forced to release a guilty person because of the fact that he refused to sign the so called "Miranda Waiver". Cases such as these do much to undermine the morale of members of the Police Department.

I am hopeful that you and your committee will be able to bring about procedures which will nullify or at least modify many of the recent Supreme Court decisions—decisions which I feel are one sided in favor of the individual with little or no thought being given to the victim of the offense.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: With respect to recent United States Supreme Court Decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of local law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities, it is my judgment that in this total protection and insurance of a defendant's "rights" as required by these decisions, we are forgetting and neglecting the rights of an innocent victim, and his constitutional rights also as a citizen.

Our forefathers conscientiously arrived at a Constitution under which all were guaranteed certain rights—the transgressed as well as the transgressor. Why then, should the Supreme Court now rule that only a defendant has these inalienable rights?

DEAR SIR: As the Chief of Police of a small department, I have found that the Miranda decision has hampered our investigations seriously.

For example: Recently we had several house burglaries resulting in a loss of approximately 2,000 dollars. A scientific investigation was conducted. The intruder wore gloves during the commission of the crime. We did preserve fibers from the tools used at the crime site. We have known burglars in our community. However, as a result of the Supreme Court decisions, they are aware of their rights and needless to say, we achieve nothing by interrogating them on suspicion.

We have never in the past beat a confession out of a suspect, nor did we use other cohersive means in obtaining a confession. We merely interviewed a suspect and used our training and education as police officers in obtaining a confession.

I suggest that we return to the interviewing stage and the accustory stage in interrogations. Also, we are aware of what we can not do, perhaps a uniform code should be rendered as to the rights of a police officer, in his dealings with the criminal element.

My sincere appreciation to you, and the other Senators and representatives for your interest in this grave matter, so crucial to the preservation of peace and property in our great Country.

DEAR SIR: It certainly is a pleasure to learn that the forgotten policeman has finally found a Champion of the "Boys in Blue". With the stand you took in a recent speech before the Senate, against some of the U.S. Supreme Court decisions which handcuff Police in doing their duty and freeing confirmed criminals, I certainly believe you are the Champion the Police have long waited for.

I whole-heartedly endorse your legislative bill S. 674 which is a bill to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

Since the Ohio vs. Mapp, Escobedo vs. Illinois and Arizona vs. Miranda decisions, this Department has lost some of its cases in Court due to these decisions.

I don't know how the Legislative Branch of our government can reverse these decisions, but if there is a way, I am sure you will do your best in trying to do so.

This Department wishes you success in your endeavor to make this a better place to live in by taking measures to fight this great crime problem confronting this nation.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Just a brief note to let you know that, as a representative of Law Enforcement, I appreciate and support your efforts in the form of S. 674, the bill to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, regarding admissibility of confessions and hope that it will receive an "ought to pass" recommendation, and that our Congressmen from New Hampshire will support it on the floor.

Since the Miranda v. Arizona Supreme Court decision, in our small town of 2,500 population, we are hamstrung in our efforts to enforce the law by an inability to interrogate suspects. They say that we should overcome this through better training and more technological advances. However, even a 7-year-old child who watches T.V. knows better than to leave his fingerprints at the scene of a crime and many crimes of stealth are committed in such a way that the only person who can shed true light on what has happened is the perpetrator himself. Many times in the past, we would solve crimes by interrogating suspects who would lie to us: then checking out their alibi and when it did not check, confronting them with the discrepancies whereupon they would confess. This was accomplished without threats, brutality or coercion, merely through patient investigation, yet now the Supreme Court would deny to us this valuable tool.

In our small town in 1964, 80% of our burglaries were solved through investigation, only 20% where the burglars were caught at the scene of the crime. In 1966 the only burglaries we solved were cases where the criminal was caught "flagrante delicto." Other departments in our area report similar statistics.

Another problem that has arisen since Miranda v. Arizona, and one which I have yet to see much comment upon, but which I feel is important, is that prior to Miranda, you would often apprehend a person for one crime, and after talking to you, he would admit to a whole series of prior crimes. Although many times you would not charge him with all the prior crimes it did clear many unsolved cases off the books and lead to recovery of many stolen items. Now, the criminal only confesses to the crime he was caught red-handed at, and the prior offenses committed by the same person remain unsolved.

Also, we can learn much about the habits and methods of criminals by questioning them about the crimes they have committed, and thus better prepare our police departments in terms of methods and deployment of forces to cope with future crimes. Many times in high crime areas we find that a certain crime tends to be committed in a particular way, and can therefore alert our men as to what to watch for. Now, since Miranda, the criminal does not give us any of these details, and we are thus deprived of a valuable tool with which we could prevent further crimes of the same type.

I hope that you are successful in your effects to help us, because if you do not succeed, there are only two courses of action open to the American public: One is to allow crime to run so rampant as to finally lead to the return of vigilantes and lynch mobs, which should never be necessary in a civilized society.

The other is to break the back of the American taxpayer by stationing a policeman on every streetcorner in the hope of preventing a larger share of crimes.

With best regards,

EARL M. SWEENEY,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SIR: I became involved in a burglary case at 2:00 a.m. one morning by accident. While returning home, I heard on squad police radio officers of my Department searching for 3 burglary suspects. In assisting them I happened to turn onto the road being used by the suspects in their getaway. Being the first officer, I built my necessary probable cause for arrest and then proceeded to advise the three suspects of their rights as required by the Miranda decision. Because of the excitement of the chase, the lateness of the hour, the rustiness of my apprehension procedure, etc., I failed to say the words "and to have your lawyer with you while you are being questioned." The result of the case was that the County Attorney ruled improper Miranda warning had been given, and the three suspects were released.

I realized this is a small case, but I believe it points out the problem in practical application of the court ruling. I further believe the requirements created by the recent rulings have caused officers to fall back from the aggressive approach to suspects needed in apprehending violators and solving crime.

Statistics on cases lost, or crime unsolved, will be difficult to obtain. We cannot know how many cases are never brought to the prosecutor due to inability to question a suspect when no other evidence is available. The results of recent court rulings to the field of law enforcement will be varied. It may be some time before we see some of the dangerous changes in our society's behavior as to right or wrong, good or evil.

I definitely believe the rulings have curtailed good law enforcement and will have a decided effect on the future crime pattern of this country.

Sincerely yours,

CLYDE A. SORENSEN, Chief of Police.

CITY OF CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA,
COMMISSION FORM OF GOVERNMENT,
February 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN. L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have been informed that you, as Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, have scheduled hearings for March 7, 8, and 9, 1967, regarding U.S. Supreme Court decisions affecting local law enforcement, and that you have introduced legislation to amend Title 18 U.S. Code with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

At a time when police everywhere are seeing self-confessed criminals set free because of technicalities invoked by the supreme court, it is, indeed, heartening to know that some of our legislators are taking steps in the opposite direction.

In a series of rulings during the past nine years, the Supreme Court has handed down increasingly unreasonable decrees on police procedure. The trend has been toward strengthening the rights of the accused, and limiting the powers of law enforcement. As pointed out in the recently released report of the National Crime Commission, both the right of police officers to question suspects and the use of voluntary confessions have been severely jeopardized.

If legislative action is necessary to halt the invasion of the Supreme Court into what has previously been a legislative and executive function—that of policing the police—by all means let us get on with it. Let us get back into the world of reality, where the rights of the individual are protected, but without disregarding entirely the rights of society. Action must be taken so that five men are not permitted to rewrite the Constitution.

Many criminal cases, without interrogation, without a confession, would never be solved. These are the cases where no evidence is available, and there are many such. More and better training, and more education for police are fine ideals, but they will not provide evidence where there is none. Interrogation and voluntary confessions must continue to play a large part in the solving of crimes.

In this small city, seven criminal cases have been lost because of the retroactive clause in the Miranda decision alone.

I am sure you have the moral support of every conscientious police officer in the country—if I could assist in some more concrete way, I would indeed be honored.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE J. MATIAS,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I commend you for efforts to restore the confession as a tool of law enforcement and of justice.

In my opinion it is a most dependable form of evidence, frequently better than an eye witness (were one present), and subject to the least possible contribution to miscarriage of justice. Its possibilities are greatest in the earliest hours following an offense or arrest and provision for reasonable opportunity for officers to elicit a free and voluntary confession without restraint of an attorney would serve justice and could in no way convict an innocent person.

I have been an officer for thirty years, believe the current court rulings will contribute to a greatly increased crime rate despite expanded enforcement activities with greatly increased operating costs.

I regret I am unable to support my opinion with any specific examples. We have had a few subjects decline to talk without an attorney (which of course ended the matter), but they could have done that before Miranda, and in any event might not have confessed. Yet, the trend seems to be toward getting the use of the "free attorney" at the interrogation stage.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN W. STOVER,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Offie Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: After almost 40 years in law enforcement, both state and federal governments, as well as in private industry, during which years I have written hundreds of reports and letters on official matters, I now cannot find sufficient words to express my disappointment, perplexity and indignation with the manner in which our United States Supreme Court is rendering decisions involving criminal law.

How can we expect to have law, order and decency in our society, when vicious criminals, murderers, robbers, rapists, etc., are set free by the top legal brains in our nation, just because they were not given what is tantamount to a suite at the Waldorf; a steak dinner; a kiss on the cheek, and of course, "You don't have to say anything; you don't have to admit anything, because it may get you into trouble, and we could thus stop your nefarious activities".

What is happening to our wonderful country as we once knew it, when we permit vicious dogs to roam and kill at will, knowing they will be protected by the top court just because they were't told of their "rights"? Aren't law-abiding persons entitled to their rights?

How can we expect our law enforcement agencies to do an effective job when they know what the result will be if they fail to inform the criminal of his "right" when, in fact, he morally is not entitled to them after the commission of a crime. When the Bill of Rights and other protecting laws were first set up, were they really meant to protect the criminal? Weren't they, in fact, meant to protect the God-fearing people who uphold the law?

What has become of our great Supreme Court which was revered and respected throughout our country? Have some of its members become senile, and no longer possess the ability to reason? Are they in conspiracy with lawlessness? Are they seeking revenge against society for some unknown reason? Are some of them waiting until a heinous crime is committed on members of their own families before they have a change of mind and reasoning?

I speak not only for myself, but for the innumerable honest, hard working, dedicated, law enforcement officers, who daily risk their lives so that yours and mine, yes, and the lives of the high court can be safe.

I wish to impress upon you, if the present trend continues, we will become slaves of the criminal masters, who will have complete immunity within the sanctum of the highest court in the land.

May I respectfully suggest that you do everything in your power to "operate" on the crowns of those "good justices" and, during the surgery, have those crowns injected with "hormones" known as "Common-Sense-Justice-for-All", the kind of justice that would protect the good people from the bad and eradicate the incomprehensible and dangerous decisions now being rendered by the Supreme Court.

Every law-abiding person is with you 100% in your efforts to enact legislation to protect the honest people of our country—and not the criminals—and give our police the tools with which they can do their jobs properly! Knock out the absurd rulings, "No love—No case", as dreamed up by the Supreme Court.

Some of my remarks may seem somewhat harsh, but I still feel that the decent man is being let down while the criminal is being protected far beyond reason.

Best wishes for the success of your endeavors and I hope for the pleasure of hearing from you.

Very respectfully yours,

HENRY W. RODNEY.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Career law enforcement officers are very much aware that guidelines must be established for the protection of individual rights. With this there can be no quarrel. We are further aware that there must be a continuous effort on a daily basis to improve police procedures. However, the guidelines for the protection of individual rights must be realistic if we are to protect innocent citizens.

The law clearly states that it must be presumed that every person should be aware of his legal rights, that ignorance of the law is no excuse. On the other hand, recent decisions of the Supreme Court (the Miranda decision for example) directs that each one must be warned and made aware of his rights. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court have made an almost intolerable situation for police officers when, before questioning a subject, he must advise him that he has a right to remain silent, that if he does not remain silent anything that he may say or write can and will be used as evidence against him in court, that he has the right to consult a lawyer before he is even questioned, that he has a right to have a lawyer present while he is questioned, and further that if he does not have any money he has a right to counsel with an attorney who will be furnished to him and appointed to represent him before any questioning by any police officer.

We understand that for the protection of the ignorant and the poor it is necessary that there be some counseling. However, it is not the ignorant and the poor who are taking advantage of these most unrealistic Supreme Court decisions. Those who are taking advantage are the hardened criminals who prey upon the innocent.

Law enforcement's difficulties have become very burdensome with these decisions and will continue to be so and we are extremely worried about the future of crime which is now gaining momentum at an all too rapid pace.

I would respectfully request that your committee seek the testimony of Virgil Peterson, the executive director of the Chicago Crime Commission, whom I feel is extremely competent and has considerable knowledge of criminal activity and the courts in the Chicagoland area.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In reference to your Memorandum of February 21, 1967: On the early morning of May 26, 1966 a fire occurred at the Schewel Furniture Co., 23 W. Cork St., this city. Subsequent investigation revealed that a white, male 27 had apparently been the first one to notice the fire. Accordingly in the routine investigation that followed we asked the subject to come to Police Headquarters so that we could talk to him. He voluntarily came to Police Headquarters on May 31, 1966 and our subsequent conversation with him led to his giving us a confession admitting that he was implicated in the fire at Schewels and also to one at the Brumback Co. on 2-24-66.

Prior to his making any statement and prior to his being questioned he was advised that he was not under arrest, that we were making no threats or promises against him, that he had the right to remain silent, that he had a right to an attorney and could use the phone to call a lawyer or his family and that any statement he did make could be used in any court of law. After he made the confession to the two offenses he sat in the police department lobby, still not under arrest or restraint, for several hours while we located the Commonwealths Attorney. Later the same day warrants were issued and he was arrested and charged with one count of Arson.

On subsequent occassions when he was questioned he was advised each time of his rights and he eventually confessed to 9 arson offenses spanning a period of several years. Total damages probably ran around $200,000.00. He re-enacted the offenses for us and was totally open about his involvement.

Between the time of his confessions and the time he was brought to trial on the 4 offenses for which he was subsequently indicted, the Miranda-vs-Arizona decision had been handed down. Consequently even though this man was advised of all rights required at the time of the confessions and the added fact that he was not even under arrest when the first 2 offenses were admitted, the retro-active aspects of the Miranda decision resulted in our statements being thrown out of court and the subsequent loss of all cases.

Arson is a very difficult case to prove as most of the evidence burns up. There fore in many instances about the only thing you have of substance is a confession and with that thrown out you simply do not have a case.

Since the Miranda-vs-Arizona and the Escobedo-vs-Illinois decisions there are many instances where we simply do not talk to suspects for fear of possible repercussions in the eventual court trial.

We have now made up our own forms which we use in taking statements and also our release forms which we use in giving lie detector examinations and I am enclosing a copy herewith. These forms were made up by Police Department personnel and are used without exception in giving lie detector examinations or taking statements.

Recent Court Decisions have made it imperative that Police Officers be well trained, dedicated men and in view of the generally low salary scales paid by Police Agencies it is becoming more and more difficult to find acceptable applicants. It is now almost a case of trying to get the best of the job applicants while paying salaries that rank among the lowest when compared with representative industrial and other employers in the area.

Your efforts and those of your fellow Senators in endeavoring to improve the laws and working conditions which Police must use are indeed appreciated.

Respectfully,

MAJ. F. M. FUNK,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SIR: The Police Chiefs Association of Bergen County, N.J., is an organization of seventy (70) Police Chiefs of seventy (70) municipalities, covering an area of 236 square miles with a population of over 886,000 people.

We wholeheartedly support your campaign in which illogical, shortsighted decisions reflect an unjustified and unprecedented concern for the law breaker.

These decisions and rulings has handcuffed law enforcement agencies by requiring impossible procedures which will insure the release of the guilty to the detriment of the law abiding people.

Since 1789 when the U.S. Constitution was adopted the Police and Courts have had a common objective: To develop and maintain a system of criminal justice which is fair, impartial and effective. We all agree that this is an exceedingly difficult and complex task.

Each and everyone of us support, without reservations, President Johnson's proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, which he outlined in his State of the Union message.

We Chiefs are of the belief that law enforcement agencies will be able to slow down our rising rate of crime if confessions shall be admitted as evidence when it is shown that the confession was given voluntarily, without any threats, promises or coercion of any kind.

Again, may we focus our thoughts on this matter to you and the other Senators and Representatives and stress our readiness to assist in any way possible to bring a change to the recent court decisions on confessions, interrogation, search and seizure, and various rights of the accused.

Sincerely,

ROBERT B. LOVEMAN,
Secretary, Bergen County Police Chiefs Association.

DEPARTMENT OF POLICE,
Frederick, Md., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3421 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Thank you for interest in the protection of society and the individual's rights. The Miranda Decision of the Supreme Court has, in a great measure, resulted in hampering the Police with interviews necessary to complete their investigatoins. The interviews are only for the purpose of the meticulous ascertainment of the truth and in some instances it proves a suspect innocent. There is nothing more important in a criminal investigation than the interview because it puts together physical evidence, technical evidence, information from citizens and the true presentation to the Judiciary upon their examinations through testimony.

Experience has proven that we have had unworthy situations because of the lack of training and integrity. The Supreme Court Decisions have been reviewed and I agree with them with the exception of the Miranda Decision because this draws the line too tightly. We must look forward in our zeal to protect the individual's freedom and not so much the person who has committed an offense. Therefore, it is my sincere suggestion that some change might be made that would give the right to the truly conscientious Police Officer to question a suspect or search him for the protection of society; and to enable the Police Officer to carry out his sworn obligation, new legislation is needed. Moreover, I suggest the following:

a. "Enact provisions with respect to law enforcement officers to stop persons for brief questioning including specifications of the circumstances and limitations under which stops are permissable."

b. "Interrogator should be given some latitude when questioning a suspect that would enable him to connect all evidence in the interview to prove or disprove the act or commission of a crime but informing the suspect of his rights and that anything that he would state will be used against him in a Court of Law."

We must have strong Police Administrators and not just men who desire to become popular, because so much depends upon his integrity and devotion to the laws of the Nation. There is no substitute for this type of man because it is the American society that he and his subordinates must serve. The Police Officer is the first line of defense in a free society and the guardian of the individual's rights and privileges. Therefore, he must be fully cognizant of his responsibilities for justice and equality under the law.

With kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES V. MAIN,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It was indeed gratifying to me to learn of your scheduled hearings on March 7, 8, and 9, 1967, with reference to the recent United States Supreme Court decisions affecting Local Law Enforcement.

Being a police official supervising some 75 police officers in a medium size southern community, I can say without any reservations or qualifications whatsoever, these recent decisions have adversely affected the responsibilities of my officers in fulfilling their obligation to the law-abiding taxpayers of this city. A check of our police files reflects a reduction in "cases cleared" since the officers are required, under the recent decisions, to advise any suspect of his so-called Constitutional Rights before interrogation. On many occasions a police officer must make a decision in a matter of seconds for the safety of the public; therefore, he does not have the time to weigh the circumstances as to whether he is going to violate a person's constitutional right or not. I personally think these decisions have put a "cloak of fear" in all law enforcement officers, not physically, but a fear of making an honest mistake when making arrests in an effort to not violate any Federal Statute.

We, as police officers as a whole, would be the last ones to deliberately violate the rights and freedoms of any American which is granted to him by the Constitution of the United States.

Your efforts, along with the other Senators and Representatives, in attempting to amend Title 18 of the U.S. Code is greatly appreciated by me and this department.

Yours very truly,

POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Elk Grove Village, Ill., February 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Your positive action in introducing Senate Bill 674, to amend Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions, is hailed by all law enforcement administrators as a possible roadblock—or at least a turning point—in stopping the downhill run of the "one-man majority", in the United States Supreme Court, to absolve criminals of their antisocial deeds, to disregard the civil rights of victims of criminal offenses, to pronounce retroactive rules in the fancied game between law enforcement and the criminal element—all under the guise of the administration of justice.

Certainly no progressive police administrator endorses either physical, verbal, or implied duress or abuse in obtaining confessions; but, to be bound by the four rules of counsel which must precede any criminal interrogation places the police investigator in the untenable position of building a fence around a prime suspect which neither the police officer nor the prosecuting attorney will be able to penetrate—unless the suspect is in less control of his mental faculties at the time of the interview than at the time of his crime.

The "one-man majority" of the United States Supreme Court has succeeded in confusing not only the police officer who is first at the scene of a heinous crime and his fellow officers who are charged with the detection and apprehension of the perpetrator; but the system has, also, so confused the lower courts and their respective prosecutor staffs that the present fiasco on display in the State of Illinois (The Speck Trial) will cost the taxpayers and estimated $100,000.00—plus the unmeasured grief for the families most dramatically involved—and no person has dared ask the suspect whether he committeed the crime.

In the name of Justice and Mercy, may your proposed legislation succeed.

Very truly yours,

HARRY P JENKINS,
Chief of Police.

DEAR SENATOR: May, I take this opportunity to express my feeling regarding S. 674, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

I am dismayed by recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions which are adversely affecting the ability of law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities to the citizens of their communities. My feelings are the same as, so many other law enforcement men, who feel the criminal has been given all rights, advantages and freedom to prey again on a victimized society.

As a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police and many other Police Associations, I find from attending these meetings and conferences, that the police officer has lost his effectiveness in dealing with the criminal and has been hampered in their interrogations with fear of having the case thrown out of Court due to some legal technicality.

Being the next door neighbor to the City of Chicago, may I suggest that Superintendent O. W. Wilson, head of the Chicago Police Department, who could make suggestions and provide valuable and pertinent testimony regarding the above mentioned legislation.

May the good Lord bless you with the strength to continue in your fight for all concerned, I wish to remain

Re Legislation Needed to Protect Society from Criminal Activity. Passage of Bill S. 674.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: We, in law enforcement, feel that the time has come when must speak out on the subject of too much protection for the "rights of the criminal" and not enough for society.

It has gotten to the point where court trials have receded to where the only questions that are argued are the ones on admissibility of evidence. The actual fact of guilty or innocence does not enter the case. The police officers testifying often suffer more harrassment than the person being tried.

Actually, the most serious affect on law enforcement (which in reality represents the 90% of the people who do not commit crimes) is not in the court room but in the field. There is no known substitute for interrogation of suspects and witnesses. Often persons thought to be witnesses turn out to be suspects and sometimes give information that could have been used to convict them had they been formally warned beforehand.

Every law enforcement officers that I know urges you to push for the passage of Bill S. 674 to amend Title 18, U.S. Code.

If we can be of assistance in any way at any time, please do not hesitate to call on us.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD C. SMITH,

CITY OF GRANDVIEW HEIGHTS,
Columbus, Ohio, February 24, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures U.S. Senate, 3421 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: With respect to your proposed legislation, S. 674, I would like to offer the support of our small municipal police agency. We are a suburban community of approximately 10,000 population, located in the metropolitan area of Columbus, Ohio.

The resultant theory to the recent Escobedo, Miranda, Mapp, and other Supreme Court decisions, that police investigations must rest basically upon scientific evidence is, in my opinion, a gross injustice to the law abiding American citizen. It is unreasonable to believe that the majority of enforcement agencies can equip, train, or hire personnel so as to conduct criminal investigations with the same professional approach as that of the Federal Agencies or the large metropolitan departments.

We, of course, cannot permit police misconduct, third degree tactics, nor the abridgment of our civil liberties, however, I sincerely believe that the rights of the innocent must take precedent to those of the criminal.

I, therefore, urge and support your committee's efforts to correct, through legislation; the adverse affects imposed upon local law enforcement by the United States Supreme Court.

Very truly yours,

D. L. MILLER,
Chief, Division of Police.

STATE OF NEBRASKA,
Lincoln, Nebr., February 23, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures U.S. Senate, 3421 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is a privilege on my part to send to you my opinion as to how the Miranda Opinion has affected our department in the performance of our duties.

We as a police organization are attempting, as far as time and finances will permit, to better educate our officers in the field of policing. We send our officers to special schools to further develop their ability in the technical fields of our work, and one of these fields is the procedure of interrogation in which they stress that privacy in interrogation is essential. Also, stressed in the interrogation instructions is the preservation of rights of those being questioned. It seems that we are defeating our purpose when we spend time and money for instructions in this field and then our Supreme Court rules that this is trickery. We, as law enforcement officers, feel that we have an obligation to the public to develop all means possible without jeopardizing anyone's rights to properly investigate every crime committed.

To better substantiate my opinion, may I relate a few actual experiences that will reflect how we are handicapped.

For many years members of the Nebraska Safety Patrol have given verbal warnings similar to those given by the Federal Bureau of Investigation Agents, to persons under arrest, prior to interrogation. This was not a necessity under the laws of our state but was done in an effort to insure that an individual was apprised of certain of his rights. Contrary to the apparent opinion of the majority of the United States Supreme Court, there is probably no person more concerned for the rights of individuals than the police officer engaged in actual law enforcement. This concern is not only for the rights of the perpetrators of crimes but also for the rights of the victims and potential victims of criminals.

The restrictions placed on law enforcement by the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, while not impossible to work with, have severely hampered us in effectively doing the job which is expected of law enforcement officers.

In a recent case, a man was suspected of murdering his wife. She was killed by a single bullet wound in her head. The victim was found lying across a bed with a rifle lying across her body. Two pathologists who examined photographs of the scene advised that from their experience it was impossible that the weapon could be found in this position under the circumstances depicted by the photos.

The husband was cooperative and readily admitted animosity toward his wife, however, he claimed he was in the other room when his wife shot herself.

He waived his rights and agreed to take a polygraph examination. When the polygraph examination disclosed he was lying and the examiner accused him of killing his wife, he terminated the interview and walked out of the interrogation room. There were no witnesses to the shooting, no fingerprints on the gun or any other physical evidence to establish a case strong enough for conviction. The husband is not only walking the streets a free man but was also appointed administrator of the victim's estate.

Professional criminals have long been aware of and have exercised their constitutional rights. Long before "Mapp" and "Escobedo", the police officer has been confronted by the burglar who says, "My name is so and so. I live at such and such a place and my lawyer is so and so." Usually this person has been arrested inside a building which he was burglarizing or has been caught with loot which can be identified. Here there is physical evidence which can be presented to and evaluated by a jury and the need for statements is not so demanding.

Far different is the case in which a masked person enters a store and robs the proprietor of his money. Here, the only possible way to solve the case is to catch the robber in the act. It is not possible to identify the robber or the money.

Both the burglar and the robber will eventually be caught if they continue to operate. In the past when one of these individuals was apprehended and he knew the case against him was sufficient for conviction, he was often willing to give statements concerning other crimes in which he was involved. Often officers from several jurisdictions questioned the subject who was "talking" in order to attempt to clear cases other than the immediate one. Rarely were additional charges filed. In cases where additional charges were filed, the courts had the prerogative to let the sentences run concurrently.

Now the police are even restricted from clearing those cases which they know they will be unable to prosecute. They are told that if they have sufficient evidence for conviction they should not try to get statements. Often, continued interrogation will clear a number of cases and bring out the identity of other criminals who have been accomplices of the person being questioned. In the past we have been able to arrest these persons and, in most cases, to obtain confessions and convictions even in the absence of physical evidence.

Now, to continue an interrogation past the immediate case even after a person has knowingly waived certain of his rights may, because of the time involved, create doubts in the mind of the court as to the voluntariness of the waiver of rights should the party attempt to repute the officer's word.

In the "Miranda Decision" numerous referrals by the court to interrogation texts clearly indicates a lack of knowledge of actual practices. Texts are available on "sure fire" methods of accomplishing nearly everything whether it be selling insurance, succeeding in life on winning an election. Are we to conclude that the salesman who uses psychology in some form to complete a sale should be castigated as using unfair tactics?

Certainly some restrictions should be placed on police interrogations to insure against any form of brutality but it is a recognized fact there is a desire to confess in many cases.

In one of our cases a person suspected of a homicide agreed to four separate polygraph examinations. He finally confessed after eight hours of interrogation. He had conferred with his attorney before the interrogation started and knew his rights. He stayed because he actually wanted to tell someone about what he had done. He needed help to bring out the truth.

Some interrogators do have certain powers of personality which enable them to obtain information and to get next to an individual more readily than do others. These powers might be compared with those of the man who sold the icebox to the Eskimo. These men who have an understanding of human nature are valuable to the police profession and certainly do not deserve the villainous connotations placed on their integrity as was done in the "Miranda Decision".

The presence of an attorney during an interrogation sets up an impossible situation. In one of our cases a man was questioned about a homicide in the presence of his attorney. On several occasions during the interview the subject indicated he wanted to confess but each time the attorney would enter into the conversation. After about an hour the interview was discontinued.

The investigation was continued and when it was apparent that the suspect and his wife were the only ones who could have killed the victim, a warrant was issued for both of them. When the questioning of the man was resumed without his attorney being present he confessed in less than six minutes.

This case was reversed by the State Supreme Court and eventually dismissed.

At the present time we have a vicious murder under investigation and have a good suspect. The suspect is incarcerated in another state for a similar case in which the victim survived in spite of multiple fractures of the skull. There is a possibility that an expert interrogator could successfully obtain a confession to this crime but it is felt the subject would not be agreeable to this.

The possibility of false confessions brought out by sophisticated methods of interrogation was mentioned in the "Miranda Decision". There is always this possibility. These suspects are also likely to be the ones who are most willing to waive their rights. Police are aware of the fact that there are persons who will confess to anything, with or without pressure. This is one of the values of a good interrogation; only the actual perpetrator will have knowledge of the minute details of the crime.

We have been fortunate in Nebraska in that our Attorney General and several of our County Attorneys were able to foresee the trends of the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and immediately instituted a program to acquaint Nebraska law enforcement officers with these decisions.

We have placed a great deal more emphasis on these subjects in our in-service training and have provided our men with opportunities to attend various schools on Search and Seizure and Interrogation.

Since December 15, 1964, we have published a Memorandum to All Interested Law Enforcement Officers in our weekly Law Enforcement Bulletin. These Memoranda are furnished by Attorney General Clarence Meyer and have been widely acclaimed in law enforcement circles.

I mentioned before that these decisions are not impossible to work with. They even are of value to the police profession in that they have brought to public attention some of the situations with which the police must deal. They have also resulted in an increased emphasis on training and recruiting. When an officer is required to make split-second decision, often a lack of physical evidence. The victim may be the only witness.

The viciousness of the crime may cause a police officer to become over zealous because the police are the only branch of the judiciary to have actual contact with the victim at the time of the crime.

A police officer may sometimes be placed in the paradoxical position of solving a crime and thus losing a case or following the rules and letting the case go unsolved.

In the past, an officer knew that if he used good judgement in the handling of an arrest he could expect fair treatment from the courts. Today there is doubt in the officer's mind. The courts have accused him of violating the very thing he stands for. They have established decisions without providing a clear rule of procedure. We are forced to make tape recordings or to get signed statements of the waiving of rights and are restricted from even talking to a prisoner who had indicated he may want a lawyer.

No group has greater respect for the rights of man than the police. They deplore brutality and the bullying of prisoners but the officer feels an obligation to do the job for which he was hired, to protect the law abiding citizen from those who know no law.

We spend millions of dollars to catch criminals, more million to try to convict them and more millions to incarcerate and rehabilitate them. Nothin is spent on the victims, they have only the police to console them.

Respectfully yours,

DAN J. CASEY,

Colonel, Superintendent, General Chairman, Division of State and Provincial Police, International Association, Chiefs of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It is gratifying to know that someone knows about the problems of Law Enforcement Agencies and is doing something about it. You are to be congratulated for your stand in reference to the recent U.S. Supreme Court one-man majority decisions.

Much has been said about these decisions and how they hamper the normal process of reasonable criminal investigations, and whatever I may say would be superfluous.

I do find from my own personal experience, as a law enforcement officer, that many cases have been lost in court as the result of these decisions and that some cases did not even reach the court because the police were unable to interrogate the suspect.

Time will not permit me to give you the facts on every case but here are a few examples.

(1) A short while ago we had an epidemic of school, church and hospital fires. We apprehended the culprit responsible for the school and church fires because he did not invoke his constitutional rights. The person responsible for the hospital fires refused to say anything and although our investigation disclosed that he was responsible for the fires, the evidence was not sufficient to prosecute. Needless to say he committed similar crimes with the same results.

(2) Two burglaries occurred one night in Saugus. A few days later culprits were arrested in another jurisdiction for crimes committed there. At the time of the arrest property were seized including property that had been stolen in two Saugus burglaries. The subject refused to speak invoking their constitutional rights. When brought before the court the judge sustained a motion to suppress all evidence for the illegal search and seizure and the case was dismissed. Is it any wonder that the crime rate is increasing enormously year after year in every city and town of our country? With the ridiculous decisions of individual rights for the criminals, the crime rate is going to increase rather than diminish.

I believe that greater latitude should be given to Law Enforcement Officers in the field of Arrest, Search & Seizure and interrogation in order to combat crime.

Thank you for your cooperation and with deep personal regards I am.

Very truly yours,

FRED FORNI,
Chief, Saugus Police Department.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee, Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: My purpose in corresponding with you is to commend you for your concern relative to recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions that have literally handcuffed professional and dedicated law enforcement personnel. Recent decisions involving Miranda and Escobedo have certainly tipped the scales of justice directly in favor of the criminal element.

Another impending decision, namely U.S. versus Lewis could effectively decision law enforcement out of existence, should the U.S. Supreme Court reverse the lower court decisions.

Although our agency has complied with the requirements of the Fifth Amendment for many years, we have found that this is not sufficient for it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove not only that the suspect was properly advised of his rights, but further that he thoroughly understood them. You might be interested in knowing that our agency lost a court decision in Circuit Court that involved the arrest and subsequent prosecution of an intoxicated driver of a motor vehicle involved in a fatal auto accident wherein an innocent person was killed. The court held that although the arresting officers had twice advised the suspect of his Constitutional Rights, it felt that because the subject was so intoxicated, he was unable to properly understand them. The burden placed upon law enforcement today is truly difficult to contend with.

It is my opinion that the U.S. Supreme Court has read this "advising" requirement into the Fifth Amendment, for exhaustive research on my part fails to delineate any directives requiring that police officers must so do.

Yours truly,

ROBERT L. MILKE,
Chief of Police.

Re bill S. 674.
Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: It is very gratifying to see legislation being introduced on the above Bill.

If it takes a unanimous decision of the jury to find a defendant guilty of a felony; I feel that there should be a greater majority than five to four in handing down decisions which become the law of the land.

I had the occasion to attend a seminar in Ann Arbor, Michigan on August 1, 1966. There were mostly Defense Attorneys present and the common thought among them was that "they at least had the law enforcement officer where they wanted him." A few examples were mentioned concerning "police brutality," but none were recent occasions. They were all at least forty to fifty years ago.

I wholeheartedly agree with rights for the individual, but all I have been noticing in recent decisions is "rights for the criminal." When is the law abiding citizen going to have representation?

Any person who has any law enforcement experience knows that confession alone does not make a case. There should be some coordinating evidence to build a case. At the same time, one of the most important points of investigation is interrogation. Many times during an interrogation the smartest suspect may unconsciously drop a remark which presents a lead to the crime. Even this is ruled out now. For example; a woman's scream is heard from a house at 3:00 A.M. A male runs from behind the house. The law officer stops suspect and asks the following questions.

1. Who are you?
2. Where do you live?
3. Where have you been?
4. Where are you going?

If the officer did not advise the suspect of his rights before he asked questions three and four, the officer has violated the suspect's rights.

My honest feeling is that we are going overboard to protect the criminal in recent decisions and it is about time to protect the honest and law-abiding citizen. It is about time the cases were tried on the merits of the cases instead of technicalities.

As I said before, it is highly appreciated that a person of your status and importance has taken an interest in our problems. I sincerely hope you will receive the response and support for the Bill S. 674.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY W. HIRD,

The introduction of S. 674 which amends Title 18 of the U.S. Code with respect to the admissibility of confessions should be of invaluable assistance to all law enforcement agencies.

CITY OF UNIVERSITY PARK,
Dallas, Tex., February 24, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: May I take this opportunity to express to you my personal appreciation and the appreciation of the various Texas Law Enforcement Groups with which I am affiliated. Our sincere thanks for your efforts in the control of the criminal element in our country today.

Recent Supreme Court decisions and certain provisions of the Revised Texas Code of Crminal Procedure has hand-cuffed and shackled law enforcement in the United States, has reduced effectiveness in crime control, reduced law enforcement personnel to a status of puppets and has wrapped the "Professional Criminal in Sheep's Clothing".

Miranda and Escobedo have been the most damaging decisions rendered to date to grant the hoodlum an additional license to ply his trade upon the law abiding citizens of our country. A great many law enforcement officers throughout this land are under the impression that our Supreme Court is making the law rather than interpreting and in doing so giving the murderer, the rapist, the robber, sex deviate and others of the criminal element encouragement to prey upon the men, women and children of our country without fear of punishment. If punishment should be meted out, our parole provisions are so lax that a murderer can be on the streets again in Texas in seven or eight years after being given a life sentence. In fact, Senator McClellan, the criminal process, not only in Texas, but throughout this nation is a complete farce.

Law enforcement officers have been robbed of their tools and initiative necessary to protect the people. The fact that law enforcement has been scuttled and stripped of authority by the decisions and provisions of the courts and legislatures does not mean for the police officers, a segment of the chain of law enforcement, to take the defeat like "A Lamb Being Led to the Slaughter".

Police officers and those in the entire criminal process must make their voices heard in the Legislative Halls of our country and defeat the program designed to cause our people to live in constant fear when at home, or on the streets. Under existing conditions the professional criminal and those who profit from his acts will thrive and flourish as crimes against the person and property continue un-abated.

During the 1965 Session of the Texas Legislature, a Revision of the Texas Code of Criminal Procedure was passed, signed by Governor Connally and became effective on January 1, 1966. This monstrosity was revised for the benefit of a few for personal gain and the State Bar of Texas did not recognize it when passed as being the revised version they had been asked to submit.

On March 7, 1967, a group of law enforcement or officers are to appear before a Senate Committee in Austin and plead for the revision of some of the provisions that were passed that restricted law enforcement in Texas as much almost as Miranda has done in the nation.

As an example under our new code, we must take the arrested party "Before the Magistrate Immediately". Under the Federal rule the arrested person must be taken before the commissioner, "With out unnecessary delay", this is quite a difference and we are asking the Legislature to grant us the Federal Rule.

Texas is the only state in the union that is not permitted to use an "oral" confession. Federal officers are allowed the use of oral confessions too but the new Texas Code does not permit it. We are asking for this rule to be provided by this session of the Legislature.

The majority of the provisions in the new Texas Code are good but just enough changed in order to hand-cuff the police and give the Texas Criminals and their cohorts an additional license to steal and plunder.

Prior to 1963, Law enforcement in Texas had not been active in so far as statutes and procedures were concerned as it was at this time that the Texas Code was beginning to be revised. Those who were assigned to the revisions, during the entire process, did not contact a police chief, police officer or a police association while in the process of revision.

Police officers throughout the nation have been beaten to their knees with the false charges of "Police Brutality" and our image is darker before the eyes of our citizens than at any time in history. The "Police Brutality" charge has been used so successfully by those who would like to see local departments dispersed and review boards installed and the entire process put under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Law enforcement is on the brink of disaster and if the present trend continues local communitites will organize vigilante groups for the protection of life and property as has already been done in some areas of the country.

In closing, may I pledge to you my complete individual cooperation and the cooperation of the various Law Enforcement Associations of which I am a member, a constant program of informing the citizens we serve of the needs of law enforcement for the protection of the people. Should we fail to advise the people of the needs of the Law Enforcement in the control of crime then in a sense we have neglected our sworn duty to the citizens we serve.

Sincerely yours,

FORREST E. KEENE,
Chief of Police.

CITY OF CUDAHY, WIS., POLICE DEPARTMENT,
February 25, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: As Chief of Police in the City of Cudahy, I heartily endorse any legislation that will lift some of the burdensome restrictions brought about by the Miranda Decision.

The full impact of this decision cannot be adequately assessed by merely comparing the number of confessions obtained before and after the decision was rendered. A more realistic picture is presented when one considers the following:

Witnesses and other people with pertinent information are now reluctant to cooperate with investigators, especially after the required warnings are recited.

Physical evidence at crime scenes is overlooked, or its value to the prosecution deteriorates, because investigators are prohibited from making the necessary inquiries that would lay proper foundation for introduction in court.

Many prosecutors have become so sensitive to the rules set down by Miranda that they often talk the defendant out of cooperating by long, detailed and repetitious warnings with regard to the defendant's rights. There also seems to be a good deal of confusion among prosecutors and some members of the judiciary as to the application of these rules. It is now impossible to find two officers of the court who will give similar answers to questions on such matters as Tacit Admissions, Res Gestae Declarations, etc.

Probably the most damaging result of these decisions has been its effect on the public's attitude toward police. Many people feel that the laws and ordinances can be violated with impunity. Matters that were once treated as routine incidents now require extensive investigation and sometimes lengthy court proceedings.

This is having an adverse effect on the efficiency and morale of the police.

I honestly feel that unless some of the restrictions on questioning suspects prior to arrest are removed, crime figures will soar and conviction rates will drop.

Very truly yours,

ANTHONY M. WISE,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

YOUR HONOR: Law enforcement in our time is very difficult and trying operation. Breaking and entering, Larceny and Burglary is taken for granted by many persons to be their legal right.

In Chicago during their heavy snow. Breaking into business establishments, carrying and hauling away merchandise was a huge operation and when officers attempted to make arrest, resistance occurred and they were accused of brutality as they were when the so-called peaceful demonstrations were held.

After arrests were made, proof beyond doubt is demanded by attorneys for their clients.

Under present conditions a person is not safe in his own home. Forced entries are made, occupants are threatened, tortured, raped, tied up, valuables stolen and some are murdered and the offender is not easily apprehended. If and when apprehension is made. Proof must be established of guilt.

We know we must inform those who are placed under arrest as to what their Constitutional rights are.

Release on Bond, especially on offenses in Chapter 38 of the Criminal Code of the IRS, is a simple matter. Once out on bond, many commit other crimes and some fail to appear in court on date set for them.

Long delays in bringing cases to trial. Changes of location for trial to be held takes additional time. All such actions pile up a back log and bring on discouragement.

I do not believe that the Founding Fathers of our Constitution intended for the criminal to be protected as they are today. I believe that this protection be given to the Law Abiding Citizens.

In recent years, Attorneys for the Defense have used and are using every technicality to sway Jurors and the Judges to point out and define a Statute in a manner that their Client is innocent of the offsense committed.

Even Attorneys do not agree on definitions many times of the Statutes.

The Supreme Court Of The United States has laid down Rules that we as Officers must follow. We have been Handcuffed. Crime can be reduced. We as officers have the knowledge, ability and are willing to enforce the State laws and City Ordinances and assist each other of any department and the F.B.I. We are and there is no doubt every department has and is. The Handcuffs Must Be Removed from us.

The pendulum has swung too far in favor of the criminals. It must swing back to ours and swiftly. When it does, there will be a reduction.

Allocating of monies to fight crime is necessary. Just as necessary are Amendments or Enactments of laws which will permit officers to protect Law abiding citizens and our free way of life.

Respectfully yours

ANDREW KOLESAR,
Chief of Police.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The recent Supreme Court decisions favoring the criminals at the expense of our citizens is shameful. Chief Justice Warren has set law enforcement back a hundred years. His fifth deciding vote has made it well nigh impossible to punish the guilty criminal element. The innocent public, police who are ham-strung in trying to perform their duties, judges whose hands are tied in deciding a case, all these are practically at the mercy of any person who decides to commit a criminal act.

I never arrested, or tried to convice an innocent man. To-day I fear making an arrest because of the loopholes expressly put into the law by the courts to aid a criminal to avoid paying the penalty for his misdeeds.

I am so disgusted with what we have to contend with in law enforcement since the U. S. Supreme Court saw fit to so recklessly interpret the law to benefit lawbreakers, to misinterpret the will of our law makers, that I am resigning my position as chief of police, effective 31 December, 1967.

DEAR SENATOR: First, let me tell you how happy I am that you are the Chairman of this very important Committee, also that you are such an outstanding member of the Democratic party.

It is with a deep feeling of respect and admiration for you that I ask that you do everything within your power to have S. 674, which will amend Title #18, U. S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

All police departments are having a very difficult time in recruiting men to the departments and it is all due to the decisions which have been handed down by the Supreme Court.

With all due respect to this fine group of men, it is a general feeling that an age limit should be set for the members of this august body.

With every best wish and trust the Good Lord will bless you with continued health so that you can serve your country for some period of time.

Recent Supreme Court decisions have handicapped us to some extent and the situation certainly needs clarifying. I believe that our people should have enough confidence in the great majority of their law enforcement agencies to trust them with the tools needed to do an acceptable job in protecting the lives, rights and property of those same people.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMANS I wish to thank you very much for introducing Senate Bill 674 which would amend Title 18 of the U.S. Code.

In the face of the many recent Supreme Court decisions that directly affect the ability of the police to serve the public, it occurs to me that we need new rules such as the one that you propose. I think too that it might be nice if it could be legislated into being that our courts recognize a certain amount of error or mis-judgment on the part of police when cases are presented for adjudication. In any event, the bill that you have proposed would certainly go a long way to assist us in law enforcement.

Thank you very much.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: We have a very timely memorandum from our Executive Director, Mr. Quinn Tamm concerning the very immature decisions made by the Supreme Court, adversely affecting Law Enforcement. These, of course, being the Mapps, Mallory, Jencks, Miranda, Escobedo and the more recent extension of the Escobedo Decision.

As a member of the Law Enforcement profession, with almost forty years experience in this field. I am truly amazed by the decisions in the above cases, along with others that have handcuffed the Police throughout our nation.

We, here in our city, have an organization of five people who have been speaking to church groups and other organizations for the past year, trying to enlighten them with the bare facts and not nebulous intangibles. It is believed that we have made some progress in this direction and we will continue to make our presentations and appearances as long as we feel that the desired and ultimate goal can be reached.

It is absolutely nauseating to see the direct result of these decisions, public apathy; complacency; and failure of our parents to assume their God Given Responsibilities. We have too many houses and not enough homes in our nation today.

Then, of course, we shouldn't overlook these so-called do-gooders, who are slobbering over these "so-called unfortunate individuals" in a vain effort to find excuses for their senseless transgressions.

It is my firm belief that unless the decent law-abiding Americans, which compromise approximately ninety percent of our population, stand up and be counted as tried and true Americans, the other ten percent, which give us ninety percent of our trouble, will be dictating policies and procedures for our guidance in the future.

Maybe, Sir, my words may be a little strong, but they describe my convictions most thoroughly.

If there is anything we can do here to assist you in your wonderful undertakings, please advise.

Kindest personal regards and very best wishes.

Sincerely,

CARLISLE JOHNSTONE,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,

DEAR SENATOR: I welcome your concern of recent Supreme Court decisions. It is hard to conceive just how the Miranda Supreme Court decision has shackled the efficiency and performance of police work.

While pursuing our obligation to preserve life and property, we are in turn very concerned with the rights of every citizen, being ourselves citizens and a member of the same society.

Our concern over the known criminal element walking free in our cities and towns has caused great dismay to every policeman dedicated to his career and his obligations to the people he serves.

It is with great hope that you, Senator, will be one of the first pioneers to make this Miranda decision more flexible in the name of every American citizen who cries out for the pursuit of happiness and the absence of fear in walking the streets of our nation.

JOHN W. BUDD, Chief of Police.

BUFFALO, N.Y., April 20, 1967.

Mr. WILLIAM A. PAISLEY,
Chief Counsel, U.S. Senate, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PAISLEY: In response to your recent inquiry, I would state that the Miranda and other recent Supreme Court decisions have had a decided adverse effect on law enforcement. We have encountered a decided lessening in the amounts of confessions we get in comparison with the pre-Miranda times. The criminal now realizes he may commit his crimes with almost certain impunity so long as he keeps his mouth shut and there are no witnesses. This feeling on the part of the criminal must certainly be responsible, to a great extent, for our alarming increase in crime.

I would certainly hope that all of the proposals contained in Bills S. 674, S. 1194 and S. 1333, as they concern confessions, may finally be adopted. However, I suspect this is wishful thinking. Something must surely be done soon to give some protection to our citizens rather than the criminals. Adoption of these bills would be a step in the right direction.

The other two Bills—S. 675 and S. 917, also contain much merit and are vitally needed by law enforcement. Some financial means must be supplied, most especially here in Buffalo, to help upgrade police salaries. Our local Patrolmen make $2,500 a year less than a New York State Trooper. Perhaps full utilization of the funds which could become available through adoption of S. 917 would help overcome this discouraging salary schedule in our City.

DEAR SENATOR: Needless to say, we in the Police profession are greatly concerned with the recent Supreme Court decision, commonly referred to as the Miranda decision.

I am of the opinion that if this decision remains as the guide line, and I say this reluctantly, that, in many instances, the victim is the only one who will be punished.

I have enclosed a newspaper clipping which is a classic example of the aforementioned.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I want to go on record against the deplorable conditions created by the Miranda decision and its adverse effect on responsible law enforcement.

The Miranda decision makes it extremely difficult to obtain convictions against known criminals. Law enforcement officers are reluctant to pursue the questioning of suspects with the uncertainty of their position which could lead to a possible false arrest charge being lodged against the arresting officer.

There is no question that the Miranda decision is responsible for criminals being returned to society to prey again on the community without fear of paying their rightful debt for their criminal acts.

New technological advances in communications are being used by the modern day criminal element. Adversely, the small local law enforcement bodies have not been able to keep pace with the new advances made in communications because of the cost to the community.

The old bug-a-boo about back room interrogation is a thing of the past. Today's law enforcement officer is a highly educated and skilled professional, who is not only interested in his profession but is usually an active member of his church and community, taking part in many civic activities.

Morale, which is the crux of good law enforcement efforts is dwindling as a direct result of the Miranda decision.

In conclusion, let us reverse the trend in law enforcement and get back on the right road with the reversal of the Miranda decision.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE E. GRIECO,
Chief of Police.

DUPAGE COUNTY CHIEFS OF POLICE ASSOCIATION,
Woodridge, Ill., March 7, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As legal counsel for the DuPage County Chiefs of Police Association, they have requested that I write to you expressing their views and suggestions regarding Supreme Court Decisions, specific examples of such decisions as Miranda.

I would say that the general feeling among there law enforcement people is that the Miranda decision and decisions of this nature have removed one of their most valuable tools in law enforcement investigation, and has substantially impaired their ability to be of service to the public at large. Also, the County of DuPage being a County represented by people of higher than average income, educational background, this overlaps also into the field of law enforcement, and the abuse of law enforcement officials as so eloquently recognized by the opinion in the Miranda decision is all but unknown in this jurisdiction. In the eighteen or more years of my own experience I only have on rare occasions witnessed or had reported incidents of questionable police behavior. As long as this constitutes no problem, the men in this jurisdiction feel a tremendous loss in effectiveness merely because possibly that in some jurisdiction there is a problem constituted and they failed to see why this cannot be handled on a case to case basis as to the individual rights rather than make a blanket preclusion of certain police procedures.

There have been certain cases wherein the Miranda decision confronts a problem. As a matter of fact my office is presently in collaboration with one of the local departments for investigating a possible homicide involving husband to wife. The Miranda decision is so very very explicit in police relying upon scientific evidence. In this instant case all of the scientific evidence, which type of evidence on careful review of all criminology would be glaring with its limitations, has been exhausted. After all Dick Tracy is the only one with a space coupe. The only hopeful solution to this possible homicide would be if the errant husband would acknowledge it. If all of the scientific evidence that we have would point toward this defendant, it still would not be sufficient as it is all corroborative to even commence a prosecution.

We have another case which we have just brought to a conclusion which uniquely brings forth a problem I am sure was farthest from the jurists' minds, and that is a case which was solved akin to the old time bounty theory. Factually it is this: two young men were very much suspected in a major crime in this County, the Chief of the local department investigating being very cognizant of the Miranda decision was fearful of approaching the young men, fully admonished their fathers that they were suspected and that if he gained more evidence would return. He was hopeful that the father could prevail upon these young men. Within a day a reward of substantial proportion was posted for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible. Immediately this local Chief of Police was waited upon by two characters, each more evil probably than those involved, who immediate made statements interrogating these two lads, and thereby demanding their reward. Of course we commenced a prosecution. I give you this as a rather unique example of the pitfalls of this decision.

In discussing this generally with law enforcement officers many of them have various stories to relate wherein they have been advised by those subject to interrogation as to what all these rights are and that they the subject of the inquiry are somewhat so called immune.

As to my own view, I note that the biggest problem has been that the law enforcement officer's confidence in his own status has been all but destroyed and this is a feeling that runs rampant among law enforcement officials that they are almost hesitant to talk to anyone. This carries over to a point where they are placed in an actual position of fear being afraid during the course of an investigation that they will in some way make a mistake and thereby endure grave embarrassment. This has a very bad effect upon their activities. The danger of this is something we cannot measure as it would be impossible to determine how many law enforcement officials are not making proper inquiry, due to this fear. This fear itself is a very natural thing with a conscientious officer trying to do his job and trying to do it right. He is in a position where he doesn't know what is right any more.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM V. HOPF,
State's Attorney.

CITY OF FRESNO POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Fresno, Calif., March 1, 1697.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: This correspondence is directed to you in response to your request, through the International Association of Chiefs of Police, for information relative to recent Supreme Court decisions affecting the admissibility of confessions into evidence in criminal matters.

It appears to be well established that the Escobedo and Miranda decisions have had a decidedly adverse effect upon law enforcement. Examining the fact that law enforcement officers are not thoroughly schooled in constitutional law, may shed some light on the situation. Contributing to the overall problem, however, is the difficulty with which lower courts apply the Escobedo and Miranda principles. In many instances they are arriving at decisions which are poles apart under very similar circumstances.

The number of convictions and guilty pleas has declined drastically since the pre-Escobedo days of 1963. This is in spite of the fact that felony arrests have increased 75% since 1963. The following table is included for reference.

City of Fresno, Calif.

	Felony arrests		Convictions or pleas
	Number	Percent	Number	Percent
1963	1,475	----------	546	37
1964	1,635	----------	539	32
1965	1,539	----------	379	24
1966	2,042	+72	461	22

Figures such as those shown make a travesty of the efforts of dedicated law enforcement officers. In previous years and through 1963, there had been a gradual increase in the number of felony arrests and the percentage of those arrests which terminated in a conviction or plea of guilty. This trend, which I attributed to better police methods, was drastically reversed after Escobedo and the California decision in Dorado.

Fresno County Court records show that the fiscal year 1965–66 experienced a new high in the number of felony cases in which criminal informations were filed. In spite of this new high, the percentage of guilty pleas as compared to complaints filed, dropped to a new low. The percentage drop in guilty pleas amounts to 24% since the pre-Escobedo and pre-Miranda era. One of the most disturbing facts, however, is that for the first six months after the 1966 Miranda decision, dismissals before trial are already higher than for the entire preceeding year.

It may appear rather trite to reiterate that the Supreme Court has contributed immeasurably to the above facts, but I am compelled to do so. Advancements in training police personnel and the utilization of more science in crime detection methods are no doubt partial solutions to the mounting crime toll, but they certainly are not the complete answer. There are too many crimes in which no physical evidence of value may be found and well trained investigators are definitely thwarted when they must tell a suspect that he has a right to say nothing to them.

I hope that the above comments may be of value to you and wish you success in your attempt to remedy this situation. Certainly, as the dissenting opinion Miranda expressed, no other country in the world has ever had such restrictions nor are such restrictions founded on a constitutional basis.

In closing, I respectfully request a copy of your Bill S. 674 and, if possible, an abstract of the hearing to be held by your committee on March 7 through 9.

Sincerely,

H. R. MORTON,
Chief of Police.

DOWNEY, CALIF., April 5, 1967.

DEL CLAWSON,
Congressman,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR DEL: I believe McClellan's Senate Bill 674 is needed. It does provide that voluntary confessions will be admissible. I feel the Supreme Court is fast pursuing a philosophy that no confession is admissible under the Constitution.

The bill provides that the issues of voluntariness will be decided by the court out of the presence of the jury and then if admitted, weighed by the jury.

It provides the guarantees to the individual as outlined in the Miranda decision.

Its outstanding points, I believe, are that it overcomes the Mallory decision which required almost immediate arraignment after arrest and in the "dicta of the reporting Judge" hinted that most likely any confession obtained after arrest and before arraignment was under duress or coerced conditions which would affect its admissibility.

Further, it protects the admissibility of the spontaneous confession or admission before or after arrest.

Very truly yours,

I. A. ROBINSON,
Chief of Police.

HON. RICHARD RUSSELL,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR RUSSELL: At the request of the Quincy City Commission, I am enclosing a Resolution recently adopted, relative to the hamstringing of Law Enforcement Officers.

It is our sincere feeling that the rights of the law abiding citizen have been disregarded long enough.

Sincerely,

H. C. GREGORY, City Manager.

RESOLUTION 552: A RESOLUTION REQUESTING MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO ENACT SUITABLE LEGISLATION RELIEVING LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS FROM SOME OF THE REQUIREMENTS OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

Whereas, in the opinion of this commission the United States Supreme Court by its Escobedo, Miranda and subsequent decisions has seriously hampered effective law enforcement by placing upon law enforcement agencies and officers serious handicaps to the quick and effective solution of crimes and the punishment of criminals thereby tempting and encouraging potential law violators to commit crimes with less fear of being convicted therefor, and

Whereas, the law abiding citizen and his right to be secure from the lawless and to have law violators punished should receive at least as much consideration, be accorded as much care and have as much protection, as the criminal and the rights of the criminal, and

Whereas, the present effect of such court decisions extending the rights of the criminal and simultaneously limiting the rights of the law abiding citizens to protect themselves from the murderer, robber, rapist and arsonist demand serious consideration by the legislative branch of the government, therefore,

Be it resolved by the city commission of the city of Quincy that the congressional delegation from the state of Florida, and all others interested in effective law enforcement, are urgently requested to use their full influence and power to the end that suitable laws be enacted, as promptly as possible, which will relieve law enforcement officers from the harsh impact of said Supreme Court decisions and place such officers where they can again be effective guardians of the peace and safety of the law abiding without being subservient and apologetic to the criminal and indecisive as to their position of respect in a civilized society.

Adopted in open session of the City Commission of the City of Quincy, Florida, on the 10th day of April A.D. 1967.

C. W. THOMAS Jr.,
Presiding Officer of the City Commission.

Attest:

JOE T. WORDBERRY,
Clerk of City of Quincy and Clerk of City Commission thereof.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL WELFARE,
ADULT CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS,
Howard, R.I., April 14, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senator, Room 2204, New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am writing requesting your support of President Johnson's so-called "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." As you know, the proposed legislation includes a most imaginative program which will provide federal grants of up to 90% to states, cities and regional areas to plan improvements in correctional systems and up to 60% to support approved programs in operation. There is also a provision for grants or contracts to support research and education projects that could be of immeasurable significance in corrections.

Rhode Island, under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act passed earlier under this administration, benefited both through the Regional State Police Training School, through the Washington Oaks Project about to be opened in Foster, Rhode Island for the care and treatment of the delinquent youth in its early stages and in other ways.

As a public servant for some twenty-six years here in Rhode Island, both as a Special Agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and as Director of the State's Correctional Services for eight years and as Warden of the Adult Correctional Institutions and Reformatory for Women, I have seen and do now observe the very great need for training and education for, and in the correctional field. At the present time, it is almost impossible to find trained personnel equipped and ready to enter the correctional field to assist in attacking the tremendous social phenomenon of crime and criminality here in the United States. As immediate Past President of the American Correctional Association, I have had opportunity to observe the picture throughout the United States and underscore again the necessity for providing funds for training at a federal level, for funds to develop professional programs of education for staff at a college and graduate level and a continuing, sorely needed program for research in this field.

I strongly urge your support and I am sending similar correspondence to the rest of our Rhode Island delegation of like suggestion and intent.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD V. LANGLOIS, Warden.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D.C., March 14, 1967.

In re Judicial Reform Bills S. 674 to S. 678, inclusive.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Criminal Law and Procedures Subcommittee, Senate Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The American Farm Bureau Federation respectfully expresses its concern regarding the national crime problem. It will be appreciated if you will include this letter in support of the principles embodied in the above bills in the hearing record. We are sending copies of this letter to other members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

S. 674, providing that a confession given voluntarily and without coercion shall be admissible, appears to us to be the most important of these bills. Society needs further protection from the adverse effects of recent Supreme Court rulings which have freed self-confessed criminals because of some technical inadequacy of the procedures used. The test of admissibility should be, as provided in S. 674, whether or not the confession was in fact, in the light of all circumstances, voluntary or not voluntary.

It is desirable that statutory standards be established relating to the circumstances in which wire communications may be intercepted, which would both clearly and positively prohibit such practice except for purposes of national security and in certain situations under judicial approval. We agree that wire tapping should not be prohibited in all cases. A complete prohibition would give the criminal engaged in narcotic smuggling, kidnapping, murder and other crimes against individuals and society an unwarranted shield if the police were denied the right to use means of acquiring evidence. It appears to us that S. 675 involves an appropriate balancing of the rights of all parties involved.

The need to provide additional penalties against those who obstruct justice in prescribed circumstances has been made abundantly clear to the public. Thus we support the principles of S. 676.

We favor the extension of authority to grant immunity as a means of requiring persons who claim the right against self-incrimination to respond to questions and aid the administration of justice, as provided in S. 677.

We believe more effective legislation, such as S. 678, must be enacted to deal with the multi-state and interstate criminal organizations. We understand that some questions of constitutionality may be involved in this type of legislation. We hope these legal questions can be resolved and that a bill meeting constitutional tests can be reported.

Finally, we want to express our appreciation for your leadership in this area. We consider it one of the important problems requiring Congressional attention. We hope that legislation can be expeditiously reported and enacted.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES B. SHUMAN, President.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 1, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Room 3241, New Senate Offie Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: News reports indicate that you are taking an interest in crime legislation. It is my humble opinion that no legislation will mitigate the crime wave as long as many members of the judiciary daily violate their oaths to uphold the law and act like mouthpieces for the criminals. In this connection I am a firm believer in the full implementation of the constitutional rights of the accused. However, the debates on this point have persistently perpetuated the fallacy that the outrageous partiality of the judiciary toward all criminals, is the result of their concern for constitutional rights. Only a cursory review of recent events will show that even where habitual felons are convicted in full compliance with all the Supreme Court rulings, certain Appeals Court judges refuse to let the convictions stand. Their opinions frankly state that our laws are too barbaric and that they are guided by their own superior personal code of ethics. It is not necessary to waste money on another billion dollar crime commission investigation to confirm this. It is sufficient to note that, although the death penalty for murder and rape are still in force in the District, and there have been many hundreds of such crimes committee in recent years, there has not been a single execution for at least five years.

Certain dogmas advanced by proponents of the "modern scientific" crime prevention measures are so idiotic that they are not really believed by their supporters. The same Mr. Katzenbach who, as Attorney General, crusaded for stamping out the murder of "Civil Rights" workers by advocating swift, severe retribution against the lawbreakers, flatly states (as head of the Crime Commission) that punishment does not deter crime.

Another fallacy is that all crime is the result of poverty, frustration, slums, ignorance, deprivation and injustice to the criminal. They say that the obvious remedy is to bribe, cajole, reward and appease the criminals until they become rehabilitated. Like most fanatics, the extremist devotees of this cult are completely immune to common sense or experimental evidence. The rapid deterioration of fine residential neighborhoods and clean comfortable public housing projects under the assault of the "underprivileged" relief chiselers, is convincing evidence that the slums do not create the criminals but that criminals create slums. In pursuit of this fallacy, the Government has sponsored a protection racket for the "underprivileged", granting huge subsidies to career "unwed mothers" and hereditary bums.

After more than six years of extreme capitulation to the anti-social elements we have expanding slums, an exploding crime rate, and impoverished local governments. Instead of abolishing poverty this program threatens to spread poverty to the middle class by virtue of a combination of confiscatory taxation and accelerating inflation. The taxpayers are not nearly as safe now as they were during the depression of the 1930 decade when there was real poverty and discrimination was astronomical compared to now. Still the insatiable demand goes on for proving to the criminals that crime pays and for the human sacrifice of hundreds of law-abiding taxpayers to the false idol "Rehabilitation".

Still another fallacy is that employment and education can be handed out, like relief checks, to resisting beatnicks, and that the expenditure of astronomical amounts of money can achieve this objective. When a teen-ager sees the Government pay his ignorant, lazy, unemployed "unwed mother" as much as his highly educated hard-working teacher, what incentive can he have to study? When felons, enjoying lifelong immunity from the law (while they are being rehabilitated) get much more money and prestige than the policeman, what faith can he have in pompous pronouncements about the indispensability of education and hard work for success?

One of the most destructive fallacies, is the dogma that vicious habitual teen-age criminals, who have repeatedly committed major crimes such as rape, robbery and even murder, must not be punished or sent to jail, lest they be contaminated by the adult criminals. They are placed on probation or in youth "correctional" institutions where they can teach their tricks to aspiring youngsters and where they serve as shining examples of the impotence of the law enforcement agencies.

I hope that my point of view will be of some value to you in this matter. Many of my friends and associates feel the same way as I do but have no vehicle for expressing their opinion. I do not believe that the only alternative to a police state is a state of anarchy.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID GINSBERG.

DEAR JOHN: I am enclosing for your consideration a copy of a letter from Mr. Morris Stagner, District Attorney, Ninth Judicial District, Clovis, New Mexico, in support of your bill S. 674.

I have informed District Attorney Stagner that I am forwarding this letter to you for your information and for possible inclusion in the record of testimony when hearings are held on this measure.

STATE OF NEW MEXICO,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
NINTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Portales, N. Mex., March 22, 1967.

Re Senate bill 674.

Hon. JOSEPH M. MONTOYA,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MONTOYA: I am writing you to enlist your support for the above mentioned bill. Recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court have created tremendous problems in connection with law enforcement. The recent Miranda decision has made it almost impossible to question persons suspected of committing crimes. In this district we have a confessed killer walking the streets for a technical reason that he was not advised that if he could not afford a lawyer the State would provide him one free of charge. This killer confessed one week prior to the Miranda decision being handed down, however, he was not tried until after that date. This past term of Court we had a confession by a burglar, which we could not use. Fortunately we had sufficient other evidence to convict him. I think you can look across the United States and observe many instances where confessed criminals are going free. The confession is an essential to good law enforcement. If you have not read the Miranda decision, I would urge you to do so, including the dissenting opinions.

I have questions concerning the constitutionality of Senate Bill 674, however, I believe most strongly that the people of this country need to speak out and what could be more effective than a bill by the United States Senate.

I believe that I can speak as President of the New Mexico District Attorneys Association in urging your support of this bill. Our Association has discussed this problem, and we are in agreement that the rights of the victims of crime must be taken into consideration. Recently I attended a meeting of the National District Attorneys Association in Los Angeles. I can assure you that the problem is a national problem. This bill goes to the heart of law enforcement across the country. I am sure that you realize that effective law enforcement is an essential part of this nation's security.

Yours very truly,

MORRIS STAGNER,
District Attorney.

Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Recent news articles dealing with crime tell again and again how known criminals and suspects are being released from custody or prison.

The Supreme Court ruling which brought much of this about is probably one of the major factors in the rising crime rate. It is a most serious problem and one which concerns every citizen. It seems that the court in its desire to assure the criminal of his rights has at the same time completely neglected the rights of the public in general and the victims in particular. Surely there must be a way out of this situation in which we find ourselves.

Crime is increasing too fast.

Something must be done and soon.

I would like to wish you success in your search for the solution.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, the U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I should like to congratulate your committee and encourage it to do whatever is necessary and possible to counteract the Supreme Court's leniency towards criminals. If their rulings of last year do not constitute leniency, then let them more clearly define their meaning and clarify this turbulent and confused issue.

It seems to me that crime could be lessened by more conscientious application of our existing laws, rather than the expenditure of millions of dollars. The war on poverty is spending enough. And what about the crime that goes on in the non-poor segments of society? There is plenty of it, and money can't help it.

As a middle-aged, middle-income housewife and mother I am appalled and outraged at the way crime is being allowed to flourish in this country.

Yours truly,

FORT STOCKTON, TEX., March 8, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator, U.S. Senate Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It is gratifying to know you are initiating a step to re-evaluate the Miranda Decision.

This is directed to you in your capacity as chairman of the Judiciary Sub-committee.

My concern is by virtue to being a Justice of the Peace, parent, citizen, and lawyer.

As a J.P. in this west Texas community of 10,000, with a crossroads of 9 arterial highways, I meet head on constantly with the damaging affectations of the Miranda case. Law enforcement in the grade of felony has run up against a blank wall. No longer can a mere suspect be questioned. If some change is not made soon enforcement will be at a standstill.

As a father and citizen, I recognize that the criminal suspect has a greater protection than my children. No longer does the mad dog get shot—but the pets are to be locked up while the former roams the streets with slobbering impunity.

It is agreed that Hon. Ramsey Clark is correct in his statement that criminal matters are a local problem. Why spend $50 million to assist local branches and study parole problems, when matters as they now exist. There is ample protection. It being the procedural guidelines that will choke law enforcement into oblivion.

As a lawyer I disagree with the majority holding. I represented a defendant by court appointment in 1954. He was electrocuted for the crime of murdering a young mother. He very willingly made the confession. No coercion, no promises—he wanted to make a statement. On the basis of same he was convicted. If same facts presented today it would be difficult to even obtain an indictment. You are to be commended in your approach.

Sincerely,

GEORGE W. WILLEY.

DECKER, GOLDEN AND REIFMAN,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS,
Chicago, March 22, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have recently read with interest about the hearings before your judiciary sub-committee relative to the growing problem of crime in our nation.

It seems as though we have more hearings and more investigating committees and spend more money and get less done all of the time in this area. The problem is pretty simple if we have the courage and intelligence to face it, and that is that we have completely failed to take proper action to keep off the streets, those people within our society who have clearly demonstrated to one and all that they are possessed of dangerous tendencies which make them a menace to the overwhelming majority of decent citizens.

It is true that we could use more policemen and better crime detecting methods, but these improvements alone will not solve the problem because our law enforcement agencies are today arresting thousands of dangerous criminals and bringing them before our courts, only to find these criminals turned back into the streets with complete disregard for the welfare of the rest of us.

The breakdown in our battle against crime has come from our courts, and parole boards which have been infiltrated by persons who are either incompetent, corrupt or lacking in ability to understand that the major function of imprisonment for the criminal is not to punish him, is not to rehabilitate him, but to protect society from him.

In our Chicago area we have seen three particularly horrible crimes within the last year, the murder of eight student nurses, the stabbing of the young airline stewardess in the Chicago Loop, and the gangland execution of two innocent teen age boys in Rockford, Illinois. In each case when the alleged criminal was caught, it was with little surprise that we found out that he had been involved with or convicted of previous crimes.

No greater evidence of our archaic system of criminal procedure can be produced than the absurdity of the Richard Speck trial now taking place in Peoria, Illinois, where after four weeks they have not as yet even selected a jury. Giving a man a fair trial is one thing, but this is ridiculous.

Another example, of course, is the famous case of Jack Ruby, the man who killed Mr. Oswald in full television view of fifty million people; there was no question of his innocence or guilt and yet three years after the commission of the crime, our archaic laws and procedures were such that there had not as yet been a final disposition of the case.

I hope that something beneficial can come out of your hearings and that we can begin to get action and pass new laws if necessary, realistically facing the problem of crime as it exists today.

Enclosed please find copies of two newspaper articles which graphically illustrate some of the points which I have made in this matter.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT S. DECKER.

ROCKVILLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Rockville, Md., March 22, 1967

Hon. J. L. MCCLELLAN.
Committee on Appropriations,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The Board of Directors of the Rockville Chamber of Commerce has directed me to request your urgent attention be given to the unprecedented crime situation which now exists in the Metropolitan Washington area.

As business and professional men in the City of Rockville the members of the Rockville Chamber of Commerce have a primary interest in the status of our region, ability of us all to conduct our businesses without fear of bodily harm and loss of customers and property through armed robbery, theft, housebreakings and personal assaults.

Our concern has been heightened by the loss through armed hold up of a total of $75,000.00 in recent days by two of our County's financial institutions during which employees were threatened with sawed off shotguns and submachine guns.

We are appalled that Montgomery County's crime rate has more than doubled in the past six years from 14.1 serious crimes per one thousand citizens to 31.7. In 1960 Montgomery County police reported twenty eight armed robberies. In 1965 there were eighty-six robberies reported while in 1966 the figure reached one hundred and nineteen!!

Montgomery County Police Superintendent, James S. McAuliffe, reports that in his estimation up to ninety per cent of our robberies and seventy five per cent of our housebreakings are committed by persons outside the County.

We realize that our City, County, and State have special responsibilities in the massive effort against crime, but we also realize that adjacency to the great urbanized center of Washington, D.C. requires us all within the Metropolitan area to unite in this effort.

It is urgently requested that before the loss of property and life reaches any further devastating proportions you lend your efforts to the serious problems now existing and direct the great resources of our government toward making our community the safer place in which to live, work and do business.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. HICKMAN, President.

HOLYOKE, MASS., March 14, 1967.

Honorable JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Subcommittee,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: I was very pleased to read that your sub-committee is reviewing crime in the United States and that you are concerned about recent Supreme Court decisions pertaining to individual rights.

As far back as 1961, decisions handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court have had serious effects on law enforcement—and have resulted in significant changes in procedures pertaining to arrests. I have particular reference to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision on June 13, 1966 regarding the so-called self-incrimination opinion rendered by this judicial body on a vote of 5–4. This is the now famous Miranda vs Arizona case.

It appears law enforcement today is placed in the position of maintaining the delicate balance, between the rights of the individual, and the rights of society, in an era in which our citizens are becoming less and less accountable for their acts. I think the Honorable Senator Alan Bible made a very strong statement when he said, "It seems to me that we have become so obsessed with uncovering new rights and safeguards for the criminal, that we have unbalanced the scale of justice."

For your information I have enclosed two articles which I believe you will find interesting. They have reference to a development which occurred in Holyoke, February 27th, 1967 and an incident in Boston, July 1965.

The Holyoke case and the Boston crime are similar, and both resulted in almost identical findings. Please note, that in the local situation here in Holyoke, it required the services of a large moving van to move the quantity of stolen goods found by the police, after the suspects led the law enforecement officers to the articles, and admitted the crimes.

On the basis of a 5–4 Supreme Court decision the occupant of an apartment in Boston containing the largest stock of marijuana ever seized in Massachusetts, was set free, because a police warrant wasn't explicit enough. One wonders what the outcome of these two cases would have been, if one of the nine U.S. Supreme Court justices had voted otherwise than the way they did, on June 13, 1966.

It is not the intent of my letter to criticize the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court—but the purpose of this correspondence is to support the review by the federal government of crime in our free society. I believe this review is necessary, and I trust that our Congressional representatives will come forth with constructive recommendations that will give the criminal justice system of this nation, the proper directive to do the job it is charged with doing.

You and your committee are to be commended for your interest in this particular matter.

Very truly yours,

DANIEL F. DIBBLE, Mayor.

YONKERS, N.Y., March 8, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Criminal Laws Subcommittee,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I agree entirely with your reported statement that recent Supreme Court decisions "have unduly restricted legitimate law enforcement practices."

The first casualty of these decisions has been objective truth: the unquestionably guilty have gone free in almost every case.

The Court itself has defensively stated recently, "This Court has never been disposed to vacate convictions without adequate justification . . ." Black v. United States, 17 L ed. 26, 29. This "adequate justification" has, unfortunately, not included the truth of the over-all proof of guilt among the pertinent considerations.

If it is properly the primary consideration, as I feel it should be, the Court has invariably done precisely what it denies. Whenever any evidence whatsoever, whether confessions or illegally obtained evidence, is suppressed, the trier of the facts loses the benefit of it in determining the truth or falsity of the charge. It cannot be otherwise since it is evidence only because it is relevant to such determination.

The motivation of the Supreme Court decisions is equally clear: that our police forces cannot be deterred from using improper means to obtain evidence except at this dreadful cost to society of turning the unquestionably guilty loose upon it. "The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered.", as stated by Judge Cardozo for a unanimous court in People v. Defore, 242 N.Y. 13, 21, rejecting such a result.

This proposition that we cannot otherwise control our police, once it is clearly stated, must be shocking to any decent citizen, firstly, because it is not true, and, secondly, because it is an admission that no viable society should, or can afford to, make.

Indeed, even if it were true that society cannot otherwise control its law enforcement ministers, a legitimate inquiry would nevertheless remain as to whether the Supreme Court cure were not worse than the disease.

There may also be in the background of recent Supreme Court decisions a sporting element which is too shallow to rise to the dignity of motivation. The poor lonely criminal confronted with the power and majesty of the state can hardly be considered a David going forth against Goliath when the state's object is to ascertain the truth.

A conclusion opposite to that of the Supreme Court as to the proper balance between protection for the individual and protection for society has been reached by judges of legal learning, judgment and ethical perception equal to that of any now on the bench as to illegally obtained evidence. People v. Defore, supra; People v. Adams, 176 N.Y. 351; Commonwealth v. Tibbetts, 157 Mass. 519. As to confessions, the requirements of the Miranda decision were rejected, expressly and by implication, by every court in the land before June 13, 1966, including the Supreme Court.

To reject, or actively inhibit, all confessions, regardless of their truthfulness, and all corroborative evidence secured as the result thereof, simply because our forefathers excluded confessions extorted by torture as too likely to be false is a peculiar twist of logic.

On the ethical plane, I am not shocked by the proposition that citizens owe the state the truth even if it may result in punishment to them. Our major religons all call for confession, restitution and penitence as the road to salvation and none preaches the salvation of not getting caught. If we substitute rehabilitation for salvation, the statement is still true.

It is unfortunate that the newly discovered requirements of Miranda have been laid down as the minimum constitutional imperatives. I fear this may narrow your Subcommittee's remedial scope to nothing. However, it will still be useful to remind the public that a course opposite to that of the Supreme Court has a rational, edhical and judicial basis warranting consideration still and offers a respectable alternative.

With a vacancy on the Supreme Court, perhaps the Senate should abandon the fiction that the Court discovers this kind of law within the four corners of the constitution, where no one ever saw it before. I am concerned with the abandonment of judicial self-restraint by the Court's majority and its proliferation of constitutional imperatives, which put our society in a strait jacket in dealing with its problems. I am appalled by the great gulf which separates the majority from the minority, which I am coming to see as a gulf between superficial verbal logic on the majority side and sound judgment on the other. The senate will be well advised to assure itself as to the sound judgment of any designee to the Supreme Court, and should refuse its consent to the appointment of anyone who tends to consider policemen more dangerous to society than criminals, or that police misdeeds may be best corrected by turning criminals loose, or that a confession raises a presumption of innocence.

Please make whatever use you deem helpful of this statement. With best wishes for your efforts to find correctives, I am

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH A. SINOPOLI.

ALEXANDRIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, INC.,
Alexandria, Va., March 7, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: We at the Alexandria Chamber of Commerce have initiated a Crime Committee for the purpose of studying the growing crime problem as it affects our area. We held a meeting this morning with the Chief of Police of Alexandria and have scheduled meetings on succeeding Tuesdays with people of the legal profession, the judicial, the public schools, and the ministerial representatives. We have also participated in a panel sponsored by American Legion Post 24 on last Sunday, March 5th.

In addition, we have written to the President, our Congressmen and Senatorial representatives, and the Governor, stressing our concern about this growing problem. We have asked civic clubs and citizens associations as well as other members to also contact the President and their representatives.

While we feel that there are certain social ills that contribute to crime and delinquency and that it will take time to change and correct these ills, we feel that the pendulum of concern for the rights of individuals, even the many times criminal, has swung too far, and that the multitude of law abiding citizens are having their rights, life and property placed in jeopardy. We are alarmed at the easy freedom gained by criminals because of some minor technicality. We feel that police officials across our Nation, and especially in the Nation's Capital, must have the support of government and civic leaders.

It is our desire to give you all support possible in bringing to reality your statement which was carried on television on March 6th, that there must be immediate action to improve this intolerable situation. Any guidance which you can furnish us in moving forward with your declaration will be most appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT W. ROTROFF, President.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCCLELLAN: The enclosed release was mailed out today to the Chairman of our National and local legislative committees and to the executive vice presidents and managers of our 117 local offices.

There are close to 36,000 members in our Association and I am sure that almost all of them back your bills which were designed to fight crime. I hope that members of your Committee receive many letters of support for this legislation which is so badly needed.

Sincerely,

ELMER T. SIVERTSEN.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CREDIT MANAGEMENT,
New York, N.Y., February 28, 1967.

TO ALL LEGISLATIVE CHAIRMEN, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENTS & MANAGERS:

CALL FOR ACTION

Because of the rising crime rate in the U.S. there is a great need for legislation which will assist the authorities in their investigation and prosecution of persons engaged in all types of criminal activity. We are particularly concerned with the rise in commercial crimes, which are very difficult to prosecute.

President Johnson has been quoted as being opposed to all wiretapping except in the National interest. To prohibit wiretapping by authorized law enforcement officers in cases involving criminal activities not related to government security, under the guise of protecting the right of privacy of the individual, would be a serious blow to all law enforcement agencies.

Senator McClellan has introduced several bills which are designed to safeguard the rights of honest citizens and at the same time materially assist duly authorized law enforcement officers in investigating and prosecuting the criminal elements in our society.

We urge the support of each of the following bills by all of the members of NACM. Please write to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee and urge other members to do the same in support of these bills.

All of the following bills were introduced by John L. McClellan (D.) Arkansas on January 25, 1967, and are now before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

S. 674—Under this bill a confession would be admissible in evidence in any criminal prosecution brought by the United States or by the District of Columbia if the trial judge determined that it was given voluntarily.

S. 675—This bill would prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses. The bill would permit wiretapping by law enforcement officers only after application had been made to, and permission granted by, a Federal or State court judge of competent jursdiction. Information obtained by authorized wiretapping could be disclosed in testimony under oath or affirmation in any criminal proceeding in any court of the United States or of any State, or in any Federal or State grand jury proceeding. The contents of an intercepted wire communication could not be received in evidence or disclosed in any criminal proceeding in a Federal court unless each defendant, not less than ten days before the trial, had been furnished with a copy of the court order authorizing the wiretapping. The ten-day period could be waived by the judge if he found it was impossible to furnish the defendant with the information ten days before the trial and that the defendant would not be prejudiced by the delay in receiving such information.

This act would not limit the constitutional power of the President to obtain information by such means as he deemed necessary to protect the Nation against hostile acts of foreign powers or to protect essential military information against foreign intelligence activities.

S. 676—Under this bill, anyone who attempted by means of bribery, misrepresentation, intimidation, or force or threats to obstruct the communication of information relating to a violation of any criminal statute of the United States by any person to a criminal investigator, or injured any person or his property for giving such information, would be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

S. 677—This bill would permit the compelling of testimony with respect to certain crimes and the granting of immunity in connection therewith. The witness would not be exempt from prosecution for perjury or contempt.

S. 678—This bill would outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. Anyone who became or remained a member of the Mafia, or any other organization using interstate commerce facilities in the commission of acts which are in violation of the criminal laws of the United States, or any State, relating to gambling, extortion, blackmail, narcotics, prostitution, or labor racketeering, would be guilty of a felony and upon conviction would be imprisoned for not less than five years nor more than twenty years and could be fined not more than $20,000.

Please write to members of the Senate Judiciary Committee urging passage of the foregoing bills and ask other members to do the same. A list of Committee Members is attached.

Sincerely,

ELMER T. SIVERTSEN,
Legislative Director.

CLATSOP COMMUNITY COLLEGE,
Astoria, Oreg., March 2, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing in reference to the Senate Subcommittee hearings to be held in the near future in regard S 674 introduced by you to amend Title 18, U.S. Code.

As a former state policeman and municipal police officer for 18 years and now actively engaged as an instructor of Police Science at college level, I only can hope and pray that your bill will meet with success.

The average police officer is only trying to do his job and fulfill his oath of office to the best of his ability. However, since some of the recent Supreme Court decisions, the enforcement of the law has become a farce. When a criminal will give a statement admitting guilt, given of his own free will and signed by him stating that no threats or favors were given, or coercion was used and it cannot be admitted into evidence, something is radically wrong with our court system. The victim of crime, the police officer, the prosecutor and the law-abiding citizens of our country no longer have any rights to, or can they expect to be protected from, the criminal, if the police are to be dictated to and told how to do their job by a group of men who are so blind to the facts of life that their decisions border on the ridiculous. Instead of giving protection under the law to the majority of the people who just happen to be law-abiding, they are giving moral and legal support to the criminal. If changes are not made soon, I have fear for the security of our government.

Having arrested hundreds of law violators myself and observed the questioning of numerous criminals, I can truthfully say I have never observed any coercion, beatings, etc., to extract a confession. I would not dispute this could not occasionally occur, but I do not believe it is as prevalent as some of our courts believe or as some of our anti-police newspapers would have us believe.

There have been recent articles in Time Magazine and the Readers Digest that call attention to these recent miscarriages of justice that may be of value to your committee.

If I may be of any assistance to you in this worthwhile endeavor, please advise.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES D. MULLINS,
Coordinator, Police Science Program.

BAMBERGER'S, A DIVISION OF R. H. MACY & CO., INC.,
Morristown, N.J., March 3, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have read with interest your remarks on the floor of the Senate with regard to recent United States Supreme Court decisions such as Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 34 LW 4521, and your proposed legislation, S. 674, to amend Title 18, U.S. Code. As a retail security executive and a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, I am in complete agreement with your remarks and support your bill.

You may be interested to know that a recent Superior Court decision in New York City (N.Y. SupCt NYCty; People v. Frank, 12/7/66) the court ruled that the New York "shoplifting statute," General Business Law Section 218, could not be interpreted as placing any duty upon the owner or owner's agent to warn a suspect of his rights. The court further ruled that Miranda deals with certain newly pronounced principles of law the burden of which only ". . . law enforcement officials must bear, often under trying circumstances." No decision of which the court was aware extended the Miranda rule to non-law enforcement officers.

In view of the above decision, we as retail security executives and officers seem to enjoy a priviliged position with regard to the Miranda rule. It is incongruous to me that a private department, operating for the primary purpose of safeguarding private property and corporate profit, has greater latitude than public law enforcement agencies charged with the safety of the entire nation. We know full well how the Miranda rule, if applicable, could hamper us in our profession. We also know that it is currently impeding justice in countless police investigations throughout the United States.

Respectfully,

ANTHONY N. POTTER, Jr.

P.S.—I would also like to call your kind attention to the Local Law Enforcement Officers Educational and Equipment Act sponsored by Senator Joseph D. Tydings. I have written to Senator Tydings expressing my support for his legislation, and I urge you to support it also.

COLLEGE OF SAN MATEO,
San Mateo, Calif., February 28, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

SIR: I am distressed over the present trend of various United States Supreme Court decisions. The problem has grown to such proportions that attempting to understand, let alone try and explain same to a group of students, is extremely difficult.

The indication is that the Court is more concerned with the "rights" of the criminal and certain technicalities than they are of the welfare of the law abiding citizen. There is strong feeling among most of our decent people that they are being made pawns of the minority criminal element in our society.

I sincerely trust you and the United States Congress will see fit to enact legislation which will halt unrealistic and damaging conduct on the part of the Court.

Sincerely,

ROBERT E. LANSING,
Instructor-Coordinator, Police Science.

MARCH 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: For several years I have hoped and wished I had the time and means to conduct a crusade against crime and punishment this city has never seen. We have been the victims of 3 burglaries within 2 years. In addition to property loss we have had to incur the expense of building a wall to keep the enemy out; obtain a dog and doghouse to alert us of enemy activities; purchase an electric timer to deceive the enemy into thinking we were home on nights we had to go out, etc.

I would not be writing you if the material loss were my only concern. I am concerned with our new way of life—the current, real situation that exists.

I am in constant fear of an "enemy" attack of our home and family. Every strange sound and movement has to be checked for fear the "enemy" is here again. A wrong telephone call at night makes us suspicious; a knock on the front door day or night, puts us on the defensive.

We can never leave the house with a single window open. Our home must always be sealed tight. Even at night, we can only afford to leave one window open. (We would prefer breathing and dying from carbon monoxide poisoning than by the hands of an "enemy" burglar . . . and so we all sleep in one bedroom although we have 3 bedrooms.)

Yes, this is Hawaii and America!

As far as I'm concerned, a real war exists here. And it pains me to think of the billions we are spending over an ideological situation in Viet Nam . . . it pains me even more to hear and read about the idiocy being handed down by the Warren court and all of the other assembly-line courts.

This I sincerely believe, is the American tragedy. Unless we can restore the spirit of the law and replace the letter with the original intent of the law, we are going to destroy America as sure as the internal forces within caused the downfall of the great Greek and Roman empires.

The expression, "We are so close to the forest we can't see the trees", holds true here. Criminals and even murderers are freed because of some legal technicality. It's about time the courts employed some courage and began to make decisions that are acceptable and meaningful—in short, to dwell on the real business the real issue on hand.

Unfortunately, the issues are clouded by shyster attorneys and conceited, self-glorious attorneys whose first business appears to be himself, his wit, his pompous show of being literate. As one cure to this, I suggest lawyers take the lie-detector test before being able to pass the bar examination.

In my desperation I have wished homes of attorneys and judges would be burgled; this would be a sure way of curing the current "illness" in our courts!

The responsible authorities here dismiss the situation as part of the times, a way of life—a disgusting complacency as far as I'm concerned. Further, I have been told that the crime rate is even greater in Washington, D.C. and that any large city has to rather expect this.

I refuse to accept this. Before America can be kept free, our homes and lives must be made safe from the "enemy" within. Toward this end, I sincerely believe you have made the first meaningful move in the right direction and will go down in history as having made the most dynamic contribution toward justice to mankind; and the greatest, courageous human being of this century—if not the American who saved America.

I admire your courage and am grateful for the first ray of hope you have brought into our lives. For some time now, I have been thinking of leaving Hawaii and America for a safer, saner place to bring up our child. Perhaps there's a chance now to be reasonably safe in America . . . with your continued efforts.

I regret I do not have the privilege of voting for you as I am a resident and voter of Hawaii; but I join, I'm sure, the millions of Americans who are extremely greateful and proud of having you represent the United States Congress!

Most sincerely,

(Mrs.) KEE SOON WONG,
Honolulu, Hawaii.

CITIZENS ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR COMMUNITY IMPROVEMENT OF JEFFERSON COUNTY, INC.,
March 6, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Without the action of the Citizens Advisory Committee endorsing the writing of this letter, I feel nontheless, that it is in accordance with the general feelings of the membership thereof, thus, you must interpret the expressions which follow to be those attributable to me alone.

While I am not acquainted with the contents of Senate Bill 674, knowing that it is intended to minimize the horrendous effects which have resulted from the Mapp, Mallory, Escobedo, and Miranda decisions is enough for me to urge that said Senate Bill be reported out of Committee and passed by both Houses and the Congress. What was a bad condition, as far as victims in "cleared" police cases is concerned, has now been made intolerable by the aforesaid Supreme Court Rulings. A recent study, headed by me on behalf of the Citizens Advisory Committee, concerning police protection in Louisville and Jefferson County reveals that cases resulting in actual imprisonment (either in jail or penitentiary) were infinitesimal in comparison to the crimes committed. I am convinced that great improvements must be made in the police forces of this nation. However, unless the courts are forced to recognize the rights of "non criminals" and are forced to not sacrifice "non criminal" victims upon the libertine altar of a judicial deity which requires the freeing of undeniably guilty persons merely to chastise the police, such police improvements will not occur. While the following matters do not fall within the purview of the legislation under consideration, I believe that they may spark interest for future action.

First, in 1964 17% of the violent crimes, 50% of all burglaries and 33% of all auto thefts in the nation were committed by persons 18 years of age or younger. Our local statistics in certain respects were even worse. As a nation, we must realize and act upon the realization that a quarter of a century of juvenile correction under state "Youth Authority Acts" have served only to shelter youg criminals from the retribution for their crimes. We must contradict the ever growing mouthings of public figures who give justification for crime because of poverty conditions. For every person born in poverty who goes astray tens of thousands do not. Conversely, we are well acquainted with the criminal tendencies which frequently appear amid an affluent society, and here too, countless thousands of others do not. Therefore, we should consider laws that will place responsibility and accountability on our young people at an earlier age.

Second, we must overrule the tendency of some Federal Courts and State basis for deciding criminal cases in which a plea of insanity is used as a defense. As you doubtlessly know, acquittals by reason of insanity increased in the District of Columbia from 1% to 25% in the six years after the Durham Rule was adopted by Judge Bazelon.

I hope you will invite former New York City Police Commissioner Michael J. Murphy, Professor Fred E. Inbau of Northwestern University, California Chief Justice Roger Traynor, and I.A.C.P. Executive Director Quinn Tamm to testify regarding the impending legislation before your committee for consideration.

Should you like a copy of the study regarding police protection in this community (earlier referred to herein) I shall be happy to make a copy available to you. This study is significant from the standpoint that one can readily see how badly we are losing the war against crime in a fine community such as this, and in an area in which the police services are really devoted to the protection of the public.

The attached leaflet contains evidence of my credentials regarding the opinions expressed above.

With every good wish to you for your continued success, I am,

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES CARLTON OLDHAM,
Chairman, Louisville, Ky.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, United States Senate, 3241, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Please be assured that I am in favor of amending Title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions.

As a former law-enforcement officer and presently employed as a security supervisor for a large chain store I am certainly in the position of knowing how important it is to amend Title 18.

Your efforts will be greatly appreciated by all law-enforcement personnel. I thank you. Best of luck.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I was pleased to read an article in the "Memphis Press-Scimitar" headlined "McClellan Looks at Crime". Your thinking concerning crime in our Country, I can positively assure you, reflects the thinking of thousands and thousands of Americans. Furthermore, I have followed your career, Senator, for many years as I am a resident of the Bootheel in Missouri which hangs down into your great State.

This article of March 25, 1967, is proof you are a United States Senator and have grown in stature as the years have rolled on and that you are not primarily concerned with the interests of your own State. I don't believe there is any doubt in any citizen's mind, if he thinks at all, that crime in America today is definitely a malignant cancer and on the upgrade continually and aided and abated by such decisions as rendered by our Supreme Court, that wire tapping could not be used. You so aptly stated that a criminal suspect today is practically assigned a nursemaid the minute he is apprehended.

Women are unsafe in almost any city in the United States at night and definitely take their lives in their own hands should they enter any public park in the evening. The hardened criminal is in full possession of all the weaknesses of our laws (and the evidence is more and more convincing that the criminal is not forced to confession through the medium of police brutality), and last, but not least, is not even permitted to confess to his crime. It is bordering on the ridiculous.

It is needless for me to go on and on, for I am sure you are in possession of far more facts than I am, but I did want you to know that it is refreshing to know someone in the Senate of this great Country of ours is interested in the enforcement of law and the protection of "old John Doe" from crooks.

I do hope you will continue to aggressively push for remedial legislation and more strict law enforcement.

Very sincerely yours,

J. RALPH HUTCHISON.

SMITH KLINE & FRENCH LABORATORIES,
Philadelphia, Pa., February 27, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, United States Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: In March, your Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures will have a unique opportunity to aid the law enforcement officers of this nation. The dedicated men and women of our police forces have been rapidly demoralized and disarmed by the Supreme Court decisions of recent years.

For the past five years, I have been the Manager of Law Enforcement Liaison for Smith Kline and French Laboratories of Philadelphia. During this time, I have directed the extensive education and services programs my company has made available to law enforcement agencies to assist them in the control of non-narcotic drug abuse. My work has brought me in constant contact with the police at every level of enforcement and in most of the states in this country. This contact and my six years previous experience as a Texas Highway Patrolman have given me the insight and opportunity to observe the progressive confusion and loss of confidence within the ranks of our police forces.

The dedication and performance of the police, in the face of manpower shortages, public resentment, civil rights conflicts, and the Supreme Court decisions, reflects tremendous credit to these men and women. Our courts have placed shackle after shackle on our police and still the police continue to try to protect the seemingly unconcerned public.

There is no doubt in my mind that you and your subcommittee have the opportunity to "champion" the long neglected cause of law enforcement in your coming hearings. The history of our nation will have a place for the man or men who alter our nation's present course towards increasing lawlessness and the accompanying disrespect for law and order. There will be many who will place all the blame for our present course on broken homes, socio-economic problems, civil rights, fear of "the bomb", or other problems we face in the 20th Century. Each of these factors have a causitive relationship to the problem, but I feel at the heart of the matter lies the decreasing fear of apprehension for crime and the increasing difficulty of the police to remove and rehabilitate the criminal once he has been caught.

The all important deterrent factor of law enforcement is being lost and if action is not taken soon, history will record our age as the time when man's boldest experience in democracy was destroyed by mob rule and "the right of might". If this should happen, it will be ironic that we allowed it to happen in the pursuit of "individual rights", the very cause for which "democracy" and "law and order" were designed to protect.

I would like to thank you for this opportunity to state my personal impressions to you and offer you my wholehearted support for the important task you now face. I am sure the March hearing will add one of the finest pages to your long and distinguished career.

Sincerely,

DONALD K. FLETCHER,
Manager, Distribution Protection.

SPARTANBURG, S.C., March 1, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Criminal Law and Procedures,
U.S. Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I have seen a copy of the letter written to you by Director W. T. Ivey, of the City of Spartanburg law Enforcement Department, and I wish to echo his sentiments fully.

It has been our observation that recent Supreme Court decisions have tied the hands of Law Enforcement Officials, and in many instances, have made officers afraid to actually move in and investigate cases as rapidly as they would otherwise.

Being a lawyer, as well as Mayor of a medium size City, I can fully appreciate the problems that the Law Enforcement Officials are having to go through throughout the United States. The public does not understand and cannot understand how confessed criminals of heinous crimes are permitted to go free on a mere technicality of their having confessed to a crime without having been advised of their rights before confessing. As a matter of fact, one of our local newspaper columnist wrote an article some time ago explaining that the best way to be cleared of a crime was to commit the crime and confess to the police before the police has a chance to investigate it.

I believe in good law enforcement and I do not believe in persecution, but unless the Congress of the United States passes some laws to protect the law enforcement officers, I fear that we will have anarchy in some places. Already, we have had too much encouragement from high places, in addition to the United States Supreme Court decisions, that have encouraged lawlessness throughout our land. We have been fortunate here, in Spartanburg, for having good law enforcement. However, unless the trend is reversed, I fear what my six children will have to put up with in the future.

Knowing your reputation for fairness, I respectfully request that your committee come to the rescue of the law abiding citizens of the United States.

Sincerely,

ROBERT L. STODDARD.

Subject: Hearings by U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, March 7, 8 and 9, 1967, Regarding U.S. Supreme Court Decision Affecting Law Enforcement.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, United States Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: It was with deep regret and sorrow to read an article on Page 2 of the New York Daily News which headlined the following on February 21, 1967: "Confessed Killer of 6 Freed on Court Edict"

This referred to Jose Suarez who had confessed to the slaying of his wife and five small children. This was the last straw and I felt that I should write to you regarding my feelings as well as those of my fellow neighbors and co-workers. The Honorable Justice Michael Kern was credited with the following statement:

"Even an animal such as this one (Suarez) and I think it would be insulting to the animal kingdom—must be clothed with all these safeguards. This is a very sad thing. It is repulsive. It makes any human being's blood run cold and his stomach turn to let a thing like this out on the streets."

In view of this case and others in the past, a number of us are deeply concerned as to what action must be taken to eliminate the technicalities recklessly invoked to nullify convictions and set free confirmed criminals to prey again on our victimized society.

We all know of your outstanding record as a fact finder and champion of Law Enforcement and we fervently pray and hope that your committee will come up with a possible solution to this very grave and disturbing situation.

I would like to advise you that I am a member of the following organizations which are involved in Law Enforcement:

1. International Association of Chiefs of Police, Inc.
2. National Law Enforcement Association, Inc.
3. N. Y. State Division International Association for Identification.
4. National Sheriff's Association, Special Deputy Sheriff of Suffolk County, New York.
5. American Society for Industrial Security.

We all feel sorry for the many road-blocks our Law Enforcement agencies are confronted with and we wish you success in your very important assignment.

Respectfully yours,

J. J. JACOPPI,

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: As a practicing attorney for more than 30 years, I have tried to reason out, as many attorneys have, some the recent decisions of our Supreme Court, particularly those affecting law enforcement. I believe the law enforcement agencies throughout the country are in great discord with these decisions of the court.

The enclosed article, taken from the "World Journal Tribune" of January 31, 1967, will give you some idea of the effect the rulings of the Supreme Court have had on the judicial process, on the American public and, in some cases, the families of persons who have been murdered.

It is my opinion that a great deal of this result comes from the fact that men who have been elevated to our Supreme Court bench actually lack judicial experience. In practically every walk of life, persons advanced to higher position are advanced on a gradual basis and only after service in a lower rank, which will season and qualify them. This is true, for example, in the Police and Fire Departments; in business corporations; in the Clergy and even in social organizations, such as the Masons or the Knights of Columbus. The reason for this is obvious. Experience in the lower echelon develops a more complete and broader base for service higher up.

Any district attorney who had dealt with criminals knows the practical problems involved and he also knows that theory, as intriguing as it may be, will not work. Some brilliant students of the law, such as professors, are so impractical that they could not find their way to the courthouse, but they could write a beautiful thesis on a given point, which when applied to an actual set of facts would not work at all.

Since those selected for appointment to the highest court in the United States are subject to approval by the Senate, I believe that the Senate should pass a set of rules requiring that such persons must have a minimum judicial experience or maximum judicial experience before they can be appointed to the Supreme Court. This is one way I feel we can do something to change the type of decisions we have been getting and which have really alarmed law enforcement agencies and the people in general. There seems to be no valid reason why the nominations for this extremely important position should not be limited to those with judicial experience.

As a lawyer, I am not prone to criticize the judiciary, but, on the other hand, I do feel that something must be done so that those who make the decisions will be more experienced in practical matters and I believe the Senate of the United States is in a position to do something about this.

Sincerely and respectfully yours,

PHILIP V. MANNING.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
3241 New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I was very pleased to learn that some of our Senators and Representatives are concerned about the U.S. Supreme Court through technicalities freeing many hardened criminals and the effect of the Miranda Decision upon Law Enforcement.

Our railroad operates in six Southeastern States and in the performance of our duties we work very closely with City, County, State and Federal Law Enforcement Officers. The Miranda Decision as well as others handed down by the Supreme Court have definitely had adverse affect on all law enforcement officers in fulfilling their responsibility. Through our association with local police executives we also know these decisions have made it extremely difficult for them to recruit competent personnel to fill the ever increasing number of vacancies. A large percentage of these vacancies are brought about by people leaving the profession as they feel they have been shackled by the various Court decisions in the last few years, which makes it almost impossible for them to effectively enforce the laws.

Our law enforcement officers today generally are well trained and qualified and no amount of money made available by Congress for training purposes as recommended by the President's Crime Commission in my opinion can or will correct the dilemma which now faces the law enforcement officer. I agree with the overwhelming majority opinion of police executives throughout the United States that the salvation of the law enforcement officer today will not come from Supreme Court decisions, but necessarily through Congressional action.

I personally appreciate your interest in the welfare of the law enforcement officer and you and your colleagues are to be commended for the stand taken in this matter.

Very truly yours,

C. L. EACHO,
Director of Property Protection.

Subject: Need for wire-tapping and admissibility of confessions.

92 EAST END AVENUE, NEW YORK, February 21, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Wire-tapping: I've just written the President telling him that I'm alarmed at the prospect of a complete ban on wire-tapping except in cases involving national security. I am a liberal, but I've never quite been able to "dig" the anti-wire-tapping mystique. I'd a lot rather have my phone tapped by police trying to get information on a racketeer than be victimized by a narcotics addict who might never have become addicted if the police had been in a better position to control organized crime. To call for a ban on wire-tapping because it's susceptible of abuse seems to me like calling for the abolition of the police just because dictatorial regimes make use of police forces to further anti-democratic ends. Even if the criterion is to be "national security", doesn't that concept include the security of the nation against subversion by organized crime as well as by agents of foreign Powers?

I would, on the other hand, be strongly in favor of banning the use of any kind of bugging devices by entites other than the public authorities.

Confessions: The currently fashionable anti-confession mystique is another tenet of the liberals that I can't go along with. Of course the use of force to extract confessions should be banned, because it might lead to conviction of the wrong person. But the idea seems to be growing that there is something basically wrong about using confessions at all.

I cannot see why the use of confessions to determine guilt should be more objectionable than the use of testimnoy by people who claim to be witnesses. Personally, if I were on a jury trying a criminal case I'd be a lot more likely to believe what a suspect said about himself than what some other person said about him. There can be any number of reasons for fallibility on the part of witnesses—inaccurate observation and memory, secret malice, or just the desire to feel important. I'd rather be in danger of incriminating myself than of being incriminated by any Tom, Dick or Harry.

Sincerely yours,

EITHNE GOLDEN.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, U.S. Senate, 3241 New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Mr. Quinn Tamm of the International Association of Chiefs of Police has called to my attention that the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures is conducting a hearing on March 7–9, 1967, regarding the recent decisions affecting law enforcement by the United States Supreme Court.

While I am Secretary-Treasurer of the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, located here in Washington, I am not writing to you in this capacity and the opinions expressed herein are strictly my own and not those of the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety.

As to my qualifications to speak on this topic, please be informed that I have spent many years as a law enforcement officer and as a police executive. In addition, I am a Life-member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. In the many years that have passed since I was an active law enforcement officer, I have continued my interest in this field.

Let me say at the onset, I do not believe that it would have been possible for me, as a police executive, to have adjusted to conditions that presently handicap law enforcement. I am sure that I would have been driven to some other pursuit in which my activities would be less restricted.

As a citizen of the Washington D.C. area, I am alarmed at the crime conditions to be found in this city and area. Despite denials by some high-ranking government officials, I am convinced that the recent opinions by the United States Supreme Court, particularly the one in the Miranda case, has law enforcement working at a disadvantage. I am sure that if something is not done, and done quickly, crime conditions in the United States will become a national scandal. It is intolerable today, I hate to think what it will become if it gets worse.

In many ways, the law of the gun that existed in some parts of our West during the middle years of the last century exists today. I was impressed by a news item that appeared in the Washington Post today in which a judge informed a holdup man that he "should have been killed."

While I have nothing to contribute to the hearings that you are conducting on March 7–9, I want to urge you and your fellow committee members to look at this situation with practical eyes—if possible, through the eyes of a conscientious dedicated law enforcement officer. Please ask yourselves "How could I function as a policeman under the Miranda decision and other similar decisions?"

I have seen the results of crime, violent crimes, and I urge you and your committee members in behalf of humanity to take some position and corrective action.

Sincerely,

RICHARD O. BENNETT.

Subject: Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967.

Hon. GEORGE MURPHY,
Senator, United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MURPHY: This legislation has been introduced in both the Senate, and the House. In principle I am in favor of this Act, but have some points I would like you to consider.

1. Title one provides 90% allowable for planning grants. Nowhere in this title, or in title four, is it specific about implementation of the plans. There should be built in a section which encourages implementation as a result of study and planning.

2. Title two is general in nature as it should be to provide the latitude needed in developing policy or administration for the act. It would appear from the wording of this title that it is talking of major subsidy.

For this reason, two items should be worked into it. First, the idea of a time limit should be advanced. It is true this could be a policy, but the act would be more meaningful if the time were spelled out in the act. Each segment of any proposal could be funded for a specific period of time.

Second, there is a need to provide more than encouragement (Section 204b) on S.M.S. areas or regionalization. Priority could be given proposals which have this built in.

3. Title three provides for funding "private organizations" (Section 302) and "private or non-profit organizations" (Section 303). This funding may be at 100% for research. There is need to exempt this section from the 15% allocation requirement as set forth in Section 410.

4. Title four provides for the administration of the act. In Section 405 it discusses dissemination of information. Specific funds should be allocated for such purposes.

5. Section 410 gives an allocation to states which is improperly stated. It's all right to limit money, but not in this manner. The money should be allocated as follows:

a. Subsidy programs such as Title II should be allocated on a combination of need and merit.

b. Planning grants Title I and Research grants Title III, should be left open to action by the Advisory Panel to the Attorney General.

To allocate the funds on a straight percentage basis in all categories will not advance law enforcement or criminal justice as necessary. There should be no limitation on the planning and research opportunities for progressive agencies and institutions of higher education.

6. Section 411 (a), there should be a semi-annual requirement for reporting made mandatory.

7. Section 411 (c), this raises the same problem as Section 410. There should be no limit to any area on demonstration, planning or research.

8. There is a need to develop boundaries for the allocation of funds in the total Criminal Justice System. If the system were divided into three categories, law enforcement, corrections and courts, it would be well to spell out limits on funds. 50–75% of total allocations each FY to law enforcements; 25–15% to corrections, 25–15% to courts.

I hope this information proves helpful in your consideration of this vital piece of legislation.

Sincerely yours,

C. ROBERT GUTHRIE,
Chairman, Department of Criminology.

RESOLUTION

At the regular meeting of the Mecosta County Board of Supervisors held at Big Rapids, Michigan, on May 8, 1967, the following Resolution was unanimously adopted.

Whereas, this Board is aware of the fact that the Citizens of this County are greatly concerned about the increase in crime.

Whereas, it is the opinion of this Board that local law enforcement is hindered, restricted and frustrated by U.S. Court decisions and lack of proper legislation restricting U.S. Court authority in the area of crime which is historically a concern and proper function of local government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That our U.S. Supreme Court and Congress be urged to take prompt action to restore to the law abiding citizen, his inherent right to be free from molestation by the criminal element and to be safe in his home and on the streets of his community; be it further

Resolved, That the Governor and our State Legislators recognize that the rights of decent citizens should receive priority over the unrestrained activities of criminals; be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded to the Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, our two U.S. Senators, our Congressman, the Governor of Michigan, our State Legislators, the Michigan Municipal League, the State Association of Supervisors, the National Association of Counties and our adjoining Counties and Cities.

Clerk, Mecosta County Board of Supervisors.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY AGENCY,

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: As a member of the Governor's Committee on Crime, Delinquency and Corrections in the State of West Virginia, I wish to lend my support to the highly worthwhile and significant legislation which you are sponsoring, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. The studies made by the staff of our Committee indicate a tremendous need for the innovative and realistic approaches to the problems of crime, which this bill would make possible.

The need for improved systems of criminal justice, including judicial and correctional reform and new approaches to the problem of delinquency, are truly a national problem, which our citizens are confronted with both here and when they migrate to urban industrial areas.

I am hopeful that a strong bill will be passed, and feel certain that any support which our Committee can lend will be promptly forthcoming.

Sincerely,

JOHN FRISK, Deputy Director.

Whereas:—Peaceful citizens can no longer go about their business, nor even walk the city streets, by day or night, without being molested and subjected to hideous assaults, even murder and rape; banks and business places are being robbed daily; taxi and bus drivers are attacked and robbed, for no apparent reason, except to satisfy the sadistic desires of the perpetrators; homes and apartments are burglarized at any hour of day or night.

To make a gangland out of a decent respectable city or town seems to be the ultimate aim of these offenders; and

Therefore:—The Executive Board of the Political Study Club of the District of Columbia in meeting assembled April 3, 1967, and read to the full membership April 15, 1967, does endorse these Bills introduced by Senator McClellan (D.) RESOLUTION—RE CRIME IN THE WASHINGTON AREA

Whereas:—Organized Crime is rampant in the District of Columbia and Washington Area; citizens who are trying to earn an honest living are being submitted to vicious assaults, robbery and many are murdered, even when small sums are involved; banks and restaurants, stores and other businesses, homes and apartments are burglarized; children and teenagers are becoming well skilled in the intricacies of all types of thievery and mugging; molestations and rape is increasing, and

Whereas:—Vandalism, demonstration marches; riots, incited by communistic leaders, make up the larger per cent of the daily news media—T.V., Radio, Newspapers, Magazines, Leaflets, and even so-called Sermons, and

Whereas:—Many of the perpetrators are freed by the Courts and allowed to build up a longer police record; and

Whereas:—Police are unjustly accused of "Police Brutality" in trying, with much difficulty, to do their duty as officers of the law, and

THE NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF WISCONSIN

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the great majority of the citizens of the United States are patriotic and law abiding men and women who love our country, and

Whereas, there appears to be a growing number in our society of those who have a total disregard for law and order, and

Whereas, the general public seems to be indifferent to this problem, even though they themselves are law abiding, and

Whereas, the lawless minority is able frequently to force its will upon the majority, in utter disregard of every democratic process, and

Whereas, many experienced police officers are leaving their jobs in frustration and disgust as a result of the lack of public support for their efforts, and

Whereas, these alarming trends must be reversed, while we have the opportunity and the resources to do so; be it therefore

Resolved, That the Wisconsin National Guard Association pledge its members to the active support of law and order, the promotion of respect for law enforcement officers and agencies, and the affirmation of common decency, and; be it further

Resolved, That the members of the Association encourage other civic, fraternal and service organizations with which they are affiliated to join in an all-out effort to accomplish this truly worthwhile activity, and; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished the Governor and the Attorney General of Wisconsin, Judges of Wisconsin's State and County Courts, and the Chiefs of Police of the cities of Wisconsin; be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be submitted by the Secretary of the Wisconsin National Guard Association at the next annual conference of the National Guard Association of the United States for consideration for adoption by that body.

HAWAII PROBATION, PAROLE, AND CORRECTIONS ASSOCIATION,
Honolulu, Hawaii, May 4, 1967.

HON. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The proposed bill "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" is a much needed bill in the State of Hawaii and the entire nation. There is great need for assistance by state and local agencies in the field of corrections. Enactment of this bill will offer the greatly needed assistance to those programs involved in law enforcement, courts, and correctional programs.

As an organization whose program is committed to improving standards and helping those in the correctional field and related agencies, we feel the proposed bill is very vital to the upgrading of professional services and truly reducing delinquency and crime.

The great improvement in child welfare conditions, for example, has been due to Federal Legislation. We in corrections are very excited and hopeful for the future of our Society in view of the broadly visioned approaches possible under the proposed Act.

We wish to urge your support of this bill.

Very truly yours,

WAYNE Y. KANAGAWA, President.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY INTERNATIONAL NARCOTIC ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS ASSOCIATION AT THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS MEETING, WASHINGTON, D.C., MAY 24, 1967

Noting, after a lengthy discussion, the many problems attendant to the enforcement of the narcotic laws; and

Noting, that it has become increasingly difficult to combat organized crime, especially as related to obtaining criminal intelligence information and evidence of narcotic trafficking; and

Noting further, the recent proposals and court decisions which have had the result of restricting the use of electronic devices to assist enforcement officers in obtaining or corroborating evidence of criminal activity; and

Noting further, that the Honorable Senator John L. McClellan on January 25, 1967 introduced in the Senate of the United States S. 675, a bill "To prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses, and for other purposes";

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the International Narcotic Enforcement Officers Association, Inc. extends its support to the purposes and procedures of S. 675 proposed by Senator McClellan; and

Be it further resolved, that the Association believes the proposed legislation to be essential to the effective enforcement of narcotic laws and the nation-wide battle against organized crime, and therefore strongly recommends the enactment of S. 675; and

Be it further resolved, that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, Senator McClellan and other members of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Narcotics.

JOHN J. BELLIZZI,
Executive Secretary, International Narcotic Enforcement Officers Association, 855 Central Avenue, Albany, N.Y.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will stand adjourned until further notice.

(Whereupon, at 3:15 p.m., the committee was adjourned, to reconvene subject to the call of the Chair.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

TUESDAY, MAY 9, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:15 a.m., in room 3302, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Hart, Hruska, and Scott.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; Joe D. Bell, assistant counsel; W. Arnold Smith, assistant counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

Today we will resume hearings on S. 674, S. 675, S. 798, S. 917, S. 1194, and S. 1333.

As I announced at the beginning of this series of hearings, these are the six bills to which we will particularly direct the testimony.

However, the bill in which the administration is most interested, S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, is the measure that we are giving priority to in these hearings, trying to move along and conclude testimony on first. While doing so, we are not barring any witness who may come here to testify, or who may be testifying, from making any comment he desires to on the other pending measures.

At the last hearing I had asked a series of questions on S. 917, the safe streets bill, but before concluding my interrogation of the Attorney General, who was testifying, I yielded to other members of the subcommittee so that they, too, might participate in the hearing that day—since we realized we would not be able to conclude I wanted them to have an opportunity for questioning.

So today I will resume about where I left off with the questions I had prepared, that I wanted to get in the record. I will try to conclude my interrogation in a little while, and then yield to my colleagues. However, I believe Senator Hart has indicated to me he has to go to another hearing. And if so, Senator, I will be very glad to yield to you for some questions at this time.

Mr. Attorney General, we appreciate your cooperation and your presence here this morning.

Mr. CLARK. It is a pleasure, Mr. Chairman, thank you.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, you are very kind. I did tell the chairman that I had an obligation to get up to a merchant marine executive hearing. He expressed amazement that anyone from Michigan was interested in the merchant marine. And I told him those people in Arkansas didn't understand where the fourth seacoast lay.

Senator McCLELLAN. I can tell you where the fifth one will be—Little Rock, Ark.—when we get the Arkansas River navigable.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman—I have no questions. I was not able to be present the day the Attorney General began his testimony, nor have I had an opportunity to read the transcript, which I shall do—and in the event I have to leave before you conclude today, I shall read today's.

I have indicated in earlier hearings that I believe that S. 917 represents very good sense. Clearly, any legislation that is introduced can be improved, and it may well be that during the testimony suggestions for improvement will be made which can be adopted. But I think the chairman in introducing S. 917, and providing time for this committee early in the session to work on it, has indicated a pretty good guarantee that we will deliver on it. I think the Nation will be the better for it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

I think the Attorney General will be back with us later at which time you will have another opportunity to question him about this and other bills.

I don't have the dates, Mr. Attorney General, but letters have gone to you requesting your views on two other bills, S. 674, which we term the confession bill, and S. 675, the wiretapping bill. Letters went to you some time ago.

I don't believe you have responded to them up to this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. RAMSEY CLARK, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Mr. CLARK. We have not responded formally to those letters at this time, Mr. Chairman. I can testify on them now. We are in the course of preparation of a written response.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well. We will proceed with the safe streets and crime control bill this morning. I will announce, as I have indicated to you, that I have a luncheon engagement that will compel me to conclude this session about 12:10 or 12:15 at the latest. I don't think it would be very productive to try to hold hearings this afternoon, with the situation as it is in the Senate. It would be a waste of your time to ask you to come back. We will just have to defer our questioning until another time.

I will now resume where I left off in my questioning, when I yielded to other members of the committee at your last appearance.

Mr. Attorney General, can you give us in simple language just how the requirement of S. 202(a) and (c) will operate? Again, Mr. Attorney General—I will say for the record—I want to make as thorough a record on this bill as we can in committee, make a history of this legislation, so we have some assurance of how it is going to operate.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to expand my answer to include section 202(d) which deals with——

Senator McCLELLAN. I had 202 (a), (b) and (c)—I had all three of them.

Mr. CLARK. Yes. But we need (d) in there, too, because it includes an integral part, the basic expenditure.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, I was going to ask that, I believe, in the next question.

The next question would be—section 202 of the bill restricts expenditures of grant money for salaries to one-third.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Wait. I failed to read the next question.

The next question added to that, after (a), (b) and (c), was—May these requirements under section 202(d) be completely and entirely waived by the Attorney General?

Now, that does cover all of them.

Mr. CLARK. OK. Section 202(a) contemplates what we have generally called action grants, or program grants. These are grants for operating expenses of criminal justice agencies. They could be made beginning on January 1, 1968. It provides that the Federal Government can make up to a 60-percent matching grant of the improvement expenditure of applicants. It also provides that no grants for facilities—that is construction and physical improvements—shall be made under section 202. Such grants are covered by section 203.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I had in mind to ask you if there was not conflict between these two sections with reference to improvements. As I understand it now, it is a 60-percent grant that cannot be used for improvements.

Mr. CLARK. That is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Later you do take care of construction grants with a lesser percentage?

Mr. CLARK. That is right. In section 203.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Fifty percent, is it?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right. I understand.

Mr. CLARK. The 202(a) also provides that not more than one-third of the Federal funds granted under this section shall be used for compensation for personnel for salaries. It has two exceptions in it. They relate to expenditures for training and expenditures for the performance of innovative functions by police and other criminal justice officials.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, first would you tell me what you mean by improvement expenditures, in line 19? Improvement—you think ordinarily of improvements as expenditures for the construction of facilities.

Mr. CLARK. Well, improvement here is a word of art. It just means "better," really, and it relates back to the word "improvement" in section 201, which generally states the purposes of the grants under title 2.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But it is very clear that "improvement" here does not relate to physical structures.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And street lighting, or facilities like that.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. Well—street lighting is different, I think.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, I just used it as a crude illustration. But certainly it does not apply to buildings.

Mr. CLARK. It does not apply to any building or other physical facilities.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the chairman yield at that point. I direct your attention to line 4 on that same page, where the words "operations and facilities" are used.

Didn't we cover that the other day when we inquired as to what facilities meant?

Mr. CLARK. I think we went from (a) through (g) of 0–1. If you would care to go back over it.

Senator HRUSKA. Normally, when we think of facilities, we mean buildings. Does it mean something else in this case?

Mr. CLARK. No. I think facilities there would include physical improvements, it would include buildings, it would include improvements in addition to the buildings, remodeling of buildings.

The exception stated in 202(a) relates only to section 202. Section 203(a) specifically contemplates physical improvements.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK. To go on now—the word "improvement" also relates to the definition, you might say, of improvement expenditures which is contained in section 202(b), and the system of the grant is this. First the improvement expenditure would be determined. That is the amount by which the operating budget proposed in an application by a law enforcement or criminal justice agency, exceeds the qualifying expenditure. The qualifying expenditure is defined in 202(c) and that is roughly 5 percent the first year above your base expenditure, 10 percent the second year above your base expenditure, 15 percent—an increment of 5 percent for each year.

Your base expenditure is defined in section 202(d) and it is your operating expenditure for your last fiscal year ending before January 1, 1968. So it it would generally be the present fiscal year for a law enforcement agency—their operating expenses during that year would be the base.

Your qualifying expenditures would have to meet this requirement of a 5-percent increase over your base expenditure. Your improvement expenditure, which is that part eligible for a Federal grant, is the difference between your proposed operating budget under the application and your qualifying expenditure.

Now, if you would like me to run that by in numbers, I can do that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right—in a moment.

While it comes to mind, let me ask you this: There has to be an area of 50,000 inhabitants in which there is an entity of government, like a city, or a county, in order to be eligible for any assistance under this act. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct—both as to title 1 and as to title 2. That requirement is not applicable to title 3.

I think——

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am talking about being eligible to get the assistance we are here talking about.

Mr. CLARK. In title 2, that is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The population of the area to be covered by the grant would have to be at least 50,000. The entity could be either a municipality, or a combination of municipalities, or a county, or a county and municipality; is that right?

Mr. CLARK. It has to be either a State or a unit of local government or a combination of States and/or units of local government that have a plan that is applicable to a population of not less than 50,000 persons.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am concerned whether we are getting this thing so complicated that in areas where perhaps they need the assistance most, they will not be able to qualify, and not become eligible.

You would require a 5-percent increase in their expenditure each year—it graduates on up to 125 percent, I believe, or 130 percent—for 6 years. What I am trying to ascertain is, suppose a county makes a plan, it has 50,000 population, but the county itself only has, outside of the municipality, probably 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000. The municipality has the largest percent of the population. The county can make a plan, because it has 50,000 people. But suppose the municipality does not go along, and it says "We are not interested," and for some reason they fail to take advantage of the program. Although the county has 50,000, it can present a plan, because it is eligible from the standpoint of numbers. But when it comes to increasing the 5 percent, how is it going to work when the county can increase the county tax by 5 percent, but cannot increase the tax in the city. The city balks—it does not do it.

How are we going to get that 5-percent increase?

The county can increase it so far as its taxes are concerned. But the municipality, if it is included in the plan, will be getting the benefit, and yet it will be paying no additional taxes.

Or vice versa.

Take the city that undertakes to do it, but it has to include the suburbs and the whole county in a plan to meet the population requirement. But then the county says, "No, we are not going to contribute anything to it, the policemen handle that down in the city, you get the money somewhere."

Are we going to have problems like that?

Mr. CLARK. Well, I don't think so.

If it is a joint plan, as we would hope it would be in all cases of smaller jurisdictions—because this is so vital to effective criminal justice action—then there would have to be an overall increase of 5 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what gives me some concern. Before you can get up a plan, the city cannot get up a plan by itself, the county cannot by itself, if it takes the municipalities within the county to make the 50,000. They have to agree and come in with a plan—so it is more than a county—it is a county and a city, or a county and a number of towns.

What I am thinking in terms of, Mr. Attorney General, is this. For them to get the benefit of these grants they are going to have to meet substantially the same standards as a larger city or metropolitan area would have to meet. In some instances they are not going to be able to do it. They are going to be left out. They will have no opportunity actually to participate. That gives me some concern.

I am not saying they should not participate and do those things to become eligible—I am not saying they should not do that. But I am looking at this from what I think is a more realistic point of view as to what is going to happen.

Mr. CLARK. I am not sure that the small cities and small towns and small counties populationwise would have a greater difficulty increasing 5 percent than the big ones. It might be just the other way around.

But it would seem to me that if a town by itself of more than 50,000 has to increase by 5 percent, that you would want to apply the same standard to a town of less than 50,000 that is combined with another jurisdiction, to qualify under the 50,000 limitation. The same would be true of the counties.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me ask you this. Just as a matter of thinking out loud—and I have not come to any final decision about it. Would it not be better to encourage, if we could, statewide plans, and get the State in on this. We could then have some assurance that the revenue is going to be provided, and the State would have the ability, revenuewise, to raise revenues to meet its obligations. Otherwise you can start one of these plans—it could even happen to a statewide plan—they could get ambitious and start one, and, in the middle of it, after 2 years, they cannot raise their next 5 percent to bring it up to 15 percent, and the whole thing flops. Then what happens?

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think in answer to your question that the bill specifically encourages statewide plans. It does not make them a prerequisite, and I do not believe it realistically could. I think if it did, it would involve a long delay and perhaps some ultimate inability in some jurisdictions to get together between State and local law enforcement.

I think the State—it is particularly important as to your smaller counties and towns, because they in and of themselves are too small to provide all of the support for law enforcement that is needed, to provide all of the opportunity for training, for education, for interchange of personnel, to provide latest techniques—so I think in your smaller jurisdictions, the States play an important role. I think that is one of the benefits of the 50,000-population limitation. It provides a greater incentive for the States to show leadership as to those jurisdictions.

A jurisdiction of less than 50,000—a jurisdiction of 50,000 is not likely to have, by national average standards, a hundred policemen. And with such a small police force, it is very difficult to provide adequate training and adequate support. The State can make a big difference here.

On the other hand, as to your major cities, your big cities, generally throughout the United States the State has not played a role financially or by guidance or other support in local law enforcement. The cities have historically had the leadership and the responsibility for local law enforcement, and the State has not played a role. So it would be very difficult for—particularly in your big States, with these major metropolitan areas, for the State to come in the first time with comprehensive planning for law enforcement agencies that have been in the business for more than a century.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Can a State, municipality, or other entity, submit a plan that is confined solely to training policemen? Would that be eligible for approval under this law?

Suppose they say:

We want to take advantage of this, we want to get the benefit of trained policemen, and we want to go into it solely for that purpose. We do not know whether we could raise the money for all of these other purposes or not, but this we give priority to and we want to do that.

They came in with a plan and say:

We want you to give us a grant under this law to help us get trained policemen.

Now, would a plan that excluded the other features that are authorized under this bill—would a plan like that be eligible for approval?

Mr. CLARK. The plan itself would have to continue the items stated in section 204(a)(2), (a) through (b). It is on page 7—204(a)(2), and then (a) through (g). This does not mean, however, that they could not limit it—their request for Federal assistance to law enforcement training. Their plan would have to show through all of the seven elements.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They would have to show they did not need the other things?

Mr. CLARK. It would have to show at least that this was a great priority and a great need.

Now, I think particularly in States, that such a request for training of local law enforcement in rural areas and things might be of great value. As you know, we place great stress on the need for training and the need for standards of law enforcement. Those are really essential, along with compensation, to improve the quality of law enforcement.

But for a municipality particularly, to come in with nothing but training, would not necessarily, but probably, be disappointing, at least—because we would hope they would seek more than that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I feel that some of them will say "Well, we want to do this and that, but the rest of it we do not want to do, we do not feel we can afford to do all of these things, so we want to get a grant, and give priority to this future or to this aspect of the assistance that is available to us under this law." Now, they may include training of policemen, they may include buying some equipment. In other words, a plan that only covers a part, whether a major part or even a minor part, of the assistance that is going to be available—would that plan be eligible for approval?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, it would be.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would be.

Then I ask you this question:

If they have a plan that, say, is only for the training of policemen, which is eligible, and is approved, then in order to continue that plan in operation, would they have to increase their revenues, their expenditures for law enforcement the next year by 5 percent, or would that be adjusted on a ratio basis of what they are spending for policemen and what they are spending for all other purposes?

Say they were spending 50 percent for police service, and the other 50 percent for other aspects of it?

Mr. CLARK. Assuming that their request for training was a 1-year request—in other words, it wasn't anything that was spread over more than 1 year—then to be eligible the next year under the bill as it is drawn, they would have to show an additional improvement expenditure of 5 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So if they start out this year and say "Well, we now have a hundred policemen, with your grant we can afford to train 12 additional policemen, or 15, as the case may be."

They come to the second year, and they would like to train another 10 or 15 policemen.

Now, in order to be able to train that other 10 or 15, they not only have to contribute their share, but to get the grant that is available they also have to increase their expenditures for criminal law enforcement and so forth by 5 percent, is that true?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. Their operating expenditure—it would have to go up 5 percent. Otherwise they could actually decrease their commitment to law enforcement by cutting down on the total number of policemen, by cutting down on their salaries, by shifting any number of expenditures that police departments regularly make, and simply increasing this one item of training.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, the point I am making is this—say they spend half a million dollars, I don't know what would be a proper figure—that is for 100 hundred policemen. I expect they would spend $1 million.

Then the next year, to send the other 10 they wanted to train, they would have to increase that expenditure by $25,000—their operating expenditure. Is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. Their base was $500,000, and 5 percent of that would be $25,000. And then they would be eligible for Federal funds only for up to 60 percent of their increased expenditure over $525,000.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, they would only be eligible for 60 percent of the cost—60 percent of the $25,000?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir. The Federal participation would begin only over and above the 5-percent increase. And that is based upon this fact—that law enforcement on the average across the country today is increasing its expenditures about 5 precent, perhaps a little better. We are doing that right now without any Federal assistance. The idea of this bill is not merely to subsidize on-going expenditures. It is to bring a new and substantially increased commitment to the public safety through improvement of your criminal justice agency.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am sure that is true. And I am not quarreling with the objectives of the bill at all. My question is—have we got it so complicated that it is going to be cumbersome to administer, or impractical in the results we will get? Those are things we have to think about.

We are dealing here with something very, very important. This is important legislation. I am not trying to wreck it. I am trying to get it analyzed on the record so we can study it with a view of making improvements if necessary. To pass this and then find in the administration or operation of it we don't get the results that we hoped for would be disillusioning to the whole outlook for better law enforcement in this country.

I am not criticizing the bill. I am trying to do our best to get out legislation here that will give us the results we hope for and the best results.

So I hope you do not take this as being too critical. I am trying to get a record here that we can study.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all. We want to explore all of its features with you, and seek their improvement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Maybe we will raise some question here that will cause you to want to reexamine certain provisions.

Section 202 of the bill restricts expenditures of grant money for salaries to one-third. I believe you have stated that 85 to 95 percent of law enforcement budgets are for personnel. Is that correct?

Mr. CLARK. That is right. We figure it averages about 90 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you think that this restriction, then, to a third, is a bit rigid and unrealistic?

Mr. CLARK. It was our judgment, after careful study, that this was a wise limitation, and it is based on a number of considerations.

One, we really need improvement, and mere salary supplementation, particularly if it is not of a very substantial dimension, will not necessarily bring that. We need to know that all of our law enforcement agencies, and we have tens of thousands, are looking across the board to improve their performance.

We need to know that they will not take the easy route with Federal money and just dump it in salaries, even though salaries are terribly important.

Now, we recognize the limitation of one-third is only on the Federal part—it is not on the State or local part.

We recognize they have to put up an additional 5 percent above their 100 percent before they get any Federal money, and that only 60 percent, or only up to 60 percent of the amount above that 5 percent will be Federal.

So actually the limitation on the total is fairly limited.

We think it will bring resources to bear in other areas, and that the spread will improve the quality of law enforcement more than we would improve it if we permitted the entire expenditure for salaries.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If they want to buy equipment, like patrol cars—using that as an illustration—if that is a part of their plan, to build up their equipment, what would be the Government's contribution, the grant percentage for that?

Mr. CLARK. It could be up to 60 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That would be 60 percent?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What is this third for salaries?

Mr. CLARK. The third is that portion of the total Federal grant that can go to salaries. Assume that the total Federal grant to a particular jurisdiction is $75,000. Only one-third of that could be for salaries—with these two exceptions, training and innovative functions. That means that the $25,000 would be matched against whatever would be 40 percent to $25,000. That could be up to 60 percent of the total improvement that they were seeking in their compensation over and above the 5 percent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It gets a little complicated, doesn't it?

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think—as Federal programs go—even though dealing with it may be complex—I think it is fairly simple.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Maybe as they go it is simple. It does get a little complicated it seems. I do not mean this critically. I mean we need to all study it together, and see how we can simplify it, and improve it. I don't want you to think I am being critical, other than to try to analyze it, and see if improvement can be made of it.

Very well.

The next question:

Section 203(a) limits grants for the construction of physical facilities, "fulfilling a significant innovation function." What does that mean—"fulfilling a significant innovation function?"

Mr. CLARK. "Innovative function," the last two words of that phrase, are defined in title 5, section 501(h) on page 16. That means a new or improved purpose within this particular jurisdiction.

It was not contemplated by this act that we would go in at this time to a broad Federal grant program for general buildings and facilities for criminal justice. It was not contemplated that we would build a courthouse in every county of the country, or that we would build police stations or precinct stations in every city of the country.

It was contemplated that most of these funds would go for improvement of personnel, practices, techniques, research and development, training, that sort of thing.

When we come to physical facilities, it is the judgment of the administration that the grants should be limited to those which perform a really significant and innovative function—that we should not get into a massive grant program for physical facilities in the criminal justice field, at least at this time.

Senator MCCLELLAN. "Innovative function" means something new, something different, does it not?

Mr. CLARK. That is right. In that jurisdiction.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Give us some illustration of what it means—concrete illustration of what would be an innovative function.

Mr. CLARK. Well, in police work it could be a new type of precinct station that would give you two seemingly inconsistent things at the same time, both of which we need. It would give you an opportunity to consolidate your police management into a headquarters, so you would not have precinct captains spread around. At the same time it would give you local visibility and contact with the people and identification with the people. That could be an innovative facility in a particular jurisdiction.

It could mean a new type—in corrections, it could mean a new type of community service place. It could be the remodeling, for instance, of the floor of a particular floor of a YMCA building—that some of the probation officers of Shreveport, La., have suggested we do—so you can test a work release program in a community where people would be working. It would be the sort of thing that the California Youth Authority has developed in some areas. In courts, it could be a new type of suburb courthouse as we see in California and places like that, out in outlying areas, away from downtown. But it would have to be significant, it would have to be innovative.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you call the repairing or replacing the floor in a YMCA building a significant innovation?

Mr. CLARK. It would be a remodeling for a given purpose. It would have custodial features, and it would be designed to permit guards and caseworker personnel to know where the people are and what they are doing.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It seems rather weak, Mr. Attorney General.

I can appreciate that a significant innovative function might be the building of, say, a midway house between jail and release. That might, in my judgment, be an innovative function—when they serve a third of their sentence in jail, or two-thirds, and you want to see if you can rehabilitate them, or try to give them some instruction, and a little inspiration, encouragement to do good and not to return to crime—you build a place where, after they serve part of their sentence in jail, you can take them and try to rehabilitate them.

Now, that might be a significant innovation. But I cannot see that repairing a YMCA, building a new floor in it, is anything like a significant innovation.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think we are talking about the same things.

I would not assume that every halfway house had to be an isolated free-standing building. It could serve, perhaps, more effectively or efficiently, as was suggested—I use this as an illustration—if it were a wing of an existing apartment house, or something like that. If we can provide the security and other appointments that you need in a halfway house sort of installation. But many of our community service facilities, which are really the future of corrections, are not free-standing, isolated buildings—they are integrated into other buildings, but they have to have particular appointments. They are different than the remainder of the building.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, let's see if we can think of another one.

Would street lighting, say—if a town says "We need to light up our streets—dark alleys are conducive to crime—we have a plan here to light up our streets, and we need funds for that."

Would that come within this significant innovative function?

Mr. CLARK. That could possibly be within the description of physical facilities. It could not be, I think, a general street lighting plan, for a number of reasons. I don't think it would be sufficiently innovative. It could run into millions of dollars.

It would have to have a particular concept. It would have to be designed to show a particular potential for crime control.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would seem to me it would be just as new and innovative as the repairing of a YMCA building.

Mr. CLARK. We have had street lights for years in most of our cities, but I have not seen a YMCA with a halfway house built into it.

Senator HRUSKA. Most YMCA's have floors, don't they? What is innovative about putting one kind of floor rather than another kind? Will it serve a new purpose, which is your definition of innovation? Placing lights where the have never been before, I would think, would follow the definition of innovative function which says it is a function which will serve a new purpose. Well, that is a new purpose. There are not any lights there now. You are going to put lights in alleys for the first time.

Wouldn't that be new in your judgment?

Mr. CLARK. Suppose it is an annex to a city that has not been in there before. I do not think it would be the contemplation of this bill that we would put street lights throughout the newly annexed part of the city simply because there have not been street lights there before. I think it would have to be significant in terms of law enforcement. I think it would have to be innovative in terms of technique. As I said earlier, I think some lighting facilities could meet this qualification. But I do not think this would be used as a general plan for street lighting throughout the United States.

Senator HRUSKA. That certainly is relative to law enforcement, because we find vast industrial plants sometimes dispensing with guards around their plants, and in lieu thereof they just have bright lights. Now, that is a factor in law enforcement—no question about it.

I don't want to press the point. But—Mr. Chairman, I should think this would illustrate that for any application that would be made, whether it is lighting or a floor or a new chimney that will draw a little better—it is a new purpose, and whatever it is, it lies within the complete discretion of whoever administers this law to say "Yes, it is innovative, or no, it is not." And I think under this description here, no one can deny that ths discretion has been abused too much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let us look at it one step further.

Suppose a municipality has never had them, and says—we want to put in some police callboxes. Would that be a significant innovative function that would come under this?

Mr. CLARK. If the city had had police callboxes before, it would not be innovative under the definition. If it had not, and the plan were significant, would afford some real advantage to law enforcement, and were innovative, it could come within this.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Under section 203(b), an applicant shall be eligible for grant only if he would be eligible for one under section 202. Do you regard the provisions of section 203(b) too restrictive?

Mr. CLARK. No. We believe that it is desirable to provide for facility grants only where the same increased commitment by the jurisdiction to law enforcement has been made that we would require under section 202 for action programs.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Section 204(a) provides that the Attorney General may make grants under title II only if the applicant has on file with the Attorney General a current law enforcement and criminal justice plan conforming to the purpose and requirements of the act. Mr. Attorney General, who is to determine if the plan so conforms?

Mr. CLARK. Well, initially, the determination would be by the Director of the Office, and ultimately, when necessary, by the Attorney General.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is there any appeal from the discretion exercised by the Attorney General?

Mr. CLARK. There is no appeal provided.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Should there be some board to appeal to, or some higher authority? I am not sure—I just asked. Have you thought of it?

Mr. CLARK. It has been given some consideration. This is a suggestion made by some of the Members in the House. An appeal under Federal grant programs has not been generally authorized. It could involve a great many problems—delay, confusion, and uncertainty. I doubt that it would really afford any meaningful difference or rights to people. I think the programs would be applied fairly and uniformly. I think as a practical matter they would have to be. And I think appeals would tend to frustrate——

Senator MCCLELLAN. There are those who are concerned about what is termed a centralization of power here in Washington, and those who have been disillusioned or disappointed in the administration of some other programs. They raise objection to what they conceive to be a centralization of power, and thus allowing the Central Government to get a grip or control on law enforcement throughout the country. And they raise objection to this. They have apprehensions about it. And I am trying to see if there is any way to alleviate this apprehension, to modify the bill some way so that there would not be reposed in one head of an agency of Government the sole responsibility, authority, and power to say yes or no to a plan.

Mr. CLARK. Well, we would certainly want to consider it with you. My reaction is that it would make administration of the act exceedingly difficult, and it would involve such inordinate delays that it might really be quite debilitating.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, it would further complicate an already complicated act.

Mr. CLARK. It would complicate an act that seems pretty streamlined to us considering all of the problems. You have to have confidence some place.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If all the power, the authority is reposed in one man or one source, of course it is streamlined, insofar as making a decision.

Mr. CLARK. Well, he has the framework of the law within which he is supposed to operate, and we have to assume that he will.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you think a population of 50,000 is the best standard that can be provided?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir, I do. I should say probably that it is my understanding that the House subcommittee, which will probably report the bill today, will also probably reduce the 50,000 to 25,000.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would that permit, Mr. Attorney General, smaller communities to come in—such as a county with a county seat of 10,000 or 15,000 and the remaining of the 25,000 out in the suburbs, and so forth? Some of those would like to come in, maybe, and as it is now, they might not be able to. You would have to get two counties to join together, contiguous counties to come together. And again you would get the complication of trying to raise that 5 percent each year—who is going to have the responsibility for that. Of course, I do not want to go too low, but it does seem to me that maybe this 50,000 ought to be lowered.

Mr. CLARK. It is a matter of judgment. We have about 550 counties that would exceed the 50,000 population level. We have about 380 cities that would exceed that population level. They contain 80 percent of the people in the country. They contain probably 74 percent of the police. If we lower it, we will increase the problems of administration by increasing the numbers of applicants. We will also reduce the incentive for these smaller jurisdictions to do something that is very desirable, and that is plan together with other small jurisdictions to improve their performance. And that is the part of the reduction that concerned me most.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I think may defeat a lot of the good that could come out of this. Getting them to join together. You get towns and counties that have their rivalries, and you have to make certain the expenditure in the joint plan for law enforcement is raised 5 percent each year and it can get complicated.

I am thinking out loud—and I might change my mind—but I believe I would rather see us get this minimum down to around 25,000 where most communities would have an opportunity to participate.

Mr. CLARK. Well, they all have the opportunity to participate under the bill as it is drawn. It is simply that they cannot participate by themselves.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Of course, I am talking about being able to act alone without having to get their neighbors to join.

Mr. CLARK. Well, they would have a number of alternatives. They would have—a small town would have the option of joining with its county, or with other small towns, or of joining in a general State plan. Any of these would have—just because they got together—benefits that would probably transcend the benefits of simply improving the small jurisdictions by itself.

We have 40,000 police jurisdictions in the United States today. I think there are so many that are so small that we really cannot expect either effectiveness or efficiency from them. There are thousands of those that are one-man law enforcement offices. And that really limits your potential.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, I believe we are going to have some pretty serious complications in trying to administer this. I am not too pessimistic, I don't want to be. But I think there are going to be some real problems trying to administer it unless we can simplify it a little bit in some areas.

Could you give us an example of what would be required in the plan under section 204(a) (2)? Are there any plans now on file in the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance which might be utilized in administering section 204(a)?

Mr. CLARK. In answer to your first—to your last part of your question first, I don't believe there are any comprehensive plans for a total law enforcement agency on file with the Law Enforcement Assistance Act office at this time.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, is there anything in that agency that can be dovetailed into this and made to fit, so we will not have lost whatever we have expended on it?

Mr. CLARK. Well, there certainly is.

First, title 3 would include all of the functions of the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance. They would merely be reorganized into this new office. That on-going operation would have all the benefit, of all the experience of LEA plus the product of its grants. Those grants also provide the base for our experience in administering a grant program, which is invaluable. And we would hope, certainly, that we could take the teachings of those grants and apply them both in the planning grants under title 1 and the action grants under title 2. So there is no loss in this. In fact, there is a tremendous gain. We are very fortunate to have had the experience of the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance as we go into this major program.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Does this act repeal the Law Enforcement Assistance Act?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, it does. Title 3 repeals and supersedes. But it really incorporates all——

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, you have learned something from the administration of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act that you can make use of, beneficially, in the administration of this one?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. But in addition, we include its specific features in here.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right.

Now—give us an example of what would be required in the plan under section 204(a)(2). Can you give us an example?

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think rather than an example, I would just say that it would be a comprehensive document that would include the seven items that are listed in—under (a) through (g). It would be a document that would set forth descriptions of general needs and problems of the jurisdiction, it would describe their existing systems, because you have to know what is being done now to see how what is proposed would relate to it. It would describe the available resources that the jurisdiction has and brings with it to its increased commitment to law enforcement. It would describe the purposes for which the Federal funds are sought, so that there would be specificity as to the very items that would be supported by Federal funds. It would describe systems and administrative machinery for implementing the plan, so we could see how they anticipated carrying out what it is they propose to do.

It would describe the direction and scope and types of improvements, so that—that would be made in the future, so that we could see it was not a concept that ended at a day certain at the end of a particular year, but went on, that it was a long-range, well-thought-out plan, and it would describe to the extent appropriate—we think this is awfully important—the relationship of that plan with other law enforcement plans by State and local government, because it is so important that these agencies have the most highly coordinated action.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have a staff of very competent people down there. Would you have them prepare and submit as an exhibit to your testimony a sample plan that you would anticipate would result from the enactment of this bill—the kind of plans you would anticipate receiving—just as a sample, so we may have it as an exhibit, and get a clear illustration of what you have in mind under the proposed act.

It would be very helpful to us if you could do that, Mr. Attorney General.

Mr. CLARK. Let us——

Senator McCLELLAN. At your convenience.

Mr. CLARK. Let us consider that. I think what we would need to do is really get some specific law enforcement department, some police department, or something, to prepare one, so we would have some specificity to it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, your people down there certainly have in mind what kind of a plan you visualize a department or municipality would submit. I would like to see an illustrative plan, taking in all features of this proposed law, if a municipality wanted to share in all of them. Give us a sample of what kind of a plan you would anticipate, maybe, from a city or unit that wanted to share in all of the grants and benefits that this law will provide.

If we can see that, I think we can have a pretty good idea of how it will work. And I would think that you folks who are studying this could have some idea and draft a sample of a plan or illustration of a plan that you think would merit approval.

Mr. CLARK. Let's see what we can get up for you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We would appreciate it if you would just let us have it as an exhibit, at your convenience.

Section 204(b) provides that in implementing this section, the Attorney General should encourage certain enumerated activities by State and local governments. What activities do you have in mind to encourage, Mr. Attorney General?

Mr. CLARK. We would encourage the seven specific areas of activity that the Congress has—would instruct by enactment of this section, that we encourage, which are set forth on page 8, to top two lines of page 9. We would encourage—if you like me to either read or paraphrase them I can do it. But I think they speak for themselves.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what you mean—you encourage these seven items that are outlined here on page 8 of the bill?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct. Going over to the top of page 9.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I see.

Are grants to be made under this law to improve or to establish public defender systems?

Mr. CLARK. I think grants could be made under this law to either improve or establish public defender systems; yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you approve grants to provide for investigative and technical services for the defendants in criminal cases? I mean, could that be included in assisstance in a plan for a public defender system?

Mr. CLARK. If a State agency or local government came forward with a plan that embodied that, there is nothing to prohibit its consideration.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would be eligible?

Mr. CLARK. It would be eligible.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How about to train defense counsel. If they came forth with a plan for that, to train a number of lawyers as public defenders, would that be eligible for a grant?

Mr. CLARK. If someone applied for it, it would not be prohibited under this bill. I might say——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, it would be eligible.

Mr. CLARK. It would be eligible. Under the law Enforcement Assistance Act, our grants to date have been for the training of prosecutors rather than defense attorneys.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is not defense. I can appreciate you might want to train, just like you do policemen, better personnel, more competent personnel on the side of law enforcement. But we are now confronted, as you know, with Supreme Court decisions which make it necessary, as I interpret those decisions, for the State or the county or the municipality, to provide counsel for anyone at the time they are taken into custodial detention—if they ask for it. If they request it, under the court decisions as I interpret them, the State or the prosecuting authority, accusing authority, must provide that person in custodial detention with counsel.

Now, is it contemplated under this bill that in order to meet that requirement, we will make eligible for grants municipalities, States, or other entities that submit plans to train defense counsel and provide an investigative service for those accused of crime, and so forth.

Is that contemplated under this act? If not so contemplated, does the act authorize and permit it?

Mr. CLARK. The act does authorize and permit it. If a criminal justice agency involved in the court system came in and applied for funds for that purpose, it would be eligible for consideration.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, I am sure you are going to have a lot of agencies insisting that such plans be submitted, and the Government will now go into the business of providing defense counsel on the same scale it provides a prosecuting attorney, and also providing investigators for those accused of crime, for technical experts, and so forth—on an equal basis of what is provided to the prosecution.

Do you foresee that?

Mr. CLARK. I doubt that that would be a major item for application, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Can't you foresee the pressure and demands for such plans since they will be eligible?

Mr. CLARK. I think the pressures and the priorities are the same, whether there is a Federal program or not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You think what?

Mr. CLARK. I say I think the pressures and the priorities on jurisdictions are the same, whether there is a Federal program of assistance or not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The pressure may be the same. But here they will have a source of getting results, a direct avenue to the authority to provide what they demand.

Mr. CLARK. If that is their item of highest priority, that would be something that——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, it would not have to be the highest priority.

Mr. CLARK. That would be their judgment if they put it in.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would be one of their requests.

Mr. CLARK. They still have got to match up to—at least up to 40 percent, they still have to make their 5-percent increased investment.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I understand. I am just illustrating where we are in this law enforcement business. Now, we are reaching the point, moving swiftly in that direction, where the public, the taxpayers, have got to provide for the complete defense of anyone apprehended or accused of crime from the time he is taken into custodial detention, all the way through appeals to courts, to the top if he insists on doing it. We are moving in that direction. And I think this act is going to give impetus to it, and stimulate a greater demand and more pressures than we have ever known in this direction. I hope I am wrong about it. But I foresee that we are providing the means and the opportunity here for such a development.

Do you want to comment on that, and suggest how badly I am in error?

Mr. CLARK. I will just make two comments, Mr. Chairman. The same potential has existed under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act. The applications that we have had in this area have been for training prosecutors rather than for training defense counsel.

Senator McClellan. That is what has happened in the past. In the past you did not have to provide them a lawyer the minute they were arrested, either. There are a lot of things in the past that do not hold valid today. And that is the point I am making.

Mr. Clark. That is this year and last year. It is not tomorrow, that is true. On the other hand, it may be that we have a great need in this area, and if we do, it is best that we prepare to meet it, I guess.

Senator McClellan. Well, let us talk about it, let us get it spread out here, and let everybody know what this is leading to and say so. That is all I am trying to do. Let us look this proposal right in the face, and evaluate it, and analyze it, and try to know where we are going from here.

Mr. Clark. That would certainly by a very tiny part of the total picture. The major purpose of this bill is to improve the quality of law enforcement.

Senator McClellan. I wish I could agree with you on that. But I do not have any assurance of that from present trends. I am afraid it is not going to be just a tiny part. I am afraid it is going to become—and I am sincere—a major part of it, and that very soon. I hope I am wrong. And I hope you are right.

But anyway, I just wanted to emphasize that point.

Mr. Attorney General, I have some five or six other questions that I wanted to ask. But I have used more than my share of the time. Again, I want to defer to my colleagues and give them an opportunity to ask you some questions before we have to recess at noon, and I am going to do that now. And I will probably, with your permission—submit these questions to you, and let you just answer them for the record. And then when you come back on these other bills, we can ask any questions for clarification of your statement if we think it necessary.

With that arrangement, I think I would like now to yield to my colleagues.

Senator Hart. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, you discussed with our chairman the possible definition and illustration of this significant innovative function in terms of capital investment, physical facilities.

Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, was it permitted to ask for a physical facility? Have we had any experience under the Law Enforcement Act that would indicate what might be visualized here?

Mr. Clark. There is no prohibition under the act against funding for physical facilities. Offhand, I cannot think of one that was actually funded.

And perhaps that tells us something, too. After all, the moving party is the applicant. Presumably they know and have some sense of priority of what they need. As they have come forward, they have not asked for funds for capital improvement for construction.

Senator Hart. So this morning's testimony indicates that the Law Enforcement Assistance Act tells us at least two things in terms of what the communities across the country appear to be seeking within the last 24 months. One—it is not physical plant, and two, it is not preparation of defense counsel.

Mr. CLARK. I think that is true in large measure.

As to the physical plant, the largest annual appropriation for law enforcement assistance for the whole Nation has been $7,250,000. You just cannot do much building with that.

But even so, I do not think that that will become a major part of this act. I would certainly hope not, because I think it is in people, in technique, in research and development that we will get the greatest return on these funds.

Senator HART. This certainly reflects the areas in which I believe the people in Michigan seek assistance—devices, as you say techniques, that will arm more effectively the police, research and development to generate that kind of weapon, in order that the police can be more effectively armed, and perhaps overriding all, the methods, a formula, a curriculum to make a policeman a more effective agent in the public employ.

Now, the second point that I should like to comment on—it really is not a question—the chairman developed with you the problem which this 50,000 breakoff figure may create. He indicated that perhaps dropping it to a 25,000 figure would avoid some of the problems, open wider the opportunities of participation across the country.

The concern he voiced I think all of us share, and certainly we appreciate the problem. But is it not conceivable that moving in that direction would defeat in part an ultimate goal here?

Is it not really one of our problems, reflecting our own history, that is having too many small units of law enforcement in this country? To the extent that by keeping the 50,000 or higher figure in the bill, we can develop a cooperative effort which may lead ultimately to what could be a very important contribution to law enforcement, as I understand it, and that is having more area and manpower under one jurisdiction.

Would we not be defeating that objective by reducing lower the 50,000 figure?

Mr. CLARK. I believe we would, and I think that is a very important consideration.

Senator HART. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Scott?

Senator SCOTT. Mr. Attorney General, I just want to suggest to you the possibility of considering and perhaps submitting to us more clarifying wording than the phrase "significant innovation," chiefly because I think it may give us some difficulties on the floor. And if it is possible to clarify that, or to make it simpler of explanation by those who sponsor the bill, it might be useful to us.

Mr. CLARK. We will endeavor to do that, Senator Scott. I will call your attention again to the definition of innovative function in title 5, subsection (h). We can try to clarify that.

Senator SCOTT. It occurs to me also concerning Senator Hart's discussion of the 50,000 limitation, that possibly smaller units might be able to pool their efforts so as to qualify under a total of 50,000 units. In other words, several small communities might qualify. We would like to be sure that provisions in the final form of the bill permitted a joining of smaller communities into a regional effort, since there is a tendency in this country toward regional groupings.

Mr. CLARK. That is an excellent point. It is one that the present bill contemplates. And it permits it in several ways.

First, the State itself can provide leadership in seeking funds for the smaller jurisdictions or those that are willing to participate within its boundaries.

Second, the smaller jurisdictions can themselves combine to exceed the 50,000 total, and there stand as an applicant together, where they could not individually, because each would be below 50,000 individually.

Third, different levels of jurisdiction, such as county and city can join together, where they can affect a total greater than 50,000. And fourth, a big jurisdiction, either by contract, which is a very valuable technique, or by simply coordination, can include—as a major city, could include small suburbs, in the vicinity, or outlying towns.

So there is the present potential for all of the smaller jurisdictions willing or able to join with other jurisdictions to exceed the total, to receive the benefits of the bill.

Senator SCOTT. That is very helpful.

I would also suggest for the record that you might want to consider under the research grant section—not for the legislation, but for clarification under it—the possibility of research grants to help the States to explore possible methods of judicial selection by nonpartisan commissions. It seems to me that might be a worthy effort.

We in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania have had a lot of discussion lately on this subject. We have done nothing about it. But we are now considering changes in our State constitution. And I am hopeful that there we may be able to, by means of improving the selection of State judges. It occurs to me that some activity in the form of research might be useful, since I am sure from what I read this is also true in a number of other States. The Missouri plan, for example, is much discussed in bar association meetings, and there are other plans.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think that again is an excellent point. I think it is something that we would hope the judiciaries of the several States would look to. We feel that they can take advantage of the present language under title 3. We have not had much grant experience in the judicial selection area, but in other State commission study areas, we have had quite a history under law enforcement assistance which provides the same base and opportunity that title 3 provides. Over 20 States have come in and received funds for State crime commissions of various types.

Senator SCOTT. Fine. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hart, any further questions?

Senator HART. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, my appointment has arrived. The people are waiting in my office. Since I am going to have to leave in a few moments. I believe I will recess now. We will either submit these questions to you, or give them to you when you come back.

As soon as you can, supply us your answers to the letters regarding the other bills that I referred to this morning—let us have those—and then we will undertake to set a date convenient for you to testify on those measures.

(The reports on S. 674, S. 675 and S. 678 were subsequently received and are printed following the texts of the bills.)

Thank you very much for your appearance.

The committee will stand in recess subject to call.

(Whereupon, at 11:45 a.m., the committee was adjourned, to reconvene subject to the call of the Chair.)

(Subsequently, the following data was furnished by the Attorney General in reply to certain questions by the chairman.)

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 20, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed please find my responses to the additional questions you have raised in your letter of May 19, 1967, regarding various aspects of the President's "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967."

I know that we share a common concern about the national problem of crime. As I indicated in my testimony, it is my belief that the Crime Control Act provides a most effective means of improving our ability to cope with crime where it should be treated—at the State and local levels.

In your letter, you express concern about the potential power and control the bill centralizes here in Washington over local law enforcement agencies. Our country has a deeply engrained tradition against a national police force, and I share your abhorrence of the possibility of the development of Federal control over local law enforcement. In my judgment, however, the proposed Bill presents no such threat.

Although the Bill itself gives a certain amount of administrative discretion to the Attorney General, such discretion is necessary to permit adaptation to the diversity of problems that will be encountered in its administration. Complete elimination of this discretion would introduce a degree of inflexibility into the program that might well make it unworkable.

The Bill itself (section 408) makes very clear that any exercise of control over local law enforcement would violate the statute. For any Attorney General to attempt to do so would involve an abuse of his authority under the statute. Moreover, as a practical matter, it would be impossible for the Attorney General to try to control the 40,000 different police jurisdictions that function in the United States. These jurisdictions have consistently maintained a strong tradition of autonomy and independence in local law enforcement.

The need for this program is clear and urgent, and I urge the Committee to give its prompt consideration to the bill.

If I can be of any further service to the Committee, please call upon me.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY, Attorney General.

ATTORNEY GENERAL CLARK'S RESPONSES TO SENATOR MCCLELLAN'S QUESTIONS—S. 917—SAFE STREETS

Title I. Planning grants

(1) Is there contemplated any restriction on the amount of grant money under Title I that can be paid professional advisory firms for drafting and assisting the local agency in formulating plans to be submitted?

No restriction is provided for by the language of the bill, and at present we do not contemplate regulations restricting the amount of grant money that can be used by an applicant to engage a professsional advisory firm to assist it in formulating plans. The matter is, however, being studied and the possibility of issuing guidelines in this area will be considered. The administrator of the program would, in any event, have to approve such an application under Title I for federal funds to be used for planning. If unreasonable amounts were to be expended to engage professional advisory firms, the application would, of course, not be approved.

Title II. Grants for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes

(1) From the national standpoint, which of the purposes contained in Section 201 do you consider to be of greatest importance?

That is a difficult question to answer since, in general, they are all important. In particular jurisdictions any one or more may be of unusual significance. If I have to single out the one that is most likely of greatest significance, I would select training and education.

(2) Do you think it would simplify the bill to place Section 203(a)—the 50% construction grant provision—under Section 202(a)?

We did consider putting 203(a) under 202(a) but found that both for ease of interpretation and clarity of meaning it was preferable to make 203(a) a separate section.

(3) Would you suggest a more simplified formula for making grants under Section 202?

It would be difficult to suggest a more simplified formula that would accomplish our objectives—viz. to ensure that an applying jurisdiction not only meets the national average 5% annual increase in its law enforcement budget but in fact exceeds it. The formula is designed to stimulate the expenditure of more State and local moneys for law enforcement purposes than would otherwise normally be spent. Federal money will be used to prime the pump—so to speak.

The formula uses a fixed base year—the 1967 fiscal year—from which to measure the average 5% increase in order to avoid the possibility that a jurisdiction will drop or fail to increase its budget one year in order to meet a 5% increase requirement for the next year. There is, however, an escape clause provided at the end of Section 202(d) in order to avoid any unfairness resulting from having a fixed base year.

(4) Would it not lend clarity to the format of the bill to place the definitions of Section 202 under Title V?

That could be done, of course. Nothing substantive turns on where the definitions are located. Because the definitions are so central to understanding the formula, however, we thought that it would be preferable to incorporate them directly into Section 202. In that way, the reader of the legislation will not have to repeatedly shift back and forth between Section 202 and the definitions.

(5) Please explain the language "the proposed operating budget, or the amount by which the proposed operating budget per capita", Section 202(b) and "operating expenditures per capita", Section 202(d).

An applicant is entitled to compute its grant eligibility using either its total budget or its budget per capita, whichever method permits the greated Federal assistance. Areas of large population growth will probably prefer to qualify under the total budget method, whereas areas experiencing a population decline will prefer the per capita method.

Assume for example, that in 1967 an area of 240,000 persons has operating expenses of $240,000 for law enforcement and criminal justice. It proposes that the same amount be spent in 1969 at a time when its population has declined to 200,000 persons. By the total budget method, the area's qualifying expenditure would be $264,000 (110 per cent of $240,000). The area thus fails to qualify for Federal assistance if its eligibility is calculated by this method. Its budget per capita, however, is $1/person in 1967. Its qualifying budget for 1969 is $1.10/person. Since its proposed budget in 1969 is $1.20/person, the area's improvement expenditure is $.10/ person, and the Federal Government is authorized to pay up to $.06/person of this amount, or $12,000 ($.06 × 200,000).

(6) Does not the phrase "Each such plan shall (1) unless it is not practicable to do so", Section 204(a), give the Attorney General complete discretion to waive the requirements of 204(a)(1) A and B?

It does give him discretion, but, as phrased, I would not expect that discretion to be exercised too freely or frequently. What we have in mind here is a situation where a local government, for example, barely misses the 50,000 population minimum and despite a good faith effort is unable to join with another local jurisdiction or come in under a state plan to meet the minimum. I can conceive in such a case of invoking the introductory language of 204(a) to waive the population requirement.

(7) Your attention is called to the absence of requests under LEA for funds for construction and physical facilities. In response to questioning in the Subcommittee hearings of May 9, 1967, you testified that there is no prohibition under LEA against funding for physical facilities (page 969). From this statement you drew an inference that the applicants did not consider such needs as primary in their priorities.

On page 7 of the LEAA Guide, Part I. A. 9., it is stated: "Type of support available: In general, most expenses involved in the conduct of grant projects will be suported with the exception of outlays for construction of facilities or purchase of capital equipment. (Emphasis added).

To ask the question again, what might be visualized under Section 203(a)?

While the text of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act contains no express prohibition on support for construction of physical facilities, the Department found it necessary to preclude investment in this type of aid because of the limited funds available under the Act for the LEAA program.

The Department has from time to time received inquiries about availability of support for construction under LEAA. S. 917 was drafted to explicitly include application of action grant funds for construction of physical facilities that are significantly innovative [Section 203(a)]. With respect to what might be visualized under Section 203(a), the total response in terms of fund allocations will depend on what priorities for construction efforts are established by states and localities in development of the comprehensive plans which are a prerequisite for Title II support. A construction priority, established in a soundly-conceived and adequately justified total plan would, of course, be honored in Title II grant requests. The types of "significant innovative functions" for which construction aid would be authorized would include such items as new police training centers, new community-based correctional treatment facilities, and modern police laboratory facilities. We do not contemplate that general office construction for police departments, courts, etc., would be included in this concept. Also, it should be noted that construction funds would be available only to the extent of the jurisdiction's general eligibility for criminal justice action grants under the formulas of Section 202 of S. 917.

Title III. Research, demonstration, and special projects grants

(1) Can you give examples of a grant which would be made under Section 302?

There are, of course, many examples of grants that might be made under Section 302. The significant criterion is whether the research, demonstration or special project will be "of regional or national importance or will make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement nad criminal justice." A certain amount of flexibility necessarily must be built into the application of that criterion. The first application for a new and unusual project might meet this criterion. Once the worth of the project had been demonstrated, however, it might be more appropriately funded under Title II.

Possible examples of grants under Section 302 might include funds for—

(1) a project for laboratory simulation of various police command and control systems for the purpose of determining the most useful type of system.

(2) the development of automatic patrol car locators involving new technical approaches.

(3) a demonstration project involving computer simulation of court processing of cases for developing new methods of relieving court congestion.

(2) What type of "private organization" do you visualize would be applying for a grant?

Under Section 302, private profit making or non-profit making organizations may qualify for a grant. Conceivably the Attorney General might contract with a police equipment manufacturer to assist in the development of an unusually innovative piece of police equipment. A non-profit research corporation might apply for a research grant to develop the application of techniques of economic analysis to police problems. California has, for example, engaged corporate members of the aerospace industry to assist in developing new communications systems.

(3) Can you give examples of a grant under Section 303?

Grants under Section 303 might be made, for example, to a university to establish an interstate criminal justice training academy or to a non-profit contractor, such as are frequently employed by the Department of Defense, to develop a regional Research in Criminal Justice Institute to service police and other agencies.

(4) Is there any provision in this bill to authorize the Attorney General to pay tuition for or fellowship grants to law enforcement personnel while engaged in college, university or special programs of criminal justice training?

(a) If not, do you consider that this provision would strengthen the bill?

This type of aid is possible in two ways. First, states may make provision for tuition or fellowship aid in their comprehensive plans under Title I and allocate Title II action grant funds for this purpose. Also, the Department considers that grants to institutions of higher education under Title III to offer scholarship and fellowship assistance to law enforcement and criminal justice students can be supported as "special projects" under Section 302 which "will make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice." Under LEAA, for example, the Department has established a national graduate fellowship program for police personnel involving grants to three universities and much the same provisions and levels of aid established for comparable fellowship grants awarded to universities under the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and National Defense Education Act fellowship programs. The Department has expressed this position in its advisory opinions on proposed legislation now pending with the Congress which would specifically establish scholarship and fellowship aid programs for law enforcement and criminal justice personnel.

(5) Assuming Congress appropriates the $50 million requested under the bill, how much of this do you visualize will be expended for Title I, planning grants, and Title III, expenditures for carrying on programs piloted by the Law Enforcement Assistance Act?

(a) What percentage of the appropriations used for Title III grants will go to continuing existing LEA programs and what percentage of the Title III funds will be used for entirely new research, etc., programs?

If Congress appropriates the $50 million requested for fiscal 1968 under S. 917, the Department contemplates that approximately $25 million will be awarded for planning grants under Title I and $15 million for research, demonstration, and special projects under Title III. The remainder will be allocated to the first action grants under Title II (possibly ready during the latter half of fiscal 1968) and costs of program administration. Among the Title III awards, it is further estimated that most funds will be applied to new research, demonstration, and special programs. That is, possibly between 20–30% of the expenditures will be used for the continuation of existing LEAA programs and the remaining 70–80% will be for new research and programs.

(6) As of April 1, 1967, your office was unable to assess the programs launched under LEA (page 32 of LEA Report, April 1, 1967). How long do you think it will take to get any reliable assessment of LEA projects?

Assessment of projects funded under LEAA is receiving the first order of priority. Most of the LEAA projects supported during the first year of operations were launched in the final quarter of fiscal 1966. Since most of the grants run for at least a year (with the exception of several short-term studies funded in the first year of LEAA activity and to be included in the output of the President's Crime Commission), few grantees will be submitting final reports until fiscal 1968. The Department of Justice plans to allocate substantial staff resources and time to the important matter of project evaluation, and it may be possible to offer reliable assessments of groups of LEAA projects by the end of calendar 1967 or the beginning of calendar 1968. The degree of assessment and evaluation will, of course, depend on the type of project and the objectives to be measured. For example, LEAA-supported training in the development of improved police competence will require follow-up over a period of years for completely reliable evaluation. It should also be noted that LEAA 1-year grants for action and training projects are considered close to the minimal duration required for an effective and measurable demonstration and thus, in many cases, may not be susceptible to immediate evaluation.

(7) What real benefits have the taxpayers derived from LEA expenditures?

The Department believes that the LEAA program, one of the smallest in government in relation to the important and major segment of state-local activity which it serves, has produced impact and benefits far beyond the limited resources available for the program:

(a) First, LEAA has supported a variety of projects which will aid and advance law enforcement capabilities and have already had substantial effect. In varying degree, these will set standards, provide models, produce knowledge, and establish facilities (information systems, training centers, etc.) badly needed for a more effective response to the crime problems. Thus, to cite a few examples:

(i) New state-wide police training and standards systems are being developed or existing ones expanded with LEAA help in 25% of the states;

(ii) Individual training demonstrations (regional or state-wide) have been supported in 50% of the states;

(iii) New state-wide correctional training systems are being developed and will soon receive support in a similar number of states;

(iv) A major expansion of the nation's management and executive training courses and facilities for police and correctional personnel has taken place by virtue of the LEAA program focus in this area (12 state or regional grants);

(v) New state planning committees have been established and helped to undertake comprehensive and coordinated criminal justice planning in 25% of the states;

(vi) New efforts in police-community relations programs (training and operations) have received support in 30 major city police departments;

(vii) Institutions in 15 states which one year ago had no college or university offering any opportunity for degree study in law enforcement for officers on the job or high school graduates interested in law enforcement careers have received LEAA funds to establish such programs;

(viii) The nation's first graduate fellowship program in police administration has been established by LEAA in the three leading universities currently offering such training;

(ix) The development of modern computer-assisted information systems for law enforcement has been fostered at the national level (single largest LEAA aid commitment has been for development and pilot operation of the FBI-coordinated National Crime Information Center) and on the state and local levels (7 state and metropolitan area information system development projects);

(x) Landmark study efforts supported by LEAA have provided essential data to the field for improved programming in such important areas as the general contribution of science and technology to law enforcement capabilities, the current status and operations of the nation's state and local correctional systems, consolidation, pooling of modern police services to increase efficiency, etc.

This diverse complex of LEAA-stimulated effort spanning all phases of the criminal justice process has been accomplished with much smaller resources than are available to many more narrowly focused programs dealing with other problems of state and local government.

(b) The LEAA program has served as an ideal laboratory and preparation for the kind of grant-in-aid partnership contemplated by the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. It has given the Department broad experience and perspectives in the methods and techniques of federal assistance, the problems and dilemmas of grant program administration, and the type of "client" it serves in dealing with state and local law enforcement. This experience has been invaluable and will be an important aid in sound structuring of larger programs.

(c) Finally, LEAA has, during its short period of operation, been a significant force in preparing law enforcement to examine its problems and move vigorously toward their resolution. The requirements for "new approaches," "innovative projects," "carefully defined plans," and high standards in projects submitted for assistance have required work and imaginative thought but have also been accepted and vigorously addressed by law enforcement agencies. Law enforcement today is progressive, aware of its responsibilities and actively seeking new solutions, new competence, and progress. This climate is an indispensable condition to the progress envisioned by S. 917 and LEAA has helped to foster it.

Title IV. Administration

(1) What problems do you anticipate in staffing and organizing and making effective and efficient use of the $50 million requested for fiscal year ending June 30, 1968? To what extent have preparations been made to administer and implement the Act, and what plans do you have to continue such preparations?

(a) What qualifications and background experience would you expect the Director to possess?

The two major problems confronting the Department in making efficient use of the funds requested for first year activities under S. 917 will be (a) the securing of adequate time for developing plans, rules, procedures, and administrative structure to provide States and localities with clear guidelines, prompt administration, and a soundly conceived and practical set of program priorities and regulations and (b) the acquisition of enough staff and properly qualified staff to organize and handle the first year workload in a manner meeting the highest standards of prudent administration of federal funds. In this last respect, the program under S. 917 will necessitate a substantial increase in staff now assigned to grant activity under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act. The Department is fully aware of the staffing problems confronting large new federal programs. The process of identifying and bringing in qualified staff will probably continue through and require the full fiscal year (1968) for completion.

In preparation for the program contemplated by S. 917, the Department has established several task forces to address major concerns in administration, organization, and rule-making for the program. An organizational structure is being finalized, initial staffing projections are being reviewed, and the beginning efforts for establishment of guidelines and definition of requisites for the various types of grants have been undertaken. During the summer, Departmental resources will be augmented by a team of knowledgeable professionals in the various fields concerned with criminal justice (police, courts, corrections, etc.) who will join the task force efforts as temporary supplemental staff in preparing for the new program. The Department has commenced regular meetings with representatives of major public interest groups concerned with the legislation (National League of Cities, Conference of Mayors, Council of State Governments, National Association of Counties, Conference of State Governors, City Managers Association, International Association of Chiefs of Police, American Correctional Association) to assure them a direct advisory voice in the structuring of the program and review of developing rules and regulations.

We would expect the Director of the Office of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance to have some knowledge and experience in the criminal justice area, or at least a major phase of it, but, more important, would look for administrative ability, program directions skills, and decisional and judgment capacities of the outstanding degree required for successful leadership of a complex and major intergovernmental program such as envisioned by S. 917.

(2) Section 407 provides that funds may be withheld from grantees when there is a substantial failure to comply with the Act and the regulations after reasonable notice and hearing. Should there be a provision in this Act for an appeal from or review of the Attorney General's decision withholding such funds?

The House Judiciary Committee has amended the bill to provide for judicial review of decisions withholding funds under Section 407. We do not object to such an amendment.

(3) How was the percentage of 15% in Section 410 arrived at? Should this percentage be made more flexible? Should Title III be exempted from the 15% requirement because some institution might be operating in a State serving a multiplicity of States in a given region?

Section 410 is designed to insure that all of the funds available under the Act are not spent in just a few states. It should be read together with Section 411(c) which supplements it by directing the Attorney General to promulgate regulations to "establish criteria to achieve a distribution among States of assistance under this Act."

The 15% figure is an outside maximum; the criteria to be formulated under Section 412 will provide for flexibility within that maximum. The 15% figure itself is the same figure provided under Section 114 and 209 of the Model Cities Act. The Act establishing the Neighborhood Youth Corps provides that no more than 12½% of the funds appropriated may be used in any one State.

We would not object to exempting grants made under Title III from the 15% requirement insofar as the grant relates to an institution serving more than one State or involves research or studies not directly related to a specific State.

(4) Should not the Congress have the authority to review the regulations under Section 411 promulgated by the Attorney General for implementing the bill in order to assure the Congress that such regulations are not being used as a means of forcing State and local enforcement agencies to conform to unreasonable standards?

Congress, of course, has the power to review regulations under this Act, as well as any other, to determine whether the regulations are consistent with the legislation under which the regulations are promulgated. No special provision is required in the statute. In any case where Congress deems such regulations inconsistent with the legislation in question it can specifically amend the legislation to clarify the matter or to eliminate the offending regulation. I would be opposed to inserting any special provisions in this legislation giving Congress any special powers to review regulations.

(5) Should not some of the responsibility for administering the procedures and evaluating the priorities to be followed in approving grants under the Act vest in the Congress?

Under the traditional division of responsibility between the legislature and the executive, responsibility for administering procedures including the evaluation of priorities in connection with a grant program is vested in the Executive under the general oversight of Congress. Of course, the legislation itself sets major priorities. I would expect Congress in exercise of its oversight function to keep in touch with the administration of this program in the same way that it oversees other Federal grant programs.

(6) Under Section 402, how many technical or advisory committees do you think will be necessary to administer the programs under this bill?

We contemplate that several advisory or technical committees will be required to assist with administration of the programs under S. 917. While our planning has not progressed to final conclusions, we would see as desirable the establishment of general advisory groups for the planning and action grant programs (Titles I and II) and for the research and demonstration effort (Title III), plus technical panels (e.g., police, courts, corrections, science and technology) to review specific Title III projects and, possibly, some review panels for Title I plans and Title II action grants. With regard particularly to review of Title I and II applications, the Department has not had sufficient opportunity for study of such questions as the desirability of advisory review of all applications (or applications from larger jurisdictions) and the appropriate role, representation and make-up of advisory committees to offer firm plans at this time.

(7) What do you have in mind when you suggest the possibility of such technical or advisory committees? What kind of committees would these be, if named?

The answer to question (6) addresses this question as well.

Title V. Definitions

(1) Section 501(a)—how much do you contemplate using "in defense of criminal cases?"

The purpose for which Federal funds will be used will be determined in the first instances by the applicants—viz. State and local governments. As I indicated in my testimony, I do not expect large amounts of money to be requested for this purpose. This is only one of a multiplicity of competing needs that the local governments will seek funds for and the likelihood is that it will tend to be very low on their scale of priorities. In any event, the amount of funds possibly involved will be small compared to funds likely to be sought for police equipment, police training, etc. On the other hand, the Bill does take a comprehensive approach to law enforcement and criminal justice problems, and an applicant could apply for money for such a purpose.

(2) Since the purpose of the bill is to make streets safe, should not the emphasis be put on the prosecution of criminal cases rather than defense of criminal cases, probation, correction and parole?

The major emphasis of the bill will clearly be directed toward substantial improvements in law enforcement. Aid to state and local governments for efficient and prompt prosecution of criminal cases will necessarily be a central aspect of the emphasis on law enforcement. At the same time, it is essential to recognize the need for a balanced program of assistance that will not arbitrarily exclude any other aspect of law enforcement and criminal justice. An approach that concentrates too heavily on only one of these aspects might easily miss the mark. If, for example, we concentrate exclusively on police improvements, we might place an unwieldy burden on our courts and correction systems. Conversely, if we could improve the rehabilitative aspects of our corrections system, we would go far toward relieving the problem of crime in our society.

General questions

(1) Would you describe the special program under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act concerning "Governor's Planning Committee in Criminal Administration?" Please cover such points as—

(a) number of States having such committees;

(b) amount of LEA funds involved in each;

(c) does the Governor's Committee act as a central State clearing house, or final board for approval of plans relating to improvement measures for State and local law enforcement agencies; and

(d) in this special LEA program, does the Governor have any veto power?

This is one of several LEAA special grant programs designed to stimulate wide-scale effort in certain key areas of law enforcement need. The LEAA program offers matching grants of up to $25,000 (50% federal contribution against 50% state contribution in funds, services, facilities, or other resources) to support the establishment or operation of State (Governor's) planning units charged with developing and coordinating comprehensive plans and programs of criminal justice improvement covering all aspects of crime control (police, courts, corrections, citizens' efforts, etc.).

The program was first announced in March, 1966 by letter to all state governors from the then Attorney General and an additional mission of the proposed committee at that time was the furnishing of data and assistance to the President's Commission study. To date—

(a) grants have been awarded to committees in 14 states and we have information that such units exist without federal support or are in organizational stages in 8 additional states;

(b) most LEAA grant awards have been at the maximum $25,000 per year level although a few were somewhat less because of matching requirement problems;

(c) although some of the projects contemplate a "clearing house" or coordination function for such committees, a few have reached this stage and, for those which have advised the Department concerning pending LEAA applications from their states (about 3 planning committees to date and here only with respect to selected applications) the review has been rendered and accepted as advisory only; and

(d) in no case has the governor exercised any formal veto power.

(2) Since the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act would supersede the LEA, is it contemplated to continue to use these State Planning Committees under the approach of S. 917?

The state planning committees can serve a very useful function under the Crime Control Act. They can help to formulate or review the plans prepared on the State level in connection with Section 204 of the Bill. They can serve as a clearinghouse of information, statewide, in connection with the development of plans on the local level. The exact function to be served by the planning committees in each state will vary depending on such factors as the size of the state, the speed with which the committee is activated, its makeup and the support given to it by the State Administration.

(a) Would not the use of these established Committees be a feasible way to coordinate the plans for an entire State?

Yes, these committees can be used to coordinate the plans for an entire state. In my judgment, the Federal legislation should not, however, impose too structured a coordination system on the states. The problems vary too much from state to state.

(3) As S. 917 proposes yet another Federal assistance program predicated upon dissemination of Federal tax funds, would the purposes of the bill be better served by apportioning, on the basis of population, the suggested funds among the States, to be administered by the States themselves?

No, I do not believe so. Once the tax funds come into Federal hands, Federal responsibility attaches to see that they are properly utilized. More importantly, there would be no particular advantages in having the funds administered by the states. The major responsibility for law enforcement in this country is handled at the local level. State governments in most states have little involvement in, control over, or responsibility for local law enforcement. Local jurisdiction would be opposed to the states attempting to assume control over their law enforcement operations and the possibility that the states would use control of the purse-strings for such a purpose is significantly greater than the possibility that the Federal Government would do so. Thus the threat to local autonomy under such a proposal would be considerably more serious than the "threat" of Federal control under the bill.

(4) Would you think that a bipartisan board or commission should be appointed to share the responsibility with the Attorney General of passing on the applications for funds under S. 917, or do you think the sole responsibility of making these decisions should rest solely in the Attorney General?

It is not desirable to dilute the final responsibility for decision in connection with a grant program of this nature. It will be, however, useful to have expert advisory groups to provide advice in connection with the administration of the program, and Section 402 with this in mind authorizes the Attorney General to appoint "technical or other advisory committees to advise him in connection with the administration of this Act * * *." I have described how such committees may be used in question (6), Title IV, supra.

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

MONDAY, JULY 10, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 3302, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senator McClellan.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; Joseph D. Bell, assistant counsel; W. Arnold Smith, assistant counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will proceed.

The Chair wishes to make a very brief opening statement.

Today we begin the fourth in a series of hearings by this subcommittee on various pending bills, which are in the nature of anticrime legislation.

Some 30 witnesses have already testified before this subcommittee at this session of the Congress on the crime menace that now threatens the security of this Nation. They have addressed themselves to several bills now pending before this subcommittee and which it is now considering. Another 18 witnesses are expected to testify during the hearings we have scheduled for this week.

Daily headlines in the press dramatically underscore the gravity of mounting crime and the urgent need to reinforce and accelerate our law-enforcement efforts. The FBI reports a 20 percent increase in the national crime rate for the first quarter of this year over the same period of last year. This is the sharpest increase that has been reported since 1958.

In the Nation's Capital the incidence of serious crime has risen over 40 percent within the past year. There are those who say—for reasons seemingly known only to them—that we do ourselves a great disservice with crime statistics. With all due deference, I respectfully submit that we do ourselves and the country a much greater disservice if we try to ignore these statistics and do nothing about the conditions they reflect. By way of parentheses, I wonder if we do ourselves a great disservice by the use of labor statistics, health statistics, and many others that we might mention.

Today in the midst of plenty, when the affluence of our people is unmatched anywhere and unparallel in world history—when Americans enjoy the highest economic standards ever achieved—lawlessness, vandalism, and violence have reached proportions that imperil the security of society and endanger the safety of our citizens. In some cities 50 percent of the people are afraid to walk the streets at night and are apprehensive of danger when on the streets and even in their places of business and in their homes in daytime. And well they might be, for the brazen criminal no longer finds it convenient or necessary to wait for the darkness of night to commit his evil deeds. The prevailing conditions and existing climate permit the criminal to operate boldly, daringly, and too often successfully and with impunity against undermanned, poorly trained, and inadequately equipped police forces. And, if the police do apprehend a criminal, he is unwittingly but most advantageously favored and protected by unsound and misguided Supreme Court decisions.

Recent 5 to 4 split decisions of the Supreme Court are seriously hampering, and in many instances completely nullifying, effective police investigation, interrogation, and arrest procedures. These decisions that deny to the trial courts and juries the best evidence in criminal cases—voluntarily incriminating statements and confessions of the accused—impede the processes of justice and reduce the prospect of securing a conviction of the guilty. They positively increase and augment the chances for self-confessed murderers, robbers, and rapists to go free and unpunished for their heinous crimes. In its pellmell rush to find and articulate still more "new rights" in criminal cases, the Supreme Court, since our last hearing, has laid down a new rule affording suspects the right to counsel at a police lineup.

The police have an obligation to prevent crime—and to arrest the perpetrators of crime—and then they are told that before they interrogate a suspect they must warn him of a long list of "rights" and make sure that he has a lawyer even if one has to be provided at Government or State expense, before requiring him to answer any questions.

In another split decision rendered since this subcommittee last convened, the Supreme Court struck down the New York statute allowing law-enforcement officers to use, on a court-authorized and restricted basis, electronic eavesdropping to secure evidence of crime. This is another serious blow to law enforcement and especially does it make it more difficult to combat the forces of organized crime. Thus, this further shackling of legitimate and effective law enforcement adds an additional burden on the Congress to fashion legislative remedies to counteract the harmful and debilitating effect Supreme Court decisions are having on law enforcement, on the security of society, and on the safety of our citizens.

Obviously, in view of the spiraling crime wave that is sweeping the Nation and the split Supreme Court decisions that are dispensing unequal justice as between the criminal elements in our society and the law-abiding citizens of our country, the legislative task and challenge confronting the Congress is indeed tremendous. But, however formidable these obstacles may be, the Congress must aggressively and persistently endeavor to meet its responsibility.

We have so far made only slight progress, but we have made a start by reporting two bills, S. 676 and S. 677, which provide severe penalties for the obstruction of justice, and for the granting of immunity for the purpose of compelling testimony, respectively. Both of these bills have passed the Senate. They are administration measures and I anticipate they will pass the House of Representatives and become law. If enacted they will do some good, but they are only a small beginning of what needs to be done.

I am hopeful that after this week's session, the subcommittee will be able to close the hearings, subject to the filing of statements, and move with reasonable expedition to the study and markup in executive session of several of the bills pending before it. This is our purpose and that is what we shall endeavor to do.

For the record, I should like to have printed at this point a list of the principal bills to which testimony will be directed during the course of the hearings this week.

(List of bills follow:)

The Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Committee on the Judiciary will resume hearings on a number of proposals to combat crime on July 10, 1967, at 10 a.m., in room 3302, New Senate Office Building. The hearings will continue on July 11 and 12 with a number of public witnesses scheduled to be heard.

The testimony will be directed primarily to the following bills which are now before the Subcommittee:

S. 552, to amend title 18, U.S. Code, in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense. (Sen. Burdick)

S. 674, to amend title 18, U.S. Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions. (Sen. McClellan)

S. 675, to prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses, and for other purposes. (Sen. McClellan)

S. 824, "Local Law Officers Education and Equipment Act"—to provide assistance for the improvement of State and local law enforcement agencies. (Sen. Tydings)

S. 917, "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967"—to assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, and for other purposes. (Sen. McClellan, by request)

S. 992, to establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice. (Sen. Edward Kennedy)

S. 1194, to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the inferior courts ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution in criminal prosecutions involving admissions or confessions of the accused. (Sen. Ervin)

S. 1333, relating to the admissibility in State courts of certain evidence. (Sen. Ribicoff)

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Paisley, do you have any statement?

Mr. PAISLEY. No, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well. I note we have four witnesses scheduled for today. Senator Tydings was scheduled to be the first witness; however, he couldn't get here at this time, but will be here sometime before noon.

Our next witness on this list is the Honorable Oliver P. Schulingkamp, judge of the District Court of New Orleans. Judge, will you come around, please?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are very glad to welcome you, sir. Do you have a prepared statement?

STATEMENT OF JUDGE OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP, DISTRICT COURT, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. First, Senator, let me say that I appreciate the invitation. I do not have a prepared statement as such. However, I have a written opinion in a case which I had in my court involving a motion to suppress a narcotics case. I was obliged under the Supreme Court decisions to maintain the motion to suppress. But in doing so, I incorporated in this decision the elements of the statement that I would like to make.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Will you give us briefly your background before we proceed.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. You mean my personal background, sir?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I am a native of New Orleans, and I was educated at Louisana State University. I have been a judge of the criminal court in New Orleans for some 8 years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is not an appellate court?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. No, sir, this is a court of original criminal jurisdiction.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. In this court we have eight judges, their jurisdiction is solely criminal.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is in the city of New Orleans?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir, that embraces Orleans Parish.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Orleans Parish?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You are one of the eight?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. You may proceed in your own way to give us the benefit of your views.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I feel perhaps, Senator, a reading of this decision, this opinion, would represent the best way to present my statement on how I feel about the, particularly the, exclusionary rule as foisted on State courts by Mapp v. Ohio.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very good.

Would you now give us a little of the background of the case, unless your opinion gives that.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Well, sir, it does, and I feel that that would be the most succinct way to proceed.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. The facts in the case show, a defendant, a white man——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Before you do that—how long did you practice law before you became a judge?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. 14 years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You were assistant U.S. attorney, I understand, too, for a period of time?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir; I was assistant U.S. attorney. I was appointed by Judge J. Skelly Wright, who was at that time the U.S. attorney in New Orleans. I was also an assistant district attorney in Orleans Parish. So most of my experience has been in criminal law.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I see. All right, you may proceed.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. All right, sir.

The facts in this case, briefly, show, that the defendant, Roger Jordan Phillips, a white man, was arrested by officers of the New Orleans Police Department, on South Rampart Street, a predominantly colored neighborhood, at a late hour at night; that he told the officers he was a stranger in town, being from out of the State; that he was looking for a place to purchase cigarettes and that he had just passed a bar where the lights were burning and which establishment was open for business; that he was not employed and gave the officers at first an incorrect address; that he did not know the name of the hotel where he was staying and that he was with a companion and that they had guns or a gun at the hotel room. The police further testified that this subject generally fit a description of a subject wanted for armed robbery and that he was shabbily dressed and in need of a shave. On the totality of these circumstances the officers properly arrested him for vagrancy, and incidental to this lawful arrest conducted a search of his person which search yielded contraband barbiturates.

(Judge Schulingkamp reads from opinion:)

The officers then conveyed the defendant to the First District Police Station and booked him. Some thirty minutes or so later, without first having obtained a search warrant, they conveyed him to the Oubre Hotel and searched his room and therein they found an appreciable quantity of marijuana.

Despite this Court's strong private opinions as to what the law should be under facts presented by this motion, it cannot subscribe to the State's view that the search of the defendant's room was "incidental" to the arrest and therefore legal. This Court holds that the search was unreasonable in the "legal" sense according to standards set forth by the United States Supreme Court.

It is academically painful to render a decision such as the one handed down this date. There is something repugnant to the sense of justice and logically incongruous in ruling in favor of a defendant when the facts reveal unquestionably he was in possession of a sizable quantity of marijuana and even further, when the defendant himself took the witness stand and judicially admitted such illegal possession. This Court is aware of the line of jurisprudence which holds that a search bad ab initio is not made valid by what it uncovers. However, one need not expend much effort to visualize the adverse effect which a ruling such as this has on the morale of law enforcement officers, assiduously engaged on a daily basis (and often at considerable personal danger) in apprehending and bringing to justice those who repeatedly display their utter disregard for law and order. These officers, realistically speaking, are not attorneys and therefore do not appreciate the niceties of the law and the reasoning of Courts higher than this one, which holds that suppressing the evidence is perhaps the only practical legal sanction to be applied against the police to coerce them to seek and obtain a search warrant. What they [these officers] do understand, only too plainly, is that in this and many other cases, the Courts have hampered their techniques, thrown out their cases and rendered nugatory their work product. Some Courts have even chastised them and criticized police officers. Some officers are bewildered as to what they can or cannot legally do. That they are frustrated and rendered less efficient in their tasks is recognized and has been expressed by many others.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Particularly by Mr. Frederic Sondern in an article "Take the Handcuffs Off Our Police" in the Reader's Digest September 1964 at page 64.

For example:

The Combined Council of Law Enforcement Officials of the State of New York has stated: "The time has come to restore to the police their proper authority to effectively carry out their sworn duties. In these times of mounting danger from the criminal element, it is the height of foolishness to handcuff law enforcement at the expense of the public safety."

Senator McCLELLAN. I assume you subscribe to that?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Wholeheartedly, Senator. [Reading:]

Indeed, it taxes the imagination to conceive of a contemporaneous conscientious police officer, facing the menacing muzzle of a gun, being much impressed by William Pitt's dramatic and almost poetic declaration [in the House of Parliament when he said]: "The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the Crown. It may be frail; the roof may shake; the winds may blow through it; the storm may enter; the rain may enter—but the King of England cannot enter, all his force dares not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement."

So much for William Pitt.

Then I say:

There is an inviting ring of the psychology of the underdog in this quotation. It is consonant with the philosophy of the Founding Fathers whereby the sovereign's power is curtailed—the same philosophy which is reflected by and embodied within the Fourth Amendment. Broadly and basically, it is good and is sanctioned and embraced by the common man, including the policeman.

Indeed the power of the sovereign should be curbed when such results in the public good; but equally, the power of the sovereign should by no means be curtailed when it results in the defeat of the prime purpose of all Government: the protection of the citizens under the rule of law. It represents a hollow mockery—a mockery of government, to stifle the accepted objectives of law enforcement in the pursuit of an ideal. In a democracy, government must be functional and practical, flexible and not static in furtherance of the utilitarian approach of the Founding Fathers: the greatest good for the greatest number.

We know that historically the setting was vastly different several hundred years ago; that kings and despots ruled the unlearned masses by "divine mandate", that freedom and liberty as we know it today was never experienced by the herd; that while the same human freedom and individual liberty are just as precious today, the development of representative democracy, with its system of checks and balances, in addition to mass communications and education as well as technological advance, offer today undreamed of protection against tyranny in a setting of changing times. . . .

The police officer knows ironically that these same advances have provided the criminal with a formidable wherewithal to further his nefarious aims. [Continuing to read:]

Realistically speaking, our modern policeman faces a world much different than that confronting the ancient agents of the Crown.

He—

senses the vast chasm existing between the ideal and the real. It is axiomatic that all government is a compromise between individual freedom and liberty and the curtailment of that liberty for the common good. A classic example of this is the statement of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes that "Freedom of Speech guaranteed in the First Amendment does not permit one to shout 'fire' in a crowded theatre."

Footnote #1. Article 1, Sec. 1—La. Constitution (Bill of Rights) "All government, of right, originates with the people, is founded on their will alone, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole. Its only legitimate end is to secure justice to all, preserve peace and promote the interest and happiness of the people."

Senator, in this statement "preserve peace" this is in line with your statement before to which I listened attentively, that the function of government must take cognizance of the rights of the vast majority of good people, the law-abiding citizens, the children and innocents, and it seems to me that recent decisions of the Supreme Court lost sight of the balance of interest in the community.

Senator McClellan. As I understand you, on the basis of Supreme Court decisions, you had to suppress this proceeding, did you not?

Judge Schulingkamp. Most reluctantly.

Senator McClellan. What did you do, sustain the motion to suppress the charge?

Judge Schulingkamp. That is correct.

Senator McClellan. You did that out of a sense of compulsion by reason of the Supreme Court decision?

Judge Schulingkamp. When I took my oath of office I swore to uphold the constitution and laws of this country.

Senator McClellan. Do you think justice was administered by the action you were required to take?

Judge Schulingkamp. No, sir, that is what troubled me in body and soul, and I say body literally because it almost made me physically sick to my stomach because there was within me a storm, a tempest, between what I knew to be right and what I had to do under my obligation and oath of office.

Senator McClellan. If I understood you correctly you said the defendant admitted his guilt.

Judge Schulingkamp. That is correct, sir.

Senator McClellan. He admitted that he possessed the contraband drug, marijuana?

Judge Schulingkamp. That is correct.

Senator McClellan. He admitted that under oath?

Judge Schulingkamp. Under oath.

Senator McClellan. And yet under the Supreme Court decision you were compelled, you felt constrained, to suppress the charges against him?

Judge Schulingkamp. That is correct, sir.

Senator McClellan. Is that justice?

Judge Schulingkamp. Senator, that is not justice.

Senator McClellan. I referred in my opening statement to unequal justice. How does that justice compare as between the rights of that individual and the protection that Government is obligated to give to its citizens?

Judge Schulingkamp. Well, there is such a disparity between that that it makes one wonder where it will end, and it completely overlooks the rights of the people, the good people, the law-abiding people, the children and the innocents, those people who depend upon the protection of the Government.

Senator McClellan. Very well.

We have before us a bill, an administration bill, entitled "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." It does not in any way deal with a case such as that you have disscussed here this morning. There is nothing in this bill that would undertake to remedy or to offset these Court decisions that compelled you to release this self-confessed guilty person back on society to pursue his nefarious aims, as you pointed out a moment ago. I am wondering if we are going to actually improve the processes of justice and eliminate these, what I term, abuses of justice or the administration of unequal justice, as I referred to them a few moments ago, by simply passing a law that will permit the training of policemen, the buying of equipment, doing research and trying to improve public relations. Those are some of the things the administration's bill would do—appropriate money for those purposes, make grants-in-aid to local jurisdictions, for those purposes. I wonder if it goes far enough, if it in any way reached this crucial problem in law enforcement today where the guilty, the known guilty, go free. Have you studied the bill?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I have perused it. I have not studied it in detail. But in answer to your question, I would say regrettably that while it may help some I don't think it is a direct approach to the heart of the problem. I think the swift and sure punishment of a defendant, and this realization on the part of the defendants generally, goes at the core of the matter.

Senator, I see defendants walk out of my courtroom such as this young man who incidentally——

Senator MCCLELLAN. I might ask you, this is not the only instance, is it?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Oh, no, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have emphasized this case. At this point I wish you would tell us how frequently comparable situations occur where you are compelled to free admitted criminals back on society without conviction and punishment?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Well, New Orleans is a city of some 650,000 or 700,000 souls. There are eight criminal judges and in answer to your question directly, I would say that motions to suppress are sustained almost on a daily basis. There are eight judges, and I feel that I speak for my brothers on the criminal court when I say that almost on a daily basis comparable cases occur, and there were cases which went before the rendition of this judgment in Roger Jordan Phillips where I said nothing, resting on my judicial dignity as the canons of ethics demand, but, Senator, I had just reached the bubbling over point with this case, and I felt obliged and obligated to put down in writing over my signature and in a public record in a case in the criminal district court my thoughts which were rather strong in being repulsed by having under my oath to do what was repugnant to my innate sense of justice.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The repetition of having to do that on the basis of observing the procedures and edicts established by the Supreme Court became so revolting to you, as I take it, you finally had to express your own views?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir.

With your permission, I would like to read just two more paragraphs of this opinion. I appreciate that the time of the committee is limited. I don't want to monopolize it, and that is the reason I am speaking rather rapidly:

> The ideal would have absolutely no government intervention in the privacy or the lives of its citizens' unrestrained liberty. The practical, however, demands a very considerable sacrifice of individual freedom, for without regulation there would be no government. It is the essence of government that there be individual relinquishment of freedom for the good of all. This principle is operative every time a motorist stops for a signal light. This principle is operative every time a good, decent, young American bleeds and dies in the rice paddies of Vietnam. This does not happen to the convicted criminal enjoying the protection of his Government because his Government generally will not accept him in the military if he has a felony conviction.

Now, the next sentence, Senator, is the core of my thoughts on the subject:

It strikes this court, as being basically fair that if the protection of all demands the very lives of its law-abiding citizens in the bloom of youth, it is not an unwarranted exaction that the protection of all demand that the criminal relinquish a bit of his privacy during a search, especially when that search produces unmistakable proof of guilt.

One of the arguments of the adherents of the exclusionary rule goes like this: That if the police are not restrained by the demand that they get search warrants, that we will soon have in this country what was comparable to the infamous Gestapo of the Third Reich in Germany. My answer to that is that that is simple hogwash. That this did not occur prior, particularly in Louisiana, where I am qualified to speak, prior to the case of Mapp v. Ohio enunciated by the Supreme Court in 1961.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, we have had essentially long experience and it never occurred?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Absolutely.

Senator McCLELLAN. And if it didn't occur during that period of time why would it occur now?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. That is correct. And furthermore that argument completely overlooks the inherent integrity and worth of the vast majority of police officers on police forces throughout this country.

Senator McCLELLAN. Don't you think in effect it is an indictment of the whole police establishment in this country?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. It certainly is inferentially if not directly.

Senator McCLELLAN. It reflects upon the integrity of the police system and the personnel of it in our Nation today, does it not?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. I can't see it any other way. We see the Supreme Court strain every point, use every philosophy and every imagination to the extreme of turning a confessed criminal loose on society; and then some policeman is made to appear the culprit because he had not been adequately trained and educated in the law to be able to guess—and no one could possibly foresee—what the Supreme Court was going to do in its next opinion. The reflection is cast on the entire law enforcement system as having Gestapo characteristics. I certainly cannot agree with such a comparison. I think we owe a great deal of gratitude to our policemen in our country because certainly conditions today make their job more dangerous and hazardous than ever before. These dedicated men should have our trust, confidence, and support in performing their duties, often without proper equipment and facilities, and nearly always without adequate compensation.

Like you, sir, I feel a kind of revulsion about the trends of our time with respect to law enforcement in our country. I can't refrain from occasionally expressing this revulsion.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I can tell you, too, that there are many citizens, substantial people in the community, who are equally repulsed and who have been articulate in expressing themselves. I think that for a time now there has been an undercurrent, but the situation has gotten so grave and acute that many citizens have taken the opportunity of expressing themselves. I have with me in my file here letters from substantial citizens, businessmen in the city of New Orleans who are overjoyed at the stand that I took. I am not saying that as any personal reflection on me, but there was a newspaper account in the New Orleans Times-Picayune when I made a public speech at the Young Men's Business Club and the response which I got in forms of letters was absolutely significant in my mind, indicating that there is now a great feeling among the good people of this country that the situation has gone far enough, and I refer specifically to the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court.

These people, the general laymen, are not legal technicians, as the police officers are not legal technicians. Many of the police officers are men with limited educations, but even despite that New Orleans and other cities, and I understand Washington, D.C., have had experience in the difficulty in obtaining police officers to serve on the force, because of the harassment which they have endured as a result of the new changing times in criminal law.

Senator McClellan. As I recall, the District of Columbia now is 11 percent understaffed, with a shortage of 300 policemen, that is in round numbers. My understanding too is that they are trying to recruit policemen from other sections of the country. What is the incentive to a man today to be a policeman?

Judge Schulingkamp. Senator, I was about to come to that point. It is my observation in the city of New Orleans within my jurisdiction that there is a great deprivation of incentive on the part of the policemen by what has ensued as a result of decisions such as Mapp v. Ohio.

I have had police officers in the New Orleans Police Department come to my home making application for a search warrant during extra business hours, late at night, for example, and they have told me in essence that they resent their work product being rendered useless, cases thrown out of court, by the courts, when they have done their utmost to seek and apprehend criminals and to bring them to prosecution, and these men are not, as I said, legal technicians, and they don't quite understand the revolution which is going on about them, and despite these setbacks and despite the fact they have been given slaps in the face, so to speak, by courts, they have nonetheless pursued their duties, but there are beginning to appear defections among the ranks of the police officers. They say, in essence, "Why should I stick my neck out? I have a wife and three children. Why should I be exposed to the criminal when I meet him in court and the judge throws out his case."

Senator McClellan. That is what I say. If he does accept the position, or if he has been in the service a long time, he will be repeatedly confronted with a complete nullification of his efforts, efforts that he makes at a personal risk to his life. What incentive is there to him to perform his duty? I mean courageously and effectively and aggressively, what incentive develops? He may wear the uniform. The fact that there is a policeman standing on the corner doesn't necessarily give assurance of security or safety unless that policeman is willing and has some incentive to perform his duty. If he reaches the point where he feels "Well, I have on a uniform and I am getting my salary, but I am going to take just as little risk as I have to," that is not good law enforcement in my judgment and it will never achieve effective law enforcement. It is a deterioration of law enforcement.

I believe from letters I have received and from people I talk to, that we are moving very much in that direction. That is the way it seems to me and I think something must be done.

Have you given any consideration to this confessions bill, S. 674, regarding the Miranda decision, the bill that would permit voluntary confessions to be submitted to the trial court and a jury?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir, I have read the bill, and I would like to see that bill or a similar bill passed.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have another bill here by Senator Ervin, a member of this committee, to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in those cases. I think that is a rather drastic remedy. We also have, by Senator Ervin, and I am cosponsor of the bill and resolution, a concurrent resolution that would submit a constitutional amendment in this same area. Of course, the constitutional amendment process is long, tedious and uncertain; and the other, the limiting of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, is a rather harsh remedy.

I had hoped, and I still hope, that we can work out in this committee a bill that will be held constitutional by the Supreme Court. Some member of the Court may have to change his mind a bit, and upon reflection there is plenty of room for a change of mind, in my judgment.

The Court has not hesitated to overrule decisions, 5, 10 or even 100 years old. I don't see why they could not overrule one that is 2 or 3 years old. I hope they do. Otherwise this country is moving toward chaos because of the trend we are experiencing with respect to law enforcement. I am not sure, but I am hopeful, that we can come out of committee with a bill that will permit the reasonable questioning and detention of suspects; that will permit the trial judge to determine any question of voluntariness of a confession, taking into consideration all of the circumstances surrounding the confession, and, if voluntarily given, submitting it to the jury for such weight as they deem it requires. I firmly believe the trial judge, and the trial jury, observing a witness, hearing his voice in response to questioning, can determine more correctly whether or not a confession is voluntary than can nine men on the Supreme Court who never see, hear, or observe the demeanor of a witness. Until we return to the procedure that was followed for a century, to permit the trial judge to hear and weigh and submit to the jury the question of voluntariness, we will continue to hamper our law enforcement officials and there will continue to be unequal justice favoring the criminal.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I couldn't agree more, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I just hope that more judges, more trial judges, will follow your lead, your example, and speak out in dissent. We hear a lot today about the right to dissent. It is time for the judges, the trial judges of this country, the law enforcement officers throughout the land and the good citizens everywhere to express their dissent at the trends that are occurring in court decisions today that are aiding the criminal.

When I say the Supreme Court, I am speaking of the five members who have so held. I certainly commend the four who have dissented, and if four can dissent in language as strong as some of them have used in these cases, I think there is enough freedom left in this country for trial judges to dissent and write opinions as you have written in this case, for the record. And let the press publicize it, and give encouragement and hope to law enforcement and law-abiding citizens of this country that there will be a change, that we will get back on the track and that there will no longer be a mockery of justice on some pretext of alleged rights that contravene the protection of society.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I will be finished soon, but I would like to say, sir, that in my humble judgment there is another aspect to the exclusionary rule which results in a great deal of harm, and this is less tangible than the mere fact that the defendant walks out of the court. This takes on kind of an intangible aspect and it results in the loss of respect for the judiciary, which, in a free society, is a matter of concern, in my judgment, and I refer to the fact that, as I mentioned before, there is a good knowledge of the fundamentals of criminal law on the part of most of the underworld, and when they walk out of court as a result of having to maintain a motion to suppress the evidence, for example, they walk out not with respect for the law, which has freed them, but they are laughing up their sleeves, in the vernacular, and they walk out with contempt because they have been freed by the processes of the law, and furthermore, the dockets of trail judges, I should imagine, throughout this country, certainly in the city of New Orleans, are clogged and crowded with the increasing crime, and the rulings on motions to suppress involve legal hypertechnicalities, legal hairsplitting, and the loss of certainty, the desired certainty, in the law. Police officers are confused as to what they may do and may not do. They are hampered in their duties, and I might say, Senator, many judges are confused, and in these cases there are factual situations which differ.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized and has said that there is no yardstick. So much of the time and professional ability and energy of judges throughout this country is taken up with motions to suppress and matters, litigated matters, with reference to legal problems created by such decisions as Mapp v. Ohio, when the good Lord knows there is enough business to occupy them otherwise. This is the intangible aspect of the thing.

Now, in closing, I should like to say I do appreciate the opportunity of having come here and your attention in listening to me and I trust I have not taken too much time.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You have not. I want you to take just a little more time. Let me ask you another question. In your long experience with criminal prosecution, do you feel that the use of voluntary confessions as evidence of guilt are a useful and an essential tool in law enforcement?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Most assuredly, Senator, because if for no other reason that in some crimes there is little evidence other than a voluntary confession. And this certainly is, in my judgment, a legiti-mate evidentiary aspect of the case, provided, of course, that it is voluntary.

Now, the proponents of the exclusionary rule argue there is much police abuse and brutality and so on, and I feel that this has been much exaggerated. Of course, there are some rotten apples in any barrel. For example, in the case of Mapp v. Ohio, the search extended to the bosom of the female defendant, and any decent man would know on the surface that this is wrong. But this does not mean that the vast majority of police officers do those things.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am sure that there have been third-degree methods used, not once, but many times.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. It sure has.

Senator McCLELLAN. In the history of our country, not just in one city, but in a number of cities. But the fact that such methods may have been used, and justice has miscarried, not only in trial courts but I think also in the Supreme Court at some time, doesn't mean we ought to abolish the Supreme Court. We ought not to abolish a trial court just because they make an error. Sometimes an error is made there in turning a guilty person loose, and there is no further remedy on the part of the State or the public for protection, is there?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. No, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Sometimes a jury may make a mistake or a trial court make a mistake and acquit one who is charged with a crime and who is guilty. So we have mistakes; but, as pointed out a while ago, we cannot reach perfection.

Two juries may hear the same evidence; one might acquit, and the other might convict on the same evidence. You may have a hung jury or even a third jury. The jury system is not perfect, but it is the best so far as we know and I would like to keep it. I hate to see it eroded to where it is no longer effective and where the hope or prospect of justice is obstructed or made more difficult by technicalities that are invoked contrary to that which is reasonable and which attempt to refute the realities of the circumstances that prevailed at the time of the crime.

I appreciate very much your appearance, and I am hopeful the Congress can remedy these conditions by legislation. I feel we must try. If ultimately the Supreme Court throws out all we do and says it is unconstitutional, and conditions grow worse and we finally reach a state of chaos in this country, much of the onus then would be on the Supreme Court, if we have done our best.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Senator, you mentioned before that the Congress was making some effort through legislation and also contemplating a constitutional revision. Now, I am not a constitutional lawyer——

Senator McCLELLAN. I said we have one proposal here for a constitutional amendment; we have four proposals dealing with this confessions issue.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. One is a constitutional amendment which I said would be a long and tedious process. Another is the bill I referred to by Senator Ervin to restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in this area, and the third is a bill which I have introduced to restore somewhat the procedure that has applied heretofore, and a bill on this subject by Senator Ribicoff. The other alternative is to do nothing, and, of course, I don't feel we should do nothing. We must do something.

I think you agree with that. The fact that we are confronted with the possibility that the Supreme Court would hold any of these actions unconstitutional, particularly the confessions bill which I introduced, are equations to which we can't know the answer, but I think it is imperative that the Congress, considering the conditions that prevail in this country, undertake by legislation to do something about the rising crime rate.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. I hope that is soon, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I might ask, do you exclude voluntary confessions such as have been prohibited by the Miranda decision?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, sir; I have had cases involving that point, yes; confessions which would otherwise be held admissible and voluntary.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me ask you, do you feel that a trial judge hearing the defendant in chambers and hearing everything that he presents is competent to determine generally whether a confession is voluntary?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Within human limitations, I would say, yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, we have still got human limitations when we get to the Supreme Court, haven't we?

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Yes, that is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Of course, again we are not perfect, but I think the trial judge can come nearer to determining whether a confession is voluntary than can the Supreme Court that never sees or hears the witness, and I would hope we can restore the admissibility of voluntary confessions as evidence in criminal cases.

I thank you very much. I do appreciate your coming in.

Judge SCHULINGKAMP. Thank you.

(The following letter with enclosures was subsequently received for inclusion in the record:)

CRIMINAL DISTRICT COURT,
PARISH OF ORLEANS, SECTION F,
New Orleans, La., July 18, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Enclosed please find photo-copies of several letters addressed to me relative to the subject matter about which I testified.

May I respectfully request that they be made a part of the record because they are representative of the great groundswell of public opinion among responsible Americans which is building against the philosophy of over-emphasis of individual rights made manifest in certain Supreme Court decisions.

I am enclosing a photo-copy of a judicial opinion of the Supreme Court of the State of Florida which I think contains remarkable language concerning the United States Supreme Court. I intended to make mention of this in my testimony but did not wish to over stay my welcome.

I would appreciate if your office would send me several copies of the testimony taken on July 10th.

In closing, let me thank you and Mr. Paisley for the courtesy extended to me. I and countless others wish you the utmost success in your noble endeavor.

Sincerely,

OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP,
Criminal District Judge.

This court is aware of just how far the United States Supreme Court has gone to throw the cloak of protection around one accused of committing a crime, but we do not think that even such court has or will attempt to fix the required time limit necessary for a competent attorney to ascertain from an accused whether he is guilty of the charge or not. It can be readily seen that if the accused contends his innocence that it will take the attorney longer to prepare his defense, but, if the accused readily admits the facts as charged to be true, certainly it does not require any specific time for a lawyer to advise such accused of his rights and to make recommendations as to his plea.

[1–3] In the instant case, the trial court found that the defendant was represented by competent counsel, who as an officer of the court is presumed to fulfill his ethical obligation as such, and therefore, the defendant's contention that he was not represented by counsel is a mere conclusion of the pleader and not only is not supported by any factual allegations, but the record discloses the same to be an untrue statement of fact and therefore without merit. Dancy v. State, Fla.App., 175 So.2d 208.

The order appealed is affirmed.

HON. OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP,
Judge, Criminal District Court, Section F
New Orleans, La.

DEAR JUDGE SCHULINGKAMP: I deeply appreciate your letter of September 26th, enclosing a copy of your judgment on motion to suppress in the case of State of Louisiana vs. Roger Jordan Phillips. Your protest and devastating critical analysis of the decisions which you were compelled to follow in freeing this obviously guilty man, just appear unanswerable to me.

I am assuming I have your permission to quote in whole or in part your decision whenever and wherever I think it might be effective in alerting the bar and the public and particularly my colleagues in the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association, on the absurd existence to which the pendulum of justice has been swung so out of balance favoring the accused to the sacrifice of the rights of the public.

Very sincerely yours,

BEN R. MILLER.

Judge OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP,
Section F, Criminal District Court,
New Orleans, La.

DEAR JUDGE SCHULINGKAMP: I read with great interest your note of even date, which expresses to me precisely what our position is in the United States today with respect to some of the decisions rendered within the last decade and a half by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I question without hestitation the wisdom of these men who rule as you so vividly point out, that the rights of the criminal minority must be protected at the expense of the law-abiding majority. The legal mesh in which you find your feet ensnared is to a large extent the result of decisions of this type which continue to plague our courts and our law enforcement personnel.

I am taking the liberty of forwarding your letter under separate head to several people who I feel sure will be interested in knowing that some members of the bench apparently share what I consider to be a very popular opinion.

Thanking you for your courteous attention to my complaint, and with kindest personal regards, I remain

Very truly yours,

SCHAFF, CURRIER & MOULEDOUX,
New Orleans, La., July 6, 1967.

Hon. OLIVER P. SCHULINGKAMP,
Judge, Criminal District Court,
New Orleans, La.

DEAR OLIVER: I read with sincere interest where you have been invited to testify before a Senate Investigating Committee. The invitation extended to you by Senator McClellan was also of great interest and we wish you a very successful meeting with the sub-committee.

I am sure you are aware that your sentiments are the same as those of a great number of Americans and not only of Louisianans. We will hope and pray that your testimony and judicial opinion will fall upon receptive ears and that your contribution to the sub-committee will reflect a change in laws to come so that our citizens who wish to live in safety and be good citizens will be given the protection and guides so that they may rely upon the police and the courts of law for their security.

We hope that in the future you will continue to exhibit a judicious understanding of those decisions by the Supreme Court which we all feel are made against the majority of the people. We hope, too, that you will constructively criticize the Supreme Court when criticism is expected in a professional manner from an experienced jurist.

With best wishes, I remain,
Coordially yours,

VAL A. SCHAFF III.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH D. TYDINGS, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Tydings, will you come forward, please, sir, and take a seat.

Good morning, Senator Tydings.

Senator TYDINGS. Good morning, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate very much your giving me the opportunity to testify this morning regarding Senate bill 824 The Local Law Officers Education and Equipment Act.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senate 824?

Senator TYDINGS. That's the bill that I introduced, Senator McClellan, on behalf of myself and Senators Brewster, Burdick, Fong, Inouye, Jackson, Kennedy of New York, Long of Missouri, Magnuson, McGee, Metcalf, Mondale, Montoya, Moss, Pell, Randolph Smathers, and Yarborough. It deals with an important but little discussed aspect of the law enforcement problem; that is, the provision of adequate education and educational opportunities for members of our State and local police forces across the United States.

Our policemen hold the most dangerous, delicate, and difficult jobs in America. A partial list of a policeman's skills must include marksmanship, solving family disputes, ambulance driving, guarding dignitaries, directing traffic, giving first aid, catching lawbreakers, testifying in court, controlling crowds, suppressing riots, finding pets, destroying dangerous animals, teaching safety, giving directions, locating stolen goods, subduing the insane, advising delinquents, and interrogating suspects. No task seems too difficult, too dangerous, or too discomforting to ask a policeman to do it.

Yet the average policeman, whom we expect to have the wisdom of Solomon, the patience of Job, as well as the strength of Samson, has at best a high school education.

In a nation which prides itself on having the world's best and most universally accessible school system, in which nearly 25 percent of its people finish college, we make the job of protecting society so unattractive that college graduates will not enter into it, and we pay so little for police work that those engaged in it can ill afford to pay their own way for further education. We must provide means for members of our police forces to further their education while members of the force, and incentives for college graduates to enter law enforcement work.

As Quinn Tamm, the distinguished president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, has said:

> It is nonsense to state or to assume that the enforcement of the law is so simple that it can be done best by those unencumbered by a study of the liberal arts. The man who goes into our streets in hope of regulating, directing or controlling human behavior must be armed with more than a gun and the ability to perform mechanical movements in response to a situation. Such men as these engage in the difficult, complex, and important business of human behavior. Their intellectual armament—so long restricted to the minimum—must be no less than their physical prowess and protection.

The fact is that the general level of educational attainment among our police forces is too low. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice reports that less than 10 percent of all police in this country have a college degree; less than one-third have taken any college course at all; and, in many departments, particulary in New England and Southern States, a majority of the officers have not even completed high school.

It is no reflection on a man that he has been financially unable to continue his education. It is a reflection on our society that we have not provided for our police the means which would be available to them in many jobs in private industry to continue their education.

To a large extent, the failure to provide financial incentives to police for continued education is traceable to the shortage of tax dollars at the local level which has also deprived police of adequate equipment and decent pay scales.

I do not condone the failure of any community to raise the revenues necessary to pay our policemen what they deserve. As I have frequently said, police pay scales in most communities are scandalously low. But while I believe the prevailing shamefully low police pay levels are one of the greatest handicaps we suffer in dealing with crime, I do not propose that the Federal Government subsidize local police salaries. To the extent the Federal Government paid part of a policeman's pay, he would be, to that extent, no longer an employee of his local police force. We should take no step which could lead to a national police force.

But I do propose that the Federal Government go to the aid of State and local law enforcement forces by helping them procure modern police equipment and by providing them with educational opportunities, so that the quality of local law enforcement can be improved, even as additional local revenues are freed to increase police pay.

This is why I introduced the Local Law Officers Education and Equipment Act—to provide our local police forces with the technology and education they need to combat crime in a modern society.

That bill provides four programs of Federal assistance for law officer education.

First, to provide cross-fertilization between police departments of the best law enforcement techniques, the bill provides for Federal assistance to State and local law enforcement agencies, to permit their officers, especially those engaged in supervisory, planning, or instructional positions, to visit other law enforcement agencies, both here and abroad, to study their techniques.

Second, the bill provides Federal assistance to State and local law enforcement agencies to permit their officers to pursue courses in police or correctional work or such other courses and subjects leading to degrees as they may choose. The bill contemplates provision of tuition and fees up to $300 a semester for this education.

Third, the bill provides full tuition and fee fellowships for law enforcement officers whose agencies wish to send them to an educational institution for specialized training directly related to their law enforcement work.

Fourth, to provide an additional source of qualified personnel for police work, the bill provides that college students who have received education loans under the National Defense Education Act be allowed to "work off" 50 percent of such loans by employment in a law enforcement agency for at least 2 years after graduation. This same loan forgiveness is already available under Federal law for college students who become teachers.

Senator McCLELLAN. May I interrupt to make one point?

Senator TYDINGS. Certainly.

Senator McCLELLAN. The theory, I think, is good.

In fact, I like, generally, the provisions of your bill, but I do have this one question. Do we not want our policemen to become more or less professional, rather than somebody on a job for 2 years only?

Senator TYDINGS. Absolutely, Mr. Chairman. It is my thought that we should try to encourage more education among career policemen.

Senator McCLELLAN. You think some of the graduates would stay with law enforcement as a career?

Senator TYDINGS. That is right. Of course, some of the college graduates would probably, as you indicated, leave, but hopefully most of them would stay.

Senator McCLELLAN. It's like West Point, they stay 4 years and then they are free to go if they do not want a military career.

Senator TYDINGS. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is the only question that occurred to me. A graduate might say, "Well, I will belong to the police force for 2 years, but I am not going to stay there, I will get by and do the best I can for 2 years and then go on." No one knows. Is there some way——

Senator TYDINGS. I would like——

Senator McCLELLAN. We want them to become policemen.

Senator TYDINGS. Well, the task force report on police which was recently published by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice endorses this tuition-forgiveness idea. They think it——

Senator McCLELLAN. The theory of it is good. I would not be very strong for it unless they propose to stay in the service. I would not want this program used merely as a way of getting an education and training, but I would like it tied definitely to law enforcement careers.

Senator TYDINGS. Well, it could be 3 or 4 years rather than 2.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I do not know. This is something that raises a question in my mind. I think the idea is a very good one.

Senator TYDINGS. And then, too, I think you would have to see how it would work.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Senator TYDINGS. These tuition aid and NDEA loan forgiveness programs in S. 824 have also been endorsed in the task force report on the police recently published by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice. I take the recommendations of the task force report as further evidence of the urgent need to provide the necessary Federal assistance to upgrade the educational level of our police forces.

I am not an advocate of proliferating Federal grant programs. In fact, I am the author of one of the State-Federal tax-sharing programs before the Congress. But the problems of law enforcement and law officer education cannot wait for enactment of an effective tax-sharing plan. The need for action is urgent.

S. 824 also contains three other titles which I commend to the committee's attention. The first title suggests the creation of a National Commission on Law Enforcement Assistance, composed primarily of members from private life, to administer Federal law enforcement assistance to the States. The purpose of the Commission would be to insulate federally aided local law enforcement agencies from Federal interference.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you take that administration out from under the Attorney General as proposed by the administration bill?

Senator TYDINGS. That is what I had in mind, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. May I make this comment, with your permission. This provision gives me concern about the administration's bill. There is so much power to be reposed in the Attorney General and so few guidelines. It seemed that the money is pretty well turned over to him and he can approve any plan he wants to or not approve anything so long as it has one of these objectives.

Senator TYDINGS. Well, that was my reservation with the administration proposal also.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I appreciate your thoughts here about it. I think you have some very good ideas in your bill.

Senator TYDINGS. The second title, Mr. Chairman, provides a system of grants-in-aid comparable to that which the President subsequently recommended when he sent over his Safe Streets bill. So, I will not go into that because it is basically the same idea, special radio systems and things like that to aid local law enforcement departments.

The third title would create a Division of Law Enforcement Research and Development in the Department of Justice to survey the Federal Government's $15 billion a year research and development efforts, as well as those of private industry, to collect and disseminate information about innovations in the law enforcement. In connection with the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, which passed the Congress in the 89th session, some of us queried whether there should be a special Assistant Attorney General specifically charged with the responsibility of trying to collect data on these new techniques, these new scientific advances, and relay them to local law enforcement officers. I do not think we have done enough in this area. I have specifically in mind the NIH with the tremendous amounts spent there, the tremendous funds spent on NASA and other Government research and development. It seems to me that some of the benefits of these great research and development programs might be used in the field of law enforcement. For instance, might we not develop some type of a weapon for a police officer as that, say in a burglary situation or an assault where he is fearful of his own safety, he would not have to kill a man, but could shoot some sort of a drug or something like that to knock an individual out.

There has been great progress in different types of riot control, using techniques which might save hundreds of lives and many, many thousands of dollars worth of property if these scientific developments and these techniques could be made available. We should have someone specifically charged with seeing that the byproduct of the different research and development programs we already have underway and already on the books, are disseminated where they might be used in law enforcement.

We all know, Mr. Chairman, that no single program can, in itself, stem the rising tide of crime in this country. In fact, much of the crime problem cannot be reached solely through criminal law.

But near the top of the list of Federal assistance to law enforcement should be the provision of adequate educational opportunities for our law officers. The President's Crime Commission has concluded that "the quality of police service will not significantly improve until higher educational requirements are established for its personnel." You cannot establish such requirements unless you provide apportunities to meet the requirements.

For 20 years the Congress has provided educational assistance through the GI bills to the soldiers who risk their lives to protect our society from foreign enemies. I urge you, Mr. Chairman, and your committee, to consider extending this same principle to the police, who daily risk their lives to protect us all from crime in our own country.

Senator McClellan. Senator, I have here some questions. I am not going to take time to ask these, but I would like for you to comment on some of them. May I submit them to you and let you submit your answers that deal with the two bills, yours and the administration bill, primarily. I think your comments would be helpful to us, and I would appreciate it if you would give us your answers.

(Subsequently the following memorandum was received:)

August 3, 1967.

Memorandum for Senator John L. McClellan, Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

From: Senator Joseph D. Tydings.

When I appeared before the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures on July 14, to testify in favor of S. 824, the Local Law Officers Education and Equipment Act, cosponsored by myself and seventeen other Senators, you asked me to respond in writing to a number of questions regarding that bill and S. 917, the President's "Safe Streets Act." Here are those questions and answers.

QUESTIONS ON S. 824

Question 1: Would you describe the main differences between S. 824 and S. 917?

Answer 1: (a) Education: The principal difference between S. 917 and S. 824 lies in the provision each makes for enhancing the educational levels of our law enforcement officers. Section 201(c) of S. 917 authorizes grants for "manpower, including the recruitment, education and training of all types of law enforcement and criminal justice personnel."

S. 824, on the other hand, concentrates on law officer education and provides four federally assisted programs to encourage it:

(1) Titles IV and V, law enforcement officers travel grants.—These two titles, the first dealing with foreign travel and the second with domestic, would provide 100 percent Federal assistance to pay travel and per diem expenses for state and local law enforcement officers to study the organization, methods, and equipment of other law enforcement agencies, both here and abroad, in order to secure a cross-fertilization within American police departments of the best domestic and foreign law enforcement theory and practice.

Personnel eligible for such assistance would include police and correctional officials, such as parole officers and prison officials.

(2) Title VI, National Defense Education Act loan forgiveness.—The encourage college graduates to enter law enforcement work, this title would provide that 50 percent of the amount of a National Defense Education Act loan made to a college student could be "worked off," if the student spent 2 years after graduation working for a public law enforcement or correctional agency.

(3) Title VII, Educational Opportunity for Law Enforcement Personnel.—To provide the incentive and the means for members of State and local law enforcement and correctional agencies to continue their education while members of such agencies, this title would provide educational assistance modeled on the educational benefits of the GI bill.

For local law enforcement and correctional personnel who wish to pursue a part-time course of studies, not directly related to police work, leading to a degree, the bill would provide the cost of tuition and fees. In return, the assisted person, who must have first been a member of a State or local law enforcement or correctional agency for at least 2 years, would have to agree to remain with that agency for at least 2 years following the last month in which such aid is given.

(4) Title VIII, police study fellowships.—The bill would provide full tuition and fee fellowships for law enforcement officers whose agency sent them to an educational institution for specialized training directly related to their police work.

(b) Administration: S. 917 would be administered by the Attorney General and the "Director of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance," in the Department of Justice.

In contrast, S. 824 would be administered by a National Commission on Law Enforcement Assistance, to secure state and local police forces receiving aid under the bill from interference by or assimilation into the Federal Government as a result of such aid.

The Commission would have nine members, three appointed by the President from among the officers of the Federal Government (one of whom would be the Attorney General, who would also be Chairman of the Commission), and six appointed by the President from private life. Except for the Attorney General, whose membership on the Commission would be permanent, all members would serve staggered 3-year terms. No more than three of the members from private life selected by the President could be of the same political party.

Members of the Commission, except the Government members, would receive only per diem allowance for their activities and will not be Federal employees.

The Commission would be specifically charged not only with the administration of the act, but also with so administering it as not in any way to subvert or decrease the independence of local police departments from the federal government. Within this general restriction, the Commission would have broad discretion in apportioning the assistance for equipment provided by the will, although a prime consideration in such apportionments would be the crime rate in relation to the density of population in the area in question. For example, as between two applications of otherwise equal merit, a preference, would be assigned to the area with the greater crime rate per 1,000 people.

The Commission could draw on the Justice Department and, in cases of foreign travel grants, the State Department, for such staff work as would be necessary to execute its functions.

(c) Research and development: S. 917 would authorize the Attorney General to make federal grants for law enforcement research and development.

S. 824 would not authorize any research and development, but, through title III, would create a Division of Law Enforcement Research and Development within the Department of Justice to survey the $15 billion-a-year Federal research and development efforts, as well as those in private industry, to collect therefrom innovations applicable to law enforcement, and to disseminate information regarding those innovations to the nation's law enforcement agencies at every level of government. The Division would undertake no R. & D. of its own.

The Chiefs of the Law Enforcement Research and Development Division would be appointed by the Attorney General, who would report periodically to the National Commission on Law Enforcement and at least annually to the Congress regarding the Division's activities.

I believe the R. & D. sections of S. 917 and S. 824 to be complimentary, not duplicative or antagonistic. I believe a combination of both basic proposals would be a worthwhile addition to the crime bill reported.

(d) Equipment: Both S. 824 and S. 917 make provision for purchase of law enforcement equipment and facilities. On balance, I believe the provisions of S. 917 regarding equipment to be superior to those of S. 824.

Question 2: In what particular ways does S. 824 improve on the major objectives of S. 917?

Answer 2: S. 824 is far superior to S. 917 in providing extensive Federal assistance for law officer education. Our society can be best served only by the best educated police force. The President's Commission on Crime and Administration of Justice said in its "Task Force Report on the Police" that "the quality of police service will not significantly improve until higher educational requirements are established for its personnel."

Yet S. 917 provides little or no emphasis upon or explicit assistance to law officer education. S. 824, however, provides the four programs noted in answer 1(a) supra. This is the principal difference between S. 917 and S. 824.

The tuition aid and NDEA loan foregiveness programs provided in S. 824 were expressly recommended by the "Task Force Report on the Police." The other program, to allow cross-fertilization of law enforcement techniques, would prove a useful supplement to the programs the Crime Commission recommends.

When the Attorney General sent me a copy of his letter of July 20 to the committee regarding S. 824, I was disappointed to see that he ignored completely these vital provisions of S. 824 which meet the police education needs which S. 917 wholly neglects.

Question 3: Do you think legislation is needed to raise salaries in our police departments as well as to furnish them with more and better equipment?

Answer 3: Though I believe the prevailing shamefully low police pay levels are one of the greatest handicaps we suffer in dealing with crime, I do not think that the Federal Government should subsidize local police salaries. To the extent the Federal Government paid part of a policeman's pay, he would be, to that extent, no longer an employee of his local police force. We should take no step which could lead to a national police force.

But I think that the Federal Government should go to the aid of State and local law enforcement forces by helping them procure modern police equipment and by providing them with educational opportunities. Thus, the quality of local law enforcement can be improved, and local revenues thereby freed to increase police pay.

Question 4: Is it reasonable to spend $150,000 in fiscal year 1968 to send police officers abroad to study and examine foreign police procedures and correctional agencies?

Answer 4: If current budgetary restraints require eliminating funding any provision of S. 824, I would agree that this appropriation should be the one to go. However, in the long run it would be penny wise and pound foolish to fail to provide this relatively slight financial assistance for American police departments to study the best foreign law detection systems and techniques, especially those in Europe and other comparably industrialized nations.

QUESTIONS ON S. 917

Question 1: Is it not desirable to require of each State a law enforcement council to approve plans and applications for a grant under this bill so as to gain greater coordination within the States?

Answer 1: Yes; I believe so, provided such State councils actually serve to increase coordination rather than indulging in politics.

Question 2: In your opinion, is the population requirement of 50,000 minimum to be eligible for a grant under S. 917 too restrictive?

Answer 2: I think it could be in individual cases. In introducing S. 824, I suggested a formula approach for final distribution based on the ratio between population density and crime rate. For example, as between two applications of otherwise equal merit, a preference would be assigned to the area with the greater crime rate per 1,000 people.

I think such a formula approach is superior to any arbitrary population limitations, particularly since many jurisdictions may have fewer than fifty thousand people, yet be part of an intercity or interstate population complex of greater numbers. Likewise, a small city might have a particularly difficult crime problem disproportionate to its population and resources.

Question 3: Should the title of the bill be changed to "Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Act of 1967"?

Answer 3: If a change in the name of the bill is to be made, I believe it should be toward a name which helps serve notice on law violators of our intention to suppress the crime wave. A name like "The Police Assistance Act of 1967" or "The Crime Control Act of 1967" might be considered.

Question 4: Do you think S. 917 should be amended to provide greater Federal assistance to upgrade our policeman's salaries?

Answer 4: Please see answer No. 3 relating to S. 824.

Question 5: Do you think it would be preferable to increase the Department of Justice's budget to cover additional expenses for administering S. 917 rather than having the Department utilize portions of the funds appropriated for grants for administrative purposes?

Answer 5: I believe the program contemplated by this bill should be self-supporting, so that Congress can more accurately judge the cost-benefit ratio of the program.

Question 6: Is it not more desirable to promote all research and demonstration projects for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes within the Department of Justice rather than farm such undertakings out to public and private organizations?

Answer 6: Although I believe these kinds of expenditures should be strictly controlled and coordinated to avoid waste or duplication, I believe we should use whatever research and demonstration resources are available—public and private—in finding new and better ways to deal with crime.

Senator TYDINGS. I will, and thank you very much, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator, while you are here you have not commented on the other bills.

Could you give us your idea about how we should undertake, or if we should undertake to do anything, on the issue of confessions?

Senator TYDINGS. You mean as a result of decisions by the Supreme Court?

Senator MCCLELLAN. The Miranda case, in particular. We have bills pending here and you are a member of the Judiciary Committee. I have not been able to talk to you about these bills. I do not know whether you feel the Congress should do nothing in this area.

Senator TYDINGS. I think this, Mr. Chairman. I have been a U.S. Attorney. Reports on the results of the Miranda case have been conflicting. For instance, the district attorney for the county of Los Angeles has done rather a thorough report. Perhaps you have a copy of that report for your subcommittee. Perhaps you have even had him testify here. I have had an opportunity to speak with him and he has reached the conclusion that the requirements laid down in the Mirandx case can be met by the law-enforcement officials in Los Angeles and have been met since the implementation of that decision without serious breakdowns in the police effort.

On the other hand, there have been very prominent law-enforcement officials and district attorneys from other jurisdictions who have made public statements and who have made speeches, some of which I have read, which are to the contrary. The Federal Bureau of Investigation for many years has required its agents to operate not entirely within the restrictions of the Miranda case, but close to them. That is, the agent, at least while I was U.S. Attorney and long before I came in, was always required at the time he arrested an individual to advise him that he was under arrest, that he was going to be charged, that anything he said would be used against him, and that he did not have to make a statement.

Now, at least in our district, they did not advise him that he had the right to see a lawyer at once and that if they were too poor to afford a lawyer they had a right to have one appointed. Those were the two new standards erected in the Miranda case, at least as I recall the decision.

I have heard a judge speak in the fourth circuit rather critically of the guidelines of the Miranda case and I have heard other judges speak on the other side.

I think the most helpful thing that this committee could do, Mr. Chairman, would be to try to shed a little light on this controversy and to try to get facts and a little information. For instance, I would like to hear what the district attorney of Los Angeles would say when you addressed that question to him; what the district attorney of Brooklyn or Queens County, or of Cook County, Ill., would say. I would like to have more facts.

Senator McClellan. My recollection is——

Senator Tydings (continuing). Rather than just, you know, statements and judgments which are not based on facts.

Senator McClellan. We have had reports from four or five of these district attorneys to whom you referred here, some of them actually testified, testified to the adverse affects of it.

The only exception, I believe, was the district attorney from Los Angeles, Mr. Younger. I understand the Younger survey was made just 2 or 3 weeks after the Miranda decision. I do not suppose that would be very impressive. But, anyhow, I think it is a grave situation.

Senator Tydings. The principal problem which concerns me is the fact that if a man is guilty of a crime, and has not been subject to coercion, but the arrest or the conviction can be thrown out because of a nonprejudicial policeman's error along the line. This does not seem to be consonant with our efforts to protect society.

Senator McClellan. It does not seem to be equal justice as between society and a criminal, does it?

Senator Tydings. That is the problem. On the other hand, there is no question you have to protect individual rights. I once thought that I had the answers here, but I am not so sure any more.

Senator McClellan. I am not trying to make you take a position or urge you to take a position at the moment, but I do think it is serious.

Senator Tydings. It is.

Senator McClellan. The emphasizing, and I think overemphasizing in some instances, in recent Supreme Court decisions of the so-called individual rights of persons demonstrated and admitted guilty, and freeing confessed criminals on some technicality—perhaps the inadvertent error or a policeman—does not tend to maintain the proper balance in the scales of justice. Society is becoming the victim of misguided justice, in my opinion.

Since several of these decisions have been by a one-man majority, 5 to 4, and there have been very strong dissents by the minority, I think it is imperative that the Congress exercise its authority to remedy this situation. I do not know what legislation we can enact; perhaps the Court would determine anything we do unconstitutional. However, I firmly believe it is our responsibility to legislate in this area and attempt to restore a more proper balance between the rights of the individual and the rights of society. The obligation is squarely on the Congress to act. Should legislation we enact be determined to be unconstitutional, then the consequences would be on the Court.

Senator Tydings I think one aspect that should be studied is the question of whether you should punish the police officer, or the district attorney when he makes a nonprejudicial mistake, either a mistake in the warrant or a mistake in the trial or a mistake in the arrest, by throwing out a conviction, even though there was no coercion or no unethical conduct on behalf of the law-enforcement officer. By throwing out such a conviction you may punish the police officer or you punish the prosecuting attorney but——

Senator McClellan. You punish society, do you not?

Senator Tydings. Yes, that is the problem; whether or not the end result is real admonishment of the policeman, and what you do accomplish by that philosophy.

Senator McClellan. It is a very grave question in my judgment and one to which I think we must give attention.

I agree with most everything in your bill and your approach in some areas are better, I think, than the administration's. I am for the objective of the administration bill. I think it is imperative that we train our policemen and certainly it is a national disgrace the low salary we pay them for the risks they take. The salaries should be increased, but the very fact that you pay them more and give them better training is not going to solve this question of restrictions on questioning suspects and obtaining confessions. They may occasionally by their skills and by their improved training and techniques find the evidence to convict without a confession. They may make some improvement that way, but it still does not help in the situation where a crime has been committed and a confession may be given and there is no other evidence, so, with the confession ruled out, they go free. You still have that problem.

We have our boys fighting in Vietnam. They are fighting what many believe to be the forces of aggression that seek to conquer the world. We believe that people should have a choice of what kind of a government they have. We are told it is to our interest to be in Vietnam because the freedom of the world is endangered if these forces are allowed to advance—if they can take Asia, then they can go on and the freedom of the entire world would be in jeopardy. We have no business to be there unless we are fighting for freedom. But, while our boys are dying over there, the criminal here at home is gaining more and more privileges and the probability of apprehension and conviction for his crime is lessening to such an extent that the crime incidence in this country has created an internal menace that threatens our domestic security on a scale that is as great or greater than the threat of aggression from without. I feel it is imperative that we give this grave domestic problem our immediate attention.

We appreciate your coming before us, Senator, and I think you have some good proposals in your bill.

Senator TYDINGS. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will be glad to have you work with us as we go along on this administration bill, and we may very well like to use some of your approaches instead of some they have proposed. I am not speaking for the committee, but it struck me that some of them may be an improvement over the proposal made in the administration bill.

Thank you very much.

Senator TYDINGS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would be delighted and honored to work with you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Dillion, Michael Dillion. Have a seat please, sir.

STATEMENT OF MICHAEL DILLON, DISTRICT ATTORNEY, ERIE COUNTY, BUFFALO, N.Y.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Dillon, do you have a prepared statement?

Mr. DILLON. Yes, Senator. I have submitted, I believe, about 15 copies of it to Mr. Paisley.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Will you give us a little of your background?

Mr. DILLON. Senator, I have practiced law in the city of Buffalo for approximately 13 years. I served 3 years as corporation counsel of the city of Lackawanna, a city located in the county of Erie.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Did that have to do with criminal law?

Mr. DILLON. No; that did not, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That did not?

Mr. DILLON. I am now completing my fourth year as district attorney of the county of Erie in New York State.

I am a member of the Executive Committee of the National District Attorneys Association, and I am the first vice president of the New York State District Attorneys Association.

Senator, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee and to participate in the deliberations of some of the most important problems confronting the Congress today. First I would like to say a few words about our crime problem in Erie County. Erie County, Senator, is located in the western end of New York State and includes the city of Buffalo, which is the second largest city in the State, and two other cities, Lackawanna and Tonawanda, and 25 towns. Our population is approximately 1,100,000 people. Our crime problems are quite similar to those of most growing metropolitan areas. We have a certain amount of organized crime in Buffalo and western New York. We have a substantial amount of juvenile crime, and we have a vast number of social and organizational problems which both give rise to and result from crime. We have problems of welfare, education, poverty, housing, narcotics, unemployment, and less than ideal economic growth. These problems are compounded by a governmental structure which has not kept pace with the times. In that connection I have in mind specifically the problem of fragmented duplicity of police forces. In Erie County we have 29 separate police departments, each operates independent of the other, and they operate with varying degrees of cooperation and coordination of their activities.

Most of our police agencies are hampered by a lack of funds and skill for the use of technical and technological equipment. With the exception of the City of Buffalo Police Department and possibly one or two others, our police agencies are without specialized squads in such sensitive fields of criminal investigation as homicide, arson, narcotics, gambling, safe and other burglaries, and other areas where special skills are required.

Our police departments use a multitude of police radio signals and, therefore, the interdepartmental communications is time consuming, inefficient, and oftentimes results in the completion of the commission of a crime before the matter is made known to the police agencies and the police are able to travel to the scene of the crime.

Now, without recounting all the ills of our present system, it is sufficient to say there is a great need for updating and improving the general efficiency of law enforcement through a consolidation of police agencies.

It is for this reason that I am particularly pleased by those sections of Senate bill 917 which call for comprehensive plans in section 101, and I am also pleased especially with sections 204(b)(2) and 204(b)(3), which "encourage plans which encompass the entire metropolitan area—and deal with the problems of all law-enforcement agencies in the area."

And these problems, Senator, are severe. Though crime is essentially an urban problem, it is reaching out to the suburbs and the more rural areas. Few issues more trouble all of our people, not just the city residents, than the fear of walking the streets at night of burglaries and muggings and robberies. Juvenile crime is a particular concern, for, as the President's Crime Commission reported, juveniles account for a disproportionate and increasing share of crime. In our own city of Buffalo, the Buffalo Youth Board recently reported that 5 percent of all youths in the 16- to 18-year-old bracket appeared in youth court in 1966, and that these accounts for some 1,537 offenses.

Now, the teenage population has changed only slightly since 1961, but at the same time the number of teenagers involved with the law has doubled. And elsewhere in the Nation, I assume, the situation is the same.

To deal with these and related problems, we need the help of the Federal Government. Our cities, where the crime problem is most visible, are too poor and inundated by the avalanche of problems which overwhelm them to do more than just meet the morning's daily crisis. Our counties and larger units of local government generally have more money. However, archaic governmental structures, blind complacency about problems that seem to be largely the city's and a lack of wealth and interest in vigorously approaching problems on a metropolitan basis—these are the factors which have kept our broader governmental units from tackling these problems effectively. Thus, we must turn to the Federal Government as sponsor and partner in the study phases, to help and support the operational aspects, but with prime responsibility for such operations left with the local government.

I, therefore, strongly support Senate bill 917 on both principle and specific application.

Proposals such as this are long overdue. Crime is both a symptom and a cause of deep trouble in our communities and it cannot be reduced without extensive study of the underlying problems, and without imaginative experimentation with new techniques. We cannot fight today's crime problems and their underlying causes with yesterday's methods.

I have two suggestions with respect to Senate 917 and I offer them quite tentatively. The first relates to that aspect of the bill which requires the local units of government to increase its budget substantially over the next few years, if it is to receive up to 60 percent of that increase for specific projects. I can well understand the feeling that Federal money should not go to those who are unwilling to lay out substantial amounts of their own. But our most acute urban problems arise from the desperate poverty of many of our major cities, many of which are just scraping by financially. For some of these it may seem just too difficult to file a complex grant application which may turn out to produce very little indeed because of the poverty which created the law enforcement problems in the first place. Thus, I would like to see a somewhat less exacting approach. I realize, of course, that section 202(d) allows the Attorney General to dispense with some of the restrictions if he thinks they are unreasonable. In that connection, Senator, I noted your comments with Senator Tydings. I have no comment to make as to where the power is reposed with respect to the dissemination and dispensation of these funds. It is in the administration bill and the Attorney General. My comments are directed to the distribution of the funds. It matters little to me as to where that power is reposed.

As I read this bill, the possibility exists for the Attorney General to allow additional funds only if the basic expenditure includes substantial and extraordinary amounts, and that does not get to the problem with which I am concerned. Perhaps the Attorney General's power might be extended to allow him to dispense with these requirements whenever he thinks the applicant cannot comply with the requirements, but that the purpose of the act will clearly be served.

My second proposal deals with the matter of emphasis—the omission of human relations training as a statutory purpose in section 201. Such training could probably be included in section 201(f) and I quote:

> Community Relations, including public understanding of and cooperation with law enforcement and criminal justice agencies.

However, there should be express reference to training personnel to understand the communities in which they work. The police task force of the President's National Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice has expressed the importance of such training. Indeed, it made a large number of recommendations dealing with the problem of police-minority group relations, including the formation of community relations units and police departments, advisory committees and the like. Our recent disorders in the city of Buffalo, Senator, about which you may have read, attest to the importance of such training. These disorders have many causes, I am sure, and our police acted magnificently, with self restraint and understanding, but at the same time with firmness. It seems clear, however, that there is often a great lack of understanding of mutual problems on both sides on the part of the community affected and the police, and I would, therefore, propose that subsection (f) be expanded to include police training in human relations and minority-group problems.

Now, with these comparatively minor suggestions I reiterate my wholehearted support for the principles and details of this bill.

I have also been asked to comment on certain other bills before this committee dealing primarily with wiretapping and confessions. I turn my attention now to bill 675, the wiretapping bill.

It is somewhat difficult to comment on S. 675 for the Supreme Court's recent decision in Berger v. New York has cast a cloud over any attempt to legalize wiretapping. Before that decision I would have wholeheartedly supported this bill as one which goes a long way toward clearing out the confusion and uncertainly in this area. It strikes a reasonable balance between the claims of privacy, claims which go to the essence of a civilized society, and the needs of law enforcement without which society cannot survive.

The Berger case, however, raises numerous questions which are very difficult to answer. Of course, the Berger decision does not deal specifically with wiretapping in the technical sense, but rather with the use of trespassery eavesdropping devices as applied to the State by the 14th amendment. In the Supreme Court the majority in the Berger decision clearly overruled Olmstead v. United States and held that it was not necessary to have physical entry upon premises to violate the fourth amendment.

The Court says that a conversation, like tangible evidence, is protected by the right of privacy secured by the fourth amendment, and that any statute which allows for the invasion of that privacy is subject to the same constitutional tests as a statute which allows an invasion of private premises for the purpose of a search to obtain things tangible.

The Court, in making this analogy, does not make eavesdropping or wiretapping unconstitutional per se, but allows for the possibility of a valid eavesdropping statute.

The directives in the Berger decision make it unlikely that this bill can stand up in its present version. For one thing, the period for which tapping can be authorized is too long, according to the Berger decision.

Secondly, there is no provision for limiting the tap to conservations involved. Whether this is even physically possible, I do not know.

Senator McCLELLAN. How can that be done?

Mr. DILLON. As I say, whether it is even physically possible, I do not know, sir. The Berger decision is contrary to the thinking that I have expressed many times throughout the State of New York with respect to the right of law-enforcement agencies to engage in court-authorized wiretapping. When I speak a little later here, Senator, with reference to recent Supreme Court decisions about which you and I may have some disagreement, please do not assume that I am including the Berger case. I do not agree with the Berger decision. I have had too much experience with wiretapping personally and I have been involved with too many other district attorneys in the State of New York who have had such experience, and I have concluded and agree with them that wiretapping is an essential tool in combating, not only organized crime, but other forms of crime in our other communities.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What will be the impact on organized crime if there can be no practical wiretapping statute?

Mr. DILLON. Well, in my judgment, Senator, the essence of organized crime is gambling. All gambling today is done in one way or another through the use and medium of the telephone. If we cannot engage in court-authorized wiretapping we cannot combat that form of gambling which is the essence of organized crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is the principal source of revenue, is it not?

Mr. DILLON. Yes; in our judgment it is.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It will continue to thrive.

Mr. DILLON. It will continue to thrive, grow, prosper, and continue to infest the legitimate business communities of the United States of America.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And with impunity.

Mr. DILLON. Apparently so, Senator, if we cannot come up with a bill that meets constitutional tests.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, that is one place we agree.

Mr. DILLON. This bill also—yes, we do, Senator, unquestionably. This bill also allows for State wiretapping wherever evidence of crime may be obtained, and this was a specific provision of our statutes in the State of New York and the Berger decision criticized that that verbiates specifically.

Whether our New York State Legislature can enact a law which meets the standard set forth by the Berger decision remains to be seen. I devoutly hope that it will be possible. As a prosecutor, daily engaged in the business of fighting crime of all kinds, I can attest to the value of the wiretapping we have done in New York. Our court order system has worked quite well. It probably could have been improved somewhat, and obviously will be, but of what human institution cannot this be said?

It is no accident that such prosecutors as Frank Hogan, of New York, and the majority of the President's Commission consider law enforcement wiretapping both necessary and yet consistent with individual liberty.

Now, on the assumption that wiretapping will still be possible, I have a few suggestions apart from the implications of Berger. First, the bill requires the judge to find that "no other means are readily available for obtaining that information." We have not had such a provision in New York and I have seen no indication that anyone has suffered thereby. Moreover, it might require a great deal of unnecessary extra effort to make such a showing.

Secondly, I think it would be a good idea, and I have long thought this, Senator, even in derogation of the statutes we have in the State of New York, that the power to apply for wiretapping orders should be limited either to the State attorney general or to the local prosecuting officer.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think our bill does that.

Mr. DILLON. Yes, I think it does provide that, Senator, as I reread the bill, the legislation in the State of New York allowed a police officer above the rank of sergeant to make such an application. I think for a multitude of reasons that that is not good procedure.

Senator McCLELLAN. I agree with that. I think your law was too liberal in that respect. I think it ought to be tight, very definitely as free from loopholes as it can possibly be made, but still I think this process ought to be made available in law enforcement. We can go out and get a search warrant. Well, they say you do search for something specific. That is true. But you are listening for something specific, too, as near as you can identify it. You might go out and search for a stolen watch or for a stolen piece of jewelry. You may visualize in your own mind what it's going to look like, but when you actually find it it may look different, and it may be somewhat different from the way it was described in the search warrant, but if it is a stolen article that should not preclude it from being used in evidence. And to combat organized gambling you have to tap a telephone, and the conversation may in part be very personal. But, that is not what you are after. You eliminate that and you use the other. When you go in a home and you search a home you see many things. You may be surprised at some of the things you see, but you do not take them and you do not use them as evidence, you do not use everything which you saw.

Mr. DILLON. Senator, the interesting thing, fact, that our experience with wiretapping in the State of New York is that court-authorized wiretapping has been in effect for approximately 30 years and then in all of those 30 years there has never been one known case of the abuse of the wiretapping provisions by law-enforcement officials. That is, the abuse and terms of the procurement of information aside from the information actually sought, for the use of information for extortion or for other purposes.

Senator McCLELLAN. During part of that time you enjoyed the distinction in your State of having the largest population in the Nation. I do not know whether now there may be an issue as between New York and California as to that, but it does seem to be—for how long did you have the law?

Mr. DILLON. We have had it approximately 30 years.

Senator McCLELLAN. For 30 years, three decades, if that law operated and was successfully used by law-enforcement officials in the State of New York, in perhaps thousands of instances, and there were no abuses of it, it seems to me that it is a pretty weak contention that there will be a lot of abuses if we enact wiretapping legislation. It would seem that the New York experience completely refutes the apprehension over abuses.

I believe we can put our confidence in the law-enforcement officials, the prosecuting attorneys, and the district attorneys when they give us the facts and evidence to support their contention that wiretapping is a necessary tool against certain specified crimes and can be successfully used under strict court supervision. I believe it would be a remote exception for our trust in these officials to be misplaced. There are, I suppose, instances of abuse of privileges in all areas of government. However, this very legislation we are trying to enact would provide punishment for those found guilty of irregularities in the use of wiretapping. Allowing for the human frailties that may enter into these things, we have to have some confidence in the law-enforcement officials and the law-abiding citizens of our land, as well as an obsession about individual rights, if we are going to preserve law and order in this country.

Mr. DILLON. I am very much in agreement with you, Senator, and on behalf of the district attorneys I deeply appreciate your comments.

Senator, in my prepared text I had noted some reservations with respect to the bill dispensing with the requirement for a court order in national security cases. Probably my initial thoughts and my initial reaction wth respect to that provision of the bill were prompted by my working with the court-authorized system and my total approval of it. On reflection, I have changed my thinking, or altered it somewhat, with respect to this, and though I am not a Federal law-enforcement official, though I am not familiar with the problems of law enforcement and national security cases, I do feel that the bill in that connection probably should stand as it is. All I did in my prepared text was note some reservations with respect to the breadth of the power given in that section.

Senator, with respect to other bills that you have discussed here with other witnesses, particularly bill 674, and bill 1194, each of these would repeal the McNabb-Mallory rule and permit the admission in Federal court of all statements otherwise deemed voluntary.

Now, again, I am not a Federal law-enforcement official and I do not feel that it would be appropriate or useful for me to comment on this aspect.

I am concerned about S. 1194, however, which goes further and would remove jurisdiction from all Federal courts to reverse or modify State court findings of voluntariness, if affirmed on State court appeal. I do not think that such a proposal would be sound.

Senator MCCLELLAN. State that again.

Mr. DILLON. Senate bill 1194, Senator, would remove jurisdiction from the Federal courts to reverse or modify a State court finding of voluntariness if that finding has been affirmed by the highest State court.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes, that is the bill introduced by Senator Ervin and I am a cosponsor. Now, my position has been that is a harsh remedy that we should not have to apply.

Mr. DILLON. Well, Senator, I think, however, that it is true that at the Federal level quite often we are viewing cases from a broader base than we are from the confined State level. Interestingly enough, Senator, the Supreme Court has handled relatively few confession cases. Now, I will admit that the impact of many of these decisions has been tremendous.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, that is what we are talking about. The impact; judges feel constrained to dismiss these cases or suppress charges.

Mr. DILLON. Well, again, Senator, I think that the position that one takes with respect to this bill would be prompted by his reaction to Supreme Court decisions in this field. I think in that connection, Senator, that my reaction might be somewhat different than that which I have heard you express here this morning, and I say that, of course, most respectfully.

Senator McCLELLAN. I just believe in this right to dissent which you are emphasizing so much today.

Mr. DILLON. I believe strongly in that myself, Senator. Indeed, I think most of the Supreme Court's decisions have been good for the courts, for lawyers, for the police, and for the community. We can live with them and we have. In that connection, Senator, I believe I know of no survey from Mr. Younger's office, the district attorney of Los Angeles County, relating to Miranda. It may well be than one does exist; however, I had many conversations with Mr. Younger with respect to surveys he was conducting subsequent to the Escobedo decision and it was his reaction after a study of the facts that the Escobedo decision had little, if any, impact upon the administration of police agencies in his county.

Incidentally, that is also my reaction in a county of a million and one hundred thousand people. You see, Senator, the public reaction from these decisions is adverse primarily because the decision at the time of its promulgation changes the rules in the middle of the game.

Senator McCLELLAN. I understand they do.

Mr. DILLON. Now, I do not agree with the Supreme Court changing the rules in the middle of any game. My whole approach to the Supreme Court decision is that once the rules have been formulated, and once we begin to apply them in futura, I say the police and prosecutor can live with them, have lived with them up to this point, and I notice, interestingly enough, just yesterday reported in, I believe, the Buffalo Evening News, a study of—conducted by some official or agency associated with Georgetown University which have indicated a comparatively minor impact from these decisions. I have not had an opportunity to study any such report, and I am not equipped to comment at any great length upon them, but our experience up to this point has been that Mapp v. Ohio, Escobedo, and even Miranda, our experience with Miranda up to this point is still quite limited, have not materially adversely affected us insofar as the amputeral application is concerned. They did have a tremendous adverse effect upon pending cases, and I have always been concerned about the retroactive application of any Supreme Court decision. I feel that that has been the—the retroactivity——

Senator McCLELLAN. Can you tell us how many cases you have had to dismiss by reason of the Miranda decision?

Mr. DILLON. Well, Senator, I would say that we have dismissed upward of 250 to 300 cases because of it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, you do not think that is a serious impact?

Mr. DILLON. Well, as I have indicated to you, Senator, it is a tremendous adverse impact upon pending cases and there I refer only to cases that were pending at the time of the promulgation of the decision by the Supreme Court with respect to new crimes, with respect to new criminal investigations commencing subsequent to the issuance of the decision. I say there we have not had such an impact.

Senator McCLELLAN. You say you have had upward of 250. If you related that to the whole country, considering the number of cases, how many thousand do you think have had to be dismissed?

Mr. DILLON. It would have to be, it probably would be beyond my power of mathematics, but it would be hundreds of thousands.

Senator McCLELLAN. Hundreds of thousands have had to be dismissed because of it.

Mr. DILLON. That is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. So then, there are potentially hundreds of thousands of guilty criminals on the streets today going unpunished for their crime by reason of the Miranda decision; do you agree?

Mr. DILLON. I not only agree with that, but there are literally more hundreds and hundreds of thousands of criminals walking the streets who are unmolested by us without any connection to the Miranda decision.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, that is true, but it is a fact that you augment that number by the Miranda decision; is that not true?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Sure there are hundreds of thousands of them never apprehended, never caught, never detected.

Mr. DILLON. Well, there is no question. I do not dispute, Senator, as a matter of fact I have spoken out repeatedly with respect to the immediate adverse impact. It is there and we cannot change—when we change the rules in the middle of the game on the police, you cannot expect the police to comply with rules that they could not anticipate 6 months earlier, or a year earlier, or a year and a half earlier.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you, do you think the Miranda decision strengthens law enforcement in this country?

Mr. DILLON. I think the Miranda decision, Senator, represents a balance between the interest of law enforcement and the rights of individuals. Senator, all people in our society are not as fortunate as you or as I am fortunate. My experience is that we hold people sometimes in jail, young people in jail, for days at a time with a complete lack of concern on the parents, if they do live in homes where parents live together, a complete lack of concern in many instances on the part of the community or other agencies as to where these young people are or what they are doing, and I busy myself and my assistants busy themselves on the telephone trying to find responsible people in the community who should be concerned about these youngsters and who are not. This would not happen, Senator, if others in the more affluent society were arrested under similar circumstances. There would be a lawyer there immediately, there would be a brother or a sister or a mother or a father there immediately, and since we do have tremendous poverty in certain areas of the city of Buffalo, I may be more aware of this problem than some other people. This concerns me, the human factor concerns me. So, I find no objection, Senator, with telling those who have engaged in criminal activities that anything they say may be used against them, because others in our society know that. I have no quarrel with telling them that they have a right to remain silent, because others more affluent in our society already know that.

Nor do I find any quarrel with telling them that they have a right to an attorney and that if they cannot afford an attorney one will be provided for them. Therefore, I do not quarrel with the Miranda decision.

Senator McClellan. You have no quarrel with it?

Mr. Dillon. Incidentally, Senator, it is interesting to know that in Erie County since I have been district attorney, we have been recommending to police agencies long before the Miranda decision that we comply pretty substantially with the Federal Bureau of Investigations procedure, and that we do advise them of the first three mandates of Miranda, that they have a right to a lawyer, a right to remain silent, and that anything they said would be used against them in a court of law.

Senator McClellan. My quarrel is that if a man is guilty but because the policeman fails in one of those areas, then you have to acquit him. That is not justice with respect to the rights of society. If he is guilty, established, demonstrated, and confessed guilty, the fact that a policeman failed to say, "You are entitled to an attorney," is not sufficient reason to punish society by releasing this criminal.

Mr. Dillon. But, Senator, our experience is that in the future application of the Miranda decision that all policemen, at least we in Erie County, we have conducted seminars and classes and have fully advised our police agencies of these requirements of the Miranda decision. It is the talk of the community; it is the talk of the police department; and any police officer in Buffalo and Erie County now, in my judgment, knows of the requirements of Miranda and adheres to them.

Senator McClellan. Well, I can understand that. They have to do it. There is no alternative. Here is the problem——

Mr. Dillon. Sir, the situation about which you have spoken——

Senator McClellan. You may take in a confirmed criminal, you have to go through all of this process with him, if he comes in there and says, in effect, "Well, they did not tell me such and such rights I have," then you have got to turn him loose.

Mr. Dillon. Senator, I think the word "confirmed" is subject to definition and interpretation, but our experience is that the truly confirmed criminal was not giving us confessions in any event.

Senator McClellan. Well, I do not know. Some of them do, there is no question about that. I have been a prosecutor too. I have had just a little experience.

Mr. Dillon. I defer to your experience in that regard, then, Senator.

Senator McClellan. I have had some of these problems and had a little experience in the courtroom as a prosecutor and trying to enforce the law. I can go along with the idea that some suspects need advice and counsel, and I am not opposing that. But when you have a person who is known to be guilty, has confessed his guilt for perhaps a heneous crime such as murder, and then is turned loose on society because some policeman fails to tell him that he had a right to a lawyer or that whatever he said might be used against him. If that is justice, it is the wrong kind of justice in a civilized society in my book.

Mr. DILLON. Senator, I do not think there is any real disagreement between us. I think I agree with all that you have said and I have read those headlines and I am familiar with those cases with respect to cases that were pending when that judgment was first pronounced.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I received a few days ago, and I will place in the record at this point for the purposes of our discussion, a telegram from Ferris E. Lucas, executive director, National Sheriffs Association. It was sent on June 21 from Las Vegas, Nev., where they were having their convention. It is addressed to me and it says:

The National Sheriffs Association, in behalf of its more than 22,000 members, had its annual conference in Las Vegas, Nevada, today, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, in recent years the various trial courts throughout the nation have been hampered in the trial of criminal cases as a result of Supreme Court decisions, both state and Federal, wherein the admissibility of a criminal's confession of having committed an alleged crime has been all but outlawed and whereas law enforcement has suffered a serious setback through the court decisions referred to above and it is conceivable that more serious problems will result unless corrective measures are taken on a national level to safeguard the public from the evil effects of such court decisions, and whereas Senate Joint Resolution No. 22 proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to provide that the voluntary admission of confessions of the accused in a criminal prosecution shall be admissible against him in any court sitting anywhere in the United States. And, that the rule of a trial judge admitting an admission or confession as voluntarily made shall not be reversed or otherwise disturbed by the Supreme Court or any other inferior court established by Congress or under its authority if such ruling is supported by competent evidence.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved that the National Sheriffs Association fully and completely endorses and approves the aforesaid Senate Joint Resolution No. 22 and recommends its adoption by both Houses of Congress and a copy of this resolution be furnished to the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Clerk of the U.S. Senate with the request that each body cause this resolution to spread it on the record of the House and the Senate."

It seems they feel that confessions ought to be admitted. I do not know completely what that represents, some resolution adopted by the association. There might be members who disagree with it, but generally, they seem to favor it.

Mr. DILLON. Well, I think it would be fine, too, Senator, though I cannot speak on their behalf, but with exceptions, I think Mr. Younger of Los Angeles is one, that the district attorneys of the United States of America may well generally agree with the content of that resolution or document from which you read.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The U.S. attorneys?

Mr. DILLON. The district attorneys of the United States of America. I think a majority of them might well agree.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You mean they would not agree with you?

Mr. DILLON. I think, Senator, that with respect to the district attorneys of the United States I may well be expressing my right to dissent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I see, you feel you may be in the minority with respect to what you have said here with respect to the district attorneys?

Mr. DILLON. I think so. Yes. I do not speak on behalf of all of the district attorneys of the United States. I think many times our judgments, however, in this connection, I think district attorneys and sheriffs and police agencies, and others are equally guilty of it, have made too much upon the emotional impact of these decisions as they were first promulgated and as the judge then a few weeks later in the city of New York dismisses a case against a defendant to whom he refers as an animal and says, "I am insulting the animal kingdom when I refer to you as an animal."

I think the emotional impact of this kind of thing is sometimes such as to give rise to judgments that are not based upon a thorough analysis of the facts and upon relaxed thorough study of this situation. I know that from my personal experience we are not in the futural application of these decisions receiving the impact that was originally anticipated. And, again, our experience is not complete yet with respect to the Miranda case, but again I think in essence I must agree with the Miranda decision because, in effect, it is giving, it is giving to these—many of the people involved in criminal activities only the same rights that those of us who are blessed with good parents, good education, good social environment long since have had.

Senator McCLELLAN. You spoke of the U.S. attorneys maybe not agreeing with you, that is, you might be in the minority as among them. Does the chief of police of Buffalo agree with your views?

Mr. DILLON. Why, no. I did not know the commissioner testified, but I have had many conversations with him and I have a tremendous respect for him and we have worked closely together on many matters and he is an excellent police officer, Senator, and he does not fully agree with the thoughts that I have expressed to you here. I know that from personal experience. You would be correct, anyway, with respect to the commissioner of the City of Buffalo Police Department.

Senator McCLELLAN. We had Mr. Tamm of the National Association of Chiefs of Police to testify before and he said the Miranda decision seriously crippled the police in solving crimes.

Mr. DILLON. Well, Senator, I do not know the extent of his experience. I do not know how many cases he has analyzed and come up with that determination.

Senator McCLELLAN. I do not know either.

Mr. DILLON. And I think that I would enjoy talking at greater length with this distinguished gentleman about that problem. You see, I think when we speak——

Senator McCLELLAN. They are people out in the field having to work with it as you are, and I just point out that I have been under the impression Miranda is doing a great deal of damage and when you tell me here that 250-odd cases in your district had to be dismissed by reason of it, then you apply that ratio throughout the country, it seems to me incalculable damage is done. It lends credence to the statement made by the judge from Louisiana who just preceded you, the psychological impact of it on the criminal himself.

Mr. DILLON. Oh, I agree with that. I agree with that. I think that these decisions have given a certain security to the criminal in his mind.

Senator McCLELLAN. Sure.

Mr. DILLON. On the other hand, Senator, again, if we are talking about cases that were pending when the decision was promulgated I am in total agreement, but if we are talking about in futural cases, cases which would develop and emanate say from today on or from the date of that decision on, our experience has not been that these decisions have had that catastrophic effect. We are still getting and the police are still procuring confessions in large numbers in cases wherein they have fully advised the defendant of his rights under Miranda.

Senator McCLELLAN. What is the change of procedure where maybe a suspect confesses and then when he come to trial says, "Well, I was not told these things"; what precaution do you take to make certain that the preponderance of evidence or evidence beyond a reasonable doubt will be presented that he was so advised?

Mr. DILLON. Well, Senator, I believe that that is a problem in all phases of criminal investigation and that is the problem of the truthfulness and veracity and believability of witnesses. And I think if the police in that situation testified that they did advise him of his rights it becomes a question of believability and I think you will find that most judges would or should be inclined to believe the police in that connection, particularly since the requirement that these admonitions be given has received such widespread publicity and is fully in the minds of the police agencies of the United States now, I am sure.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think the decision has had any impact on the morale of our policemen?

Mr. DILLON. Unquestionably, sir. Unquestionably they have had a tremendously adverse impact.

Senator McCLELLAN. Adverse?

Mr. DILLON. Unquestionably. However, I think that in the future, Senator, that with adequate training, and that is why these bills, in my judgment, are good and are healthy, with adequate training, with increased use of technical and technological equipment, and most importantly, Senator, and no one can tell me, at least I concluded, that this is the most important factor, adequate pay for police agencies of the United States of America, particularly in Buffalo and in the county of Erie. I think that you will get a much better job done and in some of this—some of this feeling of being left out in the cold by the courts which now permeates the policeman of our community will be set aside if the policemen are given better training, if they are given more salary and better equipment, and are able to cope with their tasks on a higher plane and a higher level.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, you think we can ultimately overcome the adverse impact of this decision?

Mr. DILLON. When the day comes, Senator, that we cannot look to the future with hope we are all in trouble.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, we must do that, we must keep our hope, but we must not just take a position of helplessness against the conditions that prevail. It is our hope, but we must make an effort to do something about it.

Mr. DILLON. I was interested very much so in the dialog between you and the distinguished jurist from New Orleans. We talked about the exclusionary rule in Mapp v. Ohio and yet Mapp specifically says that this is a constitutional requirement and unless we get, unless there are people on the Supreme Court who will change their thinking with respect to the mandates of the Constitution we are just spinning wheels about the exclusionary rule.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, that is the trouble about the Supreme Court. They are human, they change their minds. You can put two more men on the Supreme Court and maybe reverse everything that has been done in these cases. That goes back to this; what is distressing, frankly, is that the Court is finding it either convenient or necessary or desirable from their particular point of view to try to upset precedents and reverse decisions that have been the law of the land and been constitutional from the founding of this Government. It disturbs me because you don't know what they will do next.

Mr. DILLON. That is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that not true?

Mr. DILLON. That is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. And that is——

Mr. DILLON. I cannot predict what they will do next.

Senator McCLELLAN. No, because you cannot depend on them to follow the law of the land. They say everybody must obey the law of the land, but they have the privilege and exercise it, of changing the law of the land according to their whim or judgment as the case may be.

Now, that is what is happening in this country. Can we expect law-abiding citizens to have the same confidence in the stability of the law when it is made a plaything with the Supreme Court? I mean, apparently so, I do not mean to criticize an individual's views. Everyone is entitled to that, but I am talking about what is happening in America today with respect to law enforcement. What is the law of the land? What district attorney knows how, today, to try a particular case, or what policeman knows how he should behave in making a given arrest? He may think he knows; he may try to follow the latest rule, but we are getting a new rule, a new law, new innovations with almost every Court session. I do not know. There ought to be some fundamentals that we should cling to, not change them every few years. It is disturbing to me. I am the emotional type, as you say, in giving way to some feeling like that, but I do get a little emotional and I see nobody paying much attention to or caring for the victims and straining and stretching legalistic technicalities in order to turn a murderer loose. It does disturb me and it is a most important part of our internal security and I do not hesitate to say so. If I am wrong, I am wrong. That is my dissent.

Mr. DILLON. No, Senator, so that my position will not be misunderstood, I think that I am in absolute and total agreement with you with respect to these decisions as they do come down, so my position will be clear. I would like to see whenever the Supreme Court does come forth with a decision of the magnitude and import of some of the ones that have recently been promulgated, to have them applied only for the future, because I think the greatest impact and the greatest adverse impact has been with respect to pending cases.

Now, there is no question with respect to those, society's rights have not been protected and murderers and robbers and muggers and rapists have been allowed to walk out of the courtrooms and walk the streets. So, we are in total agreement, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think it is a tragedy; I think it is a national tragedy. I do not see how anyone, how anybody can place any other evaluation on it. Maybe I am wrong, but that is what I feel. If it is emotional; it is emotional, but I feel it and I feel it deeply. That is the only reason I am sitting here today. I am already burdened with legislative and official duties, but if I can make some contribution, just a small contribution, if I can throw some roadblock, even a minor one, in the pathway of this Nation's destruction by lawlessness and chaos that will ensue, I will feel like I have done the best, I have seized an opportunity to do something the best I could for my country.

Mr. DILLON. Well, Senator, I think that that attitude and that feeling is reflected in some of the legislation about which we are deliberating today, and I am pleased to have had the opportunity to come before you with respect to it, and I think that much can be accomplished by the passage of most of it.

Senator McCLELLAN. I want to say to you in conclusion, I appreciate your coming. I would like to get the other point of view. I may argue with you a little in the spirit of dissent, as I say, and as I say this I say it in all deference to your point of view. I grew up in an environment where you respected the court. From my youth I was inspired and it was instilled into me. I wanted to become a public servant. Certainly I get no satisfaction whatsoever in making any comment that is in the nature of criticism of our constitutional authority. That is why I have never been as partisan as I might have been. I think that if I am in a Republican administration it is my duty to serve my country and to do the best I can.

Well, anyhow, I do appreciate very much your appearance before us, and I hope out of our labors here will come something that will be helpful.

Mr. DILLON. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you.

I believe I have another witness scheduled. Come right around, please, Mr. Sensing.

STATEMENT OF THURMAN SENSING, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, SOUTHERN STATES INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think we will proceed, if you do not mind. We will probably get through pretty soon.

Thank you very much for coming. Be seated and give us your background, please, sir, and do you have a prepared statement?

Mr. SENSING. I do.

Senator, as you probably know, my name is Thurman Sensing. My home is Nashville, Tenn.

I represent the Southern States Industrial Council, the headquarters of which are in the Stahlman Building, Nashville, Tenn. The council was established in 1933. Its membership is comprised of some 2,400 industrial and business concerns, located mainly in the 16 Southern States from Maryland to Texas, inclusive, with about 15 percent of its membership outside that region.

The council has some 110 of the industrial and business leaders of the Nation on its board of directors representing those 16 Southern States and directors at large scattered across the country from Portland, Oreg., to New York City. The council is entirely nonpartisan, dealing only with principles and not with political parties. We appreciate this opportunity to be heard.

We now face in this country an almost intolerable situation. General crime and a new type of street lawlessness and rioting are sharply on the increase; the criminal and the rioter in the street are becoming more brazen and more contemptuous of the law and the lives and property of fellow citizens.

Yet at the very time as our laws need tightening, need more teeth, they are being stretched and bent and almost totally emasculated.

Rapidly mounting public concern, I might say public alarm, is shown by the fact that in recent months, numerous bills have been introduced in Congress dealing with crime and crime fighting. Among them are S. 675, S. 678, S. 916, S. 922, S. 1194, S. 917—the so-called President's bill on crime—and, of course, S. 674.

I have come here today, as a representative of the Southern States Industrial Council and its membership, to urge upon this committee and all Members of the Congress action in the area of law enforcement and reduction of crime. Specifically, I am here to endorse and support S. 674 as one of the major steps that must be taken to curb crime and violence in the streets.

In a recent meeting of the council's board of directors at Hot Springs, Va., the following statement was unanimously adopted:

> The Council views with alarm the Supreme Court decisions—Mallory, Escobedo, and Miranda cases—which have had the net effect of barring criminal confession under almost all conceivable circumstances, thus allowing the guilty to go free. The Council favors legislation to correct this situation.

These Supreme Court decisions make law enforcement exceedingly difficult—in many instances, almost impossible. They help the criminal escape the consequences of his crime, and hamper the policeman on the beat. Police authority has been sharply eroded by these decisions, when, in fact, law enforcement officers need to have their authority more firmly upheld.

We cannot look to the courts for relief in the incredible situation that has arisen, because it is the highest court in the land—the U.S. Supreme Court—which is making it harder and harder for the police to protect American communities, and for prosecutors to prepare an adequate case against the lawless.

If we cannot look to the courts for relief, neither can we look to the executive branch. Law enforcement, except for certain Federal crimes, is the responsibility of State and local authorities. In order for them to fulfill that responsibility, they must be freed from the unreasonable restrictions placed upon them by the U.S. Supreme Court, and for that we must call upon the Congress. We must appeal for enactment of new legislation such as S. 674 to insure that our laws are weighted in favor of the peaceful citizen and not of the criminal and lawless element in this Nation.

The distinguished chairman of this committee inserted a statement by FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover into the Congressional Record on March 6, 1967. I should like to quote a few particularly pertinent words from that statement:

Swift detection and apprehension, prompt prosecution, and proper and certain punishment are tested crime deterrents. As we have seen, however, this combination of deterrents can be ineffective because of breakdowns in one or all of its phases. That is why we cannot expect high-quality police service alone to bring full relief from the crime problem. If the hardened criminal is arrested but not punished, he is not long deterred from his criminal pursuits.

The council applauds that statement. There is another facet of current American life, and not a pleasant one, to which we must also give our attention.

At a meeting of the council's board of directors in May 1966, the following statement was unanimously adopted:

The Council views with grave concern the mounting violence and lawlessness ostensibly carried out in support of various aspects of the civil rights program...

A rising tide of mob terrorism and guerrilla warfare has been added to the rising tide of general crime. The policeman is thus caught between private crime on the one hand, and what I shall call public crime on the other. He is almost defenseless, without the certain and just backing of the law of the land. He is bedeviled by those who commit crimes ranging from murder to petty theft on one side and those who disregard law and take to the streets on the other. The peaceful, private, citizen is, apparently, the law's forgotten man. For the Supreme Court, while giving most liberal protection to the law breaker, has practically turned its head away from the vast majority of Americans of all sections of this Nation for whose benefit Congress makes laws.

S. 674, a bill which the council hopes will become law, provides that any confession shall be admitted in evidence if it is voluntarily given. Trial judges would determine whether a confession is truly voluntary in character.

This bill is designed to correct the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the notorious Miranda case, which made it virtually impossible to secure a conviction of self-confessed criminals in cases where the prosecution must rely on voluntary confessions of guilt. By its action in the Miranda case, the Supreme Court virtually assured the freedom of murderers, for example, who kill without witnesses being present and who do not leave fingerprints or other evidence. Murderers, of course, rarely make it a point to secure witnesses for their deeds.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am not a lawyer. I am an interested and concerned citizen testifying before this committee on behalf of many other interested and concerned citizens who comprise the Southern States Industrial Council. The council believes S. 674 to be a fair and equitable bill. It fully protects the law-abiding and peaceful citizen. It does not abridge the rights of the defendant. I want to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the committee and the other Members of Congress whose names are attached to this bill. On behalf of the Southern States Industrial Council, I urge the enactment of this measure.

Although I have stressed S. 674, the Southern States Industrial Council recognizes that it is only one of the steps that must be taken to reduce the frightening growth of crime and lawlessness in this country, to make the streets of this Nation safe again, and bring the lawbreaker and terrorist to justice.

We strongly urge congressional action in the whole field of crime control legislation. Passage of S. 674 and similar reform measures is the best way to conduct an anticrime crusade in this country.

Law and order must be observed by all people alike.

Thank you.

I would like to submit for the record copies of two newspaper clippings and read one brief paragraph from each one.

Senator McCLELLAN. We will check to see if they have already been printed in the record, and if not, they will be inserted at this point.

TERRORISM MAKING BUSINESS UNSAFE, D.C. BANKER SAYS

(By Donald B. Hadley)

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA.—Terrorism is making it unsafe to operate businesses or even walk the streets in Washington. Thomas P. McLachlen, president of the District Bankers Association, said here today.

Addressing the first general session of the association's 49th annual convention at the Greenbrier, McLachlen said law-abiding citizens fear for their homes, their livelihoods and even their lives.

"Businessmen are being terrorized by the lawless element in our community, as witness you recall the recent Senate Small Business hearings, when local merchants actually appeared to testify wearing masks because of fear of reprisals," he added.

BACKS BOARD OF TRADE

McLachlen, who is president of McLachlen Banking Corp., said the bankers' association is giving strong support to the Washington Board of Trade's Committee to Reduce Crime Now, but he urged individual bankers to do more to persuade law-abiding citizens to openly and actively cooperate, support and respect law enforcement agencies.

The speaker conceded that poverty, hardcore unemployment and unstable family life all contribute to crime, but added: "The hard-core criminal element in our city must be dealt with swiftly, surely and firmly. Law enforcement agencies bear this responsibility, but to be effective, they must have the respect and public cooperation of all law-abiding citizens."

COURT JAM DEPLORED

The Board of Trade committee believes that quick arrest, speedy trial and fair, but sure punishment is one of the best ways to deter crime, yet the District courts are inundated with work and swift justice is almost unknown, he declared.

"It currently takes 21 months from filing a case until the case goes before a jury—almost two years," the speaker said. "Only four years ago, the time gap was only four months."

"Under present law and practice, a person charged with any crime other than a death offense may be released on his personal bond if he simply pledges to reappear for trial," he said. "The committee supports efforts to amend the Bail Reform Act to allow courts to consider a defendant's past record and his potential danger to the community when fixing bond and releasing this person.

"The committee also is seeking an increase in the police department which now is operating at nearly 300 persons below strength and urges increased salaries and better equipment to do the job now," he said.

EXPECTS 10 PERCENT TAX BOOST

An estimated Fdeeral budget deficit of some $30 billion for fiscal 1968 will force Congress to approve a tax increase and it may be 10 percent rather than 6 percent, the bankers were told by Mortimer Caplin, Washington attorney and former Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Congress can be expected to redefine mutual savings banks and remove some of the tax-exempt privileges they now enjoy before the end of the year, Caplin said.

Legislation passed in 1962 to increase the tax liability of savings and loans and mutual savings banks to levels more comparable with those for banks has been a disappointment, he said.

Collections from savings and loans were expected to yield about $168 million a year, but amounted to only $35 million last year. Collections from mutual savings banks totaled only $7 million in contrast to an expected $32 million, he declared.

BANKS PAY 26 PERCENT

While commercial banks pay an effective tax rate of around 26 percent on income, mutual savings banks are paying a rate of only around 2 percent, he said. Proposed legislation now calls for issuance of Federal charters for mutual savings banks and due to their unfair tax advantages, many new ones are likely to be formed, Caplin said.

Many savings and loans firms also are planning to convert into mutual savings banks, he said. This serious problem is being studied by the Treasury and legislation to remedy it also is under study, Caplin added.

ADVISES FOR INFLATION

Banks and investors should prepare for more inflation by placing funds in intermediate corporate, municipal and state bonds and assume slightly greater mortgage risks to get higher yields, Dr. Richard H. Rush, New York financier, consultant and author, told the bankers.

There is no point in putting money in short-term increments now because the yield isn't there, and if it is placed in 30-year mortgages, the money at maturity may be worth only half of what it is worth today, he said.

There is quite a bit of evidence of the hoarding of long-term money and keeping it in short-term obligations that can be converted into cash quickly, he said. In the first half of this year, corporate flotations of around $6 billion were 80 percent of their entire 1966 total and state and municipal offerings absorbed another $6 billion. Short-term rates have gone way down in relation to long-term rates, he added.

Rush advised banks to find higher yields in short-term mortgages for home improvement and debt consolidation, and also by seeking loans and participations in a wider area than formerly, especially in growth cities where yields are higher. Foreign loans are a promising field, he said.

AIB REPORT HEARD

Washington Chapter, American Institute of Banking, which trains men and women for banking careers, had a membership of 1,428 and total enrollments of 1,368 in the last year, C. Jackson Ritchie, Jr., immediate past president of the chapter, told the bankers.

While the chapter did not set new records, the year's totals were well above five-year averages of 1,345 in membership and 1,336 in enrollments, he said. The year's program provided 22 courses in some 49 classes and 92 certificates were presented to students at the last fall.

Mr. SENSING. The first one is from the Washington Evening Star of June 15 wherein Mr. Thomas P. McLachlen, president of the District Bankers Association at White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., on that date:

Businessmen are being terrorized by the lawless element in our community. As witness you recall the recent Senate Small Business hearings, when local merchants actually appeared to testify wearing masks because of fear of reprisals.

The other one is an editorial from the Chicago Tribune which was reprinted in the Nashville Banner on June 28, 1967:

The Rhode Island state police have been ordered to disregard the recent do-gooder rulings of the Supreme Court in their effort to stem a rising tide of crime. In issuing the order, Col. Walter E. Stone, the superintendent, said that "hoodlums have turned the streets into a jungle." The latest incident was a shooting fray Wednesday in Providence.

"I've ordered my men to grab these guys on sight," Col. Stone said, "and frisk them and make sure they're not armed. This situation requires firm, tough policemen . . . We're not going to be guided by do-gooder decisions of the last year or two which have been protecting these guys and putting halos around their heads."

That may not be the best way to handle the problem, but this man was faced with what I referred to in the beginning of my statement as an intolerable situation and perhaps this is the best way he could handle it under the circumstances.

Senator McCLELLAN. I guess he felt it was better to do that than to let the Supreme Court reverse all convictions and let them come out there armed.

Mr. SENSING. I am sure he did.

Senator McCLELLAN. And have the community be exposed to the violence at the time.

Mr. SENSING. I hope this committee will consider our statement.

Senator McCLELLAN. We sure will and we appreciate your coming. I note you represent about 2,400 different industries.

Mr. SENSING. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Will you establish the fact that you are speaking for them? Would you say you are here representing them?

Mr. SENSING. The very fact that they are members of the council I think is best evidence that I am speaking for them.

Senator McCLELLAN. With what authority? How did they authorize you to speak for them?

Mr. SENSING. They didn't.

Senator McCLELLAN. They did not?

Mr. SENSING. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. You feel you are speaking then as a member?

Mr. SENSING. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. And not for all of them?

Mr. SENSING. I am the executive vice president of the council and speaking as such.

Senator McCLELLAN. Speaking as such?

Mr. SENSING. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have a contact with your membership that knows of this statement that you proposed to make?

Mr. SENSING. Yes; we referred to this bill and several others from time to time in our releases which we send to all our members. We get out a semimonthly full-page bulletin. I get out a weekly newspaper column under the title "Sensing the News." All of these go to all members and we have referred to these various bills and this problem of crime and I am sure they are all thoroughly in accord with it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Have you had responses from them?

Mr. SENSING. Oh, yes; a number of them. In fact, the chairman of our legislative committee has asked our members to write their Senators.

Senator McCLELLAN. Support this bill?

Mr. SENSING. Yes, sir; and we have heard from a great many members with copies of the letters that they have written.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see. I just wanted the record to reflect your authority was so that if you were speaking for the organization as a group, to so reflect it. If not, you might be speaking just for yourself in your capacity as executive vice president.

Mr. SENSING. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. It would be my wish that many organizations throughout the country would weigh these issues and give us the benefit of their support, offer their suggestions, counsel, for this is a very, very grave problem in my judgment and it is one that will not permit inattention too long.

Mr. SENSING. Certainly is.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. SENSING. Thank you.

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will stand in recess until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:55 p.m., the subcommittee recessed, to reconvene at 10 a.m., tomorrow, Tuesday, July 11, 1967.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

TUESDAY, JULY 11, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 3302, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Hruska, Hart, Scott, Ervin, and Edward M. Kennedy.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; Joseph D. Bell, assistant counsel; W. Arnold Smith, assistant counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

Our first witness is the Honorable Edward S. Piggins. Come around, Judge. Senator Hart wanted to introduce Judge Piggins. Since he has not yet arrived, we may as well proceed.

(Subsequently Senator Hart entered and introduced the witness.)

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. I simply want to introduce to the committee a person who has been a friend of mine for a long time, who was a very distinguished member of the bar, a trial lawyer of great effectiveness, who took his post on the circuit court of Wayne County, court of general jurisdiction in our metropolitan center. His service there has been ratified overwhelmingly by the electorate—once or twice——

Mr. PIGGINS. Twice.

Senator HART. He assumed an assignment that is loaded with difficulty, that of a grand juror, and you can judge from the statement he has filed the deep convictions he brought to that assignment.

He served as the commissioner of police of the city of Detroit, so that his testimony reflects the experience of a lawyer, a police official, a judge, and a conscientious good citizen. I know the committee will hear his statement and later study it with great interest.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska is recognized.

Senator HRUSKA. It is a great honor to introduce this witness. He is a unique and highly competent official. He is a member of the Michigan Crime Commission and former police commissioner of Detroit. The Michigan Crime Commission is on record as supporting in general the wiretap bill, S. 675.

78-433—67——57

Judge Piggins is very knowledgeable on the subject of organized crime. I am sure he will make a great contribution to this record.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that Michigan, as far as I know, is the only State that has what is referred to as a one-man grand jury. By statute a judge of the circuit court is designated to undertake the activities and to exercise the duties and powers of what in most States is either 12, 23, or 24 men grand jury. That grand jury convenes and the session this time was 1 year. It inquires into all phases of crime and allegations of irregularities or improprieties in government.

The judge, who composes and constitutes this one-man grand jury, has powers to grant immunity, subpena powers, and all the powers of inquiry which are ordinarily vested in a multiple-membership grand jury.

Judge Piggins brings with him a reputation which is wide, sound, and wholesome. Therefore, it is my honor to present him to this committee for testimony.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Senator.

Judge, we sincerely welcome you today and appreciate your willingness to come and testify at these hearings and give the committee the benefit of your experience and your counsel.

As I said to you a few moment ago when we visited in my office, this country is confronted with a very grave problem with respect to lawlessness and the need for more effective law enforcement. The Congress, the legislative branch of the Government, has a responsibility in this field and this committee in its capacity and function as an arm of the Congress is studying bills that have been introduced and have been referred to it with a view of trying to ascertain what legislation is needed. We are seeking to enact legislation which we feel is needed, so that the Congress may meet its responsibilities. We realize, of course, that the Congress is not the only branch of Government that has a responsibility, but to the end that we have that responsibility we want to try to meet it. We will need and we are earnestly soliciting the help of all members of the judiciary, of police establishments, and all good citizens who are interested in trying to help correct the critical crime conditions that today prevail.

We welcome and we appreciate your presence. You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD S. PIGGINS, JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT, THIRD JUDICIAL CIRCUIT OF MICHIGAN

Mr. PIGGINS. Thank you, Senator McClellan. I also want to thank Senator Hart and Senator Hruska for their kind remarks. I would like to make one limitation, however. While I happen to be a member of the Michigan Governor's Crime Commission, and at the moment chairman of the subcommittee on organized crime, I do not speak officially for that group. It may be that some of the members of that commission share my points of view. But as I say, I speak as a result of no official action that they have taken one way or the other. I have a statement that I should like to make.

Senator McCLELLAN. Will you give us a little of your background. training, and experience, for the record?

Mr. PIGGINS. Well, I am a lawyer. I practiced law in the city of Detroit for 25 years. In 1954, the then living mayor of Detroit appointed me commissioner of police, which position I held for almost four and a half years, during which time I think Detroit had its last major strike involving any violence of any kind, namely, the Square D strike.

Following my tenure of service as commissioner of police, I returned to the practice of law for a year and was then elected to the circuit court, which is the highest trial court of Michigan. It is a State court. It so happens that its jurisdiction covers the third circuit, which is the metropolitan county of Detroit, or the county of Wayne, some 3 million to 4 million people.

During my 8 years as judge of the circuit court, to be more specific, in August 1965, I was directed by other members of that bench to conduct a grand jury inquiry into, as Senator Hruska said, certain allegations of crime and certain allegations of impropriety in government which allegedly existed in Wayne County, which, incidentally, is the fourth largest or the fourth most populated county in this country, although Detroit is only the fifth largest city. Under the statute, at least the interpretation of the statute, my investigation terminated at the end of 1 year and I was willing to continue and I felt I should continue because I was in the middle of the stream and I felt I could reach the other side. But circumstances beyond my control prevented that.

So for the last year I have been back on the bench.

Now, if I may talk to you for a few minutes, I would like to talk about four or five matters that I think are of interest to you.

1. Propriety of legislative intervention to strengthen those areas of the criminal law affected by recent appellate decisions.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I do not come here to debate the soundness of recent Supreme Court decisions nor to criticize them. While I do possess my own personal judgment of these rulings, little can be gained by censure and a great deal can be gained by seeking intelligent solutions. It is perhaps sufficient to state that rarely have these recent decisions in the field of criminal law been unanimous, and violent criticisms of majority opinions have been expressed by some Justices themselves in dissent. Whether they are right or wrong it must be honestly conceded, even by the distinguished members of the High Court, that many Americans are disturbed.

There are thousands of Americans today who in their lay judgment believe that our courts have overextended themselves to create legal escape routes through which guilty criminals may flee to undeserved freedom. It cannot be denied that the hardened professional criminal recognizes these advantages and will avail himself of every opportunity to use them when necessary. Neither can it be denied that they have not made the work of the police easier. While I do not subscribe to the methods he suggests, I point to a recent example of attitude when the director of a State police agency recently instructed his officers to ignore "Miranda" and "Escobedo" and get out and do some effective police work. I say I don't subscribe to that theory, but at least that is the attitude.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you find that attitude prevails in many areas, that people feel that way about it?

Mr. PIGGINS. I don't think they will go so far as to say to ignore the decision, but I do feel they are a little bit disgusted with some of them.

Senator McClellan. Disgusted?

Mr. Piggins. Yes, sir.

One cannot be entirely out of sympathy with an American public that voices a vigorous protest when it watches confessed rapists and murderers go free to repeat their crimes because their confessions have been barred from evidence for what appears to the lay public, at least. to be an unrelated technicality.

One of the basic purposes of our American system of jurisprudence is to discover the truth. It is likewise just as basic that for a confession to be used against the confessor it must have been freely and voluntarily made. In determining the voluntariness of a confession, however, it would seem only logical and this Congress by legislative fiat might legislate the requirement that in deciding the question of voluntariness a judicial inquiry should be made into all of the surrounding circumstances and a confession ought not to be ruled out merely for some technical reason that does not relate to the substance. This same substantive inquiry ought to be exercised in applying the law of search and seizure and in the authority of the police to detain and interrogate suspects for reasonable lengths of time.

I don't think there is any dispute about this. There are not only laymen but lawyers who believe we are reaching a point of imbalance. There are some lawyers in this country today who believe that the rugged legal principle of precedent or stare decisis no longer exists. There are some who are convinced that many of the decisions today are born out of sociological theories rather than out of solid legal thinking.

Senator McClellan. You feel the majority on the Court think that they are no longer bound by previous decisions. When you talk about Supreme Court decisions being the law of the land, who is it now who is violating the law of the land? Who is disregarding it? I ask you that question because a citizen feels he has to obey the law.

The citizen is bound by law founded on precedent, the wisdom of the past—the law of the land; then five men decide all at once it is not the law and change the law. The citizen is confused. Now, that is a condition we are witnessing in America today and I wonder what happens to respect for law and order? What impact does it have on respect for law and order, when the majority of the Supreme Court acts in that manner?

Mr. Piggins. Not only that, Senator, but there are lawyers in the civil field who have to tell their clients, this is the law today, this is the precedent that has been established, but I don't know what it will be tomorrow.

Senator McClellan. What is the reason for that? Can you tell us why this condition now obtains?

Mr. Piggins. I think I am going to come to that in just a minute. There are some lawyers who believe the doctrine of stare decisis is outmoded. I reserve my opinion but I do say that while individual rights are entitled to just and reasonable protection so too the whole of society must be accorded the same just and reasonable protection from the individual criminal and whenever our system of criminal jurisprudence fails to maintain that balance, we threaten the basic philosophy which gave rise to the birth of this country 191 years ago. When a system we consider sacred fails to maintain that balance, as I say, I think we threaten the basic philosophy that gave rise to the birth of this country so many years ago.

I recite these things because the Congress of the United States now finds itself faced with a serious responsibility. The responsibility of determining whether it has the power, and I believe that it has, of determining whether there is a need, and I believe that there is a need, of enacting constitutional legislation which will not contravene the rights of the individual but which will guarantee to the American people that high degree of protection from the criminal element that they must have to live in peace and freedom.

Senator McCLELLAN. And which we think they do not now have.

Mr. PIGGINS. They do not now have. There are many manifestations of it.

Careful inquiry and study should be made into the field of the criminal law and proper legislation when required should be enacted. It can be done, but it must be done thoroughly and cautiously. It must be done with an eye to what the Supreme Court might do, if you can visualize that.

I urge your immediate consideration of this problem in the area of confessions, search and seizure, detention, investigation by police and arrest.

2. Constitutional and legal legislative authorization to law enforcement officers to momentarily detain and search individuals for weapons when sufficient probable cause exists.

This is an area into which skittish politicians hesitate to venture for fear of political repercussions. Yet, this is one phase of criminal law that is so vital in this time of emergency that it deserves honest, prompt, and forthright consideration.

It has often been erroneously and improperly alluded to as the stop-and-frisk procedure implying the unrestricted authority of the police to indiscriminately stop a citizen and search him without just cause. It has also been improperly and unjustly labeled as a means by which minority groups may be harassed. The truth is that carrying weapons today is widespread and those who carry weapons illegally are not confined to any one minority group. They are found in all segments of society.

Police officers and good citizens who know will tell you that the one single police procedure which will have the greatest immediate impact on holdups, robberies, and other street crimes is the authority of the police to confiscate weapons from those who have no right to carry them. The greatest percentage of holdups, robberies, assults, and other street crime is committed by young criminals who are illegally armed with guns or knives. Minus these weapons, it is my personal opinion, they would hesitate in many instances but possessed of a gun or knife their psuedo sense of bravado is shored up. Observers for the President's Commission learned that in some large cities 10 percent of those frisked were found to be carrying knives and another 10 percent were carrying guns.

No one can defend the unrestrained, unreasonable, promiscuous detention and search of individuals without valid reason but here again a balance must be achieved between the rights of the illegally armed potential vicious criminal and the absolute necessity of guaranteeing the physical safety of society.

The fourth amendment prohibits "unreasonable" search and seizure. When this qualifying language was inserted into the amendment it was obviously the intention of the framers to restrict only "unreasonable" searches and seizures. The word "unreasonable" must not be given such a strained interpretation that it invades the right of society to protection from the lawless. When the suspicious conduct of individuals or gangs of individuals, under suspicious circumstances—I can give you an example—4 o'clock in the morning in a high-crime neighborhood three or four young hoodlums who have previous records are standing on a street corner—to me that creates a suspicious conduct—creates probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed or is about to be committed, the police should be permitted to act. The mere knowledge that such authority is about to be restored of the police, in and of itself, would constitute a significant psychological deterrent to young potential hoodlums who loiter on street corners, in high-crime areas, illegally armed with weapons. At the moment, this right of the police is in the gray uncertain area of the law and as a consequence many American police officers are hesitant to act. They don't know if they are going to be criticized by their superiors.

Senator McCLELLAN. Today the policeman hesitates to take any action, does he not? He is reluctant to?

Mr. PIGGINS. Very much so.

Senator McCLELLAN. He can be charged with false arrest or brutality.

Mr. PIGGINS. Disciplined and made a victim of some public criticism by some public organization that really don't know the facts.

Congress and State legislatures should immediately proceed to clearly and explicitly define by law when the American police officer can exercise this necessary procedure. Whether we are prepared to admit it or not, we are in a war against crime—just as much as the one in Vietnam and probably more visible to the American citizen—and every available statistic will prove that we are losing. Crimes of violence and street crime have created an emergency and law enforcement must have the weapons to meet and defeat this vicious enemy and must have them now. If this valuable police procedure—and it is valuable—which will unquestionably alleviate the condition can be lawfully conferred by legislation, its consideration should be given immediate priority.

Contrary to the false conclusions of many shortsighted politicians, there are millions—and I have tested this out—of honest, good citizens from all groups of society—minority, racial, ethnic, and others—who would endorse and support this procedure because they once more would like to walk the streets of America—and I am including the steps of the U.S. Capitol—free from fear of criminal attack and there are thousands of capable police officers who can and would carry it out without offending the individual rights of the decent law-abiding American.

3. Stringent controls over efforts to corrupt public officials: I am talking about this in the vein of organized crime.

Investigators for the President's Commission on Crime report conclusively that there is corruption in public office today and while they are not aware of the extent, they indicate that it is of sufficient magnitude to require study and action as well as public concern. I am speaking of the attempts of organized crime and others who seek to purchase political influence and protection.

I know of no greater trust in our social structure than that of discharging the duties of public office. The beneficiaries of that trust are millions of dependent Americans whose interest and welfare should at all times be the paramount consideration. When a public official abuses that trust to enhance his own personal or political fortune to the exclusion of the public's interest he should be summarily stripped of both title and authority. There is no place for him.

Fortunately there are hundreds of dedicated public officials who are invulnerable to ulterior efforts but there is the occasional invertebrate, the perfect target for the corrupter, whose weakness of character or naivete makes him the victim of those who seek to buy power and favoritism. It is he who tarnishes the escutcheon of public service. It is he whose conduct nurtures the seeds of crime and corruption, particularly organized crime.

From police experience, it is axiomatic that wherever organized crime successfully operates you will find bribery and corruption of public and police officials. Organized crime simply cannot function successfully without protection. Payments to public and police officials are just one of its accepted and normally expected costs of operation. How is it done? Ingeniously. Practically gone is the day of the direct payoff, except on rare and stupid occasions. The methods employed today are far more subtle and devious. Excessively large political contributions indicating more than a normal altruistic interest in good government should always be suspect. Sizable political donations from questionable sources are often channeled down through a maze of levels until the original donor becomes almost obscure, yet still retains his purchased influence through the same chain of contact which frequently sometimes includes innocent go-betweens who may not even be aware of their involvement.

This is the common modus operandi of organized crime. So-called testimonial banquets and similar occasions are often nothing more than methods of paying money by which the honoree receives far more currency than testimony and are of times arranged, financed, and contributed to by questionable persons whose prime purpose is to obligate the recipient. Quick and certain money making and profitable investment opportunities, sizable holiday gifts—I am not talking about a small insignificant matter—commissions, referral fees, and other considerations are danger signals to which every public official should be alert. Often a public official can innocently find himself in a predicament which may be difficult to explain. These are but some examples of the machinations employed by those, particularly organized crime, who seek to corrupt and gain power over the weak and vulnerable office holder.

To provide safeguards against these dangerous practices as well as to eliminate traps into which well-meaning officials might unknowingly fall, Congress and State legislatures should enact effective and enforceable laws requiring a full, complete, and meticulous accounting, setting limitations, of all such receipts including precise limitations, details, and circumstances. They should be subject to governmental audit and they should be made periodically public through the press and through other forms of the news media. Tax laws relating to such matters, particularly gifts, should be made absolutely clear and stringent as an additional safeguard against such dangers, as well as a protection for the innocent. There are many examples of that all over the country.

I can conceive of no honest public official who would ever voice an objection to such control and surveillance, and I urge this committee to give this potentially dangerous area its most careful and thorough attention. Public confidence is a mandatory ingredient to the successful operation of government and nothing undermines that confidence more than questionable practices in this area.

4. Wiretapping: No facet of the criminal law has been subjected to more confusion and misunderstanding, or fanfare, in recent months than that of wiretapping or eavesdroping by the use of electronic devices. It has provoked a conflict between individual privacy and the needs of law enforcement in its battle to protect society. One of the major causes for this confusion and misunderstanding is ignorance in too many quarters as to what wiretapping or eavesdropping actually is. What are we talking about? How is it defined?

Generally, wiretapping is electronic eavesdropping without the consent of either party to the conversation, without the consent of either one or both parties.

If one party consents there is no illegal wiretapping as we generally construe it. When neither party to the conversation consents, electronic eavesdropping becomes allegedly illegal—I say allegedly because I am not sure it is illegal—although there are those who would still make it illegal even though one party to the conversation consents. Because of these refinements and because of the advance of technology in this field it becomes a subject necessary of a most thoroughly studied inquiry. Because of the scientific ingenuity of man, laws controlling electronic surveillance must contemplate the invention of even more fantastic devices. Although not yet practical, considerable advances have been made in the use of ultrasonic waves or laser beams through which minute vibrations from window panes or thin walls will enable the eavesdropper to listen to closed-room conversations without any intrusion or trespass and at a safe distance. Microphones the size of a sugar cube, or a button on a coat, or a martini olive have proven usable.

Senator SCOTT. Which may prove that martinis may be injurious to your health or safety.

Mr. PIGGINS. And there is a twofold danger, Senator. It might not only upset your stomach, it might upset your domestic life.

Senator SCOTT. It could well do that.

Mr. PIGGINS. But aside from all of this which Congress must necessarily consider, let me make my position crystal clear. Responsible police agencies must be allowed the use of scientific and electronic wiretapping devices for the purpose of detecting and preventing crime, particularly organized crime. I am aware of the recent decision in the Berger case in which the Supreme Court declared the New York statute unconstitutional, but the real import of that opinion did not declare wiretapping per se illegal. If there is a careful analysis of it there is some indication that the authority might well be granted to law enforcement if the law concerning it contains proper legal limitations within the restrictions of the fourth amendment. Congress should enact legislative authority that will stand the test of constitutionality to clothe the police with this valuable weapon and should clearly define its reasons for so doing.

Senator McClellan. Let us assume that such a law could be enacted within the Constitution. There are those who oppose it, as a matter of principle, saying that it is an invasion of privacy and therefore, legal or not, it should not be permitted. These opponents say that the use of such means should not be made available to the law-enforcement agencies because of the possible abuse of the use of that tool and because it may infringe on the right of privacy which we cherish in America as free men. Will you comment upon that briefly?

Mr. Piggins. I am going to do that in just one moment. I might say that those who oppose it base their opposition, as you pointed out, on freedom of speech, right of privacy, and based not only on the fourth amendment, search and seizure, but the fifth amendment, which does not demand a man to be a witness against himself and the sixth amendment which gives him, which gives an individual the right to counsel. That's stretching it a bit, but they use that in any event.

The Constitution of the United States guarantees the privacy of the individual and these guarantees must not be toyed with to the extent that they may be gradually chipped away and eventually lost. The promiscuous unrestricted use of wiretapping should never be permitted but the legal constitutional employment of this vital enforcement and detection procedure—for the purpose of protecting society from the criminal, under adequate regulatory safegurads—is a mandatory necessity and this Congress should so legislate. I don't know how or why I call it the McClellan-Hruska bill.

Senator McClellan. Senator Hruska is a cosponsor as are also other members of the committee. It is not a question about who may be the author. There is a question of what is needed for the country and there are many who favor the legislation and many who oppose it.

Mr. Piggins. In any event, it is the bill numbered 675. The McClellan-Hruska Senate bill No. 675 in substance carries out this objective.

The American public should be told and made to understand that the most constant illegal users of wiretapping are the members of organized crime. It is as obvious as the nose on your face. All over the country they use it to operate the off-track betting.

Senator McClellan. The ones who complain about it and fear it most are the criminals.

Mr. Piggins. That is right.

The American public should be told and made to understand that the one segment of our social structure most vitally concerned with depriving law enforcement of this weapon, is organized crime. What a clear open field it would have, operating its vast network of electronic interceptors in the perpetration of its numbers racket, its off-track horse betting syndicate, its narcotic distribution and its multitude of illegal conspiracies, knowing that it enjoyed the full protection—I document the potential that they violate the law—of the very law it was deliberately violating while frustrated law enforcement, deprived of such use, stood by as helpless and as ineffective as a bow and arrow against a machinegun. I have given to the members of the committee a detailed explanation of how the numbers racket operates in the city of Detroit—the northern part of Ohio, throughout Michigan and in parts of Canada. You may have some questions to ask me in connection with it. I think you will find it interesting. To me it is the best living proof that organized crime exists in that area that there is.

Would any fear-stricken American parent, beside himself over the kidnaping of his child, ever oppose police interception of a telephonic message from or between the kidnapers? Could the source of telephonic obscenity, extortion, anonymous threats and related offenses ever be discovered without the police having the authority to tap the caller's message?

The fourth amendment since its enactment has authorized search and seizure under prescribed procedures. I am aware of the Supreme Court decision that does say information obtained under wiretapping is not the same as seizing tangible objects. However, I say, is there any difference? Is there any difference between the search for and the seizure of contraband materiel, lethal weapons and narcotics used in the perpetration of crime and the search for and seizure of contraband information also used in the perpetration of crime? I say there is no difference. Both should be allowed in the interest of public safety, which, in the final analysis, should be the real test.

The smokescreen continually laid down by opponents is the threatened invasion of the privacy of the good unsuspecting citizen. I say in answer—that if law enforcement is deprived of this indispensible weapon that same good unsuspecting citizen will lose far more than his right of privacy. He will endanger his own physical safety and that of his children. He will jeopardize his right to free enterprise. He will not only invite but he will guarantee a social climate which breeds even more criminal misconduct than that which now plagues us and he will eventually threaten the very existence of his own precious freedom.

It is difficult for anyone who is experienced in this field or who has knowledge in this field, not to convince you gentlemen, but to convince the average citizen, that this menace exists, that there is such a thing as the Mafia or the Cosa Nostra or the syndicate or the family or the mob. But let me say to you on this record it is not a myth, it is not a fantasy, it is not a fiction. It is a legal, living, evil thing that every American ought to know about.

I sincerely and emphatically urge this honorable body to study this entire subject with unlimited thoroughness and recommend legislation authorizing the use of electronic and scientific interception by responsible police agencies within properly controlled constitutional and legal limitations and prescribed procedures.

Senator McClellan. May I ask you this? Have you any suggestions with respect to specific provisions that such a law should contain? This legislation, as you know, requires rather thorough court supervision through the application for a court order made by the Attorney General or officials designated in the bill. A court, of course, would have to weigh the probable cause or the reasonable cause in support of such an application. I do not know how to tighten it up any more than we have in the bill.

You have studied the bill that we have before us. Can you tell us how to tighten it up any more?

Mr. PIGGINS. I think you have done a pretty good job on it. What I would do is to take the Berger decision and go over it in relationship to the proposed legislation. I think generally speaking the same procedure that is used in connection with getting a search warrant—making it a little more strict, putting a time limit on it, describing the area to be tapped—even the method—prescribing for the return of the tapped information to the custody of the court. All of these precautions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I thought we might require the executing officer to report to the court or permit the court to require him to report at intervals on the progress being made.

Mr. PIGGINS. From time to time I think that is a good idea.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That will strengthen whatever we have here.

Mr. PIGGINS. You might go further, that is to require the contents of the tape be turned over to the court, to the custody of the court and retained there.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As it is received.

Mr. PIGGINS. As it is received, and perhaps made available to defense counsel on proper motion.

Senator MCCLELLAN. After the charge is made.

Mr. PIGGINS. Right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I simply believe that this instrumentality is vital to law enforcement, particularly in the area of organized crime, as you say. I do not think the use of this weapon against organized crime should be denied to society. I am opposed, as every citizen is, to promiscuous wiretapping, but that is what is happening now. It is a privilege that is being enjoyed by underworld characters, particularly in organized crime, and unless this weapon, under control of the courts, is made available to law enforcement, we are just waging a losing battle against organized crime. It now has all the advantages in the use of wiretaps.

Mr. PIGGINS. Senator, I will make this statement, that if responsible police agencies, those agencies where organized crime exists, are deprived of the use of this vital weapon, our generation and the generation that follows us and maybe the generation which follows them are going to live under organized crime.

I have been asked many times, do you think organized crime can be stamped out in this country? My answer is, if it can't be stamped, out, an awful crimp can be put in its operations. Give me the powers of a grand jury—perhaps strengthened a little bit—give me a period of 10 years, give me capable investigators and police officers, give the power of contempt, give me the use of proper legal wiretapping and I will guarantee you within 10 years there will be a big crimp in organized crime in this country. It is not a short-range deal. It is a long-range deal. But if we don't get after it now, this evil octopus is going to move until it gets hold of a lot of areas of our society we don't want it to get hold of.

Senator McClellan. It is like a disease, if we do not get it under control now it will be fatal.

Mr. Piggins. Five. Reply to Senator Edward V. Long.

During the past several months I have spoken by invitation to a number of audiences throughout the State of Michigan. In the context of those remarks, I have expressed criticism of certain procedures employed by the subcommittee chaired by Senator Edward V. Long, of Missouri. The Senator took issue with my comments and invited me to appear before his tribunal to answer. I promptly accepted advising him of several dates, any one of which he was free to choose from and on which a brief respite from my judicial responsibilities would permit my absence from Detroit. None of these dates were ever convenient for him and he persisted in inviting me on dates on which he knew, or should have known from my previous advice, that it was impossible to walk away from my obligations to the people of the State of Michigan. When Senator John McClellan, who with no apparent difficulty whatsoever, arranged a convenient date for my appearance, I suggested that Senator Long be invited to be present. I don't know if he is here or isn't. I also wrote Senator Long advising him of my planned appearance here and suggested that he attend to interrogate me if he wished.

What I propose to now say briefly for this record is more than a mere reply to the Senator from Missouri. I believe that it should be of considerable interest to this committee—which, incidentally, has cordially treated and courteously treated me—to the entire Congress and to the people of this country who should be vitally concerned in preserving the integrity of this high legislative body.

It is reasonable to assume that the Long subcommittee was established to conduct a fair, unprejudiced, open-minded inquiry into criminal law administration practices including but not limited to the propriety of the use of wiretapping devices, particularly by law enforcement agencies. I am sure many members of that committee, including Senator Hart, who is here, share that belief. Prior to the commencement of formal committee hearings in Washington, Senator Long visited Detroit and while there, on more than one occasion, publicly announced, and I am able to document these announcements by news releases, that he had already concluded that law enforcement officers should not be allowed to use wiretapping devices. He stated publicly that his hearings would serve "as a prime example of how corrupting wiretapping and eavesdropping can be." He announced that he had already learned that certain governmental agencies had been violating Federal, State, and local laws, and that government agents believed that they had a right to trample on citizens' rights. While he had already concluded that the use of wiretapping should be restricted to instances involving national security, without defining that vague phrase—and I might say that Arnold Toynbee has pointed out that 22 or 23 civilizations, world civilizations, have come and gone and 19 have gone down because of weakness within. And I think it was President Thomas Jefferson who said if this country is ever to be destroyed it will be destroyed by the enemy from within rather than by the enemy from without.

So when he is talking about national security I wish he would define that phrase—he stated bluntly to the utter astonishment of every sophisticated enforcement official in this country, that he did not consider crime of the Cosa Nostra or Mafia type a menace to national security. He proclaimed during a nationwide television documentary that he would make wiretapping illegal for all. He had already fathered the administration bill in the Senate which would impose harsh and unreasonable restrictions on the use of electronic detection and had authored a book—I don't know what the name of it was—I think it was called the "Intruders"—expounding the same general philosophy. All of this, gentlemen, before his formal Washington hearings of April 4, 1967, had ever commenced. Could there be any doubt that the chairman's mind had already been made up? Could there be any doubt that he had already arrived at preconceived conclusions? It is sacredly implicit in our American concept of justice and fair trial that no issue of importance should ever be decided until after a full, complete, and fair hearing of both sides. What Senator Long did, not only violated this basic American concept, but was tantamount to a judge deciding a case before he has heard all of the evidence. This is not the kind of committee procedure that strengthens the integrity of this high body. I stated and I repeat now that this procedure was wrong and un-American.

The majority of witnesses summoned to testify were able and highly respected Detroit career police officers and government agents. They were exposed to an atmosphere that strongly suggested that unless their testimony coincided with the Senator's preconceived conclusions it was unwelcome. They were interrogated in such a fashion as to leave the false impression that they themselves were deliberate law violators called only to confess their misdeeds before a television audience. This is clearly verified by the statement of the committee's chief counsel that "we decided to put the spotlight on Detroit" and that Detroit had been selected by the subcommittee "to choose which was the easiest to demonstrate the point we wanted to make." The Senator made much of affidavits, if indeed they were affidavits, of two individuals who were not even summoned to testify, both of whom had histories of emotional disturbance. He noticeably made no visible effort to summon the hierarchy of organized crime, the members of which are notoriously the most flagrant users of electronic interceptors. This not only resulted in a distortion but constituted a withholding, from the Congress and the people, of the total facts. This I say was wrong and un-American.

The distinguished Senator from Missouri, and I am sorry he is not here, stated on the committee record, obviously with Senate immunity but with absolutely no credible foundation in truth, that a respected Federal judge of the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals had not only permitted but had encouraged illegal wiretapping and bugging. It is in the record and I can point it out to you. He likewise indicated on the record that I had been invited to appear before him but had never found it convenient, when the real truth is that I had accepted his invitation and was waiting for him to select a date when I could leave the Michigan court and appear—incidentally, at my own expense. This, again, I say is wrong and un-American.

I take no sadistic pleasure in criticizing any one, but I should like to remind Senator Long that under our democratic philosophy of a free people, neither the figurative purple toga of a U.S. Senator nor the black robes of a judge cloak him with immunity from vocal expressions of public disapproval. Very often it has a valuable and humbling effect.

Gentlemen, I appreciate your consideration and your courtesy in listening to my comments which may have merely touched upon some aspects of a vital subject. May I close with this one observation. The real, the basic underlying cause—not the superficial efforts we make—of the predicament in which we Americans find ourselves today is a neglect of the simple moralities of life.

We have been too busy striving to amass a material fortune, seeking prestige and status, trying to reach the moon and accumulating physical and temporal comforts to devote the necessary proper time toward stressing the human ethical and moral virtues of life. Anybody who knows American history knows that. America's creation and its very existence rests on a bedrock foundation of morality and the greatest service that any public leader can render his country today is to point it back in that direction.

Senator McClellan. Judge Piggins, we thank you very much. You have presented a very forceful and persuasive statement with respect to legislation needed in certain areas of law enforcement. We have heard over 30 witnesses since these hearings began and I think your testimony this morning will be as helpful and useful as any we have had.

I share very deeply many of the views you have expressed and conclusions that you have reached regarding the crime situation in this country. I share with emphasis your statement that organized crime and lawlessness in this country have reached proportions which threaten national security. We find on this issue there are those who say they favor the use of wiretapping for national security, thinking in terms of a foreign enemy, I assume. But I think in terms of national security overall—which includes our internal security. As you point out, many great powers in the world have fallen from the impact of forces from within rather than asaults from without. To me the crime situation in this country is a danger to our security, to our national security.

I speak of it as our internal security, and if we are not able to reverse present trends it is only a matter of simple calculation to see chaos ahead. We have only to compare the rate that crime is increasing over and above the population increase to see that it is just like compounding interest. Project that ahead for the next 10 years and see where you are. I do not believe that this Nation can survive. I do not believe any sovereign power could survive without effective law enforcement. We cannot allow crime to prevail over society. I think action is urgent.

I appreciate your presence. With respect to the mutual numbers betting document that you submitted to us, with your permission I will have it printed in the record at this point as a part of your testimony, without objection.

(The document referred to follows) :

MUTUEL NUMBERS BETTING

The Detroit Metropolitan area presently operates two forms of mutuel betting, the Detroit number and the Pontiac number.

Mutuel numbers betting is made in three categories:

1. Mutuels: three digit betting.
2. Bolita: two digit betting.
3. Single action: single digit betting.

DETROIT NUMBER

The Detroit number is one of organizational control, derived from the minds of men. In contrast to the method used in determining the winning Pontiac Number which can be verified through the racing form and newspapers, the Detroit Number is impossible to verify because of its origin.

HOW OBTAINED

Selectors are chosen by the syndicate and operate by clandestine methods. The selectors are responsible to the big men of the syndicate and serve at their whim. It is the selectors responsibility to secure the two winning combination bets (three digits) daily except Sunday which are satisfactory to those paying service to the syndicate.

The first digit of the three number combination remains the same as the first digit of the first three number combination which is commonly referred to as the Pontiac number. After the first number has been determined the selectors contact all units throughout the area to arrange a second digit for the first win combination. The selectors, after contacting all units and having been informed by them what numbers are carrying the heaviest bets, arrange a second number compatible to all units with the least amount of money bet upon it. This process is followed throughout in the arranging of the first and last win combinations (mutuel betting) for the Netroit Number.

SIMILARITY BETWEEN THE DETROIT AND PONTIAC NUMBER

The first digit of the first win combination are alike in the Detroit and Pontiac numbers. The third digit of the first win combination becomes the first digit of the last win combination in both the Detroit and Pontiac numbers.

Example: Detroit winning number:

1st winning number	625
Last winning number	574
Pontiac winning number:
1st winning number	699
Last winning number	908

Post time of the fourth race of the preselected horse race track which is used to obtain the Pontiac Number is the same "deadline" used by the syndicate for the accepting of bets on the Detroit Number.

STIMULATING BUSINESS FOR THE DETROIT NUMBER

The Detroit Number is relatively new and had its beginning on April 28, 1964. Prior to this time the syndicate paid 500 to 1 odds on a winning bet. If a player placed a $2 bet he could expect to win $1,000. However many bettors are disappointed when the operators refuse to acknowledge the winning hit. Since the inception of the Detroit Number the syndicate has reduced the payoff odds on the Pontiac number to 400 to 1 and as low as 300 to 1 while increasing the payoff odds on the Detroit Number to 600 to 1 and as high as 700 to 1. The changing odds are an instrument toward encouraging a greater influx of business on the "fixed", Detroit Number. The odds of a bettor hitting on the Pontiac Number are 1000 to 1 (000–999). The odds of a bettor hitting on the Detroit Number are infinitesimal, because of the manner in which is is contrived.

PAYMENT TO SYNDICATE FOR SERVICE

Those operators expressing disdain for the organization and refusing to pay for the service performed are rapidly enlightened to the advantages of compliance. Those that remain adamant are lined up with large bets and the syndicate arranges the bets placed to become the winning numbers. The last five gangland murders were directly related to organized gambling.

PONTIAC NUMBER

The Pontiac Number receives its name from the city of Pontiac. The syndicate devised this system and its results are published throughout Michigan, Ohio, and sections of Canada, which shows its extensive influence. This system publishes two winning numbers daily except Sunday. The mutuel houses customarily pay 500 to 1 odds on a win combination, a three digit number. The mutuel houses gain a 2 to 1 advantage because there are a possible 1,000 combinations.

The winning number for this system is determined by computing the mutuel prices paid at a preselected horse race track.

Detroit syndicates only use those tracks having totalisators (tote-boards). In the summertime the Illinois tracks are used and in the winter the southern tracks are used for the determination of the winning number.

"Deadline" is that time of the day when the syndicate refuses to permit further collection of mutuel bets and all bet tickets must be in responsible, trusted hands. "Deadline" is established as post time of the fourth race of the preselected horse race track. At this time the syndicate is able to determine the first digit of the first winning combination.

The first eight races of the preselected horse race track are used to compile the two win combinations for mutuel numbers betting. If the race results in a dead heat, all mutuel prices posted are included.

METHOD OF OBTAINING WINNING NUMBER COMBINATIONS

The following winning combinations for mutuel numbers was extracted on June 20, 1967 from the preselected Arlington Park race track:

1st race mutuel prices

Horse	Win	Place	Show
Horatio C	$4.00	$3.00	$2.60
My Favor		17.60	10.00
My Opinion			4.40
Total mutuel win		41.60

1st race paid	$41.60
2d race paid	72.40
3d race paid	20.80
4th race paid	41.80	"Deadline" for accepting mutuel bets.
4 races paid	176.60	Digit 6, the 1st number to the left of the decimal point becomes the 1st digit of the first winning combination.
5th race paid	32.80
5 races paid	209.40	Digit 9, the 1st number to the left of the decimal point becomes the 2d digit of the 1st winning combination.
6th race paid	20.20
6 races paid	229.60	Digit 9, the 1st number to the left of the decimal point becomes the 3d and last digit of the 1st winning combination.

First winning mutuel number: 699.

In selecting a last winning number combination under this system, the last digit of the first winning combination automatically becomes the first digit of the last winning combination. On this date, Number 9 became the first digit of the last winning combination.

7th race paid	$20.60
7 races paid	250.20	Digit 0, the 1st number to the left of the decimal point becomes the 2d digit of the last winning combination.
8th race paid	18.60
8 races paid	268.80	Digit 8, the 1st number to the left of the decimal point becomes the 3d and last digit of the last winning combination.

First winning mutuel number: 699.
Last winning number: 908.

TYPES OF BETS

Each winning number is called a race, for example if the bettor wishes to bet on only the first winning combination for the day he will make the notation F.R. (first race) on the bet ticket. If the bettor desires to bet on only the second winning combination for the day he will make the notation L.R. (last race) on the bet ticket. If the bettor wishes to bet on both winning combinations for the day he will make the notation B.R. (both races) on the bet ticket.

Bets are recorded in triplicate in a book called a "K" book. The original ticket (yellow) is delivered to the "house" for tabulation. The first copy (thin white tissue) is left in the "K" book as a record for the writer. The second copy (white) is given to the bettor as his record of the bet. When a writer is recording a bet in the "K" book he will first record the date in the space provided at the top of the ticket and then record the name, initial or other identifying mark or code of the bettor in the square provided in the upper right hand corner of the ticket.

Assuming that the bettor desires to bet the number 563 for $2 in the first race, the writer will then record this bet as follows: 563—$1 F.R. The writer will then total the amount of the bets and record it in the square provided at the lower right hand portion of the ticket marked "Total Sales". If the bettor desires to bet the number in both races, the total of his bet will be doubled.

The term "boxing a number" is explained as follows: The bettor wishes to bet the number 563 in a box for $2; this means that the bettor desires to bet on all combinations of this number. For example: if the number 635 would win the bettor would have the winning number. This bet is recorded in the "K" book as follows: 563—$2. Inasmuch as there are six possible combinations the total bet would cost $12 for the first race and $24 for both races. However, if the bettor desires to bet a number in which the same digit appears twice, such as 565, there are only three possible combinations that could win and the cost of the bet would only be tripled.

A bettor can place any amount of money, beginning with one cent, if he so desires, on a number. However most mutuel houses in the Detroit area limit the amount of the bet to $5 on any one number.

The bulk of numbers bets are recorded in "K" books, however, in such places as factories or hospitals where the supervision is strict in relation to the writing of numbers and it is not practical to carry a "K" book, the bets are then recorded an any piece of paper that might be available to the bettor or writer. In many cases these bets have been recorded on the back of invoices, napkins, order blanks, and even on toilet tissue. In these cases there will only be two copies of this bet, one is delivered to the "house" for tabulation, and a copy is retained by the bettor or writer for his own record.

BOLITA

In betting "Bolita" the player bets two digit numbers instead of three. The bettor bets any combination of two numbers from 00 to 99. There are a possible 100 different combinations. If the player hits, he is paid off at odds of 49 to 1. In making bets the player must play at least 25 cents on any two digit number. If he desires to play more, his bet must be in multiples of 25 cents. The same numbers posted by mutuel houses as winning numbers in three digit playing are used as payoff numbers in Bolita. In making a bet the player must indicate what "station" or position he is wagering his two numbers to hit, they must be consecutive stations. For example, he can bet on the first and second digit, the second and third, the third and fourth, or the fourth and fifth. On June 20, 1967, the five winning digits were 69908. On this date the four winning "Bolita" combinations would have been 69, 99, 90 and 08.

If a player would have bet 69 to hit in the first two stations (the first and second winning digits) he would have a winner and would be paid off at odds of 49 to 1 for every quarter so bet. Inasmuch as the same winning numbers are used in Bolita as in the three digit mutuel numbers play, the same deadline for accepting bets also prevails.

A writer will accept bets on the first two winning numbers up until post time of the fourth race of the race track which was preselected for the winning numbers. Bets will be accepted on the second and third digits up to "post time" of the fifth race, and so on. This type of betting is getting more popular with players daily as they can bet on four winning combinations daily instead of two as in three digit mutuel betting. Another big advantage to this type of betting is that the writer usually has the bank roll with him and the player gets paid off as soon as the winning digits become known.

SINGLE ACTION

This form of betting is similar to "Bolita" and "Mutuels" (the three digits betting) inasmuch as the numbers used to determine the winners are the same. The term "single action" speaks for itself—it is a system of betting on each individual number with the same deadline for accepting bets prevailing. In the same as Bolita, the bettor is required to bet a minimum of 25 cents and if he so desires to bet more his bet must be in multiples of 25 cents. The winners are paid off at 6 to 1 odds. This is an attractive form of betting and has grown in popularity in recent years. The reason for this is that the bettor places his bet with the writer and as soon as the first number is released, he collects his winnings and has about 20 minutes to place his bet on the second digit and so on. The writers for single action usually station themseves in poolrooms, stores, barbershops, etc., and accept their bets and then call them into a central office where the record of each bet is kept. The writer receives 20 percent of the money bet as his commission. However, some houses will pay as high as 25 percent, depending upon the volume of business the writer has.

METHOD OF OPERATION

The entire process must start with the player who has chosen his bet for the day and will then contact his writer who may be stationed in a home or business place which is called a "walk-in" station or may accept bets by phone. Some writers will walk about their neighborhood accepting bets from their players. The writer will gather all these bets and put them into an envelope which is called a "book" and await the arrival of the "pick-up-man" (women engage in these activities as frequently as men). The pick-up-man will collect several "books" from locations across the entire city and convey them to either a "Substation" or "drop". In a large operation, to eliminate heavy traffic at any one location, several "substations" may be used. At each "substation", three or four "route men" will turn in their "books" and then one person will transport the "bag" to the "main drop". This insures secrecy as fewer persons know the location of the "Subdrop" or "Maindrop" and by eliminating traffic at these locations it makes detection more difficult. Prior to post time of the fourth race at the preselected horse race track, which is known as "deadline", all bets must be in the drop and prepared for delivery to the "office" or to an "office worker" by the "bag man". Generally only the "bag man" will know the identity of the "office worker" and he is completely trusted by the "house". The "bag" leaves the "drop" and is conveyed to "the meet" with the greatest caution and secrecy and must be delivered just before deadline.

Once in the hands of the office worker the bets are taken to the "office" and tabulated to determine the amount of money to be collected from each route. After the winning numbers are known the bets are checked for "hits" and each route has a "tape" run showing the total amount of bets, hits to be paid out and the profit or loss. These tapes travel down the chain of command in the organization and the organization then sets out to collect their profits, payoff on hits and secure the necessary supplies for the next days business.

Senator McCLELLAN. With respect to our colleague, Senator Long, the Chair wants the record to show that I, of course, did not have time to read your statement which we just received. I think you did advise us, however, that you had written to Senator Long inviting him to be here.

Mr. PIGGINS. Suggesting that he be here. I have no power to invite him.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I assumed the Senator would use his own discretion. I did not take it on myself to invite him again. I had no idea what you were going to say.

Mr. PIGGINS. Perhaps if his counsel is here, I would be glad to answer any questions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Of course Senator Long is chairman of a subcommittee, and he is functioning in accordance with his standards and ideals. I am not commenting upon that. Should he desire to make any statement, he may, and he may appear before this subcommittee if he should like. He may prefer to continue with his committee and make his record there of what he wants to have in support of his position.

Mr. PIGGINS. I am sure you understand my comment related to Senator Long and not to the members of that committee. Senator Hart is a member of that committee. My comments were related to Senator Long and not to the members of that committee.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I understand and Senator Hart is a member of this subcommittee and he is your Senator, I believe. He is a valuable member of this subcommittee, I might say. While we do not always agree, he brings up strong arguments and presentations for his points of view and most often we do agree. He has heard your testimony this morning, and in view of the fact he is your Senator, the Chair is going to defer to him for first questioning.

Senator Hart.

Senator HART. It would not be fair of me to abuse the chairman's privilege by now asking 20 minutes of questions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Proceed.

Senator HART. I really have not that many questions. Perhaps I might in a sense repeat the chairman's question.

In light of the recent Supreme Court decision to which you make reference which evaluated the New York statute, you say that you believe we could constitutionally provide for wiretapping. Do you believe than under the language of that decision such a statute could be drafted without having as preliminary conditions to the authorization of the tap so much disclosure and advertising and conditions as to make absolutely useless the resulting tap? As I read that decision, and I confess I read it the way layers are not supposed to read it, thinking about two other things and listening to a Senate debate, I got the impression that the New York statute went further than any statute that we have seen in State jurisdictions, and yet failed to meet the constitutional test, because among other things it did not advise in public with sufficient particularity the taps, the period, and the persons.

Now, if you were to write a statute that did that, would not that be sort of putting a label on the phone, "Don't use it if you are engaged in illegal transportation or activity"?

Mr. PIGGINS. It also talked about trespass. I have talked with individuals—not directly, but indirectly—who participated in writing the amicus curiae. The impression I get from reading it, and I recognize that there could be different impressions, is that it did not come right out and say wiretapping per se is wrong. It said the New York statute was wrong because of certain defects. Now, it seems to me that the Congress, by legislation could well cure those defects.

Now, if the defects are cured and another test case made of it, and the Supreme Court says, well, it is still wrong because it is a violation of the search and seizure provisions of the Constitution, or it is a violation of the first amendment, there isn't much you can do about it. The onus then is on the Supreme Court. I don't know whether they will go that far. But I would say that if they went that far, the thinking was more sociological than it is legal.

Senator HART. The chairman has identified me as one of your Senators. I do not want to fly under false colors, but I know because of reading the earlier record you have some difficulty of my sort of a schizophrenic feeling on this wiretap business.

Mr. PIGGINS. No: I really don't.

Senator ERVIN. That is encouraging because I have the same feeling.

Mr. PIGGINS. I know you personally, I know your family background and I would have an idea as to what your feelings are. I have not, to tell you the truth, read any specific quotation as to how you feel.

Senator HART. Well, this subject was a matter of hearing by the Judiciary Committee the first year I landed here—that was 1959—and I suppose it goes back before that.

Senator SCOTT. Was there not a time when the Attorney General, Robert Kennedy, testified in favor of a wiretapping bill which had been brought up before the committee?

Senator HART. Now you know, in case you did not know before, Hugh Scott's party—you know exactly what it is now. But you are wrong, Senator. That was 1959 and that was when——

Senator SCOTT. Was it not when he first came here?

Senator HART. Attorney General Rogers came up. In 1961 Kennedy came up.

Senator SCOTT. And recommended passage of a wiretapping bill.

Senator HART. Yes, he did.

Senator SCOTT. I want the record to be clear on that.

Senator HART. I disagreed with both Attorney General Rogers and Attorney General Kennedy. I did not buy the idea that we could balance out these competing principles, society's interest, the individual's rights in the fashion that they proposed it without doing more damage than good. I still have terrible difficulty convincing myself that there is a way. You mentioned the kidnaper and the parent—of course you describe the feeling of the parent. He would do anything to insure the recovery of the child and the punishment of the kidnaper.

Mr. PIGGINS. I might point out, Senator, that there are very relatively—with the exception of District Attorney Hogan's statement in New York, the average metropolitan police department does not day in and day out do wiretapping. It is a rare thing. It is only used in cases of extreme importance and emergency. If you can say that it is unconstitutional and you cannot balance the rights of the individual against society, how do you justify search and seizure which has been the law in this country since the enactment of the fourth amendment?

Senator HART. This analogy has been suggested and I respect it up to a point. I can follow it up to a point. I think we will all agree that there are distinctions which to some of us, suggest that there is a difference. This is a particular property designated. There is a particular tangible object that may be obtained. Nothing else, nothing else incidental may be picked up. How in Heaven's name do you avoid the incidentals that you pick up on a telephone? This, you see, is where I think the analogy breaks.

Mr. PIGGINS. Maybe the advance of technology will be able to screen that out. I don't know.

Let me give you another example. I am sure you have been on a boat, a yacht, and you heard a ship-to-shore radio and you have heard a dozen conversations that you didn't want to hear and didn't intend to hear innocently. I don't know where you are going to be able to eliminate it unless they have some kind of fantastic scrambler, and I wouldn't put anything past the technological brains of this country. They can do anything.

Senator HART. We are in agreement on that one. As a matter of fact, I have suggested that a few years from now all of this will be a pretty academic case—because of that police commissioner job, you are better able to make this guess than I—but I assume that the day is not long distant when our thoughts will be known. We have the lie detector with all of its fallibility now—that involves, as I understand, some physical contact with you. But the day after tomorrow, as history runs, and I am sure we all know how we each feel about the other and thank God we will not be alive to see it, but in any event, this will become academic, I suspect. But in the meantime, with you and others, we will try to gear up a Federal response that is adequate. I am delighted that you came today.

Incidentally, I thank you—I did not realize the correspondence you have had with Senator Long. I am very grateful you did not involve me as your social secretary on that one. I think I am lucky and you were kind—thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Ervin?

Senator ERVIN. Case and Comment which is a lawyer's magazine for May–June 1967 has this to say:

> The existence of crime, the talk about crime, the reports of crime and the fear of crime have eroded the basic quality of life of many Americans. A commission study conducted in high crime areas of two large cities found that:
> 43 percent of the respondents stay off the streets at night because of their fear of crime.
> 35 percent say they do not speak to strangers any more because of their fear of crime.
> 21 percent say they use cars and cabs at night because of their fear of crime.
> 20 percent say they would like to move to another neighborhood because of their fear of crime.
> The findings of the Commission's national survey generally support those of the local surveys. One-third of a representative sample of all Americans say it is unsafe to walk alone at night in their neighborhoods.

Do you not think those facts indicate that Congress ought to do something to protect those who do not wish to be murdered, raped or robbed?

Mr. PIGGINS. Very clearly, very definitely they do. There are people in large cities in this country today, as you pointed out, who can't find areas where they can take a walk after dark for fear of rape or assault or mugging or some other crime. And when we reach that stage in this country I think as Senator McClellan has pointed out, we are getting pretty close to national insecurity.

Senator ERVIN. You are familiar with the Miranda case, are you not?

Mr. PIGGINS. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. The Miranda case is based on these words of the fifth amendment: "No person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case." Do you not think these words require the interpretation which was placed on them by the Supreme Court of the United States and virtually all other Federal courts from the time of the writing of the Bill of Rights down to June 13 of last year; namely, that they apply only to testimony which is compelled or required?

Mr. PIGGINS. Do you mean Senator, do I agree with Miranda?

Senator ERVIN. I am asking the exact opposite, I think. Do not those words in your view, apply only to testimony which one is compelled to give?

Mr. PIGGINS. I think that's a fair interpretation. If you were going to put it the other way around, then even a confession would never be admissible because a confession is made by the defendant and even though it is now admissible on the basis of voluntariness freely made, if a person does not have to take the stand or can't be compelled to testify against himself, on that theory you can't even use his confession.

Senator ERVIN. Those words have no possible application to voluntary statements, do they?

Mr. PIGGINS. I don't think they do. I think it is stretching it a little far.

Senator ERVIN. They also do not apply unless a man is a witness, is that not correct?

Mr. PIGGINS. Of course, he can't be a witness in a criminal case unless he takes the stand himself. That's the purpose of the amendment. If he does that, that's a different story.

Senator ERVIN. The third condition is that there must be a case which is a criminal case, or a case that can result in subsequent criminal prosecution against the witnesses.

Mr. PIGGINS. Which could incriminate him, as the amendment said.

Senator ERVIN. Now, do you see how anyone who has any proper regard for the plain meaning of the word of the English language can say that the words "No person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case" have any possible application to a voluntary confession by a person who is not a witness, made in a colloquy with a police officer?

Mr. PIGGINS. I may agree with you. I don't like to be in a position as a lawyer or a judge of criticizing those decisions. I don't mean to say I agree with them. There are many cases I disagree with them. But I think they have stretched it a little bit. They have not only stretched it, they have not only stretched the significance of the law, but the meaning of the word. I pointed out awhile ago the reason for search and seizure in the fourth amendment.

Senator ERVIN. I used to have some reluctance to criticize things myself—court decisions—until I read what Chief Justice Harlan Stone said. He said where courts deal, as ours do, with great public questions, careful scrutiny and frank criticism constitute the only protection we have against unwise decisions and against judicial usurpation.

Mr. PIGGINS. What you are saying is something very important. I think many people forget this, that the Supreme Court decisions in the final analysis may take time. Eventually we will be governed by public opinion.

Senator ERVIN. The Miranda decision states in substance that even a voluntary confession made by the accused in custody to a law enforcement officer will be excluded unless it appears that prior to the making of the confession the law enforcement officer stated to the accused that he didn't have to say anything, that anything he said could be used against him, that he didn't have to answer any questions unless he had a lawyer present and that if he was unable to get a lawyer of his own the court would appoint one, and that even in these cases he could not waive those requirements unless he stated expressly and in substance that he did not want a lawyer and wanted to make a statement.

And it had to be made within a reasonable time after the police officer gave such a warning. Do you not think those rules result in keeping people from making voluntary confessions?

Mr. PIGGINS. There is no doubt about it. Let me answer your question by asking another.

There is an old basic fundamental legal maxim that I learned in law school—ignorance of the law is no excuse. Every man is presumed to know the law. But apparently that is not the rule today. He is not presumed to know the law. You have to tell him that he is entitled to keep quiet and entitled to a lawyer. What has happened to the old legal maxim?

Senator ERVIN. Under the Miranda decision you may have the most brilliant professor or teacher of constitutional law, or the most learned judge in the United States, and if he was arrested for a traffic violation—I will not make it more serious in this hypothetical question—his voluntary confession that he was violating the traffic laws could not be received in evidence against him unless the police officer who stopped him first, told him all of these things; isn't that so? It makes no exception.

Mr. PIGGINS. I think you can stretch to the ridiculous. It may be that every second-story burglar from now on will carry his lawyer with him. That is going pretty far.

Senator ERVIN. They almost held that in a couple of cases. They said the victim of a crime could not be permitted to look at the accused unless the accused had a lawyer.

Mr. PIGGINS. My suggestion, of course, carrying it to an extreme, will put the old lawyer out of business because it will be rather difficult for him to climb through a window.

Senator ERVIN. What percentage of those who commit serious crimes do not already know that they do not have to say anything and do not already know that whatever they say derogatory will be used against them and do not already know that they do not have to talk unless they have a lawyer?

Mr. PIGGINS. The punk on the street knows that who does not have much of a record yet——

Senator ERVIN. So, as a practical matter, the Federal and State courts throughout the United States are constantly being compelled by the Miranda decision to allow to go unwhipped of justice, persons who have voluntarily confessed that they committed the crime with which they are charged, simply because the police officer does not tell them something they already know. Is that not a fact?

Mr. PIGGINS. That is exactly right.

Senator ERVIN. The court held, 2 weeks ago, that a victim of a crime cannot be permitted to look at a suspect in custody for the purpose of determining whether or not the victim can identify the suspect unless the lawyer of the suspect is present.

Do you think there is any provision in the Constitution that would justify such a holding as that?

Mr. PIGGINS. I think it is carrying it pretty far. I think it was a great impeding process to the police. If you have ever seen a showup, they walk across the stage and have them stop five or six suspects, have them turn right and left. They can't see the audience, but the audience can see them.

What earthly value is a lawyer going to be at that stage of the proceedings, except to say to his client, "Don't go in the showup?" I don't—I just can't understand it. I haven't read that decision.

Senator ERVIN. The only reason the court gives for it is, in effect, that the lawyer would be better prepared to combat the evidence about identifying—the evidence of the victim identifying the suspect at the trial if he was present at the confrontation. I would ask if the same thing would not apply at the time the crime was committed. Would not the lawyer be better prepared to defend the man on the criminal charge if he was present and saw all of the events that occurred at the time the crime was committed?

Mr. PIGGINS. Depends on the lawyer.

Senator ERVIN. So, the logical extent of these cases would be for the court to hold next that you cannot prosecute a man unless you have a lawyer present who was also present at the time he allegedly committed the crime giving rise to the criminal charge.

Mr. PIGGINS. All of which is enough to verify Joe Cook's jokes that all lawyers are criminals to begin with.

Senator ERVIN. Sam Johnson said, "Oh Justice, what crimes are perpetrated in thy name."

Mr. PIGGINS. Exactly right.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Scott.

Senator SCOTT. Judge, from your earlier testimony I wanted to comment on these close decisions of the Supreme Court, 5-to-4 decisions, for instance. They seem to me to—and I would like to know whether you agree—have had a teeterboard effect on the law—you have already said you think it reflects the uncertainty of the bench, the bar, and the public as to what is the law. Since so many major turns are occurring in legal precedents on 5-to-4 decisions one way or the other, and the Court has veered both ways lately—the justice who has had that swing vote in effect, is he not in a way creating a new maxim here of one man, one law?

Mr. PIGGINS. I suppose in a sense that one man then creates the law for 100 million people. On the other hand, a majority, a simple majority, perhaps in some legislative action is permissible where one man can swing.

Senator SCOTT. This is our system, but it does illustrate that the Constitution is all sails and no anchor. We are running into troubles with the system we have to live with and justify.

With reference to what you said about what is happening to the maximum of ignorance of the law, excluding no one, perhaps we ought to amend that and say ignorance of the law excludes no one except four members of the Supreme Court at any one time.

Mr. PIGGINS. Senator, you have a point there that gives rise to some good thoughts. I think there are certain issues which come before the Congress which require two-thirds vote or more than a simple majority and it may well be in certain matters which come before the Supreme Court, I think that is within your power to legislate, that there should be more than a simple majority, that there might be two-thirds vote of something. At least it's worthy of consideration.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What if we so legislated and the Supreme Court held the legislation unconstitutional?

Mr. PIGGINS. We get back to our basic system of a government by checks and balances. It depends on the individuals who grace the High Bench at that time.

Senator SCOTT. What would you think of the comment made by a previous witness, the district attorney of Philadelphia, Mr. Arlen Spector, who suggests in his testimony that it would be highly desirable for the Supreme Court to conduct extensive hearings and consider much basic evidentiary material before making fundamental modifications in the constitutional law?

Mr. PIGGINS. You mean they should hear evidence?

Senator SCOTT. If they are going to make fundamental modifications he suggests the possibility that they have before them, not necessarily a hearing of evidence, but as he puts it, they conduct extensive hearings in order to consider much basic evidentiary material.

In other words, hearing above and beyond the arguments of counsel. This is a normal thought. I'm not adopting it as my own, but I wonder what your reaction is.

Mr. PIGGINS. It is a new concept, of course. I presume the court has a right to lay down its own rules of procedure. We never had appellate courts where they go beyond the judicial hearing or conduct hearings from others who are not lawyers. It may have merit. But if these decisions keep coming down the way they are, there may be some clamor for some such things as that.

Senator SCOTT. One other thing. I have before me the Congressional Quarterly fact sheet which points out that not until the 1960's did these efforts, that is, to enact a wiretap bill, relate to crime. In the 1950's the issue of consequence was subversive activities and in 1954 the House passed a bill that legalized the use of wiretapping in national security prosecutions. The Kennedy administration in 1961 endorsed a proposal for a wiretapping law authorizing Federal agencies to wiretap in cases of national security, organized crime, and other serious crimes and placed no limit on State wiretapping.

In 1962 the Kennedy administration sent a bill to Congress somewhat more restrictive, authorizing Federal wiretapping in cases of national security, organized crime, and other serious crimes, limited statewide tapping in certain serious crimes, and then in 1963 following the Cosa Nostra hearings, Attorney General Kennedy proposed legislation which included the provisions granting immunity to witnesses in certain court cases.

I read that because I have to confess a certain inconsistency of my own—that is the difficulty of speaking outright and discussing these matters—that I supported Attorney General Kennedy at that time. I find myself in somewhat an embarrassing position of having cosponsored the Long bill and having publicly to admit some doubts about that bill as to whether or not we should seriously consider the inclusion of organized crime within the wiretapping proposal. It is always difficult to admit that you may have been wrong. But I am afraid that I may have been, so at this point I would have an open mind and am very much concerned, especially because of the impact of your testimony and other matters that I have read since and particularly the Supreme Court's recent decisions in such matters as the Berger case. But I do thank you very much.

I would like to conclude, if I may, with one comment. I do not want to delay the next witness.

Like yourself, I have had a good deal of experience with criminal law and I have no doubt whatever, that in many major cities, perhaps in most of them, organized protection of organized crime is widespread, protection which continues to be made for the operation of houses of prostitution, for the highly affluent and prosperous numbers games and I have read the testimony of the next witness and I will not comment on that at this point, but I wish there were more muckraking than less. I wish there were more exposures of the kind of protection I had to deal with as a senior assistant district attorney, the kind of protection I am certain exists today and exists to support political parties, among other doubtful fringe benefits. I think it is extremely dangerous. I think it will destroy the organization of our system and viability unless something is done about it. This is not a question, but I wanted to indicate that your testimony has been most helpful and I appreciate it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Thank you kindly.

Mr. PIGGINS. Thank you, Senator.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR EDWARD V. LONG, DEMOCRAT, OF MISSOURI, RELATIVE TO TESTIMONY OF JUDGE EDWARD S. PIGGINS, JULY 1, 1967

Senator LONG. Senator McClellan, chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, has this morning furnished me a copy of a proposed statement to be made before his subcommittee by Judge Edward S. Piggins of Detroit, Mich. I have read those portions of Judge Piggins' statement which are critical of the activities of my subcommittee.

First, let me say that I share Mr. Piggins' concern about the increase in organized crime. My voting record proves this conclusively as I have supported numerous measures to aid in the fight against organized crime. As chairman of the Senate National Penitentiaries Subcommittee, I have worked closely with the Bureau of Prisons and the Department of Justice to improve our Federal correction system. My efforts in this area will continue.

The public records of my Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure contain testimony to the effect that the Detroit Police Department was active in the use of modern electronic surveillance devices. When Judge Piggins was the commissioner of police, our records indicate that there was considerable illegal wiretapping and eavesdropping by the Detroit police. If Commissioner Piggins did not know of these illegal activities, he should have known.

During our investigations in Detroit and during the course of the hearings, we received the full cooperation of Mr. Ray Girardin, the present commissioner of police in Detroit. It would seem that Mr. Girardin would be the best judge as to what adverse effect, if any, our inquiries had upon either the morale or effectiveness of the Detroit Police Department.

Judge Piggins did not attend the hearings of my subcommittee and our records fail to reflect that he was ever furnished with a transcript. I have today instructed my staff to furnish him with a typewritten transcript in lieu of our yet unprinted hearing record which I hope will put his anxiety at rest. If, after having read the record, he still has reservations, we will again endeavor to afford him an opportunity to express the same on the record.

After 2 years of investigating eavesdropping and wiretapping, I do not believe it unusual that I should have reached a definitive stand on the subject. I introduced the administration's Right of Privacy Act because I shared the opposition of the President and the Attorney General to the unconstitutional and unconscionable use of these electronic devices. A majority of the Supreme Court recently placed severe limitations on State law enforcement eavesdropping and the Attorney General has issued regulations stopping Federal use. Thus, it appears rather clear that I do not stand alone in advocating the right of privacy.

Senator McCLELLAN. Attorney General Sennett, if you will come around, please, sir. Senator Scott is recognized.

Senator SCOTT. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I take great pleasure in introducing at this time the attorney general of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the Honorable William C. Sennett.

Attorney General Sennett was in private practice in Pennsylvania for 10 years, was a special assistant attorney general in 1963, executive assistant to the then Lieutenant Governor Shafer and in 1966 was appointed by him as attorney general and is representative of Governor Shafer's highly commendable practice in naming a cabinet who combine youth and experience.

Interestingly, the cabinet is 10 years younger on the average than the cabinet of his immediate predecessor, which also was a very good one. I take pleasure in presenting Attorney General Sennett to you.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Mr. Attorney General, you may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM C. SENNETT, ATTORNEY GENERAL, COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SENNETT. Thank you, Senator McClellan.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you, Senator Scott for the graciousness of your remarks in introducing me to the chairman and to the members of the committee.

I direct my remarks to organized crime and to the legislation which is currently before you, S. 675.

Thank you for inviting me here today. I very much appreciate this opportunity to appear before the subcommittee to discuss some of the critical facets of our crime crises.

First, I must commend this subcommittee for the fine work you are doing here. The agonizing problems in our criminal justice system will not submit to simple solutions. This subcommittee has taken an intelligent, determined, and dedicated approach in its attempt to solve many of our perplexing crime problems by much-needed legislation.

The enacting of criminal statutes requires great care and deliberation. The criminal law, it is said, is the cutting edge of the law. In a free society, it is critical that the cutting edge be tempered in the interest of individual liberty.

Mr. Chairman, the core-center of our freedom is undoubtedly the right to privacy. Privacy or the right to be left alone by government unless there is cause for contact, is indispensable to our way of life.

But evil men must not be assured the sanctuary of privacy to plot the criminal destruction of our communities.

In April of this year, the Governor of Pennsylvania, Raymond P. Shafer, said:

> The National Security is today being threatened by crime. We must not limit an effective war on crime just as we would not restrict a total effort against any foreign aggression, if we allow the use of electronic devices to prevent an enemy nation from endangering our national security, why should we prohibit the use of such devices to prevent or help eliminate this present domestic danger?
> The legitimate interest of society, for its own protection, requires that law enforcement agencies be able to use wiretapping and electronic listening devices in their fight against Twentieth Century crime.

These remarks of Governor Shafer project Pennsylvania's view that there is immediate need for wiretapping authority in order to combat crime—particularly organized crime. I am here today to document that "need" for this subcommittee.

Pennsylvanians have become increasingly alarmed by several warnings issued by the President's National Crime Commission. That Commission's specific identification of a National Confederation of Organized Criminals, together with its ominous report that some of the tentacles of this deadly confederation reach deep into Pennsylvania, make it imperative that our system of criminal justice in Pennsylvania have the capacity to respond to this creeping menace.

According to the National Crime Commission:

> Organized crime is a society that seeks to operate outside the control of the American people and their governments. It involves thousands of criminals, working within structures as complex as those of any large corporation, subject to laws more rigidly enforced than those of legitimate governments. Its actions are not impulsive but rather the result of intricate conspiracies, carried on over many years and aimed at gaining control over whole fields of activity in order to amass huge profits.

And further, the President's Crime Commission emphasized:

> The purpose of organized crime is not competition with visible, legal government but nullification of it. When organized crime places an official in public office, it nullifies the political process. When it bribes a police official, it nullifies law enforcement.

If this be true, as I think we can accept it as being true, then internally organized crime is in fact—as Governor Shafer has indicated—a clear and present danger to our national security.

Further, in carefully documented reports, the President's Crime Commission unequivocally emphasized the failure of current National and State efforts to control organized crime. This, coupled with the almost universal belief that traditional investigative techniques by law-enforcement officers are not adequate to confront high echelon organized crime figures, makes the demand for new techniques to combat crime imperative.

Should these new law enforcement techniques so necessary to combat crime in this country include authority for eavesdropping? Mr. Justice Black seems to suggest one answer for us in his dissenting opinion in the Berger case:

> Today this country is painfully realizing that evidence of crime is difficult for governments to secure. Criminals are shrewd and constantly seek, too often successfully, to conceal their tracks and their outlawry from law officers. But in carrying on their nefarious practices professional criminals usually talk considerably. Naturally, this talk is done, they hope, in a secret way that will keep it from being heard by law enforcement authorities or by others who might report to the authorities.
> In this situation "eavesdroppers," "informers," and "squealers," as they are variously called, are helpful, even though unpopular, agents of law enforcement. And it needs no empirical studies or statistics to establish that eavesdropping testimony plays an important role in exposing criminals and bands of criminals who but for such evidence would go along their criminal way with little possibility of exposure, prosecution, or punishment . . . .
> The eavesdrop evidence here shows this petitioner to be a briber, a corrupter of trusted public officials, a poisoner of the honest administration of government, upon which good people must depend to obtain the blessings of a decent orderly society.
> No man's privacy, property, liberty or life is secure, if organized or even unorganized criminals can go their way unmolested, ever and ever further in their unabandoned lawlessness. However obnoxious eavesdroppers may be, they are assuredly not engaged in a more "ignoble" or "dirty business" than are bribers, thieves, burglars, robbers, rapists, kidnappers and murderers, not to speak of others.
> And it cannot be denied that to deal with such specimens of our society, eavesdroppers are not merely useful, they are frequently a necessity.

Mr. Justice White in the same case, Berger v. New York, also focused on the necessity for electronic eavesdropping authority:

> If the security of the National Government is a sufficient interest to render eavesdropping reasonable, on what tenable basis can a contrary conclusion be reached when a state asserts a purpose to prevent the corruption of its major officials, to protect the integrity of its fundamental processes, and to maintain itself as a viable institution? The serious threat which organized crime poses to our society has been frequently documented. The interrelation between organized crime and corruption of governmental officials is likewise well established, and the enormous difficulty of eradicating both forms of social cancer is proved by the persistence of the problems if by nothing else.

The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice in an in-depth report on organized crime in the United States presented a detailed analysis of the death of a city. Not a mythical city—but a city mythically called Wincanton. Some have wondered where Wincanton, U.S.A., is located. Where it is, is not important. What is important is the tragic fact that organized crime literally stripped the honor, decency, and government of the city, layer by layer. When the gangsters finished, nothing was left of the soul of the city.

In Wincanton, the chief racketeer-overlord with "national connections" contracted, bartered, and sold the position of chief of police for $10,000. The mayor, the police chief, and the police department were paid on a weekly basis, by the overlord and his syndicate. The chief racketeer gave the police specific instructions to keep hands off gambling and prostitution within the city.

With this kind of stranglehold on the government of the city, the city's growth and development was choked and its government paralyzed.

Who can deny that this city was put to plunder? Who can deny that democratic government in this city was totally and ruthlessely destroyed by criminals? Who can deny that the capture of this city by organized criminals was as great a threat, if not a greater threat to the city's security than invasion by hostile armies? Mr. Chairman, and members of the subcommittee, let us not delude ourselves, our very national security is at stake in this battle to combat crime.

Where is Wincanton, U.S.A.? Wincanton will be everywhere unless we get the investigative tools needed to bring organized crime to its knees.

Is there a need for court-approved eavesdropping? What kind of evidence is produced by this investigative device? Little is written on the subject, but recently the U.S. District Court of the District of Rhode Island made summaries of 10 days electronic surveillance an official part of the record in a pending organized crime prosecution in that district.

These 10 days of electronic surveillance show in graphic detail the day-to-day, hour-to-hour, minute-to-minute machinations of New England's No. 1 criminal czar.

These electronic surveillances revealed private criminal conversations by this New England czar wherein he discussed—among other things—sending bank robbers to Philadelphia; the kidnaping of an individual in Miami, Fla.; the induction of a Cosa Nostra member in New York; splitting of $18,000 proceeds from a crime to get the man who committed it out of jail; the replacement of a numbers baron in Baltimore who was going to jail, and the hiring of a "hit" man to be used in the Providence area.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do I understand that all this information was gained in one wiretap?

Mr. SENNETT. In 10 days of surveillance.

Senator McCLELLAN. How recently?

Mr. SENNETT. This year.

Senator HRUSKA. The testimony was released this year, but it was gathered electronically at an earlier date.

Mr. SENNETT. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. In the last two or three years?

Mr. SENNETT. It is fairly current.

Senator McCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Mr. SENNETT. Other topics of conversation by this top organized crime figure in New England included: The effect of the Bonanno defection on Canada; shylocking personnel; arrangements to pay off one of the State police departments in New England; discussion concerning labor racketeering; discussion concerning the sale of a track in New England for $900,000; and the discussion of franchises of juke box machines under the control of Angelo Bruno in Philadelphia.

Finally, the electronic surveillance revealed that the New England racketeer kingpin categorically stated: "If the killings—in Boston—don't stop, I'll declare martial law."

These electronic surveillance summaries unquestionably demonstrate the need for court-approved electronic surveillance. The supreme arrogance of the man—he'll declare martial law. Where is government when he declares martial law?

Does organized crime cripple effective government? Recently a civic leader in Westchester County, N.Y., charged publicly that organized crime figures had stopped redevelopment in that county dead in its tracks. An underworld figure purportedly explained the syndicate's attitude on redevelopment: "You make more money out of a Harlem than a Scarsdale."

Surely, if we do not protect ourselves against the scourge of organized crime, we shall lose our government and our freedom. The experts agree that we have failed to effectively combat this urgent criminal problem. The experts agree that, at present, it is clear that traditional investigative techniques are totally inadequate to bring organized crime figures to justice. For the sake of free government and for the safety of our citizens, I urge you to present to the Congress a constitutionally sound act to permit closely supervised court-approved electronic eavesdropping.

Senator McClellan. You appreciate our problem there when you say present to the Congress a constitutionally sound act to permit closely supervised court-approved electronic eavesdropping. We may so think, but the Supreme Court may disagree with us.

Mr. Sennett. In answer to your question, I think the Supreme Court in the Berger decision, has given us the guidelines within which both the Congress and the States may draft and enact constitutionally sound legislation.

Senator McClellan. I hope it has and I am inclined to share your view, but I am not fully convinced. But I take this position: Let the Congress meet its responsibility in the light of its judgment, and then if the Supreme Court disagrees, let it take the onus of such consequences as may follow.

Mr. Sennett. After a searching examination of the Berger decision, it is Pennsylvania's view that a workable, constitutionally sound statute for strictly supervised court-approved electronic eavesdropping is feasible.

Pennsylvania's view is that there must be sufficient safeguards to justify the extreme degree of invasion of privacy caused by eavesdropping. Pennsylvania's proposed statute, therefore, will include the following safeguards:

1. Applications to court for court-approved eavesdropping must be made on application of the attorney general and the local district attorney.

2. Court-approved orders for court approved eavesdropping will issue only after a precise and definite showing of "probably cause" under oath. The oaths would be by the police officer who would have the necessary information, but the application would always be by the district attorney and the Attorney General.

3. The person or persons whose conversations and communications are being sought, the nature of the conversations and communications, the crime and the place must be described with detailed particularity—as much as is possible.

4. The maximum time of coverage for court-approved eavesdropping will be 24 hours.

I would suggest, as I say, my statement, keeping it to as short a time as 24 hours.

Senator McClellan. Let me ask you this: I have no objection to limiting it if you can get results. But it takes a little while to place a wiretap. You cannot place a wiretap just any time of day. Without advertising the fact you've got to take these things into account. Do you not agree?

Mr. Sennett. I think the devices that would be currently, if not at least available, possible, are to the extent sophisticated that the matter of placement has become almost no problem.

Senator McClellan. That may be true. All right, go ahead.

Mr. Sennett. 5. A specific provision waiving the requirement of any advanced notice to the accused on the basis of need and emergency. This is one of the most important things that the Berger decision has left open. But the Berger decision certainly implies, as I interpret it, that if you recite there is a need and an emergency, you do not have to give advance notice to the accused.

Senator McClellan. What would be the point of the wiretap if you have to give advance notice to the accused?

Mr. Sennett. If you have to give advance notice there is no chance possible. But the Berger decision recites this possibility, it says its advance notice or the showing of need in an emergency.

Senator McClellan. In other words, I take it from the Berger decision, if you want a wiretap, got the court's approval, and gave advance notice, it would be legal. It would also be futile as well as legal, would it not?

Mr. Sennett. Absolutely futile.

Senator Hruska. Is that not part in keeping with the Supreme Court's recent decision in the matter of regular searches and seizures?

Mr. Sennett. I think there is an analogy between the theory in the search-and-seizure matter that you mentioned and this also.

Senator Hruska. Thank you.

Mr. Sennett. 6. Provision for the official return of the court order as a matter of record similar to the return requirements of search warrants. I don't believe I mentioned in my prepared statement, but certainly, in addition for return of the court order, making the information available at a subsequent time to the accused under discovery procedures.

With these specific safeguards it is Pennsylvania's belief that law enforcement officers will have, in some measure, the weapons which they need to combat organized crime and, at the same time, our citizens' right to privacy will be carefully protected by the safeguards I have just outlined.

I might then, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that not only the evidence brought forward by the electronic surveillance in New England, not only the statements in New York, not only the reports of the President's Crime Commission, but also his prosecution with which we are familiar in Pennsylvania, both Federal and State, over the last several years, show the absolute factual existence of organized crime and its effect upon government and communities. One of the best ways to root it out is to give our State law enforcement officials a constitutional statute, and I believe it can be drawn within the guidelines suggested by Justice Clark in the majority opinion in the Berger case.

Senator McCLELLAN. If the Congress provided a statute authorizing it in Federal cases, a State law not in conflict therewith would, I assume, be held constitutional and the States could therefore enact statutes that do not contravene to Federal law.

I thank you very much for your statement. I see nothing to argue about or quarrel with the requirements, other than the 24 hours.

Mr. SENNETT. The 24 hours may be somewhat restrictive.

Senator McCLELLAN. It may be too short. I do not know. But I agree that it ought to be under the strictest supervision of the court issuing the warrant with the authority to recall the order and the authority to require a report. I have no objection, as someone has suggested, to requiring the filing with the court promptly upon discovery any testimony, or all testimony, and let it be placed in the court's custody. I have no objection to any reasonable restriction or requirement to prevent, as far as possible, any abuse. But to deny to law enforcement this instrument, this means of combating crime, I think, is a grave injustice to society.

Senator Scott?

Senator SCOTT. I thank you, Mr. Attorney General, for a very useful statement.

I have the same concern Senator McClellan has expressed about the 24 hours, partly because of certain experience with sometimes the lethargy or interruptions which occur in the actions of a political—of a police official who may be diverted to some other business by orders of his superior or simply slow moving—all because of the continuity which may occur during a wiretap where a conversation was interrupted by one of the parties who says, "I will call you back tomorrow." This may be a minor thing, but perhaps a period of longer than 24 hours may be useful.

On two other bills which Senator McClellan and I have cosponsored, if you would care to express any reaction—the obstruction of criminal investigation—this is related to criminal activities. It is a crime to obstruct court proceeding, yet it is not a crime to obstruct an investigation. By stifling the flow of information at the investigative level some persons can prevent the case from ever reaching the court. This bill would make such obstruction of activity, for example, through threats, violence, and force, a criminal activity. Do you have any opinion on that?

Mr. SENNETT. Yes, Senator, I think that it would be our view that such legislation is necessary. I have had the opportunity to review the statute which you provided to me prior to my coming here, and I believe there is a deficiency in the law in not allowing us to proceed in this particular area. I believe the legislation is sound.

Senator SCOTT. Thank you. This bill, S. 677 on witness immunity—these bills are now pending in the House. The witness immunity bill is intended to cover situations where many witnesses who can provide necessary information in criminal cases refuse to do so, exercising their constitutional right against self-incrimination which results in the defendant going free, whereas if there were witness immunities another result may well occur.

This bill would prevent such a possibility—such a possible miscarriage of justice by vesting the Attorney General with the power to ask the court to compel the witness to testify and without a promise not to prosecute.

Mr. SENNETT. Yes, Senator, and certainly a general immunity statute where it is limited to the attorney general's providing the immunity is necessary. I would also say that at the present time in Pennsylvania we have drafted a similar immunity statute which would be limited to the attorney general's discretion and we hope to have it inrtoduced and enacted by our general assembly.

Senator SCOTT. Just in conclusion, so the record shows the background, I would appreciate your correcting me if I am not stating this accurately, but for a period of a great many years in Pennsylvania, there was no effective restriction on wiretapping. It was conducted interstate and intrastate. Then there was a decision which I think outlawed intrastate wiretapping. There was a subsequent decision which outlawed interstate wiretapping. At least in both cases they restricted the practice, following which in a session of the legislature where there was some emotion surrounding it the legislature repealed all wiretapping legislation in Pennsylvania. That is the present situation; is it not?

Mr. SENNETT. That is correct. We are one of the few States where the legislature has enacted several years ago a statute which make wiretapping a criminal offense. Incidentally, there has never to my knowledge, been a prosecution under that statute and it is our view, of course, that that statute should be repealed and replaced with the type of statute authorizing which I have described today.

Senator SCOTT. A Senator said to me this morning before we met here that we seem to proceed in the way of a pendulum, that we go too far in one direction and permit too much and then go too far in other directions and outlaw everything. I think that's the purpose of these hearings, to find out if wiretapping is to be permitted and what scope should be allowed, what protective safeguards provided for and whether such a bill can be enacted, as Senator McClellan says, which will pass the scrutiny of whichever five members of the Supreme Court happen to form a temporary majority on that day.

That is all I have.

Mr. SENNETT. It is a problem.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Any other questions?

Senator ERVIN. Just one or two.

The Berger case is based on the fourth amendment?

Mr. SENNETT. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. If I remember correctly, it says the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated.

And no warrant shall issue except upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized. That is substantially it, is it not?

Mr. SENNETT. That is right, sir.

Senator ERVIN. The Supreme Court recently held in several cases that the provisions of this amendment relating to unreasonable searches and seizures of the person apply where intrusions are made below the surface of the body to obtain evidence, did it not, such evidence as the contents of the veins in cases to show intoxication or lack of intoxication?

Mr. SENNETT. Yes, that is correct.

Senator ERVIN. Now, they imply that the provisions of the fourth amendment—is not a voice essentially a part of the person as much as what courses in the man's veins?

Mr. SENNETT. No question in my mind.

Senator ERVIN. So there is nothing in the amendment which would outlaw a reasonable search and seizure of the person for the purpose of ascertaining what the voice was uttering in respect to criminal matters.

Mr. SENNETT. As long as it is reasonable and within the safeguards, I think the amendment applies.

Senator ERVIN. So your paper makes it very clear that there is no doubt in your mind that Congress would have the power under the fourth amendment to permit eavesdropping for the purpose of ascertaining where the crime was being committed, provided there were sufficient restrictions to make certain that whatever process was used was at least sufficient to comply with the minimum requirements about warrants under the fourth amendment.

Mr. SENNETT. As I interpret the Berger decision, they have given really to Congress the guidelines within which such legislation can be drafted.

Senator ERVIN. I wanted to commend you on the excellence of your statement.

Mr. SENNETT. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hart?

Senator HART. Mr. Attorney General, with Senator Ervin I want to thank you for the statement that is brief and very explicit.

Just two things. You heard me express some concern to Judge Piggins about what the Berger decision would permit us to do. In a sense you anticipated the question. You indicated what you think it could do. Clearly, the greatest difficulty, the greatest hangup is this fifth item, what is needed in an emergency to justify your going ahead without putting the label on the phone "Use at Your Risk."

You emphasize the necessity that whatever activity in terms of tapping is authorized shall be under the strict supervision of the court.

Now, we go to the court, we explain that we want to tap the phone of this New England crime figure that you have discussed here. And whatever the assertion of necessity and urgency is that will permit us to do it without telling him, we recite that. In any event, the court is persuaded that there is a necessity. So we get on that tap and then we hear two things which you describe as having been picked up here—discussion concerning the sale of a track in New England and discussion of franchises of jukebox machines under Angelo Bruno's control. We hear them in a discussion that the man has with his lawyer, because both of them involve legal arrangements.

How do you screen that out, and do not we have a right to absolute protection in our conversation with our own lawyers?

Mr. SENNETT. There is no question at all, Senator, I don't think, that if we enact this legislation we are going to get conversations which we probably should not have and in any event cannot use. But I think the protection is here if we can't use them. Certainly the conversations between attorney and client are privileged. So we can't use them.

Now, the fact that they are known is unfortunate. But I think the balance should be weighed between the individual's right to privacy and security, and the Nation's right to security from organized crime.

Senator HART. You should not have the information but you get it. If you were a law-enforcement official you could not use it, but would you not feel an obligation, acting on the knowledge that you should not have, to go out and make the case which you make only because you have the knowledge you should not have?

Mr. SENNETT. Well, certainly, the tainted——

Senator HART. Are we not turning over that to you, which we should not turn over to you?

Mr. SENNETT. I think what you say is correct, but I also think that the balance must weigh in favor of the country.

Senator HART. What I am anxious to do is see that we understand that we are doing these things if we do enact this law, compelling us therefore to make the judgment that public good justifies the intrusions which otherwise ought not to be permitted. That is the only reason I ask the questions.

Mr. SENNETT. I think you have to come to that conclusion.

Senator HART. Some people like to sort of fog it up and avoid—not Members of Congress—but people who write— editorials, et cetera.

Mr. SENNETT. But of course we are assuming somewhat in the Senator's question that information which we are going to get is perfectly legitimate information, we should not have it and so on. There is no question in the first instance we are not looking for that information, nor do we want it. What we are looking for is the type of information that we should have if we are going to effectively combat crime.

Senator HART. Thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska?

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Attorney General, I sympathize with the struggles that the Senator from Michigan, has in this matter. I have seen him agonized on previous occasions, starting 7 or 8 years ago, and I know that he holds these convictions deeply in his heart and in his thinking and philosophy. However, in putting the case of the disclosures of a privileged communication that is overheard on one of these taps between a lawyer and his client on a $900,000 deal to buy a race track, we cannot quite consider that segment all by itself, can we? Is it not true that we would have to take the sweep of the disclosures over the 10-day period and find out what those brought to society that will enable us to combat efforts being made by the Cosa Nostra? Do we not have to put that in prospective rather than say that you are violating a highly privileged liberty of Americans, namely, the privilege of communication between attorney and his client?

Mr. SENNETT. I think so. As I believe I said to Senator Hart, you have to weigh it in the balance and you have to look at the danger and the threat, you have to look at the broader perspective of all of the information you are going to obtain and then you are going to come to the conclusion that it is necessary.

Senator HRUSKA. A witness who will appear later will go into great detail about telling us what was disclosed in some of those airtels, and I think perhaps we can await that testimony before we get into too big a hurry to make a judgment.

I notice one line in Berger against New York—it says that the fourth amendment is the basis of the decision. In any event we cannot forgive the requirements of the fourth amendment in the name of law enforcement.

Mr. Attorney General, from the tenor of your testimony I would think that if there is going to be any forgiving of the requirements of the fourth amendment it would not be in the name of law enforcement, it would be in the name of survival of our civilization and the freedoms and liberties that constitute that civilization. Would that be a fair characterization?

Mr. SENNETT. I think so, Senator. I think what we are challenged with is the basic threat to our national security and survival. Just as the justification for use of these devices in external security against hostile forces.

Senator HRUSKA. In all fairness to the Court and Judge Clark did say this, on the other hand the Court has in the past under specific conditions and circumstances sustained the use of eavesdropping devices.

Let me ask you this one more question: Last Friday on July 7 there appeared in the New York Times under date Washington, July 6, what purports to be the text of a memorandum by the Attorney General Ramsey Clark on new regulations limiting wiretapping and electronics eavesdropping by Federal agents.

This is supposed to be a classified document—I am beginning to understand the ingenuity and resources of the fourth estate—but it appears in print. I assume it is a copy. Have you had occasion to read it?

Mr. SENNETT. I am sorry, Senator, I have seen the New York Times which came across my desk yesterday. I read it briefly, but I have not read the purported document.

Senator MCCLELLAN. A newspaper article is not classified. However, we have copies of the memorandum by the Attorney General and this document can be printed in the record.

Senator HRUSKA. We can take judicial notice of the fact that the New York Times has a fairly large circulation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The memorandum will be printed in the record at this point.

(The article above referred to follows:)

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 16, 1967.

MEMORANDUM TO THE HEADS OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

RE: WIRETAPPING AND ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING

It is essential that all agencies having any responsibility for law enforcement take steps to make certain that electronic and related devices designed to intercept, overhear or record private verbal communications be subject to tight administrative control to assure that they will not be used in a manner which is illegal and that even legal use of such devices will be strictly controlled. In order further to assist you to achieve these ends, the following rules have been formulated.

I. Prohibition against Use of Mechanical or Electronic Devices to Intercept, Overhear or Record Conversations

A. Prohibition against Interception of Telephone Conversations.—1. Section 605 of the Communications Act (Title 47, U.S.C. § 605) prohibits the interception and divulgence or use of telephone communications and is applicable to federal law enforcement agents.

2. Interception by federal personnel of telephone conversations, by any mechanical or electronic device, unless with the consent of one of the parties to the conversation, is prohibited by Presidential directive, and this prohibition applies whether or not the information which may be acquired through interception is intended to be used in any way or to be subsequently divulged outside the agency involved. Any question as to whether the use of a particular device can be said to involve a prohibited interception of a telephone conversation should be referred to the Department of Justice.

3. To further assure protection of the privacy of telephone conversations, each agency shall adopt rules governing the interception by its personnel of telephone conversations under circumstances where a party to the conversation has consented. Such rules shall, where appropriate, provide for the advance approval by the agency head of such interception.

B. Prohibition against Overhearing and Recording of Non-telephone Conversations.—Legal principles applicable to the overhearing and recording of non-telephone conversations are discussed in paragraphs 1–3 below. These principles are consistent with the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Berger v. New York, 35 Law Week 4649, decided June 12, 1967.

1. Eavesdropping in any form which is accomplished by means of a trespass into a constitutionally protected area is a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The penetration by inches into a party wall by the spike of a microphone has been held to involve a trespass. Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961). And, although the question has not been squarely decided, there is support for the view that any electronic eavesdropping on conversations in constitutionally protected areas is a violation of the Fourth Amendment even if such surveillance is accomplished without physical trespass or entry. Homes, private offices, hotel rooms and automobiles are clear examples of constitutionally protected areas, but other locations may also be held within the scope of constitutional protection depending upon the particular circumstances.

2. Even where no invasion of a constitutionally protected area has occurred, surreptitious electronic surveillance involving an intrusion into a privileged relationship, such as that of attorney-client, may violate rights entitled to protection under constitutional provisions other than the Fourth Amendment, including the First, Fifth and Sixth Amendments.

3. Under presently controlling court decisions, however, certain uses of electronic devices are legal. See, for example, the decisions in Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427 (1963) and in Osborn v. United States, 385 U.S. 323 (1966), where the use of recording devices was held to be legitimate if the consent of a party to the conversation had been obtained. Moreover, the use of mechanical or electronic equipment to record statements intended to be disseminated to the public generally, public speeches for example, is clearly not illegal and is not subject to the rules formulated in this memorandum.

4. In the light of the immediately foregoing discussion in paragraphs 1–3, any use of mechanical or electronic devices by federal personnel to overhear or record non-telephone conversations involving a violation of the Constitution or a statute is prohibited.

5. In order further to assure protection of the right of privacy, to resolve questions which may arise under paragraph 4 and strictly to limit legal electronic surveillance, agencies shall, except as provided in paragraph II. 2 below, obtain advance written approval from the Attorney General for any use of mechanical or electronic devices to overhear or record non-telephone conversations without the consent of all of the parties to such conversations.

II. Controls Over the Use of Mechanical or Electronic Equipment

1. A request for advance approval from the Attorney General pursuant to paragraph I.B.5. hereof for the use of mechanical or electronic devices to overhear or record non-telephone conversations shall be made to the Attorney General in writing by the head of the requesting investigative agency and shall contain the following information: (a) the reason for such proposed use; (b) the type of equipment to be used; (c) the name of the person involved; (d) the proposed location of the equipment; (e) the duration of proposed use; and (f) the manner or method of installation.

2. If, in the judgment of the head of the investigative agency involved, the emergency needs of an investigation preclude obtaining such advance approval from the Attorney General, he may, without having obtained such approval, authorize the use of mechanical or electronic devices to overhear or record non-telephone conversations without the consent of all of the parties thereto. In any such circumstances, however, the head of the investigative agency shall, within twenty-four hours after authorizing such use, provide the Attorney General in writing with the information referred to in paragraph II. 1, above, and with an explanation of the circumstances upon which he based the judgment that the emergency needs of the investigation precluded him from obtaining such written advance authority.

3. In connection with the use of mechanical or electronic devices authorized above, the responsible agent shall, where technically feasible, record the conversations overheard by means of a tape or similar permanent record. The responsible agent shall preserve the tape or other permanent record of the conversations. He shall also submit to the investigative agency a written report setting forth the actual use or uses made of each mechanical or electronic device in connection with the authorization. Such report, the tapes or other permanent records of conversations, and any logs, transcripts, summaries or memoranda and similar material which may have been prepared shall be treated as agency records, but shall be specially classified, filed and safeguarded and shall not, nor shall information contained in such material be made available to agency personnel or others except when essential to government operations. A record shall be made and retained concerning each person to whom such information or material has been made available.

4. The head of each investigative agency should be responsible for limiting the procurement of devices primarily designed to be used surreptitiously to overhear or record conversations to the minimum necessary for use consistent with the rules formulated herein. To the extent possible, all mechanical or electronic devices used in intercepting, overhearing or recording conversations shall be stored in a limited number of locations to insure effective administrative control.

5. The agency shall maintain an inventory of all such equipment at the place where it is stored, including a record of the date that the equipment was assigned to an agent and the date the equipment was returned. Copies of these records should also be maintained at agency headquarters, together with the written report of the responsible agent referred to in paragraph II. 3 hereof. All agency records should be maintained for a period of six years.

6. The head of each investigative agency shall submit to the Attorney General on July 1st of each year a report of all uses of mechanical or electronic equipment by such agency during the previous year in accordance with the rules formulated in this memorandum, containing with respect to each use the information required by paragraph II. 1, above, and a brief description of the results obtained. The report shall also include a complete inventory of the devices referred to in paragraph II. 4, above, in the possession of the agency.

7. The functions to be exercised by the head of an investigative agency in accordance with this memorandum may be delegated by him to another officer of his agency.

III. National Security

The foregoing rules have been formulated with respect to all agency investigations other than investigations directly related to the protection of the national security. Special problems arising with respect to the use of devices of the type referred to herein in national security investigations shall continue to be taken up directly with the Attorney General in the light of existing stringent restrictions.

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

Senator HRUSKA. I do not want to impose duties or burdens on you beyond the call of duty, and you have already passed that point. Would you care to read this in the light of your testimony—would you care to read this and study it and favor us with any comment you have, in line with your previously given testimony as to its impact, as to its meaning for law-enforcement purposes?

Mr. SENNETT. I will have it analyzed, Senator, and if you desire I will comment on it to you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will be pleased to have your comments if, after you have had an opportunity to study it, you wish to comment.

Senator HRUSKA. That concludes my questions at this time.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you have a wiretapping statute in Pennsylvania?

Mr. SENNETT. As I understand it, Senator—as I understand the statute books in Pennsylvania, at the present time there is a law outlawing wiretapping. We are preparing legislation, such as I have described here today, which will be introduced during the current session.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

We appreciate your interest and your assistance.

Mr. SENNETT. Thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The next witness is Professor Blakey. Will you come around, please?

I would like to mention this, Professor Blakey, before you are introduced. The attorney general of California, Hon. Thomas C. Lynch, was invited to appear at our hearings to give his views on pending legislation. Mr. Lynch was unable to attend at this time, but he has submitted a statement concerning S. 674, S. 1194, Senate Joint Resolution 22, and S. 675, which I will place in the record at this point.

Also, I will place in the record a telegram the subcommittee received from the National Police Officers Association; a letter from Justice Miles McDonald of the Supreme Court of the State of New York; a letter from Mr. William Hopf, State attorney, Du Page County, Wheaton, Ill.; and a letter from Hon. Warren P. Knowles, Governor of Wisconsin.

(The statement of Mr. Lynch and letters referred to follow:)

STATEMENT OF THOMAS C. LYNCH

My views have been requested on the following Senate Bills, introduced at the current session of Congress: S. 674, S. 1194, S.J. Res. 22, and S. 675. I am most grateful for the opportunity to place these views before this Subcommittee. A discussion of the individual bills follows:

S. 674

S. 674 is a bill to provide that, in federal prosecutions, the sole standard of admissibility of a confession or admission shall be voluntariness. I heartily endorse the bill, and consider it a promising start toward restoring the right of law enforcement officers to solve crimes through meaningful interrogation, while fully protecting the rights of the individual.

One portion of the bill would eliminate the rule of McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), and Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957). These cases held that failure of the police to observe the federal statutes and rules requiring that an arrested person be brought before a committing magistrate without unnecessary delay bars the admission in federal prosecutions of any confession made after arrest and before arraignment. Eradication of this rule seems to me long overdue and badly needed. While perhaps some incentive should be given federal officers to obey the prompt-arraignment statutes, the exclusion of confessions obtained in violation thereof is too high a price for society to pay for this type of "constable's blunder." Since the McNabb-Mallory rule was formulated in the exercise of the Supreme Court's supervisory powers over lower federal courts, and has never been considered a constitutional requisite, no constitutional obstacle is imposed in the way of its legislative repeal.

The remainder of the bill appears to be an attempt to modify the rule of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). Some modification of this decision seems to me eminently desirable. The restrictions upon police interrogation imposed by Miranda have significantly reduced the number of confessions obtained through interrogation and thus impeded the solution of many serious crimes. Moreover, I do not believe that the limited protection of individual rights which Miranda affords adequately compensates for the deleterious effect the decision has on law enforcement.

The bill takes the eminently sound approach of making voluntariness the sole condition for admissibility of confessions or admissions. It is difficult to quarrel with the proposition that a confession should be admissible if, and only if, it is voluntary. The factors, enumerated in subsection (b), for determining whether a confession is voluntary, seem well adapted to that end.

There is, of course, some question as to the constitutionality of S. 674, but it is my opinion that the bill is constitutional. It will be recalled that the essence of Miranda, constantly reiterated throughout the opinion, was the proposition that voluntariness is the sole limitation placed by the Constitution on admission of confessions. But the precise holding was involuntariness of any confession is conclusively presumed where the accused, before making his confession, has not been warned of his rights to remain silent and to have the assistance of counsel, and steps at least as effective as the warning therein prescribed had not been taken to insure that any confession was the product of the accused's free choice. But the Court realized that its guidelines were laid down in the absence of legislative action, and encouraged Congress and the states, "in the exercise of their creative rule-making capacities," 384 U.S. at 467, to formulate alternative means of protecting individual rights.

It seems to me that the Court has implicitly acknowledged that Congress, with its vastly superior fact-gathering powers, is in a much better position than the Court to formulate standards most likely to result in a correct determination, in a given case, of the issue of voluntariness of a confession. The bill under consideration sets out factors bearing on the voluntariness of confessions. If findings of fact are made by Congress that demonstrate the relevance and importance of these factors, and their superiority to the rules laid down in Miranda, it would seem that the Court would have little choice but to defer to the expert judgment of Congress. Accordingly, I consider the bill constitutional and am happy to give it my full support.

Since I have been asked to recommend changes in the bill, I would like to point out a possible loophole which could easily be closed. Nothing in S. 674 expresssly states that the absence of the "fourfold warning" set out in Miranda does not prevent a finding of voluntariness. It will be recalled that Miranda rests upon the proposition that voluntary confessions are admissible, but confessions made in the absence of the warning are not voluntary. In an effort to construe S. 674 so as to harmonize with the Constitution, the Court could say that the bill, on its face, does not show an intent to change the Miranda rule, but in fact codifies it, while adding other factors than the fourfold warning which are to be considered in determining voluntariness. It would seem that there is a sufficient likelihood of such an interpretation to make it advisable to amend S. 674 so as to provide that the presence or absence of any of the factors listed in subsection (b) shall not be conclusive on the issue of voluntariness.

Speaking as a member of the President's Crime Commission, I consider S. 674 of vital importance. However, it applies only to federal prosecutions.

As Attorney General of California, I am particularly concerned with the need for modifying the Miranda rule insofar as it applies to state prosecutions. It has occurred to me that Congress might be able to fill this need. Accordingly, I would like to urge the introduction of a bill which would make the provisions of S. 674 applicable to state prosecutions, except where individual states elect to establish more stringent rules for the admission of confessions.

A most promising source of congressional power for such legislation has been suggested by Mr. Jon O. Newman, United States Attorney for the District of Connecticut, and former law clerk to Chief Justice Warren, in his article, "Cops, Courts, and Congress," The New Republic, March 18, 1967, p. 16. The recommendations of this article have been embodied in S. 1333, introduced by Senator Ribicoff. The theory therein suggested can be summarized as follows: Miranda rests on the proposition that the Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights therein interpreted are applicable to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress is expressly given power to enforce the Amendment by appropriate legislation. It would thus appear that congressional regulation of state rules of evidence, derived from interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment, would lie within the realm of appropriate enforcement of the Amendment.

I recognize that there is a distinction between enforcing the Amendment and defining or interpreting it, the latter presumably being beyond congressional power. But I do not find the distinction troublesome. The Fifth and Sixth Amendments declare, respectively, the privilege of self-incrimination and the right to assistance of counsel. The rule excluding evidence obtained in violation of those rights was developed by the Court solely in order to enforce the rights. The legislation I have in mind would not attempt to alter Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights, but merely to modify the rules which the Court, in the absence of congressional action, has developed for their enforcement. Thus, the distinction between defining and enforcing constitutional rights would be preserved.

There is a paucity of authority on the limits of congressional power under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, as Congress has seldom had occasion to make use of this section. Following the Civil War, Congress enacted a public-accommodations bill, based on section 5, which was invalidated in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883), because it was considered to prohibit individual rather than state action, and was thus beyond the scope of the Amendment. The only attempt by Congress under section 5 to regulate evidentiary rules in state courts was post-Civil War legislation providing that Negroes were competent witnesses. The constitutionality of this legislation was apparently never passed upon by the Supreme Court, and state courts reached different results. Compare The State v. Rash, 1 Houston Cr. Cas. 271 (Ct. Gen. Sess. Del. 1867) with Ex parte Warren, 31 Tex. 143 (1868).

However, broad congressional action under section 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, which is identical to section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, has recently been upheld. In South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966), the Court upheld congressional action which affected voter qualifications in the states. The enactment was held an "appropriate" exercise of congressional power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment. The following language is instructive:

"South Carolina contends that the cases above are precedents only for the authority of the judiciary to strike down state statutes and procedures—that to allow an exercise of this authority by Congress would be to rob the courts of their rightful constitutional role. On the contrary, § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment expressly declares that 'Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.' By adding this authorization, the Framers indicated that Congress was to be chiefly responsible for implementing the rights [emphasis added] created in § 1. 'It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce [emphasis in original] the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the [Civil War] amendments fully effective.' Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 345. Accordingly, in addition to the courts, Congress has full remedial powers to effectuate the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting." 383 U.S. at 325–26.

To my mind, the foregoing language supports two propositions: (1) Congress has full power to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and the Court has acted only in default of congressional action, and (2) Congress may adopt any appropriate means of enforcement. The balance of the Katzenbach opinion indicates clearly that Congress has great latitude in determining what is "appropriate" legislation, and its judgment will not lightly be interfered with by the courts.

Also instructive is the following language from an even more recent Supreme Court opinion:

"We have no hesitation in saying that the right of these defendants not to be punished for exercising their Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment right to be silent—expressly created by the Federal Constitutiton itself—is a federal right which, in the absence of appropriate congressional action, it is our responsibility to protect by fashioning the necessary rule." Chapman v. California, 87 S.Ct. 824, 826–27 (1967). [Emphasis added.]

I can only concur with the following words of Mr. Newman, supra at 20:

"No one can guarantee how the Court would rule. However, the Court would pause for a long, hard look before telling Congress that it could not enforce the Fourteenth Amendment in ways with which the Court disagreed. In any event, the possibility of an adverse ruling is no reason not to enact the statute and force the Court to face the constitutional issue."

S. 1194

S. 1194 seeks to change the Miranda rule by limiting the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Section 1 provides that the sole test of the admissibility of a confession or admission in a federal criminal prosecution shall be voluntariness, and the federal appellate courts shall not have jurisdiction to disturb a trial court's finding of voluntariness if the finding is supported by any competent evidence. Section 2 provides that the federal courts are without jurisdiction to disturb a finding by a trial court in a state criminal prosecution that a confession is voluntary if the finding has been upheld by the highest state appellate court having jurisdiction of the cause.

While I support the aims of the bill, I must confess some doubt as to its constitutionality. While Congress has the express constitutional power to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and exercises of that power have been upheld, see Ex parte McCardle, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 506 (1868), the power is arguably limited to fixing the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Court. S. 1194 appears to be an attempt to deprive the Court of power to render a certain decision in a case over which it has subject-matter jurisdiction. It is doubtful that the Supreme Court would acquiesce in the excision of its most important power—the power to decide a case as it sees fit.

Constitutional considerations aside, I am not sure that I am able to give my wholehearted support to the bill. The provision foreclosing federal-court review of state-court determinations of voluntariness could pose some considerable dangers to basic constitutional rights. While most state courts can undoubtedly be relied upon to uphold the strictest standards in determining voluntariness of a confession, a few may feel that dangerously lax standards are sufficient. It must be remembered that beginning with Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), all of the confessions which the Supreme Court has held involuntary in the constitutional sense, and hence inadmissible in state prosecutions, had been held admissible by the highest state courts which had passed on the question. The bill would thus seem not only to sanction wide discrepancies among the states in the standards of voluntariness, but would leave an admitted federal constitutional right at the mercy of state courts.

In sum, while S. 1194 represents a well-intentioned approach to an urgent problem, I would prefer the enactment of S. 674 and similar legislation relating to state prosecutions, as I have previously indicated.

S.J. Res. 22

S.J. Res. 22 is a proposed constitutional amendment providing that, unless Congress or a State provides a different test for criminal prosecutions within its respective jurisdiction, the sole test of the admissibility of a confession or admission shall be whether it was voluntarily made. The ruling of a trial judge admitting a confession or admission as voluntary shall not be disturbed by any federal court if the ruling is supported by competent evidence.

I wholeheartedly support this proposed amendment. The case for an amendment of this type has been well stated in the Supplemental Statement on Constitutional Limitations, in which I joined, appended to the report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice:

"There is no more sacred part of our history or our constitutional structure than the Bill of Rights. One approaches the thought of the most limited amendment with reticence and a full awareness both of the political obstacles and the inherent delicacy of drafting changes which preserve all relevant values. But it must be remembered that the Constitution contemplates amendment, and no part of it should be so sacred that it remains beyond review....

"The legitimate place of voluntary confessions in law enforcement must be reestablished and their use made dependent upon meeting due process standards of voluntariness."

To my mind, S.J. Res. 22 represents an eminently sound implementation of those principles. It is not entirely foolproof, since the courts could always misuse their powers by holding that a finding of voluntariness is not supported by competent evidence unless it appears that Miranda was complied with. But such a gross distortion of legislative aim is not to be anticipated. Moreover, I believe that some provision for limited federal-court review of state-court determinations of voluntariness is a necessary and proper part of the bill.

Until Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), and Miranda, voluntariness of a confession was the sole constitutional requisite to its admission in evidence in a criminal prosecution. It might well be noted that the judicial interpretation of the Bill of Rights in these cases discovered constitutional rights theretofore unrecognized in 180 years of judicial history. The amendment would seem only to restore the pre-Escobedo rule. As such, it cannot be said to represent such a tampering with the Bill of Rights as to impair the values secured therein. It would give the federal courts, particularly the Supreme Court, sufficient latitude to prevent erosion of due process standards of voluntariness, while preventing the courts from applying standards that have no relationship in fact to the central issue of voluntariness. I therefore am happy to endorse it.

My support of the proposed amendment, however, should not be taken as disparaging the need for prompt enactment of other legislation, such as S. 674 and the complementary legislation relating to state prosecutions which I have urged, while S.J. Res. 22 takes its slow, painful, and perilous course toward adoption.

S. 675 is a bill to prohibit wiretapping except by law enforcement officers acting under court order, or at the direction of the President in national security cases.

I am happy to support this bill. As noted in the report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, the present state of the law on wiretapping is intolerable. Remedial legislation is urgently needed, and S. 675 fills the need very well.

I do not believe that wiretapping by an individual or nongovernmental entity can ever serve a sufficiently valid social purpose to compensate for the invasions of privacy occasioned thereby. Accordingly, I approve of those provisions of the bill outlawing wiretapping except by law-enforcement officers.

At the same time, unrestricted wiretapping by law-enforcement officers would seem to pose a grave danger to citizens' right of privacy. I consider that the dangers of arbitrary and unjustified wiretapping are sufficiently obviated by the bill's provisions permitting wiretapping by law-enforcement officers only with the prior, express, and specific approval of a court. These provisions entrust to the discretion of a neutral, detached magistrate the decision as to when invasions of citizen privacy will be permitted. This insures that such invasions will be sanctioned only in cases of compelling social need. Wiretapping is at once too valuable a tool for the solution of crime to be abandoned altogether, and too dangerous to be allowed to be used arbitrarily. To my mind, S. 675 adequately accommodates the sometimes conflicting rights of the citizen to privacy and the law-enforcement officer to solve certain crimes in the only effective matter available.

If S. 675 is enacted, I will promptly seek enactment by the California Legislature of the state legislation which the bill authorizes.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., July 12, 1967.

JIM WOOD,
Assistant Counsel, McClellan Subcommittee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WOOD: The National Police Officers Association of America, representing the interest of 480,000 law enforcement officers throughout the United States, welcomes the Senate subcommittee's consideration of S-675 relating to the admissability of voluntary confession in Federal criminal prosecution as a helpful forward step in its battle against crime in its deliberation. The subcommittee is urged to bear in mind the onerous burden placed upon law enforcement officers as a result of recent court decision. We recommend that it seek a middle ground where the vital interest of the defendant, the police officers, and society in general will not only be satisfied but receive the maximum benefit. We would remind the subcommittee that individual liberty is meaningless if it disrupts the social system under which we live. Obviously unwarranted extension of privileges to either the law enforcement agency or the defendant in a criminal action is undesirable by withholding law—and the means to enforce it—there can be no real personal liberty. The legislation under consideration we believe represents a sincere effort on the part of the Congress to recognize the problem and to clarify many areas left in question by the court and to protect the rights of the defendant through its double face guard of providing for a judicial termination of the voluntariness of a confession and permission for a jury to determine the relative importance of confession in a court trial. At the same time it seeks to remove many of the obstacles confronting today's police officer and, in the long run, will promote the better serving of the ends of justice. We respectfully request favorable consideration of S-674 and wish to go on record as registering our deep convictions that its reporting and passage will aid the nation in its towering fight against crime.

Respectfully,

LT. MARIO BIAGGI,
National President, National Police Officers Association of America.

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Brooklyn, N.Y., May 31, 1967.

WILLIAM A. PAISLEY,
Chief Counsel, U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PAISLEY: Please accept my sincere thanks for your letter of May 17th, which I have been endeavoring to answer since its receipt. The pressure of work has been so great that this is the first opportunity I have had to furnish you with the information you desire.

With reference to the question of importance of confessions in criminal cases, and specifically in regard to Judge Sobel's statistical survey, I must inform you as follows: After 25 years of active participation in the enforcement of the criminal law, as Assistant District Attorney, District Attorney, and a Judge presiding at criminal trials, I am convinced that confessions are by far the most reliable evidence in criminal cases. Frequently one has doubts with regard to eye-witness identifications, and this, I believe, is an area which causes great concern to prosecutors who, like every other citizen, are most anxious not to convict an innocent person. With respect to confessions, however, a false confession is almost always easily detected, and while there are false confession from time to time, they are usually readily recognized and disregarded.

As far as Judge Sobel's figures are concerned, these figures are, in my opinion, most unreliable, as they were based upon a very small cross-section of the actual cases pending in this court during the period which Judge Sobel used as the basis for his investigation, the reasons being as follows:

Shortly after the decision in the U.S. Supreme Court case of Jackson v. Denno (378 U.S. 368), which arose in this court and in this state, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York laid down certain specific rules in a decision entitled People v. Huntley (15 NY 2d 78). This decision laid down certain rules which were later incorporated in the Code of Criminal Procedure of the State of New York (Sec. 813 (f), (g). (h) and (i). The statute and the decision required that in a case in which the People intended to offer a confession, they must serve notice thereof on the defendant prior to the trial. Defendant thereafter had an opportunity to demand a hearing to contest the voluntariness of the confession. This hearing had to be conducted prior to the trial.

After the decision in Escobedo and Miranda, any objections to the confession, based upon either of these decisions, were similarly to be determined in the course of this hearing. The District Attorney of this County adopted the practice of serving the required notice upon the defendant at the time the case was assigned to a trial part—usually two weeks to a month in advance of the trial. All that was required of the defendant was that he serve a notice on the District Attorney that he desired a hearing with respect to the issue of voluntariness of the alleged confession.

Judge Sobel, in the computation, used as the basis for his estimates only the cases in which the District Attorney served a notice that he intended to use the confession at the time of the trial. He failed to realize that prior to this time all of these cases had at least two preliminary conferences before the court for the purpose of disposing of the case by a plea to a lesser degree of the crime. My experience during these pretrial discussions (I sit in a pre-trial part a great percentage of the time) has been that approximately 40% of all indictments filed result in a disposition in the pre-trial part. From my experience in these parts, I have ascertained that at least 75 to 80 percent of the cases disposed of in the pre-trial parts were cases in which there was a confession by the defendant; and by far in the greatest percentage of the confession cases, the defendant was willing to plead to a lesser degree. The greatest majority of the cases, in which confessions had been obtained, were disposed of by a plea of guilty before the case reached the stage of being noticed for trial, and for that reason Judge Sobel's figures have no validity regarding the importance of the confessions, and he has eliminated a large number of cases in which the defendants had confessed and already pleaded guilty before the necessity for the service of the notice upon the defendant ever arose.

I pointed this out to Judge Sobel but as far as I have been able to ascertain he has never rechecked his figures or conducted any further survey, either to validate the existing figures or to disprove my assertion with respect thereto.

I am extremely interested in the Bill introduced by Senator McClellan to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and jurisdiction of other Federal courts. I am afraid, however, of what the Supreme Court would do if it were offered the opportunity of passing upon the constitutionality of the Bill. I am inclined to believe it would hold that the Bill was unconstitutional and that only a constitutional amendment would remove the effect of the Miranda decision.

I am grateful to you for your thoughtfulness in forwarding to me the various legislative documents and Senator McClellan's speech. If I can be of further assistance, I shall be only too glad to cooperate, as I am convinced that we have gone much too far in protecting the accused. I have always been of the opinion that the first 10 Amendments were a limitation on the Government of the United States and were never intended to convey to the Federal government the right to limit the activities of the states in their enforcement of their penal laws. The colonists who adopted the Constitution were afraid of the Federal government, not of the state governments. That fact that for over 150 years the Constitution was so interpreted seems to me to bear out this point of view.

Sincerely,

MILES F. MCDONALD.

WHEATON, ILL., June 14, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Some months past I wrote to you in response to a letter relevant to cases that we may have had where some of the Supreme Court decisions acted as an impediment. In following this up, we have had two cases in this jurisdiction, involving the death of an infant where there was some appearance that this may have been a result of child abuse, and most particularly is this so in the most recent death we are investigating. In years past in this very critical area of child abuse, interview of the parents would prove beneficial, investigation wise. However, with the recent Miranda decision you are in a very unusual situation due to a fear of talking with the parents. By its very nature, child abuse is a type of case where it is seldom if it is ever viewed by disinterested people and secondly, it is only rare that there would be external physical real evidence for prosecution.

I pass this on to you as an area that I see that the Miranda decision hampers tremendously, and this area of child abuse is becoming such a critical problem.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM V. HOFF,
State's Attorney.

THE STATE OF WISCONSIN,
Madison, June 12, 1967.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: We in Wisconsin have followed with great interest the introduction and progress of S. 917, "The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." We are pleased that legislation of this type has been introduced and are hopeful that Congress will move ahead with this important legislation.

In reviewing this legislation, our staff has analyzed certain portions that we believe should be modified to assure an adequate role for state government in coordinating these programs. We believe the bill should be modified as follows:

(1) Set a time limit for a designated state agency to develop a comprehensive plan for the purposes of the bill. The state agency is to be designated by the Governor.

(2) If the statewide plan is developed within the time limit, one of the primary criterion for accepting local plans should be conformity with the statewide plan.

(3) Local projects should also fit within the framework of the statewide plan unless the designated state agency recommends exceptions.

Wisconsin presently has a Governor's Commission on Law Enforcement and Crime which I would designate along with the State Bureau of Management as a review agency for projects developed in the area of law enforcement systems. This would be done for the following reasons:

(1) This bill is an extension of the present Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

(2) The Governor's Commission on Law Enforcement and Crime was set up to carry out the purposes of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act at the prompting of LEA.

(3) The purposes of the Governor's Commission on Law Enforcement and Crime are almost identical to the purposes of the bill.

This commission was the first in the nation established under the LEA program and has an outstanding membership. I believe it would be most unfortunate if local communities were allowed to develop applications that were inconsistent with the statewide plan as presently being developed.

If it would be helpful to your committee to receive direct testimony from Wisconsin State Government, I hope you will provide us with this opportunity and suggest that you call me at your convenience to arrange for proper representation.

Sincerely,

WARREN P. KNOWLES, Governor.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska wishes to introduce our next witness, Prof. G. Robert Blakey.

Senator HRUSKA. I should like to say Professor Blakey is a member of the Notre Dame Law School faculty and he is recognized as one of the authorities in the field of electronic surveillance. He was attached to the President's Commission on Crime and was for several years with the Department of Justice in Washington.

I think it is a particularly great achievement of this committee that he does appear here and testifies as he will today.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may proceed, professor. I notice you have a prepared statement. It is a bit lengthy, but I do not want to deprive you of making a full and thorough presentation of your views.

Senator Hruska, I understand, cannot be at the session this afternoon because of some other hearing which he feels compelled to attend. Senator, did you wish to ask some questions now, before we proceed? I doubt if we are going to have time for him to read all the statement before you ask questions.

Professor BLAKEY. If it is all right with the committee, I would just as soon insert the entire text in the record at this point.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will put it in the record.

Professor BLAKEY. I can summarize it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In the meantime, to accommodate Senator Hruska, we will let him proceed if he wishes to ask some questions, at this point before he leaves.

STATEMENT OF PROF. G. ROBERT BLAKEY, NOTRE DAME LAW SCHOOL

(Professor Blakey's statement follows:)

STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR G. ROBERT BLAKEY

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee: My name is G. Robert Blakey. I am a professor of law at the Notre Dame Law School. My subjects include Criminal Law and Procedure and a special seminar on organized crime. My appearance here today is personal. My views are my own. They should not be attributed in any group or organization with which I am now or have been associated in the past.

I deeply appreciate this opportunity to appear before you and discuss the problems associated with the use and abuse of electronic surveillance. There can be no question that these problems are some of the most vexing that this Body has ever faced. Striking the proper balance between privacy and justice in a free society is always difficult. All too often controversies in this area tend to become arid debates between contending ideologies. Too often aspects of the problem are identified as the whole problem. Here, as elsewhere, we must view things in context. "For that which take singly and viewed by itself may appear to be wrong when considered with relation to other things may be," as Burke says, "perfectly right—or at least such as ought to be patiently endured as the means of preventing something that is worse." (Stanlis, Edmund Burke: Selected Writings and Speeches 318 (1963).)

I have on other occasions taken up some of the problems associated with electronic surveillance. In the June issue of Current History (Blakey, "Organized Crime in the United States" 52 Current History 327 (1967)), I discussed the scope and challenge of organized crime in the United States today. As a special consultant to the President's Commission on Crime and the Administration of Justice, I prepared a detailed legal analysis of the evidence gathering process in organized crime investigations, which included a proposed statutory scheme for court controlled electronic surveillance. (Blakey, "Aspects of the Evidence Gathering Process in Organized Crime Cases" Task Force Report: Organized Crime 80, 91–113 (1967).) I do not want today to repeat what I said on those occasions. Instead, I would like to discuss two questions with you: the implications of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Berger v. New York No. 615, decided June 12, 1967, and the assertion made by some that electronic eavesdropping is "neither effective nor highly productive." (Statement attributed to the Honorable Ramsey Clark, Attorney General of the United States, New York Times, May 19, 1967 p. 23, col. 1.)

I

Berger v. New York, of course, reversed by a vote of 6 to 3 the conviction secured through a court ordered eavesdrop of a New York public relations man for conspiracy to bribe the chairman of the New York State Liquor Authority. Mr. Justice Clark delivered an opinion for the Court in which the Chief Justice and Justices Brennan, Fortas and Douglas joined. Justices Douglas and Stewart each concurred in the reversal for special reasons of their own. Dissents were filed by Justices Harlan, Black and White.

Broadly, the majority reversed because the New York statute which authorized the eavesdrop on its face failed to meet certain standards the Justices felt constitutionally mandatory; they did not undertake to examine the administration of the statute. Significantly, they indicated that a statute meeting those standards would pass constitutional muster. The dissenters, on the other hand, would have upheld the statute as administered without addressing the broad questions found by the majority to be presented by the face of the statute. In a very real sense, the majority and the minority did not disagree so much on the answers to be given but on the questions to be asked. Indeed, if a different case were presented to them tomorrow involving a new statute constructed on the blueprint laid down in the majority opinion and administered according to the criteria of the dissenters, I would fully expect to find the Court by a substantial majority upholding the statute and affirming the conviction if it were secured through the careful use of electronic surveillance techniques. In short, I read Berger as an invitation by the Court to the Congress to get down to the difficult business of drafting a fair, effective and comprehensive electronic surveillance statute. All that remains now is the question of legislative will.

II

Mr. Justice Clark began his opinion with a careful delineation of the issues which he felt faced the Court. He noted that Berger essentially challenged the New York statute on three grounds: 1) the statute on its face set up an unconstitutional system of trespassory intrusions into constitutionally protected areas, 2) it authorized searches for "mere evidence," and 3) electronic surveillance constituted a violation of the privilege against self incrimination.

Mr. Justice Clark immediately relegated to a footnote Berger's contention that the statute could not stand because of the evidence per se rule. This contention was, he said, settled adversely to Berger by the Court's recent decision in Warden v. Hayden, No. 480 decided May 29, 1967, which overturned the old rule. Justices Harlan and White explicity agreed with the majority on this score. Only Mr. Justice Douglas lamented the passing of the rule. He would have employed it to strike down all electronic surveillance however authorized or limited. Until the Court's decision in Berger, the evidence per se rule represented an implacable foe. Its demise was a significant victory for those who advocate carefully controlled court order electronic surveillance.

Mr. Justice Clark next announced the holding of the majority: ". . . the language of New York's statute is too broad in its scope resulting in a trespassory intrusion in a constitutionally protected area and is, therefore, violative of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments." He then noted that this disposition obviated the necessity of a discussion of the other issues raised.

The recognition by a majority of the Court that the constitutionality of electronic surveillance was properly handled solely in terms of the search and seizure standards of the Fourth Amendment was of enormous importance. The American Civil Liberties Union of New York as amicus strenuously pressed on the Court First Amendment objections to the New York statute. They presented an extraordinarily able brief arguing that all electronic surveillance—court order or otherwise—had an unconstitutionally inhibiting effect on free speech. As I just noted the Court found it unnecessary to discuss this point. I think we may therefore infer that the Court has rejected it on the level of a principle which would render a court order system per se unreasonable. Indeed, Mr. Justice Harlan in dissent explicitly makes the point that the First Amendment would only have a case by case impact in this area. This, too, is a significant victory for those who advocate carefully controlled court order electronic surveillance.

The majority's similar treatment of Berger's Fifth Amendment self incrimination claim carries with it an identical inference. We may safely conclude that there is no danger now of the Court expanding the traditional scope of the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination into an insuperable barrier to court order electronic surveillance. This conclusion is buttressed by the treatment the dissenters accorded this claim. Both Harlan and White dismissed the claim with cryptic cites to recent opinions of the Court such as Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1967), which hold that a finding of compulsion is a necessary predicate to the application of the privilege. Again, we have a significant victory for the advocates of carefully controlled electronic surveillance.

III

Having thus announced the holding of the majority, Mr. Justice Clark moved on to an analysis of the case. He first set out a short description of the facts of the case, which, I might add, constituted a truly frightening example of the danger governmental corruption poses in a society which today finds so many aspects of its business and private life regulated by government. Next he gave a short review of the legal and factual history of eavesdropping covering the ground from the old fashioned practice of listening outside windows to modern techniques of wiretapping and bugging. I only wish he had also traced the growth and development of organized crime and shown the threat it presents to so many sectors of our national life. Curiously, too, he attributed to California a court order bugging statute. Finally, he reviewed the history of the Court's own cases dealing with the constitutional principles involved in electronic surveillance.

Mr. Justice Clark's review for the majority of the history of the Court's own cases is especially important. Traditionally, the Court has drawn a distinction between wiretapping and bugging. Wiretapping has never been treated as a violation of the Fourth Amendment, since it does not involve an actual entry into a constitutionally protected area. Instead, the Court has treated it as a violation of Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1103). Bugging, on the other hand, has been rejected as a law enforcement technique only where it was accomplished through a physical invasion without warrant into a constitutionally protected area. Otherwise, it has been upheld. Many people fully expected the Court to overturn this distinction and hold unconstitutional the unconsented or unwarranted overhearing of conversations which took place within a constitutionally protected area or which were projected over constitutionally protected means. Surprisingly, the Court did not disturb its precedents. (Mr. Justice Douglas in his concurring opinion observes that Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928), which held on two grounds—no trespass and no tangible seizure—that wiretapping did not violate the Fourth Amendment, was overruled, but I think he is right in this only on the second ground, and that this result had been obtained anyway in other cases.) Instead, Mr. Justice Clark chose for the majority to handle the case within the rather narrow confines of the Court's old precedents. This means, of course, that wiretapping remains—at least for now—purely a policy question for Congress, and non-trespassory bugging poses—as yet—no constitutional questions. This result will probably not withstand the pressure of further appeals in the area—the Court has a non-trespassory bugging case on its docket for next term—but it does give the Congress and the states considerable room for legislative activity now. If a comprehensive scheme of regulation were now adopted, moreover, this might obviate the necessity for further Court action in this area on the constitutional level. In the long run, this course of action would be preferable, since legislative solutions are more amenable—at least in theory—to reform in light of experience.

IV

After noting that the standard was the same for federal and state authorities—and that the standard was the "reasonableness" of the search under the Fourth Amendment and the opinions of the Court applying that Amendment—Mr. Justice Clark subjected the face of the New York statute to a detailed analysis. First, he noted with approval that the statute employed the court order technique with its "neutral and detached magistrate." He then raised, but did not press, an objection going to the difference in terminology employed by the Fourth Amendment and the statute on the question of pre-search justification. The Fourth Amendment says "probable cause," while the statute said "reasonable ground." Mr. Justice Harlan rightly pointed out in dissent that the distinction was without difference. I suppose on the other hand, that legislators would be prudent to employ the right terminology in the future. In any event, he then moved to what the majority found to be the central objection to the statute: its "blanket grant of permission to eavesdrop * * * without adequate judicial supervision or protective procedures."

Mr. Justice Clark first noted with disapproval that the statute was not limited to particular offenses and that the statute did not require a description of the type of conversations to be overheard. Absent this sort of particularization, the statute gave, he said, the officer executing the order "a roving commission." In contrast, Mr. Justice Clark held up for a model the procedures used to approve the tactical use of electronic surveillance techniques given approbation by the Court in Osborn v. United States, 385 U.S. 323 (1966). There, federal officers sought judicial authorization for the overhearing of bribery conversations which the agents had probable cause to believe were going to take place at a meeting in a lawyer's office on a particular afternoon. For Mr. Justice Clark, the face of the New York statute did not contemplate that sort of discriminating use of electronic surveillance techniques. Its authorization was objectionable because it was blanket in all cases.

Mr. Justice Clark pointed out next that the face of the statute apparently automatically authorized a two-month period of continuous surveillance. This, he said, was the equivalent of authorizing a series of intrusions even though a single limited showing of probable cause might have been made. In contrast, Osborn had upheld a surveillance carefully tailored to intrude only to the extent required to meet the limited objective established as reasonable by the showing of probable cause. In Osborn, the constitutional standard of reasonableness was met, for "no greater invasion of privacy was permitted than was necessary under the circumstances."

The Osborn authorization, too, envisioned a quick termination of surveillance once the officer's limited objective was achieved. In contrast, the New York statute apparently permitted the surveillance to continue for the statutory period even though the objective for which the order had been sought may have been realized. Extensions could also be obtained on the mere showing that it was in the "public interest." No new showing of probable cause was apparently required. The New York statute, in short, failed to draw a careful distinction between tactical and strategic surveillance and failed to require a showing proportionate to the two distinctly different uses of electronic surveillance. Permitting what amounted to strategic surveillance on a tactical showing was, Mr. Justice Clark observed, "a blanket grant." As Mr. Justice Stewart observed in his concurring opinion: "The standard of reasonableness embodied in the Fourth Amendment demands that the showing of justification match the degree of intrusion." Legislators contemplating new legislation in this area would do well, therefore, to draw a sharp distinction between the showings required and the authorizations granted depending on the contemplated use of the surveillance techniques. Provision, too, should be made for quick termination when the objective is reached and for close periodic supervision during an extended duration of surveillance.

Finally, Mr. Justice Clark recognized the distinct difference between the conventional warrant and the electronic surveillance warrant: the electronic surveillance warrant depends for its success on the absence of notice. Yet Mr. Justice Clark observed the New York statute required no showing of "special facts" or "exigent circumstances" to overcome the normal requirement of pre-search notice. Here, of course, Mr. Justice Clark was undoubtedly referring to the sort of analagous situation sustained by the Court in Kerr v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963), a case in which he authored the majority opinion sustaining unannounced entry to arrest and search where there was reasonable fear that announcement might result in the destruction of evidence otherwise lawfully subject to seizure. Such a showing of "special facts" or "exigent circumstances" would unquestionably be met by a legislative requirement that judicial authorization for the use of electronic surveillance techniques be conditioned on a showing that "normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried." This is the English standard now for the use of wiretapping on the Home Secretary's warrant. (Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England 65–69 (1958)) Mr. Justice Clark observed, too, that there was no requirement of post-search notice. No inventory or return was required to be filed. This requirement, of course, presents no legislative difficulty. Indeed, it is already a requirement on conventional warrants. (Cf. Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 41(d))

V

Having thus finished articulating the majority's blue print for constitutional electronic surveillance, Mr. Justice Clark took up the question of need. First, he noted the opinion of the majority of knowledgeable law enforcement officials that the use of these techniques is indispensable. He then noted that this opinion is today not supported by empirical statistics. I only wish he had also explained why empirical statistics are needed. Much of our modern understanding of human psychology, for example, rests on clinical not empirical data. Yet the law has rightly not demanded empirical proof before it has updated its techniques in that area. Here, of course, informed law enforcement opinion is the comparable clinical data. Hopefully, however, when new legislation is passed, it will provide for the gathering of this kind of data to the degree possible in this area.

Mr. Justice Clark did, however, refer to some statistics collected in the early 1950's, which, according to him, seemed to show that wiretapping was not needed in organized crime cases. Curiously, he classified extortion as not involving organized crime, and seemed to feel that a quantified judgment, that is, a percentage judgment, could be made of the importance of the cases. The English Privy Councilors who studied wiretapping in England over a twenty year period—concluding that both the interests of privacy and justice could be well-served in a system of controlled electronic surveillance—answered Mr. Justice Clark's mistaken notion in these terms:

"We cannot think it to be wise or prudent or necessary to take away from the Police any weapon or to weaken any power they now possess in their fight against organized crime. . . . * * * If it be said that the number of cases where methods of interception are used in small and that an objectionable method could therefore well be abolished, we feel that . . . this is not a reason why criminals in the particular class of crime should be encouraged by the knowledge that they have nothing to fear from methods of interception. * * * This, in our opinion, so far from strengthening the liberty of the ordinary citizen, might very well have the opposite effect." (Report of the Committee of Privy Councillors Appointed to Inquire into the Interception of Communication (1957) reprinted in, Wiretapping, Eavesdropping and the Bill of Rights. Hearings before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 85th Cong. 2nd Sess Pt., 460–99 at 489 (1958)).

Mr. Justice Clark also referred to the recent confessions of the Department of Justice in certain bugging cases. He noted that the Department has stated that it presently no longer plans to use the techniques in organized crime cases. Interestingly, he did not note the Department's announcement that it would continue to use them in the future without judicial supervision of any type albeit in a more serious class of cases. Here I cannot help but speculate with Mr. Justice White how the federal government can constitutionally use these techniques in "security cases" on the national level but state governments cannot use these techniques even under judicial supervision in "security cases" on the local level.

Mr. Justice Clark also, Mr. Justice White in dissent rightly observes, incredibly suggests "that there has been no breakdown of federal law enforcement in the area of organized crime." Here, of course, he simply ignores, as Mr. Justice White points out, the findings of the President's Crime Commission, which were brought to the Court's attention in the briefs of the parties. Nothing in the briefs or the record suggests that these findings are not in accord with the true situation. I cannot help but feel with Mr. Justice White that on this score the Court is not dealing with the "facts of the real world."

"In any event," and this is important, Mr. Justice Clark for the majority found the question of need not determinative. For the majority, their blueprint for constitutional electronic surveillance was compelled by the interests of privacy independent of the interests of justice. Their standard was no mere "formality." Yet it was not, Mr. Justice Clark said, "inflexible, or obtusely unyielding to the legitimate needs of law enforcement." Instead, it was merely the "basic command of the Fourth Amendment."

Finally, Mr. Justice Clark indirectly referred to the opinions of the dissenters and the suggestions there made that no warrant or statute could be drawn to meet the majority's requirements. He then conceded if that were true the fruits of eavesdropping had to be banned under the Fourth Amendment. But he followed his concession quickly with the reminder that the Court had approved the careful use of electronic surveillance techniques in the past and suggested that the majority was not willing to make the "precincts of the home or office . . . sanctuaries where the law can never reach." The Court, he said, only wanted the use of these techniques to meet "a constitutional standard." The New York statute for them did not meet that standard. Had it been drafted differently, it would have been sustained. Because it was not, it had to be struck down. But he left the clear impression that if the statute were redrafted along the lines suggested by the majority it would be upheld.

VI

The Court has thus given this Body the blueprint for a constitutional system of authorized electronic surveillance. Only the question of legislative will remains. One obstacle to that will is the position of the present Attorney General. As I noted at the beginning of this statement, it is apparently the position of Mr. Clark and others that electronic eavesdropping is "neither effective nor highly productive." Testifying before Subcommittee No. 5 of the House Judiciary Committee, he suggested that this opinion was based on an examination of the logs kept by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in selected organized crime cases in which under previous Departmental direction the Bureau had employed electronic surveillance techniques. These logs have neither been made public nor made available to this Body.

What I have just suggested, of course, remains generally true. Summaries of some of these logs, however, have become public during the course of litigation in which the Department is now engaged. Attached as an appendix to this statement is a story which appeared in the Providence Journal of Providence, Rhode Island, on May 20, 1967. That article reprints verbatim ten "airtels" of the Federal Bureau of Investigation summarizing for the Washington office of the Bureau information electronically obtained by the Boston office of the Bureau.

To the uninformed reader these airtels seem relatively meaningless. To make them pregnant with significance, it takes only a little familiarity with the nature of organized crime. (See generally the Task Force Report: Organized Crime (1967) and Organized Crime and Illicit Traffic in Narcotics, S. Rep. No. 72, 89th Cong. 1st Sess. (1965) (hereinafter cited Rep.) along with the relevant supporting hearings (hereinafter cited H.)) When you have this familiarity, the impact of these few airtels is staggering.

What I would like to do now is to outline in general terms what these airtels mean and to place them in a context from which the indispensable character of electronic surveillance techniques to any serious attack on organized crime will emerge.

VII

These airtels were disclosed during a post-trial hearing in a tax case involving Louis "The Fox" Taglianetti, a member of La Costa Nostra. (Rep. 44) His criminal activities include gambling, robbery and burglary. (H 551) the airtels are summaries of daily logs kept by Bureau agents of conversation picked up on an electronic device used for the purpose of obtaining strategic intelligence placed by the Bureau in the office of the National Cigarette Service, a vending machine corporation, located at 168 Atwells Ave., in Providence, Rhode Island. The device was placed there to obtain accurate coverage of the activities of Raymond Patriarca, the head of the New England "family" of La Cosa Nostra and a member of its national ruling board, the "Commission." (H. 567). Patriarca's criminal record includes convictions—during his younger years before he obtained the immunity which goes with success in organized crime—for such crimes as armed robbery, arson and the White Slave Act. The decision to place Patriarca under surveillance, in short, was not without justification. His associates—as the airtels show—include nearly every hood in the country who has graduated from the drugstore cowboy stage, and his criminal activities—again confirmed by the airtels—run the full gamut.

The device was in operation from March 1962 to July 1965. The ten airtels made public are the airtels from this period in which Taglianetti was mentioned. The other airtels were kept confidential by the District Court. What is contained in them can only be inferred from those made public.

VIII

What then in broad outline does a careful analysis of these ten airtels establish—out of the mouths of the men themselves—in a context in which there was no reason to lie?

IX

From August 1960 until June 1964, I was a special prosecutor in the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Department of Justice. Nothing in the routine reports that I read from any federal agency contained data of this quantity or quality. Apparently, the Federal Bureau of Investigation was not then making electronically obtained data directly available to Departmental attorneys. I read, of course, general intelligence reports, but these seldom were on the concrete level of these airtels, and they could not be used for prosecution or investigation purposes. The investigation reports I read were the product of the use of normal investigative methods. There is just simply no comparison in the two kinds of reports. In light of this, I find it nothing short of incredible that Mr. Clark and others would seriously suggest that the use of electronic surveillance techniques is "neither effective nor highly productive."

X

Mr. Clark also suggested that organized crime, though important, is a "tiny part" of the entire crime picture. I would also like to register my disagreement with this suggestion.

Mr. Justice Brandeis in his classic dissent in Olmstead v. United States 277 U.S. 438, 485 (1928) rightly remarked: "Our government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example." Mr. Justice Brandeis then spoke in the context of lawless law enforcement. There is, however, another way in which government teaches by example. Its failures, too, do not go unnoticed especially among the young, who watch what we do but seldom listen to what we say. Unlike other successful criminals who operate outside of an organization who require anonymity for success, the top men in organized crime—like Raymond Patriarca—are well known both to law enforcement agencies and to the public. Like Patriarca, in the earlier stages of their careers, they may have been touched by the law, but once they attain a top position in the rackets they acquire a high degree of immunity from legal accountability. The statement of a leading worker with gang boys long ago pointed out the effect of this process:

"When a noted criminal is caught, the fact is the principal topic of conversation among my boys. They and others lay wagers as to how long it will be before the criminal is free again, how long it will be before his pull gets him away from the law. The youngsters soon learn who are the politicians who can be depended upon to get offenders out of trouble, who are the dive-keepers who are protected. The increasing contempt for law is due to the corrupt alliance between crime and politics, protected vice, pull in the administration of justice, unemployment, and a general soreness against the world produced by these conditions." (Quoted in Thrasher, The Gang 455 (1927))

As part of organized crime, an ambitious young man knows that he can rise from body guard to a power in the community. Roy French the horsetrainer who got word to Patriarca to help him get a license as a horsetrainer at the Rhode Island tracks knows something about our society today that Mr. Clark does not (1–26–65 ¶¶ 12–13). The man who contacted Patriarca about his labor troubles at his construction sites in Maine, Connecticut and Rhode Island knows something about our society today that Mr. Clark does not (1–28–65 ¶ 12). Nick, the young man who got Patriarca to get him membership in La Cosa Nostra, knows something about our society today that Mr. Clark does not (9–13–63 ¶¶ 4–7).

No civilized society can long permit the operation within it of an underworld organization as powerful and as immune from accountability as La Cosa Nostra. The success story of this group is symbolic of the breakdown of law and order increasingly characteristic of many sectors of our society. To hold the allegiance of the law-abiding, society must show each man that no man is above the law. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice summed it up in these terms:

"In many ways organized crime is the most sinister kind of crime in America. The men who control it have become rich and powerful by encouraging the needy to gamble, by luring the troubled to destroy themselves with drugs, by extorting the profits of honest and hardworking businessmen, by collecting usury from those in financial plight, by maiming or murdering those who oppose them, by bribing those who are sworn to destroy them. Organized crime is not merely a few preying upon a few. In a very real sense it is dedicated to subverting not only American institutions, but the very decency and integrity that are the most cherished attributes of a free society. As the leaders of Cosa Nostra and their racketeering allies pursue their conspiracy unmolested in open and continual defiance of the law, they preach a sermon that all too many Americans heed: the government is for sale; lawlessness is the road to wealth; honesty is a pitfall and morality a trap for suckers." (The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society: A Report by the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice 209 (1967))

This is what I wish Mr. Clark understood.

XI

The Supreme Court has now handed down the blueprint for constitutional electronic surveillance. The President's Crime Commission has called for legislative action. If there is any doubt in this Body's mind of need for this legislation, I suggest that the doubt be resolved by this Body calling for the other airtels in the possession of the Department of Justice. It is a fair inference if Patriarca was under surveillance that the other members of the Commission—9 to 12 in number (H. 7)—were as well. The Department has found it in the public interest to disclose various airtels to District Courts to insure that fair trials have been given to the worse sort of hoodlums. I suggest it would be equally in the public interest to disclose all of the airtels in every situation where a Commission member was involved to this Body. Examine them for yourself. Make your own judgment on the clear and present character of the threat to free institutions in our society posed by organized crime. See for yourself if electronic surveillance techniques are the indispensable tools knowledgeable law enforcement officials say they are. When this is done I have no question that the problem of legislative will have been overcome.

Thank you.

CLARK SAYS RISE IN CRIME IS SMALL

ATTORNEY GENERAL DECLARES "THERE IS NO WAVE"

By Sidney E. Zion

Attorney General Ramsey Clark said yesterday that he did not believe there was a crime wave in the nation.

"The level of crime has risen a little bit," Mr. Clark said, "but there is no wave of crime in the country."

Mr. Clark gave this assessment in an interview here after addressing a luncheon meeting of the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., at the Americana Hotel.

Asked about official statistics that indicate substantial increases in the crime rate yearly, the Attorney General said: "We do ourselves a great disservice with statistics."

Thus, he said, it is "quite clear," despite impressions to the contrary, "that the murder rate has declined steadily since the 1930's," from 7.8 slayings per 100,000 population to 5.4 last year.

"MOST ACCURATELY REPORTED"

"The fact is," Mr. Clark said, "that murder is the crime most accurately reported, so we can make comparisons with the past."

The Attorney General said he met with police chiefs from 14 major cities on Wednesday and that they generally reported a slight increase in crime.

"One city was up 1 per cent from last year, but last year they had been down 1 per cent from the year before," he said.

Mr. Clark said that despite President Johnson's nearly total ban on wiretapping and bugging imposed in July, 1965, the Department of Justice's prosecutions against organized crime were now "at an all-time high."

He said that in the fiscal year following the President's order, which banned all electronic eavesdropping in Federal cases except where the national security was directly endangered, organized-crime prosecutions went up 30 per cent.

"With the rarest exceptions," Mr. Clark said, "we have found that electronic surveillance was unnecessary, either in obtaining direct evidence of crime or in developing leads."

He has concluded, he said, that electronic eavesdropping is "neither effective nor highly productive."

The Attorney General said that organized crime was a "tiny part" of the entire crime picture, though an important one.

"In his speech to the Legal Defense Fund luncheon, which was in honor of the 13th anniversary of the Supreme Court's desegregation decision, Mr. Clark noted that as a result of that ruling nearly half a million Negro students were enrolled in schools with white students in the 11 Southern States.

"What greater transformation effected by the rule of law does history reveal?" he said.

OUTLOOK ON RIGHTS

In a panel discussion of the luncheon meeting, the prospects for the civil rights movement were reviewed by Saul D. Alinsky, executive director of the Industrial Areas Foundation; Mr. Kenneth B. Clark, president of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, and Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

"We are fine at demonstrating and protesting," Mr. Alinsky said. "But we don't yet have the organization to compel the power structure to follow through on the concessions they make. It's as though a labor union won a contract, then dissolved and expected the employer to live up to the agreement."

APPENDIX B

[Providence Journal, Providence, R.I., May 20, 1967, p. 1, col. 1]

THE TAGLIANETTI CASE: WHAT THE 'BUG' TOLD AT 168 ATWELLS AVE.

Chief Judge Edward W. Day of U.S. District Court has reserved decision as to whether evidence in the income tax evasion conviction of Louis "The Fox" Taglianetti in April, 1966, was tainted by Federal Bureau of Investigation "bugging" of the office of a "close associate."

In seven days of court hearings which ended last Thursday, evidence was adduced that the electronic surveillance was maintained by the FBI on a daily basis from March, 1962, to July, 1965, and that the microphone was planted at 168 Atwells Ave. to monitor conversations in the office of National Cigarette Service.

It was further testified during the hearing that Raymond L. S. Patriarca and Philip Carrozza are the "principals" in National Cigarette Service.

During Taglianetti's trial 13 months ago, Patriarca, summoned by the government, had testified that he was a "partner" with Carrozza in National Cigarette Service and that Taglianetti was a "good will" man who got the firm many "locations" for its cigarette vending machines.

Taglianetti was found guilty by a jury of evading income taxes in the years 1956 through 1958. Last September, Judge Day sentenced him to seven months and a $3,000 fine. Taglianetti appealed, which stayed the sentence.

While the appeal was pending before the Circuit Court at Boston, the Justice Department came forward last December and volunteered that the FBI had "bugged" the "place of business of a close associate" of Taglianetti. The Justice Department said no fruits of the microphone surveillance had tainted the income tax case, but asked the court to decide.

The Circuit Court rejected a defense motion for a new trial, remanded the case to Judge Day on the narrow issue of whether the evidence had been tainted and said that if he could not determine this issue after a hearing, he could order a new trial.

Judge Day began hearings on May 9. When they were concluded last Thursday after seven court days, he gave defense counsel until June 15 to file a brief and the government until July 15 to file an answering brief.

At the outset of the proceedings, defense counsel asked production of the records of the FBI surveillance. Under the Jencks Act, Judge Day examined the entire record in chambers and ordered the government to give defense counsel all FBI records of conversations in which Taglianetti had participated.

The Jencks Act provides that in any federal criminal prosecution a defendant shall be entitled to examine and use any government statement or report relating to the testimony of a government witness, and if it contains matter which does not relate to the testimony of the witness, the government shall deliver the statement or report to the judge, who shall examine it privately and excise the material not relating to the witness' testimony before directing the government to deliver it to the defendant.

The defense was given only a fraction of the complete FBI record. The remainder is locked in Judge Day's office. The hearing began after defense counsel had time to examine the FBI material turned over to them.

Through a series of Internal Revenue and FBI witnesses, Charles J. Alexander, Justice Department attorney from Washington who was assisted by U.S. Dist. Atty. Edward P. Gallogly, undertook to demonstrate that no information from the FBI bugging had been communicated to Internal Revenue and that, with two exceptions not relating to Taglianetti, none of the information had been disseminated outside FBI channels.

By intensive cross-examination of government witnesses, Bruce M. Selya, defense counsel with John A. Varone, undertook to undermine this government claim by showing a wide distribution of multiple copies of the surveillance data to FBI headquarters in Washington and to branch FBI offices in several cities, beyond the knowledge of witnesses here as to what happened to the information elsewhere.

The defense also claimed that the FBI bugging of a conversation between Taglianetti and Robert G. Crouchley, Providence attorney, while Mr. Varone was incapacitated after an automobile accident in 1965, was an invasion of lawyer-client relationship.

Repeatedly in cross-examination Mr. Selya drew acknowledgements from government witnesses that Taglianetti was not the "subject" of the electronic surveillance at 168 Atwells Ave.

John F. Kehoe, special agent in the Boston FBI office who was coordinator of the surveillance for the Justice Department organized crime and racketeering division, described how the FBI data was recorded.

The agent operating the tape recorder at Providence kept "logs" in which he made note of individuals speaking and the subject matter discussed.

The tapes and logs were delivered daily to Mr. Kehoe. Listening to the tapes, and checking what he heard with what the logs said, he made memorandum notes. From the memorandums he later dictated "airtels," the FBI term for air mail messages sent through FBI channels, which went to Washington FBI headquarters and other FBI offices as subject matter indicated. At the bottom of each "airtel" the numerals and cities named show how copies were sent to which FBI offices.

The tapes later were erased and used over and over at Providence.

Mr. Selya introduced a series of these airtels, furnished the defense by the government, as a defense exhibit last Wednesday afternoon.

The defense exhibit on record in the case follows:

Re Boston airtel 4/16/63.

BS 837–C* advised on 4/16/63 that Patriarca took his wife to the New England Baptist Hospital, Boston, Mass., for an operation.

On 4/17/63 Rudolph Sciara, who was recently acquitted in State Court on a charge of murder, was told by Patriarca that he is doing too many favors for people and that he should discontinue doing same as it will lead him into trouble. Sciara had mentioned that he had arranged the bail for three individuals, not identified.

Patriarca instructed him that, when arranging bail for any individual, he should make sure that the bondsman does not know his (Sciara's) identity as he believes that all bondsmen are stool pigeons.

He then was very critical of an individual he believed to be a dentist, who had just visited him and said that this dentist is a stool pigeon for the FBI. (This statement not true.) He pointed out that when he had taken his wife to the hospital in Boston, the dentist, whom he had not seen for several months had dropped in and inquired about her health. When Raymond told him that his wife was in the hospital in Boston, he apparently notified the FBI because they surveilled the hospital and observed Patriarca meeting with various individuals, including (name blanked out).

(Blanked out) Patriarca said that he was contacting (blanked out) in an effort to obtain the parole of Leo Santaniello and Lawrence Baiona.

He also told Sciara that today the criminals are fighting scientific crime detection and, therefore, have to be very careful.

Re Boston Airtel to Bureau dated 3/7/63.

On 3/9/63, BS 837–C* advised that two unmen discussed Taglianetti's tax case in which he has recently been indicted. Raymond thought that if they obtained the proper attorney, and that he pointed out to the judge that Taglianetti has a young family, no criminal record, and has a good employment record, that he might get a suspended sentence. Raymond suggested that Taglianetti ought to attempt in some way to have the USA recommend a light sentence because of the above facts. If the USA does recommend a light sentence, Patriarca believes that the judge would go along with the recommendation.

On 3/11/63, Johnny (LNU) (not John Williams) and another Unman told Patriarca that they intend to get some whiskey from the warehouse but do not intend to go through the kid who works in the place. He pointed out that this source of supply of whiskey has not been available to them in the recent past which necessitated that they purchase their own whiskey. The location of this warehouse was not mentioned.

On the same date, another Unman told Raymond that one gang is competing against the other but did not describe either gang. He said that Pete (LNU) is all done as he is going to the (can). Pete wanted to take a couple of banks alone and there was mention of Philadelphia but the informant was unable to ascertain the details of same. Immediately thereafter Patriarca said "We can't send him to someone down there as there is too much heat around." Efforts are being made to identify a Peter who was probably recently arrested in this area.

On the same date, Eddie (LNU) told Patriarca that he grabbed the kid yesterday, not further identified. This concerned a bet which a woman had placed and Eddie was of the opinion that the woman pastposted the bookie. The woman threatened to call Johnny Barborian of Providence, Rhode Island and it was not clear to the informant whether she did contact Barborian. At the end of the conversation Patriarca told Eddie to pay the hit.

Re Boston airtel 3/14/63.

BS 837–C* advised on 3/14/63 that Raymond Patriarca was contacted by Louis Taglianetti relative to his pending IRS case. They discussed his IRS case somewhat in detail but mentioned nothing of significant value.

Raymond discussed with Unman regarding R.I. registration RL490 which allegedly was observed in a parking lot when Raymond had a meet sometime ago. This plate was checked out and found not significant to this investigation.

On 3/15/63 Raymond accepted some checks from an unidentified individual who owed Raymond money. This individual said that he would pay Raymond $85.00 thereafter to fulfill his obligation.

Another unidentified individual told Raymond that Nicholas Parlato of Newport, Rhode Island, was interviewed for two hours relative to the job not specified. Raymond said he hopes that he gets the job.

John Barborian discussed with Raymond the kidnaping of an individual in Miami, Florida, last July. This information is set out in a separate letter.

Another unman tells Raymond that the fellow from Chicago wants $2.00 a case for 25,000 cases of shoe polish. Second unman said it was only worth $1.50 per case. They decided that Sam LNU should go to Chicago relative to this matter but Raymond said it was not worth it.

On 3/16/63 Patriarca reminded Frank Forti that he had a meet with (Tony Pussy) Russo at the hotel at 5:00 that day.

On 3/18/63 unman tells Raymond that the girl who was supposed to go to the track with the money lost her pocketbook and billfold with the money in it and that they lost the bank roll. This apparently concerns a gambler, not identified and that this individual went to New York to get another bank roll.

Another unman asked Raymon how he could get a hold of Mickey the Wise Guy (Michael Rocco) and he directed this individual to Frank Rossetti of Providence, Rhode Island. Said that Rossetti would know the phone number of Mickey the Wise Guy.

Rebestel, 9/13/63.

BS 837-C * advised on 9/13/63 that Patriarca was in NYC on 9/9/63. While Patriarca was waiting at the Edison Hotel for some unknown person he met Pogey (believed to be Pogey Torriello). Pogey was with Hymie (LNU). Pogey indicated to Patriarca that his money is all tied up with Frankie (LNU) and, in order to get some capital, he, Pogey, will have to sell his stock.

Mike (LNU) ascertained from Joe Lindsey, noted Boston Philanthropist, that he, Lindsey, was not interested in obtaining the points. Informant was of the opinion that the points were worth $10,000 but was unable to determine what corporation the points were being sold for. Lindsey was of the opinion that the points were not worth $10,000 and, therefore, declined to purchase same.

Patriarca told Henry Tameleo of Providence, R.I. that he is going to NYC, probably on Monday, September 23rd. It should be noted that the informant was not positive about this date but did learn the following:

Patriarca is going to New York with Henry Tameleo and that they are going to make Nick or Chick a member of the "family" Wednesday night, 9/25/63, at the Roma. The reason they are going to make Nick on Wednesday night is "in case they want to make peace Thursday." If they did, he indicated that he (Patriarca) would be tied up trying to effect the peace. Patriarca has obtained permission from the Commission to make Nick because it was an emergency and pointed out that if it were not an emergency, the Commission would not recognize him as a member. He obtained the permission from Tony (LNU) to make Nick a member and the ceremony is to take place at 4:00 p.m. on 9/25/63.

Ray indicated he talked to Pogey only for a short time because Pogey's kid was coming down and Pogey did not want to permit the boy to see Patriarca. Patriarca does not like to hang around New York when he is conducting business there but only stay a sufficient amount of time to allow him to conduct his business.

Raymond was unable to understand Pogey completely "as he juggles his words all the time." Pogey did tell him, however, that some guys are coming tomorrow, meaning 9/14/63, and Joey (LNU), Dana and another individual (not known) went there on 9/12/63. Informant was unable to ascertain the significance of this but was of the opinion that it concerned the selling of points in some gambling casino. The sale is a legitimate sale and the person investing would obtain at least 6 per cent on his investment legitimately.

Patriarca instructed Tameleo to go to Boston and tell Jerry Angiulo what is going on and the Commission has Ok'd the making of this kid (Nick). Patriarca is going to turn Nick over to an individual, whose name the informant could not ascertain, or "whoever they put in Chicago."

Patriarca advised that the other kid, Moe (LNU), called Doc (LNU) and he, Moe, is going to string him out. Informant was unable to ascertain the significance of this.

Raymond said that the other 24 guys are not made, but the informant did not ascertain the significance of this.

Patriarca then told Tameleo to tell Joe (possibly Joseph Lombardo of Boston) that the boss and underboss in New York are out; that right now that "family" is under the Commission. Patriarca did not know who they were going to make as boss of this "family" as they have not picked the person as yet. He specifically warned Tameleo to give this information to Joe and Joe alone; if he wants to tell it to anyone else that is his business. He also told Tameleo to tell Joe that the kid will be made at 4 o'clock on September 25th.

On 9/16/63, Frank Davis, Providence, R.I., has been summoned to appear before IRS for a formal interview inasmuch as he has not reported correct income. Consideration is being given to possible criminal action.

The sensitive nature of the informant's position necessitates that every effort be exercised to maintain his security.

Rebossirtel 10/31/63.

The following information was furnished by BS 837–C.*

On 10/31/63, Unman told Patriarca that he had a mysterious telephone call. As a result of this call he was of the opinion that his phone had been tapped. Unman was involved in bookmaking but the informant did not have details concerning this. Patriarca uses a public telephone booth when it is necessary to make important calls.

Another Unman requested Patriarca's help in a case involving an unknown individual who is facing a jail sentence for a crime committed by him. The defendant still has $18,000 from the result of the crime. Patriarca will assist this individual, providing he gets half of the money or $9,000. He did not indicate in what way he would help the defendant. Unman would contact him later when he discussed the details with the defendant.

On 11/1/63, no pertinent information was developed.

On 11/4/63, Louis Taglianetti, Providence, R.I., discussed his Internal Revenue case with Patriarca. No pertinent information was developed.

Frank Davis, Providence, R.I., still owes the Cranston Loan Co. a substantial amount of money. Davis' former partner Harrington is afraid that he will lose his collateral on a loan that Davis has outstanding.

Patriarca was not sympathetic and told Davis not to worry about Harrington but let him lose his money.

Davis requested Raymond to speak to Dario, President of the Lincoln Downs Race Track, Lincoln, R.I., about the loan with the Cranston Loan Co.; however, Patriarca advised he could not do this under the present circumstances. Raymond stated that he has not made any money in legitimate businesses in the past.

Joseph Krikorian (aka Joe Kirk) contacted Patriarca. Krikorian was not too enthused about taking over Julius Salisbury's gambling business in Baltimore, Md., while Salisbury was in prison. According to the informant, Kirk did not believe that there would be sufficient money in the enterprise; and, further, that he did not like the idea of giving up the business when Salisbury is released from prison. He did mention that the number play in Baltimore is extremely good, as in Washington, D.C. Informant was unable to ascertain all details concerning this operation in Baltimore.

Kirk and Patriarca are disgusted with the operation of the Berkshire Downs Race Track, Hancock, Mass. It appeared that the Berkshire Downs Race Track is going into bankruptcy.

Unman, who formerly ran the fights in Providence, R.I., had previously contacted Col. Walter E. Stone prior to his testimony before the Senate Crime Commission in Washington, D.C. He warned Stone not to go out on a limb and to be very general in his statements before this Crime Committee.

Stone apparently did not take this man's advice and, consequently, made a fool out of himself with his testimony concerning Patriarca. Patriarca, however, cleared himself to a great extent at the State Grand Jury, Providence, R.I. on 10/24, 25/63.

Patriarca claims that 90% of Stone's testimony was untrue. Patriarca denied ever being dishonest with his friends and thought that probably Stone, when he testified concerning Patriarca's dishonesty among his friends, was trying to get him, Patriarca, knocked off.

Patriarca is aware of the possibility that some of the young punks coming up might figure Patriarca at one time was a stool pigeon and, therefore kill him.

Patriarca does not intend to testify before the Federal Grand Jury at Providence, R.I., which is to be held in the near future. He intends to force USA Pettine to prove everything. Patriarca believes that Col. Walter E. Stone must have been brain-washed by the AG, Robert Kennedy, to have testified in the manner that he did for the Senate Crime Commission.

The sensitive nature of the informant's position necessitates that every effort be exercised to maintain his security.

BS 837–C* advised on 10/19/64 that Unman explained to Raymond that he (Unman) was trying to line up some man for a hit and the difficulties which have arisen concerning this. (This possibly deals with the attempted killing of Willie Marfeo, Providence, R.I., which information has previously been disseminated. Nothing additional was obtained concerning this as set out in previous airtels.)

Louis Taglianetti, Providence, R.I., discussed in detail his IRS trial which is in progress.

Patriarca has been subpoenaed to testify in this case inasmuch as Taglianetti claims that he received a salary from the National Cigarette Vending Machine Co. which is owned by Patriarca.

USA Raymond J. Pettine, Providence, R.I., is attempting to force Taglianetti to plead to an income tax violation.

Patriarca was extremely angry in that all his witnesses in the libel case between the Boston Herald Traveler and Patriarca were held in contempt for taking the 5th Amendment. They were also ordered to pay all lawyers fees in connection with this hearing. In the event he is questioned about the Mafia or La Cosa Nostra he is going to reply that the only Mafia he ever heard of is the Irish Mafia that the Kennedy's are in charge of. Patriarca will deny knowing of Cosa Nostra until Valachi mentioned it at recent hearings.

Taglianetti is considering feigning a heart attack in order to postpone his tax case.

On 10/20/64, Joe Modica advised that Sam (LNU) is in bad shape financially. Joe inquired of Patsy Capaldo (apparently in connectiton with the Berkshire Downs Race Track). Patsy appeared before the Crime Commission sometime ago. Joe then discussed the racing dates for the Berkshire Downs Race Track and both he and Patriarca were very disturbed that Lou Smith, who owns Green Mountain, might ask for the same racing dates as Berkshire Downs. Patriarca stated that the track lost $185,000 this year.

Modica was concerned that Patriarca might be of the opinion that he (Modica) was trying to "horn in" on the Hancock Race Track. He explained how Sam Rizzo borrowed the $5,000 to assist him in purchasing the Hancock Raceway at auction. He stated that Rizzo is not off the hook for the $5,000 and that he is still trying to obtain same.

Patriarca told Modica that the word had come down that no one was to do any business with any of Bonanno's group because of the fact that he (Bonanno) failed to show up at a commission hearing when ordered to do so.

Nick Bianco, Brooklyn, N. Y., told Raymond that concerning "that thing" in Jersey he left Tuesday and did not expect to return until Thursday. He met Johnny Coco (Lardiere) and Coco and Nick looked around "for that guy." Nick was of the opinion that he was going to live with them (probably meaning Coco and his group) for a few days. He (Lardiere) showed us where the guy lived and told Nick to go back to Brooklyn and wait for his call.

Patriarca mentioned that Coco helped a lot of the individuals in New Jersey.

Nick stated that Coco called him yesterday and said that he was talking to Tommy (LNU). He told Tommy that he was "pretty successful" and told him (Tommy) "what had to be told." Nick said that it was a telephone conversation and he was not able to fully comprehend the message but was of the opinion that everything was going along satisfactorily. Coco told him to wait for a call from him.

Patriarca mentioned that Rudolph (possibly Sciarra) was in Jersey and he (possibly referring to the victim) "hides in the joints."

Nick left and returned later the same day and continued the conversation relative to the Jersey thing. He stated that he was with Johnny Coco for four or five hours. Nick explained to Coco who the guy was and they searched all the joints.

He told Raymond the guy had a light blue car, registration CL 591. He then added that the 591 was possibly a combination of the numbers 591 and further, added that the initials of the guy were backwards, and then added, "RC."

Nick stated that he (victim) hung around with Sonny Diorio's kid whom Patriarca described as a redhead or blond kid. Sonny is a couple of years older than Nick, but the informant had no further description of either the victim or those associated with him.

Patriarca mentioned that the kids were on the junk but the informant was not sure whether he was referring to Sonny Diorio's kid or "the fat kid" that hangs around with him.

Nick was thinking of approaching the "fat kid" but was afraid of scaring him.

Nick further advised of a situation that occurred a short time ago. It appeared that the Feds left and the cops came in—"right into the house." They told Joey that "if you run, we'll put you in for a material witness" and demanded a $200 payoff, which Josey gave them. They ordered Joey to stay in the house. A short time thereafter Rocky (LNU), who is very close to Joey, came walking down the street. He apparently was confronted by the police with shotguns and, after being observed by Joey, the cops were convinced that he was "OK."

Nick stated that those guys have 20 guys who "write for them" and they (meaning the police and Feds) have very good information. They figured out that the information is coming from somebody who is very close to Frank (LNU).

They keep knocking the Carlo and Joey thing.

Ray stated that Joey, whom he described as the guy with Carlo, called him a few weeks ago and said that Carlo wanted to see Patriarca on Thursday, but Patriarca was unable to make the trip. He told Joey to call Friday if Carlo (Gambino) wanted to see him on Friday or thereafter. He has not received a call from Joey since that time.

Nick stated that he met Carlo's brother Joe on the street the other day and Joe told them that Bonanno's group was pulling away from him (Bonanno).

He stated that Mike Zepella (PH), who is with Bonanno, "turned in the other thing" with 63 or 65 guys and they expect more.

Vito, the one in jail, was described as the muscle man for Lelow (Ph). It appeared to the informant that Lelow is the top guy of the Bonanno group in Canada. Lelow, according to Nick, took his side (probably Bonanno's) and "does not want to know anything." Everyone else is coming along and the number is now up to approximately 150 (who have apparently defected from Bonanno).

Nick made the statement that Profaci had the smallest group, namely 120. According to Patriarca, Bonanno has a lot of old people on account of his (Bonanno's) father. The individual who started the ball rolling in connection with the defection from Bonanno was Gasper. He went to Joe Bonanno and said to him "Why don't you straighten this out?" and when Bonanno did not comply with the orders, apparently from the commission, he was the first to defect and they all followed.

Patriarca asked whether the Sheik had straightend that thing out and Nick replied in the affirmative. Nick stated that he is going to move into a hotel in Joey's neighborhood until he can get an apartment.

Nick stated that he has two kids shylocking, one of whom is pretty good. He described one of these kids as the Casale kid who lost his brother and is considered by Nick to be a good worker.

Patriarca mentioned that Johnny Williams is Coco's compare and further that he (Patriarca) made Coco and turned him over to the Jersey group. According to Nick, Coco hangs around at the bowling alley on Bloomfield Ave. The guy that owns the joint (probably meaning the bowling alley) was recently arrested for counterfeiting and all the guys that hang in there are bank robbers.

The sensitive nature of the informant's position necessitates that every effort be exercised to maintain his security.

BS 837–C* advised that Louis Taglianetti and Bob (LNU) contacted Patriarca. They intend to contact Bernie Ezhaya in order to resolve the Union situation. Informant did not know the details of same.

Henry Tameleo advised he contacted George Kattar and reiterated to Kattar that in order to operate he "must have the State". Kattar told him that he has arranged to pay-off the State Police and that he would furnish to Tameleo the identities and the amounts paid to individual members of the State Police. This apparently refers to a gambling operation that Kattar will open in Biddeford, Maine, which was previously reported. The Boston Office is conducting an investigation relative to this matter. It appeared that "Blackie" (LNU) who owns the club had been tipped off by members of the State Police that a game was to be held. In view of this, the opening of the operation has been temporarily discontinued.

Peter Kattar is also attempting to swindle some doctor or dentist of $50,000.

Jack Tripoli has inquired of Kattar whether this deal was actually a swindle and suggested to Kattar if it was, he desired a piece of it. Kattar is of the opinion that Tripoli was only feeling him out to ascertain if same was actually a swindle.

Tameleo stated that Joe Barbosa of East Boston, Massachusetts, was the person who killed Joseph Francione in Revere, Massachusetts, recently. Tameleo also advised that he had contacted Jimmy D. (Deangelis) and requested his assistance to help Louis Grieco. Jimmy was going to contact Probation Officer Hildredge in order to assist Grieco.

Tameleo told Patriarca that he ordered "Big Benny" Teresa to get rid of Barney Villani. Villani, according to Tameleo is a stool pigeon and has testified in court against an unknown individual involving an arson deal.

Tameleo advised that Jerry Angiulo had requested that he, Tameleo, find out who was responsible for the murder of Henry Reddington recently. Anguilo had received inquiry from New York concerning this. Tameleo ascertained from Joseph Modica that Samuel Linden had been asked by some unknown individual whether he desired the killing of Reddington to be postponed inasmuch as Linden was owed $8,000 by Reddington, Linden told this individual that he did not care about the $8,000 and did not desire to hear any further information concerning the proposed killing of Reddington. Patriarca instructed Tameleo to ascertain the identity of the individual who approached Linden.

There was also talk of Frank Smith who was a close associate of Linden. Patriarca was of the opinion that Smith, a local hoodlum, was the individual who probably asked Linden the above.

On 1/29/65, Edward "Whimpy" Bennett and Stephen Flemmi contacted . . . who was responsible for the Reddington murder. Bennett and Flemmi did not know but did discuss various murders in Boston and the reasons therefor. The Informant was unable to ascertain the details of this information.

There was also talk about the McLaughlin-McLean feud but the Informant was unable to ascertain the details of same. There was mention of a meeting in connection with this but the Informant could not ascertain the details of same.

Unman contacted Patriarca and indicated that he has construction jobs in Maine, Connecticut and Rhode Island. Unman claimed that the Union Hall was not sending men to his jobs and that he was suffering because of this, laborwise. Patriarca indicated that we would assist him in this regard. Details were not known to the Informant.

On 1/30/65, Informant advised that Patriarca was leaving Providence. Patriarca was surveilled to New York City by Boston Agents where the surveillance was taken up by New York Agents.

On 2/17/65 three unmen (one of whom is possibly Arthur (LNU) discussed a union problem involving the Gilbano Construction Co. One of the unmen is seeking a position in this union and another unman says that the union is the "lousiest in New England" and is the second largest.

The union representative in Hartford, Conn., is Mike Bolozano (PH) who apparently hires only members with criminal records. One of the unmen is attempting to obtain a pension from the union inasmuch as he is physically incapable of being employed.

Louis Taglianetti was complaining about additional IRS inquiries concerning him and the fact that he thinks his telephone is tapped.

He complained to William Adams of the New England Telephone & Telegraph Co. concerning this possible tap.

BS 837-C* advised on 10/26/64 that John Biele, aka John Foto contacted Patriarca. Foto stated he saw Pogey Tauriello in Florida last year and also saw Patsy Erra but did not indicate the circumstances under which he met them. Foto is carrying a .32-caliber Derringer gun. General conversation took place between Patriarca and Foto which was not pertinent.

Louis Taglianetti of Providence, R.I., discussed his IRS income tax trial in detail with Patriarca, none of which is pertinent to this investigation.

An individual believed to be Danny Raimondi's father contacted Patriarca. Raimondi questioned Patriarca about the fate of Bonanno. Raymond explained that he was called to New York three weeks ago, during which time the fate of Bonanno was discussed. They decided that Bonanno was no longer a Boss or Commission Member. They also put out the word that nobody is to have any business dealings or association with any members of the Bonanno group.

A week later, Patriarca received another call from New York to attend another meeting. However, prior to the time he left Providence, this meeting was cancelled for some unknown reason. It was Patriarca's opinion that Bonanno was not killed by any member of the opposing faction. He pointed out that, if the opposing faction wanted him killed, they would have done so at the time they grabbed him on Park Avenue, as is the case in most killings of this type, particularly when there are witnesses, such as the lawyer, around.

He pointed out that they were taking a chance in kidnapping Bonanno and killing him later and could not see why it would serve any purpose to kidnap him first. Because of this, he believes that Bonanno is still alive and that he, Bonanno, engineered the alleged kidnapping. He pointed out that he is not sure of this, but it is only his opinion.

Raymond stated that he spoke to the group in New York in behalf of Raimondi and told them that, because his son is "with him," meaning Patriarca, they should not cause him, Raimondi, any harm. Raimondi pointed out that Gus Marino (ph) was thrown out, apparently by the Bonanno group. Raimondi is a member of the Bonanno family.

Patriarca further pointed out that, when Bonanno did not appear before the Commission when requested on eight or nine different occasions, he was given one additional chance. Instead of Bonanno himself appearing, his son appeared, but they told him that they did not want to talk to the son, but the father. Raymond explained that about one-half of Bonanno's group have turned themselves in to the Commission. He pointed out that even Bonanno's relation by marriage who was on the Commission voted to throw Bonanno out of Cosa Nostra. This Commission member was described as being from Detroit.

Raimondi mentioned the name of Caruso and stated that Larry (probably Gallo) was going "there" Thursday again. Informant did not know the significance of this statement.

Raymond pointed out that the Soldiers of Bonanno are regarded as being with Bonanno until they declare themselves otherwise to the Commission. Raymond pointed out that he wanted no fighting among this group and stated that Bonanno was the cause of his own downfall, because he was so greedy.

Raimondi then mentioned that he at one time was very wealthy and, because of his habit of helping friends financially, he has lost most of his money. He pointed out that at one time an individual name not mentioned, somebody. While completing was given an order to kill the murder, he was observed by a witness. Later, on another job, probably murder, he was picked up and identified by the witness in the first murder. A payoff of $5,000.00 was necessary to "square the rap away." $5,000.00 was furnished to a Lt. Dunn (ph) for this purpose and the charge was dropped. The individual was released and the following day he was also murdered. This resulted in the loss of $5,000.00 to Raimondi.

The main purpose of Raimondi's visit to Patriarca was to force his son, Danny Raimondi, of Providence, R.I., to call his mother twice a week and send her $10.00 a week, as she is very sick. Patriarca said that he would make Raimondi telephone the mother twice and visit her at least once every two weeks and send her $10.00 per week.

On 10/27/64 John Baborian and Patriarca discussed the Berkshire Downs Race Track. This track lost $140,000.00 last year and Baborian requested Patriarca's intervention with Lou Smith, owner of Rockingham Race Track, Salem, N.H., and the Green Mountain Race Track in Vermont. The reason was to make sure that Smith would not request the same racing dates at Green Mountain Race Track as those requested by Berkshire Downs Race Track.

According to Baborian, Doc (probably Sagansky, who has a financial interest in Berkshire Downs Race Track) does not desire to sell his interest. The Berkshire Downs Race Track now owes $12,000.00 to various horse men and $5,400.00 to someone else. They have reduced the mortgage by $50,000.00. $11,000 of the money in Berkshire Downs belongs to Campanella & Cardi Construction Company. Patriarca advised that he would have Smith contacted in order to eliminate any conflict in racing dates.

The files of the Boston Office reflect that Daniel Raimondi, aka Daniel Lytwyn, is the son of Nellie Raimondi, nee Lytmyn, who in 1959 resided with Danny's step-father (FNU) Raimondi, with a married daughter, Mrs. Walter Mates, 2037 West Fifth Street, Brooklyn, New York.

From: SAC, Boston (92–118) (P)
Subject: Raymond L. S. Patriarca AR (00: Boston)

Rebosairtel, 1/26/65.

ES 837–C* advised on 1/25/65 that Joe Modica, Boston, Mass., contacted Patriarca specifically concerning the Berkshire Downs Race Track in which Raymond Patriarca allegedly has a financial interest.

Patriarca told Modica to contact his friend who is allegedly extremely close to Attorney General Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts and have him arrange to release the $100,000 bond that is being held by the Massachusetts Court in connection with civil suits that have been heard in Massachusetts courts.

Patriarca told Modica that it was necessary for "Doc" (possibly "Doc" Sagansky of Boston, Mass.) to put an additional $300,000 in to the track in order for it to open for the 1965 season. In the event the $100,000 bond mentioned above is released by the courts to Salvatore Rizzo, Patriarca assured Modica that he would get his $5,000 back, which he loaned to Rizzo, plus an additional $5,000 interest.

Patriarca explained that Johnny Wilson's uncle in NYC had indicated that he had a prospective buyer for the track for $900,000, but the deal fell through.

Modica mentioned Abe Barese (PH) located in East Boston and his connection with some crap game located there. (Informant was unable to ascertain details concerning same.)

Gennaro J. Angiulo and Peter Limone contacted Patriarca. Angiulo discussed in detail his pending case involving the assault of a federal officer in the North End section of Boston.

It will be recalled that an Internal Revenue Service undercover man was questioned by Angiulo and his associates, Peter Limone and William Cresta, concerning his true identity and was told to get out of the North End section of Boston.

Angiulo stated that he had contacted Attorney Francis Di Mento, a former Assistant United States Attorney, and requested him to defend him. Di Mento asked for $25,000, plus an additional $5,000 in the event it went to the Supreme Court. Angiulo refused but subsequently did agree on a fee of $10,000, plus $5,000 in the event the case went to the Supreme Court.

Their plan of defense is to attack the words noted in the indictment, "willfully and forcefully assaulted," and point out that they did not know the identity of the individual, nor did they actually forcefully eject him from the location in which they talked to him.

Their alibi is to contact Eddie Griffin who is a "90% blind man" and request him to testify that he asked Angiulo to question a sailor who lived in his house concerning the rape of a girl in the North End.

It is to be noted that the undercover man was posing as a sailor and resided in the North End section.

They intend to get another stand-up witness who will testify that he overheard Griffin ask Angiulo the above, but that he did nothing about it just walked away. In this way they feel that Griffin's testimony will be substantiated.

Roy French, a horse trainer, contacted Angiulo through an intermediary requesting assistance to obtain a license as a horse trainer at the Rhode Island tracks.

Patriarca indicated he would assist in this.

Jimmy O'Toole, close associate of Top 10 Fugitive George Patrick McLaughlin, contacted Peter Limone and requested that arrangements be made for him to see Patriarca. The reason for the request was to make arrangements that George McLaughlin could contact Patriarca telephonically. A lengthy discussion took place as to the best procedure and the tentative arrangements were that O'Toole was to call Peter Limone. He, in turn, would give a number of a public phone. Fifteen minutes later O'Toole would call the public phone number, during which time Limone would attempt to contact Patriarca and make arrangements for him to go to another public telephone. The telephone number would be relayed to McLaughlin as to the phone number Patriarca could receive a call and, thereafter, he would call Patriarca. (The reason for this contact is not known to the informant.)

During the conversation concerning McLaughlin Patriarca asked Angiulo whether he heard that Georgie "wanted to get in with Bernie McGarry." (This apparently occurred some time ago when Harold Hannon was involved in efforts to arrange George's "getting in with Bernie McGarry.) There was also a comment that Bennett, according to Hannon, was trying to frame the McLaughlins and the McLaughlins were very apprehensive of Bennett.

According to Angiulo, Hy Gordon bought the diamonds from the kids (no further description) for $29,000. (This probably occurred in Miami, Fla., as Johnny Foto, who allegedly is presently in Florida, was the individual who brought the kids to Hy.)

Angiulo stated that when he was recently in Miami, Santo (Trafficante) introduced a lawyer for Hoffa to Patsy Erra. He described Erra to the lawyer as the owner of the Dream Bar. Erra denied same emphatically in front of the lawyer.

"Keystone" Lepore of Providence, R.I., presently vacationing in Miami, Fla., received a franchise for juke box machines with a small television attached thereto, whereby an individual can actually see the recording artist singing and dancing for Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Michigan.

Angelo Bruno of Philadelphia, Pa., is one of the individuals issuing the franchises for various states in the country.

Angiulo stated that the crap game in Boston has a bank of $15,200, and they decided to cup up $6,000 of the above.

An individual named Bandes, whose first name is possibly Danny, was the original owner of this crap game which was taken over by Patriarca and his group.

Larry Baione, recent release from Massachusetts State Prison, requested permission to open another crap game, and Patriarca refused same inasmuch as Bandes did request permission from Angiulo to give a certain percentage of the crap game to Baione when he was in prison and renewed the offer when he was released.

Patriarca agreed to Bandes' furnishing 5% of his take of the crap game directly to Larry Baione but warned that Baione's piece was not to come off the top.

Raymond also advised that during his recent visit to NYC, he was to meet Tommy Brown and Tommy Ryan. However, when Mike walked in to the restaurant he told them that there was "a 24-hour watch" on both Brown and Ryan.

"Tony, the Sheik" was mentioned as being scheduled to attend the meeting and it was not clear to the informant if he actually did attend same. One of the individuals probably who did attend, named Tony, was recently made a "capo regime." Sam Cufari of Springfield, Mass., also attended. Because of the warning by Mike of the 24-hour surveillance of Brown and Ryan, they became particularly alert to any surveillance.

They did observe an individual wearing a hearing aid, and all suspected him of being "a Fed."

Patriarca warned Angiulo to be cognizant of any individual wearing a hearing aid and instructed Angiulo to warn the individuals around Boston.

On 1/26/65, Louis Taglianetti of Providence, R.I., advised Patriarca that he was worried about the FBI inquiries made concerning him in Brooklyn, N.Y. He believes that his troubles with IRS created an FBI interest in him.

Patriarca, in the discussion, stated that Carlo (possibly Gambino) was related to the man in Springfield (possibly referring to Sam Cufari).

Taglianetti told Patriarca about a scheme that he has been working on for approximately two years. It appears there are two associations—one in Brooklyn, N.Y. and one in New York, N.Y., consisting of 100 and 300 members, respectively.

The president of one of these associations is married to the daughter of "a boss." Taglianetti could not recall his name. The president of the other association knows a "friend of ours."

Taglianetti ——— and Frankie (LNU) attempted to bring them together as the New York association has "a little weight" and is hurting the Doctors in Brooklyn.

Arrangements were made for the two Doctors to meet with Taglianetti and Frankie; however, the Doctor in New York kept postponing a meeting, the last time his excuse being that he was going to Michigan.

Taglianetti intends to cause dissension and then has threatened one of the doctors by having someone else make threatening calls to him.

When Taglianetti met one of the Doctors he (the doctor) "knew who we were and what it was all about." Taglianetti apparently intends to shake down the Doctors in these associations and made the comment that "We'll get in there somehow."

Patriarca cautioned him to be very careful as he could not trust the Doctors involved.

Taglianetti stated that one Doctor called him and agreed to make Louis' Doctor friend from Brooklyn president of the association, but arrangements have not been finalized in this direction. Louis desires that Frankie get someone to threaten the Doctors, as "You can't get money from nothing," and further points out that the Doctors scare easily.

Bobby (LNU) called Louis the previous night and stated that one Doctor had changed his mnd. Louis made mention of the fact that the associations cost the Doctors $100 to join the organization. (Possibly Chiropractors Association).

Frankie (LNU) from Boston, Mass., contacted Patriarca and discussed the recent underworld killings in Boston.

Raymond tells Frankie to keep off the street as much as they can because of the recent roundups of criminals in Boston by the local police.

Frankie stated that all the people are getting scared of Jimmy (apparently referring to James Flemmi) and asked Raymond to talk to Jimmy and impress upon him that there should be no more killings in Boston.

Raymond agrees to talk to Flemmi and made a statement that "if the killings don't stop I'll declare martial law."

Patriarca indicated that he thought very highly of James Flemmi.

The sensitive nature of the informant's position necessitates that every effort be exercised to maintain his security.

Subject should be considered armed and dangerous.

Senator Hruska. This will be very well, and I appreciate your courtesy. It is in keeping with that which you also extend to brethren in distress.

Professor Blakey, would you comment briefly upon your connection with the President's Crime Commission and the scope of your role there?

Professor BLAKEY. I was a special consultant to the President's Crime Commission. My task was primarily analyzing Federal and State law as it might apply to organized crime. A certain portion of my time was also spent in dealing with the problem of electronic surveillance. I had the opportunity to study procedures in this area on the Federal level and in New York, Illinois, and in California, on the State level. I also prepared a rather lengthy document for the President's Crime Commission analyzing electronic surveillance.

Senator HRUSKA. In your written statement you comment and analyze the Berger case in a very penetrating fashion, in a focus and perspective that is truly remarkable. It excited my admiration and high respect for a mentality that would produce that kind of statement.

Professor BLAKEY. Thank you.

Senator HRUSKA. I am told you wrote the amicus curiae brief in the Berger case.

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, I represented the attorney general of Massachusetts, the attorney general of Oregon, and the National District Attorneys Association in that connection and I prepared the amicus brief, urging affirmation in Berger v. New York.

Senator HRUSKA. I understand that you are also a member of the American Civil Liberties Union, pay dues, and have a card.

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. How, in view of that fact, can you support permissive electronics surveillance? It is a little bit of a mystery to me, but maybe it need not be. Can you explain that?

Professor BLAKEY. First, Senator, I think it involves not a difference between the values that I hold and those held by a large number of the members of the American Civil Liberties Union, but in terms of the way that we see that, I think, they can best be realized. I support court order electronic surveillance because I think it is the only way to secure privacy in this country. It is because I love privacy more, not less, that I support a system of court-ordered electronic surveillance. I agree with the judgment of the President's Crime Commission that if we can regulate this situation and bring it into some sort of court-order system, we will be able to curtail police abuse. It is that feeling that makes me support such legislation.

Second I see that the primary victims of organized crime are the people in urban areas, chiefly the poor, the people who, in so many other contexts, the American Civil Liberties Union stands up for. I believe if we are to ever do anything about getting organized crime off the backs of the urban poor, it will only be through the authorization of electronic surveillance techniques. As it has been brought out many times it is not the rich, it is not the middle class, who take dope or are victimized by loan sharks; it is the urban poor. They are the people who, out of desperation, a feeling that perhaps tomorrow I will hit the number and strike it rich, who are victimized by the professional gambler. They are the people who have their income and their resources drained away from them through professional gambling. So it is also because I share with many other members of the American Civil Liberties Union a deep concern for the urban poor that I think it is time we get organized crime off their backs. And I believe electronic surveillance is needed to do the job.

Senator HART. Would the Senator yield at that point?

Senator HRUSKA. Yes.

Senator HART. I welcome a fellow member of the American Civil Liberties Union. In our material soliciting membership we list about a dozen questions—as to how a prospective member feels about the following—and we say, "These are some of our answers. If you agree with us 75 percent of the time you should be a member of the American Civil Liberties Union." So we are a group that makes allowance for 25 percent deviation on everything.

Senator HRUSKA. That is most notable and I thought that there was an explanation of it. Not all people are aware of that explanation and I thought it might be well to place it on the record here.

Professor Blakey, the principal opinion in the Berger case was written by Mr. Justice Clark. At one time, he held the office of Attorney General.

There seems to be a discrepancy between the Berger opinion he wrote for the court and the position that he took when he was Attorney General. Then he authorized wiretapping on the grounds that it was "imperative" that it be used in "major criminal cases." Would you like to comment upon these two stages of Justice's professional career?

Professor BLAKEY. I find no inconsistency between Mr. Justice Clark's position as a Supreme Court Justice and his position as Attorney General. I find no inconsistency in it because I read the Berger opinion as laying down a constitutional blueprint for electronic surveillance. It is true the court struck down the New York statute, but I think it is very important to note the way in which it struck the statute down. It did not strike it down in any per se way, that is by finding that all electronic surveillance is always unconstitutional. It said that the statute did not contain certain safeguards and therefore it had to go. Well, I think the logical inference is that had the statute contained those provision, those protections, the Supreme Court would have sustained it. I thus see Mr. Justice Clark's vote in the case, and particularly his authorship of the opinion, as an attempt to bring to the Court his own experience as the Attorney General and to guarantee that the principle that electronic surveillance can constitutionally be used in major criminal cases might be upheld on the constitutional level. I interpret his vote in the case as really upholding the principle of electronic surveillance even though it resulted in the New York statute being struck down.

So I find no inconsistency between the two.

Senator HRUSKA. There is some apparent difference on the surface.

Professor BLAKEY. I think, Senator Hruska, there are people who would like to use the Berger opinion as a means of preventing legislative action in this area. They are apt to see some inconsistency, but I don't think it is in the opinion itself.

Senator HRUSKA. The last sentence of the opinion reads something like this: "Our concern with the statute here is whether its language permits a trespass or invasion of the home by general warrant contrary to the command of the fourth amendment"—and then the final sentence—"As it is written, we believe that it does."

As I understand the opinion as summarized in that sentence, the Supreme Court really examined the face of the New York statute rather than analyzing the facts of the cast. Is that correct?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, Senator Hruska, and I think that that in itself is a significant indication of the Supreme Court's attitude on electronic surveillance. If they had handled the case within the narrow confines of their precedents, particularly their procedural precedents, and analyzed only the facts of Berger, they would have sustained the case. But I am afraid—and now when I speak I am putting into words what I think was on the Supreme Court's mind—had they sustained Berger, the likelihood is that the New York statute would have become the model and would have been copied and enacted by other States and the National Congress. I think that there were some members of the Supreme Court who did not want to see the New York statute drafted as it was to become that model. So they went to the face of the statute itself and struck it down and struck it down in such a way that they could write, in effect, an advisory opinion to the Congress and the States on the kind of statute they would like to see. Now, the only way they could do that would be to go to the face of the statute. And so I say again, by their use of that technique, striking at the face of the statute, we have another independent reason to believe that the Supreme Court would like to see a fair, effective, and comprehensive electronic surveillance statute passed. In short, they have issued what they were not supposed to issue, an advisory opinion.

Senator HRUSKA. They have held out an invitation?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Are you familiar with the Miranda case?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. They went into that situation pretty much on the surface and on the face. They did not inquire into the circumstances of that case; am I correct?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. From the explanation you give it would appear that there was a reluctance to have the New York law used as a model.

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Professor, during the discussion of the majority opinion in your statement you refer to "strategic" and "tactical" surveillance. Could you explain the difference?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes. The objective which a law enforcement agent might have in placing a criminal or a group of criminals under surveillance can be one of two things. The first would be to obtain strategic intelligence but since this deals with a broader problem perhaps it might be helpful to draw a distinction between "incident" and "organized" crime.

The normal criminal situation deals with an incident, a murder, a rape, or a robbery, probably committed by one person. The criminal investigation normally moves, from the known crime toward the unknown criminal. This is in sharp contrast to the type of procedures you must use in the investigation of organized crime. Here in many situations you have known criminals but unknown crimes.

So it is necessary to subject the known criminals to surveillance, that is, to monitor their activities. It is necessary to identify their criminal and noncriminal associates; it is necessary to identify their areas of operation, both legal and illegal. Strategic intelligence attempts to paint this broad, overall picture of the criminal's activities in order that an investigator can ultimately move in with a specific criminal investigation and prosecution. Now, tactical intelligence is the kind of intelligence that is needed when you are aiming at a narrow objective in the context of a specific investigation, a narrow investigation. Perhaps the best illustration I can give you is the "airtels," which form the appendix to my statement. They represent the gathering of strategic intelligence against organized crime, in that case against Raymond Patriarca.

Senator HRUSKA. The case of "Louie the Fox?"

Professor BLAKEY. Yes. Tactical intelligence, on the other hand, is illustrated by the Osborn case, which the Supreme Court heavily relied upon in the Berger opinion. You moved in there and monitored only one conversation or only one meeting. You had a limited, tactical purpose, whereas in the Patriarca situation you had a broader purpose. You wanted intelligence on a series of activities of one individual. So the distinction deals, first, with the purpose of the agency and then perhaps, second, with the extent of time the subject is under surveillance.

Senator HRUSKA. There is pending before the Senate and this committee has under consideration S. 2050, which this Senator introduced. Its introduction was postponed, incidentally, after it was learned that the Berger decision was to be rendered. We tried to adapt it to the guidelines and the blueprint that was set out by the Supreme Court. Have you had time to analyze that bill?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, I have had.

Senator HRUSKA. Would you like to comment on this bill in regard to the tactical and strategic surveillance that you have used—that you have just told us about?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, I would.

In general, let me congratulate you, Senator Hruska. I find much in the bill that I like. It is an exceptionally well-drafted bill. I think it would be both a fair and effective instrument if passed.

I am, however, somewhat disturbed that the distinction between tactical and strategic intelligence is not sufficiently drawn in the bill, because the use of electronic equipment for strategic intelligence purposes is fraught with the possibility of abuse and I think such uses should be surrounded by greater safeguards than appear in the statute as you have introduced it.

Senator HRUSKA. Would it be an improvement of the bill to modify it or amend it to the point where it would draw more sharply between the two types of surveillances?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

On the other hand, I think that a court, probably in the process of interpreting the bill, would draw a distinction in the probable cause requirement and relate it to this kind of distinction anyway. But, personally, I would rather see the Congress draw the distinction itself, rather than leave it up to the process of interpretation.

Senator HRUSKA. You heard the testimony of Attorney General Sennett. He testified about a bill that he would like to see become law and he had a 24-hour period of surveillance in it. That would be strictly within the field of tactical surveillance, would it not?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, it would.

Senator HRUSKA. It would not fit at all the situation of strategic surveillance.

Professor BLAKEY. That is right, and I think to that extent, it would not be effective against organized crime.

Senator HRUSKA. You note in your prepared statement the announcement of our present Attorney General that organized crime prosecutions are up 30 percent as of now. You made quite a study of organized crime for the President's Crime Commission and also as a professor of law. Would you like to comment on that statement?

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Chairman, during the course of this oral presentation I will mention some newspaper articles and other sources and make some references to them. In fairness to the people involved, I would like to have this material incorporated in the record, so that there would be no question as to whether I have quoted anybody out of context.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They may be incorporated in the record at the places you refer to them. Indicate as you proceed where each document is to be inserted and make it available to the reporter.

(Excerpts from hearings before the House Committee on Government Operations on the subject of the "Federal Effort Against Organized Crime" follows:)

HEARINGS ON THE FEDERAL EFFORT AGAINST ORGANIZED CRIME BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS, 90TH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION, PART 1

* * * * * * *

Mr. VINSON. As a direct result of this meeting, the Attorney General's Special Group on Organized Crime was appointed in April of 1958. This group established some regional offices and began to gather intelligence information on all of the attendees at the Apalachin conference. Extensive grand jury investigations were conducted and, as a result, 20 of the attendees were indicted and convicted of conspiracy to obstruct justice.

The case, however, was subsequently reversed in the Second Circuit Court of Appeals. After the Apalachin trial, the Special Group, which had been established in response to Apalachin, was disbanded and some of its personnel and its functions were shifted into the Organized Crime Section of the Department.

In 1959, the Special Group that had been created proposed that there be established an Attorney General's Office on Syndicated Crime, with nationwide jurisdiction under all Federal laws, I believe we previously tendered to committee counsel the report of that group. The suggestion was that the unit be a field prosecution office first, operating just as closely to the cooperating Federal, State, and local agencies as possible.

But despite these steps, it is a fact that little alteration in the staff of the Section or in the program took place, except for minor increases in manpower, until 1961, when the Department's present organized crime program got underway.

In 1961 a sharp "beefing up" of our Organized Crime Section began, and by 1963, we had 60 attorneys assigned to the Section. They began making regular trips to the field to meet with representatives of investigative agencies and U.S. attorneys. The flow of information to the Section increased considerably, and the interagency exchange of information and cooperation improved to a marked degree. The increase in convictions over preceding years was impressive.

I have here something I could offer for the record now. It is our Organized Crime Section statistics, running from 1961 through 1966, indicating the number of criminal informations and indictments by year, the individuals indicted by year, and the individuals convicted.

In each of these categories, there is a steady trend upward, with one exception, one category in 1 year, where there was a dip.

Mr. FASCELL. Without objection, that will be included in the record at this point.

(The document referred to follows:)

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, ORGANIZED CRIME AND RACKETEERING SECTION

Individuals indicted	121	350	615	666	872	1,198
Individuals convicted	73	138	288	593	410	477

Mr. VINSON. One of the most beefed-up activities of the new Section was a gathering of substantial intelligence. This was largely contributed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which showed the definite existence of a national cartel known as the Cosa Nostra.

* * * * * * *

Professor BLAKEY. I am familiar with a large number of investigative agents on the Federal level and, indeed, most of the personnel in the Department of Justice. I know that they are honest, forceful, perhaps underpaid and overworked, but, in general, they represent probably the best investigative force in this country today dealing with the problem of organized crime. They have available to them the finest scientific equipment and laboratories. They have been spending in recent years upwards of $20 million a year on the organized crime drive.

If you examine the work that was done a number of years ago, I think you can say the existing program is a success. But if you examine the existing program in reference to what could be done, I think you are going to have to say it is a colossal failure. Let me give you a measuring stick to test this judgment.

The Department has identified an estimated 5,000 members of La Cosa Nostra. Between 1961 and 1966, the Department has succeeded in indicting approximately 200 of them and convicting approximately 100. That gives them against the hard core in organized crime about a 2-percent batting average. With the best we have to offer, that is, the FBI, the Internal Revenue, the top lawyers of the Department of Justice, with an expenditure of $20 million a year over a 5-year period, we have not secured the conviction of more than 2 percent of the hard core of identified people. I think that is an indication of failure. And the reason we haven't been able to get beyond that point is simply because we haven't given the best men the necessary legal tools.

Mr. VINSON. We stand ready, of course, to furnish to the States whatever assistance we can so that, in a unified effort, we can achieve maximum reduction in the influence and in the extent of organized crime.

Now, I noted that your opening statement was oriented largely to the Organized Crime Section of the Criminal Division. My statement, of course, was so oriented also, as that is my primary responsibility.

However, I must point out in fairness to them, the people who are massively involved in the effort against organized crime and the people whose efforts pay off in the struggle against organized crime are the investigative agencies, the principal ones of whom I have mentioned.

I have two further exhibits that may be of interest to the committee. The first is a quantitative analysis of indictments, convictions, acquittals, and so forth, of persons in the period 1961 to 1966, whom we have definitely identified as "Cosa Nostra personnel."

It is broken down on pages 2, 3, and 4 as to type violations for which they were indicted.

Mr. FASCELL. Without objection, the exhibit will be included in the record.

Senator HRUSKA. In the principal opinion in the Berger case we find this language:

We are also advised by the Solicitor General of the United States that the Federal Government has abandoned the use of electronic eavesdropping for "prosecutorial purposes."

Then a number of cases are cited. Then the opinion resumes:

Despite these actions of the Federal Government there has been no failure of law enforcement in that field.

In view of the statistics that you have given us, has there been any spectacular numerical success in prosecution in that field?

Professor BLAKEY. Well, Senator, it is possible to say there have been successes. I don't want to take away from the men in the Department the legitimate convictions that they have secured. They secured a conviction against Genovese in New York and that was a good conviction. Recently, they secured a conviction against Battaglia in Chicago and that was a good case. Recently according to the Times they indicted Raymond Patriarca in Rhode Island and that will be a good case. Yet that case itself illustrates the difference between normal investigative methods and the use of electronic equipment. When the device was operating, the FBI prevented Marfeo's killing; after it was removed, they were only able to solve his murder. Which is better?

But they also failed to secure a conviction twice against Marcello in New Orleans. They failed in a case against Bruno in Philadelphia. They failed in the case against Balesteri in Milwaukee. They have not even brought indictments against some of the other heads of families such as Maggaddino in Buffalo or Catena in New Jersey or Zerilli in Detroit. The truth is they have simply not been able to move against the top people. If you have to measure their success against the job that they could do, if they were given effective legal tools, you have to say the program is a failure. If you measure it in the context of the existing limitations, I would say the program is a success. But I would much rather have them on the go with effective legal tools.

[The New York Times, July 2, 1967]

(By John H. Fenton)

BOSTON, July 1—The Federal Government began this week the first legal steps on what may be a long road toward bringing to trial Raymond L. S. Patriarca, the reputed head of organized crime in New England.

Patriarca, 59 years old, was arrested June 20 in a dry-cleaning establishment operated by a close associate in Providence, R.I. A Federal grand jury here had indicated him a few hours earlier on a charge of conspiracy to commit murder.

Patriarca, who operates a cigarette vending machine company, among other enterprises, had not had any official brush with the law since 1938, when he was sent to jail for armed robbery in Massachusetts.

But in 1963, before a Senate subcommittee on Government Operations, he was identified as the leader of the Cosa Nostra crime syndicate in New England.

After pleading not guilty in Federal District Court here, Patriarca was released in $25,000 bail and the case was continued for a month to give his lawyers a chance to file motions aimed at forestalling prosecution.

In one of its first moves to close legal loopholes, the Department of Justice filed a memorandum in Federal Court Tuesday, in accordance with a new department policy, noting that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had bugged Patriarca's place of business over a period of three years, beginning in 1962.

MEMO ABOUT BUGGING

The memorandum also noted that "none of the monitored conversations will be used in evidence in this case nor were they the source of any leads to any evidence in this case."

It is expected that the filing of motions by both Government and defense and hearings on them will consume many months. No trial date has been set.

Patriarca is not alone in the murder case. Henry Tameleo, a business associate, and Ronald Cassesso, who is already in prison for armed robbery, were named in the same indictment.

Joseph Baron, also known as Joseph Barboza, who was a witness before the grand jury, was named as co-conspirator but not as a defendant. He, too, is in prison, convicted for illegal possession of firearms.

The murder victim was William Marfeo, a small-time hoodlum who operated a dice game in Providence. He was shot down in a restaurant on Atwells Avenue, in the Federal Hill district of Providence, last July 13.

The gunman, a short, stocky man wearing a straw hat, ordered Marfeo into a telephone booth, shot him four times and walked out.

Paul F. Markham, United States District Attorney in Boston, who was handling the case for the Government, said in an interview in his office that the grand jury might be asked to remain in session. It began its investigation three months ago.

NEW ENGLAND TARGETS

"We have targets in the continuing investigation of organized crime, and Patriarca was the first because of his being identified as the kingpin," said Mr. Markham.

Walter T. Barnes, chief of the organized crime division for New England of the Department of Justice, who was present, noted that the move against Patriarca and the others was helped by an antirackets statute enacted in 1961 at the urging of Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, then the Attorney General.

One of the counts against Tameleo charged him with using interstate telephone communications with the intent of committing murder to further illegal gambling.

Aonther, in which both he and Patriarca were named, charged them with causing Baron and Cassesso to travel interstate with the intent of committing murder to further gambling.

There has been no indictment charging anyone with the actual murder.

"One of the disheartening aspects of the situation is that the general public is more or less apathetic," said Mr. Markham, "and until it becomes aroused, there will be difficulty enforcing the law at the local level, where we cannot operate."

"What the public does not seem to appreciate is that this is gambling money in action, involving millions in New England and probably billions nationally," he went on. "The racketeers put this gambling money into circulation through loan-sharking, which can involve otherwise innocent small businessmen who can't get collateral for a loan through regular banking channels and turn to the sharks."

NEW INQUIRIES URGED

"The state legislatures would do well to investigate just who owns the race tracks, for example," said Mr. Markham, "and the number of racketeers who own bars and other joints through straws is appalling."

The slaying of Marfeo, according to knowledgeable sources in Providence, stemmed from competition between dice games for high stakes, beginning in 1964.

For some time, racketeers had operated a "floating" dice game that moved from place to place to avoid detection. But Marfeo, the sources said, set up a stationary game in a private club on the second floor of a tenement in the Federal Hill district. This disturbed other gang factions because it centered police "heat," or surveillance, on the area. Marfeo had to go.

Federal Hill has long been an Italian community in Providence. It has been changing over the last five years as more and more Italians have moved away after becoming affluent.

But while he keeps his business address in the area, Patriarca never made his home there. He lives in the residential East Side where neighbors say they rarely see him.

Patriarca's wife died two years ago. He suffers from diabetes. He often sits in the doorway of one of his associates' business places on Atwells Avenue, puffing a cigar. He dresses casually most of the time. But he usually wears alligator shoes, which are expensive. They set off the white socks he has favored for years.

One sunny afternoon about a week ago revolver shots rang out on Atwells Avenue. No one was hit, but the window of a restaurant was shattered. The police are said to know the intended victim, but they cannot prove it. Persons in the area who were questioned said they did not notice anything unusual.

Senator HRUSKA. Whatever progress has been made to date, would it be your considered judgment if these additional tools which would come forth from the bill of the chairman of this subcommittee or my bill that a more effective job could be done?

Professor BLAKEY. Absolutely. And I say that based on my own analysis of the New York office—District Attorney Hogan's office——

Cenator MCCLELLAN. Will you yield a moment?

Senator HRUSKA. Certainly.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You made the comparison within the confines of what they have—the tools with which to do it now—and you say possibly they have had a measure of success. But within the confines, or within the limitations of what they could do, if they were given the tools, you would say it is a failure; is that correct?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, then, within the broad concepts and needs of society—what is needed today to protect society against the criminal—have they achieved success or failure?

Professor BLAKEY. A failure.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is our problem.

Professor BLAKEY. Let me say, Senator McClellan, that the job they are doing is going to get tougher, too, because if you analyze the statistics carefully you will note that their major cases are income tax cases, and if you analyze the testimony of their people before the Fascell committee in the House in this area, you find that the racketeers are paying more taxes in response to the existing Federal effort in the area of organized crime—and paying more taxes means it is going to become more and more difficult in the future to repeat even the limited success they presently have had. So the picture in the future is bleak. Quoting the existing statistics is misleading.

Senator HRUSKA. You were a special prosecutor for the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Department of Justice. Could you tell us how long you served in that capacity?

Professor BLAKEY. Just about 4 years.

Senator HRUSKA. From what time to what time?

Professor BLAKEY. August 1960 to June 1964.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you very much. There is a claim of some that electronic surveillance leads to the police state, and "hag-ridden community"—familiar language—sounds quite effective and formidable. Would you have any comment on it?

Professor BLAKEY. Let me say this, Senator. It seems to me the burden of proof ought to be on the people who make that kind of allegation to show that New York, which has had electronic surveillance since the 1930's, is, in fact, or at least was up until July 12 a police state or a "hag-ridden community." Yet when we examine the New York community you find four political parties, you find a center of finance, you find a center of art, you find a center of all sorts of activities—in many ways literally the center of the Nation—located in the State of New York. There is as much or more freedom of speech there, as much or more artistic activity there, than anywhere else in the United States. Anybody who says that court ordered use of electronic surveillance techniques will inevitably lead to a police state, in short, has to show that New York today is a police state and this is nonsense because they have been able for 30-some-odd years to use the equipment carefully and avoid abuse and not become a police state.

Senator HRUSKA. Would you say that, in support of your statement, that that way of gathering evidence does have the support of the people?

Professor BLAKEY. Absolutely.

Senator HRUSKA. In recognition of what they are getting in exchange for it?

Professor BLAKEY. I am familiar with a poll that was conducted by the Mutual Broadcasting System, Inc., which indicated that approximately 80 percent of the people who were interrogated about their attitude supported the possibility of the FBI using this equipment both in security cases and in major organized crime cases; they were of the opinion that it should be used in both of these kinds of cases. So it seems to me that knowledgeable people in this country are concerned and do support fair and effective criminal legislation.

[Excerpt from the FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin, October 1966]

PUBLIC POLL GIVES STRONG SUPPORT TO FBI

Director J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI received a resounding vote of confidence from the public in a recent survey conducted by the Mutual Broadcasting System, Inc. The study, made under the network's feature, "The American Consensus," shows that the public overwhelmingly supports the FBI in its responsibilities of investigating crime and subversion.

According to the Mutual Broadcasting System release, polls showed that 80 percent of the people polled and having opinions agreed that the FBI should be permitted to use wiretapping in cases when national security is threatened, specifically in the investigation of foreign agents, saboteurs, and foreign spies. In addition, the same percentage of the public expressed the opinion that the law should be changed to permit wiretapping when the FBI is tracking down white slavers, riot leaders, and extortionists. Asked to evaluate the FBI's success at apprehending kidnapers, a whopping 97 percent of those polled and having opinions stated that the FBI is doing a good job.

Here is a list of the pertinent questions and the percentages as reflected in the poll:

1. As you know, wiretapping of telephone conversations is now illegal. Some people say that the law ought to be changed so that the FBI could use wiretapping to catch foreign agents, saboteurs, and foreign spies. Do you agree or disagree that the FBI should be able to use wiretapping in these instances?

	Percentages			Those having opinions
	Male	Female	Total	Male	Female	Total
Agree	68.7	68.4	68.5	78	83	80
Disagree	19.8	14.1	16.8	22	17	20
No opinion	11.5	17.5	14.7

2. Some people say that the FBI should also be able to use wiretapping of telephone conversations in their work of tracking down white slavers, dope peddlers, riot leaders, and extortionists. Do you agree or disagree that the law should be changed to permit the FBI to use wiretapping in these instances?

	Percentages			Those having opinions
	Male	Female	Total	Male	Female	Total
Agree	70.1	67.7	68.9	79	81	80
Disagree	19.0	16.2	17.5	21	19	20
No opinion	10.9	16.1	13.6

3. Catching kidnapers is one of the functions of the FBI. In this would you say that the FBI has done a good job or a bad job?

	Percentages			Those having opinions
	Male	Female	Total	Male	Female	Total
Good	76.9	72.3	74.5	98	95	97
Bad	1.5	3.9	2.7	2	5	3

HARRIS POLL: THE PUBLIC'S VIEW ON CRIME

By Louis Harris

About one American in five is convinced that an organized crime syndicate is operating in his community, that the syndicate is tied to the Mafia and that there is a close tie between organized crime and local politics. The number rises to about one in three in big cities and in the suburbs.

Awareness of organized crime seems to be slightly higher in the suburbs than anywhere else. One reason appears to be that higher visibility of wrongdoing in a small community may keep it down. City residents are more inclined to say they simply can't be sure.

Bookmaking, prostitution and liquor rackets are reported to abound in suburbia, while narcotics, robbery and juvenile gangs are all considered as more likely in the cities. Rural and small-town Americans report a drastically lower incidence of organized criminal activity.

People believe that crime syndicates are seeking power and control of elected officials protection to operate rackets, money shakedowns and beneficial legislation.

A cross section of adult America was asked:

"Do you think an organized crime syndicate exists in this community?"

Organized crime syndicate

When asked to identify the main activities of the syndicate in their community, a sizable roster of crime emerged:

"What are the main activities of organized crime in your community?"

* * * * * * *

Senator HRUSKA. New York has had that law for 30 years ending June 12?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Why have not they made more progress against organized crime?

Professor BLAKEY. That is a difficult question to answer, Senator. No one law is going to solve all problems. Organized crime is related to more things than the presence or absence within a jurisdiction of the right on the part of the police to use electronic surveillance techniques. But solely from a legal point of view, a number of things have to come together. You have to have competent men, enough men, and you have to give them the necessary time. They have to have the support of the community and they have to have legal tools. In various places in New York, at various times, you have not had the right combination of these factors and for that reason, New York has not done more. But I think, strikingly, in the one place where, at least for the last 27 years, more or less, you have had the proper combination of men, tools, laws, dedication, competence and honesty, you have had a brilliant record of legal success against organized crime. I am referring to New York County and District Attorney Frank Hogan's office. There is no district attorney's office in the country, State or Federal, that can stand up to or match the record of Hogan's office. And I can say to you categorically that the key thing in Hogan's office, in addition to men, talent, honesty, integrity, has been electronic surveillance, and without electronic surveillance Hogan's shop will be shut up to a significant degree in its activities against organized crime.

Senator HRUSKA. We have run into this—that there have appeared on the scene in New York vast organized crime activities which are not only national but international. Yet, when the New York authorities exposed a major satellite operation in the State of California which forbids wiretapping altogether, and the FBI is forbidden to use it, it is a blind alley to the New York authorities, or to any law enforcement authority insofar as this type of source of evidence is concerned.

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. That also would be a heavy factor.

Professor BLAKEY. Absolutely.

Senator HRUSKA. You heard me earlier this morning refer to what has been published as a statement by the Attorney General on new regulations limiting wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping by Federal agents. It is entitled, "Memorandum to the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies," and it bears the date of June 16, 1967.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is going to be printed in the record in full.

Senator HRUSKA. Have you had a chance to analyze this release?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, I have analyzed it as it appeared in the New York Times.

Senator HRUSKA. Have you any comment on it?

Professor BLAKEY. Three things need to be said about that memorandum. Insofar as it reflects existing law, it is probably not particularly helpful because it only reflects existing law. Insofar as it attempts to anticipate the probable result of a decision of the Supreme Court next term in eliminating the distinction between trespassory and nontrespassory bugging, the memorandum is probably right because it is probably accurate in its anticipation. On the other hand, I think the memorandum, insofar as it ties up the use—the present lawful uses of electronic surveillance devices—primarily in the situation where one of the parties consents—ties them up with an enormous amount of redtape, that is, the specific approval, case by case, of the Attorney General—I think that the memorandum effectively abolishes the use of electronic surveillance techniques as a law enforcement tool, and it does so with little or no gain to privacy, because I see no issue of privacy involved when one of the parties consents. To go further, it does so at the cost of truth in the criminal trial, because when you can bring in a wire recording you have an accurate representation of what was said. If you don't have the wire recording you only have human memory, and the human being what he is, this is no good. So by tying it up in red tape, the memo abolishes the use of these techniques and it does so at the expense of truth in the criminal trial.

I think it will also have another unfortunate effect. Many times these electronic devices are used by informants, not only to record the informants' statements with other people, but also to allow the police officer to monitor the transaction, so in case the informant's life is put in jeopardy, the police will have an opportunity to intervene. Well, insofar as this memorandum will, by tying it up in redtape, lessen the use of these devices in this way, I think it will unnecessarily jeopardize the lives of informants. I find nothing that I can say that is charitable about this aspect of the memorandum.

Senator HRUSKA. The last paragraph in the memorandum is this:

> The foregoing rules have been formulated with respect to all agency investigations other than investigations directly related to the protection of national security. Special problems arising with respect to the use of devices of the type referred to herein in national security investigations shall continue to be taken up directly with the Attorney General in the light of existing stringent restriction.

Is there room for the conclusion in view of your description of organized crime and its scope and the evidence that is before this committee—is there room for the conclusion that the threat posed by organized crime, and in particular La Cosa Nostra, falls within the label of national security?

Professor BLAKEY. I think that anybody who really knows what he is talking about and has actually examined the scope and nature of organized crime in this country today must conclude that it represents a serious threat to our domestic security and saying that somehow it does not, it seems to me, is hiding the plain facts, and insofar as the Attorney General has drawn a distinction between "national security" and "major criminal cases" and has excluded organized crime from the national security problem, I think he is taking very, very bad advice.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, in his concluding paragraph of the principal statement that he made, this witness refers to the summary of the surveillance, the airtel that was taken in the case of Patriarca, and he says further that Patriarca was one of some nine or 12 members of the commission of the La Cosa Nostra. It is reasonable to assume that if Patriarca was the subject of surveillance, that other members of this commission likewise were subject to surveillance by the FBI. The suggestion is made in the testimony that it would be equally in the public interest to disclose all of these airtels to this subcommittee.

The suggestion is made that we should examine them for ourselves and make our own judgment on the clear and present character of the threat to present institutions in our society posed by organized crime.

I make particular mention of that at this time because it would seem to me that it would be well to make that particular request of the FBI a part of the agenda for the executive session at some time and to make a decision on whether or not the committee should make a request for those airtels for the purpose that was stated.

And with that, Mr. Chairman, I conclude my remarks, but not before telling the witness again how much I admire his statement and how excited I was when I did read his testimony and when I considered the substance of his answers to the questions that I have asked him. We are deeply grateful to you for coming here with this information.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I believe the subcommittee has in its possession transcripts of some of the other airtels.

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Chairman, I am generally aware that the subcommittee has in its possession copies of the airtels that were made public. Indeed, my appendix includes a copy of them and an analysis of them.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We do not have the others.

Professor BLAKEY. My reference is to that situation. If the FBI, pursuant to the Department instructions, placed Raymond Patriarca under surveillance for a period of 2 to 3 years, I think it is fair—and I am speaking now simply from the public record—to infer that they also placed the other members, some nine to 12 in number, under surveillance. And if there is any question in anybody's mind as to whether organized crime is national in scope, represents a serious threat to domestic security, or that electronic surveillance would be an effective way in which to deal with it, then this body, in executive session, should call for those airtels—perhaps not all of them—at least a representative sample of them—and you can examine them for yourselves.

There is nothing like seeing the raw data that these airtels show. I think the impact of them would be such as to clearly persuade those members of this body that may have some doubt in their minds as to the scope and nature of the threat of organized crime and whether or not electronic surveillance should be authorized.

I would not like to see the information made public. My suggestion is that it be given to the committee in executive session and that you should examine them for yourselves. This judgment is a judgment that should be made by Congress and not necessarily by the newspapers or the public generally. I am sure there is an awful lot of information in those airtels which, perhaps, ought not to be made public.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I appreciate your suggestion very much. The subcommittee will pursue the matter and ascertain if we can secure the documents for our own information. I agree that there might be much in there that should not be made public. At least, if we can procure them, we will have firsthand knowledge of what is going on and be enlightened sufficiently so that we will be able to legislate intelligently.

Senator Hart?

Senator HART. I enjoyed the questioning, but I was somewhat distracted.

Some suggestion was made about the committee considering or asking for additional airtels. The committee would consider that?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes. We would have to seek them from the FBI.

Sentor HART. I do not know how to frame this. Were some of these airtels obtained by trespass?

Professor BLAKEY. Senator, I am in a very difficult position.

Senator HART. I asked the question because we will be, too. I do not want to be a party to asking for them if in fact they were the result of trespass.

Professor BLAKEY. I am in a difficult position in answering your question insofar as it would deal with the factual question; that is, Did the FBI put in trespassory devices against some of these people? First of all, I am in a difficult position because if I have that knowledge I may have acquired it as a departmental attorney, or second, I may have acquired it as consultant to the President's Crime Commission. I am trying here to speak only from the public record.

But it would seem to me that for the legislative purpose of making up your mind about the nature and scope of organized crime and whether or not we ought to pass legislation, it shouldn't make any difference how the information was obtained. Assume it was obtained by trespass—that deals with something that happened in the past. Maybe administrative action should be taken or something ought to be done about what happened in the past. But the question that faces this committee, this Congress, is a question about the future. What we do tomorrow. Once the information was obtained, the eggs were broken. How the information might be used to make a legislative judgment is a wholly different question. I would have no hesitancy if I were a member of this body in getting my hand on the best information possible, from the best source possible, to make up my mind.

Senator HART. I knew a question like this would be apt to rock the boat, but I do not have to read that to be convinced that organized crime is a threat and a serious one. I am at this point reluctant to say that, I think, even if it was a bad guy whose conversation I shall read, that I nonetheless want to go ahead and read it—if, in fact, his rights fere violated. I do not know whether this trespass violates his rights or the public's rights. But I raise this before we get into a serious discussion within the committee as to whether we want seriously to consider asking the investigative agency of the Federal Government to turn over to the Congress raw material, some of which may be the consequence of trespass action on their part.

Professor BLAKEY. The context in which I made the suggestion is this: the Department of Justice presently thinks it is in the public interest to make this information available to Federal courts so it can guarantee people's rights.

Senator HART. Was there not some implied consent there?

Professor BLAKEY. No. In the Taglianetti case, for example, the device was in on Raymond Patriarca, and the court had to examine almost 3 years of airtels, while only 10 of them related to Taglianetti. The district court had to review them all. Assume the device was put in by trespass, as I think the record indicates it was, the court—a different branch of government, the judicial branch—in the pursuit of fair trial, had to examine those airtels to reach a correct legal decision.

I see this as an analogous situation: why should not Congress, which has to make a different kind of legal judgment, why should not they have the opportunity in executive session to examine those same airtels? I am not suggesting they be made public. That would be a wholesale violation of privacy. But the Members of the Congress must make a difficult public policy judgment. They ought to have access to the best information available, however it was obtained.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Will the Senator yield at that point? We are not going to convict anybody. We are not trying anybody. We are simply seeking background information to assist us in our legislative endeavors. This is not a trial where we are using trespass testimony.

Professor BLAKEY. An examination by you of the airtels in executive session would not be an evasion of privacy different from that involved when a court examines them in a trial.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We take all kinds of testimony about crime. This gives us information as to how crime is committed and the extent of it, and from this we will be able to recommend effective legislation.

Senator HRUSKA. This is true, Professor, that in connection with some of the objections made to this type of wiretapping; namely, that they would include in their body many private and privileged communications, even, a reading of these airtels in executive session would enable us to form a good judgment as to what proportion of that type of material is found in these airtels compared with the proportion of the business of the organized La Cosa Nostra.

Professor BLAKEY. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. Then we could see from the standpoint of the legislation how much of the good stuff is being violated in order to get a lot of the bad stuff before us.

Professor BLAKEY. You would have an opportunity to strike a balance.

Let me say, too, in the execution of any search warrant for written documents it is necessary to pore over a large number of papers that are not subject to seizure. For example, it is possible today to get a search warrant for a lawyer's office to pick up there two or three incriminating letters. To find those two or three letters, the executive officer would have to read every single privileged communication that the lawyer had had for whatever number of years he decided to keep record. And that is authorized by the fourth amendment today. Simply the reading of them would not be a violation of the privilege. The violation would come in a subsequent use of the information.

Senator HRUSKA. A tail or stakeout is the same thing. A lot of it is not only irrelevant but it deals with perhaps some of the most intimate affairs of his life, yet it has to be done in order to achieve what has long been approved in the judicial process.

Professor BLAKEY. Correct.

Senator HART. My last question is very uncontroversial.

For the record, if you can, tell us what a law-enforcement agency can do in terms of intercepting in the mail a letter that I address and mail to John Smith?

Professor BLAKEY. If you had probable cause to know the contents of the letter, and the letter was subject to seizure, you could get a search warrant to seize the letter, and you could turn around and use the letter against the individual in a criminal prosecution, and there would be no violation of the fourth amendment or the fifth amendment. I see no difference whatsoever, moreover, between a search warrant for a letter and an electronic surveillance order for a telephone call.

I see, however, a better analogy, perhaps, in the use of a subpoena to bring in telegrams. It used to be that copies of telegrams were kept. This would be a written record of conversations and grand juries have subpoenaed telegrams numerous times, and this is not a violation of the fourth amendment.

Senator HART. Thank you. I think it is useful to have in the record the way we treat these things and respect and insure privacy and what limits there are in communications through the mail.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I wonder if you would like to give a further résumé of your testimony, Professor Blakey?

Professor BLAKEY. I certainly do not want to hold up the committee. I had hoped, however, to spend some time generally discussing the impact of Berger.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You can come back at 2:30?

Professor BLAKEY. Absolutely.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right. The committee will stand in recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 1:27 p.m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 2:30 p.m. the same date.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will resume.

Professor Blakey, you may proceed.

Professor BLAKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I was just beginning to say before the noon recess, I would like to spend some time with the committee discussing two things. First, the Supreme Court's decision in the Berger case, and second, the position of some that electronic eavesdropping is "neither effective nor highly productive."

Berger v. New York, of course, reversed by a vote of six to three the conviction secured through a court-ordered eavesdrop of a New York public relations man for bribery. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Clark. The Chief Justice and Justices Brennan, Fortas and Douglas together with Mr. Justice Clark made up the majority.

The majority reversed the case by going to the face of the New York statute and finding that it did not include certain safeguards or limitations that they thought constitutionally necessary.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That would bring it within the definition of reasonable search?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They felt that the statute did not require it?

Professor BLAKEY. They felt the statute on its face didn't include certain limitations, and they thought there was a possibility that it might be administered in an unreasonable way and so they struck it down. The dissenters, and the decision really on the merits of the case was five-four, were willing to uphold the administration of the statute, without looking at its face. They felt that that was all that was properly before them. What I am suggesting, in short, Mr. Chairman, is that the Supreme Court, when it got to the question of principle, in the area of electronic surveillance, was probably 8 to 1 in favor of electronic surveillance under certain constitutional limitations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, they felt that it could be authorized under the Constitution and would not be unconstitutional under proper safeguards?

Professor BLAKEY. That is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, you think only one felt that it would be unconstitutional?

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Justice Douglas made that very clear.

What I am suggesting here is that the Berger opinion is really not an illustration of the striking down of electronic surveillance as much as it is an illustration of the affirmation of its basic principle. And the disagreements between the majority and the minority were over what questions should be asked in the context of the case and not really the answers that should be given.

In short, I read Berger as an invitation by the Court to Congress to get down to the difficult business of drafting a fair, effective, and comprehensive electronic surveillance statute. Congress has got to decide for itself that this is a good idea and it should be done. If you make that decision and you follow the constitutional blueprint in the Berger opinion, I have no doubt that if a case comes back up to the Court, and the statute is fairly administered, that it will be sustained.

Let me elaborate a little bit on what I am trying to say.

Prior to Berger, before the Berger case was decided, there was a constitutional rule that the police could not seize evidence per se. Now, if this rule had been applied in the Berger opinion, in the Berger case, the New York statute would have gone down the drain on a per se ground, there would have been no hope of legislative action. Well, as you know, the Supreme Court rejected the application of the evidence per se rule in the context of the electronic surveillance, so here we have a significant victory for those who advocate court order surveillance

When you see also that a very strong, effective argument was presented to the Court in the briefs that electronic surveillance is inconsistent with the first amendment, that is, the fact of wiretapping and bugging being practiced would have an unconstitutionally inhibiting impact on free speech. Now, had the Court sustained this argument, it would not have been possible to draw constitutional legislation.

The court did not even dignify that argument—and let me say it was presented ably—did not even dignify it by mentioning it in its opinion. It treated the problem solely in the context of the fourth amendment, and this means that the question was one solely of reasonableness. This again, it seems to me, was a significant victory in the context of the case for those who advocate limited electronic surveillance.

Let me suggest also that there are some who would argue, and persuasively, that electronic surveillance is in some way inconsistent with the fifth amendment, that to record a man's conversations and then use them against him is taking his testimony and using it against him—against his will, and it is inconsistent with the fifth amendment. Had the Court sustained that argument, there would have been no possibility of legislation.

Senator McClellan. Was that argument presented?

Professor Blakey. It was. It was presented in some detail, and the Court dismissed it in a footnote—not the Court itself, not the majority—some of the minority dismissed it. The majority didn't even speak about it.

The point that I am making is that another per se argument didn't get off the ground. What the Court did, in effect, was—it handled electronic surveillance under a court order system squarely within the context of the fourth amendment. It left out the first, left out the fifth, and it said if a statute is drafted along these lines, we will sustain it. If it is not, we will strike it down. It is thus most important to ask ourselves what was the Court's blueprint for electronic surveillance?

The first thing the Court wants to see is some sort of judicial supervision, and I think most of us can immediately concede that this is an important safeguard and a needed safeguard.

The second is that it wants the statute related to specific offenses.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think that the statute should limit its application to specific crimes and name them in the statute?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I do.

Senator McCLELLAN. That would be better. If you left it general, it might be struck down by the Court for not requiring that a specific crime be mentioned in the application.

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to believe that the use of electronic surveillance techniques is a very serious—presents a very serious problem and as a society we should not authorize people to use these techniques except in those cases where it is absolutely necessary and a serious criminal problem is presented to us. I think we can draw a distinction between, for example, petty gambling, a poker game in which several friends would play—in many States this violates the law and could be called gambling—we can draw a distinction between that and felony gambling, where you have a professional bookie operation. One presents a general social danger; the other presents a danger only to a pocketbook. Wiretapping would be appropriate in one case but it would be clearly inappropriate in the other. The statute ought to draw that distinction.

Senator McCLELLAN. Your thought is, and I am inclined to agree, that the statute should name the specific crimes for which wiretapping operations would be permitted.

Professor BLAKEY. I think we could pick out the characteristic activities of organized crime, authorize the use of these techniques in those kinds of investigations, and refuse to authorize them in other situations.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you name the crimes that you think should be covered?

Professor BLAKEY. I have given some thought to this, and the first problem that presents itself is that any list is somewhat arbitrary. Yet the important point is that there be a list and that you make an attempt to draw some lines. I would include such things as murder, felony gambling, narcotics, counterfeiting, and the other basic activities of organized crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Extortion?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, and kidnaping.

Senator McCLELLAN. A limited number.

Professor BLAKEY. The important thing is to try to make a judgment—what is organized crime active in today—and then authorize it in those areas but not others.

Senator McCLELLAN. That would be at least a conservative approach, to get it established as a valid procedure and then, if experience indicated, add other crimes.

Professor BLAKEY. Or subtract certain crimes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Certainly.

Professor BLAKEY. If we found that the possibility of abuse was higher in certain areas than others, and that therefore certain kinds of investigations perhaps ought not to be undertaken using these techniques, we could exclude them.

Senator McCLELLAN. Our first task is to get the procedure approved in a statute so drawn as to make it come within the category of a reasonable search.

Professor BLAKEY. The third major requirement set out by the Court had to do with time. The Court seemed to be concerned that the New York statute on its face would authorize a surveillance, a 2-month surveillance, on any kind of showing. For example, if you made the limited showing that you knew that two members of the Cosa Nostra were going to have a meeting, and they were going to discuss a bribery situation, you could get a wiretap or a bug order for that meeting, yet the face of the statute seemed to authorize 2 months of surveillance when, in fact, you only needed to listen for 2 hours. So the statute on its face was apparently broader than necessary. So the Court felt there ought to be some limitation on the time factor.

Senator McCLELLAN. On this particular point this morning, some mention was made of a 24-hour period. It occurred to me that 24 hours is simply too short a time. You might within that time hear a conversation wherein it was said, "We haven't got this quite worked out, I will call you tomorrow at 5 o'clock or the day after tomorrow I will call you and give you this full information." Then you would have to go back and get another order.

Professor BLAKEY. The important point, Mr. Chairman, is that there be some relationship between the time of the authorized surveillance and the kind of showing made beforehand. If the only thing that you can show beforehand is that you know there is going to be a specific meeting, I'm inclined to believe that this Supreme Court reading the fourth amendment would say an authorization to listen for a length of time longer than that meeting would be unconstitutional. On the other hand, if you can show that the individual is, for example, as in the appendix here, a member of the Cosa Nostra, a Commission member, and he is engaged in a course of criminal activity over a period of years, each day dealing in murder, narcotics, or other crimes——

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, a crime of continuous or repetitious fashion.

Professor BLAKEY (continuing). Then it seems to me, the Court would be willing to authorize a longer period of surveillance, if you had close judicial supervision at periodic points of time.

Senator McCLELLAN. They report to the court.

Professor BLAKEY. Then a long-term surveillance could be undertaken. The vice of the New York statute was that it did not draw a distinction between tactical and strategic intelligence. The statute did not try to draw that distinction even though it authorized extended periods of surveillance.

Let me explain this with the use of a concrete example. In Chicago since 1919 there have been in excess of a thousand unsolved gangland slayings. Those gangland slayings have been the product of approximately 30 professional "hit men"—they are killers; they call them "hit-men." Those men receive their "contracts" from a board of Cosa Nostra officials on a regular basis. The going rate is from $1,000 to $10,000 per hit. Now, one of those individuals is a man named Vincent Joseph Inserro, known as "the Saint." He is a favorite enforcer of Sam Giancana, the top man in Chicago. This man is a murderer by profession.

What I have just given you is a very general outline of a problem, of a situation. I think if you filled that in with a little more detail, established the connection between Inserro and Giancana, established what phones he used, where his hangouts were, and showed with reliable information that this man is, in fact, a professional killer, you could get or you ought to be able to get an order to tap his phones or bug his main areas of activity for the purpose of monitoring this professional "hit man's" activities. That would be for strategic intelligence. In contradistinction, tactical intelligence would be if you know that one conversation was going to take place or one meeting was going to take place between someone and a third person, you might monitor just that one conversation. That would be tactical intelligence.

I think an electronic surveillance statute in this area has to draw that kind of a distinction if it is to meet what the Supreme Court is demanding in terms of reasonableness. All they are asking is that the use of these devices be discriminate. That they discriminate, rationally, between the limited situation and the situation where surveillance of a greater duration is required.

Senator MCCLELLAN. There probably should be two sections, one for longer periods and one for shorter periods.

Professor BLAKEY. Which requires a different kind of showing in each section.

The last major requirement set out by the court in the Berger case dealt with notice. Now, this has been unfortunately misinterpreted by some to indicate that the Court somehow wanted you to give a letter beforehand to the fellow whose phone you are going to tap. I think that has to be read in the context of Mr. Justice Clark's opinion. He used two technical phrases, "special facts" and "exigent circumstances." Both of these phrases were taken from his own opinion in Ker v. California, where he wrote a majority opinion for the Court which sustained an unannounced entry to arrest and search where there was reasonable fear that announcement might result in the destruction of evidence otherwise lawfully subject to seizure. There he said because the police could show that there was a reasonable likelihood that the evidence would be destroyed the police could lawfully enter without announcement. That is an analogous situation from the area of search and seizure. What the Court is talking about here, I am inclined to believe, is that if we are to use an extraordinary means of investigation, that is, a search without notice, we've got to show that this case is something other than a normal case. My own suggestion is that before a statute authorizing electronic surveillance is passed a provision should be put in it that these extraordinary techniques could not be used absent a showing that "normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried." That, as a matter of fact, is the English standard for the use of wiretapping under the Home Secretary's warrant. As you know, the English have used wiretapping for some time in the administration of criminal justice on a Home Secretary's warrant.

They have to show to the Home Secretary that they couldn't have done it using normal investigative techniques.

This kind of a requirement would confine the use of this extraordinary investigative technique to those situations where they are clearly needed. If you make that special showing beforehand I think you have made the kind of showing that can dispense with the usual requirement of notice in the execution of search warrants. I don't think the court was saying anything more than that and I have a feeling that that kind of provision in the statute would pass constitutional muster.

What I am saying, in short, is that the Court has, in fact, laid down a constitutional blueprint. They have given us the constitutional framework of what electronic surveillance statutes ought to look like if they are to be constitutional, so the only question really left for us now is the question of legislative will. We must make up our minds if these techniques are neccesary.

It seems to me at this point that one of the major stumbling blocks to that decision, that is, the decision that we need this equipment, is the position of the present Attorney General, and I would like, if I may, to address myself to that for a few moments.

Mr. Clark has on a number of occasions been quoted in the press or testified before congressional committees that he does not feel wiretapping or bugging is necessary in major criminal cases. Specifically, he has said that they are "neither effective nor highly productive."

And he suggested, particularly in his testimony before the House Judiciary Committee that this opinion was based on his examination of logs that the FBI kept in past surveillance cases.

(Excerpts from hearing referred to are as follows:)

HEARINGS BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE No. 5 OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 90TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION, No. 3 (1967)

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir, there is.

Chairman CELLER. How many?

Mr. CLARK. About 38.

Chairman CELLER. Do they involve national security?

Mr. CLARK. Each of them involves directly the national security.

Chairman CELLER. And nothing else?

Mr. CLARK. Nothing else. There are no other wiretaps or electronic surveillances involving trespass.

Chairman CELLER. Some bills have been offered that provide that there cannot be any legalized wiretaps unless an order is obtained from a Federal judge. That is not in these bills.

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; that is not.

Chairman CELLER. I take it the reason for that is that in national security cases you would not wish to go to a Federal judge to get permission, because you would be in a way divulging the purpose of the wiretapping and it might reach the nation or the embassy or the consular agent whom you are following or shadowing or againt whom you were trying to get the evidence. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CLARK. That is part of the reasoning, yes.

Chairman CELLER. So that the wiretaps in that limited area would be carried out with the consent of the Attorney General.

Mr. CLARK. That is right.

Chairman CELLER. Would it have to be your personal consent or your subordinate?

Mr. CLARK. It would be in accordance with our present practice, which requires my written consent.

Mr. McCLORY. Would the chairman yield?

Chairman CELLER. Yes.

Mr. McCLORY. If it is permissible at this time to pursue the subject of wiretap with a couple of questions I would like to ask a few. There is a change in the policy in the Attorney General's office, is there not?

At the last session of Congress a much broader wiretap provision was recommended by the Attorney General which would have permitted this type of wiretap where you go in and ask the court for permission to tap and to secure evidence or at least to investigate the crime through that procedure.

Mr. CLARK. I think I could say—first I should say that I really had not planned to testify on wiretapping today, I understood we would take that up tomorrow—I think it would be fair to say that over a period of 6 years the Department has come more and more to the view that wiretapping should be prohibited. I think the last testimony before the Congress on this subject was by Attorney General Katzenbach, probably this month of last year. He said, among other things, that above all the present situation is intolerable and probably the worst that we could invent, that if we could not seek some control and security the best thing we could do was to prohibit wiretapping altogether. I am sure he was excepting the national security area.

Mr. McCLORY. You have taken a changed position. There has been a development in the Attorney General's position which now is to limit it to national security.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. McCLORY. Could I just ask this further question? Isn't it esssential, isn't it almost vital, in connection with the investigation of organized crime, where the communications media, particularly the telephone, are used so extensively and in an interestate context, to effectively investigate organized crime, to use wiretaps, at least for the purpose of investigation, even though the material which is received itself is not admissible, but to lead toward admissible evidence which the prosecution requires in order to prosecute organized crime?

Mr. CLARK. There are a great many problems about that. First, as you know, the Supreme Court has before it the Berger case from New York which raises a series of questions about the constitutionality of the use of evidence secured by this means. That would also perhaps include leads developed from this type of surveillance. I think first that there is a very, very heavy burden on those who would seek to permit wiretaps to show that it is essential. The evidence that I have does not indicate that at all. I think we may not know all that we need to know to make a final judgment, but we know this, for instance. We know that there were more indictments returned last year involving more people by more than 25 percent under the Federal organized crime statutes than in any preceding year. We know that the evidence that went into securing those indictments was not developed through the use of any electronic surveillance. Therefore, we have to assume that we can be effective without it. We might question why it is that so many jurisdictions—local jurisdictions—that use wiretaps have been ineffective in eliminating organized crime from their jurisdictions when other jurisdictions that have not used wiretaps don't find organized crime present there.

Chairman CELLER. Mr. Attorney General, as I understand it—I probably have been an offender—your idea was to touch and cover wiretapping in tomorrow's session, and that you desire to limit your testimony today to the bill called Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. Am I right in that regard?

Mr. CLARK. I would much prefer that if it would please the Committee, because in my judgment the Crime Control Act offers a thousand times the potential to control crime, to reduce crime, to protect the people of this country, than these other bills.

Chairman CELLER. I am sorry, I did not follow the procedures myself.

Mr. McCLORY. I will be better prepared to ask the questions tomorrow, too.

Mr. CLARK. I will be better prepared to answer them, I hope.

Chairman CELLER. Mr. Donohue.

Mr. DONOHUE. Tell me, Mr. Attorney General, do I understand that in the bill before us incorporates all the provisions contained in the Law Enforcement Act of 1965.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir, that is correct. Title III provides for the full potential of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 and expands on it just a little. Titles I and II are the new and vitally needed measures that we seek.

Mr. DONOHUE. Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 there was appropriated about $10 million for implementing and carrying it out.

Mr. CLARK. Since its enactment there has been approximately $14½ million appropriated. That covers 2 fiscal years.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK. Well, I think electronics is an area where we just can see immense technological development. And I think there is a very close relationship between technological devices that can be used perfectly lawfully and those that can be used for purposes of this act in a way that would be unlawful. So as far as technological development is concerned, I think it will and should go forward, and I think that the Federal Government would be authorized under the act to do whatever is necessary to stimulate it.

Mr. MATHIAS. Do you anticipate that you would search out these activities or would you act only in response to complaints?

Mr. CLARK. I think we would enforce it as much as we do other laws. We would confer very closely with the State and local law enforcement authorities, to be sure that there is perfect understanding about the Federal law and what is required to comply with it. Certainly where we had complaints or where we had other reasons to believe that there were flagrant abuses, investigation might be indicated.

Mr. MATHIAS. Would you believe this would require additional manpower in the Department to police the private wiretapping and eavesdropping violations being created?

Mr. CLARK. I think the enactment of the law would serve as a pretty substantial deterrent. I think most of the people in both private and public sectors that are involved in this sort of thing would know about the law and that most would comply with it voluntarily.

However, I can see, too, that there would be some additional burdens placed on the Department. We would just have to see, on the basis of experience, what additional staff we might need.

Mr. MATHIAS. The distinguished minority member of the committee, Mr. McCulloch, referred to the National Crime Commission's report and read some sections of it. I would like to refer to that part of the report on page 201, where it says:

"The great majority of law enforcement officials believe that the evidence necessary to bring criminal sanctions to bear consistently on the higher echelons of organized crime will not be obtained without the aid of electronic surveillance techniques."

Now, obviously the Justice Department disagrees with this conclusion, and I am wondering what alternatives do you have to offer to accomplish this job?

Mr. CLARK. I think we have a rather intense experience in organized crime. And I think that organized crime can be controlled, and its impact reduced, without use of electronic surveillance or wiretapping.

As an illustration of that potential, I point out that in calendar 1966 25 percent more indictments, involving 25 percent more people, were brought under our organized crime statutes than in the preceding year.

All of these indictments were brought without any use of electronic devices or wiretaps.

I think it is a matter of the quality of your investigative resources as well as the quantity. I think that is the way to control crime, not by a bunch of fellows having earphones on and hoping someone will say something they should not.

* * * * * * *

And former Attorney General Kennedy, in 1962, in testifying on this bill, stated, "I would think that an argument could be made for the counterfeiter. I think that a strong argument can be made for including robbery and perhaps we should have included it."

I have before me also the testimony given before the Senate Judiciary Committee in May—March and May 1966, and I am referring now to page 39 of that testimony, with regard to a wiretapping bill, where your immediate predecessor, Mr. Katzenbach, testified with regard to the bill, there stated, "I think it should be left to the States. I think in leaving it to the States this law should prescribe limits and guidance as to procedures." He would permit wiretapping to be carried on by the States.

In looking at his testimony, he seems to be in general agreement with regard to the so-called McClellan wiretapping bill that was introduced at that time.

Do you concur in that—those earlier positions taken, or do you agree that those positions were taken?

Mr. CLARK. Very much as you describe. I have a little different emphasis that I put on it. I have been with the Department since 1961. I think I can remember the very first discussions that we had in the spring of 1961, and even the place and characters, when we first started talking about wiretapping. And I was not a direct participant in most of them, in those earlier years, I was involved collaterally. I can remember the battles, and I think that there has been a pretty steady tendency within the Department and within the personalities involved to view the desirability of wiretapping outside the national security area with greater skepticism.

I think we have more or less continuously cut down the area where we thought it might be supportable and desirable for law enforcement purposes. And I think we finally came, last year, to the position that Nick Katzenbach stated, that a complete ban would be better than what we then had.

Mr. MCCLORY. In other words, there has been a general development of the thinking in the Attorney General's Office that wiretapping should be used in a continually narrower area, and so that its use has moved from these different offenses to which former Attorney General, now Senator Kennedy, made reference, to the limited subject of national security; is that substantially right?

Mr. CLARK. I think that is right. I should state that my views were highly restrictive from the inception. I think we also have new learning. I feel certainly that we have learned in the Department a great deal in reviewing the files in this task that we have been involved in since last fall.

We have looked at hundreds and hundreds of bug and wiretap logs and I think we have an experience on which to base a judgment now that we did not have as clearly earlier.

Mr. MCCLORY. Now, I know that many of us were surprised at the time the President delivered his state of the Union message with regard to the subject of wiretapping, since we were aware that the President's Crime Commission appeared to give general support to wiretapping, particularly with regard to combating organized crime; and my recollection is that the controversy between now Senator, former Attorney General, Kennedy and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, as to who authorized certain wiretaps, was very much in the news and then suddenly, at the time of the President's state of the Union message, he came out with this flat opposition to wiretapping, invasion of privacy, which seemed to be a rather blunt rebuke to Senator, former Attorney General, Kennedy.

Is it not a fact, Mr. Attorney General, that this Presidential attitude with regard to Senator Kennedy's advocacy of wiretapping and this controversy in which he was involved entered into the President's position with regard to wiretapping, which we are now pursuing in this legislation?

Mr. CLARK. I think I know that that was not a factor at all. I think I know from many years back that the President has been deeply opposed to wiretapping and electronic surveillance. I think that he made this more than manifest in 1963 and 1964 and 1965. I think that my recollection and chronology of the Hoover-Kennedy dispute, or whatever thing was, was that it took place primarily in November and December of 1966 and pretty well subsided then, so that when the President's state of the Union message came forward, I do not think it was in anybody's mind particularly; but I do recall that there was large applause at that part of the state of the Union message.

Mr. MCCLORY. Not by Senator Kennedy.

Mr. CLARK. I did not see Senator Kennedy at that particular time.

Mr. MCCLORY. I did.

Aside from that, would you answer this: As the head of the law-enforcement agency of the Federal Government, are you individually opposed to authorizing or permitting statutory authorization of wiretapping under court control with regard to, say, the activities of organized crime, in limiting it to organized crime activities?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, I am opposed to that. All of my experience indicates that it is not necessary for the public safety. It is not a desirable police investigative technique and that it should only be used in the national security field, where there is a direct threat to the welfare of the country.

Mr. MCCLORY. I want to read just a few excerpts from a testimony of Frank Hogan, district attorney for New York County, N.Y. One is from the testimony that he gave on wiretapping before this subcommittee in 1955, in which he stated—he exhibited some charts and then he stated:

"The figures demonstrate that although wiretaps were installed in a very small percentage of our cases, they have produced, I think, remarkable results, especially in the toughest of all investigations to break: investigations involving organized crime and the corruption."

And then I will read from page 201 of the President's Crime Commission report with regard to also quoting the district attorney, Frank Hogan, where he states there:

"The single—most valuable weapon in law enforcement fight against organized crime—"

Professor BLAKEY. I find the Attorney General's public statements to be in shart contrast with certain other public statements of knowledgeable officials. For example, Mr. Cartha De Loach, who is an Assistant Director of the FBI, has been quoted in the New York Times as saying that wiretapping and bugging are very helpful and necessary and useful.

(The articles referred to are as follows:)

[New York Times, Nov. 23, 1966, p. 1, col. 7]

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22—The President's National Crime Commission has split with the Justice Department over wire-tapping and electronic eavesdropping by law enforcement officers.

The commission has tentatively decided to ask Congress to authorize wiretapping and "bugging" by Federal agents, under strict safeguards and only with court approval. A majority of its members have endorsed the view that police eavesdropping is necessary in the fight against organized crime.

This came despite strong opposition from Acting Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who asked the commission to avoid the subject entirely in its report.

Mr. Clark and President Johnson are said to favor a new Federal law that would outlaw all wiretapping and electronic surveillance by the police.

The break between the Crime Commission and the Justice Department came at the commission's meeting here Nov. 11, when Mr. Clark made an impassioned plea for the commission to stay out of the issue.

Reports have been circulating in Washington about the Nov. 11 meeting, at which a top official of the Federal Bureau of Investigation argued with Mr. Clark over his assertion that F. B. I. eavesdropping had been "a waste of time."

According to a knowledgeable source, Mr. Clark, in urging the commission to drop the eavesdrop issue, said he had read some of the transcripts from the F.B.I.'s "bugging" of Fred B. Black Jr., Washington public relations man.

The F.B.I. has recently been embarrassed by disclosures that it "bugged" conversations of Robert G. Baker, former secretary to the Senate Democratic majority, and Mr. Black, in connection with an investigation of criminal activity in Las Vegas and Miami.

Mr. Clark said its insignificance convinced him that the bureau had been wasting its time in eavesdropping.

At this point Cartha D. DeLoach, assistant to J. Edgar Hoover, F.B.I. director, was said to have interrupted Mr. Clark and to have said that the department's "bugging" operations had helped to gain valuable information about criminal activity.

According to the report, Mr. DeLoach mentioned specifically political corruption in Chicago and gambling activities in Las Vegas. He concluded that the F.B.I. would be handicapped in fighting organized crime unless eavesdropping was legalized.

Mr. Clark went on to say, the source reported, that if the eavesdropping issue was included in the commission report, it would act as a "red herring" to distract public attention from important but less controversial recommendations.

According to the report when Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, the commission chairman, called for a show of hands by those who wished to drop the eavesdrop recommendation, only two voted with Mr. Clark. They were Federal Judge Luther W. Youngdahl of the District of Columbia and Mrs. Robert J. Stuart, president of the League of Women Voters.

The crime commission, officially named the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, was created by President Johnson in an executive order issued July 26, 1965. Its purpose is to study the causes of crime in the nation and to make recommendations to the President on ways to combat crime.

The report of the 19-member commission is due on Jan. 23. If the commission sticks to its present position the Administration will be placed in an awkward position, as the President plans to use the commission report as the basis for his anticrime proposals to the next Congress.

As initially organized, the commission had no panel on organized crime. However, after Lewis F. Powell of Richmond, Va., former president of the American Bar Association, and other commission members insisted that any national crime study must deal with the problem, a panel and staff study group was established.

CHAPTER ON CRIME

At the Nov. 11 meeting the commission considered the chapter on organized crime written by the organized crime panel for the final report.

The chapter stated that electronic eavesdropping and wiretapping was crucial to the anticrime effort. It recommended a new Federal law that would allow Federal agents to obtain court approval to eavesdrop in cases involving organized crime and certain other serious crimes. It would also allow states to pass similar laws, as long as they contained the same safeguards provided in the Federal law.

A 1934 Federal law makes wiretapping a crime, but the Justice Department has ruled that Federal agents do not violate this law if the information is not disclosed outside the Government. Electronic "bugging" is not covered by any United States criminal law.

However, in June, 1965, President Johnson prohibited all Federal agencies from using either wiretapping or "bugging," except in national security cases.

Wiretapping is the interception of telephone calls. "Bugging" is the use of hidden microphones to pick up all conversations in a given area.

In recent instances of FBI "bugging" that have come to light, the devices picked up only one end of telephone calls made from the "bugged" room, so that the antiwiretap law was not violated.

The Supreme Court ruled in 1928 that police wiretapping does not violate a defendants' constitutional rights, but many legal experts think the high court will eventually declare both wiretapping and "bugging" unconstitutional.

[New York Times, Jan. 30, 1967, p. 1, col. 1]

WASHINGTON, Jan. 19—The President's National Crime Commission, under pressure from supporters of President Johnson, has backed away from a recommendation for new legislation to permit wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping by the police.

The decision, which came ten days before the President proposed an outright ban on police eavesdropping in his State of the Union message Jan. 10, removed the prospect that the President would be contradicted by a recommendation from his own crime commission.

However, the report, which will go to the White House Monday, will nevertheless provide ammunition for Congressional opponents of Mr. Johnson's proposed ban on eavesdropping, according to sources here.

A majority of the commission members, while agreeing not to contradict the President bluntly in their formal recommendations, have insisted on stating in the official report their "belief" that court-supervised eavesdropping by the police is necessary to combat organized crime.

According to reports here, another major recommendation of the crime commission will be a radical shift from "reform school" treatment of juvenile offenders to widespread reliance on closely supervised probation. The commission has figures showing that recidivism is twice as high among youngsters who have been sent to institutions.

The report is also said to recommend:

Laws requiring better locks on homes, businesses and cars.

Bail reform to let more suspects go free pending trial.

Treatment instead of incarceration for habitual drunkards.

Improvements in "mass production" lower courts.
More money for law enforcement and better-qualified policemen.

The commission will also express strong support for the Johnson Administration's antipoverty measures, which it considers necessary to reduce the causes of crime and delinquency.

The commission's decision on the eavesdropping issue came at a meeting on Dec. 30, after one of its members, Leon Jawarski, a Houston lawyer, said he would dissent from the panel's report unless the group rescinded its earlier decision to recommend permissive eavesdrop legislation.

Mr. Jaworski, a senior partner in a 102-man Houston law firm, is a longstanding supporter of Mr. Johnson's and was prominently mentioned as a possible successor to Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy in 1964.

FAVORED ON NOVEMBER 11

He was not present at the commission meeting, Nov. 11 when a majority of its members went on record in favor of recommending new legislation to let Federal and state law enforcement officials tap wires and use "bugging" devices under court supervision and strict controls.

Mr. Jawarski reportedly warned the group that unless the recommendation was changed he would file a strong dissenting statement, charging that the commission had acted without sufficient facts and had made its decision on ideological rather than factual grounds.

In response, four members, Prof. Herbert Wechler of Columbia Law School, Justice Charles D. Breitel of the New York Court of Appeals and Ross L. Malone of Roswell, N. M. and Lewis F. Powell of Richmond, Va., former presidents of the American Bar Association, insisted that the group stand by its earlier recommendation.

Some members of this group said that they would dissent and charge political interference if the recommendation was deleted.

THREE-DAY ARGUMENT

The argument continued sporadically over the three-day meeting, Dec. 28–30, with neither side willing to budge.

Finally, Under Secretary of State Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, the commission's chairman, persuaded the members to accept a compromise that would prevent the commission from contradicting the President outright, while retaining for the record the majority's view on eavesdropping.

Unless a last-minute change is made at the commission's meeting this weekend, the report will recommend only that Congress consider new eavesdrop legislation, without suggesting what its substance should be.

It will recommend that Congress wait until the Supreme Court rules on the pending case involving the constitutionality of New York's eavesdropping law, which is similar to the one advocated by a majority of the commission members.

AWKWARD TO JOHNSON

The published report will contain a statement, in different type than the formal recommendations, revealing that the majority favors court-supervised eavesdropping by the police, while the minority feels it has insufficient information to form an opinion on the subject.

But even this expression could prove awkward to the president, who plans to use the commission's recommendations as a basis for his anticrime program in Congress this year.

In his State of the Union Message Mr. Johnson said:

"We should protect what Justice Brandeis called the 'right most valued to civilized men'—the right to privacy. We should outlaw all wiretapping, public and private—wherever and whenever it occurs, except when the security of the nation itself is at stake and only then with the strictest safeguards. We should exercise the full reach of our constitution powers to outlaw electronic "bugging' and 'snooping.' "

In a telephone interview from Houston Mr. Jaworski declined to comment on commission affairs.

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. James H. Gale, Assistant Director of the FBI in charge of its organized crime program, has been quoted in the New York Times as saying the same thing.

(The articles referred to are:)

[New York Times, Mar. 30, 1967, p. 1, col. 5]

WASHINGTON, March 29—The chief of the Federal Government's organized crime unit charged today that the teamsters' union and the East Coast longshoremen's union were linked with each other and the Cosa Nostra.

Henry E. Petersen, chief of the Justice Department's Organized Crime Section, which co-ordinates the Government's interagency fight on crime, made the statement during a discussion session at a conference of law enforcement leaders here.

Frank E. Fitzsimmons, general vice president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, in a telegram of protest to Mr. Petersen this evening, called the statement "slanderous." Spokesmen for the longshoremen were unavailable for comment.

Mr. Petersen, who apparently did not know that the informal seminar was open to reporters, refused later to elaborate on his statements.

He has rarely spoken on the record to newsmen in the past and is not widely known outside of law enforcement circles.

His statement came as he delivered a casual, 10-minute explanation of the Government's program to combat organized crime. The statement was made this morning to a group of about 80 panelists, during the second day of the Justice Department's two-day National Conference on Crime Control.

Mr. Petersen said that four or five years ago, Senator John L. McClellan's Senate rackets committee was very much concerned about reports of a possible merger between the Teamsters and the International Longshoremen's Association.

No formal merger took place, but Mr. Petersen said, "I know for a moral certainty that this amalgamation exists."

Furthermore, he said, "In the upper echelons they have more than an effective liaison between the I.L.A., the Cosa Nostra and the Teamsters."

He said that the Government had identified about 5,000 persons across the nation who are members of the Cosa Nostra, the nationwide crime syndicate that was formerly known as the Mafia.

Shortly after Mr. Petersen spoke, Chief Justice Earl Warren said in a prepared speech to the delegates that "so long as businessmen in the name of private enterprise associate with hoodlums, accept their business, and peddle their influence, communities are bound to be unhealthy."

Chief Justice Warren's speech stressed the unhealthy impact of organized crime, as compared with street crime, and he said that "corruption is the basis of organized crime."

He specified corruption among policemen, prosecutors, courts, city councils and businessmen, but he did not mention unions.

"Organized crime can be stopped because it is a direct assault upon the community in which it thrives, and no crime syndicate can openly defy the law in any of its money-making activities if the community is determined that it shall not exist," he said.

Speaking to a group that includes a large delegation of police officers and prosecutors—some of whom have attributed rising crime to court decisions—the Chief Justice suggested looking at the beam in one's own eye "rather than at the mote in our neighbor's."

In an unusual move for a Chief Justice Mr. Warren had strong praise for President Johnson's anticrime efforts. He declared that the President's program afforded "the greatest opportunity the nation has ever had to rid itself of organized crime and at the same time destroy the conditions which inevitably breed degradation and crime of every description."

One panel session this morning produced a rare admission from a high official of the Federal Bureau of Investigation that wiretapping and eavesdropping were useful investigative tools.

The statement, from James H. Gale, the assistant director in charge of the bureau's efforts against organized crime, came during an exchange with Eliot H. Lumbard, special assistant counsel for law enforcement in New York.

Mr. Lumbard said wiretapping and eavesdropping "had been intensely useful" in the state's anticrime efforts, and expressed concern that law enforcement would suffer a serious blow if police eavesdropping was abolished.

President Johnson has asked Congress to outlaw all police eavesdropping except in national security cases, and the Supreme Court has agreed to consider the constitutionality of the New York law that permits court-supervised bugging by the police.

Mr. Lumbard said state officers in New York, using wiretapping, had jailed several important racketeers, while Federal officials in New York had been able to convict only minor figures.

Mr. Gale responded from the audience with statistics on successful F.B.I. prosecutions.

Asked by Mr. Lumbard if eavesdropping had proved useful, Mr. Gale said, "Yes. It was useful."

Mr. Lumbard asked how this could be squared with recent assertions by Attorney General Ramsey Clark that Police eavesdropping was an inefficient law enforcement device. Mr. Gale declared that he would stand on his earlier statements on the subject.

CHARGE CALLED "SLANDEROUS"

WASHINGTON, March 29 (UPI)—The Teamsters' general vice president, Frank E. Fitzsimmons, termed the statement by Mr. Petersen "slanderous" and urged him either to repudiate his remark or present evidence in court.

"Such slanderous statements should certainly be based upon reliable evidence and not on a 'moral certainty,'" he said. "If you have any evidence which supports your charges, it should be presented in court. If not, we urge that you address the same or an appropriate forum and deny the remarks in fairness to the more than 1.8 million Teamsters and their families across this nation and in Canada."

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. William O. Bittman, who was the prosecutor in the Bobby Baker and James Hoffa cases has been quoted in The New York Times as saying essentially the same thing.

(The following was supplied for the record:)

[New York Times, June 26, 1967, p. 15, col. 1]

WASHINGTON, June 26—William O. Bittman, the former Government prosecutor who won convictions against James R. Hoffa and Robert G. Baker, has disputed Attorney General Ramsey Clark's suggestion that the Government's electronic eavesdropping was ineffective in combating crime.

Mr. Bittman left the Justice Department last month, not because of any policy disagreements, but to become a partner of Hogan and Hartson, one of Washington's largest law firms.

He agreed to be quoted about his experiences with information picked up through electronic bugging because, he said, other lawyers who know the facts are still employed by the Government.

"I'm out now, so I can tell the facts," he said.

"There is no question, in my opinion," Mr. Bittman said in an interview, "that the use of certain electrical devices would be of great help in fighting organized crime in this country if it could be used as evidence."

He said that in preparing for certain trials as a Government prosecutor, he had read numerous logs in which agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation had recorded conversations picked up by hidden microphones.

The Supreme Court has ruled that conversations picked up on bugs planted by trespassing, as these were, cannot be entered in evidence.

Evidence developed through leads obtained by bugging is also inadmissible. Therefore, Mr. Bittman said, he read the F.B.I.'s logs of all bugged conversations involving any individuals whom he prosecuted to make certain that none of his evidence had been tainted by bugging.

In the trial of Mr. Baker, the former Senate Democratic secretary, who had business contacts with Las Vegas gambling figures, Mr. Bittman read reams of logs of bugged conversations in Las Vegas casino offices. Last month seven Las Vegas casino operators were indicted for "skimming"—concealing gambling receipts and not paying income taxes on them.

"In Las Vegas," Mr. Bittman said, "the Government learned from bugging the amount of money that was being skimmed, who was doing the skimming, how the skimming was done, who the couriers were that were delivering the money around the country, when they were leaving and who was going to receive the money.

"How can you say this was no help to law enforcement?"

The Government contends that the case against the Las Vegas gamblers were made by agents of the Internal Revenue Service, without the aid of any evidence picked up by the F.B.I. bugging, which occurred in various casinos from 1961 until some of the bugs were discovered three years later.

Mr. Bittman said that "we are losing the battle against organized crime.

"Since we're not staying even, I don't think we should deny reputable law enforcement any legitimate tool," he said.

LAW OPPOSED

Attorney General Clark has opposed a law to permit wiretapping and bugging by the state police and Federal agents. He and President Johnson support a bill that would outlaw all private and official eavesdropping, except in internal security cases with the permission of the Attorney General.

Mr. Clark's basic argument has been that police eavesdropping is a harbinger of the "big brother" state, but he has also said in Congressional testimony and published interviews that the Federal Government's eavesdropping proved ineffective and wasteful of police manpower.

Mr. Bittman emphasized that some of the individuals he had prosecuted had not be the subject of eavesdropping by Federal agents. Attorneys for Hoffa, the teamsters' leader, have claimed that bugs were used on him, but the Government has denied it and no evidence of this has ever been produced.

[South Bend Tribune, Nov. 16, 1966, p. 17, col. 1]

WASHINGTON.—The names of Lyndon B. Johnson and several top political figures pop up in transcripts released by the government of "bugged" conversations involving Bobby Baker.

But the government says the role of Baker, one-time Senate Democratic secretary, in the conversations was only coincidence and that the eavesdropping had nothing to do with his indictment for tax evasion, grand larceny and fraud.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover said in an affidavit presented to a federal court yesterday that the 34-page transcript covered all the Baker conversations on which the FBI eavesdropped. But Baker said there must have been more.

The transcript was released at a U.S. District Court hearing on whether the conversations should be suppressed because of Baker's claim they can be used against him.

The hearing was to continue today.

The 11 conversations in the transcript were monitored from three points: Miami, Fla.; Las Vegas, Nev., and the Washington hotel room of Fred B. Black Jr., a former Baker business associate.

The calls from Black's suite were recorded between February and April, 1963. Baker said he might have made 500 calls from Black's suite during that period.

DENY OTHER RECORDS

He said some conversations there involved Wayne Bromley, a key figure in Baker's indictment for evading $23,090 in federal income taxes and obtaining $100,000 by fraud. But the government insisted it had no other records of Baker conversations.

One conversation was between Baker and Dean McGee of the Kerr-McGee Oil Co. in Oklahoma City following the death of Sen. Robert Kerr, D-Okla.

"Well, Lyndon (then vice-president) told me the other day," Baker is quoted in the transcript, "that (Rep.) Carl Albert (D-Okla.) told him they did not think Bob (Kerr) Jr. could win that seat.

"They want you (McGee) to take it. I told them that was out."

TELLS OF DEAL

Then Black got on the phone and told McGee, ". . . Since the old man (Kerr) died, this fellow (space agency Director James) Webb has gotten weaker and weaker where state of Oklahoma is concerned . . . He's just not doing anything for us. I'm getting concerned about a few things in Oklahoma City itself. NASA is not helping us. When the senator was alive, he'd be helping."

Later, Baker is quoted as telling Black that Earle Clements, former Kentucky senator, made a "deal" to settle his tax problems with the federal government and "the FBI and Internal Revenue couldn't do a thing."

The conversation ended with Black musing: "I wonder if they got the lines tapped."

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Bittman's statements, in addition, were made in reference to the situation in Las Vegas of "skimming," that is, stealing money.

I might add at this point that there was a very enlightening series of articles in the Chicago Sun-Times in July of last summer—apparently outlining what was obtained by the FBI with the use of electronic devices in Las Vegas—and it indicated a truly frightening situation—perhaps a half million dollars a month was being taken without payment of tax and used for all sorts of illegal purposes.

(The articles referred to are as follows:)

[Chicago Sun-Times, July 10, 1966, p. 1, col. 1]

LAS VEGAS, NEV.—Amounts ranging from $200,000 for a former Nevada governor to $200 for a justice of the peace have been paid by gangsters who engineered enormous thefts from six gambling casinos here.

In one recent year, the illegal siphoning from gambling profits totaled more than $6,000,000.

The vast sums were divided and delivered as bundles of cash to crime syndicate gangsters around the country, including Chicago's gang leaders Anthony (Tony) Accardo and Momo Salvatore (Moe) Giancana.

The $6,000,000-plus vanished, at the rate of $100,000-a-month in each casino, from the Desert Inn, the Stardust, the Flamingo, the Sands and the Fremont. From the smaller Horshoe, in the same year $70,000 a month was stolen.

The money—from casinos and not hotels bearing the same names—was skimmed from the gambling take before the gross winnings were listed in the records on which Nevada computes its state gambling tax.

To protect the vast funding of syndicate operations, a generous and steady supply of money was kept flowing into politicians' warchests. The gifts were labeled political contributions but were considered as payoff by the gangsters and their casino frontmen.

The sums ranged from the $200,000 the Desert Inn paid out as a contribution to a former governor to $200 for a Clark County (Las Vegas) justice of the peace.

More recently, another governor got $20,000 from a casino, while one U.S. senator received $1,000 and another got a $12,000 contribution.

A member of the Nevada Judiciary received $5,000 from a casino. A U. S. congressman got $500. For Clark County officials and Las Vegas city fathers the contribution price tag did not customarily exceed $300 each.

PROMINENT FIGURES

Prominent figures in both the Democratic and Republican parties received the contributions which the gangsters hoped would ensure against Nevada officials prying into the casino procedures that made possible the illegal skimming.

The politicians got the money from the gangsters' casino frontmen, but the funds were really largesse from the hoodlums who held hidden interests in the six gambling halls.

No cash was given to politicians unless approved by the secret gang owners of the casinos.

In the Stardust Casino, the boss is Giancana.

At the Desert Inn, it was John Scalish, the Cleveland rackets boss.

And at three other Las Vegas casinos—at Fremont, the Sands and the Flamingo—the shots were called by Meyer Lansky, the New York underworld oldtimer now living in Miami.

SMOOTH THE WAY

In addition to providing insurance, the gangsters intended their political contributions to smooth the way for negotiations that occasionally could get ticklish.

One such case occurred when Mayor Riddle, the sauve political fixer for the casinos, confronted a Nevada official.

Years ago when he ran an illegal gambling hall in Illinois, Riddle learned not to mince words with politicians.

Accordingly, he told the Nevada official and political leader that gang henchman Irving (Niggy) Devine, 56, was willing to shell out $25,000 in cash for a state gambling license.

SOME PROBLEMS

The price was high because Devine feared that his links with notorious Cosa Nostra mobsters would bar him from obtaining a license.

Riddle's proposition presented some problems. As an outright payoff it appeared too blatant, but presented at the appropriate time as a political contribution, it might make the transaction possible.

Devine's deal fell through, only because his open gangland connections made him too hot as a licensee.

Once skimmed, the gangsters' millions were dispatched in cash bundles around the country to be poured into legitimate businesses. In gang argot, the cash was known as "black money" because it came from illicit sources and had yet to be funneled through legitimate enterprises, from which it would reappear as clean and lawful profits.

Sharing the black money in the year that skimming hit $6,000,000 were at least 10 underworld big shots.

THE SHARERS

Among them were Lansky, Scalish, Giancana and Accardo. Others were:

New York gangster Vincent (Jimmy Blue Eyes) Alo and the Eboli brothers, Pasquale and Thomas.

Three New Jersey hoodlums, rackets chief Gerardo (Jerry) Catena, Angelo (Gip) De Carlo and Anthony Boiardo.

Like the tip of an iceberg, a small part of the skimming story recently received public attention because of testimony in open court by FBI agents.

They told of a "vast sum of money" being diverted to "criminal elements" across the country from the Desert Inn Casino, which they said had secret owners.

Because of that, the agents told a federal court in Denver, an electronic bug was concealed in the Desert Inn.

The agents testified the microphone was hidden in an effort to determine how much money was skimmed and who got it.

The FBI also was interested according to the testimony of Las Vegas FBI Chief Dean Elson, in "such things as corruption of public officials."

After the FBI testimony in Denver, Nevada Gov. Grant Sawyer ordered the Las Vegas district attorney, Edward G. Marshall, to begin the probe of the FBI bug in the Desert Inn.

BIGGEST INDUSTRY

But up to now, no orders have come from the state for a full investigation of the skimming in the casinos.

In previous public statements, Sawyer described as "ludicrous" and "myths" reports of skimming in the gambling casinos that are Nevada's biggest industry, taxpaying or otherwise.

The governor told a 1965 convention in the Dunes gambling hotel here that stories of gangsters' secret interests were "pure nonsense."

Even the Las Vegas Internal Revenue Service chief, Dallman Davis, asserted publicly two years ago that whatever skimming took place in the casinos was small stuff.

In fact, however, the $6,000,000-a-year skimming take topped the $4,900,000 the state collected in gambling taxes in the first three months of this year.

POLITICAL INFLUENCE

Along the Las Vegas casino strip, the gamblers point to the Dunes owner, Riddle, as the man with sure thing political clout.

Riddle himself confirmed in an interview with a Sun-Times reporter that he has the political influence that the casino bosses call "juice."

Said Riddle:

"I am a very close friend of Gov. Sawyer."

Riddle stopped talking politics at that point.

His modesty, or caution, about discussing his political accomplishments was not shared by other bosses of the Las Vegas casinos.

The gamblers said Riddle boasted in the past of carrying messages from powerful Nevada politicians to the officers of the Nevada Gaming Control Board.

The NGCB enforces the state's gambling license statutes. It supervises the operation of the casinos and checks, as best it can with a small staff, the winnings on which the casinos pay tax.

Riddle also keeps a careful watch on the finances of some Nevada officials, to determine whether they need money or whether they didn't, The Sun-Times was told.

LAS VEGAS, NEV.—The roster of secret shareholders is a scrap of paper.

On it are nine names or initials. Each is preceded by a number.

Lush dividends go to those on the list. Each share of stock they hold yields $2,000 a month in cash. It is sealed in a numbered envelope and delivered by special messenger.

A single share in the illicit enterprise has a market value of $52,500.

It's a rich investment, to be sure. But the risks it presents are deadly.

For the dividends flow from secret interests in gambling casinos here to Cosa Nostra chiefs in Chicago and other cities.

And the hassles among them over the casino booty—like any quarrel between cutthroats—are often just plain murder.

The business of the undercover casino holding companies is skimming, the siphoning of millions of dollars a year from the gross winning of Nevada's state-licensed gambling halls.

Skimming is state and federal tax cheating on a mammoth scale.

Neither the Internal Revenue Service nor the gambling tax division of the State of Nevada collected a penny in tax on the skimmed, or stolen, millions.

The cash vanished from the casinos before the winnings were listed in records on which the state computes its gambling tax.

In a single year, The Sun-Times has disclosed, more than $6,000,000 was skimmed out of six casinos and into the hands of Cosa Nostra mobsters.

Four of the casinos—the Fremont, the Sands, the Flamingo and the Horseshoe—were controlled by one team of gangsters in 1963.

Another squad of hoodlums ran the other two casinos, the Desert Inn and the Stardust.

Chicago's wealthiest professional thugs, ever quick to move in numbers on a sure thing, were in both casino groups.

Representing the Chicago crime syndicate in secret ownership of the Fremont-Sands-Flamingo-Horseshoe was Anthony Joseph Accardo.

Accardo is known in the Chicago mob as Joe Batters, or Joe B. or simply J. B.

He was in the undercover casino combine that listed its members by numbers for payoffs.

No. 1 on the Fremont-Sands-Flamingo-Horseshoe skimming list was Meyer Lansky, a New York racketeer now residing in Miami.

Accardo came second. Beside the numeral 2 on the skimming list was Accardo's gang nickname, J. B.

No. 3 was Bennie Seigelbaum, 63, one of the couriers who fanned out from Las Vegas to deliver the numbered envelopes of skimmed cash to the gangsters.

NEW JERSEY CRIME LORD

The seventh name listed was that of Gerardo (Jerry) Catena, a New Jersey crime lord.

In eighth place, the name of Lansky appeared again for a second cut of the skimming booty.

How many secret casino shares were held by each of the nine is unknown. Their individual monthly take also is their own secret.

It has been established, however, that the individuals on the list split up about $100,000 a month in skimming money.

The skim in the four casinos seldom dropped below $94,000 a month. Sometimes it exceeded $113,000.

Among the clandestine owners of the Desert Inn and the Stardust were Chicago gang boss Momo Salvatore (Moe) Giancana and Cleveland rackets chief John Scalish.

$100,000 A MONTH

At the Stardust and the Desert Inn, as in the other four casinos, cash was sluiced from the winnings for the mobsters at the rate of about $100,000 a month.

The records, if any, of the Stardust-Desert Inn skimmers never have come to light.

But Giancana's end of the skimming thefts in the two casinos exceeds $65,000 a month.

Scalish, in Cleveland, gets slightly less than that. His monthly payoff is $52,000.

Lansky's second helping of the monthly skimming boodle is regarded as a reward for his indispensable service to the national crime syndicate.

He acts as the financial adviser to the Cosa Nostra supreme council, the Commission.

Giancana, Scalish and Catena are among the members of the 12-man commission. Accardo moved off it in 1956 to make room for Giancana.

WIZARD OF FINANCE

The Cosa Nostra commissioners might botch the skimming operation without Lansky, their wizard of finance.

His counsel is essential for gangsters who rise to the Commission by proficiency with guns and bomb, rather than the ability to count without using their fingers.

Lansky is the skimming price-fixer, too. A formula he devised established the $2,000-a-month yield from each skimming share and set at $52,250 the worth of each share in underworld markets.

None of the hidden holdings in the casinos may be peddled without mob approval, either from Lansky in one combine or from Giancana and Scalish in the other.

The owners of record in the casinos are licensed by the Nevada Gambling Control Board.

But the secret gangster owners operate on Cosa Nostra licenses. The only state record that bears their names is a blacklist.

BEHIND THE SCENES

The blacklist does have some effect on the mobsters. It compels them to shun public appearances in the counting rooms. They keep behind the scenes, using frontmen to control the casinos.

The mere appearance of the blacklisted Giancana in a casino hotel two years ago was considered by the state as an offense heinous enough to revoke the gambling licenses of singer Frank Sinatra.

To steer clear of that kind of trouble in the Stardust and the Desert Inn, Giancana has two frontmen.

One of Giancana's representatives, John Drew, is licensed by the state as an owner at the Stardust.

The other Giancana standin, George Gordon, is like his boss in that Gordon's Casino holdings do not show on the records.

The reason for that is simple—the state would reject Gordon in a hurry if he applied for gambling licenses.

RECORD OF ARRESTS

Gordon is a sidekick of notorious mobsters and thus unacceptable to the state as a licensee. Moreover, Gordon, a Miami lottery operator, has a record of arrests for bootlegging and possession of opium.

Nevertheless, Gordon boasts that he holds 14 secret shares in the Desert Inn and eight undercover shares in the Stardust.

Whatever the yield from Gordon's secret shares—it would be $44,000 a month if the Lansky $2,000-a-month computation were applied—Gordon earns it.

His main task in the Desert Inn and Stardust is to iron out the interminable wrangles of the Giancana camp and another gambling faction led by M. B. (Moe) Dalitz, majordomo in the Desert Inn.

The chief trouble between the Dalitz group and Giancana's men is that they don't trust each other, especially when it comes to counting skimming money.

OTHER MATTERS

But they have fallen out in the past over other matters, such as whether singer Eddie Fisher should appear at the Desert Inn or at a night club controlled by Giancana in Chicago.

The matter was debated for weeks until Gordon wangled the decision—what else?—that Fisher should sing in Giancana's club.

How Fisher himself felt about that apparently didn't concern the gangsters.

Skimming operations were pooh-poohed or ignored by state officials in Nevada until the testimony of Federal Bureau of Investigation agents brought the huge tax-cheating conspiracy out in the open where everyone was aware of it.

FBI agents told a federal court in Denver that a listening device had been installed in the Desert Inn to determine who received huge sums skimmed there.

THE LID IS LIFTED

That was the first time the lid was lifted on the FBI evidence of skimming.

It was viewed by most casino owners as a major disaster that should have been avoided by a Chicago ganster, Felix (Milwaukee Phil) Alderisio, in his attempts to keep out of prison.

Alderisio was convicted in Denver last year of threatening to kill an oil promoter to force him to repay $70,000 skimmed from the cashier's cage of the Desert Inn.

Found guilty with Alderisio was one of the Desert Inn owners, Ruby Kolod, a former Cleveland hoodlum.

Alderisio appealed his conviction and 4½-year prison sentence under a go-easy warning from Giancana.

Giancana—now identified as one of the gangsters who got the skimming money—reportedly instructed Alderisio to avoid any appeal action that might bring forth a disclosure of the vast casino thefts.

But Alderisio, Kolod and their lawyers didn't handle it that way.

FBI TESTIMONY

Their appeal—as yet undecided—provoked the FBI testimony about the multi-million-dollar skimming racket.

The chief defense counsel for Alderisio and Kolod is Edward Bennett Williams of Washington, D.C.

Williams also represents a number of Las Vegas casinos. His clients once included the Desert Inn and Stardust, connected by interlocking management. Williams does not represent either the Desert Inn or the Stardust at this time.

The Desert Inn skimming disclosures came after the Fremont casino boss, Ed Levinson—with Williams as his counsel—filed suit against the FBI, charging his privacy had been invaded by another electronic bug.

The wisdom of suing the U.S. government is something other casino owners have trouble comprehending right now.

In the Desert Inn, a reporter asked Dalitz just what the casinos had to gain by taking the FBI to court.

PUT IN A BIND

"What can I gain?" wailed Dalitz. "I don't want to talk about it."

Across the street in the Stardust, a state-licensed owner, Milton Jaffee, said the casinos had been put in a bind by Levinson's lawsuit.

"I don't want nothing to do with that lawsuit—nothing," he said. "The government's a cinch winner."

"I don't know what Levinson thinks he's doing. You'll have to ask him."

Levinson, in turn, passed the buck of comment to Williams.

"I've been told not to talk about any of this," said Levinson. "Call Williams in Washington."

Another casino-owner, Hy Abrams of the Sands, announced he would talk to a reporter only in the presence of his lawyers—all four of them.

Then Abrams indicated that he might reply to just one question on his own.

"When did you last see Meyer Lansky?"

"I'm not going to answer any question like that," said Abrams.

Tuesday: How the skimmers go about it.

[Chicago Sun-Times, July 12, 1966, p. 2, col. 1]

LAS VEGAS.—Come along to the counting room where the gangsters' bonanza of black money was skimmed from the winnings of a gambling casino.

The skimmed cash was counted in the casino executive suite. Step inside for a look at chicanery, thievery and tax-cheating on a vast scale.

The skimming loot was staggering. It topped $6,000,000 here in a year. That much was stolen from just six of the scores of casinos in downtown Las Vegas and on the gambling strip outside the city.

Once skimmed, the stolen cash was placed in numbered envelopes and dispatched around the country to top mobsters, including Chicago's Anthony Accardo and Momo Salvatore Giancana.

Occasionally the skimmed cash was even distributed to individuals outside the national crime syndicate for having rendered special services.

PAYMENT GOES TO NOTABLE

A Hollywood film star received a four-figure payment of skimming money three years ago. It was a tax-free bonus on top of his regular fee for an appearance in a Las Vegas night club.

Other payoffs from the stolen casino cash have gone to financiers who helped the Las Vegas gamblers swing big deals in legitimate business.

Investment in legal enterprises was a key factor in transforming the gangsters' "black" skimming money into clean, legitimate profits.

By skimming off millions before casino winnings were reported, the gangsters escaped Nevada and federal taxes. Here's how it was done:

Regular skims of cash took place at the end of each casino shift, when the drop boxes of money from the gambling tables were toted up in an office off the cashier's cage.

Only casino owners were permitted there during that count. But many of the pit bosses and cashiers who brought the money to the owners had knowledge of the skimming.

HOW WORKERS GOT THEIR SHARE

To buy the silence of those casino workers, a smaller, $5,000-a-month skim was set up for them. It wasn't completely effective, however.

Some casino employes, irked because their black money was a pittance by comparison to the whopping amounts harvested by the gangsters, were willing to talk to authorities about skimming.

When between $100,000 and $200,000 had been set aside in the casinos—that was once or twice a month in the year of the Big Skim—the cash was taken to the casino executive office where the gangsters' front men gathered to count and divide it.

The big headache in skimming was splitting the take to the satisfaction of such suspicious chiselers as Giancana, Accardo, and Miami hoodlum Meyer Lansky.

Their cuts of the black money were set by coded records that state and federal tax collectors never saw.

The secret records were a hodgepodge of tally sheets, memo books, and scraps of paper on which gangsters were listed by nicknames, initials and numerals.

THERE WAS CHAOS

If, as happened frequently, the count didn't come out even, there was chaos as the worried skimmers shuffled through stacks of currency and money bags again and again.

At a 1963 skimming session, a casino boss and courier pawed over $168,000 in greenbacks attempting to straighten out cash and records for an accounting demanded by Lansky.

That count went into overtime, lasting almost two hours. It usually took the skimmers only about an hour to split the money, put in on the books and dispatch it.

The skimmers use different systems to keep track of the cash and that was another source of trouble.

USED BOOKIE SYSTEM

One casino cashier used the bookie system of ins-and-outs when he skimmed. The skimmed cash was listed as "ins" and the gangsters' shares as "outs."

Another sticking to gangland tradition, kept his records in a little black book. But his couriers used the ins-and-outs system and their figures often conflicted with his.

In the year of the Big Skim, $6,000,000 disappeared from six state-licensed casinos, the Fremont, the Horseshoe, the Desert Inn, the Sands, the Stardust and the Flamingo.

SENT AROUND COUNTRY

The executive suites of the Fremont and the Desert Inn were the central collection headquarters for the cash stolen from the other casinos. From these two locations, the money was dispatched around the country.

Accardo received a share of the boodle diverted from the Fremont, Sands, Flamingo and Horseshoe.

Giancana got his cut from skimming at the Desert Inn and Stardust.

It would appear, from the amounts skimmed by the casino combines over two months in 1962, that Accardo had the best of the deal.

In one month, the Desert Inn-Stardust skimming was $132,000. The next month the two casinos did even better, skimming $138,000.

THE BIGGEST STEAL

But the four other casinos, at the same time, sluiced off $168,000 one month and $150,000 the next for Accardo, Lansky and others.

In fact, the biggest steal of all was in the Fremont-Sands-Flamingo-Horseshoe hookup early in 1963. It came to $320,000.

That record theft was not achieved voluntarily, however.

The skimmers were working under pressure. The previous month, they hadn't tended to business and got behind. Then they had to grab the $320,000 to square accounts with Lansky and New Jersey rackets chief Gerardo (Jerry) Catena.

For years, Nevada officials looked high and low for evidence of skimming but were unable to find it.

As it turned out, they were looking in the wrong place. State agents spot-checked the cashiers cages while the big thefts took place in the casino executive suites.

CONFIRMED BY FBI

The existence of skimming finally was confirmed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which disclosed in federal court at Denver two weeks ago that hidden microphones had been placed in the Desert Inn.

Dean Elson, FBI chief in Las Vegas, testified that secret shareholders in the Desert Inn were benefitting from "a vast sum of money" being taken off the top of the casino winnings.

Nevada state officials, acting on the request of Gov. Grant Sawyer, have since opened an inquiry into the FBI bugging but no inquiry has been started into the skimming practices or the charges that secret owners benefit from the casino gambling business.

OWNERSHIPS SHIFTED

The Gaming Control Board and the Nevada Gaming Commission have the authority to put any casino out of business by revoking the state license of its owners of record.

The secret casino interests sometimes are juggled by the gangsters' representatives at skimming sessions after the count of the black money. The mob front men shave one hidden interest and then another to gain extra shares for themselves or a hoodlum.

As they shift around the secret ownership, the gang agents must be sure that the total—the sum of the secret shares, and the holdings of state-licensed owners—does not exceed 100 per cent.

But now and then the swaps of the hidden shares are as chaotic as the dreadful times when the skimming count goes awry.

Once, in the Stardust, the conferee toted up the secret shares and legitimate holdings to find they had parceled out 110 per cent of the casino.

[Chicago Sun-Times, July 13, 1966, p. 2, col. 1]

LAS VEGAS.—Eight bagmen and a brunet satchelwoman were the couriers who hauled $6,000,000 to Chicago gangsters and other mobsters from gambling casinos here.

Packed in the attache cases of the bagmen—the woman used a black leather handbag—was cash skimmed illegally from the hoodlums from the winnings of six casinos.

So vast was the skimming thievery that the money movers fanned out from here several times a month to make the deliveries of currency to the mob.

Each toted a fortune—between $100,000 and $200,000.

Most of the casino loot went directly to the gangsters in Chicago, Miami, New York, New Jersey and Cleveland.

But sometimes the messengers dropped the money in foreign banks which kept secret the names of depositors.

The skimming money delivery network was circuitous and devious. It had to be, for the carriers of the money were key figures in a huge national conspiracy to cheat the U.S. government and the State of Nevada out of taxes on the skimmed funds.

EAST, NORTH, THEN WEST

The stolen casino cash was transported from Las Vegas to Miami and then up the East Coast to New Jersey and New York.

From there, the couriers traveld west, dropping off the cash in Cleveland and Chicago.

As they hauled the skimming money across the country on jet planes, many of the couriers appeared as businessmen, but a few were sporty. One was dressed in a pink sweater and blue slacks to pick up $136,000 for New Jersey gangsters at the Miami airport.

Earlier, the brunet girl friend of a casino boss popped up on the delivery circuit to carry $115,000 in her handbag as she went by train from Las Vegas to Miami.

BOTH HANDS ON HER PURSE

Whatever their pose as couriers, all of the messengers had one thing in common—a tight grip on the satchels that contained the mobsters' money.

One courier had the habit of putting his briefcase of money on the floor of the aircraft and planting both feet on it.

The bagwoman, on her three-day train journey from Las Vegas to Miami, clutched her cash-crammed purse with both hands whenever she ventured out of a roomette.

The gangsters insured themselves against any losses with a simple policy. It was that a courier who lost his bag risked losing his life along with it.

Among the couriers were:

1. George Gordon, 57, of 628 88th St., Surfside, Fla., a former big-time bookie who is on the payroll of the Desert Inn Casino.

Packages of skimming money for Chicago gang chiefs Momo (Moe) Salvatore Giancana and Anthony Accardo were carried by Gordon.

When he isn't carrying a satchel of skimming cash, Gordon travels across the nation, dunning hard-luck crapshooters to pay their debts to the Desert Inn.

2. Benjamin Seigelbaum, 63, who hauled cash from four casinos here to Miami gangster Meyer Lansky. Seigelbaum lives in Miami Beach.

Gordon was a member with many Las Vegas casino owners in a huge Newport (Ky.) bookie ring. His police record includes arrests in New York for dry law violations and possession of opium.

The stocky Seigelbaum has been seized by authorities in the past for concealing assets in bankruptcy, black marketing and embezzlement.

Another skimming courier, a playboy, carried payoffs to Miami until his penchant for gambling caused the gangsters to strip him of his satchel on the suspicion that he might steal from them.

Other members of the nine-man courier team were owners of casinos here.

One owner—when his international money mover was sidelined temporarily—moved more than $200,000 from Miami to vaults in Jamaica. Another casino chief diverted cash from the Desert Inn and carried it down to Miami himself.

The skimming racket here is mastermined by Lansky, a former New York racketeer.

His present base in Miami caused the stolen casino cash to be funneled through that city before it was passed on to other mobsters.

KEEPS THE SPLIT STRAIGHT

Lansky kept the split straight, making sure that each gangster received $2,000 a month from each of their secret shares in the Las Vegas casinos.

He also fixed at $52,500 the price for which the hidden casino interests could be peddled in Cosa Nostra markets.

The $6,000,000 was skimmed from six casinos—the Desert Inn, the Stardust, the Fremont, the Sands, the Flamingo and the Horseshoe.

The exact total of Lansky's undercover holdings in the casinos is unknown.

It may be computed, however, from the $84,000 he received in just one of the monthy skimming payoffs. The money came from a total skim of $150,000 in the Fremont, Sands, Flamingo and Horseshoe.

At the Lansky-set rate of $2,000 a month from each hidden share, the $84,000 indicates that he held 42 shares in one or more of the four casinos.

That probably makes Lansky the biggest of all the undercover casino owners.

After Lansky got his end, the couriers carried on the skimming money to New York and Chicago.

The total for Accardo and Giancana topped $100,000 a month. By Lansky's formula, it may be deduced that the Chicago mob had more than 50 secret casino shares.

In New Jersey, the payoffs were received by Gerardo (Jerry) Catena, Angelo (Gip) DeCarlo and Anthony Boiardo.

DeCarlo had two secret shares in the Horseshoe and the Fremont and three fourths of a share in the Sands.

The interests of Catena and Boiardo never have come to light. But a $48,000 skimming payment to Catena one month indicated that Catena had some 24 shares hidden somewhere in the Fremont, Sands, Flamingo or Horseshoe.

In New York, cash skimmed from those four casinos was dropped to mobsters Vincent (Jimmy Blue Eyes) Alo and the Eboli brothers, Pasquale and Thomas.

CLEVELAND MOBSTERS' TAKE

In Cleveland, skimming money from the Desert Inn was received by rackets boss John Scalish. His monthly payoff of $52,000 indicated a hidden interest of 26 shares in the Desert Inn.

To accommodate another Cleveland mobster, Frank Milano, a special Mexican spur of the skimming delivery track was set up.

Milano's money from secret ownership in the Desert Inn was taken to him in Mexico City, instead of being channeled through Lansky with the other payoffs.

Reports of skimming in the Las Vegas casinos were discounted by Nevada officials until two weeks ago, when it was disclosed in federal court in Denver that the Federal Bureau of Investigation was probing the racket.

Nevada authorities have the power to revoke gambling licenses and shut down a casino on any evidence that the owners are dealing with Lansky or other hoodlums.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you one thing. Prior to Mr. Clark's recent elevation to the position of U.S. Attorney General, is his experience comparable to those others whom we have quoted? In other words would his experience lend greater weight to his conclusions than would the experience of others you have cited?

Professor BLAKEY. The fascinating thing about Mr. Clark's position—and I feel myself uncomfortable in discussing it, because I know Mr. Clark to be a scholar, a gentleman, an eminently reasonable man whose mind is open—is to find him taking this position publicly; it just disturbs me, because based on the public record, it is just not supportable. But he has indicated that he takes this position because he has actually read the FBI wiretaps and logs. I am specifically referring to his testimony before the Celler committee.

Initially, I mentioned to you the testimony of these other witnesses as some indication that other people who have had access to these documents have, I take it, different opinions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Others had access to the same documents?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes. To go beyond that now, all of those documents have not been made public, and therefore there is no way I can discuss what is in them based on the public record.

Senator McCLELLAN. What I was trying to emphasize was that Mr. Clark was only recently appointed to the position of Attorney General, and that does not give him any greater knowledge, necessarily, than he had before, and his opportunity for knowledge before assuming that position was comparable to those who disagree with him.

Professor BLAKEY. That is correct. But let us not leave it just on the basis of what he says and what they say; we have to resolve it. Let us take a look at the record.

It just so happens that in the Taglianetti case in Rhode Island certain of these FBI logs were, in fact, made public through court procedures. I have attached an appendix to my statement which includes those logs.

Mr. Clark suggests that the FBI's use of these devices was "neither effective or highly productive." Let's see what the logs show.

The electronic device was directed against Raymond Patriarca. He is the head of the Cosa Nostra family in New England and a member of its national ruling body. His criminal record includes such things as a conviction for armed robbery, for arson and for white slavery. What I am saying, in short, is that the device was not put in indiscriminately. It was put in against a person from whom you could reasonably expect to get significant data. It was in from March 1963 to July 1965. We have out of that 3-year period 10 "airtels," which are summaries of what the FBI overheard. They are just 10 summaries out of a 3-year period. Now, if we take and analyze just those 10 summaries——

Senator McCLELLAN. Would this be 10 separate conversations?

Professor BLAKEY. The FBI periodically——

Senator McCLELLAN. Made a summary.

Professor BLAKEY. Of what was heard and forwarded it to Washington.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see.

Professor BLAKEY. We have here then 10 summaries of what was heard.

Senator McCLELLAN. How many summaries were made during that same period would you say?

Professor BLAKEY. There is no way from the public record that I can indicate, but it is obviously a lot more than 10.

Let me make one more comment here, Mr. Chairman. In dealing with this problem—and I might say I have had this problem in class—sometimes there is a credibility problem. A lot of people just simply do not believe that organized crime is what it is and is as bad as it is,

I have taken students through the Valachi committee hearings, but their attitude has been, "I don't believe it," and to quote as an example of this attitude on a higher level, there is a passage in Arthur Schlesinger's book, "A Thousand Days," (p. 696) in which he notes that a number of criminologists were skeptical of the Department of Justice support of the notion at that time that there was a Mafia. What I find so terribly convincing about these airtels is that here it is from these peoples' mouths—no question about a paid informant—this is it.

What do these 10 airtels give us? I have outlined that in great detail in my statement and I don't want to repeat all of it here. But just those 10 documents establish the existence of the Cosa Nostra; they establish its structure; they establish the functions of the various members; they indicate the power of the various members—for example, of the boss—they give you the size of various families; they give you the geographical extent of their operations; and they indicate that the Cosa Nostra actively operates in such States as Rhode Island, Illinois, Maryland, Washington, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Florida, and Pennsylvania. They give you also an indication that it operates on an international scale; apparently a group is in Canada. They give you an indication of some of the illegal activities by the Cosa Nostra, including murder, kidnaping, extortion, fraud, bribery, loan sharking, and gambling. They give you some indication of their legal activities—the infiltration of business, including legitimate gambling. labor unions, racetracks, vending machines, and liquor. They show you that the associates of this one boss are in every major area of the country and consist of every hood who has graduated from the drugstore cowboy stage; all were contacted at one time or another by Patriarca. The only description that I can give which accurately capsulizes those airtels is this: Imagine if you could have had an electronic device in on an Italian duke in the 16th century, such as Cesare Borgia, who was dispensing largesse, ordering killings, and all that sort of thing. That is exactly what you had when you put the device in on Raymond Patriarca, and it wasn't Italy; it was the United States, and it wasn't the 16th century; it was today.

Senator McCLELLAN. This man is one of about a dozen of heads of families is he not?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. In the United States?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. So you can multiply what you here picture as one operation by a dozen.

Professor BLAKEY. And all we have is say 10 glimpses; we have only 10 still shots.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is of just his operation alone?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes, absolutely.

Senator McCLELLAN. And you have at least 10 or 12 more like him with the same power doing the same things in other places in the United States.

Professor BLAKEY. Mr. Chairman, you have 12 members of the Commission, but you actually, according to the President's Crime Commission, have approximately 24 groups.

Senator McCLELLAN. Twenty-four instead of 12?

Professor BLAKEY. The 12 is the "board of directors" and the 24 are the "branch offices" of the whole group.

Senator McCLELLAN. So you have 24 instead of the 12 operating as he does?

Professor BLAKEY. Yes. You have these groups in virtually every major metropolitan area in this country.

Now, from August 1960 to June 1964 I was a special prosecutor in the Department of Justice, and I was at that time in the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section. There I read the normal investigative reports of the IRS and FBI. I give this as background to make this point: I had access at that time to the best that normal investigator techniques could produce. At that time, apparently, the FBI was not making directly available to the Department electronically seized data. We had, of course, generalized intelligence reports which described some of these things, but nothing on the level of the specificity of these airtels. And let me say this, nothing that I saw at any time, in the 4 years that I was there, supposedly at the center of the strongest drive to date against organized crime, manned by the top people in the country, even touched on the specificity of these airtels. If I had had those airtels, and they were legally admissible, and a couple of FBI agents to do a little leg work, I could have made murder cases hand over fist. I wouldn't even have bothered about the gambling cases. But to find now that the Attorney General suggests that this equipment is "neither effective—or highly productive" in light of my own personal experience and my analysis of this information in the public record—I find it just incredible. Mr. Clark must be taking advice from the wrong people.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are you shocked at it?

Professor BLAKEY. I don't want to say that I am shocked, but I can't explain how he can take this position.

Senator McCLELLAN. You simply can't understand it.

Professor BLAKEY. I simply can't understand it. He has taken abnormally bad advice from somebody. I can say for a fact that he can't be taking advice from the men on the line.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think he is taking advice from people who know what the facts are?

Professor BLAKEY. I can't believe that he is taking advice from people who know what the facts are, because the advice just simply doesn't reflect the facts.

Senator McCLELLAN. The facts refute the stand he has taken and the course he is following.

Professor BLAKEY. That is my conclusion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Clark is also quoted as suggesting that organized crime is but a "tiny part" of the general crime picture. I would like, if I may, in conclusion, register a very serious disagreement with that Organized crime is not a tiny part. Organized crime is a major problem in this country. Mr. Justice Brandeis, speaking of lawless law enforcement, in his famous dissent in the Olmstead case suggested that the Government was a teacher. Well, I am inclined to believe that he is right. I think, too, that the Government teaches, also by its failures. If we are unable to bring these people to book—the top leaders in organized crime—what does that teach our children?

What does that teach the slum kid who wants to work his way up, that he ought to go out and get a job and save and work and do the things that traditionally we have said was the right way to succeed in American life? Or does it teach him that the way to succeed is to be sharp—the way to succeed is to ignore our traditional values.

I am suggesting, in short, that the failure of our society today to bring to book the major leaders of organized crime—I mentioned this morning some of the statistics—5,000 people identified—and we have been able to get maybe 2 percent of them for just a bare conviction—says an awful lot to an awful lot of young people, an dmaybe we can find some of the causes of juvenile delinquency, some of the causes of lawlessness in this country, in the stark realization that crime does pay and, if it does, why should people go with the traditional values?

Senator McClellan. They have more reason now to conclude that crime pays than ever before in the history of this Nation.

Professor Blakey. These airtels are documented proof of it.

Senator McClellan. And the testimony is running daily that it is paying; is that not correct?

Professor Blakey. Yes. What I am suggesting is that no civilized society can long permit the operation in it of an underworld operation that is as powerful and as immune from legal accountability as La Cosa Nostra. The success story of this group is symbolic of the breakdown of law and order increasing the characteristic of many segments of our society. We must show everybody that nobody is above the law. For the simple, the blunt, truth is that these people are today above the law. And that is intolerable.

Senator McClellan. If they are immune from punishment, is that not tantamount to having a supergovernment above our Government—they have become the law?

Professor Blakey. I couldn't agree with you more, Mr. Chairman. I think the best illustration of what you say is this: Raymond Patriarca was discussing, according to the airtels, at one time the murder situation in Boston. You know, there were—there have been something like 43 gangland slayings in Boston—and Patriarca expressed his dissatisfaction with these gangland slayings—that the people in the underworld weren't exercising discipline—and his remark was, "If it doesn't stop, I am going to declare martial law." This remark is symbolic of what kind of power that man has. He can say in all seriousness that he can declare martial law among the underworld in Boston and stop the killings, or attempt to stop killings about which the normal investigative procedures and techniques of law enforcement have been able to do virtually nothing.

This is what I wish Mr. Clark understood, and I think if he did, he would change, and I think Congress could get down to the very difficult task of drawing a fair and effective electronic surveillance statute.

Thank you.

Senator McClellan. Professor Blakey, you have given us some very enlightened testimony with respect to this particular aspect of the overall problem in mounting a successful war on crime.

I do not recall anything you have said or any conclusions that you have reached with which I would disagree. There might be some of your suggestions that I will want to study and weigh further. But I think you have performed a real service for your country by coming here and giving the subcommittee, the Senate, and the Congress the benefit of your knowledge in this field. Personally I am grateful to you for it.

Professor BLAKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I appreciate it and we will welcome any further contribution that you might be able to make for us.

Professor BLAKEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do not be surprised if I call on you for some help.

Professor BLAKEY. Never hesitate.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

I would like to have inserted and printed in the record the bill, S. 2050, introduced by Senator Hruska and others on June 29, 1967, and which has just been referred to this subcommittee. It will be printed in the record at this point.

(The bill, S. 2050, follows:)

[S. 2050, 90th Cong., first sess.]

A BILL To prohibit electronic surveillance by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of offenses, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Electronic Surveillance Control Act of 1967".

SEC. 2. The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Wire communications are normally conducted through the use of facilities which form part of an interstate network. The same facilities are used for interstate and intrastate communications. In order to effectively protect the integrity of interstate communications and the privacy of parties to such communications, it is necessary for the Congress to define on a uniform basis the circumstances and conditions under which interceptions of wire communications may be authorized and to prohibit any unauthorized interceptions of such communications.

(2) Electronic, mechanical, and other intercepting devices are being used by public and private persons to overhear oral communications, made in private areas, without the consent of the parties to such communications. The contents of these communications and evidence derived therefrom is being used by public and private person, as evidence in court and administrative proceedings. It is also being used by persons whose activities affect interstate commerce. The manufacture, distribution, advertising, and use of these devices are facilitated by interstate commerce. In order to effectively protect the integrity of court and administrative proceedings, to prevent the obstruction of interstate commerce, and to protect the privacy of oral communications, it is necessary for Congress to define on a uniform basis the circumstances and conditions under which the interception of oral communications made in private may be authorized, to prohibit any unauthorized interception of such communications, and to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, and advertising of intercepting devices.

(3) Criminals make extensive use of wire and oral communications in their activities. The interception of such communications to obtain evidence of the commission of crimes or to prevent their commission is an indispensable aid to the administration of justice.

SEC. 3. (a) Part I of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new chapter:

"§ 2513. Confiscation of wire or oral communication intercepting devices

"Any electronic, mechanical, or other intercepting device used, sent, carried, manufactured, or assembled in violation of section 2511 or 2512 of this chapter may be seized and forfeited to the United States. All provisions of law relating to (1) the seizure, summary and judicial forfeiture, and condemnation of vessels, vehicles, merchandise, and baggage for violations of the customs laws contained in title 19 of the United States Code, (2) the disposition of such vessels, vehicles, merchandise, and baggage or the proceeds from the sale thereof, (3) the remission or mitigation of such forfeitures, (4) the compromise of claims, (5) and the award of compensation to informers in respect of such forfeitures, shall apply to seizures and forfeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this section, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this section; except that such duties as are imposed upon the collector of customs or any other person with respect to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels, vehicles, merchandise, and baggage under the provisions of the customs laws contained in title 19 of the United States Code shall be performed with respect to seizure and forfeiture of electronic, mechanical, or other intercepting devices under this section by such officers, agents, or other persons as may be authorized or designated for that purpose by the Attorney General.

No such witness shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, nor shall testimony so compelled be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding (except in a proceeding described in the next sentence) against him in any court. No witness shall be exempt under this section from prosecution for perjury or contempt committed while giving testimony or producing evidence under compulsion as provided in this section.

"§ 2515. Prohibition of use as evidence of intercepted wire or oral communications

"§ 2516. Authorization for interception of wire or oral communications

"(a) The Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice specially designated by the Attorney General, may authorize an application to a Federal judge of competent jurisdiction for, and such judge, after making the findings required by section 2518(c) of this chapter, may authorize, in conformity with section 2518 of this chapter, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or a Federal agency having responsibility for the investigation of the offense as to which such application is made, to intercept wire or oral communications when such interception may provide evidence of—

"(1) any offense punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year under sections 2274 through 2277 of title 42 of the United States Code (relating to the enforcement of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954), or under the following chapters of this title: chapter 37 (relating to espionage), chapter 105 (relating to sabotage), or chapter 115 (relating to treason);

"§ 2517. Authorization for disclosure and use of intercepted wire or oral communications

"(a) Any investigative or law enforcement officer who, by any means authorized by this chapter, has obtained knowledge of the contents of any wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, may disclose such contents to another investigative or law enforcement officer to the extent that such disclosure is appropriate to the proper performance of the official duties of the officers making and receiving the disclosure.

"(b) Any investigative or law enforcement officer who, by any means authorized by this chapter, has obtained knowledge of the contents of any wire or oral communication or evidence derived therefrom, may use such contents in the proper discharge of his official duties.

"(c) Any person who has received, by any means authorized by this chapter, any information concerning a wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, intercepted in accordance with the provisions of this chapter may disclose the contents of that communication while giving testimony under oath or affirmation in any criminal proceeding in any court of the United States or of any State or in any Federal or State grand jury proceeding.

"(d) The contents of any wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, intercepted in accordance with the provisions of this chapter may otherwise be disclosed only upon a showing of good cause before a judge of competent jurisdiction.

"§ 2518. Procedure for interception of wire or oral communications

"(a) Each applicatiton for an authorization to intercept an oral or wire communication or for approval of an interception of such a communication shall be made in writing upon oath or affirmation and shall state the applicant's authority to make such application. Each application shall include the following information:

"(1) the identity of the person who authorized the application;

"(2) a full and complete statement of the facts and circumstances relied upon by the applicant;

"(3) the nature and location of the wire communications facilities involved or the place where the oral communication is to be intercepted;

"(4) a full and complete statement of the facts concerning all previous applications, known to the individual authorizing the application, made to any judge for authorization to intercept, or for approval of interceptions of, wire or oral communications involving any of the same communication facilities or places specified in the application or involving any person named in the application as committing, having committed, or being about to commit an offense enumerated in section 2516 of this chapter, and the action taken by the judge on each such application; and

"(5) in the case of an application based on the grounds set forth in paragraph (1) of subsection (c) of this section, the number of orders authorizing or approving interceptions by—

"(A) Federal officers, if such application is authorized by a Federal officer,

"(B) State officers, if such application is authorized by a State officer, or

"(C) officers of a political subdivision of a State, if such application is authorized by an officer of that political subdivision, which have been entered under that subsection on applications based on those grounds and which are outstanding on the date of the application.

"(b) The judge may require the applicant to furnish additional testimony or documentary evidence in support of the application.

"(c) Upon such application the judge shall enter an ex parte order, as requested or as modified, authorizing or approving interceptions of wire or oral communications within the territorial jurisdiction of the court in which the judge is sitting, if the judge determines on the basis of the facts submitted by the applicant that—

"(1) there is probable cause for belief that an offense with respect to which such an application may be filed under section 2516 of this chapter is being, has been, or is about to be committed;

"(2) there is probable cause for belief that facts concerning that offense may be obtained through such interception;

"(3) normal investigative procedures have been tried and have failed or reasonably appear to be unlikely to succeed if tried; and

"(4) the facilities from which, or the place where, the wire or oral communications are to be intercepted are being used, or are about to be used, in connection with the commission of such offense, or are leased to, listed in the name of, or commonly used by, a person who has committed, is committing, or is about to commit such offense.

"(d)(1) If the facilities from which a wire communication is to be intercepted are public, no order shall be issued under subsection (c) of this section unless the judge, in addition to the requirements of that subsection, determines that—

"(A) such interception will be so conducted in such a way as to minimize or eliminate the number of interceptions of wire communications not otherwise subject to interception under this chapter; and

"(B) there is a special need to authorize the interception of wire communications over such facilities.

"(2) If the facilities from which, or the place where, the wire or oral communications are to be intercepted are being used or about to be used, or are leased to, listed in the name of, or commonly used by, a licensed physician, licensed lawyer, or practicing clergyman, or are premises used primarily for habitation by a husband and wife, no order shall be issued under subsection (c) of this section unless the judge, in addition to the requirements of that subsection, determines that—

"(A) such interceptions will be so conducted in such a way as to minimize or eliminate the number of interceptions of privileged wire or oral communications between licensed physicians and patients, licensed lawyers and clients, practicing clergymen and confidants, or husbands and wives; and

"(B) there is a special need to authorize the interception of wire or oral communications over such facilities or in such places:

No such privileged wire or oral communication so intercepted shall be disclosed or used other than as it is necessary in the disclosure or use of wire or oral communications whose disclosure or use is authorized under this chapter.

"(e) Each order authorizing or approving the interception of any wire or oral communication shall specify—

"(1) the nature and location of the communications facilities as to which, or the place where, authority to intercept is granted;

"(2) each offense as to which information is to be sought;

"(3) the identity of the agency authorized to intercept the communications; and

"(4) the period of time during which such interception is authorized.

"(f) No order entered under this section may authorize or approve the interception of any wire or oral communication for any period exceeding forty-five days. Extensions of an order may be granted for periods of not more than twenty days. An extension shall not be granted unless an application for such extension is made in accordance with subsection (a) of this section and the court makes the findings required by subsection (c) of this section.

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, any investigative or law enforcement officer who determines that—

"(1) an emergency situation exists that requires a wire or oral communication to be intercepted immediately, and

"(2) there are grounds upon which an order could be entered to authorize such interception, may intercept such wire or oral communication if an application for an order is made in accordance with this chapter, within forty-eight hours after the interception has occurred, or begins to occur, for the approval of the interception. In the event such application for approval is denied, the contents of any wire or oral communication intercepted shall be treated as provided for in section 2515 of this chapter, and an inventory shall be served, in accordance with subsection (i) of this section, on the person whose wire or oral communication was intercepted.

"(h)(1) The contents of any wire or oral communication intercepted by any means authorized by this chapter shall, if possible, be recorded on tape or wire or other comparable device. Immediately upon the expiration of the period of the order, or extensions thereof, such recordings shall be made available to the judge issuing such order and sealed under his directions. Custody of the recordings shall be wherever the judge orders. They shall not be destroyed except upon an order of the issuing or denying judge and in any event shall be kept for ten years. Duplicate recordings may be made for use pursuant to the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of section 2517 of this chapter for investigations. The presence of the seal provided for by this subsection, or a satisfactory explanation for the absence thereof, shall be a prerequisite for the disclosure of the contents of any wire or oral communication or evidence derived therefrom under subsection (c) or (d) of that section. The recording of the contents of any wire or oral communication under this subsection shall be done in such way as will protect the recording from editing or other alterations.

"(2) Applications made and orders granted under this chapter shall be sealed by the Judge. Custody of the applications and orders shall be wherever the judge directs. Such applications and orders shall not be disclosed except in accordance with this chapter, and shall not be destroyed except on order of the issuing or denying judge, and in any event shall be kept for ten years.

"(3) Any violation of the provisions of this subsection shall be punished as contempt of the issuing or denying judge.

"(i) Within a reasonable time but not later than one year after the termination of the period of the order or extensions thereof, the issuing judge shall cause to be served, on the persons named in the order, an inventory which shall include notice of—

"(1) the fact of the entry of the order;

"(2) the date of the entry and the period of authorized or approved interception; and

"(3) the fact that during the period wire or oral communications were or were not intercepted and recorded:

On an exparte showing of good cause to a judge of competent jurisdiction the serving of the inventory required by this subsection may be postponed.

"(j) The contents of any intercepted wire or oral communication or evidence derived therefrom shall not be received in evidence or otherwise disclosed in any criminal proceeding in a Federal or State court unless each defendant, not less than ten days before the trial, has been furnished with a copy of the court order under which the interception was authorized or approved. This ten-day period may be waived by the judge if he finds that it was not possible to furnish the defendant with the above information ten days before the trial and that the defendant will not be prejudiced by the delay in receiving such information.

"(k)(1) Any aggrieved person in any trial, hearing, or proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, or other authority of the United States, a State, or a political subdivision of a State, may move to suppress the contents of any intercepted wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, on the grounds that—

"(A) the communication was unlawfully intercepted;

"(B) the order of authorization or approval under which it was intercepted is insufficient on its face; or

"(C) the interception was not made in conformity with the order of authorization or approval.

such motion shall be made before the trial, hearing, or proceeding unless there was no opportunity to make such motion or the person was not aware of the grounds of the motion. If the motion is granted, the contents of the intercepted wire or oral communication, or evidence derived therefrom, shall be treated as provided for in section 2515 of this chapter.

"(2) In addition to any other right to appeal, the United States shall have the right to appeal from an order granting a motion to suppress made under paragraph (1) of this subsection if the United States attorney shall certify to the judge or other official granting such motion that the appeal is not taken for purposes of delay. Such appeal shall be taken within thirty days after the date the order was entered and shall be diligently prosecuted.

"§ 2519. Reports concerning intercepted wire or oral communications

"(a) Within thirty days after the date of the expiration of an order (or any extension thereof) entered under section 2518(c), the issuing Federal or State judge shall report to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts—

"(1) the fact that an order was applied for;

"(2) the kind of order applied for;

"(3) the fact that it was granted as applied for or as modified;

"(4) the period of time including extensions for which it was issued;

"(5) the offense or offenses specified in the order; and

"(6) the identity of the applying investigative or law enforcement officer's agency, and who authorized the application.

"(b) Within thirty days after the termination of the investigation in connection with which an order (or any extension thereof) was sought, or any trial arising out of such investigation, whichever is later, the Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice specially designed by the Attorney General, or the principal prosecuting attorney of the State, or the principal prosecuting attorney for any political subdivision thereof, as the case may be, shall report to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts—

"(1) the information required by paragraphs (1) through (6) of subsection (a) of this section;

"(2) the number of arrests resulting from interceptions made under such order, and the offenses for which arrests were made;

"(3) the number of trials resulting from such interceptions;

"(4) the number of motions to suppress made under section 2518(k)(1) of this chapter with respect to such interceptions, and the number granted or denied; and

"(5) the number of convictions resulting from such interceptions and the offenses for which the convictions were obtained.

"(c) In March of each year the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall transmit to the Congress a full and complete report concerning the number of applications which were made, granted, or denied during the preceding calendar year for authorization or approval of interceptions of wire or oral communications. Such report shall include a summary of the data required to be filed with the Administrative Office by subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

"§ 2520. Recovery of civil damages authorized

"Any person whose wire or oral communication is intercepted, disclosed, or used in violation of this chapter, shall (1) have a civil cause of action against any person who intercepts, discloses, or uses, or procures any other person to intercept, such communication, and (2) be entitled to recover from any such person—

"(A) actual damages but not less than liquidated damages computed at the rate of $100 a day for each day of violation or $1,000, whichever is higher;

"(B) punitive damages; and

"(C) a reasonable attorney's fee and other litigation costs reasonably incurred:

A good faith reliance on an order issued under section 2518(c) shall constitute a complete defense to an action brought under this section."

(b) The table of chapters of part I of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new item:

"119. Interception of wire or oral communications ..... 2511".

SEC. 4. Section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1103; 47 U.S.C. 605) is amended to read as follows:

Senator MCCLELLAN. In order to accommodate several witnesses who are very anxious to get away, I am going to call Mr. Hastings, Mr. McCullough, and Mr. Wood.

Your testimony, I understand, will be directed toward S. 552.

Very well, Mr. Hastings, state your background, sir, for the record.

STATEMENT OF J. L. HASTINGS, MANAGER OF SPECIAL SERVICES, THE ATCHISON, TOPEKA & SANTA FE RAILWAY SYSTEM

Mr. HASTINGS. My name is J. L. Hastings. I am in charge of the railroad police department for the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway System, and also vice chairman for the Police Advisory Committee of the Association of American Railroads.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How long have you held these positions?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have held the latter one just for 1 year and the former for 6⅓ years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I note you have a prepared statement.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do.

Senator MCCLELLAN. With your permission, I will have the statement printed in full in the record at this time, and then let Mr. Wood make a brief statement as to his background.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Hastings follows:)

STATEMENT OF J. L. HASTINGS, MANAGER OF SPECIAL SERVICES, THE ATCHISON, TOPEKA & SANTA FE RAILWAY SYSTEM, IN SUPPORT OF S. 552, ON BEHALF OF ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

My name is J. L. Hastings. My address is 80 East Jackson Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois. I am Manager of Better Freight Handling and Special Service for The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway System. As Manager of Special Service. I am in charge of our Railway Police Organization and therefore am vitally interested in the protection of our passengers and employes. I am Vice Chairman of the Police Advisory Committee of the Association of American Railroads, which consists of 15 members from various railroads in the Northern, Southern, Eastern, and Western parts of the United States, as well as two members from the Canadian Railroads. I appear here in support of S. 552 "To amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

The Association of American Railroads is a voluntary, unincorporated, nonprofit organization. Its membership comprises railroads that operate 96 percent of the total mileage of all railroads in the United States, have annual revenues approximating 96 percent of the total annual revenues of the railroads, and whose employes constitute 95 percent of the total number of railroad workers in the United States.

I would like to speak first on the problems concerning my own railroad and assure you that I am only referring to a few representative cases which have been handled by members of my department in connection with the stoning and shooting at passenger trains.

On September 6, 1965, at San Clemente, California, rocks were through at our passenger train 2/27. One window was broken and the flying glass struck a passenger, inflicting several small lacerations about the side of his face and neck.

In an instance such as this, I'm sure we can all agree the injuries sustained could have been far more severe, possibly with the loss of vision.

Another incident occurred on December 31, 1965, when our Train No. 18 was hit by rocks as it was departing Los Angeles, with the end result of a passenger being struck and cut by flying glass.

More recently we were involved in a case near Kansas City wherein a lady passenger became ill from shock when a rock crashed through the window where she was seated.

My testimony will outline the general problems faced by the railroads of this country in dealing with acts of vandalism committed against trains and other vehicles operating on railroad rights of way. It will set forth and discuss some of the vandalistic acts which have occurred on certain other railroads of the country and will outline some of the activities of the railroads which have been undertaken in an effort to combat the problem. In addition to my statement, Mr. D. L. Wood, Chief Special Agent, Illinois Central Railroad; Mr. W. F. Meeker, Inspector of Police, and Mr. E. C. Sloan, District Claim Agent, Pennsylvania Railroad, will present the Committee with information relating specifically to problems which have arisen on the individual railroads they serve. My statement will also indicate how it is expected that the provisions of S. 552, if enacted, would be useful in combatting vandalism and will offer a minor amendment which, in our opinion, is necessary in order that S. 552 might better meet the problem.

There is nothing new about the problem with which the railroad industry is confronted except that it is a growing one and one which we have not been able to solve under existing law and law enforcement. Over the years, the matter has been the subject of numerous conferences, and the like, in a search for a better and more effective way to deal with it. For example, in 1964, under the sponsorship of the Association of American Railroads, the matter was aired extensively at a national conference of railroad police and protection officers. At the conference it was brought out that vandalism to the railroads presents a major problem today, and by far, the most common and most serious act of vandalism is stoning or shooting at passing trains. We are presently attempting to combat this problem through meetings held with parent-teacher organizations and other civic officials. You will find under the first attachment excerpts from the report of the 1964 meeting explaining some of the projects directed to this problem. This includes a commentary on the Railroad-Scouting Cooperative Program. The cooperation between the American railroads and the Boy Scouts of America has already produced some tangible results. A Railroading Merit Badge Course is offered to instruct the youngsters in railroading operations including safety. Attachment No. 2 gives evidence of the industry-scouting cooperation existing in Maine.

In the time available since it become apparent that hearings were to be scheduled on S. 552, the Association of American Railroads has been able to obtain from several railroads some rather detailed chronological data setting forth the record of vandalistic acts regularly occurring on such railroads which would be made a criminal offense under Federal law if S. 552 were to be enacted. Attached to my statement is such data furnished by the New Haven Railroad (Attachment No. 3), and the Rock Island Railroad (Attachment No. 4). The Chicago and North Western Railroad has submitted a memorandum which lists the material and labor costs involved in replacing broken windows (Attachment No. 5). Also attached is a summary of such reports covering occurrences on the Santa Fe Railway (Attachment No. 6). Information relating to the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Illinois Central Railroad is not included herein but is being furnished the Committee by the witnesses that will follow me and who are prepared to answer any questions members of the Committee may have with respect to data involving those two railroads. The problem is more serious on some railroads than on others. It can certainly be said, however, that it is national in scope and the same kind of vandalistic acts occur irrespective of the geographic area served. The three railroad witnesses here today represent railroads which serve the Eastern, Southern, and Western sections of the nation.

From the information attached it will be seen that the kinds of acts which most frequently occur are the following:

1. The stoning of trains.
2. The shooting of rifles at trains.

Of paramount importance to this Committee and also to the railroad industry is the unfortunate fact that as a result of the existing vandalism, people are suffering physical injuries. On the Rock Island Railroad alone during the year 1966, the records indicate that at least 25 persons were hurt as a result of vandalistic actions. Often such personal injuries are inflicted upon train crewmen as well as upon train passengers. In some particular areas train crewmen are actually fearful for their safety and apprehensive of performing certain assignments over certain routes, in particular, because of the frequent incidents of stoning and shooting. In this regard it is our understanding that a representative of railroad train crew employes will appear before the Committee in support of S. 552.

It should be emphasized that we are not dealing with a mere nuisance problem. Some occurrences have resulted in serious injury. Anytime anyone fires a bullet at a train it is possible that someone may be killed. Indeed this has happened. In 1959, for example, on the St. Louis–San Francisco Railway an express messenger riding in the caboose of a train near Belton, in Cass County, Missouri, was struck in the forehead by a .22 caliber rifle pellet and was instantly killed. Just about three years prior to that a soldier in the United States Army was struck by a .22 caliber rifle pellet while riding as a passenger on a train near Nichols, Greene County, Missouri.

Citing another instance on my own railroad, on October 30, 1966, numerous windows were broken in a passenger train near Carlsbad, California, and the engineer sustained several lacerations to his left arm and hand.

In another case near Belen, New Mexico, the windows of a Pullman car were broken by a .22 rifle slug.

On February 22, 1967, near Wichita, Kansas, trainmen reported unknown person fired several rifle shots at the engine. The engineer reported by radio that he had been forced to seek refuge on the floor of the engine cab to avoid these shots.

Still another case occurred on July 31, 1966, at Chicago when a bullet entered a window of the left side of RPO car, passed through a bag of mail and out a window on the opposite side of the car.

A shocking example of the threat to human life posed by vandalous acts was portrayed in newspaper accounts of the death of a Pennsylvania woman in 1960. While riding a commuter train on the Reading Railroad this woman was killed by flying glass when a window was shattered by a rock thrown at the train. (Attachment No. 7)

It follows that passengers who have been injured in such accidents will be reluctant to utilize railroad services in the future after having undergone such an experience. Likewise, it follows that passengers on trains who have witnessed such acts may have some hesitancy about their safety which will very likely influence their decision whether in the future to travel by railroad.

While our primary concern relates to the fact that people are being hurt and in some instances killed, we are also concerned that the railroads suffer financial loss as a result of these acts. Our claims filed indicate that such loss in terms of direct expense to the carrier is significant.

The needless waste involved in terms of property damage directly resulting from the stoning of and shooting at passenger trains is illustrated by a simple reference to the number of broken windows which have to be repaired by practically every railroad each year. The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, for example, reported that during the year 1966 it was necessary to replace 3,014 windows which had been broken in this way. The New Haven Railroad reported that in the same year it was necessary for them to replace 1,011 windows for the same reason. The extent of the problem varies from railroad to railroad but it is fair to say that it occurrs to some degree on all railroads. When it is considered that there are around eighty major railroads operating in the United States, and large numbers of smaller ones, the magnitude of the problem (where 4000 windows in one year have had to be replaced on two railroads alone) is readily apparent.

The property damage is not limited to broken windows but is sometimes extensive with respect to an individual stoning or shooting. A very recent example was covered in the Washington Post Newspaper of November 3, 1966. A four Column story with picture, copy attached, shows that as a result of stoning six cars of a train were derailed. According to the article "a crew of 125 men working with three railroad cranes labored through the day to remove the damaged cars, clear and restore the torn tracks, and restore normal service." A reporter on the scene reported the spontaneous comments of a special duty engineer who was aboard the locomotive at the time of the accident: "We're at their mercy. We get stoned every day." I am certain this engineer meant from rocks.

There is a need for enactment of S. 552. The evidence indicates clearly that local law and local enforcement are not adequate to meet the problem. It must be said, however, that State and local police departments are aware of the problem and have made every effort to curb these acts of vandalism. I have submitted examples of some efforts of three such agencies: The Chicago Police Department (Attachment No. 8); The Maryland State Police (Attachment No. 9); and the Baltimore City Police Department (Attachment No. 10).

Many of the offenders are never apprehended. In some cases this is the result of the inability of local police to devote the time and effort necessary to discover the perpetrators. In others, the action may have occurred at isolated places along the railroad rights-of-way where there is little local law enforcement available.

It is easy to say that enactment of Federal legislation will not improve the situation. However, this overlooks the fact that some of the vandalism results in major personal injury or property damage with respect to which all possible means of solution should be directed. At the very least enactment of S. 552 would make it possible to call in the F.B.I. to assist in the apprehension and conviction of offenders whose acts have resulted in major injury or loss. More importantly, it should be borne in mind that making such acts Federal crimes would be a substantial deterrent against the possibility of such acts occurring. It is in this area where the most fruitful possibility for improvement exists since the major goal is the prevention of such acts rather than simply apprehending those who commit them. It has been our experience that simply making it known that certain conduct is a Federal offense tends to deter some such activities. The F.B.I. has been very cooperative in this regard and has provided printed warnings (Attachment No. 11) with respect to other Federal crimes for posting in and around depots and yards. It is believed that such warnings serve as a positive deterrent.

On the Santa Fe we have a printed poster (Attachment No. 12) describing the U. S. Code, Title 15, Chapter 31, which covers the destruction of property moving in commerce. We have distributed these notices at strategic points over the Santa Fe System and have met with a certain degree of success in minimizing the damage to our freight. This statute has been utilized with the assistance of the F.B.I. and some arrests and successful prosecutions in Federal Courts have resulted.

The railroad industry has grappled with this problem for many years and has exerted a considerable amount of energy towards its elimination. Whenever possible we have our Special Agents ride the trains with two-way radio communication between the officer on the train and the one following in the patrol car. We also on occasion have supplied the officer riding the train with a camera so that we may photograph subjects trespassing along the rights-of-way for the purpose of identification and subsequent handling with the police department. A certain amount of success has been attained through this method of control, however, many locations are not readily accessible to the immediate arrival of officers. Often the culprit is obscured by cover of darkness, hidden by shrubbery or suddenly disappears into a house and is difficult to locate and identify.

There is nothing new about the concept of Federal criminal statutes to deal with this kind of criminal action. There is a Federal train wrecking statute, for example (18 U.S.C. 1992); a statute making it a Federal crime to destroy or injure property moving in interstate or foreign commerce (15 U.S.C. 1281); and a statute making it a Federal crime to embezzle or steal interstate or foreign shipments (18 U.S.C. 659). In such statutes Congress has previously recognized the National interest in similar matters and the need for Federal action. While these statutes to some extent overlap local and state law and are not in continuous use for enforcement purposes we firmly believe that their mere existence is important as a deterrent to the commission of criminal actions to which they apply.

My testimony and that of railroad witnesses who will follow me shows that a considerable number of the acts with which we are attempting to deal occur with respect to commuter or other short run passenger trains in metropolitan and urban areas. While the point is arguable it is possible that the present wording of S. 552 might not apply in these circumstances since, technically at least some of these trains might be said to be operating in intrastate service and not in interstate or foreign commerce. To make it eminently clear that the bill covers the entire problem, including commuter and short run train service, it is recommended that S. 552 be amended to apply to any train, engine, motor unit or car used, operated, or employed "on the line of any common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce."

In summary, it is very clear that existing law enforcement is not adequate. The number of violent and vandalistic acts which regularly occur are of a serious nature involving substantial personal injury, heavy property damage, and significant financial loss. Even though making such acts Federal criminal offenses, as S. 552 would do, will not solve the entire problem in our opinion it is essential legislation which will serve as a deterrent against the commission of such acts and will also be useful as an additional tool of law enforcement particularly in cases of more serious proportion.

S. 552 should be amended to make certain that it reaches all aspects of the problem including commuter and metropolitan services. There should be no opposition to this proposal for the reason that the only persons who might object are those to whom its provisions are directed. We respectfully request that the Committee approve and report S. 552, including the two amendments suggested herein, and that it be enacted.

STATEMENT OF D. L. WOOD, CHIEF SPECIAL AGENT, ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD

Mr. WOOD. My name is D. L. Wood. I am chief special agent of the Illinois Central Railroad headquartered in Chicago.

I am past president of the Police Advisory Board of the Association of American Railroads. I have held the position of chief special agent of the Illinois Central Railroad for 20 years. Prior to that I was 7 years with the FBI stationed in Atlanta, Washington, and Chicago.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. I am going to let your statement be printed in the record at this point in full.

(The prepared statement of D. L. Wood follows.)

STATEMENT OF D. L. WOOD, CHIEF SPECIAL AGENT, ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD, IN SUPPORT OF S. 552 ON BEHALF OF ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD AND THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

My name is D. L. Wood and I am Chief Special Agent of the Illinois Central Railroad with headquarters at 135 E. 11th Place, Chicago, Illinois. I am appearing on behalf of the Illinois Central Rairoad and the Association of American Railroads to support S. 552 "to amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

I have a B.A. degree from Macalaster College at St. Paul, Minnesota, LL.D. degree from St. Paul College of Law and am a member of the Bar of the State of Minnesota. I have worked with young people as a public school teacher and as a coach of basketball and football. From 1940 until 1946, I served as Special Agent, Resident Agent, and Supervisor with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In December 1946, I resigned from the FBI to accept a position as Chief Special Agent in the Special Agents Department of the Illinois Central Railroad, a position I still hold. I am past President of the Police Advisory Committee of the Association of American Railroads, the Chicago Railway Special Agents and Police Association, and the Special Agents Association of Chicago. I am a charter member of the American Society for Industrial Security.

At the present time, there is federal legislation making it a criminal offense to steal from an interstate shipment. There is also federal legislation making it a crime to maliciously destroy property involving interstate train movements. Further, it is a federal offense to derail or attempt to derail trains in interstate movement as well as to embezzle funds from an interstate carrier or to falsify records involving interstate movements of trains.

To my knowledge, there is no federal legislation making it a criminal offense to injure a person, either a passenger or crew members, on an interstate train movement.

It would appear to me logical and necessary to have such legislation inasmuch as life is the most valuable commodity in existence.

The problem of shooting or stoning of trains is one which has confronted the railroads for many years. In recent years, this problem has become more acute because of the increase in population and the increase in urban communities developing along railroads. The seriousness of stoning or shooting trains cannot be over-emphasized. The potential dangers of injury are terrific. The possibility of flying glass may be fatal or injurious to the eyesight, which is of most serious consequence.

By way of statistics, on the Illinois Central Railroad in 1966, we had 251 incidents of stonings or shootings at trains. One hundred thirty-eight (138) of these incidents were of sufficient seriousness to cause lawsuits to be filed against the Illinois Central. Any one of these incidents might have been the cause of death or a more serious type injury.

The most serious of these incidents in 1966 occurred in Chicago on June 30. A fifty-year-old woman was riding one of our trains when the train window was struck by a rock. A piece of flying glass entered her right eye and resulted in the complete loss of sight in that eye. Other passengers on the train were injured, but not seriously. This accident has resulted in a lawsuit which is still pending against the railroad in the amount of $200,000.

In July 1964, also in Chicago, a woman was injured as the result of a train stoning. A piece of glass entered her eye, but fortunately the injury was not as serious as the one previously cited.

Approximately ten years ago, a woman was riding one of our trains in Chicago, and the train was shot by two youths. A pellet of the .22 rifle shot by one of the youths entered the woman's neck, and the pellet lodged so close to the spinal cord that the doctors were afraid to operate for fear of total paralysis. The woman still carries the pellet in her neck.

In 1967, for the first four months, we have had a total of 67 stonings or shootings at trains. Ten of these resulted in injuries of such a serious nature that suits have been filed against the railroad. In 1965, we had a total of 290 stonings or shootings, 106 of which resulted in lawsuits against the railroad. Attached to my statement is a record of incidents of stoning and shooting at suburban trains which was compiled during the period of August 1, 1965 to July 31, 1966.

The following is a list of some examples of stonings or shootings which have occurred involving trains of the Illinois Central Railroad in 1966 and 1967. It will be observed from the following examples that some of those responsible for such acts were apprehended and dealt with in one way or another. Unfortunately, not all offenders were caught, however. Even if all of the offenders were now being apprehended, in my opinion enactment of S. 552 would be helpful as a deterrent to the commission of such acts. The Illinois Central Railroad as well as other railroads conduct extensive educational and other campaigns in an attempt to prevent the occurrence of acts of vandalism. The existence of a law making such acts a federal crime could effectively be used in this program and would constitute an impressive additional factor in demonstrating the importance of the matter.

On January 2, 1966, a juvenile shot at our passenger train "The City of New Orleans" near Frenier, Louisiana. He broke a window in the observation car, but there were no personal injuries. He also shot and damaged several signal control wires in the area. The juvenile was identified and later appeared in court, at which time he was placed on indefinite probation.

On February 8, 1966, a college student threw a soft drink bottle at a passenger coach of a Missouri Pacific train operating on Illinois Central lines near Baton Rouge, Louisiana. There were no personal injuries. The student was apprehended and handled on a local basis.

On February 14, 1966, three juveniles threw stones at Illinois Central passenger train "The Panama Limited" at New Orleans. They broke several windows in one of the coaches and due to the coach being equipped with safety glass there were no personal injuries. As a result of our investigation, we were reasonably sure of the identity of the juveniles who caused this damage, but since they denied throwing the stones, we were unable to take any positive action.

On March 6, 1966, an engineer of one of our freight trains reported that juveniles had shot at his train with a 22 rifle and had broken a window in engine #443. This occurred near our freight yard at New Orleans. It was determined that this damage was caused by one of a group of juveniles who were handled in juvenile court and placed on one year's probation by the judge.

On March 18, 1966, at Rosine, Kentucky, an unknown person or persons shot at our freight train, narrowly missing the train engineer.

On June 2, 1966, two juveniles shot at our passenger train #3 near New Orleans, Louisiana. The pellets from the gun struck the side of the engine cab but fortunately no one was injured. The two juveniles unfortunately were not identified and as a result were not apprehended.

On June 7, 1966, a juvenile shot and damaged the windshield of an Illinois Central engine at Reserve, Louisiana. There were no personal injuries. The juvenile was handled on a local basis, and the parents made restitution for the damage.

On November 28, 1966, a juvenile threw a stone at our freight train at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, striking the train engineer. Fortunately, he was not injured. This was handled with the local juvenile officer.

On June 5, 1967, a freight train was shot at near Dubuque, Iowa, resulting in a broken caboose window. One of the pellets from the gun or a piece of glass struck the head of the brakeman, but fortunately he was not injured. In this instance, it was almost miraculous that the brakeman was not seriously injured. Unfortunately, the guilty party or parties were not apprehended.

These are just a few. It will be noted that I have included some incidents where the offenders were caught. Unfortunately not all of them are apprehended. In my opinion, even though some of the offenders are now being caught, enactment of S. 552 would be of significant benefit as a deterrent to the commission of such acts.

The Illinois Central Railroad has attempted to not only patrol its property to prevent injury to its patrons, but has also carried on an educational program for many years attempting to depict the dangers of being on railroad property. These programs have had two thoughts in mind: one, if we educate the juvenile to stay away from our property, the juvenile will not be injured; two, since approximately 90% of all shootings or stonings of trains are performed by juveniles, if we can keep the juveniles away from our property, we stand a good chance of protecting our patrons.

In 1966, various members of the Special Agents Department contacted schools and other youth organizations located near our right of way. This was for the purpose of showing juvenile safety films. During 1966, 417 film showings were made with an attendance of 59,175. During our patrol of the right of way, we removed 2,813 juveniles. It has been the policy of this department that whenever possible the juveniles are taken home and the dangers of their trespassing explained to the parent or guardian. When it is not possible to take the juvenile home, he is warned and released providing he has not done any damage. A letter is then mailed to his parents with a copy sent to the school which he attends. This letter points out the date, time, and location where the juvenile was found on our right of way. It is our intention to pursue this policy to even a greater extent in an effort to reduce the number of depredations against the railroad, especially those which cause heavy damage, injury, and death.

During 1966, as well as in years past, we have sought and have been given public service time on local television and radio stations. We have made slides for showing on TV and have recorded spot announcements for radio programs. In the time allotted in these lines of communication, we have attempted to depict the danger to the juvenile by his trespassing on railroad property. On the Illinois Central Railroad, we have a coined phrase—"The World's Most Dangerous Playground". We use this phrase in an effort to "drive home" the danger to the juvenile by his being on the railroad. We have also had many articles published in local newspapers all along our line. A sample of this which recently appeared in the Delta Democrat Times at Greenville, Mississippi, is attached. In an effort to "bring home" the danger of trespassing on railroads to the juvenile, we have conducted tours of Boy Scouts, other youth organizations, as well as school classes, through railroad facilities as well as having them on board our passenger trains to see how a railroad is operated. We are of the opinion that if we can educate the child to the dangers of trespassing on a railroad, we can do much to minimize depredations also.

In addition to the above, because of the many depredations which occur in the city of Chicago, we have furnished a monthly report to Superintendent O. W. Wilson of the Chicago Police Department and others, indicating the date, time, location, and type of depredation. It is agreed that most of our depredations occur in the highly congested areas. However, we can show to the other extreme that depredations often occur where there are no dwellings near the right of way. We have had obstructions and damage to signals and communication wires where there are no homes for one or two miles.

The Illinois Central Railroad has received wholehearted cooperation from the various law enforcement agencies along our right of way in attempting to combat this serious danger of stoning or shooting at trains. From the above, you can see that the combined efforts of local law enforcement and railroad police have been unsuccessful in controlling this ever-present danger. The passage of Senate Bill S. 552, in my opinion, would be of benefit in controlling this ever-present menace by bringing the federal law enforcement agencies into this situation.

PUBLIC FORUM: THE WORLD'S WORST PLAYGROUNDS FOR KIDS ARE AROUND RAILROADS

(By T. W. Wilkinson)

EDITOR'S NOTE: Today's contributor to the Public Forum is T. W. Wilkinson, of the special agent department of the Illinois Central Railroad. The Public Forum is open to all Delta Democrat-Times readers. Contributions should not exceed three double-spaced typewritten pages, be libelous or a personal attack on an individual.

With the approaching end of another school year, vacation time soon at hand, we would like to convey some thoughts to parents and children in the interest of safety. We all look forward to vacation as a time of fun and relaxation and lets take advantage of our well supervised playgrounds, swimming pools, and baseball fields. Railroad trains fascinate many youngsters, especially boys, although many adults pause to watch trains go by.

Through the assistance of the Boy Scout organization, school and juvenile authorities and Police, we are trying to teach youngsters to think for themselves about safety, but some children still get hurt. There is the boy who must always be doing something, perhaps restless at home, and unless his parents check on his play habits, he, and a couple of pals, may drift to the railroad tracks and become possible accident victims. It could happen this way on unsupervised playgrounds. We would like to mention a few safety rules that could possibly save the loss of an arm, leg or life.

Keep away from railroad cars, no matter how safe they look. It is always dangerous to crawl under or play on railroad cars, if the cars moved, which could happen, you might be hurt. Don't climb on a freight car or hop on a moving train. Climbing on a railroad car doesn't seem dangerous, but you can miss a step or lose your grip on the ladder and have a bad fall. Keep off tracks and bridges, do not try to test your balance by walking the rail, one slip could result in serious injury. One misstep crossing a railroad bridge could cause serious injury if a leg slipped between the ties, and you could be killed if you are trapped on a bridge or trestle.

Never place objects on the rails to see what will happen. Do not be the cause of others being hurt or killed. Some thoughtless children place objects on rails to watch a train mash them. A rock, bolt, spike, or other larger objects placed on rails, could wreck a train or a track Motor car. Never deliberately dare to stand on the track in front of an on-coming train, nor try to beat it to the crossing. It is the show-off who stays on the track until the train is dangerously close. A slip or fall then could be fatal.

When you must cross railroad tracks, use designated public crossing places, look in both directions and only cross when the way is clear. Never throw rocks or shoot at passing trains and track cars, nor break signal and switch lights. Some youngsters show ugly habits when the willfully damage railroad property.

Throwing rocks or shooting a rifle at a train may break windows and cause cuts from broken glass, or even loss of eyesight, to helpless travelers or railroad people on the train. It shouldn't be considered fun to deliberately hurt people on the train. Never be the cause of an accident by unlocking or unlatching a railroad switch. Leave switches alone, any tampering with locks or latches of switches could cause serious trouble. Do not take chances—stay away from freight trains, moving or standing still. Don't play "Hide-and-Seek" in empty freight cars. A railroad man might close the car door and the train could go a long way before you could summon help to get out. You can be seriously injured by a shifting load if the train suddenly started. Remember you are playing your safest when you don't play on the railroad.

Never touch a railroad flare or attempt to light one—nor try to explode a torpedo. They are dangerous playthings. Railroad men use brilliantly burning flares and powerful torpedoes to warn locomotives engineers to stop their trains. A railroad man is taught the right way to use these so he won't burn himself, or have an eye put out.

These are only a few of many rules of safety parents can teach their children, remembering a child learns by observation. So after explaining to them the dangers of trespassing on railroad property, let's set them an example.

May we again state the railroad tracks and property are "The World's Most Dangerous Playgrounds." Stay alive, stay alert, the life you save may be your own. May all have an accident free vacation. Members of the Illinois Central Railroad Special Agent Department are ever alert for juvenile trespassers, standing ready to assist and explain the dangers. We feel, through the cooperation of parents, school authorities and local authorities, many a limb and life can be saved.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I will try to be as brief as I can because I want to leave, too.

Over the years we have had numerous problems with the breaking out of windows on our passenger trains and shooting out of windows on our passenger trains.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They shoot them out while the train is in motion?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. With passengers in them?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Anybody killed?

Mr. HASTINGS. On the American railroads, we have had passengers killed and passengers seriously injured and employees who have sustained injuries and even met death.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It is just promiscuous without any design to kill any given person.

Mr. HASTINGS. That's correct.

At the present there is no Federal law to cover this.

May I state briefly, and point out that there is a Federal law that covers the movement of freight in interstate traffic. The shooting or damage of this freight is a Federal offense, but the shooting of passengers is not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The shooting is not a Federal offense, but it is, of course, a local crime.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is a local crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What would be the advantage in passing this bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. It would be a deterrent, Mr. Chairman, the same as the law that covers theft of interstate shipments. Prior to that time, when that law was passed, the railroads were sustaining approximately $12 million a year from loss from boxcars, and last year it amounted to $745,000.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You think the fact that it is a Federal law will be a deterrent?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I note we have a letter from the Attorney General who states that the Department of Justice does not recommend the enactment of this bill because the nature of the acts to be proscribed can be handled satisfactorily by the States. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, in many instances they can, but throughout the territories that our railroads travel, some of the counties have very few deputy sheriffs or law enforcement officials to handle the cases for us, and I do not think it is adequate enough. I believe through the enactment of this law the deterrent factor alone will help us, rather than what we can get through prosecution.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Under this bill it, would be the responsibility of the FBI and the U.S. marshals to make the investigation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, down through the years, Mr. Chairman, we have always worked with them.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I understand, but this bill would give them the jurisdiction and responsibility.

Mr. HASTINGS. That's correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. There would be dual responsibility, the State and Federal.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The Attorney General further stated that if the bill was given favorable consideration by this committee that a section should be added to provide, and I quote, "A judgment if conviction or acquittal on the merits under the laws of any State shall be a bar to any prosecution under this section for the same act or acts." In other words, what he has in mind, I am sure, is that if State authorities happen to take over the case and get an indictment or presentation and then try it, and the defendant is acquitted, they do not want you running to them and saying, well, try him in the Federal courts, too.

Mr. HASTINGS. We understand this in the railroads, Senator, because we have it with the other crimes that we deal with.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So you expect this provision to be attached to the bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes, I do.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Now, Mr. Wood, do you have any comments?

Mr. WOOD. I would like to back up what Mr. Hastings has said by saying simply this: that we have had excellent cooperation from the local law enforcement people. They do not have the time or the manpower to take care of the situation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They expect the railroads to take care of themselves. I represented railroads at one time, and I have been a prosecuting attorney.

Mr. WOOD. We are concerned with the seriousness of shooting and stoning of trains. At the present time we have a lady in Chicago who was hit by a piece of flying glass from one of our suburban trains. She has lost the sight of one eye and she is suing the railroad for $200,000.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How are they going to establish any negligence for failure to meet your responsibilities if somebody shoots at the train?

Mr. WOOD. This is a difficult question, Senator, and it has to go before a jury.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Being a lawyer, if I had her as a client, I am wondering if I could figure out the premise upon which I would allege negligence.

Mr. WOOD. This becomes a fact for the jury, of course.

Senator MCCLELLAN. At least substantiate it.

Mr. WOOD. What I am trying to point out is the great seriousness of the possibility of real serious eye injuries. A few years ago we had a woman who was on one of our trains, the train was shot at by a couple of boys with a .22 rifle, and the pellet struck her in the neck. The doctors were afraid to operate for fear of total paralysis. This woman today still carries this pellet in her neck. What we are trying to do is to see if we can now do anything to safeguard our patrons.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, you are seeking every deterrent that you can find.

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It does not cost much to pass a law.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I say one thing more, Senator? In connection with the law in connection with damage to freight, on my railroad we have posted this over the entire system and if such a law protecting our passengers was put into effect and made a Federal offense, I would do the same thing over the entire railroad system of 14,000 miles.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You would do what?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would post a sign over the railroads showing this and it would become the deterrent we expect.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You will be authorized then and you will be within your rights to post it?

Mr. HASTINGS. That's correct. In this connection, I took it up with Mr. J. Edgar Hoover and he authorized my going ahead with it, with putting up the posters with regard to freight.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Anything else, gentlemen?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I am confident the committee will give your bill serious attention.

Senator Burdick, who introduced S. 552, the bill you have been discussing, has sent over two newspaper articles describing incidents of vandalism. I will place these in the record at this point.

(The articles follow:)

[The Philadelphia Inquirer, July 10, 1967]

PRR FREIGHT TRAIN DERAILS IN N. PHILA.

The 95-car Pennsylvania railroad freight train bound for Harrisburg was derailed early Sunday morning a few hundred yards east of the Broad St. and Glenwood Ave. overpass in North Philadelphia.

No one was injured, but four tracks were blocked and train traffic was tied up for hours. No cause was given for the accident, which occurred at 3:48 A.M.

The train was out of Camden and bound for the capital city and points west.

Eastbound trains from Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati, O., were detoured on a freight cutoff to Trenton, bypassing Philadelphia.

The tracks were cleared by 7:15 a.m. in time for the Broadway Limited passenger train from Chicago.

The derailment occurred 21 minutes after another Pennsylvania train jumped the tracks in Edison, N.J.

A railroad spokesman said that accident apparently was caused by vandals who placed a six-foot crosstie along the tracks.

Five crewmen of the five-car mail train were slightly injured.

[Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 10, 1967]

TWO PRR TRAINS DERAIL IN EAST

PHILADELPHIA, July 9 (AP)—Two Pennyslvania Railroad trains derailed within 21 minutes of each other early today, ripping up track, tearing down high tension wires, and fouling the line's schedule. No one was seriously injured.

The derailments came just east of the North Philadelphia station, where part of a 95-car freight jumped the tracks, and about 70 miles away in Edison, N.J., where a mail train overturned and spread across four main lines.

George C. Vaughn, general manager for the railroad's eastern region, said the New Jersey derailment was caused by a tie which had been placed across the tracks, an apparent act of vandalism.

The mail train, made up of two locomotives and five cars, was about 28 miles out of New York City on its run from Harrisburg, Pa., when it left the rails at 3:27 a.m.

Edison police said five men from the train's crew, including the conductor, head brakeman and a flagman were taken to Middlesex Hospital for treatment. Their condition was not serious.

Senator McCLELLAN. Our next witness is Mr. Nickerson. We apologize for making you last. We are trying to be as accommodating as we know how.

STATEMENT OF EUGENE H. NICKERSON, COUNTY EXECUTIVE, NASSAU COUNTY; ACCOMPANIED BY FRANCIS B. LOONEY, POLICE COMMISSIONER, NASSAU COUNTY, N.Y.

Mr. NICKERSON. I am county executive of Nassau County, which is a county of about a million and a half in New York on Long Island.

I have with me my police commissioner, Commissioner Francis B. Looney, in case I cannot answer any of the questions you might ask. I won't read my statement but simply have it filed for the record and summarize it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, your statement will be received and printed in the record in full at this point, Mr. Looney, would you identify yourself, please?

(The printed statement referred to follows:)

STATEMENT BY EUGENE H. NICKERSON, COUNTY EXECUTIVE, NASSAU COUNTY, N.Y.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I am Eugene H. Nickerson, the elected County Executive of Nassau County, New York, which is the nation's most populous suburban county, now numbering nearly 1,500,000 citizens.

I appear today in support of S. 917, the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967," to commend this new approach to Federal encouragement of effective local crime control, and to urge that in formulating final legislation, greater attention to be given to the urgent national problem of suburban crime.

The approach of this bill is excellent. The Safe Streets Act will encourage not only closer cooperation between different levels of government in law enforcement, but a broader attack on crime, with policemen, judges, probation officers, doctors, social workers, employers, labor leaders and others working together to prevent crime and to save first offenders from a lifetime of crime.

In response to the report of the National Crime Commission, and in anticipation of passage of the Safe Streets Act, we have begun formation in Nassau of a County Council on Crime Prevention, composed of public officials and private experts who are well-equipped to develop over-all crime control programs in the county.

Should S. 917 be enacted into law, it is this group which should be eligible to receive Federal aid for planning. No blueprint for combatting crime in Nassau County can be effective unless it is a county-wide plan.

I am concerned about allowing planning grants to units of population as small as 50,000 as provided in Title I, Section 102. Fifty thousand may indicate a meaningful comprehensive planning unit in a rural area; it does not in Nassau County.

This section is further weakened, in my judgment, in the House bill, H.R. 5037, which broadens eligibility even further.

If long-range crime control planning were carried out by a multitude of governments within a county, going off in different directions at the same time, the result would be diffusion and confusion.

The County should work with all the local communities to develop a comprehensive and cohesive plan before the communities themselves apply for project grants.

I believe that it would be a tragic waste of the taxpayers' money if the Federal Government should find itself in the position of supporting uncoordinated planning in crime control.

The necessity for County-wide action can be seen in the current New York Times articles on the influence of organized crime in areas of Westchester County. Westchester does not have a County Police Department. Nassau County does—a force of more than 3,000 policemen, the tenth largest in the nation, and second to none in quality.

We take County action in law enforcement, in police-community relations, in health, welfare, inmate rehabilitation, and other related fields.

I stongly urge that Title I ensure that effective comprehensive planning be done in our suburban areas on a county-wide basis.

Nassau County looks forward to participating in this program in partnership with Federal and municipal officials who share our desire to attack the severe problems of suburban crime on all fronts.

The question might well be asked by some—does a suburban County have to worry very much about Crime control? Do the suburbs need this Act? The answer, I believe, is yes. As you well know, the increase in major crimes in the suburbs during the first quarter of this year exceeded that of the cities, according to Mr. Hoover's report. Although Nassau County has done a good job in holding down its crime rate, we are not happy about any increase. We believe Nassau County is in an excellent position to establish, in cooperation with the national government, a model of the type of planning which must be done now to prevent crime in the area of its fastest growth—the suburbs. All too often we look back and lament past trends. Let us look ahead and learn how to combat suburban crime now.

The cost of fighting crime has increased astronomically. It is unfair to ask the small homeowner to pay through his property tax all the costs of our attack on a national problem, a problem that has no respect for county lines or State lines.

With all the modern improvements in crime prevention and detection, the fact remains that you cannot automate a policeman. Our police costs have risen steadily and if our population continues to increase those costs will continue to rise. The policeman must be there on the spot, on the job, risking his life to save the lives he has pledged to guard.

The Nassau County policeman carries out in our county all the functions of the State Police as well, and yet we receive virtually no State aid for our department.

With little financial help from either Washington or Albany, we have moved ahead with a first-rate police training program, a community relations program in every precinct, a modern rehabilitation program in our County Jail, a Juvenile Aid Bureau which we believe has prevented countless crimes and criminal careers, and many other innovations.

These activities are essentially local demonstration programs without benefit of Federal aid, and they are now being emulated by police departments in many parts of the country.

The reason that our programs have not qualified for Federal assistance is that we have already established them on our own. Washington apparently considers any new platform to be ancient history if it has been in effect five minutes before an application for Federal aid is submitted.

But I believe that Nassau County, because of its breakthroughs in new concepts and techniques to fight crime, is exactly the kind of local government which Washington should be most anxious to assist in carrying out programs of significance to the nation at large.

The other major point which I woud make relates to the whole fiscal problem of local government. It is a commonplace that the main plight of local government is that it has had the tremendous burden attendant upon the increase in population in this country thrust upon it, without having the fiscal resources which would enable local government to bear those burdens.

Well over 90% of all the tax revenues of local government consist of the property tax. Yet this is a notoriously unfair tax, and bears very heavily on the retired person, the widow, the person whose income has leveled off or is going down.

Yet Title II of S. 917 would require increasing amounts to be put up every year by the already hard pressed local property taxpayer. Perhaps we could stand this if some form of Federal tax sharing or general purpose grants come in effect. But the present tax structure of local government cannot absorb greatly increased costs without additional aid.

I am hopeful that this assistance will be forthcoming. Thus, I would urge that the legislation make grants available as a matter of Federal responsibility to a national problem, and in recognition of the critical fiscal plight of local government throughout America.

Help us to improve our crime control programs, to make new breakthroughs in research and planning. We are organizing for an all-out, county-wide attack on all aspects of crime in Nassau County. If the Safe Streets Act recognizes county government as the most effective unit to plan the battle against suburban crime, and authorizes sufficient project aid in the future to give the local property taxpayer a fair break, it could be the turning point in bringing about a substantial reduction in crime.

May I call your attenton to certain changes which appear in H.R. 5037. The word "training" has been inserted in Title III, Section 301 to broaden the purposes of grants beyond research and development. I heartily approve that suggestion.

I believe that Title IV of H.R. 5037 is superior to the present version of S. 917 in its consideration of total project cost rather than merely improvement cost.

I am convinced, however, that it would be a shortsighted action for Federal project grants to be tied either to a specific annual increase in the local appropriation, as provided in S. 917, or to the vague wording in H.R. 5037.

Federal aid obviously will not assist local government, nor, indeed, permit local government to survive, if we must continually raise property taxes in order to qualify for Federal aid.

I stand ready, Mr. Chairman, to furnish the Committee with more detailed comment on these and other provisions, should you so desire.

We value your leadership in recognizing the role of the Federal Government in assisting local crime control, and I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you today.

Mr. LOONEY. My name is Francis B. Looney, Commissioner of Police, Nassau County, New York.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. NICKERSON. I appear, Mr. Chairman, in support of S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 and commend it and think the approach of the bill is excellent. I have indicated why in my full testimony.

There are two things that I would like to suggest to you. There are several things in my testimony of a minor nature which you might want to consider as to the specific provisions.

But there are two things I think that I would like to focus on, one is the provision of making planning grants to communities as small as 50,000 which seems to be undesirable because if you are going to have any meaningful planning, certainly in a place like Nassau County with a million and a half people where there are some instances of village and city police—we have only two small cities—you really are going to create a chaotic situation if you have planning grants on that small a basis. We are forming a crime council for the county as a whole and we think that it ought to be the kind of body to get the grants.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It strikes me that the Attorney General would not be compelled to approve a plan from a city of 50,000 people if he knew that a larger group, say your whole county, was going to submit a plan. He would have the discretion to reject the plan for the smaller entity.

Mr. NICKERSON. I understand that, Mr. Chairman. What I am suggesting is that 50,000 seems a very small planning unit which is authorized under the bill to make application to the Attorney General.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That may be true in your State. Let us take my State—there are only about three or four towns with that population in my State. A plan then would have to take in the whole county for the smaller units to be able to benefit. Of course this is a general statute and ought to be applicable to the whole Nation.

Mr. NICKERSON. I understand that. I speak from the standpoint of Nassau County and I would hope that grants would not be made other than on a county-wide basis where you have a meaningful planning unit. Maybe in other areas of the country different situations obtain.

Senator McCLELLAN. There would be enough discretion left for the Attorney General in a situation like yours to make a determination as to the best approach. If you have a million and a half people in a county the whole county might well have a coordinated plan. I think the Attorney General would be justified in requiring a coordinated plan. The purpose of this is to get as much coordination as possible in areas where they can work out a plan and execute it together.

Mr. NICKERSON. I think one of the distinctions between Nassau County and Westchester, which is our neighbor across the Sound, is that we have a county police system and Westchester does not. You have perhaps read in the newspapers of the problems that they have had. Our system has been successful because we have had county police.

Mr. Chairman, the other major point which I would like to make relates to the whole fiscal problem of local government. I guess it is commonplace in the Congress and elsewhere that the main plight of local government has come about because of the tremendous burdens thrust on it due to the increase in population. Basically the services of local government are not services you can automate. You need a policeman and it is difficult to automate him. You can automate clerical work, so the costs of it has gone up. We think that title II of 917 would require increasing amounts to be put up every year by the already hardpressed property taxpayer. More than 90 percent of all of the tax revenues, local tax revenues of local governments come from property taxes which is an extremely unfair and inequitable tax as the economists recognize now and bears heavily on widows, retired people, and the like. We have to sustain these increasing burdens and yet the act would require us to put up more and more and more as we get Federal aid in order to qualify, so-called qualifying expenditures. Maybe we could stand this if the Congress were to pass some kind of tax-sharing legislation so that it affords some relief down to the local level.

I testified before Senator Muskie's committee and he had me draw that inference. We would hope that the Congress could authorize grants to be made available to local governments on this kind of thing as a matter of Federal responsibility to a national problem. You have been discussing all day the whole problem of crime as a national problem. We have it in Nassau County. We are a great big county with all the problems that a metropolitan area has. We would be the sixth largest city in the United States if we were a city.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As I recall, I interrogated the Attorney General about this provision when he testified before us with the idea that it is going to make it difficult for a plan to take in four or five towns or take in a whole county with four or five towns in it. In my State, for example, you may have a county that has 50,000 people in it with four or five towns of 5,000 or 10,000 each in the county. Maybe one could raise their share and others could not. It gets complicated. I would like to find a more direct approach to this problem. I think we may have to say we will give you so much if you will match it. If you match it out of what you have this year or what you had last year it would be sufficient. I do not think you can require them to raise taxes in order to get this benefit. I think that would be a hindrance. It may be an obstruction to the best results that could be achieved.

Mr. NICKERSON. I think local government is in a very serious fiscal situation. Nassau County is thought of as a rich county. It is from the total income. It is the unfairness of the tax structure which we are allowed, namely, the unfairness of the property tax which burdens so heavily. People just cannot stand that burden, particularly those whose income has leveled off or is going down. So that is my other major point.

I make suggested language substitution for some provisions of the bill in the rest of my testimony, which I won't burden you with now.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very good. Do you think this proposal for the Federal Government to step in and share a responsibility in this field by helping finance the training of officers, acquiring equipment, helping pay the salaries of the local police, and other things that are set forth in the bill, is justified and needed under conditions that prevail in this country?

Mr. NICKERSON. Absolutely. I think we have an excellent police department—one of the reasons we have is because we have an excellent commissioner. But also we place great emphasis on training and as I have gone around our State I can see how important training is for police.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Are you apprehensive? Senator Tydings testified here yesterday morning and he expressed some apprehension over the prospect of the Federal Government participating in the payment of salaries of policemen. In other words, the local establishment might get hooked on that money and thus the Federal Government would gain control or domination over the local police force.

Mr. NICKERSON. That wouldn't bother us at all, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If it did get that control?

Mr. NICKERSON. We wouldn't worry about their getting control of it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me give you an illustration. I used to be for Federal aid for education. I do not mind putting this on the record. I believe that in many of our States there was an imbalance of wealth in the country, geographically speaking. Some children in the poorer States did not have an equal opportunity for education. I thought the Federal Government should step in and give some assistance. I wanted to support legislation for Federal aid to education. But there was a specter that if you let the Federal Government contribute, that it then can exercise a control. Many of my friends who were strong for Federal aid to education said, "Oh, the Federal Government would never do that." Now, look what has happened to education. I voted for Federal aid to education after the Civil Rights Act passed. But look what has happened to Federal aid. They can absolutely tell you what you have to do or cut it off. Now they require that you bus children from one side of town to the other to get what they call a balance, a racial balance. Do not tell me the Government cannot do it. It is doing it in other fields. Right in front of our eyes. You say you are not afraid. Maybe they will never undertake it in this field. But if it undertakes it, it can do it.

Mr. NICKERSON. That is certainly true.

Senator McCLELLAN. The administering agency can cut off funds.

Mr. NICKERSON. They can condition that aid on your meeting certain standards. We are not concerned about that. I think when you are talking in terms of training standards and excellence of police, maybe they will eventually say you have to meet certain standards of training. But we are certainly prepared to meet those standards in Nassau County.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am arguing about a power—and I was illustrating a power. You say you are afraid they will require that a certain number of Negroes be put on a police force. Incidentally, I want them on it in towns where they have Negroes. I think they ought to be on the force. I think they ought to be trained and highly trained as well as anyone else. I do not oppose that. I favor it. But I do not want the Attorney General or anyone else in the Federal Governent to get the power to say that you have to import from another town over here some whites to put in this Negro community or vice versa. I do not want to give them that power, and I do not think they should have such power.

Mr. NICKERSON. Doesn't that depend on the Congress? The Congress can put such conditions in the legislation as it chooses to put in.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would like to. But how are you going to spell it out? I am talking about control. When you lodge a responsibility or power in the Federal Government to make plans, approve plans, and so forth, it is a little difficult to define every detail.

Mr. NICKERSON. If the Congress thinks that it is being inappropriately done, it can pass legislation.

Senator McCLELLAN. I may very well be in the minority, as I am so often, but that d es not change my mind because the majority happens to disagree with me. I am talking about the things that I believe in. These are the things I want to prevent. Senator Tydings expressed the apprehension, not in the specific terms that I have used here to demonstrate a case, but he expressed the apprehension in testifying here yesterday that if the Federal Government participated in paying salaries for personnel—that it might seek a domination or control over the administration of law enforcement locally. I share his apprehension. But I just used my illustration at the moment here for discussion on the record to point out what can and has happened when the Federal Government contributes to local programs. I want the record to reflect what I think.

Mr. NICKERSON. Again, as you have been saying earlier in the day, it is a question of weighing the various interests, one against the other, and obviously the local governments would like to be free to enforce the laws they see fit. The local governments are in a desperate fiscal plight by and large.

Senator McCLELLAN. We do not want a national police state, none of us. No one foresees one. But these things come about step by step—a little more, a little more, and finally, the scales are tipped and the balance goes the other way. I do not know if it will ever happen. But in weighing these provisions, you must take these potentialities and these possibilities into account.

Mr. NICKERSON. If you are talking about serious aid to law enforcement, really serious aid, you are talking about aid for salaries, because this is the major portion of every budget.

Senator McCLELLAN. I do not say I am opposing it. I am only engaging in a discussion. Perhaps others are more liberal than I am. The point that I am making is, when power is reposed in any authority there is a measure of control associated with it, and you cannot deny it. We should exercise a great measure of caution to try and guard against any possible abuse of that power. I do not mean any particular person. I am talking about legislating for the conditions of today and what could happen in the future.

Well, gentlemen, I appreciate very much your presence.

Mr. McCulloch, Mr. Sloan, and Mr. Meeker, come around, please.

Will each of you identify yourselves for the record?

Mr. SLOAN. I am E. C. Sloan. I am district claim agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

Mr. MEEKER. I am W. F. Meeker. I am inspector of police of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. at Philadelphia.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am Edward L. McCulloch. I am national legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Senator McCLELLAN. You want to testify regarding S. 552? Do you have prepared statements? We will receive your prepared statements and place them in the record at this point.

(The prepared statements of E. C. Sloan, W. F. Meeker, and Edward L. McCulloch, follow:)

STATEMENT OF EDWARD L. McCULLOCH, BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS, IN SUPPORT OF S. 552

My name is Edward L. McCulloch. I am National Legislative Representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 400 First St. N.W., Washington, D.C. My appearance here is in support of S. 552 "to amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers includes in its membership 37,000 railroad employees who operate the nation's railroads. Engineers are stationed at the farmost position (in the power unit) at the head end of freight, passenger and commuter trains, usually behind large glass windshields and are greatly concerned about the frequency and seriousness of acts of vandalism, particularly the throwing of stone at trains and shooting at trains, with which they are regularly confronted.

It is my understanding that previous witnesses have submitted to the committee a number of examples and illustrations indicating the magnitude of the problem. I shall not attempt to catalogue any additional information of this kind nor repeat theirs, but shall simply confirm that such acts are serious and that they occur regularly and all too frequently.

Locomotive engineers are often the prime target of those who shoot or throw at trains. The records will show that engineers have been hit and injured, sometimes seriously, by stones, bottles, buckshot, .22 caliber rifle pellets and BB's. Other operating employees who also ride the train engines or cabooses have, likewise, been subjected to such dangers. Our men, of course, carry out their assignments as directed but they are becoming increasingly more apprehensive about certain runs which traverse areas where such vandalism is commonplace.

While I am speaking primarily as a representative of the employees whose safety is endangered it should be stated also that we are concerned about the safety of rail passengers who are also subject to the hazards of the rock throwers and train shooters. We must take every precaution and adopt every reasonable means at our disposal to combat this problem.

Congress has enacted a statute which makes it a federal criminal offense to destroy or injure property moving in interstate or foreign commerce (15 U.S.C. section 1281). But it is not now a criminal offense under federal law to injure or kill a railroad passenger or employee by throwing stones or shooting at trains.

We believe that the public interest and the national interest with respect to the safety of passengers and employees far exceeds that for the safe transportation of property. We, therefore, strongly urge that S. 552 be approved and enacted into law, thus filling this void. Even though, as we recognize, the provisions of S. 552 do not represent a cure-all, we are convinced that enactment of such legislation will materially assist the railroads in combatting the problem that has been described by the various witnesses before this committee. It will, in our opinion, have significant value as a deterrent to acts of vandalism. Once it becomes known that certain conduct constitutes a federal offense there is a tendency to be somewhat more respectful of the law. S. 552 will also make it possible to call on the Federal Bureau of Investigation in such matters and this could be of considerable benefit where criminal acts of particular seriousness have been perpetrated.

It is understood that there may be some question whether the provisions of S. 552, if enacted, would apply with respect to some commuter or urban train service. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if such an important segment of the problem were to be left out of the bill's coverage. This is where many of the criminal acts occur. We agree that any such uncertainty should be eliminated and accordingly adopt and approve the amendment to S. 552 suggested in this regard by Mr. J. L. Hastings in behalf of the Association of American Railroads. Such amendment would change lines 2 through 5 on page 2 of S. 552 to read as follows:

". . . engine, motor unit, or car used, operated, or employed on the line of any common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce [by any railroad] shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both." [Added language italicized, deleted language in black brackets.]

In summary, a serious problem exists which is resulting in injury and danger to railroad employees and passengers. The protection of lives justifies federal legislation to greater extent than the protection of property and the existing void as to passengers and employees should be corrected by enactment of S. 552.

STATEMENT OF W. F. MEEKER, INSPECTOR OF POLICE, THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, IN SUPPORT OF S. 552 ON BEHALF OF THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

My name is W. F. Meeker, and I am Inspector of Police in the system offices of The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 30th Street Station, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. I appear on behalf of the Association of American Railroads in support of S. 552 "to amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

At present my duties are primarily administrative in connection with the Police Department of The Pennsylvania Railroad Company. After nearly five years in the U.S. Army during World War II, I entered the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad January 14, 1946, as a patrolman in the Police Department in Chicago. I have served in the capacities of Sergeant, Lieutenant and Captain of Railroad Police. I was appointed Inspector on December 1, 1960. I am familiar with the general problems of policing railroad property and with the problems involving vandalism of various types, both from the point of view of personal investigation and handling of these matters and from the point of view of the overall problem presented on the Pennsylvania Railroad system.

From joint endeavors with other railroad police and my activities and association relationships it is my opinion that the problems of the Pennsylvania Railroad are reasonably illustrative of problems that are faced by other railroad security officers. We do have some special problems in that we render an unusual proportion of passenger service, both long haul and commuter compared to some of the other large railroads. However, we do operate in a fairly large geographic territory, serving the northeast corridor, some of the country's largest cities, and a vast number of small towns, and operating both in densely populated areas and in relatively rural country. I can say that vandalism and such acts as throwing stones or shooting at trains is a matter of concern on our entire system.

On our railroad we have found that despite our best efforts we are making little or no headway in eliminating or even reducing the many dangerous acts of vandalism and recklessness. While there has been an increase in the number of persons apprehended for stoning trains, the number of trains stoned, the number of windows broken and the number of persons injured has also increased as outlined below.

	1964	1965	1966	Average per month for 3 years	4 months 1967	Average per month, 1967
Trains struck by stones or other missiles	1,399	1,278	1,542	117.6	674	168.5
Windows broken by stones or other missiles	1,168	1,200	1,526	108.2	613	153.2
Persons injured by such acts	180	123	223	14.6	63	15.7
Persons apprehended for committing such acts	699	641	740	57.8	311	77.8

The constant attention of the railroad police in connection with these acts is indicated by the relatively high proportion of apprehensions shown in the above table.

In addition to the persons apprehended for actual stoning of trains as outlined above, during the period 1966 through the first four months of 1967, over 97,000 trespassers were ejected from railroad property by our patrolmen, and a total of 5,163 persons were actually arrested for trespassing. Unfortunately, many of the stonings of trains are carried out by persons who, themselves, physically do not trespass on the railroad property.

Our activities are not concerned solely with enforcement and direct police investigation. The Pennsylvania Railroad has produced a safety film entitled "Tracks, Trains, and Safety Facts." This film is used as a part of the educational activity conducted by my department. Our officers go to schools in uniform, make a talk, and show the film. The film has the approval of national associations concerned with education. The film has been shown in more than 7,000 schools and has been viewed by over 1,685,000 students. In addition, it has been shown to 660 adult groups and to an actual attendance of about 117,000 adults. In relation to the value of the proposed legislation as a deterrent, we feel that the enactment of the legislation would serve a useful function in our educational program, because the seriousness of the vandalism of the kind being considered would then be emphasized as a federal offense.

Although the injuries caused by these dangerous acts are often of a minor nature, the possibility of serious injury or death and extensive property damage exists. For example, at 9:15 P.M., August 22, 1966, P.R.R. Engine 5970 was stoned by a group of juveniles as it passed through Maryland. Engineman Henry Yedinak was struck by a rock and sustained a compound fracture of the right frontal sinus. On May 13, 1967, Mr. Yedinak returned to duty with our company as a fireman—due to the injury he could not qualify as an engineman. Three boys, two age 14 and one age 15, were apprehended. One was sentenced to the Maryland Training School for Boys for in indeterminate period, the other two were sent to Boys Village for an indeterminate period.

On November 2, 1966, the engine of P.R.R. Freight Train BP–2 was pelted with stones. A number of stones entered the cab of the engine and the engineman in ducking away from barrage accidentally released the dead-man control causing an emergency brake application. As a result, six cars in the train were derailed. Twelve juveniles who were apprehended appeared in Juvenile Court on January 9, 1967, were found to be delinquent and were placed on probation.

Our files contain many such examples of reckless acts, including the case of a passenger on our "Congressional Limited" who was shot in the head and seriously injured on January 29, 1960. The results of this action will be described by Mr. Sloan.

Our railroad is also plagued with track obstructions and tampering with switches, signals and other safety devices which create an extremely dangerous situation and jeopardize the safety of persons on board trains. During the year 1966 an average of 47.0 track obstructions were reported per month. During the period January 1, 1967, to April 30, 1967, an average of 62.7 such obstructions per month have been reported. In 1966, instances of switches or signals having been tampered with averaged 33.8 per month, while the average for the first four months of 1967 stands at 38.0.

Fortunately, only a small percentage of these acts cause any serious damage. Many of them, however, are not covered by the existing train wreck statute (18 U.S.C., Section 1992) because they do not involve the criminal intent necessary to constitute a violation of 18 U.S.C., Section 1992. We believe that the provisions of S. 552 would be effective in this regard since they would make such acts a federal criminal offense if committed with reckless disregard for the safety of persons on trains.

Following are three cases which illustrate the serious consequences of placing obstructions on the tracks or tampering with switches.

At 12:10 A.M., May 9, 1962, a P.R.R. freight train in Pennsylvania ran in on a siding and struck a draft of 48 cars. It was found that the switch was lined and latched for the siding. The switch lock could not be found. The fireman was killed instantly and the engineman seriously injured. Investigation resulted in the apprehension of two boys, ages 11 and 14, who were tried, but the Court of Quarter Sessions ruled that the boys did not realize the gravity of their acts and the petition was dismissed.

About 7:55 P.M., December 4, 1960, in Indiana, P.R.R. freight train GR–19 derailed four engine units and ten cars due to a switch for a siding having been lined against main track movement. Two youths, ages 17 and 19, responsible for reversing the switch were apprehended and convicted in U.S. District Court, on charges of violation of Section 1992, Title 18, U.S. Code.

At 11:00 P.M., September 9, 1966, in Pennsylvania, P.R.R. freight train LA–1, operating on No. 4 track, and ore extra, operating on the parallel track, No. 3, were wrecked as a result of a large metal tank having been placed on No. 4 track. A 19-year-old youth was arrested and is presently awaiting trial on a charge of violation of Section 1992, Title 18, U.S. Code.

From the last two examples, it is apparent that the Federal law penalizing the wrecking of trains (18 U.S.C. 1992) is actively enforced by the prosecution of persons responsible for the wrecking of trains. We feel this is a valuable deterrent. Prosecution cannot be had under Section 1992 for certain other dangerous acts such as the throwing or shooting of missiles at trains. We realize that enactment of S. 552 will not solve all of these problems, but we do believe that it would serve as a strong deterrent and coupled with the provisions of Section 1992 would greatly assist the railroads in protecting persons on board trains from such reckless and dangerous acts.

We respectfully request that the Committee approve and report S. 552 and that it be enacted.

STATEMENT OF E. C. SLOAN, DISTRICT CLAIM AGENT, THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, IN SUPPORT OF S. 552 ON BEHALF OF ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS

My name is E. C. Sloan and I am District Claim Agent of The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 30th Street Station, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. I appear here on behalf of the Association of American Railroads in support of S. 552 "to amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

While my specific duties involve the supervision of The Pennsylvania Railroad Company's Claim Department in Philadelphia and in a considerable area of Pennsylvania Railroad territory south, west and north of Philadelphia, I have served in other districts on the Pennsylvania Railroad, having this month completed 27 years service on the Pennsylvania Railroad.

I am familiar with the general claims problems of the Pennsylvania Railroad and have access to the central files of the Claim Department and other departments relating to claim work.

My testimony is intended to illustrate by specific experience of the Pennsylvania Railroad the problems that the railroads have in dealing with vandalism committed against railroad equipment and especially vandalism endangering railroad passengers and railrod personnel.

Our primary concern, both the Railroad's in general and the Claim Department's in particular, of course, is for the safety of our passengers and personnel. The specific work of the Claim Department, as distinguished from the Police Department, involves people who have suffered injury as a result of vandalism, and our data concern primarily the injuries and cost and suffering that result from vandalism. The primary importance of the proposed legislation to the Pennsylvania Railroad of preventing injuries by deterring or preventing vandalism should not prevent consideration of other factors in which the railroads have also a direct interest in the passage of the proposed Bill. Among such direct interests are extra burdens of cost imposed by vandalism, primarily in passenger service, in our Operating, Police, and Claims Departments—in passenger service which in general is operated at a deficit already.

The operating costs involved in replacing broken windows are very considerable. Not only is the cost of replacing the glass as such surprisingly high, but the burden to the Railroad is even more important in the necessity to shop cars for replacement of mindows. Especially in commuter service, the problem of equipment utilization is severe. Such commuter equipment is productive only during the rush hours on week days—in other words, only about 4 hours a day, 5 days a week—and the necessity to shop these cars for the replacement of windows adds to an already severe burden of operating costs. In addition, of course, there is the large amount of time and cost involved in the necessity for the Police Department to devote itself to minimizing and investigating these totally useless and dangerous acts such as stonings and shooting at trains.

In the claims work of my own department, we are faced not only with the cost of the actual settlement of claims in payments to injured persons but to the cost of Claim Department personnel in investigating and negotiating the cases, medical services in connection with medical examinations and care (especially of injured employees), and the cost of legal services in litigated claims. For example, 2 of our lawyers in Philadelphia alone in the last 4 or 5 years have handled 11 suits resulting from stonings of trains, 3 of which are still pending. Among these, the settled suits have been disposed of by payments to the claimants of figures ranging from minimal nuisance value to as high as $4,500. The case settled for $4,500 involved a claim by a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra who was travelling on a special orchestra train which was stoned. He suffered, from flying glass, cuts of his eye lids and eye balls. It is easy to imagine the extent of social loss and personal suffering that might have resulted from this senseless stoning. Fortunately, the musician in this case had a relatively good recovery.

One of our more serious recent cases in Philadelphia (not included among those mentioned above) was finally disposed of last year, in March 1966. A 28-year-old salesman from Baltimore, married and with a 1½-year-old son, was shot on a passenger train passing through Pennsylvania. Two boys were apprehended who admitted shooting the train with a stolen rifle. The bullet, after passing through a safety glass window, entered the salesman's head in the area of his left temple, flattened against his skull, and caused an oblique fracture of the posterior left parietal calvarium with a depression of a small bone fragment at the point of impact. The salesman was taken to the St. Francis Hospital at Trenton, New Jersey, from the train on January 30, 1960, and was discharged from the hospital on February 8. He suffered serious concussion, but also brain injury as shown by later electroencephalograms and interference with his faculty of speech. He was examined by a neuropsychiatrist on behalf of the Railroad as late as December 22, 1965, at which time it was found that as a result of the contusion of his brain he still had and will continue to have a partial sensory aphasia (a speech difficulty) which becomes acute especially when he is fatigued or under extreme pressure, and also sharp shooting pains from the region of the injury into his forehead accompanied by numbness on the left side of his face resulting from neuralgia caused by the injury. Our neuropsychiatrist concluded that he would continue to have these pains and difficulty with certain words, especially long ones, and certain types of phrases that bother him repeatedly.

The injuries sustained by passengers are not limited to the cuts, glass damage to eyes, or the impact of missiles or bullets directly upon their bodies. Our psychiatric experts in personal injury cases recognize that emotional disturbances and even permanent neuroses tend more specifically to follow injuries sustained by people who are caught totally unawares by the accident. In other words, a person who is entirely relaxed and unsuspecting of the onset of an injury is more susceptible to emotional and nervous damage. This, the psychiatric experts testify in our cases, is so even though the usual injuries as in automobile collisions occur with some rapidity. Even within the flash of time before the impact in such collision cases, the psychiatrists say, the person is able to set himself emotionally for the oncoming impact and the result is much less disastrous from the point of view of nervous damage. This is no small matter in personal injury cases, as the problem of emotional damage is coming more and more to the fore in claims work. For example, among the three still unsettled cases in Philadelphia in the group mentioned above, there are two that involve claims of damages for post-traumatic anxiety. In one of these, the individual was actually struck by the missile, and serious injuries are claimed, including not only post-concussion syndrome (which is thought to be primarily the result of the physical impact) but traumatic neurosis.

When railroad employees are hurt by stones or wounded by guns their claims are covered by the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 U.S.C. 51–60). The Congressional mandate of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, extends the benefits of the FELA to all of our employees. I do not remember a case in recent years in which we could interpose the defense of the non-applicability of the FELA on the basis of an effort to demonstrate that the employee was not engaged in interstate commerce—a defense so far as the Act was concerned which was available in earlier years. Even office employees are now considered to be covered by the Act solely on the basis that they occasionally handle papers that involve interstate shipments. Some of our commuter trains move only intrastate; the crews of these trains are covered by the FELA, however, because these trains are used by passengers who reach the main stations and travel on the interstate trains. Thus, Congress has already demonstrated its interest and constitutional power to regulate important aspects of railroad operations that are not directly involved in interstate movement. We understand that Mr. Hastings has proposed an amendment to S. 552 to make certain that it applies to all our operations, and we believe this is a worthy suggestion.

The hazards of vandalism to the personal safety of our employees and the losses from vandalism incurred by the railroad are not necessarily limited to the direct injury occasioned by the missile. Our witness, Mr. J. L. Hastings, has, for example, described a recent episode in which a stoning caused a Pennsylvania Railroad engineman to remove his foot from the dead-man control so that the emergency application of the brakes resulted in a derailment. This event illustrates the fact that employees whose duties are concerned with the movement of trains and the safety of our passengers and freight may be so interfered with in their duties that serious consequences could result. In that particular case, the primary loss to the Railroad was the operating problems arising from the derailment and the loss and damage claims to the freight involved.

In the last full year for which statistics are available (1966), 89 persons filed claims against the Pennsylvania Railroad for personal injuries sustained as a result of fire arms discharged or missiles thrown at our trains. Settlements have been paid on 74 of these claims, and 15 claims are outstanding. This is about 1 injury of this kind every 4 days. It must be borne in mind that these are persons sufficiently injured to file claims, and the total does not include all persons who were hurt by acts of this kind. From the public point of view and the point of view of these injured people, it should be considered that in almost every case of injury the head and eyes are involved in this type of accident. This, of course, means that nearly every injury could result in loss of vision or death.

Train speeds are increasing, and so is our concern with respect to tampering with and throwing things at trains. The faster the train the more tempting the target to the puerile interests of the juveniles who are mostly responsible for stonings and shootings. Also on fast trains the impact of missiles is increased as a result of the increased train speed.

For all of these reasons, the passage of S. 552 is urged. The very difficulty of controlling vandalism suggests the necessity to bring every possible pressure to bear, both to apprehend individuals who have committed such acts and to deter, to the extent possible, the commission of vandalism against trains. It must be admitted that the most strenuous effort on the part of police a all levels, railroad, local, state, and federal, will not in all probability serve to eradicate the unpredictable and senseless behavior of some of our citizens and juveniles. However, just because this is so, we believe that the best interests of the public and of the carriers requires that every effort be brought to bear on this increasingly serious problem.

Mr. SLOAN. Sir, my testimony pertains mainly to the severity of the injuries sustained by our passengers and employees and the costs to the railroad company as far as settlement of claims, cost of investigation, cost of litigation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you, do they get judgments against you on the part of the passengers?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, they do. To give an example, two of our lawyers in Philadelphia alone in the past 4 or 5 years have handled 11 suits resulting from stoning of trains. Settlements and judgments range from minimum nuisance value to as high as $4,500. The $4,500 involved a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra who sustained eye injuries. We recently had a passenger, 28 years of age, married, with a son who was riding a train passing through Pennsylvania and the train was shot at by two youngsters who later admitted that they had done it—the bullet was fired from a stolen rifle—and he sustained a severe fracture of the skull, brain injury which resulted in a permanent impairment to his speech.

Senator McCLELLAN. What did that cost you?

Mr. SLOAN. In that particular case, plaintiff and counsel envisioned a rather substantial verdict and we were forced to trial and the result was in favor of the railroad company.

Senator McCLELLAN. You did have a trial?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. What happens to the culprits, the perpetrators of these acts? Are any of them ever prosecuted?

Mr. SLOAN. That is more in the field of Mr. Meeker, who can cover that.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Meeker, will you tell us?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes, sir. For example, I have some figures here on apprehension of persons responsible for stoning of trains.

As an example, during the period 1964 through 1966 our police apprehended an average of 57.8 such persons per month. During the first 4 months of 1967 such apprehensions averaged 77.8.

Senator McCLELLAN. Why do you need a Federal law if you are apprehending them?

Mr. MEEKER. It is our thought, Mr. Chairman, that due to the past record, that despite our best efforts, our railroad security forces with the assistance of the State and local authorities are actually losing the battle to control this.

Senator McCLELLAN. If you apprehend them, what happens with respect to punishment? Are they punished?

Mr. MEEKER. They are taken to the various juvenile courts and hearings are set up across the country. But I would say that almost without exception the penalty is probation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are most of them juveniles?

Mr. MEEKER. In excess of 90 percent would be juveniles.

Senator McCLELLAN. What age range?

Mr. MEEKER. They would range at—we have had them as young as 4 and 5 years old, all the way up to 18.

Senator McCLELLAN. What good would Federal statutes do to deal with cases like that?

Mr. MEEKER. My only thought on that is, it is my feeling that fortunately I think the public today still has considerably more respect for Federal laws than they do our local ordinances or State laws.

Senator McCLELLAN. One time they had a great deal more because apprehension was quick and swift disposition of the case was made. It was far more probable than in State and local jurisdictions. But I am not sure but what the prestige of the Federal Government in that area is losing ground.

Mr. MEEKER. I would have to agree, and I think it is very unfortunate.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think so, too.

Mr. MEEKER. The only thing I can add to that, hopefully, is that Federal law might serve as a deterrent by causing parents to maintain a little closer watch over the activities of their children.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am not sure it will.

Mr. MEEKER. Not only in this field but all others.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. McCulloch, do you want to make any comment?

Mr. McCULLOCH. While I speak primarily as a representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers who are employed on the railroads and who are oftentimes victims of the rock throwing——

Senator McCLELLAN. Many times it is the employee who gets hurt as well as the passenger.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Our employees run the front end of the trains and usually behind windshields that can be broken. We are mainly here in support of this bill and we would ask that it be made a Federal act. Anything the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers can do to further protect our employees and to protect also the passenger public who ride these trains, naturally we will support. That is my purpose in being here and I would encourage this committee to recommend this bill and endeavor to get it passed. This is a serious problem on the railroads and it is becoming more serious, and we feel that Federal legislation would definitely help.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are these cases of vandalism increasing?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Any faster than the general crime rate?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I don't know, but certainly equal to it. There are many places, Senator, on the railroads where locomotive engineers are very reluctant, especially in urban areas and on commuter trains—they are actually reluctant to go out on the job because these incidents happen two or three times in the process of a day, and it is becoming increasingly alarming. Therefore we are here in support of it.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is what we are trying to do here, to find some way to counteract, to combat, the debilitating effect of some court decisions on crime. I make that statement on my own judgment, on my own feeling about it, and also to weigh the whole general situation. There are many other factors than court decisions—many other sources of cause—and we have a serious condition in this country. This cannot go on.

Mr. McCULLOCH. We couldn't more agree.

Senator McCLELLAN. We have to clamp down. I want to legislate within the Constitution if we can, and we will proceed in that way. But ultimately there has to be, in my judgment sound interpretation of the Constitution as to what was intended and what was meant when the words were written, otherwise the court is just going to find loopholes and declare everything unconstitutional, and thus invite catastrophe in this society. Something has to be done. We are going to try.

Any further comment, gentlemen?

Mr. SLOAN. I would only point out, Senator, in nearly all of this type of accidents the injuries involved are to the head and to the eyes, and this could mean in every one of them loss of vision or death.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. I am one of your boys from Arkansas and I voted for you many times.

Senator MCCLELLAN. A lot of us good people are from Arkansas. Where is your home?

Mr. MCCULLOCH. North Little Rock.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Without objection, a communication from Robert W. Crown, chairman of the Assembly Committee on Ways and Means of the California Legislature, dated July 7, 1967, and its enclosure, a prepared statement of Assemblyman Robert W. Crown and Assemblyman John T. Knox, chairman, Assembly Committee on Municipal and County Government, California Legislature, on S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, will be inserted in the record at this point and will be printed.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: Assemblyman Knox and I are extremely grateful for your kind invitation to appear before your subcommittee and present testimony on your S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967.

Regretfully, important legislative duties in Sacramento prevent our coming to Washington to present testimony in person; however, we respectfully request that the enclosed statement be entered in your official record of the testimony on S. 917 and be printed with any report or transcript that is issued by your subcommittee.

Your kindness in this matter is greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

PREPARED REMARKS OF ASSEMBLYMAN ROBERT W. CROWN, CHAIRMAN, ASSEMBLY WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE, AND JOHN T. KNOX, CHAIRMAN, ASSEMBLY COMMITTEE ON MUNICIPAL AND COUNTY GOVERNMENT, CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE, ON S. 917 (MCCLELLAN), THE SAFE STREETS AND CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1967

INTRODUCTION

Chairman McClellan, Members of the Subcommittee. We deeply appreciate the Subcommittee's invitation to appear and present testimony on S. 917. We regret that important legislative duties in California prevent our personal appearance. We respectfully request that the following statement be entered in your official record of testimony.

S. 917 A VITAL BILL

S. 917 is a vital bill and is of great importance for a number of reasons and we commend Senator McClellan and the Senate co-authors on their foresight in sponsoring this legislation. First, crime has become a major problem in California as it has throughout our country. For many years, we have relied on the Uniform Crime Reports, published by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, as an index of our crime problem. However, recent reports by the Federal Crime Commission, under the direction of Ottorney General Katzenbach, indicate that the number of crimes across our nation may be twice as high as indicated by the Uniform Crime Reports.

In the Commission's survey (as recently published in the magazine Trans-Action) the Commission discovered that as high as 20% of the households in the country may have been criminally victimized. Forcible rape, a particular vicious crime, is believed to be four times as high as originally reported.

Unfortunately from the standpont of crime, we must admit that we come from a part of our nation referred to as the "Wild West." Indications are that this area has a higher crime rate than any other in the nation. In California in the last year, crimes of violence have increased 13%. Crimes against property have increased a staggering 30%. The need to do something more than enact stiffer penalties and longer jail terms has never been more apparent. Your S. 917 recognizes that need.

PUBLIC CONFIDENCE

S. 917 is important, secondly, because of the problem that the police face as a public institution in our society. Recent public opinion polls indicate that, next to concern for our war in Viet Nam, the public is most concerned about safety in their streets. Yet much of the public lacks faith in their law enforcement officials. Fifty-five percent of those persons interviewed by the staff of the Federal Crime Commission felt that the police are ineffective.

Thirdly, law enforcement is being called upon increasingly to combat sophisticated and complex criminal and social problems. Even though I have great respect for our law enforcement officials, I am nevertheless forced to believe that many do not have the ability, the knowledge, or the technical skills to cope with these increasingly complex problems.

TECHNOLOGY AND CRIME

The problems are mulitple. We are liivng today in an age of technological sophistication, and crime and the criminal are not expected from this condition. For the most part, the ability of our law enforcement agencies to deal with organized crime is completely inadequate. Furthermore, the advances in science and technology, as reflected by our aerospace industry, have not been lost upon our criminal population. The police are simply not able as yet to cope with this condition.

As you are undoubtedly aware, California has one of the best developed systems of crime reporting in the nation. At the same time, according to the Bureau of Criminal Statistics of our Attorney General's office, the abiltiy of the police to solve the increasing number of crimes has dropped astonishingly. Crimes solved by the police—referred to as clearance rates—are as follows, when you compare the rates for 1964–65 with the rates for 1960–61:

Crime	Rate of clearance (percent down)
Homicide	7
Robbery	28.3
Aggravated assault	10.6
Forcible rape	14.8
Burglary	31.4
Grand theft	27.3
Auto theft	22.1

In addition, there is an ever increasing problem of adequate police personnel and its training. The police are encountering increasing difficulty in maintaining their authorized strength. This is due principally to an inability to attract qualified applicants. It is our understanding that in Los Angeles, only 2.8% of the applicants to the Los Angeles Police Department were found acceptable.

ADEQUATE PAY

A basic problem in police officer recruitment is the problem of salaries, an issue we have been attempting to meet in California. While for the most part law enforcement agencies in California have reasonably good starting salaries, few allow salary increments commensurate with the police officer's growth in experience and years of service.

It appears that only a few police agencies have been able to increase the maximum salary to the point where qualified and intelligent officers are able to remain on the force without penalizing their families. The police cannot be expected to recruit competent personnel until communities are willing to pay the price for improved police performance. Until salaries are increased to competitive levels, law enforcement services will fight a losing battle in their efforts to upgrade the quality of their personnel.

In many instances, the police task is complicated by a hostile and antagonistic public. Of 90 possible occupations, public preference for law enforcement work ranked 54th. A positive public image is vital if law enforcement is to be successful.

COURT RULINGS

Recent Supreme Court rulings dramatize the need for peace officers of exceptional skill and training.

I must point out that considerable conflict exists between the police and our court system over the use of probation. It is possible that this problem represents a lack of understanding on the part of both the courts and law enforcement. The police must recognize not only the reformative disadvantage as well as prohibitive expenses of extensive use of incarceration. At the same time, the courts must take note of the law enforcement attitude that they expend a great deal of effort and at times are involved in considerable personal danger, only to have the offender returned to the community where additional offenses may be committed. It is my belief that S. 917 will provide ways in which this problem of communication, as well as the others that we have mentioned, may be brought to solution.

NEW WEAPONS FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT

To cope with these problems, law enforcement needs new weapons. Innovation must become a key word in our efforts to deter and control crime. By innovation, I mean such programs as the Community Service Officer concept, as proposed in the Federal Crime Commission Report. If the police are to be effective, they must have a positive relationship with the public. The use of individuals who are familiar with an area and its subcultures should be a great assist in establishing better police-community relations. At the same time—with adequate financial support—such persons could receive the education necessary to become competent law enforcement officials.

We might also allude to that innovation program referred to as the work furlough. This program of returning selected offenders to the community so that they might maintain their employment and at the same time be contributing members of the community, is an exciting program.

BRAINS FIGHT CRIME

Richard A. McGee, Administrator for California's Youth and Adult Corrections Agency, recently placed the problem of innovation and experimentation in proper perspective when he said, "We need to fight crime with our brains, not our emotions." S. 917 presents the embodiment of this statement. Modernization of law enforcement is essential; we must experiment, research, and study, to find solutions to our problems. If law enforcement is to grow and meet its many challenges, it needs bills like S. 917, which stimulate and encourage law enforcement. I am aware that we must develop and use the techniques of scientific analysis in expanding our knowledge of crime prevention and deterrence. Someone has recently said, somewhat facetiously, no doubt, that the major research breakthrough towards better law enforcement has been the discovery of money. While humorous, it does represent some truth: Substantial sums of money will be necessary to cope with our crime and law enforcement problem. S. 917 must therefore be considered vital.

A.B. 901

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, what we have said here is based upon deep conviction. We have personally attempted through the introduction of legislation in the California Assembly, to come to grips with this problem of adequate police support in salaries, standards and training.

Our major crime bill A.B. 901, contains two basic provisions, each of which will assist cities and counties in fighting crime and maintaining law and order. The first provision will insure adequate compensation of all peace officers in the State by matching local funds with State subsidies, making it possible for law enforcement to compete for the best brains and talent available. The California Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training would be required to establish minimum standards of compensation,[1] retirement allowances, and other fringe benefits for local peace officers, as well as minimum standards for the recruitment and training of peace officers. The local jurisdictions meeting these standards would receive subventions from the State.

UPGRADE TRAINING LEVELS

The second provision will allow local police agencies to upgrade dramatically the levels of training available to their peace officers. Up to five regional training centers would be established in the major population centers of the State. Peace officers would be assigned to these training centers for intensive training in the most advanced techniques of law enforcement and management training, thereby providing a level of training which most local jurisdictions are now unable to afford. We believe that the lack of this type of training in California is one of our major shortcomings, and I would like to point out that the provisions of S. 917 are ideally suited to stimulating centers for this type of training throughout the nation.

AREAS NEEDING FINANCIAL SUPPORT

If the police and other law enforcement agencies are to increase their capabilities, we will need to do much research and experimentation, properly financed. Some of these areas that demand attention are first, the fractionalized state of our present law enforcement effort, multiple jurisdictions, limitations on authority, and arbitrary boundaries. Regional governmental organizations of law enforcement should be attempted in order to erase these disabilities.

We also need greatly increased coordination in the assignment of responsibility among the many agencies and services that seek to solve criminal problems in our complex society: city police; county sheriff; human rights organizations courts; fair employment agencies; public and private welfare assistance agencies; urban renewal agencies and the others dealing with the "war on poverty."

STANDARDS OF ENFORCEMENT

Secondly, we must develop and implement adequate standards of law enforcement. While we are fortunate in California to have the Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training, its efforts are nevertheless directed only to minimum standards. Programs of adequate career development and training are lacking.

Crime is "big business" and cannot be effectively fought with inadequate and old-fashioned techniques. We have much to learn from the aerospace industry and our national Defense Department as to methods of properly allocating limited funds for maximum effectiveness.

Another vital issue is the training and retaining of good law enforcement personnel. Also related is the need for providing improved management policies and services in law enforcement.

Finally, the police must be assisted in developing better methods of crime deterrence.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman and Members, we believe that S. 917 is a crucial and invaluable first step toward assuring all Americans security of person and property. At present, there are severe deficiencies in our systems of law enforcement and S. 917 would correct many of these deficiences. It is our firm conviction that unless we are able to recruit intelligent and educated police personnel, to provide them with high quality basic and advanced training, and then to retain them for the purposes for which they have been trained, we will certainly lack the proper personnel to successfully fight crime and control social disturbances. It is because of these convictions that we are appearing before you today to ask that you support and approve this very important bill. Thank you.

[1] We would prefer to make these mandatory but our Charter City and County provisions preclude this.

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 4:20 p.m., the subcommittee recessed until 10 a.m., July 12, 1967.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

WEDNESDAY, JULY 12, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 o'clock a.m., in room 3302, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan and Edward M. Kennedy.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; Joseph D. Bell, assistant counsel; W. Arnold Smith, assistant counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel, and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

Senator Yarborough, the committee is very glad to have you this morning.

Senator YARBOROUGH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may proceed and tell us how to get a good start today.

Senator YARBOROUGH. Thank you. You are very generous.

STATEMENT OF HON. RALPH YARBOROUGH, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

Senator YARBOROUGH. You have given me a good start by giving me the privilege and honor of cosponsoring with you as the principal author of S. 917, a bill to give protection to people, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act. I consider it an honor to appear before your subcommittee and to say it is an honor to cosponsor this bill with you at your invitation.

Our crime problems are growing in size and complexity. Crime reaches across the face of our Nation. Long-term, comprehensive, and innovative planning is required if we wish to arrest the growth of crime and return offenders to society as productive citizens.

The President's Crime Commission has given us abundant evidence of the fact that crime has become a national crisis and this Nation's shame. In a few years our citizens who will be able to point with pride to our men on the moon might be unable to walk safely on any of our Nation's streets. Equally clear then is the fact if we wish to prevent the arrival of some kind of Dark Ages in our Nation's law enforcement history, we must do a great deal and quickly.

The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act is a well-considered and far-reaching proposal. Its provisions will encourage our States to increase their expenditures for crime prevention, detection, and criminal rehabilitation. This bill provides an essential inducement for State initiative and innovation.

One of the most promising parts of this proposal is its emphasis on innovation. The enormity of our crime problem requires new ideas and approaches, new institutional arrangements and developments. As a result of this bill, I see in the future in our States new crime detection laboratories, rehabilitation centers, and halfway houses. I also anticipate new imaginative cooperative groupings of towns, counties, and perhaps even States for pooling resources for a collective assault on similar problems or in some situations in groups of neighboring communities with related problems.

I believe that the 90th Congress has an opportunity to produce this Nation's first massive assault on crime. The safe streets and crime control bill is an important part of this historic effort.

I further believe that our efforts are incomplete if we do not take the lead in providing legislation whose purpose would be the compensation of innocent victims of crime. The innocent victims compensation bill, S. 646, which I reintroduced in the Senate on January 25, focuses on the victim's loss as a result of the criminal act. It is not enough just to talk of new innovations in crime prevention and criminal rehabilitation, while leaving the innocent victim of a violent crime as the forgotten man in our society. I believe that this innocent victims compensation bill shows a recognition of society's obligation to victims and survivors of victims of murders, rapes, and assaults. As important as reducing crime is meliorating its effects on its victims.

If society assumes the responsibility for the welfare of criminals and protection of their rights to counsel and to a fair trial, then it is inconceivable to me, that it could neglect, as it has done, the victims injured when society fails to provide adequate protection for its law-abiding citizens. While the elimination of crime is our goal, the innocent victims of violent crimes certainly deserve to have their suffering alleviated by monetary compensation in an amount assessed by an impartial tribunal.

The Violent Crime Compensation Commission established under this bill would individually judge compensation for all legitimate victims of crime, whether or not the perpetrator had been caught or the presence of criminal intent had been proven. This three-man tribunal, appointed by the President, would have the power to set an appropriate amount of compensation up to $25,000, after considering such relevant factors as the nature of the crime, the financial needs of the victim, and evidence of any possible encouragement by the victim to the commission of the crime. The provisions of this bill would apply only to the District of Columbia and the other limited areas under the police power of the Federal Government. A compensatory award would neither bar further civil action by the victim against the criminal, nor bias the subsequent prosecution of the criminal.

The historic precedents behind the idea of compensation for innocent crime victims dates back to the ancient penal codes of Babylon, Israel, Greece, and Rome, where the punitive fines collected from criminals were paid directly to the injured victims. In form and concept, S. 646, the current bill, is similar to recent legislation enacted in New Zealand, Britain, and New York, and along the same lines as that of a California law.

I believe that this bill will prove a great step toward the goal of socially responsible and humane treatment of victims of crime concomitant to that now extended to the criminals themselves. This is especially necessary as the victims of violent crimes are usually those who can least afford this expense and suffering so unfairly imposed upon them. State records reveal countless individuals who have been reduced to the welfare roles merely because of the unfortunate coincidence of their being present at the scene of a crime. By the provisions of S. 646, innocent citizens brutalized by criminal violence would be aided in paying for hospital expenses and loss of income. Under the proposed legislation this compensation would also indemnify victims who had acted as "good Samaritans" and were injured while attempting to prevent a crime. This latter provision would benefit law enforcement officials by encouraging citizens to aid personally in stopping crimes that they witness with the knowledge that, should they incur injury, they would be reimbursed by the Government.

All of this, it seems to me, is a response to a growing awareness of the plight and needs of the innocent victim. Judging from the results of a 1965 Gallup poll, which showed that 62 percent of the people polled were in favor of compensation of victims, support for legislation to remedy this problem is nationwide. I believe that this increasing recognition of society's obligation to protect its citizens from criminal attack and its responsibility to compensate them if it fails to do so, makes the passage of S. 646 of vital importance to a truly comprehensive national crime control program.

Mr. Chairman, I submit this statement along with the brief statement on 917 because 917 is the chairman's bill and he is familiar with all of its terms.

Senator YARBOROUGH. I want to say to the chairman that when I first introduced this bill in 1965 no State had such a law, though New Zealand and Great Britain did have and I had hoped that the Congress would pass such a law as an encouragement to the States. Governor Rockefeller appointed a commission in New York to study this. They wrote us, we sent them the bill, all of the material we had been accumulating for 2 or 3 years and New York State has passed a very similar bill to this one pending in Congress. California passed one but it is tied into social welfare. It is very inadequate compared to the New York, New Zealand, and Great Britain laws. Maryland was considering it at their session of the legislature. I do not believe they finally passed it. It made considerable progress in the Maryland Legislature.

I thank the chairman and members of the committee.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, Senator.

The compensation of victims bill is before the full committee. It has not been referred to the subcommittee. I do not know whether it will be referred.

I am in full sympathy with the objectives of the bill. The only thing that I am still not satisfied about, and am deeply concerned about with this bill, is the anomalous situation we would have, especially in the District of Columbia with its excessive crime rate, of compensating victims of crime and then having the culprit, the criminal, turned loose by the courts, unpunished, notwithstanding his guilt, on some dubious technicality.

Senator YARBOROUGH. I agree.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think it would be tragic to impose such an obligation on the taxpayer—of course, that would probably happen in some instances in any event if such a bill were passed.

Senator YARBOROUGH. That will happen in some instances.

Senator MCCLELLAN. There is no perfection in government. But in view of the trends today, I can well envision that there would be victims compensated by the Government—the taxpayers—only to see the perpetrator of the crime go free without any punishment.

That would be a tragic situation. So I think if we do this we've got to concentrate, too, on tightening up our laws and our procedures and our effective police operations to the end that we can be a little more sure of certain detection, speedy trials, conviction, and punishment.

I appreciate your appearance here this morning, Senator.

Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. I want to express my appreciation for the testimony of Senator Yarborough. I think this is certainly an area of criminal justice which many people have thought about and are interested in, and Senator Yarborough's statement on it is illuminating and is helpful to all of us. I think one of the real troubles in the area as mentioned by the chairman is what would be the results of such a law, what would be the implications not only for the individuals that would be compensated, but how would this really work, and how would it affect criminal justice? This is something we can all speculate on. I do not feel it is a legitimate reason to say we should not move in this area. But I do think we certainly ought at the present time to be doing a great deal more research and study on it. I think the goal is sound, and I am sure we are going to do something in this area before too long. I think Senator Yarborough's statement on it is really helpful and I commend him for it.

Senator YARBOROUGH. The genesis and theory of the bill is that the Government has taken over the duty formerly performed by citizens—that of protecting himself and his family. In my State in the frontier days and I know in the chairman's State, and even when I was a small boy, many people carried pistols. They were supposed to protect themselves and their families. It was about the only law enforcement we had. Twenty-five miles from the county seat there was a locally elected constable who would not always be around. People still had to protect themselves. Those days are gone. It is illegal to bear arms.

If the Government fails in that duty to so control crime as to protect people having taken over the collective duty of furnishing the police power and protection it ought to have some mode of compensation and in Washington, of all cities. This is the Nation's Capital, our constituents come here from all the 50 States. If they get shot down in the streets, assaulted, murdered, raped, there ought to be some compensation for their physical loss. This bill does not apply to property loss. It has worked well in New Zealand, England, and I predict it is going to work well in New York State. It is not dependent upon the criminal. He may be insane. The law was not strong enough. We are not willing to tax ourselves heavily enough to put a policeman on every corner to protect the folks, so it would be not dependent upon whether he had the capacity to have a criminal intent. The crime is committed, the victim is lying there, murdered, stabbed, and the loss is just the same.

The fact that this happened to a person without their fault or failure would be enough to entitle them to compensation. This was debated for years and years in the House of Lords in England. Finally New Zealand, in 1963, was the first English-speaking jurisdiction to adopt such a plan. They read all the debates in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons in England and adopted it. England followed suit in 1964. I introduced my bill in 1965, the first in Congress, and in the meantime New York and California have acted, the two most populous States in the Union with a total of nearly 40 million in population, and I think we ought to act in the Federal jurisdiction, particularly in this great National Capital where our citizens will come from all the States and in view of the rate of crime we have here.

I am coauthor of this bill with the chairman. This would not weaken law enforcement. I want to see law enforcement and control. What good is it for the widow to have a little money if the breadwinner, her husband, is not around. The $25,000 limit would not compensate people, but we realize if you do not keep a limit you've got pragmatic difficulties.

Senator McCLELLAN. I have great sympathy for the objectives of this bill and its objective. As Senator Kennedy said, however, it is an area that needs study. The bill is on the theory that the Government has a duty to protect the citizen, is it not?

Senator YARBOROUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. An illustration given to us yesterday in testimony points up the problem in this area.

Two policemen on duty in a squad car in the early morning hours observed on the street corner three or four hoodlums, known to be law violators or suspects. They would like to stop them and determine whether they are carrying a gun or not. But they've got no right to stop them. They cannot stop them unless they have reasonable grounds to think they are up to mischief. They have no right to search them and take any guns away from them. The citizen says, "Protect us." But the policemen have to drive on down the street, cannot do anything about it and 30 minutes later these hoodlums break in somewhere and they murder somebody. How are you going to stop crime? The policemen in that situation have every reason to believe these people are up to mischief, yet they can do nothing about it, yet we expect them to stop crime. So on one hand we find we cannot stop crime then we propose to enact legislation on the other hand to pay the victim. How are we going to solve that problem?

Senator YARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, the civilization that lacks the courage and the will to protect life and property will collapse.

Senator McCLELLAN. I agree with you. Is it our duty to let the policeman have the authority under those circumstances, to arrest such people and put them in jail? That is the crux of the situation which we face in this country today. We are telling the policeman to protect the citizens. Then we are telling him you cannot stop or search a suspect and you cannot question him. Should the policeman take a suspect in and question him, the suspect has a right to refuse and say, "I won't answer any questions until you get me a lawyer." How are you going to enforce the law under these conditions? I think it is something that must be the concern of all of us. There is a crime wave sweeping the country, it is increasing every day, yet the policeman cannot go out there and take a suspect in and question him; cannot apprehend him and take him in and see if he's got a gun, even though he is a known criminal. I do not know how you are going to protect the citizen if you do not give the police a little authority to take action necessary to protect society. That is the crux of this thing, in my mind.

Senator YARBOROUGH. That is manifest: that our officers have to have power to enforce the laws.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I agree with you. Compensating the victim afterward may be a matter of justice and something that we ought to do, but I do not think that is going to get at the problem of stopping crime.

Senator YARBOROUGH. Oh, no, I do not think it will stop crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am trying to get at the prevention of crime so we will not have a victim and have to pay a victim. That is our real problem today.

Senator YARBOROUGH. I think, Mr. Chairman, the Good Samaritan provision of the compensation of innocent victims of crime will be of some help. It will not stop crime. It will not reach the major problem.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Again, I will tell you I am in sympathy with the general objectives of the bill.

Senator YARBOROUGH. And I have the honor of being the coauthor of the main bill, S. 917, under your leadership.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Congressman Scheuer, will you come forward please?

Senator KENNEDY. Just before the Congressman comes up, we have a number of other people on our witness list this morning, including Congressman Scheuer, Dr. Alfred Blumstein, Dr. Donald Hornig, and William Walsh, president-elect of the American Bar Association Section of Criminal Law. These gentlemen will be commenting on the bill that I introduced and Congressman Scheuer introduced in the House, S. 992, and I would appreciate it if we perhaps could have them as a panel, and thus expedite the workings of the committee.

Prior to calling them, I would like to, if I could, make a statement with regard to the bill which we will take testimony on.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator, let me get them all at the witness table.

It will help to expedite it and I am very glad to do it.

Congressman Scheuer, Dr. Blumstein, Dr. Hornig, and Mr. Walsh.

We will proceed in this manner:

Congressman Scheuer, you may make your statement. Then each of you please give your background and then proceed.

Senator KENNEDY. Prior to the start of Mr. Scheurer's statement, would the Chair indulge me for just a few minutes for a statement on this?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Go right ahead.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

Senator KENNEDY. This is an occasion to which I have looked forward ever since at least 1964, when I first became interested in the problem of how to organize our efforts in research, development, and training in criminal justice fields. And I must say the timing could not have been better. Perhaps to our surprise the great public interest and concern regarding crime in 1964 has grown steadily and is right now perhaps at its peak.

And it is precisely this peak of concern about crime which gives us in the 90th Congress not only a unique opportunity, but also a solemn responsibility to leave to future Americans a permanent legacy of tools to deal with crime. It is within our power to fashion the current momentum and support for anticrime measures into a lasting framework of legislation and institutions capable of continuing the struggle against crime even when public concern again wanes, as history tells us it will.

If we let this opportunity escape, it may be generations before we have it again. But we have a duty to ourselves, and the American people, and our children, and our grandchildren, not to miss this chance. We must build a structure which captures today's energies and excitement and carries them into the future, so that we may have an unremitting, broadscale effort to seek solutions in every dimension of the crime problem, at every level of government, in every part of the Nation.

President Johnson has taken initiatives which have laid a firm foundation for the work Congress needs to do. His Crime Commission, under the able chairmanship of Nicholas Katzenbach, provided a fertile source of ideas, recommendations, questions, and above all, challenges to our ingenuity and our dedication to a tranquil and just society. And President Johnson has also, in his package of crime legislation, suggested the key elements of a permanent path to progress. At its heart lies the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, a bill which in its comprehensiveness and balance reflects the President's own attitudes and actions concerning crime.

The Crime Commission put its finger on a central element of our future planning when it opened its chapter on "Research—Instrument for Reform." It said:

> The Commission has found and discussed throughout this report many needs of law enforcement and the administration of criminal justice. But what it has found to be the greatest need is the need to know.

Expressed another way, what this passage means is that the Commission discovered that there are more questions about crime for which we have no answers yet, than there are questions for which we have answers. And in many areas the Commission not only could not find, during its limited life, the answers to questions, it couldn't even find the right questions to ask.

In the year 1967, a time of space exploration, of incredible sophisticated weaponry, of computers and automation and cybernetics, it is hardly necessary to make the case for research and development and experimentation as the key to progress. Yet, in the field of crime, this Nation has utterly failed to meet its responsibilities to think about what it is doing and to apply its best brains and imagination to doing it better. Until 1965 there was almost no Federal support for broad-scale research, development, and experimentation in criminal justice fields, and even today we are letting the Law Enforcement Assistance program limp along, with this and other responsibilities, with what—in relation to need—must be considered a paltry sum of $7 million.

I believe that the President and Attorney General Ramsey Clark and the 90th Congress are determined to do something about this shameful situation. I believe that we do want to leave a legacy of authority and structure which guarantees that the Federal Government will focus its best efforts on solving the crime problem, and that those assigned this task will have the resources and staff and status they need to do the job. The only question is how. What institutional framework will best serve the national need in this area?

It seems to me that there is wide agreement on the answer. The President referred to it in his 1967 message on crime. The Crime Commission went into it in some detail in its report. The very distinguished witnesses we will hear today and many of their colleagues and organizations subscribe to it. The answer is the establishment of a National Institute of Criminal Justice, a concept which is embodied in S. 992, a bill I introduced early this session. It is cosponsored by Senators Burdick, Dodd, Kennedy of New York, Magnuson, Nelson, Prouty, and Randolph.

Let me emphasize right from the start that S. 992 is wholly consistent with S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act. While the President and Attorney General have not asked for a specific congressional mandate for a National Institute, they have expressed their expectation that such an Institute would be established under Safe Streets, and they certainly do not oppose the concept or the idea of a congressional mandate. The one thing the Attorney General has asked for is flexibility. He wants as many options as possible in building an institute so that it can be efficient, effective, and adaptable. S. 992 is designed to have such flexibility, and would, I am confident, allow for a structure which best addresses the needs it is designed to meet.

But the one thing S. 992 would do is provide assurances that we will have a National Institute—no matter who the future President and Attorney General may be—and that it will have the resources to do the job. Let me briefly state, as I did when I introduced it, the job which a National Institute under S. 992 would do.

As I envision the Institute, it would be analogous to the National Institute of Mental Health. It would be headed by a Director, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, holding a rank equivalent to an Assistant Attorney General. The Institute would conduct research and development projects in crime prevention and control, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders. It would seek new ways to strengthen and implement the Federal-State partnership in these areas. It would look into the causes of crime, the means of preventing it, and the theories and techniques for correction and rehabilitation. Working very closely with the Office of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance, it would administer the Federal funds available for research and demonstration projects in educational institutions and in State and local agencies.

The Institute would undertake a program of fellowships through which professionals in field relating to criminal justice would be able to spend time at the Institute, working on research projects and employing their experience and their insights. The Institute would also conduct workshops at which experts from different backgrounds and different parts of the country would meet and gain experience from the experiences of others. It would provide field assistance to police departments, courts, correctional agencies, universities, and other agencies through an extension service. It would gather information and results from efforts touching on criminal justice which are being carried on in the Federal Government and elsewhere throughout the Nation, and would synthesize this information and disseminate it both for professional use and for use in schools and by the general public.

It would also establish a program evaluation and assessment capability now lacking in the executive branch. Any agency of the Federal Government issuing grants or contracts relating to law enforcement and the administration of justice would be able to call upon the institute to assess and evaluate the programs the agency was conducting, as well as to correlate and disseminate the results.

The Director of the Institute and his staff would be assisted and guided by a national advisory committee appointed by the Attorney General. This committee would consist of leading experts from all the disciplines relating to the administration of justice, as well as respected national figures and civic leaders.

In short it would be a well-staffed, highly competent, neutral, nonpolitical institution which could serve as a marketplace of ideas and a repository and disseminator of information, a seeker of truth and a stimulator of progress, without responsibility for governmental functions, or for day to day administering of large grant-in-aid programs. Such questions as the mix between in-house and contracted-out research, the extensiveness of physical facilities, the relationship between the institute and the Regional Academies of Criminal Justice, which are proposed under my bill, S. 993, and so forth, would be left to the Attorney General and the director, as long as they fulfilled the primary tasks of stimulation, coordination, evaluation, correlation, and dissemination.

I do think it would be a mistake not to begin immediately to provide the funds and direction to design and start the Institute, even on a pilot basis, at the same time as the mechanism for implementing the Safe Streets Act is being developed. The two units will have to work closely together, and neither can be designed without full attention being given to the design of the other. Thus not only is there no good reason not to develop them simultaneously, but commonsense demands this course. Many of the personnel hired at the initial stages will, of course, necessarily be working on developing both the Institute and the assistance program. But this should be an advantage, not a barrier, both in terms of sensible design and future coordination.

On the question of the location of the Institute within the Government, there is certainly something to be said for the Commission's view that in the long run it might be desirable to have the Institute independent of any department. But in the short and medium run, it is clear that considerations of practicality and of optimum effectiveness require that the Institute be established within the Department of Justice.

We are very fortunate today to have four highly qualified witnesses to testify on S. 992. Congressman Scheuer of New York has sponsored an equivalent bill in the House. He has gained support for it through hard work and persistence, and gave his colleagues a taste of what the Institute might do by sponsoring an exhibit on crime research in the Rayburn Building not long ago. Dr. Donald Hornig, President Johnson's Science Adviser has, of course, an overview of the Federal Government's entire research and technological development effort. He and his assistant, Dr. David Robinson, who is also here today, worked very closely with the Crime Commission's Science and Technology Task Force.

Mr. William F. Walsh is a leading lawyer in Houston, Tex., and is chairman-elect of the American Bar Association's section of criminal law. The officers of that section have worked very hard reviewing many of the bills before this subcommittee, and we will look forward to having the benefit of their views. Mr. Walsh has been particularly interested in the National Institute as evidenced by his piece in the winter edition of the American Criminal Law Quarterly, in which he said:

> In spite of the burgeoning interest in criminal law, there is still a dearth of hard data and empirical knowledge about the operation of the criminal law. This complex subject requires study in depth, not only by commissions and committees, which are necessarily temporary in their character, but by a permanent research agency. The Congress should, I believe, establish a National Institute of Law to conduct research itself and by grants to private individuals and organizations. I believe that such an agency could do for the law what the National Institutes of Health are doing for medicine.

The final witness today on S. 992 will be Dr. Alfred Blumstein, who was Director of Science and Technology for the Crime Commission, and who is with the Institute for Defense Analyses, a leading Defense Department research contractor.

Mr. Chairman, again let me thank you for your cooperation in letting the subcommittee have a chance to consider this legislation. I believe it is one of the most vital and promising bills we will consider this year.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Senator.

Congressman you may proceed—I will place you in charge of the panel.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER, A MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM THE 21ST DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Mr. SCHEUER. I am afraid you honor me too much, Senator. I am not among peers. I am definitely among my superiors.

I will just speak very briefly. I assume my prepared testimony will be printed in the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have a prepared statement? It may be printed in the record.

(The statement referred to follows:)

TESTIMONY OF JAMES H. SCHEUER, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 21ST DISTRICT, NEW YORK

Mr. Chairman: I appreciate the opportunity to testify in favor of S. 992.

In considering the new policy area of Federal assistance to local law enforcement, we have an unusual advantage. We can rely upon one of the most innovative, thorough, and well-written reports ever issued by a government agency. I refer to the President's Crime Commission Report, Crime in a Free Society, and the accompanying task force reports, particularly the task force report on science and technology which outlines a National program of research. In large measure, this bill creates the administrative structure and assures the funding to carry forth the program outlined in this report.

I first became deeply interested in the problem of crime several years ago as a result of the concern of my constituents.

Every survey I have made of my own Congressional District in the South Bronx has shown that neighborhood security is the most critical concern of the residents in this area. This anxiety is not unique. People in our major cities across the country as well as in rural areas live in fear of becoming the targets of unrestrained criminal activity on the streets and in their homes.

Accordingly, I have given a large part of my legislative time and energies to the problem of crime. While doing so, I have become convinced that the problem of crime is not our number-one domestic concern, but also represents our most dramatic gap in the application of science and technology to public problems.

Forty years ago the police were pioneers in applying science and technology to government. But unfortunately, the innovations of the 1920's—the radio patrol car, tear gas, and finger-print identification—still represent the highpoint in police technology. Today's policeman must still rely on the same basic equipment as he did forty years ago—the truncheon, the lethal sidearm, and the patrol car.

This lack of innovation in equipment serves as a dramatic example of the widespread need to bring law enforcement up to date.

This need, however, goes far beyond the availability of new weapons and technology, for many of the key questions in the area of crime are interdisciplinary questions—the type of question answered by cooperating teams of physical scientists, psychologists, sociologists, political scientists, engineers, and lawyers, as well as criminal justice officials. The National Institute of Criminal Justice proposed in this bill could make the long-needed start in answering such questions as:

How to Select and Train Police Officers

How can we select and train police officers who will "keep their cool" and remain calm under the wide variety of present urban crises including:

The apprehension of the youth in a "borrowed car."

The apprehension of a mentally disturbed person or a threatened suicide.

The dealing with an obstreperous or reluctant drunk on the street, in a barroom, or in an automobile.

The protection and control of crowds assembled for marches, demonstrations or political rallies.

The apprehension of a suspect cornered in a building such as a bank or a warehouse.

The apprehension of a criminal suspect, particularly one fleeing on foot at night or in a congested district.

The single officer attempting to discharge his duty or make an arrest in the presence of a hostile assembly.

The showdown with the armed criminal, often at night, in a poorly illuminated area.

Dealing with the dangerous criminal holed up in a hideout, perhaps with one or more hostages.

Rioting bands or mobs.

How to Prevent Crime

How can street lighting be better used to prevent crime?

Can cars, places of businesses, apartment houses and public housing units be designed to make crime less likely by reducing opportunity and increasing the risk of apprehension?

Is closed-circuit TV surveillance of high crime public areas practical?

How can we encourage a closer relationship between the criminal justice system and other government agencies?

How can we make police patrol more crime-inhibiting?

Can we identify likely delinquents in time to alter their behavior?

How can we use former criminals to help prevent young people from becoming future offenders?

How Can We Improve the Apprehension of Criminals?

How can we best allocate scarce police resources?

Do delays in our court system encourage more crime by discouraging citizen participation in the law enforcement process?

How can citizens be encouraged to report crimes to the police? Why don't they want to "get involved" in the law enforcement process?

How can we make it less costly for citizens to serve as witnesses?

How to Increase Deterence and Rehabilitation

What causes our high rate of recidivism?

How can we individualize our rehabilitation programs?

How can we reconcile the conflicting mechanisms of deterence, incarceration and rehabilitation?

Do police patrols act uniformly over the population to deter crime?

It is remarkable, but we have not even begun to answer the most rudimentary questions in the area of crime prevention. Every three months the FBI issues its Uniform Crime Statistics and generally the Director reports a shocking increase in the general crime rate: contained in these quarterly reports are fundamental and fruitful areas of investigation which, to the best of my knowledge, no one in our Federal establishment is yet investigating. Perhaps the following differences are in minor degrees due to various types of reporting, but to my knowledge, no one is investigating the cause and significance of these differences. The last FBI quarterly report indicated that:

In Omaha, Nebraska, assaults increased spectacularly by 1,380% while the national average increased only 14%.

In Albuquerque, New Mexico, larcenies increased 312% while the national average increased 18%.

In Cleveland, Ohio, larcenies increased 180% while the national average rose only 18%.

In Savannah, Georgia, instances of aggravated assault decreased 78% while the national average rose 15%.

In Rochester, New York, auto thefts decreased 36% while the national average was up 20%.

In each of these cases, there has been a remarkable deviation from the norm. But, according to Quinn Tamm, of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, no one in our government is asking which of these cities which have had successful experiences what they are doing that other cities might emulate.

In other cities, certain categories of crime have risen atypically, but again, no one is trying to find out what unusual conditions in these cities might have caused this rise and what these cities with spectacularly poor records could do to improve their experience.

The fact that we are not yet even trying to answer these rudimentary questions reveals the primitive state of anti-crime research.

This committee is now considering a number of measures which represent Congressional responses to the problem of crime. Most of these bills have some type of research component.

S. 992 differs from most of the other proposed anti-crime measures in that its prime purpose is basic and applied anti-crime research with a fully developed framework for a successful program of research and development.

Since the end of World War II, the Federal government has had considerable experience in large-scale research and development. This bill has been designed to take advantage of our experience of the last two decades in order to insure the right combinatiton of flexibility and innovation on the one hand, and coordination and administrative control on the other.

Responsibility and Innovation

The Federal government will soon be sponsoring some type of anti-crime research program. The success of that program is heavily dependent upon that caliber of the people running it. Our best assurance of attracting first-rate scientists at the operational level is to attract a scientist of national reputation to head the program.

Men equipped with a solid scientific background and the judgment and wisdom needed to apply scientific findings to a sensitive policy area, are hard to find, and they are eagerly sought by private industry and other government research and development programs. We cannot attract this caliber of professional unless we make the position comparable to the top research and development officials in similar Federal government programs and private industry.

As a case in point, one of our large cities is now having difficulty finding a first-rate scientist to head their anti-crime research program even though they are offering a salary of $25 thousand a year—a salary almost equivalent to a Level V Cabinet officer.

S. 992 will help to solve the problem by providing that the Director of Research shall be equivalent to the rank of Level IV or Assistant Attorney General. This is equivalent to:

The Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Science and Technology in the Department of Commerce;

The Principal Deputy Directors of Defense Research and Engineering in the Department of Defense; and

The Assistant Secretaries of Research and Development in the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

It is even one step below the Grade III Level Director of Defense Research and Engineering in the Department of Defense.

The creation of the position would bring about a long-needed change, for the Department of Justice is now one of the few Cabinet-level Departments without an individual in a level grade position responsible for research and development.

Funding

Equally important to the recruitment of personnel is assured funding for a meaningful research and development program.

S. 992 is similar to the now-amended House version of the Administration Crime Control Act, H.R. 5037, in that it provides for earmarked funds for research. It is desirable to earmark research funds because the research function lacks the political appeal of other operating programs.

The products of research are not immediately dramatic—they are long-range, sometimes negative, and generally hidden from the public eye. There may be no immediate practical, visible application to justify the expense. Research has to be carefully evaluated for its long-range potential and for its long-range yield.

Politics, on the other hand, to most practitioners of the art, is a short-run way of life with a short-run methods, and short-run goals. Generally priority is given to programs with large public visibility. The Administration and most of the Members of Congress predictably will be more interested in programs that are calculated to produce an immediate and visible local impact.

If we are to start on the difficult long-term questions posed by the President's Crime Commission, the research function must be assured by specific legislation, and earmarked funds.

This bill approaches its maximum expenditures in manageable stages to insure adequate build-up of funding as research design and management capability develop. The first year the bill calls for $10 million, to fund the recruitment of scientists and the build-up of critical research and development machinery. It then authorizes $30 million the second year and $60 million the third year as capability develops.

The President's Crime Commission report states that we now spend over $4 billion a year on our criminal justice system. Were we to spend the entire $100 million in one year instead of three, we would still only be spending 3½% of our budget on research, as compared to the 15% and the 7% spent annually on research and development in the Departments of Defense and Commerce, respectively.

National Institute of Criminal Justice

Once we have provided for adequate personnel and funding, we must then locate the operation in the optimum organizational structure: one that provides an opportunity for broad-gauged, creative thinking and at the same time, insures a responsiveness to crime prevention and control problems at the precinct station house level.

S. 992 provides for a National Institute of Criminal Justice to be located in the Department of Justice. This is almost the identical organizational structure as the National Institute of Health, which has been so spectacularly successful in combatting basic problems of disease.

Much of the research in this bill will be conducted on a local grant basis. There are two good reasons for this. First, problems to be researched are uniquely related to local conditions and are best suggested and analyzed within local areas by local personnel. Secondly, the quite essential research resources, qualified scientists, are located throughout the country in state and local governments, universities, research institutes, and private corporations, many of which already have several decades of experience in building research and development capability through work on our highly sophisticated military and space age systems and technology.

Consortiums of local law enforcement officials, and experienced scientists in universities and private corporations will provide the best combination to tackle the difficult problems of anti-crime research. But, locally based research also raises significant problems.

If a large portion of our research is conducted on a local grant basis:

How will it be coordinated?

How shall we select the best institution for carrying out a particular project?

How will we coordinate demonstration projects?

How will the research be evaluated?

S. 992 establishes the machinery to help answer these questions and to assure the effectiveness of our local grant operation, for it establishes an in-house research institute with an independent capacity for research and evaluation. It also provides the umbrella under which we can bring together enough research people to provide the intellectual stimulation necessary to attract today's best scientists.

An Institute located in the Department of Justice also provides the organizational structure needed to encourage good two-way communication between those who perform the research and those who must apply research fundings. The Institute should be located within the Department of Justice to encourage operating law enforcement officials at every level—city, county and state—to communicate their needs to researchers and to insure ready access to research findings.

Two-way communication with state, county and local law enforcement agencies would also be assured by the development of an extension service similar to the highly successful county agent extension service operating within the Department of Agriculture. In this proposed service, Federally trained anti-crime consultants would work with state and local law enforcement officials to acquaint them with research findings and communicate their needs to the central research institute.

The Promise of Research and Demonstration Programs

Given the right personnel, funding and organization, it would be possible for us to conduct a research and demonstration program which will change the quality, nature, scope and scale of our entire criminal justice system.

The possible benefits from such a research program range from sophisticated new hardware to complete re-evaluation of the three traditional mechanisms of law enforcement: incarceration, deterence, and rehabilitation.

The number of devices nearly developed or developed but not yet applied to law enforcement is already considerable. Imagine the results if we could provide local law enforcement agencies with:

Devices to give patrolmen vastly improved night vision.

Odor-sensory devices to detect the pressnce of explosives, narcotics, or humans, where their presence was suggestive of illegal activity.

Light armor for law enforcement agents.

A gun that stuns or otherwise temporarily disables but does not kill.

Closed-circuit television for observing high crime areas.

Secrecy in police radio communication.

A police lapel radio or wrist radio for two-way instantaneous communication

A police radio vehicle locater combined with a computer for instant dispatch

Better street lighting research

A multi-purpose specially designed standard police vehicle

The list is far from complete, but the scope of possible devices raises the even more important problem of selection.

Were a city to adopt these devices in random fashion the cost would be prohibitive. The problem is not a lack of possible alternatives, but rather an abundance of potential devices as against limited resources and a lack of cost-benefit criteria for effective decision-making among the available alternatives.

Would a police patrol car at $100,000 a year be as effective as a patrol vehicle locater and dispatcher at the same price? Or would a combination of heat, odor and sound detection devices and street lighting at the same $100,000 be more effective than both suggested alternatives?

No city can afford to experiment on its own to answer all of these questions. The price is too high both in dollars and in public safety. Our local law enforcement people need to pool their knowledge and experiments to develop basic guidelines to apply to their local situations. A good example would be a specially designed police patrol vehicle; an obvious need which no manufacturer to our knowledge has been asked to design.

There is, in addition, a special need to develop a more complete science of identification. The recent Escobedo and Miranda decisions have curtailed the traditional use of interrogation and confession to establish identity and guilt. Unfortunately we are making almost no progress in finding a substitute for these now-judicially proscribed methods. The forensic sciences of physical and organic evidence hold great promise of filling this gap.

Only a small percentage of crimes committed are crimes of physical violence, but it is these crimes—rape, murder, robbery, aggravated assault—which threaten the pattern of life in our great urban centers. It is precisely in these crimes of physical violence that the aggressors leave physical evidence, which would leave them susceptible to apprehension and conviction through an improved science of identification.

A national institute would encourage those in forensics, the science of evidence, to keep more closely in touch with chemists, biologists, and physicists, so that current discoveries and advances could then be applied to the identification and apprehension of criminals.

In many areas the dramatic potential in the forensic sciences alone justifies a national research effort. For example: traces of blood are found at the scene of a violent crime almost as often as fingerprints. If the blood has not dried, we can approach individually identification of the person on the basis of the protein distribution in his wet blood, his antibodies and his hemoglobin types. There are enough unique groupings in fresh blood to divide everyone on earth into millions of sub-groups so that in effect we would have a unique "bloodprint" for every human being. But once the blood dries, we must almost go back to the basic typing set up by Landsteiner in 1902. This means that instead of millions of groups we have only four.

Particles of hair are also left at the scene of violent crimes such as rape. In practice we must still depend upon the subjective judgment of one man visually examining a hair particle under a microscope, using as his criteria, length, breadth, color and scales.

Some leading scientists believe that each human's hair is organically unique, that each hair stores evidence of an individual's recent diet, medicine, and drug intake. Imagine the benefit to law enforcement if we could develop a unique "hairprint" for each individual similar to a fingerprint, and in addition have some clue as to that individual's recent activity.

Out methods of handwriting analysis are also primitive when compared to their potential. Today's handwriting experts still use the basic system described by the French in 1609, two years after the founding of Jamestown. It is a useful system, but it leaves a good many areas untouched. It is within our existing technology to develop a computer language of handwriting characteristics and then feed this information into an instantaneous retrieval system. We should be able to compare handwriting characteristics instantaneously by objective criteria instead of merely taking the word of one expert against another.

Other tremendously important areas of identification are virtually untouched. For example, whenever two individuals touch, there is an exchange of microorganisms. So far we do not know how long they will live after transfer, and how they can be identified on a victim and on a suspect. Can we continue to ignore these possibilities?

With all these promising avenues of exploration we need a cost-benefit analysis to identify the areas of greatest promise. We must put our effort into developing first those areas which will have the maximum payoff. And we must coordinate this expensive nation-wide effort. Unfortunately, at this time, there is no sustained effort to identify even the important research areas.

A National Institute of Criminal Justice, located in the Department of Justice, is the logical organization to encourage and organize all of these promising areas of research.

Conclusion

Two years ago Congress embarked upon a massive new program of Federal aid to elementary and secondary education. At that time we wisely decided that the Federal involvement should not simply be more of the same: the use of the Federal tax base to support on-going local school programs. Our program was designed to encourage innovation and creativity; to help local schools attack their problems in new and more effective ways.

Federal assistance to local law enforcement must be no less innovative. The key to a new approach and the most suitable role for the Federal government is research and development.

This is the crucial year in which we will probably embark on a new program of substantial Federal involvement. The philosophy we adopt will set the pattern for decades to come. We must provide the personnel, the funding and the organization to reshape completely our whole criminal justice system.

I submit that S. 992 is the proper vehicle for this program.

Mr. SCHEUER. In the interest of brevity I will not read my statement. I will comment on a few aspects of the problem as I see it.

First of all, I would like to thank you, sir, for the opportunity of appearing here and I want to express my gratitude and my deep admiration to Senator Kennedy for the marvelous leadership that he has shown in this important area for his insight, for his hard work, and for his continuing contribution to the development of this legislation. He has really played a major leadership role in the development of this enormously important field of crime in the streets and the Federal Government's responsibility to protect its citizens, and I want to express my great admiration for the splendid contribution he has made.

I support S. 992 enthusiastically and wholeheartedly and I have introduced a companion measure in the House of Representatives. I think if any documentation were needed for the necessity of having a really high-powered research and development program, the President's Crime Commission report, "Crime in a Free Society," would be one of the most magnificent pieces of government writing I have ever seen and would be eloquent testimony to that need. And particularly the Task Force Report on Science and Technology which is headed by Dr. Alfred Blumstein, the gentleman on my left, which is a magnificent piece of writing and testifies far more eloquently than I to the need for effective harnessing of the best brains in our country to a full-scale research and development program in the field of crime.

I believe in States rights and I believe in the vitality and intelligence that we have in this country on the city and State and county levels. But I believe we are dealing with a problem of such complexity here, that from the design and organizing point of view, cities, States, an counties simply do not have the capability to do the job. When we wanted to do research and development on the atomic bomb or on space transport we did not ask a State or city or county to do it. The Federal Government took upon itself the challenge of designing the research and development program and administering it.

The advances that we have made in our space age technology, our military technology as Senator Kennedy so eloquently put it, the fantastically sophisticated devices and application of cybernetics and sophisticated systems of all kinds almost defies the comprehension of the average lay person. And it is this kind of management know-how, this kind of scientific design and administration know-how that brought these unbelievable breakthroughs in the field of military technology, our space technology. It is that kind of excellence and sophisticated know-how that we must apply to the field of crime.

The police three, four, or five decades ago were innovative in developing the patrol car, fingerprinting identification, but unfortunately in the last three or four decades our burgeoning scientific technological know-how has not been applied to the field of crime. The average police officer is equipped today as he was half a century ago—with a radio patrol car, his sidearm, police truncheon, night stick, and that is about it.

The number of questions to which we have not only not produced answers to, but the questions we have not even formulated as the Senator has stated, are numerous.

How do we select police officers who are to keep their cool under the enormous varieties of situations which they meet? Think of the varieties of situations, ranging all the way from the apprehension of a kid in a so-called borrowed car, the apprehension of a mentally disturbed person or a threatened suicide, the dealing with an obstreperous or reluctant drunk on the street. Also, the protection and control of crowds assembled for marches, and so forth, dealing with the dangerous criminal holed up in a hideout and riding bands or mobs, an infinite variety of situations the police officer faces. How do we select police officers who will keep calm, who will exercise prudent judgment? And how do we equip him? How do we train him to have a deeper insight and understanding into these extraordinarily complicated and sensitive and potentially explosive urban situations? And after we have selected him and trained him, how do we equip him with systems and weapons, hopefully non-lethal weapons, someday, that will not require him to make the choice between doing nothing or involving himself in a tragic case of overkill? How do we give him the variety of options that are appropriate to the variety of situations which he meets?

In the whole field of the prevention of crime an overwhelming proportion of crime is involved in breaking and entering homes and businesses and in car thefts—500,000 car thefts annually. How do we organize our society so the people take prudent means to reduce opportunity of crime, to lock their cars—how do we get car owners or auto manufacturers to install a device so that you cannot leave a key in a car while you park? Eighty percent of the stolen cars are left with doors open and 50 percent of stolen cars have the keys left in the locks. This is an open invitation to car theft and it is the first step that frequently takes the young teenager down the road to more serious criminal involvement.

How can we make police patrol more crime inhibiting? How do we make our systems of police and also court systems more effective and involving the public so we can improve the success with which we apprehend criminals? At the present time only about 24 percent of the cases of serious crime result in an apprehension. Why is it that citizens don't want to get involved? Why is it they do not want to get involved in the criminal justice system? Is it the fact that our police system treats them perhaps almost as badly as the police would treat a suspect? Is it that our court systems cause them tremendous wastage of time, loss of salary, and perhaps even loss of jobs? What are the changes in the system that could induce the average citizen to participate in law enforcement, in the law enforcement process as a good samaritan, as a volunteer?

Once the individual gets involved in a law enforcement process we must find out why our rate of recidivism is so high—why is it when we get a youth involved in our law enforcement process and he goes to trial and incarceration, rehabilitation and correction, and the like and in the overwhelming number of cases we get him back as a customer in 1 or 2 years? Why has our system of criminal justice failed to deter crime? When a crime is committed why do we apprehend a quarter of the cases and when we finally do apprehend, why are we so unsuccessful in leading him out of a life of crime?

As the Senator pointed out, these are the questions that have not even been formulated.

In the latest quarterly report of the FBI we have dramatic proof of the fact that there are great differences between the rates of crime in our various cities, and that these differences are not being investigated. For example, in Omaha, Nebr., assaults increased by 1,380 percent while the national average increased only 14 percent.

In Albuquerque, N. Mex., larcenies increased 312 percent while the national average increased 18 percent.

In Cleveland, Ohio, larcenies increased 180 per cent while the national average rose only 18 percent.

In Savannah, Ga., instances of aggravated assault decreased 78 percent while the national average rose 15 percent.

In Rochester, N.Y., auto thefts decreased 36 percent while the national average was up 20 percent.

What have we done to investigate what some of these cities are doing where their record is far better than the national average? They must be doing something right but we do not know what that something is. We have no machinery for finding out what is the something so we can apply it to other cities. Have we even asked in the cities where their experience is far worse than the national average—what are they doing that other successful cities are not doing or what are they omitting to do that successful cities are doing? As far as I know, and I have made an extensive effort to find out, nobody in Government has even attempted to analyze these spectacular differences in crime rates in our various cities as against the national average and come up with some explanation.

Well, these are some of the questions that it is high time we address ourselves to.

I strongly endorse Senator Kennedy's bill. I hope that we will come up with an outstanding scientific professional to head up this program. The Justice Department is one of the few Cabinet-level departments without an individual in a position responsible for research and development.

S. 992 will provide for a Director of Research who shall be equivalent to the rank of level IV or Assistant Attorney General. This is equivalent to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Science and Technology, the principal Deputy Directors of Defense Research and Engineering in the Department of Defense, and the Assistant Secretaries of Research and Development in the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

It is actually a step below the grade level III Director of Defense Research and Engineering in the Department of Defense.

One of the principal reasons why I feel Senator Kennedy's bill is so much overdue is that we must by legislation nail down a chief executive science administrator of the highest capability, and his budget, if criminal research and development is ever going to get a fair shake at funds and talent. Most practicing politicians operate from year to year. We look to them here and now for a program of dramatic and visible impact at the local level and we tend to find long-range projects less attractive. We discount projects where there must be many failures in order to make a short step forward. For this reason research programs generally do not generate a great deal of support as far as the practitioners of the political arts are concerned. I will wholeheartedly agree with Senator Kennedy's approach of nailing down the administrative apparatus, nailing down a high caliber of excellence in the scientific leadership of the Institute and of assuring funds at least for the first several years.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will have some informal conversation later on.

Senator KENNEDY. Dr. Hornig will speak next.

STATEMENT OF DR. DONALD F. HORNIG, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Dr. HORNIG. Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, I am pleased to have an opportunity to comment on S. 992, the bill to establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice, and on those provisions of S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, which deals with grants for research and development.

The problem of crime control has assumed increasing dimensions and it requires of us the application of the best tools available. The need for systematic research and development into the causes of crime, the detection of crime, and the prevention of crime is great, and properly carried out, offers important possibilities for progress.

THE PRESIDENT'S CRIME COMMISSION TASK FORCE

The President's Crime Commission took a step that I believe to be a landmark in the study of crime. It set up a Task Force on Science and Technology to study the utility of systematic efforts in this area which my office was pleased to be able to help establish.

A special advisory group met regularly with the task force to review its findings and recommendations. Dr. Robinson, of my staff, met with the group and kept in close touch with the work of the task force. Finally, the President's Science Advisory Committee reviewed the recommendations of the task force and endorsed them. One major point that comes out of the task force report is that there is much more to be done. The task force was able to examine a few problems in detail, but spent most of its effort laying out further efforts in many more areas.

Although our lack of knowledge of what causes crime, and how crime can be reduced, is appalling, it became clear from their work that systematic analysis and modern scientific techniques can improve our knowledge and with it our ability to deal with crime. We are confident that research and development can be as successful in improving the operation of the anticriminal system as it has been in improving industrial and military operations.

Some of the examples described in the task force report—a locator for patrol cars, engineering of metropolitan communications systems, new command and control equipment, design of police cars for more effective operations—certainly should be followed up but they only begin to recognize the opportunties available.

THE NEED FOR NATIONAL EFFORT

A very good case can be made that research and development can improve the operation of our criminal justice system and the benefits will greatly exceed the cost. Why, then, have not the local agencies which deal with criminal justice been able to justify these programs?

Of course, there have been extremely effective efforts in communities, particularly in larger States and cities, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation has done a great deal in the limited areas of its jurisdiction. But the costs of good research here—as in other areas—are very heavy, and purely local benefit can seldom justify them. For example, it might cost $500,000 to develop a better police patrol car whose use might be worth $50,000 per year to a force of the size needed by the city of Milwaukee.

This benefit, spread to 50 cities, would make the development worthwhile, but a single community cannot be expected to meet the costs.

Furthermore, even when local research is carried out, it may be unreasonable to expect the local community to assume the cost of publication and dissemination of the results nationally.

Given the sound expectations for substantial benefits from research and development in criminal justice, and the difficulties of undertaking it in piecemeal fashion, a national effort in this area is important and overdue.

Major questions, however, remain to be worked out as the program proceeds:

1. How should such research be carried out?
2. Who should do the research?
3. How can we insure that the results will help local law enforcements?
4. What is the appropriate Federal role?
5. What is appropriate level of investment?

S. 917 AND 992

I would like to compare the two bills. It is in this context that I would like to say a few words about Senate bill 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 and Senate bill 992, to establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice. There are differences in emphasis in these bills, but the purpose of both is to devise the best possible program for managing research and development in criminal justice.

While both bills have goals which I most emphatically endorse, I believe that S. 917 has advantages in several respects:

First. S. 917 includes grants both for research and improvement of law enforcement, and places authority for both functions under one man. S. 992 is concerned only with the research program.

There is a slight difference between these two approaches. S. 992 insures more independence of the research program and keeps it away from pressures for day-to-day activities. S. 917 may insure a closer connection between the research and the actual field operations. If Congress makes clear that it wants a well-developed research program, I am sure that it could be achieved in either framework. On balance, I prefer the more flexible approach.

Second. S. 917 calls primarily for grants to outside nonprofit agencies for research, although it provides that certain studies may be done in-house. S. 992 sets up an institute which could both establish laboratories and contracts with outside sources in order to carry out its program. Experience has shown that setting up Federal laboratories is an arduous and time-consuming job, and it has often been difficult to get the best people to commit themselves to them. I think it would be easier in the beginning to get a competent in-house group that would be able to evaluate the programs carried on by others. Although after the program is established we might wish to reexamine whether a new laboratory should be set up, at present it would probably be more prudent to follow the approach of S. 917.

Third. Finally, S. 992 in essence authorizes funds specifically for research; S. 917 lumps together the total program of grants for improvement of law enforcement and for research purposes. Many scientists who are concerned that pressures for immediate results will reduce the emphasis on a well-managed, long-range research program would welcome the approach of S. 992.

However, the administration bill would allow more or less money to be used for this purpose according to the utility of the proposals and the quality of the programs. Again, if the Congress makes clear that it desires a good research program, I am certain that the Director would carry one out. On balance, the decision in the administration was that the more flexible and coordinated approach was advantageous.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, S. 917 and S. 992 are slightly different ways of going about getting a worthwhile and effective research program. I believe that the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act can meet our goals somewhat more effectively. However, I believe above all that whichever approach is taken the time has come to apply the full force of scientific analysis, of research, and the development of new tools and techniques to the reduction of crime without further delay.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Dr. Hornig.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Dr. Hornig. I am glad to have your support in principle for the goals and concept of S. 992. I do of course appreciate the constraints under which you are testifying, and thus I especially commend you for your frankness in discussing some of the issues here. I want to stress again that I do not envision S. 992 as an alternative to S. 917, but rather as a supplement to it. S. 992 will give the President a firm congressional mandate to do what it is he has said he wants to do, and it will give the Attorney General the flexibility he has said he wants to do, and it will give the Attorney General the flexibility he has said he wants. I think that some of the questions you raise, and which I have thought through in designing S. 992, would best be answered by the passage of both S. 917 and S. 992. This is certainly the result I have always had in mind.

I would like to ask Mr. Walsh if he would be kind enough to be the next speaker.

Mr. Welsh, as I mentioned, is the chairman-elect of the criminal law section of the American Bar Association and has been deeply interested in all the problems of crime and law enforcement. He has come all the way from Houston, Tex., to be with us this morning.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM WALSH, HOUSTON, TEX.

Mr. WALSH. As Senator Kennedy has indicated, this is a subject in which I have a great interest. I cannot speak for the American Bar Association, of course. The section council has endorsed the principle of S. 992 and we will present that to the house of delegates in Hawaii nevt month. But, of course, until action by the house of delegates, no action of any subsidiary of the American Bar is in an official position.

I do think it is safe to say, however, and proper to say, that nothing that came before us at our last council meeting met with such unanimity as our wholehearted approval of S. 992. Our section council is composed of experienced lawyers, defense lawyers, prosecutors, FBI agents, professors, judges, and I don't think that there was anything that was presented to us in our last meeting which was in February, which received such quick and ready acceptance by everyone, as the principle of S. 992.

I find myself in disagreement with the distinguished witness who just preceded me, although I recognize the considerations which he has in mind in advising you and in testifying here.

I do not think that it is desirable to couple the research function with the operational function. I think to the contrary, it is wrong to do so, and the thing that I like about 992 is that which this gentleman does not like, is that it separates the two functions.

Senator, I have been practicing law for 15 years now, and of course, compared to your experience at the bar that is very little. But I do know that when I went to law school—and this is just, as I say, 15 years ago—those who were thought to be interested in criminal law were thought to be way out—there must be something wrong with a fellow who wants to do that sort of work. The best graduates didn't go into the criminal law. They were more interested in the more lucrative and profitable aspects of practice. Today, almost suddenly, almost overnight, and I mean by that in terms of the law, within 3 or 4 years, criminal law has suddenly become fashionable. A lot of people are getting interested in it. There is a growing, burgeoning focus, if you please. on the criminal law. I think that's fine.

Unfortunately, a lot of the folks are looking at it for the first time and do not have your experience, for instance, do not know what they are talking about. I consider it absolutely vital that we establish some kind of research agency within the Federal Government which can be properly staffed—in Senator Kennedy's words earlier—well staffed, neutral, nonpolitical, which can administer the kind of research program which needs to be done.

I am concerned that if we adopt the approach of 917 we will overwhelm the decisional basis of the individual who occupies such a position. There is, in the operating agencies, a need to show results now, Senator, the one thing of which I am convinced is that we need somebody who doesn't have to show results now. We need someone who can sit back, someone with experience, competence, with staff, with funds available, who can sit back and look at the thing from a long view.

For the last 3 years I have been engaged in the American Bar Association project to establish national minimum standards for the administration of criminal justice and it has been one of the most thrilling profesional experiences that I have had. On the particular committee which I serve is Luther Youngdahl, former Governor of Minnesota and a recently retired district judge in the district court here. In talking to Judge Youngdahl he used an expression on a couple of occasions describing his political philosophy—his phrase means something to me—he says that as Governor of Minnesota he used to prefer to think of the next generation rather than the next election. I think what we need is a research agency which will think in terms of the next generation—someone we are not calling upon to produce immediate results. I do not have a prepared statement and the reason that I don't is that I didn't know until just last week that I was going to be able to be here, and I wanted to come myself—I feel so strongly about Senator Kennedy's approach to this thing that I wanted to be here, if it was at all possible to do so.

I hope that the concept of S. 992 will be recognized, whether or not the safe streets and crime control bill is passed. I see no inconsistency. I see nothing wrong with having a separate agency in addition to whatever the Justice Department needs for its day-to-day operations.

In concluding I can only say that I feel that I have had a cahnce to discuss that with a lot of people who are much more experienced than I, particularly with our section council, and I have not found anyone who is really familiar, who has had his hands wet in the criminal law field who doesn't recognize the essential need for the kind of institution which is proposed by 992.

Now, I personally might quarrel with some of the concepts. I prefer not to have it in the Department of Justice. If it is to be in the Department of Justice I prefer to have it the way the Court of Military Appeals is in the Defense Department, that is "for administrative purposes only." But these are small points. These are things that perhaps later, if the thing is established and if the Congress really realizes its utility and recognizes its accomplishments, things that can perhaps be polished and improved.

I am very much in favor of the concept of S. 992 as it is and I hope, Senator, that you give it every consideration.

Thank you, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Walsh.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Mr. Walsh.

STATEMENT OF DR. ALFRED BLUMSTEIN, INSTITUTE OF DEFENSE ANALYSES

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I am honored by the opportunity to present my views on the need for a Federal research and development program for the prevention and control of crime, a program such as the one embodied in S. 992.

Although I speak only as a private individual, I should introduce myself by indicating that I am a member of the research staff of the Institute for Defense Analyses. For the past 15 months, I have directed the work of the Science and Technology Task Force of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice.

It was during that period that I became impressed with both the urgent need for a properly structured research and development program and the important contribution it could make in creating a criminal justice system that is both more fair and more effective.

In my testimony I would like first to demonstrate the urgent need for such a research and development program and the potential improvements that could result. I would then like to show why this is a proper and necessary function for the Federal Government to undertake.

NEED FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Our Task Force on Science and Technology was composed largely of scientists and engineers experienced in modern technology, much of it derived from work with military weapon systems. We were all amazed at the primitive level of technology with which the criminal justice system is forced to do its job:

In general, we were surprised to learn how undercapitalized is the criminal justice system: a $3,000 investment in a police car supports a $100,000 annual patrol operation; over 85 percent of most police budgets are used to pay salaries.

Some policemen are forced to stand idle on a street corner even though there may be an emergency nearby simply because they have no portable radios by which headquarters could reach them.

Motorized policemen who leave their radio-equipped cars cannot call for help if they are attacked because they now have no link to the car's radio. In contrast, many appliance repair companies now maintain continuous radio contact with their repairmen out in the field.

The car sent to an emergency is often other than the closest one because the dispatcher does not now know its correct position and availability, a capability that can be provided automatically.

In confronting a crime suspect or an unruly citizen, a policeman is forced to choose between a billy and a pistol—the same choice he was offered a century ago. Nonlethal weapons with a longer range than the billy but without a pistol's disabling characteristics are needed.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you mind a brief interruption at that point?

I do not know whether there is a philosophy developing to disarm the police of this country or not.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Not at all.

Senator MCCLELLAN. At times I get the impression from some material we read and things we hear. Would we be charged with inhumane treatment if we armed the police with something to knock out a dangerous or unruly suspect or put them to sleep? I am just wondering—he should not use the club unless he has to and, of course, should not use the gun unless he has to. Is that your idea, that we can get something in between, flash them in the face and put them to sleep, stop them in their tracks?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. We might provide a third choice—not to use when he has to use a pistol—there is no thought of disarming the police officer but merely to provide him an option when he doesn't have to use the pistol.

But not where he has no choice but to use it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I am getting at. Is there something, or is it your idea that in research we can develop something that will take the place of the pistol so that instead of shooting him and possibly killing him, that an officer could immobilize him, so to speak?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. One of the problems in completely disarming a policeman is that if a criminal knew that the policeman's only weapon was a nonlethal weapon, then he might be emboldened to take actions that would be hazardous to the policeman. So we don't want to completely disarm him.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Not completely?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. We don't want to disarm the policeman. I think we want to provide him with greater flexibility in meeting situations as they occur with whatever means is appropriate.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I want to get the record straight here at this point.

We keep talking about these new instruments that may be developed, and bear in mind, I am a thousand percent for research—every bit of it. I am committed to a bill that will provide the best way—I assume under 917 that adequate research authority is there. The administration, I believe, had in mind to institute a system or an operation of research and development of techniques. I want to support the bill on the basis that that will be done. But I would hate for the inference to ever appear or get abroad that what we have in mind is to ultimately disarm the police. I do not think that is very good psychology to go out to the underworld. I hope we will keep a little emphasis on the police being able to protect themselves along with doing more to protect society.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. I think that point is very much implicit in the suggestion.

Sentaor MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Although most of a patrolman's activities center about his vehicle, most police cars differ only slightly from the car a suburban housewife uses for her grocery shopping. Cars designed specifically for police use would include convenient radio controls, teleprinters, nonlethal weapons, photography, and other evidence collection kits, audio or video recording equipment, and specifically designed rear compartments for the transport of prisoners.

Fingerprints left at the scene of a crime cannot normally be traced to an unknown suspect, partly because the systems used are little different from those first introduced at the beginning of this century.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is an intriguing statement. Why is this so?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Because the structure of our fingerprint files—our normal fingerprint files are based on 10 fingers.

Mr. WALSH. They don't have a single print file except for peculiar kinds of crimes, Senator. The FBI does maintain some as far as jewel thieves and a few special categories of that sort. But as far as the single fingerprint or anything less than the full fingerprint card, they just can't match them. They don't have the mechanics to do it. It can't be done.

Senator McCLELLAN. Cannot that be done without a lot of research? Seems if they take one print they can take another.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Most major police departments have files, single-print files of a small number, a thousand or 2,000, repetitive criminals. But the process of searching is extremely tedious. Computer technology, pattern recognition technology, perhaps used in conjunction with an operator, could permit much more rapid searching of much larger files so that these so-called latent prints left at the scene of the crime could be traced to owners, even though their cards may be in the full 10-print file.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you favor a law of compulsory fingerprinting?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. I have not considered such law, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. That would be one way to get a file for everybody.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Right now, I believe, the FBI has in its fingerprint files 180 million sets of fingerprints, and in its criminal file about 16 to 17 million sets of fingerprints.

Senator McCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. New instrumentation techniques, permitting identification by voice, hair, blood, or clothing, are becoming increasingly effective. Unfortunately, their high cost and technical complexity have prevented most police departments from using them more widely.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is the area where the Federal Government can step in and perform a great service and be of great assistance in the field of law enforcement. They can make such techniques available to all local agencies throughout the country. That is what we have in mind in this research, is it not? Not just for the use of the Federal agencies, but to make the fruits of it available to all law enforcement agencies throughout the country.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. That is precisely the idea of providing Federal support to local law enforcement rather than only for Federal enforcement.

Senator McCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Court records are written and rewritten by hand even though many small businessmen use central computers to help maintain their inventories.

More generally, computers can be used throughout the system to help in providing immediate access to information needed for solution of specific crimes, for help in making sentencing and correctional decisions regarding the roughly 2 million convicted persons each year, and for more efficiency of the more than half million persons employed by the criminal justice system.

Even more important than all these technological needs and opportunities, however, is the fundamental need to discover the impact on crime of the many actions taken to control it. Very little is known to even a rough approximation about how much any prevention, apprehension, and rehabilitation program will reduce crime. And without such knowledge, how can we intelligently choose among them?

Patrol by marked police cars which demonstrate a visible threat to a potential criminal is widely accepted as good police practice, being known as "preventive control." But it is not clear what kinds of crime such patrol prevents, and how much of each. Nor is it clear under what circumstances patrol in marked police vehicles is more effective than patrol in unmarked vehicles, or whether using police resources in this way is more effective than assigning these same police officers to detailed followup investigation on specific crimes or to other kinds of preventive activity.

I don't presume to have answers to such questions. However, neither do the most vehement advocates of either side. Only through a carefully developed research program will we be able to identify the factors that give rise to various kinds of criminal behavior and the consequences of each of the many kinds of posisble actions that might be taken to control them.

The work of our Science and Technology Task Force identified some of the basic question in a form that now makes them amenable to research.

In some of our early discussions, we wondered about the consequences of actions by the criminal justice system on the people who pass through it. To address this problem, we developed a computer simulation model which calculated typical criminal careers of 1,000 persons arrested for index crimes for the first time. We calculated, for instance, that murder, rape, and robbery accounted for only 4 percent of the initial arrests but for 19 percent of the later arrests. Auto theft and larceny of $50 or over, on the other hand, accounted for 68 percent of the initial arrests but for only 35 percent of the subsequent arrests. These results, although they are still tentative because of poor data, raise questions about why successive arrests appear to be for more serious crimes. This phenomenon may be due to the aging of the individuals, to the development of antisocial attitudes, or possibly even to reactions to treatment by the criminal justice system. It suggests the seriousness, in terms of escalating criminal conduct, of the problem of recidivism. A question to be explored is whether the rearrest probabilities and the crime-type distribution become worse for those who are processed further through the system. If that is the case, it may result either from differences among individuals who reach the various stages or from the treatment itself. Unfortunately, data to examine such basic questions do not now exist.

As another example, early in our investigations we wondered what portion of our society is ever arrested. By analysis of various data on arrests and on arrest records we calculated that approximately one-half of the boys in the United States today will be arrested some time in their lives for a nontraffic offense. This estimate may not be exactly correct, and in any event, is not a literal prediction of the future. Rather, it is a projection based on current trends—changes in the future could well reverse these trends. Perhaps even more shocking than the figure itself, however, is the fact that so fundamental a question had not been explored previously. Furthermore, when the answer to so basic a question is surprising to so many, we can only conclude that much too little is known about what is going on in the criminal justice system.

We also need such analysis techniques to decide where to invest technological resources so that they can be effectively applied to our basic objective of reducing crime. To illustrate this, we collected data from Los Angeles on the factors that give rise to apprehension of criminals. We found, as we expected, that rapid police response to a crime call gave rise to more apprehensions. But we were surprised to find that unless the suspect is caught at the scene of the crime, or is identified by a victim or witness, that the chances of ever catching him may be less than 12 percent. We then compared alternative technological means for getting to the crime scene faster: more patrol cars, more telephone clerks answering citizens' calls, car-locater devices to find the closest patrol cars, and computer-assisted command and control systems in the command center. For the conditions of the hypothetical city we examined, we found that delay could be reduced most inexpensively by the most expensive investment: computer automation of the command center.

This was the best investment to reduce delay, which is correlated with apprehension by the police, which by the theory of deterrence is presumed to reduce crime. Such a chain of reasoning is necessary to make optimum technological choices, and all the links in any such chain need considerable strengthening.

Another place such analysis techniques can be beneficial is in the management of the courts. Through a computer simulation of the processing of persons arrested for felonies through the District of Columbia court system, we were able to show that the processing through the grand jury was the critical bottleneck, as to experiment with various possible changes in the operation of that court system—all without disrupting the critical ongoing operations of the court.

These very preliminary steps we have taken in only a few areas has convinced us that there is a significant contribution to come from a major research and development program. And we have not even touched on such areas as identifying basic causes of crime, treating drug addiction, planning a strategic attack on organized crime enterprises, selection and training of criminal justice officials, and many other areas that properly belong in a research and development program. In view of this potential, it is surprising that until the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance was established in 1965 the Justice Department was the only Cabinet department with no research and development program.

NEED FOR A FEDERAL ROLE

It may very well be that the application of science and technology to criminal justice has been retarded so long as a result of the fragmentation of the criminal justice system. We have over 40,000 separate police agencies, and several thousand court systems and correctional systems. Only a handful of these are large enough and rich enough to undertake major research or equipment development projects on their own. There is little incentive for them to do so, since that would probably be an inefficient investment of resources for any one of them. Although the results would benefit all, the innovator alone would have to bear the high cost. Even if the individual agencies independently conducted their own projects, we would probably see many of them pursuing identical questions not knowing of the work and results of the other. Furthermore, there would be little incentive for an individual agency to disseminate the results of its work to other agencies that might be able to use them.

This is a typical situation in which it is appropriate for the Federal Government to take a leading and coordinating role. The Federal Government could provide the risk capital to conduct the research or to develop the new technology at a cost that would be small by Federal standards but would swamp the budget of any individual criminal justice agency.

It could also assure that a coordinated and mutually supporting program is developed, and it could foster the implementation of the results. Without such a major Federal involvement, it appears unlikely that there can be significant innovation in the operation of the criminal justice system. And all recent trends in crime rates, arrest rates, and recidivism rates indicate that what we are doing today is inadequate to cope with the crime problem. It was considerations such as these which led the National Crime Commission to recommend:

The Federal Government should sponsor a science and technology RTD&E program.

Such a program would:

Undertake basic research into the causes of crime and into the consequences of actions taken to control it.

Provide for the development of equipment that could be widely used by criminal justice agencies throughout the country.

Create a coordinated program whose parts would complement and build upon each other.

Assure that the results of the program are made available in a form that would be usable by criminal justice agencies throughout the Nation.

Provide technical assistance and guidance to State and local agencies in planning and implementing their programs and to the Federal Government in administering its subsidy program.

In order for such a program to become effective, there must be demonstrated a clear Federal commitment to it. Experience in industry, in the Department of Defense, and in other government departments has demonstrated that, unless a research and development program is separately supported, its resources are likely to be diverted to other needs. The program's dollars and staff are the most likely candidates to be used to fight the current fires that are always blazing. Since research and development is investment for the future, it is very difficult for the future users to defend themselves against current demands. National policy, as established by Congress, however, must protect the future. One way to do that is by creating a separate and identified funding and organizational structure for the research and development program.

Regardless of its funding, a research and development program cannot be effective unless it attracts competent scientists, and engineers. In today's economy the demand for research and development talent far exceeds the available supply. Private industry, universities, and all levels of government are competing for this same pool of manpower.

If we are to attract into criminal justice the competence the program needs, then there must be demonstrated a major commitment to an effective program over an extended period into the future. This commitment should take the form of a specifically authorized research and development program, with long-term funding. The program should be headed by a scientist of the caliber of the research and development directors in the other Cabinet departments. His organizational position would thus also have to be comparable.

Only with such commitments, a philosophy embodied in S. 992, can a criminal justice research and development program bear the fruits of which it is certainly capable.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Dr. Blumstein.

I just want to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have had extremely important and eloquent testimony about the importance of research efforts from individuals who have had a long background of experience and concern about criminal justice. I think that one of the matters which is of great concern to me is that in 917 we do not have this specified to the degree that 992 would do so. We do have testimony of the distinguished Attorney General, that some $20 million will be used for title III of 917. I believe that the Attorney General would certainly carry through, because I believe he also recognizes the importance and significance of research.

But I think that we have certainly seen this morning among those whose experience reaches far back in the fields of criminology and criminal justice the importance and significance of having an independent and specific mandate for this kind of agency. I thought the testimony was extremely compelling with regard to institutionalizing the research and development program, which 992 does, and I am extremely hopeful that we can have full consideration of this legislation when this committee is considering the crime legislation in its markup.

I do not want to infringe on the committee's time any more. I want to express my appreciation to all of these gentlemen, particularly to Mr. Walsh who has come such a long way and because of own deep interest, for appearing here on this question; and also to express my appreciation to the understanding and patience of Mr. Hogan, who I see outside in the audience; Mr. Broderick, who has been extremely kind, and Mr. Rector. I know they are busy men as well.

With the permission of the Chair I would like to read just one very short paragraph which is taken from the National Municipal Policy, the National League of Cities. 1967. chapter 7, paragraph 10, which is "Crime Research and Prevention." This is the position of the National League of Cities.

It says:

Crime is a nationwide problem common to all of the Nation's 18,000 cities, each of the 50 states as well as the rural areas. Loss of life and property from criminal activity cost the Nation untold billions of dollars annually despite the expenditures of additional billions of dollars to maintain expensive law enforcement activities and penal institutions and only limited success has been achieved in the war against crime.

Significant reduction in criminal activities can be achieved only if the root forces of crime are isolated and attacked and if new crime-fighting techniques are developed. Because crime constitutes a nationwide threat to society the United States Government should undertake basic research into the causes and prevention of crime and the development and innovation of new crime-fighting techniques.

I want to have that in the record and I also have some other material which I will not take the subcommittee's time to read, but which I would like to have put in the record at this point. These are statements in support of S. 992 by Mr. Quinn Tamm, executive director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, and Mr. Milton Rector, executive director of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency; and an extremely relevant statement on the role of the Federal Government in developing the technology of criminal justice by Mr. Daniel L. Skoler, Associate Director of the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance of the Department of Justice.

(The matter referred to follows:)

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON CRIME AND DELINQUENCY,
New York, July 28, 1967.

HON. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: It is encouraging to us that the Congress, recognizing the urgent need for action in crime control, is moving with such speed on a number of law enforcement and criminal justice bills. We are concerned, however, that in the rush to develop action programs, the equally urgent need for careful research, evaluation, and planning will be overlooked.

It is for this reason and because, as the summer progresses, the dangers of speed increase, that the NCCD wishes you to know of its strong support for the concepts embodied in S. 992. We endorse the development of a systematic grant program for research on new approaches, methods, techniques and devices in prevention and control of crime. We are enthusiastic about a program of behavioral research into causes and prevention of crime and on police and correctional methods. We endorse a survey of Federal programs and needs for further assistance. We support the placement of this program in the Department of Justice so that its work will be integrated with other criminal justice programs and the day-to-day problems of those who administer them. And we hope that a national research institute would assume central responsibility for designing and assessing the research, evaluation, and planning of the Federal crime control program, and examining and approving these components of state and local plans.

We are, however, concerned that many of the duties projected for the National Institute of Criminal Justice are identical to some aspects of the Crime Control bill. This bill, and particularly H.R. 5037 as reported, would deal with broad planning and action programs for police, prosecution, courts, and corrections. Like S. 992 it would support projects in recruitment, education, and training of personnel, demonstration projects, and information programs and technical consultation. These are duties which we believe could be handled better by the administrators of the crime control program; and we think that giving identical duties to a semi-autonomous National Institute would weaken the research of both. It would encourage the crime control administrators to concentrate their resources on "action programs"; the demands that they do so are already great. And it would encourage the National Institute to emphasize training and consultation in its program. Neither would attend to the vital, but far less glamorous function of research.

Therefore, while we strongly support S. 992, we hope that you and the Senate Committee will consider reducing its scope of action to research of all kinds, surveys of current activity and need, development and scrutiny of evaluative procedures, and collection and dissemination of research information. We think that grants to State and local law enforcement agencies, fellowship programs, and extension work should be the responsibility of the crime control administrators.

Sincerely,

MILTON G. RECTOR, Director.

STATEMENT OF QUINN TAMM, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CHIEFS OF POLICE, ON S. 992, A BILL TO ESTABLISH A NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

The genesis of official police organizations occurred in this country as the result of citizens desiring to pay other individuals to perform their duties of safeguarding our communities. In Colonial times, of course, each man had to stand a watch as part of the unorganized constabulary.

In the intervening 300 years since this practice first began to exert itself, the citizens of this country and their governments have continued to leave protection and law enforcement in the hands of individuals hired and paid as police officers. Unfortunately, as the individual citizen became less involved in the protection process, so has his interest in his police forces diminished. As a result, the police have been largely ignored by their constituents and by their governments in the development of protective and law enforcement techniques.

Police agencies and their functions have been left to grow and develop something like Topsy. The result is a hodgepodge of unstandardized operations, some of which are outstanding and some of which are mere jerry-built structures of errors.

The term research is almost completely foreign to police operations. Let me emphasize this, however: The police in my estimation have done a magnificent job of bringing themselves to the level of enforcement techniques which exists today. This did not come about, however, through research as it has been applied to most other endeavors in this Nation; it came about through trial and error on the part of dedicated men attempting to raise the level of their professions without adequate funds, adequate equipment, adequate public and political interest, adequate time and adequate technical knowledge.

S. 992, introduced by Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, and its counterpart in the House of Representatives, introduced by Representative James H. Scheuer of New York, certainly constitute a step toward alleviating the lack of the vital resources to which I have referred. Should the National Institute of Criminal Justice become a reality, I predict that the police of this Nation will, for the first time in history, be able to determine more specifically why they exist, what their function is, the nature of the beast with which they are grappling and, most importantly, how they may break through the mysterious barriers which are preventing a reduction in crime.

The police today are operating much as they did in Frontier days. The equipment is virtually the same. But, the crimes, the demands of a higher civilization for more attention to individual rights and the crushing problems caused by the urbanization of our society have made their tasks the more complicated. Technique and technology in almost every endeavor affecting the well-being of our citizens have kept pace in practically every field but law enforcement.

Even the most basic police tools are archaic. For instance, when one considers the field of communications, a policeman operating alone on his beat is in some instances completely isolated and on his own. Today, through communications, this Nation can control the movements of a satellite millions of miles from the Earth, change its direction and make it function much like a human. At the same time, however, a police communications center frequently cannot contract a police officer a mile from headquarters. When a policeman leaves his vehicle, he is out of touch completely with headquarters in most of our communities. It seems that some of this communications technology could be applied to the police, and the research envisioned by S. 992 could certainly bring this about.

Take the police car as another example. The automobiles used by police today are nothing more than souped-up versions of the standard passenger car. Is this correct? Is this the best that can be provided in a society which requires the highest mobility for its police? Why isn't there some research conducted to design a prototype police vehicle which may not even resemble today's passenger vehicle? Should the officer manning the vehicle be seated in a higher vantage point than he has in today's common automobile? Should the steering apparatus be on the right rather than the left so that he can observe buildings, sidewalks and those places where the action is? Should some thought be given to designing astronaut-type contour seats in police vehicles in order that on an 8-hour stint the police officer will not become fatigued and will be alert? Should there be some means for him to activate the car radio in order to contact headquarters when he is not in the vehicle? Should the car be narrower in order to ply through today's congested traffic? Should he not have infrared devices to magnify his vision during the night-time hours when crime is more prevalent?

These are but a few questions which are applicable on two of the most basic pieces of police equipment.

It cannot be hoped that automobile manufacturers would devote the necessary funds and effort to engineering such a prototype vehicle with the limited market which exists for police cars. No city, county or state has the wherewithal to conduct such research and design.

The answer then lies with the establishment of a resource organization such as the National Institute of Criminal Justice, and I urge its creation.

While I have devoted my thinking to the hardware aspects of what the National Institute of Criminal Justice could improve, I do not want to overlook the research which would come about aimed at the human problems in crime. We must learn why our judicial processes have no apparent deterrent effect on crime. We must solve the enigma of recidivism. We must delve into why our young people are so isolated from society and why they so often resent and violate those restrictions which we call the law.

The problems are many and the resources are sparse. Should S. 992 become a reality, I believe we can begin to dissipate the fog which has obscured these problems for so long.

Federal Assistance in Developing the Technology of Criminal Justice

By Daniel L. Skoler, Office of Law Enforcement Assistance, U.S. Department of Justice

A variety of events, most centered within the past two years, have combined to produce a recognition of the seriousness of the nation's crime and public safety problems, a commitment of national energy and resources to their alleviation, and a consensus that modern science and technology can play a major role in this effort.

In March 1965, for the first time in history, a President of the United States saw fit to present to the Congress a special message on crime.[1] In this message, he drew attention to mounting crime statistics, described the detrimental effect of crime on individual and national well-being, and outlined a program of federal assistance to the state and local governments which bear major responsibility in our governmental system for the preservation of law and order. This program included (i) the establishment of two Presidential crime commissions—one to conduct a searching study of crime, law enforcement, and criminal justice in America and the other to perform a similar function for the nation's capital area, (ii) the launching of the nation's first federal aid program exclusively devoted to improvement of state and local law enforcement and crime control capabilities—an effort of demonstration and experimental proportions, (iii) the advancement of a number of federal legislative proposals directed to specific crime control problems—gun usage, treatment of narcotics offenders, unification of federal correctional services, recodification of the federal criminal law, etc.

This theme has continued for two successive years, reinforced and reaffirmed by substantially similar Presidential declarations in 1966[2] and 1967,[3] a record of vigorous and, we believe, productive activity in implementation of the original White House mandate and culminating in two major developments—one a conclusion and the other a prelude. These refer, first, to the completion and release of the report and findings of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice and, second, to the advancement of a new and massive legislative program for financial subsidies to the agencies of criminal justice and for continuing research and development to upgrade the effectiveness of the nation's law enforcement response.[4]

It is interesting to note that from the beginning of this sequence of events, both the Administration and the Congress saw in the nation's remarkable space age and systems technology a source of untapped and substantial help. As the nation viewed what appeared to be a rising tide of violent crime, an apparent inability of our correctional institutions to effectively redirect criminal behavior and motivations, and an institutional apparatus which seemed unable to cope with its law enforcement and criminal justice workloads, the successes of science elsewhere stood out as promising models. Thus, the President stated in his 1966 message:

"If we knew today of better measures to deal more effectively with crime, we would seek to adopt them. But we do not yet have the answers.

* * * * * * *

"The computer has revolutionized record-keeping in modern industry. Surely it can do as much for criminal records. Modern electronics has made it possibl(to summon a doctor from his seat at the opera. Surely it can do as much to make police instantly responsive to public needs. And there may well be yet unimagined contributions which science can bring to the field of law enforcement." [5]

And the Attorney General reported to the Congress as it considered the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965:

"The same sophisticated and intensive method of attack that has successfully developed rockets must be used in analyzing law enforcement techniques. . . . Many ideas need to be developed. Among them are: computer identification of fingerprints; personalized radio transmitters for patrolmen; better police weapons; faster transmission of citizens' complaints of crime; electronic apprehension aids in business. More sophisticated equipment for the collection and dissemination of information is also required." [6]

And Congressional leaders took the floor in both House and Senate to advance such propositions as:

"This country, which will spend $21 billion [sic] on research and development this year, could well apply much of the benefits of this massive research effort to the protection of its own citizens and to the maintenance of law and order in our great urban centers, given the requisite effort. The $10 million to be appropriated equals less than one-twentieth of one per cent of the annual expenditures for scientific research carried on in this country—truly a modest beginning.[7]

"The crime problem demands the same kind of research techniques and priorities which we have assigned to our defense effort, the space programs, and the battle against disease and illness . . . [it] lends itself to solution by modern research techniques, including operations research, systems analysis, and electronic computers. This belief has been fortified in the past two weeks by conversations with skilled professionals in the scientific and law enforcement communities. Surely a government which spends on the order of $15 billion a year on research projects ranging from putting a man on the moon to a search for a cure for the common cold, can place some part of its efforts in the battle against the growing menace of lawlessness." [8]

And the President's Crime Commission departed from traditional analytical and jurisdictional lines to establish, in addition to its four major study groups on assessment of crime, police, courts, and corrections, an additional "task force" on science and technology.

And now the Crime Commission has passed its legacy to the nation, strongly affirming the value of "science and technology" in the struggle against crime and proposing a major niche for a scientific and technological research program in its 8-point program of recommended federal support.[9] As summarized in the Commission's outline of proposed "national strategy":

"Chapter 11 of this report has shown that the skills and techniques of science and technology, which have so radically altered much of modern life, have been largely untapped by the criminal justice program. One extremely useful approach to innovation is the questioning, analytical, experimental approach of science. Systems analysis, which has contributed significantly to such large-scale government programs as national defense and mass transportation, can be used to study criminal justice operations and to help agency officials choose promising courses of action.

"Modern technology can make many specific contributions to criminal administration. The most significant will come from the use of computers to collect and analyze the masses of data the system needs to understand the crime control process. Other important contributions may come, for example, from: flexible radio networks and portable two-way radios for patrol officers; computer assisted command-and-control systems for rapid and efficient dispatching of patrol forces; advanced fingerprint recognition systems; innovations for the police patrol car such as mobile teletypewriters, tape recorders for recording questioning, and automatic car position locators; alarms and surveillance systems for homes, businesses and prisons; criminalistics techniques such as voice prints, neutron activation analysis and other modern laboratory instrumentation.

"The Federal Government must take the lead in the effort to focus the capabilities of science and technology on the criminal justice system. It can sponsor and support a continuing research and development program on a scale greater than any individual agency could undertake alone. Such a program will benefit all agencies. It should stimulate the industrial development, at reasonable prices, of the kinds of equipment all agencies need. A useful technique might be to guarantee the sale of first production runs. It should provide funds that will enable criminal justice agencies to hire technically trained people and to establish internal operations research units. It should support scientific research into criminal administration that uses the agencies as real-life laboratories." [10]

As indicated, this "science and technology" thrust is to be exhibited in many contexts and modes of participation—systems analysis, field experimentation, equipment and facilities development, definition of equipment and system standards, consulting and technical services, industry stimulation, and well-financed research centers. Primary initial "payoff" is expected in the areas of the information and communications sciences and in operations research and systems analysis which probes beyond hardware needs to organizational and operational problems confronting law enforcement and criminal justice agencies. Greatest immediate impact should be felt in the police field which shoulders the heaviest dollar and manpower burdens in crime control and, in all program components, federal aid will be an important element.

It is the purpose of this paper to explore and offer observations concerning the federal role in implementing this facet of the national strategy—scope, size, models, characteristics and anticipated problems of a science and technology program in the law enforcement area.[11] In so doing, reference will be made to other federal experience and more questions will be posed than answered—most with less certainty and thoroughness than the topic warrants—but hopefully with sufficient particularity to lay bare relevant issues.

Federal Capacity for Stimulation of Scientific Research and Development

To suggest that federal assistance has a significant role to play in developing the science and technology of criminal justice—or, for that matter, of any field of social endeavor—borders on understatement. Today, with more than $15 billion for its annual research and development budget, the Federal Government supports almost two-thirds of the research and development work of the nation.[12]

This is a far cry from the special Congressional appropriation in 1832 that authorized what was probably the first federal grant for experimental research—a $1,500 allocation to the Franklin Institute at the University of Pennsylvania to investigate the reasons for explosions of steamboat boilers.[13] The current federal research picture is almost equally remote from that prevailing just prior to World War II when the government's total R&D budget, an effort focusing primarily on support of the agricultural sciences, is estimated to have aggregated less than $100 million annually.[14]

Whatever these antecedents, the technological demands of World War II established a clear federal initiative and expertise in research program support which has grown steadily in both volume and scope and continues to grow today. Fifty-five years ago annual expenditures for research and development were in the range of $10 million. By the end of World War II they had swollen to a billion dollars; thereafter, outlays increased to $3 billion by 1955, $8 billion by 1960, $12 billion by 1963, and over $15 billion today.[15] Throughout this period, considerable experience has accumulated in patterns and techniques of funding, advisory and technical review, accommodation of political responsibility with scientific independence, support for the facilities and manpower development necessary for effective research, formulation of research policy, and the creation of new aggregations and instrumentalities to serve special needs.[16] Roles have been fashioned for universities,[17] profit-making corporations, special-purpose laboratories and research groups, aggregations of the foregoing, and "in-house" (i.e., within the Federal Government) research facilities. While this has been accomplished primarily within the context of the national defense effort, science and technology has shouldered major responsibility in other federal programs—non-military space exploration, non-military atomic energy applications, conservation of natural resources, agricultural engineering and production, health and medicine, development of general scientific capabilities, economic development and analysis, etc. And, while most R&D investiment has been in the applied science area and closely related to the specific purposes of the sponsoring federal agency, even the most "mission-oriented" programs have found it desirable to make some funds available for basic research to advance fundamental knowledge in fields relevant to their interests.[18]

While it may be—undoubtedly is—unrealistic to regard this aggregation of federal experimentation, variation, and experience as residing in any single, properly evaluated data bank or pool of experience, the fact is that extensive and perhaps unique expertise is harnessing research to serve national policy lies within the federal ambit for "science and technology" efforts to study and draw upon.

Past Federal Participation in Development of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Technology

Despite the impressive record of federally-supported research since World War II in many areas of social concern, such efforts in law enforcement, criminal justice, correction of offenders, and crime prevention have been modest. This, in part, reflects the recency of federal recognition of crime control as an appropriate area for extensive grant-in-aid investment. It was recently estimated that total federal assistance of any kind—research, training, facilities, technical assistance, demonstration projects, etc.—having some relevance to local law enforcement, criminal justice, and crime control activities aggregated less than $20 million annually. At best, a minority part of this could be classified as R & D support within the context of this analysis.[19]

With largesse (and a sense of responsibility), perhaps characteristic of researchers in interpreting their mandates, it is interesting to note the investigators went beyond examination of scientific issues relevant to boiler explosion to recommend a draft bill, later enacted, which became the nation's first regulatory legislation affecting business enterprise (Steamboat Inspection Service).

For several years (nearly a decade) the National Institute of Mental Health has sponsored a program of behavioral and sociological research in crime and delinquency (nature and causes, personnel and agencies, treatment and rehabilitation of offenders), which currently runs about $8 million per year. Subsequently a training and demonstration program focusing directly on delinquency and youth crime was authorized under the Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Offenses Control Act of 1961. This, too, has involved a substantial social science research component and stabilized at aid levels in the order of $8 million annually. Both of these efforts have operated within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare primarily as grant programs with a significant intramural research component in the National Institute of Mental Health program. Despite many positive features and research successes, neither has involved a "hardware" emphasis, nor any substantial investment in systems analysis or operations research outside of traditional criminological and sociological analyses.

In terms of hard technology, one can point only to the continuing refinement of applied police laboratory techniques by the Federal Bureau of Investigation crime lab and a significant interest and investment by the Atomic Energy Commission in development of neutron activation trace analysis for identification of criminal evidence in investigative and prospective efforts. Over a period of 5 years, AEC has invested approximately $200,000 in development research in this area, largely incident to its program of encouragement for non-military applications of nuclear energy technology. In the very recent past, NASA and NSF have brushed the field in a few exploratory efforts—one related also to neutron activation analysis, another to human factors research and program budgeting approaches to metropolitan police patrol vehicle and manpower operations, and still others to social organization of police and prison systems.

This activity—or lack of it—is not only understandable in the context of lack of federal impetus and direction for R & D in aid of criminal justice but also reflects a void characteristic of the local and private sector as well. One scientist has described the situation as follows:

"Physical and social sciences have been applied to crime prevention at a relatively low level of effort for perhaps three quarters of a century . . . We spend about $3.5 to $5 billion a year on law enforcement and crime prevention activities. Corresponding to almost any industrial effort, 3 percent of this [100 to 150 million] to improve the effectiveness of the effort would be so reasonable as not to require great justification." [20]

And the President's Crime Commission has pointed out:

"The scientific and technological revolution has so radically changed most of American society during the past few decades has had surprisingly little impact on the criminal justice system . . . The police, with crime laboratories and radio

[19] As described in the Justice Department Hearings on the 1966 Supplemental Appropriation Bill, 89th Cong., 1st Session, part 3 at p. 184 (GPO 1965):

"Our estimate of the total current level of annual expenditures for State and local assistance in crime-related areas by Federal grant and related service programs is approximately $20 million. The bulk of this amount (at least 75 percent) is for youth crime and delinquency programs and only a small fraction (probably less than 10 percent) relates to the law enforcement area of the criminal process (as opposed to correction or rehabilitation of offenders, research on the nature of crime and criminal behavior, or the courts and related agencies of criminal justice).

networks, made early use of technology, but most police departments could have been equipped 30 or 40 years ago as well as they are today." [21]

Until the advent of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965, there was in fact no general federal commitment to assistance in local law enforcement and crime control problems. As indicated, that statute was a major element in the "war on crime" launched with President Johnson's 1965 crime mesage and a companion to the Crime Commission studies. The Act was proposed and has operated as a modest demonstration and experimental effort ($7.25 million per year) aimed at stimulating activity and improvement in all segments of the criminal justice process—police, courts, corrections, and prevention—and at all levels of endeavor—training, operational techniques, studies and research, agency planning, citizen action efforts, management and organizational improvement, scientific and technological development.

The "science and technology" program under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act has been a modest one, beset by the same money constraints confronting all other LEAA program focuses. Nevertheless, it has moved forward in these first 15 months of operation and, hopefully, in a rational way. Basically, the program has consisted of:

(a) A comprehensive survey of potential applications of science and technology to the agencies, methods, and problems of crime control [22] (the largest single LEAA project award to date).

(b) Two national symposia bringing the scientific and law enforcement communities in dialogue on, first, general problem definition; second, exploratory excursion into specific problem areas.[23]

(c) Approximately a dozen individual "R&D" projects divided among (1) general information system design and development—national state, and metropolitan models, (2) application of computer, operations research and ADP technology to specific operational and management problems and (3) development of laboratory techniques and capabilities (neutron activation analysis, residue research in arson, and national survey study of lab facilities and personnel).[24]

The initial focus on $.5 million worth of "science and technology" feasibility study, formulated with cooperation from and monitoring by the President's Crime Commission, has obviously adhered to concepts of good scientific practice in approaching a new target area. The symposia would likewise seem to qualify as manifestations of "good scientific form" at this stage of program activity. The scattered and concurrent selection of individual science and technology projects might, however, raise some question.

These, too, have had their purpose (apart from immediate technical goals) and a not insignificant one. Given the action mandate of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act (Lyndon Johnson—Our efforts against crime must not be limited to long range programs. . . The Law Enforcement Assistance Act will give us the means to accelerate the fight against crime now) and the need to begin de-

Laboratory techniques and capabilities efforts include Grants 013 (national survey), 015 (arson research), and Contract 67-13 (neutron activation analysis). velopment to credible models and formats, we look with satisfaction at these projects.[25] Our six law enforcement information system projects all emphasize careful pre-study and design, involve competent consultant help, and thus introduce a needed deliberative factor in the race for on-line computer capability attracting more and more law enforcement agencies. It is hoped that these will set healthy standards for the many systems that are bound to follow. Additionally, the national crime information system development effort offers potential benefit to all state and local agencies. Our three projects seeking to utilize information, ADP and operations research capabilities for development of specific new operational techniques (e.g., patrol allocation, resource allocation, crime prevention) will help multiply hardware effectiveness for all potential users. Here, too, innovative and technical competence have been guiding criteria. Our three laboratory-focused projects all offer promise appropriate to their goals and dimensions. Taken together—survey, symposia, and individual projects—this has involved an LEAA investment of more than $2.2 million or approximately 20 percent of all project monies awarded to date.[26] The remaining months of fiscal year 1967 will add roughly 50 percent to this investment (dollars and number of projects) to provide, we believe, a credible impact for the resources allocated.

Special Considerations Relevant to a Criminal Justice R&D Effort

There are several constraints which would seem to warrant consideration in blueprinting any "science and technology" program in crime control. Their articulation should help distill viable approaches from the wide range of alternatives available from other federal experience.

(a) Size of Effort. The most frequently drawn analogies in support of the R&D potential for criminal justice improvement are those of the defense establishment and our national space exploration, nuclear energy, and health research programs. However, the vast contrast in dollar outlay for these programs as against our most optimistic hopes for a law enforcement effort should be closely examined. Using even 5-year-old figures (fiscal 1963), these R&D precedents emerge as many times larger than what can reasonably be expected for the war on crime.[27]

[25] The majority of LEAA "science and technology" projects referred to above and other LEAA supported research (14 projects in all) have been the subject of paper, panel, or work-group presentations at the Illinois Institute of Technology's First National Symposium on Law Enforcement Science and Technology (also supported by LEAA funds) and thereby disseminated to the more than 1,000 representatives of the scientific and law enforcement communities in attendance (March 7–9, 1967). These include LEAA grants #010 (study of accelerant residues in fire remains at Washington State University); #013 (national survey of crime laboratory facilities, manpower and training at N.Y.C. College of Police Science); #015 (metropolitan information system design in D.C.); #030 (computer simulation for police resource allocation and organizational improvement in N.Y.C.); #044 (measurement devices for community tension and violence potential in Houston); #039 (computer mapping and related patrol resource allocation experimentation in St. Louis); #049 (data banking, crime prediction and development of suppressive and action strategies in Philadelphia); #051 (integrated criminal justice information system design in California); #021 (public survey crime victimization measurement by the National Opinion Research Corporation); #071 (model police communications system design in D.C.); and contracts 66–0 (national crime information system telecommunications requirements and code standardization by FBI which Institute of Telecommunications Sciences and Aeronomy); 66–10 (analytical study and models re narcotics and dangerous drug traffic and enforcement by Arthur D. Agency	R&D expenditures [1] (billions)
Department of Defense	$7.1
National Aeronautics & Space Administration	2.4
Atomic Energy Commission	1.4
Health, Education, and Welfare	.7

[1] Estimated R&D expenditures (i.e., obligations, inclusive of plant) for the current fiscal year (1967) are $7.4 billion for DOD, $5.0 billion for NASA, $1.5 billion for AEC, and $1.2 billion for HEW. National Science Foundation expenditures, which were $160 million in 1963, will surpass $300 million. See Federal Funds for Research, Development and Other Scientific Activities, National Science Foundation, 195 pp. (Pub. 66–25, Govt. Printing Office 1966).

Assuming a foreseeable R&D buildup in criminal justice to $50 to $80 million annually (a reasonable but probably optimistic forecast) the quantitative difference may carry qualitative implications. Fifteen times smaller than the most modest of the above programs (health and medical research at over $1 billion annually in 1966 [28]), the criminal justice effort may have to watch its figurative step: (i) First, it will probably not be able to command the industry attention that the more affluent defense, space, and atomic energy programs have been able to attract. Constraints on support for contractor and grantee facilities, for investment in competing approaches and investigations, and for proceeding with a generally lavish hand in funding research will necessitate more careful and deliberate action; (ii) As an "economy size" program, the National Crime Commission recommendation for substantial investment in major scientific and technological research programs within one or a few research institutes would seem to make particular sense. Only by this method may it be possible to achieve the "critical mass" necessary to attract top talent, facilities, and aggregations of the foregoing to criminal justice research; and (iii) Since the Justice Department may never be a prime R&D market, development of the necessary expertise, discrimination and, indeed, agency aggressiveness in research contracting may be hard to come by. Utilization of the know-how of other major contracting agencies for procurement and proposal work may result in quicker and more efficient dollar deployment. There is no reason, for example, why a defined requirement for a light-weight portable radio receiver for patrolmen could not be farmed out to the Army Procurement Agency with its extensive experience in communications contracting—and, in the process, spare the Justice Department the complex administrative and audit structure required for wide-scale procurement of this character.

(b) Nature of Effort. Whereas the bulk of federal research support (over 85%) already goes to applied research and development as opposed to basic research, the criminal justice science and technology effort should probably do so in even greater degree. With the latter's anticipated modest resources, basic research can better be left to the National Science Foundation (which has a major mandate in this area) plus the basic research components—and they are substantial—of the defense, space, and nuclear energy programs. This need not be detrimental even from a non-budgetary standpoint since so much of the basic research conducted by other agencies (information and communications technology, trace analysis, etc.) should be transferrable or adaptable for law enforcement use.

One "basic resource" investment, however, should perhaps not be ignored That is the development of trained manpower to work with the technology of criminal justice. The extensive scientific manpower development programs administered by the National Science Foundation (and other major R&D agencies) may not be able to adequately feed the manpower pool required for criminal justice R&D unless graduate study opportunities directly in the field are provided. NASA experience indicates a high retention rate for its graduate fellowship recipients, i.e., their continuance in space-related research work whether in government, universities, or private industry (over 50%). Although criminal justice needs will be modest, there may be a natural reluctance for the well-trained physical scientist to move in this career direction and a program of graduate and post-graduate fellowships (not very costly—less than 1 million for 150 candidates annually) may help insure an adequate supply of scientific talent.

[28] Compare also the smaller R&D efforts of the Departments of Commerce, Interior, and Agriculture—105, 155, and 270 million dollars, respectively, in fiscal 1966 (estimated)—still 2 to 4 times larger than the criminal justice projections offered here. It is interesting to note also that basic and applied research in the social and psychological sciences, so pertinent to the fields of criminal justice and crime control, absorbs only 6% of the total federal research budget (development excluded—fiscal 1966 figures) and that industry remains the nation's prime R&D performer today (69% of national total—65% of federally-supported R&D) with intramural, university, and other non-profit performers at substantially lower levels of participation (20%, 12%, and 4% respectively). See Federal Funds for Research Development and Other Scientific Activities, National Science Foundation (Government Printing Office, 1966).

(c) Character of the Market. In the defense, space and even atomic energy programs, the Federal Government remains the chief consumer of the products of sponsored research. The criminal justice situation will more closely resemble that confronting HEW in its medical and educational research programs where ultimate users will be state and local communities. This raises, in addition to problems of technology development, problems of technology utilization which may prove as complex and tenacious as the former. It suggests that a number of supporting services may have to be developed, including:

(i) an effective program for dissemination and demonstration of R&D knowledge and results;

(ii) special techniques for "spread" such as guaranteeing markets or production output for needed hardware innovations as inducements to industry;

(iii) initiative in establishing standards for equipment and equipment systems to permit wide and flexible utilization of technology.

These are emphases which might be less critical to a defense procurement agency seeking to meet a new weapons requirement. Each presents serious complexities, perhaps heightened by political obstacles to change that may be encountered in local law enforcement agencies and structures.

(d) Independent Versus Departmental R&D Effort. It has been suggested that the national research effort would be better served if administered by an independent agency outside the Department of Justice.[29] The National Science Foundation can be cited as a model for this approach—or perhaps the large R&D programs conducted by such independent agencies as the National Aeronautics and Space Administration or the Atomic Energy Commission. It is interesting to note, however, that each of these structures was developed in response to new and large problems (national science capabilities, space exploration, nuclear energy utilization) not at the time covered within existing jurisdictional bounds of established departments. On the other hand, problems of health and medicine, manpower, education, and other areas of federal-local interest have been accommodated—and reasonably well—within departments which have traditionally concerned themselves with these matters.

In view of (i) the Justice Department's traditional concern with and expertise in crime, law enforcement, and corrections, (ii) growing technical assistance and service components within its bureaus and divisions for support of state and local endeavor,[30] (iii) likely assumption of responsibility in the near future for massive "formula grant" programs to help subsidize state and local criminal justice operations, and (iv) what would seem to be a desirable trend in government organization to reverse the proliferation of independent agencies directly responsible to the chief executive—the same type of umbrella that engrosses the Public Health Service within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare may prove desirable in the criminal justice area. This does not mean that an R&D structure within the Department of Justice should not be accorded the attributes and substantial independence of a "national foundation." Indeed, this format may be desirable. The important issue is whether, with the natural and growing ties between federal and local law enforcement and criminal justice administration, a complete bifurcation of federal policy direction between R&D and general grant-in-aid and operational collaboration is desirable.

[29] The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society, President's Crime Commission, supra n. 9, ch. 12 at p. 277 (National Foundation for Criminal Research).

[30] The Federal Bureau of Investigation has developed a wide variety of such services, highlighted by training, laboratory, and now computerized information retrieval services. Both the Bureau of Prisons and Criminal Division have intensified their service activities to local agencies and will be committing greater resources to such efforts in the future (e.g., Prison's New Communities Services Division, on-going jail inspection service, and national prisoner statistics program and Criminal Division's national auto theft and burglary prevention campaign and prosecutor training materials and guidelines).

(e) Complexity of the Problem. One final caution should be introduced in assessing the contribution of space age technology to achievement of more effective crime control capabilities and criminal justice apparatus. This is the possibility that the task may be a more difficult one than that presented by the challenges of defense weaponry, space conquest, or even mass transportation. Such analogies, articulated frequently by "science and technology" advocates and echoed in the National Crime Commission report, do not seem to involve in comparable degree either the behavioral complexities or delicate political and social values which inhere in our crime control problems and institutions. The types of "social engineering" now inventoried among the areas of active involvement of the systems analysts still have a quantitative and physical ring (city planning, traffic control, economic allocation, etc.) which seems to fall short of the range of difficulties presented by the phenomenon of crime. It may also prove to be the case that this field offers less potential for gain through operations research and systems analysis than others. Further, with the expection of police activity and possibly metropolitan misdemeanor courts, the number of transactions and subjects dealt with by our criminal justice systems may be sufficiently modest as to preclude the realization in some situations of optimal cost or organizational benefits to be derived from information, communication, or other system sophistication. Finally, the basic validity of the proposition that poverty, ignorance, and social injustice lie at the roots of crime may serve to confound or arrest the "science and technology" contribution as it has the social science and behavioral research "know-how" thus far devoted to the crime problem.

When sophisticated scientists approach this field, and perhaps in recognition of the foregoing complexities, many seem to exhibit a tempering of initial optimism. As one research administrator stated:

"We, as technologists, are bound to be very surprised and may I say challenged when we walk into a field where the very basic definitions are open to question . . . Some people, and I was one, walked into this field thinking that there was a great similarity between this and counter-insurgency. I would like to tell you that I was wrong. The methods are different, the devices are different and the similarities can be extremely misleading." [31]

Whatever the case, the "case has not yet been made" and without minimizing the value of pursuing all avenues offered by modern knowledge, we should nevertheless be prepared for the possibility that science and technology may fall short of expectations in many undertakings. This, of course, need not derogate from what successes can be achieved nor in our general determination to exploit this tool to the utmost in dealing with crime.

Toward an R&D Budget

Some observations as to size of the federal R&D investment in criminal justice were previously made—i.e., $50 to $80 million annually—as a projection of buildup in the near future within the context of the total law enforcement assistance program contemplated by currently pending legislation.* Because of the importance of dialogue on both the extent and contours of such a budget, a breakdown has been ventured based largely on an interpretation of the findings and needs identified by the criminal justice "science and technology" survey commissioned in 1966 by the Department of Justice in cooperation with the President's Crime Commission.[32] The projection, completely unofficial, assumes an "R&D" investment commencing at $20 million per year and increasing within three to four years to the $50 to $80 million dollar level. Within this framework, a $75 million budget might be allocated as follows:

[31] Eugene Fubini, address at National Symposium on Science and Criminal Justice, June 1967. Proceedings p. 14 (Government Printing Office 1967).

[32] LEAA Contract No. 66–7, supra f.n. 18.

* Under the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, it has been estimated that $300 million will be required for fiscal year 1969 for the total program contemplated by such legislation (Attorney General's Statement before Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Judiciary Committee, March 7, 1967) and the Attorney General has further indicated the possibility that aid could grow to $1 billion annually during the 5-year operational period initially contemplated (testimony before House Subcommittee No. 5, March 15, 1967). The projected "R&D" investment of $50 to $80 million would represent a 5% to 8% allocation against a billion dollar base—if anything, on the modest side for a federal developmental effort of these proportions. The budget breakdown presented in this paper is illustrative only. It does not reflect and has not had the benefit of extensive study, both as to total amounts and individual allocations, required for sound programming.

	Annual cost (millions)
1. Research Institutes (four-support for basic operating expenses & variety of projects)	14
2. Total Systems Analysis (8–10 jurisdictions—State & metropolitan—plus national study; includes data collection)	9
3. Operations Research & Field Experimentation (40–60 projects—police, courts, corrections, crime prevention)	11
4. Demonstration Information Systems (Approx. 10–15 info. systems projects)	5
5. Simulation Centers (2–3—primarily police operations)	2
6. Equipment-System Development:
Fingerprint automation	3
Command and control centers	2
Crime laboratories	5
Radio systems and car locators	2
Miscellaneous (weaponry, car design, alarm technology, etc.)	5
7. National Criminal Statistics Center (primarily intramural effort)	4
8. Individual Research & Study Projects (40–60—behavioral research, legal analysis, study of nature of crime and specific offenses, analysis of agency organization and management, personnel and human resources development, etc.)	10
9. Standards & Standardization Projects	2
10. Science & Technology Graduate Fellowship Program (150 students annually)	1
Total	75

The foregoing assumes (i) a competent in-house federal staff to administer the program with appropriate technical expertise but functioning primarily at the program administration level; (ii) substanial "farming out" of specific hardware development; (iii) several advisory groups to develop funding priorities and assess projects; and (iv) one research and analysis organization among the proposed centers with particularly close ties to the federal program and a role in the latter's own evaluation, organizational analysis, and operations review. The budget is, of course, independent of the equipment, construction, and other subsidies possible under the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, some of which will quite likely be allocated by local agencies for computers and ADP facilities, crime lab equipment, etc.

Conclusion

The topic of this discussion has been federal assistance in developing the technology of criminal justice. Perhaps the most important point to be made is that without federal aid, such development, if it comes at all, will be hard and slow. The investments necessary are obviously beyond the means of individual states and cities and the opportunities for gain which might attract substantial investment by industry are sufficiently uncertain as to preclude reliance on this factor. Because the order and type of "science and technology" effort blueprinted by the President's Crime Commission and discussed in this paper requires only the most modest of priorities (—probably one of the lowest federal R&D investments among major "social problem" programs) and because the nation seems aware and determined to deal with its crime problem, there is good reason to believe that resources will be matched to needs, and as part of the total response, an age-old problem will be brought under the surgical, and hopefully, remedial eye of modern science and technology. This paper has attempted to highlight some of the salient issues and considerations in any such effort, and, in so doing, help contribute to a proper launching.

I want again to express my appreciation to Dr. Hornig, Dr. Blumstein, my colleague, Mr. Scheuer, who is carrying the battle in the House of Representatives and has, I think, made a very useful comment and testimony here today and has been the real leader in the House of Representatives in this endeavor.

I want to thank the Chair.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Senator.

I am wholeheartedly in support of the very best research program we can devise. I not only support the authorizing legislation but will support the necessary appropriations. I think it can be of great help and I think that there is a need for it.

I would like to ask a question or two about the use of these devices once they are developed. But first I would like to get your definition, your interpretation, of "criminal justice"? We hear this phrase over and over. I think it ought to be defined somewhere. We may have different ideas about it. What is your idea? What is "criminal justice," Doctor?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. I have spoken about the criminal justice system which I define to be the system of police, criminal courts and correction and the collection of activities engaged in by that collection of agencies.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You could also call it the system of law and order, could you not? What would be the difference?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. The system of law and order provides essentially the background, the basis for the operation of the criminal justice system.

I am operationally oriented, Senator, toward the things that work to bring about law and order through the criminal justice systems. It is very clear that crime is controlled by many agencies, many actions outside the criminal justice system. But we are concerned in a major part of our work with the operation of this criminal justice system.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In many places where the term is used there could be substituted more appropriately the term "social justice." I do not think it is criminal justice of any kind for a guilty person to escape punishment because the law is not being enforced, do you?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. That is certainly true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So, I think social justice is involved here, whether we protect society or not. It is a social justice, is it not?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. I agree entirely where society is unprotected.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You cannot use the term "criminal justice" unless you give it a rather strained construction because criminal justice might very well fail to include social justice, do you not think?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. To the extent that it fails is an inadequacy of the criminal justice system.

Senator MCCLELLAN. One other question. You talk about the development of techniques. Is it your belief that these techniques can be and should be used against the criminal to detect and apprehend him, and to develop proof of his guilt as evidence?

Mr. SCHEUER. Yes, very definitely. I come from a district where crime in the street is far and away the major cause of concern of my constituents.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So you feel they ought to be used.

Mr. SCHEUER. Absolutely. And let me particularly zero in on a point you made, Senator. There is widespread concren, and I am not going into the validity of the concern, but that concern is based upon the results of the Miranda and Escobedo cases and the capability of our criminal justice system to apprehend criminals and prove their guilt. It seems to me we are more conscious than ever before of the rights of individuals in our society than to pursue the even tenor of their lives without fear of the violent attack on the streets and without the diminution of the quality of their lives. It seems to me that we might quote Grover Cleveland when he said we are faced with a condition and not a theory. The theory is that the Escobedo and Miranda cases are there. We cannot use interrogation and confessions in the fashion in which they were formerly employed. So perhaps we have a vacuum. What more constructive result can we look for in shoring up the capability of our criminal justice system than to improve it for science that Dr. Blumstein was adverting to and to bringing out of their rather primitive state of development, the science of blood identification, fingerprint identification, hair identification, handwriting identification, voice identification? We have the scientific capability to do far more in terms of identifying a suspect as the perpetrator of a crime than we used to if we would only apply our existing science and technology capability.

And it seems to me when a suspect is brought before the bar, if we cannot use his confession and if we cannot interrogtae the way we used to, well perhaps we ought to put more resources into other ways of identifying that suspect as the actual criminal.

Senator McClellan. If we cannot use a suspect's confession, if we cannot require him to answer questions—and I don't mean that he should be compelled to testify against himself at trial—but if he is protected and shielded from any interrogation by officers who are undertaking to enforce the law, then how much would new techniques help this situation? As you know, in certain crimes the only leads possible are those developed from the suspect's own statement.

If we carry this theory very far in protecting the rights of the suspects, I doubt that officers would have the right to fingerprint him. What chance have officers to get that possible evidence against a suspect when they are not permitted to interrogate him without a lawyer present, and without certain warnings? Do you have an answer for that?

Mr. Scheuer. Until some court of law says we do not have the right to do that, I assume we do have a right to getting fingerprints, to get a blood sample.

Senator McClellan. Do you think it violates the individual's rights, his personal rights, to make him do that, to give evidence against himself? Do you agree with that position?

Mr. Scheuer. I would not be prepared to take that position, Senator. And to this I don't believe the Court has taken that position. I would like to bring to your attention a recent U.S. Supreme Court decision, Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966), where a blood sample was taken over the defendant's objection and the evidence of a chemical analysis of the blood was introduced at his trial.

In considering whether or not such evidence could be admitted, the Court said that:

> We hold that the privilege (against self-incrimination) protects an accused only from being compelled to testify against himself, or otherwise provide the State with evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature, and that the withdrawal of blood and use of the analysis in question in this case did not involve compulsion to these ends. . . . (384 U.S. at p. 761)

* * * * * * *

"Not even a shadow of testimonial compulsion upon or enforced communication by the accused was involved either in the extraction or in the chemical analysis. Petitioner's testimonial capacities were in on way implicated; indeed, his participation, except as a donor was irrelevant to the results of the test, which depend on chemical analysis and on that alone. Since the blood test evidence, although an incriminating product of compulsion, was neither petitioner's testimony nor evidence relating to some communicative act or writing by the petitioner, it was not inadmissible on privilege grounds. (348 U.S., at p. 765)

I feel that it should be noted here that this was a 5-to-4 decision and that, therefore notice should be given to the reasoning set forth by the dissenting Justices. In their dissent, the Justices seemed to be more concerned with the fact that the test involved an involuntary taking of blood than in admitting the results of the test per se. Chief Justice Warren, in his dissent in Schmerber, referred to his dissent in Breithaup v. Abram, 352 U.S. 432. In Breithaup, which considered the same question as Schmerber, the Chief Justice said:

We should, in my opinion, hold that due process means at least that law enforcement officers in their efforts to obtain evidence from persons suspected of crime must stop short of bruising the body, breaking skin, puncturing tissue or extracting body fluids....

Justice Douglas and Justice Fortas adhered to the views set forth by the Chief Justice in Breithaup.

So it would appear that the Supreme Court would certainly allow the results of various forensic tests to be used as evidence in criminal trials, particularly if these tests did not involve doing any violence to the accused or were left at the scene of the crime.

In the case of handwriting, the Court made a similar ruling in Gilbert v. California, 35, Law Week 4614, the Court ruled as admissible samples of handwriting taken without the suspect's consent.

Senator McCLELLAN. Neither am I prepared to take such a position, nor am I prepared to take the position of the majority of the Supreme Court that you have no right to interrogate a suspect.

Mr. WALSH. All they have said is that they can't take you down to the police station in the dead of night and interrogate him alone.

Senator McCLELLAN. No; it says you cannot interrogate him about the crime if he is a suspect, unless you tell him he is entitled to a lawyer and give him other warnings set out in Miranda. Am I right?

Mr. WALSH. No, sir; I don't think you are.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, I disagree with you.

Mr. WALSH. The police are free to go out and do all the interrogation they want without warning of any kind if they will do it out in the field instead of taking the person down to the police station.

Senator McCLELLAN. Can they do it in his automobile?

Mr. WALSH. In the policeman's automobile? Probably not. If a policeman at once put him under arrest then all these rights begin to flow. But the FBI, for instance—I hate to think how many Federal cases I have tried where they have had all kinds of admissible statements, statements that would be admissible under any late current tests.

If they want to go up and interrogate a fellow in his own surroundings, that is one thing. I had a case last year where a young man was thought to have committed a crime. I have known his family for 15 years or so and I am absolutely satisfied that the fellow was innocent. As a matter of fact, he wanted to help the police as much as they wanted his help. He had made, on the evening of the offense, a detailed statement to police; he cooperated with them in every way. The police in turn, from all other likely evidence, from all other likely avenues of approach, decided that he was the likely suspect and, therefore, he was the one that they wanted to try and convict. My advice to him, as his lawyer, was: As long as they want to question you about this and they want to do it at your school or place of employment, cooperate with them in every way and tell them anything they want. But if they decide that they are going to arrest you and take you down to their steel concrete jail, and they want to interrogate you there, at that point, tell them you want me there."

Senator McCLELLAN. That is advice you gave as his lawyer. But he did not have to answer out there before you were present or even when you told him to answer. Some other lawyer might have told him something different.

All lawyers are not going to cooperate as well as you did in that instance.

Mr. WALSH. We were just as interested in solving the crime as the police were, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. You were; but not everybody is.

Mr. WALSH. The point that I make is, the police would have been entitled to ask him questions out there, in my opinion.

Senator McCLELLAN. Not if he had become a suspect.

Mr. WALSH. Even if he is a suspect, as long as he is not in custody and not under arrest. That was the thrust of Judge Lumbard's testimony before this committee.

Senator McCLELLAN. If the officer says walk out here, I want to ask you some questions, and he answers in effect, "the devil, I want to walk off," how is the officer going to question him unless he takes him in custody?

Mr. WALSH. He has the right under the fifth amendment. The police don't have to advise him of all those rights unless they first arrest him and place him in custody.

Senator McCLELLAN. One other question.

If we ever use these devices, these techniques, what is your suggestion about the use of wiretapping, electronic devices in serious criminal cases? We have a technique there we could use. I am talking about using it under strict court order, comparable to issuing a search warrant. What is your comment about that?

Mr. WALSH. Senator, if you are asking me, I will say there is no way you could tap a telephone under a court order that would satisfy the fourth amendment. If somebody wants to tap my telephone they are not only listening to me; they are listening to every individual who may choose to call my law office and that is the essential difference between the search warrant contemplated by the fourth amendment. That gives a named place, a named individual, a named offense which the individual, which the policeman can go out and in good faith, execute. He can search my office, assuming he has a valid warrant.

Senator McCLELLAN. In searching your office would he not see many things you would not want him to see besides what he is looking for?

Mr. WALSH. That may be, but he is not listening to every conversation with every client who would call me. If I got a search warrant to search Senator McClellan's telephone I would be listening to every constituent, every Federal employee who might have an occasional call to you. There would be no way to limit it. That I think is the ultimate vice in the wiretapping situation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are we to permit organized crime, the hoodlums, the underworld, to continue to use this technique but not combat it with the same effort, the same instrumentalities?

Mr. WALSH. Senator, organized crime is basically a police problem. You do not have organized crime without the consent and toleration of the police. We do not have organized crime in Houston.

Senator McCLELLAN. They have the court on their side. They are still operating effectively with this instrumentality. What difference does it make if they have the police or court or both? It is still a crime and still doing great damage in this country.

Mr. WALSH. I don't think you have an organized crime situation in the community where the police will not tolerate it. I do not think you have an organized crime situation in the community unless the police will tolerate it. We do not have organized crime in Houston, Tex. It doesn't exist and our local law enforcement people wouldn't permit it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Why not use it to catch the corrupt policeman and hoodlum and the underworld character? Why not use it to catch both? If it is going on I think the end justifies the means because of conditions we have in this country today with organized crime increasing. It is definitely entrenched in many localities and wiretapping is one of the most effective ways to get to the top. You say we ought not wiretap, that law enforcement must be denied this instrumentality that gives the criminal the opportunity to flourish. I do not agree. We must go out and fight crime with weapons that are as effective as those used by the criminal or we are going to mollycoddle around and just talk a great deal and proceed on a lot of theories while crime continues to increase. We are going to have to hit at the source of it, where we can, and hit hard.

I believe we have testimony that out in the street, in the open, only about one out of 12 perpetrators of crime is apprehended; is that right?

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. Twelve percent, one out of eight.

Senator McCLELLAN. One out of eight. That is where it is out in the open. It is high where there are no witnesses.

Dr. BLUMSTEIN. It is about one out of four of index crimes and 12 percent where there was no one at the scene—12 percent.

Senator McCLELLAN. I had some statistics on this recently, I think I got them from the Crime Commission report. If I am not mistaken there is only about 12 out of 100 that were actually apprehended and punished for serious crimes. That left 88 out of a hundred that absolutely escaped any punishment. I do not think you can have effective law enforcement with the odds that heavy against society's protection. I just do not think you can have it until we get instilled in the minds of the criminal and would-be criminals that he is running a very grave risk when he goes out to commit these serious crimes. As long as he feels like the odds are one out of a dozen, or something, of that order, he is not going to be too apprehensive about punishment. These are things that concern me. This is the time for all of us to speak out against such an intolerable condition.

Mr. WALSH. That is why we supported the kind of research program that we are hoping this committee will approve.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Research is all right. You can research from here to the moon, but if you do not punish these criminals, they are going to continue to commit crimes. If they are going to get by with it, they are going to continue with their life of crime.

Mr. WALSH. We are trying to reduce the odds.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am also for punishing those who are guilty. You talk about reforming. Some of these people you can never reform. The beginner—certainly. Give him every chance, and I am for that. Establish these halfway houses and everything else and give them every opportunity for rehabilitation. But when they continue to repeat these heinous crimes they forfeit their rights and I am for putting them away, out of society.

Mr. WALSH. I don't disagree with you. I think there are some people who are absolutely incapable of any kind of reform and these people need to be locked up and put away for society's protection. There is no question about it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have them now on the streets, they are being turned loose. You can talk about improving the system of justice. This is one of the critical areas, in my view, that needs improvement. These habitual criminals, continually repeating crimes—are just turned loose on society. I do not know all the answers. But I think I am right about this. The trends of today cannot continue beyond another decade. You can talk about the enemy from without—the aggressor who might attempt conflict with this country and the free world. Meantime, we fall apart from within. the internal security of this country is in danger as well from internal sources operating today, the criminal forces in this country, the lawlessness. I think we have an equal or greater danger to our survivals as a nation from these internal enemies than from any external danger.

Congressman Scheuer said something about how to recruit policemen to keep cool. Well, when science can determine who is going to keep cool under given circumstances—when someone can do that they will make a great contribution. You cannot get policemen of any kind today. We have got a shortage of 11 percent in the District of Columbia. That is why I favor not only training, but I favor in the administration bill the possibility of higher salaries. I am not concerned about the Federal Government paying them directly, but I would rather see the Federal Government help bear other expenses like facilities, training, equipment, and so forth, and let the local governments determine the measure of pay. Salaries must be increased, otherwise you are not going to recruit or keep policemen. Organized crime will corrupt the police and that is maybe where it is generally conceded. I am no expert in that field. But what incentive is there to a policeman today, anybody to become a policeman? No wonder recruitment is difficult. Not only are they underpaid, poorly equipped, undertrained, but they become, more or less, the accused in a criminal trial in a good many instances today. Too many cases are tried against the police on the theory that every crime involves police brutality. I do not agree. I am not one of those who think all the policemen in the country or law enforcement people are corrupt. I think we have some wonderful dedicated men and sometimes I wonder why any of them, those that are dedicated, remain on the police forces and try to protect society under the conditions that exist today. I am with you 100 percent on the research. I do not know the best way between the two bills. But when we go to mark up this legislation I am going to support research and very generously so.

I want to see it get in operation and get moving so we may realize results from it.

Gentlemen, thank you. Thank you very much.

Mr. Hogan, will you come around, please?

Senator KENNEDY. I am sorry to interrupt. I will be unable to be here at the testimony of Mr. Hogan. I am going to take it with me. I will read it, for I have great respect for him. He is a very close friend of Mr. Garrett Byrne who is the district attorney of Suffolk County, and in whose office I worked as an assistant district attorney, so I know him both professionally and privately.

I regret I will not be here but I will look forward to studying his testimony in some detail.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Hogan, would you prefer a recess and come back at 1:30? I may want to ask you a lot of questions but I want to do whatever is most convenient to you.

Mr. HOGAN. You are very gracious. Whatever is most convenient for you will be all right with me. I am hoping to go back to New York at 4 o'clock.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You will be able to do that, I am sure, if we start at 1:30.

Let us proceed for a while.

Mr. HOGAN. If this is the customary time for recess——

Senator MCCLELLAN. I just happened to look at the clock and saw it was 12 o'clock. Yesterday or the day before we ran until 1 o'clock or 1:30 before recess.

Mr. HOGAN. I am happy to accommodate you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Why not let us go ahead and start with you. If you wish to read all of your statement or just put it in the record——

Mr. HOGAN. It is long. I am perfectly willing to follow your suggestion.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I suggest this, then. I do not want to deprive you of anything. I suggest you read what you want to and comment on it, and I will ask the reporter to follow you in any part that you maybe omit in your prepared statement and it will be printed in the record at the point where you skipped.

Mr. HOGAN. I have two different statements here and if they can be put in the record, since I will skip about, that will be satisfactory.

STATEMENT OF FRANK S. HOGAN, NEW YORK COUNTY DISTRICT ATTORNEY, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. HOGAN. Senate bill 675 would make it unlawful for any person to wiretap other than duly authorized law enforcement officers acting under court supervision.

I note among the findings in section 2 of the bill the following:

(c) Modern criminals make extensive use of the telephone and telegraph as a direct instrumentality of crime and as means of conducting criminal business. In some circumstances, interception of wire communications in order to obtain evidence of the commission of crime is a necessary aid to effective law enforcement.

I wholeheartedly concur in that finding. It sums up, in a few words, everything that has been said about the importance and the necessity of legalized wiretapping.

I have served in the office of the district attorney of New York County for 32 years, the last 25 of them as district attorney.

On the basis of that experience, I believe, as repeatedly I have stated, that telephonic interception, pursuant to court order and under proper safeguards, is the single most valuable and effective weapon in the arsenal of law enforcement, particularly in the battle against organized crime.

In my judgment, it is an irreplaceable tool and, lacking it, we would find it infinitely more difficult, and in many instances impossible, to penetrate the wall behind which major criminal enterprises flourish.

THE NEW YORK EXPERIENCE

In New York, as you are aware, by vote of the electorate in 1938, our State constitution was amended to authorize court-ordered wiretapping, where it could be shown that there was "reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime may be thus obtained." In 1942, implementing legislation placed the entire procedure under judicial control. Statutory requirements were enacted to restrict the use of this privilege to intercept and to make certain that civil liberties were not abused in the utilization of the privilege. In 1958, similar laws were passed to bring eavesdropping by electronic device, commonly known as "bugging" under judicial control with correspondingly strict safeguards on the use of this technique and severe penalties for its unlawful use.

The judicially supervised system under which we operated has worked. It has served efficiently to protect the rights, liberties, property, and general welfare of the law-abiding members of our community. It has permitted law enforcement to undertake major investigations of organized crime.

In my statement I have listed a number of them going back 30 years.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see a number of them. Could you state with reasonable assurance to this subcommittee that these top hoodlums whom you name as members of the crime syndicate would not have been convicted or could not have been convicted except for the fact that you were permitted to use wiretapping or electronic detection devices to get evidence against them?

Mr. HOGAN. I state so emphatically, and the records of our investigations will bear out that statement in each case.

Senator McCLELLAN. If we can enact a law to meet the test laid down by the Berger decision, and I think we can, we are still confronted with the argument that you might hear me talking to my girl friend; or you might hear me talking about a business deal and I would not want anybody to know about it.

Well, of course, we all have private conversations we would not want anybody to know about. But there must be some sacrifice. We cannot have everything and give nothing. Freedom cannot be maintained without giving. We pay a price for it. We, in my judgment, will have to pay a price for law enforcement. It gets down to that point. Is the risk of having an occasional conversation overheard where something is said that you would not want anybody else to hear going to deter our law enforcement officials from combating organized crime, or is that presumed right of privacy more precious to us than using this instrumentality to effectively combat organized crime? I think that is the issue before us.

Mr. HOGAN. I think it is a very small price that we pay for the protection of society.

In the first place, this privilege is sparingly used. In my statement I point out that every year we have some 62,000 criminal matters in New York County. We have averaged 70 court orders for interceptions for the past 25 years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Some 70 per year?

Mr. HOGAN. 70 per year. Last year it was 66, as I recall it, with something like 20 renewals or extensions. This is in a county which has approximately 2 million telephones. Moreover, I don't think people realize the number of policemen, the number of detectives, that are required to man one of these plants. You must have no less than four and very often six, because if a conversation comes over indicating a meeting between Criminal A and Criminal B, you have got to have an automobile and you have got to have detectives there to cover that meeting. So that this is sparingly used.

In my office almost exclusively it is used in the field of organized crime. Now, moreover, a detective has a recording machine—used to take it down in inadequate shorthand, but now he has a machine, and if there is a personal conversation he is more than likely to turn the machine off. He is not interested in that, just as if he were maintaining surveillance of a criminal, he wouldn't be a good detective if he were watching other people in a restaurant or making observations with respect to innocuous incidents for which he wasn't being paid. His mind is on his job, his eye is on the ball and he is putting it down, he is recording only those things that relate to the crime that he is investigating. So that in any police work, by the very nature of police work, the police are going to see many things, overhear many things that are innocent, but that is an exceptionally small price to pay. There must be some invasion of our liberties if we are to offer any protection to members of society. And as you pointed out earlier, in a typical search warrant, the persons knocking at the door and going in, they observe everything in that room. If they are looking for stolen bonds, they may go through everything in your files, but they aren't making notes for purposes of blackmailing or anything of that kind.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It was brought out here that you can subpena letters that have been written in the greatest confidence, and bring them into court—subpena a document or any number of documents.

There is one other thing that we ought to get established here. As you point out, only in 60, 70, less than 100 instances was it used in 66,000 criminal proceedings, is that correct?

Mr. HOGAN. 62,000.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So the possibility that it would be used against any citizen at any time is almost completely remote, is it not? I am talking about a law-abiding citizen.

Mr. HOGAN. It would be a fraction of a tenth of 1 percent. Moreover, Senator, I should say my own experience is—I see every application that is submitted—that is an office rule—no application is submitted to a judge unless I have read it—and my conclusion over the years is that at least 80 percent of those persons whose telephone conversations are intercepted have criminal records and often very long criminal records.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I point out. The law-abiding citizen has nothing to fear, does he?

Mr. HOGAN. Of course not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Does a law-abiding citizen have anything to fear from the policeman being armed?

Mr. HOGAN. He certainly does not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is the point. There has to be a presentation to a court of competent jurisdiction under oath, alleging and swearing to the information you have that gives you reasonable cause to believe that the planting of a detection device or the tapping of a telephone will secure evidence of a crime. Is that not true?

Mr. HOGAN. That is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, it would be pretty hard to meet those requirements against a law-abiding citizen, would it not?

Mr. HOGAN. If the police officer, Senator, or the District Attorney negligently or through prejudice went in with an inadequate affidavit, it would be the judge's province to examine and decline him the right to do it. That is why there is so much virtue in the bill which introduces the court as the responsible agency for issuing the order. For years, in the Federal system they haven't required any court authorization, which I think is wrong. I don't think even the Attorney General of the United States should be permitted to do this without court authorization. But where you have court authorization, as Senate bill 75 provides, there is ample protection for the law-abiding members of the community and indeed for criminals who are not presently engaged in any crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think the law-abiding citizens have got to make up their minds whether or not they are willing to take such a minor risk as may be involved in order to better guarantee a free and safe society in which to raise our families. If we are unwilling to take this small risk, then organized crime will continue to flourish until we have no safe society.

Mr. HOGAN. Senator, I think law-abiding citizens are willing, eager to accord this privilege to law-enforcement personnel, and I would be perfectly willing to abide by a vote. But, unfortunately, legislators are not willing to take the risk. They sense that this is not regarded as a nice thing to do, to listen in while somebody is planning a murder. The Attorney General of the United States refers to electronic equipment as abhorrent devices. This, in my opinion, is ridiculous. If you are going to make an out-and-out attack on organized crime and then say this isn't cricket, you mustn't do this, then it is just asinine.

Senator McCLELLAN. We have witnesses who just preceded you who want to go into a great program of research. I agree.

Mr. HOGAN. I do, too.

Senator McCLELLAN. But the Attorney General says we do ourselves a disservice in the use of statistics on crime. I believe he said, if I am quoting him correctly, or substantially so, we do ourselves a great disservice by the use of these statistics. Are not statistics a part of research?

Mr. HOGAN. I think he said—and I have included it in my statement—that wiretapping and eavesdropping were not essential and they were not productive. And he said they had cases to prove it. I know nothing about his cases, but I know about our cases, and my statement is long because I have been specific. I have described a number of cases, a number of investigations where this privilege was accorded to us, where arrests took place, and that is the best answer I can give to the Attorney General. And I may say that within my experience, going back to 1935, this is the first time an Attorney General has reflected such thinking. I have included in my statement also, Senator, a letter sent to you by every living former U.S. attorney from the southern district of New York.[1] Now, this is the busiest U.S. attorney's office in the country. It is in the center of the organized crime area where narcotics is a great problem, and gambling, and where there is a concentration of these top gangsters, and where, former U.S. attorneys like Chief Justice Lombard of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Supreme Court Justice Saypol, Justice McNally of our appellate division in New York, Myles Lane, the chairman of the State investigation commission—every last one of them agreed that electronic eavesdropping was essential. And I can't believe that those U.S. attorneys, serving from 1929 on, didn't reflect faithfully the convictions of the attorney generals serving from 1929 until very recently.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you not think that their experience over this long period of time would qualify them as well if not better than the Attorney General to speak with authority on the subject?

Mr. HOGAN. With great respect to the Attorney General, a fine person and a fine lawyer, I don't think he has had any experience in this particular field.

His predecessor, who was counsel to your committee, Senator, did have that—Senator Kennedy did have that experience when he was serving as your counsel. I think he had a particular interest in this and I was pleased only a month ago when I was in Washington talking to you, and I went around to speak to Senator Robert Kennedy and I found that he is still of the same conviction that this is a most valuable weapon for law enforcement and he approves heartily, enthusiastically, of Senate bill 675.

I spoke to Senator Javits at the same time and he pledged support for the enactment of this bill which as you say will have to be altered to correspond with the standards proclaimed by Justice Clark speaking for the majority of the Court.

I have included in my statement, Senator, some suggestions for changes which I think meet the Court's criticism.

[1] Letters referred to appears at page 511.

I may say also that our office in New York is busy at the present time drafting a substitute statute for the Code of Criminal Procedure Statute which was found inadequate by Justice Clark. I anticipate the final draft of that statute will be ready in about a week, and I will be very pleased to send your counsel copies of that for such use as you may wish to make of it.

Senator McCLELLAN. We will be very glad to have that.

May I just ask you one other question and we will recess for lunch?

I think you have had about 30 years' experience with wiretapping, have you not?

Mr. HOGAN. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. At the rate of 50, 60 applications per year—70—you have had somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 applications for a wiretap or electronic surveillance during that 30-year period of time. Would that be about correct?

Mr. HOGAN. 2,000, 2,100 for 30 years, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Out of all of those wiretaps or electronic surveillances—and you cite the number of convictions of top hoodlums or underworld characters which were secured by reason of your use of this device to detect crime—Mr. Hogan, have you ever had one case in New York where there was an abuse of the authority to conduct such a surveillance?

Mr. HOGAN. I think of no case in New York County where this privilege was abused. Moreover, the New York State Legislature appointed a committee some years ago and spent better than 3 years investigating the utilization of the privilege over a period since 1942. It dug into the files in my office, of the police department, of other district attorneys throughout the State. There was a great hue and cry about possible abuse of the privilege at that time, and I think the chairman of the committee and others thought they were going to find evidence of abuses. But after 3 years they acknowledged in the report that they found not a single abuse of this privilege.

Senator McCLELLAN. When was that report made?

Mr. HOGAN. I made reference to it—I do not want to depend on my memory—it is in my statement.

Senator McCLELLAN. Counsel tells me the study began in 1955.

Mr. HOGAN. Assemblyman Savarese was the chairman of the committee.

Senator McCLELLAN. It has not been established or demonstrated that there has been one instance of abuse in 30 years of experience with court controlled wiretapping in New York State.

Mr. HOGAN. If I may just read briefly the conclusions which I stated: This conclusion, moreover, is supported by investigations of legalized wiretapping.

Beginning in 1955, a joint legislative committee conducted a 5-year study in the State of New York inquiring particularly into possible abuses by law enforcement officers. This investigation had come into being as a result of the hue and cry being raised at the time about supposed wholesale invasions of privacy.

In its report, the committee explicitly declared that no abuses whatever by any district attorney had been found in the use of the wiretapping privilege. Quite the contrary. The committee concluded that the system of legalized telephonic interception had worked well in New York for over 20 years, that it had popular approval, and that it enjoyed the overwhelming support of our highest State offices, executive, legislative, and judicial. There was unanimous agreement that law enforcement in New York had used this investigative weapon fairly, sparingly, and with the most selective discrimination.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

We will stand in recess until 1:45.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the subcommittee recessed, to reconvene at 1:45 p.m., this same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator McCLELLAN. Proceed. I hope not to interrupt you as I did. I will let you resume with your prepared statement.

Mr. HOGAN. With your permission, since you have been kind enough to incorporate both statements in the record and since I have to be a clockwatcher and you have other witnesses, I am just going to make some brief references to the wiretap statement and then, if you will indulge me, we will talk a few minutes about the second statement that I have on confessions.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are going to have the wiretap statement printed in full at this point.

(The complete statement of Mr. Hogan follows:)

STATEMENT OF FRANK S. HOGAN, NEW YORK COUNTY DISTRICT ATTORNEY, ON S. 675

Senate Bill 675 would make it unlawful for any person to wiretrap other than duly authorized law enforcement officers acting under court supervision.

I note among the findings in Section 2 of the bill the following:

"(c) Modern criminals make extensive use of the telephone and telegraph as a direct instrumentality of crime and as means of conducting criminal business. In some circumstances, interception of wire communications in order to obtain evidence of the commission of crime is a necessary aid to effective law enforcement."

I wholeheartedly concur in that finding. It sums up, in a few words, everything that has been said about the importance and the necessity of legalized wiretapping.

I have served in the office of the District Attorney of New York County for thirty-two years, the last twenty-five of them as District Attorney.

On the basis of that experience, I believe, as repeatedly I have stated, that telephonic interception, pursuant to court order and under proper safeguards, is the single most valuable and effective weapon in the arsenal of law enforcement, particularly in the battle against organized crime.

In my judgment, it is an irreplaceable tool and, lacking it, we would find it infinitely more difficult, and in many instances impossible, to penetrate the wall behind which major criminal enterprises flourish.

THE NEW YORK EXPERIENCE

In New York, as you are aware, by vote of the electorate in 1938, our State Constitution was amended to authorize court-ordered wiretapping, where it could be shown that there was "reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime may be thus obtained." In 1942, implementing legislation placed the entire procedure under judicial control. Statutory requirements were enacted to restrict the use of this privilege to intercept and to make certain that civil liberties were not abused in the utilization of the privilege. In 1958, similar laws were passed to bring eavesdropping by electronic device, commonly known as "bugging," under judicial control with correspondingly strict safeguards on the use of this technique and severe penalties for its unlawful use.

The judicially supervised system under which we operate has worked. It has served efficiently to protect the rights, liberties, property and general welfare of the law-abiding members of our community. It has permitted law enforcement to undertake major investigations of organized crime. Without it, and I confine myself to top figures in the underworld, the New York County District Attorney's Office, under the leadership of my distinguished predecessor, Thomas E. Dewey, and during my own tenure, could not have convicted Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Jimmy Hines, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, Joseph "Socks" Lanza, George Scalise, Frank Erickson, John "Dio" Dioguardi and Frank Carbo. Joseph "Adonis" Doto, tried in New Jersey, was convicted and deported on evidence supplied by our office and obtained by assiduously following leads secured through wiretapping.

In December, 1957, the United States Supreme Court, in the Benanti case, held that Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act forbade the interception and divulgence of telephonic communications by State as well as Federal officials.

It was news to us that we, together with judges, police officials and other prosecutors in New York State, had been committing Federal crimes for twenty-odd years. In our defense, let it be noted that we became lawbreakers under most respectable auspices. Our State Constitution and our Code of Criminal Procedure authorize us to intercept and to divulge telephone conversations which constitute evidence of crime. But Federal statutory law had now been interpreted in such a way as to bar us from using such wiretap evidence in a court of law.

Someone had said that the Supreme Court has erected a vast superstructure of opinion law on a "sleeper" of thirty-one obscure words in the Federal Communications Act which were never intended to interfere with the police powers of the several States. The words in question were never debated nor even mentioned in the Congressional deliberations prior to the enactment of the law in 1934, nor in the entire act is there any reference to wiretapping as an instrument of law enforcement.

Indeed, both prior to and since 1934, there have been efforts in the Congress to enact a ban on telephonic interception that would apply to State law enforcement officers. These efforts failed, but they certainly would never have been attempted, if the legislators had any notion that they had made law in passing the Communications Act, as the Supreme Court in the Benanti case insisted they did.

On numerous occasions, prior to the Benanti ruling, our office supplied information and evidence obtained from wiretaps to many other jurisdictions throughout the United States which resulted in the apprehension and conviction of notorious criminals.

Over the years, also, our office has been able, with court approval, to provide Committees of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives with transcripts of telephone conversations which proved of great value to them in important Congressional investigations.

The late Senator Estes Kefauver wrote to me in 1951 endorsing a statement of a magazine writer that material from the New York County District Attorney's Office—brought to public attention at the hearings of the Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce—"helped make the Senate crime investigation a smashing success." Virtually all of that material had been uncovered by court-authorized wiretaps.

Telephonic interception enabled us to give similar assistance to the Select Senate Committee investigating organized crime's infiltration of labor and business. In letters to our office and in the Congressional Record, Senator John McClellan, the Chairman of the Committee, expressed appreciation for our cooperation. Senator Robert Kennedy, then counsel to the Committee, made constant use of our information and knows how valuable electronic surveillance is to the preservation of law and order.

No member of Congress ever raised the slightest objection to the receipt or use of the valuable information which my office had obtained by legal wiretapping and was enabled by court direction to make available to them.

Surely these facts shed some light on the question of Congressional intent in the enactment of the Federal Communications Act of 1934.

Yet the Supreme Court tells us that it is a crime under the act for us to intercept and divulge telephone conversations. And that is the law of the land.

The result, obviously, has been to place the prosecutor in a dilemma. He is sworn to investigate and prosecute crime and to use all legal weapons available to him. One of the most important of these weapons certainly is legal wiretapping. But if that key weapon is used, he may find that by so doing he violates Federal law.

This is completely repugnant to all prosecutors. We are not only obliged to uphold the law; we must do all possible to maintain respect for law. When it comes to observing the law, we want to and should set the example.

Our State's highest court, the Court of Appeals, has held that evidence obtained by legal wiretapping is still admissible despite the Federal Court rulings.

But we cannot, in good conscience, direct a police officer to take the stand and commit what the Federal Courts have denominated a Federal crime. And if we should do so, as the Court of Appeals says we may, what of the Federal prosecutor? In one of the Federal decisions he is called upon to take due notice of violations of Section 605 by State officials. Is he to blink the eye and connive at our wrongdoing, or prosecute us for introducing evidence obtained by means of the investigative powers accorded us by our State Constitution and statutory law?

Section 605, which the Supreme Court has made applicable to State law enforcement, makes it a Federal crime to intercept, but it adds the words "and divulge such intercepted communications." We interpret that to mean that no Federal crime exists unless both elements are present, that is, interception and divulgence. That was the position taken by Attorney General Robert H. Jackson and, until recently, has long been the policy of the Department of Justice.

We, therefore, continue to utilize wiretapping, pursuant to court order, for purposes of surveillance and for obtaining leads. But we are inhibited from exploiting our findings to the fullest. No matter how incriminating the evidence we uncover nor how essential to successful prosecution, we may not introduce it on trial or before Grand Juries. We cannot confront recalcitrant witnesses with recordings of their own conversations and thus persuade them to testify truthfully or face possible indictment for perjury or contempt. We cannot induce the reluctant or frightened victims of extortion and of other crimes to cooperate in the furtherance of law enforcement and justice.

Worse, we have found ourselves constrained by the Federal rulings to dismiss important cases and to abandon important investigations.

Senate Bill 675 sets the record straight with respect to Congressional intent. It removes State law enforcement from the limbo of uncertainty in which we have been confined as a result of the Benanti decision. It restores to the States the right which they possessed without dispute prior to that decision—the right to intercept telephonic communications, when done pursuant to a court's order based on a judge's determination that probable cause exists for belief that such interception may disclose evidence of the commission of a crime. This is a right which in New York State we have utilized in the public interest since 1938 and which I believe we have utilized with fairness and discretion.

THE USE OF LEGAL EAVESDROPPING IN NEW YORK

Eavesdropping has been the subject of many popular misconceptions. There is much confusion, so it seems, in the minds of good people between lawful interceptions, pursuant to court order, and illegal interception of oral communications by private persons.

Our appraisal of the subject should be a reasonable and objective one and our approach should be based on facts and experience, not on preconceptions. We must keep a sharp eye out for the hysterical alarmist with a flair for the dramatic. This is a field that produces the most extravagant accusations of abusive practices, as ill-founded and unsupported as they are shocking, and as irresponsible as they are inaccurate.

A notable example of loose talk was the assertion some years ago by a distinguished jurist that in the year 1952 alone there were 58,000 court orders permitting wiretapping in New York City.

Now this was unadulterated fiction. The researcher, who came up with this figure for the Justice, at first sought to explain it away by declaring that he had included illegal wiretaps as well as those authorized by the courts, and then, by way of amplification, he indicated that he was unable to recollect the name of a single one of the informants who allegedly supplied the factual quicksand upon which his calculation was unfounded.

We were able to demonstrate that the Justice's figure was off by at least 10,000 per cent. As a matter of fact, legal wiretapping is rare. Its danger to the privacy we all cherish is minimal. It is used almost exclusively in the area of organized crime, and, for the most part, only when other avenues of investigation are closed.

But we still hear tales of the fabulous number of telephone booths and private lines which have been wired for sound by the police. Most of today's horror stories seem to be concerned with the companion investigative technique, that of eavesdropping by electronic device. These fantastic stories serve to generate an emotional reaction hostile to wiretapping, a fear of the wholesale and indiscriminate invasion of the privacy of the individual, and a dread that Big Brother may be watching over our every home and office.

Because of these irrational fears, the very terms, eavesdropping and wiretapping, have become frightening words. Just so, in Eighteenth Century England, when crime was rife on the highways and was sweeping over London in tidal waves, efforts to establish a constabulary met with fierce resistance. Freeborn Englishmen feared the very name "police." It was a French word and, therefore, conjured up the spectre of foreign tyranny.

Some have seized upon two words from the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes in the Olmstead case in 1928—the famous phrase, "dirty business." But they have not bothered to read the rest of the opinion. What they overlook is that Justice Holmes expressly disavowed the position that wiretapping was a violation of our Federal Bill of Rights. And, when he used the term, "dirty business," he was not describing legal wiretapping so much as he was characterizing the conduct of the Federal officers who, in gathering evidence, committed a crime by tapping wires illegally in defiance of the laws of the State of Washington.

Lest we fall victims to a catch phrase, let us ask if there is any business more dirty than the illicit traffic in narcotics. Let us remember, too, that bribery, extortion, the syndicated gambling, which provides the financial life blood of the underworld, and all organized crime are dirty businesses.

And, let us not forget that it was the same Justice Holmes who said on another occasion: "At the present time, in this country, there is more danger that criminals will escape justice than that they will be subjected to tyranny."

The Framers of the Bill of Rights, who were not unacquainted with tyranny, did not hold the privacy of the individual in his person and effects to be an absolute right nor his home to be an impenetrable sanctuary. They guaranteed his safety against only "unreasonable" search and seizure, and accorded to law enforcement the privilege of invasion, under court authorization upon a showing of probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

The Founding Fathers did not, of course, anticipate the invention of the telephone nor the wonders of our present electronic age. It is clear, however, that they did not intend the Fourth Amendment to provide a citadel of refuge for the criminal. There was a point, they knew, where individual privacy must yield to the public good.

A court order for wiretapping is in the nature of a warrant for search and seizure and the one raises no more a problem of privacy or a violation of civil rights than the other.

Indeed, our New York State Constitutional provision empowering law enforcement officials to intercept telephone messages uses almost the exact language of the Fourth Amendment, and our implementing legislation holds us to the same restrictions as for any other search warrant.

The quest for evidence, whether by search of the premises of a suspect or by interception of telephonic communications must be based upon "reasonable" grounds. That is the key word.

The sworn affidavit which we submit to the court in connection with a wiretap application must set forth our reasons for believing that evidence of crime will be obtained. It must specify the specific telephone line or lines which it is proposed to tap and must identify the individual in whose name the telephone is listed.

There are, also, some very practical considerations which rule out the arbitrary and capricious use of this important investigative weapon and which necessarily reduce invasions of privacy to a minimum.

At least two detectives, usually four, and sometimes six, are required to man each installation, depending upon the activity of the line and the number of hours of the day it is being used. It is not simply a matter of monitoring the conversations. The listeners may overhear arrangements for a meeting of two or more of the conspirators. One of the officers must be prepared to cover that "meet," as it is called in police parlance. The rendezvous may well disclose the existence of hitherto unknown participants in the criminal activity under investigation and the surveillance by the detective at the scene may bring to light new clues worth developing.

Since we must necessarily be selective, we confine our attention to major targets and the most serious crimes, especially of the organized variety. Specifically, we are most likely to use wiretapping in investigations of the drug traffic, of extortion and coercion, of bribery, corruption and murder.

Now just how great is the threat to personal privacy posed by legalized wiretapping Let us examine some facts and figures. Every year, in New York County, we dispose of upwards of 4,000 felony indictments in our Supreme Court. As a result of consolidation of the lower courts in September, 1962, our prosecuting burden there has increased tremendously. We now handle some 50,000 misdemeanor and lesser offenses, a caseload double that which we had formerly carried. In addition, there are some 12,000 other items—complaints, investigations, and the like—and thus a total in all of well over 65,000 criminal matters a year.

That was the picture last year. During that year, 1966, in the face of the huge volume of criminal business I have described, we obtained court orders for 73 wiretap interceptions, and 36 renewals.

Surely that figure is not unreasonable and does not represent a wholesale intrusion on the privacy of our citizenry.

There was nothing unusual about last year's total. Our average over the past quarter century has been less than 66 court orders for wiretap interceptions a year. If we include the renewals, the average comes to 87 a year. This remember, in a city of approximately 8,000,000 people, with 1,167,987 telephone lines in New York County, and 3,367,422 in the entire city.

The number of court orders for eavesdropping by electronic device has been even less than the total of wiretap authorizations. Last year, we obtained 23 such orders. Since 1958, when the law permitting such eavesdropping by law enforcement authorities under court order was enacted, our average has been less than 19 orders a year.

The record indicates, I submit, that we have been most careful and prudent in our utilization of the power accorded us by our State Constitution and law. I think, too, the figures suggest that the danger that law enforcement officials may listen in on conversations that do not concern some criminal enterprise is exceedingly remote.

This conclusion, moreover, is supported by investigations of legalized wiretapping. Beginning in 1955, a Joint Legislative Committee conducted a five-year study in the State of New York inquiring particularly into possible abuses by law enforcement officers. This investigation had come into being as a result of the hue and cry being raised at the time about supposed wholesale invasions of privacy.

In its report, the committee explicitly declared that no abuses whatver by any District Attorney had been found in the use of the wiretapping privilege. Quite the contrary! The Committee concluded that the system of legalized telephonic interception had worked well in New York for over twenty years, that it had popular approval, and that it enjoyed the overwhelming support of our highest State officers, executive, legislative and judicial. There was unanimous agreement that law enforcement in New York had used this investigative weapon fairly, sparingly, and with the most selective discrimination.

INVASION OF PRIVACY

Law enforcement asks for and welcomes judicial examination of the need for eavesdropping in every proposed investigation, and judicial authorization, supervision and review of its use. Indiscriminate and promiscuous use of the legal privilege to intercept conversations is as offensive to police and prosecutors as it is to society as a whole. We believe that the individual must be protected against any unnecessary invasion of his privacy. None of us wants other people to be poking into his personal affairs. Everyone cherishes his right to be left alone.

But there is no civil right which is absolute. All of us have a right to expect security and protection from the depredations of the criminal. Police investigation, by its very nature, must intrude, to some extent on the privacy of the individual. A court ordered warrant to seize a ransom note in a kidnapping case necessarily will bring before the searcher's eye a number of personal documents that the court never intended to be seized and that the searcher never desired to see. The fact is that perception is not seizure. And it makes no difference whether the searcher perceives aurally or visually.

What we must focus on is unwarranted intrusion. It is not the law enforcement officer, intercepting communications pursuant to court order on a showing of probable cause under oath, who is to be feared. Rather we should be alarmed at the activities of the private operative. It is he who is seeking evidence on the suspected spouse, or attempting to discover the plans and programs of a commercial enterprise, or trying to gain some secret information for purposes of blackmail. Are we to assume, because the privilege of wiretapping in criminal investigations is denied to law enforcement, that there will be no illegal interceptions by these snoopers for hire?

Let us fix our attention on the heart of the problem. Let us make a clear distinction between the burgeoning unregulated eavesdropping and the statistically rare court-ordered incidents of wiretapping.

Most of the illegal operators specialize in planting electronic listening devices, but there are wiretappers among them, too. All types of eavesdropping devices are nationally advertised and presumably are widely sold to any Paul Pry who wishes to buy them.

Surely every state should impose severe penalties for activity of this sort. Yet only seven states, including New York, impose sanctions for eavesdropping by electronic devices.

Some measure of the effectiveness of our State law is provided by the record of prosecutions conducted over the past twelve years in New York County.

Since 1955, and prior to December, 1966, a total of thirteen defendants were arrested as a result of investigations by my office on charges of unlawful eavesdropping and two others were accused of a somewhat related crime, illegal use of Telephone Company equipment. These last two were not involved in interference with personal privacy, but in a scheme to defraud the Telephone Company of toll charges. Of the unlawful eavesdroppers, seven were accused of illegal wiretapping, five of illegal "bugging," and one of a combination of the two. One defendant died before trial. All the others were convicted.

In December of last year, after an investigation spanning twenty-seven months, we presented evidence to a Grand Jury which resulted in the indictment and arrest of twenty-eight individuals and the indictment of three corporate defendants on charges having to do with unlawful eavesdropping, either by wiretapping or electronic "bugging."

These defendants are at present awaiting trial. They include private investigators, employees of private detective agencies, electronics experts, as well as three business executives and two attorneys, who are alleged to have utilized the unlawful services of the "private eyes."

Our New York law, also, outlaws possession of electronic eavesdropping devices but only if it can be shown that there was an intent to use it illegally. A Bill, recently introduced in Congress, would make it a crime, punishable by five years in prison, for any person, except an agent of a common carrier or an officer of government, to distribute, manufacture or advertise wire or oral communication equipment.

Legislation of this nature, and vigorous prosecution such as I have described, would quickly and effectively eliminate the apprehension in the minds of law-abiding citizens that their privacy was being invaded.

NEED FOR AND EFFECTIVENESS OF EAVESDROPPING

Why is eavesdropping so essential in combatting organized crime? In this area, we are confronted by two serious problems: first, the persistent unwillingness of complainants, victims, or witnesses of any sort, to come forward, because of apathy, fear or self-interest; and, secondly, the inaccessibility of the top figures in the rackets.

The street corner bookmaker, the policy runner, the dope pusher, often an addict himself; these are the expendables of organized crime. They are arrested by the scores and are readily replaced. From time to time, there may be a raid on some minor, or major, outpost: a seizure of narcotics, the "knocking over" of a policy bank, or of a horse wire room. But these casualties are the occupational hazards of the rackets. Annoyances, yes. Inconveniences, but they hardly discourage the bosses of the illicit traffic in heroin or the high command of a gambling empire.

As the President's Commission repeatedly demonstrates in its Report, the criminal organization is dedicated to protecting its masters. The reluctance, or fear, of witnesses as well as lower level functionaries to assist law enforcement agencies oftentimes creates insurmountable barriers to the obtaining of information. Omerta, the code of silence, is more than just a word. Often, when the organization has pervaded legitimate businesses and, on occasion, corrupted local officials, law-abiding citizens, who are the real sufferers, remain unaware that they have been victimized.

The professional racketeer of today is not a common hoodlum. He is an astute businessman, dealing in and with the most up-to-date business institutions, but scrupling at nothing to achieve his objectives.

In his illicit enterprises, there are no tell-tale records or books of account to be seized and examined. There are no files of inter-office memoranda. There is no documentary trail of evidence. All communication is by word of mouth.

His interests are scattered across the nation as are his associates. He must have at hand the means of ready contact with them. It is the telephone that thus becomes the vital and essential instrument of communication.

That is why, despite extraordinary expenditures of effort and the most diligent investigation, without wiretapping, law enforcement can hardly advance beyond the street level.

Wiretapping is not a substitute for police legwork. It is frequently the preliminary to a great deal of it.

When the mobster resorts to the telephone, as he must, he is most cautious, of course, in his conversation. His language is guarded and cryptic. But we have found that, from time to time, there are fortunate lapses which, if they don't provide direct evidence of crime, do give us valuable leads. We gain, too, new insights into matters under investigation in the light of information already in hand. We develop, also, a reservoir of useful background material about key underworld figures. That last is what the President's Commission had in mind when it stated that "information regarding the capabilities, intentions, and vulnerabilities of organized crime groups is ser ısly lacking." The Commission recognizes, and places great stress on, the need what it describes as "strategic intelligence."

There are some kinds of crime—extortion, for example—in which the telephone itself often becomes the very instrument of the crime.

In an investigation of this type, recordings of telephone conversations have enabled us to induce the frightened and close-mouthed victims to tell us the truth.

Businessmen who have bribed labor officials or public officers have no choice but to admit their complicity when confronted with their taped conversations. The bribe giver is, of course, an accomplice to the crime. The wire recordings provide the independent corroboration of his accomplice testimony, which is required under New York State law.

The Attorney General of the United States has questioned the effectiveness of wiretapping as a police technique. He was quoted recently as stating that Federal prosecutions in the field of organized crime had risen 30 per cent in the last year, following the Presidential ban on all electronic eavesdropping.

I know nothing about the Attorney General's prosecutions. I don't know what cases he has in mind nor how difficult or easy the evidence was to come by. But from the vantage point of a somewhat longer period of service in law enforcement, I respectfully disagree with his premise that wiretapping is neither effective nor productive.

We have some cases, too.

Let us take one in the field of narcotics. The drug traffic is perhaps the worst scourge that law enforcement must battle in New York City. We have 40 per cent of the nation's addicts, who commit many assaults, robberies and burglaries to finance their desperate needs.

In January, 1960, after an intensive investigation lasting many months, we indicated eight defendants for conspiracy as a felony, for felonious possession and sale of heroin, and for other crimes. It was one of the most important roundups in years. The heads of this ring were engaged in the importation and distribution of heroin on a major scale. They operated extensively throughout the East and did a narcotics business running into millions of dollars annually.

Caught in the net were Joseph Russo, who had previously served a State prison term of two to five years; his brother Anthony, also a notorious wholesaler and no stranger to police lineups; Aniello Carillo, whose police record covers a page and a half and who faces a life sentence if convicted on this indictment; his son, Frank, also sporting a diversified criminal record; as well as John "Baps" Ross, who was considered to be the largest narcotics distributor on the retail level in the country.

The transaction, which resulted in the arrest of the eight, was the sale to Ross of one kilo of pure heroin, worth from a quarter to half a million dollars to the underworld when cut and sold in decks at the street level.

The case well illustrates the insulation of the key figures in this vicious traffic. Here the top men made all arrangements for the importation of heroin and its sale and delivery to major distributors, but they never touched the drug. Only these top figures knew the details of the entire operation. They dealt only with trusted lieutenants. The heroin was handle was handled by at most two of the conspirators and they were on the courier level. Some of the conspirators had never met and not one man in the operation knew all his confederates.

Thus, even if there were a break in one of the links of the chain, those at the top would be secure from apprehension.

But, while the chief figures in the ring never came in contact with the heroin, it was essential that they communicate with one another as to the amount, place, and type of each transaction.

The actual transfer which led to these arrests took place in an automobile. This vehicle was moved from location to location by one or two men at a time, men who received their orders by telephone and who, upon completing their assignment, would temporarily abandon the car for fellow conspirators to pick up. After a series of such devious maneuvers, designed to shake off possible pursuers, the heroin would be concealed in the empty car which would be left at a location designated at the last moment. The purchaser would then be instructed by telephone as to the whereabouts of the contraband which he was to pick up at an appointed time.

As a result of outstanding work on the part of detectives of the Police Narcotics Bureau, it had been learned that the communications center for the conspiracy was the telephone of the younger Carillo.

On a showing of probable cause an order was obtained to tap this telephone line. Listening in on the ring's command post, the detectives monitored conversations caried on in laconic and wary language, indeed in code. The detectives, however, were able to crack the code and trace step by step the circuitous route followed by the conspirators in the course of completing the transaction.

The detectives struck when the contraband, a kilo of pure heroin, was picked up by its purchaser, John "Baps" Ross. It was a stroke of luck that the officers nabbed Ross. He usually avoided handling the narcotics himself and had an associate make the "pickup," but his aide was attending a funeral that night.

But for the wiretaps we would never have been led to Ross. We did not need the evidence they provided, however, in order to convict him. He had been caught red-handed in possession of the heroin. He was found guilty and was sentenced to serve seven and a half to fifteen years in State prison.

But the wiretap evidence was essential to prove the guilt of the other seven conspirators. It demonstrated conclusively the key role which each of them played in this major underworld operation and would clearly have established the guilt of each of them beyond a reasonable doubt.

But under the rulings of the Federal Courts, it would have been necessary for us to commit a Federal crime to convict these major figures in a traffic whose commodity is slow death.

We delayed proceeding to trial for almost two years in the hope that Congress would enact legislation permitting the use of court-authorized wiretap evidence. But these hopes were disappointed and, most reluctantly, we moved for the dismissal of the defendants. All seven of these vicious criminals went scot-free.

In June of 1964, we began an investigation into suspected payments of graft to police officers to overlook violations of the gambling laws by a mob operating a thriving numbers racket in the East Harlem section of Manhattan.

At the very outset, fourteen police officers, including a lieutenant, were called before the Grand Jury and were asked to sign waivers of immunity before testifying. All refused. They were thoroughly within their rights, of course, in invoking their Constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, but their action could fairly be interpreted to mean that these officers could not truthfully answer questions about the performance of their duties without involving themselves in crimes. The consequence of their refusal to sign the waiver was the forfeiture of their jobs.

Later, five of the officers were recalled before the Grand Jury and offered immunity. They still refused to testify and all were cited for contempt.

In the course of this investigation, we had succeeded in infiltrating the policy racket with an undercover investigator. But he could not get beyond the lower echelons. He did, incidentally, observe the passage of money to a police officer. But his conclusion about what he had seen, while quite obvious, did not constitute legal evidence. With his help, however, we did manage to indict and convict the three operators of one policy bank on felony charges and we proved perjury charges against a police officer.

But we never did get to the heart of the matter. Had we been able to introduce the court-authorized wiretap evidence in our possession, we could have proceeded against the top underworld figure who dominated the numbers racket in East Harlem and we could have exposed the corruption of all too many police officers who had been assigned to enforcement of the gambling laws in the area.

We have not always been so frustrated. Before the Supreme Court rulings inhibiting us in our use of wiretap evidence, we had most effectively used such evidence, obtained pursuant to court orders, in many important trials and investigations.

Checking on information, in 1953, that gangsters had taken control of the Distillery Workers' Union and were siphoning off moneys from its welfare fund—as it turned out, $3,000,000 in less than three years—we obtained a court order for telephonic interception.

The conversations we overheard led us to Louis Saperstein, a Newark insurance broker, who was paying kickbacks to his underworld associates for the union business they were steering in his direction.

Saperstein was called before the Grand Jury and granted immunity. Although confronted with recordings of his incriminating conversations, he refused to cooperate. He was cited for and convicted of five counts of criminal contempt. Five weeks behind bars served to refresh his recollection and to loosen his tongue. He became the People's witness against the notorious labor racketeer, George Scalise, a henchman of the late gang boss, "Little Augie" Pisano, and against Sol Cilento, the corrupted secretary-treasurer of the union.

The recorded telephone conversations provided the necessary corroboration of the testimony of Saperstein who, as a matter of law, was an accomplice. Scalise and Cilento elected to plead guilty to the charges.

This, incidentally, was the pioneer prosecution for racketeering in union welfare funds and had an impact on both State and National legislation.

Information developed in the course of a loan-sharking investigation in the late '40's resulted in a court order for a wiretap at a check-cashing agency, operated by a brother of the notorious gangster, Tony Bender, and known to be a hangout of criminals.

One dividend accruing from this tapped wire was an intercepted communication which led directly to the capture of Sam Granito, who was wanted by the Boston police for his part in a $107,000 payroll robbery.

But of much greater interest was the fact that through seemingly innocent messages heard over this wire—and through these intercepted messages alone—we came upon evidence of a crooked and flourishing policy racket which had sunk its roots in three States and compromised the integrity of a midwestern financial institution.

This crooked game was operated by a Newark mob and its victimized players were mostly residents of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Its swollen profits were due to the rigging of the winning number each day by the respected secretary of the Cincinnati Clearing House. It was his assignment to falsify the daily clearance figure to provide the number wanted by his gangster accomplices, the number that had been least played that day.

A lengthy investigation in New York, New Jersey and Ohio was required to piece together all the fragments of this fabulous jigsaw puzzle. It resulted in the conviction of eight members of the tri-State ring, including such underworld notables as Daniel Zwillman and Irving Bitz, and Dennison Duble, the Cincinnati Clearing House Secretary and a pillar of his community, who was corrupted by payments of $1,000 weekly, a pittance in the light of the mob's take from this fraudulent scheme.

It was the seemingly innocuous telephone messages, essential to the operation of the conspiracy, relayed through New York each day and the only overt acts committed in New York County, which made it possible for us to assume jurisdiction and uproot the racket at its key centers in other States.

Wiretap evidence was of tremendous advantage in the successful prosecution of a half-million-dollar stolen bond ring, led by one Irving Mishel, who acted as a broker for burglars specializing in the theft of securities. His system of negotiating these securities was quite devious and required constant use of the telephone.

Mishel operated with forgers and underworld characters, including Irving Nitzberg, an alumnus of Murder, Inc. A wiretap on his home telephone was the prime factor in bringing about his indictment, conviction and a ten to twenty-year prison sentence. In addition, Nitzberg and eight others were indicted. All pleaded guilty to charges of grand larceny and forgery.

In 1957 and 1958, my office conducted an investigation of corruption in the sport of professional boxing. It had long been an open secret in sporting circles that Frank Carbo, a notorious hoodlum, was the underworld czar of boxing. Through court-ordered wiretaps we were able to establish that he was acting as an undercover manager of fighters in violation of law, that the licensed managers of record were his fronts and that the officers of the International Boxing Club, the official matchmakers for Madison Square Garden, were his flunkeys.

What better proof could we have had that he was the actual manager than his own voice issuing commands to his underlings over the telephone? The wiretap interceptions served also to loosen the tongues of his helpers. Carbo pleaded guilty and went to jail for two years.

In an investigation lasting nearly two and a half years in the early '50's, we were able to unearth a shocking state of corruption in college basketball on a nationwide scale. The scandal involved fifteen professional "fixers," thirty-three players in six colleges, and forty-nine intercollegiate games in which score-rigging deals for the benefit of gamblers were negotiated in New York and in twenty-two other cities in seventeen States.

I am certain that we could never have made a dent in this criminal enterprise, which was polluting college sport all over the country, without the benefit of court-authorized wiretaps.

The information obtained over the wires enabled us to piece together an accurate picture of the workings of this bribery ring. The recordings of incriminating conversations persuaded recalcitrant players to cooperate. The fifteen "fixers" were indicted. With the exception of one, who died before final disposition of his case, all were convicted and imprisoned.

Without wiretaps we never would have convicted Mike Clemente, president of Local 856 of the International Longshoremen's Union, the underworld boss of the lower East Side piers in New York, and a key figure in waterfront crime.

We began a lengthy investigation in 1950 on the basis of information that he was using his union as an instrument of extortion. We expected to be able to prove that Clemente was demanding money from shippers, under threats of strikes and work stoppages, for permitting them to unload paper at the piers he controlled.

The evidence, which we had developed as a result of a court-ordered wiretap, did not establish the necessary proof of the crime of extortion, but it did bring about Clemente's downfall. It made it possible for the Grand Jury to indict him and for my office to prove him guilty of the crime of perjury in the first degree as a result of his false testimony at hearings before the State Crime Commission in 1953.

Meanwhile, the taps had provided us with direct leads which resulted in the conviction of two of Clemente's henchmen, Saro Mogavero, vice-president of Local 856, and Louis Giaccone, its business agent, for the crime of extortion. By this prosecution, stemming directly from the tap on Clemente's wire, we were able to establish that the so-called public loading system on the city piers was outright coercion and extortion and we were thus instrumental in bringing about the abolition of this racket by the State Legislature.

The uncovering of criminal activity in the field of labor-management relations is all but impossible without the utilization of legal wiretapping. Industrial racketeering we have found, takes two forms. On the one hand, there is the faithlessness of labor leaders who betray the trust reposed in them by the rank and file of their unions. On the other, there is the more disturbing development—the infiltration of the labor movement by underworld hoodlums who seek to pervert the machinery of unionism into an instrument of extortion and coercion.

My office has maintained a continuing interest in John Dioguardi, better known as Johnny Dio, since he was first sent to prison for racketeering in the garment area of New York back in 1937. When he returned to his old haunts, we kept an eye on him and, in the fall of 1950, discovered that, among other things, he had begun to blossom out as a power in a number of labor unions.

Dio managed to get himself a charter from the United Auto Workers' Union of the American Federation of Labor, not to be confused with the United Automobile Workers of America. He succeeded in becoming regional director of the union and set up two paper locals in New York for the sole purpose of systematically shaking down small businessmen who did not want their employees organized by legitimate unions.

At the very outset, we convicted two of his lieutenants in one of the unions, Anthony Topazio, and an ex-burglar, Joseph Cohen, for attempting to extort money from the owners of a flower bulb concern. They were sentenced to prison.

Another of Dio's associates, Samuel Zackman, tried the same extortion racket in the messenger service business. He and his partner, Nicholas Leone, were convicted and sentenced to prison.

We also discovered that Dio had acquired a dominating influence in Local 405 of the Retail Clerks Union and in Local 239 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. Court-authorized wiretaps revealed the predatory activities of the officers of these locals. The intercepted conversations clearly spelled out the extorsive demands of these conspirators made in the name of labor organization.

Marginal businessmen, who cannot afford the loss of a single day's deliveries which a picket line would cost them, are sitting ducks for criminals of this stripe. Payments of tribute are demanded under threats of picketing, or as the price of a so-called "sweetheart" contract which confers little or no benefits on the workers but shields the boss against the organizing efforts of genuine unionism.

Chiseling employers, who would thus cut corners and get the unions off their backs, have no disposition to complain about the extortionate demands made upon them or to cooperate with the authorities. But when confronted with wiretap evidence, they have no alternative but to tell the truth or risk prosecution for perjury or contempt.

Two officers of Local 405 of the Retail Clerks' Union, Max Chester, secretary-treasurer, and Max Fink, business representative, pleaded guilty to attempted extortion; while two others, Irving Slutsky, vice-president, and Philip Brody, organizer, pleaded guilty to conspiracy.

Similarly, court-ordered wiretaps led to the plea of guilty to attempted extortion by Samuel Goldstein, president of Local 239 of the Teamsters' Union.

This same Goldstein, together with Max Chester and Dio himself—who, in the meanwhile, had the effrontery to open an office as a labor relations consultant—were convicted in July, 1957 of conspiracy to commit the crime of bribery of a labor representative.

The scheme was for officials of a platting company to pay a $30,000 bribe to Max Chester for a soft contract in order to head off and frustrate the genuine collective bargaining activities of the United Electrical Radio Workers of America.

In the course of our continuing surveillance we uncovered, in 1956, an ambitious scheme of Dio, in league with another underworld character, Anthony Corallo, better known as "Tony Ducks," to capture control of Joint Council 16 of the Teamsters' Union, the governing body of the union in the New York area. The evidence of this conspiracy was made available to the Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, as were the telephone conversations of this gangster Dio with Mr. James Hoffa, then vice-president and later the president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

Corallo, we discovered, had acquired a dominant role in the affairs of Local 875 of the Teamsters' Union, and this local, court-authorized wiretaps disclosed, was being used as an instrument of extortion. All of its officers and representatives were indicted in 1956: Jack Berger, president; Nathan Carmel, vice-president; Aaron Kleinman, secretary-treasurer; and Jack Priore, Milton Levine, and Sam Zakor, organizers. All pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy or extortion.

In sum, during the four years from 1954 to 1958, we were able, thanks to legal wiretapping, to indict and arrest some twenty-five officials of labor union locals, either corrupted officers who had sold out their members, or hardened criminals who owed their jobs to the underworld.

I have given but a sampling of our cases which have been dependent for their success upon our wiretapping privilege, but this sampling will demonstrate, I hope, why we attach such importance to this technique of criminal investigation.

The contention that wiretapping is unproductive is rebutted by the figures. Because we no longer divulge evidence so acquired in court or before Grand Juries, I cannot offer any current records of arrests and convictions that could be attributed directly to wiretapping.

But let us look at the record for some prior years. Take, for example, the ten-year period from January, 1948 through December, 1957, when the Supreme Court rendered its decision in the Benanti case.

In those ten years, my office obtained 733 court orders for wiretap installations in 233 investigations. The evidence obtained resulted in a total of 465 arrests. Of those arrested, 364 were convicted, while 87 were acquitted or discharged. Nine more were turned over to authorities in other jurisdictions, while five cases were abated because of death.

This would mean that during the average year of that decade, we installed less than 74 wiretaps in fewer than 24 investigations. As a result, disregarding fractions, we made each year 46 arrests and convicted 36 of those arrested, while less than nine of them were acquitted or discharged.

Since 1958, when electronic surveillance was brought under judicial control, our office has made limited use of this form of search for evidence in criminal conspiracies. A representative selection of cases demonstrates the powerful effectiveness of this investigative activity.

The infiltration of organized crime into legitimate business has reduced the ethics of affected enterprises drastically. In the Merkel Meat scandal, it resulted in an extremely grave health hazard. Investigation of this prominent meat processing concern in connection with suspected commercial bribery revealed that certain products were adulterated. Further investigation suggested that accident did not account for the presence of the impurities. Little positive proof could be obtained, however, until an eavesdrop was authorized by the court. Once installed the device revealed a flourishing conspiracy to supply the consumer with inedible and diseased meats.

Conversations between Norman Lokietz, the president of Merkel Meats, Inc., and a meat broker and noted loan sharker, Charles Anselmo, revealed that the Merkel management had conspired to adulterate its product not only with horsemeat, but with the flesh of diseased cows and carrion. Called before the Grand Jury, the president and vice-president, Samuel Goldman, both perjured themselves, and were indicted for that crime as well as conspiracy to sell inedible meats. The recordings convincingly contradicting their Grand Jury statements, both officers decided to cooperate with the authorities. Additionally, subpoenas, based upon leads obtained from the eavesdrop, were sent to other individuals and corporations, eliciting corroboration and evidence showing the method and extent of the conspiracy. For the proof demonstrated that Anselmo had purchased his supplies from animal food suppliers and packaged it as fit for human consumption. By bribing a federal inspector, he had placed counterfeit inspection stamps on the cartons and sold them to Merkel, who knowingly passed the contents on to the consumer. Indicted for selling adulterated and mislabeled foods, Anselmo interrupted his trial to plead guilty to that charge and to conspiring with Lokietz. The president of Merkel also pleaded guilty to the same conspiracy count, and the vice-president Goldman pleaded guilty to perjury.

Organized crime has also gone into business for itself. In another New York case, Anthony Lombardozzi, the defendant, and nine others contrived a "bust-out" operation. Under such a scheme, a store is opened and builds credit with suppliers by promptly paying for goods for several months. Then, stocking a large inventory on credit, ostensibly to meet a consumer demand, the store is suddenly closed, the owners disappear, and the goods are spirited away to be sold at a clear profit. Naturally, proof of such a larceny by false pretense depends entirely upon establishing that the storeowners have no intention of paying for articles ordered. In this case, the ten defendants combined to open a store named Co-op Discount Stores, Inc.

To all appearances a legitimate business, the company paid for purchases religiously and on time for a six-month period. An eavesdrop device, installed upon information as to the real nature of the business, disclosed that the owners were not intending to pay for merchandise delivered after December 8, 1963. By that time, the store would have received a quarter of a million dollars of goods on the pretext that a large inventory was needed for the Cristmas season. Actually, the defendants intended to shut the premises and melt away with the merchandise. The conspirators were arrested on December 9th as they were carting off the merchandise; all ten pleaded guilty.

Another operation of organized crime is illustrated in a case featuring John Lombardozzi and Michael Scandifia. Falsely claiming to be a Teamster Union official, Scandifia, together with Lombardozzi, obtained $88,000 worth of diamonds on memorandum from Kaplan Jewelers in Manhattan by representing that other union officials were interested in purchasing the jewels. After complaint was made to the authorities some weeks later, investigation disclosed that the stones had been sold for $56,000 to a jewelry concern across the street from Kaplan's two or three days after the consignment. Although the owner of this jewelry store told the police that the $56,000 was just a deposit, other information suggested that it was not.

The culprits being identified as Scandifia and Lombardozzi, a court-ordered eavesdrop was installed on Scandifia's garage in Brooklyn. The installation overheard the two men and others discuss the jewelry fraud case, indicating the intent to defraud. Beyond this, evidence was obtained relating to other crimes which would not otherwise have been unearthed. Scandifia was overheard plotting with one Leonard Grossman, a neighborhood police officer, to murder a man who had given information to the federal authorities. Scandifia asked Grossman to obtain dum-dum bullets for two pistols, and gave the policeman the guns. A search warrant issued on the basis of this information produced the weapons from Grossman's car. Other conversations overheard in that garage resulted in eighty arrests for such crimes as murder of a gang member, conspiracy to commit murder, hijacking, extortion, assault, racial discrimination in the construction industry, criminally receiving stolen goods, and larceny by false pretenses by "bust-out" operations. Several convictions have been obtained to date; many indictments are still pending in New York and Kings Counties.

Labor racketeering provides another fertile field for gangland tactics. In one case five defendants were charged with conspiring to assault and threaten others, to destroy key telephone company installations, and to wiretap illegally. This case arose from an attempt by the Teamsters Union to oust the Communications Workers of America as the labor representative of the New York Telephone Company employees. Unknown to the members of the Communications Workers Union, Henry Habel and other officers of the C.W.A. were in league with the Teamsters, conspiring together to accomplish the change in representation. Expecting rank and file opposition to their betrayal, the defendants planned to strengthen their arguments by intimidating the opposition with threats and physical beatings. The telephone company's compliance was to be assured by dynamiting key telephone installations.

Kenneth Burkhard, a C.W.A. shop steward, was therefore employed as a "front man," and directed to hire the "strong arm" men who would brutalize the opposition leaders and blow up the telephone installations. Fortunately, Burkhard's activities came to the attention of the District Attorney's Office, and undercover detectives worked themselves into his confidence. They were given the "contracts" to assault designated victims, and supplied Burkhard with the dynamite. Although paid for, the beatings were, of course, faked, and the explosive was specially designed to react like a wet firecracker when ignited.

The undercover agents, however, were never able to approach the persons directing the conspiracy, nor to obtain much more than hearsay evidence implicating them. Eavesdropping warrants were therefore issued by the court, authorizing electronic probes into Habel's office and Teamster Union headquarters. The plans conceived in furtherance of the conspiracy were thereby detected, resulting in the indictment and conviction of the key men in the operation, whose acts were confined to plotting in the privacy of their offices and issuing orders to subordinates.

Electronic eavesdropping pursuant to court order was of invaluable assistance in an investigation, beginning in 1962, which exposed wholesale corruption in the administration of the New York State Liquor Authority. It led directly to the indictment of Martin C. Epstein, who was ousted as Chairman of the Authority because of his refusal to waive immunity before the Grand Jury. Because of serious illness his trial on charges of accepting unlawful fees has been delayed.

Electronic eavesdropping also made possible some of the charges brought against former Judge Melvin H. Osterman of the State Court of Claims. He pleaded guilty during trial to three counts of conspiracy to bribe Epstein.

Electronic eavesdropping led also to the accusations against several other defendants who were among the seventeen indicated in the course of the investigation. Seven of them have been convicted so far.

Many others with long experience in law enforcement support my contention that wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping are indispensable tools in combating organized crime.

Every former United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, now living, advocates court supervised eavesdropping. In a letter, dated March 7, 1967, addressed to Senator McClellan, they emphatically give expression to their conviction that it is needed for the protection of society. The signers of that letter, in order of their service, were Charles H. Tuttle, Appellate Division Justice James B. McNally, Federal District Judge John F. X. McGohey, Supreme Court Justice Irving H. Saypol, Chairman of the State Commission of Investigation Myles J. Lane, Chief Judge of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals J. Edward Lumbard, Paul W. Williams and S. Hazard Gillespie. A copy of their letter to Senator McClellan accompanies this statement. (The letter referred to was previously made a part of the record and appears on page 511.)

The National District Attorneys' Association strongly argues for federal and state laws comparable to New York's and, by formal resolution, has urged Congressional action to remedy the situation in which law enforcement authorities find themselves as a result of adverse Federal Court rulings.

The District Attorneys' Association of the State of New York, representing the 62 counties of our State, unanimously supports my position.

The President's Commission points to the need for "strategic intelligence." It concludes that "organized crime continues to grow because of defects in the evidence-gathering process."

After an extended exposition of the problem in the Commission's report, a majority of its members follow through to what seems to me to be the only logical conclusion—the necessity of legal wiretapping and eavesdropping under carefully circumscribed judicial authority. The minority members seem to adhere to a policy of wait and see.

Curiously, inconsistently, ironically, no minority member, not one responsible critic of wiretapping, not even the Attorney General of the United States, urges that it should be abandoned in situations involving the national security. The unanimous acquiescences to its use in this field of investigative activity is tantamount to a concession that wire interception and eavesdropping are essential weapons of detection against elaborate, organized criminal conspiracies.

How can it be claimed that electronic searches are ineffective in the fight against organized crime in the face of the unchallenged assumption that they are needed and that they are effective in matters of national security!

That concession sums up the whole argument for legalized wiretapping. It is an admission, first, that its utilization by law enforcement is necessary, and, second, it is an admission that it produces results. And it produces results in a problem area of vital importance to the internal security of our nation.

People v. Berger

By way of concluding my testimony, I should like to offer a few observations on the decision of the Supreme Court in People v. Berger.

Berger was a New York County prosecution. The deep wound we suffered at the hands of a majority of the Supreme Court is still painful to the touch. It may be a long time healing! Putting aside the ache and agony of it all, we concern ourselves with questions left unanswered by the majority opinion of Justice Clark. For present purposes, the most serious question is the impact of the decision on telephonic interceptions by wiretapping.

In holding that the New York statute (Section 813(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure), which authorized electronic eavesdropping in the Berger case, was "too broad in its sweep resulting in a trespassory intrusion into a constitutionally protected area and is, therefore, violative of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments," the majority opinion failed to make clear whether Section 813(a) was declared unconstitutional only insofar as it specifies the procedure for obtaining ex parte orders for eavesdropping which requires a physical intrusion into a constitutionally protected area.

There is a great deal in the majority opinion to suggest that the restrictive commands of the Fourth Amendment are felt only where a physical entry must be made to accomplish the surveillance. For one thing, as I quoted a moment ago, Justice Clark's opinion uses the term "trespassory". The word recurs in several crucial passages, as for example, in the concluding sentences of the opinion: "Our concern with the statute here is whether its language permits a trespassory invasion of the home, by general warrant, contrary to the command of the Fourth Amendment. As it is written, we believe that it does."

The question remains: would a wiretapping statute, limited to the use of external devices installed without physical trespass, be exempt from the Fourth Amendment? There are still other indications that the Berger rule applies only where physical boundaries have been penetrated. The Goldman case was cited approvingly by the majority, describing the holding of that case thus: "There the Court found that the use of a detectaphone placed against an office wall in order to hear private conversations in the office next door did not violate the Fourth Amendment because there was no physical trespass in connection with the relevant interception".

Perhaps of paramount significance to this question of whether a federal wiretapping statute must follow Berger's construction of Fourth Amendment demands is the Court's treatment of the Olmstead decision. Olmstead, it will be recalled, flatly held wiretapping outside Fourth Amendment control. Justice Douglas, for one, thought the Berger majority overruled Olmstead, albeit sub silentio. But did it?

The Olmstead case cited two bases for its holding exempting wiretapping from the Fourth Amendment: first, it deemed conversations to be intangible and hence outside the security offered by the Constitution to "persons, houses, papers, effects," all of which are "things;" secondly, Chief Justice Taft wrote that wiretaps were not intrusions because the telephonic communications were intended to be projected outside the confines of the home or office, and were carried along wires which were no more a part of the building "than are the highways along which they are stretched." The only part of this holding which was specifically "negated" was that conversations, as such, were outside the reach of the Fourth Amendment. What the majority held, then, was that conversations were within the Fouth Amendment and the use of electronic devices to "capture" them was a "search". But the Court did not reject Chief Justice Taft's alternatice ground, that the Constitution has no effect on the acquisiion of oral evidence by elecronic devices which do not physically penetrate the protected area. Specifically, and rather remarkably, wiretapping continues to be outside Fourth Amendment control.

It follows from this conclusion that in drafting a wiretapping statute, as distinguished from an eavesdropping law, the strictures announced by the Berger decision may be disregarded. And that is the point relevant to this committee's present labors.

And yet we can agree, I think, that it would be unwise to ignore the views of the Court if an enduring statute is to be enacted. We have learned all too frequently, and often to our dismay, the ease with which the Court overturns long accepted procedures of criminal investigation, ever limiting access to relevant and probative evidence of guilt. Indeed, as in Berger the Court goes unhesitatingly to the statute, if it regards it as the weakest link, and strikes it down notwithstanding the fact that the affidavits and orders submitted and issued thereunder may have fully complied with controlling notions of specificity. Chastened and wary, we must keep one eye on the future and attempt to furnish ourselves with laws which will withstand inevitable judicial onslaught. For it is one thing to say that the Court did not apply Fourth Amendment restrictions to wiretapping in Berger and quite another to predict that, when the issue comes before them, they will approve a wiretapping statute that does not measure up to the eavesdropping law they indicate they would approve. I cannot believe that the Court will long adhere to the surviving remnant of Olmstead and accord wiretapping unchecked scope.

In the light of this disbelief, our office is participating in efforts of draftsmen in New York to replace our 813(a) with a statute which conforms to the recently proclaimed constitutional standards. Such a measure, I expect, will be a comprehensive and explicit provision applying with similar restrictions to both eavesdropping and wiretapping.

With regard to Senate Bill 675—a fair, sensible, well-drawn and critically important bill as it stands—I would suggest revision to incorporate the four specific points called for by Justice Clark in Berger. Of these, the first three are not particularly troublesome and could quite easily be inserted in the measure. Section 8(a), in one of its subdivisions, should require the statement of belief that a particular offense is being or has been committed, as 8(c) (1) presently requires. Section 8(a) should also require a description of the particular conversations sought. While, of course it is impossible to describe a future conservation by specifying the words to be used, this I feel is unnecessary. As with conventional search warrants, sufficient particularity is supplied by description in terms of the subject matter. For example, as a search warrant may issue to seize materials used in illegal gambling, so conversations may be described as the placing and receipt of bets on horseracing.

Section 8(e) too would require revision. I do not know whether forty-five days is in itself too long for a tap, authorizing the equivalent of a series of intrusions as the Berger majority puts it. Perhaps it should be reduced to fifteen or thirty days. It should also have a self-termination clause calling for the shutting down of the "plant" when the sought evidence has been acquired, unless a specific showing is made of a continuing criminal enterprise requiring further maintenance of surveillance. A requirement of prompt execution should be inserted. And it should be provided that extensions may be granted only on a showing of "present probable cause for the continuance."

Finally, a section should be drawn dealing with notice. This would seem to be the sticking point. Obviously, as recognized even by Justice Clark, secrecy is the essence of this mode of search. In all but the rarest cases, advance notice to anyone connected with the facility or premises under surveillance would utterly destroy the value of the tap. So the majority allows that what they deem a "defect" can be overcome by what they term "a showing of exigent circumstances." I interpret that phrase to mean that the secret surveillance is necessary because other conventional access to evidence has proven fruitless or is patently unavailing, that the conversations are expected to provide material evidence otherwise inaccessible, and that secrecy is an imperative condition of effectiveness. On such a showing of exigency, the law should allow the Court expressly to order that the giving of notice may be delayed to a point in time after the order has terminated or, where appropriate, after the investigation has been concluded.

Although not specifically called for by Berger, I would favor also the inclusion of a requirement for a sort of "return" on the warrant wherein the executing officer reports to the issuing court the results of the interceptions.

These adjustments I believe would effectively insulate the statute from future attack and accord to officials, federal and state, the long awaited authority fairly to utilize this essential and effective weapon of law enforcement. The prevalence of organized crime and the serious threat posed by it to the welfare of the nation demand no less.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have not had the opportunity to read your statement but I know it contains some very pertinent comments and information.

Mr. HOGAN. As I stated this morning, I attempt to answer the Attorney General of the United States who doesn't think that this privilege accorded to us in law enforcement is necessary or is effective. And my answer to him is not composed of generalities.

We have conducted dozens of investigations over the years. We have prosecuted hundreds of cases which I think prove that Mr. Clark is wrong, and I give specific evidence—not general statements or opinions. I describe a case in the field of narcotics where we caught redhanded a man who was selling a kilo of heroin. There were seven others all with criminal records involved with him.

Unfortunately we could prosecute only the man who was caught with the heroin because the other evidence depended upon our wiretaps and section 605 prevented us from introducing that evidence in court. Indeed, we delayed proceeding to trial for almost 2 years in the hope that Congress would enact legislation permitting the use of court-authorized wiretap evidence, but these hopes were disappointing and most reluctantly we moved for dismissal of the defendants. All seven of these hardened criminals went scot free.

Senator McClellan. I think at this point you might state something with respect to how you have been handicapped since the Court ruled that a disclosure of any information you obtain in that manner could not be used as evidence.

Mr. Hogan. For the past 10 years, we have just been able to use this privilege for investigative purposes and so often we felt completely frustrated when we were unable to produce the evidence before a grand jury or before a court. Our own highest court said that we could do it, but a district attorney is in the position of asking a police officer to commit a Federal crime if he takes the stand and gives evidence of telephonic interception. So many cases have gone down the drain because section 605 has been so interpreted by the Supreme Court in the Benanti case. I am sure that Congress never intended to impair law-enforcement efforts when this section of the communications law was passed.

I had occasion to appear before the House Judiciary Committee and Congressman Celler told me there was no debate on it, there was never any intention of Congress to regulate law enforcement or to prevent law enforcement from obtaining a court order.

Indeed, as you recall, Senator, I made available to Senator Kefauver, during his investigation of crime, evidence obtained from wiretaps. He and his counsel knew where it came from, and I am sure that he wouldn't have availed himself of that evidence if he thought that Congress intended to prohibit law-enforcement officers from engaging in this type of investigative activity.

In the same way, we cooperated with your committee and with your counsel, Mr. Robert Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy came to our office on many occasions and looked over our interceptions. They were used with great effectiveness and they were the basis for laws regulating the conduct of officials of labor unions. Congress has made full use of our activity in this area. It is just most inconsistent to say Congress intended to forbid it.

Senator McClellan. Made use of it for legislative purposes.

Mr. Hogan. For legislative purposes.

But the Supreme Court in the Benanti case in 1957 ruled that Congress did so intend and made it a Federal crime for us to divulge this type of evidence, with the result that many cases have been dismissed. I described one.

Senator McClellan. You are saying that many of those cases that were not dismissed as compared to others that were airtight cases where you certainly would have expected to secure conviction?

Mr. Hogan. The one that I just described undoubtedly would have persuaded any jury beyond any conceivable reasonable doubt that the defendant was as quilty as could be. No evidence is more convincing than that where the voice of the defendant can be identified and he is saying, "Let's go out and rob a bank"—it is pretty difficult to get around that sort of evidence. Much better than an eyewitness in many cases. Particularly when he was headed for the bank where they caught him with guns on him.

Another case in the field of official corruption—we were investigating a violation of gambling law by a mob operating a numbers racket in the East Harlem section of Manhattan. At least 14 police officers were called before the grand jury, asked to sign waivers, asked about their official duties in that area. Every last one of them refused to testify. They lost their jobs. After that we called five of them before the grand jury and said, "We are giving you immunity, now you testify." They still refused to testify and all were cited for contempt and sent to jail.

Senator McClellan. Is it an instrumentality that could be used effectively in detecting corruption in public circles by public officials?

Mr. Hogan. Most effective. Most effective. In this case we never did get to the heart of the matter. Had we been able to introduce court-authorized wiretap evidence we could have proceeded against the top underworld figures who dominated the numbers racket in East Harlem and we could have exposed the corruption of all too many police officers who had been assigned to enforcement of the gambling laws in this area.

But here was another case where we couldn't proceed because of what I think is a most inaccurate interpretation of what Congress intended to do in passing that law.

Well, I describe other cases here and I just have time briefly to allude to them.

There is one involving the Distillery Workers' Union which, incidentally, resulted in convictions of top people in the underworld. This was before Benanti when we could use wiretap as evidence. This was the pioneer prosecution for racketeering in union welfare funds and it had an impact on both State and National legislation.

Another case that I describe is an interstate gambling racket where the gambling was conducted in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and New York. It was a rigged gambling racket. The secretary of the Cincinnati clearinghouse, a most respected citizen of Cincinnati, mentioned for mayor of the city, was on the payroll of the mob receiving $1,000 a week. His function was to provide the last number of the payoff number when he heard from New York to the effect that the smallest play was on 4, let us say. So then, even though the number which came from the clearinghouse was 7, he would switch it to 4, for which little, but very important, service he got $1,000 a week. This was all done by telephone. We couldn't have made a start on it without telephonic interception and the secretary of the Cincinnati clearinghouse and all the conspirators were convicted as a result of the wiretap interceptions.

I describe in my statement a forgery ring, involving a half million dollars in stolen bonds, which was broken up by wiretap testimony.

I describe our investigation of professional boxing where we proved that Frank Carbo, a notorious hoodlum, was the underworld czar of boxing. Through court-ordered wiretaps we were able to establish that he was acting as an undercover manager of fighters in violation of law, that the licensed managers of record were his fronts, and that the officers of the International Boxing Club, the official matchmakers for Madison Square Garden were his flunkies.

In an investigation lasting nearly two and a half years, we were able to expose a shocking state of corruption in college basketball on a nationwide scale.

This scandal involved 15 professional fixers, 33 players in six colleges, and 49 intercollegiate games in which score-rigging deals for the benefit of gamblers were negotiated in New York and 22 other cities in 17 States. With the exception of one defendant who died before the final disposition of his case, all of the fixers were convicted and imprisoned.

I describe a long investigation of the waterfront in New York which resulted in many convictions as a result of wiretapping. By this prosecution, we were able to prove that the so-called public loading system on city piers was nothing more than outright coercion and extortion. We were thus able to bring about the abolition of public loading in New York State. This investigation contributed to the formulation of the waterfront commission and which did away with public loading.

I describe—and this may be familiar to you, Senator—the activities of one Johnny Dioguardi.

Senator McCLELLAN. I seem to recall.

Mr. HOGAN. We had a long, continuing interest in Dioguardi and our surveillance of him paid off. I describe how he managed to get himself a labor union charter even though he had a criminal record, how he succeeded in becoming a regional director of this same union and how he set up paper local unions in New York for the sole purpose of systematically shaking down small businessmen who did not want their employees organized by legitimate unions.

I state that, in the course of our continuing surveillance, we also uncovered in 1956 an ambitious scheme of Dioguardi, in league with another underworld character, Anthony Corello, better known as "Tony Ducks," to capture control of Joint Council 16 of the Teamsters Union, the governing body of the union in the New York area. The evidence of this conspiracy was made available to the Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, as were the telephone conversations of this gangster Dioguardi with Mr. James Hoffa, then vice president and later president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

In all, and I describe cases during the 4 years from 1954 to 1958—we were able, thanks to legal wiretapping, to indict, arrest, and convict 25 officials of labor unions, either corrupted officers who had sold out their members or hardened criminals who owed their jobs to the underworld.

This is just a sampling of our cases. I know that S. 675 has only to do with wiretapping, but eavesdropping is just as important. I have described many cases where, particularly since 1957 when the Supreme Court cut off our right to divulge wiretap interceptions, we have used eavesdropping. I am just going to read one.

Senator McCLELLAN. Were you able to use the information obtained by eavesdropping in the trial of cases?

Mr. HOGAN. Until 3 weeks ago when the Supreme Court in Berger——

Senator McCLELLAN. You intercepted?

Mr. HOGAN. We have had a statute since 1958, almost contemporaneous with the decision of the Supreme Court in Benanti, which permitted us to eavesdrop and we have made about 23 applications a year. Everybody talks about eavesdropping. Well, most of the eavesdropping is done by private detectives, where evidence is sought in matrimonial cases, or where one firm is trying to steal the secrets of another. But court-authorized eavesdropping is used just as sparingly, even more so, than wiretapping. As I say, our average in the 10 years we have been using—9 years—has been about 20 applications a year.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is there any law now against eavesdropping?

Mr. HOGAN. There is nothing but the Supreme Court's opinion to the effect that the New York statute was inartfully drawn, in that it didn't cross every T or dot every I. That is what we are doing now, trying to put together a statute which hopefully the New York Legislature will pass and which will permit not only wiretapping but eavesdropping in accordance with the rules laid down by Justice Clark and the majority of the Supreme Court.

Senator McCLELLAN. What I was driving at, is there any State or Federal law now to deprive private detectives from using these techniques to gather information for his client?

Mr. HOGAN. Yes, it is a felony in New York State.

Senator McCLELLAN. In New York State?

Mr. HOGAN. And six other States—in 43 States you can eavesdrop to your heart's content.

Senator McCLELLAN. So I think we need a Federal statute to prohibit it except under a court order issued upon the application of law-enforcement officials—the attorney general or the district attorney, who has the responsibility to actually try the case. One reason I think we ought to limit the policeman in asking for it—is that you get a second screening by having them go to the district attorney, lay all the facts before him and let him evaluate it before you present it to the court. Just like citizens would come in with a proposal and let the district attorney or prosecuting attorney make the application to the court, using possibly the policeman or whoever brings in the information as witnesses to substantiate probable cause of the lead.

Mr. HOGAN. I think our statute was too liberal in that it permitted a police officer above the rank of sergeant to make the application. I expect that the statute we will submit to the legislature will provide that the application must be made by a district attorney or the attorney general of the State. The police then will have to come to persuade us first, and then persuade the court.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is a lot of precaution, is it not, another safeguard?

Mr. HOGAN. Yes. But returning to your first point, Senator, we have long advocated a statute such as we have in New York which would make it a felony for anybody not authorized by a court to eavesdrop or wiretap. Indeed, my office has prosecuted many such private snoopers. There are 27 under indictment right now awaiting trial—private detectives, investigators, a couple of attorneys. And those cases will be tried under our New York law which makes it a felony for anybody, other than a properly authorized law-enforcement officer with court sanction, to intercept telephone conversations.

Senator McCLELLAN. We need a law with teeth in it prohibiting all wiretapping and all eavesdropping by electronic instruments except where ordered by a court under the procedures established by law for law-enforcement officials to install or to make use of the electronic devices. It seems to me that the ordinary citizen would feel safe in the knowledge that it is not going to be used against him if he is a law-abiding citizen.

Mr. HOGAN. It should, unless he is an incurable romanticist that imagines anything can happen.

Senator McCLELLAN. I want to keep it under absolute control of the court. I am willing to go further to strengthen the bill to see to it that they make interim reports to the court and permit the court to require them to make notes of the progress being made, and so forth. So that the court can determine whether it should be extended.

Mr. HOGAN. I agree with you.

Senator McCLELLAN. Because if we cannot trust our courts, the integrity of our courts, we are beyond redemption.

Mr. HOGAN. I think there should be reporting requirements to the court, the court in effect should be a monitor, as well as the instrument that authorizes the interception in the first place.

I am just going to read one example of the value of eavesdropping. I have a number of them here in this statement. But this is a classic, I think.

This has to do with a top operation of organized crime featuring two well-known criminal characters, John Lombardozzi and Michael Scandifia. Falsely claiming to be a Teamster Union official, Scandifia, together with Lombardozzi, obtained $88,000 worth of diamonds on memorandum from Kaplan Jewelers in Manhattan by representing that other union officials were interested in purchasing the jewels. After complaint was made to the authorities, some weeks later investigation disclosed that the stones had been sold for $56,000 to a jewelry concern across the street from Kaplan's 2 or 3 days after the consignment. Although the owner of this jewelry store told the police that the $56,000 was just a deposit, other information suggested that it was not. The culprits being identified as Scandifia and Lombardozzi, a court-ordered eavesdrop was installed in Scandifia's garage in Brooklyn.

The installation overheard the two men and others discuss the jewelry fraud case, indicating the intent to defraud. Beyond this, evidence was obtained relating to other crimes which would not otherwise have been unearthed.

Scandifia was overheard talking with one Leonard Grossman, a neighborhood police officer, to murder a man who had given information to the Federal authorities.

Scandifia asked Grossman to obtain dum-dum bullets for two pistols and gave the policemen the guns. A search warrant issued on the basis of this information produced the weapons from Grossman's car. Other conversations overheard in that garage resulted in 80 arrests for such crimes as murder of a gang member, conspiracy to commit murder, highjacking, extortion, racial discrimination in the construction industry, assault, criminally receiving stolen goods, and larceny by false pretenses for bustout operations.

Several convictions have been obtained to date, many indictments are still pending in New York and Kings Counties. Unfortunately, they are going to have to be dismissed because of the Berger Supreme Court opinion. In my statement I give other illustrations in many fields of what I think is the value of eavesdropping.

Finally, before analyzing the Berger case which I will not go into at this time, I would point out that the majority of the members of the President's Commission reach the only logical conclusion—the necessity of legal wiretapping and eavesdropping under carefully circumscribed judicial authority. The minority members seem to adhere to a policy of wait and see. Curiously, inconsistently, ironically, no minority member, not one responsible critic of wiretapping, not even the Attorney General of the United States, urges that it should be abandoned in situations involving national security. The unanimous acquiescence to its use in this field of investigative activity is tantamount to a concession that wire interception and eavesdropping are essential weapons of detection against elaborate, organized criminal conspiracies.

How can it be claimed that electronic searches are ineffective in the fight against organized crime in the face of the unchallenged assumption that they are needed and that they are effective in the matters of national security?

That confession sums up the whole argument for legalized wiretapping. It is an admission, first, that its utilization by law enforcement is necessary, and, second, it is an admission that it produces results, and it produces results in a problem area of vital importance to the internal security of our Nation.

Senator McCLELLAN. In that connection, do you think that the mounting incidence of crime in this country today threatens the security of the country, the internal security of this country?

Mr. HOGAN. I do, indeed, and the welfare of everybody in the country. This may not be so evident in the agricultural sections of the country, but it is certainly plainly evident in every metropolitan center. It is a cancer in our society, and I think it is a much more serious threat to internal security and the welfare of the country than whether X is a member of the Communist Party, or something like that.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would ask you just one thing further: If it is a threat to our internal security as you believe it is, do not those who insist that individual rights transcend the importance and the urgency of stamping out crime incur the risk of losing all of their liberty and losing all of their rights by simply insisting upon this very minor concession they are asked to make with respect to yielding to the authority for electronic surveillance of known criminals who are engaged in crime, and who are known to be engaged in criminal activities, and against whom it is most difficult to secure evidence against except in this fashion?

Mr. HOGAN. I agree entirely. It is shortsighted. These people live in a different world, a world of unreality it seems to me, if they can not see the value of the system that has been so effective especially where every possible safeguard is incorporated in the law as this committee has been trying to do in Senate bill 675.

Concerning confessions, Senator, I am just going to limit myself to some figures which fortunately we have. There has been a great deal of discussion.

(Mr. Hogan submits the following:)

STATEMENT OF FRANK S. HOGAN, NEW YORK COUNTY DISTRICT ATTORNEY, ON S. 674

I am grateful for this opportunity to testify with respect to proposed legislation in the field of criminal law which has been introduced by the Chairman, Senator McClellan, and other members of the Senate.

Concerning confessions, I regret the demise of the fair and rational criteria which governed the use of this vital evidence prior to June 13, 1966. No one, I think, could dispute the traditional exclusion of evidence of questionable reliability. And to assure ourselves that a verdict will not be thereby tainted, sound rules of evidence should bar confessions which are truly the product of threats or improper inducements and promises. In addition, there is probably a salutary disciplinary function in a rule which tends to discourage the use of force by law enforcement officers seeking to acquire evidence. But I believe that the Miranda decision, for all its praiseworthy clarity and exactitude, is a fundamentally unsound edict with consequences inconsistent with justice.

The theoretical fallacy, as I see it, lies in the premise that all incriminatory statements obtained from a suspect in custody are necessarily contaminated by an intangible "atmosphere" of coercion. Even assuming that the custodial interrogation produces some pressure to confess, I can not take the long step with the Court from that assumption to the conclusion that such pressure amounts to unconstitutional compulsion. In addition, the notion that strict compliance with the unprecedented formula of warnings decreed by the majority dissipates the atmosphere of coercion seems highly illogical. The vapor of custodial compulsion is surely not so poisonous if a free choice can be made to waive the rights to silence and counsel. And the majority of the Court evidently believes it can be.

But beyond the weakness of the decision's rationale, I can attest that the consequences have been distressing to those who still regard a criminal trial as a search for the truth. I should, however, first insert this caveat. In reciting figures to you drawn from our files, I make no pretense at scientific precision. The multiplicity of factors operative in each case, motivating a man to confess, to lie, or to remain silent, have not been, and perhaps can never be isolated and analyzed. In a real sense, the unique features of each case caution against gross compilations.

Yet I think our experience has been dramatic enough so that some conclusions may be drawn. Among these are that the Miranda caution significantly inhibits the making of a statement by a suspect to a police officer. Also, at least in two important areas, homicide and forcible rape, successful prosecution of demonstrably guilty persons is seriously impaired by reduction in the use of confession evidence.

For the six month period preceding the Miranda decision we kept records of the number of admissions used in presenting cases to our grand jury. These figures include almost all felony cases in New York County except homicides. The grand jury presentation occurs, in most instances, after arrest and arraignment. At the preliminary arraignment a substantial number of cases are dismissed for the lack of a prima facie case, or reduced to a misdemeanor charge. Hence, those which reach the grand jury are the more solid and serious felony cases. During the period from December 1965 through May 1966, such cases against 2610 defendants were presented to the grand jury.

Evidence of a confession or admission of guilt by 1280 of these 2610 defendants was presented to the grand jury. Thus, in the six month period before Miranda, roughly 49% of the non-homicide felony defendants made incriminating statements.

From July 1966 through December 1966, the six months after Miranda, cases against 2448 non-homicide defendants were presented to the grand jury. Only 354 admissions or confessions could be presented during this post Miranda period. Only 15% confessed in the six months after the Miranda ruling and 49% confessed before.

This drop from 49% to 15%, I think, justifies the conclusion that in felony cases generally the Miranda rule caused a significant reduction in the number of defendants who give incriminating statements.

It is considerably more difficult to assess statistically the number of defendants acquitted, or never even arrested or indicted, for lack of the crucial confession. In the ordinary felony case, there is frequently other evidence upon which a prima facie case may be made. Most obviously, there is almost always the testimony of the victim who is frequently able to identify the defendant as well as relate the facts of the crime. But how often this testimony is too weak to satisfy the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, it is hard to say. Sometimes there is other evidence, such as eyewitnesses, scientific evidence like fingerprints, the recovery of stolen property, or weapons in the defendant's possession. This of course helps satisfy the burden. Yet often even the most diligent police work fails to unearth objective evidence pointing to the defendant's complicity. A voluntary confession may then provide essential corroboration of the complainant's testimony. Many time, also, the credibility of the complainant requires some corroboration. The jury and the prosecutor may hesitate to trust a vengeful or disreputable complainant on so serious a matter as a felony charge. In these circumstances the vital evidence of a reliable confession is a safeguard of justice.

Homicide and rape and special cases: in homicide there is no complaining witness and frequently no eyewitness; in rape, in our jurisdiction, the complaining witness must be corroborated by independent evidence in every element.

The Homicide Bureau of our office has found that the greatest difficulty arising from Miranda has occurred in cases where the arrest and interrogation occurred before the date of that decision, June 13, 1966, but the trial of the defendant had not yet occurred. Miranda, of course, applies to all cases not yet tried on that date, regardless of the date of arrest. In New York County, several homicide cases have been dismissed on the People's motion because statements of the defendants were barred from evidence under Miranda, and the remaining evidence was insufficient for conviction as a matter of law.

In one such case, the defendant was charged with two separate crimes of murder in the first degree, for stabbing two women to death after attempting to rape them. Apart from the killer, there was no living witness to either murder. The defendant, previously convicted of felonious assault for slashing a woman with a knife, was apprehended with the aid of a composite sketch drawn by a police artist from a description supplied by the victim of a recent rape with a similar pattern. The defendant gave detailed confessions of both murders to an Assistant District Attorney after he had been advised that he did not have to make a statement and that, if he did, it could be used against him.

These confessions were rendered inadmissible by the Miranda decision, because the defendant had not been advised of his right to have counsel present. Thorough investigation produced no other evidence to salvage the indictment.

In another case, a storekeeper on the Lower East Side of Manhattan was shot and killed during an attempted robbery. Of the three men indicted for the crime, two—the self-confessed lookouts, who admittedly had picked the store to be robbed—had to be released after Miranda because they had not been advised as to right to counsel. Incidentally, the case against them could not have been saved even if the third defendant had been available against them. Unlike most states and the federal jurisdiction, a defendant's guilt cannot be established in New York by the testimony of an accomplice alone.

In two other homicide cases, the People were left with sufficient evidence to proceed to trial without the defendants' pre-Miranda statements, but were inhibited from using the confessions to cross-examine them when they took the stand and denied their guilt. Acquittals resulted.

A distinguished colleague of mine in law enforcement, District Attorney Evelle Younger of Los Angeles County, has expressed the view that confessions are essential to successful prosecution in only "a relatively small percentage of criminal cases". Mr. Younger cites a sample of 648 California cases, of which 67 were deemed to require a confession or admission for conviction.

In our view, over ten per cent is a rather significant, not a "relatively small," percentage. Moreover, since the Los Angeles County figures do not indicate the nature of the crimes involved, their value is very limited. Not all crimes are equally difficult to prove without statements by the defendant. In homicide cases we believe that substantially more than 10% require a confesion or admission for conviction. A survey of the 91 homicide cases in our office awaiting trial or disposition in the fall of 1965 disclosed that 25 of the cases would have lacked legally sufficient evidence for trial without the defendant's statement.

Our Homicide Bureau has kept a case by case tabulation of all suspects questioned in homicide cases since Miranda. From June 13, 1966 to June 13, 1967, 216 homicide suspects were questions. Of these, 64 refused to make any sort of statement to the Assistant District Attorney after receiving a Miranda warning. Of those who made a statement, 75 inculpated themselves. In sum, after receiving the required warning, about 30% of the 216 homicide suspects said nothing, 35% gave exculpatory statements, and 35% chose to incriminate themselves. This represents a marked change from pre-Miranda times when it was the Homicide Bureau experience that rarely did a suspect refuse to make any kind of statement, even if it was only to protest his innocence. In 1965, an Assistant District Attorney in my office conducted a survey of the last 100 capital cases in New York State. Of these 100 cases, confessions or admissions were obtained in 85. Of the 41 New York County cases on the list, confessions or admissions were received from the defendants in 31.

We also anticipate that the number of defendants choosing to go to trial will increase in direct proportion to the tendency of Miranda to reduce statements by suspects. Past experience indicates that the defendant who realizes that he has admitted his guilt to the authorities is more likely to plead guilty than go to trial. Of a random sample of 159 pre-Miranda felony prosecutions, including homicides, in which the defendants pleaded guilty before trial, there had been confessions or admissions in 96 cases or 60.4%. Of the 228 felony defendants who proceeded to trial in the same year, 118 pleaded guilty during trial; 43 of these, or 36%, had confessed or made admissions. By contrast, of the 110 felony defendants whose cases were decided by verdict after trial, only 23 or 24%, had made statements. Sixteen of these defendants were acquitted. Of these, none had made a statement.

To summarize these figures in the most tentative way, and taking account of our case-by-case experience in the investigation and prosecution of serious criminal charges, I would say that the stringent requirements of Miranda have significantly increased the chances that a criminal will escape judgment, where under previously prevailing fair standards he would have been convicted for his crime.

For this reason I welcome the efforts of this Committee to draw legislation seeking to return to the pre-existing and rational standards of exclusion: true involuntariness, I welcome it because such an enactment would provide a legislative finding of great weight, contrary to the assumption of fact underlying the Court's decision last year. Moreover, the proposed Bill, S. 674, clearly expresses an intelligently formulated policy, to be applicable in federal prosecutions, setting forth standards of due process. The bill provides a model for similarly directed state measures governing state trials. And it seems to me that policy for the conduct of police investigation and the admissibility of trial evidence is more appropriate to the legislative than the judicial responsibility.

In an article in the March 18, 1967 issue of The New Republic, Jon O. Newman, the United States Attorney for the District of Connecticut, makes a strong argument for the modification of the absolute rule of exclusion dictated by the Miranda decision. He suggests the adoption of a flexible rule and explains it thus:

"How would a flexible rule work? The decision to admit or exclude unlawfully obtained evidence would be left to the discretion of the trial judge, to be exercised with regard to certain specific criteria. Among these would be the kind of illegality, the good faith of the police, the seriousness of the crime, and the prosecution's need for the evidence."

"The trial judge should have discretion to admit or reject confessions even though the Mirada rules are not strictly followed. Of course if the evidence shows that the confession is not voluntary, it would automatically be excluded. The risk of unreliability is too high to be tolerated, and any form of coercion is too hostile to our concepts of fairness. But if the officer gave substantially the Miranda warning, or if he forgot to give any warning under the pressure of a midnight street arrest of an armed hoodlum, or if the crime is serious, or the prosecution must fail without the confession, a trial judge should be permitted to weigh all these factors and then decide whether to admit or exclude the confession."

The Newman suggestion seems eminently sensible to me, as does S. 674. Whether the enactment proposed will withstand attack in the United States Supreme Court is difficult to say. It does contradict the presently operative construction of the Fifth Amendment. But a closely divided Court does not inscribe immutable annotations to the language of the Constitution itself. The Court itself has clearly and dramatically taught us the ephemeral quality of their own rulings. I do not believe that lawyers or legislators are precluded from attempts to change the mind of the Court by conscientious and persuasive demonstration of error in a prior decision. Nor should we be discouraged from this effort where the margin is narrow, our resolve high. and our conviction urgent and sincere. Moreover, a fair and sensible alternative such as S. 674, drawn after careful study and the accumulation of solid evidence, is an effective and potent weapon for the persuasion of the practical, intelligent, and well-motivated Justices of our High Court. Anyway, such is my earnest hope. For I would hope too that no drastic avenue of relief from onerous decisions need be contemplated. While the path of Constitutional amendment may be open, I think we can all agree that it should be avoided unless and until it becomes more evident that it is an essential and inescapable last resort.

Mr. HOGAN. There has been a great deal of dispute as to whether the Miranda case actually made any difference insofar as admissions of guilt are concerned. For the 6 months, preceding the Miranda decision, our office kept records of the number of admissions used in presenting cases to our grand jury. These figures include almost all felony cases in New York County except homicides.

The grand jury presentation incurs in most instances after arrest and arraignment. After preliminary arraignment, a substantial number of cases are dismissed for the lack of a prima facie case, or are reduced to a misdemeanor charge. Hence, those which reach the grand jury are the most solid and serious felony cases. During the period from December 1965, through May 1966, such cases against 2,610 defendants were presented to the grand jury.

Evidence of a confession or admission of guilt by 1,280 of these 2,610 defendants was presented to the grand jury. Thus, in the 6 months period before Miranda, roughly 49 percent of the nonhomicide felony defendants made incriminating statements.

From July 1966, through December 1966, the 6 months after Miranda, cases against 2,448 nonhomicide defendants were presented to the grand jury. Only 354 admissions or confessions could be presented during this post-Miranda period. Only 15 percent confessed in the 6 months after the Miranda ruling, and 49 percent confessed before.

This drop from 49 percent to 15 percent, I think justifies the conclusion that in felony cases, generally, the Miranda rule caused a significant reduction in the number of defendants who give incriminating statements.

So, I regret the demise of the fair and rational criteria which governed the use of this vital evidence prior to June 13, 1966, I would hope that something could be done which would return the discretion to the trial judge. Where the evidence is voluntary, then whether or not the complete litany recommended by Miranda is recited by the police officer should be given weight but should not be conclusive with respect to excluding the confession or the admission.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I think the bill, S. 674, is pretty well drawn. I want to study it further, and, of course, the committee will study it. I do thing that a trial judge who was there at the time and can examine the accused and inquire into all of the circumstances attending any statement that he may have made can better determine the voluntariness of it than can the Supreme Court. And I do think that a jury who is impaneled to try guilt or innocence, who is vested with the authority to render a verdict that deprives a man of his liberty, maybe even his life, if they are competent to do that, they are competent to judge whether a confession was coerced or if it was voluntarily given. That is the way I look at that issue.

You may not have seen them, but the two afternoon papers in Washington have interesting editorials. One of them mentions you specifically and comments upon your testimony. They evidently had an advance copy of your statement. But, anyway, I think since they do refer very emphatically to this wiretapping issue, I think I will place these two editorials in the record at this point following your testimony. One is from the Evening Star of today, entitled "Phony War on Crime." And the other is in the Washington Daily News of today entitled "Ramsey Clark and Crime."

I think they are very illuminating editorials, and I would like to have them printed in the record at this point.

(The editorials referred to follow:)

[The Washington Daily News, July 12, 1967]

RAMSEY CLARK AND CRIME

In Seattle the Attorney General of the United States delivered a speech widely interpreted as a rebuttal to complaints that he is "soft" on crime.

The speech didn't rebut much of anything—or say much of anything. So it hardly can be interpreted as anything.

He said the world always has had crime but now "the renaissance has begun." President Johnson has proposed a "safe streets and crime control" law, the National Crime Commission has made its report and there is an "enlightened concern" among citizens.

But neither the President's proposed law nor the Crime Commission report in themselves will make much change. The "enlightened concern" among citizens, more accurately described as "high alarm," may—if people in the position of the Attorney General will listen.

Mr. Clark again complained of those who "divert attention from the real problems" by saying recent court decisions have "caused crime." Nobody says the decisions "caused" crime, but a long string of court decrees certainly has made it easier for criminals to get away with their depredations on society.

He talked about improving penal institutions, and nobody can quarrel with that, and he talked about "the relation of social reform to the control of crime," and nobody would quarrel about that.

But the Attorney General is the chief law enforcement officer of the nation. It is his job to set the pace in enforcing the law and in prosecuting those who violate it.

"What could be more meaningful to the public safety," he asked, "than upgrading law enforcement so that more crimes are discovered and solved and more violators assured firm, sure, speedy justice?"

Well, the answer to that is: Nothing could be more meaningful.

And if the Attorney General would dedicate himself to bringing those things about—while leaving social reforms and defense of far-out judicial decisions to others—he could turn out to be just what a crime-weary country ordered.

[The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., July 12, 1967]

PHONY WAR ON CRIME

There comes a time when a spade should be called a spade, and there also comes a time when a phony war should be called a phony war. That time has been reached in Lyndon Johnson's much-touted and loudly-heralded "war on crime."

The sweeping—and they are sweeping—regulations just put out by Attorney General Ramsey Clark restricting the use of wiretaps and electronic listening devices are the last straw. The attorney general surely would not have sounded this call for retreat without the approval of the President. So one is driven to the conclusion that the war on crime is a phony war, and that all of the President's high-flown speeches, not to mention the attorney general's rhetorical contributions, have been nothing more than wordy exercises designed to conceal the fact that this administration's heart is not in its so-called war.

The attorney general's new regulations go well beyond the restrictions on wiretaps and bugging imposed two years ago by the President. They forbid law-enforcement practices which the Supreme Court has not yet outlawed. A suspicious sould might think that they are an invitation to the court to go farther than it has up to this time—and this may not be lost upon the "liberal" judicial majority.

Ramsey Clark obviously has a thing about wiretaps and bugging. He thinks they are a waste of manpower. He has testified that they are "abhorrent" devices. He says that all of his experience shows that electronic surveillance (he has had very little experience in criminal law enforcement) is not necessary for the public safety, is not a desirable or effective investigative technique, and that these abhorrent devices should be used only in the national security field. He has never explained why wiretaps and bugs are essential in national security cases but useless against organized crime. Of course he cannot come up with any rational explanation.

Let's turn to another witness. Frank S. Hogan, New York County district attorney, has been in the front line of the war on crime for 27 years. He told the President's Crime Commission: Electronic surveillance is the single most valuable weapon in law enforcement's fight against organized crime. . . . It has permitted us to undertake major investigations of organized crime. Without it, and I confine myself to top figures in the underworld, my own office could not have convicted Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Jimmy Hines, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro, Joseph "Socks" Lanza, George Scalise, Frank Erickson, John "Dio" Dioguardi, and Frank Carbo.

Well, there it is. Take your choice. Frank S. Hogan, who has sent scores of vicious hoodlums to jail, is quite willing to use the "abhorrent" eavesdropping weapon in his war on crime. He thinks it is an essential weapon. Ramsey Clark and Lyndon Johnson are not willing. They would prefer to conduct their war with speeches at twenty paces. And, in consequence, this war is one which organized crime will surely win and which the American people, the ultimate victims, will surely lose.

Senator McCLELLAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Hogan. I think I have some understanding of the problems that you are struggling with. I hope this committee, after carefully weighing and studying these bills and the problems in the field of crime and law enforcement today, will submit legislation that will commend itself to the Congress. We need more effective instruments in law enforcement, and we need to strengthen criminal justice, and that means putting more criminals behind the bars where they belong.

Mr. HOGAN. Thank you very much, Senator, and whenever we in law enforcement are discouraged, we think of your understanding of our problems and your long championship of measures which would make it possible for us to do a better job, and we are most grateful to you.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Keating, come around, please, sir.

I understand, Mr. Keating, you want to make a brief statement and was anxious to get away to catch a train.

Mr. KEATING. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. You were not on the list here, and I am taking you out of order to try to accommodate you.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate it very much.

Senator McCLELLAN. You may identify yourself and proceed with your statement, Mr. Keating.

STATEMENT OF T. (TOM) W. KEATING, SENIOR VICE CHAIRMAN, PENNSYLVANIA LINES EAST OF THE BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN & ENGINEMEN, REPRESENTING THE PENNSYLVANIA SYSTEM GENERAL GRIEVANCE COMMITTEE AND THE PENNSYLVANIA READING SEASHORE LINES

Mr. KEATING. My name is Tom (T. W.) Keating, senior vice chairman of the Pennsylvania Lines East of the Brotherhood of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen. I am speaking for the Pennsylvania System General Grievance Committee and the Pennsylvania Reading Seashore Lines.

Because Senator Burdick, the sponsor of this legislation, is necessarily out of the country at this time, I would like to bring you up to date on some statistics which the Senator gave you when hearings on this bill were held earlier.

During 1966 Senator Burdick told you that in the short segment of the Pennsylvania Railroad between Washington and a point just north of Wilmington, Del., an incident of vandalism occurred on the average of more than once a day. I want to report that in the time since you have had this report until a recent date, these incidents have continued to average more than once a day. Of 187 incidents reported in 1967 up to June 19, there were eight people injured, and in only 25 reported incidents were there any people arrested. I submit the full list of reported incidents for inclusion at the end of my testimony.

In terms of the entire Pennsylvania Railroad, in 1966 there were 1,540 incidents of trains being stoned with a total of 222 passengers injured, but again the number of those arrested falls far short of the total number of incidents.

Occasionally, vandalism proves to be quite dramatic as happened early in the morning of May 22 when a Pennsylvania Reading Seashore Lines passenger train bound from Wildwood, N.J., plowed into a barricade of steel stakes and large oil drums. One hundred passengers were shaken up in this incident which happened at exactly the same spot as an incident 5 months earlier in which a steel drain pipe was rolled on the track as a barricade.

These statistics that I have brought to you have pertained to the Pennsylvania Railroad, the railroad with which I am most familiar. However, in my business with other offices of the Railroad Brotherhoods, it is my strong feeling that this is a nationwide problem because incidents of vandalism are not limited to any particular section of the country. They are found in places where the concentration of population is the heaviest. Naturally, it is in these areas of the heaviest population where there is the greatest danger to public health and safety arising from the risk of a train put out of control by vandalism.

An example of what I am trying to say can be found in an excerpt from a statement made by Walter P. Dunn, an engineer on the Boston & Maine Railroad, when he testified before the Senate Commerce Committee on another bill. I submit it for inclusion at the end of my statement.

You gentlemen I am sure can visualize how you might feel driving down the highway and having a stone thrown through your windshield. This is exactly the same sensation that a man riding in a cab of a train would have if a stone were thrown through his window. Though the situation with an automobile is very serious, it is even more serious for a train because of the weight and momentum of the train and because there may be hundreds of passengers on this train.

In its report to you, the Department of Justice indicated that there were no specific statutes in this area, but they saw no need for any statutes because they were not aware of any great number of incidents of vandalism. I believe the magnitude of the problem has been very clearly pointed out, and I hope for the benefit of working railroad men as well as railroad passengers and all of the citizens, that you will act favorably toward S. 552.

[The Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, May 22, 1967]

TRAIN HITS BARRICADE, 100 ARE JOLTED AT SHORE

About 100 riders were jolted today when a Pennsylvania-Reading Seashore Lines passenger express bound from Wildwood to Philadelphia plowed into a barricade that had been erected across the tracks.

The barricade was made up of "seven or eight" 50-gallon oil drums and steel stakes that had been driven into the roadbed, a railroad spokesman said.

The incident occurred at 7:20 A.M. at Folsom, Atlantic County, on the railroad's Cape May spur, about three and a half miles south of Winslow Junction.

ANOTHER INCIDENT

It was the second such occurrence in five months. Last Dec. 8 a train crashed into a steel drain pipe that had been rolled across the tracks at the same place.

The train involved in today's crash left Wildwood at 6:27 A.M. and was due at 30th Street Station at 8:27 A.M. It was composed of two stainless steel cars.

It was proceeding at a fast pace over the single-track roadbed when the passengers were startled by the sudden application of brakes followed by the sound of a crash.

"It sounded like the whole bottom of the train was ripped up," one passenger related.

NO ONE IS HURT

No one was hurt, but the train was badly damaged. Its air hoses were ripped up, cutting off brake power.

The conductor had to hike down the tracks to reach a wayside telephone to call for help.

The passengers waited abroad the stalled train until another train which left Atlantic City for Philadelphia at 7:15 A.M. picked them up.

The train from Atlantic City switched to the Cape May spur at Winslow Junction, backed down the tracks, hooked on to the stalled train and then pulled into Philadephia.

The Wildwood passengers were an hour and 10 minutes late.

State police began an investigation.

Mr. KEATING. I am not too familiar with the application of the law, but primarily I think this:

That we have had occasions when reports of vandalism have been made to local authorities and because it is a juvenile matter, the State takes interest in it and nothing is done about it, and I see the Attorney General in a newspaper article says—and I can only speak from the article or rather from letters in the record here—that they say no reason for it because they had State statutes. Yet, in the newspaper article, we find that a judge tells them—

> Well, there will be nothing done to you, but we are going to give you a calling down for putting something in front of these trains.

As long as they keep letting them go and not do something to discipline them for it, we are going to have it, and it is increasing every day, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You probably share my philosophy that unpunished crime breeds more crime.

Mr. KEATING. Yes, sir. And if we let them start as youths and grow up we will have some more of what I have just been listening to. If there could be some way of punishing them by just showing them the seriousness of the nature of the violation they have committed, maybe that would be sufficient. I do not like to be callous.

I have here to submit to you a statement taken in testimony before the Senate Commerce Committee when they were holding hearing on Senate bill 2180 which I think is very enlightening. I will not read it.

Senator McCLELLAN It will be inserted in the record and will be printed in full.

(The statement referred to follows:)

(The following is an excerpt taken from the statement of Walter P. Dunn, locomotive engineer employed by the Boston & Maine Corp., Fitchburg Division, made before the Surface Transportation Sub-Committee of the Committee on Commerce, when they were holding hearings on Senate Bill S-2180, June 29, 1966, during the Second Session of the 89th Congress:)

I now wish to discuss the exact nature of the freight run on which I am presently employed as a locomotive engineer. My present assignment is best described as a combination of local freight and industrial switching duties. This assignment operates daily from Boston to Watertown, Massachusetts, and returns to Boston. The total miles traveled each day is 16 miles. This run, like hundreds of similar runs, has only one man assigned to the engine crew, namely the engineer. The train crew is composed of a conductor and two brakemen.

I report five days a week, Monday through Friday, at a regular starting time in the Boston Engine Terminal facilities of my employing carrier. After a thorough inspection of the locomotive assigned me each day, I am then required to run this locomotive single-manned, with nobody in the cab to accompany me on this leg of my assignment, to a point called West Cambridge, Massachusetts. This operation, nearly five miles in length, is made at maximum permissible road speeds on main-line trackage in signal territory, and I repeat, with nobody in the cab other than myself. At West Cambridge, I meet the train crew, make up or couple onto the outbound train, test the air brakes and then proceed to Watertown, Massachusetts, the turnaround point of this assignment each day. The distance from West Cambridge to Watertown is approximately two and seven-eighths miles in length.

As has been already stated, the first several miles of my run is made at road speeds with no one in the cab of the locomotive with me. In this span of miles, I am compelled to pass through what we railroaders refer to as the "combat zone." This is a slum area extending from Prospect St. Bridge, Somerville, Massachusetts, to the West Cambridge, Massachusetts Yard facilities. On days when the schools are on holiday or during summer vacation, it is the usual thing for the engine to be stoned almost continuously while passing through this area. The tracks are strewn with debris and rubbish, nearly rail-high in places, and cement blocks, logs, iron bars, barrels, supermarket carriages, and many other objects are forever being placed on the rails in hope of derailing an engine or train.

From Prospect St. Bridge to West Cambridge, there are about six overhead bridges of various types. The amount of stones and other objects hurled from these bridges at moving engines or trains defies adequate description here; such as the device of a large rock tied to a rope and suspended to the exact height of the window glass area of a fast moving locomotive.

I feel it readily evident that a locomotive engineer, especially when single-manned is a sitting duck in the situations described, and with no advance warning as a rule, is prone to serious injury or even worse as these objects come crashing through the cab windows, with the ever present possibility confronting him that he can become blinded for life, if he survives the incident.

The tension and anxiety which confronts an engineer every day of his life in normal road operations is certainly compounded when he must face these additional anxieties and hazards I have mentioned. It is my understanding that this condition is prevalent on all railroads operating in urban areas, and is not peculiar to the Boston & Maine Corporation alone.

I have personally been stoned so severely that it became necessary for me to place a board on the dead-man pedal, contort my leg around the throttle stand of the engine in order to place my foot on the board and thus attempt to operate the engine from the middle of the cab, in order to get away from the glass areas of the locomotive cab which were being stoned. The operation of the locomotive is interfered with to some extent by this means, but to stop the locomotive in the midst of a gang of hoodlums on the track, would be to invite serious injury at best.

On more than one occasion, I have stopped the locomotive, however, with the result that one or more intoxicated hoodlums have entered the cab of the locomotive brandishing knives. When locomotives were double-manned, this possibly served as somewhat of a deterrent to such acts of violence, but with single-manning, the engineer has lost the psychological advantage of two men being present, and is a prime target for the whims of the slum area hoodlums and others.

It is a matter of carrier record that on November 18, 1965, my engine was so severely stoned that the front windows of the engine were smashed out by a gang of vandals on a bridge at West Cambridge, and I was forced to leave the job at that point due to a head injury. The carrier's records are replete with similar incidents, which apparently are continuing unabated, providing a frustrating problem to any engineer.

An engineer, either single or double-manned, being exposed to the above hazards and the tension and anxiety which attends such lawless deeds, is most certainly entitled, in my view, to a reduction in the hours he can be required to work each day. I have personally found it to be a nerve wracking, exhausting experience to operate a locomotive each day under the conditions mentioned. Taking into account the routine problems of operation which I shall describe in the following, coupled with the few I have just described, certainly provides a valid case in behalf of the modest reduction in hours of service proposed.

In continuing my description of the run I presently operate, it is pointed out that while I have no one in the cab with me from Boston to West Cambridge, I do have the head brakeman with me in the cab from West Cambridge to Watertown, Massachusetts. This is by virtue of the fact that he must flag protect four grade crossings in this distance and is assigned to ride the engine. Speeds are slow on this portion of the run, due mainly to poor track conditions, but are also kept down because of the presence of objects often placed on the track in attempt to derail the train. On one occasion, the head brakeman and I were forced to break up and remove an entire cedar post fence which had been placed on the rails. Tampered switches are an ever present hazard where vandals break the switchlocks and then either line the switch for a side track or leave it half-lined in an attempt to derail the engine or train. Constant vigilance, with or without the head brakeman, is required of an engineer on this type of run.

Mr. KEATING. I have nothing further to say unless there was some questions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I do not have any questions. There is not but one issue before us, and that is are the State laws in this area effective?

Mr. KEATING. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You have got State laws, and you normally say: "Let them enforce the law." But it is not just the State and the local community that have an interest. These are interstate passengers, interstate goods, interstate employees.

Mr. KEATING. That is correct, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And it takes a Federal statute to give the protection needed. I have no hesitancy in voting for it.

Mr. KEATING. I am sure it will help us.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. McDermott?

Come around, please.

Congressman Eilberg, we welcome you before this subcommittee.

Will you introduce your constituent?

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSHUA EILBERG, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FOURTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee. Through your courtesy I have the privilege of introducing to you a witness who is extremely well versed in the field and problems of law enforcement—Thomas F. McDermott.

My association with Mr. McDermott goes back some 15 years when I was a young assistant district attorney in Philadelphia and he was already a police officer of considerable note. Since that time I have worked closely with him at times and have benefited from his advice at other times.

Tom McDermott first became a Philadelphia police officer in 1928. He has worked as a uniformed policeman, a detective, and commanding officer of such special units as narcotics squads and special investigation squads. He has received more than 100 official commendations from three Philadelphia mayors, various commissioners, civic associations and newspapers. Included among his personal momentos is an award of merit from the U.S. subcommittee investigating narcotic traffic in this country.

When Tom McDermott officially retired in 1960, he was chief of the Philadelphia County Detectives. Since then, retirement to him has meant the post of chief security officer for Food Fair Stores, Inc., one of the Nation's considerable largest food chains which happens to be headquartered in my district.

I know Mr. McDermott will have some interesting things to say to you. And I know you will extend to him the same kind courtesy you have shown me.

Thank you.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Congressman Eilberg. We appreciate your statement, and we welcome you and Mr. McDermott before the subcommittee.

Would you like to read all of your statement?

Mr. McDERMOTT. No, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let it be inserted in the record in full at this point, and you will give us your background, please.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS F. McDERMOTT, FIRST VICE PRESIDENT, CHAIRMAN, PUBLIC RELATIONS, POLICE CHIEFS ASSOCIATION OF SOUTHEASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. McDERMOTT. Senator, I appreciate the courtesy of your committee and the privilege of appearing before you.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I am Thomas F. McDermott, and at the present time, I am the first vice president and chairman of public relations for the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania. This association has a membership of over 600 active police and security officials. The area covers the southeastern part of Pennsylvania, the southern part of New Jersey, and the entire State of Delaware.

It is in this capacity that I appear before you today, and may I say that I come before this committee with more than 30 years of law enforcement background. I have walked a beat as a policeman, operated a police patrol car, later promoted to the rank of detective, then to sergeant of detectives, lieutenant of detectives, and then to chief of Philadelphia County detectives.

I am giving you my background for no other reason than to show you that I have law enforcement experience and I qualify to testify before your committee today.

I know what it is to be under fire; I know what it is to be under attack by a group of people that have no knowledge of what the arrest is, when you are making an arrest, and attempt to take prisoners away from you. I know what it is to be surrounded by a mob and have the prisoner attempted to be taken and freed without any knowledge of what actually took place prior to this occurrence.

Senator McCLELLAN. Sometimes indifferent as to what it is, anyhow.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I have made arrests for practically every crime on the books.

I have investigated practically every crime.

I have worked in a section of Philadelphia which was known as "the Crime Belt," which was later termed as the "Jungle."

I have spent the biggest part of my police career in that section of the city. I worked with the courts and have spent a good many of my police years in courts, and I know what it is to work with the courts and the district attorneys.

Our association, which takes in the entire Delaware Valley area, wishes you to know that we appreciate what you are doing on behalf of law enforcement.

We know that bill S. 674 and bill S. 917 are for the benefit of law enforcement in general. And we honestly consider that this legislation is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, as the first vice president of this association, it has been my pleasant duty to exchange views with police chiefs from all over the United States. I am a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police and meet with them every year. They are dedicated police officials, conscientious-thinking men, and these men all work closely with the district attorney or prosecutor in their respective areas, and are guided by their directives.

But, like the police, the prosecutors are troubled and confused by decisions of our High Court, and many have expressed their views in the press.

The recent Miranda decision has been published, discussed, and projected for the future on many occasions. When this decision was recorded, it became the law of the land and we are dutybound to acknowledge it and its meaning. But this does not mean, however, that in the free flow of communication, well-intentioned and responsible persons who work in the field of law enforcement must remain silent when experience and practice dictate otherwise in the face of these far-reaching decisions.

Mr. Chairman, members of our association have designated me to relay to you their alarm over the many "far-out" decisions handed down to our High Court and that the Mallory, Escobedo, Mapp, Massiah, and the Miranda decisions representing American judges' rules reflect a deep-seated distrust of law-enforcement officers everywhere, totally unsupported by relevant data on current material based upon our experience. These words, Mr. Chairman, are not mine; they are words of Mr. Justice White who wrote a scathing minority opinion in the Massiah and the Escobedo decisions.

The Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania, through its President William F. Riempp, chief of police of Bensalem Township, Pa., join Mr. Justice White and others in their fear of any extension of the doctrines enunciated by the Supreme Court. We, the members of this policy body, take no backward step for any group when it comes to the zealous protection of the defendant's rights. We do not question the rights of defendants to have counsel; we encourage it, and we wish to go on record to hope the program to protect the indigent is increased. Under no circumstances would we take unfair advantage of a defendant prior to arrest and during the actual trial. We fail to see how anyone can thrill or take pride in an unfair advantage over any arrested person. We applaud any court for having the courage to set aside such convictions. But, from the corrective plateau of a given case, we feel their great and unwarranted intrusions on those charged with the enforcement of law have resulted and have, without any doubt, hampered seriously the police in their fight against crime.

Senator, I listened to District Attorney Hogan, and I worked with the district attorney in New York on many occasions, and I want at this time to state that I used wiretapping. I used wiretapping considerably prior to the time the law went into effect in Pennsylvania. I used it in connection with Mr. Dash, who was district attorney in Philadelphia, and who is the author of "The Eavesdroppers," and is now connected with Georgetown University who has taken a decided view against wiretapping or electronic equipment of any kind. But Mr. Dilworth, who was then district attorney of Philadelphia, proposed wiretapping almost similar to that which Mr. Hogan proposes today, and this goes way back. If you will read Mr. Dash's book on eavesdroppers, you will see where Mr. Dash pointed out to everyone the horrors of eavesdropping and the horrors of wiretapping, but it was not horrible when he, as district attorney, worked with me on uncovering many hundreds of drug peddlers. As Mr. Eilberg spoke, we worked with the Senate Committee Investigating Narcotics, and Mr. Dash testified before Mr. Welker and Senator Daniels as to what it meant to the law-enforcement officer and how essential it was to good law enforcement

Senator McCLELLAN. It was a good tool when he had the responsibility.

Mr. McDERMOTT. It was an occupational disease I believe at that time. That is what Mr. Dash called it, that he was suffering from an occupational disease, of district attorney. I believe it is the opposite. I think you have the occupational disease now from a civil libertarian's viewpoint.

We, in our wiretapping investigations, uncovered drug rings, and, as a result, we made 106 arrests, and out of the 106 arrests 105 were convicted, and we could not understand how we lost the other one as our cases were solid.

But, Mr. Dash participated in that investigation.

But I agree with District Attorney Hogan, it is essential.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that not a scientific method?

Mr. McDERMOTT. The only scientific method that helps a police officer to help investigate a crime is being able to investigate and interrogate. There is very little scientific method. On the other hand, the people who are advocating scientific methods are now saying "Now, you can't use scientific methods."

The Attorney General of the United States stated that there was not much crime to get excited about. As a matter of fact, he said there was an increase in crime and at the same time the President appointed a committee to investigate crime, that it was so serious.

But, Senator, we work with it day in and day out. We know what it is to see a rape in an alley and to see a murdered in the backyard and have no evidence whatsoever to go on. The only thing that we can use, the only help we can get in a case like that would be from what is derived from information. Without information, you are licked.

Now, if you have the proper information, the information leads to interrogation. If the police cannot interrogate, then we have no place to go. All the scientific equipment in the world will be useless.

Senator McCLELLAN. I can hardly conceive that we tell the policemen to go out here and protect society. That is what police are for, to protect society as well as to detect and apprehend the criminal after the crime is committed. People look to them as a shield for protection. If you go off on a vacation, the fact that there are active policemen in the area on the block gives you a little sense of security. You feel like your property or goods are protected. If a policeman cannot inquire and expect to get answers I do not know how you can investigate very well.

It seems to me that every citizen who believes in freedom, liberty, all the rights they profess they want to keep, know that they cannot be kept in a land of lawlessness.

Now, you have got to make a choice. You either give up some minor right or privilege, yield it on some occasions in aid of law enforcement, or you yield to the superior power of the lawless element. You have got to do one of the two. You can talk about all civil liberties you want to; but they will all be lost if we lose this war on crime in the United States.

Mr. McDERMOTT. At the rate we are going, we are losing it, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are losing it—and faster than we think.

I have no further political ambitions. I sit here today doing my best to bring in here the testimony that will enlighten us, and up to this hour we have not refused to hear any witness who wanted to be heard before this committee on these bills.

If it is wrong, bring the facts in here that will establish that this principle is wrong and let us have it. I think the gravity of this situation is just now beginning to be felt. I do not know that it will be adequately felt so that public interest, public sentiment will demand that Congress act. I cannot say about that, but I do know, and I say this without any reservation, that among law-abiding decent citizens of this country there is less confidence today in the law-enforcement machinery in this land than before.

Mr. McDERMOTT. That is right, absolutely right, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. No question about it. The decent citizen says "Where is my protection?" This he sees: He sees known rapists and murderers, self-confessed turned loose by the highest court in the land, told to go their way. They do not even say "Sin no more." And those are the conditions. Some will smirk at it, I know that. But I have seen folks smirk at less important things. The time is here when the law-abiding and decent people of this Nation must awaken to the danger that is imminent—not a quarter of a century from now, not a half century from now, but within the next decade.

Proceed.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Senator, may I just for a moment read an article that has been republished in the Evening Bulletin from one of our police magazines?

It was written by me. It is just a small article.

LIFE OF A HYPOTHETICAL POLICEMAN—TRIBULATIONS OF A POLICEMAN

In any ordinary day, this is the gamut I run. Who am I? Dr. Kildare or Dr. Casey?—No! I am your policeman, hired by you, paid by you and one who tries to give the kind of service you, the public, demand.

Is there any other endeavor that can compare with this type of activity? I think not. As a police officer, I may in daily functions be involved in the entire gamut of human problems, emotions and conflicts.

It may be necessary for me to assist in a birth of a child on the way to an emergency ward, and maybe before the end of my duty be at the side of a person breathing his last.

JACK OF ALL TRADES

I may assist a stranger lost in a big city, return a lost child to a distressed parent, arrest a holdup man, issue a ticket for a traffic violation or render first aid to a person injured in a traffic accident.

In general, I am charged with protecting persons and property from criminal attack and depredation. I am expected to be courteous, patient and kind under all circumstances and conditions.

I am expected to have the courage of an astronaut, the chivalry of Sir Walter Raleigh, the integrity of George Washington, the judgment of a Supreme Court justice, the patience and restraint of a Sunday school superintendent, and the sweetness and light of a saint, and I am expected to have more than a working knowledge of all the Federal, State and local laws that I am sworn to enforce.

I am called upon to make snap judgments as to whether to arrest or not in a specific case, even though this same decision might take a top lawyer days to ponder.

WHEN JUDGES SPLIT

When judges and legal minds have such a difficulty with a definition of due process, and when Justices of the United States Supreme Court split 5 to 4, and our own Pennsylvania Supreme Court, 4 to 3, as to a specific application of due process, how am I, the lonely policeman, to know what to do? How am I, patroling my beat on foot or in my police car three-quarters of the time at night, expected to know, or, if you will, to guess right and make a legally correct split-second decision as to what action to take; especially when I am suddenly confronted with a problem, perhaps in hot pursuit of a criminal or in the investigation of a crime, whether I should enter a building without a search warrant and, after entering, whether I should seize obvious evidence which would disappear or be contaminated if not immediately impounded?

I stand right in the arena of action—with all attention focused on me. These are not the only perplexing problems I face, for now I know that, should I make a mistake of judgment in one direction, it could cost me my life, and in another direction, I could find myself a defendant in a false arrest suit or other civil or disciplinary action.

And even if I choose the right course, there still remains the possibility that I will be viciously assaulted by irrational mobs of onlookers, who, even though not knowing the circumstances surrounding the arrest, will attempt to free the prisoner I have apprehended. This is happening more frequently than reported in the press.

THE FALSE LIBERAL

I must have the skin of a rhinoceros because the police profession is fast becoming the target for slander, libel and abuse from an assortment of tawdry characters, ranging from pathetic "crying nellies" on the one hand to outspoken enemies of society on the other.

Then in the middle between these two extremes are such habitual critics as the false liberal who labors under the misguided obession that law enforcement is inherently incompatible with the cause of civil liberties.

I act as an arbiter in family quarrels even though in most cases I come out second best. I am most likely to be on the receiving end of a bop on the head with a shoe or a slipper by the same woman who called me to protect her from her drunken husband. Of course I am supposed to act as a counselor in all personal problems and be a master in public relations and an expert in race relations.

Now, perhaps you will ask what inducemnets were offered me to become a policeman. I sometimes wonder myself, because my salary is much less than that of truck drivers, bricklayers, carpenters and many other trades in which none of the aforementioned talents are needed.

THE ROADBLOCKS

I receive no time and a half or double time for Sundays and holidays; they are just plain days to me. When I am in court testifying against some criminal that I have arrested, often the defense lawyer tries to convince, and sometimes succeeds in convincing, the judge and jury that I should be prosecuted for arresting such a poor innocent person.

These are the many roadblocks that are thrown in the path of doing efficient police work. I am admired by the public just as long as I do not inconvenience them personally. Believe me, it does not help my morale to be beaten, scorned or harrassed.

I came into police work because I had high ideals and a desire to be a good law enforcement officer. I thought I could pit my wits against any law violater and have a good chance to win, but unless you, the public, decide you are going to back me up, I shall fail.

Condemn me when I am wrong, but support me when I am right.

That article has been republished and reprinted by the Evening Bulletin, in Philadelphia, on many occasions. It is my personal opinion of what the police officer goes through today.

The rest of my statement I can forego, but I would like to offer it to you, with the exception of my last paragraph, which is as follows:

In conclusion, we believe that during this era of conflict between our Supreme Court and the entire structure of law enforcement, it is incumbent upon all of us to remain steadfast in our obedience to the mandates of statutory law and judicial decision. In that this is a government of laws, and not of men, these divergencies will be resolved through democratic processes. We firmly believe that the vast number of the citizens of our great nation desire a strengthening of the hand of law enforcement. The protection of individual rights demands the effective enforcement of our laws for, otherwise, just who is going to protect the weak from the strong? We are all confident that all this can be accomplished within the framework of the Constitution of the United States of America.

So, Mr. Chairman, let's unite in a spirit of confidence, courage, and determination as we await the dawn of new tomorrow. Let us ask those five ultraliberal justices of the Supreme Court to please join us.

Mr. Chairman, I am the editorial editor of the National Police magazine which carries an editorial in each issue. I ask that you put that in.

Senator McCellan. Do you have the editorial there?

Mr. McDermott. I would like to submit it for the record.

Senator McClellan. How many editorials have you?

Mr. McDermott. I brought four issues with just a small editorial in each.

Senator McClellan. Let the four editorials be published in the record at the conclusion of your testimony.

(The editorials referred to are as follows—NOTE: Only three received:)

CRIME IS EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

(This editorial feature was prepared by Thomas F. McDermott, First Vice President of the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania)

There are many headlines giving the descriptions of atrocities and wanton attacks by primitive savages on the citizens of towns and cities throughout this country. They are becoming more and more frequent; more and more savage, and with more and more contempt on the part of the perpetrators for the forces of law and order.

At this hour, the more urgent and persistent call of patriotism in the United States demands the rehabilitation of justice, and requires that the nation take heed to the wide and spreading extent of vicious crimes.

A system of laws, together with the substantial enforcement of these laws, constitute the thing we call public justice. Without justice supreme in any country or place, life, person, and property are under a shadow of constant hazard.

This is the heart of the situation. The American people are confronted by a national peril which is growing graver every hour, and if public opinion is not so effectively aroused as to procure some prompt and heroic remedy, the day may soon come when the regularly constituted machinery for the maintenance of law and order may break down altogether, and the safety of life and property will depend on voluntary defenders.

Our sole hope of raising America to her former position of a law abiding country is the awakening of public opinion to the actual and terrifying facts.

Responsibility for the present menace cannot be shifted to mere agents. We may smugly say that it is the business of the judges, the prosecuting attorneys, and the policemen to suppress crime; but it will never be suppressed until we make it everybody's business. It is our business to know the facts and to effect any necessary changes. It is to make felt, courageously and immediately, the influence of public opinion upon the conduct of our legislators, courts, congressmen, and every authority having a duty with the enactment of criminal law.

There are those idealists and theorists who will, from their ivory towers, oppose the deterrent factor in law. Progress in social science is made through theory and ideals, but it should be recognized that a full and wholesome practice of these theories must be accomplished, particularly in affairs affecting society as a whole, to insure success. To have rights without safety of life, limb, and property is a meaningless thing. Individual rights considered apart from their relationship to public safety and security are like labels on empty cartons.

In truth, we cannot have unbridled liberties and at the same time have a safe, stable society. Let's find out where liberty ends and license begins, at which point does the individual criminal's liberties conflict with the nation's security; at what point does the rights of the individual infringe upon the collective rights of society.

There must be a mobilization in one form or another of the determined, law-abiding people of this country to affirmatively declare war on disruptive elements. Public opinion must be awakened to the alarming crime rate, and to the realization that crime is everybody's business.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING

(This editorial feature was prepared by Thomas F. McDermott, Second Vice President of the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania

The constant furor generated by writers regarding wire tapping, the placing of microphones, and the use of various electronic instruments is very amusing. Every time such articles appear, the public runs around like ants in a hill checking to see if they are being spied upon.

There does exist the possibility that some governmental and private organizations have utilized listening equipment at times, but I feel very safe in saying that outside of the larger police departments, such as Philadelphia and Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania, the police departments would first not need the listening devices and secondly could not afford to include them in their budget.

Another fact that should be considered by the public is that with the present understaffed situation in every police department, there is no time to waste in tapping phones or homes unless that person is actively involved in crime. The police do not have the time, manpower, or interest to spy on what would be in the great majority of cases in a very dull life.

A great deal of publicity was given to the fact that the olive in a martini could be bugged with a toothpick. This brings us down to the situation that we must depend upon our suspect drinking martinis and not highballs or beer. The ridiculousness of the whole situation seems to appeal to the public's innate propensities to "cloak and dagger" stories.

At one time large police departments utilized wire tapping in proceedings against known racketeers, bookies, and gamblers. This was the only way in which law enforcement could pierce the "iron curtain" with which these overloads of crime surrounded themselves. It was the only way in which you could deal with the bookies who constantly used the telephone as their favorite method of operation.

Alleged civil liberty exponents protest that the legalization of wire tapping would mean that police could listen to a conversation between a man and his wife. I wonder out of the billions of conversations how many would even prove interesting let alone illegal.

The wiretap has been outlawed but the laws on the subject are ambiguous. I believe the federal law does not forbid the tapping of your telephone but rather the disclosure of information gained in such a way. Other states permit wire tapping if a court order is obtained in advance. I, for one, hope that this important weapon will someday be restored to the police, but in the meantime let us calmly analyze the various facets involved rather than to dread that someone will hear the grocery order, the conversation about Mary's mumps, or the fact that John's back is acting up again.

There is no doubt that the rights of people are guaranteed under the Constitution, but one of the rights is that they may be secure in their homes. I feel that one of the best ways of enforcing that security is to give police the means to apprehend the criminal.

Sheltering Justice

(This editorial feature was prepared by Thomas F. McDermott, Second Vice President of the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania)

Policemen are called law enforcement officers, but are they really? Just when has the law been enforced? The law has been enforced when the law violator taken into custody is brought before the court and the penalty by law is involked against him. Police do not invoke the penalty of the law.

No one likes to be arrested unless he is a "nut." But the professional criminal does not particularly fear arrest if that is all that happens to him. Sure, it is a nuisance and a temporary interruption to his activities, but he doesn't actually fear it. Naturally he would rather not have it happen, but he is not afraid of it either. Just what is he afraid of? He is afraid of swift indictment and trial, not necessarily a greater severity of justice, but celerity, certainty and finality of justice.

The failure of justice in America, which largely makes for the present increase in crime, can only be consequent upon a widespread lack of respect for, and fear of, our country's laws, and that lack has its origin, in most part, in the American habit of "dilly-dallying" with the criminal.

God fearing, well-disposed men and women would still respect the rights of their fellow men even if there were no penal laws. The law violator cannot be coaxed in good conduct by any love of the law.

There is a great need in this country today for the law violator to have a fear of the penalties of the law. It is most essential to the efficacy of punishment as a deterrent, that the penalty follow swiftly upon the crime; that the suffering of the victim and the retribution of the wrongdoer should mingle as nearly as possible. The public mind needs to connect the suffering of the prisoner with the wrong done his victim, or else the great unconcerned multitude will pity the present misery of the criminal and lose sympathy with the forgotten misery of the victim.

Penalties shorn of their deterrent or reformatory effect have for their imposition absolutely no jusification. If society is as well off when it waives a penalty as it is when it inflicts a punishment, then, no matter how mild the sentence, its fulfillment becomes in itself a needless cruelty. For that reason, when by lapse of time for any reason whatsoever, the punishment dissolves its connection with the offense, the deterrent, as well as the reformatory effects, are destroyed.

The time consumed by arrest, trial, conviction, sentence, new trial, appeal to State higher courts, new trial again, conviction, then appeal to Federal Courts or ultimately to the United State Supreme Court, or easy parole or probation after conviction, with easily flowing executive clemency, contitutes today in the United States, an injury to the law abiding citizen that is without excuse, defense, or parallel.

The purpose of punishment is not retribution, but for the deterrence of evil in others, and the reform of the criminal.

Just where do the rights of the criminal end, and just where does the safety of the public begin? And what are the rights of the poor forgotten third party—the bereaved family of a victim of crime?

It seems to this writer, that this is the heart of the whole subject of crime and punishment. I firmly believe that the criminals' rights extend up to, and including, a fair trial and constitutional disposition of any reasonable doubt—and no further.

Once convicted at a fair trial, with every reasonable legal resource exhausted, the convicted criminal must take his medicine. If he believes it is a bad medicine, then he should have thought of that before undertaking his crime.

The "bleeding hearts" pleas and argument that punishment neither makes amends to the victim, nor serves as a deterrent to other potential criminals, is pure hog wash. The whole point is that punishment is directed toward neither of these ends—it is society's retaliation against the wanton transgressor, and the punishment should be sure and swift. It is only common sense that a society which doesn't retaliate against the transgressor, has no backbone, no character, and no moral fiber.

The supreme need now of this country of ours is for a sheltering justice—justice for guilt or innocence, which shall be for the innocent a shield; for the guilty a resolute sword—justice which shall go undelayed, sure, and final in the fulfillment of its awards, as well as of its condemnations.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I have here an indication that the press in Philadelphia is backing us.

I have the editorials of various papers and cartoons that I would like to submit.

Senator McCLELLAN. The editorials may be printed in the record at this point, the cartoons will be made a part of the subcommittee files.

EDITORIAL VIEWS OF THE TIMES: WHO'S BEING PROTECTED?

The Times this week begins a brief series of articles on crime and how recent United States Supreme Court decisions are hampering efforts of police and the lower courts to protect decent citizens.

The author of these articles knows whereof he writes. Thomas F. McDermott was former Chief Philadelphia County Detective and presently is a vice president of the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania.

His thoughts reveal how frustrating it must be for a dedicated officer of the law to try to enforce that law.

He is disturbed, as no doubt you are, by the continuing unsuccessful attempt to stem the spread of crime.

It is particularly unfortunate that this frustration is the result of several recent decisions of the Supreme Court, our highest tribunal. Equally unfortunate is the fact that neither Mr. McDermott nor we are able to do anything about Supreme Court decisions except to "burn" within ourselves.

Then, it follows, what is the solution?

The United States Supreme Court has the power to set the precedents. It also has the equally important power, and has exercised it in many recent cases, to change those precedents.

Let us hope for the latter event, so that law enforcement officers can have the feeling of having done a good job, and law abiding citizens can rest safely in their homes or be able to walk their city's streets without looking over their shoulders in fear of attack or worse.

BRING THEM TO TRIAL

Justice delayed interminably is justice denied entirely.

The people of Philadelphia, viewing with consternation a rising wave of crime, are entitled to whatever comfort could be derived from knowing that suspects accused of criminal acts will be brought to trial with all deliberate speed.

This frequently is not the case. The city is witness to the sorry spectacle of defendants in criminal cases winning one postponement after another, often for reasons that appear transparent and unsubstatial. Meanwhile, the accused roam the streets, free on bail, and sometimes are arrested and charged with additional crimes while awaiting trial on earlier charges.

The instance of a Philadelphia man who recently won a fifth postponement of his trial on a series of burglary charges is a flagrant example. There evidently is no end to the technicalities that an enterprising defendant can come up with to stymie the wheels of justice.

Although the right of defendants to legal counsel in criminal cases has been made clear by the U.S. Supreme Court, it is not necessary in upholding the right, to allow the defendant to make a mockery of American jurisprudence. Presiding judges in the courts may insist on adherence to efficient procedures and reasonable deadlines in the selection of counsel and the preparation of cases. This should apply both to the prosecution and the defense.

Some years ago, while discussing the desirability of tempering law with sympathy, the eminent Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes observed that "it is still more desirable to put an end to robbery and murder."

This kernel of judicial wisdom would seem to have special application in present-day Philadelphia.

TIMES EDITORIAL VIEWS: IS THERE NO PROTECTION UNDER THE LAW?

On Dec. 20, 1965, at 12:45 p.m., Policeman Thomas Jones observed two men carrying a large carton in North Philadelphia. There was something about the two men that aroused the officers' suspicion. The officer stopped the men for questioning and inside the carton was a large 17-inch portable TV set. After listening to their explanation of how the TV came into their possession and not being satisfied with it, the officer took the two men into custody.

Investigation was continued in police headquarters and at 4:25 p.m. the same day, John Maxwell, of N. 19th St., above Allegheny Ave., returned home and found his apartment burglarized and his 17-inch TV missing. Mr. Maxwell identified the television set the policeman had taken from the two men as his property, stolen from his apartment during his absence.

On the strength of the evidence presented before the magistrate there was little doubt as to the guilt of the defendants and they were held for the action of the Grand Jury. The Grand Jury found a "true bill" against the defendants and they were held for trial for court.

On June 30, 1966, the two defendants were brought up for trial before Judge David Weiss, of Westmoreland County, sitting as a visiting judge in the Philadelphia court.

The defendants' lawyer, from the Voluntary Defender's office, told Judge Weiss that in his opinion, this was an illegal arrest, basing this opinion on the grounds the officer had apprehended the two defendants before he knew a crime had been committed.

Believe it or not, Judge Weiss, after complimenting the officer for being so observant, agreed with the lawyer and discharged the two defendants stating: "There had been no crime reported at the time the men were taken into custody," and therefore it was an illegal arrest.

"In over 30 years in law enforcement, I never heard a decision such as this and I never believed I ever would," comments Thomas F. McDermott, former chief of County Detectives.

Judge Weiss apparently had based his decision on one of the many decisions which has been handed down recently by the United States Supreme Court.

A decision such as this has given a license to steal, rob, rape or murder with complete immunity, the only stipulation is that the crime must be committed without witnesses or without giving the victim the opportunity of reporting the crime.

"I wonder if the full impact of this miscarriage of justice can be realized by the public," Mr. McDermott says.

"Let us say you have just returned home after a two-week vacation and find your home has been burglarized. From neighbors you learn the police stopped several men driving from your driveway. The neighbors inform you the police questioned the men but having no complaint were forced to leave the burglars go.

"When you inquire at the police station as to why the men were freed, you are informed the police were powerless to search the car without a warrant and no warrant could be obtained without a complaint and as there was no report of a crime, they had to leave the men go free.

"This may seem ridiculous, but the decision was made in a Philadelphia court room based on, I believe, Judge Weiss' interpretation of recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions.

"I suppose the victim in this case, John Maxwell, should be happy Judge Weiss did not give the thieves his TV set."

For the past two years, almost weekly, the Times newspapers have called attention to the increase in crime. It is only in recent months that the daily papers have joined in the battle to make our persons, streets and home safe for all law abiding citizens.

Thanks to our splendid police force, the Greater Northeast is probably the most law-abiding section of Philadelphia. But it still isn't safe enough.

THE LEGALITY OF CONFESSIONS

With State and lower Federal courts at loggerheads over the use of confessions at criminal trials, it was as inevitable as it was desirable for the U.S. Supreme Court to pass on this question. The Court has agreed to do this, in reviewing appeals involving five indigent prisoners who were convicted on the basis of confessions.

In taking up this tangled issue, the Supreme Court will no doubt clarify the 1964 landmark ruling in the case of Danny Escobedo, of Chicago. Because Escobedo had asked to see his lawyer before confessing to the killing of his brother-in-law, and the police kept the two apart, the Supreme Court threw out the conviction.

But several questions were left unanswered by the decision. Does the right to counsel apply if the suspect does not ask to see a lawyer, or cannot afford to hire one? Are the police required to advise a suspect of this right at the instant of arrest? When, and under what circumstances, does a suspect's statement become admissible?

The U.S. Court of Appeals in the Third Circuit, embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, held last month that a suspect must be told of his right to counsel, and to keep silent, immediately upon arrest. The New Jersey Supreme Court decided not to follow that decision, but the Pennsylvania Supreme Court felt itself bound by it.

If that had not furnished enough complications, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, taking in New York, Connecticut and Vermont, has taken a diametrically opposed view to that of the Third Circuit Court in holding that a suspect does not have to be advised by the police, in the initial stage of an investigation, of his right to remain silent or to have a lawyer.

The majority opinion stated that it was 'highly undesirable to lay down a rule which would deprive the police of the opportunity to question suspects and to use such statements as are found to have been given voluntarily and to have been procured fairly."

The rights of a suspect must be protected, but the public has to be protected against the lawbreaker, also. Tying the policemen's hands in making an arrest and an investigation after the commission of a crime is not insuring the public's protection. A good many persons, on both sides of the law enforcement fence, will await with interest the Supreme Court's action.

Murder at the Corner Grocery

It was a few minutes before closing time Saturday night when a thug with a gun in his hand walked into the grocery at 13th and Dauphin sts., killed the proprietor and wounded his wife in an unsuccessful holdup attempt.

The tragedy and brutality of this cold-blooded crime are shocking. A life is snuffed out in less time than it takes to tell. A man who served as neighborhood grocer for 13 years, and had the courage to defend his family and property against armed intrusion, is dead.

Worst of all, the episode has an all-too-familiar ring. Crimes of violence upon the citizenry of Philadelphia in their homes and places of business and on the streets are common occurrences. Municipal officials and the public at large have been too complacent about it. Police, for the most part, have done a commendable job of catching the culprits but the courts, in far too many cases, are disposed to bestow leniency upon the convicted to a degree which we believe is very often unwarranted.

More sympathy for the victims and less for the criminals would help. Fewer second, third and fourth chances for vicious and unrepentant hoodlums would reduce the danger to law-abiding society. The entitlement of the public to be secure in their persons and in their property needs to be more vigorously safeguarded by increased police vigilance, by more forceful prosecution of defendants and by sterner judicial attitudes toward the guilty.

[Philadelphia Inquirer]

When the Police Are Handcuffed

Persons accused of committing crimes are entitled to full protection of their Constitutional rights. There should be no question about that. However, when these rights are interpreted in such a way that they are magnified beyond the bounds of reason and common sense, then the inevitable result is a mockery of the law and a shameful degrading of law-enforcement officers.

The public has rights, too. One of those rights is to be protected against criminal activity and to be assured that police are unhindered in carrying out legitimate investigative work to prevent crimes and to apprehend perpetrators of crimes.

There are increasing instances of suspects in criminal cases arrogantly assuming attitudes of defiance when taken into custody and harassing law officers with outrageous demands and insults.

In New Jersey, for example, a suspect in a murder case was not satisfied merely to be provided with legal counsel at taxpayers' expense. He demanded a lawyer with a national reputation and fame as a defense attorney.

The same suspect filed a number of complaints about inadequate lighting in his cell, insufficient changes of clothing while in jail, and the tardiness of prison officials in providing him with a toothbrush.

Are prisoners, henceforth, to be supplied with the last word in three-way, indirect lighting, conveniently placed next to an easy chair? Shall the well-dressed prison inmate of the future have a choice of suits—in color, styling, with vest optional and, of course, all selections available in double-breasted models, if desired? How about color television sets in all the cells—and don't forget curtains at the windows in the occupants' favorite designs.

The woes of law-enforcement officers begin long before the defendant gets to jail, if he ever does. In Philadelphia the other day a suspect in a morals case was found hiding in a clothes closet—hardly a place for a law-abiding citizen to be, when the police come calling—but he naturally had no explanations to offer after being informed of his inalienable right to say nothing.

In another arrest, pertaining to investigation of the loan shark racket, police found the suspect well prepared with a handy slip of paper setting forth his rights under the Fifth Amendment—a convenient item to fall back on, until the lawyer gets there.

To give defendants their full rights is one thing. To mollycoddle them, to fawn over them, to deliberately give them the upper hand and to place the police in a subservient position—that is unjustifiable nonsense.

It's time to take the handcuffs off the policeman doing his duty and put them where they belong.

TIMES EDITORIAL VIEWS: SPEED REQUIRED FOR TRUE JUSTICE

Justice delayed interminably is justice denied completely.

This is exactly what has happened in the Anthony Scoleri case. The people of Philadelphia, viewing with consternation and alarm a rising wave of crime, are now aware of a condition existing where instead of being brought to trial with all deliberate speed, indicted criminals are successful, through their legal mouthpieces, of having their criminal cases postponed over and over again; and in many cases the reasons are not substantial.

Finally, after many continuances and months and sometimes years later, the defendant may be found guilty. Immediately, justified or not, the merry-go-round begins, appeal after appeal after each conviction. Witnesses may die or disappear, or in some cases be threatened with bodily harm or worse. Then, in many instances, the Commonwealth has no case, and the convicted criminal walks out a free man, thumbing his nose at all those who caused his arrest.

The United States Supreme Court, as presently constituted, has probably had the greatest impact on the nation of any court in recent years, and in its position and thinking at least, of the five-man liberal majority. This five-man team has imposed a whole series of restrictions on police and lower courts in its dealing with suspected criminals and defendants.

The people in Philadelphia should not be confused when they read and hear of unusual court decisions. These are are not Philadelphia Court decisions. We in Philadelphia have courts to be proud of. Our Philadelphia judiciary is more qualified to pass on major criminal cases than any member of the United States Supreme Court.

Our judges, to a man, are all qualified to render judgment in any case before them. I am speaking of course of our veteran judges, and there is no doubt the recent appointees to the bench here will follow suit, as all were good, honest, qualified attorneys.

There are many people who do not know that of the present members of the United States Supreme Court, only three had prior judicial experience.

Major crimes of violence continue to mount. Murder, forcible rape, robbery and aggrivated assault climbed 15 percent as a group; while property crimes of burglary, larcency of over $50 and auto theft climed 13 percent. All crimes of violence are on the increase, and much of the blame can be placed on High Court decisions.

This overprotection of the individual, at the expense of the community, will lead either to a Utopia or Hell on earth.

Pity the businessman who seems to be bearing the brunt of increased criminal activity. If no one goes to jail for the crimes he commits, it seems only common sense that more people will be willing to take a chance and commit crimes.

The smart criminal knows he will have the benefit of restraints on the use of evidence at his trial. He knows he can appeal to the Federal Courts after his conviction in a State Court, and have a good chance of having his sentence upset.

Crime is paying, and the criminal is blind if he misreads or misunderstands it. So that the public understands. I repeat that local courts are compelled to follow the lead of the U.S. Supreme Court, and when "funny" decisions are handed down in regard to illegal search or illegal detention of a prisoner, it is at the High Court's direction that this is done.

We have confidence that under President Johnson's determined effort to halt crime, and courts like ours in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, perhaps the pendulum is moving now in the other direction.

POLICE AND SUSPECTS: NEW RULES

The ground rules laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court in the police questioning of suspects go far beyond the scope of the landmark decision in the Escobedo case, and seem bound to have a profound impact on law enforcement.

The majority decisions handed down on Monday, reversing convictions for murder, armed robbery and rape, were based on the alleged absence of safeguards insuring that statements made by the defendants were truly the product of free choice.

The historic 1964 ruling in the Escobedo case extended the right of counsel to a suspect in a police station.

Monday's decision considerably broadens the rights guaranteed a person under arrest, and correspondingly restricts police interrogation and the use of confessions made by a suspect in the absence of a lawyer.

Chief Justice Warren declared that current practice of "incommunicado" interrogation is at odds with one of our Nation's "most cherished principles that the individual may not be compelled to incriminate himself."

So what is to be done when the police capture and arrest a person suspected of, say, murder, or rape or armed robbery?

The Chief Justice presents these guidelines for various situations:

The suspect must be warned, prior to any questioning, that he has a right to say nothing, that anything he says may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney—retained by him, if he so desires, or appointed for him.

If the suspect is alone and indicates in any manner that he does not wish to be interrogated, the police may not question him.

He may waive any of these rights, provided this is done voluntarily, knowingly and intelligently; and if at any subsequent stage of the questioning he wishes to consult with any attorney before speaking, there can be no further questioning.

Certainly, no arrested person should be deprived of any right guaranteed him by the Constitution. At the same time, it would be a pity, at a time of increased lawlessness, if more attention is given the rights of lawbreakers than the rights of the public to have effective police protection.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Harlan said "I believe the decision of the court represents poor constitutional law and entails harmful consequences for the country at large. How serious these consequences may prove to be only time can tell."

His warning has a somber ring.

ADVISING THE SUPREME COURT

A certain sort of merit badge belongs to those who have the temerity to stick out their necks for the sake of causes which are not universally popular. For politicians—who must always keep their eyes on the main chance—such riskiness amounts to a redouble in spades.

Arlen Specter, the unusual district attorney of Philadelphia, is in the running as of now because of his forthright, and quite astounding dissertation to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Where most young lawyers on the make bring out the prayer rugs and face the Supreme Court building, Mr. Specter offered useful criticism of the fashion in which this august tribunal makes "fundamental modifications in constitutional law."

Mr. Specter made it clear that in simple modesty he does not pretend to superimpose his judgment above that of nine learned justices. He does wonder—along with many a less coherent spokesman for the older kind of American pattern—if the justices themselves really know what they are doing, if the law would not be better rewritten by the Congress, as the Constitution proposed, than by men in an ivory tower who (though he did not put it this way) perhaps cannot see the woods for the trees.

The Philadelphia DA, not long aboard, has already enough experience to know that the rights of a defendant are not the whole story. His right to suggest that present practice takes a single grain and turns it into a wheat field is quite in accordance with recent history. The justices may not wish to pay any attention to a young lawyer from Philadelphia; but judicial honesty would demand that they do so.

[Philadelphia Inquirer, Aug. 14, 1966]

THE DECLINE OF MORALITY

There is a sickness...

A young man slaughters his wife and mother, and then proceeds to shoot to death 14 persons he never knew.

Another man invades a nurses' home and strangles eight young women, one by one.

In a two-county area along the New Jersey shore, four teen-age girls are found beaten to death in a period of less than a year.

Women raped and beaten and murdered, in their homes, in doorways and alleyways, at night-time and in broad daylight: each day brings its new, terrible account.

There is a sickness...

Racial hate and turmoil besiege the summer. There is a prevalence of terror on the streets. Rioting breeds violence, looting and destruction. Negroes stone whites, and whites stone Negroes in a never-ending charade. The steaming ghettoes send up their cries of despair: out of their miseries and frustrations comes the dangerous desperation of "Black Power."

There is a sickness...

What is right has given place to what is wanted. Contempt for the law is encouraged by those who say that laws are to be obeyed only if they do not get in your way. If you don't get what you want—demonstrate for it; stage sit-ins, sit-downs, lie-downs, or any other means of pressure and trespass you can think of. If you are a student, and you disagree with school policy—go on strike, picket the classrooms, take over the faculty buildings.

The upholders of law and order are treated by some as enemies. When the police do their duty at the risk of their lives, they are accused of brutality, while the real brutes shoot them down without giving them a chance. Court decisions hamper the law enforcer. Police are required to treat criminal suspects with elaborate courtesy, informing them—at the moment their victims may be lying dead at their feet—of their right to refuse to answer questions.

There is a sickness . . . Not physical sickness, not necessarily sickness of the mind, but a degeneration of the moral fibre: a decline of morality.

There are such things as law and justice and discipline and order, and they can still count if we want them to. But courage and integrity are required in the exercise of public authority—not supine yielding to the pressure groups of the moment. Young people need parental concern and guidance—not misplaced indulgence. Poverty, ignorance and intolerance can only be eradicated by the concerted forces of decency and goodwill.

There is a sickness in our society; but it can be overcome by a resurgence of the old-fashioned virtues, by reliance again on the basic principles of a civilized order: honesty, justice and charity toward all.

[Philadelphia Inquirer, Oct. 28, 1963]

POLICE AND THE PEOPLE

Philadelphia police have enough troubles trying to enforce the laws and arrest criminals without being harassed and assaulted by hostile bystanders and unruly mobs.

Public interference with policemen in their performance of dangerous duty was apparent in two ugly episodes over the weekend.

Three patrolmen summoned to break up a fight among teen-agers at a dance hall were beaten badly, requiring hospital treatment for multiple injuries, when dozens of youths turned on the police.

In another tragic affair a patrolman was threatened by a mob of bystanders after he had shot to death a shoplifting suspect who, in resisting arrest, is said to have brandished a knife and tried to escape. Police reinforcements rescued the patrolman but hundreds of persons subsequently gathered in the area. A patrol windshield was smashed during the disturbance.

A fatal shooting by a policeman is a serious matter under any circumstances and is subject to full investigation by appropriate authorities. Mobs in the streets, fed by rumors and uninformed of the facts, achieve nothing but disgrace.

Police are charged with the responsibilities of maintaining order and protecting the public against the lawless. Policemen engaged in the performance of these duties are entitled to public support and cooperation—more than they are now getting in Philadelphia.

We urge all citizens, and especially parents of teen-agers, to encourage by their own example a respect for the law and law-enforcement authorities. Responsibilities of the law-abiding public deserve attention in the schools, in the churches and in the homes.

[Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, July 24, 1966]

GANGS IN THE STREETS

A frightening aspect of the disorders in Chicago, Cleveland and New York is the involvement of apparently well organized youth gangs. The activity, and at times the leadership of these lawless bands strips from these outbreaks any legitimacy as a form of social or economic protest.

Those who, while not part of these troubled racial ghettos, seek to understand and try to help correct the housing and other conditions which stir unrest cannot help but be both repelled and discouraged by the activity of roaming groups of hoodlums interested only in violence for the sake of violence.

A tragic aspect of this is that those who live in these areas of discontent and who have in many cases set about with the help of officials to improve conditions will be the real victims if the gang influence continues. For it is they who must stay in these areas and make their way after the shooting, the looting and the arson ends and the police and the guardsmen and the gang members have gone away.

The real victims of Watts, Chicago, Cleveland and of North Philadelphia of a few years ago have been the great majority of the residents, law abiding and committed to decency, who have lived in the midst of terror. It is to them that authority owes an awesome responsibility.

The cause of this law abiding majority can be strengthened if city officials everywhere to eliminate, on an emergency basis if need be, the source of local complaints. There is, for example, no excuse at all for the hundreds of abandoned and stripped automobiles which dot—like festering sores—the streets of already congested neighborhoods.

Rubbish and garbage can be cleaned from the streets and lots cleared of debris without legalistic arguments as to who is to blame. Disorderly taprooms, often the breeding places of violence, can be the targets of stern police supervision. Streets can be adequately lighted even if this involves special, protective fixtures. Every available recreational area can be kept open and supervised. Housing and sanitation codes can be enforced with the full strength of the law.

These are perhaps mere surface things. But by eliminating such sources of local complaints officials can show their concern and win the support of the many against the few whose aim is anarchy, not protest.

[Philadelphia Inquirer]

A MENTAL PATIENT AND HIS GUN

"They should never have let me out of the hospital!"

That opinion reportedly expressed by a former mental patient—who bought a rifle in a New York City surplus supplies store and, a half hour later, shot down two strangers with it—would be hard for most people to deny. But the questions raised in this case are difficult to answer.

The gunman had entered the hospital voluntarily and had seemed to improve under treatment. He was described as quiet and even as "very nice" by neighbors. Hospital spokesmen said he was non-violent, and appeared to have "an understanding of his mental condition." For this reason they had referred him to a clinic for aftercare but had not felt it necessary to seek court order to hold him against his will when he decided to leave.

Perhaps medical science has not arrived at the stage where more infallible ways of dealing with the mentally ill are possible. Hospital authorities should be very careful, however, in cases like this and lean over backward in favor of the public safety rather than the other way around. The ease with which this man bought the weapon is another matter, however. The sale was apparently legal enough, yet it ought to be more difficult than this, it seems to us, for a former mental patient, one, in fact, supposed to be under treatment at the time to walk into a store and buy a weapon without meaningful objections.

Criminals, perhaps, will find a way to obtain guns in the face of legal restrictions. So will some mental patients. But, in this case and others like it, there is good reason to doubt that the killings would have occurred, if a tighter law had made the weapon more difficult to obtain.

Our citizens should not have to risk facing armed mental patients in the streets.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I have one more article here that I would like to submit, an article about a Judge Weinrott of our court who invites all of the Justices of the U.S. Supreme Court to come and sit with him in Philadelphia and listen to the cases as they are heard in a minor court and to secure knowledge and experience in knowing what the justices in the lower courts put up with.

(The article referred to as follows:)

WEINROTT INVITES U.S. JUSTICES HERE TO SEE IMPACT OF FREE-COUNSEL RULE

Judge Leo Weinrott said yesterday he would like to invite the justices of the U.S. Supreme Court to sit on the bench with trial judges in cities such as Philadelphia, New York and St. Louis to observe the effects of one of their decisions.

Judge Weinrott was referring to the March, 1963, Gideon vs. Wainwright ruling of the high court. It requires that indigent criminal defendants be given legal counsel.

His comments were inspired by the case of a man sentenced in 1947 to a 13½ to 27 years for robbery and assault and battery by the late Judge Harry S. McDevitt.

The prisoner, Clarence Gilbert, now 37, spent ten years at Farview State Hospital for the criminal insane.

RAISES QUESTION

Now he asks a new trial, claiming he was not represented by counsel.

Assistant District Attorney Harold L. Randolph told the judge Gilbert now contends police beat him to obtain a confession.

Judge Weinrott said Gilbert's plea raises the question whether he's entitled to a lawyer for a habeas corpus hearing.

"If he's right and the Supreme Court of the United States is right—and I don't have to agree with them—raising the dead is causing havoc," the judge said.

"If someone asks for commutation or parole," he added, "you'd have to supply a lawyer at every stage of the proceedings.

NOT ENOUGH LAWYERS

"This is just sheer, absolute, unadulterated nonsense," he declared.

The judge said he questioned the 5–4 decision of the Supreme Court.

"I'm bound," he stated, but queried: "How far am I bound?

"One thing I'm sure about," he added.

"It wouldn't hurt if whoever sits on the highest court sat up here—Philadelphia, New York, St. Louis—and see what's happening—maybe we'd get a slightly different viewpoint.

"Somebody has to be alerted here—there is no end to anything," he declared.

"There's not enough lawyers in Philadelphia," he said.

He took the plea under advisement.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I submit my entire prepared statement.

(The prepared statement submitted by Mr. McDermott reads in full as follows:)

PREPARED STATEMENT OF THOMAS F. MCDERMOTT, 1ST VICE PRESIDENT, CHAIRMAN PUBLIC RELATIONS, POLICE CHIEFS ASSOCIATION OF SOUTHEASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Thank you, Senator, I appreciate the courtesy of your committee and the privilege of appearing before you. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am Thomas F. McDermott, and at the present time, I am the 1st Vice President and Chairman of Public Relations for the Police Chiefs Assn. of Southeastern Pennsylvania. This association has a membership of over 600 active police and security officials. The area covers the southeastern part of Pennsylvania, the southern part of New Jersey, and the entire State of Delaware.

It is in this capacity that I appear before you today, and may I say that I come before this committee with more than thirty years of law enforcement background. I have walked a beat as a policeman, operated a police patrol car, later promoted to the rank of detective, then to sergeant of detectives, lieutenant of detectives, and then to Chief of Philadelphia County Detectives. I have commanded the Burglary Squad, the Narcotic Squad, and later the Commissioner's Squad, and I considered it a distinct privilege to have been a member of one of the finest Police Departments in the United States. For more than 27 years, I have been assigned to the detective branch of the Philadelphia Police Department, working in close cooperation with the District Attorney's Office and the courts. In citing my police experience, all I am trying to do is convince this committee that I have sufficient qualifications to testify on the conditions confronting the law enforcement officer today.

I have made arrests and have investigated practically every type of crime that can be mentioned and in the prosecution of these cases. I have spent a good part of my police years in our courts. So, Mr. Chairman—may I say on behalf of the Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania, I am proud to stand up and be counted on the side which is for the best public interest. I wish to go on record for our association and police organizations from the entire Delaware Valley area which our association covers, that we favor all the bills introduced by Senator McClellan designed to improve and promote efficient law enforcement. Especially, Bill S. 674 to amend Title 18, United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions; the other Bill, S. 917, better known as the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." We honestly consider this proposed legislation one of the most important matters to come before this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, as the 1st Vice President of the Police Chiefs Association and a member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, it has been my pleasant duty to exchange views with Police Chiefs from all over the United States. They represent every state in the Union. They are dedicated professional police officials—conscientious thinking men. These men work closely with the District Attorney or Prosecutor in their respective areas and are guided by their directives, but like the police, the prosecutors too are troubled and confused by the decisions of our high courts, and a great many have expressed themselves through the news media.

A recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, known as the "Miranda decision," has been published, discussed, and projected for the future on many occasions. When this decision was recorded, it became the law of the land, and we are duty-bound to acknowledge it and its meaning. But, this does not mean, however, that in the free flow of communication, well intentioned and responsible persons who work in the field of law enforcement must remain silent when experience and practice dictate otherwise in the face of these far-reaching decisions.

Mr. Chairman, the members of our association have designated me to relay to you their alarm over the many "far out" decisions handed down by our High Court, and that the "Mallory, Escobedo, Mapp, Massiah, and the Miranda decisions representing American Judges' rules reflect a deep seated distrust of law enforcement officers everywhere, totally unsupported by relevant data or current material based upon our experience." These words, Mr. Chairman, are not mine; they are the words of Mr. Justice White who wrote a scathing minority opinion in the Massiah and Escobedo decisions.

The Police Chiefs Association of Southeastern Pennsylvania, through its President William F. Riempp, Chief of Police of Bensalem Township, Pennsylvania, join Mr. Justice White and others in their fear of any extension of the doctrines enunciated by our U. S. Supreme Court. We, the members of this police body, take no backward step for any group when it comes to the zealous protection of the defendant's rights. We do not question the rights of defendants to have counsel—we encourage it and we wish to go on record to hope the program to protect the indigent is increased. Under no circumstances would we take unfair advantage of a defendant prior to arrest and during the actual trial. We fail to see how anyone can thrill or take pride in an unfair advantage over any arrested person. We applaud any court for having the courage to set aside such convictions. But, from the corrective plateau of a given case, we feel their great and unwarranted intrusions on those charged with the enforcement of law have resulted and have without any doubt, hampered seriously, the police in their fight against crime. We agree that new methods and techniques can be utilized; but a trend which gives the criminal a protection against normal interrogations submitted to willingly, and/or statements voluntarily given, is a trend which has "crippled law enforcement" and made our task a great deal more difficult for unsound and unstated reasons, which can find no home in any provision of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I think we would be remiss in our duties if we did not vocally try to the best of our ability, to inform the Court that these decisions deserve another full look in some effort to equalize society with the individual.

We believe the procedural safeguards of our Constitution are designed to prevent the innocent from unjust or erroneous prosecution and conviction. They were surely not meant to allow the guilty to delay or evade their just deserts, except insofar as is absolutely necessary to protect the innocent. In its emphasis upon such safeguards, the Supreme Court has, however, lost sight of this fundamental principle and has, in effect, said the laws are to be interpreted so that the guilty shall have the maximum opportunity to escape the punishment that law decreed.

Mr. Chairman, the newspapers reported recently that President Johnson was "Worried" over the increase in crime and lawlessness sweeping the country. On May 20, last, Attorney General Ramsey Clark was quoted in the press as saying that the "level of crime has risen a little bit, but there is no wave of crime in the country." To say the least, this is confusing. Another misconception that is heard frequently is that just as soon as the police use what scientific methods that are now available, they will be better able to cope with the crime problem. This is utter nonsense—T.V. shows and the movies with their super sleuths have led the public to believe that all the police need to do when there is a rape in an alley or a murder or an assault on a street is to use "scientific methods" to search for clues in tracking down the perpetrator of the crime. This is pure fiction. There are very few cases in which this can be done.

Scientific methods can help clinch a case once you get your suspect. But, gentlemen, let me tell you when there aren's any clues and you have nowhere to go, there is only one method that can help, and that is the method that we all use from the F.B.I. down to the newest police recruit—"The Informer", and gentlemen, without information—we are lost. After the information is secured, you look for and find your suspect and interrogate. If help is not received by law enforcement permitting them to question suspects, or if the evidence obtained is thrown out in court, then, Mr. Chairman, all the money in the world or all the scientific equipment now at hand is not going to prevent the criminals from being turned loose on society.

We are not discussing people whose guilt is in doubt—I am speaking of murderers who led police to a body they buried after the murder—I talk about drug peddlers caught with the drugs in large quantities in their possession. I am speaking of rapists who made written statements and turned over to the police, stained clothing for analysis. These are the people who are freed and turned loose again on society on nothing but technicalities. Scientific equipment? What about wiretapping—this needed device for the effective fight against crime?

Again, our Attorney General is against this also. He has taken a stand against wiretapping. Gentlemen, I used wiretapping, and I used it successfully in apprehending many top narcotic peddlers—Yes, I used it while working with San Dash, former Phila. District Attorney, and the author of the "Eavesdroppers" who was a strong advocate for court-permitted wiretapping. We never, under any circumstances, tapped the wires of anyone not violating the law. I ask—How can wiretapping under court order be condemned? The "CIVIL LIBERTARIANS"—on one hand—want everyone to go along with court decisions, and on the other hand—they state the courts cannot be trusted in controlling wire tap requests by police.

Wiretapping is needed under court control and should be permitted under strict supervision of the courts, with heavy jail sentences for willful violations.

Mr. Chairman—Police all over our nation are worried and confused and to a man, look to you and your committee for help. Our Association wishes to extend our appreciation to you and your splendid committee for your untiring efforts to save America in the fight against the criminal and his allies.

Now, may I comment on Bill S. 917. Mr. Chairman, we can proudly say that Philadelphia was the first city in the United States to anticipate favorable congressional action on Senate 917 by creating the Phila. Law Enforcement Planning Council. This agency is developing the comprehensive plans for improving law enforcement at all levels. It is not just another agency; it is unique because the nine member planning council is appointed by the Mayor, the President of City Council, and the Administrative Judge, thus, making it responsible to the three branches of government. Its initial funding has been provided by the City of Philadelphia, but its program can be carried out only if the Congress acts favorably on the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967."

We can undertake the wide variety of steps that need doing promptly. In our police departments, we are desperately in need of an Operations Research Program to speed up decision making under all circumstances. We desperately need management studies of our courts to improve the quality of Justice. We know that we need dozens of other improvements, but we are chiefly interested in innovations, any one of which might mean more than all of the things we have been doing for years. The introduction of the computer in police work is going to require careful adaptation of this science to a wide variety of police functions. One of them is currently under study in Philadelphia.

The use of the computer has a potential in predicting crime, but this, in itself, is only the beginning. Philadelphia, like every other city, has a great deal to learn if we are ever to have effective law enforcement, and we look on the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" as the means by which we can learn. The text books have been written by the President's Commission. We, who are expected to apply that learning in our day-to-day operations in law enforcement, must have the help which this Congress provides. We beg of you to do your utmost in securing the enactment of this much-needed legislation.

We in our Association endorse the suggestions made sometime ago by Daniel Gutman—Dean of the New York Law School when he advocated the following steps be taken:

1. Enactment by Congress of legislation to permit wiretapping, pursuant to court order, for evidence of major crimes.
2. Recodification of procedural requirements for search and seizure which are distinctive for ancient strictures no longer valid. (Some advancement along this particular area was made by recent Supreme Court decision.)
3. Extension of the right to detain and interrogate with proper safeguards against coercion or violation of constitutional rights.
4. Clarification of the extent and application of the "right to counsel" concept.
5. Relaxation of the rule excluding all evidence improperly obtained, so as to vest discretion as to admission in the trial judge.
6. Convening an extraordinary session of ranking members of the judicial, legislative, and executive branches of the Federal Government for thorough consideration of the problems of law enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, this is a challenge to the bar, the law makers, and the public. The executive and the judiciary must cooperate. This is a responsibility of everyone.

The members of our association are extremely proud of our Judges in the lower and the high courts in our respective states, and we believe our District Attorneys are second to none, and we ask this question—Can all the lower courts be accused of disregarding the rights of arrested persons? Can all of our State High Courts be wrong in their interpretation of the law? Can only the five Supreme Court Justices be right?

In conclusion, we believe that during this era of conflict between our Supreme Court and the entire structure of law enforcement, it is incumbent upon all of us to remain steadfast in our obedience to the mandates of statutory law and judicial decision. In that this is a government of laws, and not of men, these divergencies will be resolved through democratic processes. We firmly believe that the vast number of the citizens of our great nation desire a strengthening of the hand of law enforcement. The protection of individual rights demands the effective enforcement of our laws for, otherwise, just who is going to protect the weak from the strong? We are all confident that all this can be accomplished within the framework of the Constitution of the United States of America.

So, Mr. Chairman, let's unite in a spirit of confidence, courage, and determination as we await the dawn of a new tomorrow—Let us ask those five "ultra-liberal" Justices of the Supreme Court to please join us.

Voted upon and approved by entire Executive Board and membership, this 15th day on June 1967.

THOMAS F. MCDERMOTT,
1st Vice President.
BENJAMIN F. CAIRNS,
2nd Vice President.
JOSEPH A. BONNER,
3rd Vice President.

Secretary.
LOUIS F. REALEY,

HARRY A. NORTON,
Sergeant-At-Arms.

Mr. MCDERMOTT. Thank you for inviting me, Senator. We, in our association, appreciate it. And, again I say, we know that you are doing an excellent job and you are working right directly with law enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

I want you to know that the committee appreciates the support it is getting from the public. Unless the public supports us, there is no prospect of passing laws to remedy these conditions. We must have public support. I am not wedded to any actual bill or provision of law except that which we can draft and revise and agree upon that will be effective. But I am unwilling to run from the issue, to refuse to meet the challenge. We have got to recognize that there is an enemy, and we have got to combat it. As I said a moment ago, I have no political ambitions. I do not have to run for office again. If I am working this hard, it is because I am misguided or I am dedicated to the principles that are fundamental to this Nation.

Thank you very much.

The next witness is Mr. Milton Rector.

Be seated, and identify yourself.

Do you have an associate with you?

Will you please identify him?

Mr. RECTOR. I am Milton G. Rector, and I am director of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency. It is a national service organization in the field of delinquency. This is Mr. Mark Furstenberg. I asked my associate to join me, because the national council has just opened a National Capital office in Washington in order that we might be a better resource to the Senate and the Congress through our international information center on crime and delinquency through which some 60 countries now register all research and development demonstration projects going on in this field, and our own research, and, more important, the work of this agency which is now dedicated to involving the public and informing the public in various specific ways.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right. Mr. Furstenberg, will you identify yourself more fully as to what your connections are?

Mr. FURSTENBERG. Yes, Senator. I was here in Washington in a variety of capacities. I worked for the study group, the Presidential study group which developed the domestic Peace Corps, now known as VISTA—the program now known as VISTA. I worked for the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency, and I was on the White House staff under President Kennedy, working on projects of crime, delinquency, and poverty.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, you may proceed.

Mr. RECTOR. I have a statement, and in respect to your time ——

Senator McCLELLAN. The statement may be printed in the record in full. You may proceed.

Mr. RECTOR. Thank you.

I would like to make two or three points very briefly.

STATEMENT OF MILTON G. RECTOR, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL COUNCIL ON CRIME AND DELINQUENCY; ACCOMPANIED BY MARK FURSTENBERG, ASSOCIATE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. RECTOR. Having listened to the problems of sentencing and punishing those who are guilty, while it does not obtain to the legislation pending today, I wonder if we might submit for the committee's consideration in the Federal criminal law, a model sentencing act which has been developed by the Council of Judges of the National Council on Crime and Delinquency?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes, you may submit it here, and I will have it marked as an exhibit for reference.

Mr. RECTOR. Thank you.

This introduces a new concept in penal law that after a person is convicted, with all the protection of due process, that then there could be a hearing on the basis of dangerousness and long extended terms could be given to persons who could be proved on the basis of their past record and criminal involvement on the point of sentencing and on the evidence which could not be introduced at the time of the trial leading to the conviction.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that what we have probation officers for? To gather up this information? Are they failing?

Mr. RECTOR. We need a different kind of law, Senator. For example, within the last month one of the kingpins in organized crime in a gambling syndicate in Westchester County, N.Y., has been convicted in violation of the Federal Gambling Tax Act. He received a sentence upon conviction, of 1 year and a fine of $5,000. Had there been a "dangerous offender" statute available to the courts, it then could have been introduced in sentencing this man who made the majority of his money from extra-legal activities, that he had a long criminal record, that he was indeed a dangerous person to society and that society could be protected from him best by long incarceration in the penal system.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would we make this apply to all penalties?

Mr. RECTOR. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Where, after conviction and before sentencing, the court could order a hearing as to his character, his activities, his past record?

Mr. RECTOR. Right,

Senator McCLELLAN. Particularly, his criminal record?

Mr. RECTOR. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. And have a hearing on that?

Mr. RECTOR. And the model sentencing act provides what we think is the beginning of the criteria for dangerousness that can be introduced in the law and should be tested. Because we feel that this is a necessary law in dealing with some of the problems of the sexual psycopaths that prey on children and women and the problems of the crime characters, organized crime characters, whom we all know get short sentences.

Senator McCLELLAN. And the professional burglar.

Mr. RECTOR. Many who come in are within habitual criminal statutes, but the jury will not find—you could, at the time of sentencing, introduce evidence that here is a person with a personality disorder and, in my business, which is correction and rehabilitation, we frankly do not know how to rehabilitate some people, and those in organized crime, the profit is so great, we would fool the public if we tried to suggest we could rehabilitate them.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think some of them are beyond redemption. I think they go so far as to forfeit their rights to liberty, and I am for incarcerating them after they have demonstrated that they have no regard for society or are not interested in performing or becoming good citizens. Where they commit heinous crime, I believe in putting them away.

Mr. RECTOR. I believe in the testimony of a man I respect very much, Frank Hogan, where he said that this is indeed a war against an internal enemy.

Senator McCLELLAN. This editorial that I referred to awhile ago—I just glanced at it—is entitled "Phony War on Crime."

I am saying to you that we are only kidding ourselves if we think that by going out here and spending some money, that that alone is going to solve the crime problem. We have got to be able to convict criminals, punish them, and take them out of circulation. As long as they are in circulation, society is imperiled by their presence.

Mr. RECTOR. The tragedy is: Some of the most dangerous, those involved in organized criminal activities, are getting the shortest sentences and lowest fines.

(The document referred to is in the subcommittee files.)

Mr. RECTOR. I am here today to support the safe streets and crime control bill.

With the exception of a few large cities, they do not have access to crime laboratories needed to assist them. Maybe such a State certified agency would provided guaranteed confidentiality of the tapes that seem to give the courts some difficulty in the taping and eavesdropping.

Also in the field of correctional administration and rehabilitation, I point out that State and local governments are now spending $1 billion a year. This confirms the need for this legislation, because the National Council on Crime and Delinquency conducted a nationwide study of correction in the United States for the President's Crime Commission and we found that State and local governments plan to spend, by 1975, $1.135 billion (in the next 8 years, this is) for additional jail and institutional facilities. This kind of expenditure needs the kind of planning which is not now taking place at State and local government levels, and this legislation would provide encouragement and incentive for planning the correctional facilities in concert with law enforcement and with the court part of the system for the administration of justice, and I will give just a few examples of what is happening now.

There are cities that have adequate city jails, and they are now building new county jails where one facility could serve both the city and county.

There are cities, small cities, planning to build new jail facilities where the State correctional systems should better provide a regional facility that would serve a number of small communities in a region and at the same time provide regional diagnostic centers for all the criminal courts in that particular region.

In the area of Federal-State relationships, I know the States of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Kansas have a special need for the criminally insane, a special institution. None of these States have sufficient offenders of this type to justify a well-developed, well-staffed institution. There is a real need at the request of the States, and it could be done in the provisions of this bill for the Federal Bureau of Prisons to provide a regional facility in that area which could serve both State courts and Federal courts; also, in the States of Montana, Wyoming, and Idaho, where these States have the money to build a penal institution they can build only one. That is all they can afford, and while they only have 10 percent that requires security, it will be an expensive institution.

In this area, too, a regional security institution constructed and operated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons could also provide diagnostic service to both the State and Federal courts for assistance in sentencing and could provide a quality of career personnel no one State could attract or afford.

The Federal court in Cheyenne, Wyo., now sends a Federal offender down to the Federal institution at Lompoc, Calif., for up to 90 days' observation and returns him for sentencing. But the criminal court has in Cheyenne, no diagnostic centers available. In more populous States, such as Pennsylvania, New York, and California, a new kind of Federal-State relationship, which will be possible under this act, would permit Federal courts also to sentence to State institutions and so provide a total new role for the Federal Bureau of Prisons to play in concert and in support of state services.

So, we very much support the bill, very strongly, through our affiliate bodies, and if we can provide any additional information, we will be glad to do so.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Rector.

(The prepared statement submitted by Mr. Rector reads in full as follows:)

STATEMENT BY MILTON G. RECTOR, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL COUNCIL ON CRIME AND DELINQUENCY

The National Council on Crime and Delinquency strongly supports and urges the passage of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act. This support was authorized by action of the NCCD Board of Trustees meeting in Washington, D.C., on May 3, 1967. The Act has been endorsed also by NCCD's 18 state citizen councils of prominent business, labor, and civic leaders. It has also been endorsed by our Professional Advisory Council of 170 of the Nation's leading authorities directing state, community, and Federal juvenile and adult correctional systems and by the fifty jurists representing all levels of courts in America who serve on NCCD's Council of Judges.

The recommendations of the President's Crime Commission report and the import of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act to the successful implementation of those recommendations were major issues considered by some 2,500 court, law enforcement, and correctional authorities and informed citizens convened at NCCD's National Institute on Crime and Delinquency June 11 to 14, 1967, at Anaheim, California.

I mention the above to underscore that substantial Federal leadership and assistance is helping state and communities to control and prevent crime and delinquency is considered an urgent need by informed laymen and professionals from all sections of our country.

The survey of Corrections in the United States conducted by the NCCD for the Crime Commission revealed that major changes will come about only when correctional planning is related to planning for the rest of the criminal justice system. Effective change will come about only when state and local planning is related to Federal planning.

For example, state and local governments are now planning to spend by 1975 $1.135 billion for new detention and correctional institutions. To operate these proposed new facilities will cost at least $200 million annually over the $800 million currently being spent.

Unless some effective means of encouraging comprehensive planning can be offered soon:

State correctional systems will continue to build institution cells when better training of judges, improved sentencing, probation, and the development of residential centers for offenders would make additional cells unnecessary.

City and county government will continue to construct and operate separate jails where one facility would serve both city and county.

Jails for detention purposes will continue to be overbuilt because planning does not take into consideration remedies for court sentencing delays and bail reform.

Jails and short-term correctional institutions will continue to be constructed to house the thousands of mentally ill and alcoholic cases when both these persons and the construction funds should be diverted to departments of health and hospitals.

Small cities will continue to build new jails when the state correctional system should provide regional detention centers for detention, diagnostic and presentence studies for all courts within that region. (Also the planning for such detention centers for children and for adults could be related to the current state plans for community and regional mental health centers.)

States should be encouraged to consider in their correctional plans how the changes in criminal law to provide special criteria for sentencing dangerous offenders can greatly reduce the number of maximum security institutions required in the future and require an extension of diagnostic and detention centers for state and Federal courts.

States planning prison industries and industrial training in their institutions should be encouraged to consider how construction and relocation of residential-type correctional centers near communities with private industry and educational facilities can permit greater use of release programs for education, training, and work and greater participation by labor and private enterprise in correctional training programs. This will vastly reduce the cost now being projected for large and geographically isolated security institutions and prison industry equipment that can be out-of-date within a short time after its installation.

Comprehensive planning in the juvenile and criminal justice systems should encourage new planning and program relationships between Federal and state correctional systems.

For example: Youngsters from many states are not diverted from the Federal courts and correctional system because the state juvenile courts, dentention and correctional institutions are far below standard. A strong Federal leadership program, as envisioned in the Crime Control Act, should provide grants, standards and technical assistance to bring the state systems up to standards of excellence and to eliminate direct Federal services to juvenile and youthful offenders.

States such as New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Kansas have a desperate need for special treatment institutions and clinical personnel for mentally ill offenders. The small numbers of such offenders in any one of these states does not justify building and staffing a specialized facility. And it is not reasonable to expect the states to develop a compact for the joint construction and operation of a regional institution.

But the Federal Bureau of Prisons and National Institute of Mental Health have the expertise and career plan by which top flight personnel could be assigned to construct and operate a regional institution to serve such a group of states.

When predominately rural states such as Wyoming, Montana, and Idaho build a correctional institution they can only justify one—and it will be an expensive security institution for all inmates although fewer than ten percent require security. A regional security institution constructed and operated by the Federal Bureau of Prisons could also provide diagnostic service to both the state and Federal courts for assistance in sentencing and could provide a quality of career personnel no one state could attract or afford. At the same time the availability of such a regional security institution would enable the states to impose their correctional services for the majority of offenders who do not require maximum security.

The Crime Control Act would also assist the more popular states—those which do have offenders sufficient to justify widely diversified systems—to upgrade their correctional systems. These state systems could serve Federal as well as state courts. Thus all offenders could be rehabilitated as close as possible to their home communities.

We would urge that the legislation require the coordination of all local government planning and operations with appropriate state planning and administrative agencies. While the NCCD does not recommend that state officials have veto powers over community planning and programming, we are of the opinion that failure to require and obtain state recommendations by the Federal granting agency on all local government plans and requests for grants under this legislation would result in a continuation of uncoordinated ineffective, and understaffed local government law enforcement, courts and correctional systems when metropolitan or state operated and staffed regional services and facilities could provide much more effective machinery and personnel for the war against crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Furstenberg, do you have any comments?

Mr. FURSTENBERG. No, I have no comments. My job is to bring you the experts and to work with your staff in any way I can be of assistance.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I would like to see a more uniform punishment prescribed and administered.

Obviously, there are many gross discrepancies and inequities in the punishment that is meted out for the same crime in different localities—even within the same jurisdiction by different judges. It is a very imperfect system that we have.

Mr. RECTOR. We found many indications of people who were not dangerous who could be rehabilitated in the street or in the prison and indications that many who were dangerous being placed on probation.

With your permission, I would like to send a copy of model sentencing act as an exhibit and, hopefully, for the future attention of this committee for legislation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. Broderick and Mr. Speiser, come forward, please.

Gentlemen, I am not insisting that you testify together, but you are the last ones representing the same organization, so I have called you, and I am not trying to say which one should testify first.

Each of you may identify yourselves for the record.

Mr. BRODERICK. My name is Vincent L. Broderick. I am an attorney, practicing law in New York City.

From 1961 to 1965, I served as chief assistant U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York and from 1965 to February 1966, as police commissioner of the city of New York.

I am testify today on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union with respect to S. 917.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Speiser?

Mr. SPEISER. I am Lawrence Speiser, director of the Washington office of the American Civil Liberties Union, and I will be testifying on the three bills affecting the admissibility of confessions, S. 674, S. 1194, and S. 1333; and on the one bill on wiretapping, S. 675.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. Broderick, will you proceed first?

Would you be interested in having your prepared statement placed in the record in full and highlight it as you choose?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, Senator, I would appreciate it if you would include my statement in the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. It will be printed in the record in full.

(The prepared statement submitted by Mr. Broderick reads in full as follows:)

STATEMENT OF VINCENT L. BRODERICK ON BEHALF OF AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

My name is Vincent L. Broderick. I practice law in New York as a member of the firm of Phillips, Nizer, Benjamin, Krim, & Ballon. From 1961 until 1965 I served as Chief Assistant United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, and from 1965 until February, 1966, as Police Commissioner of the City of New York.

I appear today on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, to testify in support of S. 917, which would enact into law the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967."

The prime interest of the American Civil Liberties Union is, of course, the protection of the civil liberties of all Americans, whatever their race, color, or religious or political persuasion, however unpopular the causes which they espouse, and whatever language they speak.

We recognize, however, as indeed we must, that civil rights and civil liberties cannot exist in a vacuum: a necessary pre-condition for the enjoyment of civil liberties is a climate of law and social order within which those liberties may be exercised. Liberty in a lawless society is an anomaly; it exists only for those who are strong enough to claim it, and the exercise of liberty by the strong, in such a society, inevitably entails the reckless destruction of the rights and liberties of the weak.

But law and social order in and of themselves do not insure that civil liberties will flourish—Nazi Germany, Communist Russia and modern Spain are witness to the contrary. Law and social order, to be meaningful in a democracy, must be oriented to concepts of individual liberty, and those who are sworn to uphold law and social order must accept without cavil those concepts. In the context of the 1967 United States we must have, in each of our urban complexes, a police force which is alert to the threat which violent crime poses to the freedom and the liberties of the citizens of that municipality; which has the capacties to contain that threat to the extent that it can be contained by an intelligent police presence; and which at the same time is oriented to the principles of American democracy.

The ACLU supports S. 917 because it will lend badly needed Federal assistance to the development of effective and properly oriented law enforcement efforts in those municipalities which do not presently have them; and it will lend badly needed Federal assistance to the strengthening of the law enforcement efforts in those which do. And I anticipate that S. 917 will encourage cooperative efforts between law enforcement and other resources of society to solve problems which cannot be solved through law enforcement efforts alone. And this is vital, because even the most imaginatively and intelligently administered police effort can only prevent some violent crime.

Much of the violent crime which besets our society takes place outside the practical or constitutional reach of preventive police action.

Thus some 50 percent of our municipal homicides occur in family contexts: husbands killing wives, parents killing children, etc. Another sizeable proportion of municipal homicides—perhaps 30 percent—involve acquaintances. Most of these homicides involving people known to one another occur indoors, in houses, tenements, bars, outside of the reach of the most carefully planned and pervasive preventive police patrol. Violent assaults follow the same patterns—more than two-thirds of them involve assailants who are related to, or know, their victims. And undoubtedly more than half of our municipal rapes involve victims who know their assailants. This type of familial and spontaneous violence is a societal problem, with social, economic and environmental roots. Much of it stems from the conditions of poverty and discrimination under which so many of our fellow citizens live, conditions which cause so many of our fellow citizens to be disoriented from the aims and purposes of our society, and to live among us without purpose in the present, without hope for the future. Unless we help these deprived citizens to help themselves—unless we provide for them decent and meaningful educational opportunities, adequate housing, and meaningful employment opportunities—then we can expect violent crime to continue.

Our efforts in the law enforcement sphere must be matched by meaningful effort to insure that all of our fellow citizens have a substantial stake in our society, and that they have the means at hand so to develop their own resources that they can achieve status and personal dignity and a proprietary interest in the health of that society through their own efforts.

THE SCOPE OF "CRIME ON THE STREETS"

Our support for S. 917 is predicated upon the conviction that, intelligently administered, it will make a major contribution toward the promotion of a more peaceful climate in our changing cities. But let me stress that this support is not predicated upon acceptance of the bromide of a national crime wave.

There is danger on the streets of many of our cities today. But in every city it tends to be danger which has been magnified by news and television coverage: in many it has been underlined by improved crime statistics, or crime statistics more conscientiously reported. I question whether the streets of most cities are less safe today than they were 30 years, or 50 years ago. New York City was wracked, little more than one hundred years ago, by riots more devastating and more wanton than any this country has seen in recent years; fifty years ago and thirty years ago there were sections of New York through which no police officer would think of patrolling alone. In my judgment, the streets in most sections of New York City are safe today, by day or by night. And I supsect that this is also true of most of our cities. One element which has tended to make the streets less safe has been, of course, reiterated alarms concerning "crime on the streets" which, particularly during political campaigns, have so frightened members of the public that they have stayed off the streets, which became, as a consequence, indeed less safe.

Most streets in most of our cities are safe—but not all. The deprived areas of our cities—overcrowed, populated by people who have been discriminated against in housing, in employment, in educational opportunities—these are not safe, nor are the streets in the areas which abut them. Which points up two of the sobering facts of violent crime in our society. The first is that violence tends to be a resort of the alienated, the deprived, the forsaken. The second is that this violence is most often inflicted upon those who attempt to live responsibly under the same conditions of deprivation. The persons most in need of protection from violent crime are the responsibly, law abiding citizens who live in our modern ghettos.

ARE INCREASES IN MANPOWER FEASIBLE?

It is noteworthy that S. 917 does not contemplate Federal assistance to municipalities by way of subsidizing manpower increases. Violent crime on the streets would certainly be dramatically reduced if it were possible to provide a constant police presence on all streets at all times. Such coverage is manifestly impossible; one of the great and continuing challenenges to effective police administration is the development of resourceful combinations of patrol and response capabilities so that there is a continuing police presence where it is needed while response capacities are maintained.

Indefinite increase in the number of police officers is not a practical solution for the problem. The manpower requirements would be too great, and the cost would be prohibitive.

In 1932, New York City had some 17,000 police offiers: in this year 1967, it has some 28,000. The great part of this increase has taken place in the last 14 years: in 1954 there were 19,000 police officers in New York. But during the period from 1932 to the present time badly needed improvement in police working conditions—shorter hours, longer vacations, compensatory time off, etc., more than absorbed the increase in manpower, so that the total number of police man-hours on patrol will be no greater in 1967 than they were in 1932—perhaps in the prime policing problem in our large cities— how to use most effectively the number will be less. The 1967 patrol force is, of course, much more mobile, with many more patrol cars. And response capacity has been greatly improved, with two-way radio. But intelligent disposition of the available force remains the relatively limited number of men who are available.

The mathematics of the situation precludes seeking a solution in indefinite manpower expansion. S. 917 will provide $50 million for the entire national "safe streets" program. This sum would provide less than 5,000 additional police officers for one year on the basis of New York City police salaries. Concentrated in New York City alone these 5,000 men would not provide the blanket street coverage which would be required to prevent violent street crime entirely. Spread those 5,000 men through the cities of the United States on a pro rated basis and they would have scarcely any impact. They would increase the available manpower by barely one-half of one percent. Put this another way: if a city had 500 men on patrol during a given tour, such an increase would enable that city to increase the number of men on patrol by only two or three.

THE APPROACH OF S. 917

What S. 917 will make possible is the development of new techniques of patrol; the development of new and more effective training and education of police officers; experimentation in the improvement in relationships with persons living in the communities which police serve; exploration of ways in which the communication media can be encouraged to assist in crime prevention.

Much work has already been done by various municipal police departments in these areas. A brief review of some of the more imaginative local efforts, and of problems encountered, will suggest areas in which S. 917 can be expected to have a fertilizing effect.

Techniques of Patrol. Thus New York City has already discovered through experience the utility of the motor scooter in precinct patrol. The patrolman mounted on a motor scooter is a visible deterrent, and a more personal presence than his fellow in a motor patrol car. He thus combines the advantages of the foot patrolman with a high mobility: he can cover five to ten times the area which a police officer on foot can patrol. When equipped with walkie-talkie radio, connecting him with his precinct and his brother officers on patrol, he can provide a presence which in itself prevents crime, and he can immediately respond to emergency. Five police officers in a given precinct, equipped with radios and mounted on motor scooters, may well provide the same quantum and quality of protection that the addition of 20 foot patrolmen would account for. And the combination of this new type of personal patrol with expanded radio motor patrol promises to provide the most pervasive preventive police patrol attainable. Yet here too the obstacle to immediate adoption has apparently been cost: while the motor scooters themselves are relatively inexpensive—approximately $350—the radios, at $600 to $650, have brought the cost of equipping one man to about $1,000.

Police-Community Relations. Detroit, New York and many other cities have placed great emphasis upon developing meaningful relationships with persons living in the communities they serve. Detroit's block clubs, organized by responsible citizens in various areas to cooperate with the police in maintaining order, have been very successful. New York's precinct community councils, composed of precinct police officers and representative citizens living or working in the precinct, have been extremely successful in certain areas—less successful in others. The block club and the precinct community council each provides a vehicle through which police and citizens come to know each other and each others' problems, and each cuts to the core of a basic policing problem in large changing urban areas—that of alienation stemming from fear which stems from ignorance.

The 24th Precinct on the West side of Manhattan provides a striking case in point. Three years ago relations between the police in that precinct, and the large Spanish-speaking portion of the precinct's population, had reached a low ebb. An incident had created tremendous hostility between the police and the Puerto Rican community. Any new spark might have kindled a riot. Today—and for the past two years—the 24th Precinct has provided a model for the nation of constructive relations between the police officers in a precinct and the residents of the precinct community. Police officers speak Spanish; police morale is high and the citizens are proud of their police force.

Why the change? Because intelligent police officers working in the precinct, community leaders, and an unusual social worker in the area named Thomas Wolfe all decided that something had to be done, and they did it. It was as simple as that. Police officers from the precinct visited Puerto Rico to study the background of the people in their community—they returned Puerto Rico's hospitality by bringing to New York, as their guests, children from the Puerto Rican areas they visited. Police officers on patrol made it a point to get to know the people on their posts, and to seek out their problems. Classes in English were conducted at the precinct house; art shows by children in the community were held there—the precinct became in fact a community center in every sense.

The 24th Precinct was a bellwether, but today it is not unique. It has its parallel in other precincts throughout New York, and in other parts of the country. And this development—of a healthy rapport between the police on a local level and the responsible members of the public they serve—is tremendously important for the future of effective law enforcement in our changing urban complexes. Law enforcement can only be effective—truly effective—when it is welcomed and supported by the community. Such support requires mutual respect—respect by police officer for the citizen, and by the citizen for his police. The development of climates of such mutual respect is essential in the years ahead. Hard economics rules out fighting street crime through unlimited expansion of manpower. The alternative is a simple one: enlist the citizenry as cooperative eyes and ears of the police, and street crime will be reduced.

But consider the obstacles.

First, there are traditions of hostility to and prejudice against police—traditions most generally with their roots in other times and other places and experiences with other police, but too often with their roots in experiences, or rumors of experience, with local police.

Then there is prejudice on the part of some police—prejudice predicted upon race, or language, or different economic circumstance.

Then there is fear: fear of the police; fear of community reaction to cooperation with the police.

And there is identification: the police officer with his blue uniform personifies authority—and he tends to have thrust upon himself the hatred and the fear and the resentment and the distrust which lack of service or mistreatment by any branch of government has engendered. I know from my own experience at various meetings between police and community representatives that the grievances presented ranged the gamut of municipal services—welfare, schools, sanitation, health, hospital—and they only rarely pertained to police work. Yet the onus bears on the police.

And then there is misunderstanding of the scope of police powers: "we can tell you who the policy operators are, and who the dope peddlers are. Why don't you arrest them?" "Probable cause" is, perhaps, a clearly defined legal concept, and is essential to the avoidance of abuse of constitutional rights, but it means very little to a mother who sees her child as a possible victim of a drug pusher. Her immediate conclusion is the police are corrupt.

And, of course, there is actual corruption. The police calling has long been an honorable one, and in more recent years great strides toward professionalization have been made. With professionalization has come a growing and welcome intolerance, in police ranks, of the corrupt police officer. Most police officers I have known and served with are decent and honorable men. But one corrupt man among many honorable ones, can, in the eyes of the public, taint the entire profession. How often, I wonder, has "police brutality" been used to characterize, not physical abuse, but petty corruption. Certain it is that there is and must be in our police ranks no room for the man who uses his shield to exact tribute.

A formidable list of obstacles. But ways and means must be found to surmount them, and S. 917, by encouraging planning, programming and experimentation, points the way. And certainly work which has already been done by such police administrators as Chief Jenkins in Atlanta and Chief Cahill in San Francisco, to mention only two of the many outstanding ones, provides a bank upon which the rest of the country can draw.

Training and education. It has become evident, in recent years, that law enforcement in the second half of the 20th Century requires a sophistication, a knowledge, and a maturity in its practitioners which might not have been necessary in earlier and more simple days. (The need may well have existed before, but it was not so widely recognized.) Thus the development in our more progressive police forces, large and small, of modern police academies, often closely affiliated to colleges and universities. And thus the strides taken by many states to set minimal training standards for municipal peace officers within their boundaries—witness the work, in New York State, of the Municipal Police Training Council. Thus also the development in many major universities of courses and even departments in law enforcement, police science, and the administration of justice.

Is all this necessary? What, after all, need a police officer know besides the content of the law which he is charged with enforcing, and the techniques of enforcement—use of the nightstick, revolver, and perhaps a smattering of judo?

He must, of course, know a great deal more, and his training and education can never be thorough enough. Certainly he must be technically equipped for his profession. This will indeed involve thorough training in the various resources he must upon occasion call upon to take punitive police action.

To a far greater extent, however, it will involve thorough training in the techniques he must as a matter of regular routine call upon to assist his fellow citizens in non-adversary relationships: techniques of traffic control; of emergency rescue; of first aid.

The police officers of New York City are held in extremely high esteem—an esteem which approaches affection—by a large part of the citizenry of that city. This esteem may be of long standing, but its outward manifestations stem from three occasions unrelated save as to time, in which the service nature of the policeman's role was vividly driven home.

The first was the visit of Pope Paul to New York, on October 4, 1965. During a 13-hour period, the Pope toured a great part of New York, conferred with President Johnson, addressed the United Nations, greeted representatives of other faiths, celebrated Mass in Yankee Stadium and visited the World's Fair. He was greeted, as he passed through the streets of the City, by literally millions of New Yorkers and visitors from out of town. He occasioned perhaps the greatest problems of crowd control and, to a lesser extent, traffic control, which New York had ever faced. It was a wonderful day—a day without a single untoward incident, because of the tremendous work, cheerfully rendered, of New York's police.

Early in November of that same year, the day after Election, the lights went out throughout the Northeast. New York was plunged into blackness as the evening rush homeward had barely begun, and it was dark all through the night. No elevators worked, no traffic lights functioned, and hundreds of thousands were trapped helplessly in subways. The occasion was ripe for chaos, and yet those who experienced that night in New York count it one of the memorable experiences of their lives. Policemen were everywhere—off duty officers reported for duty by the thousands, and all through the night they worked, selflessly and cheerfully, side by side with volunteer citizens, giving direction and comfort and assistance, rescuing those who were trapped, moving traffic, controlling crowds, instilling confidence.

January 1, 1966 marked the beginning of a 13-day transit strike which threatened to bring New York to a grinding, crushing halt. It did not. Through 13 days the lifelines of the City—its subways, its elevated railroads, and its buses—did not move, yet the City remained viable and operable and life, somewhat judgment. Do we ever consider the terrible burden we place upon a police officer by requiring him—on duty and off duty—to be armed? His gun becomes a part of his life: his children are raised in its shadow. We cannot relieve him of this burden until we have taken effective steps to eliminate the availability of arms to lawless members of the community—steps which are, incidentally, long since overdue—but we certainly have the obligation to see to it that he has been educated to live with this burden.

Most of all, perhaps, we must prepare him for the most frustrating anomoly of all—boredom. Because boredom is the lot of every good police officer. Those long hours of night patrol, of park patrol, of patrol in quiet residential precincts—the police presence is necessary and hence the patrol is necessary, but to the extent that the patrol is successful and prevents crime, the police officer performing that patrol is victimized by a consuming boredom, and he must be educated to live with it. (One side advantage of the motor scooter for police patrol is that with its potential for variety in petrolling patterns, it may alleviate this boredom.)

While social order is a necessary predicate for the meaningful exercise of liberty, there is always the danger that the quest for that order will dampen the zest for liberty. Another reason, therefore, why education is essential today for police officers. The law is necessary to the exercise of individual rights, and must be zealously applied to protect those rights. Thus the right to picket, the right to protest, the right to espouse unpopular causes could scarcely be effectively exercised without the protection of police officers who understand that a part of their function, in maintaining law and social order, is to provide an umbrella of protection for the exercise of those rights.

The Bill of Rights and the landmark decisions of the Supreme Court in the civil rights and civil liberties fields must not merely be known to the police officer; they must be so understood by him that they can be intelligently applied by him in his daily work. The police officer's decisions must usually be made under crisis conditions, without recourse to treatise or lawbooks, with full knowledge that his action (or forebearance from action) may be subject to leisurely after-the-fact critical review by attorneys and judges who have such resourse. Thus the imperative of an informed and mature education for the police officer is clear.

There was a time, happily now long past, when education was suspect in police circles. Today its desirability, and its neecssity, are generally recognized. Yet for many reasons, partly economic, partly historical, we do not attract the college graduate to police work. Thus police salaries tend not to be competitive with those in private industry, or, in many cases, even with those paid by other government services. Again, most urban police departments are subject to civil service requirements which mandate that aspirants for senior police administrative positions must pass through all lower ranks, in a series of competitive examinations, before they achieve them: the necessarily long apprenticeship before positions of administrative responsibility can be achieved, together with the extent of exposure during that period, deter ambitious and able young college graduates from choosing a law enforcement career. The more reason, therefore, why educational opporunities must be made available to those who have chosen police work.

Education is, of course, not for the police officer alone: it must also be for the police administrator, of all ranks. And it is here that there is most need for the creative, inquiring approach which S. 917 can do much to engender.

Police administrators, particularly in our larger cities, have long been masters in the bread-and-butter of police work—planning and directing the disposition of men; and the control of crowds and traffic; rescue work at disasters; developing programs for coping with patterns of local crime. They have only latterly realized the importance in changing urban areas of developing and sustaining healthy community relations. They have often, in my judgment—and I have been as guilty as others—permitted their policies to be dictated by immediate problems. without adequately considering the impact of their policies in other areas. A case in point: the practice has developed as a regular routine of police administration to transfer men periodically who are engaged in particular types of work, or when they are promoted. The rationale for this approach, although an unspoken one, has often been the fear of corruption—fear that the plainclothesman or the police superior, who becomes too familiar with the businessmen or with the wrongdoers in the area of his responsibility, is in danger of being corrupted by them. Now obviously a police administrator must always be aware of the danger that men under his command will be corrupted, because nothing can more quickly destroy the morale of a police force and the confidence of the public in the police. But is a policy of frequent transfers a desirable safeguard? It runs counter to two basic principles of police work, one of long standing and a second which has been more recently developed. So far as crime detection is concerned, a police officer depends upon his sources of information, and these can only be developed over a period of years—frequent transfers prevent the development of such sources. And so far as rapport with the community is concerned it is important for a police officer to know the people in the community he serves, and their problems, and for them to know him—frequent transfers make this impossible.

In New York City precincts—there are some 79 of them—are commanded by captains, which is the top civil service rank. (Promotions above the rank of captain are by designation of the Police Commissioner). Each precinct has been scientifically graded with respect to incidence of crime, and hence the complexity of its command requirements. Until very recently, a captain's first command was one of the quieter precincts, and he was gradually moved, as he matured in rank and in capacity, to more difficult precincts. By the time he was assigned to one of the precincts with the highest crime incidence he was ready for advancement to depuy inspector. The system insured that captains—the future top administrators of the Department—received a great variety of experience prior to their next promotion. But it made the development of an effective rapport between the precinct commander and the citizens of his precinct extremely difficult, since many captains spent no more than six months in any given precinct. The system outraged local community groups, who, recognizing the value of police-community communication, sought to establish effective working relationships on the precinct level, and it became obivous that it had to be changed lest the police-community relations program be undermined. The problem was that the criteria for evaluating the performance of captains was based upon this pattern of varied service. Thus we sought to develop new criteria which would make it possible to establish captains in one precinct on a relatively permanent basis. Commissioner Howard Leary has carried this move toward permanence one step further by retaining commanders in busy precincts even after they have been promoted to deputy inspector.

And here is another problem of police administration. In New York it has been the practice to assign almost all men promoted to deputy inspector to the enforcement of the public morals laws, principally the laws pertaining to vice and gambling. Thus men who have been seasoned in command are relieved of command on promotion and assigned to entirely different and specialized duties—duties for which many of them, competent to command, are not suited. You will find that no established police practice should be lightly discarded, because there is always a good reason for it, though the reason may often be buried far in the distant past.

Here the rationale may have been that all superior commanders—inspectors and above, who hold division or borough commands—are ultimately responsible for the enforcement of the public morals laws within their commands, and they must know the problems in connection with enforcement. One of these problems is that where police departments have been corrupted, the corruption has developed in the public morals areas. And yet query whether it is good administration (a) to relieve of command men who have been seasoned in command, merely because of the happenstance of promotion; and (b) to assign to a particular type of work men who may not be suited, by taste or by temperament, to that particular work.

I cite these problems not because I expect this Committee to take their particulars under advisement, but because they illustrate that there is much room for education and for experiment in the field of police administration, and I suggest that it may develop that the most significant fruits of S. 917 in action may come in this area.

Our society is changing very rapidly. Change begets problems, and many of those problems will develop in the law enforcement area. Thus even if law enforcement had today been polished to a fine science—which is has not—there would be need for S. 917 because the problems of today are no the problems of yesterday, and the science of today may not be adequate to cope with the problems of tomorrow.

One more example from this field of police administration. The police system of incentives and rewards is geared to punitive police action. In New York, for example, most police decorations, medals and citations reward positive police action in the apprehension of criminals, bravery in the performance of duty.

This materially affects a police officer's prospects for advancement, because he receives credit for such attainments upon promotion examinations.

But it has long been my view that some of the finest and most dedicated police officers are those who rarely make an arrest; who by their quiet and commanding presence on patrol deter crime and preserve social order. Their arrests are few because their performance of patrol has prevented the occasion for arrest to arise.

Yet we in police administration have not yet developed means of isolating and recognizing them. Here again study, experiment and imagination, stimulated by S. 917, may make a tremendous contribution to municipal safety, because suitable recognition of this type of police performance will inevitably stimulate emulation.

Involvement of communications media. Newspapers and television regularly report crime—it makes good news. As has been noted, their enthusiasm in reporting violent crime has played a major role in the recent hysteria, only now subsiding, concerning "crime on the streets."

These same media can be involved, and should be involved, in constructive efforts to prevent crime and to fight crime. The FBI has long exploited this potent resource through its "most wanted men" program. Police Superintendent Orlando Wilson enlisted media support extremely effectively for his "crime stop" program in Chicago. Occasionally, when more dramatic crimes are committed, newspapers will cooperate in various communities by publicizing reconstructed drawings of fugitive putative criminals.

Constructive programs on a local level in other communities should be similarly devised to meet local needs. They will call for imagination, and they will require newspaper and television cooperation. And they will need this cooperation on a regular, non-exploitative basis. Any such program should be developed with an awareness of the need to avoid prejudicial pre-trial publicity.

IS LAW ENFORCEMENT ONLY A LOCAL PROBLEM?

It is stressed, in S. 917, that municipal law enforcement is a local function. I do not quarrel with this premise, but neither do I accept it unquestioningly. I do not know. Certainly 50 years ago, when communities were in fact isolated from one another, maintaining public order was in every sense a local problem. Today, however, with every modern means of communication and travel available to criminals, do we not hamstring preventive action against them by stressing the provincial limitations on law enforcement? Is there anything local about our traffic in firearms? It makes freely available to the New York hoodlum any type of handweapon he desires, in spite of a strict local handweapon law, because other states do not have such restrictions. Is there anything local about a gambling syndicate which uses the proceeds of gambling from one state to finance criminal operations in other states? Isn't there a need for some sort of national police effort which could cope with the interstate aspects of organized crime outside of the straightjacket of the existing, and rather narrowly confined, Federal criminal law? The New York metropolitan community is comprised of three states—wouldn't law enforcement and the public it is designed to protect be better served if there were, in that community, a police effort not restricted by artificial political boundaries?

Wouldn't municipal law enforcement itself be improved and fertilized by some mobility of police personnel? The ideas and techniques developed in San Francisco, St. Louis and Chicago might be similarly applicable in New York, and free exchange of police personnel, particularly in the administrative ranks, would certainly stimulate the free flow of ideas.

I stress that I am not committed to a national police effort, but in my judgment, its feasibility should be extensively explored before we dismiss the concept by reiterating the concepts of yesteryear. S. 917 recognizes the necessity of national coordination of law enforcement: let us not, at the threshhold, rule out a more administratively cohesive approach.

CONCLUSION

In sum, gentlemen, I urge on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, and personally, that S. 917 be enacted into law. While entitled the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, I note with approval that the proposed law has a broader thrust—a concern with the total administration of justice. It will encourage research, experimentation and initiative. It will certainly foster, on a local level, an approach to crime which will respect the individual liberties of the citizen. If will foster the further development, on local levels, of the climate of law and social order which is a necessary premise for the exercise of individual liberties. It recognizes that the answer to violent crime is not merely more police officers—though there are places where more are badly needed. It encourages a primary emphasis upon the qualtiy of the police service rendered, which in turn will depend upon the calibre of person recruited to police work, on the scope of the education and training which that person will bring to his work, and on the direction and leadership which he receives.

There is nothing incompatible between civil liberties and effective law enforcement: in 1967, in the United States of America, they must be interdependent. Police service rendered without due regard for the rights of the citizen can be an invitation to chaos, while civil liberties without effective police service cannot exist. It is my conviction that S. 917 will provide a necessary impetus to a more effective administration of criminal justice throughout the nation.

Senator McCLELLAN. You were speaking primarily to the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, the administration bill?

Mr. BRODERICK. That is correct, Senator.

The American Civil Liberties Union strongly supports this bill and urges its adoption. The primary basis upon which we support it is, we feel, that its basic purpose is to support and further the exercise of democratic liberties.

Senator McCLELLAN. What do you mean by democratic liberties?

Mr. BRODERICK. I mean your liberty and my liberty to walk the streets in peace, to live our own lives without interference by our neighbors, and to exercise rights which we have guaranteed by the Constitution.

Senator McCLELLAN. That means law enforcement, does it not?

Mr. BRODERICK. It means a climate of law and social order. And to maintain a climate of law and social order, a vigorous law-enforcement effort is necessary. We feel that S. 917, the administration's bill, will foster throughout the country a more vigorous law enforcement effort to create such a climate and we believe this is in the public interest and we believe that it is in the particular interest of an area that the American Civil Liberties Union is primarily interested in, and that is the protection of individual rights.

Senator McCLELLAN. The American Civil Liberties Union, are they interested in people keeping their obligations of citizenship?

Mr. BRODERICK. It certainly is.

Senator McCLELLAN. You never place any emphasis on it; you always place the emphasis on rights, and nobody says what I ought to do to help my country. That is the thing that has gotten us off on the wrong track in this country. It used to be patriotic for those who though there was a central obligation to preserve their country and to sacrifice for it. And today, all we hear is: "Rights. Rights. Rights." And never an obligation.

Mr. SPEISER. They are not mutually exclusive. The protection of rights of citizens is a way of protecting our country. They are not inconsistent.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is not the only thing.

Mr. SPEISER. That is quite true.

Senator McCLELLAN. We put all the emphasis on that today. You see the beatniks going around, and all these bozos, saying "I am a human being." That is all they can boast of "I am a human being." Nothing that they ever did, nothing they ever contributed, no ambition or anything; nothing to sustain or support a wholesome society. All they say is "I am a human being." I tell you, unless we decide in America that we are going to fight this war on crime, we are sunk. I say that to you.

I know you are good citizens; I know we have honest differences of opinion, but I feel it very deeply, and I know the Attorney General says we do ourselves a disservice when we read statistics, but we do ourselves a greater disservice if we do not read them and pay no attention to them and try to do something about it, in my judgment.

Mr. BRODERICK. In my judgment, we will do ourselves a still greater disservice if we emphasize law and order to the exclusion of other considerations such as individual liberties. It would be relatively simple——

Senator MCCLELLAN. You put that ahead of law and order, and you say you could not have civil liberties without law and order.

Mr. BRODERICK. I say that; and that is the whole thrust of the American Civil Liberties' position on S. 917. I say it will be relatively easy to establish an atmosphere of law and order in the United States.

It was easy to do it in Nazi Germany, it was easy to do in Communist Russia. We have a problem, because in establishing and maintaining an atmosphere of law and social order, we also have a tradition of respecting individual rights and individual liberties. One of the previous speakers said there was no incompatibility between law and social order on the one hand, and civil liberties and individual rights on the other hand. I go further than that. Without law and social order and without the effect of law enforcement to maintain the climate of law and social order, there will be no such thing as individual liberties, because the liberty of the strong will be a license that runs over the liberties of everyone else.

We do believe—and I do believe. I believed when I was police commissioner in New York City and I believe it today—that it is essential that our law-enforcement effort be oriented toward respect for individual rights. I believe it is so oriented in New York; I believe it is so oriented in Atlanta; I believe it is so oriented in Detroit; I believe it is so oriented in San Francisco, and it should be so oriented in every city, in every hamlet.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Where do you consider it is oriented so as to include it?

Mr. BRODERICK. I am talking about places that I am familiar with. I am familiar with the efforts that the law-enforcement administrators have made there to make sure that their effect of law enforcement effort is an effort which respects individual rights, and it seems to me that this is essential as we move into the 1960's and 1970's.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Proceed.

Mr. BRODERICK. I would say that I think one of the very important parts of S. 917 is the emphasis it places on planning.

Senator, you had before you a panel this morning in which there was some difference of opinion as to whether plans should be related to or made separate from operations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think that was research instead of planning. As I understood it, it was research.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think research and planning are fairly closely related, and I think that both of them do have to be divorced from operation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Have to be divorced?

Mr. BRODERICK. Research and planning on the one hand have to be divorced from operations on the other hand, and it seems to me that the administration's safe streets and crime control bill will encourage that sort of divorce. It emphasizes—the emphasis it places on planning, per se, it seems to me, is an extremely important emphasis.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You would favor that bill then, rather than Senator Kennedy's bill—that approach?

Mr. BRODERICK. I would certainly favor the approach in the administration's bill as being one which is an all-inclusive approach and which has the possibilities for a great variety as the program progresses. I do not think it rules out Senator Kennedy's bill, and I certainly would, on principle, support everything I see in Senator Kennedy's bill, also.

But I do see within S. 917 room for everything that Senator Kennedy's bill and Congressman Scheuer's bill in the House are supposed to do.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think so, too, but there might be some minor amendments or some amendments that would make the adjustment here a modification to conform with the best judgment. But I do not know that a full new law is needed. If we are going to enact the safe streets and crime control bill some provision in there could take care of it.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think both bills are directed to the same purpose. Both bills are directed to the same purpose, and both bills are desirable because of that.

I would like, Senator, to just underline what I mean when I say you just divorce planning and research from operations.

A great deal of police work is crisis work, it is reacting to problems that arise. And if your planning and research efforts are related in any way to your operational effort, even only to the extent of common personnel or having a common office, planning-operation office, you are going to find that your planning and your research does not get done, because operations always provide the imperative. The crisis occurs, plannnig is set aside, research gets set aside, and you approach the current problem.

A separate planning and research effort is essential in this bill, and in encouraging this on a local level we will make a very great contribution.

I would like to emphasize that this bill, while it proposes an expenditure on a yearly basis of some $50,000,000, which is a great deal of money, is really only providing seed money. The bill is only going to be successful if it initiates and stimulates intensive local action.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How much would you recommend instead of the $50,000,000?

Mr. BRODERICK. I am not suggesting a higher figure. I want to suggest to you that $50,000,000 in terms of the national muncipal law enforcement effort is very little money, indeed. $50,000,000, put in terms of manpower, would pay the salary of 5,000 men for 1 year. If you spread 5,000 men among all the municipal police officers, you would find that it would have no improvement at all. If you were to attempt to attack street crime, it would be a useless effort; 5,000 men would be adding two or three here, two or three there. It would have no impact at all.

This amount of money in a planned effort, in a research effort, in an effort to stimulate innovation, as the bill puts it, it seems to me will be extremely useful.

I think it must also be recognized, Senator, that the problem of violent crime is only partly a problem that can be met by police activity. Relatively, a small percentage of our violent municipal crime occurs on the streets and only that relatively small percentage can be prevented by street patrols. And the effort which would be represented by the administration's bill here it seems to me must be matched by efforts in other areas. It must be matched by efforts to deal with root causes of crime itself, with the conditions of poverty, the conditions of ill-housing, the conditions of inadequate employment which propel some people to violent crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. When we were less educated and we had more people with poverty, why did we have less crime the than we have now?

Mr. BRODERICK. I do not know whether we had less then.

Senator McCLELLAN. You mean you do not think crime has increased?

Mr. BRODERICK. I think it has increased in absolute——

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think we have a crime problem?

Mr. BRODERICK. We have a crime problem today and we had one 30 years ago and we had one 50 years ago, and I thank God that we have become aware of it today, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. You think it has grown no worse?

Mr. BRODERICK. I am saying, Senator, that I do not think that it has grown nearly as bad as the publicity about the crime and the statistics about the crime indicate that it has grown.

Senator McCLELLAN. You think the statistics are wrong?

Mr. BRODERICK. I think the statistics are more accurate than they were 30 or 50 years ago. You are having crimes reported that you did not have reported then. I think you had a blackout on crime from slum areas up to 15, 20 years ago. I think that you have much more accurate reporting today. I think you are going to have more accurate reporting next year, and I think we can expect to see an increase in crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think that the statistics are increasing because—not because crime is increasing but because we are detecting more of it?

Mr. BRODERICK. We are doing a great deal of discovery. We are having more reported. I think that is a part of the answer to your question. I think there are frustrations that exist today that did not exist 30 or 50 years ago. I think that we had for the previous generation and for the generation before that safety valves that may not exist today in our urban communities. We had the frontier, we had other areas to move from when there was a block-off of employment in a given area. I think that some of these new frontiers have not opened up today, and I think we have a great fraustration among some of our people that drives them to crime. I think one of the sobering facts that we must realize, that where you have crime produced by conditions of poverty, the victims of that crime by and large are responsible citizens living under the same conditions of poverty. In a city like New York, the victims of our violent crime, the victims of our street crime tend to be, by and large, Negroes, Puerto Ricans, other people who live under slum conditions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Who commits the crime, by and large?

Mr. BRODERICK. In those areas, it is by and large committed by the same people, living under the same conditions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Against each other?

Mr. BRODERICK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think, Senator, the hour is growing late.

I think I have set forth my position and the position of the American Civil Liberties Union on S. 917 in my statement.

So, I would just repeat that I urge personally, and the American Civil Liberties Union urges personally, this bill.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am not trying to crowd you. I notice that we will probably have a vote call in a little while.

Is there anything further you wish to say?

I am not going to interrogate you, because I have not had an opportunity to read your statement. But your support of S. 917 is in line with all of our purposes, to find ways to combat the crime situation and much of 917 I wholeheartedly support; that is, its objectives, to train policemen, to give them better equipment and to do research in the ways of detection of crime, and so forth. All of those things, I support, and I think the Federal Government has the responsibility and that it should try to meet that responsibility.

Mr. BRODERICK. If I may just address myself to two points, Senator?

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. BRODERICK. One is the question of public support of the police.

Senator McCLELLAN. Will you proceed now, Mr. Speiser?

Mr. SPEISER. I would just as soon let Mr. Broderick finish, because he comes from out of the city. I am here in the city. I can submit my statement; I can come back at some other time.

Senator McCLELLAN. Your statement will be placed in the record in full, and we will continue with him and we will try to give you an opportunity to highlight yours. I wanted to be sure we get your statement in the record, and you have been very patient with us.

Mr. BRODERICK. It has been my experience, Senator, that a police department which has the proper orientation toward the enforcement of law and maintenance of order has the support of the public. In my judgment, the New York City Police Department has the support of the public and has had the support of the public.

I think one of the great contributions which can be made by S. 917 is to encourage development on every level of policemen: on the administrative level, on the local precinct level of healthy relationships between the police department, the men in the department, and the people in the community. It is out of the question today in fighting crime, first, to think in terms of any mass expansion of police forces. The mathematics of the situation just make it out of the question. Newly recruited policemen cost $10,000.

Senator McCLELLAN. I do not see why anyone wants to do it even at that price with no more support than they get.

Mr. BRODERICK. My statement is that they do get support if the proper groundwork is laid, and the proper groundwork is the development of good relations, continuing relations, on every level of police work between the police and the community they have served.

I have seen examples in other cities, in Detroit, and I know of practices in New York City where there has been very healthy and vigorous rapport between police and the community and effort has been made to encourage a good relationship.

In Detroit, they have block clubs. These are organizations within small communities, two- and three-block areas, that are formed for the purpose of cooperating with the police—people that have pride in their community and want to encourage the most active possible police protection in that community. They cooperate with the police in every way. And they have had the impact of reducing crime. What you have here is an expansion of police by making the community itself a part of the police force for law-enforcement purposes. We have had the same sort of development through precinct community councils in New York City.

The one part of the educational process which is essential today for people who go into police work is that they understand the people who live in communities where they are serving. In New York City, the conditions are entirely different in different areas, and there can be 10 or 20 different combinations of situations that a police officer, depending on where he is serving, has to cope with, has to understand. A part of his education must be that he knows the relationship with the community on a day-to-day basis, and it is a very essential groundwork and is a basis for effective law enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I suppose that is covered by this bill, the authorized training of police.

Mr. BRODERICK. It certainly is.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Training in the matter of public relations?

Mr. BRODERICK. It certainly is, and it is one of the great features of the bill.

The other point that I want to make is: It does seem to me that this committee should think through very thoroughly the question of whether or not there is a need for a national police force. I am not suggesting that there is such a need. I am not suggesting that we should have a national police force. What I am suggesting is that there are great policing problems that cannot be coped with today satisfactorily on a local level.

The New York metropolitan community is composed of three States and yet, for all practical purposes, it is one urban complex. It seems to me that it might very well be that a national police effort in an area like that would be much more effective so far as law enforcement is concerned than the effort of three different States or the municipalities of the different States. I think we have been paying lipservice for a long time to the principle that a national police force is an intolerable thing to even consider. What I am suggesting is that we could consider it.

I think today, in some testimony, it was suggested by you that there was an area that the national Federal law was needed because there was not an adequate State law to deal with the particular problem.

Senator McCLELLAN. It dealt with interstate action.

Mr. BRODERICK. It did. Of course, I am talking about interstate crime. I am talking about the type of crime that Frank Hogan did.

Senator McCLELLAN. This was a crime committed against an interstate activity and people engaged in interstate activity. I am not arguing it, but it did occur to me. Ordinarily, I would say "Yes, let the State enforce it. They have laws." But it is not just the local community that is affected. You are talking about the train cases.

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir.

And I would also direct your attention to the organized criminal cases where the interstate activity is the criminal activity, and it does seem to me that we should seriously whether, for many reasons not just this one, a national police effort might not be a good supplement to local police enforcement.

Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Mr. Broderick.

All right, Mr. Speiser.

STATEMENT OF LAWRENCE SPEISER, DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON OFFICE, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

Mr. SPEISER. I will briefly state the conclusions with respect to the other bills before the committee.

We believe that the three bills on the admissibility of confessions are unconstitutional because they do not provide proper warnings as are set down in Miranda, and we do not feel that legislation can undercut the due process requirement that the Supreme Court has set down.

Senator McCLELLAN. You are talking about the constitutional amendment. That is a concurrent resolution, I believe.

Mr. SPEISER. I did not have any constitutional amendment in the packet of bills.

All of these attempt to overturn Miranda by legislation, and I do not believe that can be done. They attempt to undercut the Mallory rule by stating that the delay in bringing an individual before a commissioner shall not be a basis for exclusion of confessions. Although the Supreme Court has not specifically ruled on the constitutional standing of Mallory, simply because they have had rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on which to base it, they would hold that the Mallory rule does have a constitutional basis as a means of preventing denial of counsel, as a means of insuring that individuals have a proper protection against illegal arrests and, of course, confessions.

It is a method of doing that, and we, therefore, are opposed to any attempts to overturn the Mallory rule.

Third, we oppose attempts to restrict appellate review by the U.S. Supreme Court as a threat to the independence of the judiciary.

Senator McCLELLAN. As between the two approaches, if one is to become the law of the land which would you prefer, the limitation of the Supreme Court's jurisdiction, or the procedure in the other bill to let trial courts examine the situation and make a determination and submit it to a jury for such weight as they felt they should give?

Mr. SPEISER. That inherently would restrict appellate review by saying the jury determination would, in effect, be final and not subject to appellate review. You gave me a Hobson's choice, because I am opposed to both, obviously.

Senator McCLELLAN. In view of the Miranda decision, we have the bill that I introduced which would restore what had been a traditional procedure heretofore.

Mr. SPEISER. I will respond to your question.

Senator McCLELLAN. There is some modification. It would restore it to where a trial court and jury would have jurisdiction.

Mr. SPEISER. I will respond, though. I think that by far the most dangerous route would be legislative attempts to take away appellant jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Senator McCLELLAN. I said we had four courses: The bill that I introduced, which would be tantamount to restoring the longstanding traditional procedures; the constitutional amendment, which would be a slow and tedious process; placing a limitation on the Court's jurisdiction; and the fourth would be doing nothing.

So, I assume you favor doing nothing?

Mr. SPEISER. No; we are in favor of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act.

Senator McCLELLAN. That has nothing to do with confessions.

Mr. SPEISER. It has something to do with it, and they are not divorced.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is there anything in the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act about confessions?

Mr. SPEISER. No, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is why I said that bill is unrelated to whether confessions shall be received in evidence.

Mr. SPEISER. The reason for your concern and the posing of the alternatives and confessions is because you are concerned about crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let us get back to my question: On the issue, on the direct issue, raised by the action of the Supreme Court in the Miranda case, I assume, as between the four things I referred to, you would favor doing nothing?

Mr. SPEISER. You are right, Mr. Chairman, and the reason for that choice is that we do not feel that the confession problem has any effect or much effect, if any, on the question of crime in the United States.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think the bill that I have offered, the one that I mentioned first about restoring judicial procedures in the country, I think it is the mildest remedy, and from my standpoint is the remedy that should be supplied. The Supreme Court can do many things, and they have done many things like 5-to-4 decisions overruling cases that have been the law of the land for a century. They are doing things. I am not sure they are wise in doing it. They may disagree with me like I disagree with the Supreme Court, but just because I disagree with the Supreme Court does not mean that I am going out here and saying that I am not going to obey the Supreme Court decision; I disagree with it; I dissent; I express that dissent, but I want to go through the constitutional process of remedy, the remedy provided by the constitutional process—by legislation. The Court may hold that unconstitutional.

The next step would be to try to amend the Constitution. It is not a personal matter with me, but if the Supreme Court is wrong in what it is doing or assuming under the Constitution as written at present, if the procedure that it is requiring now is an obstruction to law enforcement and if it hampers the apprehension and protection of criminals, I think it should be remedied if we can remedy it, because I think it does incalculable harm to our country. There may be differences of opinion, and there are differences of opinion. I only express mine. I know your contemporary argues that we have had crime all the time and the statistics are not right.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have said that in another context.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But the point is, the point that I am making is: If harm is going to come to this country by reason of the law of the land as now decreed by the Supreme Court, I think every citizen who loves his country and wants to preserve liberty would want to try to do something about it. We may have different ideas about what we want to do; we may have different ideas as to the consequences of these decisions. Those of us who have an abiding conviction that they have done great harm and will obstruct and hinder and hamper law enforcement and diminish law and order, think we should try to do something about it.

You are satisfied with it, with the status quo, or the result and information and see no evil consequences of it. You have a perfect right to say: "Let us do nothing; this is all right; let us live with it." That is what you are talking about when you talk about the democratic processes. I believe in democracy. You have the perfect right to disagree with me, and I have the right to disagree with you. I happen to be in a position where I can vote on an issue here. It is a vote you cannot control, but you have representatives here and the people have different viewpoints and the people are represented, and we, the Congress, can by inaction make a serious mistake if this condition needs remedying, and we ignore it.

Mr. SPEISER. I think this is a thoroughly useful debate, and I think that it is one of the good things in our democracy that we are here debating this kind of problem. I believe that one of the advantages of the administration is to study the effects of Supreme Court decisions on crime, on police enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You heard what I said this morning. I think time is beginning to run out on this crime situation. I may be wrong. I hope I am.

Mr. SPEISER. The difficulty with that, Mr. Chairman, is that we have countervailing interests, countervailing values. in our society, and if there is the effect that you feel there is, and, obviously, with which I disagree, then the thing to do would seem to be a constitutional amendment, but it should be an amendment that should be debated that it is going to have a change in our society.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I do not feel as strongly as you do about a constitutional amendment. The Supreme Court changes. You cannot depend on it being stable. I hope we get men on the Court in time who will decide that this Court was wrong. I hope it will become a reality and not only a probability.

Mr. SPEISER. Lastly, of the bills before the committee, S. 675, wiretapping, we are opposed to it. We believe it does not satisfy even the criteria that was suggested by the Supreme Court in the Berger case.

Senator McCLELLAN. If we met the criteria, would you still support it?

Mr. SPEISER. We are opposed to wiretapping because it is inherently violative of the fourth amendment.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, I disagree with that. We have heard testimony here that makes a pretty strong case for wiretapping.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I disassociate myself with Mr. Speiser's views on that.

Senator McCLELLAN. Gentlemen, thank you very much. We appreciate your presence and are glad to have your views on the record.

Mr. Speiser's prepared statement will be included in the record in its entirety.

(The prepared statement submitted by Mr. Speiser reads in full as follows:)

TESTIMONY OF LAWRENCE SPEISER, DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON OFFICE, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

My name is Lawrence Speiser, Director of the Washington Office of the American Civil Liberties Union. I am a member of the Bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, the District of Columbia and the State of California.

I am presenting testimony on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union on various bills before this subcommittee besides S. 917, "The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act," which was the subject of testimony for the ACLU by Vincent L. Broderick, Esquire.

THE ACLU OPPOSES ALL PROPOSALS TO WATER DOWN THE STANDARDS FOR THE ADMISSIBILITY OF CONFESSIONS

A. S. 674, S. 1194 and 1333 are unconstitutional under Miranda v. Arizona in failing to provide proper warnings to the accused.

These three bills attempt to overturn recent Supreme Court decisions affecting the admissibility of confessions in federal criminal trials. S. 674 provides that any confession may be admitted in evidence if it is voluntarily given. It provides that the trial judge in determining the issue of voluntariness shall take "into consideration" any delay between arrests and arraignment and whether the defendant was given any kind of cautionary instruction. S. 1194 would make the sole test of the admissibility of an admission or confession its voluntary character and would bar the Supreme Court or any other court from barring such confessions even though no cautionary warnings were given by police officers or anyone else. S. 1333 would create a flexible rule for admissibility of illegally obtained evidence or confessions, leaving it to the trial judge to determine in the exercise of his sound discretion.

All three bills concerning the admissibility of confessions in federal criminal prosecutions require that the confessions be voluntary. Voluntariness, however, has come to mean more than a simple declaration by the accused that be confessed of his own free will. If obtained as a result of physical coercion, such a declaration is utterly invalid and inadmissible. Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936). A confession secured by means of mental coercion is equally defective, Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954), as is one obtained while the accused was without benefit of counsel. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964).

Up until recently, however, physical and mental coercion and denial of counsel were treated as factors to be weighed by the trial judge in determining voluntariness. The United States Supreme Court, in the landmark case of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), altered the status of these elements, finding them to be constitutional rights inherent in the 5th and 6th Amendments. The Court set down constitutional requirements that the accused be warned prior to questioning "that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed." 384 U.S. at 444. These warnings are not to be weighed in a general formula or "totality of circumstances" test by a trial judge. They, or their judicially-approved equivalent, stand as an absolute federal constitutional pre-requisite of admissibility." Anno.—Admissibility of Confessions, 16 L. Ed. 2d 1295.

None of the bills before the subcommittee measure up to the Miranda requirements. S. 674 grants the trial judge authority to determine the issue of voluntariness prior to admission in evidence—essentially a restatement of the pre-Miranda rule. Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963). The standards by which the judge is to make his determination consist in sum of the obsolete "totality of circumstances" test. Taken together, these two features of the bill reduce the Miranda rule from a prerequisite to a mere set of suggestions.

S. 1194 grants the trial judge similar authority to judge voluntariness and omits entirely the Miranda warnings, requiring only that the ruling on voluntariness be supported by "any competent evidence admitted at trial."

S.1333, while listing the warnings (although omitting, as does S. 674, the right to appointed counsel), leaves the determination of voluntariness to the "sound discretion" of the trial judge. It, too, lists the "totality of circumstances" tests as the criteria for the judge's ruling, adding to it the alien considerations of the seriousness of the charge and the strength of the prosecution's case without the confession.

These defects in the bills practically preordain their unconstitutionality. Accordingly, we oppose them.

B. We oppose all attempts to undercut the Mallory Rule

Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure reads:

"(a) Appearance Before the Commissioner. An officer making an arrest under a warrant issued upon a complaint or any person making an arrest without a warrant shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the nearest available commissioner or before any other nearby officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States."

To assure complance with this congressional edict, the Supreme Court in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943) held that confessions obtained from defendants during a period of unlawful detention were inadmissible in evidence. A decade ago the Court declared that prompt arraignment, as required by Rule 5(a) "is part of the procedure devised by Congress for safeguarding individual rights without hampering effective and intelligent law enforcement". Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 at 453 (1957). Taken together, these cases hold that confessions elicited during a period of "unnecessary delay" in bringing the defendant before a magistrate renders such evidence inadmissible at trial.

§ 3501(c) of S. 674 reads:

"In any criminal prosecution by the United States or by the District of Columbia, a confession made or given by a person who is a defendant therein, while such person was under arrest or other detention in the custody of any law-enforcement officer or law-enforcement agency, shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay in bringing such person before a commissioner or other officer empowered to commit persons charge with offenses against the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia if such confession is found by the trial judge to have been made voluntarily and if the weight to be given the confessions is left to the jury."

Such a provision violates both the Mallory rule and Rule 5(a) on which it is based. Rather than compelling exclusion of confessions obtained because of unnecessary delay, the matter is left solely for the trial judge to determine if the time lapse was sufficiently long to make the confession involuntary.

The Mallory rule represents a significant procedural safeguard against illegal arrests, coerced confessions and denial of counsel. For these reasons, we feel that it rests on firm constitutional footing and that any statute which attempts to eviscerate it is unconstitutional. The specific wording and clear intent of the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the Bill of Rights afford ample support for this proposition. Although the Supreme Court has not yet enunciated this proposition we believe it is not from a rejection of this contention but merely from the salutary judicial rule against basing a ruling on constitutional grounds when other bases are available.

Soon after Mallory was decided Senator Wayne Morse, in protesting legislation directed against the Rule then pending before this Committee, termed such proposals "unwise, undesirable and unnecessary". A similar objection was expressed in the 1962 District of Columbia Commissioner's Committee Report on Police Arrests for Inuvestigation—that the Mallory Rule if observed provided protection against police arrests on suspicion. That report cited United States Attorney for the District of Columbia Oliver Gasch as reporting the deterrent effect of Mallory on police practices had resulted in the D.C. police "making better cases by carrying on more extensive investigation prior to the arrest of suspects."

Fundamental demands of due process dictate that a defendant be brought promptly before a magistrate to determine if he was arrested for probable cause. Equally basic is his right to be informed of the charges against him and to receive advice of counsel. Only by a consitiutional requisite for prompt arraignment can these guarantees be secured. S. 674 fails to provide such protection and hence should not be adopted.

C. We oppose attempts to restrict appellate review by the United States Supreme Court as a threat to the independence of the Judiciary

Article III of the United States Constitution delineates the judicial power of the United States Supreme Court in Section 2, Clause2:

"In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Counsels and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

The impact of this provision is colored by Article VI, Clause 2, which declares the Constitution to be the Supreme Law of the land. From these two threads Chief Justice John Marshall wove the historic fabric of judicial review, which has come to be a permanent feature of American government:

"It is (Marshall said) emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each."

Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 at 177. Beginning with the basic notion that an independent judiciary, disinterested and unresponsive to political machinations, is best suited to umpire the workings of the Republic, the Court has passed on the constitutionality of Congressional enactments, arbitrated disputes between States and governed the workings of the federal court system it heads. In addition, it has served as the national appellate court on civil and criminal litigation, establishing rules of evidence and law, the power for which is essential for the dynamic judiciary our trifurcated executive form of government demands.

The trinity of bills before the committee—S. 674, S. 1194 and S. 1333—seek in varying degrees to restrict the Court in its appellate functions, This common trait is indicated, first, by sections designed to delute Miranda and McNabb-Mallory down to discretionary rules of thumb for trial judges. The effect on appellate review is to restrict the grounds of reversal to abuses of discretion, not prejudicial error of law.

S. 1333 entitles the section pertaining to confessions "Flexible Rule for Admissibility of Illegally Obtained Evidence"—but flexibility at the trial level resulting in restriction at the appellate level. The same bill relies heavily on trial court discretion, allowing value judgments as to the "degree" to which interrogations meet constitutional standards and any "justification" law enforcement officers may advance as an excuse.

S. 674 allows the trial judge full discretion on admissibility as well, but S. 1194 makes the trend most obvious. It seeks to "define" Supreme Court appellate review in criminal cases involving admissions by withdrawing all jurisdiction on the issue of voluntariness "to review or to reverse, vacate, modify or disturb in any way" the trial court ruling.

Such proposals fly in the face of American legal tradition and sound judgment. They, in effect, shackle the Supreme Court in its efforts to lay down rules of evidence—an historic pursuit of our highest tribunal. Taken in the context of the present concern over the rise in crime, they assume the Court is restricting police enforcement through decisions designed to protect the due process rights of innocent and guilty accused.

The basic fallacy of the claim that the Supreme Court is to blame for the rise in crime has been recognized by countless authorities. The effect of court limitations on police interrogation was found to be negligible in the 1966 Report of the President's Commission on Crime in the District of Columbia, pp. 594–613. Rejecting the notion that a complex problem can be attributed to a single factor, then Acting Attorney General Ramsey Clark a year ago expressed the following view:

"Court rules do not cause crime. People do not commit crime because they know they cannot be questioned by police before presentment or even because they feel they will not be convicted . . . In the long run, only the elimination of the cause of crime can make a significant and lasting difference in the incidence of crime . . . The present need for greater protection . . . can be filled not by . . . court rulings affirming convictions based on confessions secured after hours of questioning or evidence seized and search made without warrants. The immediate need can be filled by more and better protection."

At a time when the Court is under unremitting criticism for supposed coddling of criminals, it would do well to consider the positive role played by the Court in the enforcement and administration of criminal justice. Recent rulings on confessions have not so much restricted police procedure as they have improved it. Knowing their procedures will be closely scrutinized in court, police are doing a more thorough job of investigation, relying on careful research rather than tainted or questionable confessions or searches. As watchman over police practices, the Court is fulfilling an historic role:

"It is evident that every restriction that is placed on police procedures by the courts—or anyone else—makes deterring or solving crimes more difficult. However, it is also evident that police procedures must be controlled somehow. In 1931, the Wickersham Commission reported that the extraction of confessions through physical brutality was a widespread, almost universal police practice. During the next several years the Supreme Court issued a number of rulings that excluded such confessions as admissible evidence in court. There can be no doubt that these rulings had much to do with the fact that today the third degree is almost nonexistent. No one can say just how much the third degree helped law enforcement in deterring or solving crimes, but even if it helped considerably few Americans regret its virtual abandonment by the police." The Challenge of Crime in a Free Society, The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, 1967, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., p. 93.

Looking beyond the myopic desire to pin the blame on a group not in a position to offer a defense, the ACLU urges this committee to reject this blatantly anti-Court legislation as senseless, self-defeating and unresponsive to the crime problem in this country.

THE PROPOSED FEDERAL WIRE INTERCEPTION ACT—S. 675—IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL IN VIOLATING THE 4TH AMENDMENT'S PROHIBITION AGAINST UNREASONABLE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

A. Wiretapping is inherently uncontrollable and usually uncontrolled

Recent years have witnessed the emergence of a new phenomenon which threatens one of the basic tenets of a free society. Great numbers and varieties of highly sophisticated electronic devices, minute and highly sensitive, have flooded the commercial market. Known collectively as "bugs," they have opened countless opportunities for secret and furtive violations of the right to privacy.

To date, no effective national regulatory legislation has been passed to curb the use of bugs and wiretapping devices. Although § 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 prohibits interception and divulgence of telephone communications by anyone, that such practices are widespread in federal and state agencies, as well as by private individuals, in states without effective prohibitions, is common knowledge. Executive recognition of the need for firm action in this area is evidenced both in the Presidential directive of June 30, 1965, forbidding wiretapping by federal agents and in the proposed Right to Privacy Act of 1967 (S. 928, H.R. 5386) sponsored by the Administration. The time for action is at hand.

The terrifying consequences that confront our society if wiretapping continues unimpeded concern us all. Perhaps the most significant aspect of these devices is the fact that they are both uncontrolled and uncontrollable. More specifically, the supposed controls, both present and proposed in S. 675, do not accomplish what they intend. Even if they did, they would still not significantly reduce the enormous invasion of privacy produced by these modern devices.

Wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping are inherently uncontrollable because there is no way to limit the tap to the persons or conversations in which the police officer may have a legitimate interest. Thus a tap on a phone catches the calls of (1) everyone who calls the phone tapped; (2) everyone who uses the phone to make a call; and (3) all the calls of the person whose phone is tapped and under suspicion. And it makes no difference how irrelevant, intimate and innocent the calls and people may be. Such invasions cannot possible be avoided, once the tap is put in.

One of the worst aspects of this inherent uncontrollability is that the necessary confidentiality of legally privileged conversations is inescapably destroyed, even if unintended. There are also many reports of deliberate bugging and tapping of lawyers' offices and telephones, as well as of doctors and ministers. This clearly threatens the 6th Amendment's right to counsel guarantee. Even where the lawyer, doctor or minister is himself a suspect, the tap or bug inevitably catches many privileged conversations of clients, patients and communicants who are fully entitled to confidentiality.

We believe that wiretapping and eavesdropping cannot be authorized consistent with constitutional requirements for a valid search and seizure. The essential elements of the 4th Amendment include probable cause and specificity. Though the first can usually be complied with, the second cannot. Most important is the specificity requirement. If there was any one abuse with which the Framers of our Constitution were concerned, it was with the general warrants and the writs of assistance which authorized general exploratory searches. To prevent this, the Founders required the search and seizure to be limited to specifically listed items. This requirement cannot possibly be complied with where wiretapping and bugging are concerned, for no such limitation is possible. Once the tap or bug goes on, the recording machine starts to operate, and everything is taken down, often for weeks and months. The best court order system in the world could not prevent this indiscriminate search and seizure.

The secrecy of the tap or bug, which can be maintained because they are used primarily for leads and not as direct evidence, almost ensures lax judicial scrutiny. This is because it is the probability of challenge that produces the protection afforded by a court order system in the conventional case. It is extremely difficult for a defendant even to learn whether wiretapping or bugging has been used in his case. Except when the police or prosecutor voluntarily discloses the existence of a wiretap, it is almost impossible to learn whether a wiretap has been used and to challenge its issuance.

S. 675, labeled "A bill to prohibit wiretapping . . ." suffers the shortcomings of similar efforts designed to authorize wiretapping under certain categories and by specified agencies. The bill permits state and federal wiretapping in cases of organized and other serious crime (murder, extortion, kidnapping, narcotics offenses) on application for a court order authorizing the placing of a tap on the showing of probable cause. Although controls as to the nature and location of the communications facility taped, the offense for which information is sought and the time period in which tapping is permitted are contained in the bill, such provisions would not prevent the violations of privacy and abuses of constitutional guarantees discussed above. Given the tendency of the courst to rubber stamp police determinations of probable cause, the provision for extension of the original forty-five days in countless twenty day chunks could result in emasculation of the limitations.

The American Civil Liberties Union objects to the extension of authority to wiretap to federal and state agencies. Grant of this broad and secretive power practically courts abuse on a wholesale basis. The danger inherent in government use of secret surveillance under the guise of law enforcement was recognized forty years ago by Justice Brandeis in the case of Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928):

"Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperilled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a law-breaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the ends justify the means—to declare that the government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution." 277 U.S. at 485.

For this same reason, we oppose the exception in S. 675 for national security. The bill grants the President power to obtain information "by such means as he deems necessary"—this is too broad and uncontrolled a power. Moreover, no case has been made as to either the effectiveness of such practices in so-called national security cases, or for the need for absolute and unreviewable executive discretion.

The exception for switchboard and common carrier interception seems divorced from any logical need of law enforcement. Such a provision appears practically impossible to enforce in the event of an abuse, and the phrase "normal course of employment" is vague, to say the least. Surely, there ought to be some indication of the purpose for which this broad exemption is to be permitted, without record-keeping, reporting and other controls. Such controls are necessary in order to ensure that this power, if allowed at all, is used as rarely as it should be and not abused, as it so easily can be.

Our primary objection to S. 675, however, concerns the vast scope of crimes towards which the bill would authorize wire-tapping. The bill goes far beyond the national security matters covered by the proposed Right of Privacy Act of 1967. It would extend this odious practice to cover a multitude of situations in which the sanctity of countless innocent persons would be invaded. Under prevailing police practices, such crimes as murder and kidnapping involve prolonged and thorough investigations. If wiretapping is allowed in the effort to solve such crimes, citizens remotely and peripherally related or acquainted to the possible and numerous suspects would discover the pervasive sense of exposure which motivated our ancestors to enact the 4th Amendment. We must constantly guard against the overzealous, keeping in mind the recent warning of Senator Ervin that "constitutional shortcuts are no substitute for good police work." 113 Cong. Rec. S2478 (Daily Ed., February 27, 1967).

In sum, S. 675 does not provide the necessary safeguards to control the abundant and widespread invasions inherent in the practice of wiretapping. Senator Long has warned that "wiretapping is a repugnant invasion of privacy . . . [I]t's use cannot be justified simply on the basis of its convenience." 113 Cong. Rec. S. 4926 (Daily Ed., April 12, 1967). The American Civil Liberties Union urges the Congress not to pass legislation which will make the gloomy prophecy of George Orwell's "1984" an imminent reality rather than a far-fetched fantasy. We urge the committee to reject S. 675.

AMMUNITION FOR THE 'WAR ON CRIME'

The report of the National Crime Commission is a lengthly, well-written and profoundly disturbing document.

By far the greater part of the report is devoted to a re-study in depth of conditions which encourage crime and an assortment of procedures to deal with these conditions.

What is new, and certainly not less important, is the fact that this report probes two areas which have been generally avoided in earlier crime studies.

The first area has to do with wiretaps and electronic listening devices, or bugs. In the second area, seven of the 19 members of the commission take a hard and critical look at the unreasonable burdens which have been imposed on law enforcement by the Supreme Court in the past few years.

A majority of the commission concluded that "the present status of the law with respect to wiretapping and bugging is intolerable" and that "Congress should enact legislation dealing specifically" with these matters. What is actually called for is legislation, subject to "stringent limitations," which would permit the use of wiretaps and bugs by law-enforcement agencies, and which would outlaw any other use of such devices.

This recommendation by the commission majority was available to the President earlier this month when he sent his crime message to Congress, a message which called for a ban on all wiretapping and bugging except in national security cases. Mr. Johnson chose to ignore the advice of his own commission. We hope that Congress will not ignore it.

It should be borne in mind that wiretaps and bugs are useful, essential really, in dealing with certain major crimes and with "organized crime"— that element of the criminal community which now, with relative impunity, takes in untold billions of dollars, corrupts law-enforcement agencies, robs the poor, murders its enemies and wrecks the lives of thousands of people through the illegal sale of narcotics. How anyone, the President included, can say that there is some "right of privacy" which forbids the use of the most modern and efficient methods to apprehend these racketeers is beyond comprehension.

The use of bugs and wiretaps would be of little or no help on the other front of the war on crime—the battle, also now a losing one, to deal with the hoodlums whose specialties are robbery, rape, burglary, and the like. What is urgently needed here is relief from such 5-to-4 Supreme Court decisions as those in the Escobedo and Miranda cases.

There is nothing in the supplemental report on this subject by the seven commission members which is in any sense an "attack" on the court or an invitation to flout its rulings. Nevertheless, the plain import of their findings is severely critical in the sense that they think the court majority has unduly tipped the scales in favor of the criminal suspect and against the public's right to be protected against crime as well as government's duty to provide that protection. For the benefit of those who think that any criticism of the Supreme Court stops just short of treason, it should be noted that this supplemental report draws much of its support from the comments of dissenting justices and from views expressed by such former members of the court as Justices Jackson and Frankfurter.

It will also be difficult to implement many of the commission's recommendations. The most that can be said now is that the major reforms that are proposed, whatever the difficulty, must somehow be made effective if there is to be any hope of winning the war on crime.

OUR CRIME-RIDDEN CITY

Three days before the President's District crime message went to Congress the law-abiding residents of this community received the latest bit of bad news. Washington crime in January jumped by 42 percent over the figure for January a year ago. Ten years ago the crime index was 205.4 percent lower than it is today.

Against this dismaying background, Mr. Johnson got off to a splendid rhetorical start. "So long as I am President," he said, "I will take every step necessary to control crime in the District and to make it a community of safe streets and homes, free from crime and the fear of crime."

Unhappily, the presidential performance fell far short of promise.

This is not to say that the recommendations offered by the President would not be helpful if put into effect. Conceivably, they could be of considerable help. But of themselves they will never control crime in the District or make this a safe city, and Mr. Johnson for some incomprehensible reason seems unwilling to take the last crucial steps in his campaign against crime.

In October, after some six years of work, Congress enacted a District crime bill designed, within presumed constitutional limits, to ease some of the handicaps which the courts have clamped on the police in the investigation of crime and the interrogation of suspects. Had this bill become law, it certainly would have helped. But it was vetoed by the President because, he said, some of its provisions possibly might have been struck down by the Supreme Court. Of course this might have happened. But why couldn't he have left that question to the courts?

There is not one word in this message which asks Congress to do anything about the Mallory rule or other crippling decisions. And this despite the fact that his own District Crime Commission agreed that some legislation is needed. A majority of his National Crime Commission said that the present status of the law on bugging and wiretapping is "intolerable" and that legislation is also needed in this area. But not a word of guidance or request came from the President. And the White House has made it clear that nothing of the sort is likely to be forthcoming.

Toward the end of his message, Mr. Johnson said this: "I pledge myself—and I urge Congress—to take every step which is necessary to ultimate success in our drive against crime."

This is repetition as far as the President is concerned. But the invitation to Congress is new.

The hope for this crime-ridden city is that the legislators will take the invitation at face value, enact the best bill they can draft and send it to the White House. If his words mean anything, the President this time will sign it—and let the courts decide its constitutionality.

COURT DECISIONS HURT CRIME FIGHT

(By McLellan Smith, DSN Washington Correspondent)

The President, in recommending broad legislation "to insure the public safety," for the second year in a row has used very strong language about the crime problem in America but was mute on one subject of acute interest to all of us.

He warned against allowing a breakdown of public order, and deplored the fact that in many areas citizens are afraid to use the public streets. He warned against the consequences of contempt and mistrust of legally established authority.

"Lawlessness is like a plague," the President declared, and one Washington newspaper stated that no one can accuse him of exaggeration. In his crime message to Congress, he pointed out that more than 7 million people each year come into contact with the law in America, and on any day over 400,000 are confined in correctional institutions.

He further commented that probably more than twice as many aggravated assaults, burglaries and larcenies occur than are reported. And it is shocking to note that crime is highest in the 15 to 21 age group, with half the arrests for burglaries involving youths under 18.

In recent years crime in the United States has increased at a rate about six times that of our poulation growth. It is a shockingly sad commentary.

And the situation is further aggravated by the ill-advised philosophy of taking the law into one's own hands, of taking to the streets in massive lawless demonstrations, and of violating laws one doesn't agree with.

This trend must be reversed! Public order is the first business of government, as the President stated.

Although the President made some far-reaching suggestions, he was silent on one that we believe to be the most critical problem in law enforcement today: Court decisions which hamper rather than help law enforcement officers and which show more concern for the rights of the criminal than for the rights of law-abiding citizens.

Such an undue burden has been put on law enforcement officers that they are severely handicapped in the investigation and prosecution of crime. Corrective legislation is pending before the Congress and we hope it will be given the consideration it deserves.

If crime is to be abated, law enforcement must be given the tools with which to work, not have its hands tied by Court decisions which overlook the rights of the law-abiding to the advantage of the criminal.

[Austin, Tex., American, Mar. 21, 1967]

IMBALANCE IN FAVOR OF THE CRIMINAL

The concern about the "crime situation" is nation-wide and it is manifesting itself at a very, very personal level—at home.

To this point, Mr. Citizen hasn't been informed about how he can participate, despite a nominal number of organizations set up to foster the study of some phase of crime.

In Austin, the Texas Grand Jury Association is having a state-wide meeting of its membership, presumably with the intention of bolstering interest in this phase of the process by which criminal activity is brought under scrutiny of the judicial system. Then there is the Crime Stop program, which, incidentally, is making some pointed inquiries about procedures of some of the agencies directly concerned with criminal activity.

Now comes Police Commissioner Howard R. Leary of New York, another of those officials on the firing line who are saying point blank that the rules of the game, as set up by society, are at an imbalance in favor of the criminal and his activity.

"If the public wants to stop crime," says the commissioner, "they must have the laws changed to safeguard the community."

Commissioner Leary points out that legislative bodies can increase the penalties for burglary, felonious assault, robberies, sex offenses and other violent crimes.

"Instead of restricting law enforcement, the laws should restrict criminal activity. We don't think the criminal element is very fearful of the present penalties."

The commissioner may be getting at the core of the matter when he says: "We are approaching an imbalance between the protection of the rights of the suspected individual and the protection of the group."

Then he expanded the list of public institutions and agencies that must respond.

"The public must look at the courts and the legislative bodies—the city council, state legislature and Congress. What laws have been passed to protect you?"

In answer to his question, the commissioner answers: "None."

THE COURT AND THE PEOPLE

Last Friday Canton (Ill.) cab driver Lloyd Miller was released from Illinois State Prison by action of the U.S. District Court in Chicago.

Miller had been sentenced to die for the November, 1955, rape murder of an 8-year-old Canton girl. The District Court, in freeing Miller, cited the Supreme Court ruling on the use of confessions.

Thus another convicted killer and rapist goes free because of the Supreme Court ruling limiting sharply the use of confessions in a trial.

A presidential crime commission, studying the problem, has revealed that seven of its 19 members say the situation calls for amendment of the Constitution. Similar suggestions have come from a Senate subcommittee studying the implications of the court's 5 to 4 Miranda decision last June, although some witnesses before the subcommittee have opposed a constitutional amendment saying a future court ruling might soften it.

But writing laws and constitutional amendments is the business of the Congress of the United States, not the Supreme Court. Congress can, if it desires, pass laws to correct what appears an obvious flaw in the law of our land.

Representative Robert Taft, Jr. (R-O.) has introduced in the House of Representatives a bill authorizing the appointment of "masters of examination" to supervise questioning of suspects by Federal law enforcement agencies. He said it could serve as a model for state legislatures to consider in revising criminal codes and added, "We must not be faced with the spectacle of the acknowledged criminal freed merely because a policeman is unable to guess how five of the Supreme Court will vote on a particular issue."

As long as the Supreme Court's set of rules remains in effect, state legislatures cannot enact laws which would nullify them. This is up to Congress. It should enact laws which will restore to police more time and opportunity to question suspects, under reasonable circumstances, than they have under the guidelines laid down in the Miranda case. There is need for more common sense in fixed standards for determining whether a confession is voluntary.

Legislation which recognizes the rights of the victim as well as the criminal should be pressed.

[Beckley, W. Va., Post-Herald, Mar. 28, 1967]

CRIME IS ENCOURAGED BY LENIENT COURTS

Crime and how to cope with it would probably be the prime subject of discussion in the United States if it weren't for the Vietnam war. The way things are going, it may soon even surpass the war in public concern.

That crime continues its upward spiral cannot be denied. It is rising more rapidly in almost all major categories than the growth of the population. But the rate of crime increase is taking a back seat to arguments over how to treat a suspected criminal.

It is a fact the worst crime rate in the nation's history has come during a period when many of the courts of the land—and in particular the Supreme Court—have erected unprecedented safeguards for suspects.

Recent Supreme Court decisions, and subsequent lower court rulings based on those decisions, have made it all but impossible to gain a confession, or even to interrogate a prisoner.

A minority statement in the report of the President's Crime Commission referred specifically to these two areas of police restriction, and asked if "the scales have tilted in favor of the accused and against law enforcement and the public further than the best interest of the country permits."

Others are asking that question, in addition to just about every police officer. The burden of proof rests upon those who long have contended there is no relationship between punishment and crime.

Never have the courts been so lenient, and never has crime in the United States been more rampant.

[Helena, Mont., Independent Record, Mar. 30, 1967]

WHY NOT FIGHT CRIME?

President Johnson has gone through the motions of declaring war on crime, but his plans for action indicate that this war will be fought with the government's hands tied behind its back, just as in the war in Southeast Asia.

For example, one of the stipulations that the President made is that there shall be no wiretapping.

This is as much as admitting that the criminals have a right to operate, to plan their forays against civilized society and that law enforcement can do nothing about it as long as they obey the rules of the game.

In fact, it makes the activities of criminals appear to be a game.

It makes it illegal to do anything about crime as long as these rules are observed by the criminal element, and whenever the law goes beyond the rules, using modern principles of detection, using confessions of the criminals themselves, then we are forced to act as though no crime had been committed.

One is reminded of a childhood game of tag during which one who was threatened with tagging could call out "King's ex," or some similar magic formula and thereby be immune.

Why should wiretapping or bugging be illegal on the part of law enforcement officers?

We can think of no reason which should be persuasive by which any law-abiding citizen would object to wiretapping or the use of other electronic media in the field of detection.

We can think of many reasons why the criminal element would object to having its plans made known before they could be consummated.

Even the President's own Crime Commission in a recent report said that it favored a limited use of wiretapping devices in cases involving national security.

We would go farther and say that limited wiretapping should be legalized in cases involving organized crime.

Perhaps the actual use of the wiretap recording might not be used in court, but it could be used to give direction to the law enforcement officers so that they would know where to look for evidence which could be used in court, so that they would know where to be on hand at the moment a crime is committed, so that they would know who might be involved and could search for evidence involving all the conspirators instead of only part of them.

Crime is getting so serious that we dare not confine ourselves to half-way measures.

Either the nation is going to control crime or crime will control the nation. We had better use all the weapons at our disposal.

[The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., May 22, 1967]

CRIME—WHAT'S THAT?

There is one thing to be said for our new Attorney General, Ramsey Clark. You never know what to expect when he takes off on the subject of crime.

In an interview the other day, the attorney general was reported as saying in effect that all the talk about a national crime wave is much ado about nothing. "The level of crime has risen a little bit," Clark said, "but there is no wave of crime in the country."

As an item in support of this thesis, the attorney general told of one city (unidentified) in which crime was up 1 percent from last year. But last year, he added cheerfully, crime in that city was down 1 percent from the year before. As for official statistics which indicate substantial yearly increases in crime throughout the country, Clark said: "We do ourselves a great disservice with statistics."

For our part, we do not quite know how to interpret this comment. It is true that crime statistics do a great disservice to the Clark suggestion that the crime wave talk is a case of making mountains out of molehills. But our attorney general, in all deference, is talking through his hat—at least as far as the crime statistics for Washington are concerned. Whatever the fact as to the statistics for his unidentified city—statistics, incidentally, which he seemed to think were quite useful—the figures for the Nation's Capital add up to a devastating rebuttal of the Clark crime thesis.

The most recent statistics for Washington show a dismaying crime rise here of 59.7 percent last month over the previous April. This included a 103.8 percent jump in robberies. The rise in serious crime in March was 51 percent over March of 1966. The President's message on crime in Washington, promising safe streets and so on, went to Congress in January. The local crime statistics for that month revealed a jump of 42 percent over the same month a year ago. And to take a longer statistical journey into the past, the crime index in Washington 10 years ago was about one-fourth of its current level.

Yet our attorney general tells us that "we do ourselves a great disservice with statistics." It would be nice, we suppose, if the nasty figures could be thrown down the sewer. Then it might be possible for some people to believe that there really isn't any such thing as a crime wave. Possible for some people that is, but not for those who are the victims day in and day out of robberies, rapes, burglaries, assaults, and you name it.

CRIME-LAW SHIFT URGED IN BRITAIN

LEGAL UNIT WOULD END RIGHT OF SUSPECT TO KEEP SILENCE

By Anthony Lewis

LONDON, June 1—Britain was urged today to abolish the right of criminal suspects to remain silent under questioning by the police.

Justice, a leading legal organization, proposed a new system of police interrogation in the presence of a magistrate. The suspect would be required to answer, and the answers could be used against him at a trial.

The proposal contrasts striking with the trend of recent Supreme Court decisions in the United States. These decisions have reinforced the protention against self-incrimination by giving the suspect the right to consult a lawyer before being questioned.

Justice is the British branch of the International Commission of Jurists. Its views will carry particular weight because it is regarded as a liberal-minded organization concerned about the rights of individuals.

PAST PROPOSAL REJECTED

Six years ago, a committee of Justice rejected proposals for change in the right to silence, terming them "alien to the general conception of justice in this country."

One member of that committee, Sir John Foster, dissented. He criticized the previlege as "a sentimental sporting rule" that allowed some guilty men to go free.

Since then, the new report said, "the climate of opinion has become less favorable to criminals and Sir John Foster's view has been more and more widely accepted."

The report concluded:

"The time is ripe to abolish the privilege of the accused to keep silent before his trial, while at the same time safeguarding him from improper pressure by overzealous police officers by requiring that his confession shall not be admissible against him unless it is made and recorded before a magistrate."

The report also spoke favorably of a suggestion to abolish the privilege against self-incrimination in trials as well, so that defendants would have to take the witness stand. But it did not take a final position on that point.

The questioning procedure suggested in the report was described as "controlled compulsory interrogation." It would begin with the appearance of an accused person before a magistrate, as soon as possible after arrest.

The police would ask the suspect questions. The magistrate would "disallow any question which he thought unfair or improper," and he could ask further questions himself.

If the suspect refused to answer despite orders, this refusal could be mentioned at the trial. The report did not propose any power to hold a suspect in contempt for refusal to answer.

The suspect would be entitled to have a lawyer present, and the report favored free lawyers for the poor. But it added that under this system it would be "contrary to public policy and to professional etiquette for a solicitor to encourage his client not to answer proper questions."

Once this new procedure was used, no other confession made by a suspect would be admissible—with one large exception. The report urged that policemen be given pocket tape recorders on which they could interview suspects before arrest.

Such interviews should be admissible as evidence, the report said, "subject to satisfactory guarantees against abuse."

[The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., June 10, 1967]

MESSAGE FROM BRITAIN

In the evolution of our system of law, as in many other things, the United States is deeply indebted to the British. And it may well be that in the business of dealing with criminals there is also much of profit for us to learn from this source.

Just the other day, for instance, an organization known simply as Justice, which is the British branch of the International Commission of Jurists, urged the abolition of the right of criminal suspects to remain silent, under questioning by police in the presence of magistrates.

The British proposal calls for getting the suspect before a magistrate as soon as possible after arrest. Subject to the magistrate's ruling on the propriety of questions, the suspect would be required to answer, and the answers could be used in a trial. A defense lawyer could attend, but it would be "contrary to public policy and to professional etiquette for a solicitor to encourage his client not to answer proper questions." Confessions obtained by other means would be for the most part ruled out.

Going a step further, the Justice report suggested that the police be given tape recorders on which to interview suspects before arrest. And while it stopped short of a firm endorsement, Justice also had some favorable words to say for the idea of ending the privilege against self-incrimination in trials as well.

This is a decided switch for the British legal group, which reached a contrary conclusion six years ago. Since then, however, the organization has been swinging toward the view that the privilege of silence is "a sentimental sporting rule" which too often allows a guilty man to go free.

It should be noted, according to the New York Times, that Justice is regarded in Britain as a liberal-minded organization "concerned about the rights of individuals."

This is all so directly contrary to the trend of our own Supreme Court in virtually ending the value of police interrogation that the mere thought of such proposals here would no doubt send our justices spinning.

Our reaction, however, is, Hail, Justice!

It is apparent that in Britain concern for "the rights of individuals" is coming to mean more than concern for the rights of criminals. The message inherent in the new British report is that the victims of crime, and the law-abiding public at large, have rights, too. The day that this revolutionary notion shows signs of gaining ground in the United States will be a day for rejoicing.

GOVERNMENT BY JUDGES

James J. Kilpatrick

The Tenth Amendment to the Constitution ordinarily is remembered, when it is remembered at all, as the "States' rights" amendment. The term is a misnomer. It ought properly to be known as the "reserved powers" amendment, but in the light of last Monday's Supreme Court decision in the California case, we may refer to it henceforth simply as the Discarded Tenth.

Until last Monday, many of us truly had believed that not even the Warren court could fail to honor the explicit meaning of the Tenth. What the amendment says is that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively "or to the people."

Those last four words strike to the very heart of popular government. Destory them, and the structure falls. What the court held on Monday is that the people of California, exercising their ultimate sovereignty, no longer have the power to amend their own State Constitution in order to proclaim an elementary statement of property rights. Five members of the high court—Warren, Douglas, Brennan, White and Fortas—substituted their own naked will for the expressed desire of more than 4.5 million Californians. Government by the people yielded on Monday to government by the judges.

The facts in the case are well known. In 1963, the California legislature adopted the Rumford Fair Housing Act. The law, intended to reduce racial discrimination, took away from the owners of certain residential property their right to sell or to lease as they wished. The opponents of the law thereupon initiated a referendum, known as Proposition 14, intended to nullify the Rumford Act and to write into California's supreme law a positive statement of every person's right "to decline to sell, lease or rent (his) property to such person or persons as he, in his absolute discretion, chooses."

Proposition 14 carried overwhelmingly in the 1964 election. Several Negro plaintiffs then brought suit to have the referendum declared void as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The California Supreme Court unheld their position. On Monday, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed by a 5–4 vote.

To describe the majority's reasoning as bizarre is to put a useful word to an inadequate purpose. The majority's reasoning was simply incredible. As the five justices saw it, California's constitutional declaration of a man's right to decline to sell his property amounted to "encouragement of racial discrimination by the State." Such a State power is prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment; it therefore cannot be exercised by the people through amendment of their basic law.

How Proposition 14 could be read as "encouragement" of racial discrimination is beyond comprehension. As Harlan said for the four dissenters, "the provision is neutral on its face." Its effect is merely to restore certain private behavior "to the sphere of free choice." The Rumford Act established a special privilege for buyers. Proposition 14 took that special privilege away, and left the law of property where it was before—in a condition where the buyer's right to buy is fairly balanced by the seller's right not to sell. If the people themselves cannot restore that right, how then is it ever to be restored?

The Supreme Court majority could not even find precedents to support its Olympian view. One cited case involved a railway; another involved a political party; a third involved a restaurant owned by a public parking authority in Wilmington; a fourth dealt with State statutes requiring segregation in restaurants. Speaking for the majority, White feebly acknowledged that "none of these cases squarely controls the case we now have before us." The fact was that none of the cited cases remotely approached a California constitutional amendment dealing with free choice in the sale of private property.

In a concurring opinion, Douglas reiterated his alarming view that rights of free choice no longer exist in any area, such as the sale of real estate, that is handled through agents licensed by the State. He has not yet been able to rally a majority of his brothers to this extremist position, but one finds small comfort in the fact. In last Monday's decision, the high court carried its obsessive egalitarianism to lengths that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment could never have conceived.

Harlan summed it up: By refusing to accept the decision of the people of California, and by contriving a new and ill-defined constitutional concept to allow Federal judicial interference "the court has taken to itself powers and responsibilities left elsewhere by the Constitution." This the high court had no right to do. But five of its members did it.

[Chicago Tribune, June 11, 1967, editorial]

It has been revealed that Richard Speck, the convicted murderer of eight student nurses, freely admitted the killings to doctors at the Bridewell, where he was taken after he tried to kill himself in a skid row hotel. . . .

. . . statements . . . made by Speck to . . . doctors amount to a confession, but they were not introduced as evidence in his trial. They were read into the court record at a closed door session, and on motion of Speck's lawyer, Public Defender Gerald Getty, were suppressed as evidence by Judge Herbert C. Paschen. The public defender contended that the doctors were acting as an "arm of the law" in questioning Speck. Presumably they did not advise him that he had a right to remain silent, and that he had a right to an attorney. . . .

The principal witness against Speck . . . escaped being killed herself by hiding under a bed. Let us suppose that she, too, had been murdered. The only evidence against Speck at his trial would have been three finger prints, and it is possible that he would have been acquitted.

There is something wrong with a system of criminal justice that bars from the trial record a confession like that made by Speck. His statements . . . were to a member of a panel of six doctors appointed by the court and approved by both the state and defense attorneys. Any rational system of justice . . . would permit the introduction of such evidence at a trial. The Supreme court, in its eagerness to protect the rights of defendants, has forgotten that the main purpose of courts should be to discover the truth.

Before the Escobedo and Miranda decisions the test for the admission of confessions as evidence was "voluntariness." If a trial judge . . . found the confession had been given voluntarily it was received into evidence. As a further precaution the jury was always instructed that it could disregard the confession if the members of the jury found the confession was involuntary.

A bill before Congress seeks to nullify the Escobedo a dnMiranda decisions. . . .

Crimes of violence in this country have been rising about four times as fast as the growth in population. It seems obvious that something must be done to enlighten the Supreme court.

"VERY WRONG"

The U.S. Supreme Court has decided, 6 to 3, that a New York State law permitting court-approved electronic eavesdropping is unconstitutional because it transgresses the Fourth Amendment ban on unreasonable searches and seizures.

This is on unwarranted ruling that takes another vital weapon away from those charged with enforcing our criminal law.

We agree with Justice John Marshall Harlan who concluded in his dissenting opinion that what the court did was "very wrong."

The ruling also may serve to thwart efforts in Congress to produce a law that will protect a citizen's precious right of privacy but at the same time permit law enforcement officers under carefully controlled procedures to use modern means of bringing modern criminals to justice.

The court, by its ruling, Justice White wrote in dissent, "ignores or discounts the need for wiretapping authority and incredibly suggests that there has been no breakdown of Federal law enforcement."

He points out what while the majority opinion, written by retiring Justice Tom Clark, does not in so many words hold all wiretapping and eavesdropping constitutionally impermissible, it achieves the same result by "transparent indirection." Justice White attached as an exhibit the pertinent reports of the President's Crime Commission suggesting Congress enact a law that permits wiretapping with "stringent limitations."

Justice Hugo Black, another dissenter, accused the six-man majority with "being compelled to rewrite completely the Fourth Amendment" in order to strike down the New York law.

Justice Harlan said the decision is another step in the court's trend in recent years to take "to itself sole responsibility for setting the pattern of criminal law enforcement throughout the country."

Congress may be able to circumvent by law these recent court decisions—including this latest—that have hampered law enforcement at a time when crime is rising. It should try.

RHODE ISLAND VERSUS THE SUPREME COURT

The Rhode Island state police have been ordered to disregard the recent "do-gooder" rulings of the Supreme court in their effort to stem a rising tide of crime. In issuing the order, Col. Walter E. Stone, the superintendent, said that "hoodlums have turned the streets into a jungle." The latest incident was a shooting fray Wednesday in Providence.

"I've ordered my men to grab these guys on sight," Col. Stone said, "and frisk them and make sure they're not armed. This situation requires firm, tough policemen . . . We're not going to be guided by do-gooder decisions of the last year or two which have been protecting these guys and putting halos around their heads."

He said he had told his men to "forget Miranda and Escobedo," the two Supreme court decisions which have done most to restrict the actions of police.

The Rhode Island attorney general says he has been assured that the constitutional rights of persons arrested or accused of a crime will be respected. This leaves it a little hazy just where the superintendent's order leaves off and whose interpretation of constitutional rights will prevail.

Col. Stone is obviously taking a risk, but up to a reasonable point it is a risk that needs to be taken. The risk, of course, is that the courts may throw out any charges he brings, thus setting the defendants free again. The reason it needs to be taken is that the existing rulings have hampered police all over the country in gathering evidence. In the opinion of respected police officials such as Chicago's O. W. Wilson, they must bear some responsibility for a disturbing growth in crime.

These rulings will stand until the Supreme court itself reverses, modifies, or "clarifies" them. The only way this is likely to come about is for a police department to do what Col. Stone has ordered his to do, and for the prosecution and the lower courts to risk rejection or reversal themselves by seeing that the matter is once again appealed to the Supreme court.

True, there is little immediate hope that the Supreme court, with its reinforced "liberal" majority, is likely to reverse itself. But having taken the position that its duty is to mold the laws to fit what it regards as today's needs and attitudes, the court will probably not ignore public opinion. If crime and disrespect for the rights of the public continue to mount, the popular clamor for change will soon be deafening.

CRIME IN THE DISTRICT RISES 41.1 PCT. DURING MAY

There were 880 more serious crimes reported in Washington last month than there were in May, 1966, an increase of 41.1 per cent.

Police Chief John B. Layton's regular monthly report showed that only aggravated assaults' decreased among the seven crime index categories listed. The 255 of those reported last month represented a decrease of 18.8 per cent from May of last year.

The 3022 crimes reported last month compared with 2142 recorded in May, 1966.

The biggest increase last month was registered in criminal homicides, with 19 of them reported compared with 7 in May, 1966—an increase of 171.4 per cent.

The next largest increase was in robberies, with 414 reported last month and 220 in May, 1966—an 88.2 per cent increase.

Burglaries were up 53.8 per cent over the May, 1966, figures and auto thefts rose 55.2 per cent. Crime index larcenies were up 20.8 per cent last month over the May, 1966, report.

The total May crimes this year compared with 2673 reported in May 1965, an increase of only 13 per cent. However, a revised classification and reporting system adopted recently makes a statistical comparison of the two figures unrealistic.

These are the comparative figures for May:

Crime	1966	1967	Percent change
Homicide	7	19	+171.4
Rape	14	15	+7.1
Robbery	220	414	+88.2
Assault	324	255	−18.8
Burglary	754	1,160	+53.8
Larceny	389	470	+20.8
Auto theft	444	689	+55.2
Total	2,142	3,022	+41.1

CRIME STATISTICS

Attorney General Ramsey Clark, unable to detect any significant increase in crime, was reported last month as having said: "We do ourselves a great disservice with (crime) statistics." The attorney general has not elaborated on this cryptic comment, nor has he denied making it.

Well, a new batch of crime statistics has come along. The FBI Crime Index, covering the first three months of this year, shows a 20 percent increase in the national crime rate. According to J. Edgar Hoover, this was the sharpest rise recorded since the FBI began publishing its quarterly reports in 1958. For the Nation's Capital, in case anyone is interested, the increase in the rate of serious crime during the three-month period was a shocking 42 percent.

Just how or why we do ourselves a great disservice with crime statistics is far from clear to us. Certainly the public is entitled to know the truth about the country's ever-rising crime rate. Presumably, the attorney general is also interested in getting the facts. So we trust that his curious remark does not foreshadow an attempt on his part to put a stop to the collection and publication of the FBI statistics. It may be possible to suppress the details of the crime story, but that would not help solve the problem or make it go away.

[The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., June 13, 1967]

EAVESDROPPING DECISION

Justice Clark's opinion in the Ralph Berger bugging case is not going to be of much help in drafting legislation to permit the supervised use of wiretaps and electronic devices in "the war on crime." For he seemed in one breath to be saying that the New York law under which Berger was convicted of a bribery conspiracy was unconstitutional because it was "too broad in its sweep." In the next breath, however, he appeared to spell out requirements for a valid law which would be impossible to meet.

If this latter is correct, as some of the dissenting justices contend is the case, then the court, without saying so in as many words, has moved toward banning all eavesdropping by law-enforcement agencies.

Justice Black, who was joined in dissent by Justices Harlan and White, ripped the Clark opinion up one side and down the other.

The majority ruling, he said, despite Berger's "obvious guilt," makes it impossible to try and convict him again. And this despite the fact that the banned evidence shows Berger to be "a briber, a corrupter of trusted public officials, a poisoner of the honest administration of government upon which good people must depend to obtain the blessings of a decent orderly society."

Eavesdroppers, Justic Black went on to say, may be obnoxious. "But they are assuredly not engaged in a more 'ignoble' or 'dirty business' than are bribers, thieves, burglars, robbers, rapists, kidnapers and murderers . . ." Nor, he went on, can it be denied "that to deal with such specimens of our society, eavesdroppers are not merely useful, they are frequently a necessity."

Justice Black noted that some people say the prosecuting authorities should use more scientific measures than eavesdropping and that others talk vaguely of some unspecified new means of apprehending and convicting criminals. But, he added, the fact is "that crimes, unspeakably horrid crimes, are with us in this country, and we cannot afford to dispense with any known method of detecting and correcting them unless it is forbidden by the Constitution or deemed inadvisable by legislative policy—neither of which I believe to be true about eavesdropping."

Needless to say, we are in wholehearted accord with these sentiments, and it surely is of some significance that this expression of them comes from a justice whose dedication to protection of our constitutional liberties is not open to question.

In this situation, we hope Congress will go forward with legislation, as recommended by a majority of the President's own crime commission, to authorize, under careful supervision, the use by the authorities of modern techniques in dealing with crime.

This most recently majority ruling, while it certainly creates problems, does not necessarily raise an insuperable barrier.

For one thing, Justice Stewart said he did not agree that the New York law was unconstitutional, and he indicated that he would have voted to uphold Berger's conviction if the affidavits supporting the request to bug his office had been in better order. For another, Justice Clark, after 18 years on the court, is now stepping aside because of the designation of his son as Attorney General.

Obviously, in this situation, a great deal depends upon the President's choice of a successor to Justice Clark. It is by no means assured, however, that a newly-constituted court would strike down a carefully drafted eavesdropping law. Congress, in any event, can hardly do less than give it a try—unless all of the fine speeches about stamping out crime are devoid of substance.

[Washington Star, July 4, 1967]

BUGGING ADVOCATE

William O. Bittman, who successfully prosecuted Jimmy Hoffa and Bobby Baker for the Department of Justice, is in a position to speak with authority on techniques which are effective in law-enforcement efforts. And now that he has left the department—not because of any policy disagreement, but to take a position with the Hogan and Hartson law firm—he has had some interesting things to say about the use of electronic devices in dealing with crime, especially organized crime.

Bittman is in fundamental disagreement with Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who has said that eavesdropping by the federal government is both ineffective and a waste of manpower. Bittman says there is no question in his mind that "the use of certain electrical devices would be of great help in fighting organized crime in this country if the information obtained could be used as evidence." He also says we are losing the battle against organized crime, "and I don't think we should deny reputable law enforcement any legitimate tool."

This view is consistent with the majority recommendation of the President's own crime commission and with the very strong testimony given that commission by New York District Attorney Frank S. Hogan, who said that electronic surveillance is "the single most valuable weapon in law enforcement's fight against organized crime."

Nevertheless, both the President and his attorney general, for all of the free-wheeling speeches about their determination to wipe out crime, are opposing the effort in Congress to authorize strictly supervised eavesdropping in major criminal cases. Furthermore, a majority of the Supreme Court announced a ruling in the Berger case this month which raises serious doubt that the court would sanction any kind of eavesdropping legislation.

Even so, we hope that Congress will pass the bill. If this country, in its losing battle against the criminal, is to be denied use of the "single most valuable weapon" in the fight against organized crime, let the onus rest squarely on the Supreme Court, the President, and his attorney general.

[The Washington Daily News, Feb. 21, 1967]

THE CASE FOR WIRETAPPING

Among its many thoughtful proposals for attacking crime, the President's Crime Commission strongly favors a law to legalize wiretapping by law officers—under strict supervision.

As it stands, the situation in this field now is "intolerable," the commission report asserts.

Under a series of laws and Supreme Court decisions, wiretap information is not admissible in Feedral courts. But it is used in some state courts, altho technically in violation of Federal law. President Johnson has banned any type of electronic snooping by Federal agents.

But the Crime Commission reported that the knowledgeable witnesses who helped it in its study of crime believe the use of "electronic surveillance" is substantial and increasing.

It is widely used by private eyes and others. And it is being done with no supervision at all.

The commission included in its report a detailed description of the difficulty of cracking organized crime because of the "layers of insulation" between the top criminals and their minions who might be caught. Then it quotes District Attorney Frank A. Hogan of New York who testified he could not have convicted some of the most infamous gangsters without wiretapping or bugging.

Wiretaps, Mr. Hogan said, are "the single most valuable weapon in law enforcement's fight against organized crime."

The great majority of law officers, the commission said, think these devices are "indispensable."

The commission conceded eavesdropping can be an invasion of privacy. So it made a sensible recommendation:

That Congress pass a law specifically dealing with this problem. That all private use of electronic snoops be outlawed—and we would add with severe penalties for violations. But that law enforcement officers be authorized to use these techniques on a "carefully circumscribed" basis—with advance court approval in each instance.

If crime is the enormous problem the Crime Commission describes—and it is—then the law is entitled to use this weapon in the people's defense.

[Johnstown, Pa., Tribune-Democrat, Feb. 27, 1967]

WIRETAPPING A POTENT WEAPON

President Johnson wants to fight crime.

But he wants to short circuit much of the power from a weapon that could reduce crime from the preposterous proportions it enjoys at present at the expense of the American public.

The President has said:

"A new federal law banning wiretapping and electronic bugging and snooping is essential."

The President wants to prohibit electronic detection except where national security is at stake and then only when the attorney general sees fit to grant exceptions.

Quick to reply to the President's proposal was House GOP leader Gerald Ford of Michigan. Questioning Mr. Johnson's request for a ban except in national security situations, Rep. Ford said that electronic listening devices are "an essential tool in law enforcement."

Rep. Ford also said that the privacy of citizens should be protected. However, he warned:

"We must not throw out the baby with the bathwater."

Assuredly, individual privacy cannot be taken lightly. It must be guarded, but there is no sense in being so intent on preserving privacy that lawlessness shall gain even more of a hold in America than it already has. An individual's privacy is not going to be respected by criminals, laws or no laws and a little over-protection by law officials is better than not enough. And electronic detection can bring an additional measure of protection to the public.

Protection from what? Think about crime in the United States.

Organized gambling.
Syndicate-controlled prostitution.
Narcotics.
Loan-sharking.
Corruption of legitimate businesses.
Murder.
Corruption of public-office holders.
Anything that is rotten and profitable in American life.

Taken separately, but especially when taken collectively, are not these crime-created cancers threats to the national security of the United States?

Of course they are.

And they are dangerous as threats from without the country, possibly even more so because they are working within the guts of the nation.

And for their own good, in the long run, the law-abiding citizens of the country likely will decide to risk a little invasion of privacy so that they can be safer than they now are from the ravages of criminals.

There is no doubt that wiretapping and electronic listening devices of all kinds are potent weapons to be used against criminality. Their use, however, must be controlled, for a police state is hardly more acceptable in the American republic than is a criminal state.

Sufficient controls can be placed on electronic detection by requiring that its use be authorized only by courts of law for use only by bona fide law-enforcement agencies.

With such controls, American law enforcement could continue to fight crime without having one of its hands tied behind its back.

[Asheville, N.C., Times, Mar. 11, 1967]

WIRETAPPING HAS A PLACE

President Johnson and Attorney General Ramsey Clark to the contrary notwithstanding, the present hue and cry against wiretapping and "bugging" by electronic devices doesn't disprove the fact that such practices have a legitimate place in law enforcement.

The outcry against electronic devices has a lot of emotional appeal on the "invasion of privacy" issue. But there are still strong reasons for permitting the practice under legal safeguards. Hear, for example, Judge J. Edward Lumbard of New York, chief judge of the U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals. He says, "Wiretapping, under safeguards, is no more an unreasonable search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment than is a search warrant."

This is plain common sense. Enforcement officials are already more than sufficiently under court restraints in seeking to solve crimes. Organized criminal racketeering is especially hard to deal with unless the police have freedom to use electronic devices. In racketeering cases it is frequently necessary to prove conspiracy, and this is extremely difficult to do unless wires can be tapped.

President Johnson and Attorney General Clark want all wiretapping and bugging forbidden except in cases involving the national security. They are wrong, and Judge Lumbard is right when he says that the practice is simply a technical extension of search procedures which have always been granted to the police. Prior securing of a court warrant would be a sufficient safety guarantee.

The current emotionalism should be drained out of the argument and reason substituted. Acres of print and hours of speeches in and out of Congress deplore the rising incidence of crime. It makes the poorest kind of sense to further cripple our beleaguered enforcement officers.

[Visalia, Calif., Times-Delta, Mar. 13, 1967, editorial]

WHY THE HORROR OF POLICE WIRETAPPING?

Our Republic has survivied in freedom for 178 years under a Constitution that permits police to intrude on private property, search through private papers and effects and confiscate evidence under authority of court-issued warrants.

It is a little difficult to understand therefore, the horror that is aroused among some people by the idea of legalized wiretapping or eavesdropping in criminal investigation.

Wiretapping and other forms of electronic eavesdropping are merely extensions of the traditional form of search and seizure of evidence, without which law enforcement would be crippled.

It is strange that the law is being asked to foreswear the use of these technological aids but not others. Logically, they should also be denied the use of high-speed cars and two-way radios.

There have been police abuses even under the Constitution. In recent years, court decisions refining the rules governing the scope of warrants, the admissibility of evidence obtained by means of them and the use of confessions have strengthened the safeguards surrounding the rights of suspected persons. There is no reason why these rules would not be equally applicable to information gained by electronic means.

Nonpolice abuse in this new technology is another matter entirely. Without question, the unauthorized eavesdropping of private conversations should be prohibited by law, just as is the unauthorized physical intrusion into private homes.

This prohibition should cover not only private citizens, nonpolice investigators and "industrial spies," but also agencies like the Internal Revenue Service which has been accused in the past of bugging rooms where taxpayers and their lawyers conferred.

President Johnson, however, wants Congress to pass a total ban on wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping except in cases involving the national security.

A bill introduced by Sen. John McClellan of Arkansas would allow wiretapping (but not bugging) by court order in federal investigations of a limited number of crimes and would also legalize the use in state courts of wiretapping evidence obtained in accordance with state laws.

Testifying before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee holding hearings on the subject, Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the U.S. Court of Appeals recommended that the bill be broadened to include electronic eavesdropping as well as wiretapping and that their use be authorized in the investigation of any federal crime.

"To the great majority of Americans," he said, "it is unthinkable that law enforcement should remain as impotent as it is today."

What it comes down to is this: Either we, the people, trust our police and our courts or we do not. Or if we do not trust them, either we exercise ultimate control over them, through our legislators, or we do not.

But if we have been able to trust them in the matter of physical search and seizure of criminal evidence, it is not clear just what terrible danger is now posed by permitting them a more remote form of this power.

Indeed, the danger may lie in doing the opposite.

[Washington, D.C., Star, Mar. 17, 1967]

NO WIRETAPS WANTED?

Our new Attorney General, Ramsey Clark, appeared on a TV show Sunday and said in confident tones that eavesdropping "is incompatible with what we want in this country." To the extent that he was undertaking to speak for the American people, rather than for himself, we think the Attorney General is just about 100 percent wrong.

Mr. Clark said the Department of Justice has so "tightened" its requirements for approval of wiretaps that a tap can be made only with his written consent, and then only when "there is a direct threat to the security of this nation." As of this time, he added, there are only 38 taps in use. He also indicated that there are no electronic listening devices, or bugs, now in operation.

Presumably, this reflects the sincere personal conviction of Attorney General Clark. Certainly it is consistent with a directive issued by President Johnson more than a year ago. And possibly, although we do not believe it, it arrays both of them on the side of the angels.

It also puts them on the side of the criminal, especially those criminals whose specialty is organized crime—destroying the lives of innocents throught the sale of dope, corrupting public officials through a variety of rackets, and murdering anyone who gets in their way. These characters operate today in a sort of privileged sanctuary and they will continue to operate securely there as long as the innocents recoil in horror from the mere mention of a wiretap. To a somewhat lesser extent, the same thing goes for other criminals—the robbers, the rapists, the burglars and the like. Invade their privacy? Heaven forbid, say Messrs. Johnson and Clark.

Is this really what "we" want in this country? In our view, if the "we" has even a kissing-cousin relationship to the vast majority of our people who suffer from crime, the answer is an emphatic No!

Three days after the Attorney General spoke his piece on Face the Nation (CBS), the most recent FBI crime report became available. It shows that serious crime in 1966 jumped 11 percent over 1965—and 1965 was a bumper year. In our own city of Washington, there was a healthy (if that is the right word) rise in every major category of crime.

The Attorney General notwithstanding, it is our earnest belief that this ever-upward trend in crime is really the thing that is "incompatible with what we want in this country." We think that an overwhelming majority of the people would welcome anything— wiretaps, bugs, fewer irrational court decisions—that might reverse this ominous trend. But it seems more and more evident that if the people are ever to get any relief they must look to Congress for it.

[An editorial broadcast by WMAL/AM/FM/TV, the Evening Star Broadcasting Co., Washington, D.C., July 6, 1967]

Congress, the Commissioners, the courts, the White House itself—better get cracking before there is no Metrouolitan Police Department to guard this crime-wracked city. The disclosure that the police force is short 352 men is another example of why the District crime rate soars every month. Higher salaries and a vigorous recruiting campaign have done nothing to slow the exodus of trained and experienced officers.

Veteran crime expert Malachi Harney recently told Congress in no uncertain terms why police quit. Harney explains that police quit most often because they are not allowed to do their jobs. A cry of "police brutality" goes up if an officer tries to protect himself. Judges put police on the defensive, but release known criminals on technicalities. Government officials refuse to back up policemen—but bend over backwards to sooth dissidents.

It will take a long time and many changes to undo the harm that has been done. But officialdom must begin protecting the rights of society by giving police a reasonable chance to do the job for which they were hired.

Senator McCLELLAN. This will close the hearings on the safe streets and crime control bill and other bills designed to promote more effective law enforcement.

I do not say that irrevocably. Others have wanted to appear, and if we have time to consider them I will do so. But the record will remain open to receive statements from those who may yet want to submit a statement. I do not know how soon we can get to considering the bills with a view to trying to mark them up and report them and make final disposition of them. We are at the stage of a session of Congress when activity increases and becomes more demanding of our time on the floor in legislative matters. This afternoon, and yesterday and the day before, we proceeded with hearings here while measures were being debated on the floor of the Senate. But if we did not do that, we would not get very much done, and so we just have to adjust ourselves and adapt ourselves to situations that are beyond our control and move with such expedition as we can to give consideration to legislation and to reporting it for action by the Senate. And this legislation, all of it, requires study.

I have expressed some pretty strong opinions in the course of these hearings on different issues, and witnesses like those who have appeared here today have expressed their opinions, and there are conflicting opinions, and so we are faced with a task that requires dedication on the part of the committee, and, I would say, tremendous industry and as much wisdom as we can command, to legislate in this field and legislate wisely.

So, the record will stand closed, subject to the conditions that I have expressed.

We reserve the right to insert in the record any additional editorials or statements or material that the committee deems appropriate.

The Chair takes this occasion to express his gratitude to members of the subcommittee, the chief counsel, Mr. Paisley and other members of the professional staff, together with the clerical staff for their industry, vigilance and cooperation in organizing this series of hearings and in making the necessary preparations so that we could move expediously we were fortunate in having before the committee the testimony of competent experienced witnesses in the field of law enforcement, particularly those entertaining conflicting viewpoints on the vital legislative proposals that the committee is considering.

The staff have been very helpful. They have met our expectations and to them goes a great deal of credit for the success we may have achieved in the hearings that are now concluded.

The committee is adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 4:45 p.m., the subcommittee adjourned.)

(Subsequently the following statements and letters were received for inclusion in the record:)

STATEMENT OF ROBERT M. BROWN,[1] AUTHOR OF "THE ELECTRONIC INVASION"[2]

As has been stressed during several hearings conducted by your investigative subcommittee and particularly the testimony of such persons as Frank S. Hogan, New York County District Attorney, as submitted to the Committee on Bill of Rights and Suffrage of the 1967 Constitutional Convention just last month, I concur that all the available facts point to extensive use of telephone and telegraph as a direct instrument of crime and as a means of conducting criminal business by modern underworld racketeers. In some circumstances, interception of such communications by law-enforcement officers is indeed necessary to combat such activities, providing that this privilege be limited to certain major offenses and contain specified safeguards to insure that such operations are in fact justified. Bill S. 675 presently being considered meets these considerations in great detail and affords even further safeguards through its inclusion of a clause requiring annual review of all wiretap court orders by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

On the basis of my experience as a licensed private investigator for two years, my background in the electronics field, and the extensive research that went into the writing of "The Electronic Invasion," I believe that with proper safeguards and court orders, telephonic interception is the single most effective weapon that can be included in the arsenal of law-enforcement, particularly in light of disturbing facts that have recently come to my attention.

[1] Robert M. Brown is editor of CEM—Communications Equipment Marketing, a communications journal serving the two-way radio industry; has served as editor and on the editorial staff of other magazines in the radio field; and has done extensive writing in technical and electronic areas. Following a part-time stint as a licensed private investigator dealing with cases of personal and corporate surveillance in the New York City metropolitan area, Brown authored a study dealing with "Electronic Eavesdropping," in the April 1967 issue of Electronics World. One month later his book "The Electronic Invasion" was released. The book, a detailed account of the little-known world of bugging and wiretapping, has been favorably reviewed by The New York Times, The Chicago Tribune, The Wall Street Journal, and Law and Order.

THE SO-CALLED PRIVATE EYES

In New York, where it is illegal to be in possession of bugging and wiretap equipment, to say nothing of its use, it is interesting to review what happened last December (1966). After an intensive investigation spanning twenty-seven months, the Manhattan District Attorney's office presented evidence to the Grand Jury which resulted in the indictment and arrest of 27 individuals and 3 corporate defendants on charges having to do with unlawful eavesdropping. These persons are presently awaiting trial.

What kind of people were caught in this roundup? For the most part they include private investigators, employees of private detective agencies, electronics "experts," as well as three business executives and two attorneys who are alleged to have employed the services of unlicensed, unlawfully-functioning "private eyes."

In my experiences as a licensed private investigator in the state of New Jersey and New York during the period of nearly two years from 1963 to 1965, I first became acquainted with a sweeping undercurrent of change affecting the investigative field that has now taken full effect throughout the country. At that time, most detective agencies engaging in free-lance "private eye" activities relied upon skilled operatives, many of whom were ex-FBI employees and retired members of Police Detective Bureaus. Being a highly-competitive field, the private investigative company in the New York City metropolitan area has been basically specialized in one "vertical" field or another. Many, for example, are known for their confidential fact-finding for corporations and small businesses, discreetly learning for their client any number of personal or corporate secrets designed to give the client a definite "edge." Other firms specialize in the more sordid areas, such as marital relations, divorce cases, etc. Others will probe into the personal lives of any given person for any given reason, providing the price is right. Operating part-time on a free-lance basis for various private investigation firms, I had an opportunity to see the wide range of activity going on at that time in a number of cases.

Just beginning to be felt in 1963 was the "electronic spy," generally a man who sold his specialized services to anyone desiring it, for a healthy percentage of the take. For the most part, this man was a combination electronics designer and private snooper who either devised his own wiretapping equipment, or knew where it could be had as circumstances warranted. The advent of this self-employed electronic private eye afforded the more industrious New York-New Jersey firms to be able to advertise (primarily in the Yellow Pages) their "space-age devices" and "electronic marvels." When a client responded and specifically requested, for example, that a phone tap be arranged for someone's office line, the investigative company brought in the electronics expert and assigned him to do the work. Normally, he received a flat fee of perhaps anywhere from $50 to $200 per day, depending upon a number of variables, not the least being risk.

Today, however, the picture has changed immeasurably. Companies like Consolidated Acoustics of Hoboken, New Jersey, mailing instructive booklets to would-be electronic wiretappers entitled "Big Money In Listening Devices," and "Investigators Manual," have given vent to a burgeoning business in professional full-time wiretapping and bugging not only in the New York City area, but on a wide national scale. Such materials, presented as training aids, have been responsible for luring many curious young people into the spy community. The brochures even tell how much to charge for various types of services, such as tape recording room conversations, installation of telephone taps, etc., based upon certain daily and weekly rates. An ad appearing, for example, as a full-page advertisement inside the front cover of the May, 1967 issue of Science & Mechanics magazine tells youngsters of the "wonderful fun, or an exciting new career" in electronic surveillance. It goes on to explain how "to get evidence of cases of extortion, adultery, etc. using electronic listening devices."

Needless to say, the advertising campaigns have paid off. Today the electronic wiretapper finds himself in a highly-competitive field, with new one- and two-man operations springing up almost daily in major big-city areas such as New York and Washington. Whereas just a few years ago the bulk of the wiretap spies worked free-lance for legitimate (licensed) detective agencies, today they work as independents, setting their own fees and dealing directly with the client. Needless to say, most do not enjoy legal status and do not advertise their services. Many are retained full-time by the criminal underworld and are "on call" twenty-four hours per day. Others get more "legitimate" business than they can handle simply by word-of-mouth.

Understandably, the new electronic "private-eye" wiretappers have incurred the wrath of the larger, established private detective agencies. For one, the older outfits are losing some business. But more importantly, the entire industry has been given a black name as more and more electronic eavesdroppers enter the scene. To complete the picture, then: Today there are two distinct kinds of private detectives competing for the client's money—the conventional investigative bureau, and the illegal (but frequently effective) wiretapper.

One reason that the electronic eavesdropper is enjoying such success is simply that only seven states (one of which is New York) impose penalties for activities of this sort. I have found that for this reason in New York it is a bit harder to locate the true dyed-in-the-wool electronic wiretapper, but they are there, and prospering. In Connecticut and New Jersey, they operate more openly. In New York we also have a trend towards convincing the client that he should plant the eavesdropping equipment, which gets the supplier off the hook entirely because there are no Federal, state or local laws prohibiting the sale, manufacture, or distribution of such equipment. Regardless of who plants the "bug" or taps the phone, however, attorneys abound who are well versed in such matters. One New York state wiretapper I have met has been arrested 243 times. Thus far, no convictions.

In a conversation with a manufacturer of sophisticated wiretap equipment just last week I learned that the proportion of his business going to "private investigators" has risen "by leaps and bounds in the past year." According to the eavesdrop supplier, "well over 60% of my business comes mainly from the so-called private eye" (meaning independent, unlicensed electronics spy) "although I cannot specify a definite geographic area." When I inquired as to what he meant by this, he replied that although a good percentage of his business comes from walk-in New York City area customers, a significant amount of customers "fly in, from as far off as Florida, Puerto Rico, and California to buy my stuff." It should be added that the criminal underworld constitutes a considerable chunk of his clientele.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Several weeks ago, when visiting another manufacturer and mail-order sales firm dealing solely with electronic wiretap equipment I was told that sales "to the syndicate" have increased three-fold in the last twelve months. At the same time I was shown an official letter from the Defense Ministry of the Government of Lebanon requesting technical information and prices on a variety of eavesdropping devices. The inference was that should the equipment meet the country's requirements, a minimum purchase of $10,000.00 would be made within three weeks. Several other eavesdrop suppliers received similar letters, although the specifications varied and the monetary value fluctuated accordingly.

Although a substantial amount of sales to foreign governments are conducted through the mails, in this particular case it was apparent that delegates from the Defense Ministry would fly to New York with cash to make purchases on the spot at a predetermined date.

ELECTRONIC MAGAZINES: AN UNDERGROUND COMMUNICATIONS LINK

In doing research for "The Electronic Invasion" I was able to draw additionally upon my experiences in the electronics area, coming up with finding (as they appear in the book) which have been termed by many as shocking revelations. However revealing these facts appear, however, they only represent what I personally have been able to determine and document. The actual statistics relating to the extent of involvement of modern wiretapping by criminal elements in our society may never by accurately ascertained.

As a member of the accredited electronics press with a background in the field that goes back over eleven years, however, I have been able thus far to gain a great deal of cooperation among both groups in question: the private investigation community and the designers/manufacturers/installers of wiretap apparatus, based on my primary function as a reporter. This has permitted me access to many laboratories and design firms that would ordinarily shun publicity, in addition to providing facts about sales and clientele which are revealed in the book.

Perhaps it should be mentioned here that my primary experience is as an electronics editor/writer, and has been ever since the hobby of amateur radio first lured me into this field at the age of twelve. Even at that time however, it was common knowledge among us electronics buffs that there were a number of individuals and companies who specialized in the manufacture and sale of sophisticated electronic bugging and wiretap equipment. One of the first rumors you heard, for example, was that there was "pure design genius" operating out of a Liberty Street, New York City, shop who could build any device imaginable to serve any specific purpose and no questions asked. The only stickler was that the price be paid in full with cash. He was Emanual "Manny" Mittleman, father of the infamous "harmonica bug," the device which permits tapping a telephone by remote control up to 3000 miles away.

Being young and enthusiastic about radio communications, it was only natural that I subscribe to some of the leading periodicals in the field. I recall receiving my first copy of one such monthly and reading four separate classified insertions featuring "low-cost electronic surveillance equipment for all applications." This is significant, since even today the majority of advertising for such equipment is found in monthly electronics publications, generally of the kind reaching the general hobbyist and experimenter, who quite often is a youngster.

What makes this all the more fascinating is that the true electronics enthusiast who can build construction projects from schematic diagrams knows full well that most of the equipment sold for wiretap and bugging purposes is a genuine racket from an economic point of view. As stressed in "The Electronic Invasion," for the most part devices sold for $175 to $500 contain less than $10 worth of components. Cooperating advertisers have also revealed to me that their ads in such electronics publications are not drawing response from the average reader, but indeed pay off.

Consider that one of the first things a person interested in wiretapping learns is to pick up the latest issue of one of these consumer electronics magazines. True, he doesn't have a real interest in the editorial content of the publication, but he'll be rewarded many times over when he turns to the classified ad section.

No one seems to know why this secret communications link is in these magazines, but the fact is that it is there and has been for nearly ten years. It is only recently that a few prime advertisers have begun to try ads elsewhere, such as in The New York Times, Signature (the Diners Club magazine), Esquire, etc. That this advertising has been successful only points out the popularization of the entire concept of wiretapping and bugging by the general public; the "underworld" market normally reached through sometimes cryptic electronics classified continues to thrive.

UNDERWORLD WIRETAPPING

There is still much controversy over where the criminals draw the line between hiring outsiders for their "surveillance" work and employing their own technical experts. While it is known that certain eavesdrop personalities such as Manny Mittleman, Sparky Wiggins, and Bernard Spindel have extremely short memories concerning with whom they do their business, there is one school of thought that the larger syndicates have full-time people (such as the electronic private eyes referred to earlier) working exclusively for them.

Just a few weeks ago, for example, police officials raided the $250,000 estate of a prominent underworld figure in Lloyd Harbor, Long Island. The law-enforcement officers were searching for gambling receipts to prove involvement in a numbers racket in New York. While no such receipts were located (it turned out that a syndicate associate had them concealed at another address), the home was found to contain a fortune in sophisticated electronic bugging and wiretap equipment. Based on possession of their gear, the underworld figure was apprehended and indicted.

INDUSTRIAL SNOOPING

While the use of bugging equipment by criminals is definitely on the upswing, so is its use by American business and industry. Technological lead time and trade secrets are an integral part of our competitive system, and a few eavesdrop and wiretap equipment suppliers can afford to lose their key industrial clients. In "The Electronic Invasion" it is documented that one out of five businesses in the United States engage in eavesdropping to some degree.

The book also reveals a list of multi-million dollar corporations who are known to possess bugging/wiretap equipment. A few of these include American Airlines, American Oil Company, Atlantic Air Freight, Avis Rent-A-Car, Chevron Oil Co., Chrysler Corp., Coca Cola Bottling Co., Hertz Rent-A-Car, REA Express, Western Union, and Wright Aero. It doesn't take much imagination to determine just what these companies are doing with their electronic listening devices.

Other facts included in the book as a result of my probes show that industrial espionage has risen 50 per cent in recent years, currently running over $2 billion annually. Since individual instances of companies using such means to "bug" their employees and competitors take up a significant portion of the book, it would not seem appropriate to go into case histories in this statement. The facts clearly show, however, that a great deal more than seventy percent of all devices that could be use for eavesdropping are in the hands of non-law-enforcement organizations or individuals. Included in that work is the story of just one wiretap/bug supplier who began with $100 in 1961 and today grosses over $5 million annually. Any business executive can walk into any one of his eleven stores in this country and walk out with an arsenal of snooping equipment—no questions asked.

SHORT COMMENT ON PUBLIC EAVESDROPPING

As indicated earlier, the general public is becoming a major market for many suppliers as evidenced by sales reports, advertising, and some of the revelations in the book too lengthy to go into here. It is interesting to note that in spite of the recent mass-marketing of such equipment to the public, few persons have ever been prosecuted for either buying or using the devices.

Although the Federal Communications Commission specifically prohibits the use of eavesdropping equipment (Section 15.11, Prohibition Against Eavesdropping, FCC Rules & Regulations), it investigated only "eight reports involving possible violation" of these rules during all of 1966. Commission Chairman Rosel H. Hyde has said of this only that "most violations were apparently made in an effort to obtain evidence for domestic relations proceedings." Persistent attempts at determining why only eight cases were unearthed in a field where virtually thousands of such devices are in daily use were halted by FCC spokesman Ben F. Waple, who told me that such information is considered to be confidential.

It would seem then, that the Commission is hardly concerned over such non-regulatory complaints as invasion of personal privacy, even though right now it is the only Federal body that has the power to enforce the prohibition against such devices by private citizens, corporate interests, or whatever.

INVASION OF PRIVACY

The United States Senate Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary has repeatedly mentioned Justice Brandeis' comment regarding privacy as "the right to be left alone."

This quote has been brought to the forefront in nearly every hearing the group has conducted, in public statements of the Senator from Missouri, and in fact every magazine article and book authored by Senator Long. So closely has this remark of Justice Brandeis been identified with the entire subject of electronic and wiretap surveillance, that it is quite possible to imagine that were the Justice alive he might be appalled to find himself spearheading a movement apparently motivated by a desire to prove the Senator's preconceived notion that wiretapping in any form is all wrong, if not un-American, anti-Motherhood, and downright evil.

The truth is that no one wants other persons poking into his personal affairs and, in fact, everyone does cherish his right to privacy if such a state truly exists. Yet to use this emotional tide to cloud our thinking to the point of quick-slap Federal legislation is against the intelligent and thoughful process we have come to know as the American Way.

While we are all aware of how precious basic rights are to us as citizens of the United States, we must also recognize that no civil right is absolute. This is because that as human beings in a civilized society we have come to expect a wide variety of liberties as well as a wide variance of police protection.

Our Constitution guarantees all citizens certain fundamental freedoms. Yet the total length or depth or scope of these rights cannot be extended nor can they be taken away. What remains, then, is that they be "adjusted" so as to be applicable for the greatest majority of the citizenry. We like to think, additionally, that this majority is basically law-abiding.

If on the one hand we feel a new kind of power, right, or authorization, is needed in certain safeguard-included instances to combat criminal and heinous crime, it stands to reason that somewhere we'll have to grant a privilege to the law-enforcement officers who are attempting to make this country a better (and safer) place in which to live. Yet we're not giving up a right and turning it over to the police; we are simply giving them a weapon with which to fight. If anyone's privacy is going to be invaded by these officers, it will be the criminal's.

In the preceding remarks I have attempted to show that while we may well indeed be living in some kind of a goldfish bowl, it is not Orwellian since it is of our own doing. If anybody is listening to our phone conversations, it is likely to be just about anyone except the police. Most probably, it is your next-door neighbor or your boss.

We have for too long allowed unscrupulous bug merchants and wiretappers to operate with a free hand by not even outlawing the sale, advertising, and shipment of the devices themselves. If we are truly concerned over what Senator Long insists on referring to as present-day lack of privacy, let us at least put things in the proper perspective before we legislate something we'll regret later. Why certain influential sources have been attempting to withhold facts and bias the news can only be interpreted as an effort to shield the guilty.

Under the provisions of the Federal Wire Interception Act introduced by Senator McClellan, wiretapping by law-enforcement officials will only be exercised if a court order can be obtained based upon the judge's decision that in his opinion such interception may provide evidence of one of the following: any offense punishable by death or by imprisonment for over one year under chapter 37, 105, or 115 of the United States Code, certain offenses in violation of the Atomic Energy Act (of 1954), offenses involving marijuana or narcotic drugs, and any offense involving murder, extortion, or kidnapping. While certain other provisions are included that do not bear repeating here, it should certainly be apparent that the McClellan bill is primarily concerned with serious crimes.

No one is suggesting that wiretapping is a substitute for police legwork. It is not. Rather, it is the preliminary to a great deal of it.

New York County District Attorney Frank Hogan's comments in one respect bear repeating, for they clearly show why in some instances such interception is useful:

"When the mobster resorts to the telephone, as he must, he is most cautious, of course, in his conversation. His language is guarded and cryptic. But we have found that from time to time, there are fortunate lapses which, if they don't provide direct evidence of crime, do give us valuable leads. We gain, too, new insights into matters under investigation in the light of information already in hand. We develop, also, a reservoir of useful background material about key underworld figures. That last is what the President's Commission [on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice] had in mind when it stated that 'information regarding the capabilities, intentions, and vulnerabilities of organized crime groups is seriously lacking.' The Commission recognizes, and places great stress upon, the need for what it describes as 'strategic intelligence.'"

Mr. Hogan also indicated that there are certain kinds of crime—extortion, for example in which "the telephone itself becomes the very instrument of the crime."

With proper controls, wiretap equipment can be an effective weapon against serious crime in this country. Like guns, the criminal element will employ the services of professional wiretappers and bug-equipment builders whether or not it is allowed to continue to be sold legally. Yet to prevent the law enforcement community—which I look upon as the only link, or rather "safety margin" between the protection of my family and the scourge of unlawful crime which would run rampant without such a buffer zone—from utilizing wiretapping as a preventative measure is like taking firearms away from the police.

While the scope of eavesdropping (as detailed in "The Electronic Invasion") is frightening to say the very least, intelligent investigation must unearth the fact that any invasion of our personal privacy is being more or less self-inflicted. Cries of Big Brotherism and the ever-popular fixation that the Federal government is probing into every bedroom in the country certainly will be popular with a large proportion of the voting populace. Yet I do not believe the public intellect is presently at a point where it can be insulted and misled very long. For such time as it is possible for private individuals as myself to speak freely, the voter stands a good chance of being able to weigh all sides to an issue. While certain Senatorial attempts to bias the news may work for a while, I will be sorely disappointed if I live to such time as to see it succeed.

Yes, we must impose controls at a Federal level upon the whole of eavesdropping and wiretapping by law-enforcement personnel. But at the same time we must bear in mind that the job is just beginning. If we want to abolish the fear that has been planted in the minds of millions of Americans, we must pursue this thing all the way: outlaw the manufacture, sale and distribution of wiretap and bugging devices. Pursuant to this I should think a Congressional investigation of the extent of electronic eavesdropping by elements of American industry is also long overdue. It should be deemed a violation of the United States Criminal Code for anyone other than duly authorized law-enforcement officers to engage in electronic surveillance and/or wiretapping. Further, it might be revealing to appoint a Wiretap Commission working in conjunction with local, state, and Federal agencies (such as the Federal Communications Commission) whose sole job it would be to regulate legitimate use and prosecute violators. Members of this Commission shall be drawn from various levels of society.

Senator Long has stressed that such practices as wiretapping and other forms of electronic surveillance be limited exclusively to cases affecting the "national security." Even the most avid critics of wiretapping have not suggested that we should abandon its use in such circumstances.

To me, this obvious acquiescence to its employment in cases of national security can only be interpreted to mean that even the Senator from Missouri recognizes that wire interception constitutes a powerful weapon of detection against elaborate, albeit foreign, criminal conspiracies.

If the time ever came when my son's life was threatened by kidnappers, I would hate to think that nothing short of a threat to our "national security" would permit hamstrung police to get there in time.

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES,
Washington, D.C., July 14, 1967.

Mr. W. H. SMITH,
Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SMITH: Following are some comments of the National League of Cities on the Safe Streets Act, which you asked me to send you during our conversation yesterday. The League generally supports the House version of the bill, though we hope that the personnel compensation limitation can be modified.

On the issue of the position of the states in coordination of local applications, we support the provision in the House bill which would allow the governor 60 days to comment on all local plans before they could be acted upon by the Federal government. We believe that this comment process will provide the coordination of plans necessary to meet the comprehensive planning requirements of the Act. Considering the priority consideration which the Attorney General has stated will be given to state action in this area, we think there is little reason to fear that state comments will be disregarded. We have had several discussions with the Department of Justice about this matter, and it is their view that the state comments would show problems of local plans and how these plans are inconsistent with other local plans or with the state plans. This process will allow identification of inconsistencies and permit the Federal, state, and local governments to work out critical differences before the grant applications are approved.

Primary responsibility for the control of crime rests upon local governments. Any alternative to the governor's comment provision which would require state approval of local applications before they are submitted to the Federal government would, we believe, seriously limit the capability of local governments to take full advantage of the Act.

At present, many states have little experience in the problems of local law enforcement, which is where the major emphasis of the Safe Streets Act will lie. A 1966 survey by the International Association of Chiefs of Police reveals that, of a total of only 29,967 state law enforcement officers, 24,715 are assigned to traffic control work. In 14 states, including California, Illinois, and New York, better than 90% of state law enforcement personnel are assigned to traffic duty.

Many states will need to develop experience in local law enforcement before they will be able to develop comprehensive state plans or to judge local plans for approval. Local law enforcement agencies who need Federal aid for improvement programs will face considerable delay if comprehensive state plans or state approval is required in states that do not have significant urban law enforcement experience.

If a formal approval process is required for local plans, authorization from state legislatures will probably be needed to establish and find the state planning and approval agency, whether it is controlled by the governor or directly by the legislature. According to the Book of the States, published by the Council of State Governments, only 21 states hold annual legislative sessions, and, of these, 10 limit their sessions in even years to budgetary matters. Most states hold sessions only in odd numbered years. Thus, in many states, authorization for a formal approval agency would not be possible without a special session until 1969, and any action on state or local grant applications would be delayed until this time. A chart showing the state legislative sessions is enclosed. The less formal comment and coordination process would not require legislative authorization. The governor could appoint existing agencies or special committees to perform the coordinating function as he saw fit.

A definite limit should be set on the time which the states have to comment on local applications. If no limit is set, political differences between some states and their major urban areas might encourage delay in comment on local applications. This delay would cause local law enforcement improvement programs grave difficulties because of the uncertainties in budgeting and staffing which the delay would create.

As noted above, the National League of Cities believes that the provision in the House bill permitting no compensation for personnel from grant funds, except for training or specialized functions, is not realistic for a law enforcement improvement program. Eighty-five to ninety per cent of local law enforcement expenditures are for personnel, and the Crime Commission report has emphasized that personnel changes must be encouraged. The limits on compensation will affect the structure of improvement programs by stimulating grant applicants to think in terms of equipment and other physical improvements in order to maximize aid potential, though expenditures for personnel improvement might provide a greater return. Grants should be allowed for personnel compensation where there are adequate safeguards that the grants will be used to improve present personnel systems.

Enclosed is a copy of the statement which Mr. Allen E. Pritchard, Jr., our Assistant Executive Director, submitted to the Subcommittee on April 20. It discusses in greater depth the National League of Cities' views on the salary limitation and the 5% improvement requirement in the Safe Streets Act. I am available to discuss any of these matters with you in greater detail at your convenience, if you so wish.

Sincerely,

DONALD ALEXANDER,
Legislative Assistant.
