CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

TUESDAY, MARCH 7, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:05 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Ervin, Hart, Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: Wiliam A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Paul L. Woodard, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order. The Chair wishes to make a brief statement. First I wish to welcome to the committee the new members, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, and the senior Senator from South Carolina. These three members of the Judiciary Committee have recently been appointed to this subcommittee, to strengthen it and to enlarge its membership because of the importance of the work that the committee will have to do at this session of the Congress, and in the future.

There have already been, I believe, some 13 bills referred to this subcommittee concerning crime and related problems. It is anticipated that other bills will be introduced and referred to the committee, and therefore there appears to be a rather heavy workload ahead of us at this session of the Congress.

In view of the gravity of the crime problem in this country, of which I think we are all becoming cognizant, we will have to give serious and constant study to the difficulties that confront us in trying to find ways, methods, and the means legislatively speaking to bring about a reduction in crime or at least arrest the rate of increase in order to bring the amount of crime in this country down to tolerable proportions, to where society can be reasonably safe.

This committee has a tremendous task. It is a great burden, I think, upon the Congress of the United States to diligently search for legislative remedies, and that burden, that challenge, is also to the administrative branch of the Government, and in my judgment, to the judicial as well, because there must be a change. The rate of increase in crime cannot continue if our society is to remain safe and secure and our people protected against the ravages of crime.

Today this subcommittee begins a series of hearings to consider important legislative proposals dealing with crime and law enforcement. It is altogether fitting and proper, I believe, that these hearings begin during Law Enforcement Week when we join in offering a well-earned bow to the hard-working police departments of the Nation.

The recurring incidence of violent crimes and the mounting crime rate, of which the American people are now fully cognizant, has been brought into sharp focus in recent months, notably by the reports of the President's District of Columbia Crime Commission and the President's National Crime Commission. The extent to which crime and the fear of crime have narrowed the scope and freedom of activities of law-abiding citizens, and affected their safety and the security of their property, was illustrated by a recent survey conducted by the National Crime Commission in high crime areas of two of our largest cities. As reported by the President in his message on crime in America on February 6, the survey indicated that 43 percent of the people interviewed said they stayed off the streets at night, 35 percent were afraid to speak to strangers, 21 percent used only cabs and cars at night, and 20 percent would like to move to a safer neighborhood. All because of their fear of crime.

The President also cited some astonishing findings of the National Crime Commission which illustrates the pervasive nature of crime in the country. Over 7 million people each year come into contact with some agency of criminal justice. Over 400,000 persons are confined on any given day in corrective institutions, at a cost of $1 billion a year. This despite the fact that most crimes are never reported; it is estimated that from two to 10 times as many crimes are actually committed as are reported.

These facts dramatically underline the critical crime problem in America. As the President so aptly stated, the existence of the public malady of crime is not open to question. Neither is there any doubt that it is our duty to cure it with every means at our command. We have the comprehensive recommendations of the most expert people in the field as to how our vast available resources of knowledge, money, and initiative can best be utilized in a concerted nationwide war against crime.

I am hopeful that concerted efforts and the laws that we enact at this session of the Congress will contribute materially toward reducing crime in our county to tolerable proportions. It is quite probable that these hearings and the bills we will be considering will mark the turning point in the struggle against lawlessness in this Nation. I sincerely hope that will be so.

Three bills that the subcommittee will consider are of particular significance. They are S. 674, which concerns the admissibility in evidence of voluntary confessions; S. 675, which would prohibit wiretapping except on authority of the President to protect the Nation from attack or hostile action by foreign powers, and except in investigations of organized crime, and certain specified heinous crimes, under court order and after a finding of probable cause; and S. 678, which would outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. Another of the bills to be considered is S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, which is the administration bill, a long-range attack upon the crime problem, which would provide planning and program grants to States and local governments to assist them in modernizing their law enforcement agencies and techniques and would focus further research on the causes, prevention, and control of crime.

In addition to the bills I have described, other bills relating to crime and law enforcement have been referred to the subcommittee. I think it would be helpful to have the list of bills, with their titles and sponsors, inserted in the record immediately following my remarks and those of other members of the subcommittee. That will be so ordered without objection.

Although it is not our intention to consider all of these bills in detail at these opening hearings, I included them in the official announcement of the hearings so that any witness who wishes to comment on any of them may do so.

Many witnesses have come here from distant cities and States, and I feel that it is only fair while they were here, to give them the opportunity to make their comment about any bill pending before the committee in which they have an interest, or in which they feel they could make some contribution.

In preparing for hearings on the three bills I first mentioned—S. 674, on confessions; S. 675, on wiretapping; and S. 678, outlawing the Mafia—I directed the staff early this year to send copies of the measures to the prosecuting attorneys of all the large cities and metropolitan areas in the country. The purpose was to acquaint them with these proposals, to seek their views with respect to them, and to solicit their suggestions and recommendations regarding other aspects of law enforcement where legislaiton may be needed. Many of them have responded and some of them will testify at these or later hearings. Statements from others will be inserted in the record.

I should like to point out that the sponsors of these measures are not irrevocably committed to support them in their present form. I shall be glad to support any amendments that may be offered which, in my judgment, improve upon any of the bills. Likewise, if alternative proposals are offered which, in my opinion, have greater merit, I shall support them. This is particularly true in the case of S. 674, relating to the admissibility in evidence of voluntary confessions. As unequivocably convinced as I am that something must be done to alleviate the baleful effects of the Supreme Court's 5-to-4 Miranda decision, I recognize that the problem of how to balance the rights of the individual against those of society is a particularly sensitive one requiring careful study and reflection before remedial legislation can be formulated. As I recently stated on the floor of the Senate, Congress can do one of four things with reference to the problem created by the Miranda and other similar 5-to-4 decisions: It can pass S. 674, or some similar measure; it can limit appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and jurisdiction of other Federal courts under article III of the Constitution; it can submit a proposed constitutional amendment; or it can do nothing. But S. 674, will serve as a basis for a careful study of the problem and for the gathering of information that will enable us to determine what legislation is needed to secure the rights of the individual without unduly hampering the legitimate activities of our law enforcement officials.

The responsibility for the enactment of adequate laws to protect society against crime today presents one of the greatest domestic challenges we have faced in recent years. Congress must act forcefully to meet that challenge. The subcommittee intends to proceed expeditiously to formulate and report legislation in this area, insofar as we can, in the hope that it will receive prompt and favorable action in the Senate and ultimately be enacted into law.

In closing, I should note that the importance attached to the mounting crime problem by the Senate Judiciary Committee is illustrated by the recent expansion in the membership of this subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures to which I have already referred. The subcommittee is pleased to welcome Senators Eastland, Edward Kennedy, and Thurmond. Each has indicated a particular concern for the issues facing the subcommittee and I am sure each of them will make significant contributions to the work we are doing.

Senator Ervin, do you have any statement?

Senator ERVIN. Mr. Chairman, you are to be commended for calling these hearings on legislative proposals to combat crime. I strongly agree with you that the Congress has a pressing duty to respond to the challenge of the crime crisis, and these hearings and the proposals to be considered here offer a fine opportunity for a strong start in discharging this duty.

I shall confine my brief remarks to four of the proposals that I consider to be of particular significance: S. 674, concerning the admissibility in evidence of confessions, S. 675 on wiretapping, S. 916, a bill to consolidate Federal correction functions, and S. 917, the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act.

S. 674, providing for the admissibility of voluntarily given confessions in criminal prosecutions in Federal courts, is directed at the unjustified handicaps placed upon law enforcement officers and trial courts by recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. Two of those decisions, Escobedo v. Illinois and Miranda v. Arizona, both products of a Court split, 5 Justices to 4, have stretched the fifth and sixth amendments far beyond their true meaning and, in effect, have made it virtually impossible to secure the conviction of self-confessed criminals in cases where the prosecution must rely upon their confessions of guilt or incriminating statements. There is no question that these decisions have resulted in the freeing of multitudes of criminals of undoubted guilt and have unduly hampered legitimate law enforcement activities. The situation must be rectified and the duty to do so devolves rightly upon the Congress.

Although I favor the substance of S. 674 and strongly feel it is preferable to the present situation, I do not believe the problem can be rectified by such a simple legislative enactment. It is true that the Miranda opinion invites legislative action on the subject of police interrogation practices. However, the restrictions set forth in that decision and the Escobedo decision are said to be required by the Constitution, and hence any legislative enactment might be deemed by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional to the extent that it failed to embody rules of police conduct at least as restrictive as those in the Miranda and Escobedo decisions.

I have, therefore, expressed the opinion that it will require either some judicial repentance, which I consider to be unlikely, or a constitutional amendment to protect the American people from the consequences of those rulings. For that reason, I introduced some days ago a joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 22, proposing a constitutional amendment providing that confessions shall be admissible in evidence in State and Federal criminal prosecutions if found by the trial court to have been given voluntarily, and restricting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and other Federal courts to reverse or otherwise disturb a ruling by a State or Federal trial court admitting a confession in evidence as voluntary if the ruling is supported by competent evidence.

However, since introducing the proposed constitutional amendment I have come to the conclusion that Congress has a more direct route by which it can rectify the problem. It is provided in article III, section 2 of the Constitution that the Supreme Court "shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make." It seems clear that under article III of the Constitution, Congress has the constitutional power to define the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and to define the jurisdiction of all inferior courts created by it under this article of the Constitution. I am, therefore, introducing today a bill which would remove the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and inferior Federal appellate courts to reverse or otherwise disturb a ruling by a Federal trial court admitting a confession as voluntarily made if such ruling is supported by any competent evidence. The bill would also similarly limit the jurisdiction of Federal courts to review, reverse or otherwise disturb a ruling by a State trial court that a confession is voluntary and admissible if such ruling has been upheld by the highest appellate court of that State.

It is my understanding that some of the witnesses have been given copies of my proposed constitutional amendment and the bill I have just described. Thus, although neither is officially before this subcommittee, I hope we will have the benefit of the testimony of these witnesses as to which of the three avenues open to the Congress would be the most advisable method of dealing with the problems raised by the Escobedo and Miranda decisions. I shall look forward particularly to the testimony on this point.

The second bill in which I have a particular interest is S. 675, on the subject of wiretapping. The bill would prohibit all wiretapping except pursuant to Prsidential order for national security purposes and except where authorized by court order, under strict procedural safeguards, for the purpose of the investigation or prosecution of certain crimes. I fully agree that legislation to define the legal limits of wiretapping is urgently needed. However, I am not convinced of the advisability of allowing an exception to the wiretapping ban in investigations and prosecutions of organized crime. For this reason, I recently joined in sponsoring S. 928, the administration's proposed Right to Privacy Act of 1967, which would ban all wiretapping and eavesdropping except for national security purposes. I am aware, however, of the insidious menace of organized crime in America and of the urgent need to bring all legitimate law enforcement resources to bear against this national enemy. Any legislation on this subject will necessarily have to strike an extremely delicate balance between the rights of the individual to personal privacy and the requirements of public security. I shall therefore listen with great interest to the testimony on the subject of the need for wiretapping authority for law enforcement purposes in the area of organized crime. Should such authority prove necessary, I shall certainly hope that it will be strictly limited and surrounded with every conceivable procedural safeguard to protect against abuse.

The third bill of particular interest to me is S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, proposed by the President to implement some of the recommendations of the National Crime Commission. The bill would provide for grants to State and local governments to assist them in improving the techniques, education, and facilities of their law enforcement personnel. Although there would be no Federal effort to interfere unduly with State and local law enforcement efforts, the grant program could be used effectively to encourage and assist improvement and modernization throughout the entire national system of law enforcement and criminal justice. This is a highly laudable goal and deserves the full support of the Congress. As the report of the President's National Crime Commission points out, the many specific needs of the criminal justice system are interlocking. The need for manpower, for better equipment, for more modern facilities and techniques, for programs, for research—each of these needs is dependent upon the other. The proposed Safe Streets Act would provide the means for injecting Federal assistance into the criminal justice system in such a way as to do the most possible overall good, having in mind the specific needs and priorities of the States, cities, and regions affected.

Finally, I would like to refer briefly to S. 916 which would consolidate all Federal corrections functions in a unified U.S. Corrections Service under the supervision of the Attorney General. A similar proposal before the 89th Congress, S. 3065, incurred the opposition of the Judicial Conference of the United States and of many individual Federal judges and probation officials. The opposition was based on general misgivings about the advisability or feasibility of establishing a unified correctional service and on particular objections to transferring the Probation Service from the courts to the Justice Department. S. 916 purports to meet those objections by continuing the probation service as a part of the court system with the responsibility for preparing presentence reports for the use of district judges. Supervision of probationers and parolees would be transferred from the Probation Service to the Justice Department.

Although the Judicial Conference has not yet taken an official position on the bill, indications are that the Federal judiciary and probation officials consider S. 916 to be fully as objectionable as S. 3065. Clearly, the bill raises many serious questions which I hope will be resolved by the testimony of the Attorney General and other witnesses testifying on the bill.

I have a statement that I intend to make on the floor of the Senate today in introducing the bill, limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; and I also have a copy of the bill. I would like to put them in the record, Mr. Chairman, with the request that the committee consider this bill along with the other bills mentioned by you, because in the next day or so I am sure this bill will be referred to the subcommittee.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let the statement of the Senator be printed in the record at this point, and let the bill, to which he refers, be printed in the record with the other bills to which I have referred this morning.

PROPOSED BILL RELATING TO THE ADMISSION OF VOLUNTARY CONFESSIONS OF GUILT IN CRIMINAL TRIALS

Senator ERVIN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Mr. Jordan of North Carolina, Mr. Thurmond, Mr. Fannin, Mr. Hickenlooper, Mr. Talmadge, Mr. Hollings, Mr. Byrd of Virginia, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Hansen, Mr. Long of Louisiana, Mr. Eastland, Mr. McClellan, Mr. Stennis, Mr. Byrd of West Virginia, Mr. Hill, Mr. Hayden and Mr. Ellender, and Mr. Dodd, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would have the effect of re-establishing the very sensible and sound rule that the voluntary confession of an accused in a criminal case shall be admissible in evidence against him on his trial.

Some days ago I introduced a constitutional amendment, S. J. Res. 22, to rectify the recent Supreme Court decisions in the Escobedo and Miranda Cases. These two decisions stretch the words of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments far beyond their true meaning and virtually make it impossible to secure the conviction of self-confessed criminals in cases where the prosecution has to rely upon their voluntary confessions of guilt. Since introducing the constitutional amendment I have come to the conclusion that Congress has a more direct route by which it can afford protection to the law-abiding citizens against the consequences of these two decisions.

It is to be remembered that these two decisions, Miranda and Escobedo, were decisions in which four of the nine Justices filed vigorous dissents. Justice Harlan appraised the majority decision in the Miranda Case aright when he declared in his dissenting opinion that "the decision of the court represents poor constitutional law and entails harmful consequences for the country at large."

It is provided in Article III Section 2 of the Constitution that the Supreme Court "shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make." It seems clear that under Article III of the Constitution, Congress has the constitutional power to define the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and to define the jurisdiction of all inferior courts created by it under this article of the Constitution.

For this reason, I have decided to take a direct approach rather than to rely solely upon the constitutional amendment route. My bill would curtail the jurisdiction of the federal court in cases involving the admission of voluntary confessions, and I can see no other practical way by which we an afford protection to the law-abiding citizens against the present tendency of five of the nine Justices to render decisions which free self-confessed criminals from the consequences of their acts.

I think my bill protects the rights of the accused as far as they ought to be protected. Under Section 1 involving confessions in the Federal Court, the accused has at least two days in court, one in the Federal District Court and the other in either the United States Court of Appeals or the Supreme Court. Of course, this section puts a necessary limit on the power of the Court of Appeals of the Supreme Court to review the case by stating that they cannot review the ruling admitting a confession if the trial court finds it to have been voluntarily made. Surely, the trial judge who sees the witnesses and can observe their demeanor upon the stand has a far better opportunity to reach a correct decision than the ivory-towered judges who read a cold printed record.

The second section of my bill allows the accused at least two days in court, one in the trial court and the other in the highest appellate court of the State having jurisdiction to review the case. It provides, in effect, that the decision of the highest court of the State affirming the ruling of the state trial court admitting a confession as voluntary cannot be reviewed by either the Supreme Court or any other Federal Court. This will put an end to the endless number of habeas corpus writs by Federal District Courts in cases where the Supreme Court of the State has affirmed the ruling of the state trial court admitting confessions in evidence in criminal cases.

The reason which prompted my introduction of this bill, the rising crime rate and the unrealistic rules which the Supreme Court has placed on our police, are the same as those which prompted my introduction of S. J. Res. 22 dealing with the Miranda case. When I introduced this amendment I made several statements which detailed my objections to the Miranda case and gave my reason for the urgent need to rectify this decision. These statements are found on Pages S635–S639 of the Congressional Record for January 23, 1967.

Already, the effects of the Miranda case are being felt around the country. Reports from many district attorneys from all over our nation indicate that the percentage of criminal suspects who now refuse to make confessions or statements is greater than before the Miranda case.

Recently, in New York a man who admitted killing his wife and five children was set free because the New York Court could not use his confession because of the Miranda decision. I would like to associate myself with New York District Attorney Aaron A. Koota's comments on this case. He said:

"The United States Supreme Court has weighted the scales of justice heavily in favor of the criminal suspect. I am not a prophet, but the handwriting on the wall indicates a trend on the part of the court to outlaw all confessions made to police. If and when that melancholy day comes, the death knell of effective criminal law enforcement will have been sounded."

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to repeat my final remarks when I introduced S. J. Res. 22: I urgently appeal to you to join me in supporting this bill. Our thousands of dedicated and honorable law enforcement officers deserve this vote of confidence; and the people of America, sick and tired of criminals going unpunished and crime increasing, demand it.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my proposed bill and a news story from the New York Times of February 21, 1967, be printed at this point in the record.

CONFESSED SLAYER OF WIFE AND FIVE CHILDREN FREED—JUDGE IN BROOKLYN CONFORMS RELUCTANTLY WITH HIGH COURT PROTECTION OF DEFENDANTS

(By F. David Anderson)

A man who admitted slaying his wife and five small children walked out of a Brooklyn courtroom yesterday, free, because the only available evidence against him was his own confession.

The defendant, Jose Suarez, 22 years, a factory worker, was arrested on April 27, 1966. Questioned by the police, he signed a statement, acknowledging having killed his common-law wife, Maria Torres, 24; their children, Yvette, 4; Nancy, 3; and Jose 11 months, and also Harry Santiago, 5, and Maria Antonio, 2.

Suarez said in the confession that after his wife had cut his leg with a knife during an argument, he seized the weapon and stabbed her and the children more than 100 times. That was on April 23 in their home at 301 Hooper Street.

THREE KEY RIGHTS AT ISSUE

On June 13 the United States Supreme Court ruled in the landmark Miranda case that a defendant in custody must be informed of his rights. These include the right to remain silent if he wishes to, the right to consult a lawyer and the right to a warning that anything he says may be used against him at trial.

Suarez was advised on none of these points, since New York State law at the time did not require it. However, the Miranda decision applied to him, inasmuch as it was made retroactive to cover all defendants who had not yet been tried.

Last month, three men were freed in murder trials here by State Supreme Court justices after rulings that they had not been informed of their right to counsel before they confessed.

On Jan. 20 Charles Wright of 554 West 150th Street won dismissal of homicide charges, but he was sentenced to 30 to 40 years in prison on a plea of guilty to first-degree rape.

Ten days later, Marvin Fitzgerald of 620 Lexington Avenue and Billy Bunche, no known address, were released in a similar case. Bunche was freed, but Fitzgerald was held on a charge of violating probation.

SEVEN-MONTH SEARCH IN VAIN

For seven months the office of District Attorney Aaron A. Koota and the police sought, without success, to obtain evidence other than the confession against Suarez. A grand jury finally indicted him on Nov. 4. One week later, with a lawyer, Suarez retracted the confession and pleaded not guilty.

"I daresay that if his questioning had conformed with the requirements of Miranda, this defendant would be in Sing Sing prison serving several life sentences," Assistant District Attorney Nathan R. Schor told the court yesterday. "I am now constrained to ask for dismissal of the indictment."

Suarez stood at the defense table, his head bowed. At no time did he speak or even look up. Frank Ortiz, his lawyer, was beside him.

State Supreme Court Justice Michael Kern then spoke.

"Unfortunately the general public doesn't understand the law. Even an animal such as this one, and I believe this is insulting the animal kingdom, must be protected with all the legal safeguards.

"This is a very sad thing. It is so repulsive it makes one's blood run cold and any decent human being's stomach turn to let a thing like this out on the street."

Leaning forward, Justice Kern addressed the prosecutor. "Are you sure, I ask you most seriously, whether his [confession] is all you have in this case?"

Mr. Schor replied: "I say reluctantly, with a heavy heart, that we simply have no alternative. There is no other evidence."

Suarez was led away in handcuffs for routine processing before his release. An hour later he was a free man.

Mr. Ortiz spoke briefly outside the court. "He's absolutely not going to stay here," he said of his client. "Someone might kill him. His father is coming from Puerto Rico to take him home. This is terrible, I agree, but what can you do under the circumstances?"

Last night Mr. Koota issued the following statement:

"The United States Supreme Court has weighted the scales of justice heavily in favor of the criminal suspect. I am not a prophet, but the handwriting on the wall indicates a trend on the part of the court to outlaw all confessions made to police. If and when that melancholy day comes, the death knell of effective criminal law enforcement will have been sounded."

Senator McCLELLAN. I am assuming, Senator, this bill will be referred to this subcommittee. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, I want to add my welcome to that which you expressed to the three newly assigned members of this subcommittee, and also to the newly confirmed Attorney General, who will testify shortly before this Judiciary Committee for the first time since his confirmation.

Senator McClellan has detailed the painful and hard facts, the burgeoning crime menace in this country, and I shall not repeat those figures. We know that crime is a truly national problem.

We have some 14 or 15 bills before us. Five of them were introduced as a package by the chairman of this subcommittee, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I would be especially eager to go ahead with the bill in which you treat with the Miranda decision. The Supreme Court itself had said in the course of their opinion that:

> We encourage Congress and the States to continue their laudable search for increasingly effective ways of protecting the rights of the individual while promoting efficient enforcement of our criminal laws.

In view of the experience we have had under the Escobedo and Miranda cases, I do believe that your bill, S. 674, is a considered and effective response to this cause.

The wiretapping bill ought to get very serious and vigorous action on our part. Last year Attorney General Katzenbach said, among other things, about the present state of the law:

> The present law gives us the worst of all possible solutions. The time has long since passed for Congress to take action to curtail continuing abuses in this field.

The safe-streets measure, S. 917, would establish a major Federal program of financial assistance to the States to build up their law enforcement and criminal justice system. It is my understanding that if this bill will be enacted in the general fashion and style in which it was introduced, that it will replace the act of 1965 known as the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

Mr. Chairman, there are other bills, of course, which will have to be and will be accorded very serious and thorough consideration by the subcommittee, and I want to pledge to the chairman every assistance I can render in this effort, and at the same time I wish to congratulate and commend him for launching this very fine effort.

REMARKS OF SENATOR ROMAN L. HRUSKA

Mr. Chairman, at the outset, I wish to extend a sincere welcome not only to the three new members of this subcommittee, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. Eastland), the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Thurmond), the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Kennedy); but also to our good friend and newly confirmed Attorney General, Mr. Ramsey Clark.

I feel certain that these new members will make substantial and constructive contributions to the work which is ahead of us. Based on his past record and his demonstrated ability, I know that we will receive the full cooperation of the new Attorney General.

This subcommittee, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McClellan), is engaged in a most serious effort. We are attempting to bring the available resources and talents to bear on the critical problems of crime. In this effort there is no room for partisan politics. In the deliberations of the subcommittee since its inception more than a year ago, we have worked together without partisan bickering. I feel confident that we will continue to do so in the future.

It is particularly fitting that we begin the current series of hearings during National Law Enforcement Week. In my view, there could be no better tribute to the hundreds of thousands of selfless men and women who make up our law enforcement community than to translate our deliberations here into workable and effective laws.

Senator McClellan has detailed the painful and hard facts of the burgeoning crime menace in this country. They are well known to everyone in this room. I shall not repeat them. I can only say that they serve to remind us of the urgency of our tasks.

We are here today to do something about crime.

We know that crime is a truly national problem. Three Presidential Messages in the past three years attest to this fact. The studies and findings of two Presidential Commissions have detailed its scope and given us insight into the nature of the multitude of problems we face.

The first order of business before the subcommittee is to gather the evidence and take action on several pending measures of top priority. Chairman McClellan has introduced a package of five bills which must necessarily command our immediate attention. Two of these, S. 676 and S. 677, are identical to bills which passed the Senate last year, but were not acted upon by the House. They have to do with the obstruction of federal criminal investigations and the extension of witness immunity provisions to four more federal criminal statutes. They are in the process of being reported from the subcommittee.

The three other bills will receive prime attention at these hearings.

The first, S. 674, would make a major step in removing the crisis of confusion which now surrounds the central issue of admissibility in evidence of confessions.

S. 675 would prohibit wiretapping except in national security and specified criminal cases.

The third bill, S. 678, would outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime machines.

Also under consideration will be S. 917, the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control act of 1967. The bill would direct federal financial resources to assist states and local governments in streamlining law enforcement and criminal justice systems to respond more effectively to the crime menace. It would also establish a broad based federal research program.

Several other pending bills are also under consideration and will receive serious attention.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly eager that we move ahead with your bill to provide for the admissibility of certain confessions in the federal system. The Supreme Court in its controversial Miranda Decision invited legislative action when it stated:

"We encourage Congress and the States to continue their laudable search for increasingly effective ways of protecting the rights of the individual while promoting efficient enforcement of our criminal laws."

In my view the bill before us, S. 674, is a considered and an effective response to this call. It is a common sense approach. It rests the question of admissibility on the test of voluntariness and leaves to those most able to ascertain the true facts—the trial judge and the jury—whether constitutional safeguards have been met in the circumstances surrounding the obtaining of the confession. While the bill before us applies only to the federal system, I feel confident it will withstand any challenge to its constitutionality and will provide a model for similar action at the state level.

Your wiretapping bill, S. 675, gets at the difficult problem of wiretapping. I have co-sponsored it and generally support it. However I feel the ban contained in this bill should also apply to eavesdropping. I now feel it should be prohibited generally with well defined exceptions with adequate and effective controls on its authorization and use at state and local levels.

The need for federal legislation in the wiretapping area is clear. Last year, in testimony before this subcommittee, Attorney General Katzenbach described the present situation most accurately when he said:

"I agree with my predecessor that the present law regarding wiretapping is intolerable. In fact, I would go so far as to state that it would be difficult to devise a law more totally unsatisfactory in its consequences than that which has evolved from section 605 (of the Federal Communications act of 1934).

". . . The present law gives us the worst of all possible solutions. The time has long since passed for Congress to take action to curtail continuing abuses in this field."

Highly publicized events occurring since that time have reinforced Mr. Katzenbach's view.

The safe streets measure would establish a major federal program of financial assistance to the states to build up their law enforcement and criminal justice systems. It is based on the experience in the administration of the Law Enforcement Assistance act of 1965 and on the findings of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice. If enacted in suitable substance and form, it would replace the Act of 1965 referred to. Although I am in general sympathy with the bill and have co-sponsored it, I feel it can be strengthened and improved in several respects.

Mr. Chairman, the hearings which we begin this week, in my opinion, should be the first of several this year directed at major crime problems. Particular emphasis should be placed on the threat of organized crime. We should examine the nature and extent of crimes of violence and crimes against property, not only as to their nature but to ascertain what role, if any, the federal government can properly play in combating them.

For example, bank robberies and burglaries often are successful because of inadequate security and protective systems. Many times the federal government must stand the loss through its various insurance programs. My information is that with no standards or requirements to adhere to, there is often a wide discrepancy as to effort taken to prevent, deter or detect criminal assaults on banking institutions. Perhaps there is a need for federal action in this area. In any event, it is a question which is worthy of serious study.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate you on outstanding work. I will do what I can to assist in your efforts.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Hart.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, I have no statement. I think the opening sentence in the Miranda opinion underscores the responsibility that this committee faces.

Chief Justice Warren in opening that opinion said:

> The cases before us raise questions which go to the roots of our concepts of American criminal jurisprudence, the restraints society must observe consistent with the Federal Constitution in the prosecuting of individuals for crime.

Whatever the statistics show today, whatever alarms the editorial writer's voice, we ought not be confused to think that this is unique in our experience as a society. People seeking to organize themselves have always been confronted with the problems that are raised currently by these opinions. The extraordinary difficulty is of balancing freedom and security, and I am not sure where I will wind up, but I sense I will not end up on Senator Ervin's bill.

Senator ERVIN. I might state that my bill is quite in harmony with the opinion of four of the Justices, because Justice Harlan said in the dissent something as strong as I say it. He said that the Miranda case is poor constitutional law, and no truer statement has ever been made.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am sure we will hear a lot of testimony concerning this. Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. I would just like to make a brief comment, Mr. Chairman. First of all, to express my appreciation to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and to the chairman of this subcommittee for the appointment to this subcommittee, and each of us in the Congress, mindful of the observations made by the distinguished chairman of this subcommittee, are deeply interested and concerned about the problems of crime that exist in our country.

I think that the President's message to the Congress outlined quite dramatically the course of action for the Congress in this session of the Congress. I think that this message was supplemented by, extraordinarily, the President's Crime Commission, which examined in crucial detail the problems of crime, and I think made an extraordinary contribution.

I think in that outline that was presented by the President's Commission, there are some areas of great priority, where we as a subcommittee and I believe as a full committee and the Congress can act expeditiously without prolonged action and prolonged deliberation. Obviously there are some additional areas where they will have to be given very careful consideration, and I would look forward, as I know the members of the committee will, to the testimony that will come before this subcommittee.

I might say that on a different occasion, Mr. Chairman, I have had an opportunity to propose my thoughts on crime and also to introduce three bills which I consider, although alone, far from sufficient for an effective national program of crime control, at least to be useful and helpful, S. 992, the bill to establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice, S. 993, a bill to authorize grants for the establishment of regional academies of criminal justice, and S. 991, a bill to provide assistance to localities for installation of street lighting to combat crime.

Only S. 992 as I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the National Institute of Criminal Justice, would come before this committee in a later session of these hearings. I shall request that witnesses appear to testify on this proposal. I appreciate the chance to join with the chairman of this subcommittee and other members of the committee who are interested and concerned about the cause of crime, have been for many, many years, and I look forward to service on this committee.

Senator McClellan. Senator, thank you very much. I don't believe S. 992 has yet been referred to the subcommittee. In all probability it will be. As I stated earlier, we anticipate other measures will be introduced and a number of them no doubt will be referred to the subcommittee.

Senator Thurmond.

Senator Thurmond. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to express my appreciation to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Eastland, and the chairman of this subcommittee, Senator McClellan, for assigning me to this important subcommittee. I feel that the work of this subcommittee will be as important as possibly any subcommittee of the Congress this year.

In my judgment, the No. 1 problem from a domestic standpoint in this country is big spending and the crime problem, and if we can assist in solving this crime problem, then I feel that this subcommittee will have rendered a very important service.

Last year, when this matter of voluntary confessions came up, Senator Ervin introduced a bill in which I joined him, and again this year I am joining him. I stated then that I did not know of any piece of legislation which would do more to curb crime than to pass legislation of this nature.

I am convinced that voluntary confessions must be admitted. They must be admitted, whether there is a lawyer present or not. They must be admitted, if a man has been held several hours or maybe a little longer than usual, so long as the confessions are voluntary, so long as they constitute the truth.

I have frequently heard it said that more men are convicted out of their own mouths than are convicted out of the mouths of other people, and that has been my experience in practicing law. That when an officer chases a man and he makes a confession, it ought to be admitted if it is the truth, and the trial judge and the jury can judge the demeanor of the witnesses. They observe them at the trial, and they are in a position to determine whether or not such confessions should be admitted. So I am very interested in this bill that Senator Ervin has introduced, of which I am a cosponsor, to reduce the appellate power of the Supreme Court in this respect.

I think today we have got to remember too, in this day when we think of individual rights, and no one is stronger for individual rights than I am, we have got to realize that society's rights are paramount to the individual rights.

It seems to me that some of the courts today are willing to turn loose many criminals for fear they might convict someone who is innocent. No one wants an innocent man convicted. But today society is suffering.

No country has ever incurred as much crime as America is enduring today. In no country has there been as many serious crimes committed, murders, robberies, rapes, arson and other crimes of a very serious nature as America is enduring today, and I feel that this subcommittee can play a major role in helping to curb crime in America today, one of the major problems.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

S. 300, to amend section 401 of title 18 of the United States Code, dealing with the power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempts of its authority. (Senator Thurmond.)

S. 552, to amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense. (Senator Burdick.)

S. 580, to amend chapter 18, United States Code, to prohibit the importation into the United States of certain noxious aquatic plants. (Senator Holland.)

S. 674, to amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions. (Senator McClellan for himself and Senators Byrd of West Virginia, Ervin, Hollings and Hruska.)

S. 675, to prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses, and other purposes. (Senator McClellan for himself and Senator Hruska.)

S. 678, to outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. (Senator McClellan.)

S. 798, to provide compensation to survivors of local law enforcement officers killed while apprehending persons for committing Federal crimes. (Senator McClellan, for himself and Senator Scott.)

S. 824, to provide assistance for the improvement of State and local law enforcement agencies through acquisition of equipment of those agencies and provision of educational opportunities to their personnel, and for other purposes. (Senator Tydings, for himself and Senators Burdick, Inouye, Kennedy of New York, Long of Missouri, Magnuson, Metcalf, Mondale, Montoya, Moss, Pell, Randolph, Smathers, and Yarborough.)

S. 916, to assist in combating crime by creating the U.S. Correction Service, and for other purposes. Senator McClellan, by request.)

S. 917, to assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes. (Senator McClellan, by request, for himself and Senators Byrd of West Virginia, Ervin, Harris, Hart, Hruska, Javits, Mundt, Scott, Tydings, and Yarborough.)

Senator McCLELLAN. In order that our record of these hearings may be more complete, without objection I direct that the following Supreme Court decisions be printed in their entirety:

Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964).

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436.

ESCOBEDO v. ILLINOIS (378 U.S. 478 (1964))

CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS

(No. 615. Argued April 29, 1964.—Decided June 22, 1964)

Petitioner, a 22-year-old of Mexican extraction, was arrested with his sister and taken to police headquarters for interrogation in connection with the fatal shooting, about 11 days before, of his brother-in-law. He had been arrested shortly after the shooting, but had made no statement, and was released after his lawyer obtained a writ of habeas corpus from a state court. Petitioner made several requests to see his lawyer, who, though present in the building, and despite persistent efforts, was refused access to his client. Petitioner was not advised by the police of his right to remain silent and, after persistent questioning by the police, made a damaging statement to an Assistant State's Attorney which was admitted at the trial. Convicted of murder, he appealed to the State Supreme Court, which affrmed the conviction. Held: Under the circumstances of this case, where a police investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect in police custody who has been refused an opportunity to consult with his counsel and who has not been warned of his constitutional right to keep silent, the accused has been denied the assistance of counsel in violation of the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments; and no statement extracted by the police during the interrogation may be used against him at a trial. Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, and Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, distinguished, and to the extent that they may be inconsistent with the instant case, they are not controlling. Pp. 479–492

28 Ill. 2d 41, 190 N.E. 2d 825, reversed and remanded.

Barry L. Kroll argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the brief was Donald M. Haskell.

James R. Thompson argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Daniel P. Ward and Elmer C. Kissane.

Bernard Weisberg argued the cause for the American Civil Liberties Union, as amicus curiae, urging reversal. With him on the brief was Walter T. Fisher.

OPINION OF THE COURT

MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG delivered the opinion of the Court.

The critical question in this case is whether, under the circumstances, the refusal by the police to honor petitioner's request to consult with his lawyer during the course of an interrogation constitutes a denial of "the Assistance of Counsel" in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution as "made obligatory upon the States by the Fourteenth Amendment," Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S. 335, 342, and thereby renders inadmissible in a state criminal trial any incriminating statement elicited by the police during the interrogation.

On the night of January 19, 1960, petitioner's brother-in-law was fatally shot. In the early hours of the next morning, at 2:30 a.m., petitioner was arrested without a warrant and interrogated. Petitioner made no statement to the police and was released at 5 that afternoon pursuant to a state court writ of habeas corpus obtained by Mr. Warren Wolfson, a lawyer who had been retained by petitioner.

On January 30, Benedict DiGerlando, who was then in police custody and who was later indicted for the murder along with petitioner, told the police that petitioner had fired the fatal shots. Between 8 and 9 that evening, petitioner and his sister, the widow of the deceased, were arrested and taken to police headquarters. En route to the police station, the police "had handcuffed the defendant behind his back," and "one of the arresting officers told defendant that DiGerlando had named him as the one who shot" the deceased. Petitioner testified, without contradiction, that the "detectives said they had us pretty well, up pretty tight, and we might as well admit to this crime," and that he replied, "I am sorry but I would like to have advice from my lawyer." A police officer testified that although petitioner was not formally charged "he was in custody" and "couldn't walk out the door."

Shortly after petitioner reached police headquarters, his retained lawyer arrived. The lawyer described the ensuing events in the following terms:

> "On that day I received a phone call [from "the mother of another defendant"] and pursuant to that phone call I went to the Detective Bureau at 11th and State. The first person I talked to was the Sergeant on duty at the Bureau Desk, Sergeant Pidgeon. I asked Sergeant Pidgeon for permission to speak to my client, Danny Escobedo. . . . Sergeant Pidgeon made a call to the Bureau lockup and informed me that the boy had been taken from the lockup to the Homicide Bureau. This was between 9:30 and 10:00 in the evening. Before I went anywhere, he called the Homicide Bureau and told them there was an attorney waiting to see Escobedo. He told me I could not see him. Then I went upstairs to the Homicide Bureau. There were several Homicide Detectives around and I talked to them. I identified myself as Escobedo's attorney and asked permission to see him. They said I could not. . . . The police officer told me to see Chief Flynn who was > on duty. I identified myself to Chief Flynn and asked permission to see my client. He said I could not. . . . I think it was approximately 11:00 o'clock. He said I couldn't see him because they hadn't completed questioning. . . . [F]or a second or two I spotted him in an office in the Homicide Bureau. The door was open and I could see through the office. . . . I waved to him and he waved back and then the door was closed, by one of the officers at Homicide.[1] There were four of five officers milling around the Homicide Detail that night. As to whether I talked to Captain Flynn any later that day, I waited around for another hour or two and went back again and renewed my [sic] request to see my client. He again told me I could not. . . . I filed an official complaint with Commisioner Phelan of the Chicago Police Department. I had a conversation with every police officer I could find. I was told at Homicide that I couldn't see him and I would have to get a writ of habeas corpus. I left the Homicide Bureau and from the Detective Bureau at 11th and State at approximately 1:00 A.M. [Sunday morning] I had no opportunity to talk to my client that night. I quoted to Captain Flynn the Section of the Criminal Code which allows an attorney the right to see his client." [2]

Petitioner testified that during the course of the interrogation he repeatedly asked to speak to his lawyer and that the police said that his lawyer "didn't want to see" him. The testimony of the police officers confirmed these accounts in substantial detail.

Notwithstanding repeated requests by each, petitioner and his retained lawyer were afforded no opportunity to consult during the course of the entire interrogation. At one point, as previously noted, petitioner and his attorney came into each other's view for a few moments but the attorney was quickly ushered away. Petitioner testified "that he heard a detective telling the attorney the latter would not be allowed to talk to [him] 'until they were done'" and that he heard the attorney being refused permission to remain in the adjoining room. A police officer testified that he had told the lawyer that he could not see petitioner until "we were through interrogating" him.

There is testimony by the police that during the interrogation, petitioner, a 22-year-old of Mexican extraction with no record of previous experience with the police, "was handcuffed" [3] in a standing position and that he "was nervous, he had circles under his eyes and was upset" and was "agitated" because "he had not slept well in over a week."

It is undisputed that during the course of the interrogation Officer Montejano, who "grew up" in petitioner's neighborhood, who knew his family, and who uses "Spanish language in [his] police work," conferred alone with petitioner "for about a quarter of an hour. . . ." Petitioner testified that the officer said to him "in Spanish that my sister and I could go home if I pinned it on Benedict DiGerlando," that "he would see to it that we would go home and be held only as witnesses, if anything, if we had made a statement against DiGerlando . . ., that we would be able to go home that night." Petitioner testified that he made the statement in issue because of this assurance. Officer Montejano denied offering any such assurance.

A police officer testified that during the interrogation the following occurred:

> "I informed him of what DiGerlando told me and when I did, he told me that DiGerlando was [lying] and I said, 'Would you care to tell DiGerlando that?' and he said, 'Yes, I will.' So, I brought . . . Escobedo in and he confronted DiGerlando and he told him that he was lying and said, 'I didn't shoot Manuel, you did it.'"

In this way, petitioner, for the first time, admitted to some knowledge of the crime. After that he made additional statements further implicating himself in the murder plot. At this point an Assistant State's Attorney, Theodore J. Cooper, was summoned "to take" a statement. Mr. Cooper, an experienced lawyer who was assigned to the Homicide Division to take "statements from some defendants

[1] Petitioner testified that this ambiguous gesture "could have meant most anything," but that he "took it upon [his] own to think that [the lawyer was telling him] not to say anything," and that the lawyer "wanted to talk" to him.

[2] The statute then in effect provided in pertinent part that: "All public officers . . . having the custody of any person . . . restrained of his liberty for any alleged cause whatever, shall, except in cases of imminent danger of escape, admit any practicing attorney . . . whom such person . . . may desire to see or consult . . . ." Ill. Rev. Stat. (1959), c. 38, § 477. Repealed as of Jan. 1, 1964, by Act approved Aug. 14, 1963, H.B. No. 851.

and some prisoners that they had in custody," "took" petitioner's statement by asking carefully framed questions apparently designed to assure the admissibility into evidence of the resulting answers. Mr. Cooper testified that he did not advise petitioner of his constitutional rights, and it is undisputed that no one during the course of the interrogation so advised him.

Petitioner moved both before and during trial to suppress the incriminating statement, but the motions were denied. Petitioner was convicted of murder and he appealed the conviction.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, in its original opinion of February 1, 1963, held the statement inadmissible and reversed the conviction. The court said:

> "[I]t seems manifest to us, from the undisputed evidence and the circumstances surrounding defendant at the time of his statement and shortly prior thereto, that the defendant understood he would be permitted to go home if he gave the statement and would be granted an immunity from prosecution."

Compare Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528.

The State petitioned for, and the court granted, rehearing. The court then affirmed the conviction. It said: "[T]he officer denied making the promise and the trier of fact believe him. We find no reason for disturbing the trial court's finding that the confession was voluntary."[4] 28 Ill. 2d 41, 45–46, 190 N. E. 2d 825, 827. The court also held, on the authority of this Court's decisions in Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, and Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, that the confession was admissible even though "it was obtained after he had requested the assistance of counsel, which request was denied." 28 Ill. 2d, at 46, 190 N. E. 2d, at 827. We granted a writ of certiorari to consider whether the petitioner's statement was constitutionally admissible at his trial. 375 U.S. 902. We conclude, for the reasons stated below, that it was not and, accordingly, we reverse the judgment of conviction.

In Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, this Court observed that "a Constitution which guarantees a defendant the aid of counsel at . . . trial could surely vouchsafe no less to an indicted defendant under interrogation by the police in a completely extrajudicial proceeding. Anything less . . . might deny a defendant 'effective representation by counsel at the only stage when legal aid and advice would help him.'" Id., at 204, quoting DOUGLAS, J., concurring in Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 326.

The interrogation here was conducted before petitioner was formally indicted. But in the context of this case, that fact should make no difference. When petitioner requested, and was denied, an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, the investigation had ceased to be a general investigation of "an unsolved crime." Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 327 (STEWART, J., concurring). Petitioner had become the accused, and the purpose of the interrogation was to "get him" to confess his guilt despite his constitutional right not to do so. At the time of his arrest and throughout the course of the interrogation, the police told petitioner that they had convincing evidence that he had fired the fatal shots. Without informing him of his absolute right to remain silent in the face of this accusation, the police urged him to make a statement.[5] As this Court observed many years ago:

> "It cannot be doubted that, placed in the position in which the accused was when the statement was made to him that the other suspected person had charged him with crime, the result was to produce upon his mind the fear that if he remained silent it would be considered an admission of guilt, and therefore render certain his being committed for trial as the guilty person,

[4] Compare Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 515 (decided on the same day as the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court here), where we said:

"Our conclusion is in no way foreclosed, as the State contends, by the fact that the state trial judge or the jury may have reached a different result on this issue.

"It is well settled that the duty of constitutional adjudication resting upon this Court requires that the question whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has been violated by admission into evidence of a coerced confession be the subject of an independent determination here, see, e.g., Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, 147–148; 'we cannot escape the responsibility of making our own examination of the record,' Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 316." (Emphasis in original.)

[5] Although there is testimony in the record that petitioner and his lawyer had previously discussed what petitioner should do in the event of interrogation, there is no evidence that they discussed what petitioner should, or could, do in the face of a false accusation that he had fired the fatal bullets.

and it cannot be conceived that the converse impression would not also have naturally arisen, that by denying there was hope of removing the suspicion from himself" Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 652.

Petitioner, a layman, was undoubtedly unaware that under Illinois law an admission of "mere" complicity in the murder plot was legally as damaging as an admission of firing of the fatal shots. Illinois v. Escobedo, 28 Ill. 2d 41, 190 N.E. 2d 825. The "guiding hand of counsel" was essential to advise petitioner of his rights in this delicate situation. Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 69. This was the "stage when legal aid and advice" were most critical to petitioner. Massiah v. United States, supra, at 204. It was a stage surely as critical as was the arraignment in Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, and the preliminary hearing in White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59. What happened at this interrogation could certainly "affect the whole trial," Hamilton v. Alabama, supra, at 54, since rights "may be as irretrievably lost, if not then and there asserted, as they are when an accused represented by counsel waives a right for strategic purposes." Ibid. It would exalt form over substance to make the right to counsel, under these circumstances, depend on whether at the time of the interrogation, the authorities had secured a formal indictment. Petitioner had, for all practical purposes, already been charged with murder.

The New York Court of Appeals, whose decisions this Court cited with approval in Massiah, 377 U.S. 201, at 205, has recently recognized that, under circumstances such as those here, no meaningful distinction can be drawn between interrogation of an accused before and after formal indictment. In People v. Donovan, 13 N.Y. 2d 148, 193 N.E. 2d 628, that court, in an opinion by Judge Fuld, held that a "confession taken from a defendant, during a period of detention [prior to indictment], after his attorney had requested and been denied acess to him" could not be used against him in a criminal trial[6] Id., at 151, 193 N.E. 2d, at 629. The court observed that it "would be highly incongruous if our system of justice permitted the district attorney, the lawyer representing the State, to extract a confession from the accused while his own lawyer, seeking to speak with him, was kept from him by the police." Id., at 152, 193 N.E. 2d, at 629.[7]

In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, we held that every person accused of a crime, whether state or federal, is entitled to a lawyer at trial.[8] The rule sought by the State here, however, would make the trial no more than an appeal from the interrogation; and the "right to use counsel at the formal trial [would be] a very hollow thing [if], for all practical purposes, the conviction is already assured by pretrail examination." In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330, 344 (BLACK, J., dissenting).[9] "One can imagine a cynical prosecutor saying: 'Let them have the most illustrious counsel, now. They can't escape the noose. There is nothing that counsel can do for them at the trial.'" Ex parte Sullivan, 107 F. Supp. 514, 517–518.

It is argued that if the right to counsel is afforded prior to indictment, the number of confessions obtained by the police will diminish significantly, because most confessions are obtained during the period between arrest and indictment,[10] and "any lawyer worth his salt will tell the suspect in no uncertain terms to make no statement to police under any circumstances." Watts v. Indiana,

[6] The English Judges' Rules also recognize that a functional rather than a formal test must be applied and that, under circumstances such as those here, no special significance should be attached to formal indictment. The applicable Rule does not permit the police to question an accused, except in certain extremely limited situations not relevant here, at any time after the defendant "has been charged or informed that he may be prosecuted." [1964] Crim. L. Rev. 166–170 (emphasis supplied). Although voluntary statements obtained in violation of these rules are not automatically excluded from evidence the judge may, in the exercise of his discretion, exclude them. "Recent cases suggest that perhaps the judges have been tightening up [and almost] inevitably, the effect of the new Rules will be to stimulate this tendency." Id., at 182.

[7] Canon 9 of the American Bar Association's Canon of Professional Ethics provides that: "A lawyer should not in any way communicate upon the subject of controversy with a party represented by counsel; much less should he undertake to negotiate or compromise the matter with him, but should deal only with his counsel. It is incumbent upon the lawyer most particularly to avoid everything that may tend to mislead a party not represented by counsel, and he should not undertake to advise him as to the law." See Broeder, Wong Sun v. United States: A Study in Faith and Hope, 42 Neb. L. Rev. 483, 599–604.

[8] Twenty-two States, including Illinois, urged us so to hold.

[9] The Soviet criminal code does not permit a lawyer to be present during the investigation. The Soviet trial has thus been aptly described as "an appeal from the pretrial investigation." Feifer, Justice in Moscow (1964), 86.

[10] See Barrett, Police Practices and the Law—From Arrest to Release or Charge, 50 Cal. L. Rev. 11, 43 (1962).

338 U.S. 49, 50 (Jackson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). This argument, of course, cuts two ways. The fact that many confessions are obtained during this period points up its critical nature as a "stage when legal aid and advice" are surely needed. Massiah v. United States, supra, at 204; Hamilton v. Alabama, supra; White v. Maryland, supra. The right to counsel would indeed be hollow if it began at a period when few confessions were obtained. There is necessarily a direct relationship between the importance of a stage to the police in their quest for a confession and the criticalness of that stage to the accused in his need for legal advice. Our Constitution, unlike some others, strikes the balance in favor of the right of the accused to be advised by his lawyer of his privilege against self-incrimination. See Note, 73 Yale L. J. 1000, 1048–1051 (1964).

We have learned the lesson of history, ancient and modern, that a system of criminal law enforcement which comes to depend on the "confession" will, in the long run, be less reliable[11] and more subject to abuses[12] than a system which depends on extrinsic evidence independently secured through skillful investigation. As Dean Wigmore so wisely said:

> "[A]n system of administration which permits the prosecution to trust habitually to compulsory self-disclosure as a source of proof must itself suffer morally thereby. The inclination develops to rely mainly upon such evidence, and to be satisfied with an incomplete investigation of the other sources. The exercise of the power to extract answers begets a forgetfulness of the just limitations of that power. The simple and peaceful process of questioning breeds a readiness to resort to bullying and to physical force and torture. If there is a right to an answer, there soon seems to be a right to the expected answer,—that is, to a confession of guilt. Thus the legitimate use grows into the unjust abuse; ultimately, the innocent are jeopardized by the encroachments of a bad system. Such seems to have been the course of experience in those legal systems where the privilege was not recognized." 8 Wigmore, Evidence (3d ed. 1940), 309. (Emphasis in original.)

This Court also has recognized that "history amply shows that confessions have often been extorted to save law enforcement officials the trouble and effort of obtaining valid and independent evidence . . ." Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 519.

We have also learned the companion lesson of history that no system of criminal justice can, or should, survive if it comes to depend for its continued effectiveness on the citizens' abdication through unawareness of their constitutional rights. No system worth preserving should have to fear that if an accused is permitted to consult with a lawyer, he will become aware of, and exercise, these rights.[13] If the exercise of constitutional rights will thwart the effectiveness of a system of law enforcement, then there is something very wrong with that system.[14]

We hold, therefore, that where, as here, the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements,

[13] Cf. Report of Attorney General's Committee on Poverty and the Administration of Federal Criminal Justice (1963), 10–11: "The survival of our system of criminal justice and the values which it advances depends upon a constant, searching, and creative questioning of official decisions and assertios of authority at all stages of the process. . . . Persons [denied access to counsel] are incapable of providing the challenges that are indispensable to satisfactory operation of the system. The loss to the interests of accused individuals, occasioned by these failures, are great and apparent. It is also clear that a situation in which persons are required to contest a serious accusation but are denied access to the tools of contest is offensive to fairness and equity. Beyond these considerations, however, is the fact that [this situation is] detrimental to the proper functioning of the system of justice and that the loss in vitality of the adversary system, thereby occasioned, significantly endangers the basic interests of a free community."

the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied "the Assistance of Counsel" in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution as "made obligatory upon the States by the Fourteenth Amendment," Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S., at 342, and that no statement elicited by the police during the interrogation may be used against him at a criminal trial.

Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, does not compel a contrary result. In that case the Court merely rejected the absolute rule sought by petitioner, that "every state denial of a request to contact counsel [is] an infringement of the constitutional right without regard to the circumstances of the case." Id., at 440. (Emphasis in original.) In its place, the following rule was announced:

> "[S]tate refusal of a request to engage counsel violates due process not only if the accused is deprived of counsel at trial on the merits, . . . but also if he is deprived of counsel for any part of the pretrial proceedings, provided that he is so prejudiced thereby as to infect his subsequent trial with an absence of 'that fundamental fairness essential to the very concept of justice. . . .' The latter determination necessarily depends upon all the circumstances of the case." 357 U.S., at 439–440. (Emphasis added.)

The Court, applying "these principles" to "the sum total of the circumstances [there] during the time petitioner was without counsel," id., at 440, concluded that he had not been fundamentally prejudiced by the denial of his request for counsel. Among the critical circumstances which distinguish that case from this one are that the petitioner there, but not here, was explicitly advised by the police of his constitutional right to remain silent and not to "say anything" in response to the questions, id., at 437, and that petitioner there, but not here, was a well-educated man who had studied criminal law while attending law school for a year. The Court's opinion in Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, decided the same day, merely said that the "contention that petitioner had a constitutional right to confer with counsel is disposed of by Crooker v. California . . ." That case adds nothing, therefore, to Crooker. In any event, to the extent that Cicenia or Crooker may be inconsistent with the principles announced today, they are not to be regarded as controlling.[15]

Nothing we have said today affects the powers of the police to investigate "an unsolved crime," Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315, 327 (STEWART, J., concurring), by gathering information from witnesses and by other "proper investigative efforts." Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 519. We hold only that when the process shifts from investigatory to accusatory—when its focus is on the accused and its purpose is to elicit a confession—our adversary system begins to operate, and, under the circumstances here, the accused must be permitted to consult with his lawyer.

The judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court is reversed and the case remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, dissenting.

I would affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois on the basis of Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, decided by this Court only six years ago. Like my Brother WHITE, post, p. 495, I think the rule announced today is most ill-conceived and that it seriously and unjustifiably fetters perfectly legitimate methods of criminal law enforcement.

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, dissenting.

I think this case is directly controlled by Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, and I would therefore affirm the judgment.

Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, is not in point here. In that case a federal grand jury had indicted Massiah. He had retained a lawyer and entered a formal plea of not guilty. Under our system of federal justice an indictment and arraignment are followed by a trial, at which the Sixth Amendment guarantees the defendant the assistance of counsel.* But Massiah was released on bail, and thereafter agents of the Federal Government deliberately elicited incriminating statements from him in the absence of his lawyer. We held that the use of these statements against him at his trial denied him the basic protection of the [15] The authority of Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, and Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, was weakened by the subsequent decisions of this Court in Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59, and Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (as the dissenting opinion in the last-cited case recognized).

Sixth Amendment guarantee. Putting to one side the fact that the case now before us is not a federal case, the vital fact remains that this case does not involve the deliberate interrogation of a defendant after the initiation of judicial proceedings against him. The Court disregards this basic difference between the present case and Massiah's, with the bland assertion that "that fact should make no difference." Ante, p. 485.

It is "that fact," I submit, which makes all the difference. Under our system of criminal justice the institution of formal, meaningful judicial proceedings, by way of indictment, information, or arraignment, marks the point at which a criminal investigation has ended and adversary proceedings have commenced. It is at this point that the constitutional guarantees attach which pertain to a criminal trial. Among those guarantees are the right to a speedy trial, the right of confrontation, and the right to trial by jury. Another is the guarantee of the assistance of counsel. Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335; Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52; White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59.

The confession which the Court today holds inadmissible was a voluntary one. It was given during the course of a perfectly legitimate police investigation of an unsolved murder. The Court says that what happened during this investigation "affected" the trial. I had always supposed that the whole purpose of a police investigation of a murder was to "affect" the trial of the murderer, and that it would be only an incompetent, unsuccessful, or corrupt investigation which would not do so. The Court further says that the Illinois police officers did not advise the petitioner of his "constitutional rights" before he confessed to the murder. This Court has never held that the Constitution requires the police to give any "advice" under circumstances such as these.

Supported by no stronger authority than its own rhetoric, the Court today converts a routine police investigation of an unsolved murder into a distorted analogue of a judicial trial. It imports into this investigation constitutional concepts historically applicable only after the onset of formal prosecutorial proceedings. By doing so, I think the Court perverts those precious constitutional guarantees, and frustrates the vital interests of society in preserving the legitimate and proper function of honest and purposeful police investigation.

Like my Brother CLARK, I cannot escape the logic of my Brother WHITE's conclusions as to the extraordinary implications which emanate from the Court's opinion in this case, and I share their views as to the untold and highly unfortunate impact today's decision may have upon the fair administration of criminal justice. I can only hope we have completely misunderstood what the Court has said.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE with whom MR. JUSTICE CLARK and MR. JUSTICE STEWART join, dissenting.

In Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201, the Court held that as of the date of the indictment the prosecution is disentitled to secure admissions from the accused. The Court now moves that date back to the time when the prosecution begins to "focus" on the accused. Although the opinion purports to be limited to the facts of this case, it would be naive to think that the new constitutional right announced will depend upon whether the accused has retained his own counsel, cf. Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335; Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12; Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, or has asked to consult with counsel in the course of interrogation. Cf. Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506. At the very least the Court holds that once the accused becomes a suspect and, presumably, is arrested, any admission made to the police thereafter is inadmissible in evidence unless the accused has waived his right to counsel. The decision is thus another major step in the direction of the goal which the Court seemingly has in mind—to bar from evidence all admissions obtained from an individual suspected of crime, whether involuntarily made or not. It does of course put us one step "ahead" of the English judges who have had the good sense to leave the matter a discretionary one with the trial court.  I reject this step and the invitation to go farther which the Court has now issued.

"[I]t seems from reported cases that the judges have given up enforcing their own rules, for it is no longer the practice to exclude evidence obtained by questioning in custody. . . . A traditional principle of 'fairness' to criminals, which has quite possibly lost some of the reason for its existence, is maintained in words while it is disregarded in fact. . . .

"The reader may be expecting at this point a vigorous denunciation of the police and of the judges, and a plea for a return to the Judges' Rules as interpreted in 1939. What has to be considered, however, is whether these Rules are a workable part of the machinery of justice. Perhaps the truth is that the Rules have been abandoned, by tacit consent, just because they are an unreasonable restriction upon the activities of the police in bringing criminals to book." Williams, Questioning by the Police: Some Practical Considerations, [1960] Crim. L. Rev. 325, 331–332. See also [1964] Crim. L. Rev. 161–182.

By abandoning the voluntary-involuntary test for admissibility of confessions, the Court seems driven by the notion that it is uncivilized law enforcement to use an accused's own admissions against him at his trial. It attempts to find a home for this new and nebulous rule of due process by attaching it to the right to counsel guaranteed in the federal system by the Sixth Amendment and binding upon the States by virtue of the due process guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. Gideon v. Wainwright, supra. The right to cousel now not only entitles the accused to counsel's advice and aid in preparing for trials but stands as an impenetrable barrier to any interrogation once the accused has become a suspect. From that very moment apparently his right to counsel attaches, a rule wholly unworkable and impossible to administer unless police cars are equipped with public defenders and undercover agents and police informants have defense counsel at their side. I would not abandon the Court's prior cases defining with some care and analysis the circumstances requiring the presence or aid of counsel and substitute the amorphous and wholly unworkable principle that counsel is constitutionally required whenever he would or could be helpful. Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52; White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59; Gideon v. Wainwright, supra. These cases dealt with the requirement of counsel at proceedings in which definable rights could be won or lost, not with stages where probative evidence might be obtained. Under this new approach one might just as well argue that a potential defendant is constitutionally entitled to a lawyer before, not after, he commits a crime, since it is then that crucial incriminating evidence is put within the reach of the Government by the would-be accused. Until now there simply has been no right guaranteed by the Federal Constitution to be free from the use at trail of a voluntary admission made prior to indictment.

It is incongruous to assume that the provision for counsel in the Sixth Amendment was meant to amend or supersede the self-incrimination provision of the Fifth Amendment, which is now applicable to the States. Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1. That amendment addresses itself to the very issue of incriminating admissions of an accused and resolves it by proscribing only compelled statements. Neither the Framers, the constitutional language, a century of decisions of this Court nor Professor Wigmore provides an iota of support for the idea that an accused has an absolute constitutional right not to answer even in the absence of compulsion—the constitutional right not to incriminate himself by making voluntary disclosures.

Today's decision cannot be squared with other provisions of the Constitution which, in my view, define the system of criminal justice this Court is empowered to administer. The Fourth Amendment permits upon probable cause even compulsory searches of the suspect and his possessions and the use of the fruits of the search at trial, all in the absence of counsel. The Fifth Amendment and state constitutional provisions authorize, indeed require, inquisitorial grand jury proceedings at which a potential defendant, in the absence of counsel, is shielded against no more than compulsory incrimination. Mulloney v. United States, 79 F. 2d 566, 578 (C.A. 1st Cir.); United States v. Benjamin, 120 F. 2d 521, 522 (C.A. 2d Cir.); United States v. Scully, 225 F. 2d 113, 115 (C. A. 2d Cir.); United States v. Gilboy, 160 F. Supp. 442 (D. C. M. D. Pa.). A grand jury witness, who may be a suspect, is interrogated and his answers, at least until today, are admissible in evidence at trial. And these provisions have been thought of as constitutional safeguards to persons suspected of an offense. Furthermore, until now, the Constitution has permitted the accused to be fingerprinted and to be identified in a line-up or in the courtroom itself.

The Court chooses to ignore these matters and to rely on the virtues and morality of a system of criminal law enforcement which does not depend on the "confession." No such judgment is to be found in the Constitution. It might be appropriate for a legislature to provide that a suspect should not be consulted during a criminal investigation; that an accused should never be called before a grand jury to answer, even if he wants to, what may well be incriminating questions; and that no person, whether he be a suspect, guilty criminal or innocent bystander, should be put to the ordeal of responding to orderly non-compulsory inquiry by the State. But this is not the system our Constitution requires. The only "inquisitions" the Constitution forbids are those which compel incrimination. Escobedo's statements were not compelled and the Court does not hold that they were.

This new American judges' rule, which is to be applied in both federal and state courts, is perhaps thought to be a necessary safeguard against the possibility of extorted confessions. To this extent it reflects a deep-seated distrust of law enforcement officers everywhere, unsupported by relevant data or current material based upon our own experience. Obviously law enforcement officers can make mistakes and exceed their authority, as today's decision shows that even judges can do, but I have somewhat more faith than the Court evidently has in the ability and desire of prosecutors and of the power of the appellate courts to discern and correct such violations of the law.

The Court may be concerned with a narrower matter: the unknown defendant who responds to police questioning because he mistakenly believes that he must and that his admissions will not be used against him. But this worry hardly calls for the broadside the Court has now fired. The failure to inform an accused that he need not answer and that his answers may be used against him is very relevant indeed to whether the disclosures are compelled. Cases in this Court, to say the least, have never placed a premium on ignorance of constitutional rights. If an accused is told he must answer and does not know better, it would be very doubtful that the resulting admissions could be used against him. When the accused has not been informed of his rights at all the Court characteristically and properly looks very closely at the surrounding circumstances. See Ward v. Texas, 316 U.S. 547; Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596; Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560. I would continue to do so. But in this case Danny Escobedo knew full well that he did not have to answer and knew full well that his lawyer had advised him not to answer.

I do not suggest for a moment that law enforcement will be destroyed by the rule announced today. The need for peace and order is too insistent for that. But it will be crippled and its task made a great deal more difficult, all in my opinion, for unsound, unstated reasons, which can find no home in any of the provisions of the Constitution.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The cases before us raise questions which go to the roots of our concepts of American criminal jurisprudence: the restraints society must observe consistent with the Federal Constitution in prosecuting individuals for crime. More specifically, we deal with the admissibility of statements obtained from an individual who is subjected to custodial police interrogation and the necessity for procedures which assure that the individual is accorded his privilege under the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution not to be compelled to incriminate himself.

We dealt with certain phases of this problem recently in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). There, as in the four cases before us, law enforcement officials took the defendant into custody and interrogated him in a police station for the purpose of obtaining a confession. The police did not effectively advise him of his right to remain silent or of his right to consult with his attorney. Rather, they confronted him with an alleged accomplice who accused him of having perpetrated a murder. When the defendant denied the accusation and said "I didn't shoot Manuel, you did it," they handcuffed him and took him to an interrogation room. There, while handcuffed and standing, he was questioned for four hours until he confessed. During this interrogation, the police denied his request to speak to his attorney, and they prevented his retained attorney, who had come to the police station, from consulting with him. At his trial, the State, over his objection, introduced the confession against him. We held that the statements thus made were constitutionally inadmissible.

This case has been the subject of judicial interpretation and spirited legal debate since it was decided two years ago. Both state and federal courts, in assessing its implications, have arrived at varying conclusions.[1] A wealth of scholarly material has been written tracing its ramifications and underpinnings.[2] Police and prosecutor have speculated on its range and desirability.[3] We granted certiorari in these cases, 382 U.S. 924, 925, 937, in order further to explore some facets of the problems, thus exposed, of applying the privilege against self-incrimination to in-custody interrogation, and to give concrete constitutional guidelines for law enforcement agencies and courts to follow.

We start here, as we did in Escobedo, with the premise that our holding is not an innovation in our jurisprudence, but is an application of priuciples long recognized and applied in other settings. We have undertaken a thorough reexamination of the Escobedo decision and the principles it announced, and we reaffirm it. That case was but an explication of basic rights that are enshrined in our Constitution—that "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and that "the accused shall . . . have the Assistance of Counsel"—rights which were put in jeopardy in that case through official overbearing. These precious rights were fixed in our Constitution only after centuries of persecution and struggle. And in the words of Chief Justice Marshall, they were secured "for ages to come and . . . designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it," Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 387 (1821).

Over 70 years ago, our predecessors on this Court eloquently stated:

"The maxim nemo tenetur seipsum accusare had its origin in a protest against the inquisitorial and manifestly unjust methods of interrogating accused persons, which has long obtained in the continental system, and, until the expulsion of the Stuarts from the British throne in 1688, and the erection of additional barriers for the protection of the people against the exercise of arbitrary power, was not uncommon even in England. While the admissions or confessions of the prisoner, when voluntarily and freely made, have always ranked high in the scale of incriminating evidence, if an accused person be asked to

The complex problems also prompted discussions by jurists. Compare Bazelon, Law, Morality and Civil Liberties, 12 U. C. L. A. L. Rev. 13 (1964), with Friendly, The Bill of Rights as a Code of Criminal Procedure, 53 Calif. L. Rev. 929 (1965).

[3] For example, the Los Angeles Police Chief stated that "If the police are required . . . to . . . establish that the defendant was apprised of his constitutional guarantees of silence and legal counsel prior to the uttering of any admission or confession, and that he intelligently waived these guarantees . . . a whole Pandora's box is opened as to under what circumstances . . . can a defendant intelligently waive these rights. . . . Allegations that modern criminal investigation can compensate for the lack of a confession or admission in every criminal case is totally absurd!" Parker, 40 L. A. Bar. Bull. 603, 607, 642 (1965). His prosecutorial counterpart, District Attorney Younger, stated that "[I]t begins to appear that many of these seemingly restrictive decisions are going to contribute directly to a more effective, efficient and professional level of law enforcement." L. A. Times, Oct. 2, 1965, p. 1. The former Police Commissioner of New York, Michael J. Murphy, stated of Escobedo: "What the Court is doing is akin to requiring one boxer to fight by Marquis of Queensbury rules while permitting the other to butt, gouge and bite." N. Y. Times, May 14, 1965, p. 39. The former United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, David C. Acheson, who is presently Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury (for Enforcement), and directly in charge of the Secret Service and the Bureau of Narcotics, observed that "Prosecution procedure has, at most, only the most remote casual connection with crime. Changes in court decisions and prosecution procedure would have about the same effect on the crime rate as an aspirit would have on a tumor of the brain." Quoted in Herman, supra, n. 2, at 500, n. 270. Other views on the subject in general are collected in Weisberg, Police Interrogation of Arrested Persons: A Skeptical View, 52 J. Crim. L., C. & P. S., 21 (1961).

explain his apparent connection with a crime under investigation, the ease with which the questions put to him may assume an inquisitorial character, the temptation to press the witness unduly, to browbeat him if he be timid or reluctant, to push him into a corner, and to entrap him into fatal contradictions, which is so painfully evidenced in many of these earlier state trials, notably in those of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Udal, the Puritan minister, made the system so odious as to give rise to a demand for its total abolition. The change in the English criminal procedure in that particular seems to be founded upon no statute and no judicial opinion, but upon a general and silent acquiescence of the courts in a popular demand. But, however adopted, it has become firmly embedded in English, as well as in American jurisprudence. So deeply did the inequities of the ancient system impress themselves upon the minds of the American colonists that the States, with one accord, made a denial of the right to question an accused person a part of their fundamental law, so that a maxim, which in England was a mere rule of evidence, became clothed in this country with the impregnability of a constitutional enactment." Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 596–597 (1896).

In stating the obligation of the judiciary to apply these constitutional rights, this Court declared in Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 373 (1910):

> ". . . our contemplation cannot be only what has been but of what may be. Under any other rule a constitution would indeed be as easy of application as it would be deficient in efficacy and power. Its general principles would have little value and be converted by precedent into impotent and lifeless formulas. Rights declared in words might be lost in reality. And this has been recognized. The meaning and vitality of the Constitution have developed against narrow and restrictive construction."

This was the spirit in which we delineated, in meaningful language, the manner in which the constitutional rights of the individual could be enforced against overzealous police practices. It was necessary in Escobedo, as here, to insure that what was proclaimed in the Constitution had not become but a "form of words," Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920), in the hands of government officials. And it is in this spirit, consistent with our role as judges, that we adhere to the principles of Escobedo today.

Our holding will be spelled out with some specificity in the pages which follow but briefly stated it is this: the prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure the privilege against self-incrimination. By custodial interrogation, we mean questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way.[4] As for the procedural safeguards to be employed, unless other fully effective means are devised to inform accused persons of their right of silence and to assure a continuous opportunity to exercise it, the following measures are required. Prior to any questioning, the person must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, either retained or appointed. The defendant may waive effectuation of those rights, provided the waiver is made voluntarily, knowingly and intelligently. If, however, he indicates in any manner and at any stage of the process that he wishes to consult with an attorney before speaking there can be no questioning. Likewise, if the individual is alone and indicates in any manner that he does not wish to be interrogated, the police may not question him. The mere fact that he may have answered some questions or volunteered some statements on his own does not deprive him of the right to refrain from answering any further inquiries until he has consulted with an attorney and thereafter consents to be questioned.

I

The constitutional issue we decide in each of these cases is the admissibility of statements obtained from a defendant questioned while in custody and deprived of his freedom of action. In each, the defendant was questioned by police officers, detectives, or a prosecuting attorney in a room in which he was cut off from the outside world. In none of these cases was the defendant given a full and effective warning of his rights at the outset of the interrogation process. In all the cases, the questioning elicited oral admissions, and in three of them, signed statements as well which were admitted at their trials. They all thus share salient features—incommunicado interrogation of individuals in a police-dominated atmosphere, resulting in self-incriminating statements without full warnings of constitutional rights.

[4] This is what we meant in Escobedo when we spoke of an investigation which had focused on an accused.

An understanding of the nature and setting of this in-custody interrogation is essential to our decisions today. The difficulty in depicting what transpires at such interrogations stems from the fact that in this country they have largely taken place incommunicado. From extensive factual studies undertaken in the early 1930's, including the famous Wickersham Report to Congress by a Presidential Commission, it is clear that police violence and the "third degree" flourished at that time.[5] In a series of cases decided by this Court long after these studies, the police resorted to physical brutality—beatings, hanging, whipping—and to sustained and protracted questioning incommunicado in order to extort confessions.[6] The 1961 Commission on Civil Rights found much evidence to indicate that "some policemen still resort to physical force to obtain confessions," 1961 Comm'n on Civil Rights Rep., Justice, pt. 5, 17. The use of physical brutality and violence is not, unfortunately, relegated to the past or to any part of the country. Only recently in Kings County, New York, the police brutally beat, kicked and placed lighted cigarette butts on the back of a potential witness under interrogation for the purpose of securing a statement incriminating a third party. People v. Portelli, 15 N.Y. 2d 235, 205 N. E. 2d 857, 257 N. Y. S. 2d 931 (1965).[7]

The examples given above are undoubtedly the exception now, but they are sufficiently widespread to be the object of concern. Unless a proper limitation upon custodial interrogation is achieved—such as these decisions will advance—there can be no assurance that practices of this nature will be eradicated in the foreseeable future. The conclusion of the Wickersham Commission Report, made over 30 years ago, is still pertinent:

> "To the contention that the third degree is necessary to get the facts, the reporters aptly reply in the language of the present Lord Chancellor of England (Lord Sankey): 'It is not admissible to do a great right by doing a little wrong. . . . It is not sufficient to do justice by obtaining a proper result by irregular or improper means.' Not only does the use of the third degree involve a flagrant violation of law by the officers of the law, but it involves also the dangers of false confessions, and it tends to make police and prosecutors less zealous in the search for objective evidence. As the New York prosecutor quoted in the report said, 'It is a short cut and makes the police lazy and unenterprising.' Or, as another official quoted remarked: 'If you use your fists, you are not so likely to use your wits.' We agree with the conclusion expressed in the report, that 'The third degree brutalizes the police, hardens the prisoner against society, and lowers the esteem in which the administration of justice is held by the public.'" IV National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, Report on Lawlessness in Law Enforcement (1931), 5.

Again we stress that the modern practice of in-custody interrogation is psychologically rather than physically oriented. As we have stated before. "Since Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, this Court has recognized that coercion can be mental as well as physical, and that the blood of the accused is not the only hallmark of an unconstitutional inquisition." Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199, 206 (1960). Interrogation still takes place in privacy. Privacy results in secrecy and this in turn results in a gap in our knowledge as to what in fact goes on in the interrogation rooms. A valuable source of information about present police practices, however, may be found in various police manuals and texts which document procedures employed with success in the past, and which recommend various other effective tactics.[8] These texts are used by law enforcement agencies themselves as guides.[9] It should be noted that these texts professedly present the most enlightened and effective means presently used to obtain statements through custodial interrigation. By considering these texts and other data, it is possible to describe procedures observed and noted around the country.

The officers are told by the manuals that the "principal psychological factor contributing to a successful interrogation is privavy—being alone with the person under interrogation." [10] The efficacy of this tactic has been explained as follows:

> "If at all practicable, the interrogation should take place in the investigator's office or at least in a room of his own choice. The subject should be deprived of every psychological advantage. In his own home he may be confident, indignant, or recalcitrant. He is more keenly aware of his rights and more reluctant to tell of his indiscretions of criminal behavior within the walls of his own home. Moreover his family and other friends are nearby, their presence lending moral support. In his own office, the investigator possesses all the advantages. The atmosphere suggests the invincibility of the forces of the law." [11]

To highlight the isolation and unfamiliar surroundings, the manuals instruct the police to display an air of confidence in the suspect's guilt and from outward appearance to maintain only an interest in confirming certain details. The guilt of the subject is to be posited as a fact. The interrogator should direct his comments toward the reasons why the subject committed the act, rather than to court failure by asking the subject whether he did it. Like other men, perhaps the subject has had a bad family life, had an unhappy childhood, had too much to drink, had an unrequited attraction to women. The officers are instructed to minimize the moral seriousness of the offense,[12] to cast blame on the victim or on society.[13] These tactics are designed to put the subject in a psychological state where his story is but an elaboration of what the police purport to know already—that he is guilty. Explanations to the contrary are dismissed and discouraged.

[8] The manuals quoted in the text following are the most recent and representative of the texts currently available. Material of the same nature appears in Kidd, Police Interrogation (1940); Mulbar, Interrogation (1951); Dienstein, Technics for the Crime Investigator (1952), 97–115. Studies concerning the observed practices of the police appear in LaFave, Arrest: The Decision To Take a Suspect Into Custody (1965), 244–437, 490–521; LaFave, Detention for Investigation by the Police: An Analysis of Current Practices, 1962 Wash. U. L. Q. 331; Barrett, Police Practices and the Law—From Arrest to Release or Charge, 50 Calif. L. Rev. 11 (1962); Sterling, supra, n. 7, at 47–65.

[9] The methods described in Inbau and Reid, Criminal Interrogation and Confessions (1962), are a revision and enlargement of material presented in three prior editions of a predecessor text, Lie Detection and Criminal Interrogation (3d ed. 1953). The authors and their associates are officers of the Chicago Police Scientific Crime Detection Laboratory and have had extensive experience in writing, lecturing and speaking to law enforcement authorities over a 20-year period. They say that the techniques portrayed in their manuals reflect their experiences and are the most effective psychological stratagems to employ during interrogations. Similarly, the techniques described in O'Hara, Fundamentals of Criminal Investigation (1959), were gleaned from long service as observer, lecturer in police science, and work as a federal criminal investigator. All these texts have had rather extensive use among law enforcement agencies and among students of police science, with total sales and circulation of over 44,000.

[12] Inbau and Reid, supra, at 34–43, 87. For example, in Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954), the interrogator-psychiatrist told the accused, "We do sometimes things that are not right, but in a fit of temper or anger we sometimes do things we aren't really responsible for," id., at 562, and again, "We know that morally you were just in anger. Morally, you are not to be condemned," id., at 582.

The texts thus stress that the major qualities an interrogator should possess are patience and perseverance. One writer describes the efficacy of these characteristics in this manner:

> "In the preceding paragraphs emphasis has been placed on kindness and stratagems. The investigator will, however, encounter many situations where the sheer weight of his personality will be the deciding factor. Where emotional appeals and tricks are employed to no avail, he must rely on an oppressive atmosphere of dogged persistence. He must interrogate steadily and without relent, leaving the subject no prospect of surcease. He must dominate his subject and overwhelm him with his inexorable will to obtain the truth. He should interrogate for a spell of several hours pausing only for the subject's necessities in acknowledgment of the need to avoid a charge of duress that can be technically substantiated. In a serious case, the interrogation may continue for days, with the required intervals for food and sleep, but with no respite from the atmosphere of domination. It is possible in this way to induce the subject to talk without resorting to duress or coercion. This method should be used only when the guilt of the subject appears highly probable." [14]

The manuals suggest that the suspect be offered legal excuses for his actions in order to obtain an initial admission of guilt. Where there is a suspected revenge-killing, for example, the interrogator may say:

> "Joe, you probably didn't go out looking for this fellow with the purpose of shooting him. My guess is, however, that you expected something from him and that's why you carried a gun—for your own protection. You knew him for what he was, no good. Then when you met him he probably started using foul, abusive language and he gave some indication that he was about to pull a gun on you, and that's when you had to act to save your own life. That's about it, isn't it, Joe?" [15]

Having then obtained the admission of shooting, the interrogator is advised to refer to circumstantial evidence which negates the self-defense explanation. This should enable him to secure the entire story. One text notes that "Even if he fails to do so, the inconsistency between the subject's original denial of the shooting and his present admission of at least doing the shooting will serve to deprive him of a self-defense 'out' at the time of trial." [16]

When the techniques described above prove unavailing, the texts recommend they be alternated with a show of some hostility. One ploy often used has been termed the "friendly-unfriendly" or the "Mutt and Jeff" act:

> ". . . In this technique, two agents are employed, Mutt, the relentless investigator, who knows the subject is guilty and is not going to waste any time. He's sent a dozen men away for this crime and he's going to send the subject away for the full term. Jeff, on the other hand, is obviously a kind-hearted man. He has a family himself. He has a brother who was involved in a little scrape like this. He disapproves of Mutt and his tactics and will arrange to get him off the case if the subject will cooperate. He can't hold Mutt off for very long. The subject would be wise to make a quick decision. The technique is applied by having both investigators present while Mutt acts out his role. Jeff may stand by quietly and demur at some of Mutt's tactics. When Jeff makes his plea for cooperation, Mutt is not present in the room." [17]

The interrogators sometimes are instructed to induce a confession out of trickery. The technique here is quite effective in crimes which require identification or which run in series. In the identification situation, the interrogator may take a break in his questioning to place the subject among a group of men in a line-up. "The witness or complainant (previously coached, if necessary) studies the line-up and confidently points out the subject as the guilty party." [18] Then the questioning resumes "as though there were now no doubt about the guilt of the subject." A variation on this technique is called the "reverse line-up":

> "The accused is placed in a line-up, but this time he is identified by several fictitious witnesses or victims who associated him with different offenses. It is expected that the subject will become desperate and confess to the offense under investigation in order to escape from the false accusations." [19]

The manuals also contain instructions for police on how to handle the individual who refuses to discuss the matter entirely, or who asks for an attorney or relatives. The examiner is to concede him the right to remain silent. "This usually has a very undermining effect. First of all, he is disappointed in his expectation of an unfavorable reaction on the part of the interrogator. Secondly, a concession of this right to remain silent impresses the subject with the apparent fairness of his interrogator." [20] After this psychological conditioning, however, the officer is told to point out the incriminating significance of the suspect's refusal to talk:

> "Joe, you have a right to remain silent. That's your privilege and I'm the last person in the world who'll try to take it away from you. If that's the way you want to leave this, O.K. But let me ask you this. Suppose you were in my shoes and I were in yours and you called me in to ask me about this and I told you, 'I don't want to answer any of your questions.' You'd think I had something to hide, and you'd probably be right in thinking that. That's exactly what I'll have to think about you, and so will everybody else. So let's sit here and talk this whole thing over." [21]

Few will persist in their initial refusals to talk, it is said, if this monologue is employed correctly.

In the event that the subject wishes to speak to a relative or an attorney, the following advice is tendered:

> "[T]he interrogator should respond by suggesting the subject first tell the truth to the interrogator himself rather than get anyone else involved in the matter. If the request is for an attorney, the interrogator may suggest that the subject save himself or his family the expense of any such professional service, particularly if he is innocent of the offense under investigation. The interrogator may also add, 'Joe, I'm looking for the truth, and if you're telling the truth, that's it. You can handle this by yourself.'" [22]

From these representative samples of interrogation techniques, the setting prescribed by the manuals and observed in practice becomes clear. In essence, it is this: To be alone with the subject is esseential to prevent distraction and to deprive him of any outside support. The aura of confidence in his guilt undermines his will to resist. He merely confirms the preconceived story the police seek to have him describe. Patience and persistence, at times relentless questioning are employed. To obtain a confession, the interrogator must "patiently maneuver himself or his quarry into a position from which the desired object may be obtained." [23] When normal procedures fail to produce the needed result, the police may resort to deceptive stratagems such as giving false legal advice. It is important to keep the subject off balance, for example, by trading on his insecurity about himself or his surroundings. The police then persuade, trick, or cajole him out of exercising his constitutional rights.

Even without employing brutality, the "third degree" or the specific stratagems described above, the very fact of custodial interrogation exacts a heavy toll on individual liberty and trades on the weakness of individuals.[24] This fact may be illustrated simply by referring to three confession cases decided by this Court in the Term immediately preceding our Escobedo decision. In Townsend v. Sain, [24] Interrogation procedures may even give rise to a false confession. The most recent conspicuous example occurred in New York, in 1964, when a Negro of limited intelligence confessed to two brutal murders and a rape which he had not committed. When this was discovered, the prosecutor was reported as saying: "Call it what you want—brain-washing, hypnosis, fright. They made him give an untrue confession. The only thing I don't believe is that Whitmore was beaten." N.Y. Times, Jan. 28, 1965, p. 1, col. 5. In two other instances, similar events had occurred. N.Y. Times, Oct. 20, 1964, p. 22, col. 1; N.Y. Times, Aug. 24, 1965, p. 1, col. 1. In general, see Borchard, Convicting the Innocent (1932); Frank and Frank, Not Guilty (1957).

372 U.S. 293 (1963), the defendant was a 19-year-old heroin addict, described as a "near mental defective," id., at 307–310. The defendant in Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963), was a woman who confessed to the arresting officer after being importuned to "cooperate' 'in order to prevent her children from being taken by relief authorities. This Court similarly reversed the conviction of a defendant in Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963), whose persistent request during his interrogation was to phone his wife or attorney.[25] In other settings, these individuals might have exercised their constitutional rights. In the incommunicado police-dominated atmosphere, they succumbed.

In the cases before us today, given this background, we concern ourselves primarily with this interrogation atmosphere and the evils it can bring. In No. 759, Miranda v. Arizona, the police arrested the defendant and took him to a special interrogation room where they secured a confession. In No. 760, Vignera v. New York, the defendant made oral admissions to the police after interrogation in the afternoon, and then signed an inculpatory statement upon being questioned by an assistant district atorney later the same evening. In No. 761, Westover v. United States, the defendant was handed over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation by local authorities after they had detained and interrogated him for a lengthy period, both at night and the following morning. After some two hours of questioning, the federal officers had obtained signed statements from the defendant. Lastly, in No. 584, California v. Stewart, the local police held the defendant five days in the station and interrogated him on nine separate occasions before they secured his inculpatory statement.

In these cases, we might not find the defendants' statements to have been involuntary in traditional terms. Our concern for adequate safeguards to protect precious Fifth Amendment rights is, of course, not lessened in the slightest. In each of the cases, the defendant was thrust into an unfamiliar atmosphere and run through menacing police interrogation procedures. The potentiality for compulsion is forcefully apparent, for example, in Miranda, where the indigent Mexican defendant was a seriously disturbed individual with pronounced sexual fantasies, and in Stewart, in which the defendant was an indigent Los Angeles Negro who had dropped out of school in the sixth grade. To be sure, the records do not evince overt physical coercion or patented psychological policy. The fact remains that in none of these cases did the officers undertake to afford appropriate safeguards at the outset of the interrogation to insure that the statements were truthly the product of free choice.

It is obvious that such an interrogation environment is created for no purpose other than to subjugate the individual to the will of his examiner. This atmosphere carries its own badge of intimidation. To be sure, this is not physical intimidation, but it is equally destructive of human dignity.[26] The current practice of incommunicado interrogation is at odds with one of our Nation's most cherished principles—that the individual may not be compelled to incriminate himself. Unless adequate protective devices are employed to dispel the compulsion inherent in custodial surroundings, no statement obtained from the defendant can truly be the product of his free choice.

From the foregoing, we can readily perceive an intimate connection between the privilege against self-incrimination and police custodial questioning. It is fitting to turn to history and precedent underlying the Self-Incrimination Clause to determine its applicability in this situation.

[25] In the fourth confession case decided by the Court in the 1963 Term, Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963), our disposition made it unnecessary to delve at length into the facts. The facts of the defendant's case there, however, paralleled those of his co-defendants, whose confessions were found to have resulted from continuous and coercive interrogation for 27 hours, with denial of requests for friends or attorney. See United States v. Murphy, 222 F. 2d 698 (C.A. 2d Cir., 1955) (Frank, J.); People v. Bonino, 1 N.Y. 2d 752, 135 N.E. 2d 51 (1956).

[26] The absurdity of denying that a confession obtained under these circumstances is compelled is aptly portrayed by an example in Professor Sutherland's recent article, Crime and Confession, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 21, 37 (1965):

"Suppose a well-to-do testatrix says she intends to will her property to Elizabeth. John and James want her to bequeath it to them instead. They capture the testatrix, put her in a carefully designed room, out of touch with everyone but themselves and their convenient 'witnesses,' keep her secluded there for hours while they make insistent demands, weary her with contradictions and finally induce her to execute the will in their favor. Assume that John and James are deeply and correctly convinced that Elizabeth is unworthy and will make base use of the property if she gets her hands on it, whereas John and James have the noblest and most righteous intentions. Would any judge of probate accept the will so procured as the 'voluntary' act of the testatrix?"

We sometimes forget how long it has taken to establish the privilege against self-incrimination, the sources from which it came and the fervor with which it was defended. Its roots go back into ancient times.[27] Perhaps the critical historical event shedding light on its origins and evolution was the trial of one John Lilburn, a vocal anti-Stuart Leveller, who was made to take the Star Chamber Oath in 1637. The oath would have bound him to answer to all questions posed to him on any subject. The Trial of John Lilburn and John Wharton, 3 How. St. Tr. 1315 (1637–1645). He resisted the oath and declaimed the proceedings, stating:

> "Another fundamental right I then contended for, was, that no man's conscience ought to be racked by oaths imposed, to answer to questions concerning himself in matters criminal, or pretended to be so." Heller and Davies, The Leveller Tracts 1647–1653 (1944), 454.

On account of the Lilburn Trial, Parliament abolished the inquisitorial Court of Star Chamber and went further in giving him generous reparation. The lofty principles to which Lilburn had appealed during his trial gained popular acceptance in England.[28] These sentiments worked their way over to the Colonies and were implanted after great struggle into the Bill of Rights.[29] Those who framed our Constitution and the Bill of Rights were ever aware of subtle encroachments on individual liberty. They knew that "illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing . . . by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure." Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 635 (1886). The privilege was elevated to constitutional status and has always been "as broad as the mischief against which it seeks to guard." Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547, 562 (1892). We cannot depart from this noble heritage.

Thus we may view the historical development of the privilege as one which groped for the proper scope of governmental power over the citizens. As a "noble principle often transcends its origins," the privilege has come rightfully to be recognized in part as an individual's substantive right, a "right to a private enclave where he may lead a private life. That right is the hallmark of our democracy." United States v. Grunewald, 233 F. 2d 556, 579, 581–582 (Frank J., dissenting), rev'd. 353 U.S. 391 (1957). We have recently noted that the privilege against self-incrimination—the essential mainstay of our adversary system—is founded on a complex of values, Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52, 55–57, n. 5 (1964); Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S. 406, 414–415, n. 12 (1966). All these policies point to one overriding thought: the constitutional foundation underlying the privilege is the respect a government—state or federal—must accord to the dignity and integrity of its citizens. To maintain a "fair state-individual balance," to require the government "to shoulder the entire load," 8 Wigmore, Evidence (McNaughton rev., 1961), 317, to respect the inviolability of the human personality, our accusatory system of criminal justice demands that the government seeking to punish an individual produce the evidence against him by its own independent labors, rather than by the cruel, simple expedient of compelling it from his own mouth. Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 235–238 (1940). In sum, the privilege is fulfilled only when the person is guaranteed the right "to remain silent unless he chooses to speak in the unfettered exercise of his own will." Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 8 (1964).

The question in these cases is whether the privilege is fully applicable during a period of custodial interrogation. In this Court, the privilege has consistently been accorded a liberal construction. Albertson v. SACB, 382 U.S. 70, 81 (1965); Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486 (1951); Arndstein v. McCarthy, 254 U.S. 71, 72–73 (1920); Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547, 562 (1892). We are satisfied that all the principles embodied in the privilege apply to informal

[27] Thirteenth century commentators found an analogue to the privilege grounded in the Bible. "To sum up the matter, the principle that no man is to be declared guilty on his own admission is a divine decree." compulsion exerted by law-enforcement officers during in-custody questioning. An individual swept from familiar surroundings into police custody, surrounded by antagonistic forces, and subjected to the techniques of persuasion described above cannot be otherwise than under compulsion to speak. As a practical matter, the compulsion to speak in the isolated setting of the police station may well be greater than in courts or other official investigations, where there are often impartial observers to guard against intimidation or trickery.[30]

This question, in fact, could have been taken as settled in federal courts almost 70 years ago, when, in Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542 (1897), this Court held:

> "In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the Fifth Amendment . . . commanding that no person 'shall be compeled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.' "

In Bram, the Court reviewed the British and American history and case law and set down the Fifth Amendment standard for compulsion which we implement today:

> "Much of the confusion which has resulted from the effort to deduce from the adjudged cases what would be a sufficient quantum of proof to show that a confession was or was not voluntary, has arisen from a misconception of the subject to which the proof must address itself. The rule is not that in order to render a statement admissable the proof must be adequate to establish that the particular communications contained in a statement were voluntarily made, but it must be sufficient to establish that the making of the statement was voluntary; that is to say, that from the causes, which the law treats as legally sufficient to engender in the mind of the accused hope or fear in respect to the crime charged, the accused was not involuntarily impelled to make a statement, when but for the improper influences he would have remained silent. . . ." 168 U.S. at 549. And see, id., at 542.

The Court has adhered to this reasoning. In 1924, Mr. Justice Brandeis wrote for a unanimous Court in reversing a conviction resting on a compelled confession, Wan v. United States, 266 U.S. 1. He stated:

> "In the federal courts, the requisite of voluntariness is not satisfied by establishing merely that the confession was not induced by a promise or a threat. A confession is voluntary in law if, and only if, it was, in fact, voluntarily made. A confession may have been given voluntarily, although it was made to police officers, while in custody, and in answer to an examination conducted by them. But a confession obtained by compulsion must be excluded whatever may have been the character of the compulsion, and whether the compulsion was applied in a judicial proceeding or otherwise. Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532." 266 U.S., at 14–15.

In addition to the expansive historical development of the privilege and the sound policies which have nurtured its evolution, judicial precedent thus clearly establishes its application to incommunicado interrogation. In fact, the Government concedes this point as well established in No. 761, Westover v. United States, stating: "We have no doubt . . . that it is possible for a suspect's Fifth Amendment right to be violated during in-custody questioning by a law-enforcement officer."[31]

Because of the adoption by Congress of Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and this Courts effectuation of that Rule in McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943), and Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), we have had little occasion in the past quarter century to reach the constitutional issues in dealing with federal interrogations. These supervisory rules, requiring production of an arrested person before a commissioner "without unnecessary delay" and excluding evidence obtained in default of that statutory obligation, were nonetheless responsive to the same considerations of Fifth Amendment policy that unavoidably face us now as to the States. In McNabb, 318 U.S., at 343–344, and in Mallory, 354 U.S., at 455–456, we recognized both the dangers of interrogation and the appropriateness of prophylaxis stemming from the very fact of interrogation itself.[32]

Our decision in Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964), necessitates an examination of the scope of the privilege in state cases as well. In Malloy, we squarely held the privilege applicable to the States, and held that the substantive standards underlying the privilege applied with full force to state court proceedings. There, as in Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U. S. 52 (1964), and Griffin v. California, 380 U. S. 609 (1965), we applied the existing Fifth Amendment standards to the case before us. Aside from the holding itself, the reasoning in Malloy made clear what had already become apparent—that the substantive and procedural safeguards surrounding admissibility of confessions in state cases had become exceedingly exacting, reflecting all the policies embedded in the privilege, 378 U. S. at 7–8.[33] The voluntariness doctrine in the state cases, as Malloy indicates, encompasses all interrogation practices which are likely to exert such pressure upon an individual as to disable him from making a free and rational choice.[34] The implications of this proposition were elaborated in our decision in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478, decided one week after Malloy applied the privilege to the States.

Our holding there stressed the fact that the police had not advised the defendant of his constitutional privilege to remain silent at the outset of the interrogation, and we drew attention to that fact at several points in the decision, 378 U. S., at 483, 485, 491. This was no isolated factor, but an essential ingredient in our decision. The entire thrust of police interrogation there, as in all the cases today, was to put the defendant in such an emotional state as to impair his capacity for rational judgment. The abdication of the constitutional privilege—the choice on his part to speak to the police—was not made knowingly or competently because of the failure to apprise him of his rights; the compelling atmosphere of the in-custody interrogation, and not an independent decision on his part, caused the defendant to speak.

A different phase of the Escobedo decision was significant in its attention to the absence of counsel during the questioning. There, as in the cases today, we sought a protective device to dispel the compelling atmosphere of the interrogation. In Escobedo, however, the police did not relieve the defendant of the anxieties which they had created in the interrogation rooms. Rather, they denied his request for the assistance of counsel, 378 U. S., at 481, 488, 491.[35] This heightened his dilemma, and made his later statements the product of this compulsion. Cf. Haynes v. Washington, 373 U. S. 503, 513 (1963). The denial of the defendant's request for his attorney thus undermined his ability to exercise the privilege—to remain silent if he chose or to speak without any intimidation, blatant or subtle. The presence of counsel, in all the cases before us today, would be the adequate protective device necessary to make the process of police interrogation

[32] Our decision today does not indicate in any manner, of course, that these rules can be disregarded. When federal officials arrest an individual, they must as always comply with the dictates of the congressional legislation and cases thereunder. See generally, Hogan and Snee, The McNabb-Mallory Rule: Its Rise, Rationale and Rescue, 47 Geo. L.J. 1 (1958).

[33] The decisions of this Court have guaranteed the same procedural protection for the defendant whether his confession was used in a federal or state court. It is now axiomatic that the defendant's constitutional rights have been violated if his conviction is based, in whole or in part, on an involuntary confession, regardless of its truth or falsity. Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 544 (1961); Wan v. United States, 266 U.S. 1 (1924). This is so even if there is ample evidence aside from the confession to support the conviction, e.g., Malinski v. New York, 324 U. S. 401, 404 (1945); Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 540–542 (1897). Both state and federal courts now adhere to trial procedures which seek to assure a reliable and clear-cut determination of the voluntariness of the confession offered at trial, Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964); United States v. Carignan, 342 U.S. 36, 38 (1951); see also Wilson v. United States, 162 U.S. 613, 624 (1896). Appellate review is exacting, see Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963); Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960). Whether his conviction was in a federal or state court, the defendant may secure a post-conviction hearing based on the alleged involuntary character of his confession, provided he meets the procedural requirements, Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963); Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963). In addition, see Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52 (1964).

conform to the dictates of the privilege. His presence would insure that statements made in the government-established atmosphere are not the product of compulsion.

It was in this manner that Escobedo explicated another facet of the pre-trial privilege, noted in many of the Court's prior decisions: the protection of rights at trial.[36] That counsel is present when statements are taken from an individual during interrogation obviously enhances the integrity of the fact-finding processes in court. The presence of an attorney, and the warnings delivered to the individual, enable the defendant under otherwise compelling circumstances to tell his story without fear, effectively, and in a way that eliminates the evils in the interrogation process. Without the protections flowing from adequate warnings and the rights of counsel, "all the careful safeguards erected around the giving of testimony, whether by an accused or any other witness, would become empty formalities in a procedure where the most compelling possible evidence of guilt, a confession, would have already been obtained at the unsupervised pleasure of the police." Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 685 (1961) (HARLAN J., dissenting). Cf. Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965).

III

Today, then, there can be no doubt that the Fifth Amendment privilege is available outside of criminal court proceedings and serves to protect persons in all settings in which their freedom of action is curtailed from being compelled to incriminate themselves. We have concluded that without proper safeguards the process of in-custody interrogation of persons suspected or accused of crime contains inherently compelling pressures which work to undermine the individual's will to resist and to compel him to speak where he would not otherwise do so freely. In order to combat these pressures and to permit a full opportunity to exercise the privilege against self-incrimination, the accused must be adequately and effectively apprised of his rights and the exercise of those rights must be fully honored.

It is impossible for us to foresee the potential alternatives for protecting the privilege which might be devised by Congress or the States in the exercise of their creative rule-making capacities. Therefore we cannot say that the Constitution necessarily requires adherance to any particular solution for the inherent compulsions of the interrogation process as it is presently conducted. Our decision in no way creates a constitutional straitjacket which will handicap sound efforts at reform, nor is it intended to have this effect. We encourage Congress and the States to continue their laudable search for increasingly effective ways of protecting the rights of the individual while promoting efficient enforcement of our criminal laws. However, unless we are shown other procedures which are at least as effective in appraising accused persons of their right of silence and in assuring a continuous opportunity to exercise it, the following safeguards must be observed.

At the outset, if a person in custody is to be subjected to interrogation, he must first be informed in clear and unequivocal terms that he has the right to remain silent. For those unaware of the privilege, the warning is needed simply to make them aware of it—the threshold requirement for an intelligent decision as to its exercise. More important, such a warning is an absolute prerequisite in overcoming the inherent pressures of the interrogation atmosphere. It is not just the subnormal or woefully ignorant who succumb to an interrogator's imprecations, whether implied or expressly stated, that the interrogation will continue until a confession is obtained or that silence in the face of accusation is itself damning and will bode ill when presented to a jury.[37] Further, the warning will show the individual that his interrogators are prepared to recognize his privilege should he choose to exercise it.

"It is probable that even today, when there is much less ignorance about these matters than formerly, there is still a general belief that you must answer all questions put to you by a policeman, or at least that it will be the worst for you if you do not." Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England (1958), 32.

In accord with this decision, it is impermissible to penalize an individual for exercising his Fifth Amendment privilege when he is under police custodial interrogation. The prosecution may not, therefore, use at trial the fact that he stood mute or claimed his privilege in the face of accusation. Cf. Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965); Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 8 (1964); Comment, 31 U. Chi. L. Rev. 556 (1964); Developments in the Law—Confessions, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 935, 1041–1044 (1966). See also Braum v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 562 (1897).

The Fifth Amendment privilege is so fundamental to our system of constitutional rule and the expedient of giving an adequate warning as to the availability of the privilege so simple, we will not pause to inquire in individual cases whether the defendant was aware of his rights without a warning being given. Assessments of the knowledge the defendant possessed, based on information as to his age, education, intelligence, or prior contact with authorities, can never be more than speculation;[38] a warning is a clearcut fact. More important, whatever the background of the person interrogated, a warning at the time of the interrogation is indispensable to overcome its pressures and to insure that the individual knows he is free to exercise the privilege at that point in time.

The warning of the right to remain silent must be accompanied by the explanation that anything said can and will be used against the individual in court. This warning is needed in order to make him aware not only of the privilege, but also of the consequences of forgoing it. It is only through an awareness of these consequences that there can be any assurance of real understanding and intelligent exercise of the privilege. Moreover, this warning may serve to make the individual more acutely aware that he is faced with a phase of the adversary system—that he is not in the presence of persons acting solely in his interest.

The circumstances surrounding in-custody interrogation can operate very quickly to overbear the will of one merely made aware of his privilege by his interrogators. Therefore, the right to have counsel present at the interrogation is indispensable to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege under the system we delineate today. Our aim is to assure that the individual's right to choose between silence and speech remains unfettered throughout the interrogation process. A once-stated warning, delivered by those who will conduct the interrogation, cannot itself suffice to that end among those who most require knowledge of their rights. A mere warning given by the interrogators is not alone sufficient to accomplish that end. Prosecutors themselves claim that the admonishment of the right to remain silent without more "will benefit only the recidivist and the professional." Brief for the National District Attorneys Association as amicus curiae, p. 14. Even preliminary advice given to the accused by his own attorney can be swiftly overcome by the secret interrogation process. Cf. Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 485, n. 5. Thus, the need for counsel to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege comprehends not merely a right to consult with counsel prior to questioning, but also to have counsel present during any questioning if the defendant so desires.

The presence of counsel at the interrogation may serve several significant subsidiary functions as well. If the accused decides to talk to his interrogators, the assistance of counsel can mitigate the dangers of untrustworthiness. With a lawyer present the likelihood that the police will practice coercion is reduced, and if coercion is nevertheless exercised the lawyer can testify to it in court. The presence of a lawyer can also help to guarantee that the accused gives a fully accurate statement to the police and that the statement is rightly reported by the prosecution at trial. See Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, 443–448 (1958) (DOUGLAS, J., dissenting).

An individual need not make a pre-interrogation request for a lawyer. While such request affirmatively secures his right to have one, his failure to ask for a lawyer does not constitute a waiver. No effective waiver of the right to counsel during interrogation can be recognized unless specifically made after the warnings we here delineate have been given. The accused who does not know his rights and therefore does not make a request may be the person who most needs counsel. As the California Supreme Court has aptly put it:

> "Finally, we must recognize that the imposition of the requirement for the request would discriminate against the defendant who does not know his rights. The defendant who does not ask for counsel is the very defendant who most needs counsel. We cannot penalize a defendant who, not understanding his constitutional rights, does not make the formal request and by such failure demonstrates his helplessness. To require the request would be to favor the defendant whose sophistication or status has fortuitously prompted him to make it." People v. Dorado, 62 Cal. 2d 338, 351, 398 P. 2d 361, 369–370, 42 Cal. Rptr. 169, 177–178 (1965) (Tobriner, J.).

In Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 513 (1962), we stated: "[I]t is settled that where the assistance of counsel is a constitutional requisite, the right to be furnished counsel does not depend on a request." This proposition applies with equal force in the context of providing counsel to protect an accused's Fifth Amendment privilege in the face of interrogation.[39] Although the role of counsel at trial differs from the role during interrogation, the differences are not relevant to the question whether a request is a prerequisite.

Accordingly we hold that an individual held for interrogation must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation under the system for protecting the privilege we delineate today. As with the warnings of the right to remain silent and that anything stated can be used in evidence against him, this warning is an absolute prerequisite to interrogation. No amount of circumstantial evidence that the person may have been aware of this right will suffice to stand in its stead. Only through such a warning is there ascertainable assurance that the accused was aware of this right.

If an individual indicates that he wishes the assistance of counsel before any interrogation occurs, the authorities cannot rationally ignore or deny his request on the basis that the individual does not have or cannot afford a retained attorney. The financial ability of the individual has no relationship to the scope of the rights involved here. The privilege against self-incrimination secured by the Constitution applies to all individuals. The need for counsel in order to protect the privilege exists for the indigent as well as the affluent. In fact, were we to limit these constitutional rights to those who can retain an attorney, our decisions today would be of little significance. The cases before us as well as the vast majority of confession cases with which we have dealt in the past involve those unable to retain counsel.[40] While authorities are not required to relieve the accused of his poverty, they have the obligation not to take advantage of indigence in the administration of justice.[41] Denial of counsel to the indigent at the time of interrogation while allowing an attorney to those who can afford one would be no more supportable by reason or logic than the similar situation at trial and on appeal struck down in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), and Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963).

In order to fully apprise a person interrogated of the extent of his rights under this system then, it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. Without this additional warning, the admonition of the right to consult with counsel would often be understood as meaning only that he can consult with a lawyer if he has one or has the funds to obtain one. The warning of a right to counsel would be hollow if not couched in terms that would convey to the indigent—the person most often subjected to interrogation—the knowledge that he too has a right to have counsel present.[42]

As with the warnings of the right to remain silent and of the general right to counsel, only by effective and express explanation to the indigent of this right can there be assurance that he was truly in a position to exercise it.[43]

"When government chooses to exert its powers in the criminal area, its obligation is surely no less than that of taking reasonable measures to eliminate those factors that are irrelevant to just administration of the law but which, nevertheless, may occasionally affect determinations of the accused's liability or penalty. While government may not be required to relieve the accused of his poverty, it may properly be required to minimize the influence of poverty on its administration of justice."

[43] While a warning that the indigent may have counsel appointed need not be given to the person who is known to have an attorney or is known to have ample funds to secure one, the expedient of giving a warning is too simple and the rights involved too important to engage in ex post facto inquiries into financial ability when there is any doubt at all on that score.

Once warnings have been given, the subsequent procedure is clear. If the individual indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during questioning, that he wishes to remain silent, the interrogation must cease.[44] At this point he has shown that he intends to exercise his Fifth Amendment privilege; any statement taken after the person invokes his privilege cannot be other than the product of compulsion, subtle or otherwise. Without the right to cut off questioning, the setting of in-custody interrogation operates on the individual to overcome free choice in producing a statement after the privilege has been once invoked. If the individual states that he wants an attorney, the interrogation must cease until an attorney is present. At that time, the individual must have an opportunity to confer with the attorney and to have him present during any subsequent questioning. If the individual cannot obtain an attorney and he indicates that he wants one before speaking to police, they must respect his decision to remain silent.

This does not mean, as some have suggested, that each police station must have a "station house lawyer" present at all times to advise prisoners. It does mean, however, that if police propose to interrogate a person they must make known to him that he is entitled to a lawyer and that if he cannot afford one, a lawyer will be provided for him prior to any interrogation. If authorities conclude that they will not provide counsel during a reasonable period of time in which investigation in the field is carried out, they may do so without violating the person's Fifth Amendment privilege so long as they do not question him during that time.

If the interrogation continues without the presence of an attorney and a statement is taken, a heavy burden rests on the Government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 490, n. 14. This Court has always set high standards of proof for the waiver of constitutional rights, Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938), and we re-assert these standards as applied to in-custody interrogation. Since the State is responsible for establishing the isolated circumstances under which the interrogation takes place and has the only means of making available corroborated evidence of warnings given during incommunicado interrogation, the burden is rightly on its shoulders.

An express statement that the individual is willing to make a statement and does not want an attorney followed closely by a statement could constitute a waiver. But a valid waiver will not be presumed simply from the silence of the accused after warnings are given or simply from the fact that a confession was in fact eventually obtained. A statement we made in Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 516 (1962), is applicable here:

> "Presuming waiver from a silent record is impermissible. The record must show, or there must be an allegation and evidence which show, that an accused was offered counsel but intelligently and understandingly rejected the offer. Anything less is not waiver."

See also Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60 (1942). Moreover, where in-custody interrogation is involved, there is no room for the contention that the privilege is waived if the individual answers some questions or gives some information on his own prior to invoking his right to remain silent when interrogated.[45]

Whatever the testimony of the authorities as to waiver of rights by an accused, the fact of lengthy interrogation or incommunicado incarceration before a statement is made is strong evidence that the accused did not validly waive his rights. In these circumstances the fact that the individual eventually made a statement is consistent with the conclusion that the compelling influence of the interrogation finally forced him to do so. It is inconsistent with any notion of a voluntary relinquishment of the privilege. Moreover, any evidence that the [44] If an individual indicates his desire to remain silent, but has an attorney present, there may be some circumstances in which further questioning would be permissible. In the absence of evidence of overbearing, statements then made in the presence of counsel might be free of the compelling influence of the interrogation process and might fairly be construed as a waiver of the privilege for purposes of these statements.

[45] Although this Court held in Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367 (1951), over strong dissent, that a witness before a grand jury may not in certain circumstances decide to answer some questions and then refuse to answer others, that decision has no application to the interrogation situation we deal with today. No legislative or judicial factfinding authority is involved here, nor is there a possibility that the individual might make self-serving statements of which he could make use at trial while refusing to answer incriminating statements.

accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled into a waiver will, of course, show that the defendant did not voluntarily waive his privilege. The requirement of warnings and waiver of rights is a fundamental with respect to the Fifth Amendment privilege and not simply a preliminary ritual to existing methods of interrogation.

The warnings required and the waiver necessary in accordance with our opinion today are, in the absence of a fully effective equivalent, prerequisites to the admissibility of any statement made by a defendant. No distinction can be drawn between statements which are direct confessions and statements which amount to "admissions" for part or all of an offense. The privilege against self-incrimination protects the individual from being compelled to incrimnate himself in any manner; it does not distinguish degrees of incrimination. Similarly, for precisely the same reason, no distinction may be drawn between inculpatory." If a statement made were in fact truly exculpatory it would, of course, never be used by the prosecution. In fact, statements merely intended to be exculpatory by the defendant are often used to impeach his testimony at trial or to demonstrate untruths in the statement given under interrogation and thus to prove guilt by implication. These statements are incriminating in any meaningful sense of the word and may not be used without the full warnings and effective waiver required for any other statement. In Escobedo itself, the defendant fully intended his accusation of another as the slayer to be exculpatory as to himself.

The principles announced today deal with the protection which must be given to the privilege against self-incrimination when the individual is first subjected to police interrogation while in custody at the station or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any way. It is at this point that our adversary system of criminal proceedings commences, distinguishing itself at the outset from the inquisitorial system recognized in some countries. Under the system of warnings we delineate today or under any other system which may be devised and found effective, the safeguards to be erected about the privilege must come into play at this point.

Our decision is not intended to hamper the traditional function of police officers in investigating crime. See Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 492. When an individual is in custody on probable cause, the police may, of course, seek out evidence in the field to be used at trial against him. Such investigation may include inquiry of persons not under restraint. General on-the-scene questioning as to facts surrounding a crime or other general questioning of citizens in the fact-finding process is not affected by our holding. It is an act of responsible citizenship for individuals to give whatever information they may have to aid in law enforcement. In such situations the compelling atmosphere inherent in the process of in-custody interrogation is not necessarily present.[46]

In dealing with statements obtained through interrogation, we do not purport to find all confessions inadmissible. Confessions remain a proper element in law enforcement. Any statement given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences is, of course, admissible in evidence. The fundamental import of the privilege while an individual is in custody is not whether he is allowed to talk to the police without the benefit of warnings and counsel, but whether he can be interrogated. There is no requirement that police stop a person who enters a police station and states that he wishes to confess to a crime,[47] or a person who calls the police to offer a confession or any other statement he desires to make. Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred by the Fifth Amendment and their admissibility is not affected by our holding today.

To summarize, we hold that when an individual is taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom by the authorities and is subjected to questioning, the privilege against self-incrimination is jeopardized. Procedural safeguards must be employed to protect the privilege, and unless other fully effective means are adopted to notify the person of his right of silence and to assure that the exercise of the right will be scrupulously honored, the following measures are required. He must be warned prior to any questioning that he has the

[46] The distinction and its significance has been aptly described in the opinion of a Scottish court:
"In former times such questioning, if undertaken, would be conducted by police officers visiting the house or place of business of the suspect and there questioning him, probably in the presence of a relation or friend. However convenient the modern practice may be, it must normally create a situation very unfavourable to the suspect." Chalmers v. H. M. Advocate, [1954] Sess. Cas. 66, 78 (J. C.).

[47] See People v. Dorado, 62 Cal. 2d 338, 354, 398 P. 2d 361, 371, 42 Cal. Rptr. 169, 179 (1965).

right to remain silent, that anything he says can be used against him in a court of law, that he has the right to the presence of an attorney, and that if he cannot afford an attorney one will be appointed for him prior to any questioning if he so desires. Opportunity to exercise these rights must be afforded to him throughout the interrogation. After such warnings have been given, and such opportunity afforded him, the individual may knowingly and intelligently waive these rights and agree to answer questions or make a statement. But unless and until such warnings and waiver are demonstrated by the prosecution at trial, no evidence obtained as a result of interrogation can be used against him.[48]

IV

A recurrent argument made in these cases is that society's need for interrogation outweighs the privilege. This argument is not unfamiliar to this Court. See, e.g., Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 240–241 (1940). The whole thrust of our foregoing discussion demonstrates that the Constitution has prescribed the rights of the individual when confronted with the power of government when it provided in the Fifth Amendment that an individual cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself. That right cannot be abridged. As Mr. Justice Brandeis once observed:

> "Decency, security and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperilled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means . . . would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this Court should resolutely set its face." Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 485 (1928) (dissenting opinion).[49]

In this connection, one of our country's distinguished jurists has pointed out: "The quality of a nation's civilization can be largely measured by the methods it uses in the enforcement of its criminal law." [50]

If he individual desires to exercise his privilege, he has the right to do so. This is not for the authorities to decide. An attorney may advise his client not to talk to police until he has had an opportunity to investigate the case, or he may wish to be present with his client during any police questioning. In doing so an attorney is merely exercising the good professional judgment he has been taught. This is not cause for considering the attorney a menace to law enforcement. He is merely carrying out what he is sworn to do under his oath—to protect to the extent of his ability the right of his client. In fulfilling this responsibility the attorney plays a vital role in the adminisration of criminal justice under our Constitution.

In announcing these principles, we are not unmindful of the burdens which law enforcement officials must bear, often under trying circumstances. We also fully recognize the obligation of all citizens to aid in enforcing the criminal laws. This Court, while protecting individual rights, has always given ample latitude to law enforcement agencies in the legitimate exercise of their duties. The limits we have placed on the interrogation process should not constitute an undue interference with a proper system of law enforcement. As we have noted, our decision does not in any way preclude police from carrying out their traditional investigatory functions. Although confessions may play an important role in some convictions, the cases before us present graphic examples of the overstatement of the "need" for confessions. In each case authorities conducted interrogations ranging up to five days in duration despite the presence, through standard investigating practices, of considerable evidence against each defendant.[51] Further examples are chronicled in our prior cases.

[48] In accordance with our holdings today and in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 492, Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958) and Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504 (1958) are not to be followed.

[49] In quoting the above from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis we, of course, do not intend to pass on the constitutional questions involved in the Olmstead case.

[50] Schaefer, Federalism and State Criminal Procedure, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 26 (1956).

[51] Miranda, Vignera, and Westover were identified by eyewitnesses. Marked bills from the bank robbed were found in Westover's car. Articles stolen from the victim as well as from several other robbery victims were found in Stewart's home at the outset of the investigation.

It is also urged that an unfettered right to detention for interrogation should be allowed because it will often redound to the benefit of the person questioned. When police inquiry determines that there is no reason to believe that the person has committed any crime, it is said, he will be released without need for further formal procedures. The person who has committed no offense, however, will be better able to clear himself after warnings, with counsel present than without. It can be assumed that in such circumstances a lawyer would advise his client to talk freely to police in order to clear himself.

Custodial interrogation, by contrast, does not necessarily afford the innocent an opportunity to clear themselves. A serious consequence of the present practice of the interrogation alleged to be beneficial for the innocent is that many arrests "for investigation" subject large numbers of innocent persons to detention and interrogation. In one of the cases before us, No. 584, California v. Stewart, police held four persons, who were in the defendant's house at the time of the arrest, in jail for five days until defendant confessed. At that time they were finally released. Police stated that there was "no evidence to connect them with any crime." Available statistics on the extent of this practice where it is condoned indicate that these four are far from alone in being subjected to arrest, prolonged detention, and interrogation without the requisite probable cause.[53]

Over the years the Federal Bureau of Investigation has compiled an exemplary record of effective law enforcement while advising any suspect or arrested person, at the outset of an interview, that he is not required to make a statement, that any statement may be used against him in court, that the individual may obtain the services of an attorney of his own choice and, more recently, that he has a right to free counsel if he is unable to pay.[54] A letter received from the Solictor General in response to a question from the Bench makes it clear that the present pattern of warnings and respect for the rights of the individual followed as a practice by the FBI is consistent with the procedure which we delineate today. It states:

> "At the oral argument of the above cause, MR. JUSTICE FORTAS asked whether I could provide certain information as to the practices followed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I have directed these questions to the attention of the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and am submitting herewith a statement of the questions and of the answers which we have received.
> "'(1) When an individual is interviewed by agents of the Bureau, what warning is given to him?

[52] Dealing as we do here with constitutional standards in relation to statements made, the existence of independent corroborating evidence produced at trial is, of course, irrelevant to our decisions. Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 518–519 (1963); Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528, 537–538 (1963); Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 541 (1961); Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199, 206 (1960).

[53] See, e. g., Report and Recommendations of the Commissioner's Committee on Police Arrests for Investigation (1962); American Civil Liberties Union, Secret Detention by the Chicago Police (1959). An extreme example of this practice occurred in the District of Columbia in 1958. Seeking three "stocky" young Negroes who had robbed a restaurant, police rounded up 90 persons of that general description. Sixty-three were held overnight before being released for lack of evidence. A man not among the 90 arrested was ultimately charged with the crime. Washington Daily News, January 21, 1958, p. 5, col. 1; Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on H.R. 11477, S. 2970, S. 3325, and S. 3355 (July 1958), pp. 40, 78.

[54] In 1952, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, stated:

"Law enforcement, however, in defeating the criminal, must maintain inviolate the historic liberties of the individual. To turn back the criminal, yet, by so doing, destroy the dignity of the individual, would be a hollow victory.

"We can have the Constitution, the best laws in the land, and the most honest reviews by courts—but unless the law enforcement profession is steeped in the democratic tradition, maintains the highest in ethics, and makes its work a career of honor, civil liberties will continually—and without end—be violated. . . . The best protection of civil liberties is an alert, intelligent and honest law enforcement agency. There can be no alternative.

". . . Special Agents are taught that any suspect or arrested person, at the outset of an interview, must be advised that he is not required to make a statement and that any statement given can be used against him in court. Moreover, the individual must be informed that, if he desires, he may obtain the services of an attorney of his own choice."

Hoover, Civil Liberties and Law Enforcement: The Role of the FBI, 37 Iowa L. Rev. 175, 177–182 (1952).

" 'The standard warning long given by Special Agents of the FBI to both suspects and persons under arrest is that the person has a right to say nothing and a right to counsel, and that any statement he does make may be used against him in court. Examples of this warning are to be found in the Westover case at 342 F. 2d 685 (1965), and Jackson v. U.S., 337 F. 2d 136 (1964), cert. den. 380 U.S. 985.

" 'After passage of the Criminal Justice Act of 1964, which provides free counsel for Federal defendants unable to pay, we added to our instructions to Special Agents the requirement that any person who is under arrest for an offense under FBI jurisdiction, or whose arrest is contemplated following the interview, must also be advised of his right to free counsel if he is unable to pay, and the fact that such counsel will be asigned by the Judge. At the same time, we broadened the right to counsel warning to read counsel of his own choice, or anyone else with whom he might wish to speak.

" '(2) When is the warning given?

" 'The FBI warning is given to a suspect at the very outset of the interview, as shown in the Westover case, cited above. The warning may be given to a person arrested as soon as practicable after the arrest, as shown in the Jackson case, also cited above, and in U.S. v. Konigsberg, 336 F. 2d 844 (1964), cert. den. 379 U.S. 930, 933, but in any event it must precede the interview with the person for a confession or admission of his own guilt.

" '(3) What is the Bureau's practice in the event that (a) the individual requests counsel and (b) counsel appears?

" 'When the person who has been warned of his right to counsel decides that he wishes to consult with counsel before making a statement, the interview is terminated at that point, Shultz v. U.S., 351 F. 2d 287 (1965), It may be continued, however, as to all matters other than the person's own guilt or innocence. If he is indecisive in his request for counsel, there may be some question on whether he did or did not waive counsel. Situations of this kind must necessarily be left to the judgment of the interviewing Agent. For example, in Hiram v. U.S., 354 F. 2d 4 (1965), the Agent's conclusion that the person arrested had waived his right to cousel was upheld by the courts.

" 'A person being interviewed and desiring to consult counsel by telephone must be permitted to do so, as shown in Caldwell v. U.S., 351 F. 2d 459 (1965). When counsel appears in person, he is permitted to confer with his client in private.

" '(4) What is the Bureau's practice if the individual requests counsel, but cannot afford to retain an attorney?

" 'If any person being interviewed after warning of counsel decides that he wishes to consult with counsel before proceeding further the interview is terminated, as shown above. FBI Agents do not pass judgment on the ability of the person to pay for counsel. They do, however, advise those who have been arrested for an offense under FBI jurisdiction, or whose arrest is contemplated following the interview, of a right to free counsel if they are unable to pay, and the availability of such counsel from the Judge.' " [55]

The practice of the FBI can readily be emulated by state and local enforcement agencies. The argument that the FBI deals with different crimes than are dealt with by state authorities does not mitigate the significance of the FBI experience.[56]

The experience in some other countries also suggests that the danger to law enforcement in curbs on interrogation is overplayed. The English procedure since 1912 under the Judge's Rules is significant. As recently strengthened, the Rules require that a cautionary warning be given an accused by a police officer as soon as he has evidence that affords reasonable grounds for suspicion; they also [55] We agree that the interviewing agent must exercise his judgment in determining whether the individual waives his right to counsel. Because of the constitutional basis of the right, however, the standard for waiver is necessarily high. And, of course, the ultimate responsibility for resolving this constitutional question lies with the courts.

require that any statement made be given by the accused without questioning by police.[57] The right of the individual to consult with an attorney during this period is expressly recognized.[58]

The safeguards present under Scottish law may be even greater than in England. Scottish judicial decisions bar use in evidence of most confessions obtained through police interrogation.[59] In India, confessions made to police not in the presence of a magistrate have been excluded by rule of evidence since 1872, at a time when it operated under British law.[60] Identical provisions appear in the Evidence Ordinance of Ceylon, enacted in 1895.[61] Similarly, in our country the Uniform Code of Military Justice has long provided that no suspect may be interrogated without first being warned of his right not to make a statement and that any statement he makes may be used against him.[62] Denial of the right to consult counsel during interrogation has also been proscribed by military tribunals.[63] There appears to have been no marked detrimental effect on criminal law enforcement in these jurisdictions as a result of these rules. Conditions of

"II. As soon as a police officer has evidence which would afford reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person has committed an offence, he shall caution that person or cause him to be cautioned before putting to him any questions, or further questions, relating to that offence.

"The caution shall be in the following terms:

" 'You are not obliged to say anything unless you wish to do so but what you say may be put into writing and given in evidence.'

"When after being cautioned a person is being questioned, or elects to make a statement, a record shall be kept of the time and place at which any such questioning or statement began and ended and of the persons present.

"IV. All written statements made after caution shall be taken in the following manner:

"(a) If a person says that he wants to make a statement he shall be told that it is intended to make a written record of what he says.

"He shall always be asked whether he wishes to write down himself what he wants to say; if he says that he cannot write or that he would like someone to write it for him, a police officer may offer to write the statement for him . . . .

"(d) Whenever a police officer writes the statement, he shall take down the exact words spoken by the person making the statement, without putting any questions other than such as may be needed to make the statement coherent, intelligible and relevant to the material matters: he shall not prompt him."

The prior Rules appear in Devlin, The Criminal Prosecution in England (1958), 137–141.

Despite suggestions of some laxity in enforcement of the Rules and despite the fact some discretion as to admissibility is invested in the trial judge, the Rules are a significant influence in the English criminal law enforcement system. See, e. g., [1964] Crim. L. Rev., at 182; and articles collected in [1960] Crim. L. Rev., at 298–356.

[58] The introduction to the Judge's Rules states in part:

"These Rules do not affect the principles

"(c) That every person at any stage of an investigation should be able to communicate and consult privately with a solicitor. This is so even if he is in custody provided that in such a case no unreasonable delay or hindrance is caused to the processes of investigation or the administration of justice by his doing so . . . ." [1964] Crim. L. Rev., at 166–167.

[59] As stated by the Lord Justice General in Chalmers v. H. M. Advocate, [1954] Sess. Cas. 66, 78 (J. C.):

"The theory of our law is that at the stage of initial investigation the police may question anyone with a view to acquiring information which may lead to the detection of the criminal; but that, when the stage has been reached at which suspicion, or more than suspicion, has in their view centred upon some person as the likely perpetrator of the crime, further interrogation of that person becomes very dangerous, and, if carried too far, e. g., to the point of extracting a confession by what amounts to cross-examination, the evidence of that confession will almost certainly be excluded. Once the accused has been apprehended and charged he has the statutory right to a private interview with a solicitor and to be brought before a magistrate with all convenient speed so that he may, if so advised, emit a declaration in presence of his solicitor under conditions which safeguard him against prejudice."

"No confession made by any person whilst he is in the custody of a police officer unless it be made in the immediate presence of a Magistrate, shall be proved as against such person." Indian Evidence Act, § 26. See 1 Ramaswami & Rajagopalan, Law of Evidence in India (1962), 553–569. To avoid any continuing effect of police pressure or inducement, the Indian Supreme Court has invalidated a confession made shortly after police brought a suspect before a magistrate, suggesting: "[I]t would, we think, be reasonable to insist upon giving an accused person at least 24 hours to decide whether or not to make a confession." Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab, 44 All India Rep. 1957, Sup. Ct. 637, 644.

law enforcement in our country are sufficiently similar to permit reference to this experience as assurance that lawlessness will not result from warning an individual of his rights or allowing him to exercise them. Moreover, it is consistent with our legal system that we give at least as much protection to these rights as is given in the jurisdictions described. We deal in our country with rights grounded in a specific requirement of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, whereas other jurisdictions arrived at their conclusions on the basis of principles of justice not so specifically defined.[64]

It is also urged upon us that we withhold decision on this issue until state legislative bodies and advisory groups have had an opportunity to deal with these problems by rule making.[65] We have already pointed out that the Constitution does not require any specific code of procedures for protecting the privilege against self-incrimination during custodial interrogation. Congress and the States are free to develop their own safeguards for the privilege, so long as they are fully as effective as those described above in informing accused persons of their right of silence and in affording a continuous opportunity to exercise it. In any event, however, the issues presented are of constitutional dimensions and must be determined by the courts. The admissibility of a statement in the face of a claim that it was obtained in violation of the defendant's constitutional rights is an issue the resolution of which has long since been undertaken by this Court. See Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574 (1884). Judicial solutions to problems of constitutional dimension have evolved decade by decade. As courts have been presented with the need to enforce constitutional rights, they have found means of doing so. That was our responsibility when Escobedo was before us and it is our responsibility today. Where rights secured by the Constitution are involved, there can be no rule making or legislation which would abrogate them.

V

Because of the nature of the problem and because of its recurrent significance in numerous cases, we have to this point discussed the relationship of the Fifth Amendment privilege to police interrogation without specific concentration on the facts of the cases before us. We turn now to these facts to consider the application to these cases of the constitutional principles discussed above. In each instance, we have concluded that statements were obtained from the defendant under circumstances that did not meet constitutional standards for protection of the privilege.

No. 759. Miranda v. Arizona.

On March 13, 1963, petitioner, Ernesto Miranda, was arrested at his home and taken in custody to a Phoenix police station. He was there identified by the complaining witness. The police then took him to "Interrogation Room No. 2" of the detective bureau. There he was questioned by two police officers. The officers admitted at trial that Miranda was not advised that he had a right to have an attorney present.[66] Two hours later, the officers emerged from the interrogation room with a written confession signed by Miranda. At the top of the statement was a typed paragraph stating that the confession was made voluntarily, without threats or promises of immunity and "with full knowledge of my legal rights, understanding any statement I make may be used against me." [67]

At his trial before a jury, the written confession was admitted into evidence over the objection of defense counsel, and the officers testified to the prior oral confession made by Miranda during the interrogation. Miranda was found guilty of kidnapping and rape. He was sentenced to 20 to 30 years' imprisonment on each [64] Although no constitution existed at the time confessions were excluded by rule of evidence in 1872, India now has a written constitution which includes the provision that "No person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself." Constitution of India, Article 20(3). See Tope, The Constitution of India (1960), 63–67.

[66] Miranda was also convicted in a separate trial on an unrelated robbery charge not presented here for review. A statement introduced at that trial was obtained from Miranda during the same interrogation which resulted in the confession involved here. At the robbery trial, one officer testified that during the interrogation he did not tell Miranda that anything he said would be held against him or that he could consult with an attorney. The other officer stated that they had both told Miranda that anything he said would be used against him and that he was not required by law to tell them anything.

[67] One of the officers testified that he read this paragraph to Miranda. Apparently, however, he did not do so until after Miranda had confessed orally.

count, the sentences to run concurrently. On appeal, the Supreme Court of Arizona held that Miranda's constitutional rights were not violated in obtaining the confession and affirmed the conviction. 98 Ariz. 18, 401 P. 2d 721. In reaching its decision, the court emphasized heavily the fact that Miranda did not specifically request counsel.

We reverse. From the testimony of the officers and by the admission of respondent, it is clear that Miranda was not in any way apprised of his right to consult with an attorney and to have one present during the interrogation, nor was his right not to be compelled to incriminate himself effectively protected in any other manner. Without these warnings the statements were inadmissible. The mere fact that he signed a statement which contained a typed-in clause stating that he had "full knowledge" of his "legal rights" does not approach the knowing and intelligent waiver required to relinquish constitutional rights. Cf. Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 512–513 (1963); Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596, 601 (1948) (opinion of MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS).

No. 760. Vignera v. New York.

Petitioner, Michael Vignera, was picked up by New York police on October 14, 1960, in connection with th robbery three days earlier of a Brooklyn dress shop. They took him to the 17th Detective Squad headquarters in Manhattan. Sometime thereafter he was taken to the 66th Detective Squad. There a detective questioned Vignera with respect to the robbery. Vignera orally admitted the robbery to the detective. The detective was asked on cross-examination at trial by defense counsel whether Vignera was warned of his right to counsel before being interrogated. The prosecution objected to the question and the trial judge sustained the objection. Thus, the defense was precluded from making any showning that warnings had not been given. While at the 66th Detective Squad, Vignera was identified by the store owner and a saleslady as the man who robbed the dress shop. At about 3:00 p.m. he was formally arrested. The police then transported him to still another station, the 70th Precinct in Brooklyn, "for detention." At 11:00 p.m. Vignera was questioned by an assistant district attorney in the presence of a hearing reporter who transcribed the questions and Vignera's answers. This verbatim account of these proceedings contains no statement of any warnings given by the assistant district attorney. At Vignera's trial on a charge of first degree robbery, the detective testified as to the oral confession. The transcription of the statement taken was also introduced in evidence. At the conclusion of the testimony, the trial judge charged the jury in part as follows:

> "The law doesn't say that the confession is void or invalidated because the police officer didn't advise the defendant as to his rights. Did you hear what I said? I am telling you what the law of the State of New York is."

Vignera was found guilty of first degree robbery. He was subsequently adjudged a third-felony offender and sentenced to 30 to 60 years' imprisonment.[68] The conviction was affirmed without opinion by the Appellate Division, Second Department, 21 A. D. 2d 752, 252 N. Y. S. 2d 19, and by the Court of Appeals, also without opinion, 15 N. Y. 2d 970, 207 N. E. 2d 527, 259 N. Y. S. 2d 857, remittitur amended, 16 N. Y. 2d 614, 209 N.E. 2d 110, 261 N. Y. S. 2d 65. In argument to the Court of Appeals, the State contended that Vignera had no constitutional right to be advised of his right to counsel or his privilege against self-incrimination.

We reverse. The foregoing indicates that Vignera was not warned of any of his rights before the questioning by the detective and by the assistant district attorney. No other steps were taken to protect these rights. Thus he was not effectively apprised of his Fifth Amendment privilege or of his right to have counsel present and his statements are inadmissible.

No. 761. Westover v. United States.

At approximately 9:45 p.m. on March 20, 1963, petitioner, Carl Calvin Westover, was arrested by local police in Kansas City as a suspect in two Kansas City robberies. A report was also received from the FBI that he was wanted on a felony charge in California. The local authorities took him to a police station and placed him in a line-up on the local charges, and at about 11:45 p.m. he was booked. Kansas City police interrogated Westover on the night of his arrest. He denied any knowledge of criminal activities. The next day local officers interrogated him again throughout the morning. Shortly before noon they informed the FBI that they were through interrogating Westover and that the FBI could proceed to interrogate him. There is nothing in the record to indicate that Westover was ever given any warning as to his rights by local police. At noon, three special agents of the FBI continued the interrogation in a private interview room of the Kansas City Police Department, this time with respect to the robbery of a savings and loan association and a bank in Sacramento, California. After two or two and one-half hours, Westover signed separate confessions to each of these two robberies which had been prepared by one of the agents during the interrogation. At trial one of the agents testified, and a paragraph on each of the statements states, that the agents advised Westover that he did not have to make a statement, that any statement he made could be used against him, and that he had the right to see an attorney.

[68] Vignera thereafter successfully attacked the validity of one of the prior convictions, Vignera v. Wilkins, Civ. 9901 (D. C. W. D. N. Y. Dec. 31, 1961) (unreported), but was then resentenced as a second-felony offender to the same term of imprisonment as the original sentence. R. 31–33.

Westover was tried by a jury in federal court and convicted of the California robberies. His statements were introduced at trial. He was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run consecutively. On appeal, the conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. 342 F. 2d 684.

We reverse. On the facts of this case we cannot find that Westover knowingly and intelligently waived his right to remain silent and his right to consult with counsel prior to the time he made the statement.[69] At the time the FBI agents began questioning Westover, he had been in custody for over 14 hours and had been interrogated at length during that period. The FBI interrogation began immediately upon the conclusion of the interrogation by Kansas City police and was conducted in local police headquarters. Although the two law enforcement authorities are legally distinct and the crimes for which they interrogated Westover were different, the impact on him was that of a continuous period of questioning. There is no evidence of any warning given prior to the FBI interrogation nor is there any evidence of an articulated waiver of rights after the FBI commenced their interrogation. The record simply shows that the defendant did in fact confess a short time after being turned over to the FBI following interrogation by local police. Despite the fact that the FBI agents gave warnings at the outset of their interview, from Westover's point of view the warnings came at the end of the interrogation process. In these circumstances an intelligent waiver of constitutional rights cannot be assumed.

We do not suggest that law enforcement authorities are precluded from questioning any individual who has been held for a period of time by other authorities and interrogated by them without appropriate warnings. A different case would be presented if an accused were taken into custody by the second authority, removed both in time and place from his original surroundings, and then adequately advised of his rights and given an opportunity to exercise them. But here the FBI interrogation was conducted immediately following the state interrogation in the same police station—in the same compelling surroundings. Thus, in obtaining a confession from Westover the federal authorities were the beneficiaries of the pressure applied by the local in-custody interrogation. In these circumstances the giving of warnings alone was not sufficient to protect the privilege.

No. 584. California v. Stewart.

In the course of investigating a series of purse-snatch robberies in which one of the victims had died of injuries inflicted by her assailant, respondent, Roy Allen Stewart, was pointed out to Los Angeles police as the endorser of dividend checks taken in one of the robberies. At about 7:15 p.m., January 31, 1963, police officers went to Stewart's house and arrested him. One of the officers asked Stewart if they could search the house, to which he replied, "Go ahead." The search turned up various items taken from the five robbery victims. At the time of Stewart's arrest, police also arrested Stewart's wife and three other persons who were visiting him. These four were jailed along with Stewart and were interrogated. Stewart was taken to the University Station of the Los Angeles Police Department where he was placed in a cell. During the next five days, [69] The failure of defense counsel to object to the introduction of the confession at trial, noted by the Court of Appeals and emphasized by the Solicitor General, does not preclude our consideration of the issue. Since the trial was held prior to our decision in Escobedo and, of course, prior to our decision today making the objection available, the failure to object at trial does not constitute a waiver of the claim. See, e. g., United States ex rel. Anglet v. Fay, 333 F. 2d 12, 16 (C. A. 2d Cir. 1964), aff'd, 381 U.S. 654 (1965). Cf. Ziffrin, Inc. v. United States, 318 U. S. 73, 78 (1943).

police interrogated Stewart on nine different occasions. Except during the first interrogation session, when he was confronted with an accussing witness, Stewart was isolated with his interrogators.

During the ninth interrogation session, Stewart admitted that he had robbed the deceased and stated that he had not mean to hurt her. Police then brought Stewart before a magistrate for the first time. Since there was no evidence to connect them with any crime, the police then released the other four persons arrested with him.

Nothing in the record specifically indicates whether Stewart was or was not advised of his right to remain silent or his right to counsel. In a number of instances, however, the interrogating officers were asked to recount everything that was said during the interrogations. None indicated that Stewart was ever advised of his rights.

Stewart was charged with kidnapping to commit robbery, rape, and murder. At his trial, transcripts of the first interrogation and the confession at the last interrogation were introduced in evidence. The jury found Stewart guilty of robbery and first dgree murder and fixed the penalty as death. On appeal, the Supreme Court of California reversed. 62 Cal. 2d 571, 400 P. 2d 97, 43 Cal. Rptr. 201. It held that under this Court's decision in Escobedo, Stewart should have been advised of his right to remain silent and of his right to counsel and that it would not presume in the face of a silent record that the police advised Stewart of his rights.[70]

We affirm.[71] In dealing with custodial interrogation, we will not presume that a defendant has been effectively apprised of his rights and that his privilege againts self-incrimination has been adequately safeguarded on a record that does not show that any warnings have been given or that any effective alternative has been employed. Nor can a knowing and intelligent waiver of these rights be assumed on a silent record. Furthermore, Stewart's steadfast denial of the alleged offenses through eight of the nine interrogations over a period of five days is subject to no other construction than that he was compelled by persistent interrogation to forgo his Fifth Amendment privilege.

Therefore, in accordance with the foregoing, the judgments of the Supreme Court of Arizona in No. 759, or the New York Court of Appeals in No. 760, and of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in No. 761 are reversed. The judgment of the Supreme Court of California in No. 584 is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE CLARK, dissenting in Nos. 759, 760, and 761, and concurring in result No. 584.

[70] Because of this disposition of the case, the California Supreme Court did not reach the claims that the confession was coerced by police threats to hold his ailing wife in custody until he confessed, that there was no hearing as required by Jackson v. Denno, 378 U. S. 368 (1964), and that the trial judge gave an instruction condemned by the California Supreme Court's decision in People v. Morse, 60 Cal. 2d 631, 388 P. 2d 33, 36 Cal. Rptr. 201 (1964).

[71] After certiorari was granted in this case, respondent moved to dismiss on the ground that there was no final judgment from which the State could appeal since the judgment below directed that he be retried. In the event respondent was successful in obtaining an acquittal on retrial, however, under California law the State would have no appeal. Satisfied that in these circumstances the decision below constituted a final judgment under 28 U. S. C. § 1257(3) (1964 ed.), we denied the motion. 383 U. S. 903.

It is with regret that I find it necessary to write in these cases. However, I am unable to join the majority because its opinion goes too far on too little, while my dissenting brethren do not go quite far enough. Nor can I agree with the Court's criticism of the present practices of police and investigatory agencies as to custodial interrogation. The materials it refers to as "police manuals" [1] are, as I read them, merely writings in this field by professors and some police officers. Not one is shown by the record here to be the official manual of any police department, much less in universal use in crime detection. Moreover, the examples of police brutality mentioned by the Court are rare exceptions to the thousands of cases that appear every year in the law reports.[2] The police agencies—all the way from municipal and state forces to the federal bureaus—are responsible for law enforcement and public safety in this country. I am proud of their efforts, which in my view are not fairly characterized by the Court's opinion.

I

The ipse dixit of the majority has no support in our cases. Indeed, the Court admits that "we might not find the defendants' statements [here] to have been involuntary in traditional terms." Ante, p. ——. In short, the Court has added more to the requirements that the accused is entitled to consult with his lawyer and that he must be given the traditional warning that he may remain silent and that anything that he says may be used against him. Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 490–491 (1964). Now, the Court fashions a constitutional rule that the police may engage in no custodial interrogation without additionally advising the accused that he has a right under the Fifth Amendment to the presence of counsel during interrogation and that, if he is without funds, that counsel will be furnished him. When at any point during an interrogation the accused seeks affirmatively or impliedly to invoke his rights to silence or counsel, interrogation must be forgone or postponed. The Court further holds that failure to follow the new procedures requires inexorably the exclusion of any statement by the accused, as well as the fruits thereof. Such a strict constitutional specific inserted at the nerve center of crime detection may well kill the patient.[3] Since there is at this time a paucity of information and an almost total lack of empirical knowledge on the practical operation of requirements, truly comparable to those announced by the majority, I would be more restrained lest we go too far too fast.

Constitution has prescribed" its holding and where the light of our past cases, from Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, (1884), down to Haynes v. Washington, supra,

[2] As developed by my Brother HARLAN, post, pp. ——, ——, such cases, with the exception of the long-discredited decision in Brown v. United States, 168 U.S. 532 (1897), were adequately treated in terms of due process.

[3] The Court points to England, Scotland, Ceylon and India as having equally rigid rules. As my Brother HARLAN points out, post, pp. ——, ——, the Court is mistaken in this regard, for it overlooks counterbalancing prosecutorial advantages. Moreover, the requirements of the Federal Bureau of Investigation do not appear from the Solicitor General's letter, ante, pp. ——, ——, to be as strict as those imposed today in at least two respects: (1) The offer of counsel is articulated only as "a right to counsel"; nothing is said about a right to have counsel present at the custodial interrogation. (See also the examples cited by the Solicitor General, Westover v. United States, 342 F. 2d 684, 685 (1965) ("right to consult counsel"); Jackson v. United States, 337 F. 2d 136, 138 (1964) (accused "entitled to an attorney").) Indeed, the practice is that whenever the suspect "decides that he wishes to consult counsel before making a statement, the interview is terminated at that point . . . . When counsel appears in person, he is permitted to confer with his client in private." This clearly indicates that the FBI does not warn that counsel may be present during custodial interrogation. (2) The Solicitor General's letter states: "[T]hose who have been arrested for an offense under FBI jurisdiction, or whose arrest is contemplated following the interview, [are advised] of a right to free counsel if they are unable to pay, and the availability of such counsel from the Judge." So phrased, this morning does not indicate that the agent will secure counsel. Rather, the statement may well be interpreted by the suspect to mean that the burden is placed upon himself and that he may have counsel appointed only when brought before the judge or at trial—but not at custodial interrogation. As I view the FBI practice, it is not as broad as the one laid down today by the Court.

(1963). Recognition of this fact should put us on guard against the promulgation of doctrine rules. Especially is this true where the Court finds that "the are to the contrary. Indeed, even in Escobedo the Court never hinted that an affirmative "waiver" was a prerequisite to questioning; that the burden of proof as to waiver was on the prosecution; that the presence of counsel—absent a waiver—during interrogation was required; that a waiver can be withdrawn at the will of the accused; that counsel must be furnished during an accusatory stage to those unable to pay; nor that admissions and exculpatory statements are "confessions." To require all those things at one gulp should cause the Court to choke over more cases than Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958) and Ciccrnia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504 (1958), which it expressly overrules today.

The rule prior to today—as Mr. Justice Goldberg, the author of the Court's opinion in Escobedo, stated it in Haynes v. Washington—depended upon "a totality of circumstances evidencing an involuntary . . . admission of guilt." 373 U.S., at 514. And he concluded:

> "Of course, detection and solution of crime is, at best, a difficult and arduous task requiring determination and persistence on the part of all responsible officers charged with the duty of law enforcement. And, certainly, we do not mean to suggest that all interrogation of witnesses and suspects is impermissible. Such questioning is undoubtedly an essential tool in effective law enforcement. The line between proper and permissible police conduct and techniques and methods offensive to due process is, at best, a difficult one to draw, particularly in cases such as this where it is necessary to make fine judgments as to the effect of psychological coercive pressures and inducement on the mind and will of an accused . . . . We are here impelled to the conclusion, from all of the facts presented, that the bounds of due process have been exceeded." Id., at 515.

I would continue to follow that rule. Under the "totality of circumstances" rule of which my Brother Goldberg spoke in Haynes, I would consider in each case whether the police officer prior to custodial interrogation added the warning that the suspect might have counsel present at the interrogation and, further, that a court would appoint one at his request if he was too poor to employ counsel. In the absence of warnings, the burden would be on the State to prove that counsel was knowingly and intelligently waived or that in the totality of the circumstances, including the failure to give the necessary warnings, the confession was clearly voluntary.

Rather than employing the arbitrary Fifth Amendment rule[4] which the Court lays down I would follow the more pliable dictates of Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments which we are accustomed to administering and which we know from our cases are effective instruments in protecting persons in police custody. In this way we would not be acting in the dark nor in one full sweep changing the traditional rules of custodial interrogation which this Court has for so long recognized as a justifiable and proper tool in balancing individual rights against the rights of society. It will be soon enough to go further when we are able to appraise with somewhat better accuracy the effect of such a holding.

I would affirm the convictions in Miranda v. Arizona, No. 759; Vignera v. New York, No. 760; and Westover v. United States, No. 761. In each of those cases I find from the circumstances no warrant for reversal. In California v. Stewart, No. 584, I would dismiss the writ of certiorari for want of a final judgment, 28 U. S. C. § 1257 (3) (1964); but if the merits are to be reached I would affirm on the ground that the State failed to fulfill its burden, in the absence of a showing that appropriate warnings were given, of proving a waiver or a totality of circumstances showing voluntariness. Should there be a retrial, I would leave the State free to attempt to prove these elements.

[4] In my view there is "no significant support" in our cases for the holding of the Court today that the Fifth Amendment privilege, in effect, forbids custodial interrogation. For a discussion of this point see the dissenting opinion by my Brother WHITE, post, pp ——, ——.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

NOS. 759, 760, 761 AND 584.—OCTOBER TERM, 1965.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART and MR. JUSTICE WHITE join, dissenting.

I believe the decision of the Court represents poor constitutional law and entails harmful consequences for the country at large. How serious these consequences may prove to be only time can tell. But the basic flaws in the Court's justification seem to me readily apparent now once all sides of the problem are considered.

I. INTRODUCTION

At the outset, it is well to note exactly what is required by the Court's new constitutional code of rules for confessions. The foremost requirement, upon which later admissibility of a confession depends, is that a fourfold warning be given to a person in custody before he is questioned: namely, that he has a right to remain silent, that anything he says may be used against him, that he has a right to have present an attorney during the questioning, and that if indignant he has a right to a lawyer without charge. To forgo these rights, some affirmative statement of rejection is seemingly required, and threats, tricks, or cajolings to obtain this waiver are forbidden. If before or during questioning the suspect seeks to invoke his right to remain silent, interrogation must be forgone or cease; a request for counsel brings about the same result until a lawyer is procured. Finally, there are a miscellany of minor directives, for example, the burden of proof of waiver is on the State, admissions and exculpatory statements are treated just like confessions, withdrawal of a waiver is always permitted, and so forth.[1]

While the fine points of this scheme are far less clear than the Court admits, the tenor is quite apparent. The new rules are not designed to guard against police brutality or other unmistakably banned forms of coercion. Those who use third-degree tactics and deny them in court are equally able and destined to lie as skillfully about warnings and waivers. Rather, the thrust of the new rules is to negate all pressures, to reinforce the nervous or ignorant suspect, and ultimately to discourage any confession at all. The aim in short is toward "voluntariness" in a utopian sense, or to view it from a different angle, voluntariness with a vengeance.

To incorporate this notion into the Constitution requires a strained reading of history and precedent and a disregard of the very pragmatic concerns that alone may on occasion justify such strains. I believe that reasoned examination will show that the Due Process Clauses provide an adequate tool for coping with confessions and that, even if the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination be invoked, its precedents taken as a whole do not sustain the present rules. Viewed as a choice based on pure policy, these new rules prove to be a highly debatable if not one-sided appraisal of the competing interests, imposed over widespread objection, at the very time when judicial restraint is most called for by the circumstances.

[1] My discussion in this opinion is directed to the main questions decided by the Court and necessary to its decision; in ignoring some of the collateral points, I do not mean to imply agreement.

II. CONSTITUTIONAL PREMISES

It is most fitting to begin an inquiry into the constitutional precedents by surveying the limits on confessions the Court has evolved under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This is so because these cases show that there exists a workable and effective means of dealing with confessions in a judicial manner; because the cases are the baseline from which the Court now departs and so serve to measure the actual as opposed to the professed distance it travels; and because examination of them helps reveal how the Court has coasted into its present position.

The earliest confession cases in this Court emerged from federal prosecutions and were settled on a nonconstitutional basis, the Court adopting the common-law rule that the absence of inducements, promises, and threats made a confession voluntary and admissible. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574; Pierce v. United States, 160 U.S. 355. While a later case said the Fifth Amendment privilege controlled admissibility, this proposition was not itself developed in subsequent decisions.[2] The Court did, however, heighten the test of admissibility in federal trials to one of voluntariness "in fact," Wan v. United States, 266 U. S. 1, 14 (qoted, ante, p. 24), and then by and large left federal judges to apply the same standards the Court began to derive in a string of state court cases.

This new line of decisions, testing admissibility by the Due Process Clause, began in 1936 with Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, and must now embrace somewhat more than 30 full opinions of the Court.[3] While the voluntariness rubric was repeated in many instances, e.g., Lyons v. Oklahoma, 322 U.S. 596, the Court never pinned it down to a single meaning but on the contrary infused it with a number of different values. To travel quickly over the main themes, there was an initial emphasis on reliability, e.g., Ward v. Texas, 316 U.S. 547, supplemented by concern over the legality and fairness of the police practices, e.g., Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, in an "accusatorial" system of law enforcement, Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49, 54, and eventually by close attention to the individual's state of mind and capacity for effective choice, e.g., Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49. The outcome was a continuing re-evaluation on the facts of each case of how much pressure on the suspect was permissible.[4]

Among the criteria often taken into account were threats or imminent danger, e.g., Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560, physical deprivations such as lack of sleep or food, e.g., Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433, repeated or extended interrogation, e.g., Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, limits on access to counsel or friends, Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433; Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U.S. 504, length and illegality of detention under state law, e.g., Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, and individual weakness or incapacities, Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528. Apart from direct physical coercion, however, no single default or fixed combination of them guaranteed exclusion, and synopses of the cases would serve little use because the overall gauge has been steadily changing, usually in the direction of restricting admissibility. But to mark just what point had been reached before the Court jumped the rails in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, it is worth capsulizing the then-recent case of Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 573. There, Haynes had been held some 16 or more hours in violation of state law before signing the disputed confession, had received no warnings of any kind, and despite requests had been refused access to his wife or to counsel, the police

[2] The case was Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532 (quoted, ante, p. 23). Its historical premises were afterwards disproved by Wigmore, who concluded "that no assertions could be more unfounded." 3 Wigmore, Evidence § 823, at 250, n. 5 (3d ed. 1940). The Court in United States v. Carignan, 342 U.S. 36, 41, declined to choose between Bram and Wigmore, and Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 191, n. 35, cast further doubt on Bram. There are, however, several Court opinions which assume in dicta the relevance of the Fifth Amendment privilege to confessions. Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 see Sotwell Mfg. Co. v. United States, 371 U.S. 341, 347. On Bram and the federal confession cases generally, see Developments in the Law—Confessions, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 935, 959–961 (1966).

[4] Bator & Vorenberg, Arrest, Detention, Interrogation and the Right to Counsel. 66 Col. L. Rev. 62, 73 (1966): "In fact, the concept of involuntariness seems to be used by the courts as a shorthand to refer to practices which are repellent to civilized standards of decency or which, under the circumstances, are thought to apply a degree of pressure to an individual which unfairly impairs his capacity to make a rational choice." See Herman, The Supreme Court and Restrictions on Police Interrogation, 25 Ohio St. L. J. 449, 452–458 (1964); Developments, supra, n. 2, at 964–984.

indicating that access would be allowed after a confession. Emphasizing especially this last inducement and rejecting some contrary indicia of voluntariness, the Court in a 5-to-4 decision held the confession inadmissible.

There are several relevant lessons to be drawn from this constitutional history. The first is that with over 25 years of precedent the Court has developed an elaborate, sophisticated, and sensitive approach to admissibility of confessions. It is "judicial" in its treatment of one case at a time, see Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 635 (concurring opinion of THE CHIEF JUSTICE), flexible in its ability to respond to the endless mutations of fact presented, and ever more familiar to the lower courts. Of course, strict certainty is not obtained in this developing process, but this is often so with constitutional principles, and disagreement is usually confined to that borderland of close cases where it matters least.

The second point is that in practice and from time to time in principle, the Court has given ample recognition to society's interest in suspect questioning as an instrument of law enforcement. Cases countenancing quite significant pressures can be cited without difficulty,[5] and the lower courts may often have been yet more tolerant. Of course the limitations imposed today were rejected by necessary implication in case after case, the right to warning having been explicitly rebuffed in this Court many years ago. Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303; Wilson v. United States, 162 U.S. 613. As recently as Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 515, the Court openly acknowledged that questioning of witnesses and suspects "is undoubtedly an essential tool in effective law enforcement." Accord, Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, 441.

Finally, the cases disclose that the language in many of the opinions overstates the actual course of decision. It has been said, for example, that an admissible confession must be made by the suspect "in the unfettered exercise of his own will," Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 8, and that "a prisoner is not 'to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction,'" Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 581 (Frankfurter, J., announcing the Court's judgment and an opinion). Though often repeated, such principles are rarely observed in full measure. Even the word "voluntary" may be deemed somewhat misleading, especially when one considers many of the confessions that have been brought under its umbrella. See, e.g., supra, n. 5. The tendency to overstate may be laid in part to the flagrant facts often before the Court; but in all events one must recognize how it has tempered attitudes and lent some color of authority to the approach now taken by the Court.

I turn now to the Court's asserted reliance on the Fifth Amendment, an approach which I frankly regard as a trompe l'oeil. The Court's opinion in my view reveals no adequate basis for extending the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination to the police station. Far more important, it fails to show that the Court's new rules are well supported, let alone compelled, by Fifth Amendment precedents. Instead, the new rules actually derive from quotation and analogy drawn from precedents under the Sixth Amendment, which should properly have no bearing on police interrogation.

The Court's opening contention, that the Fifth Amendment governs police station confessions, is perhaps not an impermissible extension of the law but it has little to commend itself in the present circumstances. Historically, the privilege against self-incrimination did not bear at all on the use of extra-legal confessions, for which distinct standards evolved; indeed, "the history of the two principles is wide apart, differing by one hundred years in origin, and derived through separate lines of precedents . . . ." 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2266, at 401 (McNaughton rev. 1961). Practice under the two doctrines has also differed in a number of important respects.[6] Even those who would readily enlarge the privilege must concede some linguistic difficulties since the Fifth Amendment in terms proscribes only compelling any person "in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Cf. Kamisar, Equal Justice in The Gatehouses and Mansions of American Criminal Procedure, in Criminal Justice in Our Time 25–26 (1965).

[5] See the cases synopsized in Herman, supra, n. 4, at 456, nn. 36–39. One not too distant example is Stroble v. California, 343 U. S. 181, in which the suspect was kicked and threatened after his arrest, questioned a little later for two hours, and isolated from a lawyer trying to see him; the resulting confession was held admissible.

[6] Among the examples given in 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2266, at 401 (McNaughton rev. 1961), are these: the privilege applies to any witness, civil or criminal, but the confession rule protects only criminal defendants; the privilege deals only with compulsion, while the confession rule may exclude statements obtained by trick or promise; and where the privilege has been nullified—as by the English Bankruptcy Act—the confession rule may still operate.

Though weighty, I do not say these points and similar ones are conclusive, for as the Court reiterates the privilege embodies basic principles always capable of expansion.[7] Certainly the privilege does represent a protective concern for the accused and an emphasis upon accusatorial rather than inquisitorial values in law enforcement, although this is similarly true of other limitations such as the grand jury requirement and the reasonable doubt standard. Accusatorial values, however, have openly been absorbed into the due process standard governing confessions; this indeed is why at present "the kinship of the two rules [governing confessions and self-incrimination] is too apparent for denial." McCormick, Evidence 155 (1954). Since extension of the general principle has already occurred, to insist that the privilege applies as such serves only to carry over inapposite historical details and engaging rhetoric and to obscure the policy choices to be made in regulating confessions.

Having decided that the Fifth Amendment privilege does apply in the police station, the Court reveals that the privilege imposes more exacting restrictions than does the Fourteenth Amendment's voluntariness test.[8] It then emerges from a discussion of Escobedo that the Fifth Amendment requires for an admissible confession that it be given by one distinctly aware of his right not to speak and shielded from "the compelling atmosphere" of interrogation. See ante, pp. 27–28. From these key premises, the Court finally develops the safeguards of warning, counsel, and so forth. I do not believe these premises are sustained by precedents under the Fifth Amendment.[9]

The more important premise is that pressure on the suspect must be eliminated though it be only the subtle influence of the atmosphere and surroundings. The Fifth Amendment, however, has never been thought to forbid all pressure to incriminate one's self in the situations covered by it. On the contrary, it has been held that failure to incriminate one's self can result in denial of removal of one's case from state to federal court, Maryland v. Soper, 270 U.S. 9; in refusal of a military commission, Orloff v. Willoughby, 345 U.S. 83; in denial of a discharge in bankruptcy, Kaufman v. Hurwitz, 176 F. 2d 210; and in numerous other adverse consequences. See 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2272, at 440–444, n. 17 (McNaughton rev. 1961); Maguire, Evidence of Guilt § 2.062 (1959). This is not to say that short of jail or torture any sanction is permissible in any case; policy and history alike may impose sharp limits. See, e.g., Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609. However, the Court's unspoken assumption that any pressure violates the privilege is not supported by the precedents and it has failed to show why the Fifth Amendment prohibits that relatively mild pressure the Due Process Clause permits.

The Court appears similarly wrong in thinking that precise knowledge of one's rights is a settled prerequisite under the Fifth Amendment to the loss of its protections. A number of lower federal court cases have held that grand jury witnesses need not always be warned of their privilege, e.g., United States v. Scully, 225 F. 2d 113, 116, and Wigmore states this to be the better rule for trial witnesses. See 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2269 (McNaughton rev. 1961). Cf. Henry v. Mississippi, 379 U.S. 443, 451–452 waiver of constitutional rights by counsel despite defendant's ignorance held allowable). No Fifth Amendment precedent is cited for the Court's contrary view. There might of course be reasons apart from Fifth Amendment precedent for requiring warning or any other safeguard on questioning but that is a different matter entirely. See infra, pp. 13–15.

A closing word must be said about the Assistance of Counsel Clause of the Sixth Amendment, which is never expressly relied on by the Court but whose [7] Additionally, there are precedents and even historical arguments that can be arrayed in favor of bringing extra-legal questioning within the privilege. See generally Maguire, Evidence of Guilt § 2.03, at 15–16 (1959).

[8] This, of course, is implicit in the Court's introductory announcement that "[o]ur decision in Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) [extending the Fifth Amendment privilege to the States] necessitates an examination of the scope of the privilege in state cases as well." Ante, p. 25. It is also inconsistent with Malloy itself, in which extension of the Fifth Amendment to the States rested in part on the view that the Due Process Clause restriction on state confessions has in recent years been "the same standard" as that imposed in federal prosecutions assertedly by the Fifth Amendment, 378 U.S., at 7.

[9] I lay aside Escobedo itself; it contains no reasoning or even general conclusions addressed to the Fifth Amendment and indeed its citation in this regard seems surprising in view of Escobedo's primary reliance on the Sixth Amendment.

judicial precedents turn out to be linchpins of the confession rules announced today. To support its requirement of a knowing and intelligent waiver, the Court cites to Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, ante, p. 37; appointment of counsel for the indigent suspect is tied to Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, and Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, ante, p. 35; the silent-record doctrine is borrowed from Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, ante, p. 37, as is the right to an express offer of counsel, ante, p. 33. All these cases imparting glosses to the Sixth Amendment concerned counsel at trial or on appeal. While the Court finds no pertinent difference between judicial proceedings and police interrogation, I believe the differences are so vast as to disqualify wholly the Sixth Amendment precedents as suitable analogies in the present cases.[10]

The only attempt in this Court to carry the right to counsel into the station house occurred in Escobedo, the Court repeating several times that that stage was no less "critical" than trial itself. See 378 U.S. 485–488. This is hardly persuasive when we consider that a grand jury inquiry, the filing of a certiorari petition, and certainly the purchase of narcotics by an undercover agent from a prospective defendant may all be equally "critical" yet provision of counsel and advice on that score have never been thought compelled by the Constitution in such cases. The sound reason why this right is so freely extended for a criminal trial is the severe injustice risked by confronting an untrained defendant with a range of technical points of law, evidence, and tactics familiar to the prosecutor but not to himself. This danger shrinks markedly in the police station where indeed the lawyer in fulfilling his professional responsibilities of necessity may become an obstacle to truthfinding. See infra, n. 12. The Court's summary citation of the Sixth Amendment cases here seems to me best described as "the domino method of constitutional adjudication . . . wherein every explanatory statement in a previous opinion is made the basis for extension to a wholly different situation." Friendly, supra, n. 10, at 950.

III. POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

Examined as an expression of public policy, the Court's new regime proves so dubious that there can be no due compensation for its weakness in constitutional law. Forgoing discussion has shown, I think, how misaken is the Court in implying that the Constitution has struck the balance in favor of the approach the Court takes. Ante, p. 41. Rather, precedent reveals that the Fourteenth Amendment in practice has been construed to strike a different balance, that the Fifth Amendment gives the Court little solid support in this context, and that the Sixth Amendment should have no bearing at all. Legal history has been stretched before to satisfy deep needs of society. In this instance, however, the Court has not and cannot make the powerful showing that its new rules are plainly desirable in the context of our society, something which is surely demanded before those rules are engrafted onto the Constitution and imposed on every State and county in the land.

Without at all subscribing to the generally black picture of police conduct painted by the Court, I think it must be frankly recognized at the outset that police questioning allowable under due process precedents may inherently entail some pressure on the suspect and may seek advantage in his ignorance or weaknesses. The atmosphere and questioning techniques, proper and fair though they be, can in themselves exert a tug on the suspect to confess, and in this light "[t]o speak of any confessions of crime made after arrest as being 'voluntary' or 'uncoerced" is somewhat inaccurate, although traditional. A confession is wholly and incontestably voluntary only if a guilty person gives himself up to the law and becomes his own accuser." Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U. S. 143, 161 (Jackson, J., dissenting). Until today, the role of the Constitution has been only to sift out undue pressure, not to assure spontaneous confessions.[11]

The Court's new rules aim to offset these minor pressures and disadvantages intrinsic to any kind of police interrogation. The rules do not serve due process

[10] Since the Court conspicuously does not assert that the Sixth Amendment itself warrants its new police-interrogation rules, there is no reason now to draw out the extremely powerful historical and precedential evidence that the Amendment will bear no such meaning. See generally Friendly, The Bill of Rights as a Code of Criminal Procedure, 53 Calif. L. Rev. 929, 943–948 (1965).

[11] See supra, n. 4, and text. Of course, the use of terms like voluntariness involves questions of law and terminology quite as much as questions of fact. See Collins v. Beto, 348 F. 2d 823, 832 (concurring opinion); Bator & Vorenberg, supra, n. 4, at 72–73.

interests in preventing blatant coercion since, as I noted earlier, they do nothing to contain the policeman who is prepared to lie from the start. The rules work for reliability in confessions almost only in the Pickwickian sense that they can prevent some from being given at all.[12] In short, the benefit of this new regime is simply to lessen or wipe out the inherent compulsion and inequalities to which the Court devotes some nine pages of description. Ante, pp. 10–18.

What the Court largely ignores is that its rules impair, if they will not eventually serve wholly to frustrate, an instrument of law enforcement that has long and quite reasonably been thought worth the price paid for it.[13] There can be little doubt that the Court's new code would markedly decrease the number of confessions. To warn the suspect that he may remain silent and remind him that his confession may be used in court are minor obstructions. To require also an express waiver by the suspect and an end to questioning whenever he demurs must heavily handicap questioning. And to suggest or provide counsel for the suspect simply invites the end of the interrogation. See, supra, n. 12.

How much harm this decision will inflict on law enforcement cannot fairly be predicted with accuracy. Evidence on the role of confessions is notoriously incomplete, see Developments, supra, n. 2, at 941–944, and little is added by the Court's reference to the FBI experience and the resources believed wasted in interrogation. See infra, n. 19, and text. We do know that some crimes cannot be solved without confessions, that ample expert testimony attests to their importance in crime control,[14] and that the Court is taking a real risk with society's welfare in imposing its new regime on the country. The social costs of crime are too great to call the new rules anything but a hazardous experimentation.

While passing over the costs and risks of its experiment, the Court portrays the evils of normal police questioning in terms which I think are exaggerated. Albeit stringently confined by the due process standards interrogation is no doubt often inconvenient and unpleasant for the suspect. However, it is no less so for a man to be arrested and jailed, to have his house searched, or to stand trial in court, yet all this may properly happen to the most innocent given probable cause, a warrant, or an indictment. Society has always paid a stiff price for law and order, and peaceful interrogation is not one of the dark moments of the law.

This brief statement of the competing considerations seems to me ample proof that the Court's preference is highly debatable at best and therefore not to be read into the Constitution. However, it may make the analysis more graphic to consider the actual facts of one of the four cases reversed by the Court. Miranda v. Arizona serves best, being neither the hardest nor easiest of the four under the Court's standards.[15]

On March 3, 1963, an 18-year-old girl was kidnapped and forcibly raped near Phoenix, Arizona. Ten days later, on the morning of March 13, petitioner Miranda was arrested and taken to the police station. At this time Miranda was 23 years old, indigent, and educated to the extent of completing half the ninth grade. He had "an emotional illness" of the schizophrenic type, according to the doctor who eventually examined him; the doctor's report also stated that Miranda was "alert and oriented as to time, place, and person," intelligent within normal limits, competent to stand trial, and sane within the legal definition. At the police station, the victim picked Miranda out of a lineup, and two officers then took him into a separate room to interrogate him, starting about 11:30 a.m. Though at first [12] The Court's vision of a lawyer "mitigat[ing] the dangers of untrustworthiness" (ante, p. 32) by witnessing coercion and assisting accuracy in the confession is largely a fancy; for if counsel arrives, there is rarely going to be a police station confession. Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49, 59 (separate opinion of Jackson, J.): "[A]ny lawyer worth his salt will tell the suspect in no uncertain terms to make no statement to police under any circumstances." See Enker & Elsen, Counsel for the Suspect, 49 Minn. L. Rev. 47–66–68 (1964).

[13] This need is, of course, what makes so misleading the Court's comparison of a probate judge readily setting aside as involuntary the will of an old lady badgered and beleaguered by the new heirs. Ante, pp. 19–20, n. 26. With wills, there is no public interest save in a totally free choice; with confessions, the solution of crime is a countervailing gain, however the balance is resolved.

[14] See, e.g., the voluminous citations to congressional committee testimony and other sources collected in Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, 578–579 (Frankfurter, J., announcing the Court's judgment and opinion).

[15] In Westover, a seasoned criminal was practically given the Court's full complement of warnings and did not heed them. The Stewart case, on the other hand, involves long detention and successive questioning. In Vignera, the facts are complicated and the record somewhat incomplete.

denying his guilt, within a short time Miranda gave a detailed oral confession and then wrote out in his own hand and signed a brief statement admitting and describing the crime. All this was accomplished in two hours or less without any force, threats or promises and—I will assume this though the record is uncertain, ante, 53–54 & nn. 66–67—without any effective warnings at all.

Miranda's oral and written confessions are now held inadmissible under the Court's new rules. One is entitled to feel astonished that the Constitution can be read to produce this result. These confessions were obtained during brief, daytime questioning conducted by two officers and unmarked by any of the traditional indicia of coercion. They assured a conviction for a brutal and unsettling crime, for which the police had and quite possibly could obtain little evidence other than the victim's identifications, evidence which is frequently unreliable. There was, in sum, a legitimate purpose, no perceptible unfairness, and certainly little risk of injustice in the interrogation. Yet the resulting confessions, and the responsible course of police practice they represent, are to be sacrificed to the Court's own finespun conception of fairness which I seriously doubt is shared by many thinking citizens in this country.[16]

The tenor of judicial opinion also falls well short of supporting the Court's new approach. Although Escobedo has widely been interpreted as an open invitation to lower courts to rewrite the law of confessions, a significant heavy majority of the state and federal decisions in point have sought quite narrow interpretations.[17] Of the courts that have accepted the invitation, it is hard to know how many have felt compelled by their best guess as to this Court's likely construction; but none of the state decisions saw fit to rely on the state privilege against self-incrimination, and no decision at all has gone as far as this Court goes today.[18]

It is also instructive to compare the attitude in this case of those responsible for law enforcement with the official views that existed when the Court undertook three major revisions of prosecutorial practice prior to this case, Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, and Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335. In Johnson, which established that appointed counsel must be offered the indigent in federal criminal trials, the Federal Government all but conceded the basic issue, which had in fact been recently fixed as Department of Justice policy. See Beany, Right to Counsel 29–30, 36–42 (1955). In Mapp, which imposed the exclusionary rule on the States for Fourth Amendment violations, more than half of the States had themselves already adopted some such rule. See 367 U.S., at 651. In Gideon, which extended Johnson v. Zerbst to the States an amicus brief was filed by 22 States and Commonwealths urging that course; only two States besides the respondent came forward to protest. See 372 U.S., at 345. By contrast, in this case new restrictions on police questioning have been opposed by the United States and in an amicus brief signed by 27 States and Commonwealths, not including the three other States who are parties. No State in the country has urged this Court to impose the newly announced rules, nor has any State chosen to go nearly so far on its own.

The Court in closing its general discussion invokes the practice in federal and foreign jurisdictions as lending weight to its new curbs on confessions for all the States. A brief résumé will suffice to show that none of these jurisdictions has struck so one-sided a balance as the Court does today. Heaviest reliance is placed on the FBI practice. Differing circumstances may make this comparison quite untrustworthy,[19] but in all events the FBI falls sensibly short of the Court's formalistic rules. For example, there is no indication that FBI agents must obtain an affirmative "waiver" before they pursue their questioning. Nor is it clear that one invoking his right to silence may not be prevailed upon to change his mind. And the warning as to appointed counsel apparently indicates only that one will be assigned by the judge when the suspect appears before him; the thrust of the Court's rules is to induce the suspect to obtain appointed counsel before continuing the interview. See ante, pp. 46–48. Apparently American military practice, briefly mentioned by the Court, has these same limits and is still less favorable to the suspect than the FBI warning, making no mention of appointed counsel. Developments, supra, n. 2, at 1084–1089.

The law of the foreign countries described by the Court also reflects a more moderate conception of the rights of the accused as against those of society when other data is considered. Concededly, the English experience is most relevant. In that country, a caution as to silence but not counsel has long been mandated by the "Judges' Rules," which also place other somewhat imprecise limits on police cross-examination of suspects. However, in the court's discretion confessions can be and apparently quite frequently are admitted in evidence despite disregard of the Judges' Rules, so long as they are found voluntary under the common-law test. Moreover the check that exists on the use of pretrial statements is counterbalanced by the evident admissibility of fruits of an illegal confession and by the judge's often-used authority to comment adversely on the defendant's failure to testify.[20]

India, Ceylon and Scotland are the other examples chosen by the Court. In India and Ceylon the general ban on police-adduced confessions cited by the Court is subject to a major exception: if evidence is uncovered by police questioning, it is fully admissible at trial along with the confession itself, so far as it relates to the evidence and is not blatantly coerced. See Developments, supra, n. 2, at 1106–1110; Reg. v. Ramasamy [1965] A.C. 1 (P.C.). Scotland's limits on interrogation do measure up to the Court's; however, restrained comment at trial on the defendent's failure totake the stand is allowed the judge, and in many other respects Scotch law redresses the prosecutor's disadvantage in ways not permitted in this country.[21] The Court ends its survey by imputing added strength to our privilege against self-incrimination since, by contrast to other countries, it is embodied in a written Constitution. Considering the liberties the Court has today taken with constitutional history and precedent, few will find this emphasis persuasive.

In closing this necessarily truncated discussion of policy considerations attending the new confession rules, some reference must be made to their ironic untimeliness. There is now in progress in this country a massive reexamination of criminal law enforcement procedures on a scale never before witnessed. Participants in this undertaking include a Special Committee of the American Bar Association, under the chairmanship of Chief Judge Lumbard of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit; a distinguished study group of the American Law Institute, headed by Professor Vorenberg of the Harvard Law School; and the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, under the leadership of the Attorney General of the United States.[22] Studies are also being conducted by the District of Columbia Crime Commission, the [19] The Court's obiter dictum notwithstanding, ante, p. 48, there is some basis for believing that the staple of FBI criminal work differs importantly from much crime within the ken of local police. The skill and resources of the FBI may also be unusual.

Georgetown Law Center, and by others equipped to do practical research.[23] There are also signs that legislatures in some of the States may be preparing to reexamine the problem before us.[24]

It is no secret that concern has been expressed lest long-range and lasting reforms be frustrated by this Court's too rapid departure from existing constitutional standards. Despite the Court's disclaimer, the practical effect of the decision made today must inevitably be to handicap seriously sound efforts at reform, not least by removing options necessary to a just compromise of competing interests. Of course legislative reform is rarely speedy or unanimous, though this Court has been more patient in the past.[25] But the legislative reforms when they came would have the vast advantage of empirical data and comprehensive study, they would allow experimentation and use of solutions not open to the courts, and they would restore the initiative in criminal law reform to those forums where it truly belongs.

IV. CONCLUSIONS

All four of the cases involved here present express claims that confessions were inadmissible, not because of coercion in the traditional due process sense, but solely because of lack of counsel or lack of warnings concerning counsel and silence. For the reaasons stated in this opinion, I would adhere to the due process test and reject the new requirements inaugurated by the Court. On this premise my disposition of each of these cases can be stated briefly.

In two of the three cases coming from state courts, Miranda v. Arizona (No. 759) and Vignera v. New York (No. 760), the confessions were held admissible and no other errors worth comment are alleged by petitioners. I would affirm in these two cases. The other state case is California v. Stewart (No. 584), where the state supreme court held the confession inadmissible and reversed the conviction. In that case I would dismiss the writ of ceritorari on the ground that no final judgment is before us 28 U.S.C. § 1257 (1964ed.); putting aside the new trial open to the State in any event, the confession itself has not even been finally excluded since the California Supreme Court left the State free to show proof of a waiver. If the merits of the decision in Stewart be reached, then I believe it should be reversed and the case remanded so that state supreme court may pass on the other claims available to respondent.

In the federal case, Westover v. United States (No. 761), a number of issues are raised by petitioner apart from the one already dealt with in this dissent. None of these other claims appears to me tenable, nor in this context to warrant extended discussion. It is urged that the confession was also inadmissible because not voluntary even measured by due process standards and because federal-state cooperation brought the McNabb-Mallory rule into play under Anderson v. United States, 318 U.S. 350. However, the facts alleged fall well short of coercion in my view, and I believe the involvement of federal agents in petitioner's arrest and detention by the State too slight to invoke Anderson. I agree with the Government that the admission of the evidence now protested by petitioner was at most harmless error, and two final contentions—one involving weight of the evidence and another improper prosecutor comment—seem to me without merit. I would therefore affirm Westover's conviction.

In conclusion: Nothing in the letter or the spirit of the Constitution or in the precedents squares with the heavy handed and one-sided action that is so precipitously taken by the Court in the name of fulfilling its constitutional responsibilities. The foray which the Court takes today brings to mind the wise and farsighted words of Mr. Justice Jackson in Douglas v. Jeannette, 319 U.S. 157, 181 (separate opinion): "This Court is forever adding new stories to the temples of constitutional law, and the temples have a way of collapsing when one story too many is added."

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE STEWART join, dissenting.

I

The proposition that the privilege against self-incrimination forbids in-custody interrogation without the warning specified in the majority opinion and without a clear waiver of counsel has no significant support in the history of the privilege or in the language of the Fifth Amendment. As for the English authorities and the common-law history, the privilege, firmly established in the second half of the seventeenth century, was never applied except to prohibit compelled judicial interrogations. The rule excluding coerced confessions matured about 100 years later, "[b]ut there is nothing in the reports to suggest that the theory has its roots in the privilege against self-incrimination. And so far as the cases reveal, the privilege, as such, seems to have been given effect only in judicial proceedings including the preliminary examinations by authorized magistrates." Morgan, The Privilege Against Self-Incrimination, 34 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 18 (1949).

Our own constitutional provision provides that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." These words, when "[c]onsidered in the light to be shed by grammar and the dictionary . . . appear to signify simply that nobody shall be compelled to give oral testimony against himself in a criminal proceeding under way in which he is defendant." Corwin, The Supreme Court's Construction of the Self-Incrimination Clause, 29 Mich. L. Rev. 1, 2. And there is very little in the surrounding circumstances of the adoption of the Fifth Amendment or in the provisions of the then existing state constitutions or in state practice which would give the constitutional provision any broader meaning. Mayers, The Federal Witness' Privilege Against Self Incrimination: Constitutional or Common-Law? 4 American Journal of Legal History 107 (1960). Such a construction, however, was considerably narrower than the privilege at common law, and when eventually faced with the issues, the Court extended the constitutional privilege to the compulsory production of books and papers, to the ordinary witness before the grand jury and to witnesses generally. Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, and Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547. Both rules had solid support in common-law history, if not in the history of our own constitutional provision.

A few years later the Fifth Amendment privilege was similarly extended to encompass the then well-established rule against coerced confessions: "In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, commanding that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.'" Bram v. United States, 168 U.S. 532, 542. Although this view has found approval in other cases, Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475; Powers v. United States, 223 U.S. 303, 313; Shotwell v. United States, 371 U.S. 341, 347, it has also been questioned, see Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, 285;

United States v. Carignan, 342 U.S. 36, 41; Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, 191, n. 35, and finds scant support in either the English or American authorities, see generally Regina v. Scott, I Dear. & Bell 47; III Wigmore, Evidence § 823, at 249 ("a confession is not rejected because of any connection with the privilege against self-crimination"), 250, n. 5 (particularly criticizing Bram) (3d ed. 1940), VIII Wigmore, Evidence § 2266, at 400–401 (McNaughton ed. 1961). Whatever the source of the rule excluding coerced confessions, it is clear that prior to the application of the privilege itself to state courts, Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, the admissibility of a confession in a state criminal prosecution was tested by the same standards as were applied in federal prosecutions. Id., at 6–7, 10.

Bram, however, itself rejected the proposition which the Court now espouses. The question in Bram was whether a confession, obtained during custodial interrogation, had been compelled, and if such interrogation was to be deemed inherently vulnerable, the Court's inquiry could have ended there. After examining the English and American authorities, however, the Court declared that:

> "In this Court also it has been settled that the mere fact that the confession is made to a police officer, while the accused was under arrest in or out of prison, or was drawn out by his questions, does not necessarily render the confession involuntary, but, as one of the circumstances, such imprisonment or interrogation may be taken into account in determining whether or not statements of the prisoner were voluntary." 168 U.S., at 558.

In this respect the Court was wholly consistent with prior and subsequent pronouncements in this Court.

Thus prior to Bram the Court, in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, 583–587, had upheld the admissibility of a confession made to police officers following arrest, the record being silent concerning what conversation had occurred between the officers and the defendant in the short period preceding the confession. Relying on Hopt, the Court ruled squarely on the issue in Sparf and Hansen v. United States, 156 U.S. 51, 55:

> "Counsel for the accused insist that there cannot be a voluntary statement, a free open confession, while a defendant is confined and in irons under an accusation of having committed a capital offsense. We have not been referred to any authority in support of that position. It is true that the fact of a prisoner being in custody at the time he makes a confession is a circumstance not to be overlooked, because it bears upon the inquiry whether the confession was voluntarily made or was extorted by threats or violence or made under the influence of fear. But confinement or imprisonment is not in itself sufficient to justify the exclusion of a confession, if it appears to have been voluntary, and was not obtained by putting the prisoner in fear or by promises. Wharton's Cr. Ev. 9th ed. §§ 661, 663, and authorities cited."

Accord, Pierce v. United States, 160 U.S. 355, 357.

And in Wilson v. United States, 162 U.S. 613, 623, the Court had considered the significance of custodial interrogation without any antecedent warnings regarding the right to remain silent or the right to counsel. There the defendant had answered questions posed by a Commissioner, who had failed to advise him of his rights, and his answers were held admissible over his claim of involuntariness. "The fact that [a defendant] is in custody and manacled does not necessarily render his statement involuntary, nor is that necessarily the effect of popular excitement shortly preceding. . . . And it is laid down that it is not essential to the admissibility of a confession that it should appear that the person was warned that what he said would be used against him, but on the contrary, if the confession was voluntary, it is sufficient though it appear that he was not so warned."

Since Bram, the admissibility of statements made during custodial interrogation has been frequently reiterated. Powers v. United States, 223 U. S. 303, cited Wilson approvingly and held admissible as voluntary statements the accused's testimony at a preliminary hearing even though he was not warned that what he said might be used against him. Without any discussion of the presence or absence of warnings, presumably because such discussion was deemed unnecessary, numerous other cases have declared that "[t]he mere fact that a confession was made while in the custody of the police does not render it inadmissible," McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332, 346; accord, United States v. Mitchell, 322 U. S. 65, despite its having been elicited by police examination, Wan v. United States, 266 U.S. 1, 14; United States v. Carrignan, 342 U.S. 36, 39. Likewise, in Crooker v. California, 357 U. S. 433, the Court said that "the mere fact of police detention and police examination in private of one in official state custody does not render involuntary a confession by one so detained." And finally, in Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U. S. 504, a confession obtained by police interrogation after arrest was held voluntary even though the authorities refused to permit the defendant to consult with his attorney. See generally Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U. S. 568, 587–602 (opinion of Frankfurter, J.); III Wigmore, Evidence § 851, at 313 (3d ed. 1940); see also Joy, Confessions 38, 46 (1842).

Only a tiny minority of our judges who have dealt with the question, including today's majority, have considered in-custody interrogation, without more, to be a violation of the Fifth Amendment. And this Court, as every member knows, has left standing literally thousands of criminal convictions that rested at least in part on confessions taken in the course of interrogation by the police after arrest.

II

That the Court's holding today is neither compelled nor even strongly suggested by the language of the Fifth Amendment, is at odds with American and English legal history, and involves a departure from a long line of precedent does not prove either that the Court has exceeded its powers or that the Court is wrong or unwise in its present reinterpretation of the Fifth Amendment. It does, however, underscore the obvious—that the Court has not discovered or found the law in making today's decision, nor has it derived it from some irrefutable sources; what it has done is to make new law and new public policy in much the same way that it has in the course of interpreting other great clauses of the Constitution.[1] This is what the Court historically has done. Indeed, it is what it must do and will continue to do until and unless there is some fundamental change in the constitutional distribution of governmental powers.

But if the Court is here and now to announce new and fundamental policy to govern certain aspects of our affairs, it is wholly legitimate to examine the mode of this or any other constitutional decision in this Court and to inquire into the advisability of its end product in terms of the long-range interest of the country. At the very least the Court's text and reasoning should withstand analysis and be a fair exposition of the constitutional provision which its opinion interprets. Decisions like these cannot rest alone on syllogism, metaphysics or some ill-defined notions of natural justice, although each will perhaps play its part. In proceeding to such construction as it now announces, the Court should also duly consider all the factors and interests bearing upon the cases, at least insofar as the relevant materials are available; and if the necessary considerations are not treated in the record or obtainable from some other reliable source, the Court should not proceed to formulate fundamental policies based on speculation alone.

First, we may inquire what are the textual and factual bases of this new fundamental rule. To reach the result announced on the grounds it does, the Court must stay within the confines of the Fifth Amendment, which forbids self-incrimination only if compelled. Hence the core of the Court's opinion is that because of the "compulsion inherent in custodial surroundings, no statement obtained from [a] defendant [in custody] can truly be the product of his free choice," ante, at 20, absent the use of adequate protective devices as described by the Court. However, the Court does not point to any sudden inrush of new knowledge requiring the rejection of 70 years experience. Nor does it assert that its novel conclusion reflects a changing consensus among state courts, see Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, or that a succession of cases had steadily eroded the old rule and proved it unworkable, see Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335. Rather than asserting new knowledge, the Court concedes that it cannot truly know what occurs during custodial questioning, because of the innate secrecy of such proceedings. It extrapolates a picture of what it conceives to be the norm from police investigatorial manuals, published in 1959 and 1962 or earlier, without any attempt to allow for adjustments in police practices that may have occurred in the wake of more recent decisions of state appellate tribunals or this Court.

[1] Of course the Court does not deny that it is departing from prior precedent; it expressly overrules Crooker and Cicenia, ante, at 41, n. 47, and it acknowledges that "[i]n these cases . . . we might not find the statements to have been involuntary in traditional terms," ante, at 19.

But even if the relentless application of the described procedures could lead to involuntary confessions, it most assuredly does not follow that each and every case will disclose this kind of interrogation or this kind of consequence.[2] Insofar as it appears from the Court's opinion, it has not examined a single transcript of any police interrogation, let alone the interrogation that took place in any one of these cases which it decides today. Judged by any of the standards for empirical investigation utilized in the social sciences the factual basis for the Court's premise is patently inadequate.

Although in the Court's view in-custody interrogation is inherently coercive, it says that the spontaneous product of the coercion of arrest and detention is still to be deemed voluntary. An accused, arrested on probable cause, may blurt out a confession which will be admissible despite the fact that he is alone and in custody, without any showing that he had any notion of his right to remain silent or of the consequences of his admission. Yet, under the Court's rule, if the police ask him a single question such as "Do you have anything to say?" or "Did you kill your wife?" his response, if there is one, has somehow been compelled, even if the accused has been clearly warned of his right to remain silent. Common sense informs us to the contrary. While one may say that the response was "involuntary" in the sense the question provoked or was the occasion for the response and thus the defendant was induced to speak out when he might have remained silent if not arrested and not questioned, it is patently unsound to say the response is compelled.

Today's result would not follow even if it were agreed that to some extent custodial interrogation is inherently coercive. See Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, 161 (Jackson, J., dissenting). The test has been whether the totality of circumstances deprived the defendant of a "free choice to admit, to deny, or to refuse to answer," Lisenba v. California, 314 U.S. 219, 241, and whether physical or psychological coercion was of such a degree that "the defendant's will was overborne at the time he confessed," Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 513; Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528, 534. The duration and nature of incommunicado custody, the presence or absence of advice concerning the defendant's constitutional rights, and the granting or refusal of requests to communicate with lawyers, relatives or friends have all been rightly regarded as important data bearing on the basic inquiry. See, e. g., Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143; Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503.[3] But it has never been suggested, until today, that such questioning was so coercive and accused persons so lacking in hardihood that the very first response to the very first question following the commencement of custody must be conclusively presumed to be the product of an overborne will.

If the rule announced today were truly based on a conclusion that all confessions resulting from custodial interrogation are coerced, then it would simply have no rational foundation. Compare Tot. v. United States, 319 U.S. 463, 466; United States v. Romano, 382 U.S. 136. A fortiori that would be true of the extension of the rule to exculpatory statements, which the Court effects after a brief discussion of why, in the Court's view, they must be deemed incriminatory but without any discussion of why they must be deemed coerced. See Wilson v. United States, 162 U.S. 613, 624. Even if one were to postulate that the Court's concern is not that all confessions induced by police interrogation are coerced

[2] In fact, the type of sustained interrogation described by the Court appears to be the exception rather than the rule. A survey of 399 cases in one city found that in almost half of the cases the interrogation lasted less than 30 minutes. Barrett, Police Practices and the Law—From Arrest to Release or Charge, 50 Calif. L. Rev. 11, 41–45 (1962). Questioning tends to be confused and sporadic and is usually concentrated on confrontations with witnesses or new items of evidence, as these are obtained by officers conducting the investigation. See generally LaFave, Arrest: The Decision to Take a Suspect into Custody 386 (1965); ALI, Model Pre-Arraignment Procedure Code, Commentary § 5.01, at 170, n. 4 (Tent. Draft No. 1, 1966).

[3] By contrast, the Court indicates that in applying this new rule it "will not pause to inquire in individual cases whether the defendant was aware of his rights without a warning being given." Ante, at 31. The reason given is that assessment of the knowledge of the defendant based on information as to age, education, intelligence, or prior contact with authorities can never be more than speculation, while a warning is a clear-cut fact. But the officers' claim that they gave the requisite warnings may be disputed, and facts respecting the defendant's prior experience may be undisputed and be of such a nature as to virtually preclude any doubt that the defendant knew of his rights. See United States v. Bolden, 355 F. 2d 453 (C. A. 7th Cir. 1965), petition for cert. pending No. 1146 O. T. 1965 (secret service agent); People v. DuBond, 235 Cal. App. 2d 844, 45 Cal. Rptr. 717, pet. for cert. pending No. 1053 Misc. O. T. 1965 (former police officer).

but rather that some such confessions are coerced and present judicial procedures are believed to be inadequate to identify the confessions that are coerced and those that are not, it would still not be essential to impose the rule that the Court has now fashioned. Transcripts or observers could be required, specific time limits, tailored to fit the cause, could be imposed, or other devices could be utilized to reduce the chances that otherwise indiscernible coercion will produce an inadmissible confession.

On the other hand, even if one assumed that there was an adequate factual basis for the conclusion that all confessions obtained during in-custody interrogation are the product of compulsion, the rule propounded by the Court would still be irrational, for, apparently, it is only if the accused is also warned of his right to counsel and waives both that right and the right against self-incrimination that the inherent compulsiveness of interrogation disappears. But if the defendant may not answer without a warning a question such as "Where were you last night?" without having his answer be a compelled one, how can the court ever accept his negative answer to the question of whether he wants to consult his retained counsel or counsel whom the court will appoint? And why if counsel is present and the accused nevertheless confesses, or counsel tells the accused to tell the truth, and that is what the accused does, is the situation any less coercive insofar as the accused is concerned? The court apparently realizes its dilemma of foreclosing questioning without the necessary warnings but at the same time permitting the accused, sitting in the same chair in front of the same policemen, to waive his right to consult an attorney. It expects, however, that not too many will waive the right; and if it is claimed that he has, the State faces a severe, if not impossible burden of proof.

All of this makes very little sense in terms of the compulsion which the Fifth Amendment proscribes. That amendment deals with compelling the accused himself. It is his free will that is involved. Confessions and incriminating admissions, as such, are not forbidden evidence; only those which are compelled are banned. I doubt that the Court observes these distinctions today. By considering any answers to any interrogation to be compelled regardless of the content and course of examination and by escalating the requirements to prove waiver, the Court not only prevents the use of compelled confessions but for all practical purposes forbids interrogation except in the presence of counsel. That is, instead of confining itself to protection of the right against compelled self-incrimination the Court has created a limited Fifth Amendment right to counsel—or, as the Court expresses it, a "right to counsel to protect the Fifth Amendment privilege . . . ." Ante, at 32. The focus then is not on the will of the accused but on the will of counsel and how much influence he can have on the accused. Obviously there is no warrant in the Fifth Amendment for thus installing counsel as the arbiter of the privilege.

In sum, for all the Court's expounding on the menacing atmosphere of police interrogation procedures it has failed to supply any foundation for the conclusions it draws or the measures it adopts.

Criticism of the Court's opinion, however, cannot stop at a demonstration that the factual and textual bases for the rule it propounds are, at best, less than compelling. Equally relevant is an assessment of the rule's consequences measured against community values. The Court's duty to assess the consequences of its action is not satisfied by the utterance of the truth that a value of our system of criminal justice is "to respect the inviolability of the human personality" and to require government to produce the evidence against the accused by its own independent labors. Ante, at 22. More than the human dignity of the accused is involved; the human personality of others in the society must also be preserved. Thus the values reflected by the privilege are not the sole desideratum; society's interest in the general security is of equal weight.

The obvious underpinning of the Court's decision is a deep-seated distrust of all confessions. As the Court declares that the accused may not be interrogated without counsel present, absent a waiver of the right to counsel, and as the Court all but admonishes the lawyer to advise the accused to remain silent, the result adds up to a judicial judgment that evidence from the accused should not be used against him in any way, whether compelled or not. This is the not so subtle overtone of the opinion—that it is inherently wrong for the police to gather evidence from the accused himself. And this is precisely the nub of this dissent. I see nothing wrong or immoral and certainly nothing unconstitutional, with the police asking a suspect whom they have reasonable cause to arrest whether or not he killed his wife or with confronting him with the evidence on which the arrest was based, at least where he has been plainly advised that he may remain completely silent, see Escobedo v. Illinios, 378 U.S. 478, 499 (dissenting opinion). Until today, "the admissions or confessions of the prisoner, when voluntarily and freely made, have always ranked high in the scale of incriminating evidence." Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591, 596; see also Hopt v. Utah, 110 U.S. 574, 584–585. Particularly when corroborated, as where the police have confirmed the accused's disclosure of the hiding place of implements or fruits of the crime, such confessions have the highest reliability and significantly contribute to the certitude with which we may believe the accused is guilty. Moreover, it is by no means certain that the process of confessing is injurious to the accused. To the contrary it may provide psychological relief and enhance the prospects for rehabilitation.

This is not to say that the value of respect for the inviolability of the accused's individual personality should be accorded no weight or that all confessions should be indiscriminately admitted. This Court has long read the Constitution to proscribe compelled confessions, a salutory rule from which there should be no retreat. But I see no sound basis, factual or otherwise, and the Court gives none, for concluding that the present rule against the receipt of coerced confessions is inadequate for the task of sorting out inadmissible evidence and must be replaced by the per se rule which is now imposed. Even if the new concept can be said to have advantages of some sort over the present law, they are far outweighed by its likely undesirable impact on other very relevant and important interests.

The most basic function of any government is to provide for the security of the individual and of his property. Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 455. These ends of society are served by the criminal laws which for the most part are aimed at the prevention of crime. Without the reasonably effective performance of the task of preventing private violence and retaliation, it is idle to talk about human dignity and civilized values.

The modes by which the criminal laws serve the interest in general security are many. First the murderer who has taken the life of another is removed from the streets, deprived of his liberty and thereby prevented from repeating his offense. In view of the statistics on recidivism in this county [4] and of the number of instances in which apprehension occurs only after repeated offenses, no one can sensibly claim that this aspect of the criminal law does not prevent crime or contribute significantly to the personal security of the ordinary citizen.

Secondly, the swift and sure apprehension of those who refuse to respect the personal security and dignity of their neighbor unquestionably has its impact on others who might be similarly tempted. That the criminal law is wholly or partly ineffective with a segment of the population or with many of these who have been apprehended and convicted is a very faulty basis for concluding that

[4] Precise statistics on the extent of recidivism are unavailable, in part because not all crimes are solved and in part because criminal records of convictions in different jurisdictions are not brought together by a central data collection agency. Beginning in 1963, however, the Federal Bureau of Investigation began collating data on "Careers in Crime," which it publishes in its Uniform Crime Reports. Of 192,869 offenders processed in 1963 and 1964, 76 % had a prior arrest record on some charge. Over a period of 10 years the group had accumulated 434,000 charges. FBI, Uniform Crime Reports—1964, 27–28. In 1963 and 1964 between 23% and 25% of all offenders sentenced in 88 federal district courts (excluding the District Court for the District of Columbia) whose criminal records were reported had previously been sentenced to a term of imprisonment of 13 months or more. Approximately an additional 40% had a prior record less than prison (juvenile record, probation record, etc.). Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Federal Offenders in the United States District Courts: 1964, x, 36 (hereinafter cited as Federal Offenders: 1964); Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Federal Offenders in the United States District Courts: 1963, 25–27 (hereinafter cited as Federal Offenders: 1963). During the same two years in the District Court for the District of Columbia between 28% and 35% of those sentenced had prior prison records and from 37% to 40% had a prior record less than prison. Federal Offenders: 1964, xii, 64, 66; Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Federal Offenders in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia: 1963, S, 10 (hereinafter cited as District of Columbia Offenders: 1963).

A similar picture is obtained if one looks at the subsequent records of those released from confinement. In 1964, 12.3% of persons on federal probation had their probation revoked because of the commission of major violations (defined as one in which the probationer has been committed to imprisonment for a period of 90 days or more, been placed on probation for over one year on a new offense, or has absconded with felony charges outstanding). Twenty-three and two-tenths percent of parolees and 16.9% of those who had been mandatorily released after service of a portion of their sentence likewise committed major violations. Reports of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States and Annual Report of the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts: 1965, 138. See also Mandel et al., Recidivism Studied and Defined, 56 J. of Crim. L., C. & P. S. 59 (1965) (within five years of release 62.33% of sample had committed offenses placing them in recidivist category).

it is not effective with respect to the great bulk of our citizens or for thinking that without the criminals laws, or in the absence of their enforcement, there would be no increase in crime. Arguments of this nature are not borne out by any kind of reliable evidence that I have seen to this date.

Thirdly, the law concerns itself with those whom it has confined. The hope and aim of modern penalogy, fortunately, is as soon as possible to return the convict to society a better and more law-abiding man than when he entered. Sometimes there is success, sometimes failure. But at least the effort is made, and it should be made to the very maximum extent of our present and future capabilities.

The rule announced today will measurably weaken the ability of the criminal law to perform in these tasks. It is a deliberate calculus to prevent interrogations, to reduce the incidence of confessions and pleas of guilty and to increase the number of trials.[5] Criminal trials, no matter how efficient the police are, are not sure bets for the prosecution, nor should they be if the evidence is not forthcoming. Under the present law, the prosecution fails to prove its case in about 30% of the criminal cases actually tried in the federal courts. See Federal Offenders: 1964, supra, note 4, at 6 (Table 4), 59 (Table 1); Federal Offenders: 1963, supra, note 4, at 5 (Table 3); District of Columbia Offenders: 1963, supra, note 4, at 2 (Table 1). But it is something else again to remove from the ordinary criminal case all those confessions which heretofore have been held to be free and voluntary acts of the accused and to thus establish a new constitutional barrier to the ascertainment of truth by the judicial process. There is, in my view, every reason to believe that a good many criminal defendants, who otherwise would have been convicted on what this Court has previously thought to be the most satisfactory kind of evidence, will now, under this new version of the Fifth Amendment, either not be tried at all or acquitted if the State's evidence, minus the confession, is put to the test of litigation.

I have no desire whatsoever to share the responsibility for any such impact on the present criminal process.

In some unknown number of cases the Court's rule will return a killer, a rapist or other criminal to the streets and to the environment which produced him, to repeat his crime whenever it pleases him. As a consequence, there will not be a gain, but a loss, in human dignity. The real concern is not the unfortunate consequences of this new decision on the criminal law as an abstract, disembodied series of authoritative proscriptions, but the impact on those who rely on the public authority for protection and who without it can only engage in violent self-help with guns, knives and the help of their neighbors similarly inclined. There is, of course, a saving factor: the next victims are uncertain, unnamed and unrepresented in this case.

Nor can this decision do other than have a corrosive effect on the criminal law as an effective device to prevent crime. A major component in its effectiveness in this regard is its swift and sure enforcement The easier it is to get away with rape and murder, the less the deterrent effect on those who are inclined to attempt it. This is still good common sense. If it were not, we should posthaste liquidate the whole law enforcement establishment as a useless, misguided effort to control human conduct.

And what about the accused who has confessed or would confess in response to simple, noncoercive questioning and whose guilt could not otherwise be proved? Is it so clear that release is the best thing for him in every case? Has it so unquestionably been resolved that in each and every case it would be better for him not to confess and to return to his environment with no attempt whatsoever to [5] Eighty-eight federal district courts (excluding the District Court for the District of Columbia) disposed of the cases of 33,381 criminal defendants in 1964. Only 12.5% of those cases were actually tried. Of the remaining cases, 89.9% were terminated by convictions upon pleas of guilty and 10.1% were dismissed. Stated differently, approximately 90% of all convictions resulted from guilty pleas. Federal Offenders: 1964, supra, note 4, 3–6. In the District Court for the District of Columbia a higher percentage, 27%, went to trial, and the defendant pleaded guilty in approximately 78% of the cases terminated prior to trial. Id. at 58–59. No reliable statistics are available concerning the percentage of cases in which guilty pleas are induced because of the existence of a confession or of physical evidence unearthed as a result of a confession. Undoubtedly the number of such cases is substantial.

Perhaps of equal significance is the number of instances of known crimes which are not solved. In 1964, only 388,946, or 23.9% of 1,626,574 serious known offenses were cleared. The clearance rate ranged from 89.8% for homicides to 18.7% for larceny. FBI, Uniform Crime Reports—1964, 20–22, 101. Those who would replace interrogation as an investigatorial tool by modern scientific investigation techniques significantly overestimates the effectiveness of present procedures, even when interrogation is included.

help him? I think not. It may well be that in many cases it will be no less than a callous disregard for his own welfare as well as for the interests of his next victim.

There is another aspect to the effect of the Court's rule on the person whom the police have arrested on probable cause. The fact is that he may not be guilty at all and may be able to extricate himself quickly and simply if he were told the circumstances of his arrest and were asked to explain. This effort, and his release, must now await the hiring of a lawyer or his appointment by the court, consultation with counsel and then a session with the police or prosecutor. Similarly, where probable cause exists to arrest several suspects, as where the body of the victim is discovered in a house having several residents, see Johnson v. State, 238 Md. 140, 207 A. 2d 643 (1965), pet. for cert. pending No. 274 Misc. O. T. 1965, it will often be true that a suspect may be cleared only through the results of interrogation of other suspects. Here too the release of the innocent may be delayed by the court's rule.

Much of the trouble with the Court's new rule is that it will operate indiscriminately in all criminal cases, regardless of the severity of the crime or the circumstances involved. It applies to every defendant, whether the professional criminal or one committing a crime of momentary passion who is not part and parcel of organized crime. It will slow down the investigation and the apprehension of confederates in those cases where time is of the essence, such as kidnaping, see Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 183 (Jackson, J., dissenting); People v. Modesto, 398 P. 2d 753, 759, 42 Cal. Rptr. 417, 423 (1965), those involving the national security, see Drummond v. United States, 354 F. 2d 132, 147 (C. A. 2d Cir. 1965)) (en banc) (espionage case), pet. for cert. pending No. 1203 Misc. O. T. 1965; cf. Gessner v. United States, 354 F. 2d 726, 730, n. 10 (C. A. 10th Cir. 1965) (upholding, in espionage case, trial ruling that Government need not submit classified portions of interrogation transcript), and some organized crime situations. In the latter context the lawyer who arrives may also be the lawyer for the defendants' colleagues and can be relied upon to insure that no breach of the organization's security takes place even though the accused may feel that the best thing he can do is cooperate.

At the same time, the Court's per se approach may not be justified on the ground that it provides a "bright line" permitting the authorities to judge in advance whether interrogation may safely be pursued without jeopardizing the admissibility of any information obtained as a consequence. Nor can it be claimed that judicial time and effort, assuming that is a relevant consideration, will be conserved because of the ease of application of the new rule. Today's decision leaves open such questions as whether the accused was in custody, whether his statements were spontaneous or the product of interrogation, whether the accused has effectively waived his rights, and whether nontestimonial evidence introduced at trial is the fruit of statements made during a prohibited interrogation, all of which are certain to prove productive of uncertainty during investigation and litigation during prosecution. For all these reasons, if further restrictions on police interrogation are desirable at this time, a more flexible approach makes much more senes than the Court's constitutional straitjacket which forecloses more discriminating treatment by legislative or rule-making pronouncements.

Applying the traditional standards to the cases before the Court, I would hold these confessions voluntary. I would therefore affirm in Nos. 759, 760, and 761 and reverse in No. 584.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

NO. 762.—OCTOBER TERM, 1965

Sylvester Johnson and Stanley Cassidy, petitioners, v. State of New Jersey, on writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case we are called upon to determine whether Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), and Miranda v. Arizona, ante, p. ——, should be applied retroactively. We hold that Escobedo affects only those cases in which the trial began after June 22, 1964, the date of that decision. We hold further that Miranda applies only to cases in which the trial began after the date of our decision one week ago. The convictions assailed here were obtained at trials completed long before Escobedo and Miranda were rendered, and the rulings in those cases are therefore in applicable to the present proceeding. Petitioners have also asked us to overturn their convictions on a number of other grounds, but we find these contentions to be without merit, and consequently we affirm the decision below.

Petitioner Cassidy was taken into custody in Camden, New Jersey, at 4 a.m. on January 29, 1958, for felony murder. The police took him to detective headquarters and interrogated him in a systematic fashion for several hours. At 9 a.m. he was brought before the chief detective, two other police officers, and a court stenographer. The chief detective introduced the persons present, informed Cassidy of the possible charges against him, gave him the warning set forth in the margin,[1] concluded that he understood the warning, and obtained his consent to be questioned. Cassidy was then interrogated until 10:25 a.m. and made a partial confession to felony murder. The stenographer recorded this interrogation and read it back to Cassidy for his acknowledgment. Police officers then took him to another part of the building and apparently questioned him further. At 12:15 p.m. he was brought back to the chief detective's office for another half-hour of recorded interrogation. Under circumstances similar to those already described, Cassidy amended his confession to add vital incriminating details. For the next 11 hours he was held in a detention room and may have been subjected to further questioning. At 11:40 p.m. the police returned him to the chief detective's office for a final brief round of recorded interrogation. Taken together, Cassidy's three formal statements added up to a complete confession of felony murder, and they were later introduced against him at his trial for that crime.

While the present collateral proceeding was pending following our decision in Escobedo, Cassidy filed affidavits in the New Jersey Supreme Court which detailed for the first time certain supposed circumstances of his confession. In his own affidavit, he claimed that on at least five separate occasions during his interrogation, he asked for permission to consult a lawyer or to contact relatives. The police allegedly either ignored these requests or told him that he could not communicate with others until his statement was completed. Cassidy also produced affidavits from his mother, his uncle, and his aunt, claiming that during this period they called the detective headquarters at least three times and once appeared there in person, seeking information about Cassidy and an opportunity to speak with him. Their efforts allegedly were thwarted by the police. These belated claims were left uncontroverted by the State and were accepted as true by the court below for purposes of the Escobedo issue.

The police took petitioner Johnson into custody in Newark, New Jersey, at 5 p.m. on January 29, 1958, for the same crime as Cassidy. He was taken to detective headquarters and was booked. Later in the evening the police brought him before a magistrate for a brief preliminary hearing. The record is unclear as to what transpired there. Both before and after the appearance in court, he was questioned in a routine manner. At 2 a. m. the police drove Johnson by auto to Camden, the scene of the homicide, 80 miles from Newark. During the auto ride he was again interrogated about the crime. Upon arrival in Camden at about 4:30 a. m., the police took him directly to detective headquarters and brought him before the chief detective, three other police officers, and a court stenographer. As in Cassidy's case, Johnson was introduced to the persons present, informed of the possible charges against him, and given the same warning already set forth. He stated that he understood the warning and was willing to be questioned under those conditions. The police then interrogated him until 6:20 a. m., a period of about one and one-half hours. During the course of the questioning, he made a full confession to the crime of felony murder. This interrogation was recorded by the stenographer and read back to Johnson for his acknowledgment.

[1] "I am going to ask you some questions as to what you know about the hold-up, but before I ask you these questions it is my duty to warn you that everything you tell me must be of your own free will, must be the truth, without any promises or threats having been made to you, and knowing anything you tell me can be used against you, or any other person, at some future time."

Like Cassidy, Johnson filed affidavits in the New Jersey Supreme Court in this collateral proceeding following our decision in Escobedo, detailing for the first time certain supposed circumstances of his confession. In his own affidavit, he claimed that at four separate points during the period described above, he asked for permission to consult a lawyer or to contact relatives so that they could obtain a lawyer for him. As in Cassidy's case, the police allegedly either ignored these requests or told him that he could not communicate with others until he had given a statement. Johnson also produced affidavits from his mother and his girl friend, claiming that on three occasions after the homicide and prior to the confession, they called detective headquarters or went there in person, seeking information about Johnson and an opportunity to speak with him. Their efforts allegedly were rebuffed by the police. These belated claims, like Cassidy's, were left uncontroverted by the State and were accepted as true by the court below for resolution of the Escobedo issue.

The confessions of Johnson and Cassidy were offered in evidence by the State at their joint trial for felony murder. The judge held a hearing out of the presence of the jury on the voluntariness of the confessions. Petitioners made no effort to rebut the testimony adduced by the State relating to this issue. The judge found the confessions voluntary and admitted them into evidence. Petitioners then expressly relinquished their right under state law to have the issue of voluntariness, and the accompanying evidence, submitted to the jury for redetermination.[2] They did not introduce any testimony to dispute the correctness of their confessions..

In summation at the close of trial, defense counsel explicitly asserted that the confessions were truthful and pleaded for leniency on this ground. Cassidy's lawyer stated to the jury:

> "Whatever is in this statement made by Stanley Cassidy is true. I know it is true. . . . [M]y reason for knowing that it is true is because of the meetings and consultations I have had with Stanley. We have been over this many, many times.
> "I know it is true because I know Chief Dube, and Chief Dube is a fine interrogator. If you do not answer truthfully, believe me, he will question you until he does get the truth, and Chief Dube got the truth."

Likewise Johnson's lawyer told the jury:

> "The statement of Johnson was truthful and honest, because when that was finished, that was the end of it.
> "There were no threats. There was no attempt to evade. There was no trickery. Anything that Chief Dube asked him he answered honestly and truthfully."

The jury found Johnson and Cassidy guilty of murder in the first degree without recommendation of mercy, and they were sentenced to death.[3]

The convictions of Johnson and Cassidy became final six years ago, when the New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed them upon direct appeal[4] and the time expired for petitioners to seek certiorari from the decision. There followed a battery of collateral attacks in state and federal courts, based on new factual allegations, in which petitioners repeatedly and unsuccessfully assailed the voluntariness of their confessions.[5] This appeal arises out of still another application for post-conviction relief, accompanied by a fresh set of factual allegations, in which petitioners have argued in part that their confessions were inadmissible under the principles of Escobedo. The court below rejected the claim, holding that

[2] The procedure prescribed by state law was outlined in the opinion below as follows: "Under the New Jersey procedure for the admission in evidence of a confession, the trial judge must first determine whether the confession was voluntary. If he finds the confession to be voluntary, and hence admissible, he instructs the jury to also consider the voluntariness of the confession and to disregard it unless the State proves it was voluntarily given." 43 N. J. 572, 586, n. 9, 206 A. 2d 737, 744–745, n. 9.

[3] A third defendant, Wayne Godfrey, was also found guilty and sentenced to death. His conviction was subsequently overturned by a federal court in post-conviction proceedings. Upon retrial for felony murder, he pleaded non vult and was sentenced to life imprisonment.

Escobedo did not affect convictions which had become final prior to the date of that decision,[6] and it is this holding which we are principally called upon to review. In view of the standards announced one week ago concerning the warnings which must be given prior to in-custody interrogation, this case also obliges us to determine whether Miranda should be accorded retroactive application.

In the past year we have twice dealt with the problem of retroactivity in connection with other constitutional rules of criminal procedure. Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U. S. 618 (1965); Tehan v. Shott, 382 U. S. 406 (1966). These cases establish the principle that in criminal litigation concerning constitutional claims, "the Court may in the interest of justice make the rule prospective . . . where the exigencies of the situation require such an application," 381 U.S., at 628; 382 U.S., at 410. These cases also delineate criteria by which such an issue may be resolved. We must look to the purpose of our new standards governing police interrogation, the reliance which may have been placed upon prior decisions on the subject, and the effect on the administration of justice of a retroactive application of Escobedo and Miranda. See 381 U.S., at 636; 382 U.S., at 413.

In Linkletter we declined to apply retroactively the rule laid down in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), by which evidence obtained through an unreasonable search and seizure was excluded from state criminal proceedings. In so holding we relied in part on the fact that the rule affected evidence "the reliability and relevancy of which is not questioned" 381 U.S., at 639. Likewise in Tehan we declined to give retroactive effect to Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965), which forbade prosecutors and judges to comment adversely on the failure of a defendant to testify in a state criminal trial. In reaching this result, we noted that the basic purpose of the rule was to discourage courts from penalizing use of the privilege against self-incrimination. 382 U.S., at 414.

As Linkletter and Tehan acknowledged, however, we have given retroactive effect to other constitutional rules of criminal procedure laid down in recent years, where different guarantees were involved. For example, in Gideon v. Wainright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), which concerned the right of an indigent to the advice of counsel at trial, we reviewed a denial of habeas corpus. Similarly, Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964), which involved the right of an accused to effective exclusion of an involuntary confession from trial, was itself a collateral attack. In each instance we concluded that retroactive application was justified because the rule affected "the very integrity of the fact-finding process" and averted "the clear danger of convicting the innocent." Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S., at 639, Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S., at 416.

We here stress that the choice between retroactivity and nonretroactivity in no way turns on the value of the constitutional guarantee involved. The right to be represented by counsel at trial, applied retroactively in Gideon v. Wainwright, supra, has been described by Justice Schaefer of the Illinois Supreme Court as "by far the most pervasive . . . of all of the rights that an accused person has."[7] Yet Justice Brandeis even more boldly characterized the immunity from unjustifiable intrusions upon privacy, which was denied retroactive enforcement in Linkletter, as "the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men."[8] To reiterate what was said in Linkletter, we do not disparage a constitutional guarantee in any manner by declining to apply it retroactively. See 381 U. S., at 629.

We also stress that the retroactivity or nonretroactivity of a rule is not automatically determined by the provision of the Constitution on which the dictate is based. Each constitutional rule of criminal procedure has its own distinct functions, its own background of precedent, and its own impact on the administration of justice, and the way in which these factors combine must inevitably vary with the dictate involved. Accordingly as Linkletter and Tehan suggest, we must determine retroactivity "in each case" by looking to the peculiar traits of the specific "rule in question." 381 U. S., at 629; 382 U. S., at 410.

Finally, we emphasize that the question whether a constitutional rule of criminal procedure does or does not enhance the reliability of the fact-finding process at trial is necessarily a matter of degree. We gave retroactive effect to Jackson v. Denno, supra, because confessions are likely to be highly persuasive with a jury, and if coerced they may well be untrustworthy by their very nature.[9] On the other hand, we denied retroactive application to Griffin v. California, supra, despite the fact that comment on the failure to testify may sometimes mislead the jury concerning the reasons why the defendant has refused to take the witness stand. We are thus concerned with a question of probabilities and must take account, among other factors, of the extent to which other safeguards are available to protect the integrity of the truth-determining process at trial.

Having in mind the course of the prior cases, we turn now to the problem presented here: whether Escobedo and Miranda should be applied retroactively.[10] Our opinion in Miranda makes it clear that the prime purpose of these rulings is to guarantee full effectuation of the privilege against self-incrimination, the mainstay of our adversary system of criminal justice. See, ante, pp. 20–29. They are designed in part to assure that the person who responds to interrogation while in custody does so with intelligent understanding of his right to remain silent and of the consequences which may flow from relinquishing it. In this respect the rulings secure scrupulous observance of the traditional principle, often quoted but rarely heeded to the full degree, that "[t]he law will not suffer a prisoner to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction." [11] Thus while Escobedo and Miranda guard against the possibility of unreliable statements in every instance of in-custody interrogation, they encompass situations in which the danger is not necessarily as great as when the accused is subjected to overt and obvious coercion.

At the same time, our case law on coerced confessions is available for persons whose trials have already been completed, providing of course that the procedural prerequisites for direct or collateral attack are met. See Fay v. Noia, 372 U. S. 391 (1963). Prisoners may invoke a substantive test of voluntariness which, because of the persistence of abusive practices, has become increasingly meticulous through the years. See Reck v. Pate, 367 U. S. 433 (1961). That test now takes specific account of the failure to advise the accused of his privilege against self-incrimination or to allow him access to outside assistance. See Haynes v. Washington, 373 U. S. 503 (1963); Spano v. New York, 360 U. S. 315 (1959). Prisoners are also entitled to present evidence anew on this aspect of the voluntariness of their confessions if a full and fair hearing has not already been afforded them. See Townsend v. Sain, 372 U. S. 293 (1963). Thus while Escobedo and Miranda provide important new safeguards against the use of unreliable statements at trial, the nonretroactivity of these decisions will not preclude persons whose trials have already been completed from invoking the same safeguards as part of an involuntariness claim.

Nor would retroactive application have the justifiable effect of curing errors committed in disregard of constitutional rulings already clearly foreshadowed. We have pointed out above that past decisions treated the failure to warn accused persons of their rights, or the failure to grant them access to outside assistance as factors tending to prove the involuntariness of the resulting confessions. See Haynes v. Washington, supra; Spano v. New York, supra. Prior to Escobedo and Miranda, however, we had expressly declined to condemn an entire process of in-custody interrogation solely because of such conduct by the police. See Crooker v. California, 357 U. S. 433 (1958); Cicenia v. Lagay, 357 U. S. 504 (1958). Law enforcement agencies fairly relied on these prior cases, now no longer binding, in obtaining incriminating statements during the intervening years preceding Escobedo and Miranda. This is in favorable comparison to the situation before Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (1961), where the States at least knew that they were constitutionally forbidden from engaging in unreasonable searches and seizures under Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25 (1949).

At the same time, retroactive application of Escobedo and Miranda would seriously disrupt the administration of our criminal laws. It would require the [9] Coerced confessions are, of course, inadmissible regardless of their alleged truth or falsity. See Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961).

[10] It appears that every state supreme court and federal court of appeals which has discussed the question has declined to apply the tenets of Escobedo retroactively. For example, see In re Lopez, 62 Cal. 2d 368, 42 Cal. Rptr. 188, 398 P. 2d 380 (1965); Ruark v. People, — Colo. —, 405 P. 2d 751 (1965); Commonwealth v. Negri, 419 Pa. 117, 213 A. 2d 670 (1965); United States ex rel. Walden v. Pate, 350 F. 2d 240 (C. A. 7th Cir. 1965). The commentators, however, are divided on this issue. Compare Mishkin, Forward: The High Court, The Great Writ, and the Due Process of Time and Law, 79 Harv. L. Rev. 56 (1965), which opposes retroactive application, with Comment, Linkletter, Shott, and the Retroactivity Problem in Escobedo, 64 Mich. L. Rev. 832 (1966).

retrial or release of numerous prisoners found guilty by trustworthy evidence in conformity with previously announced constitutional standards. Prior to Escobedo and Miranda, few States were under any enforced compulsion on account of local law to grant requests for the assistance of counsel or to advise accused persons of their privilege against self-incrimination. Compare Crooker v. California, 357 U.S., at 448, n. 4 (dissenting opinion). By comparison, Mapp v. Ohio, supra, was already the law in a majority of the States at the time it was rendered, and only six States were immediately affected by Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609 (1965). See Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S., at 418.

In the light of these various considerations, we conclude that Escobedo and Miranda, like Mapp v. Ohio, supra, and Griffin v. California, supra, should not be applied retroactively. The question remains whether Escobedo and Miranda shall affect cases still on direct appeal when they were decided or whether their application shall commence with trials begun after the decisions were announced. Our holdings in Linkletter and Tehan were necessarily limited to convictions which had become final by the time Mapp and Griffin were rendered. Decisions prior to Linkletter and Tehan had already established without discussion that Mapp and Griffin applied to cases still on direct appeal at the time they were announced. See 381 U.S., at 622 and n. 4; 382 U.S., at 409, n. 3. On the other hand, apart from the application of the holdings in Escobedo and Miranda to the parties before the Court in those cases, the possibility of applying the decisions only prospectively is yet an open issue.

All of the reasons set forth above for making Escobedo and Miranda nonretroactive suggest that these decisions should apply only to trials begun after the decisions were announced. Future defendants will benefit fully from our new standards governing in-custody interrogation, while past defendants may still avail themselves of the voluntariness test. Law enforcement officers and trial courts will have fair notice that statements taken in violation of these standards may not be used against an accused. Prospective application only to trials begun after the standards were announced is particularly appropriate here. Authorities attempting to protect the privilege have not been apprised heretofore of the specific safeguards which are now obligatory. Consequently they have adopted devices which, although below the constitutional minimum, were not intentional evasions of the requirements of the privilege. In these circumstances, to upset all of the convictions still pending on direct appeal which were obtained in trials preceding Escobedo and Miranda would impose an unjustifiable burden on the administration of justice.

At the same time, we do not find any persuasive reason to extend Escobedo and Miranda to cases tried before those decisions were announced, even though the cases may still be on direct appeal. Our introductory discussion in Linkletter, and the cases cited therein, have made it clear that there are no jurisprudential or constitutional obstacles to the rule we are adopting here. See 381 U.S., at 622–629. In appropriate prior cases we have already applied new judicial standards in a wholly prospective manner. See England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U.S. 411 (1964); James v. United States, 366 U.S. 213 (1961). Nor have we have shown any reason why our rule is not a sound accommodation of the principles of Escobedo and Miranda.

In the light of these additional considerations, we conclude that Escobedo and Miranda should apply only to cases commenced after those decisions were announced. We recognize that certain state courts have perceived the implications of Escobedo and have therefore anticipated our holding in Miranda. Of course, States are still entirely free to effectuate under their own law stricter standards than those we have laid down and to apply those standards in a broader range of cases than is required by this decision.

Apart from its broad implications, the precise holding of Escobedo was that statements elicited by the police during an interrogation may not be used against the accused at a criminal trial,

> "[where] the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, the suspect has been taken into police custody, the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent . . . ." 378 U.S., at 490–491.

Because Escobedo is to be applied prospectively, this holding is available only to persons whose trials began after June 22, 1964, the date on which Escobedo was decided.

As for the standards laid down one week ago in Miranda, if we were persuaded that they had been fully anticipated by the holding in Escobedo, we would measure their prospectivity from the same date. Defendants still to be tried at that time would be entitled to strict observance of constiutional doctrines already clearly foreshadowed. The disagreements among other courts concerning the implications of Escobedo,[12] however, have impelled us to lay down additional guidelines for situations not presented by that case. This we have done in Miranda, and these guidelines are therefore available only to persons whose trials had not begun as of June 13, 1966. See Tehan v. Shott, 382 U.S., at 409, n. 3, with reference to Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1. (1964), and Griffin v. California, supra.

Petitioners challenge the validity of their convictions on several other grounds, all of which we have examined with great care, including the claim that their confessions were coerced. We conclude without unnecessary discussion that those grounds which may be tested on this direct review of the judgment of the New Jersey Supreme Court are without merit. We further find that petitioners' contentions relating to the voluntariness of their confessions are beyond the scope of our direct review in this proceeding.

Petitioners' coerced confession claim was fully litigated and rejected both at trial and in prior post-conviction hearings in the state courts. On neither occasion, however, did petitioners attempt to substantiate certain allegations made for the first time in the present proceeding. As stated above, petitioners now assert that they were prevented from obtaining outside assistance while they were being interrogated. The police allegedly refused them access to their families or a lawyer and also thwarted the efforts of their relatives and friends to contact them. We have already pointed out that allegations of this kind are directly relevant to a coerced confession claim and that such a claim presents no problem of retroactivity. See also Davis v. North Carolina, post, p —.

The New Jersey Supreme Court invoked a state procedural rule, previously applied in another confession case, as a bar to reconsideration of petitioners' coerced confession claim, even in the light of their new allegations regarding the denial of outside assistance. See N.J.R.R. 3:10A–5 (1965 Supp.); State v. Smith, 43 N.J. 67, 202 A. 2d 669 (1964). This is an adequate state ground which precludes us from testing the coerced confession claim on the present review, whatever may be the significance of the state court's reliance on its procedural rule in federal habeas corpus proceedings. See Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963).

The judgment of the Supreme Court of New Jersey is Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE CLARK concurs in the opinion and judgment of the Court. He adheres, however, to the views stated in his separate opinion in Miranda v. Arizona, ante, p. —.

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, MR. JUSTICE STEWART, and MR. JUSTICE WHITE concur in the opinion and judgment of the Court. They continue to believe, however, for the reasons stated in the dissenting opinions of MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE WHITE in Miranda v. Arizona and its companion cases, — U.S. —, that the new constitutional rules promulgated in those cases are both unjustified and unwise.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK, with whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS joins, dissents from the Court's holding that the petitioners here are not entitled to the full protections of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments as this Court has construed them in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, and Miranda v. Arizona, ante, p. —, for substantially the same reasons stated in their dissenting opinion in Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, at 640.

I. —, 206 A. 2d 82 (1965), which construe Escobedo broadly, with People v. Hartgraves, 31 Ill. 2d 375, 202 N. E. 2d 33 (1964), and Browne v. State, 24 Wis. 2d 491, 131 N. W. 2d 169 (1964).

A BILL To amend section 401 of title 18 of the United States Code, dealing with the power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempts of its authority

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That title 18, section 401, of the United States Code is amended as follows: At the end thereof, add the following:

"The power of the district courts under this section and section 402, title 18, shall not be vacated, reviewed, restricted, or restrained by the courts of appeals except upon an appeal from a final order or judgment of commitment entered by the district courts."

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE U.S. COURTS,
Washington, D.C., October 3, 1966.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: This refers further to your letter of May 13, 1966, transmitting for study and report S. 3350,* a bill "to amend section 401 of title 18 of the United States Code, dealing with the power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempts of its authority."

This is to advise you that at its meeting on September 22 and 23, 1966, the Judicial Conference of the United States voted to disapprove S. 3350.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM E. FOLEY,
Deputy Director.

A BILL To amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 97 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"§ 1993. Committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains

"Whoever willfully, with intent to endanger the safety of any person on board or anyone who he believes will board the same, or with a reckless disregard for the safety of persons on board, commits any act with respect to any train, engine, motor unit, or car used, operated, or employed in interstate or foreign commerce by any railroad shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both."

SEC. 2. The analysis of chapter 97 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"1993. Committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains."

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., April 24, 1967.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

Dear SENATOR: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice concerning S. 552, a bill "To amend title 18 of the United States Code in order to provide that committing acts dangerous to persons on board trains shall be a criminal offense."

The bill would add a new section 1993, to title 18, United States Code, to make it a Federal crime for any person to willfully commit any act with respect to a train, engine, motor unit, or car used, operated, or employed in interstate or foreign commerce by any railroad, with intent to endanger the safety of any person on board or whom he believes will board, or with a reckless disregard for the safety of persons on board. A violation of the proposed section would be punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than ten years, or both.

While the bill is framed in broad language and the acts denounced are not specifically defined, Senator Hart stated in introducing an identical measure in the 89th Congress that its provisions were aimed at individuals who throw rocks and other objects at trains (Cong. Rec., Sept. 13, 1966, p. 21412).

Under existing law, it is a Federal crime to derail or wreck trains or commit acts of depredation against railroad facilities with intent to derail or wreck trains (18 U.S.C. 1992); to destroy or injure property moving in interstate or foreign commerce in the possession of a common or a contract carrier by railroad, motor vehicle, or aircraft (15 U.S.C. 1281); to embezzle or steal interstate or foreign shipments (18 U.S.C. 659); and to embezzle and steal carrier's funds derived from commerce (18 U.S.C. 660). Also, existing law, applicable to the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, provides Federal penalties for murder, robbery, or acts of violence against train passengers or crew members (18 U.S.C. 1991).

We have no information that the number or nature of the acts to be proscribed are such that they cannot be handled satisfactorily by the states. Moreover, we assume that, unlike the statutes noted above, most of the instances of missile throwing would involve juveniles, making them more appropriately a subject for local action in juvenile court. Accordingly, we are unable to recommend the enactment of S. 552. However, in the event it is determined that S. 552 warrants favorable consideration, we suggest that a provision similar to that found in section 659, 660, and 1992, title 18, United States Code, be added as follows:

"A judgment of conviction or acquittal on the merits under the laws of any state shall be a bar to any prosecution under this section for the same act or acts."

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

——— ———, Attorney General.

A BILL To amend chapter 3 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit the importation into the United States of certain noxious aquatic plants

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 46 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out in subsection (b) "subsection (a)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (1) of this subsection, or which has been imported into the United States, any territory of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any possession of the United States, in violation of paragraph (1) of subsection (b)";

(2) redesignating subsection (a) as subsection (a)(1);

(3) redesignating subsections (b) and (c) as paragraphs (2) and (3), respectively; and

(4) adding a new subsection as follows:

"(b)(1) The importation into the United States, any territory of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any possession of the United States, of alligator grass (alternanthera philoxeroides), water chestnut plants (trapa natans), or water hyacinth plants (eichornia crassipes), or the seeds of such grass or plants, or of any other aquatic plant or the seed thereof which the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe by regulation to be injurious to the interests of agriculture, horticulture, forestry, or to wildlife or the wildlife resources of the United States or to recreational value of streams, rivers, lakes, or other bodies of water in the United States, or to the navigation of rivers and streams of the United States, is hereby prohibited.

"(2) Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Secretary of the Interior, when he finds that there has been a proper showing of responsibility and continued protection of the public interest, shall permit the importation for zoological, educational, medical, and scientific purposes of any such aquatic plant or seed thereof, where such importation would be prohibited otherwise by or pursuant to this section.

"(3) Whoever violates the provisions of this subsection, or any regulation issued pursuant thereto, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by this Act shall become effective thirty days after the date of enactment.

A BILL To amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 223, title 18, United States Code (relating to witnesses and evidence) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3501. Admissibility of confessions

"(a) In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States or by the District of Columbia, a confession, as defined in subsection (e) hereof, shall be admissible in evidence if it is voluntarily given. Before such confession is received in evidence, the trial judge shall, out of the presence of the jury, determine any issue as to voluntariness. If the trial judge determines that the confession was voluntarily made it shall be admitted in evidence and the trial judge shall permit the jury to hear relevant evidence on the issue of voluntariness and shall instruct the jury to give such weight to the confession as the jury feels it deserves under all the circumstances.

"(b) The trial judge in determining the issue of voluntariness shall take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the giving of the confession, including (1) the time elapsing between arrest and arraignment of the defendant making the confession, if it was made after arrest and before arraignment, (2) whether such defendant knew the nature of the offense with which he was charged or of which he was suspected at the time of making the confession, (3) whether or not such defendant was advised or knew that he was not required to make any statement and that any such statement could be used against him, (4) whether or not such defendant had been advised prior to questioning of his right to the assistance of counsel; and (5) whether or not such defendant was without the assistance of counsel when questioned and when giving such confession.

"(c) In any criminal prosecution by the United States or by the District of Columbia, a confession made or given by a person who is a defendant therein, while such person was under arrest or other detention in the custody of any law-enforcement officer or law-enforcement agency, shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay in bringing such person before a commissioner or other officer empowered to commit persons charged with offenses against the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia if such confession is found by the trial judge to have been made voluntarily and if the weight to be given the confession is left to the jury.

"(d) Nothing contained in this section shall bar the admission in evidence of any confession made or given voluntarily by any person to any other person without interrogation by anyone, or at any time at which the person who made or gave such confession was not under arrest or other detention.

"(e) As used in this section, the term 'confession' means any confession of guilt of any criminal offense or any self-incriminating statement made or given orally or in writing."

(b) The section analysis of that chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3501. Admissibility of confessions."

A BILL To prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Wire Interception Act".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. On the basis of its own investigations and of published studies, the Congress makes the following findings:

(a) Wire communications are normally conducted through the use of facilities which form part of an interstate network. The same facilities are used for interstate and intrastate communications. In order effectively to protect the integrity of interstate communications and the privacy of parties to such communications it is necessary for the Congress to prohibit interception of any wire communication using such facilities and to define on a uniform basis the circumstances and conditions under which such interception is permitted.

(b) Existing law prohibiting interception and disclosure of wire communications has not been effective to preserve the integrity of the Nation's wire communications systems. There is inconsistency among the laws of different States relating to wiretapping and there is extensive wiretapping without legal sanction. Additional legislation is needed to provide adequate protection against improper interception of wire communications and to regulate such interception in the limited area in which it should be permitted.

(c) Modern criminals make extensive use of the telephone and telegraph as a direct instrumentality of crime and as means of conducting criminal business. In some circumstances, interception of wire communications in order to obtain evidence of the commission of crime is a necessary aid to effective law enforcement.

(d) Wiretapping may invade the privacy, not only of the suspected criminal, but of innocent persons using the tapped facility. Accordingly, the privilege of wiretapping should be limited to certain major offenses, and accompanied by safeguards to insure that the interception is justified and that the information obtained thereby is not misused.

INTERCEPTION AND DISCLOSURE OF WIRE COMMUNICATIONS PROHIBITED

SEC. 3. (a) Except as otherwise specifically provided by this Act, it shall be unlawful for any person to—

(1) willfully intercept, attempt to intercept, or procure any other person to intercept or attempt to intercept, any wire communication; or

(2) willfully disclose or attempt to disclose to any other person the contents of any wire communication if the person disclosing that information knows or has reason to know that that information was obtained through the interception of a wire communication; or

(3) willfully use or attempt to use the contents of any wire communication if the person using that information knows or has reason to know that that information was obtained through the interception of a wire communication.

(b) It shall not be unlawful under this Act for an operator of a switchboard, or an officer, agent, or employee of any comunication common carrier, whose facilities are used in the transmission of a wire communication to intercept disclose, or use that communication in the normal course of his employment while engaged in any activity which is a necessary incident of the rendition of service.

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to limit the constitutional power of the President to obtain information by such means as he deems necessary to protect the Nation from actual or potential attack or other hostile acts of foreign powers or to protect essential military information against foreign intelligence activities. The contents of any communication intercepted by authority of the President in the exercise of the foregoing power shall not be received in evidence in any judicial trial or administrative hearing and shall not be otherwise used or divulged except as is necessary to implement this subsection.

(d) Violations of this section shall be punished as provided in section 1362, title 18, United States Code.

EVIDENCE OBTAINED FROM UNAUTHORIZED INTERCEPTION NOT ADMISSIBLE

SEC. 4. Whenever any wire communication has been intercepted by any person, no part of the contents of that communication obtained through that interception and no evidence derived therefrom may be received in evidence in any proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, legislative committee, or other authority of the United States, or any State or political subdivision thereof if the disclosure of that information would be in violation of section 3 of this Act, and the interception took place after the effective date of this Act.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN INTERCEPTION OF WIRE COMMUNICATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) The Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice specially designated by the Attorney General, may authorize an application to a Federal judge of competent jurisdiction for, and such judge, after making the findings required by section 8(c) of this Act, may grant, in conformity with section 8 of this Act, leave to permit the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or other Federal agency having responsibility for the investigation of the offense as to which such application is made, to intercept wire communications when such interception may provide evidence of—

(1) any offense punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year under chapter 37, 105, or 115 of title 18 of the United States Code, or sections 224 to 227, inclusive, of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 921), as amended;

(2) any offense involving murder, kidnaping, or extortion punishable under title 18 of the United States Code;

(3) any offense punishable under section 201, 1084, or 1952 of title 18 of the United States Code;

(4) any offense punishable under section 471, 472, or 473 of title 18 of the United States Code;

(5) any offense involving the manufacture, importation, receiving, concealment, buying, selling, or otherwise dealing in narcotic drugs or marihuana punishable under any law of the United States; or

(6) any conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

(b) The attorney general of any State or the principal prosecuting attorney for any political subdivision thereof, if such person is authorized by a statute of that State to make application to a State court judge of competent jurisdiction for leave to intercept wire communications, may apply for, and such State judge, after making the findings required by section 8(c) of this Act, may grant, in conformity with section 8 of this Act, leave to intercept wire communications within that State when such action may provide evidence of the commission of any crime or any conspiracy to commit crime as to which the interception of wire communications is authorized by the law of that State.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN DISCLOSURE AND USE OF INTERCEPTED WIRE COMMUNICATIONS

SEC. 6. (a) Any investigative or law enforcement officer who has obtained knowledge of the contents of any wire communication in accordance with this Act may disclose such contents to another investigative or law enforcement officer to the extent that such disclosure is appropriate to the proper performance of the official duties of the officers making and receiving the disclosure.

(b) Any investigative or law enforcement officer, who has obtained knowledge of the contents of any wire communication in accordance with this Act, may use any information therein contained in the proper discharge of his official duties.

(c) Any person who has received, by any means authorized by this Act, any information concerning a wire communication intercepted in conformity with section 5 of this Act may disclose the contents of that communication while giving testimony under oath or affirmation in any criminal proceeding in any court of the United States or of any State, or in any Federal or State grand jury proceeding.

PENALTY FOR UNAUTHORIZED INTERCEPTION OR DISCLOSURE OF WIRE COMMUNICATIONS

SEC. 7. Section 1362 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) redesignating the text thereof as subsection (a); and

(2) inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Whoever willfully intercepts, discloses, or uses any wire communication, or attempts to do so or procures another person to do so, in violation of the Federal Wire Interception Act, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both."

PROCEDURE

SEC. 8. (a) CONTENTS OF APPLICATION.—Each application under section 5 of this Act shall be made in writing upon oath or affirmation, and shall state the applicant's authority to make such application. Each application shall include the following information:

(1) A full and complete statement of the facts and circumstances relied upon by the applicant;

(2) The nature and location of the communications facilities involved; and

(3) A full and complete statement of the facts concerning all previous applications, known to the individual authorizing the application, made to any judge for leave to intercept wire communications involving the same communication facilities, or any of them, or involving any person named in the application as committing, having committed, or being about to commit an offense, and the action taken by the judge on each such application.

(b) ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE IN SUPPORT OF APPLICATION.—The judge may require the applicant to furnish additional testimony of documentary evidence in support of the application.

(c) GROUNDS FOR ISSUANCE.—Upon such application the judge may enter an ex parte order granting leave to intercept wire communications at any place within the territorial jurisdiction of the court in which the judge is sitting, if the judge determines on the basis of the facts submitted by the applicant that there is probable cause for belief that—

(1) an offense for which such an application may be filed under this Act is being, has been, or is about to be committed;

(2) facts concerning that offense may be obtained through such interception;

(3) no other means are readily available for obtaining that information; and

(4) the facilities from which communications are to be intercepted are being used or about to be used in connection with the commission of such offense, or are leased to, listed in the name of, or commonly used by, a person who has committed, is committing, or is about to commit such offense.

(d) CONTENTS OF ORDER.—Each order granting leave to intercept any wire communication shall specify—

(1) the nature and location of the communications facilities as to which leave to intercept is granted;

(2) each offense as to which information is to be sought;

(3) the identity of the agency authorized to intercept the communications; and

(4) the period of time during which such interception is authorized.

(e) TIME LIMIT AND EXTENSIONS OF ORDER.—No order entered under this section may grant leave to intercept any wire communication for any period exceeding forty-five days. Extensions of the order may be granted for periods of not more than twenty days each upon further application made in conformity to subsection (a) of this section and upon the findings required by subsection (c) of this section.

(f) NOTICE OF INTENTION.—The contents of an intercepted wire communication shall not be received in evidence or otherwise disclosed in any criminal proceeding in a Federal court unless each defendant, not less than ten days before the trial, has been furnished with a copy of the court order or other authorization pursuant to which the interception was made. The ten-day period specified above may be waived by the judge if he finds that it was not possible to furnish the defendant with the above information ten days before the trial, and that the defendant will not be prejuiced by the delay in receiving such information.

(g) MOTION TO SUPPRESS.—Any defendant in a criminal trial in a Federal court may move in that court to suppress the use as evidence of the contents of any intercepted communication or any part thereof or evidence derived therefrom, on the ground that (1) the communication was unlawfully intercepted; (2) the order or other authorization pursuant to which it was intercepted is insufficient on its face; (3) in the case of an order of a court, there was not probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the order was issued; or (4) the interception was not made in conformity with the order or other authorization. Such motion shall be made before trial or hearing unless opportunity therefor did not exist or the defendant was not aware of the grounds of the motion, but the court in its discretion may entertain the motion at the trial or hearing. If the motion is granted the evidence shall not be admissible in any court or proceeding.

(h) SEALING OF APPLICATIONS AND ORDERS.—Applications made to a court and orders granted by the court pursuant to this Act shall be sealed by the court. They shall not be made public except in accordance with this Act or by order of the court.

REPORTS CONCERNING INTERCEPTED WIRE COMMUNICATIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Within thirty days after the expiration of any order (including any extension thereof) entered by any State or Federal judge granting leave to intercept any wire communication under this Act, the judge shall cause to be transmitted to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and to the Attorney General of the United States a true and correct copy of (1) that order and any order for the extension thereof, and (2) the application or applications made therefor. Within thirty days after the denial by any judge of any application made to him for the entry of any such order, or for the extension of any such order previously entered by him, under this Act, the judge shall transmit to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and to the Attorney General of the United States a true and correct copy of that application.

(b) In March of each year the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall transmit to the Congress a full and complete report concerning the number of applications under section 5 of this Act which were made, granted, and denied during the preceding calendar year. Such report shall state:

(1) the number of applications made by or on behalf of each Federal or State agency, and the number of orders granting or denying such applications;

(2) the number of applications made to, and granted and denied by, each Federal or State court;

(3) the number of applications made, granted, and denied with respect to each category of criminal offenses enumerated in section 5 of this Act; and

(4) the number of applications made, granted, and denied within each State, and each municipality or other political subdivision thereof, with respect to each such category of criminal offenses.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 10. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "wire communication" means any communication made in whole or in part through the use of facilities for the transmission of communications by the aid of wire, cable, or other like connection between the point of origin and the point of reception furnished or operated by any person engaged as a common carrier in providing or operating such facilities for the transmission of interstate of foreign communications;

(2) The term "interstate communication" means any communication transmitted (a) from any State to any other State, or (b) within the District of Columbia or any possession of the United States;

(3) The term "foreign communication" means any communication transmitted between the United States and any foreign country;

(4) The term "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any possession of the United States;

(5) The term "intercept" means the acquisition of the contents of any wire communication from a wire communication facility or component thereof, through the use of any intercepting device, by any person other than the sender or receiver of such communication or a person authorized by either;

(6) The term "intercepting device" means any device or apparatus, other than an extension telephone instrument furnished to the subscriber or user by a communication common carrier in the ordinary course of its business as such carrier;

(7) The term "contents", when used with respect to any wire communication includes any information concerning the identity of the parties to such communication or the existence, contents, substance, purport, or meaning of that communication;

(8) The term "person" means any individual, including any officer or employee of the United States or any State or political subdivision thereof, and any partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, or corporation;

(9) The term "investigative or law enforcement officer" means any officer of the United States or of a State or political subdivision thereof, who is empowered by law to conduct investigations of or to make arrests for offenses described in this Act, and any attorney authorized by law to prosecute or participate in the prosecution of such offenses; and

(10) The term "judge of competent jurisdiction" means—

(a) a judge of a United States district court or a United States court of appeals; and

(b) a judge of any court of general criminal jurisdiction of a State who is authorized by a statute of that State to enter orders granting leave to intercept any wire communication.

COMMUNICATIONS ACT AMENDMENT

SEC. 11. The text of section 605 of the Communications Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 1103; 47 U.S.C. 605) is amended to read as follows:

"No person receiving, or assisting in receiving, or transmitting, or assisting in transmitting, any interstate or foreign communication by wire or radio shall divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning thereof, except through authorized channels of transmission or reception, to any person other than the addressee, his agent, or attorney, or to a person employed or authorized to forward such communication to its destination, or to proper accounting or distributing officers of the various communicating centers over which the communication may be passed, or to the master of a ship under whom he is serving, or in response to a subpena issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, or on demand of other lawful authority; and no person not being authorized by the sender shall intercept any radio communication and divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning of such intercepted communication to any person; and no person not being entitled thereto shall receive or assist in receiving any interstate or foreign communication by radio and use the same or any information therein contained for his own benefit or for the benefit of another not entitled thereto; and no person having received any intercepted radio communication or having become acquainted with the contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning of the same or any part thereof, knowing that such information was so obtained, shall divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning of the same or any part thereof, or use the same or any information therein contained for his own benefit or for the benefit of another not entitled thereto: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the receiving, divulging, publishing, or utilizing the contents of any radio communication broadcast, or transmitted by amateurs or others for the use of the general public, or relating to ships in distress."

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 12. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the other provisions of this Act and the application of any provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

A BILL To outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF FACT

SECTION 1. That the Congress finds and declares that there exist in the United States, organizations, including societies and syndicates, one of which is known as the Mafia, which have as their primary objective the disrespect for constituted law and order; that the members of such organizations are recruited for the purpose of carrying on gambling prostitution, traffic in narcotic drugs, labor racketeering, extortion, and commercial-type crimes generally, all of which are in violation of the criminal laws of the United States and of the several States; that these organizations, such as the Mafia, are conducted under their own code of ethics which is without respect for moral principles, law, and order; that the existence of these organizations is made easier through the use of bribery and corruption of certain public officials; that secrecy as to membership and authority within such organizations is a cardinal principle; that discipline and authority within such organizations are maintained by means of drastic retaliations, usually murder, and that similar methods are employed to coerce nonmembers; that, because such organizations violate every law of decency and humanity, they constitute a grave threat to the American way of life; that the members of such organizations refuse to cooperate with congressional investigative committees and deliberately engage in actions which are intended to hinder and frustrate the work of these legislative committees; and that, for the aforementioned reasons, the Mafia and other such organizations, societies, and syndicates should be outlawed.

MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 2. (a) Whoever on and after the date of enactment of this Act knowingly and willfully becomes or remains a member of (1) the Mafia, or (2) any other organization having for one of its purposes the use of any interstate commerce facility in the commission of acts which are in violation of the criminal laws of the United States or any State, relating to gambling, extortion, blackmail, narcotics, prostitution, or labor-racketeering, with knowledge of the purpose of such organization, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be imprisoned for not less than five years nor more than twenty years and may be fined not more than $20,000.

(b) In determining membership or participation in the Mafia or any other organization defined in section 3 of this Act, or knowledge of the purpose or objective of such organization, the jury, under instructions from the court, shall consider all evidence presented as to whether the accused person—

(1) has been convicted for the violation of any State or Federal criminal law relating to the offenses mentioned in subsection (a);

(2) has made financial contributions to the organization in dues, assessments, loans, or in any other form;

(3) has given financial assistance in the form of gifts, loans or bail bonds to any member of any such organization or to such organization;

(4) has carried out or attempted to carry out any order or instruction from the organization to do any act which would be a violation of any of the criminal laws of any State or of the United States, or in any other way has carried out to any degree the plans, designs, objectives, or purposes of the organization;

(5) has participated to any degree in meetings of the organization at which was discussed matters relating to any of the criminal violations referred to in subsection (a); or

(6) has refused to cooperate with law enforcement agencies and legislative bodies in their efforts to protect society from the demoralizing influences of crime and vice.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Mafia" means a secret society whose members are pledged and dedicated to commit unlawful acts against the United States or any State thereof in furtherance of their objective to dominate organized crime and whose operations are conducted under a secret code of terror and reprisal not only for members who fail to abide by the edicts, decrees, decisions, principles, and instructions of the society in implementation of this domination of organized crime, but also for those persons not members, who represent a threat to the security of the members or the criminal operations of the society;

(2) "organization" means any group, association, society, confederation, or syndicate whose aims, objectives, and purposes are as stated in subsection (a) of section 2 of this Act; and

(3) "interstate commerce facility" means any mode of travel interstate, whether by common carrier or by private means, and any communication facility as defined in paragraph (b) of section 1403, title 18, of the United States Code.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 19, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request, I am pleased to submit these views concerning:

S. 674, to amend Chapter 18, of the United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions;

S. 675, to prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses;

S. 678, to outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates.

S. 674 provides that a confession shall be admissible in evidence if it is voluntarily given. It would also legislatively overrule the decision in Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), in which the Supreme Court held that if the arresting officer fails to comply with Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure requiring presentment of an arrested person "without unnecessary delay" any confession obtained during the period of "unnecessary delay" shall be excluded.

S. 674 would amend Title 18 by adding a new section 3501 entitled "Admissibility of Confessions". Subsection (a) provides for an initial determination by the trial judge as to whether the confession was voluntary and, if found voluntary by him, submission of relevant evidence on the issue to the jury. It also provides for an instruction that the jury may give such weight to the confession as it feels it deserves. Subsection (b) lists five specific factors which the trial judge is to consider in determining the issue of voluntariness. Subsection (c) provides that a confession shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay in presentment if the confession is found by the trial judge to have been made voluntarily. Subsection (d) is concerned with confessions made without interrogation, to persons other than police officers and non-custodial confessions.

A review of S. 674 indicates a conflict with the 1966 decision by the Supreme Court in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436. That case holds that the prosecution may not use statements obtained during custodial interrogation unless there has been adherence to specific constitutionally protected procedural safeguards based upon the privilege against self-incrimination. Such safeguards are in addition to the application of the traditional test for voluntariness and are designed to protect against the potential for coercion inherent in custodial surroundings. If S. 674 is intended to dispense with the procedural safeguards established by Miranda or if it is designed to modify the constitutional standard of voluntariness, it would be in conflict with current constitutional requirements.

Miranda requires that before custodial interrogation can take place, the suspect "must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him" and "that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation" and "that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him." The case also indicates that a suspect may waive his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel.

Subsection (b) of S. 674 requires the trial judge in ruling on voluntariness to consider all the circumstances surrounding the giving of the confession including the five listed factors. Several of the listed factors deal with matters encompassed within the warnings required by Miranda. For example, 3501(b)(3) requires the judge to consider "whether or not such defendant was advised or knew that he was not required to make any statement and that any such statement could be used against him." Similarly (b)(4) requires consideration of "whether or not such defendant had been advised prior to questioning of his right to the assistance of counsel."

Subsection (b) only requires that the trial judge "shall take into consideration" such factors. Miranda, on the other hand, imposes a constitutional requirement that such warnings be given prior to any interrogation. If subsection (b) is intended to dispense with the requirement that such warnings be given and to substitute a flexible standard that the presence or absence of such warnings need only be considered on the issue of voluntariness, it fails to comply with the mandate of Miranda and would be deemed unconstitutional. Only if the Miranda requirements are read into subsection (b), or as a constitutional gloss to be added to the bill, would this provision survive constitutional attack. In such case, however, there is a serious question whether subsection (b) does anything more than restate existing law regarding voluntariness.

Subsection (c) would overrule the Mallory decision. Under that subsection a confession otherwise voluntary would not be barred solely because of delay between arrest and arraignment. But under subsection (b)(1), the trial judge in determining voluntariness is to consider the time elapsing between arrest and arraignment.

Prompt arraignment of arrested persons is necessary in a free society which values the fair administration of criminal justice. The decision in Mallory, excluding confessions obtained during a period of unnecessary delay between arrest and arraignment, is designed to withdraw the incentive which law enforcement officers may have to delay arraignment. It is intended to encourage them to bring an arrested person promptly before a judicial officer. It discourages prolonged incarceration and interrogation of suspects without giving them the opportunity to consult with friends, family or counsel.

An outright repeal of Mallory would withdraw the encouragement for law enforcement officers to arraign suspects promptly. It would leave the "without unnecessary delay" provision of Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as a rule without any remedy.

There is an additional reason why legislative action dealing with the Mallory problem would be unwise at this time. The decision in Miranda v. Arizona was rendered on June 13, 1966. That decision obviously may have implications for the Mallory problem. In my judgement, it would be premature to take legislative action with respect to Mallory until we have had more experience with the Miranda requirements and see their impact on the course of future decisions under Rule 5(a).

I believe that we are all agreed that the present state of the law on wire interception is unsatisfactory. Legislation is required. Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 605), is inadequate, and many legislative proposals on the subject have been considered over the past twenty years, including S. 675. While S. 675 has merit, it does not go far enough in safeguarding individual privacy. Wiretapping should be allowed only in national security matters, with a total restriction imposed in all other cases.

Of necessity, when a line is "tapped" a large mass of material is intercepted and recorded, the great preponderance of which has no relationship whatever to the purpose of the tap. A tap cannot be selective and must record all that goes over the wire. It is unlike a search warrant where an officer must specify what he is searching for. As Justice Brandeis suggested more than forty years ago, wiretaps are more serious infringements of privacy than general warrants.

Viewed in this light, wiretapping—whether by private individuals or public officials—should be generally prohibited. The needs of law enforcement can be met without reliance on such large-scale intrusions on personal privacy. At the very least, proponents of judicially authorized wiretapping have a heavy burden of proof to meet to justify such intrusions, a burden which has not been met. Only when the national security itself is at stake, when the society itself is threatened, can such activity be justified.

S. 928, (the proposed Right of Privacy Act of 1967) in my opinion best meets the standards I believe necessary in this area. It also prohibits electronic eavesdropping which is an equally serious privacy problem. After consideration of all pertinent factors, the Department of Justice favors enactment of S. 928 in lieu of S. 675.

S. 678 is a bill to outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. I certainly wholeheartedly support the basic aim of this bill. Complete eradication of these corrupt syndicates, which prey on society and systematically subvert the processes of justice, is a goal we all share. Unfortunately I cannot agree that S. 678, if enacted, would accomplish its purpose.

This bill would make knowing and willful membership in the Mafia, Cosa Nostra, or any similar racketeering organization a federal offense punishable by imprisonment of up to twenty years and a fine of up to $20,000. Various factors are listed as relevant for consideration by a jury in determining membership or participation in the outlawed organization or as showing knowledge of the purpose or objective of such organization. In addition to problems of proof which would be involved in its enforcement, this measure raises a number of constitutional issues of substantial magnitude. Serious questions would be posed under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the privilege against self-incrimination and possibly the Frst Amendment. These problems would insure extensive litigation. Because of this I would prefer to rely on existing law which as detailed below appears to be generally adequate.

There are numerous Federal penal provisions dealing with activities generally associated with organized crime. In addition, 18 U.S.C. 371 makes it unlawful to conspire with another to violate any Federal law. Taken together the offenses described by present law are applicable to almost every activity in which the organizations listed in the proposal would be engaged. While no present statute would apply to membership alone, the conspiracy statute prohibits the conspiratorial activity associated with membership in such an organization.

Your efforts in support of the passage of anticrime legislation have been outstanding. I appreciate them as I do your sponsorship of S. 917, the proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967", S. 916, legislation to establish the United States Corrections Service, S. 676, "To amend Chapter 73, Title 18, United States Code, to prohibit the obstruction of criminal investigations of the United States" and S. 677, "To permit the compelling of testimony with respect to certain crimes, and the granting of immunity in connection therewith." These proposals, if enacted, would be extremely helpful in combatting organized crime.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report and the enactment of this legislation would be in accord with the Program of the President.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

A BILL To provide compensation to survivors of local law enforcement officers killed while apprehending persons for committing Federal crimes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

DETERMINATION OF SURVIVORS' RIGHT TO COMPENSATION

SECTION 1. If the law enforcement agency which employed a deceased local law enforcement officer at the time of his death satisfies the Attorney General that the death of such officer resulted from his apprehension of, or attempt to apprehend, any person for the commission of a crime against the United States, then the Attorney General shall pay the survivors of such officer (referred to in this Act as "qualifying officer") the compensation provided in section 2.

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION

SEC. 2. (a)(1) The Attorney General shall pay to each person—

(A) who is an eligible survivor (as defined in section 3(4) of a qualifying officer at the end of a month for which a benefit is payable under paragraph (2), and

(B) who has made application for such benefit in accordance with subsection (b) a benefit for that month equal to $250 divided by the number of eligible survivors of such officer at the end of such month who have made application for such benefit.

(2) A benefit shall be payable for each month beginning with the month of death of such officer and ending with (A) the ninety-ninth month after such month of death or (B) the month preceding the first month in which there is no eligible survivor, whichever is sooner.

(b) A person may apply for a benefit for a month under subsection (a), in a manner prescribed by the Attorney General, at any time—

(1) after he becomes an eligible survivor of a qualifying officer, and

(2) before the date of payment of a benefit for such month to any other person by reason of his being a survivor of such qualifying officer.

A person may apply in a single application for benefits for more than one month.

(c) Compensation under this Act to the survivors of a qualifying officer employed by the District of Columbia shall be in addition to any other compensation to which they may be entitled under any other law of the United States.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "local law enforcement officer" means a full-time law enforcement officer employed by a State or a political subdivision of a State, or by the District of Columbia.

(2) The term "crime against the United States" includes any act made a crime by a law applicable only to the District of Columbia.

(3) The term "survivor" means a widow, child, or parent.

(4) The term "eligible survivor" with respect to a qualifying officer means—

(A) a widow,

(B) if such officer leaves no widow or if she dies or remarries, a child, or

(C) if no person is eligible under subparagraph (A) or (B), a parent.

(5) Subject to such regulations as the Attorney General may deem appropriate, the terms "widow", "child", and "parent" have the same meaning as they have for purposes of subsections (d), (e), and (h), respectively, of section 202 of the Social Security Act; except that an individual is a "child" only if in addition he is unmarried and satisfies clauses (i) and (ii) of section 202(d)(1)(B) of such Act.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., March 7, 1967.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice on S. 798, legislation "To provide compensation to survivors of local law enforcement officers killed while apprehending persons for committing Federal crimes."

The bill would establish a system of compensation under which payments could be made to survivors of a local law enforcement officer who died as a result of his apprehension of, or attempt to apprehend, a person for the commission of a crime against the United States. The Attorney General would make payments to survivors if the deceased officer's employing agency satisfies him that the officer's death was in the scope of the proposed statute. "Eligible survivor" would be defined as a widow, or if there is no widow or the widow dies or remarries, a child, or if there is no widow or child, a parent. Compensation in the amount of $250 monthly would be divided among eligible survivors and would be payable until the expiration of 99 months after the officer's death or until there is no eligible survivor, whichever occurs first. For the purposes of the Act, law enforcement officers employed by the District of Columbia, or by a state or political subdivision thereof, would be considered "local law enforcement officers."

Through the country, local law enforcement officers supplement the activities of Federal law enforcement personnel, thereby obviating, in large measure, the need for a larger Federal force. The enactment of legislation authorizing compensation to the families of such non-Federal officers who are killed while aiding in the enforcement of the Federal laws would appear to be an appropriate recognition of the contributions made by local forces.

Section 1 of the bill provides for compensation where death resulted from the apprehension of a Federal law violator. However, no standard is indicated for establishing that death "resulted" from such apprehension, and it is possible that considerable time might elapse between an injury sustained during apprehension and the officer's death. So that standards could be established for determining when death "resulted" from a covered injury, as well as settling any other aspects of the program which may require guidelines, we suggest that the bill be amended to give the Attorney General authority to promulgate general rules and regulations for carrying out his duties under the Act. It is noted that while sections 2(b) and 3(5) grant some rule making authority to the Attorney General, such authority is limited to prescribing the manner in which eligible survivors may apply for benefits and promulgating regulations concerning the meaning to be accorded the terms "widow", "child", and "parent" (the persons entitled to receive benefits.)

The payment of benefits to officers "employed" by a law enforcement agency (section 1) presents a problem in that it is not clear whether compensation would be available to the survivors of an officer who terminated his employment between the time of injury and the time of death resulting from such injury.

Section 1 poses another problem by directing that the Attorney General "shall pay" compensation to the survivors of a qualifying officer, although no compensation fund is provided. We suggest that provision for the authorization of necessary funds should be added to the bill.

Further, it is not clear that compensation would be available to an officer killed while apprehending an individual wanted for both a Federal and a state or local crime, which we understand is the intent of the legislation. Accordingly, we suggest that the bill be amended to indicate whether compensation is to be available in such cases.

We suggest that section 3(2) be amended to avoid any misinterpretation of the Act's application. Although the section defines "crime against the United States" as including any acts made crimes by a law applicable only to the District of Columbia, it is possible that this definition might be considered as limiting the Act to such offenses. In the interest of clarity, we suggest language along the following lines:

The term "crime against the United States" means any Federal crime and includes any act made a crime by a law applicable only to the District of Col-Columbia.

If the Congress gives favorable consideration to this proposal, it should keep the subject matter under study. What can be done to encourage better compensation and insurance programs for all law enforcement officers? Should programs relating to Federal law enforcement officers be reviewed? Should administration of such programs be placed in the Department of Labor which has broad experience in their implementation? Is a more comprehensive program desirable for officers in the District of Columbia Police Department?

The views expressed in this letter are equally applicable to H.R. 454, H.R. 683, H.R. 1060, H.R. 1184, H.R. 2548, H.R. 3167, and H.R. 3578, identical bills also before the Committee.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK, Acting Attorney General.

JUNE 29, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: We have considered your request for our views on a proposed amendment to S. 798, to add a disability clause which would extend compensation to local law enforcement officers themselves in the event they are disabled while enforcing Federal laws.

We note that in H.R. 1060, to which you refer, the word "disability" means the inability to engage in any substantial gainful activity by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment which can be expected to be of long-continued and indefinite duration or to result in death. We assume that the term would be given a comparable definition in S. 798 if amended as you contemplate.

In our opinion, this would be a desirable amendment in furtherance of the objectives of the legislation. We believe that such an amendment could easily be inserted in section 1 of the bill.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

RAMSEY CLARK, Attorney General.

A BILL To provide assistance for the improvement of State and local law enforcement agencies through acquisition of equipment for those agencies and provision of educational opportunities to their personnel, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The Local Law Officers Education and Equipment Act."

TITLE I—NATIONAL COMMISSION ON LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE

SEC. 101. For the purpose of administering and supervising the administration of titles II, IV, and V of this Act, there is hereby established in the Executive Office of the President a Commission to be known as the National Commission on Law Enforcement Assistance (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission").

SEC. 102. (a) The Commission shall be composed of nine members appointed by the President as follows:

(1) The Attorney General;

(2) Two officers of the executive branch of Government;

(3) Six members from the general public: Provided, however, That no more than three of such members shall be of the same political party.

(b) Except for the Attorney General, who shall be a permanent member of the Commission, the term of office of each of the other members of the Commission shall be three years except that, of the first eight appointments, four shall be for a term of two years and four shall be for a term of three years. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor is appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

(c) The Attorney General shall be Chairman of the Commission.

(d) Five members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum. A vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment or designation was made.

(e) The Commission is authorized to adopt such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry out the authority conferred upon it by this Act.

(f) For the purpose of assisting in the implementation and operation of titles II and V of this Act, the Attorney General shall make available to the Commission staff assistance from within the Department of Justice.

(g) For the purpose of assisting in the implementation and operation of title IV of this Act, the Secretary of State shall make available to the Commission staff assistance from within the Department of State.

SEC. 103. The Commission shall submit to the President and to the Congress not later than January 31 in each year a report detailing the activities of the Commission during the preceding calendar year with specific reference to the number and nature of requests made, granted and denied under titles II, IV, and V of this Act, and the uses to which grants were put by the agency or individual receiving them.

SEC. 104. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, board, Commission, officer or employee of the United States to exercise any direction and control over the organization, administration or personnel of any State or local law enforcement or correctional agency.

TITLE II—ACQUISITION OF LAW ENFORCEMENT EQUIPMENT AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 201. (a) The Commission is authorized to make grants pursuant to the provisions of this title during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years for the purpose of assisting State and local law enforcement agencies to acquire equipment of proven effectiveness to improve their capacity in the prevention and control of crime.

(b) For the purpose of making grants under this title there is authorized to be appropriated $80,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, $120,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1969, and $160,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1970.

USES OF GRANTS

SEC. 202. Grants under this title may be used, in accordance with applications approved under section 203 for carrying out the purpose of this title, which shall include, but is not limited to, the acquisition of—

(1) police communications systems;

(2) accident prevention and investigation equipment;

(3) nonlethal riot control devices;

(4) automatic data processing equipment;

(5) video tape and sound recording equipment for use in transcribing interrogations in the course of law enforcement investigations;

(6) equipment for crime detection and analysis laboratories; and

(7) ancillary equipment and supplies necessary for operation, maintenance and instruction in the use of the equipment acquired under this title.

SEC. 203. (a) A grant under this title may be made to a local law enforcement agency or agencies, but only upon an application submitted to the Commission at such time or times, in such manner, and containing such information as the Board deems necessary. Such application shall—

(1) set forth a program for the acquisition of equipment which carries out the purposes set forth in the preceding section;

(2) provide assurances that the State or local law enforcement agency, or both, will pay from non-Federal sources the remaining cost of such programs;

(3) provide that such agency or agencies will make such reports in such form and containing such information as the Board may reasonably require; and

(4) provide such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as may be necessary to assure proper disbursement of and accounting of funds received under this title.

(b) The Board may approve applications for grants under this title or any modifications thereof, only if—

(1) the application meets the requirements set forth in subsection (a) of this section;

(2) the application demonstrates that the agency has a need for the equipment;

(3) the equipment to be purchased is of proven effectiveness;

(4) the equipment can be expected to assist in the prevention, detection, or control of criminal activity or in the administration or operation of the agency; and

(5) in the case of applications for an increased Federal share in accordance with section 204(b), the application from the local law enforcement agency or agencies within a State has been approved by a State agency designated or created for the purpose of this subsection.

(c) In considering applications for grants under this title, the Commission shall consider the density of the population and the crime rate in the area served by the agency making application for a grant and, if the other requirements of this section have been satisfied, the Commission shall give preference in the making of grants to agencies serving more densely populated areas with the highest crime rates.

PAYMENTS

SEC. 204. (a) The Commission shall pay to each local law enforcement agency in that State which has an application approved under section 203(b) an amount equal to the Federal share of the amount needed for the purposes set forth in such application.

(b) For the purposes of subsection (a), the Federal share for each applicant shall be 30 per centum for each fiscal year, but such share shall be increased to 50 per centum for any fiscal year if a State agrees to pay 30 per centum of the amount needed to accomplish the procurement or acquisition approved under section 203(b) for that year.

(c) Payments under this title may be made in installments and in advance of by way of reimbursement, with necessary adjustments on account of overpayments or underpayments.

DEFINITION

SEC. 205. As used in this title, the term "State" includes the several States of the Union, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

TITLE III—DIVISION OF LAW ENFORCEMENT RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 301. There is established under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice a division to be known as the Division of Law Enforcement Research and Development; said Division shall be vested with the duty of acquiring, collecting, classifying, and preserving information concerning innovations and devices applicable to law enforecement and corrections and making such information available to State and local law enforcement and correctional agencies.

SEC. 302. The cost of such acquisition, collection, and dissemination shall be paid from appropriations made to the Department of Justice, unless otherwise provided by law.

TITLE IV—INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGE PROGRAM

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 401. It is the purpose of this title to expand and improve the techniques, capabilities, and practices of State and local agencies engaged in law enforcement, the correction of offenders, and the prevention and control of crime by providing to eligible police officers in State and local law enforcement agencies and correctional institutions an opportunity to visit, for the purpose of study and observation, law enforcement and correctional agencies of foreign governments.

DEFINITION OF ELIGIBLE POLICE OFFICER

SEC. 402. As used in this title, the term "eligible police officer" means any person who—

(1) is employed in a supervisory, planning, or instructional position by a public State or local law enforcement agency or public correctional institution; and

(2) at the time of application for a grant under this part has been so employed by any such agency or institution for at least six years.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 403. The President is authorized in accordance with the provisions of this part to provide by grant, contract, or otherwise for the travel and study abroad of eligible police officers who are selected for such travel by the Commission.

LIMITATION

SEC. 404. No travel grant may be made to an eligible police officer under this part, unless—

(1) he makes an application therefor in such manner and at such time as the Commission may prescribe containing a written statement setting forth the intended purpose of the travel, and its relevance to his present or future duties;

(2) he has at the time of such application been employed by a public State or local law enforcement agency or correctional institution in an executive, management, command, or instructional position;

(3) the law enforcement agency or correctional institutions employing such officer certifies its desire to have him perform the travel and conduct the study; and

(4) the foreign governmental agency to be visited agrees to cooperate with the contemplated study visit.

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 405. For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this title there is authorized to be appropriated $150,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years.

TITLE V—TRAVEL AND STUDY WITHIN THE UNITED STATES

PROGRAM AUTHORIZED

SEC. 501. (a) The Commission is authorized to conduct either directly or by means of grant of contract a program for the temporary exchange of personnel of State and local law enforcement agencies and correctional institutions for periods not to exceed ninety days to permit such personnel to observe and study the operation of other such agencies or institutions within the United States.

(b) Each person who participates in the exchange program authorized in this part shall be eligible (after application therefor) to receive a stipend at the rate of $100 per week for the period of his travel and study, and travel expenses as authorized by section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code for persons in Government service employed intermittently.

ELIGIBLE OFFICERS

SEC. 502. Officers eligible to perform study and travel under this title shall be those employed by State and local law enforcement and correctional agencies in supervisory, planning, or instructional positions or those designated by such agencies to develop or modify operational or administrative procedures.

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 503. There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this part $450,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years.

TITLE VI—AMENDMENT TO NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT OF 1958

SEC. 601. Section 205(b)(3) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, as amended (78 Stat. 1102; 79 Stat. 1253; 20 U.S.C. 425(b)(3)), is further amended by (1) inserting the words "or as a full-time law enforcement or correctional officer with a Federal, State, or local agency," after the words "United States," and (2) by deleting the word "academic" and the words "or its equivalent" where they first appear.

TITLE VII—TRAINING GRANTS FOR STATE AND LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT AND CORRECTIONAL PERSONNEL

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 701. To enable the Attorney General to make payments in accordance with the provisions of this title to eligible police officers in order that such officers may more easily participate in general educational and training programs offered by institutions of higher education, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 702. As used in this title—

(a) The term "eligible police officer" means any person who—

(1) is employed by a public State or local law enforcement agency or public correctional institution, and

(2) has at the time of application for payment under this title been so employed by any such agency or institution for at least two years.

(b) The term "institution of higher education" means an educational institution in any State which (1) admits as regular students only persons having a certificate of graduation from a school providing secondary education, or the recognized equivalent of such a certificate, (2) is legally authorized within such State to provide program of education beyond secondary education, (3) provides an educational program for which it awards a bachelor's degree or provides not less than a two-year program which is acceptable for full credit toward such a degree, (4) is a public or other nonprofit institution, and (5) is accredited by a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association, or, if not so accredited, is an institution whose credits are accepted, on transfer, by not less than three institutions which are so accredited, for credit on the same basis as if transferred from an institution so accredited. Such term also includes any business school or technical institution which meets the provisions of clauses (1), (2), and (5). For purposes of this subsection, the Attorney General shall consult the Commissioner of Education to obtain a list of nationally recognized accrediting agencies or associations.

PAYMENTS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 703. (a) The Attorney General is authorized to make payments under the provisions of this title to institutions of higher education or to other agencies or institutions approved by him for the purposes of this title. Such payments shall be for the tuition and fees of eligible police officers, who apply therefor, not to exceed $300 per semester during the period of attendance, full time or part time, by such police officers at any such institution or agency, while the officer is making satisfactory progress in such program or course.

(b) No payment shall be made to an institution of higher education in behalf of an eligible police officer under this title for any period during which he is enrolled in and pursuing a training program or a course of study paid for by the United States under any provision of law other than this title or title VIII of this Act, where payment of such grant would constitute a duplication of benefits paid to the eligible police officer from the Federal Treasury.

(c) No payment shall be made to any eligible police officer initiating his training program or course of study after June 30, 1975.

SEC. 704. An eligible police officer who receives the benefit of education under the provisions of this title shall be obligated to serve the law enforcement agency or correctional institution employing him for a period of two years following the last month during which educational benefits of this title were provided for him.

APPLICATIONS AND REPORTS

SEC. 705. (a) Any eligible police officer who desires payments under this title shall file an application with the Attorney General in such form and containing such information as the Attorney General determines necessary.

(b) The Attorney General shall require reports containing such information in such form and to be filed at such times as he determines necessary from each eligible police officer receiving the benefit of payments under this title.

(c) The Attorney General shall make arrangements with institutions of higher education and other agencies and institutions approved by him for the purposes of this title providing for reports to be filed in the manner prescribed by him on the enrollment, interruption, and termination of the program of training or the course of study of each eligible police officer enrolled therein and receiving payments under this title. The Attorney General is authorized to pay to such agencies and institutions the costs incident to the filing of such report. No payment shall be made to such agencies or institutions for the period during which such reports were not submitted as required by this subsection.

TITLE VIII—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF STATE AND LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES AND PERSONNEL

SEC. 801. Section 2 of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 (79 Stat. 828) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. For the purpose of improving the quality of State and local law enforcement and correctional personnel, and personnel employed or preparing for employment in programs for the prevention, detection, or control of crime, the Attorney General is authorized (1) to make grants to, or to contract with, any public or private nonprofit agency, organization, or institution for the establishment (or, where established, the improvement or enlargement) of programs and facilities to provide professional training and related education to such personnel, and (2) to award traineeships or fellowships to such personnel for study in accredited colleges or universities related to law enforcement, crime detection or corrections, the development of professional skills, or the application of knowledge and technology to law enforcement problems."

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1967.

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

Dear SENATOR: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice on S. 824, a bill "To provide assistance for the improvement of State and local law enforcement agencies through acquisition of equipment for those agencies and provision of educational opportunities to their personnel, and for other purposes."

The bill would provide Federal assistance for up-grading the technical capacity of police forces to provide them training and educational opportunities and career incentives and would provide a commission on law enforcement assistance to administer the provisions of the Act. The commissioner would be authorized to make grants for the purpose of assisting state and local law enforcement agencies to acquire equipment and to improve their capacity for prevention of crime. Grants under this title may be used for, but are not limited to, the following purposes: police communications systems, crime prevention and investigation, non-lethal riot prevention equipment, automatic data processing, video tape and sound recording equipment, and crime detection equipment.

The Act proposes a financial partnership between the Federal Government and the states to purchase the requisite equipment. A cost sharing formula provides 30% Federal funding when a local government provides the rest and 50% funding when a state government provides 20% of the local costs.

Title III of the Act establishes a Division of Law Enforcement, Research and Development within the Department of Justice whose duties include acquiring, collecting, classifying and preserving information concerning innovations and devices applicable to law enforcement and corrections. The new Division would make such information available to state and local law enforcement and correctional agencies. Additional provisions of the Act provide for grants and contracts for travel and study and for exchange of local law enforcement personnel. There are also provisions to amend the National Defense Education Act to include full time law enforcement and correctional officers for state and local agencies. Additional provisions help to support education and research in the area of law enforcement and corrections.

The Administration's proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" (S. 917) gives authority to develop a broad range of programs to assist state and local governments to improve law enforcement. Its proposed programs are in many cases identical with those proposed under S. 824. The major difference between the two Acts is the emphasis on detailed and coordinated planning for current and future requirements which is necessitated and subsidized under S. 917. That bill proposes a comprehensive plan for improving all facets of law enforcement and the administration of justice and has the added advantage of requiring detailed planning which should insure that the funds receive optimum utilization. It is believed that S. 917 is a better proposal for providing assistance to state and local law enforcement agencies and personnel.

The Department of Justice recommends the enactment of S. 917 rather than legislation such as S. 824.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

"4042. Duties of Bureau of Prisons."

SEC. 8. Section 5002 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 5002. Advisory Corrections Council

"(a) There is hereby created an Advisory Corrections Council composed of four United States judges designated by the Chief Justice of the United States, and, ex officio, the Chairman of the Board of Parole, the Chairman of the Youth Division of the Board of Parole, the Director of the United States Corrections Service, and a physician designated by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. The judges first appointed to the Council shall continue in office for terms of one, two, three, and four years, respectively, from the date of the amendment of this section, the term of each to be designated by the Chief Justice at the time of his appointment. Their successors shall each be appointed for a term of four years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that any judge appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of such predecessor. The chairman shall be designated annually by the Chief Justice.

"(b) The Council shall meet annually and at special sessions which may be held from time to time upon the call of the Chairman.

"(c) The Council shall consider problems of treatment and correction of persons convicted of offenses against the United States and shall make recommendations to the Attorney General, the Judicial Conference of the United States, and other appropriate officials to improve the administration of criminal justice and assure the coordination and integration of policies respecting the disposition, treatment, and correction of all persons convicted of crime. It shall also consider measures to promote the prevention of crime and delinquency and suggest appropriate studies in this connection to be undertaken by agencies both public and private.

"(d) The Council shall give attention to orders addressed to probation officers or community correctional officers by the United States judges, the Board of Parole, and the United States Corrections Service. It shall seek to resolve inconsistencies and clarify ambiguities and may make recommendations to that end to the Attorney General, the Judicial Conference, and the Board of Parole.

"(e) The Council shall keep under continuous review the standards and practices of the presentence investigations and reports and may make recommendations to the Attorney General and the Judicial Conference to increase their utility at every stage of correctional process.

"(f) The Council shall review and evaluate research by the United States Corrections Service and may make recommendations concerning the adequacy of such research to the Attorney General and to the Judicial Conference.

"(g) The Council is authorized to request from any department, agency, or independent instrumentality of the Government any information or records it deems necessary to carry out its functions, and each such department, agency, or instrumentality is authorized to cooperate with the Council and, to the extent permitted by law, to furnish such information and records to the Council, upon request made by the Chairman or by any member when acting as Chairman.

"(h)(1) The Council shall appoint an Executive Director and such other personnel as may be necessary to carry out its functions. The Executive Director shall supervise the activities of persons employed by the Council and shall perform such other duties as the Council may direct.

"(2) The Council may also procure services to the same extent as is authorized for the departments by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946, as amended (5 U.S.C. 55a), at rates not to exceed $100 per day.

"(i) The members of the Council shall serve without compensation but necessary travel and subsistence expenses as authorized by law shall be paid from available appropriations of the Department of Justice."

"5015. Powers of Director as to placement of youth offenders."

and inserting in lieu thereof

"5015. Powers of Attorney General as to placement of youth offenders.".

SEC. 18. The fourth paragraph of section 5034 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out of the second sentence the words "Director of the Bureau of Prisons, under such regulations as the Attorney General may prescribe," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Attorney General"; and

(2) by striking out the word "Director" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Attorney General".

SEC. 19. Section 5036 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the words "Director of the Bureau of Prisons" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Attorney General".

SEC. 20. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 21. Until such time and to such an extent as the Attorney General shall certify to the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts that probation officers are no longer needed in a particular district to supervise parolees and probationers, probation officers shall continue to perform all supervision functions being performed by them under existing law, and to execute apprehension warrants issued under section 5020 of title 18, United States Code.

SEC. 22. This Act shall be effective on July 1, 1967.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Enclosed for your consideration and appropriate reference is a legislative proposal, "To assist in combatting crime by creating the United States Corrections Service, and for other purposes".

A primary goal of law enforcement is the rehabilitation of offenders and their return to useful citizenship. Too often we fail to attain this goal. One study of the Federal corrections process reflects that 35 percent of those who have been convicted of a Federal offense later commit a serious crime, while another study finds that this rate of repeat is as high as 48 percent.

One of the deficiencies in our corrections process results from its fragmentation—probation and parole supervision being conducted as a part of the court system and prisons and other institutional services being the responsibility of the Executive branch.

As you know, the 89th Congress enacted legislation which provides three important techniques for use in achieving prisoner rehabilitation (P.L. 89–176). This legislation authorizes the Attorney General to place prisoners in residential community treatment centers, to permit them to take emergency or rehabilitative leave, and to permit them to work at paid employment or participate in community training programs. As a result, new techniques involving prerelease and work release programs are being perfected in the hope we will more often return useful, rehabilitated citizens to their communities.

The instant proposal would constitute a further step in the improvement of our corrections process. It would establish a United States Corrections Service which would combine under a single direction the supervision of convicted persons, irrespective of whether they are confined in an institution, totally in the free community on probation or parole, or somewhere between complete confinement and complete freedom—for example, in a half-way house. This consolidation of responsibility for the supervision and rehabilitation of Federal offenders certainly has the potential of being more effective.

The proposal would also make several changes in the membership and responsibility of the Advisory Corrections Council. The Council would be composed of four United States judges, and, ex officio, the Chairman of the Board of Parole, the Chairman of the Youth Division of the Board of Parole, the Director of the United States Corrections Service, and a physician designated by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. This Council would continue to consider problems of treatment and correction and would also consider problems of coordination and integration of policy among the branches of the Government having statutory responsibilities in this area. It would make recommendations to the Attorney General and to the Judicial Conference of the United States relating to these responsibilities and to the improvement of the administration of criminal justice. In addition, the Council would be authorized to employ an Executive Director and other necessary personnel to carry out its expanded functions.

Last Congress, the Department of Justice submitted a proposal similar to this one, but broader. It would have transferred the United States Probation Service from the courts to the Department of Justice, lodging with this Department all of the functions of the Service, including responsibility for the preparation of presentence reports. Unlike the earlier proposal, however, the current measure continues the Probation Service as a part of the court system with the responsibility for preparing presentence reports for the use of district judges.

The continued increase in crime warrants the prompt, close attention of the Congress to this proposal. I urge its early introduction and consideration.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this legislation from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Acting Attorney General.

A BILL To assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967".

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares it to be the policy of the United States to promote the general welfare by improving law enforcement and the administration of criminal justice. Crime is essentially a local problem that must be dealt with by State and local governments. But sustained and substantial national assistance is necessary to aid these governments in coping with the lawlessness that has become a serious problem of national significance.

It is the purpose of this Act to increase the personal safety of the people of the Nation by reducing the incidence of crime; to stimulate the allocation of new resources and the development of technological advances and other innovations for preventing crime; to increase the efficiency and fairness of law enforcement and criminal justice through improved manpower, training, organization, and equipment; and to encourage coordination in planning, operations, and research by law enforcement and criminal justice agencies throughout the Nation.

TITLE I—PLANNING GRANTS

SEC. 101. It is the purpose of this title to encourage States and units of general local government to prepare and adopt comprehensive plans based on their evaluation of State and local problems of law enforcement and criminal justice.

SEC. 2. The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to States, units of general local government, or combinations of such States or units, for preparing, developing, or revising the plans described in section 204: Provided, however, That no unit of general local government or combination of such units shall be eligible for a grant under this title unless it has a population of not less than fifty thousand persons.

SEC. 103. A Federal grant authorized under section 102 shall not exceed 90 per centum of the total cost of the preparation, development, or revision of a plan.

TITLE II—GRANTS FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE PURPOSES

SEC. 201. It is the purpose of this title to authorize grants to States and units of general local government for new approaches and improvements in law enforcement and criminal justice. The purposes for which grants may be made may include but shall not be limited to—

(a) public protection, including the development, demonstration and evaluation of methods, devices, equipment and design to increase safety from crime in streets, homes, and other public and private places;

(b) equipment, including the development and acquisition of equipment designed to increase the effectiveness and improve the deployment of law enforcement and criminal justice personnel;

(c) manpower, including the recruitment, education, and training of all types of law enforcement and criminal justice personnel;

(d) management and organization, including the organization, administration, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice agencies and functions;

(e) operations and facilities for increasing the capability and fairness of law enforcement and criminal justice, including the processing, disposition, and rehabilitation of offenders;

(f) community relations, including public understanding of and cooperation with law enforcement and criminal justice agencies; and

(g) public education relating to crime prevention, including education programs in school and community agencies.

SEC. 202. (a) Beginning January 1, 1968, the Attorney General is authorized to make grants to States, units of general local government, or combinations of such States or units for the purposes described in section 201. The amount of any such grant shall not exceed 60 per centum of the improvement expenditure of the applicant: Provided, however, That—

(1) no grant under this section shall be used for the construction of any building or other physical facility; and

(2) not more than one-third of any grant under this section shall be expended for the compensation of personnel, except that this limitation shall not apply to the compensation of personnel for time engaged in conducting or undergoing training programs and specialized personnel performing innovative functions.

(b) Improvement expenditure is the amount by which the proposed operating budget, or the amount by which the proposed operating budget per capita, whichever is greater, of the applicant for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes for the fiscal year for which the grant is sought exceeds the applicant's qualifying expenditure.

(c) Qualifying expenditure is—

(1) 105 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1968;

(2) 110 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1969;

(3) 115 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1970;

(4) 120 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1971;

(5) 125 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1972;

(6) 130 per centum of the base expenditure if the application is for funds to be used in the applicant's fiscal year ending in the calendar year 1973.

(d) Base expenditure is the applicant's operating expenditures or operating expenditures per capita, as the case may be, for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes for the fiscal year completed next preceding January 1, 1968: Provided, however, That if the applicant's base expenditure includes substantial and extraordinary amounts and the Attorney General is of the opinion that the requirements of this section constitute an unreasonable restriction on the applicant's eligibility for a grant under this section, the Attorney General may reduce such requirements to the extent he deems appropriate.

SEC. 203. (a) The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to States, units of general local government, or combinations of such States or units for the construction of buildings or other physical facilities which fulfill a significant, innovative function. The amount of any such grant shall not exceed 50 per centum of the cost of such construction.

(b) An applicant shall be eligible for a grant under this section only if such applicant would also be eligible for a grant under section 202.

SEC. 204. (a) The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to an applicant under this title only if such applicant has a file with the Attorney General a current law enforcement and criminal justice plan which conforms with the purpose and requirements of this Act. Each such plan shall—

(1) unless it is not practicable to do so (A) encompass a State, unit of general local government, or combination of such States or units; and (B) be applicable to a population of not less than fifty thousand persons;

(2) incorporate innovations and advanced techniques and contain a comprehensive outline of priorities for the improvement and coordination of all aspects of law enforcement and criminal justice dealt with in the plan, including descriptions of: (A) general needs and problems; (B) existing systems; (C) available resources; (D) purposes for which Federal funds are sought (with specific reference to their sequence, timing, and costs); (E) systems and administrative machinery for implementing the plan; (F) the direction, scope, and types of improvements to be made in the future; and (G) to the extent appropriate, the relationship of the plan to other relevant State or local law enforcement and criminal justice plans and systems.

(b) In implementing this section, the Attorney General shall—

(1) encourage State and local initiative in developing comprehensive law enforcement and criminal justice plans;

(2) encourage plans which encompass the entire metropolitan area, if any, of which the applicant is a part;

(3) encourage plans which deal with the problems and provide for the improvement of all law enforcement and criminal justice agencies in the area encompassed by the plans;

(4) encourage plans which provide for research and development;

(5) encourage plans which provide for an appropriate balance between fund allocations for the several parts of the law enforcement and criminal justice systems covered by the plans;

(6) encourage plans which demonstrate the willingness of the applicant to assume the costs of improvements funded under this title after a reasonable period of Federal assistance; and

(7) encourage plans which explore the costs and benefits of alternative courses of action and promote efficiency and economy in management and operations.

TITLE III—RESEARCH, DEMONSTRATION, AND SPECIAL PROJECT GRANTS

SEC. 301. It is the purpose of this title to encourage research and development for the purpose of improving law enforcement and criminal justice and developing new methods for the prevention and reduction of crime.

SEC. 302. The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to, or enter into contracts with, institutions of higher education and other public agencies or private organizations to conduct research, demonstrations, or special projects which he determines will be of regional or national importance or will make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice.

SEC. 303. The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to institutions of higher education and other public agencies or private nonprofit organizations to establish national or regional institutes for research and education pertaining to the purpose of this Act.

SEC. 304. A Federal grant authorized under section 302 or 303 may be up to 100 per centum of the total cost of each project or institute for which such grant is made. The Attorney General shall require, whenever feasible, as a condition of approval of a grant under this title, that the recipient contribute money, facilities, or services to carry out the purpose for which the grant is sought.

SEC. 305. The Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 (79 Stat. 825) is repealed and superseded by this title: Provided, however, That—

(a) the Attorney General may award new grants, enter into new contracts or obligate funds for the continuation of projects in accordance with the provisions of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, based upon applications received under that Act prior to the effective date of this Act;

(b) the Attorney General is authorized to obligate funds for the continuation of projects approved under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act prior to the effective date of this Act, to the extent that such approval provided for continuation; and

(c) any awarding of grants, entering into contracts or obligation of funds under subsection (a) or (b) of this section and all activities necessary or appropriate for the review, inspection, audit, final disposition and dissemination of project accomplishments with respect to projects which are approved in accordance with the provisions of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act and which continue in operation beyond the effective date of this Act may be carried on with funds appropriated under this Act.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 401. (a) There shall be in the Department of Justice a Director of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose function shall be to assist the Attorney General in the performance of his duties under this Act.

(b) Section 5315 of title 5 of the United States Code is amended by the addition of the following at the end thereof:

"(78) Director of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance."

SEC. 402. The Attorney General is authorized to appoint such technical or other advisory committees to advise him in connection with the administration of this Act as he deems necessary. Members of such committees not otherwise in the employ of the United States, while attending meetings of the committees, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Attorney General, but not exceeding $100 per diem, and while away from home or regular place of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5703) for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

SEC. 403. To insure that all Federal assistance to State and local programs for law enforcement and criminal justice is carried out in a coordinated manner, the Attorney General is authorized to request any Federal department or agency to supply such statistics, data, program reports, and other materials as he deems necessary to carry out his functions under this Act. Each such department or agency is authorized to cooperate with the Attorney General and, to the extent permitted by law, to furnish such materials to the Attorney General. Any Federal department or agency engaged in administering programs related to law enforcement and criminal justice shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consult with and seek advice from the Attorney General to insure fully coordinated efforts.

SEC. 404. The Attorney General may arrange with and reimburse the heads of other Federal departments and agencies for the performance of any of his functions under this Act, and, as necessary or appropriate, delegate any of his powers under this Act with respect to any part thereof, and authorize the redelegation of such powers.

SEC. 405. The Attorney General is authorized—

(a) to conduct research and evaluation studies with respect to matters related to this Act; and

(b) to collect, evaluate, publish, and disseminate statistics and other information on the condition and progress of law enforcement and criminal justice in the several States.

SEC. 406. Payments under this Act may be made in installments, and in advance or by way of reimbursement, as may be determined by the Attorney General.

SEC. 407. Whenever the Attorney General, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to a grantee under this Act, finds that, with respect to any payments made under this Act, there is a substantial failure to comply with—

(a) the provisions of this Act;

(b) regulations promulgated by the Attorney General under this Act; or

(c) the law enforcement and criminal justice plan submitted in accordance with the provisions of this Act; the Attorney General shall notify such grantee that further payments shall not be made (or in his discretion that further payments shall not be made for activities in which there is such failure), until there is no longer such failure.

SEC. 408. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over any police force or other agency of any State or local law enforcement and criminal justice system.

SEC. 409. Unless otherwise specified in this Act, the Attorney General shall carry out the programs provided for in this Act during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, and the four succeeding fiscal years.

SEC. 410. Not more than 15 per centum of the sums appropriated or allocated for any fiscal year to carry out the purpose of this Act shall be used within any one State.

SEC. 411. The Attorney General, after appropriate consultation with representatives of State and local governments, is authorized to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to implement the purpose of this Act, including regulations which—

(a) provide that a grantee will from time to time, but not less often than annually, submit a report evaluating accomplishments and cost-effectiveness of activities funded under this Act;

(b) provide for fiscal control, sound accounting procedures and periodic reports to the Attorney General regarding the application of funds paid under this Act; and

(c) establish criteria to achieve an equitable distribution among the States of assistance under this Act.

SEC. 412. On or before August 31, 1968, and each year thereafter, the Attorney General shall report to the President and to the Congress on activities pursuant to the provisions of this Act during the preceding fiscal year.

SEC. 413. For the purpose of carrying out this Act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968; and for each succeeding fiscal year such sums as the Congress may hereafter appropriate. Funds appropriated for the purpose of carrying out this Act shall remain available until expended.

TITLE V—DEFINITIONS

SEC. 501. As used in this Act—

(a) "Law enforcement and criminal justice" means all activities pertaining to crime prevention or the enforcement and administration of the criminal law, including but not limited to activities involving police, prosecution or defense of criminal cases, courts, probation, corrections and parole.

(b) "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, the Canal Zone, American Samoa, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(c) "Unit of general local government" means any city, county, township, town, borough, parish, village, or other general purpose political subdivision of a State.

(d) "Combination" as applied to States or units of general local government means any grouping or joining together of such States or units including a grouping or joining together for purposes only of preparing, developing and implementing a law enforcement and criminal justice plan.

(e) "Metropolitan area" means a standard metropolitan statistical area as established by the Bureau of the Budget, subject however to such modifications and extensions as the Attorney General may determine to be appropriate.

(f) "Public agency" means any State, unit of general local government, combination of such States or units, or any agency or instrumentality of any of the foregoing.

(g) "Construction" means the erection, acquisition, expansion, or repair (but not including minor remodeling or minor repairs) of new or existing buildings or other physical facilities, and the acquisition or installation of initial equipment therefor.

(h) "Innovative function" means a function which will serve a new or improved purpose within the particular law enforcement and criminal justice system into which it is introduced.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1967.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The President, in his State of the Union Address and in his recent Message on Crime in America, stressed the fact that we must combat crime with every means at our command. He stated that crime must be rooted out in local communities by local authorities, and that the National Government can, and expects to, help. He indicated that, among other things he would recommend the enactment of the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" to provide this assistance. Accordingly, there is enclosed for your consideration and appropriate reference a legislative proposal "To assist state and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, to increase the effectiveness, fairness, and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice systems at all levels of government, and for other purposes."

As the President stated in his Crime Message, the National Crime Commission's report "gives us an extraordinary insight into the nature of crime and criminal justice" in the United States. Lawlessness in this country has become a serious problem of national concern. Farsighted programs are already underway to assist State and local governments in eradicating the conditions which breed crime—bad housing, inferior education and unemployment. Equally bold and imaginative action must be taken by our government to assist law enforcement and criminal justice systems at the State and local levels.

This legislative proposal contains broad and comprehensive authority for the efficient and effective channeling of substantial resources to State and local government for the improvement of all law enforcement and criminal justice throughout the Nation. As the President stated in describing this proposal, "It will enable us to assist those States and cities that try to make their streets and their homes safer, and their police forces better, and their corrections systems more effective and their courts more efficient."

Title I of the proposal encourages state and local governments to prepare and adopt comprehensive plans for meeting their particular crime problems. Each plan will include a detailed outline of priorities for the improvement and coordination of law enforcement and criminal justice in the geographic area encompassed by the plan and a description of the proposed means of accomplishing needed changes. Planners are required to incorporate innovations and advanced techniques and encouraged to provide for research and promote efficiency and economy in operations. The proposal would authorize the Attorney General to approve grants not to exceed 90 per cent of the total cost of the preparation, development or revision of such plans.

Title II of the proposal authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to State and local governments which have formulated a plan such as has been described. These grants may be used for the entire range of new approaches and improvements in law enforcement and criminal justice, including improvements in police equipment; the recruitment, education and training of personnel; the application of modern management techniques to police and criminal justice operations; and the development and use of new approaches in the enforcement, prosecutorial, judicial and correctional stages of the criminal process.

Grants under Title II are on a matching basis. The Federal share may be up to 60 per cent. The grants are keyed to a requirement that the applicant exceed a 5 per cent annual increase in law enforcement and criminal justice expenditures in order to qualify for a Federal grant. This requirement is designed not only to provide Federal financial assistance but also to stimulate increased State and local spending for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes. In the case of construction, the Federal share is limited to 50 per cent and may only be used for such a purpose where the new facility will serve a significant, innovative function. Up to one third of a grant may be applied to salaries.

Title III of the proposal will carry on the functions of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 by authorizing grants of up to 100 per cent for research, demonstration or special projects which the Attorney General determines will have regional or national importance or will make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice. This title also provides for the making of grants to establish national or regional institutes for pertinent educational and research activities.

In summary, the proposed legislation is a substantial and far-reaching anti-crime program which works with and through State and local government agencies to bring technology and improved capability into the battle against crime. It provides incentives for State and local authorities to work out effective plans for combatting crime in their areas and authorizes Federal financial assistance in implementing these plans. Its objective is a safer, more crime-free, Nation.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that enactment of this legislation is in accord with the Program of the President.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Acting Attorney General.

A BILL To establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) there is hereby established in the Department of Justice a National Institute of Criminal Justice (referred to hereafter in this Act as the "Institute").

(b) The Institute shall be headed by a Director appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be compensated at the rate provided for an Assistant Attorney General.

SEC. 2. (a) For the purpose of assisting State and local law enforcement agencies, courts, and correctional institutions in the prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders the Institute shall—

(1) carry out a program of research in, and development of, new or improved approaches, methods, techniques, and devices for the prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders;

(2) undertake systematic research into what the nature and extent of an appropriate program of Federal assistance to States, local law-enforcement agencies, the courts, and other agencies concerned with the administration of justice, and correctional institutions should be;

(3) carry out a program of behavioral research designed to provide more accurate information on the causes of crime and the effectiveness of various means of preventing it, and to evaluate the relationship between correctional procedures and the successful rehabilitation of convicted offenders into society;

(4) provide grants-in-aid to States, local governments, police departments, judicial agencies, correctional institutions, and educational institutions for the purpose of creating and maintaining demonstration and research programs relating to improving the approaches, methods, techniques, and devices for the prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders, and for developing new career opportunities in these fields;

(5) carry out a program of fellowships and instructional assistance consisting of—

(A) long-term research and training fellowships in the development of new or improved approaches, methods, techniques, or devices in accordance with paragraph (1) of this subsection, and

(B) short-term workshops for the dissemination of information and knowledge resulting from research authorized by this Act, for such terms, and with such stipends and allowances for travel and dependents, as the Director may prescribe;

(6) carry out a program of collection and dissemination of information obtained by the Institute, Federal agencies, and other public or private institutions engaged in research or demonstration projects under this Act which relates to such approaches, methods, techniques, and devices and which may be useful in the prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders;

(7) undertake, upon request from other Federal agencies, the valuation and assessment of and dissemination of publications and results arising from grants and contracts initiated by such other agencies in the fields of prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders; and

(8) provide an extension service to furnish demonstrations and practical instruction through consultants, field agents, or in any other manner determined appropriate by the Attorney General, to personnel of State and local law-enforcement agencies, the courts, and other agencies concerned with the administration of justice and correctional institutions.

(b) The Institute shall establish such laboratories and research facilities as may be necessary to carry out the programs described in subsection (a). The Institute may conduct programs authorized by this Act by grant or contract with individuals, and with public or private agencies or organizations.

(c) The Institute shall make available, for the benefit of the States and local law-enforcement agencies, courts, and other agencies concerned with the administration of justice, correctional institutions, and the public, information and publications concerning the results of programs conducted under this Act, and innovative or advanced approaches, methods, techniques, and devices for the prevention and control of crime, the administration of justice, and the rehabilitation of offenders.

SEC. 3. (a) The Attorney General shall appoint a national advisory committee to advise him in connection with the administration of this Act.

(b) Members of such committee not otherwise in the employ of the United States, while attending meetings of their committee, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Attorney General, but not exceeding $50 per diem, including traveltime, and while away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

SEC. 4. To carry out this Act there is authorized to be appropriated (1) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1968, the sum of $10,000,000, (2) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1969, the sum of $30,000,000, (3) for the fiscal year ending June 3, 1970, the sum of $60,000,000, and (4) for each fiscal year thereafter, such sum as may be necessary.

SEC. 5. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the organization, administration, or personnel of any State or local police force or other law-enforcement agency, court, or correctional institution.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., July 11, 1967.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

Dear SENATOR: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice on S. 992, a bill "To establish a National Institute of Criminal Justice."

The bill would establish, in the Department of Justice, a National Institute of Criminal Justice to be headed by a Director appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It would authorize the Institute to conduct research, and to provide grants for research by others, in the fields of crime prevention, administration of justice and rehabilitation of offenders. Also, the Institute would be charged with undertaking research into the nature and extent of an appropriate program of federal assistance to state and local authorities in these fields. Finally, the bill would authorize the Institute to provide a variety of training fellowships, collect and disseminate information, establish laboratories and research facilities, provide consulting and technical services to local agencies, and carry on other specified activities to promote progress in the over-all administration of criminal justice.

The Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 828, authorizes the Attorney General to make grants for training state and local law enforcement personnel and for improving the capabilities, techniques and practices of state and local agencies engaged in law enforcement, the administration of the criminal laws, the correction of offenders, or the prevention and control of crime. The Law Enforcement Assistance Act is therefore an existing vehicle for many of the objectives contemplated by S. 992. Moreover, the President, in response to the findings and recommendations of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice, has proposed the enactment of the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967," S. 917. This proposal, if enacted, while repealing the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965, would expand on the programs pioneered under that law and is sufficiently broad in scope to implement virtually all of the objectives and functions delineated by S. 992.

In particular, Title III of the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, deals with research, demonstration, and special project efforts. The unit administering the Title III program, which authorizes the establishment of national or regional institutes for research and education, might well take on the character of a national institute or national foundation, but it would, under the administrative scheme of S. 917, have the advantage of common over-all direction and integrated planning with the broad planning and formula grant assistance available under Titles I and II of S. 917. Like S. 992, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act contemplates a Director appointed by the President at an Assistant Attorney General compensation level.

While the Department of Justice supports the purposes of S. 992, we recommend that the broader proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967," S. 917, is a far better vehicle through which to accomplish them.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

———— ————, Attorney General.

A BILL To amend chapter 313, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the commitment of certain individuals acquitted of offenses against the United States solely on the ground of insanity

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 313, title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 4249. Commitment of certain individuals acquitted of offenses against the United States on the ground of insanity

"(a) Whenever the issue of insanity at the time of the commission of an offense against the United States is raised by the pleadings or evidence, the court shall find or, in the event of a jury trial, shall instruct that the verdict shall be one of the following: (1) guilty, (2) not guilty, or (3) not guilty by reason of insanity at the time of the commission of the offense. The judgment shall so state.

"(b) Whenever any person charged with an offense against the United States is acquitted solely on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, the United States attorney, if he has reasonable cause to believe that such person so acquitted may be presently insane and that, because of his insanity, his release would constitute a danger to himself or others, shall file a motion for a judicial determination of the mental condition of such person, setting forth the grounds for such belief, in the trial court in which the proceedings which resulted in his acquittal were conducted. Upon the filing of such a motion or upon its own motion, the court shall, after notice, hold a hearing within a reasonable time to determine whether the person acquitted of an offense against the United States on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, would, because of his insanity, constitute a present danger to himself or others. Such person shall be entitled to be represented by counsel at such hearings, and, if such person is indigent, counsel shall be provided for him at the expense of the Government.

"(c) After the filing of a motion to determine the mental condition of a person found not guilty of an offense against the United States solely because he was insane at the time of its commission, or upon its own motion, the court may order such person to be examined by at least two qualified psychiatrists designated by the court. The psychiatrists so designated shall, within sixty days thereafter, file their reports with the court setting forth their findings with respect to such examination, including their conclusions as to the mental condition of such person and whether the release of such person would constitute a danger to himself or others. For the purpose of examination the court may order the person committed for such reasonable period as it may determine, not to exceed sixty days, to the custody of the Attorney General who shall hospitalize such person in a sutiable mental institution or other facility designated by the court.

"(d) If, after the hearing provided in (b), the court shall determine that the person, because of his insanity, would constitute a present danger to himself or others if released from custody, the court shall commit the person so acquitted to the custody of the Attorney General, who shall hospitalize such person in a suitable mental institution or other facility.

"(e) Whenever a person shall be committed to the custody of the Attorney General or his representative pursuant to subsection (d) of this section, his commitment shall run until his mental condition is so improved that his release would not constitute a danger to himself or others.

"(f) Where any person has been confined by the Attorney General in a mental institution or other facility pursuant to subsection (d) of this section and the superintendent of any such mental institution or the head of any such facility certifies that, in his opinion, the release of such person will not in the reasonable future constitute a danger to himself or others and that the person is entitled to his unconditional release from such mental institution or facility, and such certificate is filed with the clerk of the court in which the person was tried, and a copy thereof served on the United States attorney, such certificate shall be sufficient to authorize the court to order the unconditional release of the person so confined.

"(g) Where, in the judgment of the superintendent of such hospital, a person committed under subsection (d) above is not in such condition as to warrant his unconditional release, but is in a condition to be conditionally released under supervision, and such certificate is filed with the clerk of the court in which the person was tried, and a copy thereof served on the United States attorney, such certificate shall be sufficient to authorize the court to order the release of such person under such conditions as the court shall impose at the expiration of fifteen days from the time such certificate is filed and served pursuant to this section.

"(h) Nothing contained in this section shall preclude a person committed under the authority of subsection (d) of this section from establishing by a writ of habeas corpus his eligibility for release under the provisions of this section.

"(i) The superintendent of any mental institution or the head of any facility in which any person is confined by the Attorney General pursuant to subsection (d) of this section shall annually, during the hospitalization of that person, submit to the court a written report with respect to the mental condition of such person, together with the recommendations of such superintendent or head concerning the continued hospitalization of such person. Upon the receipt thereof, the court shall consider such report and recommendations and, if it determines that his release will not in the reasonable future constitute a danger to himself or others, the court shall order his immediate release. Such reports and recommendations shall be made available to counsel in any judicial proceeding challenging the continued hospitalization of a person committed under the provisions of subsection (d).

"(j) The Attorney General is authorized to enter into contracts with the several States (including political subdivisions thereof) and private agencies under which appropriate institutions and other facilities of such State or agencies will be made available, on a reimbursable basis, for the confinement, hospitalization, care, and treatment of persons committed to the custody of the Attorney General pursuant to subsections (c) and (d) of this section.

"(k) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable to the District of Columbia."

(b) The chapter analysis of chapter 313, title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"4249. Commitment of certain individuals acquitted of offenses against the United States on the ground of insanity."

A BILL To define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the inferior courts ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution of the United States in criminal prosecutions involving admissions or confessions of the accused

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. That the sole test of the admissibility of an admission or confession of an accused in a criminal prosecution in any trial court ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution of the United States shall be its voluntary character and neither the Supreme Court nor any inferior appellate court ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution of the United States shall have jurisdiction to reverse, vacate, modify, or disturb in any way a ruling of such a trial court in any criminal prosecution admitting in evidence as voluntarily made any admission or confession of an accused if such ruling is supported by any competent evidence admitted at the trial.

SEC. 2. Neither the Supreme Court nor any inferior court ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review or to reverse, vacate, modify, or disturb in any way, a ruling of any trial court of any State in any criminal prosecution admitting in evidence as voluntarily made an admission or confession of an accused if such ruling has been affirmed or otherwise upheld by the highest court of the State having appellate jurisdiction of the cause.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1967.

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice on S. 1194, a bill "To define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the inferior courts ordained and established by the Congress under article III of the Constitution of the United States in criminal prosecutions involving admissions or confessions of the accused."

This bill would provide that in federal courts the sole test of admissibility of an admission or a confession would be voluntariness. The Supreme Court and intermediate federal appellate courts would not have jurisdiction to review the trial court's ruling on the admission of a confession if that ruling had been supported by "any competent evidence admitted at the trial." No federal court would have jurisdiction to review a ruling of a State court that a confession is voluntary if that ruling had been upheld by the highest appellate court of that State.

The law regarding the admissibility of confessions in both Federal and State courts is that statements "given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences" are admissible, Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 478 (1966), but that confessions given without proper safeguards of Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights are inherently compelled and therefore inadmissible, Id. at 457–58.

The apparent purpose of S. 1194 is to establish voluntariness as the sole test of the admissibility of a confession in criminal trials. The Miranda decision affirmed that voluntariness is the test of admissibility; it also defined further criteria by which voluntariness would be determined. Even if S. 1194 were enacted, the trial courts would be obliged to apply that criteria in making a determination. The only effect of the bill would be that federal appellate courts could not review a ruling of admissibility if that ruling had been (1) supported by any competent evidence in a lower federal court, or (2) upheld by the highest court in a State having jurisdiction over the matter.

Such a bar to appellate review would be undesirable. Such a limitation would make the numerous trial courts the final interpreters of the meaning of the Miranda decision. This could lead to serious confusion and conflict in the criminal law, not only between different jurisdictions, but even within the same jurisdiction. Appellate review contributes to the achievement of uniformity in the law and to the goal of equal protection.

Apart from those considerations, this bill touches upon fundamental constitutional rights. By denying review of a ruling of admissibility supported by "any competent evidence admitted at the trial," the bill does not provide constitutional guarantees equal to Miranda.

For the reasons stated above, the Department of Justice is opposed to enactment of S. 1194.

The Bureau of the Budget has informed us that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

A BILL Relating to the admissibility in State courts of certain evidence

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS

SECTION 1. Congress hereby finds that it is necessary to enforce by appropriate legislation the restraints which the United States Supreme Court has determined are imposed upon State law enforcement officials by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, specifically the prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures and the prohibition against interrogation of a suspect without advising him of his constitutional rights; that an appropriate method of enforcing these restraints is a requirement that in any State criminal trial, evidence obtained as a result of an unreasonable search or seizure and evidence obtained by interrogation of a suspect that is not preceded by advice as to constitutional rights shall be excluded unless the trial judge determines in the exercise of his sound discretion, and in accordance with appropriate criteria, that such evidence should be admissible to avoid a miscarriage of justice; and that this method of enforcing the aforementioned restraints is necessary to insure observance of these restraints by State law enforcement officers and also to guard against the possibility that a miscarriage of justice may occur whenever one of these restraints is in any manner violated.

FLEXIBLE RULE FOR ADMISSIBILITY OF ILLEGALLY OBTAINED EVIDENCE

SEC. 2. (a) Whenever upon the trial of any criminal charge in the courts of any State, evidence is offered by the State which has been obtained by or as a result of an unreasonable search or seizure, such evidence shall not be admissible, unless the trial judge determines in the exercise of his sound discretion that the exclusion of such evidence will result in a miscarriage of justice, in which event he may rule the evidence to be admissible.

(b) In exercising the discretion conferred in subsection (a), the trial judge shall consider—

(1) the degree to which the search or seizure fails to meet the constitutional standard of reasonableness;

(2) the justification, if any, of the law enforcement officer for failing to meet the constitutional standard of reasonableness;

(3) the seriousness of the criminal charge; and

(4) the likelihood that the State will not be able to present a prima facie case without the offered evidence.

FLEXIBLE RULE FOR ADMISSIBILITY OF STATEMENTS

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever upon the trial of any criminal charge in the courts of any State, evidence is offered by the State which is, or has been obtained as a result of, a statement voluntarily made by a person in custody or whose liberty has been restrained, who has not been advised of his constitutional rights concerning the privilege against self-incrimination and the right to counsel, such evidence shall not be admissible, unless the trial judge determines in the exercise of his sound discretion that the exclusion of such evidence will result in a miscarriage of justice, in which event he may rule the evidence to be admissible.

(b) In exercising the discretion conferred in subsection (a) of this section, the trial judge shall consider—

(1) the degree to which the interrogation in which the statement was made fails to meet constitutional standards;

(2) the justification, if any, of the law enforcement officer for failing to meet the constitutional standard of reasonableness;

(3) the seriousness of the criminal charge; and

(4) the likelihood that the State will not be able to present a prima facie case without the offered evidence.

(c) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to permit a trial judge to rule admissible a statement not made voluntarily or evidence obtained as a result of such a statement.

APPELLATE REVIEW

SEC. 4. The decision of a State trial judge made pursuant to this Act shall be reviewable by the appellate courts of the State and the United States Supreme Court in the same manner as rulings on the admissibility of evidence are reviewable by the laws of the State and of the United States.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 5. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and application of the provision to other persons not similarly situated or to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., July 19, 1967.

HON. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: This is in response to your request for the views of the Department of Justice on S. 1333, a bill "Relating to the admissibility in State courts of certain evidence."

S. 1333 would authorize a State trial judge, in the exercise of his discretion, to admit into evidence items seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment as well as "voluntary" confessions obtained without Fifth and Sixth Amendment safeguards, if the trial judge determines that the exclusion of the evidence would result in a miscarriage of justice.

The Department of Justice considers this legislation of doubtful constitutional validity. The authority granted Congress by Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the assumed constitutional basis for this bill, does not appear to permit Congress to pass legislation which grants State judges authority for avoiding constitutional standards. Only last Term, the Supreme Court in Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 651, n. 10, stated:

"* * * § 5 does not grant Congress power to exercise discretion in the other direction and to enact "statutes so as in effect to dilute equal protection and due process decisions of this Court." We emphasize that Congress' power under § 5 is limited to adopting measures to enforce the guarantees of the Amendment; § 5 grants Congress no power to restrict, abrogate, or dilute these guarantees."

The Department considers this pronouncement a rather clear indication that the Court would find the proposed legislation unconstitutional. Further, when the Supreme Court ruled that illegally seized matter must be excluded from evidence in State courts, it indicated clearly that it was announcing a constitutional rule, not an implementing rule of evidence. The opinion in Mapp v. Ohio described the "exclusionary rule" as an essential part of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, 367 U.S. 643, 567. In our view, an attempt by Congress to overrule Mapp v. Ohio, as proposed in S. 1333, would itself be unconstitutional.

Similarly, the Court indicated in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 457–8, that confessions obtained during custodial interrogation without proper safeguards of Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights are inherently compelled and their admission into evidence is prohibited by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Again, we consider an attempt to overrule this decision unconstitutional.

Section 4 of S. 1333 provides that decisions on the admissibility of confessions and illegally seized evidence would be reviewable by the appellate courts of the State and by the Supreme Court in the same manner as other evidentiary rulings. Since the issues involved are inherently of constitutional dimensions, however, it is extremely doubtful that section 4 would, or could, have the effect of reducing the issue in such appeals to a question of evidence, as distinguished from a question of basic due process.

For the reasons stated above, the Department of Justice recommends against enactment of this legislation.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All Senators have been invited to testify, to give the committee the benefit of their conclusions, their judgment and recommendations in this field. We are very pleased this morning that we have four of our colleagues with us who have responded to that invitation. First we will hear from Senator John Stennis, the junior Senator from Mississippi. Senator Stennis.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN STENNIS, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

Senator STENNIS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, first I am grateful for the bills that have been introduced, and for the effort and work on behalf of the subcommittee up to the present and in the future to bring these matters to a proper issue, and try to do something about it.

I am here, Mr. Chairman, impelled with this sense of general obligation. I feel that the trend of decision with reference to criminal procedure in particular is such, if not stopped and in part reversed, but if permitted to continue, will leave society where it will be unable to protect itself from the law violator. I think we are living in a time that was well expressed by one of the outstanding ministers of an outstanding church in this city in a sermon I heard sometime last summer, in which he said that times are such that everyone is responsible for the acts of the wrongdoer except the wrongdoer himself. I believe that is the trend and the thought of the times. The wrongdoer is not responsible but someone else or some other group is.

I don't like to make personal references, but I come too, as one that spent 20 years, perhaps the most active 20 years of his life, in the trial courtroom, as a practicing lawyer, as a trial lawyer, and then as a trial judge, and I have those years of observation of the administration of justice in real life and as it is, and I think these procedural trends that I have mentioned take the heart out of the police departments and the individual policemen themselves, and puts him under such handicap and restriction that he can no longer be effective, and he loses the will to do so.

I think by and large the old time-tried system in use for centuries in the English courts, of having all the facts presented first to a trial judge, a man experienced in the law and trained in procedures and by experience, to pass on whether or not a confession is voluntary—if he has any doubt about it, he throws it out right there.

The second safeguard is that if he admits it, it still has to go before a jury of 12, where there has to be a unanimous decision of guilt, before anything can be done regarding the accused.

As I say, that is the heart of the system that has been tried for centuries. No system is perfect, but this one has served the practical end as well as the just end. As I understand this S. 674, the bill regarding the Miranda case, it seeks to restore the law generally to what it was that I have just outlined with reference to confessions.

Senator McCLELLAN. As I indicated here, we have four approaches now.

Senator STENNIS. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. One, to more or less restore the practice that prevailed, and that I think was constitutional, from the beginning of our Government. S. 674 seeks to restore that practice. Then secondly we have the harsher remedy proposed by Senator Ervin as he spoke here this morning, the bill which he has introduced today, which would simply restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the appellate courts and limit that jurisdiction so that they couldn't review the action of State courts where the issue had been carried to the highest court of the State.

Now that is, I think, a harsh approach, harsher particularly than the S. 674 approach. But, as I have said, we either do nothing to start with, or we undertake to restore the practice and procedures that have been tested and proven worthy and most reliable, or we take the harsher step of limiting the jurisdiction of the Court.

Apparently, under the Constitution we would have the authority to do this. The Congress may, however, have to go through the cumbersome process of trying to secure the adoption of a constitutional amendment. Or, of course, we have the fourth alternative, to do nothing.

Those are the only four remedies. I don't mean that S. 674 cannot be studied and modified, but I am talking about it as an approach to the problem. Very well, proceed.

Senator STENNIS. I thank the chairman. I prefer for myself the rule that I have outlined, because it has been beaten out on the anvil of experience and time-tested literally for centuries. I had the privilege, with the chairman, of visiting a court in England, the Old Bailey, where we saw a continuation of that same process going on there at this very high level, and both of us were impressed with it.

Mr. Chairman, most unfortunately for me, I am under tremendous pressure for time. Nothing is more important than this, but I did call a meeting of the group of which I happen to be chairman. I feel compelled to be there at 11 o'clock. May I ask the committee to admit the first four pages of my written statement to the record, and I will read briefly then from one or two points.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, however, we will have your whole statement printed in the record.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN STENNIS, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

I certainly want to commend the committee for its splendid work. While everyone else is talking about the serious crime problem, this committee has gotten down to the hard job of doing something about it. The legislation which the Committee is now considering is a small but necessary and promising start toward bringing the criminal menace under control. I do not believe I can improve on the proposals before the committee, but I do want to take this opportunity to give my strongest support to the fine effort which they represent.

Of the several bills under consideration, I think the most significant—in many ways—is S. 674, relating to the admissibility of confessions. This bill is necessitated, of course, by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436. In this case, as the committee knows, five members of the Court created a new rule of constitutional law that no confession, no matter how freely given, could be used to convict a criminal if the police failed to advise him beforehand that he has a right to remain silent, that anything he says can be used against him, that he has the right to have an attorney present while he is being questioned, and that if he cannot afford a lawyer, one will be furnished free.

This decision is less than a year old and it is still too early to assess its full impact on law enforcement. This is no reason for Congress to hesitate in counteracting it, however. The Court had no sure knowledge of what its effects would be when it laid down its new rule, and Congress need not wait to see what the full consequences will be before restoring the old. We have already had several months' experience under the new rule, and all of it bad. There are frequent reports in the press of confessed murderers, rapists, and other vicious criminals being set free under the Miranda ruling, but I have yet to read an instance where the Miranda decision has contributed to the conviction of a guilty man or has even saved a genuinely innocent man from an unjust conviction. If the purpose of our system of criminal justice is to convict the guilty and clear the innocent, it has been seriously and unnecessarily impaired by the Miranda decision.

This decision holds grave implications for our system of criminal law. If the ruling of the Court is rigorously enforced in its full sweep, it could well mean the end of all police interrogation and the total exclusion of confessions and other incriminating statements from criminal trials. Any interference with a person's liberty, any interruption of his freedom of movement, however slight, by the police may be considered an arrest requiring the appointment of counsel to protect his rights. Unless the police were accompanied by defense counsel, they could not delay a suspect briefly on the street or at the scene of a crime or at his home to ask even the most superficial questions about the crime. Under such circumstances, fewer questions will be asked by the police, fewer confessions will be made by criminals, and more crimes will go unsolved.

Even if the suspect waives his right to counsel and agrees to talk, the police cannot rely on the waiver and accept his confession because the burden of proving the waiver is on the prosecution. If the suspect gives a confession or other information which leads the police to additional evidence, and his confession is later found to be involuntary, all of the evidence obtained as a result of it will also be inadmissible under the so-called "fruit of the poison tree doctrine." Thus the police will be discouraged from seeking even voluntary confessions and will be reluctant to question witnesses who might be potential suspects for fear that it will actually produce other evidence that may become "tainted." If this condition persists, confessions will become extinct and law enforcement will suffer a further decline.

We simply cannot afford this needless waste of evidence. The questioning of suspects is too valuable an aid to the solution of crime to be suppressed. Confessions are too important to law enforcement to be thrown away. Many serious crimes cannot be solved without police interrogation and many dangerous criminals could not be convicted without voluntary confessions or the evidence to which they lead. It is sheer folly to ignore these realities in considering the formulation of rules governing the admissibility of confessions.

Regardless of what the ultimate effects of the Miranda decision may be, this is obviously no time to be experimenting with new protections for the criminal. Last year, 2,780,000 serious crimes were committed. Over three quarters of these cases went unsolved. In those instances where charges were filed, there was a five percent decrease over the preceding year in the number of convictions. At the same time there was a thirteen percent increase in the number of acquittals and dismissals recorded. Three out of every ten murder defendants were either acquitted or their cases were dismissed at some state in the proceedings. The same was true for about one third of the rapists and persons charged with aggravated assault.

This dangerous trend will undoubtedly continue at an accelerated pace under the Miranda decision. Only two months after the opinion was published, the District Attorney for Brooklyn, New York reported to the New York Times that the number of criminal suspects who were refusing to make any statement to the police had increased fourfold. The District Attorney spoke from experience what most of us know from common sense when he added: "Most of these men will walk the streets as free men. These vicious crimes may never be solved. Recent Supreme Court rulings have shackled law-enforcement agencies making it possible for vicious criminals to escape punishment."

This is an early warning of what we may expect to follow from this ill-advised opinion if something is not done to limit its sweeping terms.

As Mr. Justice White said in dissenting with the majority opinion in the Miranda case, "The most basic function of any government is to provide for the security of the individual and of his property." It should be emphasized that this is the basic function of all three branches of the government, and if one branch neglects its responsibility, it is the duty of the other two to apply the appropriate checks and balances provided by the Constitution. I believe Congress is responding to the duty in proposing the enactment of S. 674, and for this reason I want to give it my strongest endorsement.

As I understand the bill, its purpose and effect is to provide that a confession shall be admissible as evidence if the trial judge and the jury find, after considering all the circumstances of the making of the confession, that it was voluntarily made. This seems to me to be an eminently fair and reasonable solution to the problem created by the Miranda case. It quite properly makes the admissibility of the confession depend on the question of voluntariness and not whether the officer has delivered a virtual charge to the jury before questioning a suspect. It puts this issue in the hands of the trial judge and the jury who actually observe the witnesses as they testify and who are, therefore, in the best position to assess the truth of their testimony. It provides that an experienced trial judge must first satisfy himself that a confession is voluntary before the jury is allowed to hear the evidence and decide for themselves, thus giving the defendant two chances to prove his statement was coerced. It adequately protects the rights with which the Miranda decision is concerned by requiring the trial judge to consider whether the accused was advised of his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to counsel in determining whether a confession was voluntary. These provisions amply protect the rights of the individual without unnecessarily disarming society in its war on crime.

I commend this bill not only for its intrinsic merit, but also for what it symbolizes. The immediate benefit of the bill will be to restore to the police a small measure of the strength that has been drained from them by the Miranda decision. I think its importance transcends this single issue, however. I believe this bill marks a turning point in several respects.

For too long Congress has been content to leave the development of the criminal law to the courts. This has encouraged the courts to pursue too strongly their own philosophy of law without due regard for the sentiments of the people and the wisdom of other equally qualified to interpret the law and the Constitution. This on occasion has led the courts to extremes which I am sure they would not have ventured under a vigilant Congress disposed to exert its own authority when appropriate. I think this bill reflects the determination of Congress to reassert its proper authority in the field of criminals and I think its enactment will be so interpreted by the courts. If it is so understood, I believe it will have a moderating and highly beneficial influence on the courts.

I think this bill represents the beginning of a new emphasis on the rights of society in the struggle with the criminal. The courts have gradually over the past 30 years greatly overweighted the scales of justice in favor of the criminal.

This bill indicates that Congress intends to right the balance again and give to the people some fraction of the protection currently enjoyed in abundance by only the most vicious and depraved members of our society. This adjustment is long overdue and the quicker it is made the closer we will be to solving the crime problem.

Our system of criminal justice is already heavily weighted in favor of the criminal defendant. The burden of proof is always on the prosecution. Every element of the case must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. All twelve men on the jury must agree as to the guilt of the defendant before he can be convicted. He may appeal any error made by the prosecution, in convicting him, but no matter how great a miscarriage of justice his acquittal may be, he is completely safe from further proceedings. With these built-in safeguards there is no reason for casually tossing new stumbling blocks in the path of justice.

Senator STENNIS. I thank the chairman. Mr. Chairman, I did not come here to speak and run away. I will come back, should anyone want to ask me questions. I would feel flattered if you did, and I am certainly willing to try to answer, and I will come back.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, this dangerous trend that I have outlined will undoubtedly continue at an accelerated pace under this 5-to-4 Miranda decision, unless something is done about it.

Only 2 months after that opinion was published, the district attorney for Brooklyn, N.Y., reported to the New York Times that the number of criminal suspects who were refusing to make any statement to the police had increased fourfold. This district attorney spoke from experience what most of us know from commonsense, when he added:

Most of these men will walk the streets as free men. These vicious crimes may never be solved. Recent Supreme Court rulings have shackled law enforcement agencies, making it possible for vicious criminals to escape punishment.

This is an early warning of what we may expect to follow from this ill-advised opinion, if something is not done to limit its sweeping terms.

As Mr. Justice White said in his dissenting opinion in this Miranda case, and I quote him:

The most basic function of any government is to provide for the security of the individual and of his property.

It should be emphasized that this is the basic function of all three branches of the Government, and if one branch neglects its responsibility, it is the duty of the other two to apply the appropriate checks and balances provided by the Constitution. I believe Congress is responding to the duty in proposing the enactment of S. 674, and for this reason I want to give it here and everywhere my strongest possible endorsement.

And then referring to what was the rule before Miranda, with reference to the power of the trial judge, I follow with this thought. This seems to me to be an eminently fair and reasonable solution to the problem created by the Miranda case. It quite properly makes the admissibility of any alleged confession depend on the question of its voluntariness and not whether the officer has delivered a virtual charge to the jury before questioning a suspect.

It puts this issue in the hands of the trial judge and the jury who actually observe the witnesses as they testify and who are therefore, in the best position to assess the truth of the testimony.

All of us with trial lawyer experience know that the biggest fact about any case is the sense of feeling, the atmosphere, and demeanor, the general tone and trend of testimony, not just what the words are, but the trend of it; the atmosphere is where you get the believability or the nonbelievability.

It provides that an experienced trial judge must first satisfy himself that a confession is voluntary before the jury is even allowed to hear the evidence, before they are allowed to hear the evidence, then giving the defendant two chances as to whether or not his statement was coerced.

The burden of proof, of course, is always on the prosecution, not for a preponderance of the evidence, but proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and if anywhere in that trial reasonable doubt is created even in the mind of a judge alone, it is his duty to stop that trial, and if necessary to declare a mistrial and give the defendant an entirely new hearing or a new trial.

Senator McCLELLAN. You are speaking with respect to a situation in which it develops that the confession was not voluntary.

Senator STENNIS. That is right. If it appeared to be voluntary in his first decision——

Senator McCLELLAN. And, of course, at the trial proper, if the judge concluded that it wasn't voluntary he could declare a mistrial.

Senator STENNIS. If that testimony comes in from any source, from the State or from the defendant, and I mention that with emphasis, because I believe that nonlawyers, and maybe some lawyers who have not had courtroom experience, fail to realize the importance of that point, and it does actually work in practice.

I believe, as I have already said, we are living in a time when there is greater demand for criminal procedure, there is less discipline in the courtroom and in the streets and in the homes. There is less punishment for wrongdoing everywhere.

I have said that I was afraid that discipline is about to disappear from the American scene except in our military services, but I am not that skeptical. I do think that one reason why our fighting men in Vietnam have shown such a remarkable spirit and morale is because of the emphasis there, many of them for the first time in their lives, of some discipline. I thank the Chair and the committee very much.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you. Are there any questions by anyone? You say you have to go?

Senator STENNIS. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would like to have you come back some time.

Senator STENNIS. Thank you, Senator. I would be delighted to.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I ask one question? Is it the Senator's impression that this aspect of criminal procedure is the most significant obstacle to the war on crime.

Senator STENNIS. I feel what is most significant—the Miranda case?

Senator KENNEDY. That is correct. I was trying to ask this in light of the President's message to Congress and in light of the rather complete presentation which was made by the President's Commission on Crime.

There have been many suggestions and recommendations as to how we should approach the problems of crime. In view of your background and experience, are you suggesting that our first step must be taken in the area which you have developed.

Senator STENNIS. I can quickly answer that. My opinion is that this is an essential move, an essential move that must be made to change the emphasis, change the approach from the Miranda decision, and even if other good points in the administrations recommendation should be carried out, failing in this one, they will virtually all fail, and our courts will be unable to function as they should, and our law enforcement officers will be so restricted and restrained that they cannot meet the practical problems that they face. I put that as No. 1.

Senator KENNEDY. I don't want to delay you but I have one further question.

Senator STENNIS. That is all right.

Senator KENNEDY. On the basis of your experience in the courtroom, which as you mentioned was for some 20 years, how long do you really think it takes to determine the impact of a particular court decision?

I am thinking now of the Miranda case, which was decided relatively recently, Is it appropriate for us to reach a conclusion that this is providing an unreasonable restriction on the ferreting out of crime, particularly in the light of the fact that Miranda has been convicted of rape and is now serving time in jail?

Senator STENNIS. That would vary a great deal according to the rule you are talking about, but this one is at the very threshold of the investigation of law violations. It is not just a courtroom matter. This goes to the very heart of your entire investigative processes, and is going to make us unable to meet the situation, I think, and it is very obvious now.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska would like to ask you one question.

Senator HRUSKA. Senator Stennis, one of your statements was that the dangerous trend will continue at an accelerated pace unless something is done about it in the application of the Miranda decision.

It may be one thing to say that it would take a while before we get nationwide statistics where we can say that prior to Miranda we would get so many confessions, now we get so many percentages less. However, in recent weeks, a new trend has appeared. As far as I know the first case that reached national attention was one in New Jersey where Miranda has been applied to juvenile cases. In this past week we found another such application in Iowa. Is this a part of the trend to which you refer, to expand it not only in particular situations but even to additional fields?

Senator STENNIS. I think if it is not challenged and changed, why by the natural course of events, the river will flow on and on and gather momentum as it goes. That is the history of our court system and our society, so there is no doubt about the expanded interpretation of it. I think that is already very evident.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, that has been the situation.

Senator STENNIS. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. In the Mallory case, for example.

Senator STENNIS. That is right.

Senator HRUSKA. Where there are new, restrictive applications.

Senator STENNIS. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. I thank the Senator.

Senator STENNIS. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator STENNIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I note that Senator Lausche has come in since we opened our hearings, and he was second on our list today. This list was arranged in accordance with the indication of those who wished to testify. I do understand, too, that Senator Bennett is under pressure of time.

Senator BENNETT. I am a part of the same meeting to which Senator Stennis has gone.

Senator LAUSCHE. Senator McClellan, I do not expect to be called before the other Senators who came here this morning prior to the time that I arrived. I will wait my turn.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, would you yield to Senator Bennett so that he might get through?

Senator LAUSCHE. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Senator Bennett, we will be glad to hear from you at this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. WALLACE F. BENNETT, U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH

Senator BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I am a little out of place this morning because the bill for which I appear is entirely different from the general crime bills you have been discussing. But it was set up for hearing as part of this package, and I think a record should be made of it.

I am referring to S. 911, whose purpose would be to make it a Federal offense to use any means of interstate communication, or transportation, or the mails, to offer for sale parcels of land in violation of State laws, in effect in the State of residence of a prospective purchaser.

The proposal is a very simple one. It follows the precedent set by the Webb-Kenyon Act prohibiting the transportation of liquor into a State in violation of the law of the State, the Connally Hot Oil Act, forbidding interestate transportation of oil made contraband by State, and a law passed by Congress in 1961, making it a Federal offense to use the facilities of interstate commerce to carry out certain racketeering enterprises which were prohibited by State law.

I have a brief statement that I had expected to read, with a more comprehensive statement for the record, together with one or two exhibits to illustrate the extent of the problem; but in view of the pressure, I would like to submit the rest of my brief statement along with the other information for the record as though it had been read. I realize that this problem may be less serious.

I would hope, however, that when the committee meets, the very fact that it is not so serious or has such wide ramifications might make it possible for the committee to get this out of the way before it settles down to a very long consideration of these other important bills.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Would you like to have your statements printed in the record in full, Senator?

Senator BENNETT. Yes, I would, Mr. Chairman and the bill which is attached.

Senator McCLELLAN. Your statement will be printed in the record at this point and the bill printed in the record with the other bills we are discussing here today. I add, however, that this bill has not been referred to this subcommittee as yet.*

(The statement referred to follows:)

TESTIMONY OF WALLACE F. BENNETT, A U.S. SENATOR FORM THE STATE OF UTAH, IN SUPPORT OF S. 911

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to testify in favor of S. 911.

My remarks this morning will be very brief. However, I do have a more complete statement which I would like to have included in the record in its entirety.

S. 911 would make it a Federal offense to use any means of interstate communication or transportation or the mails to offer for sale parcels of land in violation of State laws in effect in the State of residence of a prospective purchaser. The proposal is a very simple one and follows the precedent set by the Webb-Kenyon Act, prohibiting the transportation of liquor into a State in violation of the law of a State, the Connally Hot-Oil Act, forbidding interstate transportation of oil made contraband by State law, and a law passed by Congress in 1961, making it a Federal offense to use the facilities of interstate commerce to carry out certain racketeering enterprises which were prohibited by State law. Land sales, their regulation, and licensing of real estate salesmen have always been a responsibility of various States and, while we may not feel that the States have completely fulfilled their responsibility in protecting their citizens from fraudulent sales, we must realize that much has been done and that much is presently being done. We find that in States where interstate land sales have been a real problem, legislation dealing with the problem has been enacted. It is true that some States have not enacted such legislation, but I feel that in the spirit of creative federalism, it is our responsibility to provide incentives for the States to improve their efforts and fill only the gaps which cannot be filled by the States.

Last August a Uniform Land Sales Practices Act was approved by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. The proposed Uniform Act has also been approved by the American Bar Association and recommended to all the States for enactment. The proposed Uniform Act is a far-reaching and comprehensive one which would provide for full disclosure on a State level. I am informed that at least 7 States are considering the uniform proposal in this legislative session. I might mention that 23 States already have legislation regarding interstate land sales. Some of these States have very effective laws. States with effective laws can control sales made by individuals operating within their borders, but they are unable to regulate sales made through the mails or by telephone or other means of communication by outsiders who do not have operations within the State.

I feel, therefore, that it is necessary for us to supplement the State laws with Federal legislation which will allow State authorities to protect their own citizens from fraudulent interstate land sales promotions by requiring the out-of-State promoter to comply with the laws of the State in which he is attempting to make sales. This is what S. 911 would require.

The only other alternative to this approach is a Federal statute which would turn over to the Federal Government the basic responsibility of interstate land sales and the regulation of those engaged in such sales. I do not think that is either desirable or necessary.

I hope that this Committee will see fit to approve this proposal so that the States may more effectively perform their responsibilities.

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT BY SENATOR WALLACE F. BENNETT IN SUPPORT OF S. 911

Mr. Chairman, I offer this supplementary statement supporting S. 911, a bill which would make it a Federal offense to use any means of interstate commerce or communication or the mails to offer for sale parcels of land in violation of laws in effect in the State of residence of the prospective purchaser.

*This bill had not been referred to this subcommittee at the date of printing this record.

As a result of hearings in the Subcommittee on Frauds and Misrepresentations Affecting the Elderly, as well as in the Securities Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee last year, the problem of fraudulent interstate land sales has been very graphically demonstrated. Through various methods, unscrupulous promoters are able to bring about sales not in the best interest of the purchaser. There are several common promotional gimmicks. I will mention only a few. One of the most used is the "give-away" scheme in which closing costs exceed the actual value of the land. Another is the "free lot" promotion, in which the free lots are very small and the purchaser finds that to have a parcel large enough for building, it is necessary to obtain another lot next to the one which was given. The price of the second lot exceeds the real value of both lots combined. There are also lottery schemes. In addition to these promotional methods, some promoters use advertising, which makes fraudulent claims or omits material facts such as easements, difficulty of obtaining water, climate, elevation, nearness to other developed areas, etc.

The Post Office Department provided a list of abuses or omissions or misrepresentations used in promotional literature and documents which I will include for the hearing record:

ABUSES, OMISSIONS OR MISREPRESENTATIONS IN INTERSTATE MAIL ORDER SALES PROMOTION LITERATURE AND DOCUMENTS

Item No.

1. "Giveaway" lots for so-called "Closing Costs" which far exceed acquisition expense or actual value of land.
2. Unrealistic projected values advanced to lull lotowners into sense of security as to equity and continuation of investment on installment plan.
3. Boundary surveys only are made, with subdivision lots platted in areas honeycombed with washes, gullies, and arroyos, so that some lots are directly in the path of natural drainage courses without flood control, or actually in arroyos many feet below the normal land surface.
4. Roads in subdivisions dedicated to county authorities for maintenance will not be serviced unless or until there are nearby residents in the subdivision. This means original roadways installed by developers will deteriorate through weathering and lack of maintenance.
5. Ready water access claimed to be available although shallow water tables may be restricted by existing water right reservations.
6. No figures on information given as to depth of water table or cost of wells where lot owners must arrange for their own water supply.
7. Distances to nearby facilities inaccurately described in units of time instead of mileage and road conditions. For example, a 47-mile mountain road with two-way traffic has been referred to subdivision promotional literature to "as 30 minutes travel time" between points mentioned.
8. Public transportation facilities "to the subdivision" not accurately explained as being to the edge of the property. Lots sold and assigned within the subdivision may be as far as 15 miles from the nearest accessible public transportation.
9. References are made to "availability" of public utilities in a subdivision, but does not include mention of cost of extending them from peripheral or marginal areas.
10. Artist's conception of subdivision property is misleading when not labeled as such.
11. Failure to issue promised "Survivor's Certificate" to lot purchasers' heirs or assignees in event of death.
12. Description of lots by metes and the bounds so that cost of survey to determine lot boundaries is far more expensive that the lot itself.
13. Designation on subdivision plats of road easements misleads reader to believe roads are actually present.
14. Subdivision location maps out of scale or proportion and thus deceptive as to relative distances.
15. Lot sales contract describing installment payments and having no acceleration clause unduly protracts time when deed will be conveyed (37 years in one instance). This may be done purposely because vendor is unable to promptly furnish deed.
16. Refund or lot switch privilege restricted to on-site inspection within limited period, making the offer unrealistic to extent the expense of special travel may exceed cost of lot.

It is unfortunate that prospective land purchasers generally know very little about real estate values, and many either cannot or do not find individuals who are experienced to assist them in making a rational decision. Too many prospective purchasers accept blown up statements or exaggerations made by sales literature and sales personnel as statements of fact, and when suggestions are made that the land may increase rapidly in value, they do not consider this as only a sales promotional statement and thus are enticed to make purchases which may not be suitable for their purposes.

Let me at this point say that the methods thus far described are used by only a very small proportion of those who are in the interstate land development business. By far the overwhelming majority of interstate land sales are legitimate and in the interest of the purchaser. As in all industry, most promoters build their business and reputation on satisfied customers.

I personally feel that in developing an attack on fraudulent promoters, it is necessary for us to consider the rights of the reputable land developers and, to the extent possible, avoid an approach which would burden them with unnecessary, undesirable, and expensive requirements. Any additional expense would, of course, be passed on to land purchasers.

A proposal has been introduced which would require all land developers who use a common promotional plan to sell over 25 parcels to register with the Securities and Exchange Commission and provide certain information regarding their proposal as determined by legislation and SEC regulation. It is my view that such legislation is unnecessary. Land sales have traditionally been a responsibility of the States. Licensing of real estate brokers and land development requirements are local matters, and I do not feel that the Federal Government or an agency of the Federal Government is in a position to fulfill this responsibility as well as are local authorities. I may also add that while the Securities and Exchange Commission seems to be the most logical agency to take on such a responsibility if it were desirable, this is outside of their present jurisdiction and would add an additional responsibility with all of its required staff and expenditure. No one has been able to determine or even estimate what the additional cost to the Federal Government would be. But I presume that it would be significant because of the great number of land development programs which are underway in this country.

Those who recommend a Federal solution to this problem claim that the States have been unable or unwilling to solve the problem themselves. While I must admit that some States have no legislation regarding interstate land sales, it is important to point out that those States in which this has become a significant problem have enacted legislation which has been very helpful. I might also add that last August 4, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws approved a Uniform Land Sales Practices Act. The proposed Uniform Act was also approved by the American Bar Association and has since been recommended to State legislatures for enactment. I am informed that at least 7 States are considering this legislation thus far this year. In addition, 23 States already have laws on their books regulating interstate land sales. Some of these laws are far more comprehensive than that which has been recommended on a Federal level. And if I might add, I believe that the Act approved by the National Conference of Commissioners is a more comprehensive approach and a more desirable approach than delegating authority to a Federal agency to require registration of land sales. It is my personal view that the States will rapidly enact legislation. They have taken great strides in the past few years, and I see no reason why this should not continue.

The bill which is before this Subcommittee today, however, is a necessary adjunct to State legislation. As was pointed out in prior hearings, even when a State has good legislation, it is next to impossible for the State regulatory authorities to take action against a promoter who does not physically do business within the State. In other words, if a promoter selling Utah land to California residents sets up an office in California, the State law of California would apply and action could be taken if the sales were considered to be fraudulent, misleading, or improper. On the other hand, if the Utah promoter used the mails or telephone or any other means of communication while remaining outside of the California borders, the State authorities are unable to enforce the requirements of their law. Even if all 50 States had good interstate land sales laws, this same problem would exist. Therefore, I believe that it is necessary for us on the Federal level to enact legislation which would make it a Federal offense to use any means of interstate communication or transportation or the mails to offer for sale parcels of land if the offer is made in violation of laws in effect in the State of residence of the prospective purchaser. This is what S. 911 would do. It is an extremely simple proposal which would only bridge the gap between what the States can do and what needs to be done. It would avoid overlapping jurisdiction and unnecessary burden and expense on land developers, and I believe that since it gives each State an opportunity to protect its own citizens against outsiders, it would encourage the rapid enactment of better State laws, and the Federal Government would, as I believe it should, do only that which the State is unable to do for itself.

This proposal is not without precedent. Examples paralleling this proposal are the Webb-Kenyon Act, prohibiting the transportation of liquor into a State in violation of the law of a State; the Connally Hot-Oil Act, forbidding interstate transportation of oil made contraband by State law; and the law passed in 1961 by Congress making it a Federal offense to use the facilities of interstate commerce to carry out certain racketeering enterprises which were prohibited by State law. This type of legislation is in the spirit of creative federalism, as I understand it.

I would like to include for the record some comments made on the problem during our hearings last year in the Banking Committee. A letter from the Deputy Attorney General, who has recently been appointed Attorney General, Ramsey Clark, stated opposition to Federal legislation to control land subdivision sales in interstate commerce:

"The Department of Justice recommends against enactment of this legislation.

"There is no clear need for new Federal legislation to control land subdivision sales in interstate commerce. In the past few years, a substantial number of convictions have been obtained under 18 U.S.C. 1341. The indictments charged use of the mails by subdivision promoters in furtherance of schemes to defraud purchasers by fraudulent representations as to the nature of land purchased and its suitability for its intended purpose. Similarly, the Federal Trade Commission already has the power, pursuant to 15 U.S.C. 45, after formal complaint and hearing, to issue and enforce cease and desist orders against land promoters utilizing false, deceptive and misleading advertising. Accordingly, additional penal sanctions and further administrative remedies at the Federal level are unnecessary.

"Real estate transactions traditionally have been regulated by the states in which the property is located. In our view, enactment of local legislation, utilizing existing state real estate commisisons and incorporating the full disclosure provisions outlined in the bill, is the appropriate remedy.

"The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program."

The Department of Commerce also opposed enactment of such legislation in a letter form Robert E. Giles, General Counsel:

"Although this Department is in full sympathy with the objectives of S. 2672, to prevent fraudulent sales of real estate, we do not recommend its enactment.

"Some sellers of land use high pressure tactics and misrepresent their product. Retired persons or those contemplating retirement may often be the victims of these tactics.

"However, we do not believe this broad proposal is necessary to cope effectively with the small minority of unscrupulous land subdividers. The bill would add considerably to the cost of homesites, and put a considerable burden on the Securities and Exchange Commission to administer such legislation effectively."

The Post Office Department stated that the solution to the problem could be provided through adequate State legislation in a letter from Lawrence F. O'Brien, Postmaster General:

"I do believe, however, that the primary solution to these problems can be provided by adequate state legislation. Our records disclose that land frauds occur infrequently in states which have adequate statutory controls which are actively enforced."

The Federal Trade Commission did not go on record either for or against Federal legislation but did state that—

"Recent letters of complaint alleging questionable practices in promoting sales of real estate in interstate commerce have been referred to the Post Office Department upon receipt of information through liaison channels that the activities complained of were receiving attention by that Department under the postal fraud statutes."

"* * * A registration requirement for all developers engaged in the interstate sale of real estate coupled with the right of private action against such developers by defrauded individuals would remove the above limitations and would greatly supplement the existing remedies."

The Securities and Exchange Commisison in testimony suggested that if Federal legislation is necessary, then a bill requiring registration with the SEC would be the most desirable way to approach the problem.

This year we have heard testimony from Manuel F. Cohen, Chairman of the SEC, in which he supported Federal legislation requiring registration with the SEC. When asked by Senator Brooke if he favored Federal legislation in the field, Mr. Cohen answered:

"Well, I didn't quite say that, Senator Brooke, I said that we had not made an independent investigation. But having read the green book of last year, and the book for the earlier year and the report, I have no basis for suggesting anything different than what was said this morning that Federal legislation of some kind is necessary. And if that is so, I think that a bill of the kind of 275 would most effectively, expeditiously, economically, take care of the problem.

"Senator BROOKE. Is it because you feel the states cannot do the job or will not do the job or, as Senators Proxmire and Mondale have suggested, the states might take too long to do the job?

"Mr. COHEN. I think it is for all of those reasons in proportion depending on particular states you are talking about."

Later in the testimony, Chairman Cohen stated:

"So on a personal basis I am more convinced perhaps than I was last year, on a personal basis, wholly apart from what I have read here, that such legislation would be most appropriate. In fact, I guess, I come around to the end by saying, Senator Brooke, flatly what I do think it is an appropriate thing. Now I am speaking for myself on this point."

When I questioned him regarding the proposal before this Subcommittee today, he said that there would be some problems. Primary among these is the lack of necessary State legislative action and enforcement and injunctive provisions. He added:

"I understand in saying what I have, I have also spoken to the idea of combining the two. I have tried here today, not to be an advocate for either approach or indeed, an advocator for the Commission being the patsy, so to speak, here."

The Department of Justice in a Statement made by Nathaniel E. Kossack, First Assistant, Criminal Division of the Department, recommended the enactment of legislation embodying the philosophy and chief substantive features of S. 275. Mr. Kossack, when asked if he thought the matter could be handled by the States, answered, "Well, assuming that everybody had the same interest, the investor and the site state had the same interests, it is a conceivable thing, but that is something which we have learned for some time now is not a conceivably possible thing."

Commenting on the approach which we have before us today, Mr. Kossack said that he had not had time to consider it but did make the following statement:

"I only have one reaction that may be of interest to you, sir, based on our experience. While we do have one or two Federal laws—one comes to mind, 1952, of Title 18, which adopts the state criminal law as a basis for prosecutions. It is quite a simple law. It is on committing bribery, which is almost uniform from state to state. We have a great deal of difficulty being experts in two fields, not that we are experts in any one field, sir, but we devote a great deal of attention to being experts in the Federal criminal law, and we don't have the time or the manpower, I would say, to be expert in 50 state laws. They are usually different, you know. The philosophy and attitude of the State of Utah naturally is quite different than the philosophy and attitude of the State of Massachusetts. It would express itself in a different criminal law."

I have already included other examples of the type of law we are considering here. I have not been aware that there is any unusual difficulty in enforcement of these laws. I also feel the fact that the attitude and philosophy is different in the various States is an important matter and that each State should be able to protect its own citizens to the degree that it desires.

We have received no official report from the other agencies or Departments to indicate if they retained their position of last year.

Regarding the injunctive power which Chairman Cohen says is a weakness inherent in the approach which is before this Subcommittee today, I have no strong feelings. We have received testimony from various witnesses that injunctive powers would be desirable. However, such powers giving State authorities the right to go into a Federal court in another State and receive an injunction are unprecedented. My background is not in the legal field, and I do not feel personally qualified to determine whether this additional authority would be desirable. However, I think that if in the wisdom of this Subcommittee it seems desirable, I would be happy to support such an addition or amendment to the bill which we are presently discussing.

While it has been suggested by some that if authority be given to the SEC to take care of the interstate land sales problem, that will be sufficient. I disagree with such a conclusion. It was pointed out very clearly in our hearings on the SEC legislation that this would be considered a bare minimum requirement and that States could have laws equal to or exceeding the Federal statutes. In fact, it was hoped that the States would have such laws and suggested that in such cases the State law would be applicable. State authorities would regulate land sales, and the Federal Government would need to take no action. It was claimed that such a Federal statute would provide incentive for State legislation exceeding its provisions. If that is the purpose of the Federal statute, then the legislation before us today would still be required. Suppose, for example, that even with the Federal law, a promoter in State A complied with the Federal regulations and the State regulations in State A before promoting land sales in State B. State B may have more stringent requirements which must be met by promoters and yet there would be no way for State B authorities to take action against the promoter in State A if he did not comply with the State law in effect in the State of residence of the prospective purchasers.

In summary, I feel strongly that S. 911, in conjunction with effective State law, is the best approach to fraudulent interstate land sales. I hope that this Subcommittee will see fit to report the bill.

Senator McCLELLAN. One question. Do you feel that the present mail fraud statutes and similar statutes are inadequate, and thus this expansion of those statutes is necessary?

Senator BENNETT. I had not felt that they were inadequate, but in the hearings before the Subcommittee on Frauds and Misrepresentations Affecting the Elderly as well as before the Security Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, certain developing types of land fraud sales were presented, and there is a bill now being considered by the Securities Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee which would turn this problem over to the Securities and Exchange Commission, and require registration of every real estate agent who wanted to sell land across the State line in a very intricate system required by SEC.

I have proposed this as a substitute, and we run into a problem of jurisdiction. The Banking and Currency Committee cannot consider this proposal, nor will you have before you the proposal to give SEC the full responsibility. So I have proposed this, which would in effect protect the right of the State in which the proposed purchaser of the land lives to be protected by the laws of his own State against people who would attempt to defraud him by the use of interstate systems.

It is a fine question, but apparently the Department of Justice feels that the present laws are not adequate because it has made an appearance before the Banking and Currency Committee suggesting that some new legislation is needed.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Any questions? Very well, Senator Fannin.

STATEMENT OF HON. PAUL FANNIN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF ARIZONA

Senator FANNIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before your subcommittee and offer a few comments on crime, the Nation's foremost domestic problem.

I want to commend the subcommittee for what they are doing. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much impressed with your statement and objectives.

As a leader of the civilized world, America is looked to for leadership in many fields, but crime prevention is not among them. In fact, America has one of the highest crime rates of any nation—and this despite the fact that our whole system of government is based upon moral and political truths which demand that each of us respect our laws and the person and property of our fellow men.

Yet, as clearly shown by the recent report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, society needs protection from itself. As related by you, Mr. Chairman, approximately one-third of a representative sample of all Americans say it is unsafe to walk alone at night in their neighborhoods; slightly more than one-third say they keep firearms in the house for protection against criminals; approximately 30 percent say they keep watchdogs for the same reason; and 20 percent say they would like to move to another neighborhood because of their fear of crime. Yes, there is a problem.

The basic cause of crime is, of course, the increasing moral and social disorder that mark contemporary society, and it is thus less a problem for the Congress than for parents, for churchmen and for educators. But Congress can—and must—properly aid the States and cities in developing plans to combat crime and to restore law and order throughout the land.

First, Congress has a definite responsibility to take corrective action against crime here in Washington, D.C. It is a national disgrace that our Capital City—which should be a showplace for visitors from throughout the world—has a crime rate three times the national average, which is itself far too high. Congress should do everything in its power to make this a model city in which all Americans—visitors and residents alike—can take pride and feel secure.

Secondly, Congress can work as a partner with State and local governments in eliminating the conditions that lead to crime. Needless to say, the correct answer is not merely more spending, more welfare. In far too many instances, particularly in the Nation's great urban centers, current welfare and housing policies have lead to an undue concentration of idle and aimless and demoralized persons in an environment which breeds crime and criminals. And no program to restore law and order can be effective unless it comes to grips with this fact. Congress must find answers to the problems which many years of permissive legislation and policies have not cured, but have only compounded.

Thirdly, Congress can provide the Nation's many excellent State and local law enforcement agencies with the tools they need to do a better job of enforcing the law, of controlling the criminal element. And in this instance money is the answer. More than any other public service bureau, law enforcement agencies have been caught in public economy drives—so much so that they can neither retain highly trained officers nor attract qualified recruits in sufficient numbers.

Furthermore, law enforcement agencies, unlike many of the professional criminal groups with which they must contend, have for the most part been unable to take advantage of the latest technological advances, advances which offer an element of hope to policemen and protection to society. And the only way to affect a change is to give law enforcement agencies the money they require, the money they must have.

In this regard, I support the new legislation before this subcommittee, particularly the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. This act is important in two respects: First, it will make needed money available to State and local law enforcement agencies; and secondly, while acknowledging that crime is essentially a local problem that must be dealt with by State and local governments, the act recognizes the need for national assistance in coping with lawlessness and in providing the majority of Americans, those who obey the laws, with their right as citizens to adequate protection against crime.

For far too many years our meager efforts to deal with crime have failed because we ourselves have neglected to consider the opinions of the foremost authorities on the subject—law enforcement officials themselves. They know better than anyone else what needs to be done—what the absence of adequate financing and public support have made it impossible for them to do. Now at last they will have that chance.

The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act will provide funds so that law enforcement agencies, acting either alone or as partners, can undertake immediately a host of needed reforms—including better trained, equipped, and paid policemen; more planning, pilot and research projects; more sophisticated crime laboratories and equipment; more and better community relations programs; and in-depth studies of crime and its causes. Therefore, the act will provide an element of immediate relief while opening the door to long-range solutions.

I have, however, a word of caution. There is some concern among State and local law enforcement officials that too much power, too much authority, is given the U.S. Attorney General under the act. For my own part, I am confident this is not the case. But Congress must make certain that the Attorney General's authority to approve or disapprove projects for funding is limited to their probable fulfillment of the aims of the act and to their economical and efficient administration. In other words, the Attorney General should write guidelines sufficiently broad to permit maximum flexibility in meeting what are essentially different needs in different communities.

Congress must preserve at all cost the right of State and local law enforcement agencies to approach the crime problem differently and individually, accepting those anticrime concepts which work, rejecting those which do not.

In my own State of Arizona, for example, the problems of crime and law enforcement are considerably different from the problems existing in other States. For example, Arizona shares a common border with the Republic of Mexico, a situation which gives rise to mutual border problems, particularly the flow of narcotics.

Also, Arizona has a peculiar problem with regard to its Indian population, which is the largest of any State. Many of the Indians live on reservations—on which outside law enforcement officers have only limited authority—and more than 75 percent of the adult Indian population cannot speak English, nor does it share a basic language that is generally spoken. Naturally, these situations create unique problems for law enforcement agencies and officers.

Congress must extend protection against crime and lawlessness to our Indian population—the overwhelming majority of which lives within the letter and spirit of the law. One way of doing this, it seems to me, is to train more young Indian men for the honorable profession of law enforcement.

The point I have sought to make is that Arizona's problems in crime and law enforcement require different solutions than do similar problems in other States. In the long run, this autonomy will produce effects, as it already has in the important field of education, far more beneficial than could ever be achieved by a single national technique. And it will do so because it encourages experimentation and innovation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I urge this subcommittee and the Congress to act favorably on this needed legislation, and to do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

We must make our cities and streets safe—our homes secure.

I commend you again, Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, for your dedication in seeking legislation to accomplish the objectives outlined by the chairman and the members of the subcommittee. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very kindly.

Any questions?

Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator BIBLE?

STATEMENT OF HON. ALAN BIBLE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEVADA

Senator BIBLE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I certainly appreciate your invitation to testify this morning. I am going to confine myself almost entirely to S. 674, one of the three bills that you mentioned that you were going to hold hearings on this morning. I am very well aware of the fact that you have 11, 12, 13, or 14 bills before your subcommittee on the general subject of crime. I hope that I might be able to contribute something of value based upon my experience as chairman of the Senate District Committee.

Crime is not a new subject to us in that committee, and we have devoted long and exhausting hearings on it in the 87th, the 88th, and the 89th Congresses. We have held more than 19 days of hearings. We have heard 100 witnesses. We held many, many executive sessions with the House of Representatives, in trying to hammer out an omnibus crime bill. We were finally successful in doing that, and unfortunately it was vetoed by the President.

The bill tried to meet some of the fatal shortcomings of the Mallory decision, which had a direct effect of denying police officers the right to question suspects. The Mallory decision which formulated the Supreme Court's interpretation of Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure was decided, as you well know, in 1955.

Mr. Chairman, I develop in detail the main parts of the Mallory decision, and then recite the Court applications of narrowing that decision as time went along, and I would ask consent that my entire statement, which is rather lengthy, be incorporated in full in the record, and that I simply highlight those parts which I think are of particular interest to this committee.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection it will be printed in the record at this point. You may highlight it, Senator.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ALAN BIBLE, A SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NEVADA

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your invitation to testify on S. 674, a bill providing for voluntary confessions and admissions to be admitted into evidence in criminal trials.

At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I want to personally commend you and the members of your Subcommittee for undertaking such a broad and comprehensive legislative crime program. I note that there are 11 legislative bills, and each of them involves a separate subject matter.

As you well know, Mr. Chairman, the Senate District Committee, of which I am the Chairman, has engaged in a long and exhaustive study of crime in the District of Columbia. Commencing in the 87th Congress and extending through the 89th Congress when the omnibus crime bill was finally approved by the Congress, the Committee has held more than 19 days of crime hearings, heard from more than 90 witnesses, and has met in more than 10 executive sessions with members of the House District Committee.

The omnibus crime bill, approved in the past Congress, but subsequently vetoed by the President, sought to curb crime through a number of legislative measures. In particular, the bill sought to correct the abuses and fatal shortcomings of the Mallory decision, which has had the direct effect of denying police officers the right to question suspects.

The Mallory decision, which formulated the Supreme Court's interpretation of Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, was decided in 1955. In effect, the Mallory ruling requires police officers to take an arrested suspect before a commissioner or magistrate without unnecessary delay. Unfortunately, in defining unnecessary delay the Mallory decision resorted to language that has placed a heavy restriction on police activity following arrest. The decision, in pertinent part, stated:

"The scheme for initiating a federal prosecution is plainly defined. The police may not arrest upon mere suspicion but only on 'probable cause.' The next step in the proceeding is to arraign the arrested person before a judicial officer as quickly as possible so that he may be advised of his rights and so that the issue of probable cause may be promptly determined. The arrested person may, of course, be 'booked' by the police. But he is not to be taken to police headquarters in order to carry out a process of inquiry that lends itself, even if not so designed, to eliciting damaging statements to support the arrest and ultimately his guilt.

"The duty enjoined upon arresting officers to arraign 'without unnecessary delay' indicates that the command does not call for mechanical or automatic obedience. Circumstances may justify a brief delay between arrest and arraignment, as for instance, where the story volunteered by the accused is susceptible of quick verification through third parties. But the delay must not be of a nature to give opportunity for the extraction of a confession."

During the decade since Mallory, the meaning of "unnecessary delay" in Rule 5(a) has not been satisfactorily resolved.

As a matter of fact, the courts of the District of Columbia have interpreted Rule 5(a) as meaning essentially no delay between arrest and commitment. This extremely narrow and impractical interpretation has had the effect of barring police officers from questioning suspects.

It has been stated by the District of Columbia Appeals Courts in various opinions that the time-lapse between arrest and presentment is not the sole measure of delay; yet the court has consistently found that a delay surpassing 4½ hours as unnecessary, regardless of the other circumstances. Shorter periods of time, however, have produced less predictable results. One member of the court has stated flatly that "confessions obtained by questioning an arrested person before thus arraigning him are not admissable in evidence". In his view, even a 5-minute delay for questioning may be too long. In Spriggs v. United States, (335 F. 2d 283 (D. C. Cir. 1964)), a conviction was reversed because of the admission in evidence of a confession made during booking some 30 minutes after arrest when the officer told the suspect three witnesses had seen him shoot. In United States v. James J. Jones, (Crim. No. 366–63), the District of Columbia trial judge excluded a confession which occurred 15 minutes after arrest. At times, certain panels on the court have appeared to endorse the position that any delay for questioning is unnecessary per se, maintaining that "if the arrest was made on probable cause, the accused should have been taken without delay to a magistrate. If there was no probable cause, he should not have been arrested."

Mr. Chairman, after the many, many hours and days that my Committee has devoted to the study of crime in the District of Columbia, I must admit that the Mallory rule appears to be a factor influencing the increase in the crime rate. Due to it, criminals are let free by the courts, while many others are permitted to plead guilty to lesser pleas that are in many instances completely incompatible with the seriousness of the crime that has been committed. Certainly, I do not look kindly upon principles of law that allow an accused to be treated more kindly than otherwise should be the case.

None of us can read the day-to-day newspaper accounts without realizing that serious crimes have dramatically increased in recent years in the District of Columbia as well as in all of our major cities. Crimes reported by the Washington Metropolitan Police Department as Part I offenses [murder, manslaughter, negligent homicide, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, housebreaking, grand and petit larceny, auto theft] have increased from 20,163 in fiscal 1950 to 34,765 in fiscal 1966, a 72 percent increase in 16 years. Although serious crime is generally increasing throughout the United States, the District's increase in recent years has been greater than that in cities of comparable size. In 1966, misdemeanor offenses included in Part I crimes increased by 47 percent over 1950. On the other hand, Part I felonies increased by 89 percent over 1950.

Meanwhile, there has been a decline in police clearance rates, or the proportion of cases solved. In 1950, the clearance rate for Part I offenses in the District of Columbia was 48.5 percent; in 1966, it was down to 26.3 percent. Some observers attribute the decline to the Mallory rule; they point out that the clearance rate is adversely affected by limits on police ability to question a suspect about serious crimes which he may have committed in addition to the one for which he has been arrested.

Although there has been a tremendous increase in crime in the District during the past 15 years, available statistical data on felony prosecutions reveals that the number of felony prosecutions has steadily decreased in the District of Columbia. Reported felonies nearly doubled between 1950 and 1965, but nevertheless the number of felony prosecutions decreased in the same period by 39 percent. Moreover, the decline in felony prosecutions has been accompanied by increasing pleas of guilty to lesser offenses. In 1950, pleas to lesser offenses or fewer counts were accepted from 21 percent of defendants. By 1960, the percentage was 38 percent and by 1965, it was still climbing. During the same period, the percentage of pleas to the counts contained in the original indictment decreased from 29 percent to 14 percent.

These statistics clearly point out that something is drastically wrong with our system of criminal justice. What is causing the drastic decline in felony prosecutions, as well as the growing increase in pleas of guilty to lesser offenses, may be conjecture, but in my opinion, the Mallory decisions and other rights granted defendants by the courts have contributed to it.

What is to be done about it is properly a matter for the Congress. Certainly, there must be remedial legislation to correct the abuses of Mallory and to properly allow some opportunity for police officers to question.

It seems to me that we have become so obsessed with uncovering new rights and safeguards for the criminal that we have unbalanced the scales of justice, and find ourselves in the unenviable position of losing control of the crime and violence that are running rampant in our cities.

The fundamental rights to the safety of our homes, our streets, and our places of business cannot continue to be eroded. The sophisticated criminal, the hoodlum, the thrill thug, and the juvenille delinquent must be stopped if our nation is to remain a nation of laws and if our countrymen are to be respecters of those laws.

The Justice Department, in testifying before the Senate District Committee in the 89th Congress in connection with proposed crime legislation, supported post-arrest procedures that would permit police officers to have some leeway in questioning a suspect following arrest. The spokesman for the Justice Department stated the following:

"But in policing a large metropolitan city where the police deal more frequently from crimes of violence, such as rape, murder, robbery, burglary, and other crimes requiring prompt arrest and often involving few, or no, witnesses, and little, if any, detectable evidence, questioning suspects is indispensable in law enforcement.

Of equal significance, and within a 4-year period after writing the opinion in the Mallory case, Mr. Justice Frankfurter, in writing for the court in Culombe v. Connecticut (367 U.S. 568, 571 (1961)), stated:

"Despite modern advances in the technology of crime detection offenses frequently occur about which things cannot be made to speak. And where there cannot be found innocent human witnesses to such offenses, nothing remains—if police investigation is not to be balked before it has fairly begun—but to seek out possibly guilty witnesses and ask them questions * * *. Such questioning is often indispensable to crime detection. Its compelling necessity has been judicially recognized as its sufficient justification, even in a society which, like ours, stands strongly and constitutionally committed to the principle that persons accused of crime cannot be made to convict themselves out of their own mouths."

The President's Commission on Crime in the District of Columbia, in its Report dated December 15, 1966, also supported a change in post-arrest procedures in order to afford police officers the opportunity to question suspects. I am indeed gratified that the Commission, in its long and conscientious study of crime in the District, concluded that such a change is considered necessary. However, I have some reservations about the change to the Mallory rule as proposed by the Crime Commission. In essence, the Commission's proposal would allow police officers to detain a suspect for a reasonable period of time. I am sure if the courts could be restrained in their interpretation of reasonableness, the procedure might then work perfectly well. My concern is that reasonableness does not have any definite meaning, and in time, problems as they now exist concerning the interpretation of unnecessary delay could develop and narrow the time the police officers might have for questioning a suspect.

Mr. Chairman, I am certainly not wedded to any particular concept of remedial legislation designed to correct the abuses brought on by the Mallory decision. In Title I of the omnibus crime bill, my Committee and the Congress subsequently approved the concept of providing that an accused who waives counsel can be held by police officers and questioned, exclusive of interruptions, for an aggregate period of 6 hours. At the end of this period, the accused would be brought before a committing magistrate. Further, any confession or admission given by the accused during a period of detention would be admissible at trial only if uncoerced and completely voluntary. The final determination with regard to the issue of voluntariness would be resolved by the judge and the jury.

Thus, in my view, S. 674 and Title I of the omnibus crime bill are quite similar, and differ only in that the latter places an outside limit of an aggregate period of 6 hours on detaining a suspect for questioning. It was the view of the members of my Committee, in their careful consideration of procedures to modify Mallory, some time period be included, so that police officers would be unable to detain a defendant in police custody for an indefinite period of time.

Whatever action the Congress takes in this matter, it seems absolutely imperative that statutory language be approved that sets forth in clear and positive terms the guidelines that will control and guide police officers once they have taken an accused into custody. Experience to date has taught us, if nothing else, that the decisions of the court are too inexact to deal with the post-arrest problem. It is only through legislation of the type heretofore discussed that we are going to remove the great aura of uncertainty that exists at the present time with regard to the procedures that police officers are to follow, once an arrest has been consummated.

If and when this is done, the immunity for criminals based on unsubstantial and frivolous grounds will be removed and the courts will once again be able to receive uncoerced and voluntary statements and utilize them as the trial judge and jury deem appropriate.

The bill under consideration today and the crime bills that have been before the District Committee have dealt with the question of admissibility of confessions and admissions. As far as these bills relate to the Mallory rule and related cases, they relate also to rules of evidence and interpretations of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, matters clearly within legislative cognizance of Congress.

However, the Supreme Court decisions in Escobedo and Miranda based further restrictions on police interrogation upon the Fifth Amendment self-incrimination clause and the Sixth Amendment guarantee of the right to counsel. Thus, since Mallory limits interrogation between arrest and presentment, and Miranda regulates conditions for any custodial interrogation by police, confessions obtained in conformity with one rule might still be barred for noncompliance with the other rule.

As yet, there are still unanswered questions concerning the interplay of these rules. For instance, there is the question of whether a delay in presentment, made necessary by application of the Miranda requirements, may become "unnecessary delay", under Mallory. It is also an open question as to whether a suspect may waive his right to prompt presentment under Rule 5(a). It is as yet too soon to tell what the long-term effect of Miranda will be. The police and courts will need sufficient time to accommodate themselves to the decision before a meaningful body of law will develop.

Additionally, the legal remedies for Miranda violations are far more comprehensive than those developed under Mallory. Because Miranda deals with constitutional rights, the defendant would have available habeas corpus and collateral attack under 28 U.S.C. Sec. 2255, as well as other procedures.

Unlike the District of Columbia, law enforcement in state and other Federal jurisdictions, in my view, undoubtedly will be seriously affected by the Miranda decision. The impact of Miranda on the law enforcement in the District has been greatly minimized as a result of the Mallory rule and the effective manner in which it has curtailed police questioning. The legal application of Mallory in the District through the courts has been so effective that the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia in October of 1964 instructed the Metropolitan Police Department as follows:

"That persons under arrest are not to be questioned regarding the facts of the offense following their arrival at precinct or headquarters, until after their appearance before the magistrate and appointment or retention of counsel."

This order has since been rescinded, and I am happy to report that as a result of the crime hearings held by my Committee in the 89th Congress, Metropolitan Police officers are now operating under police regulations that permit members of the force a 3-hour period in which to question suspects following arrest.

From my limited study of Miranda, I can foresee certain disastrous effects on police procedures both here in the District and other state and Federal jurisdictions, and I would like to point these out at this time.

First, the admissability of "thresh-hold" statements given by persons at the scene of a crime would be in serious jeopardy. These spontaneous statements, often actually made during or immediately after commission of a crime, and before the defendant is put in a position in which he is cut off from the world around him, have been extremely valuable and particularly trustworthy. Also, such thresh-hold statements are important in obtaining a fuller confession at a subsequent time in the police investigation.

Second, Miranda puts on the government the burden of showing that the defendant was informed of his rights, and that his confession or other statement was made with knowledge of his rights. Often, this would be impossible to prove. In the circumstances surrounding apprehension and taking into custody of a defendant, it may be difficult or dangerous to stop to apprise the person of his rights and to obtain the quantum of proof required by Miranda that the defendant was properly notified and that his statement was made only after being so informed. To put this burden on the police would mean that arrests and post-arrest acts would become a travesty on what a policeman's job should be.

While, as I said previously, the Congress can and should legislate with regard to Mallory, the situation with Miranda may be different. Because Miranda deals with constitutional rights and thus allows collateral attack, it may become necessary for Congress to amend the Constitution to extricate the criminal law from the dilemma created by that case.

In any event, time is of the essence. As has been said many times, a trip of a thousand miles begins with a single step, and I look upon S. 674 as the first step forward of an advance that must not be stopped.

Mr. Chairman, in closing, I want to thank you for allowing me to appear here today and to present my views on these important crime legislative matters.

Senator BIBLE. It became apparent to us in hearing these many, many witnesses, and there were pros and cons obviously, and there came before our committee many suggestions. There is no easy or quick or patent answer to this question. It is many faceted, and certainly there is a long-range approach with which I concur, but there are intermediate and more timely remedies which I think can be taken.

I am going to confine myself as best I can to the question of the bill introduced by yourself, Mr. Chairman, with which I am in agreement. I think this bill will go a long way or potentially a long way toward helping us out of these many, many problems.

I became convinced personally, as chairman of the D.C. Committee, that the Mallory rule was a factor in influencing the increase in the crime rate, and I know that can be argued pro and con. It is an individual interpretation as to whether the Mallory rule was one of the factors in the District of Columbia. Personally I think it was, based upon the testimony which I heard and the actual statistical information that came before our committee, which I think could be of some interest to you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator, if I may interrupt.

Senator BIBLE. Certainly.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is there any testimony at all to refute the conclusions you have come to with respect to its impact?

Senator BIBLE. Well, I think there are those in the field of criminology who would testify that this in itself wasn't the main factor, that there were the psychological factors, there was the upbringing of the fatherless child in the District of Columbia who had no place to go and no playground to play on and no recreation and no job opportunities. I recognize these as long-range factors.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Nobody questions those may be factors.

Senator BIBLE. They were factors. I wouldn't say that there was a unanimous feeling of those who testified. The record will speak for itself, and believe me it is a long and voluminous one, as to the effect of the Mallory decision. Personally I think Mallory had an adverse effect on law enforcement, and certainly this was the belief unanimously of those charged with the responsibilities of keeping the streets safe, and that was the chief of police and the men under him, the men who walk the street.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is this the opinion of those charged with the responsibility, the unanimous opinion?

Senator BIBLE. I think without exception.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I was interested in getting in the record.

Senator BIBLE. Now in the District of Columbia there are a few statistics, and I am not going to burden this committee because I know you have an extensive witness list, but I want to highlight a few of the more significant ones that occur to me.

In crimes reported in the Washington Metropolitan Police Department as part 1 offenses—part 1 offenses are murder, manslaughter, negligent homicide, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, housebreaking, grand and petit larceny, and auto theft—there has been an increase from 20,000 in fiscal 1950 to 34,000 in fiscal 1966; a 72-percent increase in 16 years, and although serious crime is generally increasing throughout the United States, the District's increase in recent years has been greater than in cities of comparable size, and constantly there was the statement made before our committee that we compare favorably in the number of crimes committed with any other State.

My retort has always been, well, that is a bad comparison because any crime is bad. The mere fact that we compare well with cities of comparable size I don't think puts us in a very favorable light.

I think it is significant statistically to point out that there has been a decline in police clearance rates for the proportion of cases solved. In 1950 the clearance rate for part 1 offenses, which I just mentioned, was 48½ percent. In 1966 it was down to 26.3 percent.

Some observers attribute the decline to the Mallory rule. They point out that the clearance rate is adversely affected by limits on police ability to question a suspect about serious crimes which he may have committed in addition to the one for which he had been arrested.

Although there has been a tremendous increase in crime in the District of Columbia during the past 15 years, available statistics data on felony prosecutions reveal that the number of felony prosecutions has steadily decreased in the District of Columbia. Reported felonies nearly doubled between 1950 and 1965, notwithstanding the fact that these doubled, felony prosecutions decreased in the same period by 39 percent.

Moreover, the decline in felony prosecutions has been accompanied by increasing pleas of guilty of lesser offenses. In 1950 pleas to lesser offenses or fewer counts were accepted from 21 percent of the defendants. By 1960, the percentage was 38 percent, and by 1965 it was still climbing.

These statistics clearly point out, it seems to me, that something is drastically wrong with our system of criminal justice. What is causing the drastic decline in felony prosecutions as well as the growing increase in pleas of guilty to lesser offenses may be, again repeating, conjectural, and depending upon the person to whom you are talking, but in my opinion the Mallory decision and other rights granted to defendants by the courts have contributed to it.

It seems to me we have become obsessed with uncovering new rights and safeguards for the criminal to such a degree that we have unbalanced the scales of justice, and find ourselves in the unenviable position of losing control of the crime and violence that are running rampant in our cities.

The fundamental rights, the safety of our homes and our streets and our places of business, cannot continue to be eroded. The sophisticated criminal and the hoodlum and the thrill thug and the juvenile delinquent must be stopped, if our Nation is to remain a Nation of law, and if our countrymen are to be respectors of these laws.

I develop then some of the other decisions in connection with the Mallory case in my full statement. I think it is significant to note that the President's Commission on Crime in the District of Columbia, in its report dated December 15, 1966, also supported a change in post-arrest procedures, in order to afford the police officers the opportunity to question suspects. I am indeed gratified that the Commission, in its long and conscientious study of crime in the District, concluded that such a change is considered necessary.

However, I have some reservations about the change in the Mallory rule as proposed by the Crime Commission. In essence, the Commission's proposal would allow police officers to detain a suspect for a reasonable period of time, and again we are right back almost where we started from, because I am sure if the courts could be restrained in their interpretation of reasonableness the procedure might then work perfectly well.

My concern is that reasonableness does not have any definite meaning, and in time problems as they now exist, concerning the interpretation of unnecessary delay, could develop, and narrow the time that the police officers might have for questioning a suspect. I am certainly not wedded to any particular concept of remedial legislation designed to correct the abuses brought on by the Mallory decision.

In title I of our omnibus crime bill, which really is the title which should be discussed with you in line with your bill S. 674, the committee and the Congress approved the concept of providing that an accused who waives counsel can be held by police officers and questioned exclusive of interruptions for an aggregate period of 6 hours. At the end of this period, the accused would be brought before a committing magistrate.

Further, any confession or admission given by the accused during a period of retention would be admissible at the trial only if uncoerced and completely voluntary, which is the thrust of your bill.

The final determination with regard to the issue of voluntariness would be resolved first by the judge and then by the jury, and thus in my view S. 674 and title I of the omnibus crime bill are quite similar, and differ only in that the latter places an outside limit of an aggregate period of 6 hours on detaining a suspect for questioning.

It was the view of the members of my committee, in their careful consideration of procedures to modify Mallory, that some time period be included, so the police officers would be unable to detain a defendant in police custody for an indefinite period of time. Whatever action the Congress takes in this matter, it seems to me that it is absolutely imperative that statutory language be approved that sets forth in clear and positive terms the guidelines that will control and guide police officers, once they have taken an accused into custody.

Experience to date has taught us, if nothing else, that the decisions of the court are too inexact to deal with the postarrest problems. It is only through legislation of this type heretofore discussed, and being discussed here this morning, that we are going to remove this area of uncertainty that exists at the present time.

The bill under consideration today, the crime bills that have been before the District Committee, have dealt with the question of admissibility of confessions and admissions. As far as these bills relate to the Mallory rule and related cases, they relate also to rules of evidence, and the interpretation of the Federal rules of criminal procedure, matters clearly within the legislative cognizance of Congress. However, the Supreme Court decisions in Escobedo and Miranda, place further restrictions on police interrogation based upon the fifth amendment self-incrimination clause, and the sixth amendment guarantee of the right to counsel. Thus, since Mallory regulates condition for custodial interrogation by police, confessions obtained in conformity with one rule might still be barred for noncompliance with the other. As yet there are still unanswered questions concerning the interplay of these rules.

For instance, there is the question of whether a delay in presentment made necessary by application of the Miranda requirements may become unnecessary delay under Mallory. It is also an open question as to whether a suspect may waive his right to prompt presentment under rule 5(a). It is yet too soon to tell what the long-term effect of Miranda will be. The police and courts will need sufficient time to accommodate themselves to the decisions before a meaningful body of law will develop.

Additionally, the legal remedies for Miranda violations are far more comprehensive than those developed under Mallory, which really in the final analysis had its delimiting effect solely here in the District of Columbia, because it was applying a rule of Federal criminal procedure to the District, whereas most States relied upon their State laws and statutes, and were not confronted with rule 5(a). But here all crimes are tried under the limitations of rule 5(a).

Unlike the District of Columbia, law enforcement in State and other Federal jurisdictions will be seriously affected by the Miranda decision. The impact of Miranda on law enforcement in the District has been greatly minimized as a result of the Mallory rule, and the effective manner in which it has curtailed police questioning. The legal application of Mallory in the District to the courts has become so effective that the U.S. attorney in the District of Columbia in October 1964 instructed the Metropolitan Police Department as follows:

That persons under arrest are not to be questioned regarding the facts of the offense following their arrival at a precinct or headquarters until after their appearance before a magistrate and appointment or retention of counsel.

I am happy to say that the order has since been rescinded, and I am happy to report that as a result of the crime hearings held by my committee, Metropolitan Police officers are now operating under police regultaions that permit members of the force a 3-hour period in which to question suspects following arrest.

I then go on to give my observations on some of the problems created by Miranda, and expressing some frank doubt as to how you particularly deal with Miranda problems, in view of the fact that it was premised and bottomed on the Constitution, and whether this does take a constitutional amendment. I frankly don't know. Maybe it takes a delimiting bill similar to that suggested by Senator Ervin with which I am not too familiar, I haven't studied it at any depth, and so accordingly, I somewhat hesitate to comment on that.

I thought that my comments might be of some help to the committee as you move forward with S. 674. The real problem that we had, in trying to correct what we felt was the adverse effect of the Mallory decision, was the time factor, and again this caused all kinds of problems, and ultimately resulted in an Executive veto on grounds that the time allowed for questioning was too long.

It is significant that the then Attorney General of the United States, Senator Kennedy, in the 88th Congress, speaking through his Chief Deputy, Nicholas Katzenbach, later Acting and then Attorney General, now over in the State Department, suggested a law which did allow a maximum of 6 hours elapsed time for this period of questioning. Later the now Attorney General, Ramsey Clark, and I know he is going to testify before you later, suggested that we could accomplish this change administratively rather than freezing it into a statutory law, and that the time to be allowed should be in the neighborhood of 3 hours.

It seems to me, and in response to a question that Senator Kennedy posed a few moments earlier, I don't try to give this priority in this long running hard fight against crime, but it is essential as one of the steps as we move forward in that direction, if we are to solve this very, very bad crime problem.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am available for questions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Senator, as I understand you, you think a very serious problem has been created by Court decisions, and you think it is the three decisions to which you have referred?

Senator BIBLE. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. You feel that the Congress has a duty to seek a remedy?

Senator BIBLE. I do.

Senator McCLELLAN. For the harm that these decisions are doing?

Senator BIBLE. I do.

Senator McCLELLAN. I feel they do militate against the best interests of society, the protection of society, and make it more difficult for law enforcement officers to perform their function.

Senator BIBLE. I certainly agree, and I might just add an additional thought. We have done everything we could to "beef up" the Police Department here in our Nation's Capital. It has an excellent Police Chief. It is a fine Department. We have added to its strength. We passed a pay bill last year to increase their pay 10 percent. It ranks among the third or fourth cities in the entire United States in the pay for beginning police officers. Notwithstanding everything that we have attempted to do, in building up our recruiting practices, more attractive pay, and a very fine retirement system, we can't get sufficient officers to bring it up to strength. Many of these potential police officers simply say they don't want to serve in this particular capacity. I think they are about 290 or 300 short of their authorized strength. There has been money for them, but the Department can't recruit them.

Senator McCLELLAN. What is the minimum, Senator, in the District?

Senator BIBLE. I think the last raise took it up to about $6,700 as a starting salary.

Senator McCLELLAN. Starting at around $550 a month?

Senator BIBLE. Very close to $550, just a shade over that figure.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And then they proceed on?

Senator BIBLE. That is right, and their promotion steps I think are somewhat attractive, but even with that, the point I am making is that we can't build our police force up to the authorized strength.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I personally think even that pay is very, very low, and still should be increased. I am in favor of paying these people who dedicate their lives to law enforcement, who take the risks to protect our homes, protect our families, much more, but my concern is that merely increasing the salaries, merely spending more money, does not resolve the problems that are created by court decisions which make it difficult, I think unusually difficult, unnecessarily difficult, for these officers to perform their duties.

Senator BIBLE. I am in agreement with you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I can well imagine, I think we all can, the impact on the morale of a dedicated police officer who works hard, diligently, and faithfully; who finally succeeds in solving a crime by apprehending a criminal suspect who voluntarily confesses, only to learn that because of some rule adopted afterward, something the officer couldn't possibly have known about, and something unknown in the regular practices and procedures heretofore approved throughout the history of our jurisprudence, this guilty criminal is turned loose. The officer probably risked his life to apprehend the criminal. He risks his life every day he is on duty, and sometimes when he is not on duty. I think this may be having some impact on the recruitment of personnel for our police departments.

Senator BIBLE. I am sure it has, and I think our testimony will at least indicate that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As I understood you with respect to S. 674, you think it could be improved by stating some time limit?

Senator BIBLE. This is my own personal feeling on it. In my prepared statement, which will be before you, I have cited some of the examples of the application of the Mallory rule, where detention of 15 minutes, for example, had resulted in the throwing out of a confession.

I think if it is possible to do so, and this is always where the going gets rough in a bill of this kind, we should, I believe, try to spell out the time. We took the figure that was given to us by the then Attorney General of the United States, and we put it in the bill. The Justice Department felt then that that was too long a period of time. They all say that the police officers' hands should not be handcuffed, that they should have a reasonable length of time in which to question the suspects, but it all falls upon what is that reasonable length of time. I don't know whether you can come up with a satisfactory answer.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, you are apprehensive, if the time limit is not set by law, that what you would think is reasonable time and what you have in mind in voting for the bill, might vary under different circumstances. I can appreciate that, "reasonable time" might be construed in a different way, or for all practical purposes to deny any time, and reasonable time might be construed as being just the time from the point of apprehension, or arrest, to the magistrate.

Senator BIBLE. That is exactly my position. I base that, Mr. Chairman, on the historic pattern set by the Court decisions after the Mallory rule. You only have to go to the Mallory rule and the subsequent decisions to see how difficult it is and the wide variations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It says "without unnecessary delay," and this has been interpreted to mean you have got to start about the time you take a suspect into custody, you have got to be on your way to the magistrate with him.

Senator BIBLE. At least it has a wide variety of interpretations, and most of them in my judgment very much limiting the police officer.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Any questions?

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, perhaps this is not a question, and I know that the record as we go along will give voice to some of the concerns by those who feel that the Court has moved prudently, and the Congress ought not to overreact to these crime statistics nor respond too enthusiastically or unwisely to the need to protect society. But let me just make this comment and I know everyone who has testified thus far will share this generality.

Some of these decisions cause a lot or trouble, and it is the kind of trouble that no police state ever suffers from. The people of this country react with abhorrence when they read of people who have to live in a country where they knock on the door in the middle of the night, take the man away, not to a magistrate but to some jail. We like to think isn't it nice that we don't do things like that. Let's be sure that we don't begin to move in that direction by overaction.

The right to keep quiet, that is the right of the poor man as well as the rich fellow, and the right to a lawyer and to a phone booth at least to get the lawyer right away, that is everybody's right. To be told promptly on arraignment of what it is that you are charged with, that is a right, and none of these are new rights. There is nothing new about this.

What I sense may be new is a series of decisions by which the Court seeks to insure that those rights which wealthy Americans have always enjoyed will be extended to all Americans, and it does cause trouble as we seek to do this, but I think we all share the desire that we not overreact.

Senator BIBLE. I certainly concur. I don't want a police state. I think there is very, very little of it and there is not any evidence that that exists in any police department, at least to my knowledge.

The days of brutality and of beatings and of all of this type of thing, which I suppose did happen at one time in the buildup of our American jurisprudence system, I don't think exists today. Maybe the pendulum swung too far the other way. I don't want it to swing as far as you say, but I want to try to find a good, sound middle ground where our streets will be somewhat safer.

Senator HART. I wasn't conscious that I indicated where I thought it should be. I don't. I do feel a responsibility to express what I am sure witnesses will later, a concern that we not overlook what is very basic.

I know that we have, if any, very few police departments where they beat up suspects any more, thanks in part to court decisions. But now we have improved psychological techniques which leave no blood, but can be perhaps just as influential in operating on a person held in custody.

No, I am not suggesting that any Member of the Senate is for a police state, by supporting these bills. That is absurd. My only point is that we are reacting to court decisions which reflect that court's concern with rights that most of us have always assumed we would be given. I think all of us would have gotten these rights had we been in a hole, but these same rights should be available to somebody that can hardly spell his name.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you have any questions, Senator?

Senator HRUSKA. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are there other questions? If I may interrupt for just a moment off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Senator McCLELLAN. Back on the record.

Senator KENNEDY. Senator, it is my understanding that the relevant provision of the Nevada Code is very similar to the Federal Code. Chapter 171, section 200 of the Nevada Code reads as follows:

> The defendant must in all cases be taken before the magistrate without unnecessary delay.

I am wondering whether this has, in your opinion, made it more difficult for law enforcement officials in Nevada?

Senator BIBLE. Frankly, I am not conversant with the problems that they have had since these later decisions. I was attorney general of Nevada. During that period of time I don't think we had any particular difficulty with the Nevada statute which you read, which is almost identical, I believe in all of the States. But in reading the press on some of the more recent criminal cases that they have had there, I do believe that Miranda and Escobedo both have given them difficulty. Obviously Mallory hasn't because that is a Federal rule, though the Federal rule is similar to the Nevada statutory one.

Senator McCLELLAN. Anything further? Speaking of a police state, I fail to see where we were moving toward a police state in this country prior to these decisions. Now others may think we were, but I fail to see that we are moving toward a police state as of now. The trend seems to be more in the direction of a crime-ridden society, and that is what gives me concern.

We have to keep some balance. The rights of the individual simply must be protected. But there is also an obligation, I believe, on the part of citizens to cooperate, in an effort to try to bring about law and order and respect for law and order. Anyway, we are going into this area very thoroughly, and I hope that in the course of these hearings we can get a cross section of views from law enforcement officials in this country.

I am going to keep the hearings open. I will not exclude the views of anyone who has anything they think they can offer because I want this weighed carefully. I plan no hasty, ill-advised, ill-considered action.

I think there is a duty that devolves upon the Congress to act in these circumstances, and I want us to approach it deliberately, studiously, and with dedication. I thank the Senator very much for his contribution. I appreciate your appearance, Senator.

Senator BIBLE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, Senator Lausche.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANK J. LAUSCHE, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OHIO

Senator LAUSCHE. Senator McClellan and members of the committee, I appear before you this morning proposing to testify in support of S. 674 and S. 675. My background with respect to criminal law lies in 10 years of service as a judge in Cuyahoga County of the State of Ohio. Four years of that 10 were given in service as the presiding judge of the criminal court of Cuyahoga County, which at that time had a population of about 1,400,000 people.

The presiding judge not only presided over criminal trials, but also was the individual before whom pleas of guilty and not guilty were made. In other words, the indicted individuals were arraigned before the presiding judge.

I do not say it boastfully, but I believe that my experience was rather broad as a basis to formulate some judgments about the meaning of crime in a community, the need of exercising reasonably all of the powers possessed by government in suppressing crime, and the need, and I would say over and above everything else, of guaranteeing and reserving to the accused a full enjoyment of his constitutional rights.

Our system of jurisprudence has its root in the Anglo-Saxon concept of how criminal laws and laws in general should be administered, and our concept is that every doubt has to be resolved in favor of the accused. And so with that basis of thinking, the writers of our Constitution, in the Bill of Rights, proceeded to set forth the safeguards that shall be available to an accused, when he is charged with crime.

The basis for the writing of those safeguards were rooted in what our forefathers understood was happening in totalitarian nations and in dictatorships, in maintaining their supremacy and their subjudication of the citizenry.

Now, I do not have it written out, but we all know of them. The accused has the right to compulsory attendance of witnesses, to a speedy trial by a jury of his peers, to the right of freedom not to testify against himself if he so desires, the right to be released under reasonable bond, and the right to be immune from cruel and unreasonable punishment.

Those safeguards were brought out in a hallowed and sacred way by the writers of our Constitution, and they have been the protection of the accused when he has come before the criminal courts in the United States.

But of late, interpretations have been made of these constitutional provisions that to many are seemingly completely in conflict with what was originally intended, and that departure from the original interpretation has become most conspicuous in the Escobedo and in the Miranda cases.

In determining whether a statement made by an accused is admissible or not admissible in a trial before the jury, the primary issue is to decide was it a voluntary statement. Government shall not be vested with authority to compel a witness to testify against himself. But if he voluntarily makes a statement, that statement in the 177 years before the Supreme Court made its pronouncement in the Miranda case, was deemed admissible in evidence.

The procedure from time immemorial, in the trial of criminal cases, whenever the challenge was made that the confession was obtained by force and coercion, was for the judge to examine the witness, learn what happened at the time the alleged confession was made, and learn whether there was duress, either actual or indirect by fatiguing and exhausting the accused, so that what seemed to be a voluntary confession was in fact one that was extorted from him.

Time and again, in a jury trial when a challenge was made that coercion was practiced, I examined the witness, the defendant's lawyer examined the witness, and the prosecuting attorney, to find out if there was coercion.If it appeared that there was not, as Senator McClellan has already stated, the jury was called back in, and the testimony was given, and finally the court, I would say:

Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, testimony has been given by witnesses A, B, C, and D. This testimony has been challenged by the accused to have been extorted from him. He states that it was not voluntarily given. It is your sacred duty to examine all of the facts, all that has been said, and then determine whether or not the confession, the statement was voluntary or involuntary.

Senator McClellan. Senator, may I interrupt you at this point?

Senator Lausche. Yes, sir.

Senator McClellan. The same jury that you say should have the right to determine whether the confession or the statement was voluntary or not is empowered, in a given case, is it not, to determine guilt or innocence, and to determine guilt in some cases where it might mean the defendant or the accused would be condemned to death?

Senator Lausche. That is correct.

Senator McClellan. It seems to me that if a jury can be empowered to pass on guilt or innocence that may condemn a man to death, or even to life imprisonment, or to a prison term, that same jury, after hearing all of the evidence, should be capable of determining beyond a reasonable doubt whether a statement of an accused was voluntary or if it was coerced.

Senator Lausche. That is a very powerful, logical, and constructive statement. The jury in my State has the power to determine whether a man shall be put to death. Why shouldn't it have the power to determine whether or not a statement was voluntarily or involuntarily made?

Now, these safeguards which you have written in the bill—I would like to discuss them for a moment:

The trial judge in determining the issue of voluntariness shall take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the giving of the confessions including (1) the time elapsing between arrest and arraignment of the defendant making the confession.

I subscribe to what Senator Bible said about the need of giving study to this provision. In Ohio, the courts have held that 48 hours is a reasonable time. The reasonableness of the time depends upon the circumstances.

(2) Whether such defendant knew the nature of the offense with which he was charged or of which he was suspected at the time of making the confession; (3) whether or not such defendant was advised or knew that he was not required to make any statement, and that any such statement could be used against him; (4) whether or not such defendant had been advised prior to the questioning of his right to assistance of counsel and (5) whether or not such defendant was without the assistance of counsel when questioned and when giving such confession.

I think there might be added advisedly a sixth condition: The circumstances and the environment under which his statement was made, that is if there were 20 detectives surrounding the man and a lot of lights——

Senator McClellan. Senator, I think it is in there. It says all of the circumstances, does it not, at the beginning? If not, it certainly should be in there.

Senator Lausche. I think you might give that consideration, because that is a very important factor.

Senator McClellan. I agree with you that all circumstances, everything that can throw any light on what the situation was at the time the individual talked ought to be considered.

Senator Lausche. Right. Now I would like to discuss the general situation. To argue that criminality is not growing rampant is to completely disregard the records that we get out of practically every metropolitan city in the country.

The limiting of the courts in the right to receive in evidence statements voluntarily made, unless the accused is told that he is entitled to a counsel, and if he says that he wants one that you must provide one for him, has had a deleterious effect on the administration of law and justice.

For 177 years I don't know how many Supreme Court judges were up there, but I suppose there were 150 to 200 at least, and no one ever thought of this Miranda principle until the five judges who recently made the pronouncement, and with those five speaking, there were four who disagreed with them.

If we want to aggravate the fear and trepidation of the women in our homes, keep the Miranda law in effect; on the other hand, if law and order is to be maintained the Congress should take action to nullify that decision.

While I have never had a gun in my home, the invasions that have been made by criminals into the homes of our citizenry have caused me to think of getting a gun for my home for the protection of my wife and myself.

But when your wife does not dare open the door, when she heard about the escape of that man up in New Jersey and she began to tremble about the thing, and that was true probably in every home in the District, well, the time has come when you have got to start thinking about the innocent victims of crime, while still, of course, providing a full protection of all the constitutional provisions that exist for the criminal.

Now I want to say one word or two on the wiretapping. The present law is inadequate. The present law seems to prohibit wiretapping unless it is consented to by one, but the language of the law makes it practically impossible to utilize it as a prohibition against wiretapping.

It prohibits wiretapping "for purposes of interception and disclosure," the two conditions must be present. It is in the conjunctive, the tapping must be for interception and disclosure. You can intercept and not disclose, and thus not violate the law, though by interception you are invading the privacy of the individual, and acquiring information upon which you then proceed in a legitimate way to obtain other information for purposes of prosecution.

The bill before the committee, and offered by Senator McClellan, contains the language "prohibiting interceptions or disclosures." It is put in the subjunctive instead of the conjunctive.

Under this bill, S. 675, wiretapping would be prohibited except for national security purposes and except in specific cases of duly authorized law-enforcement officers engaged under specific court order. I subscribe to that provision, Mr. Chairman. That is my testimony, and if there are any questions you desire to ask, I will try to answer them.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator. Wiretapping is something that has concerned me for some time. Some two or three Congresses ago I introduced wiretapping legislation—substantially the bill before us today—which I thought had the support of the Department of Justice, and I think it did at that time. However, I can appreciate that there is some element of dissatisfaction in any kind of a wiretapping law.

Occasionally there would be some information secured that would be strictly private and that should be kept private, and information that no one would have a right to have or want.

But the criminal element in this country, certainly the organized criminal forces, makes tremendous use of the telephone, and I think all of the police enforcement officers and the FBI, would pretty much verify that statement. They use it as a weapon, as an instrument to further their own nefarious trade.

Shall we say law enforcement shall not be permitted to use the same weapon? It is somewhat like this. We know that the ganster, the thug, the robber, carries a gun. Shall we disarm our police just because we think it is wrong to kill, to murder? You have to fight these criminals with weapons comparable to those they use.

I think the wiretapping proposal is premised largely upon the same principle which permits the securing of a search warrant to invade the privacy of a home. If you believe a crime is being committed, stolen property concealed, or there is evidence there of a crime, a search warrant can be obtained. And a search warrant can only be procured on a proper showing before a court of competent jurisdiction.

Senator LAUSCHE. That parallel is excellent.

Senator McCLELLAN. And that court carries control, it retains control, it can revoke a search warrant at any time, it can say under what conditions it can be executed, and the court here would have comparably the same power in dealing with wiretapping.

Senator LAUSCHE. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. There has to be a showing made that would warrant a wiretap order, and the court could retain control of it and specify the exact place, the time, the duration, and the purpose.

There are those who say we should have no wiretapping except in the matter of the security of the country. Let me say this in that connection: The life of a citizen, the protection of an innocent child who has been kidnaped, the protection from heinous crime, is just as important to the individual citizen as is the protection of this country from its enemies. I do believe there has to be some authorized use made of this instrumentality in waging the war on crime, especially organized crime, and specifically crimes of the nature of kidnaping, murder, extortion, narcotics rackets, and syndicated gambling. If we don't use that weapon, our police, in my judgment, will be handicapped, and unduly so. I just make that observation.

Senator LAUSCHE. The writers of our Constitution never intended that criminals shall be made absolutely immune from being reached by law. They tried to adopt reasonable prohibitions, and that they did.

Now, then, it is best illustrated by the provision in the Constitution, the right of one to remain uninterrupted in his home, shall be inviolate, and no search and seizure shall be made except upon authority duly issued by a court of justice.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, suppose you tap a wire, you will hear, perhaps, some conversations that you have no right to hear. That is true in many instances. But when you take a search warrant and go into a home you may see a lot of things you have no right to see. So it is the same situation. There has got to be some yielding to combat lawlessness.

Senator LAUSCHE. I would like to summarize my view of it. I give the fullest protection possible to the citizen in the enjoyment of his privacy, and in approaching these exceptions, there are two of them in the bill now, nail them down within the strictest meanings available so as to insure to the maximum degree possible that there shall be no abuse of that right.

I have not thought it out adequately, but to begin with, I subscribe to the proposal made here. How does this conform, if I may ask, Senator McClellan, with the Crime Commission's study?

Senator MCCLELLAN. As I recall, a majority of the members of the Crime Commission indicated they favored some measure of this nature. I believe it was on the confession matter that seven of them indicated they favored it, and with respect to this issue of wiretapping, a majority indicated they favored it, but the President didn't——

Senator LAUSCHE. Didn't recommend it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Didn't recommend it in his message.

Any questions?

Senator HART?

Senator HART. No. I thank Senator Lausche very much.

Senator LAUSCHE. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Montoya couldn't be present, but he has sent a statement which I am ordering without objection be placed in the record at this point.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JOSEPH M. MONTOYA BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, IN SUPPORT OF S. 824, THE LOCAL LAW OFFICERS EDUCATION AND EQUIPMENT ACT, MARCH 7, 1967.

Mr. Chairman, crime is rising faster than the population of our country, turning our cities into places where terror exists, tearing at the fabric of our national life and making fear a permanent dweller in the lives of millions of innocent citizens. This is a situation that can and must be alleviated.

As a result of this situation, we hear many voices raised in concern. Those who have suffered first hand are the most bitter. Others have an awful anticipation that sooner or later they and theirs will feel the heavy hand of the criminal. A few seek to spread fear so they may take personal advantage of it.

It is therefore incumbent upon us to think clearly, speak objectively and act realistically in order to aid law enforcement, so that the citizen and his property may be given the security he and his family deserve.

But to leap into a frenzy of uncoordinated punitive measures may hurt society more than assist and preserve it. I believe we must attack the problem by aiding law enforcement agencies of the states and localities without interfering with their freedom to act.

Perhaps the crux of our problem lies in the pincer-type situation our law enforcement people find themselves in. Faced with the perpetrator of violent or open crime on one hand and the minion of organized crime on the other, our city, county and state officer of the law finds he lacks modern equipment, is underpaid for risks he is asked to take and is increasingly isolated from the very community he risks all to protect.

One of the most appalling things I have noted is that this estrangement has proceeded so far that extremists from the fringes of the world of ideology are able to woo into their ranks numbers of law enforcement personnel as a result of taking positions in their support.

Some steps have been taken by the Congress to aid law enforcement on all levels. The Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 helps develop new equipment and aids training and operating procedures. A national commission is studying our criminal law and procedures with a view to recommending revision and modernization of existing Federal criminal law by 1968.

The new Senate Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures is a positive step, while the National Crime Commission has certainly cast long overdue light into hitherto darkened corners. But these, even taken all together, are not nearly enough.

Let us examine some visible roots of our national problem. The pay of the average policeman in this nation is shockingly low. How can we ask men to risk their lives for our benefit if they have to make a financial sacrifice in order to do so?

Then there is a question we must ask about how the local law enforcement officer is keeping up with latest scientific developments. Does he have access to computers and TV tape recording systems that can do so much for his function? Usually he does not have swift access to these things. We must get fruits of technology into the hands of these officers as swiftly as possible, and certainly faster than we do now.

Let us inquire into the caliber of personnel now being attracted into law enforcement. Where are the college graduates? The skilled and increasingly educated officers and research people? The criminal is smarter and tougher nowadays than his counterpart of previous eras. Why not the officer?

We must enable persons to further their education through police work. If we establish a series of educational incentives, it is conceivable that many young people will enter the field of law enforcement in order to better themselves, rather than because they cannot find anything else. College graduates can be produced through law enforcement. Some will stay in police work as a result.

Let us scrutinize costs of law enforcement, which bear down so heavily upon communities, preventing them from doing justice to their police personnel. It would be aggravatingly and dangerously unconstitutional for the Federal Government to take a hand in active local law enforcement. But government could make financial aid available, thus enabling localities to more easily bear the burden of costs.

I do not advocate that our national government subsidize local police salaries. This could be a step in the direction of establishing a national police force, and this I oppose vehemently. But helping pay for modern equipment, and providing personnel with educational opportunities, thus freeing revenues on local levels for salaries of local officers . . . this would accomplish much.

All of the problems I have outlined have solutions. The special message of the President gives us an excellent cue. It is my opinion that this bill, S. 824, best embodies these solutions. It will provide federal assistance to enable state and local law enforcement agencies to acquire modern crime-fighting equipment and to provide a broad program of educational opportunity for state and local law enforcement personnel.

Briefly, this bill will:

(1) Provide up to 50% of the cost of modern law enforcement equipment for state and local police use.

(2) Create a Division of Law Enforcement Research and Development in the Department of Justice to disseminate information relevant to law enforcement work.

(3) Establish travel-study grants for state and local law enforcement officers to examine the best domestic and foreign law enforcement theory and practice.

(4) Provide that two years of law enforcement work by college graduates could serve as repayment of 50% of a National Defense Education loan.

(5) Provide tuition payment programs for state and local officers who have at least two years tenure and agree to serve for two additional years after completion of aided education.

(6) Provide full expense fellowship grants to law enforcement personnel who pursue courses directly related to their work.

(7) Create a Federal Commission for Law Enforcement Assistance to supervise administration of the Act and protect independence of state and local law enforcement agencies.

In this manner we can reach out a hand to the hard pressed law enforcement groups throughout the nation. They would be provided with greater incentives to perform, their ranks would be swelled by infusions of healthy, intelligent new blood, and the result should be more effective law enforcement because of Federal aid . . . although without Federal interference.

Senator McCLELLAN. Senator Hruska asked permission that his full prepared statement which he summarized this morning be placed in the record. It will be placed in the record at the point where Senator Hruska testified, without objection.

There will be placed in the record at this point a statement of Senator Spessard L. Holland of Florida, concerning the bill, S. 580.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
March 6, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. McCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, Senate Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: It is my understanding that your Subcommittee will consider my bill, S. 580, to amend Chapter 3 of Title 18, U. S. C., to prohibit the importation into the United States of certain noxious aquatic plants, during the course of the hearings scheduled for March 7, 8, and 9, 1967.

Since it will not be possible to appear personally before the Subcommittee, it would be appreciated if you will take the necessary action to have the enclosed statement in support of S. 580 incorporated into the record at the proper place.

With kind regards, I remain

Yours faithfully,

SPESSARD L. HOLLAND.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR SPESSARD L. HOLLAND IN SUPPORT OF S. 580

Mr. Chairman, I fully support S. 580, a bill I introduced to amend Chapter 3 of Title 18, USC, to prohibit the importation into the United States of certain noxious aquatic plants, which your distinguished Committee is now considering.

Section 46 of Title 18, USC, presently makes it a crime to transport from one state to another certain types of water plants and seeds thereof; namely, alligator grass, water chestnut plants and water hyacinths.

My bill, Mr. Chairman, would merely extend the present law to prohibit the importation of these noxious aquatic plants from a foreign country into the United States. Certainly where present law provides that transportation of these plants across state moundaries is detrimental to the nation's interest and when millions of dollars are being spent by local, state, federal agencies and private interests in an effort to control these noxious aquatic weeds, none of which species are native to the United States, it appears to me to be only logical that we prohibit transportation of these same noxious plants into any area of the United States from foreign lands.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to belabor this matter as I know the Committee has many other problems to consider. I do ask, however, that a letter dated November 16, 1966 from Mr. James D. Gorman, President of The Hyacinth Control Society, Incorporated, outlining the problems with respect to the control of noxious aquatic weeds, together with a resolution adopted at a formal meeting of The Hyacinth Control Society, Incorporated, on June 21, 1966, at Lakeland, Florida, be included as a part of my statement.

THE HYACINTH CONTROL SOCIETY, INC.,
Fort Lauderdale, Fla., November 10, 1966.

Senator SPESSARD HOLLAND,
Old Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HOLLAND: The membership of the Hyacinth Control Society has directed me to contact you and bring to your attention a serious problem which exist in several southeastern states including Florida.

Millions of dollars are being spent by local, state, Federal agencies and private interests in an effort to control noxious aquatic weeds. Many thousands of dollars are being spent annually in research and experimentation to develop chemical means to control these noxious aquatic weeds.

The aquatic plants that are causing our greatest problems are water hyacinths, alligator weed and elodea. None of these plant species are native to the United States but have been imported and introduced into our lakes and streams and waterways. Elodea is a serious problem, not only in the southeastern United States, but also in California, Oregon and Washington in the west. Water hyacinth and alligator weed are prevalent throughout the southeastern states.

The members of the Hyacinth Control Society realize that nothing can be done to restrict the noxious aquatic plant species already introduced into our waters, we do feel action should be taken to prevent importation of other noxious aquatic plants. The most feasible solution appears to lie in Federal legislation to control the importation of these exotic aquatic plants into this country. At present many aquatic plant species are being imported by commercial and private interests and distributed throughout the entire country.

Experience has shown us that the unrestricted importation and distribution of exotic aquatic plants can only lead to increased problems for all agencies involved in water control, water supply, mosquito control, fish and wildlife management, recreation and navigation in this country.

The members of the Hyacinth Control Society, who are dedicated to the control of noxious aquatic plants, respectfully request that you consider the introduction of Federal legislation in the Congress of the United States which would regulate and control the importation of exotic aquatic plants into this country and prohibit the importation of those plant species found to be detrimental or harmful.

I am attaching herewith a resolution adopted by the membership of the Hyacinth Control Society, Inc. at its formal meeting in Lakeland, Florida on June 21, 1966 calling for the support of the various state and local agencies and bodies in accomplishing the necessary legislation to limit the importation of exotic species of aquatic plants.

Your early and favorable consideration of this request will be appreciated.

Yours truly,

JAMES D. GORMAN,
President, Hyacinth Control Society, Inc.

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Hyacinth Control Society, Inc; meeting in Formal Business Session during its annual meeting in Lakeland, Florida, Tuesday June 21, 1966,

Whereas, that the members of the Hyacinth Control Society, Inc; are dedicated to the control of all noxious aquatic plants in all lakes, streams, ponds, and other bodies of water,

Whereas, several species of exotic aquatic plants have been introduced into the United States of America,

Whereas, several species of these exotic aquatic plants such as water hyacinth, elodea, and alligator weed are presently causing great economic losses of our water resources,

Be it resolved that the members of the Hyacinth Control Society, Inc. do hereby call special attention to these great economic losses of our water resources,

Be it further resolved that the membership request the support of the various State and Federal bodies and other agencies to enact necessary legislation limiting the importation of exotic species of aquatic plants into the United States of America and/or the separate states.

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will stand in recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:15 p.m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 2 p.m., the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will come to order. We welcome you, Mr. Attorney General. You may proceed. We are very glad to have you present your views.

STATEMENT OF HON. RAMSEY CLARK, U.S. ATTORNEY GENERAL; ACCOMPANIED BY FRED VINSON, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

Attorney General CLARK. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It is a great privilege to appear before you and this distinguished committee. At the outset I would like to say that I well know your personal concern about the crime problem in America, and that is a concern that this administration shares fully. We want to work with this committee in every way possible to enact laws that will most effectively protect the citizens of the United States.

Today I have prepared for delivery a statement on one of the numerous bills that you have set for hearing. It is the bill among those that we feel so strongly has the great potential to make the most significant difference in the crime control problems of the United States.

Two years ago tomorrow, President Johnson, in announcing creation of the National Crime Commission and recommending the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, observed that crime will not wait while we seek to eliminate its underlying causes. These are immense and stubborn forces pervading our environment, measuring our character and determining the quality of our lives. Through long-range effort we can conquer poverty, ignorance, disease, discrimination, social tension and despair, family breakdown, the dehumanization of mass culture, and injustice. To do these things is our firm commitment. But while we strive to uproot the causes of crime, we must secure the public safety.

Protecting the lives, the property, and the rights of its citizens is the first purpose of government. The level and quality of public safety and criminal justice afforded by our governments is not adequate to our need. It must be made so.

Crime is a national problem. It tarnishes the goodness of life in every part of the country. The effectiveness of law enforcement, of corrections, of courts in any part of the Nation affects the rest of the Nation. If crime flourishes in one city, its tentacles reach others. When criminals go unapprehended or unpunished in one county harm results to others. If one State's prisons release inmates bent on further crime, some victims will be in other States. We must seek excellence in all processes of criminal justice in every jurisdiction throughout the country.

But law enforcement is a local responsibility. As a nation we have preached local law enforcement. As a nation we have practiced it. There are more of New York's finest, the police of New York City, than there are Federal law enforcement officers for the Nation. Los Angeles County has six times more deputy sheriffs than there are deputy U.S. marshals for the whole United States, and the Los Angeles Police Department is larger than the sheriff's office. A single county has twice as many probation service officers as the entire Federal Probation Service. The Federal Bureau of Prisons has less than 5 percent of the prison population of the Nation. The Federal judiciary is but a tiny fraction of the judiciary of the States.

We would have it no other way. Our safety and our liberty depend on the excellence of local and State law enforcement.

How then can the Federal Government significantly assist in crime control?

The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 is the way, consistent with our principles, that Congress and the President can lend their powers to reduce crime in America. It is the heart of President Johnson's national strategy against crime. It is the one appropriate way the Federal Government can make a major difference. Its potential is immense.

It is based on the demonstrated need for more resources, better applied, to improve the estate of criminal justice in America. The need is to carefully study and plan, to coordinate among agencies, to raise standards and train personnel, to develop methods, to provide more and better police; to devote new sciences and expanded resources to corrections; to assure fairness, effectiveness and efficiency in the courts.

The proposed act recognizes that we spend only a little more than $4 billion a year for local, State, and Federal police, corrections, and courts, and that this is not nearly enough. Approximately $2.8 billion is for police, $1.03 billion for corrections, some $300 million for courts and prosecution. It is estimated that the average annual increase in investment for these functions is 5 percent.

The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act seeks to create and guide new investment.

It takes into account the wide diversity and variations of needs and problems among law enforcement agencies, and the necessity for flexibility. It recognizes that law enforcement is a service with perhaps 90 percent of its expenditures going to salaries, that there are 40,000 police jurisdictions with more than 420,000 law enforcement officers serving, that corrections and courts are undermanned and controlled by State laws often needing change, that crime is increasing more rapidly in urban than in rural America, that the cost of law enforcement per capita ranges more than three times as high in large cities as in rural areas and small towns.

It is supported by the most comprehensive study of crime ever undertaken in this country. The National Crime Commission has amassed an invaluable reservoir of fact, experience and judgment. The theory of the act is buttressed by 18 months grant experience involving the expenditure of $10 million for research, demonstration, training, and education in law enforcement under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965.

Planned, studied, and tested, the Crime Control Act is ready.

Because a mere increase in expenditures is both inadequate and inefficient, the act provides leadtime for the most careful planning by agencies of criminal justice. It will permit potential applicants to begin planning upon its passage. Fifty million dollars will be sought to provide adequate planning funds and continued research, development, and demonstration.

For fiscal year 1969, $300 million will be asked to commence a sweeping action program. The funds will be granted generally for calendar, and fiscal years beginning in 1969, providing ample time for careful planning and detailed budgeting.

The Crime Control Act as planned can triple the rate of increase in resources devoted to criminal justice. Requiring the normal 5 percent increase for eligibility, Federal funds for action programs will be available up to 60 percent of the expenditures above that level. Instead of a normal $200 million increase, an additional $700 million can be available for better police, corrections, and courts by the injection of $300 million from Federal sources in this program.

The grants can cover the spectrum of criminal justice and will emphasize such priority areas as:

1. Specialized training, education, and recruitment programs, including intense training in such critical areas as organized crime and police-community relations, and the development of police tactical squads.
2. Modernization of equipment, including portable two-way radios for patrol cars, new alarm systems, and improved laboratory instrumentation for applying advanced techniques in identification.
3. Programs for the reorganization of personnel structures and the coordination and consolidation of overlapping law enforcement and criminal justice agencies.
4. Advanced techniques for rehabilitating offenders, including the establishment of vocational prerelease guidance in jails, work-release programs, and community-based corrections facilities.
5. High-speed systems for collecting and transmitting information to police, prosecutors, courts, and corrections agencies.
6. Crime prevention programs in schools, colleges, welfare agencies, and other institutions.

In addition to planning and action grants, the act contemplates construction grants for innovating facilities and firm commitment to the research, development, demonstration programs pioneered under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

It is a vital proposal, urgently needed. The Crime Control Act of 1967 can make a safer American tomorrow. We must act on it now.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, we have prepared a statement on S. 916 providing for a unified Federal Corrections Service. Under the circumstances I will read briefly from the statement, and summarize the remainder, if that is satisfactory.

A continuously increasing national crime rate, and a recidivism rate estimated as between 35 and 50 percent tells us that our system of criminal law is failing—it is time to act. When we know that three of four persons convicted of felonies were previously convicted of misdemeanors, usually while youths, we know we are failing. When estimates indicate half of those convicted of a felony will, after release, be convicted of a subsequent felony, we know we are failing.

We are taking action to reduce crime on many fronts which hold great promise. The establishment of a unified corrections service, however, is a step which may offer the greatest opportunity for bringing Federal criminal laws to maximum effectiveness.

Corrections is a key, a very major part, of our total opportunity to reduce crime. If we cut the rate of recidivism in half, and science tells us we can, a major part of our crime will be eliminated.

Whatever our view of the purposes of the sanctions of criminal law, society must seek to consequences from their exercise:

Protection of the public from further offenses, and rehabilitation of the individual and his return to a useful life.

But to separate these two essential aims obscures their oneness. Rehabilitation is protection. The best, the only sure way to protect society from the antisocial convicted of crime, who will be at large again some day, is to rehabilitate him.

Our success will be measured by the effectiveness of our corrections system. The value of the most effective corrections system devisable is measurable not only in billions of dollars, but in lives and human happiness.

One of the laws' primary goals must be the rehabilitation of the offender and his return to useful community life. To accomplish this end, he is placed in the corrections process, which extends from the imposition to the completion of sentence. This process, which includes probation, imprisonment, and parole, is presently divided. Parole and probation supervision are lodged with the courts, prison services are lodged with the executive branch, and research is diffused through both systems.

We believe that this disunity impedes the channeling of resources and efforts in a rational, systematic manner. For example, although probation and parole supervision are two of the key steps in avoiding a return to a criminal activity, the depth and quality of supervision may depend on the caseloads and presentence reporting duties of the approximately 550 probation officers in the 93 Federal judicial districts. This diversity of supervision may affect the planning of an offender's treatment program, since the program must take into account the amount of support which the probation officer can provide a parolee in the community.

If this division of responsibility and authority were eliminated and the corrections process worked toward the rehabilitation goal as a single, unified mechanism, it would be greatly strengthened. Directed by one authority, an offender's rehabilitation program would correlate the efforts of the institutional personnel who evaluate his needs and devise and execute his treatment plan, and the community personnel who supervise his release on parole.

The division of the correction function between the courts and the prison system is at perhaps the most critical point in the correctional process, distinguishing prison operations from community operations. This at a point when, as we can see from our past experience, the great need in corrections is the strong shift toward community operations. For here is the opportunity to rehabilitate.

The value and potential of community based operations is shown by a recent experimental treatment program conducted by the California Youth Authority and discussed in the National Crime Commission report. Juvenile court commitments, excluding those for whom institutional care was deemed requisite, were divided between community and regular institutional programs. Youths assigned to the community treatment project were supervised by officers having a caseload of 10 to 12 and employing treatment methods designed to meet each youth offender's individual needs. After 5 years, the community treatment project reports that only 28 percent of its group have had their paroles revoked, as compared with 52 percent of those who were institutionalized. Community supervision employing a variety of individually tailored treatment alternatives could similarly benefit Federal offenders, both youths and adults. This type of treatment program would be feasible under the proposed corrections system.

To date, there has been no major national investment in corrections research. However, since the goals of parole and probation and their supervision techniques are so closely analogous, a division of research could be created within the service to conduct study on subjects of benefit to the entire system. There would be no gaps, no duplication of effort. Most important, results could then be implemented on a uniform basis, throughout the corrections system.

In answer to the need for strengthening the corrections process, the 89th Congress enacted legislation providing three innovative techniques to be used in achieving prisoner rehabilitation. This important legislation authorizes the Attorney General to place prisoners in residential community treatment centers, to permit them to take emergency or rehabilitative leave, and to permit them to work or participate in community training programs. As a result, new techniques involving prerelease and work release programs and halfway houses are being perfected to return useful, rehabilitated individuals to their communities.

Under the work program alone, almost 3 percent of our prison population are being released for employment in the community. If these new techniques are to achieve their maximum rehabilitation potential, adequate supervision is an essential adjunct. To this end, we have appointed a force of work release coordinators in the newly established Division of Community Services. These new techniques may soon apply to probationers and parolees. Efficiency and reason would require that a single authority be used to provide coordinated assistance and supervision for them. Such supervision would extend from the court granting probation or the institution in which sentence is served, to the residential institution center from which the offender is eased back into community life.

That the respective corrections agencies have accomplished as much as they have under the present system is a tribute to their efforts and cooperation. But to be fully effective, the corrections system should have a single administrative framework within which the flexible sentencing and treatment alternatives presently available can operate and in which time and money can be budgeted on a coordinated basis. Such a framework would permit a better balanced range of services, since coordinated planning will assure that funds and personnel are allocated in relation to need. Moreover, it would free parole officers to devote more time to the preparation of presentence reports.

The establishment of a unified corrections system within the Department of Justice is predicated on its responsibilities in the field of law enforcement, particularly those of containing and reducing the incidence of criminal activity.

A unified corrections system will afford an opportunity to greatly reduce crime while enabling us to return many persons who would otherwise continue criminal activity to their communities to lead productive lives. It is essential to the public safety. It is essential to our humanitarian purposes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Do you have any comment on any of the bills now pending before the committee at this time?

Attorney General CLARK. I have planned no formal comment on any of the other bills. If you would care, I am prepared to make an informal comment. It might be that we could work more constructively with the committee at some other time, but whatever would please you, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. We do not want to proceed further because a number of members of the subcommitee expressed the desire to ask you some questions on these two bills. Other members cannot be here because they are very much interested in the issue now before the Senate, particularly an amendment that is highly controversial and that is expected to be voted on shortly. I think your suggestion is very good as to the other bills, since you are not today prepared to make a formal statement on them.

We shall defer questioning about those until you can return. The bills that I refer to that I have a particular interest in are S. 674, the confessions bill, as I term it, which deals with the Miranda decision and other 5-to-4 decisions of the Court; S. 675, the one on wiretapping, those two particularly; and S. 678, outlawing the Mafia.

On S. 678, I understand, there is a serious question as to its constitutionality. I recognize that. But I do think that there is a great challenge there, if there is any way we can, within the framework of our Constitution, reach organized crime and those who are dedicated to it, who belong to the syndicate or organization, whether named or unnamed, whose objective or primary pursuit is that of violating the law and reaping the illegitimate fruits thereof.

If there is any way to reach them within our constitutional framework, I think Congress should concern itself with legislation in that field. And, of course, we want, as you have suggested, the cooperation, the counsel of the Attorney General's Office, the Department of Justice, the highest law enforcement office in the land, in all these areas. As I have tried to say not only in statements here but elsewhere, the particular bills as now drafted can probably be improved, and wherever they can we seek information that will guide us in making these improvements. The evil of the crime menace is frightening, but how to reach the objectives of these bills, how to deal with the problem that is created, is a matter about which we can have honest differences of opinion, of course.

I would like to invite your attention to these bills to which I have specifically referred, and I hope you will give us the benefit of your opinion as Attorney General. I would think—I may be wrong, but I would think—that just the two bills you have referred to, that you have emphasized in your statement here, are not alone adequate to deal with the overall crime problem; that there are other tools and weapons that are needed in this law enforcement war against crime.

I invite your attention to these and your study of them. We will want to examine thoroughly the proposed safe streets and crime control bill and ask many questions concerning its provisions. Although generally I support it, we may want to refine it or strengthen it in some areas to try to insure that we get the best results from it.

I don't think, and I am sure you do not, that just spending money is the answer to the crime problem. We have got to get results as we spend it. It is results that is going to have its impact on reducing crime, not just the amount of money we spend. I think the proposals in S. 917 should be examined carefully to determine as best we can what the consequences, what the results will be, before we authorize and appropriate money for these purposes.

As to its overall general objectives, I strongly support the bill.

Thank you very much. That was the signal for a vote. Thank you. The committee will stand in recess. Did you want to say anything?

Attorney General CLARK. No, Mr. Chairman. Only that I will be happy to testify or to submit our views on these bills to suit your pleasure.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. The committee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

(Thereupon, at 2:45 o'clock p.m. the committee recessed, to reconvene Wednesday, March 8, 1967, at 10 o'clock a.m.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan (presiding), Ervin, Hart, and Scott.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Paul L. Woodward, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

Our first witness this morning is our distinguished colleague, Senator Burdick, of North Dakota.

Senator Burdick, we welcome you and are glad to have your comments.

STATEMENT OF HON. QUENTIN N. BURDICK, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA

Senator BURDICK. Mr. chairman and members of the committee, you have some broad problems here affecting criminal law. I have a matter here which I believe commands attention of this committee and the Nation.

When it was first brought to my attention, I thought it was small and insignificant. When a group met with me in my office about a year ago, they told me there was a growing problem about vandalism on railroads, and they told me of incidents where rock throwing had derailed trains, had injured employees of the railroad and injured passengers; and at first having heard the story, I assumed that it was a series of isolated instances, but it is a pattern.

The testimony I will give this morning will indicate that in a 13-month period these violations occurred almost every day, and in many cases more than once a day. In the period of 13 months there were 478 of these violations. Mr. Chairman, vandalism endangers the safety of people who are passengers on trains. It endangers the safety of the crews who operate these trains. And it can seriously impair their ability to operate trains in a safe manner.

The bill before you this morning would carry penalties up to $5,000 or imprisonment of 10 years in jail for any individual who is convicted of injuring or the safety of others in this manner.

Senator McCLELLAN. I believe you are testifying to S. 552, Senator?

Senator BURDICK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. That bill will be printed in full in the record with other bills under consideration in these hearings.

Senator BURDICK. On just one part of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the line which serves Washington, there were 487 incidents of rocks thrown at trains which resulted in everything from broken train windows to a one 5-car train wreck in a period of some 13 months. Among these 478 incidents, 31 people were injured, most of them by flying glass from shattered windows. To get some idea of the number of such incidents that are nationwide, you must multiply this number of 478 times the fact that this is only one segment of one of the railroads operating in this country.

The most serious incident occurred on November 2, 1966. At that time some youngsters told the judge that they were trying to toss rocks into open box cars as the train passed by, but the engineer of the train ducked as rocks crashed through the glass of the engine cab. His foot slipped off the automatic deadman control, jerking the train to an emergency stop. Six cars were then derailed. In this instance, four of the youths were arrested, but of the 487 other reported instances, arrests were made in only 58 of them.

I might add at this point, Mr. Chairman, that these incidents of vandalism are not confined to youth. There are many instances of adults also engaging in this vandalism. Concern for the safety of people on board trains is the more obvious concern because it is easy to visualize someone being hit by a flying rock or flying glass. Concern for the ability of operating personnel on board trains to carry out all of their necessary functions is perhaps most vital.

These acts of vandalism occur most frequently in areas of heavy population, and it is in the most heavily populated areas where there is the greatest risk to life and property due to train derailment or other types of train accidents.

At this point I would like to insert in the record of this hearing all the reported incidents of throwing of rocks and other objects at trains between January 1, 1966, and February 13, 1967, on the Chesapeake division, eastern region, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which includes the territory from a point just north of Wilmington, Del., to Potomac yard, Washington, D.C., and to Delmar, Del. And I add here a documentation of the time, place, and train and where these 487 incidents took place.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, that this either be filed or made a part of the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection it will be received and made a part of the record.

Senator BURDICK. At this time, Mr. Chairman, I should like to include a picture for the file showing the derailment caused in the Northeast Washington area. Thomas W. Cox, of Alexandria, was the engineer of this train. He tried to duck as rocks crashed through the glass of his cab. In the process his feet slipped off the automatic deadman control, triggering the train to an emergency stop. As a result, six cars were derailed and the tracks were torn up disrupting the rail traffic for many hours.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The picture will be received and will be retained in the permanent files as an exhibit.

Senator BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, this matter has reached, in my opinion, serious proportions. It is not a case of incidents of isolated cases where young boys out for a lark throw rocks. This is a pattern. This is happening just too often. When you consider it happens everyday and sometimes twice a day on this small segment, I think we have to do something to discourage this type of conduct.

In checking with my staff, I thought perhaps there might be sufficient legislation on the books that would take care of vandalism on the tracks, but they are of the opinion and I am of the opinion, and the people who operate the trains are of the opinion that they need some stiffer penalties for this type of conduct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. There is no Federal statute to cover this so far as you know?

Senator BURDICK. Not specifically.

That is all I have this morning, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

How many arrests did you say had been made in these 487 cases?

Senator BURDICK. 57.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How many convictions?

Senator BURDICK. I don't believe I have that. I am sure it would be less than 57. I understand youth are involved in many of these, Mr. Chairman, and of course you know much leniency is given to youthful offenders.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I understand, but as to conviction, if we could get the disposition where there was in effect a finding of guilt, though not so reported in terms of the record.

Senator BURDICK. I would be very happy to provide it for the committee.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If you have it and if it is convenient. I just wondered what the result was. You say that these are not just the acts of youth who are out for a thrill or something. What is behind it? Do you have any idea?

Senator BURDICK. No, I don't know what is behind it. I presume it starts out as a juvenile lark sort of thing, and then it grows. I don't know what causes this.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As I say, it is understandable to all of us that youngsters might get out and throw some rocks at trains, but you said that adults were engaged in this, too.

Senator BURDICK. Yes, and they don't throw them at the train. They throw at the cab. They throw them at the engineer, who has cargo and passengers to take care of.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In this instance where they had the wreck, do you know whether anyone was arrested in connection with that?

Senator BURDICK. Yes, I do. Nine youths were arrested in that case. Let me see what the disposition of the case was.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you know what the disposition was?

Senator BURDICK. Well, the story says—I will make this a part of the record too, the news story on this one—the judge told the boys, all of whom were present with members of their families, that he doubted anything ever will be done to punish them. I understand that the maximum penalties are often stiff for youth if they are first offenders, but as I say, the instances here include adults, and be that as it may, this just can't go on if it happens this frequently, in my opinion.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Senator Hart, any questions?

Senator HART. No, thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator BURDICK. Thank you.

NINE JUVENILES FACE COURT IN DERAILMENT

Nine youngsters charged with tossing rocks at a Pennsylvania Railroad freight train, which resulted in the derailment of seven cars and $12,600 damage Nov. 2, appeared yesterday in the District Juvenile Court.

Two of the boys denied involvement in the case and their cases were continued to a later date.

Six others pleaded involvement and their cases were continued until case histories can be compiled on each.

The charge of tossing rocks filed against a 17-year-old was dropped because he entered a plea of involvement of stealing a pack of hot dogs from a food store on Dec. 10. The theft case was continued for disposition.

Charges of assaulting the freight train engineer by throwing rocks at him were dismissed on the motion of Miss Rhoda Lakritz, an attorney for the Neighborhood Legal Services Project.

One of the youngsters told Chief Judge Morris Miller that they were trying to toss rocks into open boxcars as the train passed by.

The judge told the boys, all of whom were present with members of their families, that he doubted "if anything ever will be done" to punish them.

He ordered case histories compiled on each of them with reports due before him in 30 days. He said if the youngsters stay out of trouble between now and then, the charges probably will be dismissed.

The boys, ranging in age from 10 to 17, were charged with trespassing on the Pennsylvania Railroad property in the 1400 block of Kenilworth Avenue NE, tossing rocks at the train, and causing the engineer to lose control of the engine, which resulted in the derailment.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, our next witness is the Honorable J. Edward Lumbard, chief judge, U.S. Court of Appeals, for the Second Circuit, New York, N.Y. I will ask that you give us a brief sketch of your background and experience.

Judge Lumbard, do you have a prepared statement?

Judge LUMBARD. I do, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you wish to read it intto the record?

Judge LUMBARD. I would like to do that for the most part if that is agreeable to you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Indeed it is. Very well.

We certainly welcome you. We appreciate your interest and your willingness to cooperate with the committee and to come here and give us the benefit of your wise conclusions and counsel.

You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. J. EDWARD LUMBARD, CHIEF JUDGE OF THE U.S. COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT, NEW YORK CITY

Judge LUMBARD. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to respond to your request to appear and testify regarding proposed legislation which has been introduced by you and other Members of the Senate. During the past 10 years the most troublesome questions before the trial and appellate courts, both State and Federal, have involved the administration of criminal justice under our Federal Constitution. The judges share the alarm of the public, the Congress and the President over the worsening crime situation and the shrinking power of law enforcement to cope with it as effectively as it should.

My extrajudicial experience includes three terms of service in the Department of Justice in the office of U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York, 1925 to 1927, 1931 to 1933, and lastly as U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York from April 1953 until I took office as a circuit judge in July 1955; in addition, four special prosecutions as assistant attorney general of New York State, 1928, 1930, 1936, and 1943; also, the representation of defendants in State and Federal courts over a period of 26 years of private practice, by assignment and retainer, in cases ranging from misdemeanors to murder; and lastly, since August 1964 as chairman of the American Bar Association Special Committee on Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice. However, on this occasion I speak only for myself.

Any proposals for expanding and clarifying the powers of law enforcement agencies must be considered in light of the fact that it has become more and more difficult for these agencies to secure sufficient evidence of crime to justify arrest, prosecution, and conviction.

First, decisions of the Supreme Court now require law enforcement agents to warn suspects, who are in custody, of their rights in such a way that those who otherwise would voluntarily speak are now virtually encouraged not to do so. Moreover, the requirement that, before any questioning, counsel must be available, if desired, and that counsel be furnished if the suspect cannot get counsel himself, prevents or postpones questioning at the very time that it would be most fruitful. Thus in many cases the most ready, the most authentic and the most natural means of getting information by the voluntary statement of the person best able to tell, is no longer available.

Second, court decisions have made it impossible to secure testimony before grand juries and government bodies where there is any claim of fifth amendment privilege.

Third, revolutionary developments in the speed and means of travel and communication have enabled organized crime to operate countrywide, through agents who may be far removed, and in such ways that detection is not only difficult but almost impossible in view of present restrictions. At the same time it is now unlawful for law enforcement agencies to tap telephone wires and divulge what is thus obtained and the use of any electronic devices is now being questioned.

There is a fourth obstacle: the increasing reluctance of witnesses to come forward to complain and to testify. As law enforcement difficulties increase and the likelihood of successful prosecutions decreases, those who suffer from organized crime become more fearful of the consequences of speaking.

The report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, published on February 18, notes the importance of the telephone to large criminal enterprises, and the belief of law enforcement officials that evidence necessary to prosecute will not be obtained without the aid of electronic surveillance techniques. It explains why this is so:

> (T)he organizational structure and operational methods employed by organized crime have created unique problems for law enforcement. High-ranking organized crime figures are protected by layers of insulation from direct participation in criminal acts, and a rigid code of discipline inhibits the development of informants against them. A soldier in a family can complete his entire crime career without ever associating directly with his boss. Thus, he is unable, even if willing, to link the boss directly to any criminal activity in which he may have engaged for their mutual benefit. Agents and employees of an organized crime family, even when granted immunity from prosecution, cannot implicate the highest level figures since frequently they have neither spoken to, nor even seen them.

Because of all these present day difficulties of getting evidence it is of the utmost importance to strengthen by all possible means the powers of law enforcement agencies to get evidence. In the present crisis, means which may have seemed questionable and undesirable a few years ago now are reasonable and necessary.

I believe that to the great majority of the American people it is unthinkable that law enforcement should remain as impotent as it is today; it is unthinkable that we should shrink from supplying the necessary powers under proper safeguards.

S. 675. TO CONTROL AND OUTLAW WIRETAPPING

With these considerations in mind, there is urgent need for legislation such as S. 675 which would prohibit wiretapping except by duly authorized law enforcement officers in the investigation of crime, upon a finding by a judge that there is probable cause to believe that evidence of crime may thereby be obtained. The application would require approval of the Attorney General or a designated assistant, and the court order would be limited to specified phones for a limited period of time, and reports of these orders would be filed with the Congress.

Authority to tap telephone wires and use other electronic devices to overhear and record conversations has long been considered by law enforcement agencies to be the single most important tool for investigating organized crime. It is reliable; it furnishes leads for investigation; it saves time and expense of agencies who have too little manpower and money to do all that the public expects.

The proposed legislation would also make it lawful for State officers to wiretap under supervision of a State court similar to that required by the proposed act for Federal officers. Thus this bill would require all the States to set up similar high standards which would have to be met before wiretapping by State officers would be lawful. The enactment of S. 675 would not only curb unlawful wiretapping but it would result in proper controls of police wiretapping where those do not now exist. Only five States, of which New York is one (New York Code of

In two major respects I think the proposed bill is too narrow in scope and that it should be broadened. First, it is limited to use in investigating just a few Federal crimes. I think it should be available in investigating any crime.

While it is true that section 5 would permit wiretapping in investigation of many major Federal crimes as it includes (1) offenses against national security; (2) murder, kidnapping, and extortion; (3) bribery and graft, and interstate transmission of gambling, and interstate traffic in racketeering; (4) counterfeiting; and (5) narcotics violations; organized crime does not limit itself to these particular Federal offenses. It frequently deals in other serious Federal crimes not included in this list, such as bank robbery, stock frauds, stolen securities, stolen automobiles, goods stolen from interstate commerce, blackmail, obstruction of justice, and schemes to defraud.

Senator McCLELLAN. If you will pardon the interruption, they also get into the bankruptcy racket, do they not?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes; they do, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. I don't believe you mentioned it. I hadn't thought of it until now.

Judge LUMBARD. You are quite right.

Senator McCLELLAN. I have information that that is correct.

Judge LUMBARD. That should be on the list.

There are a host of other Federal crimes, not covered by S. 675, which may well be just as important, such as threats against the President, assaulting an officer of the United States, injuring property of the United States, arson, blowing up a bridge or a tunnel, destruction of aircraft, and air navigation facilities.

Furthermore, I believe that a limitation as to the crimes investigated is really unnecessary as there are several factors which themselves greatly limit the use of wiretapping.

First, the proposed statute, section 5a, provides that only the Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General specifically designated by him, may authorize the necessary application to a Federal judge for approval to wiretap. Thus the application will be carefully screened.

Second, wiretapping is expensive and is not used except in situations of importance where results may reasonably be expected, as I am sure District Attorneys Koota and Frank Hogan of New York City can tell you. This has been the New York experience. Even with modern devices it requires at the least four men for each 24 hours to monitor a wiretap.

Third, the judge to whom the application is made can be expected to exercise sound discretion about approving its use unless a strong showing of need is made in cases of lesser importance.

And there is still a fourth limiting factor—the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts is required to report each year to the Congress on the number and nature of all applications.

Although the proposed bill limits the permissible areas for wiretapping by Federal agents for Federal crimes, it does not do so with respect to State wiretapping. Under appropriate orders of a State judge, section 5b provides that leave may be granted "when such action may provide evidence of the commission of any crime * * * as to which the interception of wire communications is authorized by the law of that State."

I need hardly remind you that in New York's prosecutions against organized crime, commencing in 1935 with the special rackets investigation under Thomas E. Dewey and continuing under District Attorney Frank S. Hogan, the single most valuable weapon has been electronic surveillance. And the President's Commission notes that "Only in New York have law enforcement officials achieved some level of continuous success in bringing prosecutions against organized crime." Since Federal court decisions have recently made it clear that use of wiretap evidence in court would be a violation of the Federal Communications Act, 47 U.S.C. 605, almost all New York State prosecutors have abandoned those cases where such evidence was necessary for prosecution.

In New York State under section 813 of its Code of Criminal Procedure, enacted in 1942 under the 1938 New York Constitution, article I section 12, a State court judge may permit wiretapping (and since 1957 this includes "eavesdropping") wherever there is reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime may be thus obtained.

What I am trying to point out is that the New York statute does not limit the use of these devices to any particular crime. It permits them to be used with respect to evidence of any crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. I don't want to interrupt you now, but at the proper time if you could, I want you to elaborate on how that law has operated with respect to whether there are trespasses or injustices done the innocent, or whether they are operated as a vital instrumentality in the detection of crime.

Judge LUMBARD. I can only say in answer to that, that the uniform belief of our New York City prosecutors over the years has been that this is the single most important weapon against organized crime; and I think the feeling is that also under the very careful system of requiring orders from a judge, and limiting the taps, and because of the fact that it is expensive to do this and it is done only in important cases, that there is a minimum of trespass on the public, on the innocent members of the public.

It seems to be that surely any citizen who is concerned about law enforcement ought not to mind the possible annoyance of using this important weapon against organized crime. I don't know any misuse of it that has come to light in recent years, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. For how many years has New York had this statute?

Judge LUMBARD. Since 1942.

Senator McCLELLAN. Since 1942, nearly 25 years. And in that period of time, what would you say about abuses? I believe you indicated that no serious abuses have come to light?

Judge LUMBARD. I can recollect no serious abuses by law enforcement officers, but I should add that the district attorney has prosecuted cases of independent investigators who were not authorized to tap wires, and that some of these people have been sent to jail.

Senator McCLELLAN. That would be true. That would be a violation of the law.

Judge LUMBARD. Certainly.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But I am talking about where it is authorized under procedures that are established by the New York law, for officers to employ those procedures in the detection of crime. There have been no substantial abuses of the powers conferred upon the courts to grant the authority to wire tap?

Judge LUMBARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have heard of none, but I think District Attorney Koota and District Attorney Hogan would be more fully advised about that than I am.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If there had been any serious abuses, it would certainly have come to light and there would have been publicity about it, I assume.

Judge LUMBARD. I think I might have heard of them, yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. At this point while you were on this, I just wanted you to elaborate a little bit on your experience in New York under a similar statute.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes. Well, as I was saying, under New York's practice, the fact is that almost all the orders permitting wiretaps have related to organized crime or to a major felony, although as I have said the statute would permit it to be used for any crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But there has been no tendency on the part of the officials who have the authority to apply in the courts and the authority to grant wiretapping orders, to make undue use of this instrumentality. They have been conservative in the use of it, I assume?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes, it has been used quite sparingly, and you will find for example, there are seven or eight times as many search warrants issued and executed than there are wiretaps orders.

Under New York's definition of crime this includes any "act or omission forbidden by law" punishable by fine or imprisonment, except traffic infractions of the vehicle and traffic laws and the conservation law. (Penal law § 2). But although the New York law thus permits wiretapping and eavesdropping for any crime, in practice almost all the orders which have been signed relate to organized crime or to a major felony. If it has been so used in New York, which requires no approval by a major law officer such as the attorney general, and no central reporting, as S. 675 does, it would seem unnecessary to limit the application of S. 675 to certain enumerated crimes.

There is a second alternative to limiting the crimes to those listed in S. 675 and that is to permit authorization in the investigation of any crime where the maximum penalty is 5 years' imprisonment or more. I believe this would cover all the areas enumerated in S. 675 and most other crimes in which professional criminals engage.

My second comment is that it is unduly restrictive to require that, before approving the wiretap, the judge must find (p. 9) that there is probable cause to believe that "(3) no other means are readily available for obtaining that information."

As S. 675 provides for challenging the wiretap order before trial by a motion to suppress (p. 11) on the ground that "There was not probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the order was issued." a requirement of a showing that other means were not readily available would lead to unnecessary litigation and delay in many cases. We already know from the nature of the offenses and the manner in which organized crime operates that the usual methods would be a waste of time. Surely any direct approach or any inquiry of those involved would only tipoff the higher ups and frustrate arrest and prosecution. As I have said, weapons which were available to law enforcement a few years ago are not available today.

The act should also cover the situation where a wiretap is permitted in an investigation of one crime and unanticipated evidence of another crime is disclosed. It seems to me this possible difficulty would also be obvious if a wider use of wiretapping were permitted with respect to all crimes.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, if the wiretap order was secured for the purpose of securing information or evidence to sustain charges of interstate gambling or racketeering or something, and in the course of that you discovered some other crime, it ought not be excluded. That evidence ought to be admissible.

Judge LUMBARD. Exactly. I think provisions should be made for that.

Senator McCLELLAN. And the bill as now drafted you think doesn't provide for that.

Judge LUMBARD. At least it would raise a question, and I suggest it might be well to make provision against it.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think that is an excellent suggestion, even if we limit the offenses that can be investigated in some manner.

Judge LUMBARD. For example, suppose wiretapping for evidence of narcotics violations has been permitted and the law enforcement agency finds evidence of extortion or counterfeiting. It would seem advisable to make specific provision for the issuance of a supplemental order permitting use of such evidence already obtained and further interception regarding the newly discovered crime. It is well settled that where during the execution of a search warrant to discover fruits of one crime evidence of other crimes is also found, such other evidence is lawfully seized and may be used. As it is equally possible that the agents may get evidence of some crime not enumerated under the five categories listed in section 5a, this is an additional reason why S. 675 should be broadened to permit wiretapping in the investigation of all Federal crimes so that such difficulties would be eliminated.

APPEALS FROM SUPPRESSION ORDERS

I suggest that S. 675 could also be greatly strengthened by permitting the Government to appeal from any order suppressing wiretaps. Of course if the Government cannot appeal that usually ends the case. Such an appeal in the Federal courts from orders suppressing evidence is now allowed only in narcotics cases. 18 U.S.C. § 1404(2).

The President's Commission has urged (p. 140) that "Congress and the States should enact statutes giving the prosecution the right to appeal from the grant of all pretrial motions to suppress evidence of confessions," and in stating its reasons it said:

> Not only does the absence of a right of appeal preclude successful prosecution in many cases, including important cases involving organized crime, narcotics, and major thefts, but it has distinctly undesirable effects upon the development of law and practice. The law of search and seizure and confessions today is highly uncertain. This uncertainty is compounded by lower court rulings that restrict police conduct yet cannot be tested on appeal, and by inconsistent lower court decisions that can be resolved only on an appeal sought by the defendant.

The uncertainty about this would be compounded, if there were orders of suppression in the district courts which prevented prosecution unless appeal could be taken from those orders, so I suggest that provision be added to with 675.

Since 1965 New York has permitted appeal by the State from all orders of suppression of evidence and also orders suppressing confessions or statements where the district attorney certifies that without use of the matter suppressed the proof available is insufficient or so weak that any reasonable possibility of prosecution has been effectively destroyed. (N.Y. Code of Criminal Procedure, § 518–a, enacted in July 1965.)

In the light of today's crisis in law enforcement, the old arguments against wiretapping are no longer weighty.

Wiretapping, under the safeguards provided in S. 675, is no more an unreasonable search and seizure in violation of the fourth amendment than is a search warrant. The fact that innocent people may use the particular telephone ought not outlaw wiretapping approved by a court; likewise the execution of a valid search warrant may also involve inspecting and looking through the effects and papers of innocent people. We cannot have effective law enforcement without running the risks of some invasion of privacy; no good citizen who places any value on living in an orderly and peaceful society where crime is under reasonable control will object to those occasional annoyances which sometimes are the byproduct of a suitable police action.

If wiretapping by law enforcement agents is legalized because, as I believe, it is necessary, it will not be "dirty business." Those who oppose wiretapping have always relied heavily on the eloquent dissent of Justice Holmes in Olmstead v. United States (277 U.S. 438), where the majority permitted the Government to use wiretap evidence to convict bootleggers despite the fact that the wiretapping was itself a crime in violation of laws of the State of Washington. Of course, these was no Federal law on the subject at the time.

Justice Holmes called it "dirty business" because the evidence was "obtained and only obtainable by a criminal act;" that is, a violation of State law, and he held that courts should exclude evidence obtained by a crime committed by the officers of the law.

It seems clear that had there been a Federal law which permitted wiretapping, upon findings of the public necessity for such legislation, as S. 675 proposes, Justice Holmes would not have said what he did about wiretapping, even in 1928; it would not have been "dirty business" had the law authorized it.

It was Justice Holmes who write in 1880, "The life of the law is not logic but experience." The bootleggers whose convictions were affirmed in the Olmstead case in 1928, I submit, were public benefactors compared to the professional criminals of 1967. There is no dirtier business today than the business of organized crime; it rules by violence and terror; it victimizes the public and corrupts public officials. Every possible resource of Government should be used to expose and destroy it.

Senator McClellan. A lot of people thought them to be public benefactors.

Judge LUMBARD. I thought that was an apt analogy.

The report of the President's Commission ends its discussion of electronic surveillance by pointing out that the "present status of the law with respect to wiretapping and bugging is intolerable" and that the present controversy must be resolved. A majority of the Commission favors legislation "granting carefully circumscribed authority for electronic surveillance to law enforcement officers."

We should never forget the price we must pay if the enemies of society are permitted to operate without fear of detection. The Commission appointed to investigate the facts relating to Pearl Harbor, of which Mr. Justice Roberts was chairman, noted in its report, filed in January 1942, that the restrictions then in effect prevented resort to "certain methods of obtaining the content of messages transmitted by telephone or radio-telegraph over the commercial lines operating between Oahu and Japan" and that the contents of the messages sent just prior to December 7, 1941, might have furnished valuable information. It concluded that among the causes which contributed to the success of the Japanese attack were "restrictions which prevented effective counterespionage." Today there are too many enemies within the country in the ranks of organized crime who can operate almost at will because we have denied to law enforcement the necessary means of detection

The Congress should legalize the use of evidence secured by electronic surveillance, under such safeguards as S. 675 proposes, as a necessary measure in the war against organized crime. Shall I now proceed, Mr. Chairman, with respect to S. 677 permitting compulsion of testimony by granting of immunity?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes, proceed and we will ask questions later.

Judge LUMBARD. The bill would extend to four new areas the power of the Government, acting through the U.S. Attorney, with approval of the Attorney General or his designated assistant, to compel a witness to testify and produce evidence in exchange for a grant of immunity from prosecution for matters concerning which testimony and evidence is given; namely—

(1) certain interstate transactions in gambling, narcotics, prostitution, extortion, and bribery;
(2) influencing or injuring a witness;
(3) bankruptcy crime;
(4) Federal bribery and graft.

While the bill thus gives some additional help to the Government in unsealing lips which otherwise would remain closed, it is only a piecemeal approach and it does not go far enough. The bill should permit the Government to compel testimony and evidence in every investigation of a Federal crime.

There is no reason why the Government should not expect every person to tell what he knows in a criminal investigation so long as that person is not compelled to incriminate himself by doing so. Except as to certain confidential communications, there is no right to remain silent apart from the right under the fifth amendment that one may not be compelled to incriminate himself. Once the Government is empowered to guarantee that a witness will not be prosecuted regarding the matters to which he may testify, and thus he cannot possibly incriminate himself, the witness no longer has any right to refuse to speak. Of course the witness obtains no immunity regarding the truth or falsity of his testimony; he must tell the truth and if he does not he may be prosecuted for perjury. S. 677 so provides, and this is the customary provision. If the witness is granted immunity and then refuses to testify he is in contempt of court and the court may find him guilty of contempt and commit him until he testifies, or the court may impose a sentence of not more than 6 months, or he may be given the right to be tried before a jury and if found guilty he may be sentenced in excess of 6 months' imprisonment.

The President's Commission has recently recommended that a general witness immunity statute should be enacted at both Federal and State levels, which would provide immunity sufficiently broad to assure compulsion of testimony. (Report, p. 141.) The Commission notes that some States already have general immunity statutes which permit the granting of immunity and the compulsion of testimony in any criminal case. The Commission also recommends that the immunity should be granted only with the prior approval of the chief prosecuting officer, as in S. 677 which requires the approval of the Attorney General or his designated assistant. Under its illuminating discussion of a "National Strategy Against Organized Crime" it states (page 200) that such a general immunity statute "is essential in organized crime investigations and prosecutions." And it goes on to point out that:

> (t)here is evidence to indicate that the availability of immunity can overcome the wall of silence that so often defeats the efforts of law enforcement to obtain live winesses in organized crime cases. Since the activities of criminal groups involve such a broad scope of criminal, violations, immunity provisions covering this breadth of illicit actions are necessary to secure the testimony of uncooperative and criminally involved witnesses.

We already have at least 39 different Federal statutes which permit the compulsion of testimony either before a grand jury or before a Government agency empowered to take testimony in certain areas of agency jurisdiction. There are five different kinds of statutes regarding immunity. Under group I statutes, of which there are at least nine, if the witness appears pursuant to subpena and testifies, he automatically gets immunity. Accordingly, he must testify if he is subpenaed and sworn. The Interstate Commerce Act has had such a provision since 1893 and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law since 1903. If businessmen in legitimate business can be compelled to testify about their business why should not those associated with organized crime be cempelled to testify about any or all of their businesses without restriction.

Group II consists of at least nine statutes where the immunity is not automatic. But when the fifth amendment privilege is claimed the Government may compel testimony by granting the immunity or, as in the case of the Immunity Act of 1954, applying to the court to direct the witness to answer. The Narcotic Control Act (18 U.S.C., Sec. 1406), also permits compulsion of testimony under the procedure proposed in S. 677.

Group III consists of at least nine statutes where immunity is automatically given a witness who is subpenaed and testifies or who is required to file an incriminating statement before certain administrative agencies.

In group IV are at least five statutes such as the Labor-Management Relations Act and the Social Security Act, where, upon claim of immunity before an administrative agency, the agency may compel testimony upon grant of the immunity.

Finally, group V consist of at least seven statutes which empower the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Power Commission to compel testimony in certain proceedings before these Commissions or in court proceedings they institute.

It would seem that if administrative agencies have been given the power to grant immunity in so many instances where the violation of the criminal law is relatively unimportant, then the U.S. attorneys should be entrusted with similar power wherever it may be in the public interest to compel testimony.

There is a difficulty in compelling testimony which should be mentioned. Despite a grant of immunity, under existing statutes, many witnesses attempt to put off the evil day of testimony as long as possible by appeal. If these appeals are allowed to wind their way through the court of appeals and an application to the Supreme Court in the usual way, the particular avenue of investigation may have been lost to the Government.

This is exactly what has happened in six recent cases in the second circuit. Four of these involved narcotic investigation witnesses whose testimony was delayed in each case for more than 2 years. The district court had ordered the witnesses committee for 2 years or until they testified. They were released on bail. However, by the time the cases got to the Supreme Court the grand jury before whom they had been brought was no longer in existence and on that ground the Supreme Court vacated the judgments.

Another witness, Emanuel Brown, who was questioned under the Motor Carriers Act, received a 23-month delay before the Supreme Court finally affirmed his contempt conviction. In the sixth case, 26 months after Harris was given immunity and ordered to testify under the Federal Communications Act, the Supreme Court reversed his contempt conviction, 5 to 4, because it had changed its mind about the necessary procedural steps in such contempt cases. With such long delays it is always doubtful whether the particular witness can any longer be useful.

Therefore I recommend that provision be made that an appeal from contempt adjudications must be taken within 5 days and, upon application by the Department of Justice, that the court of appeals be required to fix an expedited schedule for hearing the case, giving it preference ahead of all other business, and that similar provisions should apply to any petition for certiorari and action thereon by the Supreme Court.

In 1951, in its third interim report, the Senate's Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce (known as the Kefauver committee) made numerous recommendations which included the proposal of a general immunity statute in these words:

> The Attorney General of the United States should be given authority to grant immunity from prosecution to witnesses whose testimony may be essential to an inquiry conducted by a grand jury, or in the course of a trial or of a congressional investigation.

If a general immunity statute was necessary in 1951, it is much more necessary today when the imbalance in criminal justice has made it difficult and, in many cases, impossible for law-enforcement authorities to get evidence of crime. With your leave, Mr. Chairman, may I now turn to S. 674?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes, sir.

S. 674. TO ADMIT CONFESSIONS UPON FINDING OF VOLUNTARINESS

Judge LUMBARD. This bill seems designed to nullify the Supreme Court decision in Miranda v. Arizona by reinstating the law as it was before June 13, 1966, when the only test of the admissibility of a defendant's statement was whether it was voluntary. I am sure the committee realizes that as the Court put its rulings in those cases on constitutional grounds, by applying the due process clause of the 14th amendment to the three State cases, and the fifth and sixth amendments to the Federal case, there would be serious question that the Court's interpretation may effectively be changed by legislation.

However, it has been suggested that the rulings in the Miranda cases apply only to situations where defendants are in the custody of the police when their statements are taken.

Senator McCLELLAN. May I interrupt? I don't know, it may be a forlorn hope, but I should like to hope that if this legislation is enacted and its constitutionality is tested, only one Justice changing his position would sustain the law. That wouldn't be unheard of with respect to members of the Court. They might change their position this time on the side of law and order instead of continuing to insist on a position that obviously does work to the advantage of criminals. If Congress passes such a statute at least one among them might be persuaded to change his position.

Judge LUMBARD. That is a matter of policy for the Congress which you are much better qualified to judge than am I.

Senator McCLELLAN. At least it would put the Congress on record.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. In this respect the law should be what it has been since the founding of this Government. It should not be changed by a Court decision, by a 5–4 Court decision which reverses, in effect, what has been the principles of justice and jurisprudence in this country from the beginning of our Government.

I know since they put it on a constitutional ground, that they might continue to hold that even a statute like this was unconstitutional. They might do so. But I, as one Member of the Congress, don't agree with their conclusion, and I think that many throughout the country are disappointed in the Court and its findings and in its ruling, particularly the law-abiding citizens of this country. I think it behooves Congress, if it will, to study it and make some expression by the enactment of a statute which in its opinion should correct this condition.

Judge LUMBARD. Senator, it seems to me perhaps the greatest contribution the Congress and the State legislatures can make in this field is getting the facts with respect to how these decisions are now operating and the extent to which they may be impeding the enforcement of the criminal laws.

Senator McClellan. That is one of the purposes of these hearings, and this bill gives us a vehicle upon which to take testimony and to weigh it in the light of these decisions. Of course, the bill can be amended if we find amendments are required.

Judge Lumbard. Courts are always persuaded by evidence of this nature and by findings of the Congress and legislative committees, and I think it is fair to say that we haven't had enough such guidance from the Congress and the legislatures in this field.

Senator McClellan. I think the majority opinion in the Miranda case suggested that the Congress should weigh this matter, did it not?

Judge Lumbard. Yes, and the Chief Justice pointed out that there may be other ways in which the Congress and the State legislatures can make suitable provisions for the taking of such statements in criminal cases.

Senator McClellan. I would like to have a suggestion from you, a concrete suggestion.

Judge Lumbard. I am going to mention that in the course of what I am prepared to say.

Senator Ervin. If I may interject myself at this point, the way I interpret the majority opinion in the Miranda case, the majority did give Congress permission to legislate in this field, provided that the requirements which Congress might impose were at least as strict as those imposed by the Court in the Miranda case.

Judge Lumbard. Yes.

Senator Ervin. It was stated by the Chief Justice that the Congress could not set up any requirements, any standards that would weaken those that, as the Chief Justice said, I believe, that "we delineate today."

Judge Lumbard. Yes, Senator, and of course, I think what the majority of the Court meant was that it is conceivable that there might be some other ways to provide for the safeguarding of the taking of data and confessions—some method other than outright exclusion.

But at the moment I was addressing myself to the fact that the Court, in its opinion, covered only those cases where the defendant in making the statement was in the custody of the police. In fact, in all four of the cases which the Court passed upon, the defendants were confined in jail at the time.

The Court in the Miranda cases passed only on situations where the statements were taken from the defendents after they had been arrested and were in the custody of the police. In fact in all four cases they were confined in jail at the time. Throughout the opinion of the Chief Justice it is clear that the rules laid down apply only to in-custody interrogation. The holding of the Court does not apply to statements made by defendants who are not in the custody of the police at the time. Take the case of a defendant, not under arrest, who is interviewed in his home where other members of his family are present, or where someone is questioned on the street. In such cases it would be open to lower courts to determine on the facts of each case whether the statements made at such a time should be received.

If these considerations are valid, there is no reason why the Congress should not feel free to state a policy and lay down appropriate rules regarding the admission in evidence of statements in Federal cases where the statements are made voluntarily by defendants before they are in custoday.

The American Law Institute, in collaboration with the American Bar Association Special Committee on Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice, on March 1, 1966, published tentative proposals for a prearraignment code. The code sets forth the circumstances under which the police could question and take statements at various times and places. It sets forth the warnings that the police would be required to give from time to time so as to insure the voluntariness of the statements, the availability of advice of counsel when requested prior to arraignment and the sanctions which would follow from failure to comply with the code. As a result of the Miranda decisions, the proposed code is being subjected to further study. Meanwhile there has been considerable speculation as to the effect of the Miranda warnings on the willingess of suspects to waive their rights and to talk without asking that counsel be present. Obviously, the manner of warning suspects may vary considerably from place to place.

Senator McCLELLAN. May I interrupt to get your opinion, Judge? What would be the interpretation of the words "in custody"? If an officer accosts somebody and starts questioning him about a crime, are they in custody? What would the Court hold on that?

Judge LUMBARD. That would depend upon all the surrounding circumstances, the other people who were present, how the officer happened to do this. You can't pass upon a matter of this sort, I think by making a general statement. The Court would have to examine all the facts in the particular case before that.

Senator McCLELLAN. You don't know how to write a statute to define "in custody"? A policeman or an arresting officer might go to the scene of the crime and see someone he feels sure should be interrogated and stop him for questioning.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes. Senator, I think you will find, I know that you know that the American Law Institute and the American Bar Association committee made proposals with respect to these matters and they suggested a prearraignment code which was published on March 1 of last year, and we did make an attempt in those proposals to define the areas, and to state the circumstances under which warnings were necessary, and all circumstances where we thought they were not necessary, and I suggest that this study might be a starting point.

Senator McCLELLAN. It would be helpful if we could find out how we could legislate and clarify it so that it would not create another area of confusion and litigation. I can well concede that if a citizen is stopped by an officer, or gives attention to the officer with deference to his authority and undertakes to answer questions that the officer may ask, that is custodial interrogation.

Now, he may say, "Get in the car and let's go down to headquarters," and he interrogates him but he hasn't arrested him. But he tries to find out what he knows. Is that custodial interrogation?

Judge LUMBARD. You see you have one situation that the man is perfectly free to come and go, and to speak or not to speak as he chooses and that is one situation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Isn't he free to do that until he is arrested?

Judge LUMBARD. Ordinarily that would be the situation.

Senator McCLELLAN. The officer may take him to headquarters and he says, "Thunder to you, I'm going to walk out." Then the officer has no choice except to arrest him. He doesn't want to let him go.

Judge LUMBARD. You see how complicated the situation is. Many people walk into a police station, and you have a problem there.

Senator McCLELLAN. You talk about writing a statute. I don't see how it can be done very well without again creating an area of confusion and doubt that would be subject to lengthy litigation before it could ever be resolved. It is a problem.

Judge LUMBARD. We agree with you that the difficulties are great, but we think that this matter is so important that the Congress and the State legislatures ought to do the best they can to lay down the rules under which statements may be taken, and to provide how the rights of the individuals should be protected.

Senator McCLELLAN. I wasn't challenging your viewpoint, but trying to emphasize the difference.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

We must await court rulings when admissions and confessions are offered in evidence. These rulings will turn upon whether the defendant has been suitably warned and whether he has understandingly waived his rights. I am now talking about cases where the man is in custody and where the police seek to use the statement or admission on the claim that they have given the required warnings, and that the man has nevertheless indicated his willingness to talk.

Of course, in many of those cases the defense will claim that the warnings were not properly given, that the defendant did not knowingly waive his rights and, consequently, that the statement should not be received. Therefore, I suggest that it would be helpful to enact provisions, similar to those proposed in S. 675 regarding wiretapping, and require notice in advance of trial that a statement or confession will be used and also require that the defendants must make any motion to suppress prior to trial.

If the trial court should rule with the defendant and suppress the statement, the Government should have the right to take an immediate appeal where suppression of the statement places further prosecution in jeopardly.

At present, the Government has no right to appeal any ruling which suppresses a confession or statement. If the Government is not given the right, an adverse ruling by the district court would put an end to the case. There are bound to be many such rulings in the next few months.

It is important that the law in this field should be developed by appeals and decisions of the courts of appeals, and that this may be done in suitable cases where the district courts have suppressed statements as well as in cases where the court has ruled with the Government and the defendant has been convicted. If the Government is allowed to appeal from suppression orders, we shall know more from the appellate courts and we shall know it sooner.

As I have pointed out in connection with S. 675, the President's Commission has recently recommended that appeals by the Government from orders of suppression should be permitted.

For these reasons I suggest that S. 674 be modified to apply to noncustodial cases and that the Government be given the right to appeal from orders of suppression.

Senate Joint Resolution 22: This is a proposed joint resolution introduced by Senator Ervin for himself and 15 other Senators which is designed to accomplish the same purpose as S. 674, but it would do this by amending the Constitution. The resolution goes further in that the Federal courts would be prohibited from disturbing any State court ruling that an admission or confession has been voluntarily made if it is supported by competent evidence.

If the Congress finds that the application of the Supreme Court decision in the Miranda cases is seriously interfering with the obtaining of voluntary statement by Federal and State law enforcement officers, the only way to correct the situation would be by amendment of the Constitution.

If the Congress so finds, then for the reasons set forth in the separate statement of seven members of the President's Commission, Messrs. Jaworski, Malone, Powell and Storey, joined in by Messrs. Byrne, Cahill and Lynch, appended to the Report of the President's Commission—page 303—I think the public interest in effective law enforcement would require a return to the rule that the admission of the statement or the confession of an accused should depend only on whether it was voluntary.

Whatever our views may be on Miranda, we must apply the Constitution and the law as the Supreme Court has interpreted them, subject, of course, to action of the Congress in areas which are not governed by constitutional rulings.

In my opinion, it is most important that the Congress should take some action in the important areas I have discussed. The legislative process permits a wide variety of views to be screened and testimony can be taken from those who know the facts and those who bear the responsibility for law enforcement.

The legislative process is far better calculated to set standards and rules by statute than is the process of announcing principles through court decisions in particular cases where the facts are limited. The legislative process is better adapted to seeing the situation in all its aspects and establishing a system and rules which can govern a multitude of different cases.

Judges seldom have before them all those who are the best informed regarding practical problems and the difficulties in living with any proposed change in the law. Judges usually are advised only by the parties in the case; the parties want to win the case and do not always care about general principles of wider application.

As I said before, it is because the Congress and the legislatures of the States have taken so little action in the field of criminal justice that the courts have more and more chosen to lay down rules which have the force of law until changed, and which all too frequently come to us in the form of new constitutional principles which then can be modified only by constitutional amendment.

Senator McClellan. Thank you very much. This is a very illuminating statement. I am very grateful to you for your interest, your courtesy, and your cooperation with this committee. I will try to limit my questioning.

I have listened with great interest to your comment on S. 674, a confessions bill. I think we all agree, most of us at least, that the impact of the Miranda and other decisions that are similar, are having a most adverse effect and will have a most adverse effect on law enforcement. It makes it more and more difficult for the law-enforcement officials to detect crime and conduct the investigative work that is necessary and fruitful in the detection of crime, and in solving or determining who committed crimes.

In this area, there is one sure way to remedy the problem and that is a constitutional amendment as you have pointed out. It is certainly at best a cumbersome process, very nearly impossible of achievement as far as the machinery of government is concerned. In addition to being cumbersome, it takes quite some time to get a constitutional amendment through. In the meantime, pending that, you have the present law, as enunciated by the Supreme Court, which would prevail.

Another remedy is embodied in a bill that has been introduced by a member of the subcommittee, Senator Ervin. Did you introduce it yesterday, Senator?

Senator ERVIN. Yes, I did.

Senator MCCLELLAN. He introduced it yesterday. He announced that he would introduce it and some of us have cosponsored it. The bill would limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, restrict its appellate jurisdiction in some of these areas.

That is a harsh remedy. I would regard it as the harshest remedy of all. We have, we think, the constitutional authority to do this, but I don't know what the Court would hold when it got there. They could hold we didn't have such authority. I think the Constitution expressly confers the authority upon Congress to do this, but I regard that as a harsh remedy. I would hate for us to have to apply it.

I have introduced this bill, S. 674, realizing that it does present a constitutional question. But with the statute as an expression of the Congress, and the facts that will be developed in relation to this problem in the course of these and other hearings it would be my hope that upon reconsideration a majority of the Court would find it in good conscience, advisable and the better course of wisdom, to return to what has been the law of the land for all these years.

Now, if that cannot be achieved by the bill that I have introduced and by modifications or amendments that the Congress may hammer out, then I believe the situation is so critical that we have no alternative except to pursue the constitutional amendment course, or in the meantime enact a statute that would restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in this area. I would regret doing that, but if we can't get other relief, if law enforcement must be afflicted with the burden which the Supreme Court has imposed upon it by these decisions, then I shall certainly support the means of last resort—to try to restore effective law enforcement in the country.

I want to thank you for your views on this. They have been very, very illuminating.

If I may, I would like to make another comment or two about "in custody." That disturbs me, what meaning the courts would give to "in custody." If an officer stops someone and says "Wait a minute, I want to talk to you," is he in custody? If he says "Come, go with me down to headquarters, I want to ask you some questions," is that custodial interrogation? I don't know. I don't know what the Court would hold. Is he not in custody until arrested? Is he not an accused until he is arrested?

The Court has implied that he becomes an accused, so far as the privileges of the Constitution are concerned, the minute he becomes a principal suspect, and as I pointed out, this gets into another area of doubt and confusion.

We have a real problem on this issue, and we want to build a record here that can give the most enlightenment possible from both sides. I don't want to preclude anyone who has something to offer for our consideration. Then we will try to find a way either with the vehicle here, the bill I have introduced, by processing it with proper amendments, or finally, if we can't do it that way we will have to go one of the other routes to achieve the objective that I feel is most imperative.

Now, may I ask you one or two questions about the wiretap bill? I think I asked you a few questions as you went along. As I understand it, you would broaden the bill so as not to exclude any crime from its provisions and application. Would you limit that to felonies only, or would you say to any crime?

Judge LUMBARD. Well, I see no reason to limit it, Mr. Chairman. I would permit its use with respect to the investigation of any Federal crime. I suggest as an alternative, as an alternative which in my view would be a compromise, that you might fix the limit with respect to crimes where the maximum penalty was 5 years imprisonment or more.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Some crimes, possibly in organized crime, the penalty might not be that great.

Judge LUMBARD. No, it might not. And you can't tell. Organized crime will go into any field where the profits are large and the possibilities are good.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Judge LUMBARD. And I don't think law enforcement ought to be any more limited than organized crime is limited with respect to its possibilities.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have been charged with being an ultraconservative, but kind of a radical in this law-enforcement issue. I find you are more liberal than I have disclosed myself to be, at present at least. I am conservative in wanting to enforce the law in this field.

But, anyway, the experience in New York State—I think it was the largest State in the Union, though I think California now claims to be, populationwise—where there is conceded to be all types of crime, the experience in the enforcement or in the use of this statute, wiretapping, has not demonstrated any serious abuses of it.

Judge LUMBARD. In my opinion, it has not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And it is the consensus of law-enforcement officials that it is and can be one of the most vital tools, one of the most useful tools, in law enforcement.

Judge LUMBARD. The most necessary with respect to organized crime.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Particularly with respect to organized crime.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. The administration's wiretap bill is not before this subcommittee, but as I understand it, it would authorize wiretapping only by order of the President or the Attorney General in cases where the security of the Nation was threatened by the acts of an enemy. I cannot rationalize why, if there is threat of sabotage to some of the Government's property, that that is more sacred and that we could make dispensation for the use of the tool to detect that crime, but yet we would deny it to the same officers to enforce laws against kidnaping and against murder, just using those as an illustration. It seems to me that if the Justice Department can rationalize wiretapping in an instance like that, I don't see how we can say it should be denied where the life of a citizen is involved, where the life of a child who has been kidnaped is involved. I just use those two as an illustration.

Then I go further. I don't see how it could be denied in use against organized crime, because if organized crime prevails in this country, that will destroy our internal security, and internal security is just as vital to the survival of our Nation and of our freedom, in my judgment, as is our ability to defend against an external enemy. So as I rationalize it, I think it is imperative that law enforcement be given this tool under proper regulation. As to the immunity statute, I would think there could hardly be any argument against it. It certainly should be held constitutional I think, in the light of statutes we already have, which have been so approved by the Supreme Court.

I again wish to thank you.

Do my colleagues have any questions? Senator Ervin.

Senator ERVIN. Yes. Judge, as one lawyer to another, I would like to simplify some of these matters that are involved here. Under the interpretations placed upon the sixth amendment prior to the Escobedo case, a man's right to counsel was assumed to arise only after there was a formal criminal charge filed against him either through a formal warrant or an indictment or other precipitate method of charge. Is that not true?

Judge LUMBARD. Usually upon his arraignment.

Senator ERVIN. The sixth amendment on this point reads as follows:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right * * * to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense.

That is the constitutional provision.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not think that the prior interpretation was correct, that this right arose only when a criminal prosecution was begun?

Judge LUMBARD. I do, and then the failure to have counsel, or the denial of counsel, simply becomes one of the circumstances which the court would pass upon in determining whether or not a statement taken in the absence of counsel was voluntary or was not voluntary.

Senator ERVIN. In the Escobedo case, which I would say by way of parenthesis was a hard case and made quicksand of this constitutional provision, the Escobedo case, by a 5-to-4 opinion, held that the right of counsel, to have counsel under the sixth amendment, applied prior to a criminal prosecution, and arose whenever an arresting officer began suspecting in his mind that the person he had in custody may have committed the offense he was investigating. Isn't that substantially the holding?

Judge LUMBARD. Well, I like to think of these cases in terms of the facts of the case, Senator. In the Escobedo case, he was in police custody, and was being questioned, and he asked for his lawyer, and his lawyer was at the station house, and the police denied the lawyer the right to see the client, and after that, the statement was taken.

Senator ERVIN. Yes.

Judge LUMBARD. So that you have an in-custody situation where counsel was asked for and was denied.

Senator ERVIN. And in that case, the man had counsel.

Judge LUMBARD. In that case he actually had counsel.

Senator ERVIN. And he was asking for the assistance of counsel.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And so it was not necessary in my judgment for the Court to reach the conclusion it did, for the Court to go beyond the words of the Constitution and say that the right to counsel arose in all cases whenever the arresting officer began to suspect in his mind that the person he had in custody was guilty. But that was the rule that was laid down in general terms in that case.

Judge LUMBARD. Well, I don't think it went quite that far, but it certainly indicated the lines along which the Supreme Court was then thinking, and it presaged the rulings which followed later in the Miranda case.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not think that the issue of whether or not the law should be changed to give the right of counsel prior to the beginning of prosecutions should be a legislative matter rather than a judicial matter?

Judge LUMBARD. It is a legislative matter and, of course, the Congress has provided that this is done now upon arraignment in the Federal courts, as you know. When a defendant is arraigned before a U.S. Commissioner, he must be advised of his right to counsel, and counsel must be furnished if he does not have his own.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, such safeguards as ought to exist should be matters for the Congress rather than for the courts, except the courts take all the circumstances into consideration and determine whether a confession is voluntary or involuntary.

Judge LUMBARD. I agree with that, Senator, yes.

Senator ERVIN. Now prior to the Miranda case, was it not virtually the uniform holding of all Federal courts and all State courts that whether an admission or confession of guilt would be admitted in a criminal case was dependent upon whether or not the admission or confession was voluntary or involuntary in character?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes, it was.

Senator ERVIN. The Miranda case departed from that, did it not, by saying that, at a minimum, before a confession, even though voluntarily made, may be admitted in evidence, the person in custody must be apprised by the arresting officer that he doesn't have to say anything, that anything he should say may be used against him, that he has a right to counsel, and that, if he is unable to procure counsel, counsel will be procured for him before he is required to say anything, or rather before he can be interrogated?

Judge LUMBARD. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. Now, under the existing law, where you prosecuted a man and sought a conviction in a criminal case, you had to show two things in any case, whether there was a confession or not. First, you had to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that a crime had been committed, and second, you had to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was the person who perpetrated the crime.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. So under the law as it existed before the Miranda case no man could be convicted of any crime merely upon his own confession that he committed the crime. In other words, before he could be convicted, it would have to be shown by evidence outside of his voluntary confession, beyond a reasonable doubt, that a crime had been committed.

Judge LUMBARD. I can't remember any case in recent times, Senator, where a man has been convicted in this country solely on his own confession.

Senator ERVIN. And, then, in addition to that, you had to show either by other evidence or by the confession that the defendant accused in a particular case was the man that committed the crime.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And you had to show these things beyond a reasonable doubt—that is, to a moral certainty.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Is it not true that, prior to the Miranda case, it was held in virtually all courts, both State and Federal, that the self-incriminating clause in the fifth amendment had nothing whatever to do with voluntary confessions?

Judge LUMBARD. Well, there had been some language in a few lower court decisions, but I should say at least 80 percent or 90 percent of the lower court decisions, both State and Federal, were as you stated them.

Senator ERVIN. You could say that that principle was established just about as firmly as any legal principle.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Now here I would like to invite your attention to the fifth amendment provision against self-incrimination—I am leaving out immaterial words:

"No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

Now, wasn't it held in these prior cases that the first element that called into play the self-incrimination clause was that there must be compulsion in the testimony?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And a voluntary confession is a confession which is made free from compulsion, is it not?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. So for that reason, taking the language of the self-incrimination clause, it would seem to have no application whatever to a voluntary confession; is that not true?

Judge LUMBARD. I think I would agree with that. That is my own personal view.

Senator ERVIN. And was it not also required that recognizing and interpreting the self-incrimination clause, that a person had to be a witness under circumstances where he was called on either by a statute or by rule of the court to give testimony?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes, it was applied only in some judicial proceeding, some form of judicial proceeding.

Senator ERVIN. And so under the language of the fifth amendment, it would seem that the plain English words there have a clear meaning and that they could have no application to a voluntary statement made by a person in the custody of an officer, because he is not a witness in any legal sense.

Judge LUMBARD. This is exactly the arguments the States made in the Miranda cases.

Senator ERVIN. And also he would have to be in a judicial proceeding, a criminal case, or a proceeding which could give rise to a criminal prosecution against him if he incriminated himself.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. In summary, don't you agree with me that just from the standpoint of assigning to the English language the true meaning of these words, that it is quite an intellectual feat to say that the self-incrimination clause could have any application to a voluntary confession?

Judge LUMBARD. I agree with your point of view, Senator, and I said so in some opinions which I wrote for our court prior to the Miranda cases.

Senator ERVIN. Now, normally in the trial of a case, the judge who passes initially on the question whether a confession is voluntarily or is involuntarily made is the trial judge, is he not?

Judge LUMBARD. The trial judge in the first instance, and then of course the jury also passes on it, where there is a jury.

Senator ERVIN. Prior to the Miranda case, wasn't it the prevailing practice where an accused on trial objected to the introduction of an admission or confession of guilt on the ground that it was involuntarily obtained, for the trial judge to exclude the jury in the first instance, and hear the testimony offered by the prosecution and the testimony of the accused as to all of the circumstances which preceded and accompanied the making of the admission or confession?

Judge LUMBARD. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. And the trial judge would give the accused an opportunity, if the accused saw fit to avail himself of it, to give his testimony concerning the circumstances under which the admission or confession was made without requiring him to testify as to the merits of the charge at all.

Judge LUMBARD. That is right. This was the practice in the Federal courts and in most of the States.

Senator ERVIN. And then if the trial judge ruled that the confession was voluntary, and therefore admitted it for the consideration of the jury, he would normally in his charge instruct the jury that the law did not permit the conviction of the man upon an involuntary confession, and that the jury in the second instance, in passing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, should determine to their own satisfaction whether or not the admission of the confession was voluntarily or involuntarily made. And he would instruct them that if they found it was involuntarily made, then they should reject it and not consider it in any aspect in passing upon the issue of guilt or innocence.

Judge LUMBARD. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not think that this procedure afforded full protection to the accused, as long as the admission of justice is in the hands of human beings?

Judge LUMBARD. I think it did, and of course in addition to that, these questions could be passed upon and were passed upon by the appellate courts if there were a conviction.

Senator ERVIN. On that aspect of it, you have had great experience in the trial court and in the appellate court. The judge who sits in the trial court and passes initially on this question has an opportunity to observe the conduct and the demeanor of the witnesses upon the stand, does he not?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And the judge who sits on the appellate court where the ruling is reviewed has to depend upon his interpretation of the printed or mimeographed record.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And do you not agree, on the basis of your experience in the administration of justice, that ordinarily it is not too difficult for the trial judge who sees the witnesses and observes their conduct and demeanor to determine what the truth is with respect to whether the confession is voluntary or involuntary?

Judge LOMBARD. Well, our whole system of justice is founded upon exactly that, plus the face that a jury of 12 persons must be unanimous. That is the Federal rule, and in most of the States it must be unanimous in making a finding.

Senator ERVIN. And does not the trial judge, in your opinion, and the jury, have a superior opportunity, or rather superior facilities to pass upon this question because of the fact they do see and observe the conduct and demeanor of the witness?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes. I have also sat as a trial judge, and I agree entirely with that, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. I have sat in both capacities, and I have never had very much difficulty as a trial judge in determining this question. I had great difficulty sometimes as an appellate judge, because an appellate judge has to depend on the record, and with just the cold record, it is very difficult sometimes to tell whether you are analyzing the testimony of an Ananias or a George Washington.

Judge LUMBARD. In the last few years we have even an additional safeguard and that is that counsel is assigned and under the Federal system is paid something in every case. Defendants are much better represented now than they were a few years ago.

Senator ERVIN. When you get to the question of just what you might call logic or commonsense, you can think of any stronger evidence that a man committed an offense than his own testimony, than his voluntary confession that he did so?

Judge LUMBARD. Not only is there no better evidence but I think the jury usually expects to know what the man said. If he said anything.

Senator ERVIN. Yes. That is an interesting point. Having done a lot of trial work, and I might say always on the side of the accused, I have always wondered about some of our theoretical brethren who insist that there ought to be a right to comment on the failure of a defendant to testify. My experience is that about the first question the jurors ask when they go out to deliberate on the verdict is "If this fellow wasn't guilty, why didn't he get up there and so state?

Judge LUMBARD. You really don't need to comment on it. It is self-evident.

Senator ERVIN. Now I think most people who are concerned with this subject, who are concerned with the administration of justice, and people who are apprised of the effects of these decisions, particularly in the Miranda case, are very much disturbed about them. I must confess that I am. I have devoted all my life and my major interest to the administration of justice and have helped to legislate on it, and I have been very much concerned about these decisions. I think enough has been done for those who murder and rape and rob, and it is time for Congress to do something for those who don't wish to be murdered, raped or robbed. I don't invite any comments on that. That is just my personal conviction.

I have given serious consideration to this subject, and as you stated awhile ago, I have proposed a constitutional amendment, cosponsored by some 18 other Senators, which would in effect set aside the Escobedo and Miranda cases and restore the rule about voluntary confessions as it prevailed prior to that time.

I recognize, as the chairman said, that we have a long and rocky road to get the Constitution amended, notwithstanding the great public feeling that has been aroused by the injury done to the administration of justice by these decisions, because it requires a two-thirds vote of each House of the Congress and three-fourths of the States. And I have been concerned about the same objection that you had with some of the other bills. Congress passed a bill applicable to the District of Columbia at the last session undertaking to alleviate the effects of the Mallory, Escobedo, and the Miranda cases, and the President vetoed the bill, largely upon the conviction on his part I think that it was unconstitutional under those cases.

And so I, yesterday, took the course of action that I have always been reluctant to take. I have never favored curtailing the jurisdiction of the Court. But I have reached the conclusion that if the Court of highest authority will not exercise judicial self-restraint, then the Congress is going to have to impose some restraints upon it. So I introduced a bill with two sections, the first applicable to the Federal courts which provides in effect that neither the Supreme Court nor any other court established by Congress under article III shall reverse or modify or otherwise disturb the ruling of a trial judge admitting a confession as voluntarily made if that ruling is supported by competent evidence. The second section applies to State courts, and provides that neither the Supreme Court nor any other Federal court established under article III of the Constitution shall review or in any manner disturb any ruling of a State trial judge admitting a confession that is voluntarily made, if his ruling has been sustained by the highest appellate court of the State having jurisdiction of the case.

Now each of these sections would give the accused 2 days in court. Under section 1 he would have a day in court before the trial judge. Then he would have a day in court in the appellate court on the question of whether there was competent evidence to sustain the findings of the trial judge. And section 2 would give the man 2 days in the State court, one in the trial court and one in the highest appellate court of the State having jurisdiction. Since the prosecution only has 1 day in court in any event, I think that certainly furnishes some protection, some substantial protection of the rights of the individual.

I hated to take this course, but I felt it was the only practical course available. If we passed a law to overcome these decisions, since they are based on constitutional grounds, the courts would say our law is unconstitutional.

I would be glad to have any comments you might make on that bill. I introduced it with reluctance, but I introduced it as the only practical and immediate way of granting some protection to society in this matter.

Judge LUMBARD. I would hope that the situation could be solved by other means, Senator. It would occur to me that this might be an unfortunate precedent for the Congress to curtail the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. We need to have an ultimate arbiter in this Federal system of ours, and naturally that is the Supreme Court. I would hope that the situation could be relieved and could be worked out by other means.

Senator ERVIN. I must confess that I share to a large extent your views on that. I have always been opposed to curtailing the jurisdiction of the courts, and I think that the times that this has been done in the history of the country—I am thinking of the McCardle case—have been most unfortunate incidents.

I would like to ask you a few questions as to what you think of the constitutionality of this approach, however regrettable you may consider it from a practical standpoint. Article 3 of the Constitution provides:

> The judicial Power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Is there any question in your mind as to the power of Congress under that clause to define the jurisdiction of the so-called "inferior courts" which it establishes under the laws?

Judge LUMBARD. I think there is no question as to your power with respect to inferior courts. I think there might be a serious question if you attempted to go beyond that. I haven't given that enough thought, but I think it is obvious that there is a serious question of constitutionality.

Senator ERVIN. Section 2 of article 3 also says this in part, after defining the cases in law and equity to which the judicial power of the United States extends:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Would those words not seem to confer jurisdiction upon Congress to define the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

Judge LUMBARD. Yes, it would, and of course, you may remember that at one time there wasn't any right to appeal a criminal case at all beyond the trial court.

Senator ERVIN. That is true. That is a recent innovation.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Apparently, in the development of our law, there have been a great many instances in which Congress has curtailed the jurisdiction of a Federal court, for example, among other things, in these trade agreement acts that we have been passing. And there are a number of other instances. I realize this is an interesting subject. The decisions are mostly by way of dicta, with the exception of a few cases like the McCardle case. There can be a very plausible case made for the proposition that Congress does have vast powers when it comes to defining the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes, it certainly does have considerable power, as you have indicated from reading the Constitution. I think this is a question of public policy which, of course, can better be determined by the Congress than by the judges themselves.

Senator ERVIN. We have had in the past three approaches to this problem that is now I think one of the most serious problems affecting the ability of society to protect itself. One is by constitutional amendment, one by the bill which undertakes to restore the former law without affecting the jurisdiction of the courts, and the one that is this more drastic measure that I have offered.

I sincerely trust that the committee and the Congress will work out some solution to the problem. I have no reason to be prejudiced. As I say, I have spent my life as far as criminal practice is concerned representing defendants, and I never held an office of public prosecuter of any kind. But it does seem to me that these decisions tilt the scales too much in favor of the accused and against society, and tend to ignore the very fundamental truth that the victims of crime are entitled to some justice too.

I have enjoyed seeing you again, Judge, and I want to commend you for the fine job which you did as a U.S. attorney, also on the district court, and the fine job you are doing on the court of appeals.

Judge LUMBARD. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I just want to make this further observation. The difficulty that confronts us here and the gravity of the problem are clear to all of us. It would be my hope that we could avoid the long process of a constitutional amendment, and that we would find it unnecessary to attempt the harsh action of limiting the court's jurisdiction. It would be my further hope that we could make such a record here of recorded counsel and opinion of learned jurists and legal minds that the Congress could enact a bill comparable to that which I have introduced, with such a strong majority that it would invite and induce the Court to reconsider its opinion in the Miranda case, and thus find the bill to be constitutional.

Some may say that is a forlorn hope. But there is an old adage that wise men change their minds, and I do believe that some of those five men, one or more of them, are wise, and that upon due reflection and consideration, they will find it not only constitutional but in the interests of justice and the protection of society in this country, in effect to restore the law regarding confessions to what it has been throughout the history of our Nation.

Thank you, Senator Scott.

Senator SCOTT. Nice to see you again, Judge Lumbard.

In your opinion, Judge, should S. 675, which now applies only to wiretapping, be extended to eavesdropping by means of electronic surveillance?

Judge LUMBARD. I think that would be very helpful, Senator. But let me point out that I think when it comes to eavesdropping, that would in almost every case be a matter of State law, because it is done locally, and it ordinarily would not affect a telephone or any interstate means of communication.

However, what 675 could do with respect to eavesdropping would be to say that what is evidence secured by eavesdropping could not be admitted in a Federal court, unless it had been done in accordance with certain procedures set up by the States and which procedures would meet certain standards; for example, the very standards which are set out in S. 675.

I do think it would be helpful to cover the subject of eavesdropping, because that now is being questioned in the courts, and if the Congress should find, upon a record, that this was an important means of getting evidence, that it was important that law enforcement should have this weapon, as I believe it is, it would be very helpful indeed if Congress made that finding and included it in this bill.

Senator SCOTT. One other question, Judge. I would like to ask you to comment on this section of the Miranda case, where in the opinion the court indicates potential alternatives, and even rather generously goes on to use the word "encourage" Congress to do something about this situation. I would like your comment on that paragraph, and I will read it so as to have it in the record at this time, because it has not been read. This is a quote from page 28 of my copy:

> It is impossible for us to foresee the potential alternatives for protecting the privilege which might be devised by Congress or the States in the exercise of their creative rulemaking capacities. Therefore, we cannot say that the Constitution necessarily requires adherence to any particular solution, for the inherent compulsions of the interrogation process as it is presently conducted.

Now I come to what I think is the gravamen here:

> Our decision in no way creates a Constitutional strait jacket which will handicap sound efforts at reform, nor is it intended to have this effect. We encourage Congress and the States to continue their laudable search for increasingly effective ways of protecting the rights of the individual while promoting efficient enforcement of our laws.

I interpolate here, of course warning. Quoting again:

> However, unless we are shown other procedures which are at least as effective in apprising accused persons of their right of silence, and in assuring a continuous opportunity to exercise it, the following safeguards must be observed.

My question is whether you feel that that opens the door for legislation which would permit our avoiding the constitutional amendment process if we can?

Judge LUMBARD. No; I don't think it permits you to do that, but there certainly is a wide area which obviously the Court has not covered in its opinion in the Miranda cases, not only the matter of questioning before a person is in custody, but then the manner in which the defendant or suspect is handled while he is in custody, the way in which the warning is given, the record that is made, the presence of other people so that when the question later comes up as to whether the warning was properly given and whether the waiver of right was knowingly and understandably made, these are obviously the next questions that are going to be raised in contested cases.

I think that this whole area is open to the Congress, and it seems to me it would be most helpful and most important that Congress should attempt to deal with these areas, and lay down the rules and the standards so far as Federal cases are concerned.

Senator SCOTT. Then you think it is possible that the Congress might, by legislation, establish standards other than those specifically established in the four major standards in the Miranda case, if those standards—and here we are on dangerous grounds, I guess—served adequately and fully to protect the individual with regard to his constitutional rights.

Judge LUMBARD. I think this is worth exploring. I cannot myself and haven't yet been able to come up with any concrete suggestions, but certainly it is not impossible that from the testimony that you take and the exploration you make of this subject, that some other method of handling part of the process cannot be worked out which would meet the test laid down by the Supreme Court with respect to protecting the defendant who is in custody when he is questioned.

Senator SCOTT. Thank you, Judge. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator ERVIN. I have to confess from my experience I believe neither the Congress nor the Supreme Court nor anybody else could ever be smart enough to devise any rules more calculated to prevent anybody from ever confessing their guilt than those that are laid down in the Miranda decision.

Judge LUMBARD. Well, that is what many of the law enforcement people say, and I am sure you are going to have before you the people who really know the facts about this; namely, the district attorneys, the State attorneys general, and the police chiefs in our larger cities.

Senator ERVIN. Judge, I would like to make one request of you. I worked awfully hard on a constitutional amendment. I don't know how many times I wrote it and rewrote it before I introduced it and then after I introduced it originally I made some changes in it. I would appreciate it if you would look very carefully at its phraseology and if you think there ought to be some changes made in it, I would certainly welcome them.

Judge LUMBARD. I would be very glad to study them, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. One or two other questions. If they base the Miranda decision strictly on constitutional issues, I don't understand how you could write a statute that did not do everything the Court has said must be done. And if you do that, you destroy everything that you seek to attain anyhow.

Judge LUMBARD. Unless you can find some suitable substitute for the requirements laid down by the Supreme Court as suggested by Senator Scott.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They wouldn't accept it as suitable unless it accomplished the destruction that their decision does. They say it is based on the Constitution. I don't know how you can do it. They say you have got to do these things. Well, how can you do less if the Constitution requires that this be done?

Judge LUMBARD. One of the alternatives which has been suggested and discussed, Mr. Chairman, as you probably know, is whether or not some of the questioning might be conducted before some magistrate or quasi-judicial officer, and the circumstances under which that might be done to comply with the Supreme Court ruling in Miranda.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If that were true, it seems to me that this would furnish the greatest loophole for a confirmed criminal that it would be possible to give him; that is, the minute the officer took him in custody and said "Let's go to a magistrate" he would say "Yes, I did it. What about it." That would be the end of it.

Judge LUMBARD. All the more reason to give law enforcement agencies the means of getting evidence through wiretapping, through the granting of immunity.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes, sir. I think we are going to have to give them every tool consistent with our Constitution in order to protect society. I think we are going to have to do it. This society of ours can't survive. It is headed for absolute chaos if the present trend of the crime rate continues.

By 1985 you would have 15 million major crimes committed in this country, assuming now, as they say, only half of them or less than half of them are reported. If you multiply that, that would be the number reported if the present rate continues, and no society can withstand an attack like that on its structure, in my judgment, no free society. We are reaching a perilous situation, if we don't arrest this trend in some way.

One other question. The American Law Institute proposes a code seeking to balance the rights of the accused with society's rights. Could not Congress formulate a similar code?

I understand they were working on some kind of a code at the time the Miranda decision came out, and then they just abandoned any further effort, is that right?

Judge LUMBARD. It was published on March 1 of last year, just 3 months before the Supreme Court decisions. It is now being studied further in the light of the Miranda case, to see whether changes should be made in order to bring it in compliance with that decision, and that work is now going forward.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am glad to know that it is. I hope in the course of these hearings that we will be given the benefit of their conclusions, if they reach conclusions in time for us to get their views.

Judge, thank you very much. You have been most helpful. We deeply appreciate it.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to make one other observation. I don't invite any comment on it, but I am going to state my interpretation of the Miranda case and the case handed down in the next week, Johnson v. New Jersey. The five members of the Supreme Court who handed down the decision in the Miranda case made a voluntary confession in the Johnson case that they had amended the Constitution in handing down the Miranda case, because they ruled in the Johnson case that the Miranda case had no application in cases tried prior to the Miranda case, notwithstanding the fact that the constitutional provision they professed to be interpreting had been in the Constitution of the United States since 1791.

Judge LUMBARD. Yes. That applied to trials, trials prior to the Miranda case, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Yes. So it is rather queer that the Constitution meant one thing from 1791 until the Miranda case was handed down and something entirely different after the Miranda case.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Senator SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may I make this comment? There is a vacancy on the Supreme Court. You have made a very moving appeal for accession of wisdom to the courts. In regard to the President's power of appointment here, and in such other vacancies as may occur during his current term, I would like to express the prayful hope that such appointments will be consistent with his messages to the Congress on crime and law enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I made that observation or something comparable the other day when the new Attorney General came before us. I expressed the hope that, in view of the announcement that his father would resign from the Supreme Court by reason of his appointment as Attorney General, the President would appoint someone who would carry out the philosophy in these cases that had been expressed by his distinguished father. I don't know whether the President heard what I said or would pay any attention to it if he did.

Senator SCOTT. The President hears everything, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have the expectations and hopes that my views will be recorded.

Thank you kindly. Will District Attorney Arlen Specter come around please. Senator Scott, would you introduce the witness to the committee please, sir.

Senator SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to present and introduce to this committee the Honorable Arlen Specter, district attorney of the city and county of Philadelphia, who was formerly a special assistant attorney general of Pennsylvania, assistant counsel for the Warren Commission on the investigation of the assassination of President Kennedy, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and of Yale Law School, past chairman of the criminal law division of the Philadelphia Bar Association, and currently a member of the advisory committee on criminal procedure of the Pennsylvania Bar Association.

He is well known as one of this country's most competent attorneys in the whole field of criminal law and law enforcement. I have read his statement and I do commend him on the concern that he expresses; and I am sure that his contribution will be an extremely useful one in these hearings. I am, therefore, very glad that Mr. Specter is here.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you.

We welcome you. We appreciate your interest and your cooperation with this committee. We appreciate it very much.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection we will recess until 1:30.

(Whereupon, at 12:10 p.m., the subcommittee recessed until 1:30 p.m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will resume.

Come around, Mr. Specter.

You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF ARLEN SPECTER, DISTRICT ATTORNEY FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. Chairman, Senator McClellan, Senator Scott, I appreciate the invitation to appear before this Senate subcommittee. I would like to say at the outset that it brings to mind the very splendid cooperation which the Philadelphia district attorney's office received from your committee, Senator McClellan, with regard to the prosecution of Local 107 Teamsters in Philadelphia. I have written my thanks to you, but haven't had a chance to appear and thank you in person.

Your committee, the McClellan committee, back in 1957 and 1958 investigated the Philadelphia Teamsters as well as the Teamsters generally; and based upon the evidence which you made available, and we had a personal meeting back in 1961 and 1962, we were able to get convictions on the six officials in Philadelphia, who have all served their time in jail, so that this is a finished matter; but I am reminded of it when I appear before the McClellan committee.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I covered a pretty wide area of the country, went to different places where there was evidence of labor-management problems, racketeering, corruption, violence, and so forth.

I have always thought that the hearings did some good. It didn't get strong legislation as I thought we should have, but I have always thought they did a little good. It reversed a trend that was getting out of hand I thought at that time.

Mr. SPECTER. Not only was the evidence which your committee uncovered instrumental in getting the convictions in Philadelphia, but I think the investigation was extremely helpful in putting the union on a much better basis to this day.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think so. I think a great many reforms were adopted.

Mr. SPECTER. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Changes that had a salutory influence throughout unionism, to be frank about it.

All right, we will be glad to hear you. We welcome you again to our inquiry into this matter relating to crime and criminal laws and procedures that are needed, reforms, and so forth. We are especially pleased to have your cooperation and the benefit of your counsel.

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, if it please the committee, I would like to have the statement made a part of the record, and I could summarize it and go to the essence of what I have to say here, and perhaps save the committee some time by so doing.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The statement will be printed in the record in full at this point.

STATEMENT OF ARLEN SPECTER BEFORE THE SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES

In evaluating the results flowing from the Miranda decisions, two factors should be considered before deciding upon any changes in the fundamental criminal law:

1. What rules are necessary to obtain justice, both from the viewpoint of the safety of the community and the rights of the individual?; and
2. How may modifications in existing rules be made without adversely affecting fundamental institutions such as the Supreme Court of the United States?

The experience of the Philadelphia District Attorney's Office discloses some of the problems resulting from the Miranda decision and may provide a basis for suggestions for future action.

Findings of the Philadelphia District Attorney's Office and the Philadelphia Police Department show that confessions and admissions are significantly decreased by giving defendants warnings before interrogation. While no statistics were compiled prior to October 1965, consultation with police officials and experienced assistant district attorneys provide a basis for reasonable estimates. Prior to the Escobedo decision in 1964, it is estimated that 90 per cent of those arrested gave some type of a statement.

Frequently the statements did not constitute admissions or confessions, but they were very helpful in later investigation. For example, in some situations a suspect would give a statement which placed him in some locale other than the scene of the crime. When subsequent investigation showed that his statement was not true, it was helpful in establishing motivation to fabricate. Thus, even while such statements might be exculpatory on their face, they were later used to incriminate the suspect.

Immediately following Escobedo, as a precautionary matter, the District Attorney's Office advised the Homicide Division of the Police Department to ask each suspect "Do you want a lawyer?" When four of the first five suspects requested a lawyer, that question was omitted and the more limited warnings required by Escobedo were given. It is estimated that the post-Escobedo warnings resulted in refusals to give statements by approximately 20 per cent of those arrested.

Statistics have been compiled by the Detective Division of the Philadelphia Police Department starting in October 1965 shortly after the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit denied a rehearing in the Russo case.[1] In general, the cases covered the most serious offenses, such as homicide, robbery, rape and burglary and some other offenses, such as aggravated assault and battery and larceny.

STATISTICAL FINDINGS

After Russo, the Philadelphia Police Department followed the instructions of the Third Circuit by advising the suspect that he had the right to consult with counsel before making any statement, in addition to the warnings required by Escobedo. From October 17, 1965, through June 11, 1966, out of 4,891 individuals arrested, 1,550 or slightly less than 32 per cent refused to give a statement in the face of Escobedo and Russo warnings.

During the period from June 12 through 18, 1966, which included the date of decision of Miranda, seventy out of 145 arrestees refused to give police a statement. On June 17, 1966, the District Attorney's Office provided the Police Department with guidelines on warnings to be given and questions to be asked in

Feb. 19 to Feb. 25, 1967	143	101

These statistics show that 59% of those arrested refused to give a statement after the Miranda warnings.

CASES ARE LOST

It is not possible to obtain precise statistics on how many of these cases have been or will be lost without incriminating statements, but it is definite that a substantial number of these prosecutions will result in improper acquittals. A review of the 200 criminal cases on the daily list in the Philadelphia courts shows that many of the guilty are being acquitted where confessions or admissions have been suppressed on the authority of Escobedo or Miranda.

The Miranda decision has caused very acute problems in cases where the police investigation was conducted prior to June 13, 1966, the date of the Miranda decision, but the trial started after the date of Miranda. In those situations, the police conformed to the interrogation rules in effect at the time of the investigation. Those rules were changed before the trial so that confessions, admissions or other helpful statements were excluded.

In such situations, people have literally gotten away with murder. On January 9, 1967, the Commonwealth was forced to nol pros the case against Fred O. Aguson which rested to a substantial extent upon a confession given voluntarily by Aguson to Philadelphia police detectives. After the Miranda decision, the confession was suppressed because Aguson had not been warned that counsel would be provided for him in the events that he wished a lawyer and could not afford his own counsel. When the confession was suppressed, the prosecution for murder had to be abandoned.

A similar result followed in the case of Commonwealth v. T. L. Bailey. Bailey and a co-defendant, Robert Rowe, were implicated in a robbery-murder substantially on the basis of confessions. The police investigation and Rowe's trial occurred before the Miranda decision. Rowe was convicted of murder in the first degree and received life imprisonment. The Miranda decision intervened before Bailey's trial resulting in the suppression of Bailey's confession. Today Bailey is walking the streets of Philadelphia. These cases are illustrative of numerous prosecutions which have been abandoned or lost where statements had been suppressed under the Miranda rule.

A number of conclusions follow from our post-Miranda experience: (1) fewer suspects are giving statements; (2) some of the guilty are being acquitted because statements are not obtained by the Police Department under post-Miranda procedures, and (3) many cases are being lost because the Miranda rules apply to matters investigated before Miranda and tried after that decision.

As to the third problem, the Commonwealth ought to be permitted to use evidence which was legal when obtained. Many of those suspects could still be prosecuted, if the rule were changed, because cases have been nol prossed which would permit further prosecution without the bar of double jeopardy.

SOME ALTERNATIVES

As to revising the restrictions imposed by Miranda on law enforcement, three alternatives come to mind:

1. A constitutional amendment;
2. Relitigating the Miranda rules with the appeal taken by the prosecution; or
3. Congressional action on a statute under the Fifth Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

OPPOSITION TO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

I adhere to the views which I expressed last year before the Senate Sub-Committee on Constitutional Amendments on the issue of amending the United States Constitution in order to countermand the Miranda decision. I am opposed to any constitutional amendment which would limit the authority of the Supreme Court to rule on questions of state criminal procedure under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. I do not think that it is practical for the Congress and the state legislatures to consider a constitutional amendment which would change the law as announced by the Supreme Court on specific cases. In my opinion, it would be highly dangerous to alter generally the authority of the Supreme Court to review state criminal proceedings. Should that be done, the danger would be substantial that unpopular reaction would later alter the interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and nothing would be secure including the most basic guaranty of freedoms of speech, religion and press under the First Amendment.

Historically, the Supreme Court of the United States has been a progressive institution reflecting the national moral conscience. The Court has provided the medium of change, in conformance with the realities of modern times, which could not be achieved through the format of new legislation because of numerous procedural and other problems. The Court's decisions have obviously drastically altered the basic concept of federalism so that the division of authority between the federal government and the states is at great variance with that which was intended at the adoption of the Constitution or on the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. But the general benefit enormously outweighs any potential for disadvantages which may restrict state criminal prosecutions. I further adhere to the view, more extensively expressed last year before the Senate Sub-Committee on Constitutional Amendments, that it would be highly desirable for the Supreme Court to conduct extensive hearings and consider much basic evidentiary material before making fundamental modifications in constitutional law.

ANOTHER TEST CASE

As to the second alternative, I have instructed my assistants to be alert to find a proper case to relitigate the Miranda rule. So far, we have not yet found the case which provides an opportunity to create a full record to relitigate the implications of Miranda. When the right case is found, it is my view that the suppression hearing should contain the full range of statistics showing the reduction in statements obtained by the police, the consequences of the Miranda rule including improper acquittals, the general impact on police procedures, and as many other factors relating to the underlying social policy as can be appropriately introduced in a suppression hearing.

CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION

The third alternative would be congressional legislation such as that embodied in the bill designated S674. The thrust of that bill leaves it up to the trial judge to determine if a confession has been voluntarily given based on a number of factors. That bill could be extended to criminal proceedings in state courts where the Miranda rule is equally applicable.

The most important restriction of the Miranda decision is the requirement that a suspect in custodial interrogation must be advised that he has a right to have an attorney appointed for him, if he wishes one and cannot afford counsel, before he is questioned. After that warning, the suspect must affirmatively waive that right.

Once that right is asserted, police interrogation is, for all practical purposes, ended. If an attorney is not provided, the police may not question the suspect further. If an attorney is provided, further interrogation is worthless. In Miranda, the Supreme Court expressly recognized the propriety of defense counsel to advise the suspect not to talk:

"An attorney may advise his client not to talk to the police until he has had an opportunity to investigate the case, or he may wish to be present with his client during any police questioning. In doing so an attorney is merely exercising the good professional judgment he has been taught. This is not cause for considering the attorney a menace to law enforcement. He is merely carrying out what he is sworn to do under his oath—to protect to the extent of his ability the rights of his client. In fulfilling this responsibility, the attorneys plays a vital role in the administration of criminal justice under our Constitution." [2]

Justice Harlan, in dissent, reached the same conclusion:

". . . the lawyer in fulfilling his professional responsibilities of necessity may become an obstacle to truthfinding." [3]

Those statements follow the frequently-quoted declarations of Mr. Justice Jackson in Watts v. Indiana:

"To bring in a lawyer means a real peril to the solution of the crime, because, under our adversary system, he deems that his sole duty is to protect his client—guilty or innocent—and that in such a capacity he owes no duty whatever to help society solve its crime problem. Under this conception of criminal procedure, any lawyer worth his salt will tell the suspect in no uncertain terms, to make no statement to police under any circumstances." [4]

Therefore, the crucial question on police interrogation arises where the suspect is given the fourth Miranda warning and asked if he is willing to waive that right. Realistically viewed, it is inconsistent to say, as the Court does in Miranda, that the waiver must be "knowingly" and 'intelligently" made. Any suspect who really understands that right could really not waive it "knowingly" and "intelligently" because to "know" or to act "intelligently" requires that he not give up that right. It is fictional to say that the fourth Miranda right could be knowingly and intelligently waived.

In the long run, it will be hard for the court to stand in the path of constitutional law on that fictional stone. I suggest that the stone will sink and that the court must step one way or the other. The Court must say that a statement may be admitted only if an attorney is present because of the absence of a real intelligent waiver of that right. Or, to take a step to the side, the Court must say that the balance between individual rights and law enforcement does not require that the suspect be afforded that last protection.

From my experience in the District Attorney's Office, I believe a balance of fairness can be established without an affirmative waiver of the fourth Miranda requirement. At a maximum, I would think it sufficient to have the first three Miranda warnings to wit:

(1) You have a right to remain silent.
(2) Anything you say can and will be used against you in court.
(3) You have the right to have the advice of a lawyer.

Beyond those warnings and affirmative waivers, it is my view that it is sufficient to leave it to the discretion of the trial court to see that justice is done in the individual case under the general rule that statements must be voluntarily given.

By appropriate legislation, Congress may well be able to modify the detailed holding of Miranda and still conform to the broad Constitutional mandate on the privilege against self-incrimination announced by that decision, at least insofar as state criminal procedure is concerned. This is an idea which was first suggested to me by my law school classmate, Jon O. Newman, the United States Attorney for Connecticut. Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that:

"The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

The Miranda decision makes the privilege against self-incrimination applicable by state criminal trials through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Congress has acted under the general terms of Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment in order to enforce the provisions of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. That legislative action, and the cases interpreting it, show that Congress has discretion to establish appropriate standards for enforcing the equal protection clause, and for that matter the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Miranda the Supreme Court said that there could be alternative safeguards to guarantee the privilege against self-incrimination. An Act of Congress could provide such alternatives and could reasonably modify some details so long as the procedures guaranteed the ultimate protection of the privilege against self-incrimination.

The ultimate balance must be struck by the Supreme Court as to the extent of the Congressional function as compared to the Court's function. In the current context of the close decision on Miranda and the excellent argument against its outer limits, the possibilities are substantial that the Supreme Court would not hold such federal legislation, under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment, to be unconstitutional even if the fourth requirement of Miranda is modified.

At least there is sufficient basis for this approach to warrant Congressional action to modify what Congress may conceive to be the most restrictive aspects of the Miranda case. The Congress, in hearings such as these, has a much broader opportunity to inquire into all the facts. It is likely that the Supreme Court would accept such legislation based on reasonable standards enacted after thoughtful legislative judgment following hearings which show a factual basis necessitating the modification.

SAFE STREETS AND CRIME CONTROL ACT

The proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" providing for federal assistance to law enforcement and the administration of criminal justice is splendid legislation. Our experience in Philadelphia shows that law enforcement is seriously hampered by the utter lack of any comprehensive plan to coordinate and improve the operation of the various law enforcement agencies and processes.

In response to this need, my Office, early in 1966 together with the Greater Philadelphia Movement and a wide range of other civic agencies, undertook a survey of criminal justice in Philadelphia. At the present time, under the directorship of Professor Paul Bender of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, the survey is in process and has already uncovered many areas in which innovation and assistance are essential. Many of the areas found in Philadelphia to be desperately in need of improvement are the same areas which were spotlighted in the recent report of the President's Crime Commission.

The requirement of the proposed Act that grants not be made to local governments until a master plan has first been evolved is a salutary one. Such a requirement will encourage a much needed fact-finding survey in the urban communities of our nation and will help to insure that federal grants to law enforcement will be for specific, well thought-out projects rather than to hastily conceived schemes for merely obtaining federal funds. Article 3, permitting grants to universities, units of local government and private organizations is also essential as it is only through a mobilization of the entire resources of the community, including long established civic agencies with expertise in particular areas, that imaginative and effective advancements can be made in the field of crime prevention and enforcement.

Mr. SPECTER. The vantage point from which my testimony starts concerns two main considerations: to wit, how to attain justice, both from the point of view of the safety of the community as well as the rights of the individual; and second, how to make modifications in existing rules without adversely affecting fundamental institutions such as the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first comment that I have to make is that the experience of the Philadelphia district attorney's office and the experience of the Philadelphia Police Department show that the new rules limiting police interrogation have resulted in a substantial decrease in the number of statements which we have obtained, and I have a body of statistical evidence to offer the committee on that subject.

Before getting to the statistics, I would like to give you our thoughts on the general situation before these decisions, before we were compiling statistics. Prior to the Escobedo case, it is a joint conclusion of experienced police officers and experienced assistant district attorneys, and myself included, that nine out of 10 men would make a statement before the Escobedo decision came down.

Now, frequently those statements were not incriminating or, that is to say, confessions or admissions; but sometimes an individual would say that he was in a given locale. Investigation later would show that to be false, and that was very helpful on further investigation to show a motivation to fabricate; so that the statements were helpful whether or not they were confessions or admissions, they were later used at trial in many instances to incriminate the suspect. In that broad context, some nine out of 10 it is estimated gave statements before Escobedo.

After Escobedo——

Senator McCLELLAN. They wouldn't necessarily be confessions, but the statement itself, the truthfulness of it or the lack of truthfulness of it, as the case may be, would give you a clue and some guidance as to further procedures.

Mr. SPECTER. Extremely helpful, even what the Court has designated an exculpatory statement, that is not incriminating on its face, later becomes as a matter of ultimate import incriminating, as the Court itself concluded, by excluding them from evidence if the Miranda rules are not followed so they have placed so-called exculpatory and incriminating statements on the same level.

At any rate, Escobedo came down and we all know the rules imposed by Escobedo and the estimate is that 80 percent, the figure dropped from 90 to 80 percent would give statements. Then we had a decision in Pennsylvania in the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit—actually, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware—which held that Escobedo had an extension, and that extension was that the defendant had to be advised that he had a right to a lawyer. Of course, Miranda ultimately went substantially further than did what we call the Russo case from the third circuit in Philadelphia.

But in October 1965, my office started to compile statistics based upon the Russo warning. We don't have to tell you about our estimates. We can tell you about facts that we have gathered.

Senator McCLELLAN. What area do the statistics cover? Let's get that clear for the record.

Mr. SPECTER. Right. These statistics covered the most serious offenses such as homicide, robbery, rape, burglary, and some other offenses, such as aggravated assault and battery and larceny. These were compiled by the detective division of the Philadelphia Police Department under the guidance and instruction of the district attorney's office, and the detective comes into the case if it is on the serious level, if interrogation is required, say, in addition to what may be a surface case, à la numbers or liquor violations.

Senator McCLELLAN. What area, geographically, does it cover?

Mr. SPECTER. The city and county of Philadelphia. Philadelphia, Senator McClellan, is all under the jurisdiction of my office, one district attorney, unlike New York City which has five boroughs and five district attorneys. We have one public prosecutor for the entire city.

Now, from October 17 through June 11, 1966, these statistics were maintained; that is, October 17, 1965, through June 11, 1966. Out of 4,891 individuals arrested, 1,550, or less than 32 percent, refused to give a statement; so, follow the trend: 10 percent before Escobedo, 20 percent after Escobedo, and then after the Russo case, up to 32 percent.

When the Miranda decision came down on June 13, 1966, my office immediately put out guidelines for the police, issued some 4 days later, on June 17, 1966, so that we could be protected as of that date forward to be sure to comply with the Supreme Court's rulings. I think these statistics are highly significant, and I have included them in my statement at pages 3 and 4 on a week-by-week basis.

Suffice it to say at this point that out of a total arrest number in the same category of 5,220, 3,095 refused to give a statement after the warnings, which was a percentage of some 59 percent of those arrested refused to give a statement after the Miranda warnings.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you say that percentage is destined to increase, to rise higher as they become more familiar with the decision and its impact?

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, I think it will be constant. The figures have been constant so far. They started off in the 58-percent range, and the same warnings are now being given. We meticulously complied with the mandate of the Supreme Court, so I would suspect that they would hold pretty much the same.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, close to 60 percent now are declining, whereas before these decisions, 10 percent only declined, so that is a gain of 50 percent. Half of your chance, then, to get a statement from the accused has been completely wiped out by these decisions.

Mr. SPECTER. That is the statistical findings we have made in these serious cases. Now, one of the most serious impacts of Miranda, and when I appear before this committee, as I appeared before the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, I feel it to really be beyond my function to be critical. I am here to give you facts and what we have found.

I appreciate and understand that the Supreme Court makes the decisions, and I am an officer sworn to uphold the Constitution, and I just carry out the law that the Supreme Court has stated.

In this context, we have had a very serious problem with cases investigated before Miranda but not tried until after Miranda. Miranda is not retroactive in its import to a substantial extent in that the Johnson case said the Miranda rule applied only to cases where the trial started on or after June 13, 1966. But still, we have a substantial backlog in the city of Philadelphia, where cases for months before the Miranda decision were not tried, and I think that some attention should be focused on the problem of having a decision, even though not retroactive as to trial started before its date, applied where investigations were legally conducted when they were put into operation, but by the intervening decision are defective as to trials which have to start at some time after those investigations were begun.

On these cases, we have decided as a matter of our policy to nolle prosequi the cases; that is, not to try them and let an acquittal be entered which would bar future prosecution on the ground of double jeopardy, but to this effect withdraw the prosecution, which then leaves us an alternative. If we get new evidence in the future or if the Miranda rules should be changed, the statute of limitations, of course, does not apply to murder in Pennsylvania, and that is a very big area of concern, and we can go back and move to take off the nolle prosequi. I don't want to dwell on it unduly, but that is a big problem for us.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, you don't want to run the risk of double jeopardy, so to avoid that, you simply withdraw the charge against them as of now, in the hope that you may develop sufficient evidence to try them later.

Mr. SPECTER. Exactly. We know that it is a losing case without the confession, that we cannot get to the jury, and we gain nothing by submitting what little we have and having an acquittal result, which puts in the bar of double jeopardy.

I have summarized two cases for you under the category of decisions which we have lost, and I could give you many, many other where this problem has come to pass.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They are in your statement?

Mr. SPECTER. Yes, they are in the statement and I won't dwell on them. They are illustrative only. One case is a curious one which you might be interested to hear just a word about, because there were two defendants involved, and the confession was the instrumental evidence as to each. One was tried before Miranda, convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to life imprisonment. The second could not be tried before Miranda, and he is walking the streets of Philadelphia today, which is a curious application of the rule in the same killing.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It is quite a curious thing, as Senator Ervin pointed out here this morning, that the Supreme Court announced certain constitutional rights that apply to people tried following the Miranda decision, but don't apply to those tried before. I don't understand that kind of judicial rationalization.

Mr. SPECTER. But I worry about advancing that argument because that may lead the Court to apply it retroactively completely and that would be more adverse.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would be worse, but again I come to how we arrive at these things, and what an awkward situation it actually puts the court in.

Mr. SPECTER. Yes. Well. the dissenters in Sylvester Johnson said the Miranda rule didn't apply to the Miranda case because the Miranda case had its trial commence before the date of the Miranda decision, which is accurate on the basis of the Johnson case.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are you going to give us some illustrations of serious cases where you have been forced to dismiss?

Mr. SPECTER. Yes, I have two murder cases in my statement.

I could have given you many, many more. We have them in substantial numbers in Philadelphia.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you have statistics as to the number of cases up to now you have had to dismiss because of these decisions, whereas otherwise you would have had confessions that would likely have brought about a guilty verdict?

Mr. SPECTER. We do not have statistics yet. We are hopeful of being able to supply some such statistics.

Senator McCLELLAN. If you get them, will you supply them to us at any time?

Mr. SPECTER. Yes. Without those statistics, the best that I can say, and this is categorically true, that some of the guilty are being acquitted, because statements could not be introduced into prior cases, and from the statistics on the reduction in the number of statements, I think it follows as a totally logical inference that we are now not getting statements which would have been helpful, had not the statements trickled off under the Miranda warnings, which we are giving.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you whether you believe that the dismissal of cases and acquittal on the basis of these decisions could possibly have any impact on the increase of crime in this country? The situation applies throughout the country, I suppose. Could it possibly have any impact on the increase of crime?

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, I think that there is too much which we don't know or at least I don't know to draw any conclusion on causal connection.

I am pleased to say that in Philadelphia in 1966, we had a decrease of 6.4 percent in major crime at a time when the national average went up to 10 percent, and exactly what caused the decrease is something which is so involved that I am reluctant to draw any conclusions on that, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. I can think of one thing that may have caused it. Apparently a good district attorney.

Mr. SPECTER. It is very generous for you to say that. Thank you very much.

Senator SCOTT. I think the fact that the district attorney is known to be free of any forms of pressure has a very direct causal connection on not merely law enforcement, but on the willingness with which the criminal mind will take chances in that community, and it is a tribute to Mr. Specter that we have had this decrease, and he is too modest to take credit for part of it, but I think that should be said.

Mr. SPECTER. I very much appreciate those very generous remarks.

Senator McCLELLAN. I didn't think I was taking much chance of error when I made the statement.

In that connection, I believe you testified before the Bayh subcommittee last year that criminals were fully aware of court decisions, sometimes even before the new Court requirements are included in police warnings.

Mr. SPECTER. Yes, that is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. Wouldn't that be pretty well true, especially true I would say, with those who are involved in or associated with some crime organization or syndicate?

Mr. SPECTER. Well, if you move to that level of sophistication, I would say it is true. Where you have the crimes of robbery, which are nonsophisticated crime, or the emotional offense of homicide or the offense of rape, it is pretty hard to make any accurate generalization on what factors motivate the people. I think that is one of the most fascinating subjects of criminal law, but I just don't want to overstate the case on it because I am not sure.

Senator McCLELLAN. I have in mind where they are associated with a syndicate.

Mr. SPECTER. Oh, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. The confirmed, habitual criminals working with an organization of a kind, they know it almost by the time the prosecuting and district attorney know it, don't they?

Mr. SPECTER. Oh, absolutely, absolutely.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am persuaded that they always take all the advantage of it they can, any loophole or any decision that gives them any advantage, they pretty soon get well educated to it and make application of it for their protection.

Mr. SPECTER. Absolutely, there is no question about that at all. On the point that you mentioned, I didn't touch the statistics between my Russo and Miranda statistics, but during the week itself, and I did present this to the Senate subcommittee last summer, from the period from June 12 through June 18—mind you, the decision came down on the 13th and my guidelines came down on the 17th—there were 145 people arrested on these serious offenses, and 70 refused to give a statement before the Miranda warnings were out. So that even before the police department issues these warnings from our guidelines, the word had reached those who were arrested. They knew something was up, and the trend had already started even before the specific warnings were given.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let's take what I would term a habitual criminal, one who has been arrested a number of times, convicted a time or two and served a sentence or two. Do you feel that there is any need to give them a warning that they don't have to say anything or that they are entitled to a lawyer?

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, when you reach that category of person, I would impose very different standards than the Supreme Court has under Miranda. I think we are dealing in a different area there in terms of knowing intelligently and understandingly applying the rights they have. I am aware of the fact that Miranda, by very forceful language, forecloses any inquiry as to knowledge of the law, and on its face would foreclose any inquiry, even if, well, I won't take district attorneys or Senators, but if a judge were involved, subject to questioning, that the warnings have to be given to a judge because it says no inquiry into his knowledge of the law.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is why to me the requirements are simply too rigid. Certainly there are those who would need that warning, but I think what we are trying to do at least with the bill I have introduced is to restore the procedures and guidelines to what they were and what they have been for all these years.

When a confirmed criminal comes up for trial, he has been convicted before, he has been through the mill. Suppose by inadvertence the policeman happened to ask him something before issuing warnings and he just volunteered, "I did it". You are precluded from prosecuting him on the basis of that statement. And yet, you didn't have to tell him of his rights. He knew he didn't have to speak. He knew he was entitled to an attorney.

I think they have given such criminals a loophole now they can use to their advantage. If a policeman asks them anything, they can say "Well, I was interrogated but I wasn't warned." If a policeman walks up on the street to apprehend someone whom he thinks may have committed a crime, and stops him, and asks him any questions before he says to him "I am going to ask you some questions, and remember, you don't have to answer, you can be silent, but if you do talk it may be used against you and you are entitled to a lawyer, and if you are not able to get one, we have to get one for you," he has to go through all of that before he can even question a man he thought was fleeing from the scene of a crime. It looks to me like it has gone entirely too far.

Mr. SPECTER. There may be some areas, Senator McClellan, where questions can still be asked before the warnings.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You say there may be.

Mr. SPECTER. May be.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We don't know that, do we?

Mr. SPECTER. Well, we do know that there is an area before custody attaches, that is a substantial restraint of a man's liberty, which is footnoted on a reference back to Escobedo to pick up the accusatory versus the investigatory stage.

I think, for example, that it may be very important when a police officer comes to the scene, before anybody has been identified, and if he sees an offense that has been committed, if he says to a man standing there "Did you shoot this man?", that is probably out. And the guy says "Yes, I did." If he says on the other hand, "What happened here?" and the man says "I shot that fellow," we may be in better shape. It is a hard line to draw.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is the trouble. We have got to say maybe. We don't know what the court will do with the trend of these decisions. Who would have thought a few years ago that we would find ourselves boxed in as we are now by reason of the Supreme Court decisions. Who would have thought this would occur. Can you foresee any time in your experience prior to this that you would have anticipated this would happen?

Mr. SPECTER. My experience does not make me so wise, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. SPECTER. I have three alternatives which I have discussed in this paper, and I will summarize briefly, coming to the third one with some emphasis, in terms of dealing with the problems posed by Miranda.

One is a constitutional amendment which I frankly oppose, and I have expressed those views last year before the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Reform, and I have repeated them in my statement here. The essence is that I do not think it is practical, on a case-by-case basis, to reverse decisions, and I am very reluctant as an individual, to see a constitutional amendment take place where it may lead into the first amendment freedoms ultimately of speech and press and religion, and that is the main reason why I think that as an institution over the course of the life of our country, that the Supreme Court has been a good one, and we ought to stop short of constitutional amendment.

My second choice is a test case, this time with the vigor and the initiative coming from the prosecutors, and I am looking for a test case which would enable me to put into a record the statistics which I have presented here, the restrictive influences on police practices, so that we might really try to relitigate this issue with some broader factors to be before the Supreme Court.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, as I suggested this morning, you would like to persuade some of them that they have made an error and that they should change their minds.

Mr. SPECTER. Yes, and I think that is possible.

Senator McCLELLAN. I can see that.

Mr. SPECTER. We know for sure that if the shoe were on the other foot, and it were five to four against the defendant, that we would have had dozens of appeals already taken to try to have the question relitigated, so why not from the prosecutor's point of view.

One of the things I said before the Senate subcommittee last summer, which I have not repeated here, is that I think a fundamental problem that the Supreme Court has is its failure to consider a broad enough panorama of factors which it really can't do very well in the procedures it has so far. But they just don't know the effect of this decision.

When they have before the Court four limited cases like Miranda and Westover, and the other cases they have, they just can't know the impact.

That could be relitigated in another test case, but even the boundaries of the test case are narrow, and that brings me to the third alternative.

Senator SCOTT. May I make a comment here, Mr. Specter, with the chairman's permission. As a citizen, it is my duty to respect the law of the land. As a Senator and legislator, it is my duty to uphold the Court whenever I conscientiously can; where I cannot, I seek to explore possible alternatives within the orderly framework of our governmental system. I think one thing that shakes public and congressional confidence in the Court is the Court's seeming determination to make broad constitutional findings which establish entirely new directions for the law on these narrow 5-to-4 decisions. One thing I think, as lawyers, that we worry about is the Court never seems to be impressed by the need for some disciplines or some restraint on itself as a court until it can find a true test case, that it can do more than to make its decision depend upon the narrow shading of a single man's opinion, knowing as the Court has to know, that the very next appointee of the Court may, in the next test case, reverse the whole procedure under that particular constitutional decision.

I say this for the purpose of getting it into the record as a part of the legislative history of what we are discussing. Because if the Court will not exert any interdisciplines, then it is a role of the legislative branch, I think, to express its concern as to that very unfortunate aspect of the Court's attitude toward vast and fundamental changes in constitutional viewpoints.

Mr. SPECTER. I think, Senator Scott, on your point, it brings me right into what I am coming to, that committees like this one, subcommittees like this one, have an opportunity for exploring facets of human experience, and to gaze at the impact of these judicial decisions in a way which the Court does not have available to it. The Court does not have available to it, the factors which you can inquire into through your legislative factfinding hearings. I think that legislation such as S. 674 may have a very useful place when it is based upon facts which you find in such proceedings to show the reasonable standards which you may come to in the terms of S. 674, or some other legislation of a similar nature.

S. 674 on its face applies only to Federal proceedings, and of course, the bill could affect State proceedings as well, or it could be left to State courts, but I want to call the attention of this committee to a very interesting idea which was called to my attention by Jon Newman, who is a law school classmate of mine, and is now the U.S. Attorney for Connecticut.

We were discussing this whole problem last December, and Mr. Newman called my attention to section 5 of the 14th amendment, and I don't know whether this particular point has been picked up before or not.

Mr. Newman is publishing an article in a national magazine which is coming out this weekend, where he develops the point somewhat differently. But section 5 of the 14th amendment provides that "the Congress shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article," and I have cited it at page 11 of my statement.

The Miranda decision and most of the other Supreme Court decisions which apply to the States are made applicable through the due process clause of the 14th amendment, which is of course an earlier section of the same article, to wit, the 14th amendment, so that there is a constitutional invitation for the Congress to speak on matters of enforcing the requirements of the 14th amendment, and the Supreme Court said that the privilege against self-incrimination and the right to counsel, the two rock beds of Escobedo and Miranda, come to be applied by the States by virtue of the due process clause of the 14th amendment.

Now then, we also have the language from the Supreme Court opinion, which says there is no constitutional straitjacket from the Miranda rule. There is a real question as to whether you can cut back on the requirements of Miranda, whether you have to increase them or can cut back on those requirements, and I would suggest that there is a reasonable likelihood that on this narrow 5-to-4 decision, with strong arguments militating against the furthest reaches of Miranda, that if Congress speaks on this subject, based on an extensive record of factfinding, and with reasonable conclusions, that the Supreme Court would be likely to uphold that kind of standard to enforce the due process clause on the States as Congress has the right to through the fifth section of the 14th amendment.

Then the question comes up, what do we do? Where do we look? Where are the really crucial areas of Miranda where we might reassess the balance, to still provide the basic right against self-incrimination and still leave some better balance between law enforcement and the rights of the individual under the Constitution.

I call to this committee's attention the fourth Miranda warning which our experience has shown us to be the most difficult of all.

The three Miranda warnings are, first, you have the right to remain silent; second, anything you say can and will be used against you; and, third, you have the right to counsel; and, fourth, if you do not have a lawyer, and if you wish a lawyer, and if you can't afford a lawyer, the State will provide a lawyer to you before questioning goes further.

Now, once that warning is given, and the person refuses to affirmatively waive it, in a way which the State can carry its heavy burden of proof under Miranda, interrogations for all practical purposes is stopped, because if the man says, "I will not waive that right," we can't question him any more, unless we provide a lawyer, and if a lawyer is provided, we know as a practical matter that no further questioning will be useful.

The lack of utility of further questioning has been recognized by the Supreme Court in Miranda, and I have cited the language from Chief Justice Warren at page 9 of my written statement, and Justice Harlan's dissenting view to the same effect, and the language of Justice Jackson back in Watts v. Indiana in 1949, where all recognize that the lawyer's function is not to help law enforcement, the lawyer for the defense. His job is to protect his client's rights, and he is not going to help out.

So that this particular warning, I think, is the really crucial one which upsets the balance. I think there is a legal fiction in the Supreme Court's opinion, as of course, many, many cases are arguably fiction, where they say that a right cannot be waived knowingly, intelligently and understandingly; rather, that in order to have a waiver of a constitutional right, it must be made knowingly, intelligently, and understandingly, and it is my view that you can't really waive that right knowingly or intelligently, or understandingly, because there is so much to be said for not waiving it.

If any man really knows what he is doing, he is not going to waive that right, because to assert that right is to beat the case, in effect, and most men want to beat the case, in the vernacular. So I may say in my statement, in the long run it would be hard for the Court to stand in the path of constitutional law on that fictional stone. I suggest that the stone will sink, and the Court must step one way or the other.

The Court must say that a statement may be admitted only if an attorney is present, because of the absence of a really intelligent waiver of that right, or the Court must take a step to the side and say that the balance between individual rights and law enforcement does not require that the suspect be afforded that very last protection.

Now if Congress is to legislate in this area, I would urge Congress to focus in on that particular problem, which we have found in our experience to be the most acute problem, really, to see whether or not it has to be there, to give meaning to the privilege against self-incrimination.

Now, I think that you might cut back even further as your proposed legislation does, S. 674, in terms of making it discretionary for the trial judge to make an evalution after considering all of the facts, and as I understand it, that is the rule in England, and I do not think that we can sit here and say that the trial judges of the United States will be derelict in their duty to enforce the Constitution.

So that if they are given a standard to consider the four Miranda warnings, and the requirements set forth in S. 674, that they will conscientiously apply the law to make an intelligent judgment, and I think the trial judge has to balance to some extent what are the Commonwealth's rights. What status does the State have in the case.

If the State has other evidence, you might say, well, as a matter of balance, even if it doesn't go too far, we will exclude it. Put this case on a more even par. But if all the State has is a confession, the State is going to be out of court, then it is a function of the judge in the administration of criminal justice to see that justice is done, and that requires the exercise of discretion every step of the way, and I think that is an area which is worth exploring.

Once this committee for this Congress has a record to support this kind of a change, then I think that when that record is presented to the Congress and Congress acts on it, when the test case comes to the Supreme Court as to whether the Congress can do that with a really factual record supporting the underlying social policy behind your legislative judgment, the chances are good that the judgment will be upheld, because the Court does wrestle with the questions of social policy.

We all know, as Chief Justice Hughes said years ago, the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is, and if you have the factual basis to show them that as a matter of social policy this is what it ought to be, I think the chances are realistic that the Court would agree in this difficult area.

Senator SCOTT. The Court says in the Miranda case, in effect, paraphrasing that being bound by what words say is not the standard, because words have lost their reality.

Now, if that is to be the standard of future decisions, then the Congress can never know the effect of the words it legislates, because at any time it wants to, the Supreme Court can say, "Well, that is what the words say, but they have lost their reality. The only true reality is the inward truth which lies in five out of nine of us."

This is a very disturbing thought to me, and I agree with you when you say that it is fictional to say that the fourth Miranda right could be knowingly and intelligently waived. Here the Court has set up a new standard not supported by law, not supported by anybody with precedent, but very tortuously worked out, in order to staple in what it is justly concerned about, the prevention of abuses.

Mr. SPECTER. Senator Scott, I think on that subject that the current task, to pick up what Senator McClellan asked about before, is that confessions are going to be "out" one day altogether, unless a statement is made or a confession is made in open court, or perhaps before a magistrate with a court stenographer present, the trend is to eliminate confessions completely, and I think Mr. Justice White comes to that view, and the trend, if we are to exercise judgment and wisdom on where the trend is going, the trend is to eliminate them completely, and I think they are going to move from the curbstone to put them out altogether, and that may emphasize the necessity of this kind of a hearing to see where we are to make a judgment as to where social policy lies, because none of these cases have been the end of this kind of litigation, and the path stretches to excluding confessions completely.

Senator McCLELLAN. Based on your experience, what would you say would be the consequences of completely outlawing all confessions?

Mr. SPECTER. I think we will lose a lot more cases. We will lose a lot more cases.

Senator McCLELLAN. When you lose cases, if a man is guilty who suffers?

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, we all suffer. There is no question about that.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is the point I am making. That is the point I am trying to emphasize, which it seems that the Court sometimes forgets. It is society, all of us, who have something at stake in these decisions.

Mr. SPECTER. Senator McClellan, what the Court is always doing on those scales, they are saying that as a matter of national policy it is more important to elevate the rights of the suspect in custody, and they are going to elevate those rights and the societal rights come down.

Now that may lead us to a situation where we ought to really take a hard took at what goes on in terms of the opportunity a suspect has for reasonable protection of his rights, without all these warnings. That hasn't been done. I think that may be an area that the committee will want to look into, because the opinion of the Court in Miranda takes a few textbooks on interrogation practices and uses the Mutt and Jeff example, and some other practices which are not desirable, really. They are undesirable.

The question is what really goes on in the police stations around the United States. So that I think they need more information.

If they had more assurances that you didn't have to go so far as the four Miranda rights to give the suspect his due, I think it would be a lot easier for us to make a case on the other side.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is your hope, then, if we make such a record here, that they will take cognizance of it?

Mr. SPECTER. I think they will. I think they could not really quote two or three text books on interrogation if a congressional committee has investigated the field and has found contrary facts about police practices in according defendants' fair rights not to be overborne or intimidated, and I think in Philadelphia, the fact is that defendants were not overborne or intimidated prior to the Miranda case.

I cannot speak with equal assurance about every other part of the United States, because I don't know, but that is something this committee can find out.

Senator SCOTT. I think the Court has been a little naive in taking the position on this reality of words, almost reaching an assumption that before Miranda, all interrogations were bad. After Miranda, all interrogations are acceptable, provided they meet a standard which the Court accepts. Now, this flies in the face of human experience and of logic.

To give you one illustration of it, the Court, suspicious of police interrogation, citing some very horrible examples, and always recognizing that there have been horrible instances, seems completely unaware of the fact that in dealing with the reality of words, that a police interrogator sufficiently embued with a desire to get away from Miranda could rattle off these four warnings so rapidly that an unsophisticated defendant would never know the questions asked, and quickly, in his desire to satisfy the police, would say yes.

There you would have sworn testimony from the police that he was asked every one of these questions, that in every case he gave the due and proper answer, that the requirements of Miranda have been met. With such an unsophisticated defendant, if he does gain a lawyer later, he may not even tell his lawyer, may not even know enough to tell his lawyer that they rattled this off very rapidly to him, "And I said yes to a lot of stuff, counsel, that I don't know what I said."

But that is not a very good defense. It seems to me that the Court, by relying on the rule of a reality of words, the temporary transient reality of such words as "five to four" deem a more or less magic formula, will have to as you say some day step aside from that difficult standard that they have established, especially in the fourth Miranda guideline. But, will you go ahead.

Mr. SPECTER. Yes, Senator Scott. The other comment that I want to make relates to the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act, and I think that that act is a piece of splendid legislation. I think that our experience in Philadelphia shows that we do need comprehensive plans to coordinate and improve the operation of the various law enforcement agencies.

My office, in conjunction with a leading civic agency, the Greater Philadelphia Movement, is now undertaking a survey of criminal justice under the direction of Prof. Paul Bender of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, and our preliminary findings to this extent, to this time, already show that Philadelphia has essentially the same areas of problems as recently spotlighted in the report of the President's Crime Commission, so that I think that the availability of Federal funds to help on such projects as we are starting to undertake in Philadelphia is a very valuable cause, and we are heartily in favor of that proposal.

Senator SCOTT. The program generally contemplates very large Federal aid programs ultimately, as I understand it. In your judgment, are there presently the necessary programs and resources in Philadelphia to carry on this program without Federal aid?

Mr. SPECTER. No, Senator Scott.

Senator SCOTT. It couldn't be done.

Mr. SPECTER. There are not those resources available, by comparison, say, to the work of the National Crime Commission, which has been a very fine project, a very expensive project, to find that kind of experience, staff, consultants; or the District of Columbia Crime Commission, which published an excellent report, spent funds which are substantially in excess of what can be appropriated to do the job in Philadelphia, and I think it is an excellent idea to have those funds available, because it will stimulate our own city council, it will stimulate private citizens' group to put up the money, knowing that they will get help on the project, and it is a splendid piece of legislation.

Senator McCLELLAN. I spoke awhile ago about some of the manuals that the Supreme Court quoted from in the Miranda case. Are you familiar with those manuals?

Mr. SPECTER. Generally.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are they in use as a guide to police in your jurisdiction?

Mr. SPECTER. I think that they are present. I recall seeing one in the district attorney's office, one of the assistants who had one, and we used to read it, and it was an impressive book. But I can never recall carrying out any of those slick tricks that they put there, you know, things about putting the other fellow at a disadvantage in the light of the sun or a Mutt and Jeff approach.

I think those are really fine theoretical devices. Their practical application, I have great question about, even if people set out to do those things.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you know whether they are in practice, being practiced, in your jurisdiction?

Mr. SPECTER. I think they are not being practiced in Philadelphia as a general rule. I think there are some individual cases of excessiveness. I think we do have those on an individual basis.

I think you can't eliminate a problem completely anywhere, but I think the general prevailing standards for police interrogation are standards of fairness. They ask a man if he wishes to make a statement, and they do not subject him to relay interrogation.

They do not keep him away from a comfortable situation. They do not keep food from him. They don't keep him for a protracted period of time. We don't have the problems that Brown v. Mississippi raised on the question of beatings.

I think that we have come to the extent where prior to Miranda, prior to Escobedo, an effort was made by a police officer to find out if the man had something to say or would make an admission, but I think it was within the bounds of what is proper, that there was no overbearing.

I think the practices in Philadelphia have been realistic and fair. We have had many test cases on whether confessions were coerced, and I have participated in those myself in prior years, and the defendant would take the stand and say that he had given a coerced confession, and the question would be, "Were you struck," and the man would say, "No."

Well, what were you worried about?
I was afraid I was going to be struck.
Were there any threatening gestures made toward you?
No.
Did anybody say he was going to hit you?
No.

So, when you come right down to it, even in the testimony of many of the cases, you are well within the traditional line of Supreme Court decisions on voluntariness.

Senator McCLELLAN. The Court in the Miranda case said that the Congress should continue to search for some way of dealing with this problem. Do you know any better way to do justice between the accused and society than to submit all of the attending circumstances to the trial court to ascertain whether a confession was voluntary, and then in turn, after the judge finds that it is admissible, to submit it to a jury and let them weigh every factor?

Do you know any fairer way to both sides?

Mr. SPECTER. I think that is a sound approach. I think Miranda seeks to go beyond, by mechanical rules. Senator Scott was pointing out the difficulty of applying a mechanical rule.

I think perhaps the Supreme Court would say—I am just speculating now—that if you had a tape recorder or a motion picture, so that every part of the exchange between the suspect and the officer was recorded, so that nobody could doctor it, then you wouldn't have to have specific warnings, or specific waivers, because there the record would be so easy to see in its true context that you could judge whether or not there was overbearing, and what they are really trying to get here is some very rigid mechanical rule which they conceive to be sufficient.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Couldn't that be questioned? Couldn't that be challenged if you didn't show all the film, if you did have a camera on all the time? I don't know any perfect way to do this.

Mr. SPECTER. In human affairs, it is very difficult to get perfection in any line.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am sure there have been instances of policemen or law enforcement officers exceeding the bounds of propriety, maybe even coercing or intimidating by threat or by violence, getting an extorted confession. I am sure that has happened.

I am also quite confident that many excesses have been engaged in by courts, by prosecuting attorneys, by defense counsel. We are human and we are not going to find a perfect answer.

But I do feel that with all of the protections that a defendant has now, all of the rights guaranteed to him that are very much in his favor, far more, I think, than he will find in most other civilized countries, that it would be fair to submit all of the facts to a jury after the trial judge has screened them and satisfied himself as to the voluntariness. After all, jurors are empowered to bring in a verdict that would deprive the defendant of his liberty, if they are competent to do that, I would think they are competent to weigh the issue of whether a confession was extorted or whether any unfair means were used to obtain it.

I know of no fairer way to do it. I still like the old-fashioned way of letting the court and the jury see the defendant and hear him, observe his demeanor, and take into account the whole atmosphere that prevails and everything that occurs.

Senator SCOTT. I think once in custody, it is highly desirable that the suspect be informed that he is entitled to counsel, that he is entitled to have counsel obtained for him if he can't afford it. I think that is a protection, a just protection of the person's rights.

But these particular standards I think are what concern all of us. They are the reasons for these hearings. It seems to me there must be a better way to restore the societal balance that you referred to.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, any other questions? We thank you very much, Mr. Specter. I hope that our labors here will some day bear fruit that will restore this balance that is essential, I think, to preserve law and order in this country and do justice between society and those citizens who are accused of crimes.

Mr. SPECTER. I appreciate the invitation. I think the record is now set straight that I am not a judge, although I appreciate the compliment, as well, which you gave me at the start.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Maybe you should be a judge, and on the Supreme Court at that.

Senator SCOTT. Keep that a part of the official record.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes. I didn't want to strike it. It is not off the record.

The next witness is Mr. Koota. Will you come around, please, sir. For the record, I might say to you something you may already know: that when the Senate is in session, there is interesting debate and important issues are under consideration, and it is difficult to get attendance at a committee meeting in the afternoon.

Mr. KOOTA. I understand, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We set these hearings, we scheduled a limited number of witnesses in the hope that we could get through with them in time, so that most of the members could be here, even when the Senate is not in session.

(Whereupon, there was a short discussion off the record.)

Senator MCCLELLAN. We are very grateful to you for your presence here and for your willingness to cooperate with us and let us have the benefit of your suggestions and recommendations.

I will have inserted in the record at this point a brief statement of your experience, and so forth.

Aaron E. Koota, District Attorney, Brooklyn, N.Y. In the practice of law for almost 40 years; since 1950 continuously in the office of the District Attorney in Kings County. 1950 joined office of District Attorney as temporary assistant to investigate Harry Gross bookmaking activities. In 1955 became a permanent assistant in charge of Rackets Bureau; 1963 appointed chief assistant to the District Attorney. In 1964 was elected as District Attorney to fill unexpired term of predecessor; 1965 re-elected for full 4-year term.

STATEMENT OF AARON E. KOOTA, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF KINGS COUNTY, N.Y.

Mr. KOOTA. Mr. Chairman, I should like, realizing the lateness of the hour, nevertheless, to read my statement, because I intend as I go along to interpolate, and if you will not deem me immodest, perhaps to respond to some of the questions that you put to Judge Lumbard and Mr. Specter.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very good. It will be perfectly all right. You may proceed and I will follow you. I may interrupt for clarification or for emphasis at times.

Mr. KOOTA. Certainly, sir.

First, as to my relation to law enforcement in the State of New York, as this honorable committee probably knows, New York State is divided into 62 counties. Each county elects its district attorney.

The city of New York embraces five counties within its periphery. One of these counties is Kings County, otherwise known as the Borough of Brooklyn, and I am the elected official, elected district attorney of Kings County. Kings County has a population of some 2,650,000 people, and crime is not altogether a stranger to Kings County.

My office numbers approximately 300 in personnel and I have 90 assistants, and I daresay that my office is either the second or third largest law enforcement office; that is, the district attorney's office or prosecutor's office, in this country.

I, myself, have been in the district attorney's office continuously for 17 years last past, and I have occupied various positions. I have been an assistant district attorney. Then I was placed in charge of the rackets bureau. I became chief assistant district attorney and I was elected district attorney in 1964, and reelected in 1965.

I welcome this opportunity to raise my voice in behalf of the victims of crime and in behalf of an inarticulate society, of our majority of lawabiding citizens, whose safety and welfare have been jeopardized by a welter of judicial opinion defining the rights of criminal suspects.

The prime responsibility of government is to assure the peace and to afford safety and security to its citizens. Our armies stand ready and alert to discharge this duty and to repel the invader and the enemy without. But what of the enemy within our borders.

His existence and pernicious impact upon our communities is attested to by the ever-increasing incidence of crime in every category. Of what avail is it to withstand the onslaught of the enemy on our border but to yield to the insidious incursions of criminal elements in our society? The damage in either case is devastating.

As the district attorney of Kings County, having a population of more than 2½ million, it is my sworn duty to prosecute crime of every nature. My concern is not only with attacking the sophisticated type of violations of law, such as racketeering and the infiltration of organized cirminal syndicates into legitimate businesses, but to deal vigorously with the day-to-day lawlessness in our streets.

The causes of crime are many and varied. Substandard housing conditions, slums, the absence of adequate educational and economic opportunity, are contributing factors to crime. While I am deeply concerned with the elimination of these causes, this is essentially a long-range proposition and is within the special area of competence of other organs of government.

My immediate concern is with punishing the racketeer, the murder and rapist, and making our streets safe for the community. No useful purpose is served in providing more parks, when men and women are afraid to frequent them.

The housewife, in mortal terror, will not leave her home at 10 o'clock in the evening to go to the corner store to buy a newspaper, for fear of attack. We build more playgrounds, but the mothers are fearful lest their children come to harm in those areas.

A former deputy commissioner of police of the city of New York, one Richard Doughtery, writing in the Los Angeles Times, Sunday, February 19, made this very pertinent observation. He said:

> We will hear a lot of harsh-sounding talk. We will be told that the answer to the crime problem in our cities lies within our grasp, if we will only get rid of our slums and recruit our cops from Harvard. We will be told that crime has to be attacked at its roots. Meantime these sounds that we hear rising nightly from the streets of our cities, sounds of splintering glass, squealing tires, stifled screams, and ugly thuds will assure us that the burglar, the car thief, and the mugger are still going about their appointed rounds with a minimum of inconvenience.

What we need is to get our system of priorities straightened around. Attacking crime at its roots through slum clearance, education, social justice, and a better life for all, is going to take a long time. Our problem is a clear and present one, to make life in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit, all our cities secure and free from lawlessness.

The facet of street crime has changed in recent years. We are confronted time and again with evidence of unspeakable cruelty and violence. Only the other day in Kings County, two young men robbed an innocent citizen and after having taken his money, needlessly and viciously stabbed and cut their victim.

Yes, it is this enemy within who has received comfort by virtue of judicial hypertechnical decisions which have weighted the scales of justice heavily in favor of the criminal suspect to the deteriment of law-abiding citizens.

In some instances, our courts have usurped the classic function of our legislatures and, in addition, through judicial process, have effected constitutional changes. As an example of the former, I cite the recent Miranda decision of our Supreme Court—Miranda v. Arizona (384 U.S. 436) decided June 13, 1966.

Historically, the function of a court is to determine the issues sub judice on the record of the case before it, but in Miranda the Supreme Court established guidelines for future police action. Confessions, no matter how voluntary, judged by ordinary theretofore traditional standards, are to be inadmissible on the trial of a criminal defendant unless certain warnings are given to him prior to this confession.

The Court not only decided the issue before it, but in effect enacted a law concerning the admissibility of evidence in the future. True, the Supreme Court, within the ambit of its supervisory power over Federal courts and procedures could, I assume, impose the warning concept on Federal officials, but its injunctions in Miranda apply with equal force to State procedures, over which the Supreme Court does not possess supervisory authority.

The curious conclusion of Miranda flows from an incorporation of the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination into the fourteenth amendment due process clause, which under Malloy v. Hogan (378 U.S. 1, 84 Sup. Ct. 1489) and Murphy v. Waterfront Commission (378 U.S. 52, 12 Law Ed. 2d 678) became strictures upon the States. Thus, where it has established guidelines for future police action, the Supreme Court, I submit, has usurped the legislative functions.

But what of amendment to the Constitution by judicial fiat? Again, a notable example is the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination. In 1908, Twining v. New Jersey—211 U.S. 78, 29 Sup. Ct. 14—held that this Federal guarantee was not applicable to the States. As recently as 1961, in Cohen v. Hurley, 366 U.S. 117, 81 Sup. Ct. 954, this principle was reaffirmed. These interpretive decisions, by implication, constituted an addendum to the privilege clause of the fifth amendment.

However, more than 50 years later, the Supreme Court repudiated this doctrine in Malloy v. Hogan, supra, and held the fifth amendment to enjoin contrary State action.

In effect then, by divided court, the Supreme Court has amended our Constitution.

I would suggest at this point that it is hardly necessary for me to say that as a citizen of this country, as a lawyer and a prosecuting official, I intend to obey the strictures and injunctions of the Supreme Court. That goes without saying. I am bound by the law, as are all of us. But that doesn't deprive me, I think, of my duty and responsibility to the citizens of our community to speak out against what I term as an injustice to the people, by virtue of decisions of our courts.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Has is occurred to you, if I may interrupt, that those who today disagree with the President, and the Commander-in-Chief, as to the conduct of the war, assert the right to dissent?

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I wonder if some of them will accord to us the right to dissent and make our position known with respect to some things that are happening in this country from within.

Mr. KOOTA. I am very dubious about that, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I wonder.

Mr. KOOTA. I wonder.

It is a truism that criminal investigation from its inception through a trial is a search for the truth—did the defendant or did he not commit the crime alleged. Disraeli said that justice is truth in action. But the primary objective in law enforcement today perforce the decisions of our courts, is not the ascertainment of the truth as to whether the defendant was the perpetrator, but rather as to police methods in obtaining evidence.

The exclusionary rules enunciated by the Supreme Court have subordinated the cardinal principle of the search for truth to an examination of police procedures. The enemies of the people are not the police, but the criminals. When the criminal escapes the just consequences of his acts in order that a police officer, who unwittingly may have invaded some constitutional right of the malefactor, may be disciplined, it is the society, the law-abiding community, which suffers.

Mr. Justice Cardozo, then Judge of the New York State Court of Appeals, in People v. Defore, 242 N.Y. 13, in 1926 reaffirmed the principle of the Adams case established more than 20 years prior thereto, that even though a search and seizure by the police was unlawful, the evidence was nevertheless admissible.

Judge Cardozo said:

> No doubt the protection of the statute would be greater from the point of view of the individual whose privacy had been invaded if the Government were required to ignore what it had learned through the invasion. The question is whether protection for the individual would not be gained at a disproportionate loss of protection for society. On the one side is the social need that crime shall be repressed. On the other, the social need that law shall not be flouted by the insolence of office. There are dangers in any choice. The rule of the Adams case strikes a balance between opposing interests. We must hold it to be the law until those organs of Government by which a change of public policy is normally effected, shall give notice to the courts that the change has come to pass.

The Congress and State legislatures, not the courts, are the organs of Government envisaged by Judge Cardozo.

It is a remarkable phenomenon of our judicial process that one judge of the Supreme Court can alter the course of legal history and chart new avenues in the administration of criminal justice. Witness the 5-to-4 decision in Miranda.

A judge who dons the robe of judicial office does not suddenly become invested with divine omniscience, or lose his characteristics as an individual. He is the ultimate product of his environment. He brings to the court the sum total of his education and experiences in life. The entire Nation may face new eras in law enforcement depending upon the attitude of this one justice.

Perhaps this is the genius of the American judicial process—because it is now unavoidable, it must be accepted.

But, if the Congress has the power under article 3 of the Constitution to control the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, perhaps a statute requiring a vote beyond a bare majority in cases affecting public security might be the sober subject of legislative inquiry.

I would return briefly to Miranda. There the divided Court established an inflexible, inexorable rule that no confession was admissible unless the prescribed admonition had been given to the criminal suspect. Thus, even a confession of a professor of criminal law to a crime would be excluded from the jury's consideration unless the warning had been given, despite the fact that this professor probably knew the legal principle of Miranda infinitely better than his neophyte police interrogator.

Now, what has Miranda accomplished? Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting from the majority, expressed his belief that the Miranda decision would entail harmful consequences for the country at large. The experience in my office vindicates the integrity of his prediction.

In Kings County prior to Miranda, in crimes such as homicide, robbery, rape, and felonious assaults, approximately 10 percent of the suspects refused to make statements.

From June 1966 to the end of September 1966 the percentage of suspects in these categories of crime increased to 41 percent. Specifically, between June of 1966 and September 30, 1966, of 316 suspects interrogated in these categories of crime, 130 refused to make any statement. I estimate that in these instances of refusal, sufficient evidence to arrest and prosecute the criminal suspect, without a confession, existed in 30 cases.

Consequently, 100 individuals, potential murderers and rapists, are walking the streets secure in the knowledge that they cannot be punished for their crimes, and free to continue to jeopardize the safety of law-abiding citizens.

I have been compelled to dismiss many cases where arrests have been made, because the confessions obtained were inadmissible under Miranda.

Senator McClellan. Can you give us any number?

Mr. Koota. Approximately 100. Approximately 100 cases were dismissed, but these are not only in categories of the more serious crimes, but are relatively minor crimes as well.

Senator Ervin. And most are cases where there was really, on the merits, no doubt of the guilt.

Mr. Koota. Yes.

Senator Ervin. And they were cases you had to dismiss notwithstanding the fact that the individual voluntarily confessed he was guilty of that crime.

Mr. Koota. That would depend upon what you mean by the term, "voluntary," Senator. Under old standards, it was voluntary.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, they had to be dismissed regardless of whether the person who confessed that he had committed the crime did so voluntarily or not——

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. You couldn't even go into that question.

Mr. KOOTA. You couldn't go into that question because the prescribed warnings weren't given under Miranada.

Has Miranda really settled the law? Prior to June 1966, the issue of confessions was limited to voluntariness. Had the police through cruel, extorsive, and brutal methods extracted the confession? An issue of fact was raised in each case, to be resolved by the court and jury.

Miranda recognizes that a confession may be admissable in evidence even though no warning is given, if the criminal suspect is not in police custody when his statement is made or if he waives the right to counsel and to remain slient. Miranda then has simply substituted one set of issues of fact for another.

But in this process of substitution, confusion has become increasingly confounded. The Miranda principle is applicable only to custodial interrogation. My office has been bombarded with police requests for opinion as to whether in a given state of facts, the suspect is in custody.

A police officer stops an automobile driven by a 16-year-old boy who acts suspiciously. His explanation as to the ownership of the car is dubious. At what point is this youth in police custody, and at what point must the officer issue a Miranda warning before the youth's confession to operating a stolen car can be introduced in evidence upon a subsequent indictment for larcency?

A woman complains to the police that she was raped by her son-in-law. A detective accompanies her to the home of the son-in-law and inquires of the latter whether he had raped his mother-in-law. He admitted that he had had sexual relations, but with her consent.

Upon a pretrial hearing to determine its validity, the confession was held to be inadmissible because at the time that the statement was made the suspect, the court rules, technically was in police custody and no Miranda warning had been given. Furthermore, whether a criminal suspect waived this right to counsel and the privilege against self-incrimination depends upon varying factors resulting in disputed issues of fact which must be resolved by a court or jury and again becomes the object of piercing judicial scrutiny.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Those are the questions I asked this morning. What is custodial interrogation? When does custody attach?

Mr. KOOTA. It is impossible to define it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It is a question of fact.

Mr. KOOTA. In each case. Whether under the peculiar circumstances of this case, this suspect is in police custody or not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. These are cases that were under Miranda.

Mr. KOOTA. These are actual cases in my office.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Where the son-in-law raped his mother-in-law?

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The officer went with her?

Mr. KOOTA. Went with her.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And the officer asked questions?

Mr. KOOTA. Simply one question: "Your mother-in-law says you raped her. Did you?" And he answered, "I had relations with her, but it was done with her consent."

Now, the court inquired of the police officer, as follows: "Would you have arrested this son-in-law had he not made this admission?"

The officer said, "Yes, on the mother-in-law's complaint."

Therefore, the court ruled, since in the secret recesses of the police officer's mind, he would have arrested this defendant, this son-in-law, therefore, he was in police custody.

Thus, in a sense the Miranda rule has opened new areas of litigation.

Again, in March of 1965, the New York Court of Appeals, establishing the law in that State, held in People v. Gunner, 15 N.Y. 2d 226, that a confession is admissable in evidence despite the failure to warn a suspect of his rights. Miranda was enunciated on June 13, 1966. But between March, 1965, and June, 1966, the police in New York, obedient to the authority of Gunner, received confessions without issuing a prior warning.

In Johnson v. New Jersey, 384 U.S. 719, 16 Law Ed. 2d 882, the Supreme Court held Miranda not to be retroactive but to apply to all cases where the trial commenced after June 13. The New York police, acting in good faith and relying on Gunner sanction, now found their efforts at crime detection and prosecution frustrated, since confessions were rendered sterile unless the particular persecution had proceeded to trial before June 13.

Only a few days ago, I was compelled by Miranda to dismiss an indictment against an individual named Suarez, who had confessed, not only to the police but to an assistant in my office, to the killing of his common law wife and five of her children, ranging in ages from 1 year to five years. The confession antedated Miranda by but a few weeks and was valid under the New York law then prevailing.

The dismissal of this indictment has agitated responsible citizens throughout the country. Only the other day, I received a letter from a resident of Milwaukee, Wis., complaining against what he regarded as a miscarriage of justice. His letter concluded by saying:

> I plead with you, Sir, to help us in this cause by devoting some of your valuable time to a Citizen's plea. Show the American People that the Halls of Justice have not slammed shut their doors in subtle apathy, for the challenge is ever apparent, and complacency has no place in a Democracy.
> I love it here in the USA, and I would especially like to see practiced, another basic right—that my family and my neighbors might walk the streets without fear.

In a radio editorial over station WEJF in Scranton, Pa., February 27, 1967, entitled, "Travesty on Justice," the speaker said:

> People have a right to be indignant when a confessed slayer of six persons is allowed to walk out of a courtroom a free man. It happened in New York, where a series of similar travesties on justice occurred earlier, and New York is not the only locale of such incidence.
> Two confessed murderers are said to be walking the streets of Philadelphia because of a ruling last year by the Supreme Court of the United States. Law-abiding citizens have reason to wonder if their rights are not being tramped upon as a result of the extreme concern of the High Court over the questionable rights of criminals.

Men and women who respect the law are entitled to equal protection, but they are being deprived of that protection, when killers are let loose by misguided officers of justice.

The United States Supreme Court has weighed the scales of justice heavily in favor of the criminal suspect, as Brooklyn Attorney Aaron E. Koota and countless citizens echo his opinion.

Again, the cause of public justice suffered a body blow.

Bearing in mind that one aspect of the philosophy underlying the exclusionary rules established by the Supreme Court was to discipline the police and, putting it bluntly, to teach them a lesson, would not that purpose have been accomplished and the cause of justice spared disservice if Miranda were applied not to trials commencing after June 13, 1966, but to confessions given after that date. Perhaps, legislative action in this area might not be subject to constitutional infirmity.

I should like to advert parenthetically to a statement made by Under Secretary of State Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, Chairman of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, according to the New York Times of last February 20. Mr. Katzenbach characterized as "unutterable nonsense" the assertion that crime is increasing because the courts are not doing their job. I agree with him.

The decisions of the Court in Mapp v. Ohio, Miranda, Escobedo, and others, have not caused an increase in the crime rate. An individual bent on robbery, burglary, or a rape, does not have one eye cocked on Washington and an ear to the latest pronouncements of the Supreme Court. But these decisions have had an impact upon law enforcement in this regard:

The confusion and uncertainty generated by Miranda and cognate decisions has weakened the most effective deterrent to crime, namely, the speedy apprenhension of the criminal followed by equally prompt prosecution and condign punishment. While Miranda is not the cause of crime, it has militated against effective prosecution.

Perhaps, in the unforseeable future, when the deleterious impact of the exclusionary rules announced in such decisions as Miranda and Escobedo upon law enforcement may clearly be demonstrated, the Supreme Court, in light of practical experience, may be inclined to different views.

They manifested that in another area of litigation involving the right of an attorney to plead the fifth amendment in disciplinary proceedings instituted against him, or general investigations by the courts which have supervisory powers over lawyers. In 1961, in the case of Cohen against Hurley, the Supreme Court held that a lawyer may be disciplined and may not in such type of inquiry plead the fifth amendment.

Yet in 1966, in Spivak against Klein just a few weeks ago, the Supreme Court reversed itself and said that a lawyer may not be disbarred because he pleads the fifth amendment. And so, with such auguries, it may be possible that the Supreme Court, in the light of practical experience, may change its position.

Now again, I noticed an air of pessimism and resignation in some of the questions put by members of your distinguished committee to Judge Lumbard and to Mr. Specter. You were concerned with the possibility that Senate 674 might be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Well, that is possible, but let us look at it from the practical aspect.

The Supreme Court does not have declaratory judgment procedures. Now, I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I dare say that 674 will not be enacted into law and signed by the Chief Executive tomorrow morning, and there is no procedure whereby, if it is signed into law, someone may walk over across the street to the Supreme Court and say to the Justices, "Now, gentlemen, here is a law we have just enacted. Is this constitutional, or is it not?"

According to our judicial process, a case must arise on an actual prosecution. It may take a year or two before such a case reaches the Supreme Court. And it may be a year or two before the Supreme Court is called upon to pass on the constitutionality of 674, and perhaps the companion bills to which I will allude in a moment.

During that time the Supreme Court may have before it actual experience of prosecutors and police officials throughout the Nation, and will see what an impact, practically, Miranda may have upon law enforcement, and they may, as I hope they will, see the light of day, so to speak, and change their opinion.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is what I said this morning.

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That we probably could establish a record here that will enlighten the Court to the peril it has created by these decisions.

Mr. KOOTA. And not only by the testimony adduced at these hearings, but before 674, if it is enacted into law, can reach the Supreme Court, it will have before it figures of actual experience of law enforcement officials throughout the country.

What did the Supreme Court rely upon in its Miranda decision? They quoted at length from a pamphlet issued by Professor Inbau of Northwestern University. There he outlined police procedures which in a sense were really shocking. The assumption was that these are followed in every station house in the country, I, in the 17 years I have been in office, have never seen those pamphlets. They have no place, they have never made any appearance at any station house in the city of New York

Senator ERVIN. May I interrupt at that point. Do you have any reason to suspect that any of the police procedures that were cited in the majority opinion in writings like that were in the record that went up to the Supreme Court?

Mr. KOOTA. I don't think so, sir.

Senator ERVIN. It would have been inadmissible, wouldn't it, in the trial court?

Mr. KOOTA. Certainly, it would be inadmissible.

Senator ERVIN. Instead of trying the record as made in the trial court, they try it by a whole lot of writers, by people who were not witnesses in the case, and who weren't subject to cross examination, and who weren't even mentioned in the case when it got to the Supreme Court.

Mr. KOOTA. Yes, sir. The second case that he cited was the case arising in my own jurisdiction. There, two hoodlums were convicted of first degree murder in the course of the robbery of the wholesale tobacconist. They killed two detectives. They were aided in their escape by an individual named Melville.

Melville was apprehended by the police and according to his testimony, he was unmercifully beaten by the police so that he implicated these two defendants, who were arrested, indicted, and convicted. Upon the trial of these two defendants for murder, Melville testified that he was beaten by the police, but that what he was saying at the trial implicating these two defendants—of course, in the trial there was no coercion exercised against him—was the truth.

Our Court of Appeals, in confirming this conviction, said that if what really happened to Melville was the truth, this is a terrible thing, and the law enforcement authorities ought to do something about it.

Now, I did something about it. I began a Grand Jury investigation, and while the confidential nature and secrecy of Grand Jury investigations prevent me from disclosing the evidence, I will say that in that proceeding the Grand Jury voted a no true bill, meaning that there was no basis for any criminal action against anyone.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to ask you about the record in the Miranda case—I mean, the one case from which the decision takes its name.

The record showed, the evidence indicated, that a girl had been kidnapped and raped.

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. The record showed that the police officers went out and arrested the defendant on suspicion, and brought him to the police station. He was kept there about 2½ to 3 hours, and no coercion was predicted on him, and at the end of 2½ to 3 hours, he voluntarily confessed that he was the man who had kidnapped and raped this girl. Then the officers gave him some writing materials and asked him to sit down and write out in his own handwriting the details of the crime he had confessed to, and he did that. He wrote it out. And then all of these facts were in the record when he was convicted, and it came up to the Court.

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And instead of deciding the case on the basis of the record made in Miranda, it was decided on a whole lot of writings by some professors and some other people discussing real or fancied activities of police officers that were not in the record, and had nothing whatever to do with the case on trial.

Mr. KOOTA. Sir, may I make this observation. The Supreme Court does not need a defense. It certainly doesn't need a defense from me. But it is a recognized practice of the judicial process that all courts will take judicial notice of conditions existing about the country.

They do not, when they become Justices of the Supreme Court, fail to see what the average citizen in the street sees, so that there is justification in my estimation for the Supreme Court relying on statistics from reliable sources. But I say that the statistics that they had were not reliable sources, and did not show a general pattern of police brutality.

To finish this Melville thought, the Supreme Court cited this Melville case in its Miranda decision as an instance of police brutality, but they don't know that the police denied that they exerted the slightest pressure upon Melville, the witness.

Now the Supreme Court has grandly assumed that this is an accepted instance where the police have exercised brutality, even though the record facts show that the police had denied they exercised any brutality.

As I have said, maybe in the unforeseeable future, the Supreme Court may change its opinion.

But what of the present? What assurances can be given to the people that our lawmakers have not abdicated the responsibility to protect innocent citizens? The keys to unlock the handcuffs that bind the criminal are easily available; but where are we to find the keys to free the shackled hands of law enforcement officials?

I suggest that it lies in the prompt enactment into law of Senate bills numbered, respectively 674, 675, 676, 677, and 678, introduced by the chairman of your subcommittee, Senator McClellan.

Perhaps most important are S. 674, relating to confessions, and S. 675, which, among other provisions, permits the interception of telephonic communications in State criminal investigations when authorized by State statute. I shall comment briefly on these bills.

Senator McCLELLAN. Before you go to those, I was interested in one statement you made when you commented on the remarks of the former Attorney General, who said it is "unutterable nonsense" to contend that these decisions were having any impact on, or affecting the increase in, crime in this country.

Do you believe that the probability of detection and punishment is in any sense a deterrent, or to any degree a deterrent against crime?

Mr. KOOTA. Without any question. That is where the frightful impact of Miranda appears.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me follow that up with one other question.

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. If there is a reasonable certainty or probability of detection and punishment, if that is a deterrent to crime, then is it logical to conclude that the absence of that deterrent stimulates, possibly, an increase in crime? It makes it more probable that there will be more crime?

Mr. KOOTA. In that sense, sir, I will agree with you, but perhaps we are engaging in semantics here, or I am, at least.

Senator McCLELLAN. I just couldn't conceive of anybody believing that turning criminals loose, known criminals, wouldn't have any impact on the increase in crime in this country.

Mr. KOOTA. It might have, in this sense.

Senator McCLELLAN. If that is true, then, the whole theory and premise of punishing people for crime to serve as a deterrent is a false premise. We are on the wrong track.

Mr. KOOTA. What I have in mind, sir—we are definitely on the right track—what I have in mind is this: Crimes are caused by impulses which are not generated, necessarily, by judicial opinion.

Crimes are caused by poverty, lack of opportunity, and so forth, but in this sense:

That where it has removed a deterrent, an effective deterrent to crime, these opinions, they are indirectly the cause of crime, because

I wouldn't walk into a police station, for example, with seven policemen around, all with guns, and proceed to commit a robbery against those police officers. In that sense, that crime wouldn't be committed.

But I had in mind the underlying causes of crime, rather than a cessation or decrease in crime caused, or increase in crime caused, by removing a deterrent to crime, which the Supreme Court decisions have done.

Senator McClellan. I think if we convinced people that crime doesn't pay, that there would be less of it.

Mr. Koota. There isn't any question.

Sentaor McClellan. And if people are convinced that crime is profitable, there will be more of it. I think it is just that simple.

Mr. Koota. I quite agree with you. Our experience indicates that in our jails, our local jails in the city of New York, the Supreme Court decisions are dealing with people who have already been arrested and charged with a crime. These decisions seep down. There are so-called lawyers in these jails who advise each other as to what the law is. They know precisely how to proceed at a trial.

I have had any number of instances where defendants have discharged their attorneys and have asked that another criminal who is held in jail on another charge sit with them and advise them as to their constitutional rights. That is a case with which I have had actual experience.

Now, when that repeated itself in two or three cases, I instructed my assistant to take this individual and move his trial—he was held for robbery—immediately, so as to get this jailhouse lawyer away from the other suspects. But I agree with you, sir. Perhaps the choice of my language was unfortunate.

The decisions of the various courts do not cause crime in the sense that poverty does, lack of educational opportunities, and so forth. But they are the cause of an increase in crime because they remove the deterrent to crime.

Senator McClellan. Very well.

Mr. Koota. First, as to S. 674, relating to confessions. Under the inexorable, inflexible rule of Miranda, a confession is not admissible in evidence under any circumstances if the requisite admonition is not given the criminal suspect, unless he has waived his right.

No matter how guiltless, how unintentional, or innocent may be the failure of the police to warn, the confession is aborted. We do not countenance or condone a flagrant or malicious violation by the police of a criminal suspect's constitutional rights. We abhor brutality and overt coercion and any official conduct which shocks the conscience.

We do not advocate a return to the days of the Stuarts and the Tudors, when, it has been said, it was much easier for police to sit in the shade of an apple tree rubbing vinegar in the eyes of a suspect to extract a confession than venture into the hot sun in search of evidence.

We condemn and deplore the tactics of the savage. When such conduct is manifested, of course, a confession should be excluded; but what if there has been an unintentional or venial violation of a defendant's right? Should not the legal consequences in the latter instances differ from the case of a physically coerced admission?

There have been occasional instances of overreaching by the police, which must be condemned. These individual cases can be dealt with in the appropriate forum, but should these sporadic infractions reasonably have generated the Miranda rule of universal application?

We hear now and then that a police officer, off duty, intoxicated and in a bar and grill, draws his revolver, fires at random and injures an innocent patron. Does anyone suggest that all police should be deprived of their guns?

I believe that each case should be treated on its own facts; that the totality of circumstances surrounding the uttering of the confession in the particular case should govern its admissibility into evidence and the sole test thereof should be simply its voluntariness.

This is the purport of Senate bill No. 674. In a speech before the Senate, your chairman, Senator McClellan, referring to this proposed law, said that "the test of admissibility should, therefore, rest upon the circumstances in each individual case."

This, in substance, is the judge's rule prevailing in England. No one will suggest that England is a backward, uncivilized nation, less zealous of safeguarding the rights of an individual than are we.

This purport of No. 674 is the rule also suggested by Mr. Justice Clark in his opinion in Miranda, wherein he stated in part:

> The rule prior to today—as Mr. Justice Goldberg, the author of the Court's opinion in Escobedo, stated it in Haynes v. Washington—depended upon "a totality of circumstances evidencing an involuntary . . . admission of guilt." 373 U.S., at 514. . . .
> I would continue to follow that rule. Under the "totality or circumstances" rule of which my Brother Goldberg spoke in Haymes, I would consider in each case whether the police officer prior to custodial interrogation added the warning that the suspect might have counsel present at the interrogation and, further, that a court would appoint one at his request if he was too poor to employ counsel. In the absence of warnings, the burden would be on the State to prove that counsel was knowingly and intelligently waived or that in the totality of the circumstances, including the failure to give the necessary warnings, the confession was clearly voluntary.
> Rather than employing the arbitrary Fifth Amendment rule which the Court lays down I would follow the more pliable dictates of Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments which we are accustomed to administering and which we know from our cases are effective instruments in protecting persons in police custody. In this way we would not be acting in the dark nor in one full sweep changing the traditional rules of custodial interrogation which this Court has for so long recognized as a justifiable and proper tool in balancing individual rights against the rights of society. It will be soon enough to go further when we are able to appraise with somewhat better accuracy the effect of such a holding.

It has been said in some quarters that confessions are not necessary in most criminal prosecutions, but I ask, "necessary to what?" They may not contribute to a prima facie case of guilt, upon which a charge or indictment is to be predicated, but they are indispensable upon the trial of such indictment where guilt must be established to the satisfaction of a jury beyond a reasonable doubt.

Who is there to say what quantum or quality of evidence will convince a particular jury of 12 men and women of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?

Senator ERVIN. I will ask you whether, as a matter of actual practice, a confession of guilt is not in many cases the difference between an acquittal and a conviction, even in cases where you have witnesses that are able to connect the accused with the commission of the crime, because when you have evidence against a defendant, and then you have a voluntary confession made by the defendant, where the evidence would otherwise be in doubt as to the identity of the perpetrator of the crime, that is what is conclusive in a high percentage of cases, in the minds of the jurors?

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely, sir. We had a case the other day where a man was arrested, charged with the robbery of a woman when she was walking down the street. The defendant approached her and put his arm around her in what we colloquially call a mugging. He stole her purse and threw her to the ground, and she was injured.

She had a fleeting glimpse of him through the corner of her eye. She examined some rogue's gallery or police photographs of individuals and pointed out, "This is the man who did it."

The police apprehended him and she identified him. That was enough to get an indictment. He denied any implication in this crime. There was enough evidence before the grand jury to procure an indictment. He was promptly indicted for robbery.

Now the case proceeded to trial before a jury of 12 men and women, and there was a lawyer present in the courtroom, and it develops on cross examination that she doesn't see too well, that she observed him out of the corner of her eye, had never seen him before, but for a fleeting moment. The light in the street was very dim. That jury was out 5 minutes and acquitted the defendant. We couldn't persuade them beyond a reasonable doubt that this was not a case of mistaken identity. But suppose we had a confession in that case? That jury would have been out 5 minutes and convicted him.

Senator ERVIN. I was impressed with the report made by J. Edgar Hoover about burglaries, for example. I don't remember the exact percentage, but he gave the percentage of burglaries that are committed by people in areas where they do not live.

He said, for example, of all burglaries committed in the suburbs, a tremendously high percentage—he gave the percentage, which I don't remember—were committed by people who did not live in the suburbs. They are usually committed in darkness and under circumstances where the victims of the crimes have difficulty identifying them.

You are making the point that in cases of that kind, the most convincing evidence as far as persuasion of a jury to return a verdict of guilty is concerned, is a confession.

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely. Your observation, Senator Ervin, suggests another thought.

My recollection is that in Miranda, the Chief Justice referred to the experiences of the FBI, and said the FBI customarily gives warnings, and they have been receiving confessions.

But the distinction between the responsibility of local police and the FBI is a very substantial one. The FBI, generally speaking, deals with the more sophisticated type of crime, violation of the Sherman Act, income tax violation, where confessions are really not necessary to conviction. But unlike our local police, the FBI does not enter the area of the day-by-day street crimes such as muggings, and rapes, and robberies. And furthermore, there is an obligation imposed upon our local police to prevent crime, and that is where the Miranda rule has a great impact on the prevention of crime; and the FBI is not charged with that responsibility.

Senator ERVIN. I think you have made an extremely valid point there. I have practiced in the Federal courts, and also in the State courts.

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. The State courts have to rely in a very high percentage of their cases, that is the prosecution has to rely in a very high percentage of their cases upon the testimony of what we would call just ordinary run-of-the-mill people.

Mr. KOOTA. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. The Federal courts normally, in the first place deal only with a restricted number of crimes; whereas the State courts deal with a whole category of crimes. And, in the second place, these crimes are usually fully investigated before the defendant is ever arrested, and they are investigated by highly intelligent people who are specialists in the particular field in which they operate, such as the income tax or the antitrust laws. The Federal Government rarely brings a prosecution until they have got a pretty good case already as to the evidence of the crime, and also evidence as to the identity of the defendant.

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely. This is what happens to us in our local cities. The police officer is walking down the street at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. A woman leans out of an apartment building and screams, "Help, murder, stop that man," and he sees a man running out of the building.

Now that man may not have committed any crime at all. What is the police officer to do at that point? Must he take out the latest decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court and carry the statutes under both arms and examine the books to see if he has a right to apprehend that man? If it turned out that that man had been a murderer and he didn't stop him, he would have been derelict in his duty. But if it turned out that that man was innocent, then he has made a false arrest.

These are the perplexing decisions that must be made by the police officer on the beat, and which the FBI does not have to make.

Although the proposed S. 674 bill affects Federal prosecutions only, its impact upon State procedures would be immediate. Underlying the Miranda rule is the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination, which is now binding upon the States. In Malloy v. Hogan, the Supreme Court declared the Federal standards for the determination of the scope and interpretation of this privilege shall be adhered to by the States. Senate bill 674 establishes criteria of confession admissibility which would perforce be followed by State legislatures or their judiciary.

May I, at this point, suggest the possibilities of an amendment to 674 in this area. In Jackson v. Denno, our Supreme Court said on the question of admissibility of confessions that the State legislatures are free to adopt either the Massachusetts rule, or what is known as the orthodox rule.

In the orthodox rule, the judge in the first instance finally determines the voluntariness of the confession, and then submits it to a jury to determine its credibility.

Under the Massachusetts rule, the judge in the first instance determines beyond a reasonable doubt in his own mind the issue of voluntariness, and then he submits it to the jury to determine that very issue. That is the procedure under People v. Huntley, which prevails in New York today.

The reason for it is that our Constitution says that in every criminal case the defendant shall have the right to trial by jury, and it be of questionable constitutionality whether a judge has a right to remove from consideration of the jury this very important issue of fact.

Senator McClellan. We don't do that in this bill, do we?

Mr. Koota. I think we do, sir; because you submit only the weight to the jury. Our sixth amendment, of course, guarantees the right to a jury trial to every criminal defendant, and I think your bill might be amended, unless I am mistaken in reading it, to provide that the judge in the first instance determines the issue of voluntariness and then submits it to the jury to determine it as a question of fact, but as I read 674, it has applied the orthodox rule, where the judge is the final arbiter of the admissibility of the confession, submitting only its weight and credibility for a jury determination.

Senator McClellan. I appreciate your suggestion. We will examine that aspect of it.

Mr. Koota. Then it avoids any possible conflict with the sixth amendment right of the criminal suspect to a trial by a jury.

Senator McClellan. What I have in mind is to get all of the facts.

Mr. Koota. I understand, sir.

Senator McClellan. Every situation that existed at the time of the confession, at the time the statement was made, and let the jury determine whether it was voluntary, and what weight should be given to it, along with all the other evidence in the case.

Mr. Koota. I may be sounding an alarm unduly because the Supreme Court in Jackson v. Denno recognized that either one of these procedures would be acceptable. It didn't condemn the procedure outlined in Senate 674, but I think the bill would be more palatable, if you will forgive that expression.

Senator McClellan. Very well. I appreciate this.

Senator Ervin. I notice now you are going to another bill.

Mr. Koota. Yes.

Senator Ervin. I have one or two questions I would like to ask about the Miranda case. I practiced law very actively for 19 years. During that time I defended, but I never did represent the prosecution, except in isolated cases.

Mr. Koota. That was a loss to the prosecution of this country.

Senator Ervin. I defended men, and I would say that I was left with the impression that the great majority of men I defended already knew they had a right to get a lawyer. Otherwise, I don't think they would ever come to me.

I was also impressed by the fact that they realized that what they said to the officers could be used against them in incriminating them. I also was impressed with the fact that most of them knew they didn't have to say anything.

Now, J. Edgar Hoover's report shows that something like 48 percent of those who are convicted of violations of the criminal law and sentenced commit another crime within a period of about 2 years after their release.

Mr. KOOTA. Recidivism.

Senator ERVIN. I don't like to just snatch figures out of the air, but I think a person with your experience can make some estimates about what percentage of the serious crimes that you are called on to prosecute are committed by repeaters?

Mr. KOOTA. Our statistics indicate that about 75 or 80 percent are recidivists; are repeaters.

Senator ERVIN. Now, what percentage of that 75 percent do you think haven't already got intelligence enough to know that whatever they say will be used against them; and to know that they don't have to say anything unless they want to; and to know that they have the right of the services of an attorney?

Mr. KOOTA. An infinitesimal number of those, very minor.

Senator ERVIN. So the overwhelming majority already know virtually all of these things that the Miranda case requires a police officer when he takes them into custody, to tell them about, before he interrogates them?

Mr. KOOTA. Certainly, and not only that, sir, but in view of the advent of television and radio, and the mass media of communication, almost every man, women, and child hears and reads about these things, that a person doesn't have to speak, that he is entitled to a lawyer. They may not know their precise legal rights, but the knowledge that they are entitled to a lawyer, it is a classic phrase that anything you say can be used against you. They all know that.

Senator ERVIN. Millions of Americans have seen such programs as Perry Mason and the Defenders?

Mr. KOOTA. Exactly.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Under the Miranda decision, I ask if this is not the practical operation of it. Today, under Miranda, we are having self-confessed murderers, rapists, and robbers turned loose merely because the arresting officers failed to tell them something that they already knew.

Mr. KOOTA. I think that is a very fair and reasonable observation, Senator.

I shall now advert to S. 675, which prohibits wiretapping except in certain instances, one of which is wiretapping in any State which by statute authorizes this procedure, and bearing in mind that I am a State prosecuting official, the right to intercept in State crimes is of immediate importance to me, although the Federal aspect is important, but more immediately the State procedures.

Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act forbids the interception and divulgence of any telephonic communication. A violation thereof constitutes a crime. The New York State Constitution, article I, section 12—since 1938—supplemented by the New York Code of Criminal Procedure, permits wiretapping.

This morning I heard Judge Lumbard say that it was in 1944 that we had wiretapping, in response to a question by your chairman. Our Constitution, which permitted telephonic interceptance, was amended in 1938, but the implementary statute was not passed for a year or two thereafter.

In United States v. Benanti, 355 U.S. 96, the Supreme Court ruled that no State may legislate in contravention of section 605; but the Federal courts nevertheless have denied applications to enjoin the introduction of evidence obtained through wiretapping in a State criminal proceeding. Thus, while it is legal to wiretap in New York and the Federal courts will not enjoin us from utilizing the evidence thus obtained, nevertheless the introduction thereof in a State criminal trial constitutes immediately a Federal criminal offense in violation of section 605.

The proposed bill No. 675 would resolve the intolerable an anomalous conflict and would permit the interception of telephonic communications in the State of New York.

Another suggestion was made by Judge Lumbard with respect to a question posed to him, as I recall, by your chairman. He would extend the statute 675 to provide that not only in these areas of specific crimes would interception of telephone communications be admissible, but any crime discovered as the result of listening to it, even though that particular crime may not be mentioned in the categories set forth in 675.

I had a very practical experience with that the other day, where police officers were investigating a robbery, and in the course of that investigation, we had wiretaps authorized by our State statute inserted in the office of a garage, and over these telephone communications we heard three men conspiring to kill an informant who was giving information to the Federal authorities in the field of narcotics, as the result of which the United States Attorney in Manhattan, Mr. Morganthau, broke up this ring, convicted them and sent them to jail.

Now, these men were out to kill this informant. They planned every step of this murder. One gave instructions to the other. They were going to a certain store, and in the back of the store there were three steps leading down, and that they were to call the proprietor, the man they were interested in was Freddie, the florist—I mention the name because this is now a matter of record in our courts.

When Freddie the florist came out, they were to tell him to kneel down, and then they were to fire bullets in his head and kill him. They were then to go out, get into the automobile, but they were to be careful in the confusion not to get caught.

One was to go to the driver's seat, the other in the seat opposite the driver. They were then to proceed down a certain street, over another street, down another street. They were then to come to a subway station, and one of them would get out and go into the subway. The other would ride down three or four more streets, specific directions, and then abandon the car and escape.

Now, the police could not possibly, in order to prevent this murder, ascertain who it was. But within a week after that, the police found a dead body in a florist shop and there were stairs leading down. The father of the deceased, Freddie the florist, told the police that two men came in. They made them both come to the stairs, kneel down, and these two men fired shots and killed Freddie the florist, the son of the owner of the store.

The two men then ran out. As they ran out, a young man spied them and was able to identify them. An automobilist, who heard shots which sounded like firecrackers, then followed this automobile, and it went down the very streets that had been planned according to the telephone communications that we had overheard.

But when they came to a deserted area, the automobile which carried one—oh, yes, this automobile stopped and one of the men got out, went into a subway, just as they had planned, and the other went on. When they came to a deserted area ,this young man who followed them in his car was fearful of his life, or that harm might come to him, and he went off.

We indicted these three men for murder. That indictment is about to be dismissed because the lower court judge held that our State procedures permitting telephonic interception violated the fourth amendment to the Constitution, search and seizures, and we are now on appeal in our lower courts.

It occurs to me that it would be a remarkable achievement in the cause of law enforcement if perhaps some day we could develop a declaratory judgment procedure as we have in civil law. In civil law, if I want to build a house on my lot and you, my neighbor, say I will be encroaching on your property, I don't have to build and wait for an ejectment action. I can walk into the appellate division, or one of our courts and say, "This is what I contend, this is what my neighbor contends; will I be violating his rights if I build this property," and we can get a ruling on that. You can't do it in the criminal law.

Now, wouldn't it be a wonderful thing if in this case I just cited, I could come down to Washington with the case and walk into the Halls of Justice across the street here, and say to the Chief Justice and his associates, "Gentlemen, these are the facts of the case. Are we right about this?"

I have got to wait 2 or 3 years before I get a decision from the Supreme Court. And what happens to law enforcement in Kings County in the meantime? Do I continue with wiretapping, or do I not continue with wiretapping?

If I continue with wiretapping, some very important investigations may subsequently prove abortive, if the Supreme Court, in a case, for example, which it now has before it, the Berger case, decides that wiretapping is in contravention of our fourth amendment.

When one talks about wiretapping, and certainly when one is for it, he finds himself in a "semantic trap." To altogether too many people who know little or nothing of the tough problems of law enforcement, "wiretapping" is a dirty word.

When District Attorneys, who are law enforcement agents, use the word "wiretapping," they mean intercepting telephone conversations of persons engaged in criminal activities and let us always keep in mind that their victims are almost always lawabiding citizens.

Shakespeare once said, "Strong reasons make strong actions." While there maye be those who think wiretapping is a "dirty business," who will deny the fact that murder, narcotic peddling, labor racketeering, larceny, bank robbery, burglary and extortion are far dirtier businesses? These are strong reasons for strong action. Such crime must be eradicated not only for the sake of preserving our democratic way of life, but also because of its corollary effects.

The criminal element avails itself of modern means of engaging in nefarious practices, and in avoiding apprehension and detection. Is law enforcement to be prohibited from similarly employing up-to-date methods of combating the constant increase in crime?

What are the principal arguments of those who oppose affording law enforcing agents the right by court order to intercept the telephone conversations of persons engaged in criminal activities: They are:

(1) If we allow wiretapping, it will destroy the sacred right of privacy of our citizens.

(2) It is not needed in the war against crime.

Let us examine these arguments:

The first is an emotional appeal based on naught but a lively imagination and unfounded speculation. The facts are studiously avoided.

Let us look at these facts.

For over 25 years in New York State, with a population of over 16 million persons, with 62 district attorneys using wiretaps in their fight against crime, not one instance of abuse could be cited.

A joint legislative committee on privacy of communications was created in New York State in February 1955 as the joint legislative committee to study illegal interception of communications, and its functioned for 7 years, to March 1962. It went most carefully into the entire problem of wiretapping, both by law enforcement agencies and by private unauthorized persons.

Far from being critical of any law-enforcing agency, the committee stated, in its final report, dated June 12, 1962—pages 16 and 17:

> In the first of these cases, the Benanti decision of 1957, the Supreme Court issued a new interpretation of an obscure clause in the Federal Communications Act of 1934, in which it said that Congress "did not mean to allow" the system of law enforcement wiretapping authorized by the New York State constitution since 1938. The disclosure of wiretap evidence was thereby construed to be a Federal crime. As detailed in our previous reports, this interdiction has had a most deplorable effect on the prosecution of crime. It has forced our prosecutors to turn loose apprehended criminals of the most sinister sorts * * *. Some hope still remains that Congress may act on legislation before it, permitting the States to wiretap against criminals under authority of a court order—the procedure originated and proved satisfactory by the State of New York.

This same committee stated in 1957:

> We know of no instance in which illegal wiretap evidence has been offered by any prosecutors since law enforcement wiretapping was regularized in 1938.

Irresponsible claims have been made that tens of thousands of telephones are tapped each year under the New York statute requiring a court order. Nothing could be further from the truth. In the year 1963, there were only 451 wiretap orders obtained by the New York City Police Department, and in 1964 there were 671 such orders obtained. This, in a city of some 8 million residents and over 4 million telephones. Can anyone honestly suggest that overzealous police have abused their authority in this area?

In my own county, with a population of almost 3 million people, and almost 1 million telephones, our office obtained a total of only 47 wiretap orders, covering a total of 72 telephones, for the first 11 months of 1966.

Is this abuse by law enforcement?

Senate bill 675 is indispensible to the effective prosecution of organized crime and racketeering in the State of New York.

Not too long ago, arrests were made in my county stemming from the indictment of 19 top level narcotic suppliers involving an alleged $90-million narcotic ring. Were it not for information obtained from court authorized telephonic interception, this result, and many like it, might never have been achieved.

I should like to avert again to the statement made by Mr. Dougherty, appearing in the Los Angeles Times on Sunday, February 19, in which he said:

> Myer Lansky and scores of other racket bigwigs can live like kings in Miami and get written up by the Saturday Evening Post. Organized crime, already flourishing, will flourish all the most, if wiretapping is eventually restricted to cases involving the national security only, as Mr. Johnson has recommended.

One of the most serious problems confronting us today is the infiltration of racketeers and organized crime into legitimate business enterprises. In October 1965 I began a frontal assault upon these malefactors by instituting a grand jury inquiry which is still in progress.

According to a New York newspaper, the World Journal Tribune, of February 21, 1967, the Federal Justice Department Organized Crime Section has begun a nationwide attack on organized crime. Among its named targets is one Joseph Colombo. I subpenaed Mr. Colombo, together with the others, including the Gallo brothers and one John Oddo—also known as Johnny Bath Beach—before our grand jury as witnesses.

They refused to testify and thereupon each was punished for contempt of court, fined and imprisoned. I am told that this is the first time that Colombo has seen the inside of a jail. In addition, each of these individuals was indicted for the crime of criminal contempt and it now awaiting trial. If I were deprived of the right to wiretap, I would be compelled to close our books on this investigation, vital to the security of the community.

The top notch racketeer insulates himself from detection by various lower echelons of cohorts. The man who actually peddles narcotics does not know the identity of the head of this ring. The boss never carries a gun, narcotics or illegal contraband on his person and is therefore not amenable to street arrest. He employs the telephone to conduct his various nefarious activities.

He can be attacked by law enforcement authorities only if they are permitted to use the same device, the telephone. If Senate bill 675 is not enacted, law enforcement will have been dealt a serious blow. Organized criminal syndicates would immediately avail themselves of the immunity thereby granted to them in the use of telephones and would extend their tenacles into every city, village, and hamlet in this country.

I should like to make this parenthetical observation. Our President stated in a message to the Congress that the prosecution of crime was essentially a local matter, and yet he advocated the abolition of wiretapping, except in cases involving national security.

We, in New York City, need wiretapping. If we don't have wiretapping legally permissible, I might as well close my books on the most serious criminal activities, organized crime, labor racketeering, narcotics rings, and similar types of activity.

Of course, in the ordinary street crime, like a street robbery, or a mugging, I don't need wiretapping. But in the most serious activities of criminal conduct, if we are not permitted to have wiretapping, we can close our books on those investigations.

Now, it may be, if crime is a local problem, why shouldn't we in our State, if we think, our citizens think, we require wiretapping, why shouldn't we be permitted to have it? Perhaps in some Midwest State or village or hamlet in some Midwest State, where perhaps the most serious crime is some youngster breaking into a gasoline station and stealing a tire, they may not need wiretapping, but because they don't need it out in that State, why should we, in States such as New York or Illinois or California, which have large megalopolises there and large urban areas, where organized crime spreads its tenacles, why shouldn't we be permitted to have it because some other State in the Union, not having these problems, does not require it?

That is the purport of S. 675. It allows wiretapping where, by State statute, the State legislators and the people think they require wiretapping.

Senate bill 677 permits a grant of immunity to witnesses before a a witness to prevent his imparting of information as to the violation of any criminal statute would constitute a criminal act. Our experience over the past years indicates that the intimidation of witnesses is one of the most potent weapons available to the malefactor to prevent official investigation.

Senate bill 677 permits a grant of immunity to witnesses before a grand jury in investigation of certain serious crimes. This privilege accorded to the Attorney General or the U.S. attorney is essential to an attack upon organized criminal syndicates. Criminal conspirators can be detected most effectively if the testimony of some underling in the conspiracy may be compelled. The grant of immunity will aid in this objective.

Senate bill 678 has the salutary purpose of outlawing organized criminal syndicates. I would offer a mild amendment. I would eliminate the term "Mafia."

We in law enforcement are aware of the existence of loosely knit, informal, but powerful criminal confederations. We have received no proof, however, that any of them bears the title "Mafia" or "Cosa Nostra," to which I have noted repeated press references. The use of such appellations tends to stigmatize an entire ethnic group and is unfair to the vast majority of decent, law-abiding Italians.

I know of no evidence indicating that only Italians are involved in organized crime. Such intimation that I have in my office tend to establish that no one race or ethnic group enjoys a monopoly in the area of illegal activities.

To conclude, Senate bills 674 and 678 constitute a comprehensive plan to provide law-enforcement officials with effective tools to combat serious crime. In my opinion, they do not impinge on the constitutional rights of any individual nor are they unfair or unreasonable.

The people of our country cannot expect its duly constituted law-enforcement officials to hunt elephants with peashooters. The proposed legislation would arm us with more formidable weapons. The powers requested in these bills are not granted to us in law enforcement as some private weapon to be used in the vindication of a personal right. These are powers that would belong to society and to the people. If our citizens will not arm our police and prosecutors with effective weapons, then as a matter of elemental fairness, they ought not to complain if we cannot discharge our responsibility to the community more effectively.

Yes, the scales of justice are now heavily weighted in favor of the criminal suspect to the detriment of decent law-abiding citizens in our communities. Prompt enactment of the proposed legislation would serve as a first but vital step to the restoration of a proper balance. I urge their speedy enactment in the interests of the safety and security of our society.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I appreciate your very fine statement.

Mr. KOOTA. Thank you, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It will be very helpful to us, and I certainly appreciate the suggestions you have made. I think they have merit. I propose to give them some study and thought.

Senator Ervin?

Senator ERVIN. I want to commend you on an excellent statement.

Mr. KOOTA. Thank you, sir.

Senator ERVIN. You bring the committee great help, because you come here not only with a knowledge of the constitutional and legal implications involved, but the practical application. After all, that is the purpose of the criminal law, to try to protect society and the victims of crime, and prevent crime down to the localities where people live.

Mr. KOOTA. Precisely, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Just one question. The Miranda case is said to be based on the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment; is it not?

Mr. KOOTA. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And that clause says that no person can be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case.

Can you see how, with due regard to the meaning of the words in which that law is couched, do you see how it could possibly apply or be intended to apply, to voluntary confessions, where there is no element of compulsion present?

Mr. KOOTA. I cannot.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. KOOTA. And, may I just make this one observation. I have been quoted widely in the press throughout the country as having said, about 2 or 3 months following Escobedo, that a criminal suspect should be given an attorney in the station house when he is arrested. But that expression was taken out of context. If you will permit me, perhaps this may not be the forum, but I should like to correct that misimpression very, very briefly.

The sixth amendment to the Constitution states that in every criminal prosecution, a defendant shall be entitled to counsel for his defense. Now, if we read the sixth amendment, in a commonsense manner, as any ordinary person would read it, it deals with the right to a speedy trial, the right to a trial by jury, that a defendant is entitled to be informed as to the nature of the charges, confrontation of witnesses, that he have compulsory witnesses in his behalf, and then that he is entitled to counsel for his defense.

This amendment is instinct with the idea that a criminal prosecution commences when a judicial proceeding is instituted. There is reason for it because, especially in 1791, our procedures were surrounded with all sorts of hypertechnical problems, and the defendant would find himself floundering around in the morass of legal uncertainty, and even if he were innocent, he might be convicted if he didn't know the difference, for example, between a demurrer and a motion to dismiss.

So the framers of our Constitution said that once a man comes into contact with the judicial process, he ought to have a lawyer who understands what the proceedings are and what the law is, and so forth. That is how I would interpret it.

Regrettably, there is a higher authority in the judicial process than the lowly district attorney of Kings County. That is the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, in Escobedo, said, "Oh, no, in our opinion, a criminal prosecution may commence in a station house under certain conditions."

Senator ERVIN. But isn't there a higher authority than that; namely, the Constitution?

Mr. KOOTA. Yes; that is even higher than the Supreme Court, but I take it, the Constitution means what the Supreme Court says that it means.

Senator ERVIN. But it is supposed to be interpreted according to the words the Constitution uses.

Mr. KOOTA. I should think so, according to the normal standards of interpretation. Therefore, I made a statement that the decision in Escobedo is, of course, binding upon me, and if the Supreme Court has said that a criminal prosecution begins, not with the institution of a judicial proceeding but commences in the station house, then any distinction between a man who knows his rights, who may be wealthy, have a lawyer, knows he is entitled to a lawyer, and some poor, ignorant individual who doesn't know that he has a right to a lawyer, is an invidious distinction, and under these circumstances, bound as I am by Escobedo, we should notify a suspect in criminal court as to his right to counsel, but fundamentally I disagree with the interpretation of the sixth amendment by the Supreme Court.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Just one question. Wasn't the New York statute amended to extend eavesdropping to electronic devices?

Mr. KOOTA. Yes, it was, sir, 3 or 4 years ago we enacted a new statute to our penal law, called eavesdropping, and there are two types of eavesdropping. One is the interception of telephonic communications, and the other is what we colloquially know as "bugging," that is, listening to a conversation between persons vis-a-vis.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is that legalized now under the same process for wiretapping in your State?

Mr. KOOTA. That is. In the State of New York, that is legal. There are some ramifications.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am wondering if we shouldn't amend this bill so as to cover that aspect of interception?

Mr. KOOTA. To answer your question specifically, I heard Judge Lumbard say to you this morning that wiretapping differs from bugging in the sense that wiretapping is affected by the interstate problems, whereas, bugging is almost entirely local. But I should like to disagree in one minor respect from Judge Lumbard.

Where he spoke of allowing wiretap interceptions not only in specific areas of crime, but also in the other crimes that might be disclosed, I would limit those other crimes to felonies, and not to include any type of crime that might be disclosed.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. KOOTA. Thank you for the privilege of appearing.

Senator McCLELLAN. Hon. James T. Wilkinson, commonwealth attorney, Richmond, Va. Will you come around, please. I am sorry we are so late in getting to you.

HON. JAMES T. WILKINSON, COMMONWEALTH'S ATTORNEY FOR THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VA.

Hon. James B. Wilkinson, Commonwealth Attorney, Richmond, Va. L. LB. University of Richmond. Began private practice in 1952; served as Assistant Commonwealth Attorney 1960–1965; Commonwealth Attorney 1966.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is perfectly all right, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. We do the best we can in scheduling witnesses. We certainly cannot foresee what the situation will be, how many questions may be asked or how much we will be delayed. We do appreciate your presence, and we are grateful to you and all others who are willing to take the time to come here and assist this committee in what we believe is a very vital undertaking. I believe you have a prepared statement.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Will you please give us a brief background.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will introduce myself, yes, sir.

My name is James Wilkinson and I am the Commonwealth's attorney for the city of Richmond, Va. Richmond is the State capital of Virginia. I have had over 7 years of experience in law enforcement either as an assistant Commonwealth's attorney or as Commonwealth's attorney. My jurisdiction covers all crimes committed in the city. The city population is a little bit in excess of 220,000 persons.

Of course our city is surrounded by two very large counties, but they do not come in my jurisdiction of criminal prosecutions. We try possibly 2,000 criminal cases a year in our court of record, which would be the court where you would have your juries and so forth. About 600 recividist cases are in the State penitentiary, and untold number of misdemeanors in the lower courts.

During the term of my office a revolution has taken place in the criminal justice of this country. The U.S. Constitution has become an instrument that changes from day to day and the stability in its interpretation which was one of the cornerstones of our Republic is a thing of the past. Lawyers and laymen alike are afraid to hazard a guess of what change will come next.

Every prosecuting attorney has an obligation to prosecute all persons justly accused of committing criminal offenses within his jurisdiction and also to see that each and every defendant so charged has a fair and impartial trial free from outside pressures.

I think that perhaps the Supreme Court overlooked the duty on the prosecuting attorney. Most prosecuting attorneys that I have met take this duty very seriously, to see that the defendant gets a fair and impartial trial. The latter duty to me is as important as the former and in my jurisdiction we conscientiously endeavor to perform these duties to the letter and spirit of the law.

If for any reason we did not perform this dual duty, our able judges would reprimand us without hesitation. The men who serve my community on the bench are of the highest caliber and integrity and demand that the Commonwealth prove its case as required by law. It is an honor and privilege to practice before the bar of these courts. I speak of both the State courts and the U.S. district court. To my knowledge, the judges of these courts have never permitted any accused to be abused by either the Commonwealth's attorney or the police.

The revolution in the criminal justice of this country, which I have spoken of, commenced in 1961 with the case of Mapp v. Ohio. It has since progressed to the point where both the safety and well-being of the American people now face a clear and present danger. People are afraid to go out at night without the protection of a weapon of some description.

Gentlemen, we hear that in our locality. I am pretty active down there. I belong to a lot of fraternal organizations and clubs, and people off the street that I know come up one after the other and ask, "How can we protect ourselves against the crime that is going on?" The safety and well-being of the American home is constantly being threatened because of the crime rate in the Nation. More and more people are requesting permits to carry concealed weapons for their own protection.

To carry a weapon in my jurisdiction you have to get permission or a permit from the circuit judge. We have noticed an increase of people asking for concealed weapons, that have to carry money at night, and so forth.

We read in the national publications where persons are organizing into groups for their self-protection. If we are not careful, the victim of a crime, a member of his family, or the community will not leave the trial of an accused to the courts but will take the law into their own hands. There is no doubt that this would be a step backward for civilization and human dignity.

Senator McClellan. Lack of confidence in the court, in the judicial process, and in the integrity of law enforcement, does it not tend to lead to anarchy?

Mr. Wilkinson. Yes, sir.

Senator McClellan. Speaking about people, they are not going to leave it to the courts and to the law enforcement officers when they feel they are wrong.

Mr. Wilkinson. In my opinion, Senator, we are rapidly approaching that position in this country.

Senator McClellan. There is a danger as well as to the individual victims. Certainly when we leave it to the lynch mob, mob justice, so to speak, far more innocent will suffer under that kind of a situation than under law and order, where occasionally some mistake is made and some who are innocent might be convicted. There is no way of achieving perfection.

Mr. Wilkinson. No, sir.

Senator McClellan. But there would be far less harm coming to the innocent, if we observed law and order, and if we enforce the law and punish the criminal and try to deter crime. If we overemphasize individual rights and continue that course overzealously, it is likely to lead to anarchy in this country.

Mr. WILKINSON. I agree with you, sir.

Frankly, the American people are becoming gravely frightened over the rise of crime and for their own safety.

The people look to Congress and State legislatures for a solution to this ever-increasing problem. The U.S. Supreme Court has also requested aid from these august bodies in meeting this challenge. Gentlemen, it is your responsibility not to fail the people on a matter of such magnitude.

Perhaps some will interpret my following remarks as being critical of the U.S. Supreme Court. I do not mean them to be taken as such. It isn't my public duty to criticize courts. But I do feel that legislation must be passed to assist in the orderly administration of the criminal justice in our Nation and that certain judicial decisions be either limited or reversed.

I think it is a proper function of the legislative branch of the Government, if a court decision is contrary to the elected representatives of the people, they have a perfect right to reverse that decision by legislation. It has been done time and time again in this country.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What makes it difficult here is that the premises are rooted in the Constitution, the courts interpretation of the Constitution. We disagree with their interpretation and undertake to legislate, and they are still in a position to rule that the legislation is unconstitutional. That is just one of our problems.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is why we have reached a point where there is one of three remedies that we have discussed here. The fourth alternative is to do nothing. If we do nothing——

Mr. WILKINSON. The latter I think would be a mistake.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I hate to think of what the consequences would be.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Trial lawyers, both for the prosecution and defense, are the soldiers in the field representing their respective clients.

I mean by that we have to meet these issues first. We want to know what the law is, so we don't convict a man who is guilty, and then some new rule is announced which will later let him go, because we all know that the further you put off a criminal prosecution, the more difficult it is to convict the defendant, if he is guilty.

The trial lawyer is the one who has to make a quick decision for his client—one which will be passed on years later by the appellate courts giving it many hours of study, research, and deliberation. On many occasions, the issue involved in a particular case will be decided by a split court of 5 to 4. We want to know what the law is in order that our advice can be reasonably relied on by our respective clients. There will always be some difference of opinion among lawyers as to the law, but a law enacted by the legislative branch of the Government, after careful study and consideration, is much more effective than a course laid down by the judiciary branch.

To state that persons don't think about the Escobedo and Miranda decisions before committing a crime is to be naive and not understand the facts of life. These decisions not only lead to and encourage crime in the streets, but they also spawn the organization of criminal syndicates and organizations. Since these decisions, many persons state to the police when they are arrested, "I know my rights, so you don't have to tell them to me."

We are getting that more and more as Miranda and Escobedo are getting out to people who are actually arrested on the street. "Don't bother about that. I know what my rights are." But they are instructed to read them to them anyway.

In fact, we have a card which they carry with them, and the other day I was told—and this is a rather strange thing—there was an arrest for a felony, but the man went around the corner and got out of sight of the officer. He caught him. He had his pistol in one hand, and explained his rights, in the card, in the other hand, so there would not be any violation.

In fact, some criminals have changed the very nature of their criminal acts just because of the difficulty of proving certain criminal offenses without a confession. For instance a burglar will change from this type of crime to forging checks because the chances of apprehension in the latter case are more difficult and benefits to the offender are greater.

Crimes such as murder, rape, robbery, and burglary are not usually committed in the daytime, with many witnesses standing by. Usually in the aforementioned cases, only the accused and the victim are present, and on many occasions the victim is unable to testify because he or she was killed as a result of the crime.

Crimes of this nature cannot be solved without some form of interrogation of the accused.

I would like to point this out. The only method that we know of communicating with each other at this present date of civilization is by talking or sign language. This committee is trying to find facts by listening to and asking witnesses questions. Our whole system of judicial progress is based on asking people questions, interrogating people to try and find the facts. Well, when the Supreme Court cuts this instrumentality off from proper law enforcement, then we no longer look for facts, but probably for error.

At this point, I would like to state emphatically and without reservation that no one wants or desires an involuntary confession. However, a voluntary one is both desired and needed in solving many criminal offenses.

One of the most serious murder cases I have participated in was solved solely by a voluntary confession made by the accused. There were two men involved in this particular crime and each blamed the other for the murder. There is no reservation or doubt in my mind, or the jury's, I might add, that these were the two men who perpetrated this crime.

Under Escobedo and Miranda, these confessions would have never been obtained and the guilty persons never punished for this serious and heinous crime. In most serious felony cases, a statement from the accused is a necessary element in the fair prosecution of his case. The jury wants to hear what the defendant has to say and what part, if any, he took in the crime.

On some occasions, a voluntary statement can be beneficial to the accused, because if he gives an alibi this may be investigated to see if he is telling the truth or not. If the accused is telling the truth, it will keep him from being charged and put on trial.

A lot of times an accused will give a statement to a police officer. We had a case in my locality, it wasn't in my jurisdiction, it was the best circumstantial evidence case I ever heard of a man committing murder. But he did talk to the police and he gave an explanation. The police continued to investigate until they found the guilty man. So the idea that the police are purely for conviction I think is facetious. Police officers are dedicated men to the service of their country and community. The purpose of a criminal trial, and this I think Miranda overlooks, is to find the truth, not to exploit the minor mistakes of law enforcement officials in this country.

Senator McCLELLAN. Today, in many instances, the High Court is not concerned with truth, but with whether the police followed some kind of procedure that according to its latest judgment and wisdom should be followed.

Mr. WILKINSON. Senator, that bothers me in many ways, when we take the truth out of the criminal trial.

We cannot obtain justice for anyone unless we first endeavor to ascertain and find truth.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, under the Miranda case, the officer having the man in custody must emulate the parrot and repeat this set formula to the man and then interrogate him, the man having waived these rights, and then the truth is permitted to come in?

Mr. WILKINSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. But if he doesn't emulate the example of a parrot, and recite this artificial formula to a man, then the truth is excluded.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. Justice weighs on both sides of the scale, for the accused and for society, and if through some technicality where a man's confession is left out, I don't think that is justice. You are not trying the case on justice.

The truth is the rock upon which all justice is built, but under the technical rules now laid down by the courts we find the edifice on which our system of criminal justice is built is but a foundation of sand. Upon this foundation, true justice cannot survive.

Most police are fairminded and do not want to see the innocent convicted any more than do the judges. In our city, we have a fine group of men on the police force, performing their duty in a proficient and professional manner.

We have endeavored in our community to comply with every rule that has been laid down by the Supreme Court. We get the Law Weekly. It is announced on Monday. We get it Wednesday. We read it, and if there has been a change, we advise our police officers by Thursday morning. I am personally proud of them and thankful that they are on duty 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, protecting my family, home, friends, and myself. If the courts continue to handcuff these men with technical rules, they will soon lose their usefulness to our community. The expression "that the guilty go free because the constable blunders" does not punish the police, but society as a whole. It lets the guilty go back into society to commit another crime against some innocent victim—perhaps your child or mine. The American people have an absolute right to be protected from this abuse and Congress has a delegated responsibility to assist them in this endless battle. We can no longer sit back and let someone else assume our responsibilities.

I bring up at this point the Federal Bureau of Investigation because it was brought up by the previous witness. There is an entirely different field of law enforcement from the Federal police, the State police to the local police. Miranda did not take this into consideration. Perhaps the further the police are from the people, the more regulation they should have from their duly elected representatives.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is an organization for which I personally have the highest respect and admiration and its leader, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, is truly a great American. They occupy a position which is entirely different from that of local law enforcement officials. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has many facilities at its command and, in most instances, works on major crimes against the Federal Government. They do not, however, have to deal with the routine matters confronting local authorities. My office has always received the utmost cooperation from the Bureau and I feel that this cooperation will continue on a bilaterial basis in the future.

The agents of the Bureau do not have the daily problems of a minor nature that face the local policeman. The local policeman on his beat has to be priest, preacher, adviser, lawyer, psychologist, doctor, friend, and protector of his community. After all the police in the community are the symbols of authority.

In certain instances, he has to make a snap judgment in apprehending an accused for the protection of the community he, the officer, serves. Under present rulings of the Supreme Court, he must make a decision in protecting the rights of the accused which the Court itself cannot agree on. The decision made by the officer will be either confirmed or reversed by the appellate courts months, or years, later, and finally by a split decision of 5 to 4. Under any stretch of the imagination, this is not fair to a law-abiding community.

The scientific evidence we hear so much about is not as reliable as television would make one believe. Most criminals do not leave fingerprints, murder weapons or other evidence behind to be examined by the experts. The criminal takes all of this evidence with him when he leaves the scene of a crime. Juries are reluctant to accept scientific evidence alone to convict a person. They usually demand more than this.

We have found recently under Miranda, which was done before, that some of the scientific evidence you think you can get is not as scientific as we were led to believe. Ballistics as far as firearms are concerned, the weapon can change from time to time.

It is contended by some that the percentage of convictions are not dropping off because of the two decisions known as Escobedo and Miranda. This is probably true. However, we read almost daily how the crime rate is soaring and the number of arrests are dropping. Apparently, there is some reason for this and I submit that these two decisions, although maybe not the whole cause of this condition, are adding heavily to it.

The only statistic I have that we keep, we don't keep statistics in our office, because we sort of feel that it might not make us look too objectively at the defendant or to the prosecution, but in checking the court records, after Escobedo came out, the number of indictments returned by our grand jury dropped 10 percent. After Miranda came out, the number of indictments dropped a total of 20 percent, making the past 2 years a total drop of 20 percent in indictments. With crime rising, I think that the police are still doing an excellent job, but with crime rising, it would look like they would increase. So there must be some reason for this, and I think that these decisions are adding heavily to it.

The Escobedo decision certainly handicapped proper law enforcement procedures, but I submit the rule is much worse in the Miranda case and is unworkable in our present-day society.

The press is constantly reporting cases in which a confessed murderer, rapist or robber is dismissed for the reason of a ruling in the Miranda decision. Some national publications have had lead articles on this point. It is the duty of a free press to report and make comments relative to a situation such as this. They are rendering a public service by keeping the public alerted to a growing danger. However, when our young people read these accounts, they are bound to become confused about the rules of right and wrong that a parent endeavors to teach.

We hear quite a bit in our society today about our young people, but when you try to teach a child right and wrong, and the child reads in the newspaper where a confessed murdered goes free, it is rather difficult to punish that child for going around the corner to the drugstore, disobeying the parents' order. In fact, when an 11-year-old—and I happen to have an 11-year-old daughter—asks "Daddy, he killed a man and is not going to be punished for this?" the whole is both clear and present. I ask, how can you answer this question with any degree of reason? It is submitted that you cannot.

The guilt or innocence of a person accused of a crime has now become secondary to the paramount issue in the trial—on what technicality the accused will be freed again on society. Under these rules, witnesses become afraid to testify in a criminal trial because they feel the accused will be set free on a technicality and will in some manner return to hurt them. People are beginning to distrust our judicial system because of the technicalities raised by the appellate courts for the protection of the accused and to the detriment of society. I again repeat, honest, hard-working people have rights also and they must be protected against crime.

I fully realize and appreciate, in our zeal to protect society, that the rights of an accused must be respected and protected by the courts. I do not advocate that we disregard the rights of an accused in our diligence to reduce crime in this country. My position is that we reestablish truth as the goal in a criminal trial and that the voluntary admissions of an accused be made available to the trier of facts. Senator McClellan's bill, known as Senate bill 674, accomplishes this without taking any rights of any accused away. This bill reestablishes the faith of Congress in our system of criminal law, which has served us so well and faithfully over the years.

I do think that this bill, 674, does exactly that. It reestablishes the voluntariness of a confession to come in. It gives the court the right to pass on it, the jury can hear the facts, and weigh them. Every other issue we have in any trial we submit to the jury. Why are we afraid to submit this? In fact, I believe it is a problem of some people showing a weakness in our system, which I think has served very well and has proven to be good.

Senate bill 675, entitled the Federal Interception Act, is also a good instrumentality for law enforcement, necessary in certain areas to aid in enforcing the criminal laws of our Nation. This bill sets up many safeguards for the public and, at the same time, gives the police the right, under certain specified situations, to investigate criminal offenses by wiretapping. This bill would be very beneficial in practically all vice investigations, such as prostitution, gambling, narcotics, and whisky.

Also on the Federal level, they have other Federal crime, espionage, and so forth. I agree with the judge who testified this morning. If you have a right to get a search warrant to go into a man's house to find evidence, if you have good probable cause, you go to the judge, the judge says that it is good probable cause, we are going to give you the right, there is no distinction.

I both recommend and urge the passage of these two bills to the Congress of the United States.

The other bill that has been presented really I don't know. There is nothing in my jurisdiction about that. But I would like to read you, if I may, it is very short, a paragraph. The gentleman who wrote this article in the Virginia Police Journal, the Honorable T. Gray Hatton. He was a commonwealth's attorney in the city of Richmond for 32 years. I didn't fill his shoes, but anyway, he retired and I ran and was elected.

But I don't think that you will find any prosecutor anywhere in this country who was more respected by people both from the defense and from the prosecution than Judge Hatton. He has been a student of the law and studied it for many years. He said, "In my experience during my term of 33 years as commonwealth attorney of the city of Richmond, I do not know of a more lethal blow that could have been given to the prosecution and conviction of the most vicious crimes than this decision has." That was reported in the Virginia Police Journal, volume 1, No. 4, 1966.

I am happy to report that in my jurisdiction, Senate bill 678 would have no application and, therefore, I do not feel that I am in a position to comment on it, one way or the other. I leave that to the other witnesses who will testify before this subcommittee.

I trust that I have made my position clear. It is both my desire and duty to see that every person charged with a crime within my jurisdiction receives a fair and impartial trial on the issue of guilt or innocence. The only way that this can be accomplished is by the presentation of competent evidence from the prosecution and defense and not by making the truth in a criminal trial secondary to technical procedure matters. I would like to point out that in the Miranda decision, the court stated that the new rules laid down today (June 13, 1966) would assist both the prosecution and defense in ascertaining the truth. This is simply not a fact of life in a criminal prosecution because any lawyer who told his client to confess to the police would more than likely be condemned by the same court for being incompetent.

It is my sincere hope that the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the various States will enact laws to put the rights of an orderly society back in proper perspective, as against the rights of an accused. The American people have a right to demand this and the great instrument revered by us, the Constitution of the United States, demands it. I trust that the legislation this Congress passes will again let the courts in criminal prosecutions look for the truth and not error.

I thank you, gentlemen, for your time and patience, and for extending me an invitation to testify before you on this crucial matter. May your final decision be, and I feel confident that it will be, in the best interest of the American people. I thank you.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very kindly, sir. Senator Ervin, any questions?

Senator ERVIN. Just a few. I will try to make them short. There was a great Virginian named John Marshall, who was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and he said this with reference to interpreting the Constitution: "The wise men who framed and ratified our Constitution must be deemed to have meant what they said."

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Do you think there is any other safe rule for the interpretation of the Constitution than that?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. The Miranda case is allegedly based upon the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment, is it not?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And the self-incrimination clause is couched in these very simple English words: "No person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case."

Isn't it your judgment, if you take Chief Justice Marshall's rule for the interpretation of the Constitution, that those plain English words of the fifth amendment have no relevance whatever to voluntary confessions?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think that is true, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And wasn't it decided in virtually all the Federal courts that have had the occasion to pass on the question, and every State court that had the occasion to pass on this question, that the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment and the comparable self-incrimination clauses in State constitutions have no reference whatever to voluntary confessions?

Mr. WILKINSON. That is correct, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And they held that on the grounds in the first place that the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment only applies to compelled or coerced testimony.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And they held that in the second place it only applied where a man was called upon to be a witness.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. And the man who is merely being questioned by police is not a witness; is he?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I will ask you, in the third place, if they didn't hold that the self-incrimination clause only applied where there was some judicial proceeding which was either criminal in nature or was calculated to bring forth evidence that would result in a criminal prosecution.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; that is my understanding.

Senator ERVIN. So on these three grounds, assigning the plain English words of the self-incrimination clause to the fifth amendment, there is no basis whatever, is there, for the decision in the Miranda case?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir. I think the Chief Justice said the new rules we lay down today.

Senator ERVIN. Yes. I call your attention, on that point, first to this: Is it not true that the fifth amendment was ratified and became a part of the Constitution in 1791?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And for 170 years the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment was construed by all the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, not to have any application whatever to voluntary confessions?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator, I believe it was White v. Maryland where they said the statements made in the preliminary hearing, he was entitled to counsel at that stage, and then they came up with Escobedo, and I believe Mr. Justice Goldberg said when it goes from the investigatory to the accusatory, they extended it to the police court, to the police station, or to anywhere that the man was at, and then Miranda came along and that crucial question—when is a man in custody?—then you have to do it.

In fact, a material witness probably would have to be warned.

Senator ERVIN. The Escobedo case, of course, is based upon the provision of the sixth amendment which says that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Mr. WILKINSON. Right.

Senator ERVIN. And prior to the Escobedo case, it was held for 170 years that that right to counsel did not arise until there was a criminal prosecution instituted either by the issuance of a warrant or the issuance or filing of an information or the return of an indictment or some other form or method of charging the crime.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; that is right.

Senator ERVIN. Didn't the Escobedo case hold, in effect, that the right to counsel preceded the bringing of the criminal charge, and it arose whenever there was a suspicion created in the mind of the arresting officer that the man he had in custody had committed a crime he was investigating?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Now the Court substituted for a certain point that clearly marks the beginning of a prosecution, the very uncertain factor of the arising of uncommunicated suspicion in the mind of an arresting officer?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. It establishes a rule of chaos rather than a rule of reason.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; many officers ask under Escobedo, "When do we advise them?" I said, "When you have in your mind subjective thought that this man is guilty, then you have got to advise them." But that is the trouble. I don't know what the officer is thinking.

Senator ERVIN. And this suspicion doesn't have to be disclosed to anybody in the world.

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. You leave the law enforcement officers uncertain, and the courts uncertain.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to ask you if the ruling in the Escobedo case is not totally incompatible with the very simple English words that say in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to have assistance of counsel for his defense.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; I think they do.

Senator ERVIN. I call your attention to this statement in the Miranda case. At the time this statement was made, the fifth amendment had been in the Constitution for 170 years:

"The warnings required and the waiver necessary in accordance with our opinion today are, in the absence of a fully effective equivalent, prerequisites to the admissibility of any statement made by a defendant."

Do you not construe that to be a voluntary confession by the majority of the Supreme Court in writing that opinion, that they were creating these warnings, the necessity for these warnings, and the necessity for these warnings, and the necessity for this waiver on the 13th of June, 1966?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. If there had been a proper interpretation of the Constitution, this would have been in 1791, wouldn't it?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think so, yes. I think the majority acknowledges that they are new rules.

Then on page 39 of the opinion the same thing: "The principles announced today"—that is June 13, 1966—they said apply in all cases.

Now, I know lawyers don't like to say things like this, but just facing the naked truth, isn't that an act of five members of the Supreme Court changing the meaning of a constitutional provision which for 170 years had no application whatever to voluntary confessions?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think so, yes, sir; no question about that. The Supreme Court changes the Constitution constantly.

Senator ERVIN. And under the Constitution, does anyone have the right or the power to change the meaning of the Constitution, except Congress and the States?

Mr. WILKINSON. That is the way in that document it says it should be amended, sir.

Senator ERVIN. The Court has the power to interpret the Constitution, doesn't it?

Mr. WILKINSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. And interpreting the Constitution is ascertaining what the Constitution means.

Mr. WILKINSON. Right, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And the power to amend the Constitution is changing the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And so on the 13th day of June 1966, five members of the Court, over the dissent of four members, absolutely changed the meaning of the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment, which under its own language and under all of the interpretations of the Court up to that moment had no application whatever to voluntary confessions.

Mr. WILKINSON. Oh, yes, sir. I think on June 13, which happened to be the day I qualified in that Court, they did away with 171 years of law and announced a new rule.

Senator ERVIN. Isn't it true before you can convict a man of a crime in any Federal or State court in the United States, that you know anything about, that you have to prove two things beyond a reasonable doubt?

First, that the crime charged in the criminal accusation had been committed, and second, that the defendant is the person who committed it?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And you have to establish the first of these propositions by independent evidence, that is, evidence independent of the confession of the accused that the crime was committed.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And you have to do that beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And then you have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crime, and in so doing under the law before the Miranda case, you could offer as proof on that question, and on that question alone, the voluntary confession of the accused that he was the guilty party.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. It is rather unique but we have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt by unanimous verdict of the jury, but yet the Supreme Court in a decision 5 to 4 can make major constitutional issues.

Senator ERVIN. Don't you agree with me that the great majority of persons who are charged with serious crimes, I am not talking about misdemeanors, but felonies, serious crimes, already know that they don't have to say anything against themselves when they are arrested, and already know that anything that they do say that is incriminating in nature can be used against them, and already know that they have the right to obtain the services of a lawyer?

Mr. WILKINSON. Oh, yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And I will ask you today as a practical application of the Miranda cases, in the courts throughout the country, if the people who are self-confessed murderers and self-confessed rapists and self-confessed robbers are not being turned loose to prey upon the public, merely because of the failure of a police officer to tell them something they already know?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; undoubtedly that is true.

Senator ERVIN. Don't you think that most people who are arrested, especially those who have not been up for other crimes, have a tendency to talk?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. I know when I practiced law on the side of the defense for 19 years, that a lot of my clients would have been cleared if I could sew up their mouths. But don't men have an almost irresistable impulse to talk about what they are thinking?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, get it off their conscience.

Senator ERVIN. And so when a man has committed a crime, he has an impulse to talk about it, doesn't he?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And a great majority of convictions in the courts can be had because of this tendency of people to talk about what they are thinking, and they tend to talk about the crimes they have committed.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. I think so.

Senator ERVIN. And don't you think that if the smartest people in world had attempted to find some method by which to keep any man from ever making a confession of his guilt, they couldn't have adopted a more effective method than that laid down in the requirements which the Supreme Court attempted to write into the Constitution by a 5-to-4 majority on June 13, 1966, in the Miranda case?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. In fact it makes some defendants scared to talk. They might want to talk, but when you talk about the lawyer and the law, they get involved in that and they wonder.

We have had cases where people have called our officers down to the jail. They have been in custody. I just talked about this the other day. They called them down and told them, "I want to make a full disclosure of everything. I want to start new."

He had a lawyer and they asked me and I said, "You have to make an appointment with his lawyer to go down there." They went down, talked with the lawyer. The lawyer talked with the man. The man came back and indicated he would still like to talk, and his lawyer said, "If I were you I wouldn't say anything."

Senator ERVIN. Under the Miranda rule, the man has to be given an opportunity to have a lawyer present before he can be asked anything, to be interrogated at all, didn't he?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And don't you know that if interrogation is to be had, the lawyer is not going to be willing for his client to say anything until he, the lawyer, has had an opportunity to investigate the case himself.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is right.

Senator ERVIN. And so when he gets the lawyer, if the lawyer has enough intelligence to get out of the legal rain, he is going to tell his client to keep his mouth shut.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think if he didn't tell his clients to keep their mouths shut, the same court that laid down the rules in Miranda would hold that he was not represented by proper counsel, and that counsel was inadequate, and reverse it.

Senator ERVIN. Do you recall in the dissenting opinion in the Escobedo case that Justice White said that the case showed an inclination or a purpose on the part of the majority of the Court, which also was a 5-to-4 majority, to prevent the admission of any kind of confession, voluntary or not?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And don't you think that the Miranda case was the fulfillment of the prophecy that Justice White made in the Escobedo case?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. We can see the day coming when I believe confessions will be ruled out altogether, unless Congress and the State legislatures take some appropriate action to stop it.

Senator ERVIN. Isn't the primary purpose of the criminal law to afford protection to society?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And do you not agree with me that we not only should see that justice is done to the accused, but that justice is also done to society and to the victims of crime?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir, very definitely.

Senator ERVIN. And don't we make it as certain as humanly possible under the laws that existed long before the Miranda case was decided, that no innocent person should be convicted? We give the defendant the presumption of innocence. We give him the right to counsel. We give the right of compulsory production of witnesses in his behalf. We give him to the right to confront and cross-examine his accusers, and require that his guilt be established by evidence which fully substantiates the truth of the charge.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Don't you think that those rules were sufficient to make it as certain as humanly possible that no innocent person be convicted?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir. I will say this. No system is perfect. I will say that our system has reached the point of perfection that man is capable of at this point in civilization.

Senator ERVIN. Can you think of any more convincing evidence of the guilt of any person charged with a crime than his own voluntary confession that he committed the crime?

Mr. WILKINSON. I don't think there is any better evidence.

Senator ERVIN. And on this question of people talking and confessing their sins, don't you know that psychiatrists say, just like the Scriptures, that an honest confession is good for the soul?

Mr. WILKINSON. The first step in repenting.

Senator ERVIN. So the Miranda case not only handicaps law enforcement, not only weighs the scales of justice in favor of the criminal and against society and the victims of crime, but, by discouraging the making of confessions, it even denies the man the benefit of the therapeutic value of an honest confession.

Mr. WILKINSON. That is right. I think this, too, Senator. Under the President's crime report on rehabilitation, if a man is found not guilty, he is certainly not going to go out and say he committed that crime or give any reason for it, but if he has made a voluntary statement, then the specialists in that field, through studying these confessions, maybe we might get to a cause of crime one day.

Senator ERVIN. Didn't the Court in a case 1 week after the Miranda case in Johnson v. New Jersey, refuse to apply the doctrine of the Miranda case to cases tried prior to the Miranda case?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And wasn't that a voluntary confession by five of the Justices who joined in the opinion that they were changing a constitutional provision which had been there for 170 years?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; I think so. I never had any question in my mind that the Court admitted on June 13, 1966, that these are new rules.

Senator ERVIN. In other words, for 170 years, according to the decision of a majority in the Miranda case, the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment had no application whatever to voluntary confessions, but then starting at noon or shortly thereafter on June 13, 1966, it changed and did apply to voluntary confessions along with a whole lot of requirements that can't be found anywhere in the Constitution.

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Not only new rules, it is a new Constitution, is it not?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir; under the new rules.

Senator MCCLELLAN. As adopted by the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think in fairness, Senator, the people on a local basis like myself, we want to know what the rules are, how we have to apply them, and apply them. If Congress says we have to do this, we are perfectly willing to submit to that. But we don't want them to come out in 1965 and say this is what you have to do under Escobedo.

We make a lot of arrests and follow Escobedo, and then come out in June of 1966 and make an entirely set for us to go by, because we act relying on them, and I think stability in the law is the greatness of our law.

Senator ERVIN. One other question.

The Constitution is supposed to be, was intended to be, the most stable of all legal documents in this country, wasn't it?

Mr. WILKINSON. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And starting with the Mapp case in 1961 down to date through Escobedo and the Miranda case, it is as constant as a quivering aspen leaf.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. The committee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

(Whereupon, at 4:40 p.m., the committee was adjourned, to reconvene tomorrow, Thursday, March 9, 1967, at 10 a.m.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

THURSDAY, MARCH 9, 1967

U.S. SENATE, SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:05 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Ervin, Hart, Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Paul L. Woodard, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order. We resume our hearings this morning on a number of bills that the committee is considering.

We are very happy to welcome Judge Holtzoff, one of our distinguished judges here in the District of Columbia.

Judge, we have some serious problems, we think, and we feel that you can be helpful to us. Therefore, we have extended to you and a number of jurists, and several distinguished law enforcement officials throughout the country, invitations to come and testify on the bills before us.

I note that you have a prepared statement. Would you like to read it? Very well, you may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. ALEXANDER HOLTZOFF, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Judge HOLTZOFF. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your gracious invitation and your introduction. I am here in response to your invitation; I would not have considered it appropriate to be here on my own initiative. But, on the other hand, I would feel I was lacking in a spirit of cooperation if I did not appear in compliance with your invitation to testify concerning the bills that you have under consideration. My testimony is given in my personal individual capacity and not in any representative capacity.

Of the various bills before the subcommittee, I feel that I may be in a position to discuss S. 674, entitled, "A bill to amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions." The purpose of the bill is to abrogate the so-called rule of the Mallory case, 354 U.S. 449, which excluded any confession, even if it is voluntary, from being admitted in a court of the United States if the defendant making the confession was not brought before a committing magistrate after his arrest without unnecessary delay, and if the confession was obtained during the period of the delay. This doctrine was predicated not on any constitutional principle, but merely is a procedural matter as a sanction or a means of enforcing rule 5 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which requires an arrested person to be brought before a committing magistrate without unnecessary delay. Since this rule is not based on any constitutional principle, it can be changed by legislation.

As is well known, of course, prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mallory case, the test of admissibility of a confession was whether it was voluntary. A coerced confession, whether the coercion be physical, mental, or moral, was excluded. This doctrine still remains. In addition the Mallory rule excluded even voluntary confessions if there is unnecessary delay in bringing a defendant before a committing magistrate and the confession is made during the period of the delay.

One great difficulty with the rule has arisen out of the differences with which it is construed and applied in the various circuits. Some circuits apply it very reasonably and liberally, while others administer it very narrowly and exclude confessions that other circuits would admit. Perhaps the narrowest construction has been placed on it in the District of Columbia Circuit. This has created serious difficulties because in the District of Columbia local felonies, such as murder, rape, robbery, housebreaking, and burglary, are tried in the Federal court, whereas elsewhere they are tried in the State courts and only Federal crimes go into the Federal courts.

In the second circuit, which has its headquarters in New York, it has been held that it is reasonable to question an arrested person and then to take the time to reduce the statement to writing. The conclusion in the second circuit is that the time taken for these purposes does not constitute an unnecessary delay and, therefore, a statement procured in this manner is admissible. This was held in United States v. Ladson, 294 F. 2d 535 and United States v. Vita, 294 F. 2d 524.

On the other hand, the District of Columbia Circuit takes an extreme position and practically holds that an arrested person must be taken to a magistrate immediately, even in the dead of night, subject to necessary time to make a record of the arrest, fingerprinting the defendant, and similar mechanical processes. This is illustrated by the case of Alston v. United States, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 66, 348 F. 2d 72, in which the conviction of a self-confessed murderer whose guilt was not in dispute, was reversed. The facts are startling. The defendant was brought to police headquarters at 5:30 a.m. He was questioned by the police for about 5 minutes and then immediately confessed on the advice of his wife who had accompanied him with the police. It was held by the court of appeals that the arresting officers should have taken the defendant before a committing magistrate immediately and that the questioning, even for 5 minutes, was not permissible—the conviction was reversed. It is my understanding that the indictment thereafter was dismissed on the motion of the U.S. attorney in view of the fact that he felt that without the confession he did not have sufficient evidence to convict.

Another case that attracted considerable public attention was Killough v. United States, 114 U.S. App. D.C. 305, 315 F. 2d 441. The defendant was charged with first degree murder of his wife. He made several confessions all of which were voluntary; the voluntary character of the confession was not disputed. There were two trials in succession. In each instance the conviction was reversed, in the light of the Mallory rule, and finally the case was dismissed and the self-confessed murderer was turned loose.

There is no doubt whatever that in the District of Columbia at least, many criminals whose guilt was either admitted or was not seriously in dispute have been turned loose because of the manner in which the rule of the Mallory case has been interpreted and applied in this jurisdiction.

In my humble judgment, this was one of the contributing causes to the difficulty in enforcing the criminal law and in the increasing rate of crime. Washington has become a crime-ridden city. The grapevine of the underworld travels fast, and members of the underworld, while not familiar with the intricacies of the law, know the general tendencies, and the result is that they become bolder, feeling that there will be some technicality or other which will save them from punishment.

We get fewer pleas of guilty than we ever did before, because experienced and sophisticated criminals feel that, well, they will take a chance. The chances are very great that eventually, if they are found guilty, the conviction may be reversed.

Not only have we had a diminution in the percentage of pleas of guilty, but trials take longer, because instead of concentrating on the real issue of the case—namely, did the defendant commit the crime, that is what we should be trying—we have to try a great many tangential issues, such as did the policeman take his prisoner promptly enough to a magistrate. Should he have questioned him? Should he have searched him? And more time is devoted to these tangential issues than to the real issue that has to be tried.

The question of guilt or innocence becomes relegated to the background, because in many of these instances guilt isn't seriously in dispute. The only matters that are tried nowadays are these side issues. And I must say that sometimes I feel, when I am trying a criminal case, as though I am in a topsy-turvy world—I am not trying the accused, I am trying the policeman—did he break any rule?

In view of these considerations and in the interest of public safety and law enforcement, legislation such as is embodied in S. 674 is highly desirable and I hope that it will be enacted.

In the commendable desire to be extremely fair to all persons charged with crime, the law has begun to lose sight of the rights of the public and the rights of the victim of the crime.

After all, the victim or the potential victim of the crime is entitled to greater protection than the man who has robbed him or attacked him. As Mr. Justice Cardozo said many years ago in the leading case of Snyder v. Massachusetts (291 U.S. 97, 122), "* * * justice, through due to the accused, is due to the accuser also. The concept of fairness must not be strained till it is narrowed to a filament. We are to keep the balance true."

I was very much interested, Mr. Chairman, that in one of your speeches you quoted the words of Judge Learned Hand. I think those words bear repetition again and again, and if I may, I would like to close my remarks by quoting them again. He said in United States v. Garsson (291 Fed. 646, 649):

> Under our criminal procedure the accused has every advantage. While the prosecution is held rigidly to the charge he need not disclose the barest outline of his defense. He is immune from question or comment on his silence; he cannot be convicted when there is the least fair doubt in the minds of any one of the twelve. * * *. Our dangers do not lie in too little tenderness to the accused. Our procedure has been always haunted by the ghost of the innocent man convicted. It is an unreal dream. What we need to fear is the archaic formalism and the watery sentiment that obstructs, delays, and defeats the prosecution of crime.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and your colleagues for inviting me here and giving me the opportunity to present my views. I appreciate your courtesy.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. I appreciate and the committee appreciates your willingness to come and give us the benefit of your wise judgment, your long experience.

We have a problem in this country. Crime is on the increase, at a rate that cannot long be tolerated. Something must be done. I think it behooves every agency of Government, the three branches of Government, to manifest some interest and assist in finding a solution.

Would you like to bring a chair around here where you can hear us a little better?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am very interested in many of your comments and I have already expressed my appreciation to you. I was particularly impressed by one statement that you made—today, in a criminal trial, the issue is no longer whether he is guilty or innocent.

Judge HOLTZOFF. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. The question of technicalities, whether every little rule was complied with in the process of his arrest and prosecution, becomes paramount, and not the question of truth as to guilt or innocence.

Judge HOLTZOFF. It is really amazing, for the trial judge to see himself diverted to trying these issues instead of the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

Senator McCLELLAN. You stated, I believe, that it is your observation that there are far less pleas of guilty now.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. That has some significance, of course. But are there, in your judgment, far more guilty people escaping the penalties of the law?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, yes. I have no doubt about that. I have no statistics, but I do know that a great many guilty persons are turned loose on these technicalities. Sometimes they aren't even prosecuted because the U.S. attorney realizes that because of some technicalities he can't make a case.

Senator McCLELLAN. Because of the barriers that confront him in these decisions? He can't hurdle the barriers of these decisions.

Judge HOLTZOFF. He can't overcome these barriers.

Senator McCLELLAN. There has been a statement made by a former Attorney General that it is "unutterable nonsense" for anyone to contend that these decisions to which you have referred tend to contribute to the increase in crime. What is your judgment about that?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I emphatically disagree with that statement. Of course, that is not the sole cause of crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. No.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Causes of crime are deep seated. But these considerations add to the number of crimes, because it makes the underworld bolder. They know that the chances of their being caught, convicted, and punished are very greatly decreased as a result of these technicalities.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, a part of our purpose in punishing a criminal is to make it a precedent and a lesson to others?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. As a deterrent to others.

Judge HOLTZOFF. As a deterrent, and as the percentage of cases in which convictions are had decreases, the deterrent likewise decreases, and the friends and acquaintances and other members of the underworld become more bold.

Senator McCLELLAN. As the chances of apprehension and punishment decrease, in proportion crime increases?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, yes. I have no doubt about that. And the frightful increase in the percentage of crime in the District of Columbia I think demonstrates that.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you agree with me that when men like the defendant Killough, the cases you referred to—and there are a number of cases that have already been cited in this record, and we see headlines of them daily in the press throughout the country—known, guilty, confessed, undisputed criminals, murderers, have to be turned loose because of some technicality—there is something wrong with our system of justice that needs to be corrected?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I certainly do. I agree with you fully, Senator. I think the way our administration of criminal justice and criminal law has recently developed, there is something radically wrong with it, and it needs correction.

Senator McCLELLAN. One other question. Have the Escobedo and the Miranda decisions aggravated an already unhappy situation by reason of the Mallory rule?

Judge HOLTZOFF. The Escobedo and the Miranda cases, of course, present a different aspect. The Mallory rule relates to delay in bringing the pirsoner to a committing magistrate.

The Escobedo and Miranda rules do discourage confessions. There is no doubt about that in my mind.

Senator McCLELLAN. The comment was made by my distinguished colleague here—judge Ervin, and witnesses responded to it—that actually, practically every defendant, every citizen, already knows that he has a right to be silent, that he has a right to counsel. What would be your observations and judgment about that after your long years of experience as a trial judge?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I think it is true that a sophisticated criminal, and most criminals have been in trouble before, because they usually started with petty offenses, knows his rights, but given this warning encourages them, reminds them of their rights and encourages them to exercise them. I have no doubt about that.

Senator McClellan. So if an arresting officer, by oversight or inadvertence happened to fail to give them even just one of those warnings, notwithstanding he may know it, notwithstanding he may have been convicted before and have been in court and had the warnings may times before and understood them, still he is entitled to be released?

Judge Holtzoff. Yes.

Senator McClellan. If the confession is the evidence upon which you must sustain a conviction.

Judge Holtzoff. Of course, the Escobedo and the Miranda cases are in a different class in one important respect. They are based on the Constitution. They hold that the Constitution requires these warnings. Therefore, it would take a constitutional amendment, unless the Supreme Court overrules itself, whereas, the Mallory rule being purely a procedural rule, can be changed by legislation.

Senator McClellan. I understood they premised their decision in the Miranda case upon a constitutional ground.

Judge Holtzoff. Yes.

Senator McClellan. But there are only five of the nine judges that so held. I wonder if it is a forlorn hope, in view of the consequences of this decision, that one of them at least might be persuaded that they have gone a little too far.

Judge Holtzoff. Of course, in recent years the Supreme Court has overruled its prior decisions more often than it has before.

Senator McClellan. That does give us a little encouragement.

Judge Holtzoff. Yes.

Senator McClellan. A little hope. Do you think this bill that you refer to, S. 674, is constitutional.

Judge Holtzoff. Oh, yes.

Senator McClellan. I don't think there is any question about that. But if it became law and was taken to the Supreme Court, and the five still felt that under its previous decisions it is unconstitutional, it would still only take one wise man of the five to change his mind.

Judge Holtzoff. Yes.

Senator McClellan. And sustain this legislation as being constitutional, and thus bring us back to some measure of equity and justice, strike some fair balance between society and the murderer, the robber and the rapist; isn't that true?

Judge Holtzoff. Yes, indeed.

Senator McClellan. Senator Ervin.

Senator Ervin. And if the Supreme Court would forget just two cases, the Miranda case and the Escobedo case, and return again to the scores and scores and scores of cases that the Court handed down between 1791 and the 13th of June 1966, we wouldn't need any legislation at all on this subject, would we?

Judge Holtzoff. No, you wouldn't.

Senator Ervin. Judge, I believe the Miranda case is based upon the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment, and that clause says no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case. Just from the standpoint of the English language, do you think that the English language would permit one to say that the self-incrimination clause had any application whatever to a voluntary confession?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I don't think so.

Senator ERVIN. And yet, that is the trouble today in the Miranda case, isn't it? The court took some plain, simple English words that were supposed to express the meaning of those who framed and ratified the Constitution, and gave them an interpretation which is wholly inconsistent with what those plain English words say; is that not true?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I think so. I have often thought in my humble judgment that the privilege against self-incrimination has been carried far beyond what the Founding Fathers must have intended.

Senator ERVIN. In the first place, the privilege against self-incrimination only applies to compelled evidence.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And it only applies to evidence where a person is required to be a witness.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Is required by the law or the rule of court to testify.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And it only applies where he testifies originally in a criminal case.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. In some judicial proceeding.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. I think your statement emphasized very well the point that there are three groups or individuals that are concerned with administration of the criminal law—one is the accused, the other is the victims of the crime, and the other is society itself.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And your statement emphasizes that the criminal law, as I understand your statement, should pay due regard to the rights of each one of the three parties concerned. In other words, the criminal law should see that justice is not only done to the criminal, to the accused rather, but is also done to the victims of the crime and to society.

As I understand it, and I believe your statement reflects the same thought, that you do justice to the accused when you insure that he shall have a fair trial, and that his guilt shall be established beyond a reasonable doubt in the testimony before he is convicted. Does not the law now, prior to these decisions, raise the presumption of innocence in favor of the accused, and require that he be specifically notified of the charge against him? It gives him the right to counsel. It gives him the right to compulsory process to obtain witnesses in his own behalf. It gives him the right to take the stand in his own behalf or refrain from taking the stand in his own behalf, and forbids comment upon his failure to testify.

It gives him the right to confront in person or by counsel the witnesses against him. He can cross-examine them. And it gives him the right to be tried by an impartial judge, an impartial jury in an atmosphere of judicial calm, and it requires also that his guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt in the minds and consciences of each one of the 12 jurors.

Do you not think that those rules that I have enumerated make it as certain as can be made humanly possible that no innocent person shall ever be convicted?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I most emphatically agree with that statement.

Senator ERVIN. And don't you think that in establishing and enforcing those rules, that the law not only gives justice to the accused, but in effect almost leans backward to do so?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I think it does. I think even the old requirement of reasonable doubt sometimes saved a guilty person from conviction, and that is salutary, because we don't want to run the risk of convicting an innocent person. But I think these additional rules that we have been discussing don't aid the innocent against erroneous convictions. They only aid the guilty in escaping punishment.

Senator ERVIN. Aren't these rules in a sense, in the ultimate sense, unfair and unjust to the victims of the crime and unjust and unfair to society?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I think so.

Senator ERVIN. And do they not only prevent the vindication of the rights of the victims of the crime, but to a very substantial degree, deny society the power to protect itself against crime?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, yes. I don't suppose there is any city in the Western World where there are more street crimes than there are right here in Washington, where women especially, and many men too, are afraid to go out after dark.

Senator ERVIN. Judge, do you not agree with me that the rules laid down in the Miranda case are very unrealistic and fail to take note of human beings as they are constituted?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes. Of course, in a sense, the Miranda case changed the Constitution, because it redefined what due process of law is. It put new requirements on due process of law. It is almost an amendment to the Constitution.

Senator ERVIN. I just wonder if you will agree with me in the proposition that the five justices who agreed to the majority opinion in the Miranda case made a voluntary confession that they were changing the Constitution when they handed down that opinion in that two or three times they referred to the rules as, "the requirements we lay down today."

Judge HOLTZOFF. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. So that is one voluntary confession that hasn't been excluded from testimony as far as this committee is concerned. Do you think, from your experience in the administration of criminal justice, which in my judgment is second to that of no man in the United States, that there is any stronger evidence of the guilt of the person charged with a crime than his voluntary confession that he committed the crime with which he is charged?

Judge HOLTZOFF. I most emphatically feel that way. I think that a voluntary confession ordinarily is the strongest type of evidence there can be. Religion encourages confessions.

Senator ERVIN. And does this not also go against human nature? It is human nature normally for a man to talk about what he is thinking and if he has committed a crime, in most cases, unless he is a rather sophisticated criminal, he wants to talk about it.

Judge HOLTZOFF. The average person isn't going to confess to a crime that he didn't commit. It isn't human nature, unless he is trying to shield somebody, and that is very rare.

Senator ERVIN. Don't you think that the Miranda case will for all practical intents and purposes virtually outlaw the use of voluntary confessions?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Pretty much. Certainly the percentage of confessions will be reduced to almost—well, I don't like to say to zero, but to a very small figure.

Senator ERVIN. Now when a man is in custody and the officer wants to interrogate him, under the Miranda case he must defer the interrogation until a lawyer is present, if the suspect wants one. Wouldn't the normal lawyer under those circumstances, being called in as a matter of precaution and as a matter of duty to his client, not having had an opportunity to investigate the case, wouldn't he advise his client not to say anything?

Judge HOLTZOFF. Oh, a lawyer would naturally, and quite properly, advise the suspect, "Don't say anything."

Senator ERVIN. That is exactly what I would do under all circumstances unless I knew exactly what the case was about.

Judge, I wish to say this—that if all the judges in the Federal and State courts in the country, the trial courts, had held the scales of justice as even and as impartially as you have, justice would have been done in virtually all the cases tried, and if all of them had adhered as faithfully to the law as you have done in presiding over the courts of the District, we could certainly say that we have administered justice under law, and equal justice under the law.

Judge HOLTZOFF. This is very generous and gracious of you and I appreciate it greatly. What you have said is beyond my just desserts.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We all feel that way.

Judge HOLTZOFF. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I want to read you a telegram. I want you to know that you are not by yourself. I want you to know that citizens throughout this country are alarmed and distressed. I read excerpts from a telegram I just received. This is one of many that come daily, letters and telegrams, pleading for relief, for protection, for the Congress to do something. Here is one, he says:

> This is directed to you in your capacity as Chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee. My concern is by virtue of being a justice of the peace, parent, citizen and lawyer. As a JP in this West Texas community of 10,000, with eight cross-roads of nine arterial highways, I meet head on constantly with the damaging affectations of the Miranda case. Law enforcement in the grade of felony has run up against a blank wall. No longer can a mere suspect be questioned. If some change is not made soon, enforcement will be at a a standstill. As a father and citizen, I recognize that the criminal suspect has a greater protection than my children. No longer does the mad dog get shot, but the pets are to be locked up while the former roams the streets with slobbering impunity.

Judge HOLTZOFF. That is good.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think that is a pretty good statement. Senator, any questions?

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, I don't have any questions. I would just like to express my sincere appreciation to the distinguished jurist for testifying here today. I feel that this matter of confessions is the most important question upon which we could take action. I feel that more guilty people are turned loose today because of the Miranda and Escobedo decisions, and also the Mallory decision, than on any other three decisions of the Supreme Court, and I hope that this Congress in this session will take action to remedy this situation.

I realize of course too, this does not relieve the President of the importance of selecting the right people for high judicial posts, and I think one of the most important qualities that he could consider would be to obtain trained jurists somewhat like we have had here this morning, to serve on the Supreme Court, rather than to appoint lawyers without any judiciary experience whatever.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Judge HOLTZOFF. May I thank you. I want to express my gratitude for a very edifying and rewarding experience this morning.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you kindly, sir.

Judge HOLTZOFF. I appreciate what you are doing for the good of the public.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, sir. Judge Kreider, will you come around please, sir. Have a seat, Judge. We appreciate your interest and cooperation with this committee. We welcome you this morning. We would be glad to have you give us the benefit of your views.

STATEMENT OF HON. HOMER L. KREIDER, PRESIDENT JUDGE, COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, HARRISBURG, PA.

Judge KREIDER. Thank you, Senator. I deem it a very high honor to be invited to express my views to this distinguished committee, in regard to Senate bills 674, 675, 678, and 917.

I am heartily in favor of the passage of all of those bills.

Senator McCLELLAN. Give me those numbers again.

Judge KREIDER. S. 674, S. 675, S. 678 and S. 917, the first relating, as you all know, to the confession in evidence subject, the second to wiretapping, the third to outlawing the Mafia, and the fourth to the bill to grant aid to the various local governments to strengthen their law enforcement agencies.

The subject of Senate bill 674 is the admissibility in evidence of confessions. It amends chapter 223, title 18, United States Code (relating to witnesses and evidence) by adding at the end thereof a new section 3501 entitled: "Admissibility of Confessions," as follows:

(a) In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States or by the District of Columbia, a confession, as defined in subsection (e) hereof, shall be admissible in evidence if it is voluntarily given. Before such confession is received in evidence, the trial judge shall, out of the presence of the jury, determine any issue as to voluntariness. If the trial judge determines that the confession was voluntarily made it shall be admitted in evidence and the trial judge shall permit the jury to hear relevant evidence on the issue of voluntariness and shall instruct the jury to give such weight to the confession as the jury feels it deserves under all the circumstances.

I consider this very important as incorporating into this bill due process provisions which are referred to in the Miranda decision.

(b) The trial judge in determining the issue of voluntariness shall take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the giving of the confession, including (1) the time elapsing between arrest and arraignment of the defendant making the confession, if it was made after arrest and before arraignment, (2) whether such defendant knew the nature of the offense with which he was charged or of which he was suspected at the time of making the confession, (3) whether or not such defendant was advised or knew that he was not required to make any statement and that any such statement could be used against him, (4) whether or not such defendant had been advised prior to questioning of his right to the assistance of counsel; and (5) whether or not such defendant was without the assistance of counsel when questioned and when giving such confession.

The urgent need for this bill was clearly demonstrated by Senator McClellan in his address before the Senate on January 25, 1967. At that time he stated that the test of the admissibility of a confession in evidence should "rest upon the circumstances in each individual case and should be applied upon the circumstances in each individual case and should be applied by those best able to make the determination—our trial judges and juries who hear and see the witnesses." Moreover, the distinguished Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedures, pointed out that "the majority of opinion in the Miranda decision[1] actually 'encourages' Congress and State legislatures to enact legislation on the subject which would safeguard the rights of the accused while promoting efficient enforcement of our criminal laws."

May I say that I have been on the bench 15 years as a trial judge in our common pleas court at Harrisburg, Pa., and that prior to that time I had a general practice of law, and tried a number of cases in the criminal courts representing the defendant, and I was so engaged as a trial lawyer for 27 years before going on the bench.

I say to this distinguished committee that I firmly believe that juries, who are given the awesome power and responsibility of determining the guilt or innocence of a defendant charged, for example, with murder and who in Pennsylvania are required by law, if they find a verdict of murder in the first degree, to fix the penalty at death or life imprisonment, are also qualified and should have the right to determine whether a confession was in fact "voluntarily given."

Senate bill No. 674 amply protects the defendant by requiring, as stated, that "before such confession is received in evidence, the trial judge shall, out of the presence of the jury, determine any issue as to voluntariness" and to withhold the confession from the jury if he finds that it was involuntary. If, however, the trial judge determines that it was voluntary, that is not the end of the matter, because he may not express his opinion and must let the jury decide how much weight it feels the confession deserves under all the circumstances, with the power in the jury to disregard it if it so determines.

These provisions, in my judgment, fully protect the defendant and apply the due process rules announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Jackson v. Denno, Warden, 378 U.S. 368 (1964). One of the wholesome provisions, and there are many, of this bill, is that a confession having been found voluntary by the trial judge and thereafter to be trustworthy by the jury, could not be set aside automatically by an appellate court solely because some policeman at the station house or elsewhere failed to give one or more of the four-point warnings now required by Miranda v. Arizona. No longer, if this bill is enacted into law, would it be mandatory that "the criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered" as stated by Mr. Justice Cardozo, who was one of the great and liberal jurists of our time.[2] In other words, the totality of the circumstances would determine whether or not the confession should be admitted in evidence. This was the time-honored rule, as Judge Holtzoff has told us this morning, which was followed by our courts prior to Escobedo v. Illinois, decided June 22, 1964 and Miranda v. Arizona, June 13, 1966, and it should be reinstated.

As pointed out by Senator McClellan and Senator Ervin, this was the rule which was followed since our Government was established, and I agree it should be reinstated.

Recently the press reported a story concerning Police Commissioner Edward J. Bell of Philadelphia.[3] I looked at your list of witnesses, and I learned this morning that he was scheduled to be in attendance. This article related to two confessed murderers who had to be set free by reason of the recent U.S. Supreme Court rulings. Commissioner Bell stated the police had warned one of the suspects of his rights but had neglected to tell him "we would furnish him with a lawyer if he wanted one." Bell said this happened a year before Miranda. The case, however, came to trial after that decision, and as a result thereof it was nol prossed and the murderer "is on the street." Because of these decisions, Commissioner Bell continued, "the chances of a successful prosecution have dropped off tremendously."

The tragic story of a man in New York City who had killed his wife and five children and was set free because he had not been meticulously informed of his rights as outlined in recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions, was reported in my hometown newspaper, the Harrisburg (Pa.) Evening News, February 21, 1967, in a front-page eight-column headline. I assure the distinguished members of this committee that the Evening News is not a tabloid. It is a fine, high-grade newspaper.

What prompted this headline of such magnitude, which I never saw in the paper before, was the fact not only of the viciousness of a crime in which the defendant had killed his wife and five children, but that three other murderers had been liberated in New York City a few months previously for similar reasons, the lack of giving these meticulous instructions to the defendants before taking any statement from them.

At the present time in Harrisburg, a city of only 79,000 inhabitants, we have three unsolved cases involving the robbery and murder of three small merchants, all within approximately 1 year. These cases have been pending for several years and may never be brought to trial if the present rules which greatly hamper criminal investigation remain in effect.

Senator McCLELLAN. Those are cases in which the crime occurred before these decisions?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Where they were indicted and due process was in operation. And these decisions have in effect made it impossible to proceed with the prosecution, because some warning was not given the defendant prior to the time he confessed.

[3] The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, Feb. 22, 1967, p. 3.

Judge KREIDER. Senator, if I may say so, by reason of these decisions, and I beg leave to limit my statement to these general words, the district attorney, and the police after thorough investigation feel that they are not able to charge anyone at the present time with the commission of any offense, and I respectfully ask your leave to limit my statement in that regard.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is all right. I just wanted to get the import of what you were saying.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. You just said the district attorney. Are you saying all district attorneys?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Are you aware of the report of the district attorney of Los Angeles County, which came out last year, in which the district attorney in a rather comprehensive study, reached a contrary conclusion?

Judge KREIDER. I read that, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. I am just trying to put your statement in the proper context. I am wondering if you could tell us what you think its strengths and weaknesses were.

Judge KREIDER. I think there was a sharp divergence of opinion between the district attorney of Los Angeles County and the late honored and highly respected Chief of Police Parker of Los Angeles, who passed away within the last year. I think they disagreed very strongly on that.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, you say the district attorneys, law enforcement officers, and police officials feel that way. I have been trying to find out in the time we have been having these hearings the reasons upon which those feelings are based. It appears to me that recent statements by district attorneys and law enforcement officials increasingly reflect the opinion that the decision has not resulted in the extraordinary hindrance that was initially expected.

I thought that the report of the district attorney of Los Angeles County was one of the most comprehensive reports dealing with the subject that we are discussing that I have seen and I think it would be helpful to consider what the district attorney in one of the largest counties in our country, has said concerning the relationship of Miranda to law enforcement problems.

I only mention that because I know you wouldn't want to leave the impression in this committee that all district attorneys and all law enforcement personnel are in universal agreement as to the effect of the decision on law enforcement.

Judge KREIDER. I have read newspaper accounts, magazine articles with respect to the gentleman to whom you referred, Senator. I know of no other district attorney who agrees with him. But nevertheless that is a factor, as you stated.

Senator ERVIN. I might state my understanding is that the Los Angeles district attorney made that statement based on 3 weeks' experience only, and I had the privilege of addressing the North Carolina State bar last October, and virtually every district prosecuting attorney, we call them solicitors in North Carolina, was there, and every one of them told me that they were seriously handicapped by the Miranda and Escobedo cases in prosecuting their dockets, and as a result of it, that hundreds of parties who were self-confessed criminals had to be turned loose.

And I would like somebody—I have been interested in this matter too—I would like for somebody to bring up some statement from some district attorney other than the Los Angeles district attorney taking such a position. There are just thousands and thousands and thousands of them in the United States, and that is the only one I have seen anywhere in the paper. I have seen some comments on this. Outside of that, I haven't seen a single one, and there are exceptions to all rules.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right, you may proceed.

Judge KREIDER. Thank you, Senator.

Truly, as Lord Shawcross, the eminent former Attorney General of Great Britain and prosecutor in the Nuremberg war crimes trials, said in an address before the Chicago Crime Commission October 11, 1965: "The Criminal is living in a golden age." [4]

Law enforcement, as we all know, is a two-way street and a fundamental duty of the Government is to protect the lives and property of all of its citizens. Under our Constitution, all law-abiding persons have rights which must be respected and safeguarded if our democracy is to survive on the homefront.

My colleagues on the bench and I have had the painful duty under recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions to take from the jury murder cases which could not be made out by the Commonwealth for lack of sufficient evidence, after we had been required to exclude the defendant's confession under those Supreme Court decisions.

The jurors and the public in general were literally dumbfounded and the judges were questioned by the press and were stopped on the street by well-meaning and intelligent citizens who respectfully inquired, sometimes in almost hushed tones, how these startling results came about.

Having personally undergone such an experience, I concluded that in the public interest—and in self-defense—it was necessary to acquaint the people with the reasons for our actions. This I endeavored to do in a series of addresses to women's and service clubs, fraternal societies, church and business groups, school teachers' institutes, as we used to call them, and other professional organizations. Invariably, the reaction was one of keen interest, pained surprise and shock that the scales of justice had been tilted, usually by a majority of only one vote in the Supreme Court of the United States, against the long-established rules of criminal procedures which had given a substantial measure of protection to our citizens since the Federal Government began to function under our Constitution in 1789.

I say to the distinguished members of this committee that I find this public interest in criminal law enforcement is more widespread than ever, that it is vigorously and often vehemently expressed, not only by men but women as well, and that it is increasing in intensity.

Senator McCLELLAN. Judge, in Pennsylvania, can the State appeal from a decision of the trial judge excluding a confession under the Miranda rule?

[4] Reported in U.S. News & World Report, Nov. 1, 1965, pp. 80–82 and quoted in the "Additional Views of Messrs. Jaworski, Malone, Powell, and Storey" in the Report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, p. 307 (February 1967).

Judge KREIDER. No.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, the State has no appeal.

Judge KREIDER. It has no appeal.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You feel bound in your duty as the trial judge by the Miranda decision?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Being the mandate of the Supreme Court, you have found it compulsory under the circumstances, to dismiss a confessed murderer, and the State has no appeal?

Judge KREIDER. In my opinion it has not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think the public should understand that.

Judge KREIDER. That is very important.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think we should make that known too, that the State government can't appeal, because the prisoner has once been put in jeopardy, and the double jeopardy provisions of the Constitution would apply.

Judge KREIDER. There are certain exceptions, if the judge has made a mistake allegedly in the interpretation of the statute.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Judge KREIDER. And in that very narrow limited category there is an appeal, but for all practical purposes, no, there is no appeal on the part of the Commonwealth.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think the record should reflect that.

Senator HRUSKA. Will the Senator yield?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes, I yield.

Senator HRUSKA. In view of the fact that there is no appeal, how can a case ever get back up to the Supreme Court so we can have a reconsideration of this question, and possibly some enlightenment hit that very fine, reverent and very fine body, and correct it? How can an appeal be gotten back?

Judge KREIDER. At the present time I cannot answer that. I don't see how it can be at the present time.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the passage of a bill like this one before us, introduced by our chairman, would the testing of its constitutionality be one way that we could get it back before the Supreme Court?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, that might be.

Senator HRUSKA. Maybe you will cover it in your statement later, but have you given any consideration to the constitutionality of S. 674?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, I have, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. Will you comment on it later?

Judge KREIDER. I do not cover that in my statement. I think it is constitutional under article 3 of the U.S. Constitution, which governs the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in all cases except where they have original jurisdiction, suits between States and affecting ambassadors, consuls and so on.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right, proceed.

Judge KREIDER. The report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice filed in February 1967 (p. 127) states: "Courts can be only as effective and just as the judges and prosecutors, counsel, and jurors who man them." This is true indeed, but these public servants cannot function effectively if vital evidence is to be suppressed by narrow and hypertechnical restrictions that thwart the legitimate purpose of all trials, which is to discover the truth.

Senate bill 674 would also relax the stringent Mallory rule [5] which requires undue haste in arraigning the defendant and thus cuts off further detention and immedate police investigation of persons suspected of having committed vicious crimes such as murder, kidnaping, rape, burglary, and robbery.

The passage of Senate bill 674 also would remove another substantial roadblock to law enforcement. As pointed out by Professor Warden, of Vanderbilt University: [6]

> In the latest publicized, but in legal effect perhaps the most important portion of the Miranda opinion, the Court placed the burden of proving the voluntary nature of the confession squarely upon the prosecution. This burden of proof will not be met by showing silence on the part of the accused when informed of his right.

Chief Justice Warren, who wrote the 5-to-4 opinion in Miranda emphasized that:

> A heavy burden rests on the Government to demonstrate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel.

I think the trial judge and jury who see and hear the defendant are best qualified to determine whether this "heavy burden" has been met. This bill, S. 674, resolves that question in my humble opinion.

Former Judge W. Walter Braham, of New Castle, is one of Pennsylvania's most outstanding and highly respected jurists. Until a few weeks ago he was president of the Pennsylvania Bar Association. In a memorable address, delivered at Philadelphia, entitled "In Aid of Judges," delivered to that body on January 19, 1967, he stated:

> It is time that some one thinks of the police in this brave new world. Miranda lays down a code of conduct for policemen which is almost impossible of performance.[7]

I pass now to just a few comments on Senate bill No. 675 which relates to wiretapping.

The wiretapping bill, known as the Federal Wire Interception Act, should be enacted into law. I agree with the sponsor's statement that wiretapping should be prohibited except when used under strict court supervision to apprehend persons when there is reasonable cause to believe they are about to commit serious crimes. As stated in S. 675, section 2(c):

> (c) Modern criminals make extensive use of the telephone and telegraph as a direct instrumentality of crime and as means of conducting criminal business. In some circumstances, interception of wire communications in order to obtain evidence of the commission of crime is a necessary aid to effective law enforcement."

This committee has effectively demonstrated to the Nation during the past few years that there is urgent need for such legislation. Every clear thinking, law-abiding citizen who witnessed its dramatic probing into the shadowy precincts of the powerful criminal syndicates could not fail to be awed by the magnitude of their domain. There is no reason why, in this day when our Government is trying to land spacecraft on the moon, our law enforcement officials should be restricted to horse and buggy methods, and thus enable affluent and arrogant bigtime criminals to smugly thwart the law by using their jet-age scientific methods to operate.

The proposed bill permits wiretapping only in exceptional circumstances which first must be set forth in a written application upon oath or affirmation by an investigative or law enforcement officer and thereafter approved by the court which may require the applicant to furnish additional testimony or documentary evidence in support thereof. Moreover, each order of court granting leave to intercept any wire communication shall specify, inter alia, the period of time during which such interception is authorized. I think it is 20 days in this bill.

With these safeguards, it appears to me there is no real danger in permitting the interception of wire communications in exceptional cases.

The bill also provides that if the law enforcement agencies need additional time, and if they can make out a case before the judge that they do need that additional time, he is authorized to extend it. The point I make, and what I like about the bill, is its specificity, and its requirements before one can get a court order to permit wiretapping.

Senator McCLELLAN. Don't you think under this bill the judge to whom the application is made can so write his order as to keep absolute control of it?

Judge KREIDER. He certainly can.

Senator McCLELLAN. There is no reason for any abuse, if the judge is honest and has integrity.

Judge KREIDER. None whatever, and I understand that they have a wiretapping bill in the State of New York and that it is working.

Senator McCLELLAN. Have had it for years, and it is working successfully.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. And if we come to a point where we are so skeptical we can no longer trust the integrity of the judges over the courts of our land, in a matter where we are undertaking to enforce the law, then we have reached a point of desperation so far as our civilization is concerned.

Judge KREIDER. I certainly agree with that statement. May I continue?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes, you may.

Judge KREIDER. I thank you.

The same sordid conditions which necessitate court authorized wiretapping, more than justify the passage of Senate bill No. 678 which would outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. Your committee, through hearings in the past, of which the whole Nation knows and commends you for your splendid work in that investigation, has obtained a vast and valuable storehouse of information disclosing the operations of the Mafia which is undoubtedly one of the most vicious organizations operating in the United States today. The bill, if enacted into law, would go far in exterminating an ominous menace to the public safety.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding, I prepared a two-page memorandum which is incorporated in my statement with respect to the harassment of the courts and the harassment of the district attorney and the clerks of the courts and all the personnel of the law-enforcement agencies with respect to repetitive habeas corpus petitions. I do not want to lengthen my statement. If you will permit, I will read it rapidly or I will incorporate it, as you so desire, whichever you prefer.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would be glad for it to be incorporated in the record.

HABEAS CORPUS

In his Pennsylvania Bar Association address Judge Branham also discussed the deplorable situation resulting from the wholesale abuse of habeas corpus by the filing of frivolous and repetitive petitions under the Pennsylvania Post Conviction Act of 1966.[8]

Time does not permit extended discussion of this enlightening address and the remedies proposed but I invite the committee's attention to it and respectfully request that it be included by reference in my statement.

In a laudable attempt to bring some order out of chaos, the Pennsylvania Act provides for a uniform type of petition in which are printed 13 reasons most frequently given to support a habeas corpus petition. The prisoner is expected to check off only those reasons applicable to him. Unfortunately, the plan has not worked as well as expected because prisoners frequently check off many irrelevant "reasons," thus leaving it to the judge to determine the proper category, if any, in which to place the meager factual averments which are alleged in support of petition. The latter are frequently untrue or highly distorted.

Statistics supplied by the district attorney of Dauphin County, LeRoy S. Zimmerman, disclose that 80 postconviction and habeas corpus petitions have been filed in our county during the period 1965–66. This is a large number for a county of 222,000 inhabitants.

These petitions follow the national pattern. Mr. Justice Clark has stated that at least 98 percent are without any merit whatever (Fay, Warden v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, at p. 445, 1963). Nevertheless, when received they must be docketed, receipt acknowledged to the petitioner, copies prepared and sent to the district attorney and the attorney general. Thereafter, the court issues a rule on the district attorney to show cause within 20 days why the petition should not be granted. The case file must be consulted and the notes of testimony read.

If the judge grants a hearing, counsel must be appointed for the petitioner, who usually will have to be brought about 100 miles from the correctional institution near Philadelphia to Harrisburg. Two deputy sheriffs are required for the round trip.

But the end is not yet.

[8] The act of 1966, Jan. 25, Public Law ——— (1965), No. 554, effective Mar. 1, 1966 (19 Purdon's Pennsylvania Statutes Annotated, sec. 1180–1, pocket pt.).

If the writ of habeas corpus is not granted the petitioner usually files an informal appeal to the superior or supreme court. The judge is required to file a memorandum opinion within 30 days stating the reasons for his order of dismissal. The district attorney likewise must file a brief and orally argue the case in the appellate courts which meet only once a year in Harrisburg. More than likely the case will be transferred for argument to Philadelphia or Pittsburgh.

Almost every week my four common pleas colleagues, Judges Herman, Shelley, Bowman, and Lipsitt, and I are harassed by frivolous habeas corpus petitions which must be given precedence over serious and important matters. While each of our judges has had more than his full share of such work, Judge James S. Bowman holds the record in this area. In one case a petitioner had been sentenced in 1943 after pleading guilty, without counsel, to snatching purses on four separate occasions from elderly women attending market. After serving about 1½ years he was paroled but recommitted on various occasions after committing new crimes. He was granted a new trial following Gideon v. Wainwright and again convicted and sentenced in 1963. Then followed to the present time a series of 17 papers in the nature of motions for new trial, petitions for writs of habeas corpus, and miscellaneous petitions, the last of which the court has indirectly learned was a habeas corpus petition of unknown nature filed in the U.S. district court.

The words of Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting in Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391, at p. 476 [9] are most appropriate:

> The orderly administration of justice requires that even a criminal case some day come to an end.

I have asked Judge Bowman to give me his views on habeas corpus and suggestions for improvement. Accordingly, he prepared a brief memorandum which I now ask permission to have incorporated in the record.

I simply want to add that Mr. Justice Clark of the U.S. Supreme Court stated in Fay v. Noia that 98 percent of these habeas corpus petitions are utterly frivolous, and our experience bears that out. We have had a great number of headaches in this. We have been required to set aside important matters simply to take up these frivolous habeas corpus petitions.

It has gotten so bad now that usually the petitioner accuses his own lawyer of being incompetent, and in some events in our county has sued his own lawyer, and even the judges, in one instance, for $15 million. He didn't collect it. He didn't get a judgment either.

But that is the stock pattern, and we thought that passage of a habeas corpus bill setting forth the 13 reasons that could conceivably be alleged, that would channel the complaint into some semblance of regularity, but it hasn't worked too well, and Judge Braham discusses that beautifully in his address, and I respectfully ask permission to have that inserted into the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection it will be received for the record.

In Aid of Judges

(Address by W. Walter Braham, President of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, Delivered January 19, 1967, at the Opening Session of the Association's 71st Annual Meeting, Philadelphia, Pa.)

The rules of the Pennsylvania Bar Association provide that "the President in his address shall refer to any statutory changes of public interest and any needed changes suggested by judicial decision during the year." I propose to refer to one statute, only: the Post-conviction Hearing Act of January 25, 1966,[1] selected because it is the Pennsylvania involvement in one of the most important and potentially troublesome developments in the law in recent years.

At the center of our discussion will be the writ of habeas corpus, the most general, the most effective, and the most highly esteeemd of all legal weapons in the arsenal of freedom. It is the writ which commands one who deprives another of his liberty to bring the prisoner before the judge and show by what lawful right he holds him.

At common law there were certain advantages to the writ of habeas corpus. The judge was not bound by precedent. There was no statute of limitations. The applicant could go from one court to another until he found a judge willing to hear his plea. The whole case could be tried de novo; that is all over again. There was no limitation on the number of times when the same prisoner could use the writ.[2] The petition for post conviction relief—a modern variant of habeas corpus—can be brought only in the court which pronounced sentence.

In England, originally no appeal was allowed in criminal cases, then only a very guarded appeal. Habeas corpus was developed as a means of correcting trial errors. In modern times, ample appeal provisions have been provided for criminal cases, and the use of habeas corpus to review the legality of trial procedures has largely disappeared.[3]

In the Federal courts of the United States, no appeal in criminal cases was allowed for almost 100 years.[4] After appeal was available, it was the law that habeas corpus would not lie as a substitute for appeal.

How disturbing it is therefore, in these modern days to discover that, after the organization of definite channels of appeal leading to the Supreme Court of the United States, the use of habeas corpus has developed again in addition to, and almost as a substitute for, the ordinary processes of appeal, and certainly as a third level of inquiry in criminal cases.

In order to understand this development, it is necessary to appreciate a few facts about American constitutional history. When the United States Constitution was adopted, it contained no Bill of Rights. There was sufficient demand for a Bill of Rights to cause a compromise to be agreed upon, namely, that the Bill of Rights would appear as the first 10 amendments. It was understood, however, that the Bill of Rights was binding on the Federal government only.[5] This view continued long after the Civil War. In 1867 the Supreme Court was, for the first time, given the right to review state convictions. The 14th Amendment was adopted in 1870. It contained this pregnant language.

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The traditional view that the provisions of the Bill of Rights did not apply to the states continued for many years, the United States Supreme Court considering that it had the right to review State convictions only to the extent of determining whether the State court had acted within its appropriate jurisdiction under the Constitution.[6]

The change to the view that the Bill of Rights applies directly to the State came gradually. I select two murder cases to illustrate this change. The first one was Frank v. Mangum,[7] decided in 1914, in which a poor Negro was convicted in a murder trial dominated by rioting both within and without the courtroom. The Supreme Court, reviewing the case in its traditional search for the jurisdiction of the lower court, believed itself powerless to intervene. Justice Holmes and Justice Hughes dissented; they believed that when the mob rather than the trial judge took over the trial, the defendants were denied that due process of law which is guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment.

In Moore v. Dempsey[8] decided nine years later, Justice Holmes' opportunity came. He was assigned to write the opinion in habeas corpus arising out of a murder case where the roar of the mob might be said to be discernible through the crackling phrases of Justice Holmes' opinion. The Supreme Court reversed its former decision and ruled that where the court was unable to control the mob and vindicate its own authority, the defendant had not had a fair trial, and that under the fourteenth amendment the court must intervene directly and grant a new trial.

Some months ago, J. Edward Lumbard, Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit[9] said that an examination of the decisions of the Supreme Court for the past 40 years discloses two trends: one, an effort to widen and strengthen the civil rights of individuals, and the other, to limit and control the efforts of law enforcement officers.

The right of an indigent defendant in a criminal case to the assistance of counsel is one illustration of a widening of civil rights. The old rule was that the States decided the right to counsel and that the law was satisfied if a lawyer was appointed in time to prepare for trial. This has been changed. In Powell v. Alabama[10] it was held that a lawyer must be provided in every capital case. In Gideon v. Wainwright in 1962[11] it was held that a lawyer must be provided in every felony case. The real change came in Escobedo v. Illinois[12] where is was decreed that a lawyer must be available to the defendant after the police are no longer engaged in a general investigation, but have focused on the defendant as a suspect.

Closely connected with the right to counsel is the right not to be compelled in a criminal case to be a witness against oneself. In the old days, men were coerced by human torture. When a defendant refused to talk and the judge said "You may examine", he meant that the government's men might take a defendant to the torture room and put him to the "wheel" or the "rack" or the "boot" until he would talk.

In modern times, the guaranty of the Fifth Amendment has meant that no confession secured by violence, by threats or by promises was voluntary and that if voluntary, it could not be used against the defendant. In the Escobedo case, it was held that no admission or confession received after the defendant was a suspect could be used against him unless the police had informed him: that he need not answer; that what he said might be used against him at trial; that he had a right to a lawyer, and that, if he were indigent, a lawyer would be provided for him. This was held to be compelling him to give testimony against himself.

Miranda v. Arizona[13] went still further. There, Chief Justice Warren indicated that ordinarily the presence of an officer may of itself have so coercive an effect on a suspect that statements made by the suspect after the officers have arrived may not be used against him unless the warnings have been given.

Mapp v. Ohio[14] was a case where officers, looking for a "numbers" violation, were searching Mrs. Mapp's house. They had no proper search warrant. They found a quantity of obscene material and she was later indicted for the possession of unlawful material. It was held in the later prosecution that the unlawful objects so discovered could not be used against her in the trial.

Two recent cases, bearing on the functions of the jury require mention. In the majority of the States it has been the practice to submit to the jury the questions whether a confession was voluntary and whether it was true. This was held to be contrary to due process in Jackson v. Denno[15] and this case has been cited more than 150 times since 1964. The right of the trial judge to comment on the failure of the defendant to testify in his own behalf has not been recognized in our federal courts, although it is the general custom in Europe and it has been recognized in some of our States: the Constitution of California specifically allowed it, but this was held to be unlawful in Griffin v. California.[16]

Having widened the rights of individuals in the manner indicated, in another series of cases the Supreme Court pointed out the procedure by which these rights are to be vindicated. The three cases spoken of are Fay v. Noia,[17] Townsend v. Sain[18] and Saunders v. United States.[19]

The Noia case discloses the determination of the Supreme Court to assert its authority over all cases of federal civil rights tried in state courts. The prisoner's petition for habeas corpus was filed in the Federal courts 14 years after the date of his sentence. The Supreme Court voided the sentence and directed the prisoner's release unless he was granted an immediate new trial. Townsend v. Sain ruled that the District Court had to accord the prisoner a full trial of his case de novo, although more than five petitions for habeas corpus had been filed in the case, and it had been three times before the Supreme Court on certiorari. Saunders v. United States involved a federal prisoner; after losing in one hearing, he was allowed to allege other grounds and get another hearing.

The mischief of the Supreme Court's suggestion is that rather than requiring improved appeal procedures, it suggested habeas corpus procedures in the federal courts or the state courts. The effect of this is to put habeas corpus in competition with appeal and really in substitution for appeal in the State courts.

Before we leave the fourteenth amendment, allow me to put in juxtaposition two experiences with the amendment.

In my college days a favorite subject of debate was the recall of judges. Great indignation has been expressed against the ruling of the Supreme Court declaring void child labor laws, laws affecting women in industry, the great Bake Shop case, etc.

Two years ago my wife and I drove half the length of the State of California, observing from time to time the modern equivalent of the recall of judges namely, great billboard signs advocating the impeachment of Earl Warren. This, of course, is an unjust reflection on an able and good man, but it shows that in the eyes of the people, the Fourteenth Amendment can be abused by the liberals of the left as well as the conservatives of the right.

The Supreme Court has suggested that each state adopt a Post-conviction Remedies Act. Pennsylvania's Post-Conviction Hearings Act was passed pursuant to this suggestion. It lists 13 reasons for post-conviction relief, including almost anything which might be wrong with any sentence.

The net result of the court's opinions and of statutes such as ours has been to put the Supreme Court somewhere in the position of a camp cook in the cow country in frontier days, standing at the chuck wagon banging on a pan and shouting: "Come and get it".

No sooner were the decisions of the Supreme Court which we have cited released than word about them flashed through the dim, occult reaches of the penitentiaries, and the courts have been flooded with habeas corpus cases ever since.

The extent to which this process has increased the busienss of the Federal courts is appalling. The reports of the Standing Committee of the American Bar Association on jurisprudence and Law Reform affirm that the applications by state prisoners for writs of habeas corpus in the Federal courts grew from 127 in 1941 to 981 in 1961, and 4,664 in 1965. The proportion of increase was 675 percent from 1941 to 1961, and 3,750 percent from 1941 to 1965. The growth in the number of these cases has continued unabated in 1966.[20] It is estimated that about 30 percent of the business of the Federal courts derives from habeas corpus. From an opinion of the District Court for the District of Columbia, I cite the following:

"In five years the most extreme example is that of a person who, between July 1939 and April 1944, presented in the District Court 50 petitions for writs of habeas corpus; another person has presented 27 petitions, a third 24, a fourth 22, a fifth 20. One hundred nineteen persons have presented 597 petitions—an average of 5".[21]

The Standing Committee on Jurisprudence and Law Reform of the American Bar Association in its report in August, 1966, has this to say:

"The delay in the enforcement of the judgments of conviction in the state courts is perhaps the worst feature of the habeas corpus proceedings in the Federal Courts by state prisoners. It is a serious factor in bringing about the unfortunate delay of criminal justice in the United States that contributes to disrespect for the laws.

". . . In the Chessman case in California, the elapsed period was twelve years." (Citations given.)

"In the Townsend case in Illinois, eleven years have elapsed, and it is not yet clear whether the proceedings have terminated. Eight of those eleven years have been consumed in habeas corpus proceedings in the Federal Court . . ." (Citations given.)

"In the Labat case in Louisiana, over twelve years have intervened, and the case is not over yet. Eight of the twelve years of delay have been in connection with habeas corpus proceedings in the Federal courts, and the case is now in the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit." [22] (Citations given.)

In these opinions, little or nothing is said about whether the defendant is guilty. Up to 12 years have been spent to determine preliminarily the civil rights of these defendants, to determine whether he is guilty of crime, has had to wait. If the defendant is ever to come to trial for his alleged crime, the witnesses will be scattered and the prosecution will probably fail.

All are agreed that most of the applications for habeas corpus are frivolous and without merit. Before the change in interpretation of the fourteenth amendment, about 2 percent of the applications were successful. After the change, the percentage of successful applications went to 2.25 in 1963, and to 3.84 percent in 1965.[23] The only figure I have for 1966 is about two percent.

What is the remedy? This suggests one of my favorite Lincoln stories. When Mr. Lincoln was on his way from Springfield, Illinois, to Washington, D.C., to take the oath of office, his inaugural address—the famous First Inaugural—was carried in a little black bag. He entrusted the bag to his son, Robert. When the train stopped at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, somehow Robert lost the black bag. Lincoln became quite perturbed and took a hand in turning over the pile of baggage on the platform until he found the black bag. He opened it, took out the First Inaugural Address and put it in his pocket, saying that this reminded him of a man back in Illinois. This man deposited $1,500 in a bank, but the bank failed. Later he received a dividend of $150. He put this $150 in another bank, but that bank also failed. Ultimately he received a dividend of $15. When the man received the $15 he put it in his pocket, saying: "Now that I have this thing cut down to portable size I will just look after it myself!"

We must cut down to portable size, the abnormal and excessive use of habeas corpus, and at all costs avoid the erection of a third level of criminal proceedings. But let us take hold of the thing at the small end, where we can get hold of it. The size of the problem will increase as you shall see.

First, the Supreme Court should trust the people more and indulge them less. The defendant, after his conviction, should be required to state what was wrong with his trial. He should state all his complaints at one time and be limited to one petition, except in a case where there is real after-discovered evidence, just as the British now do, with great success.[24]

This is what the Federal Habeas Corpus Act [25] expects Federal judges to do anyway. It is out of date to suppose that the defendant in a criminal case does not know his rights.

Second, the court should put more trust in the lawyers of the nation. One of the anomalies of the present is that the Federal courts in habeas corpus will reopen an old case, reverse the conviction and set the defendant free because the lawyer who represented the prisoner long ago did not follow the law as the Supreme Court now states the law to have been then, although the nine wise men of the Supreme Court are themselves unable to agree with any unanimity on the law. In Fay v. Noia, 14 years had elapsed between the time of sentence and the time when the petition for Federal habeas corpus was filed. Noia had not appealed in the State courts because he feared the death penalty, but the Supreme Court overlooked this failure to exhaust State procedure because the decision had been made by the defendant's lawyer rather than by the defendant himself. Yet, in Gideon v. Wainwright, the court is emphatic that the lawyer must be available to make this kind of decision for the defendant.

Third, the court should trust the jury. The power to decide the facts must be lodged with the jury or with the judges. Until Jackson v. Denno, in the majority of American jurisdictions, the power was lodged with the jury, subject to some differing measure of review by the court.[20] This is especially important in cases which involve the conduct of investigating officers. The idea that juries always stick with the officers is eroneous. It never seems to occur to the critics that most of the confessions taken by officers are true. A common fallacy lurks in this situation. The critic wishes always to compare a good judge with a bad jury. But many of us can remember that not all Pennsylvania judges—even Pennsylvania Federal judges, have been good men, or good judges, and every trial judge can attest that many juries display surprisingly good sense, shrewdness, penetrating power and earthy wisdom.

During my years on the bench, I caused to be written on the wall of my courtroom—plain for the jury and all the world to see—two sentences from the first inaugural, taken from the black bag of Mr. Lincoln:

"Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world?"

The Supreme Court needs to consider that language before concluding that only the nine men in Washington can make wise trial decisions, and before it concludes that elaborate proceedings must be set up whereby judges and not the jury will decide the facts.

The fourth is that the court should be fair to the police. It is time that someone thinks of the police in this brave new world. Their right of investigation is almost denied by the Escobedo, Miranda and Mapp decisions. Miranda lays down a code of conduct for policemen which is almost impossible of performance.

The Supreme Court, in its desire to make uniform criminal procedure all over the country, forgets that the Federal officers are a corps elite, selected for their brains, and general superiority, and carefully trained for specific work under the federal statutes. Their duty may be in bankruptcy, counterfeiting, the FBI, or some other specific field.

The State officers are a different lot. A vast number of them, policemen, constables, sheriffs, and other state officers, have had little or no training. They must take on all comers, murderers, arsonists, rapists, thieves, kidnappers, burglars, robbers, as well as have part in prosecuting the Federal offenses mentioned.

The officer investigating a crime often does so in peril of his life. When, gun in hand, he follows a suspect down the devious ways of the criminal's world, he is entitled to know that the people and the people's judges are behind him. He wants to feel that when he gets information, it will be received thankfully and not thrown aside because someone in high places seems more intent to find improper conduct of officers than to detect and punish criminals. If police, already suffering from public indifference and the timorous determination "not to become involved," are also to be confronted with a hostile court, we soon will have no policemen worthy of the name.

Fifth, the judges should trust the ordinary processes of appeal. In England and America, the established appeal procedures are those evolved by generations of habeas corpus cases. Criminal appellate procedure is crystallized habeas corpus law.

If one will but examine the Pennsylvania Post Conviction Hearings Act, he will find that any one of the 13 causes for relief can be vindicated in the ordinary process of appeal. Of what utility is the third level of procedure in criminal cases?

Supra, 12 Law Ed. 2d 927, 925 et. seq.

Charles S. Diamond, Chief Judge of the State of New York, says that we are trying to make two parallel judicial lines meet.[27] One is the long ladder of State trial, State appeal, and then appeal to the United States Supreme Court by certiorari.

The other parallel line begins with the taking of the case at any level of the state trial into the District Court of the United States by habeas corpus, hearing it there and then proceeding, if necessary, to the Court of Appeals and on to the Supreme Court of the United States.

If all habeas corpus cases are begun in the federal court and proceed by appeal to the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court cannot possibly handle this burden. Their only solution is to find some way of trusting the State courts to make most of the initial decisions. The unfortunate thing is that by opening wide the doors of the Federal courts to habeas corpus, and by suggesting habeas corpus as a post-conviction remedy to the States, they have taken the vitality and usefulness out of State appeals in criminal cases.

There are only two alternatives. Either continue the present system, commission more federal judges, and build more Federal court houses to try and re-try convictions long past or place a larger measure of confidence in the State courts, accept their result whenever possible and compel civil rights complaints to be tried upon appeal.

The Supreme Court has begun to modify the extreme rigor of Fay v. Noia, Townsend v. Sain, and Saunders v. United States. In Linkletter v. Walter[28] it decided that the rule of Mapp v. Ohio[24] (evidence wrongfully obtained) is not retroactive; and in Tehan ex. rel v. Shott,[29] it decided that the rule of Griffin v. California[30] (wrongful comment on failure to testify) is not retroactive. The Supreme Court has also evidenced an increasing disposition to refer the habeas corpus cases back within the power of the existing case; sometimes to the trial court[30] sometimes to the state appellate court[31] and often to the district court.[32]

I make two suggestions, to bridge the gap between the two parallel lines. First, give the state appellate court the power to hear evidence in aid of their decision, as the British Court of Appeals does.[33] This might allow the State to put its case in better shape for review by the Supreme Court and in any event, has the merit of trying the cause rather than trying the record.

Second, since the Supreme Court of the United States has the power to refer to the district court any applications for habeas corpus presented directly to it[34] why not—by another statute, hold State prisoners to ordinary appeal but allow the Supreme Court to refer to the district court, a habeas corpus case coming to it upon certiorari from the highest State court.

I make one suggestion to the state courts. The pendulum swings and having swung, swings back. Lincoln said of the Dred Scott decision: "But we think the Dred Scott decision is wrong. We know the court that made it has often overruled its own decisions, and we shall do what we can to have it overrule this. We offer no resistance to it."

The body of decisions which have so profoundly affected the true investigation and trial of criminal cases are now the law. If they are bad laws and mistaken public policy—as some believe—events will disclose. In the meantime, they must be obeyed. The state judges have not been guiltless, and they can help the situation by making better records of the appointment of counsel, the receiving of pleas, the admission of confessions in evidence, and the passing of sentence.

Professor Daniel J. Meador has very sensible suggestions to make along this line, in the Virginia Law Review.[35] He has also a good word to say for States establishing post conviction remedies.[36] Do not get me wrong. In the First World War, we had a song about reveille, always an unpopular bugle call which concluded:

"We will amputate his reveille
And step upon it heavily
And spend the rest of our lives in bed."

I do not response to amputate post conviction remedies. I only propose to step upon them heavily, because the true post conviction remedy is appeal.

"We do not think it impracticable in any part of this country to have trials free from outside control. But to maintain this immunity it may be necessary that the supremacy of the law and of the Federal Constitution should be vindicated in a case like this."

Justice Holmes suggests here a short remedy, change of venue, and a long view remedy, that the Supreme Court must maintain its right to hurl the thunderbolt of reversal at any court where gross disregard of the requirement of due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment has been shown. In Price v. United States [38] decided March 28, 1966, indictments were obtained in a Federal court against State police officers and others, charging conspiracy to violate civil rights by releasing the victims from jail and then murdering them. The somber aspect of these cases is more apparent from an examination of the legislation involved, which consisted of two sections of a civil rights act passed in Reconstruction Days,[39] This is the big end of our problem, where it is hard to get hold of.

If the criminal elements of our population are to be brought under control, something rising above the civil rights of individuals must be considered. The Preamble to our Constitution reads thus:

"WE the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this CONSTITUTION for the United States of America."

The first duty of a government is to be strong and to be strong enough to govern. A government which cannot maintain the public peace is not a good government. The fathers of the Constitution put the need for unity strength and consistency of government before anything else. Their civil rights had to wait and were accorded the honor of being the first ten amendments.

Great wrongs have been done in the past, but this is no reason why we should hang the dead albatross of a great mass of unnecessary habeas corpus and post conviction cases about the necks of the judges of the present. Everything in the Federal Habeas Corpus Act indicates that the civil rights proceedings must be concluded rapidly. Section 2243 comments that "the court shall summarily hear and determine the facts and dispose of the matter as law and justice require". Section 2244 contemplates that the court shall be required to hear only one applicant and that the defendant must first exhaust his state remedies. 18 U.S.C., paragraph 241, 242.

Section 2245 allows the trial judge to send up a certificate setting forth the facts at the trial. Sections 2246-7-8 authorizes the use of affidavits, depositions or a hearing, or the use of documents to find the facts quickly.

A tremendous amount of law has grown up about the defenses to a writ of habeas corpus. The three principal ones are a waiver by the defendant, his failure to exhaust state remedies and the existence of an independent state procedure which might defeat his right. Unfortunately this subject has become one of the utmost subtlety and complexity. For example, the Supreme Court has decided that the defendant need not have followed the ordinary courses of state appeal so long as he did not try to by-pass these state procedures.

I have not the time to discuss this very intricate and technical question. The general weight, or as they would say in Washington nowadays, the general thrust of the federal habeas corpus practice is in the interest of informality and speed. When, therefore, the views adopted by the Supreme Court have produced a judicial tangle so complicated and so technical that as many as twelve years can be spent in an attempt to determine initially the civil rights of the defendant, leaving the criminal prosecution to die on the vine, we are justified in respectfully suggesting that some of the views expressed by the Supreme Court may require reexamination, and that some may be erroneous. In the meantime—like good soldiers—we obey, try to furnish the court with proper state records, and hope that the mass of civil rights litigation may be in time absorbed once more into the ordinary processes of appeal.

In my humble opinion the American public and all the courts of the land should seriously ponder the concluding paragraphs of the statement previously alluded to which was approved by seven members of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice and appears at the end of the Commission's report under the heading: "Additional Views of Messrs. Jaworski, Malone, Powell, and Storey," at page 307. As we lawyers and judges know, Mr. Leon Jaworski is an outstanding lawyer in Houston, Tex. He is a former president of the Texas Bar Association, and the American College of Trial Lawyers. He also served as Special Assistant U.S. Attorney General. Messrs. Malone, Powell, and Storey are likewise emminent members of the legal profession. Each of them is a past president of the American Bar Association.[1] Now what did they say in their concluding paragraphs under this heading "Additional Views"? They say at page 307 of the report of the President's Crime Commission:

Whatever can be done to right the present imbalance through legislation or rule of court should have high priority. The promising criminal justice programs of the American Bar Association and the American Law Institute should be helpful in this respect.

And I may say that the emminent jurist who testified here yesterday, according to the press accounts, Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the second circuit court of appeals, who is the chairman of the American Bar Association's project, which is preparing a report, has been laboring for over a year on this whole question. I am very sorry that I didn't arrive in time to hear him yesterday. They continue:

But reform and clarification will fall short unless they achieve these ends:

1. An adequate opportunity must be provided the police for interrogation at the scene of the crime, during investigations and at the station house, with appropriate safeguards to prevent abuse.
2. The legitimate place of voluntary confessions in law enforcement must be reestablished and their use made dependent upon meeting due process standards of voluntariness.
3. Provisions must be made for comment on the failure of an accused to take the stand, and also for reciprocal discovery in criminal cases.

The Philadelphia Inquirer in an editorial February 7, 1967, also hit the nail on the head:

The war on crime will not be won by harassment of police and keeping them on the defensive, while criminals are favored and their victims are forgotten.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I just ask, was the quotation that you are taking from the Crime Commission report, was that the minority or the majority holding?

Judge KREIDER. Senator, it is labeled "Additional Views of Messrs. Jaworski, Malone, Powell, and Storey." The report was prepared by these four eminent lawyers, and it was joined in by Thomas J. Cahill, the chief of police of San Francisco, by the district attorney general of Suffolk County, Mass., Hon. Garrett H. Byrne, of Boston, who is now, I believe, the president of the National District Attorney's Association, and it was also joined in by Thomas G. Lynch, the attorney general of California. Those four joined with these views that apparently were prepared by the four men I mentioned.

[1] Hon. Ross L. Malone, attorney at law, Roswell, N. Mex.; Hon. Lewis F. Powell, attorney at law, Richmond, Va.; and Hon. Robert G. Storey, president, the Southwestern Legal Foundation, Dallas, Tex.

Senator KENNEDY. It is my understanding——

Judge KREIDER. They don't dissent, Senator, from the Crime Commission report, but as we all know, the Crime Commission report did not deal with the subject that is now before this committee. And so they didn't deal with the matter of suppressing confessions. There was no dissent.

Senator KENNEDY. I see.

Judge KREIDER. The seven men joined. There is unanimity there. But they added their "Additional views." These are seven outstanding men, one of whom was awarded the American Bar Association's Gold Medal.

I think it was Robert G. Storey of Texas. He was formerly dean of Southern Methodist University Law School. Lewis F. Powell is an eminent lawyer of Virginia, and Ross L. Malone, an outstanding lawyer of New Mexico. I have already mentioned Mr. Jaworski. I consider their statement, it is only five pages, a perfect literary gem on this subject, and I have tried to read all the law journals that they cite, the leading ones which they rely on, which are articles written by what we would call liberal justices. I want to say here that I also heartily commend the able chief justice of Pennsylvania, the Honorable John C. Bell, Jr., whose views have been very emphatically expressed on this subject, and are in line with what I believe are the views of the majority of this distinguished committee.

Senator KENNEDY. I don't want to interrupt your thought, but directing our attention to the Crime Commission's report, it is my understanding in reading from page 94, that the Crime Commission did make these observations, and I would like to read from the report:

> Only recently has research commenced to assess police needs for confessions and the possibilities of establishing rules under which stationhouse questioning would be permissible. The Commission believes that it is too early to assess the effect of the Miranda decision on law enforcement's ability to secure confessions and to solve crimes.

That position was held by 12 members of the Commission, a number of whom have had prosecuting experience and who are deeply committed to law enforcement as well. I am sure that you would want the record to be complete with regard to the findings or statements of the Crime Commission on this subject.

Judge KREIDER. I would, Senator. May I say this too, before I conclude; that this statement under the heading of "Additional Views," page 307, the very end of the report——

Senator MCCLELLAN. As I understand it, they went beyond the purview of their report.

Judge KREIDER. That is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In order to state their additional views on this important issue.

Judge KREIDER. Exactly, and in so doing, they cite what I consider some of the finest literature on the subject: an article by the eminent chief justice of California, Roger J. Traynor; another by an equally outstanding jurist, Justice Walter V. Schaefer of the supreme court of Illinois, and a third by a member of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, a great legal scholar, Henry J. Friendly of New York. When you add all that and read those well written law review articles on this subject, the substance of it is that even though they have been very liberal in their respective jurisdictions, more so than in Pennsylvania, on this confession rule and related subjects, those eminent jurists have reached the point where they feel the pendulum has swung too far in favor of the criminal.

Senator McCLELLAN. While we are on that subject of what the Commission recommended, I believe a majority of the Commission does support your views with respect to wiretapping.

Judge KREIDER. Yes, Senator, they do. I thank you. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. And the "additional views" are not necessarily contrary to the views of the majority of the Commission.

Judge KREIDER. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. But these were additional opinions.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. On the issue and the aspect of law enforcement not covered by the Commission.

Judge KREIDER. Exactly so, and the Commission stated in its main report that they weren't going into this question of voluntary confessions, and how it has been treated in Escobedo and Miranda, because of the very thorough studies that have been made and are now being made.

The studies were started, as I said, about a year and a half ago by a committee under the chairmanship of Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. This committee includes some of the finest legal scholars in the land. There is also a similar committee of the American Law Institute on which are outstanding legal minds.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you tell us what happened at the meeting of the American Law Institute when it was brought up?

Judge KREIDER. Senator, I think there was debate. I cannot say definitely. It may be that it was voted down. I am not sure. Perhaps you have better information on that than I do. I am not sure.

I will say there is a very heavy sprinkling of law school professors in some of these, and I have great respect for them; but, as a trial judge, we are on the frontline with the shock troops, and we must carry out these commands of the Supreme Court of the United States, even though we really feel that they have gone too far.

Senator KENNEDY. Of course, there are some eminent trial personnel on the Commission, as well, who are in the forefront.

Judge KREIDER. Yes; that is true.

Senator KENNEDY. As you are.

Judge KREIDER. That is true; and one is former Attorney General Rodgers, I believe; Mr. Katzenbach, of course.

Senator KENNEDY. One of my impressions is that there isn't sufficient information at the present time to reach the more dramatic conclusions in this area. As you mentioned, there are a number of studies being made at the present time.

I am suggesting that there is a significant body of opinion that feels that it is just too soon to make a determination, that we just haven't got the statistics and the facts to take what many of us consider to be an extraordinary step with regard to an individual's need to be aware of his rights, and his need to be represented by competent counsel in court.

Judge KREIDER. Of course; may I suggest, Senator, that that is covered in bill 674, where the trial judge who holds his preliminary hearing in secret, so to speak—or, rather, not in the presence of a jury—is admonished and is required under 674 to take all that into consideration: the warning and whether the suspect knows the nature of the charge against him, and so forth. I think that is a great addition, and I think that is an attempt to comply with what we were told to do in the Miranda decision.

May I conclude with this final paragraph:

In my opinion, one of our most urgent needs is the return to a practical, commonsense interpretation of the plain and simple words of the Constitution of the United States which has served us so well for the last 178 years. Only in this way can the alarming increase in serious violations of the criminal law be successfully overcome and the rights of law-abiding people protected against the highly organized, well-financed, and astutely represented professional felons who now enjoy a greater immunity from conviction of their crimes than at any time in the history of our country.

I want to thank the committee for inviting me to be present. It is a great honor.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much. The committee will want to ask you some questions, I am sure. From the concluding remarks of your statement, and from your statement as a whole, you apparently do not agree with former Attorney General Katzenbach that it is "unutterable nonsense" for anyone to contend that the impact of these decisions contributes to the increase in crime?

Judge KREIDER. I must respectfully disagree with the opinion of the learned former Attorney General of the United States.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It seems to me, if I read correctly the dissenting opinion of the four Justices who did not go along with the Miranda decision, they predicted what the consequences of the decision would be in this respect.

Judge KREIDER. I think Mr. Justice White predicted that in Escobedo, in 1964, and his colleagues, the three who joined him in dissenting with him in making a four-man dissent.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So, the minority has been warning of the consequences of these decisions.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I will not question you further. I noticed one place you referred, on page 4, I believe you refererd to Lord Shawcross' statement, "The criminal is living in a golden age."

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. When you read that I thought of a book I had read, a book entitled "Crime Without Punishment." He wasn't able to do justice to the subject. My, my, now we have so much more material.

Judge KREIDER. Indeed you do.

May I ask your permission to include in the record, if the committee sees fit, not only Judge Braham's address to the Pennsylvania

Bar Association, but also the statement of my learned colleague, Judge James S. Bowman, a former member of the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania and former assistant city solicitor of Harrisburg, who has been bedeviled perhaps more than any other member of our court, and we have all had our fair share.

He has had 17 different petitions, motions, et cetera, presented to him by one individual long after the conviction took place, and it is still going on. Judge Bowman has compiled a concise two-and-a-half-page report of his views on what could be done by Congress to remedy this terrible harassment which we are all subjected to.

Senator McCLELLAN. You would like to submit it for the record?

Judge KREIDER. I would.

Senator McCLELLAN. Without objection, it will be received for the record.

(The material referred to follows:)

STATEMENT OF JUDGE JAMES S. BOWMAN OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, 12TH JUDICIAL DISTRICT, DAUPHIN COUNTY, PA., ON HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES

Of deep concern to me and to all trial judges, is the practical impact of recent United States Supreme Court decisions in the area of the constitutional rights of an individual involved in criminal investigation or proceedings upon the work of all litigation before them. It is to this problem that I would direct my remarks.

Inherent in our Federal-State form of government is a dual system of courts for the administration of justice. It has worked remarkably well over the years with minimal friction. Recently, however, this picture has drastically changed. Largely arising from the Fay and Townsend decisions,[1] which broadened the Federal judicial power to review alleged denial of constitutional rights in State courts, have been a flood of habeas corpus proceeding in both Federal and State courts which have seriously impaired their ability to perform all of their judicial responsibilities to all litigants. Repetitive and multiple petitions passed upon trial courts and reviewed by appellate courts in both systems have produced no end to justice rather than serving the ends of justice. The existing chaotic conditions demand prompt and serious consideration and an early solution.

The dual nature of our judicial system will require, of course, a dual attack upon the problem. In what manner any individual State should or would approach the problem and its solution, I cannot say. It would seem clear, however, that if Congress acted at the Federal level, the individual States would have little difficulty in enacting statutes or clarifying existing statutes or procedures which would substantially reduce, if not wholly solve, this perplexing and wholly unnecessary problem.

For example, in Pennsylvania there is some decisional and statutory authority permitting only one collateral attack by way of habeas corpus upon a criminal conviction and judgment of sentence imposed thereon. However, since most of the repetitive and multiple petitions collaterally attacking a conviction and sentence raise real or imagined constitutional issues, most Pennsylvania courts have ignored or hesitated to apply this body of law because of the ever present jurisdiction of the Federal courts to independently review a second, third or even tenth petition by the same individual. It would seem that in such cases, a State court, in giving anything less than full consideration on their substantive merits to these repetitive petitions, makes the State court's action suspect in the minds of the Federal judiciary. Hence, another reason for the roundelay of petitions.

If Congress would act in two areas, I believe we will have laid the groundwork for State action which would soon follow, and that the dual action of Congress and the individual States will lead to an acceptable solution to the problem. No other known judicial system affords to individuals convicted of crime such repetitive and multiple oportunities for reconsideration of their guilt and neither reason nor constitutional considerations require the present situation.

If Congress would proscribe the use of the Federal courts by persons alleging their constitutional rights to have been violated in State courts to one and only one proceeding in the Federal courts within a prescribed time limit after their remedies in the State judicial system have been exhausted (or perhaps within a prescribed time limit after conviction by the State trial court and on waiver of further appellate review in the State judicial system), a large percentage of repetitive and multiple petitions would be barred or discouraged at both levels.

Secondly, if Congress would proscribe the use of the Federal courts by such persons who collaterally attack in the State courts their conviction to one and only one proceeding in the Federal courts, and then only if the individual had not had Federal review of his conviction after direct appeal in the State courts (or waiver of appeal), an adidtional number of repetitive and multiple petitions would be barred or discouraged at both levels.

We commend legislation in this area as certainly not solving all of the problems now confronting both State and Federal courts as an outgrowth of the various U.S. Supreme Court decisions on the constitutional right of individuals and jurisdictional matters, but as a clear step in the direction of restoring reason to a problem which has been one of grave concern to all jurists who deal with it on a day to day basis.

Senator McCLELLAN. Any questions? Senator Ervin?

Senator ERVIN. Judge, Chief Justice Stone said that where courts deal as ours, with great public questions, the only protection you have against unwise decisions and even against judicial usurpation is careful scrutiny of their decisions and comment upon them, and this gives me license to tell the truth as I see it.

Judge KREIDER. Indeed it does.

Senator ERVIN. Now is not the Miranda case based upon—allegedly based upon interpretation of the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, I think so.

Senator ERVIN. I would like to read that clause to you:

No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.

Assigning to those words their plain English meaning, can they linguistically speaking have any possible application to the voluntary confession?

Judge KREIDER. I don't think so.

Senator ERVIN. And the Supreme Court of the United States, and virtually every other Federal court and virtually every State court in the United States, didn't they hold from the time those words were incorporated in the Constitution in 1791 down to the date of the Miranda case, which was June 13, 1966, that they did not have any possible application to voluntary confessions?

Judge KREIDER. That is my understanding.

Senator ERVIN. The courts held that they only applied to the testimony which a man was compelled to give.

Judge KREIDER. In court.

Senator ERVIN. And he had to give it in the capacity of a witness.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And he had to give it in a judicial proceeding which was either criminal in nature or was calculated to cause a criminal prosecution against him.

Judge KREIDER. That I feel was the law, until Escobedo and Miranda.

Senator ERVIN. Now the Escobedo case is based on this provision in the sixth amendment:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Now, wasn't that provision interpreted from the time that it became a part of the Constitution in 1791 down to the date of the majority opinion in the Escobedo case, to give a man the right to assistance of counsel only when a criminal prosecution originated?

Judge KREIDER. Absolutely correct.

Senator ERVIN. And is there any criminal prosecution in existence when a person is merely taken into custody and suspected by the arresting officer of having committed a crime he is investigating?

Judge KREIDER. I don't think a criminal prosecution is in effect at that stage when the police are simply trying to find out what they can about the activities of a suspect.

Senator ERVIN. As a matter of fact, until this decision interpreting the clause, it was held that the right of counsel did not arise until some formal accusation which set a criminal prosecution in motion was made.

Judge KREIDER. Yes, that is true.

Senator ERVIN. And aren't police officers incapable under the law of initiating a criminal prosecution in the sense of this provision?

Judge KREIDER. I didn't quite understand you, Senator.

Senator ERVIN. Does not the power under the law to begin a criminal prosecution reside in the prosecuting attorneys or other persons. rather than police officials?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, indeed, and that is all the more reason why the police officials should have some latitude in the first instance at the station house to question a suspect, and it may favor him. As pointed out by these eminent jurists in the articles I have referred to, he may clear himself, and innocent people who are picked up with him will be cleared and don't have to wait around until some lawyer comes for the suspect, until the innocent people are hurt.

Senator ERVIN. Now under the rights of counsel clause of the sixth amendment as it was interpreted before the Escobedo case, you have a point which could be demonstrated by objective evidence as to when the right of counsel arose; namely, the beginning of prosecution.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Now under the Escobedo case, that right of counsel resides as soon as some kind of suspicion begins to be engendered in the inner side of the cranium of the arresting officer that the man in his custody might possibly have committed a crime the officer is investigating.

Judge KREIDER. Indeed.

Senator ERVIN. And there is no way that you can determine with any degree of certainty when that right of counsel now originates under the Escobedo case.

Judge KREIDER. That is absolutely correct. There was a cartoon in the Christian Science Monitor about 2 weeks ago, a newspaperman sent it to me. It shows a policeman with one hand chained to a post where the callbox is attached, and he is calling headquarters and saying, "But Sarge, I was explaining to him his constitutional rights." And the felon got away.

I thought it pointed up this whole business, it is a terrible burden, an impossible burden to place on a policeman who is chasing a felon. It may have been a man he thinks had kidnaped his neighbor's child. What is the policeman to do? Well, he has the right to make some investigation on the spot, but as you pointed out, Senator, when must he stop and say, "Now call your lawyer?"

Senator ERVIN. We hear a great deal nowadays about the conflict of interest.

Judge KREIDER. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Doesn't the Miranda case put the policeman in that kind of a situation because first he is supposed to be enforcing the law?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And it compels him to be the legal advisor to the accused.

Judge KREIDER. Exactly so.

Senator ERVIN. I might state I have never been able to get an absolute divorce from my first love, which is the practice of law. I spent the first 19 years of my working life largely in trial work, and 7 years as a judge in a court of general jurisdiction. Over those 25 years I had a lot of opportunity to confront this question about voluntary confessions.

I would like to ask you as a matter of fact if you do not agree with me that when a man is willing to make a voluntary confession, that it has some therapeutic value on that man. In other words, as a lawyer, I felt that when a man made a voluntary confession of his guilt, there was more hope of his rehabilitation, and as a judge, I felt the same way about it, because psychiatry teaches us, and I think also religion, that more can be done to rehabilitate a man who is willing to assume responsibility for his own misdeeds.

Judge KREIDER. Yes. I am heartily in accord with your statement.

Senator ERVIN. Also I noticed that you were of the opinion that with respect to the overwhelming majority of accused persons, and especially those who have been in trouble before, which is usually the case in more serious offenses——

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN (continuing). That the average person coming into court or coming into conflict with the law knew that he had a right to counsel.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Knew that he had a right to remain silent, knew that anything that he said derogatory to his cause could be used against him. What is your experience as a trial lawyer and as a trial judge on that?

Judge KREIDER. You are absolutely correct. And these habeas corpus petitions which we receive, written in longhand, have the latest decisions of the Supreme Court cited in there, and correctly as to volume and page, Escobedo, Miranda, et cetera.

Senator ERVIN. I might add that I get letters like that every 2 days from people in prison, who write me about it, and they seem to be better posted on it than I am.

Judge KREIDER. I wouldn't subscribe to that, Senator, but the criminal today who is incarcerated has in our State, I think, access to a jailhouse lawyer as they call him. They get the court's written opinion, as the members of this committee well know. It is required that the court send a copy to the petitioner who is in prison.

Then of course these various prisoners try to make their case fit into that. Now they have got the theory all right. What they do, I think, is copy the syllabi of the reports or statements in the judge's opinion, but their facts don't fit into the legal generalization. But they know the law all right, and it is amazing to see, and I have no objection, but they do.

My objection is to these frivolous petitions that have no relevancy at all. I sentenced a man 10 years ago who had been convicted of murdering his wife. He was a butcher in the Swift Packing Co., and used his gutting knife that he used on animals on his wife. The jury found him guilty in the first degree. I sentenced him.

He filed a habeas corpus several years ago alleging the stock reasons. Now he has come up with the statement that I was disqualified to sentence him or to preside 10 years ago because I had taken an oath before Almighty God to do my duty, and he said that violates the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States. So we get all kinds of frivolous petitions.

Senator ERVIN. As a practical matter, isn't the result of the Miranda decision, and to some extent the Escobedo case, that self-confessed criminals, in some cases murderers, in other cases rapists, in other cases robbers, are turned free in the courts throughout this country, simply because the arresting officer failed to tell the criminal something he already knew?

Judge KREIDER. Exactly so. Commissioner Bell of Philadelphia illustrated that in the quote that I gave in my statement, where they gave him the three-point warning, three points out of the four, but they forgot to say "If you can't afford a lawyer we will get one for you."

Now they forgot that. As a result, as you and the other members of this committee have pointed out, the confession was invalidated, suppressed, and that was the end of the case, because the district attorney couldn't get any additional evidence.

Senator ERVIN. You brought out in your reference to the indiscriminate use, the repeated use of habeas corpus, you brought out the fact that it had gotten so that it is almost virtually impossible under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States ever to bring a criminal case to the end any more.

I will ask you this question. It is very elementary, of course.

When the prosecution prosecutes a man for a crime, and the prosecution loses a case, that is the end of the case forever as far as the prosecution is concerned.

Judge KREIDER. Right.

Senator ERVIN. And we used to say that every man and every party has a day in court, so the prosecution gets one day in court and he loses, that is the end.

Judge KREIDER. That is alsolutely the end.

Senator ERVIN. It used to be a rule of law that when a man was tried on a criminal charge, and he was convicted and sentenced, that subject to appeal and having his case reviewed by a higher court, that his conviction and his judgment settled conclusively every issue which was actually litigated in the case and every issue which could have been litigated in that case; is that not true?

Judge KREIDER. That is true, and I think that the rule has been that, and it has been the rule in England, and is the rule today in England.

Senator ERVIN. I believe we judges used to call that res judicata.

Judge KREIDER. Yes, indeed.

Senator ERVIN. When the defendant had his day in court subject to his right to review, that that ended the controversy.

Judge KREIDER. It did.

Senator ERVIN. Then we came along with a set of rules under which certain rulings, particularly in cases originating in Illinois, where the Supreme Court set aside convictions and judgments in criminal cases, in many cases years after they were entered, and years after the witnesses had become unavailable.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. States had to pass what they call postconviction hearings.

Judge KREIDER. Exactly.

Senator ERVIN. To give a man a second day in court on constitutional questions. And so first you have this situation, first the court tried the defendant, and then under the postconviction hearing act the defendant appeared in court.

Judge KREIDER. Indeed.

Senator ERVIN. And then they gave the defendant the right to try his own lawyer after the trial in court.

Judge KREIDER. That is a stock procedure today.

Senator ERVIN. And then we hear of the case of the Giles brothers over here in Maryland, where they were not only tried in court, tried their own lawyers, but now they are going to try the prosecuting attorney to see whether the prosecuting attorney didn't dig up some evidence he could have drug up in behalf of the defendants. This has gotten to the point that it is virtually impossible, under these decisions, to ever get a criminal case to the end as far as the defendant is concerned.

Judge KREIDER. That is absolutely true, and in my judgment is a sad commentary on American legal procedure.

Senator ERVIN. We have people whose guilt was proven beyond a reasonable doubt who go to prison, and years later apply to the lower Federal courts for writs of habeas corpus, even in cases where the Supreme Court of the United States has refused to review the case originally on petition for writ of certiorari to the State court.

Judge KREIDER. Exactly.

Senator ERVIN. And then they go in there years after the crime was committed, years after the conviction was had and the judgments entered, and in many cases after the witnesses have died or their memories have failed, or they have become unavailable, and now these people are being turned loose under these decisions.

Judge KREIDER. We have that exact situation in our own court.

Senator ERVIN. It used to be that the contest between the prosecution and the defendant in a criminal case was whether or not the defendant could be shown to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. The contest is now degenerating into a lot of quibbling about these technicalities, artificial rules like those in the Miranda case.

Judge KREIDER. Absolutely.

Senator ERVIN. Can you think from your experience as a lawyer and as a trial judge that there is any evidence in the world which is more convincing of the guilt of a defendant than his voluntary confession that he committed the crime with which he is charged?

Judge KREIDER. I cannot, and I say that the voluntary confession has always been considered the highest form of evidence.

Senator ERVIN. And is not the effect of the Miranda case to make it very difficult even to permit a defendant who wants to make a voluntary confession to make that confession?

Judge KREIDER. I think so.

Senator ERVIN. Wouldn't virtually any lawyer who hasn't had an opportunity to investigate the case, or even one who has, feel he should advise his client not to speak?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. When he is called there by the police?

Judge KREIDER. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. After arrest?

Judge KREIDER. That is correct.

Senator ERVIN. I might state we used to try these cases on the issue of guilt or innocence.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. And we tried them and the cases ended, unless he got a new trial for errors committed. Don't you believe that when the law gives the accused the benefit of the presumption of innocence, gives him the right of assistance of counsel, gives him the right to either remain silent or to take the stand in his own behalf, gives him the right to compulsory process to obtain the testimony of witnesses in his own behalf, gives him the right to confront and cross-examine his accusers, and requires that before he can be punished as a criminal that every one of 12 men shall be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence in the case that he is guilty, don't you think that afforts as much protection as the accused is entitled to?

Judge KREIDER. I certainly do. I can't see how he could get better protection than that.

Senator ERVIN. And do you not agree with me that the practical result of the decision in the Miranda case is that we are doing an injustice to society and an injustice to the victims of crime in the overzealousness to see that no innocent man is convicted?

Judge KREIDER. I certainly agree with you, and that is the reason I am here, to express the views of a humble trial judge who is on the firing line daily, with his colleagues.

Senator ERVIN. I was home some time ago, and I found that there was a 3-week term in the criminal court. They spent the first week trying new cases, charges of crime; they spent the last 2 weeks under these new decisions of the Supreme Court trying the court on postconviction hearing act and trying counsel.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator ERVIN. Retrying cases that had been tried before, and they are compelled to do it if a fellow just writes something on a postal card to a judge.

Judge KREIDER. We had a case where a man was convicted of murder. He chased the victim down a hill. The victim stumbled and fell, and the defendant jumped on him and plunged a knife into the victim's heart.

The case came to trial, and the defense was self-defense. The jury didn't believe the defendant, and they convicted him. He brought habeas corpus. First we have had two lawyers appointed by the court to represent him, at the taxpayers' expense, and rightly so.

Then we appointed another lawyer whom he requested, after the conviction, to look into this habeas corpus matter. That man, gentlemen, after reading the whole record, begged to withdraw. We granted that.

Then the defendant accused his own trial lawyers of incompetency, and said they told him he didn't have the right of appeal. We had to bring the prisoner up from Philadelphia 100 miles, hold a hearing on whether or not his own lawyers had told him he didn't have the right to take an appeal.

Well, any lawyer who would tell a defendant that could be disbarred, as we all know, immediately; so he has now had four lawyers, and that matter is now on appeal. It is being held under consideration by the Supreme Court. They referred it back to us for an evidentiary hearing on what his trial lawyers had told him or didn't tell him.

So as you say, Senator, the two lawyers had to be brought into court. They came voluntarily. They are able men. They had to take the stand and defend themselves and their professional reputation. For that hearing I appointed a fourth lawyer to represent the defendant.

Senator ERVIN. As a result—I am very much interested in this—I believe that the criminal law should be justice to the victims of crime as well as to the accused.

Judge KREIDER. Surely.

Senator ERVIN. I may say from all the information I obtained, and from all of my observations, that enough has been done for those who murder and rape and rob, and it is time for Congress to do something for those who do not wish to be murdered, raped, and robbed.

Judge KREIDER. I hope the Congress will do that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have a situation here where it is now 12 o'clock. I first thought we would try to conclude with you. I am sure there are other questions. Do you folks have any questions?

Senator THURMOND. I don't think so. I just wish to express my appreciation, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HRUSKA. I have one brief question.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will try to conclude with you, and as to the other witnesses, the distinguished witnesses whom we have to hear today, I will announce that we will try to reconvene at 1:30, or shortly thereafter, and proceed for whatever time it takes.

All right, if there are brief questions, Senator, we will try to conclude with you so you won't have to come back.

Senator HRUSKA. Judge, we have already canvassed the idea that the prosecution has no appeal ordinarily where the ruling of the court is against the prosecution in a criminal case.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Now Congress could pass a law giving an appeal to the Federal Government, providing for a pretrial testing of admissibility of confessions?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Would such a statute be constitutional in your judgment?

Judge KREIDER. I believe it would.

Senator HRUSKA. There would be no involvement of double jeopardy, would there?

Judge KREIDER. I don't think so.

Senator HRUSKA. Inasmuch as it is preliminary in character?

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. And not a final order?

Judge KREIDER. Yes, and under Jackson v. Denno the judge now has a preliminary hearing as we all know, in the privacy of his chambers, or at least in the absence of the jury, and the defendant can testify there. He must be there with his lawyer.

We take his evidence, and that isn't double jeopardy when later on if we deem the confession voluntarily given, we go back into the courtroom and let the confession go to the jury, and the defendant can take the stand. I don't think he can claim double jeopardy because of the previous—well, he can't because Jackson v. Denno holds that we must grant him that preliminary hearing.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, these proceedings would be had before a jury would have been sworn.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. So there can be no question of double jeopardy?

Judge KREIDER. Exactly.

Senator HRUSKA. There cannot be until at a point after the jury is sworn, isn't that correct?

Judge KREIDER. That is correct, and I think your point is a very interesting one, Senator.

Senator HRUSKA. It would serve to sort of balance this thing off a little bit.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. And balance is what we are striving to get.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. In these bills that we are considering.

Judge KREIDER. Indeed.

Sentaor HRUSKA. Thank you very much. I commend you for your statement also. It is an excellent one.

Judge KREIDER. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hart.

Senator HART. Judge, I apologize for having been late in arriving, but I shall read your statement. I indicated in the opening days of hearings some concern that we might be overreacting, and I think I ought to make this comment before asking you one point.

I look to the Supreme Court to declare and to identify constitutional rights in specific cases; and this, as we now so well know, they did in a case called Miranda.

Judge KREIDER. Yes.

Senator HART. That was recent. You read the President's Crime Commission report. You pointed out the, as you say, magnificent language of the seven. But, isn't it correct to say that it could be read, and should be read, as indicating that 12 others did not feel that the time yet had arrived to react finally to the Miranda rule?

Judge KREIDER. Senator, in my humble opinion it would not be correct to so construe it.

Senator HART. How should it be construed, if seven say this and 12 don't say it?

Judge KREIDER. Well, then, that is a matter of—— Senator HART. Isn't that really what the point is?

Judge KREIDER. I don't think so, Senator. I get this impression: That the committee as a whole—I believe there were 17 or 19—decided that they would not enter into this vital area which is before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure, and they specifically stated that this matter was being looked into by the American Bar Association's special committee under Chief Judge Lumbard of the second circuit, and also by the American Law Institute, and on that committee for the American Law Institute is Professor James Vorenburg of Harvard. He is their reporter, as is Professor Bator of Harvard, and both are very learned men.

Their articles in the Harvard Law Review are magnificent on this subject, and they are well balanced. And, so, I think the President's Crime Commission felt they did not have the time to devote to this subject, did not have as much time as the American Bar Association's committee, the Lumbard Commission, and the American Law Institute. So, they did nothing about it.

Senator HART. Judge, let me respectfully disagree. Not only did the 12 not sign what the seven said about Miranda, but the 12 said, "This Commission believes it is too early to assess the effect of Miranda"—too early to assess. I wonder if this isn't prudent counsel. One of these statistics that has developed since Miranda is the conviction of Miranda in another trial without a confession.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Without a confession——

Senator HART. Without the confession. It was rejected in the case that went up to the Supreme Court; is that correct? The rejected confession was not available, or used, in the second trial; and on the second trial Miranda was convicted.

Judge KREIDER. Yes, but there, if I may say——

Senator HART. And isn't this the kind of information that it is resonable to assume the Crime Commission wanted developed in the aftermath of Miranda? How can police enforcement authorities react? What procedures can be obtained?

Can we make better detectives by paying them more and training them better, rather than saying you can hold a fellow for just about as long as you want, or you don't have to tell him he needs a lawyer, or can have one if he wants him, and that he doesn't have to talk?

Rich men's sons know that. Poor men don't. But the right should be available equally to all. And these are the kinds of things, I think, that are involved in our response in this kind of very admittedly dramatic Supereme Court ruling.

But it is the Court, and it has reviewed the facts, and it has identified these as constitutional rights. After we decide how we ought to react, then we have got to decide how by legislation we overrule the Constitution.

Senator McCLELLAN. Any other questions?

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, I just want to express my appreciation to the distinguished judge who appeared here today, and who has testified at this hearing.

I was a circuit judge in South Carolina for 8 years prior to becoming Governor. In my opinion, unless we reverse the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question of confessions, we are going to continue to have more and more crime. I was very interested in your statement and your answers to questions, and I just want to commend you for coming here. You have made a fine contribution to this hearing.

Judge KREIDER. I thank you very much. If I can contribute anything to help you in your views, I feel amply rewarded. I know I am highly honored by your invitation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very kindly.

The committee will stand in recess until 1:30.

(Whereupon, at 12:10 p.m., the committee was recessed, to reconvene at 1:30 p.m. the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator McCLELLAN. The committee will come to order. Police Commissioner Girardin, will you come around, please?

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, may I speak a word in introduction?

Senator McCLELLAN. Senator, this distinguished witness is from your State. We would be most happy to have you present him.

Senator HART. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Ray Girardin is a man who made a rare jump from newspaper reporter to police executive, and has a record of accomplishment in both fields.

A crime reporter in Detroit for some years, Mr. Girardin built a superb reputation for fairness and impartiality and understanding. It has often been said of Commissioner Girardin that he can understand human failings without towering, and that his discipline is never without compassion. He has, in short, been an excellent police commissioner since his appointment 3 years ago, because he is extremely sensitive in this matter of balancing these competing principles that we were listening to here for the last couple of days: society's right to protection and the individual's right to assurance of fair treatment.

Perhaps better than any other commissioner Detroit has known, Ray Girardin has been able to balance daily those two principles. This subcommittee, I am sure, will be able to listen to Mr. Girardin with interest. To me he is more than just a commissioner. He is an old and trusted friend, and I am delighted at the opportunity to present him to my colleagues.

Senator McClellan. Very well. Mr. Commissioner, we welcome you. We appreciate your cooperation with this committee. You have a prepared statement I believe. You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. RAY GIRARDIN, POLICE COMMISSIONER, DETROIT, MICH., ON BEHALF OF THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS, JEROME P. CAVANAGH, MAYOR OF DETROIT, NATIONAL PRESIDENT: ACCOMPANIED BY JOHN F. NICHOLS, DEPUTY SUPERINTENDENT, DETROIT POLICE; AND JOHN J. GUNTHER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. Girardin. May I introduce first Mr. John Gunther, the executive director of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and deputy superintendent of the Detroit Police Department, John Nichols, who are with me.

I have a prepared paper, if I may, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate this opportunity of appearing in behalf of the city of Detroit, and the U.S. Conference of Mayors of which our mayor, Jerome P. Cavanagh, is national president. I wish to speak in support of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. I am a lifelong resident of Detroit, former chief of probation for criminal court, and have been the police commission in Detroit since December 1963. Consequently, I am very familiar with the problems of law enforcement and the administration of justice in large cities.

At the outset let me say I am in complete support of the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 and the financial help and the prestige that goes with financial help from the Government of the United States.

Crime on the city streets long has been a major concern of both public officials and citizens. This concern has become increasingly acute as the incidence of crime in our metropolitan areas continues to rise. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, in its excellent report, stated that 43 percent of the persons polled were fearful of walking city streets at night.

My experience indicates that this finding is accurate. The anxieties of so many may or may not be justified, but they are there. They are real.

Without question crime is a serious problem in the city of Detroit today, as well as most others. This is the situation in almost every large city in America. Our department and its executives constantly receive inquiries from citizens on how they can best cope with crime. Evidence of concern in crime problems is the ever-increasing attendance at community relations meetings held at our police stations. Audiences attending these meetings are not listening passively. They are articulately expressing their fears and seeking answers to the crime problem.

This keen interest is not confined to any particular group of citizens. It permeates every level of the community. At the commercial-industrial level there has been considerable evidence of a mounting concern, and action programs have been launched to counteract crime. The news media have been exceptionally cooperative in disseminating information provided by our department. One newspaper in Detroit has instituted a reward program allocating considerable space and $100,000 in rewards to bring about the arrest and conviction of dangerous criminals.

The Greater Detroit Board of Commerce is backing a full scale police recruitment program. Industry has created a 24-hour-per-day program whereby public utilities and other commercial enterprises operating radio-equipped fleets notify police whenever a crime situation is observed by one of their drivers. Six thousand of these radio-equipped cars are on our streets. Detroit's sizable Negro community, along with other ethnic groups in the city, has been in the forefront of efforts to aid recruitment and encourage assistance and cooperation of citizens with our police department. Countless other civic and fraternal groups, aware of the problem, are extending all cooperation possible.

Tomorrow I shall join Detroit's Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh in presiding over a 2-day crime conference in Detroit which is being attended by leading citizens and representatives from industry, education, churches, and citizens groups. It will consider means of combatting crime more effectively, and it will study crime problems in depth. Topics to be explored include (1) economic and social causes of crime; (2) constitutional problems relating to law enforcement; (3) community resources and correctional facilities; (4) citizens involvement with law enforcement; (5) crime statistics and reporting; and (6) police personnel and effective law enforcement.

The crime increase and general concern has stimulated the police department to develop new means of dealing with crime problems. In Detroit, over 18 months ago, we created a highly mobile tactical force to concentrate efforts in areas of highest crime incidences. Officers on the street have been equipped with small portable two-way radios providing instant communication at all times even when they are away from their patrol cars. A new police emergency telephone dialing system, incorporating a special telephone number for emergency calls only, has been created to provide the speediest response to citizen calls for police service.

Officers manning the emergency switchboard are specially trained to handle the calls expeditiously. Procedures have been modernized by the use of an electronic computer to analyze crime trends, to deploy personnel more effectively, and to make available instantaneous information about wanted criminals and vehicles. An officer on the street, by using his radio, is able to determine the status of a person or vehicle quickly and accurately within about 20 seconds. This results in two advantages—first, the investigation is rapid and thorough; and, second, the citizen is not delayed unnecessarily.

Police have been forced to give up nonpolice service which for years have been performed by the police, and for years the kind of thing that they have been performing.

In Detroit we have turned over to the State licensing of motor vehicle operators.

New procedures on maternity cases have relieved the police of transporting all but a few extreme emergency cases. The enforcement of parking meter violations has been assumed by another city department. Persons involved in minor automobile accidents are requested to report them at district stations rather than calling a car to the scene.

A dramatic illustration of the relative importance of law enforcement problems is the fact that despite other pressing municipal requirements the Detroit police budget has been increased in the last 5 years from $48 million to $64 million.

Notwithstanding the efforts I have cited here, and many more, crime has continued to rise. In Detroit part is a paper increase due to much more accurate reporting of crime by our police. But part is a real increase. I know this upsurge is documented by reports from police agencies throughout the the country.

For many decades the Federal Government has recognized that certain problems are national in scope, transcending the limits of local boundaries. Thus it has engaged in active assistance to agriculture, interstate commerce, land reclamation, and reforestation.

In recent years, cities have been recognized as possessing unique problems, which are amenable to solution through Federal aid, such as housing, urban redevelopment, slum clearance, transportation, water and air pollution. I submit that crime on our streets is every bit as serious a national problem as these others which already receive attention from the Federal Government.

I would like to address myself to the potential which the provisions of the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" offer to the solution of this intense crime problem.

The grants which can be made available for planning under the provisions of the act will enable cities such as Detroit to formulate action programs for immediate and long-range reductions in crime incidence.

The proposed act provides for the development of new methods and equipment. Currently, in Detroit, under a pending grant from the Office of Law Enfrocement Assistance, we are working with Wayne State University's Center for the Application of Sciences and Technology to discover new ways in which data from the Nation's space program can be used to develop new hardware and techniques.

An electronic data processing computer has been used in our department since 1963. We have made specific law enforcement applications which were undreamed of by the manufacturer. A listing of stolen and wanted vehicles is printed by use of the computer and put in the hands of every officer in the field today. A computer modus operandi system which compares many characteristics of perpetrators with the characteristics of known criminals has led to the identification and apprehension of numerous persons wanted for serious crimes. This demonstrates that advanced technology can be applied creatively to law enforcement. We are confident that space age technology possesses unlimited possibilities for improvement of police services but large-scale innovations for crime control have not been developed. Why? Because of lack of funds. Local units of government just cannot afford these development programs.

The military services have made drastic changes in their techniques over the last 25 years. If they had no new weapons since basic World War II equipment, the results would be disasterous. Yet the Nation's police are involved in a war on crime, and, for the most part, we have little but the old weapons.

This act provides the means for tapping our technological resources to benefit law enforcement's battle in controlling crime.

The manpower shortage is one of the more serious problems confronting police departments. Detroit and other major cities are facing a crisis in recruiting and retaining qualified officers.

The situation will become critical in the early 1970's when the many officers who were hired in the abundant postwar labor market of the late 1940's become eligible for retirement.

Senator KENNEDY. May I make a comment?

On the point that you were suggesting maybe two or three lines before about the need to stay abreast of the various techniques which are being advanced, I had a chance yesterday at the Illinois institute of Technology to attend the seminar that they are having with police commissioners and chiefs from around the country. At the seminar they were engaged in a discussion of many of the law enforcement techniques that have been recently developed.

Of particular interest to me was the fact that the Defense Department, the Air Force, and our military police have recently been working with law enforcement personnel in declassifying a number of important and significant gains that have been made within our Defense Establishment. New law enforcement techniques that have been developed are now being shared with local police officials. I thought that this was certainly encouraging.

I was unaware that restrictions on this type of information had previously existed to such a great extent, and I was most pleased to see that they are being removed.

Would you not agree with me that this kind of cooperation and assistance would be helpful in reaching the point which you suggest in your testimony, and that is the need for local law enforcement officials to be fully informed of the modern techniques which are being developed?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes, Senator, it would be extremely helpful, and now in the last few years we have been developing—science is developing—techniques that can come to the aid of law enforcement.

Actually 30 years ago they put a radio in a police car, and very little happened after that until the recent dates. I think we should be in a position to take advantage of everything.

Senator KENNEDY. Is it your understanding that the Armed Forces have developed a number of new surveillance and security techniques?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Under combat conditions.

Senator KENNEDY. I was thinking of surveillance and security techniques that are used to protect Minuteman installations and other sensitive locations and which might be adaptable to civilian law enforcement needs.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. As I understand it, it has taken a good deal of time for these developments to be declassified and made available to law enforcement personnel. Is it your opinion that this kind of cooperation would be extremely helpful to local law enforcement personnel?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes, I do, Senator, and frankly it has been so classified that I don't have a complete awareness of all the possibilities.

Senator KENNEDY. Would you urge the continuation of the declassification of this kind of material?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes, and undoubtedly this wouldn't affect national security at all. Yes, I certainly would.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, you may resume.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Recognizing this problem, the manpower problem, Detroit has devoted full energies to recruiting applicants and retaining trained officers. The complete spectrum of current recruiting techniques has been employed. To make the position attractive for new recruits and to retain skilled officers the salary of patrolmen has been increased from $6,141 in 1962 to $8,335 this year. Despite the major efforts made the department is still 500 men short of its budgeted strength. Practically all cities are experiencing a shortage of qualified police officers.

In a study conducted by the National League of Cities last year involving some 284 police departments, 64.5 percent reported that they were operating below authorized personnel strength. This applies to large as well as small cities.

With Federal assistance Detroit could make a two-pronged attack on the personnel shortage: (1) present personnel could be trained to perform their duties more effectively; and (2) recruiting efforts could be intensified and new recruiting techniques developed.

We need—all police departments need—training, training, and more training. The work is more complex than ever. We are in a social revolution which is not yet resolved. The U.S. Supreme Court's recent interpretations of the Constitution require more skillful investigations. The sophistication of urban crime requires intensive training in human relations in order to secure the respect and cooperation of the citizenry. In this regard, past practices in law enforcement as symbolized by the patrolman walking a beat—comforting as he was to the neighborhood—are an anachronism.

Crime today is mobile and anonymous, and we must not only be mobile to fight it but computerized as well.

Industry and the Armed Forces have long recognized the value of continuing inservice training—and they have found methods of financing it, too. Police departments, however, have been frustrated in their efforts to supply necessary training. On one hand limited police budgets restrict the opportunity for training, and on the other hand police executives in chronically understaffed departments find it impossible to remove officers from the street to attend extensive training programs.

If Detroit were to receive Federal assistance for training—and I believe this applies to all cities—we would first develop programs of high impact to minimize the time officers must be away from their regular duties, possibly incorporating teaching by closed circuit television. Simultaneously we would develop training programs for which the officer would be paid during his off-duty hours. Federal assistance would permit the department to employ the services of highly skilled professional educators in structuring and implementing the programs.

The effect of training on recruitment cannot be overlooked.

Detroit's experience has shown that the existence of a well structured college degree program in police administration, such as that established at Wayne State University last fall, together with the program of tuition reimbursement which has been instituted by the city, is one of our best resources for inducing qualified persons to apply. A police department staffed with well trained, enthusiastic, professional officers is attractive to the type of recruit police departments require.

With greater resources available, recruiting efforts could be extended and better techniques developed and adopted. A comprehensive plan would insure the ultimate goal of police recruiting—that every qualified person in the total community be made aware of the opportunities, rewards, and satisfactions of a police career.

Today's police departments must adopt the most modern and best concepts of management and organization.

In Detroit we have introduced the output oriented budgeting plan which has proven so successful in the U.S. Defense Department. Our budget staff has had enough experience with this innovation to recognize the value of relating budgeted input to department goals and of comparing alternative methods of achieving desired results. We feel that expanded efforts in this area would result in greater control and better management decisions. But again our efforts are severely impeded by the need to use all available city funds in line activities.

Our city has an executive training program at Wayne State University. However, because the class is small and only a few persons from each city department can attend, the program fails to meet our needs. Indoctrination of new promoted top police officers and periodic training for other executives would result in a more efficient police force.

But sufficient funds cannot be diverted to finance the training. Management training would lead to better organization, administration, and coordination of police activities. It would enable our hard-pressed executives to function at a new and higher plane of efficiency.

Nationally, the experience we have watched during the past 2 years under the Economic Opportunity Act and the Local Law Enforcement Assistance Act has been promising enough to suggest that local initiative can be productive if it is stimulated and if funds are available. As I have indicated new ideas are being tried in police training, and in the use of new communications equipment, and in the deployment of tactical forces, to mention just a few. We believe this process should be extended. More local departments should become involved in trying new ideas, new techniques, and new equipment.

We believe the President is right in urging this.

We also wish to extend our endorsement to the objectives embodied in the Crime Commission report. From our point of view the most important contribution made by this Commission in its far-reaching and comprehensive recommendations is that it has clearly established the interdependence of the several components of a system of justice in combating crime. We at the local level know only too well the problems arising from archaic bail bond systems, inadequately staffed probation departments, lengthy delays in processing through our lower courts. We are acutely conscious of the impact which these shortcomings add to our own struggles to modernize and professionalize our working police forces. We believe the Commission's recommendations and the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967" will contribute to our local efforts in a decisive and constructive way.

There is only one aspect of the proposed legislation that will cause us difficulty in Detroit—and, I suspect, in most cities, be they large or small. The funding formulas for the special action programs and the construction of special purpose facilities may, at this stage, be unrealistic in terms of local capability. While we recognize the need for our cities to enlarge their own financial commitment to local law enforcement, we must point out that local expenditures in the police and public safety area have been skyrocketing during the past decade. According to the Commerce Department, between 1957 and 1962 local expenditures for police and fire protection increased about 40 percent—almost three-quarters of a billion dollars. Estimates for the period 1962 to the present indicate at least a comparable increase. Exclusive of public education these expenditures, which now exceed $3 billion annually, represent the largest single item in the budget of almost all our cities. I might point out that the funds requested by the President for this total program represent only a little over 1 percent of present municipal expenditures.

With regard to new special action programs described in section 202(a) of S. 917, we would therefore urge a funding formula similar to that authorized for planning—namely, a 90 to 10 percent, Federal-local sharing. These are new programs and new concepts which the legislation describes correctly as experimental. For this reason, and in light of our present heavy commitment, we urge that if these programs are to be started in the next year, Federal aid with a minimum amount of local money will be essential. Also we point out these programs must necessarily demonstrate their worth on a proven basis before the cities are asked to assume the major burden.

With regard to the construction of special facilities described in section 203(a) of S. 917, we would urge a funding formula comparable to the present formula in urban renewal—two-thirds Federal, one-third local. In planning for capital expenditures of this type our cities are under terrific pressures and limitations. The urban renewal formula has been successful in drawing heavy commitments from cities and could do the same in this area. Expecting or asking for a larger capital commitment will likely result in too low a priority being assigned these useful types of facilities in view of the terrific competing priorities for very limited local dollars.

My discussion up to this point has dealt with improving the capability of police departments, and, as I have indicated, there are many, many areas and opportunities for accomplishing this end. However, we must face the whole problem of crime. What good is the most efficient police department if the correctional part of the criminal justice does not rehabilitate offenders? This question is more important because the most depressing characteristic of our present correctional system is the high rate of recidivism of offenders. I am not unfamiliar with the problems faced by the courts, probation and parole departments, and penal institutions. As indicated earlier, before becoming police commissioner in Detroit, I was in charge of the Recorder's Court probation department having jurisdiction over all persons placed on probation by Detroit courts. The understaffed and overworked probation facilities throughout the country face an impossible task. I believe probation would work if given a chance. Probation officers everywhere have impossible caseloads. Frequently, they are unable to have even sporadic contact with their clients, much less do any supportive work. The courts, parole departments, and penal institutions are not adequately staffed and organized to provide effective remedial programs for offenders who come within their jurisdiction.

Detroit is proud of its reputation as a leader in community relations and as a city which thus far has avoided the severe racial explosions that have erupted in most major cities in the Nation. The police department has taken a major role in achieving this position. I cannot visualize a successful community relations program without the complete involvement of the police. For this reason, I was elated to see the importance attached to community relations in this act. The best police department imaginable could not fulfill its objectives in a hostile community. (I have attached to my statement a report prepared by the U.S. Conference of Mayors describing our highly successful experimental saturation training program funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity.)

And the acts of violence fomented by civil disturbances have the same end result in property damage, injuries, and deaths as the general run of crimes. I feel that police departments are as obligated to prevent civil unrest as they are to prevent crimes. Crime and civil unrest are community problems and solutions require complete community involvement.

Successful conclusion of any attack on crime must necessarily involve not only the crime itself but the multiple causes leading to it. Therefore, all parts of the act are important, because they are aimed at the complete structure of crime, its causes, its results. Because of its attack on the entire problem and because implementation of the Act would be a giant step toward a crime-free America, I unequivocally support this act.

If money were available tomorrow Detroit is prepared to implement progressive police developments in three areas: (1) a new generation computer to increase the capability of activities in this area; (2) completion of the final half of our personal two-way radio system, and (3) development of a highly trained special task force which could be directed against every phase of street crime.

Nationally, we know that other cities are equally prepared to use the resources which this act would make available. Let me cite again the 1966 National League of Cities Police Survey. The survey also showed these encouraging trends in urban law enforcement, and I quote:

> The readiness of most police departments to try new technologies and techniques. Improved communications, such as the portable radio for foot patrolmen, and the rapidly expanding use of electronic data processing equipment and other devices show the modern sweep of law enforcement on the municipal level.
> Increased emphasis on specialized training and college-level courses for officers.
> Better cooperation between municipal police departments and other law enforcement agencies.
> Willingness on the part of many cities to undertake independent studies of their police administrative and organizational procedures and to carry out the recommendations once the studies are finished.

The recognition of the need for more public relations programs to gain support for law enforcement goals, and the progress by many departments in establishing such programs.

Thus, there are signs that municipal police departments are making progress in their professional competence and administrative procedures. This comes at a time when law enforcement efforts must come to grips not only with rising crime rates but also the complexities of providing full protection under the law to all citizens.

The President's Commission report on the challenge of crime in a free society has made clear the scope of the problem of crime and what this Nation can and must do to control it. The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act is potentially one of the most important steps our Nation can take to combat this problem effectively. Detroit stands ready with the other cities of the Nation to take full advantage of the resources which this act will provide to take full advantage of your consideration and support of it as an invaluable aid to local units of government in our unceasing battle against the critical problem of crime in America.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Commissioner. Did you wish to comment on any of the other bills before the committee?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I have no further comments unless the members ask me questions.

Senator McCLELLAN. I notice you directed your prepared statement soley to the safe streets and crime control bill.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. What is your principal recommendation? If I followed you correctly, is it to increase the ratio of Federal aid that is recommended in the President's bill?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes, Senator, to increase it; because I am afraid the cities have just about reached the end of their financial capabilities, and this I wouldn't want continued for a long time. I think that we are on the verge of a breakthrough in many areas to combat crime, and I think we need help. I don't visualize that we are going to need this help for the rest of the existence of the cities.

Senator McCLELLAN. The next question I was going to ask you, whether you saw the need for this comparable Federal aid program for law enforcement throughout the country as a permanent program?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I believe I mentioned, Senator, I——

Senator McCLELLAN. You just said that. That was the next question I had in mind.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Commissioner, what do you foresee will be the probable length of time that assistance of this nature will be needed by the cities?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, that is a very difficult question, because I can't prophesy the results, nor can I say with any certainty when we will successfully have gotten at the roots of crime, the breeding ground of crime, and I think that this is a very dire need. We are doing something about the criminal, but what we are doing about him can't be too terribly successful when we consider that the rate of recidivism is around 70 percent in our State penal institutions. I think we are missing and not getting at the causes of crime, and I think perhaps with Federal funds we can make some inroads there.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am trying to ascertain whether you anticipate that, generally, municipalities are going to be better off and better able to take over the burden of financing, to keep police departments well trained, modernized in equipment, and so forth; they are going to be able to do that without Federal assistance in the future? I have been wondering about it. I support this bill, certainly all of its general objectives. I support it and I will study it with respect to any modifications that I might feel would be advisable.

But I am concerned, however, when we enter into a program of this kind with the Federal Government, our experience in the past has been that they have usually become permanent programs, and I am persuaded in my own mind that this is going to become a permanent program.

I don't mean to say I am apprehensive. I don't want to use that word. I am persuaded that it will likely become a permanent program. However, if a permanent program of this kind, on a reasonable basis, will bring about—will have the effect of producing or contributing to an arrest of the present trend in crime, or to reducing the incidences of crime, and contribute to an effective law enforcement program throughout the Nation, then I would supoprt it as a permanent program.

But the point here is this is an experiment we are entering into to a great extent, and I would express this view—I think we must enter into it with some measure of caution. In other words, there is no use going out and spending a whole lot of money and getting no results, and thus maybe become disillusioned with the idea. I think if we approach it gradually and make some tests as we go along, and then increase Federal assistance as we gain experience and determine the areas where it is needed and where it can be most effective, I think that would be a prudent approach to it.

I am not now passing judgment on the amount the President has recommended. So far as I know at this moment, that amount is satisfactory to me, if we can get testimony here from the right sources indicating how this money will be spent, and what programs it will support and what they expect to achieve. Although we are all concerned about this crime problem and want to do something about it, I think this is a good vehicle for us to make use of to try to do something about it. I think we need to try to study this as we go along and find out how this money, or any money, any Federal aid, can be used most effectively to achieve our goals. I don't think we can or should do it hastily.

And so I hope we will have testimony here from police commissioners, police chiefs and others to give us suggestions—concrete illustrations. Supposing this comes along and some of this money is made available to us. What will we do with it? Have you got any concrete statement now? You have covered it in part, but do you have anything further as to what you would do with your share of this money?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. You wouldn't have to take it for every goal. I imagine one community might need it for one purpose and another community might need it for another.

Mr. GIRARDIN. I know the needs of our community.

Senator McCLELLAN. What would you give priority to in your community? What aspect of the program would you want to give priority to in your community?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No. 1, training.

Senator McCLELLAN. Training?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes. No police department can have enough training. We need training, training, and more training, both before the man becomes a police officer and while he is in service. I would say this would be No. 1.

Now, of course, we have a definite manpower shortage. We are about 500 men under our full strength, and this is a big problem for us. But, if the police officers are trained enough, and if we have the hardware—that is, the computer, the communications, and various things like that—we are not going to miss the manpower as much as we do with out it. One trained man probably is worth several untrained.

Senator McCLELLAN. This is the area I had in mind, where possibly we would move into a more or less permanent program of Federal assistance. The proposal to aid communities, or police forces and so forth, to get facilities and equipment, that might be temporary as compared to the other needs.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. I mean once you get them equipped that way, as you say, it should be kept up. But as for a training program, I envision something besides just a training program, or a source of training available just from the local community itself.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think by consolidating and taking in areas where you may establish institutes for training of local police, and applicants, and so forth; continuing schools, so to speak. I think in that area we may well anticipate the Federal Government is moving into something permanent, particularly to keep up with the technology and modern progress of the times.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is a continuous thing.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. It isn't feasible to just train for today, and then forget about it. I think through this legislation, in that area particularly, we may be moving to the establishment of something that will be permanent, where the Federal Government will have a continuing responsibility, perhaps. I don't want to use that word, but a continuing participation in law enforcement through the country in that area.

Thank you very much. Senator Hart?

Senator HART. Senator, if I could, I will yield to Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. I appreciate it. Let me commend you for what I think has been an extremely helpful and useful statement. I must say that I thought it was extremely comprehensive. You have pointed up the importance of community relations and I am in complete agreement with you on this point. I think that you have highlighted the importance of it, and it was, I think, one of the most significant parts of your testimony.

Are you familiar with Mr. Vincent W. Piersante?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes. He was our chief of detectives until a short time ago.

Senator KENNEDY. How long did he serve as your chief of detectives?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Approximately 2 years.

Senator KENNEDY. What was his background in law enforcement?

Mr. GIRARDIN. He spent 25 years with the Detroit Police Department, and he retired when his time was up to go with the State attorney general.

Senator KENNEDY. As I understand it, he wrote an article that was published in the New York Law Journal, in which he made a comment about the Escobedo case and confessions in general. I believe he also addressed himself to the likely effect of the Miranda and Escobedo cases on confessions.

I am wondering if you are familiar with his general conclusions?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I believe I am familiar with his conclusions, Senator. I don't believe I read the particular article to which you refer.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you state his general conclusions?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I am just not certain of his general conclusions. If I may state mine, I will be happy to. That is, that I would like more time to determine whether this is going to work for or against society. The Miranda decision was handed down, I believe, in June last year. We had some preparation for it by the Escobedo decision. I think we saw the handwriting on the wall. But there is quite a difference between the two.

Now, I certainly don't have the impression that we have a revolving door at police headquarters as a result of the Miranda decision, but I still feel it is too soon to tell, because 6, 7, 8 months is not a decent length of time to draw definite conclusions as to whether it is good or bad, in my opinion.

Senator KENNEDY. I am delighted to have your expression, because of your extraordinary background in law enforcement. I believe Mr. Piersante would be in accord with those observations, and I think it is extremely useful to have what I consider to be one of the largest and most successful organization, which you head, testify on this matter before this committee. I appreciated your comments.

Mr. GIRARDIN. I thank you, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding to me. I regret having to leave.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hart.

Senator HART. I, too, am grateful to have your impressions, suggestions, and recommendations with respect to the reaction to Miranda.

I would like to ask about another bill that has attracted considerable attention here, before concluding by commending you on the strong support you gave to the safe streets bill.

There has been much concern voiced about wiretapping. There is a bill here that would authorize it. I believe you are familiar with the general outline under so-called "safeguards." As a police reporter, as a probation officer, and as a police commissioner, what is your feeling with respect to wiretapping?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, I am afraid of wiretapping unless it is very, very carefully controlled.

Senator HART. Why?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Because, in my experience people have become overzealous in the use of wiretaps—legally or illegally—and this invasion, I think, is a very dangerous situation. Now, I don't have personal knowledge of any great crimes being cleared by the use of wiretaps.

I can conceive of it being a shortcut in, for instance, a handbook operation. I can conceive of it working to the unwary. But criminals certainly are sophisticated enough, I believe, not to discuss their nefarious acts over the telephone. As I say, I don't have personal knowledge of any important case being cleared up that way.

But I am a little afraid that, if it isn't tightly controlled, and used only in certain cases with the tightest controls, it can get out of hand.

Senator HART. We have been told, or I have read, that organized crime finds as its most serviceable weapon the telephone, and the implication at least in that statement is that if you just permit police to tune in on the phone, organized crime would be severely reduced in its power. Do you buy that?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, I just have a strong feeling that certainly around the country there must have been a lot of tuning in on the telephones of organized crime, and I think it is still with us. Whether this tuning in on their phones was legal or not legal, I don't know.

It probably is a shortcut. It takes the place of surveillance. But if it becomes a law, don't you think most people who are the most sophisticated criminals, would be the first ones not to use it at all?

Senator HART. If I can answer the question, "Yes." But I think it is a point that comes better from you.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Then pardon me for asking the question. I meant to state it as my opinion.

Senator HART. Yes, because your opinion means a lot more in the judgment of what we should do on wiretapping than somebody who has not been engaged in the field, which describes me.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, under strict controls and for a limited use—I can conceive, for instance, of a kidnaping. Of course, in that instance it wouldn't be wiretapping so much as monitoring the call. Now we are getting into another area. This would be an eavesdropping type device, to monitor the call, and then to trace back its source as quickly as possible. There are certain emergencies of this kind where a life might be in danger. But it should be carefully controlled.

Senator HART. Your primary responsibility is protecting the public against crime and its effect. I asked you about wiretapping, and you express a great reserve about its use, and suggested several times that it be under very careful control. You haven't told us just how detailed that control should be, what areas of alleged crime it should be available in.

But the broader question, though responsible for law enforcement and public protection, why is it that you voice this great reservation about the use of it?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Well, I think No. 1, we can do our work pretty well without it. No. 2, it is the kind of invasion I don't particularly care for, because often innocent people, are ensnared in this business, innocently ensnared. As I say, I don't know that it has resulted in solutions, that its value has been so great.

But by the same token, I would increase the penalty against any person using it who is not using it legally, under perhaps a high court order, a Federal court. I would increase the penalty, because I think there is far too much of it being used by unauthorized persons.

Senator HART. You replied to Senator Kennedy with respect to your reaction to the Miranda case, and you said you didn't want the impression left that the front door of the police station was a swinging door as a result of it. Explain what you have directed be done in the Detroit Police Department as a result of Miranda and Escobedo, and in the general area of what counsel you give to somebody that is in custody.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Well, if the person is an accused person, we tell him his rights under the Constitution and his rights to an attorney, and that if he does not have an attorney, that an attorney will be provided for him. That attorney then is provided him, not by us but by the court. But we do this if he says he wants an attorney.

In the Escobedo case we felt we had the right to continue discussing the situation with him. But I think this might be significant, on whether this has had an effect on law enforcement in Detroit or not.

In the year 1966, we took 1,100 more criminal cases to recorder's court than we did in 1965, with roughly 200 less police officers in the department, and those who are in the department are a lot busier because our business has increased. Crime went up, but so did the others. I can't yet say we lost the possibility of taking Mr. X to court, whom we feel committed a crime, because of either the Escobedo or Miranda decisions. I think we should reserve some judgment until we have given it all a chance to work. It is a lot easier, of course.

Now instructions to investigate more thoroughly—and this is why we need to pay our officers higher salaries, to get more skilled men—to investigate more thoroughly, to find more circumstantial evidence, if it is there, to find more witnesses, if they are there. I think so often the prosecution is dependent largely on a confession. But I like to see a case where every element is in there and ready to be established.

Senator HART. Commissioner, before Escobedo, with its clear requirement of giving advice to the person in custody, what generally was the procedure when a person was in custody?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I just wanted to check with Deputy Nichols to be sure that my recollection was correct. The case would be discussed by the officer with the accused or with the suspect, whatever status he might occupy at that time, and if he admitted the crime, a rough statement would be taken, and he would sign it and usually would conclude by saying that this statement was given freely and voluntarily.

He would then be taken to the prosecutor's office for a formal statement, and at this particular time the assistant prosecuting attorney who took the statement would advise him of his constitutional rights.

Senator HART. Which, as you recall it, was that it could be used against him.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes. It didn't go much further than that, if I recall correctly, Senator, except that he had to give it freely and voluntarily, and that it could be used against him.

Senator HART. Pre-Escobedo and post-Escobedo, if you had a person that the community was convinced in its heart was a criminal, an old pro, the real threat to society, what did he regard as his rights and what kind of talking did he do, whether it was with or without Escobedo?

Mr. GIRARDIN. A hardened criminal never told us anything anyway unless he was in such a position that he tried to make a deal. By a "deal" I mean if he would tell us something we didn't know, usually on someone else, we would go a little easier on him.

However, we are getting this and have been getting this reaction even from children. We have 12-year-olds who are accomplished burglars, and they tell us that we can't take them to court because it is a waste of time. They will just get W. & R., which means in the parlance, warned and released.

We have rapists at 14, stickup men with a gun at the same age. They won't tell us anything, and they haven't for many years.

Senator HART. This is the point. I was trying to determine whether it made any difference in your relations with that kind of individual, whether there was an Escobedo rule or a Miranda rule or not.

Mr. GIRARDIN. The hardened criminal? There is a saying, "Tell the truth and go to jail." This is very prominent among the underworld in the hardened criminals. This is their philosophy. If they say anything they are going to wind up in prison, so they say nothing, and this is not just current. This has been going on as long as crime.

Senator HART. Then what kind of person is it about whom it is now said that because he is warned, he is told of his rights, and that the rights include "You don't have to talk and you can get a lawyer"—what kind of a person is it that now you don't get a confession from, but you did before?

Mr. GIRARDIN. It is probably more often the casual offender than not. It is probably also the person who feels the need to talk about it. The ones that we are getting the confessions from or not?

Senator HART. No, I am trying to get at what kind of a fellow it is that because the Detroit police now tell him, "You don't have to talk, you can get a lawyer," who doesn't talk, but who would have.

Mr. GIRARDIN. For instance, Senator, if we have say a burglar and we have got a good case against him, he might be inclined, prior to then, say "All right, I will tell you about a lot of burglaries if you do so and so for me." He is less inclined to talk about anything at all now.

I notice in our reports—I have no way of knowing whether these persons who would talk about it or not, but I have noticed in reports, that I read day after day on our regular crime that a person who knifes or shoots another one—and usually this is a friend or a relative, a very dear friend or a relative, it is in a house, it is the kind of crime the police can't very well control—doesn't want to talk about it after he is told that. But usually the victim, if he lives, doesn't want to prosecute anyway because they are relatives or very good friends.

Senator HART. You have described the robber or burglar against whom you have a good case anyway. He might talk in connection with a deal.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator HART. Is it fair for me to summarize my understanding of your testimony with respect to Miranda, that at this time you are not in a position to tell us one case you have lost because of Miranda, and second, that you feel it is too early to make any firm judgment with respect to the course of action which you take?

Mr. GIRARDI. Yes, that is a fair summary.

Senator HART. Let me ask you this. The "slow ball" that is thrown at those of us who feel that it would be desirable not to over-react is this. They say that the crime rate is worst now than it was 5 years ago. Therefore, these cases which insist upon rights being explained to the accused must be responsible for it. They push it further to say that once upon a time, and it may well have been when you were covering the police beat, it wasn't just psychological duress that was involved. Maybe it never happened in Detroit, but some places in the country years ago they used a rubber hose. And the crime rate became worse after the police were told you can't use the rubber hose. Therefore, it was because of no more rubber hose. And isn't a beaten up criminal exactly what should be delivered up to protect the public.

Now, how do you react to that?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, I think it is oversimplifying it, because crime has multiple causation. There are many, many, many factors. The rise in crime has been going up steadily and markedly for at least 15 years, but to attribute it to one thing like a broken home of an alcoholic mother of a father who doesn't understand or poverty or whatever, I think this is too easy and glib an explanation for crime, and it is too complicated for that.

This is one of the things that we have to know more about. What causes crime? What causes this person in the family to become a criminal, and his brother to join the clergy, and another brother to be a model citizen. Or what causes in the "culturally deprived"—if I may use the cliché—area, two boys in this family to be hauled up as murderers, and two boys living directly next door, under the same stresses, the same dynamics, the same pressures, to put themselves through college and become citizens who have something to contribute to society. We don't know. We just don't know those things.

And until we have some of the answers, we won't be able to say how much influence this factor has and how much influence that factor has. We have got to get the whole picture, and this is why I am gratified with the response, gratified with this bill, and also gratified with the National Crime Commission's report, in which they talk about getting at the causes of crime.

I think that if we realize that there isn't any simple answer, and put our collective energies and brains together, we will get at the source and cut it off there, and maybe throw a generation or two away in the meantime.

Senator HART. Commissioner, it is that last point that I want to conclude on, by thanking you for highlighting to us the primary importance that you give to the safe streets bill, and making clear to us the assistance the adoption of it would give you and other police departments across the country.

This is as Senator Kennedy has said, excellent testimony, excellent testimony. I think our chairman has wisely suggested the desirability of getting into this record specific examples of the means that would be used to avail of the authorized money.

I think that it would be useful, Mr. Chairman, to have the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance Counsel in here and tell us what has been done with the so-called pilot programs that have been authorized under that Local Law Enforcement Assistance Act of several years ago.

I introduced that bill, and at that time I and others associated in that effort explained that we hoped it would enable us soon to expand the program, and that it would enable us to determine the effectiveness with which the Federal Government would contribute to local law enforcement. And clearly, testimony from that office should be helpful to the committee.

Thank you very much.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I was interested in one of your statements, your last statement that we have got to try to find out some of these things. What was it you said about a "generation or two"?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I said it might take us a generation before we know some of those answers, Senator. I talked about the 12-year-olds who are going out with guns and robbing people, and I don't know what you do about them. I don't know what you do really except get them off the streets.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What is a generation, 20 or 30 years?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Twenty years. I didn't mean to keep this program that long.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you know what the increase in the crime rate was, the average during the past 5 or 6 years?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Well, statistics differ so.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am talking about those that are reported that we usually go by. You see them published in the paper. They come from the FBI, I believe.

Mr. GIRARDIN. The crime reports I estimate in 5 years is perhaps 18 percent on a general increase. I am not sure. I would have to check.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I had occasion recently to check on this. My recollection is I think it is 8.6 percent average increase annually. Now one year it went over 10, and another year it went below this, but the average for I think 5 or 6 years, as I made the calculation 2 or 3 weeks ago, it averaged eight-point-something percent as I remember. It is 8.6 or 8.9; I am not sure.

Did you ever make a calculation throwing away a generation?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Did you ever make a calculation at 8.6 or 10 percent or some calculation like that; if crime continues to increase at that rate, annually, from now until 1975, how many crimes would be committed in this country by that time, or for 20 years or a little less, say to 1985—how many crimes will be committed by that time on an annual basis?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes. Senator, maybe I didn't make myself clear. I live with this 24 hours a day, and I believe in doing everything we can, and that is why I am so strongly in support of this bill.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I favor this bill, too.

Mr. GIRARDIN. But I say before we know the causes of crime, it might take that long, and in the meantime our efforts will be somewhat stopgap, but we have got to get these people off the streets.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have got to get the criminal off the street.

Mr. GIRARDIN. That is right, that is what I am saying.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How are you going to get the criminal off the street except by detection and arrest and punishment?

Mr. GIRARDIN. That is why I want more training.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Building a deterrent where he will not have the inducement to commit crime.

Mr. GIRARDIN. There is no other way that I know of.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is right. Now according to my calculations, and these are conservative, if I am not mistaken—I have lowered the rate—at the rate we are going now, we had 3 million crimes committed last year, that is reported crimes.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And all of the statements are that there are two to three times and sometimes as high as 10 times as many committed as are reported, but there are over 3 million reported in 1966, and this crime rate—I haven't taken it for the last year or the highest year, but over a period of 5 or 6 years that I have made this calculation—that is the average.

Now, if crime increases that much each year, averages that from now until 1975, on the basis of our present calculations and on the basis of present reporting, there will be 7,500,000 crimes committed annually—major crimes—and if you project it on to 1985, which is a little less than a generation, it will be 15 million major crimes.

My contention is that we can't—our society can't tolerate that much crime in this country. I don't believe it can. I believe we will have absolute chaos. You talk about now having 12- or 14-year-old kids. They know what the law is. You can't do anything with them. Who will obey the law, when you get a condition like that? Who will respect it? Who will respect the institutions of law enforcement, when a condition like that prevails in this country? Nobody will.

You hear people talking today about taking the law into their own hands. Why? You hear people talking about getting guns to keep in their homes, who never kept a gun. Why? Just because of what you pointed out—fear. Fear of what? Crime. Why? Because we are not doing enough about crime. The criminal is still at large and is still on the streets.

You talk about this Miranda decision having no impact. Let me ask you this. Do you doubt that the Miranda decision is causing cases to be dismissed where the defendant is absolutely guilty?

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, as I said, I don't know of a case. It may, it may not. I would like more time to gather statistics and see what effect it has.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I assume we can take the opinion—I am not saying from now on, but I ask you, would you say now that there are no cases having to be dismissed, where the defendant is known to be guilty, has confessed his crime, simply because of the Miranda rule?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No, sir; I don't know. I did not say that. I don't know that that is true, but whether they have or have not been, and I wouldn't say they have not been——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, we have had testimony here and you have seen headlines in the paper.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. That give you concrete illustrations, about a man who murdered his wife and five children.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. And being turned loose, and the same judge said—I think at the time he commented on it—that there had been two other similar cases like it recently in that jurisdiction. We hear of them everyday from policemen and from headlines in the newspapers and from judges who have testified here.

In view of that, I don't see how we can say, unless we disbelieve them, that the Miranda decision is not having some impact upon the crime rate in this country.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, it may be having an impact on the crime rate. I think what I said was this. That I don't know of a specific outstanding case in my district where we could attribute it to the Miranda case.

I think that there are many factors that contribute. Maybe some people are walking the streets who shouldn't be. I have read about them—yes, who should not be—because of confessions that were made that were not in accordance with the law.

Senator McCLELLAN. What do you think the impact has been of these headlines portraying this all over the country about murderers getting loose on such a flimsy pretext—such as he wasn't told that he could have a lawyer—yet known by his own confession to be guilty? What impact do you think that has on people who are on the borderline of becoming criminals?

Mr. GIRARDIN. I don't know.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is not conducive to persuading them not to enter into a life of crime, is it?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No, it isn't, Senator. You are right. But I also think that the person who commits a crime doesn't think he is going to get caught.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, they are beginning to have more reason for believing that these days, with the crime rate as it is and with less punishment for crimes.

Mr. GIRARDIN. That is right. Our prisons in Michigan have a 25 percent smaller population than they had 6 years ago.

Senator McCLELLAN. Notwithstanding the increase in crime since that time.

Mr. GIRARDIN. The population in the State has gone up and the rate of crime has gone up. Yet our prison population is down 25 to 30 percent.

Senator McCLELLAN. You can't attribute that to better law enforcement, can you?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No, I can't attribute it to that, not when we are taking more people to court than we ever did, Senator. But I think there is a more liberal parole and probation policy.

Senator McCLELLAN. The point I am getting at, when you get these hardened criminals they ought to be kept confined until they can demonstrate that they successfully have gone through a reformation and it is safe to turn them loose. When we turn them loose after they have been convicted of these henious crimes, before they have demonstrated that it is safe and that society will not be endangered by liberating them, I feel very strongly they ought to be kept confined.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator, it is very hard to get accurate statistics, but as near as I can come to it, 97 percent of the persons who go to a penal institution come back into society again.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How many?

Mr. GIRARDIN. About 97 percent is the closest I can come to it, come back.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What percentage of them go back to the penitentiary?

Mr. GIRARDIN. In our State prisons, and I think you will find this is true in a survey around the country in the State prisons, about 70 percent of the inmates have been in a penal institution before, either as a juvenile in a reformatory, so called, or in an adult installation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now one or two other questions. I understand you didn't want to testify on any of these other bills. That is my understanding, and I didn't ask you any questions about them. But you have gotten into other areas now, you challenged the wisdom of wiretapping. You say there ought to be a lot of restrictions on it, and I wholeheartedly agree with that word "restrictions."

I don't think it ought to be permissive as it is today under existing law. In the State of New York, as I understand it, there has been a wiretap law for quite some time, several years that they have used it. The officers who are coming down here testifying before us tell us they know of no abuses of it. Of course, I suppose there are always abuses in everything to some degree.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But none of a consequence, from their experience, yet you say you don't know that authorized wiretapping helps law enforcement. The New York officials testified that it helps. They have had experience with it. Have you had any experience with it?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No. It is only hearsay.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think maybe they would be better judges as to that issue.

Mr. GIRARDIN. I do, too.

Senator MCCLELLAN. New York law enforcement officials have been handicapped by a Supreme Court decision indicating that evidence is not admissible even if they get it, nor are the fruits of it admissible. They can't use it because of the interpretation the Court has placed on the Federal Communications Act. It is not admissible in court; to use the evidence they found would be a breech of the Federal law.

I take the position—and I am as much for protecting privacy as everyone else—and I am just as much for law and order—and I am just as much for disarmament, if it can be done safely.

But the thug, the robber, the burglar, the gangster carries a gun. I would rather see no citizen carry a gun. I would rather see policemen without guns. But I don't favor sending the policeman out after such characters without protection. We have heard testimony over and over, that these criminal elements, particularly the organized elements of crime, use the telephone extensively. The only contact the fellow who actually commits the crime has with the higher-ups, or "boss," is through the telephone.

Now if we are going to deny law enforcement agencies the use of the same tool that the criminal is using to promote his nefarious trade, why then the criminal has an advantage. I think under certain circumstances that we can trust our courts and police commissioners like you, and district attorneys who are under oath and who are dedicated to law enforcement, to handle a tool, an instrumentality like this, without being fearful of abuse of this authority.

I know you say sometimes you hear an innocent conversation, something you ought not hear. That might be true. But you get a search warrant and go in somebody's home and you may see some things you didn't expect to see or want to see, and that nobody wanted you to see, when you go in there to search for stolen property.

I tell you today we are going to have to forget about some of these trivialities—worrying with all this sentimentality that somebody who is innocent somewhere some time might suffer a little injustice. But above all we are being told, let the criminals go, don't use weapons against them that are vital in this day—vital, essential, and indispensable if we are to compete with their tactics.

I hope you will consider that. If we enact this law, you don't have to use it, but those who want it and feel they can use it judiciously and effectively to enforce the law can use it and I believe we can trust them to do so. There may be an exception now and then. We have exceptional situations all the time. We sometimes have the exception of a policeman sometimes who takes a bribe. You have sometimes an exception in a lawyer who may become a crook. You have exceptions in all places.

But generally I believe you can trust and put confidence in our law enforcement officials, those with high responsibility, not to abuse or violate the use of an instrumentality of that kind that is so urgently needed.

Are there any other statements you wish to make?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No, sir.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner did, in reply, as he concluded, express a willingness to answer any questions with respect to other legislation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I said I had understood that he didn't want to, and I didn't question him about any other bills.

Senator HART. Isn't it true that one of the problems of society is that the dishonest guy has a lead over an honest guy?

Mr. GIRARDIN. That seems to be one of our problems.

Senator HART. And the Bill of Rights somehow or other was intended to guard against using Government instrumentalities too vigorously to cut down the lead.

Mr. GIRARDIN. I believe that is why it was written.

Senator HART. That is what I believe.

Senator ERVIN. And when the dishonest guy wants to make an honest and voluntary confession, it doesn't help the honest people in society to deny him, to erect artificial inducements to keep a dishonest person from making an honest confession, does it?

Mr. GIRARDIN. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Thank you.

Senator HART. If he wants to make a confession hard enough, he can do it after you have told him.

Mr. GIRARDIN. This happens.

Senator McCLELLAN. In your experience, it is almost useless to interrogate anybody.

Mr. GIRARDIN. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, they are not going to tell you.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Pardon? Oh, the hardened prisoners.

Senator McCLELLAN. The hardened criminal.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Senator Hart asked me if we got much cooperation from the hardened criminal. As a rule, no; because he feels he is going to put himself in trouble.

Senator McCLELLAN. If he already knows enough now not to cooperate, it seems to me that if the arresting officer happened by inadvertence not to tell him of his constitutional rights, and he did make some statement that might be incriminating, it seems to me that that would be a poor excuse to turn him loose, if he is guilty.

Senator HART. But that goes to the basic problem. The smart bad guy won't. He knows his rights and doesn't have to be told. What do we do about the stupid bad guy, for whom there isn't a right unless he is told about it?

Senator McCLELLAN. Take this man who killed his wife and five children, is that the illustration?

Senator HART. Is that the one with 100 stab wounds?

Senator McCLELLAN. I didn't see the count. Whether it was one or 100, they were dead.

Senator HART. My reaction when that was discussed, I wondered if they had any sanity hearing.

Senator McCLELLAN. They did, and found him sane, so the papers report. I say it is a sad commentary on our system of justice when a man can murder his wife and five little children, and admit it, and then be turned loose on a technicality—because somebody didn't tell him he was entitled to a lawyer. I think it is tragic.

Senator HART. It is tragic. It is a technicality that you couldn't use a rack, and we got away from that. I mean these are all technicalities intended to protect substantive rights, and this is the reason it isn't so easy to sit around here and write a general rule with respect to the protection of the Bill of Rights.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are forgetting about the right of the people who get killed, get murdered, get robbed and mugged. We are forgetting about that. They have some rights, too.

If a fellow confesses that he murdered a member of my family or murdered your child, how would you feel about him being turned loose because some policemen failed to tell him he was entitled to a lawyer, something he already knew anyhow?

Senator ERVIN. The trouble is not an inability to write a clear rule. There is a clear rule written on this point in the fifth amendment which says no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case. That is about as clear and about as simple a statement as could be made in the English language.

Chief Justice Marshall said the people who drafted that and ratified it, it must be assumed that they meant what they said. The trouble is, in the Miranda case, five men, who had no authority to change the meaning of that expression undertook to rewrite it, and did rewrite it in a manner which is highly inconsistent with that statement of the constitutional principle.

Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have a letter here from one of your colleagues, the chief of police of one of your cities in Michigan, speaking of the Miranda case, and he says, among other things:

"It has made police recruiting tenfold more difficult."

Mr. GIRARDIN. Recruiting?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Recruiting of policemen. I can understand why they are short of police. They are not well paid in the first place. They are not adequately paid at all.

Mr. GIRARDIN. No.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In my judgment, I think they ought to be paid more and they ought to be better trained. I am strong for it and I am going to support this safe streets crime control bill, because I think it is very, very important. But I can understand why people don't want to become policemen today.

They work their hearts out and take a chance with these crooks, expose themselves to danger, place their lives in jeopardy and go through all of that, and then after several months, the fellow is turned loose because somebody didn't tell him that he was entitled to a lawyer, and everybody who knows the law in this country knows he is entitled to a lawyer. The policeman has seen this and lived with it.

Of course they know they are entitled to a lawyer. We have received several letters from chiefs of police in your State who are supporting the position that something must be done about the effect of the Miranda decision.

Thank you very much. I appreciate your appearance. In discussing this with you, you are certainly entitled to your opinion and I appreciate your coming here.

I want to get the other side of it and see what can be presented in opposition to these bills. I want to get the most forceful arguments that can be made against them in this record.

Mr. GIRARDIN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Tamm, come around please. The previous witness submitted a report of police-community relations in Detroit. I am sure he wanted it to go in the record. It will be printed in the record at the conclusion of his testimony.

(The statement referred to follows:)

POLICE-COMMUNITY RELATIONS TRAINING IN DETROIT—EXPERIENCE REPORT 106—COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE, U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS

INTRODUCTION

MAY, 1966.

Of necessity, American cities are increasingly interested in effective police training in community relations. The need was indicated by the 1965 survey of 310 cities, jointly conducted by the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the International Association of Chiefs of Police. Less than a third of those cities had formalized police-community relations programs, and even in those having some community relations training, there was wide diversity of quality and type of programs.

Of the recently increased number of training programs, the most significant are those which can be adapted to the conditions and resources of other communities. Such an operation was undertaken in Detroit during the summer and fall of 1965 and is being reported here for the benefit of those Mayors seeking information on other cities' experience.

BACKGROUND

In a four-month period, 1800 of Detroit's 4463 policemen participated in a 20-hour, four-week training course which covered all aspects of police-citizen problems. The program was voluntary and was held outside regular duty hours. The officer was paid $3.50 per hour for attendance. The training involved virtually all officers of the inner-city precincts in which a majority of the city's low-income and Negro citizens live. These officers' work experience, feelings and frustrations presented both a challenge and an opportunity to the course planners and instructors.

Considering the difficulties, the program was unusually effective (in the opinion of close observers) because it began to change the police officers' perceptions—of themselves and their work, and of minority groups' problems and attitudes. And it gave them some increase in skill and confidence in handling daily problems.

If that judgment is accurate, credit should go to a course design which, in handling the most complex and emotional parts of police work, used real-life situations, enabled the men to talk and think freely about them, and kept the lecture portions of the program in a supporting rather than dominant role.

HOW THE IDEA WAS BORN

The starting point was a 1964–65 study by Greenleigh Associates, a management research organization, of the social services that deal with poverty in Detroit. (The study, a major part of Detroit's Community Renewal Program, was approved and jointly financed by the federal Housing and Home Finance Agency and the City.) One of Greenleigh's recommendations was that police be given special training in understanding and working with persons in low income areas; that they should learn to handle the problems of minority groups and other culturally deprived residents with whom they come in contact with deeper insight and tolerance. It was stressed that average officers who have a good understanding of their job have a great potential for bringing to bear practical delinquency and crime prevention programs.

FEDERAL AID SECURED

The Greenleigh recommendation moved Detroit police officials to seek a federal anti-poverty grant of $213,222 for police training, to be jointly operated by the Police Department, the Commission on Community Relations (CCR), and the local anti-poverty agency, Total Action Against Poverty (TAAP). The grant was approved in June, 1965, and from July through October, 1965, the 8-session course was repeated four times.

In establishing the need for the program, it was emphasized that the summer months in the City of Detroit are marked by rising unemployment and increases in certain types of crime. Based upon data supplied by the Michigan Employment Security Commission and the Detroit Police Department, unemployment averages 21% higher during the summer months while the number of assaults and reported cases of larceny are 13% higher. In precincts where the majority of low income families and minority groups live unemployment, the number of street crimes and police contacts are over twice the rate elsewhere in the city.

DESIGN AND CONTENT

Based upon an earlier manual developed in connection with a Philadelphia police training project (Arthur Siegel and Associates, Professional Police-Human Relations Training, Springfield, Illinois: Chas. C. Thomas Co. 1963) the project staff adopted both the format and the specific study materials to coincide with situations in Detroit.

The staff adapted new case material to local situations and to specific class needs as they emerged. Fundamental to the approach taken in the program was the belief that hostility to police is not caused so much by occasional incidents where excessive force may be involved, as by the chronic repetition of clumsy manners, insensitive and rude communications to citizens, and thoughtless indignities. This reminder ran throughout the materials.

In the Detroit course, each class period of 2½ hours was divided into (1) a specialist's presentation on a police-related subject, and (2) the role-playing of a real-life police case, followed by free discussion of it in small groups. Each group's ideas were then reported to the full class.

LECTURES

Typical course lectures ran as follows:

Challenges of Contemporary Law Enforcement—by a local judge.
Successful Police Work in the Light of Recent Court Decisions—by a lawyer.
Community Changes as It Affects Police-Community Relations—by the executive of the Citizens' Committee for Equal Opportunity.
Law Enforcement and Prejudices—by a psychologist.
The Police in Emergency Community Situations—by a police sergeant.
Professional Police Work in a Changing Society—by an Oak Park (Ill.) officer.
The Civil Rights Movement in Perspective—by an ex-director of the Michigan Civil Rights Commission.
Increasing Community Support for Police Work—by the Director of the Chicago Police Department's Police-Community Relations Bureau or by a staff member of the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

A question period followed each lecture, then a coffee break, during which tables were set up for the group discussion to follow.

DISCUSSING "REALITY"

With each class of 60 regrouped ten at a table, police "actors" role-played a typical episode depicting the more frictional and difficult aspects of police dealings with citizens. Other cases were read aloud prior to discussion. After the case presentation each table group argued how the police could have handled it better, and all groups reported their ideas in a quick general session. This was repeated with stage 2 and 3. In mimeographed case materials, discussion questions challenged the men.

This part was the life and heart of the training process. It gave each man the chance to tap his experience, say what he would have done, and defend his idea against the next man's. A mark of the effectiveness of this material was the continuing debates back in the squadroom. This stimulated considerable interest among the officers awaiting training in later sessions.

CASE SYNOPSES

Brief descriptions of the cases follow:

In "House Search" white and Negro vice squad officers, with search warrant, visit the Rossi's on a "numbers" tip. Mrs. Rossi's reaction, her reference to Negroes, the Negro officer's crack about Italians, the manner of the search, and the officers' apologetic departure—all this invited lively second-guessing.

"Argumentative Neighbors" involve police in two men's squabble about parking space; suddenly they must deal with an anti-Semitic insult, too.

"Molesting a Female" tests the officers' skill in dealing with an intoxicated white woman and a Negro man. Is she his common-law wife, as he claims?

"Crowd" begins with an illegally parked car, and police questioning its Muslim owner, but as a crowd forms and "brutality" remarks multiply, the situation becomes stickier.

"Street Loitering" involves Appalachian men at a corner on a hot night; ordered to move on, they return soon; when the police come by again, and frisk the men, resentment and blows result. How do you get along with hill folk?

"Fights and Riots" mixes liquor, a Mexican, three white men attacking him, police arriving, and a Negro in the crowd trying to tell an officer that the Mexican was blameless. Both minority men feel misunderstood and maltreated by the police reaction.

"Drunk" depicts an officer's urging a drunk to go home, then dealing with the man's collapse, and convincing the crowd that no "brutality" had occurred.

A FIRST IN THE NATION—CITIZEN PARTICIPATION

Almost unheard of in police training was the invited presence of citizens during the lecture part of each session. It was done to give them more understanding of the difficulties and problems of police work. Then during the coffee break the guests (usually three in a session, and different ones each time), had their coffee in a nearby room with police coordinators and Community Relations Commission staff men. This gave the citizens a chance to comment on the lecture, air their views of police work, and to suggest how to improve police-citizen relations. They were invited and urged to help that process by reporting their experience back to their neighborhood groups and friends.

A number of the citizens were proposed by inner-city organizations, block leaders and neighborhood councils. Some were suggested by precinct commanders. An effort was made to find persons who could improve two-way communication. Before attending they were briefed by Community Relations Commission staff. They were paid $3.50 an hour from OEO funds.

At first some police participants were dubious if not suspicious of such attendance. But the 'outsiders' did not attend the group discussions where they might have been a distracting or inhibiting factor. Superior officers were generally convinced that civilian participation was a strong asset and aid to future benefits from the training. Among the officer-participants themselves there was general acceptance of the value of this type of citizen participation as the course progressed. It was agreed by all those connected with the program that this aspect of the course design made an important contribution to its impact and success.

SUMMARY OF KEY ELEMENTS IN DETROIT PROGRAM

1. The program was voluntary and was conducted on the officer's off-duty time with compensation.
2. The case approach and the real-life nature of the material was made as relevant to the working patrolman's experience as possible.
3. The experts' presentation, which provided timely information, were made less lecture-like when balanced with free discussion. Parts of each presentation could be related immediately to the case material.
4. Participation was built in, far beyond customary police training. Nearly half of the time the men were questioning the lecturers or discussing the cases in small groups. Following the role-played case or the reading of a case, the discussion groups compared ideas and reactions.
5. Identification of the case situations with the officers' own experience was given repeated emphasis.
6. The absence of 'right answers' in the case situations was deliberate: the officer was allowed maximum freedom of opinion—but then he had to defend it against comrades who disagreed. Group leaders stressed professional role of police.
7. The variety of ethnic and religious intergroup situations discussed conveyed the dimensions of low income status facing the policemen. Not just race.
8. Ventilation of police gripes against citizens was not prohibited. Recognition was given, however, to the necessity to uphold the law regardless of the attitudes involved.
9. Presence of civilians in the lecture section, though partly symbolic, was a healthy novelty, which the police acepted. The innovation was not lost upon neighborhood groups to whom the citizens reported.
10. "Saturation and contagion" effects were achieved giving this experience to nearly all policemen in the inner-city within four months. During that period the talk in squadrons reflected curiosity and questions among those who were taking or had completed the course. The talk indicated that new ideas were being stimulated and were getting attention.
11. The program cost $213,222 (10% city; 90% federal). This works out to about $118 per man. At $3.50 an hour, each officer participant was paid $70. Speakers fees, staff salaries, clerical services, and materials account for most of the remainder.
12. The program was coordinated by both the Police Department and the Commission on Community Relations, emphasizing community involvement. Key consultants were drawn from both academic and civic resources.

SUMMARY

While this program was undertaken initially as a demonstration training project, it is expected that it will be further developed and will be funded again this year. Meanwhile, course outlines, discussion guides and case studies are available for those who may be interested from the Detroit Commission on Community Relations, Water Board Building, Detroit, Michigan.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Tamm, you are the executive director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. You live here in Washington?

STATEMENT OF QUINN TAMM, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CHIEFS OF POLICE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. TAMM. Yes, that is correct, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have a prepared statement?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, I do have.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, you may proceed to read it if you like. You may give us any other background that you feel should be in the record regarding your experience and qualifications to speak on this subject.

Mr. TAMM. I will say that I have had some 32 years experience, sir, in the field of law enforcement, including 6 years as executive director of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, and if I may be permitted, I do have a statement that I would like to make.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do we have copies of it?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. You may proceed.

Mr. TAMM. Senator McClellan, on behalf of the 6,500 law enforcement executives who comprise the membership of our association, I first want to express to you and your colleagues our very sincere appreciation for the exemplary work you are doing in focusing attention on the growing restrictions upon the police and their ability to perform their duties effectively. These hearings are most welcome from this primary standpoint.

My colleagues and I have been greatly encouraged by the bills which you and other concerned Senators and Representatives have introduced in the 90th Congress to give some aid and relief to the dedicated, hard-pressed police officers responsible for protecting the lives, liberties, and properties of American citizens.

It seems to me we are living in an age of paradox. While we of the police, like all other citizens, are thoroughly in favor of the balance of power concept of our Republic, we admit to some confusion. We are confused because it seems that as greatly as the executive and legislative branches toil to help the police and to bring about a decrease in crime, the judicial branch (in the form of our U.S. Supreme Court) appears to be applying itself just as assiduously to stripping the police of their traditional, time-tested, and previously acceptable devices and techniques for combating crime.

I consider it no exaggeration to state unequivocally that we have the best trained, best educated, and most efficiently led policemen today that we have ever had in our Nation's history. I take particular pride, if I may say so, in the steps that the law enforcement agencies themselves have taken to improve their departments. I feel that law enforcement and police particularly have been the first to recognize the need for improvement.

The interest and concern that have been so thoroughly demonstrated by the congressional and administrative branches of our Federal Government promises that our capabilities will soon be augmented with more modern scientific tools, equipment, and means of communication, all of which should add up to making it more difficult for the criminal to prey upon society with impunity. At the same time, however, as fast as we adapt modern technology and social concepts to police use, we find ourselves being denied the use of the simplest basic investigative techniques by virtue of Supreme Court decisions.

When he dissented in the Miranda decision, Justice Harlan said, "This Court is constantly erecting new stories in the temple of constitutional law, but temples have a way of falling when one story too many is added."

With this statement, I most heartily agree.

Almost 200 years ago, 55 Americans among them merchants, bankers, farmers, doctors, soldiers, lawyers, and educators met in a room in the city of Philadelphia. Some of them were rich; some were poor. Some of them were from the North; some of them were from the South. The bonds that drew them together were love of their new country and their fervent resolve to safeguard its people and its institutions. The results they achieved made them immortal. They were the framers of the Constitution of the United States.

I firmly believe that these men of vision and dedication foresaw the power and majesty of the Nation whose course they charted during those troubled days of 1787. I am equally convinced, however, that these men of vision never dreamed that the United States would one day be plagued by an epidemic of crime so sinister, so virulent, and so widespread that it threatens the well-being of every law-abiding citizen.

Those 18th century days were austere ones. They were days of hard work and sacrifice conducted in accordance with the Biblical concepts of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth; swift, stern, and righteous justice in retribution for evildoing. I am certain that the framers of our Contistution never intended it to be distorted into a technical instrument for the benefit of depraved criminals.

I believe that the law-abiding merchants, doctors, lawyers, farmers, soldiers, and educators of today are generally as shocked and dismayed as their forefathers would have been at the execessive concern evidenced in recent constitutional interpretations with the well-being of the wrongdoer rather than the well-being of the law abiding.

Certainly no right-thinking man would condone the railroading of a fellow citizen through abuse of his God-given and constitutionally provided rights. On the other hand, responsible men must know that that nearly divine instrument which we call our Constitution cannot long be used to serve the criminal rather than the law-abiding citizen if our land is to endure as a place of peace and domestic tranquillity. Constitutional safeguards are for the good of all, not for the criminal minority alone. The law-abiding citizen wants and deserves his constitutional rights, but, he also wants and deserves the protection of the power of the laws stemming from the Constitution. We are in the inconsistent situation of seeing the Constitution used to negate the effectiveness of our laws.

Honorable Americans believe in the law. They do not fear it. As one great legal writer said, "To the law-abiding person a law forbidding robbery is no more felt as a restraint than is the necessity of wearing clothes."

I recently read what I believe is an apt delineation of Government's responsibility. I quote, "Government has no right to turn the cheeks of its citizens. Instead, it is gravely obligated by the very purpose of its existence to see to their protection." I am of the firm opinion that the majority of the decent people of this country have had about enough of a judicial system which allows criminals to roam the streets and commit vicious, depraved acts time after time after time. I believe our citizens are fully aware of the situation, and I predict that if there is not a turning point reached soon toward more realistic Supreme Court decisions we are going to witness one of the greatest surges of outraged citizenship that we have ever seen.

First, the populace must be informed and understand what is being done to them. Then, I believe, they will demand action to safeguard themselves and their families. I think the average man now knows what Supreme Court interpretations like the Miranda decision are doing to this country.

Senator McClellan. Would you suspend? There is a rollcall vote. We will return just as soon as we can. We appreciate your patience with us, but we can't help it.

(Short recess.)

Senator McClellan. The committee will resume. You may proceed, Mr. Tamm.

Mr. Tamm. In continuing my statement, Senator, in December 1966, CBS News posed a series of questions to a cross section of the U.S. population 18 years of age or older. Among these questions on current events was a query, with multiple-choice answers, concerning the Miranda decision. Sixty-two percent of the respondents knew what the Miranda decision dictated. According to the report, a majority in the country is apparently concerned about the consequences of this Supreme Court decision. Asked, "Do you think that the police should again be allowed to be tougher with suspects than they can be now?"—56 percent said "Yes." Asked, "Do you think that the present restrictions on the police are correct and fair?"—only 32 percent said "Yes." These responses held true for both urban and rural population groups, although responses against the Miranda decision were more pronounced among older people.

I do not intend to describe to this subcommittee certain specific and horrifying examples of distortion of the law because of recent Supreme Court decisions. You have heard testimony from practicing police executives who, I am sure, can do this much better than I. I will also leave to them the factual tasks of revealing to you how the Miranda decision has adversely affected their actions as law enforcement officers.

I do want to mention one aspect, however, which may not have been considered, and that is the effect of such Supreme Court decisions on police attitudes and morale. I submit that no man will continue to try to do the best job he can when, day by day, the means of performing that job are being withdrawn. Even a ditchdigger will lose interest if his tools are taken from him. The old so-called open-and-shut case is rare in this day and age. Crime is a complicated business. Coping with it is becoming even more complicated, and the police are now surrounded by such a murky atmosphere of court decision and judicial indecision that about the only type of crime they can take decision action on is the crime of violence which occurs before their very eyes. An opaque curtain of judicial protection now cloaks the activities of the criminal, and it is becoming more and more difficult for the police to part this curtain. As a result, many of them are becoming understandably reluctant to even try. So, when we ask whether there are any statistical results as far as judicial restrictions on police are concerned, it must be borne in mind that there is such a thing as a "ghost" statistic which never comes to light.

The President's Crime Commission told us that there are many, many crimes which are never reported. Let me add that there are many, many crimes that may be detected by the police but which go unsolved because all avenues to solution have been blocked. The true effect of Supreme Court decisions is like the proverbial iceberg, where the great mass lies unseen beneath the surface.

Once again, I commend you to your task, and I respectfully urge you to act with unswerving vigor in bringing about the necessary legislation or constitutional amendment to strip the hoodlum of his power, and return it to the hands of the man who must enforce the law.

I should like to add that we are gratified with President Johnson's vigorous interest in helping the police fight crime. All in all, the report of the President's Crime Commission is a workable blueprint for building a sufficient force against crime. At the same time, however, we must eradicate the paradox. We cannot have one hand of Government turning the key on the criminal while the other hand opens the back door for his escape from punishment.

In this connection, with the appointment of the Honorable Ramsey Clark as Attorney General of the United States, I note that the distinguished Justice Tom C. Clark has indicated he will retire from the bench. The present composition of the U.S. Supreme Court has certainly not resulted in decisions generally evidencing understanding of the police problem as the 5-to-4 decision of late have indicated. I sincerely hope that when the President considers the appointment of the Justice to replace Justice Clark he will bear in mind the need to maintain at least as much balance as exists today. With crime on the rise, and the police increasingly restricted and made more impotent, this is no time to have the Supreme Court become even more one-sided in its interpretative philosophies.

Your statement, Mr. Chairman, in this regard as quoted in the Washington Post on Friday, March 3, 1967, sums it up most aptly and comprehensively: "I can only express my hope that the President will name a replacement who shares his (Ramsey Clark) father's philosophy that recent decisions are doing great damage to law enforcement." We of the police hope most fervently that you gentlemen of the Senate will use your influence and your voices in this matter.

I am honored and grateful to have had this opportunity to appear before this committee. I can assure you that you have the hopes and support of the members of our association in your deliberations on this vital problem.

Thank you very much.

Senator McClellan. Thank you very kindly, Mr. Tamm. I am going to defer to my colleague, Senator Ervin, who, I believe, has an appointment shortly.

Senator ERVIN. I appreciate it. From your experience, can you estimate the percentage of persons who are charged with serious crimes who already know that they have a right to remain silent when they are taken into custody, and who already know that anything they say derogatory to themselves can be used against them in court, and who already know that they have a right to counsel?

Mr. TAMM. I would say, sir, from my experience, that the large majority of criminals know that they don't have to say anything, that they have the right to counsel.

Senator ERVIN. I will ask you if you don't see, every day, some article where somebody charged with murder, or some other serious crime, is turned loose because the arresting officer failed to give him these instructions?

Mr. TAMM. This is becoming more apparent in the newspapers every day, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And so, as a practical matter, as a result of the Miranda decision, we have to free murderers, rapists, or robbers throughout the land, merely because the arresting officer did not tell them something they already knew?

Mr. TAMM. I think this is generally true, sir, with regard to crime in general, and crime as a whole, and I think you only have to look here in the District of Columbia to see that you are having a greatly increasing amount of crime. I believe, and I may be wrong, but I believe I read that crime increased in February of 1967 over February of 1966 some 42 percent. But also, and a very significant fact, is that the number of arrests and the number of cases that are being taken to court in the District of Columbia has been materially reduced.

Senator ERVIN. Do you agree with me that it would be very difficult for the wisest of men, after studying the problem, to devise any way that is more efficacious to prevent people from ever making voluntary confessions of guilt than what was done by the majority opinion in the Miranda case?

Mr. TAMM. I think from what I have been able to see of it, I would say it has been most effective.

Senator ERVIN. As a practical matter, most people who make a voluntary confession to an arresting officer normally make it when they are first arrested, don't they?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And they make it, you might say, at the stationhouse when they are just taken into custody?

Mr. TAMM. Very early in the proceedings, yes.

Senator ERVIN. And if a man, before he can be questioned at an early stage of the proceedings, has to have a lawyer present, the lawyer would ordinarily be one who has not had an opportunity to investigate the circumstances of the case, and as a matter of precaution he will tell the suspect to keep his mouth shut, won't he?

Mr. TAMM. If I were a lawyer, I would, and most lawyers do; yes, sir.

Senator ERVIN. And so as a practical matter, the decision in the Miranda case is calculated to prevent or at least to minimize the number of voluntary confessions that are made, and it will have that effect, won't it?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir, in my opinion, it will.

Senator ERVIN. Do you think that, at any time, men go around voluntarily acknowledging that they have committed a crime?

Mr. TAMM. No, sir.

Senator ERVIN. Do you know of any evidence which has more convincing force to prove that a man is guilty of a crime charged against him than his own voluntary confession that he is guilty?

Mr. TAMM. No, sir. A great number of the cases that go to court, and a number of the cases that were mentioned in the Supreme Court decision as being a decisive indication that so many cases going to court result in conviction, a very high percentage of these, it has been my experience, are the result of a guilty plea. You don't get a guilty plea without a confession, and you don't get many guilty pleas without interrogation.

Senator ERVIN. And as a matter of fact does not the prosecution, in a very high percentage of cases, offer in evidence voluntary admissions or voluntary confessions?

Mr. TAMM. In a very high percentage of the cases, yes.

Senator ERVIN. And it is particularly true, isn't it, that in a doubtful case, where the evidence of eyewitnesses or the circumstantial evidence is conflicting, the fact that they could offer in evidence voluntary admission or voluntary confession of the defendant that we was the guilty party is the difference in many cases between a verdict of guilty and a verdict of not guilty, isn't it?

Mr. TAMM. There is no question about it.

Senator ERVIN. And so, as a result of excluding voluntary confessions under these artificial rules created for the first time on the 13th day of June 1966, many people have voluntarily confessed that they are guilty will ge unpunished by justice?

Mr. TAMM. I think this is true.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not agree that the decision in the Miranda case weighs the scale of justice heavily on the side of the accused and against the victims of crime?

Mr. TAMM. I feel that very strongly.

Senator ERVIN. Do you not believe the victims of crime are entitled to justice just as much as are the accused?

Mr. TAMM. I think this is true. We should have justice for all.

Senator ERVIN. I thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hart?

Senator HART. I am sure Mr. Tamm anticipates the question I will ask. For a great many years you were an effective representative of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and I ask you what procedures have been developed with respect to counseling a man that he did not have to talk, that he could get a lawyer, and by 1964 if he could not afford one you got him one, how that crippled the FBI?

Mr. TAMM. May I say, sir, the policy of the FBI and of all of the Federal investigative agencies for many years was to include in the preamble of the statement or confession taken from an individual the fact that he could stand mute, that he did not have to speak, that he did not have to answer the questions, that he was entitled to counsel if he so desired it. This warning was included as a standard paragarph at the start of a statement which an agent of the FBI or of any other Federal agency might take.

At no time in the experience—and you must understand that I left the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1961—at no time in my experience did I know of a special agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation ever telling a man that he would go out and get him a lawyer. This was not done.

Senator HART. As I say, beginning in 1964 or 1965, that was done.

Mr. TAMM. I am not sure about the practices that are followed today.

Senator HART. I am not sure, though I base that on the statement in the Miranda case, which describes in some detail the procedures that have been developed down to the present. I think that while the opinion in full, I assume, has been ordered printed in the hearing record, Mr. Chairman, I would ask your unanimous consent that we have printed at this point in the discussion the narrative explanation given by the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Mr. Hoover, to the Supreme Court, together with the comment of the Court at this point.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That will be printed in the record.

Senator HART. The opinion in full is in, I assume.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The whole Miranda opinion, including its dissents, is to be printed in the record. At this point any excerpt from it which you wish to have inserted, Senator, may be inserted.

(The document referred to follows:)

Excerpt from Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

Over the years the Federal Bureau of Investigation has compiled an exemplary record of effective law enforcement while advising any suspect or arrested person, at the outset of an interview, that he is not required to make a statement, that any statement may be used against him in court, that the individual may obtain the services of an attorney of his own choice and, more recently, that he has a right to free counsel if he is unable to pay.[54] A letter received from the Solicitor General in response to a question from the Bench makes it clear that the present pattern of warnings and respect for the rights of the individual followed as a practice by the FBI is consistent with the procedure which we delineate today. It states:

> "At the oral argument of the above cause, MR. JUSTICE FORTAS asked whether I could provide certain information as to the practices followed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I have directed these questions to the attention of the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and am submitting herewith a statement of the questions and of the answers which we have received.
> "'(1) When an individual is interviewed by agents of the Bureau, what warning is given to him?
> "'The standard warning long given by Special Agents of the FBI to both suspects and persons under arrest is that the person has a right to say

[54] In 1952, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, stated:

"Law enforcement, however, in defeating the criminal, must maintain inviolate the historic liberties of the individual. To turn back the criminal, yet, by so doing, destroy the dignity of the individual, would be a hollow victory.

"We can have the Constitution, the best laws in the land, and the most honest reviews by courts—but unless the law enforcement profession is steeped in the democratic tradition, maintains the highest in ethics, and makes its work a career of honor, civil liberties will continually—and without end—be violated . . . . The best protection of civil liberties is an alert, intelligent and honest law enforcement agency. There can be no alternative.

". . . Special Agents are taught that any suspect or arrested person, at the outset of an interview, must be advised that he is not required to make a statement and that any statement given can be used against him in court. Moreover, the individual must be informed that, if he desires, he may obtain the services of an attorney of his own choice."

nothing and a right to counsel, and that any statement he does make may be used against him in court. Examples of this warning are to be found in the Westover case at 342 F. 2d 685 (1965), and Jackson v. U. S. 337 F. 2d 136 (1964), cert. den. 380 U. S. 985.

" 'After passage of the Criminal Justice Act of 1964, which provides free counsel for Federal defendants unable to pay, we added to our instructions to Special Agents the requirement that any person who is under arrest for an offense under FBI jurisdiction, or whose arrest is contemplated following the interview, must also be advised of his right to free counsel if he is unable to pay, and the fact that such counsel will be assigned by the Judge. At the same time, we broadened the right to counsel warning to read counsel of his own choice, or anyone else with whom he might wish to speak.

" '(2) When is the warning given?

" 'The FBI warning is given to a suspect at the very outset of the interview, as shown in the Westover case, cited above. The warning may be given to a person arrested as soon as practicable after the arrest, as shown in the Jackson case, also cited above, and in U. S. v. Konigsberg, 336 F. 2d 844 (1964), cert. den. 379 U. S. 930, 933, but in any event it must precede the interview with the person for a confession or admission of his own guilt.

" '(3) What is the Bureau's practice in the event that (a) the individual requests counsel and (b) counsel appears?

" 'When the person who has been warned of his right to counsel decides that he wishes to consult with counsel before making a statement, the interview is terminated at that point, Shulz v. U. S., 351 F. 2d 287 (1965). It may be continued, however, as to all matters other than the person's own guilt or innocence. If he is indecisive in his request for counsel, there may be some question on whether he did or did not waive counsel. Situations of this kind must necessarily be left to the judgment of the interviewing Agent. For example, in Hiram v. U. S., 354 F. 2d 4 (1965), the Agent's conclusion that the person arrested had waived his right to counsel was upheld by the courts.

" 'A person being interviewed and desiring to consult counsel by telephone must be permitted to do so, as shown in Caldwell v. U. S., 351 F. 2d 459 (1965). When counsel appears in person, he is permitted to confer with his client in private.

" '(4) What is the Bureau's practice if the individual requests counsel, but cannot afford to retain an attorney?

" 'If any person being interviewed after warning of counsel decides that he wishes to consult with counsel before proceeding further the interview is terminated, as shown above. FBI Agents do not pass judgment on the ability of the person to pay for counsel. They do, however, advise those who have been arrested for an offense under FBI jurisdiction, or whose arrest is contemplated following the interview, of a right to free counsel if they are unable to pay, and the availability of such counsel from the judge.' " [55]

Senator HART. Mr. Tamm, isn't it true that every time the Supreme Court has delineated constitutional rights which restrict the power of the police, that there has been concern voiced that the public's interest is being made subservient to the interests of the criminal? Isn't that a lesson of history?

Mr. TAMM. Generally speaking, yes. I would think the police and the public, possibly the public with which we come in contact, sir, feel that the Supreme Court is taking this position. The police take the position of course that the decisions which are being made by the Supreme Court, which so materially affect their work, are divided opinions, generally 5 to 4, and based upon that, we feel that we have a justifiable position in feeling that the minority may have an opinion with which we could agree.

Senator HART. Indeed one would never quarrel with that right. Mr. Chairman, may I offer for the record at this point then a message from the Director of the FBI, Mr. Hoover, which appears in the September 1, 1966, issue of the Law Enforcement Bulletin. It is just one page. It takes notes of this concern, but at the same time makes the point that there is little to be gained from just shouting protests and criticisms, and there is much to be gained from throwing our full resources and energies into the training of professional law enforcement in order to be effective within the framework of the current law.

[55] We agree that the interviewing agent must exercise his judgment in determining whether the individual waives his right to counsel. Because of the constitutional basis of the right, however, the standard for waiver is necessarily high. And, of course, the ultimate responsibility for resolving this constitutional question lies with the courts.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, that will be included in the record and I would like to have Mr. Hoover's latest article in the March issue of the FBI Law Enforcement Bulletin printed in the record. It appears on page 2, I believe. They may both be printed in the record.

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

TO ALL LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICIALS

SEPTEMBER 1, 1966.

There has been much "wailing and gnashing of teeth" in some law enforcement circles lately in response to developments in the criminal law, particularly confessions, interrogations, search and seizure, and various rights of the accused.

Historically, American courts have assumed the reponsibility of assuring that governmental power is not misused to injure the rights of individual citizens. Our courts are now committed to exercising supervisory control over law enforcement through the exclusionary theory whereby evidence obtained in violation of certain rules cannot be used in a criminal trial.

Various courts have been roundly criticized for recent decisions which some reviewers say reflect an unjustified and unprecedented concern for the lawbreaker; for illogical, shortsighted judicial policies which in effect legislate new laws to the detriment of society. They have been charged with handcuffing law enforcement by requiring impossible procedures which, it is said, will insure the release of the guilty while destroying the morale of the officer.

In reply, some critics of police declare that unless we have tight, restrictive control of law enforcement, police lawlessness will result. The extremes of both views tend to cloud the fact that the police and the courts should have a common objective: to develop and maintain a system of administering criminal justice which is fair, impartial, and effective. All will agree that this is an exceedingly difficult and complex task.

There is little to be gained from just shouting protests and criticisms, but there is much to be gained from throwing our full resources and energies into training a professional law enforcement corps to be effective within the framework of current rules of law and evidence.

We, as citizens, expect the business and technical segments of our society to keep abreast of the latest developments in their respective areas and to conduct research to foster progress. Our profession, dedicated to the preservation of America's basic freedoms, certainly cannot exempt itself from a similar demand from other citizens. A continuing, comprehensive research and training program, with a conscientious application of the knowledge gained therefrom, is the key to properly discharging our responsibilities to the people and the Nation.

Increased professional police training is no longer a desirable goal, no longer a matter of choice for United States law enforcement. It is an absolute necessity.

JOHN EDGAR HOOVER, Director.

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

MARCH 1, 1967.

Could it be that 1967 will be remembered as the year the American people demanded respect for law and order and a halt to rising crime in our country?

While this hope may not fully materialize, there are some promising symptoms of growing public concern. In many areas, citizens are genuinely alarmed, and rightly so, by increasing criminal violence. Indications are that more and more people want effective enforcement of the law and realistic punishment of those who break it. Federal, State, and local governments are initiating new and broader programs to aid law enforcement and to provide better training and equipment for the enforcement officer. Civic and patriotic groups are rallying to support police and are calling for citizens to obey the law and to help prosecute those who refuse to obey it. These are encouraging signs.

Actually, the American public is seeking, and sorely needs, a proven formula to deter crime. The people are growing tired of substitutes. Swift detection and apprehension, prompt prosecution, and proper and certain punishment are tested crime deterrents. As we have seen, however, this combination of deterrents can be ineffective because of breakdowns in one or all of its phases. That is why we cannot expect high-quality police service alone to bring full relief from the crime problem. If the hardened criminal is arrested but not punished, he is not long deterred from his criminal pursuits.

One State supreme court justice recently stated that it is completely unrealistic to say that punishment is not a deterrent to crime. "It is simply contrary to human nature," the justice explained, "not to be deterred from a course of action by the threat of punishment." This is the kind of reasoning and straight talk that makes sense to both the public and law enforcement. It is a refreshing contrast to the weak theories which rationalize criminal behavior and make villains of all policemen.

Coddling of criminals and soft justice increase crime; denials to the contrary have no valid support. Yet, these truths are still lost in the maze of sympathy and leniency heaped upon the criminal. Lame excuses and apologies offered for the lawbreaker are exceeded only by the amount of violence he commits. Meantime, law-abiding people who have a right to expect protection from criminals have this right abused and ignored.

Certainly, the American public must soon take positive action to curtail crime and violence. Good intentions are worthless. Funds for better law enforcement will help, but will not do the complete job. Community and civic authorities, educators, religious leaders, and prominent men and women from all walks of life must speak out, demand justice for law-abiding citizens, and unite the people in a forceful campaign against crime. There is nothing wrong with the clergy's warning against excessive compassion for the criminal at the expense of innocent victims. There is nothing wrong with educators' denouncing rabble rousers and agitators who disrupt the orderly processes of the academic community and defy authority. And there is nothing wrong with community and city officials' crusading to rid their streets of thugs, rapists, and robbers.

Law enforcement, of course, is gratified with the great strides that have been made in the profession in recent years. It is also appreciative of new efforts to make its fight against crime more effective. Law enforcement will take full advantage of all aid and assistance and meet its obligations with a determination to give the public adequate protection. Let the public remember, however, that detecting and apprehending criminals are not the whole answer. The criminal must know that his destiny also includes prompt prosecution and substantial punishment.

JOHN EDGAR HOOVER, Director.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Just one question and chief counsel would like to ask you a question too, Mr. Tamm.

How long have you been at the head of this International Association of Chiefs of Police?

Mr. TAMM. Since January of 1961.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And you have been in the law enforcement business for how many years?

Mr. TAMM. Thirty-two years. I spent 26 years in the FBI. I was an assistant director.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Have you sometimes had accusations of police brutality, of extortion, confessions, rubber strap, rubber hose, and so forth techniques? What is your judgments in all of your years of experience as to a great decline in the use of such tactics as that?

Mr. TAMM. It has been my experience and my very strong feeling, sir, that the accusations and charges of police brutality are extremely exaggerated, overemphasized, and actually in today's modern police department, they have no place. Thirty years ago, yes, but we are living in the present time, and if we have to go back 30 years to look for faulty police practices, then I question our thinking.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is it prevalent now?

Mr. TAMM. No, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you know any where in our country where it is prevalent? I don't mean to say that in isolated instances it does not happen. Isolated instances happen with many things, but I am talking about this as a practice, and whether it is condoned any more by reputable police departments. You are evidently in contact with all of the police departments in the country, most of them at least, as executive director of their international association, and I would like to have your full comment on it, whether there is any merit in that contention at all that it is necessary to impose these bars and restrictions on police to keep them from committing inhuman treatment on prisoners.

Mr. TAMM. Sir, I would like to just briefly, in answering this question, say that I have been engaged in teaching police officers for 30 of the 32 years that I have been in law enforcement, and my teaching has been based upon the constitutional rights of all people to fair and just treatment by all law enforcement officers, to the point where my remarks have been published in textbooks printed by the American Civil Liberties Union, and I have looked at this with a great deal of objectivity because of my intense feeling in this regard, and I can tell you without equivocation that this practice is not in existence to any degree in the law enforcement agencies of our country today.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You say that without any qualification?

Mr. TAMM. Without any qualifications at all. I would agree with you that there may be isolated instances of misbehavior on the part of a police officer, but the police agencies as constituted today and as administered have no place for an officer who does not treat his people or the people with whom he comes in contact with respect.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So there is no condition prevailing such as that?

Mr. TAMM. To my knowledge, no, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You feel that the Supreme Court should not make new rules to correct something that doesn't exist?

Mr. TAMM. I don't think that these conditions exist to any extent whatsoever.

Senator HART. Mr. Chairman, as a followup on that point, I share with you the feeling, and I hope we are all right on this, that physical abuse is almost eliminated. I recognize that there will always be exceptions. But over a period of recent years, police authorities are surely against it. But isn't it fair to say and to recognize that that intense concern by police leadership to eliminate abuses was in response at least in part to the increasing concern and intrusion of the courts into this very area?

Mr. TAMM. The concern of the courts with regard to third-degree methods, yes, sir. But I also would like to believe that it is due upon the part of the police administrator to improve the operations of his particular organization, and I think this has come about to a greater degree because of the education and training of police officers.

Senator HART. That may well be, but on balance it is more the concern of the leadership than the pressure of the courts?

Mr. TAMM. I believe this is true, sir.

Senator HART. But it is fair to say that it did coincide?

Mr. TAMM. It is fair to say there was pressure by the courts 30 years ago, yes, sir.

Senator HART. And now we don't have the physical abuse, but in the Miranda case, there is a description by an author taken from his work "Fundamentals of Criminal Investigation," where he describes the qualities which interrogators now should possess. Let me read it and then ask you if you think that this is the quality of investigative skill and attitude that should be commended:

> In the preceding paragraphs emphasis has been placed on kindness and strategies. The investigator will, however, encounter many situations where the sheer weight of his personality will be the deciding factor, where emotional appeals and tricks are employed to no avail he must rely on oppressive atmosphere of dogged persistance. He must interrogate steadily and without relent leaving the subject with no prospect of surcease. He must dominate his subject and overwhelm him with his inexorable will to obtain the truth. He should interrogate for the spell of several hours pausing only for the subject's necessities and acknowledging the need to avoid a charge of duress that can be technically substantiated. In a serious case the interrogation may continue for days with the required intervals for food and sleep but with no respites from the atmosphere of domination. It is possible in this way to induce the subject to talk without resorting to duress or coercion. This method should be used only when the guilt of the subject appears highly probable.

What is your view with respect to that technique?

Mr. TAMM. I am not too sure whether this is in Bond's book or not. It may be.

Senator HART. No, it is not Bond. It is O'Hara.

Mr. TAMM. I, 30 years ago, sir, taught interrogation and it is obvious where I taught it. These were accepted practices in those days, but not in today's day and age, no, sir. I don't think these are accepted practices, and I don't think these are the mark of the good investigator or a good interrogator. But 30 years ago, I taught this principle and it was accepted 30 years ago.

Senator HART. That was writen in 1959.

Mr. TAMM. Well, as I say, I taught 30 years ago, and I am not too sure that in 1959 I would agree with this concept. I definitely would not agree with the concept of day-after-day questioning. I would take exception to that. I don't think that any modern educated, properly indoctrinated, and properly trained police officer today would either. But these are accepted practices. We have had a great number of practices that have changed in the years, that have to do not only with police, but in many ways with our mode of living and the things we do, and the fact that we do progress and improve ourselves, and we are cognizant of the constitutionality and the rights of people I would think would indicate that law enforcement is meeting its responsibility, and all I am saying to this committee, sir, and to you, is that law enforcement needs help. This is all we want.

Senator HART. Like overruling Mallory?

Mr. TAMM. In regard to Mallory and in regard to a great number of these decisions, sir, may I say to you, and with full knowledge that

I do represent law enforcement, that bad cases sometimes make bad law, and that the feeling that I have with regard to the Supreme Court decisions in some instances, and especially in these 5-to-4 decisions that some materially affect law enforcement is that a poorly investigated and poorly presented case could be reversed by the Supreme Court with a single one-line sentence, without burdening all of law enforcement with the result of one faulty investigation, and I feel this way very strongly, and I feel that this is what has happened.

I think that in certain cases, and I have read some of these cases in the investigative background of the cases, and they would almost make you sick, but I don't think it is necessary for the Supreme Court or for the courts to burden law enforcement with the problem that is created by one poorly investigated case, and this is the way I feel. Otherwise, you would not have these split decisions.

Senator HART. I don't even know whether Mallory was five to four. I state that on the record. Is it your position that arrested people should not be advised of their rights?

Mr. TAMM. Absolutely not.

Senator HART. Of course not. And if the Supreme Court says as a constitutional principle they should be told one, two, three, and four, that is what the police authorities should do?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir. I think that they should be advised of their rights. I question the responsibility of law enforcement to provide them with a lawyer, and I do think that if we would look, if I may be permitted to say so, if we would look at some of the practices in European countries, in which interrogation periods are permitted to police, and we place the responsibility upon the law-enforcement officer to meet those periods and to conform to the law, I think we would be better off, and if the law-enforcement officer violates those regulations, then he can be punished.

Senator HART. A defendant who is not advised and will confess gives you a confession which you are comfortable with? That is not your position?

Mr. TAMM. I don't quite follow you.

Senator HART. A man who is not advised, and confesses, is here. The fellow who is advised and as a result of the advice does not confess, you have got these two situations. Would you feel comfortable in proceedings using the confession of the man who is not advised?

Mr. TAMM. No, because I feel that under the present circumstances, we have to conform to the law, we as law enforcement officers and that they should be advised, and if a police officer does not, then he should be subjected to administrative punishment. But I do have a doubt, sir, as to whether society is being served by barring that confession.

Senator HART. You doubt what?

Mr. TAMM. I have a doubt that society is being served when you bar the confessions of a guilty person, if you bar the confession.

Senator HART. For many years it was not barred.

Mr. TAMM. That is right, sir.

Senator HART. And you have the feeling that society was the better?

Mr. TAMM. I do, yes. I feel that way because I think that where it was not barred and where the man was guilty and he has so confessed, and he was taken off the street, so that he was no longer a menace to society, and I do not think this improved society.

Senator HART. I can pursue that by saying they should never let them out, because they repeat so frequently.

Mr. TAMM. No. In fact I feel that rehabilitation is a possibility.

Senator HART. I have enjoyed the exchange. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If I understand you correctly, you don't feel society is served by the guilty going free on a technicality where a policeman inadvertently or otherwise has failed to advise him of a right that he probably already knew anyhow?

Mr. TAMM. I feel very strongly that this is a disservice to society.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Society is not to blame for one error of the police, if we do our best to train him.

Mr. TAMM. I don't feel that society should be punished because the law enforcement officer makes a mistake.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The law enforcement officer——

Mr. TAMM. Should be punished.

Senator MCCLELLAN. There may be a proper reckoning for him?

Mr. TAMM. That is right, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Proper discipline for him, but here is a man who confesses to murder and there is no doubt about his guilt, but the policeman failed to do his duty, to advise him that he was entitled to a lawyer, something he probably already knew. In fact, there is the strongest probability that he already knew it. But society must suffer and become the victim. I just can't follow that as justice between society and the criminal, and between the criminal and the citizen. It seems to me the criminal gets the advantage.

Mr. TAMM. The police feel that way.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I believe the American people feel that way.

Mr. TAMM. I think so, too.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I don't think there is any question about it. I know we have to have standards, but there are degrees of errors, and some errors could be fatal, but that ought to be the ultimate goal and the primary objective of a criminal investigation and trial to get the truth, and upon that premise render judgment.

Chief counsel would like to ask a question or two, Mr. Tamm.

Mr. PAISLEY. Mr. Tamm, the courts in this country have always excluded confessions which the trial judge finds to have been coerced, isn't that true?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAISLEY. There has been some testimony before the subcommittee about the difficulty in police recruiting. Is that a general condition throughout the country in your experience?

Mr. TAMM. Generally speaking. We participated in a survey which Commissioner Girardin mentioned with the National League of Cities. I do not know of a major city in the country that is up to its full police strength, sir—its budget strength.

Mr. PAISLEY. Did you hear Mr. Girardin testify here today?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAISLEY. Do you recall how much below his authorized strength his police force was?

Mr. TAMM. I think he said 500 men, if I recall the figure.

Mr. PAISLEY. That is not an inconsequential number of police officials.

Mr. TAMM. Percentagewise, sir, it is rather typical of the country at the present time.

Mr. PAISLEY. To what do you attribute that condition throughout the country?

Mr. TAMM. There are a number of factors, as far as we can find out and as far as we can determine. One of the really tangibles is what I would call the police image, and the fact that law enforcement does not have the favorable endorsement of the communities in which they serve. I think, and I firmly believe this, that law enforcement and law enforcement officers are leaving, and the recruits are not coming in, because it is becoming more and more difficult to do the job and to do it properly. And then I guess the third factor that I would put in would be the salary.

Mr. PAISLEY. Salaries?

Mr. TAMM. I would say that that probably ranks third, and the difficulty in recruiting.

Mr. PAISLEY. Do you think these recent 5-to-4 Supreme Court decisions, excluding evidence which the police officers have gathered, have had anything to do with it?

Mr. TAMM. I would say it has had a definite morale factor upon the police officer, and the way you get recruits is just like you do in any industry, and that is by people who are employed telling people that they meet or friends of theirs, or talking about the assets of their job, and I don't think police officers are doing that today. I don't think that we have this type of spirit. I think that the police officer himself feels that he is in difficulty, and he is beginning to wonder whether it is worth it or not.

Mr. PAISLEY. Thank you, sir. That is all.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Are you familiar with the report of the Assistant District Attorney in Los Angeles? I think it has been referred to here today.

Mr. TAMM. You mean the statement by the District Attorney of Los Angeles County with regard to the Miranda case?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Evelle J. Younger, district attorney. Are you familiar with that report?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir; I have it in my office. Are you asking me to comment on it?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes, I would be glad if you would. I had not had a chance to read it. The impression I got this morning was that a 3-week survey indicated that the Miranda case was having no impact upon law enforcement. Have you read this?

Mr. TAMM. Yes, sir; I have. If I recall it correctly, in trying to recall it to my mind, I think that the district attorney stated that it was not necessary for law enforcement agencies to have confessions, that their survey indicated that confessions were not necessary in the prosecution of the cases, and my reaction to this is very simple. This in 3 weeks after the Miranda decision was made. It is based on an extremely limited number of cases, and I think it is premature.

I might mention that my association at the same time did a survey of the major cities to find out just exactly what effect the Miranda decision was having upon law enforcement in this country, and our findings were so one-sided in favor of the police that we decided not to publish it, because we felt it was premature, and I don't think this is an objective approach to the whole problem.

We are now doing a survey somewhat nationwide in conjunction with a university, and we are getting some amazing answers again as to the effect that the Miranda decision has had on law enforcement. But until we have finished, we are not going to say. But we did do a survey that we completed at the same time as the district attorney in Los Angeles, and I just think this was premature. I don't think the results would have been conclusive, although as I say, there was a great deal of discussion on cases being lost.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have just hurriedly glanced at this. This is possibly what was quoted in the record this morning. "The Miranda Decision is causing some problems in the prosecution of current cases filed prior to the decision, but should not create significant difficulties in the prosecution of future cases."

That is under paragraph 4 of the summarization of the Dorado and Miranda decisions and their retroactive application, which is signed by Mr. Younger, district attorney for Los Angeles County. That is one quote from it. That is in paragraph 4 on page 4 of the report, I believe. And on the next page—this is also on page 4, I guess. What I read to you was on page 3. Now, on page 4, I find this seemingly contradictory statement:

> These decisions can be harmful to law enforcement in a way that cannot be measured, by preventing a confession at the first confrontation between suspect and policeman, and depriving the officer of information necessary to make an arrest. However, arrest in Los Angeles County continues to increase at a consistent and predictable rate.

Without objection, I am going to make this document and a letter from Mr. Younger a part of the record at this point.

COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 20, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: I am in receipt of your letter of February 10, 1967, concerning my impression of the impact of the Miranda decision on the prosecution of criminal cases in Los Angeles County.

We have not done any supplemental research since the survey was conducted. However, our general overall statistics in this office do not indicate any marked change from the situation which prevailed at that time.

I can only reiterate my belief that the officers are following the mandates of the Supreme Court in the Miranda decision, and that insofar as we are able to observe from the prosecutors' viewpoint, this decision has not materially affected our ability to convict. However. I must state, as I did before, that we are not prepared to say that these decisions have not impaired the efficiency of law enforcement in areas which are at this moment not subject to accurate measurement.

Mr. Nedrud is slightly mistaken when he says that I have been appointed chairman of a committee, the primary function of which is to gather nationwide statistics reflecting the effect of the Miranda decision.

I have been appointed chairman of a committee on prosecution problems. This committee will undertake to study many problems which affect the prosecution of criminal cases and will try to identify what the major problems for prosecutors throughout the country are. However, at this juncture, it does not appear that the Miranda decision as such will consume a very large portion of the committee's time. There are other problems which are deserving of attention and which appear to have more readily attainable solutions.

I will try to keep you posted of the work of this committee and contribute what I can to help your committee.

Yours truly,

EVELLE J. YOUNGER,
District Attorney.

RESULTS OF SURVEY CONDUCTED IN THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY REGARDING THE EFFECTS OF THE "DORADO" AND "MIRANDA" DECISIONS UPON THE PROSECUTION OF FELONY CASES, AUGUST 4, 1966

SUMMARIZATION OF THE "DORADO" AND "MIRANDA" DECISIONS AND THEIR RETROACTIVE APPLICATION

People v. Dorado (62 C.2D 338)

Holding

The Dorado decision holds that when (1) the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, (2) the suspect is in custody, and (3) the authorities are carrying out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, then the suspect must be effectively informed of his right to counsel and his absolute right to remain silent.

Retroactive application

In the case of In Re Lopez and Winhoven, 62 Cal.2d 368, the California Supreme Court held that the Dorado rule does not apply to convictions which became "final" prior to June 22, 1964, the date of the Escobedo decision. The definition of "final" as given by the United States Supreme Court is as follows:

"By final, we mean where the judgment of conviction was rendered, the availability of appeal is exhausted, and the time for petition for certiorari had elapsed before our decision in Mapp v. Ohio." Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 622 fn. 5.

This definition was made applicable to California by People v. Polk, 62 Cal. 2d, 443.

Miranda v. Arizona (16 L. ED. 2D 694)

Holding

Miranda v. Arizona may be summarized as follows:

Whenever a person has been taken into custody by the police or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any way, he must be advised of the rights listed below. It should be noted that the opinion appears to indicate that a person need not be advised of these rights if the police are engaged in general on-the-scene questioning as to facts surrounding a crime without having taken a suspect into custody or in any other way deprived the person questioned of his freedom of action in any way. The opinion further indicates that if questioning were to be conducted by police officers visiting the residence or place of business of the suspect and there questioning him without taking him into custody, such specification of rights would also probably not be necessary.

The rights of which the person questioned must be forewarned in clear and unequivocal terms are the following:

1. That he has a right to remain silent.
2. That if he gives up this right to remain silent, anything he says can and will be used as evidence against him in court.
3. That he has the right to consult with an attorney and to have that attorney present during the interrogation by the police.
4. If he is unable to afford an attorney, he is entitled to have an attorney appointed to represent him during the course of the interrogation, free of charge.

Once the rights set forth above have all been explained to the suspect the police are not entitled to continue their interrogation of the suspect unless the suspect thereafter affirmatively clearly states that he understands and desires to waive the rights of which he has been advised by the police. If the suspect indicates in any manner, at any time prior to or during the questioning, that he wishes to remain silent or to have an attorney, the interrogation must cease unless an attorney is present. Even though the suspect may make some statements to the police which are either volunteered or made after being advised of these rights and after knowingly and intelligently waiving these rights, the suspect has the right at any time to terminate the interrogation by indicating that he no longer desires to talk to the police or wishes to remain silent. A waiver must be entirely voluntary; any waiver of these rights which is obtained by means of inducement or trickery will be deemed to be an invalid waiver.

Retroactive application

In Johnson v. State of New Jersey, 16 L. ed. 2d 882, 892, the Supreme Court of the United States has determined what the retroactive effect shall be of the decisions previously rendered in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, and Miranda v. Arizona as follows:

"* * * Because Escobedo is to be applied prospectively, this holding is available only to persons whose trials began after June 22, 1964, the date on which Escobedo was decided. * * * The disagreements among other courts concerning the implications of Escobedo, however, have impelled us to lay down additional guidelines for situations not presented by that case. This we have odne in Miranda, and those guidelines are therefore available only to persons whose trials had not begun as of June 13, 1966. * * *"

DORADO V. MIRANDA SURVEY CONCLUSIONS

In an effort to determine to what extent, if at all, the Miranda decision has been harmful to successful prosecution of criminal cases in Los Angeles County, a survey was conducted by members of the staff in this office (see enclosure 1, memo dated 7–28–66). An earlier survey, similar but involving fewer cases, was made relative to the Dorado decision (see enclosure 2, memo dated 1–4–66). The results appear to justify the following conclusions:

1. Efforts by this office to assist the 48 independent law enforcement agencies in this county to understand and comply with recent decisions[1] have been effective. We are fortunate to have in Los Angeles County police officers who are intelligent and conscientious. When they know the ground rules, they will follow them.

2. Confessions are essential to a successful prosecution in only a small percentage of criminal cases.

3. The percentage of cases in which confessions or admissions were made has not decreased, as might have been anticipated, because of the increased scope of the admonitions required by Miranda.

4. The Miranda decision is causing some problems in the prosecution of current cases filed prior to the decision, but should not create significant difficulties in the prosecution of future cases. Similarly, Dorado created problems, some dramatic and some tragic (see enclosure 3, statement dated 7–14–66), with respect to pending cases; but should not be a major problem in future cases. The one thing we cannot cope with and the thing that disturbs most citizens in and out of law enforcement, is the fact that some of the changes become effective retroactively. If the Supreme Court wants police officers to sing "Yankee Doodle Dandy" to a suspect before taking a confession, we will do our best to see that every police officer in Los Angeles County learns the words and tune and sings at the appropriate time; but we can't anticipate the requirement.

5. In every human being, however noble or depraved, there is a thing called conscience. In some people the conscience is as small as a fly speck; in others it's as big as a grapefruit. Large or small, that conscience usually, or at least often, drives a guilty person to confess. If an individual wants to confess, a warning from a police officer, acting as required by recent decisions, is not likely to discourage him. Those who hope (or fear) these decisions will eliminate confessions as a legitimate law enforcement tool will be disappointed (or relieved).

6. These decisions have not made it impossible for law enforcement to successfully protect lives and property, but, presumably, have made it more difficult for the police to ascertain the truth by curtailing their use of the important investigative devise of proper and reasonable interrogation of suspects. These decisions can be harmful to law enforcement in a way that cannot be measured—by preventing a confession at the first confrontation between suspect and policeman and depriving the officer of information necessary to make an arrest. However, arrests in Los Angeles County continue to increase at a consistent and predictable rate.

[1] Including regular meetings of our County Law Enforcement Coordinating Council; preparation and dissemination of monthly Criminal Intelligence Reports; preparation and dissemination of monthly Law Enforcement Legal Information Bulletins and of a Search Warrant Manual for Police Officers; maintenance of an around-the-clock legal advisory service; dissemination of a soon to be published investigative manual; and, within a few weeks, closed circuit TV training programs conducted weekly by our staff and transmitted to all local police agencies.

EVELLE J. YOUNGER,
District Attorney, Los Angeles County.

To: Lynn D. Compton, Assistant District Attorney.
From: Earl Osadchey.
Subject: Miranda Survey.
Date: July 28, 1966.

Pursuant to your direction after June 13, 1966, when the Miranda v. Arizona decision was delivered, a survey was undertaken to determine, if possible, the immediate effects of this decision upon the prosecution of current felony cases. This survey was conducted concurrently in the complaint, preliminary, and trial stages of prosecution in this department.

The attached survey questionnaires were distributed to the various divisions affected on June 21, 1966. Because of the normal delay in delivery of these forms via County messenger service, some of the Branch and Area Offices did not actually receive these forms for several days. Therefore, since the survey was ended on July 15, 1966, there was only approximately a three-week sample of cases obtained.

The questions asked on the forms were necessarily not too comprehensive in order to conserve the time of the deputies and to preclude the need for secretarial assistance in filling out the forms.

The following is my personal analysis of the results obtained. It should be borne in mind that the results obtained are subject to several interpretations and that since there is no similar survey available for felony cases processed prior to the Escobedo and Dorado decisions, no correlation is possible of the comparative effects of the pre- and post-Escobedo, Dorado, and Miranda restrictions upon obtaining extrajudicial statements.

As you recall, a "Dorado Survey" was conducted by this department for the week of December 13 through 17, 1965. Please note my memo to you dated January 4, 1966, evaluating the results of this Dorado Survey. I will refer to this Dorado Survey in this present analysis.

It should also be noted that since this present survey follows so closely upon the heels of the Miranda decision that in many of the cases surveyed in the preliminary stage and in most all of the cases in the trial stage the defendants were arrested prior to the Miranda decision when only the Dorado admonition was being given. Therefore, no assumption should be made that the trial of cases where defendants were arrested after the Miranda decision will present the same profile that these cases surveyed in the present preliminary and trial stages reflect.

With these considerations in mind, I respectfully submit the following results and my analysis thereof regarding this "Miranda Survey."

COMPLAINT STAGE

There were requests made for issuance of felony complaints against 1,437 defendants in this sample.

Seven hundred twenty-one, or 50 percent, of the defendants in this sample had made a confession, admission, or other statement. In the Dorado Survey (referred to previously), there were 40 percent of the sample that had made a confession or admission. It is interesting to note that the percent of such extrajudicial statements has not decreased, as might have been anticipated, because of the increased scope of the admonitions required by Miranda over Dorado.

Felony complaints were issued against 828 defendants, or 58 percent of the total defendants in this sample. This compares with our normal issuance and rejection rates.

Of the 828 defendants against whom complaints were issued, 471, or 57 percent, had made confessions, admissions, or other statements. In the previous Dorado Survey, 46 percent of the defendants against whom complaints were issued had made a confession or admission. Of these 471 defendants against whom complaints were issued and who made extrajudicial statements, all but 38 had been given the new Miranda admonition. Of this group of 38 defendants who made extrajudicial statements without benefit of the Miranda admonition, the issuing deputies deemed that 27 of these statements were admissible even without such admonition being given. In the 11 instances where the statements were deemed not admissible, complaints were issued anyway, evidently because there was sufficient evidence without such statements.

When these 471 matters reach the preliminary and trial stages of prosecution, there should be no problems with the admissibility of these extrajudicial statements due to Miranda.

It is obvious from this sample of 1,437 defendants that the law enforcement agencies almost immediately after the Miranda decision was returned commenced complying with its requirements. The new Miranda admonition was given to over 1,100 of these defendants. Most of the balance of these defendants apparently were not as yet in custody when the request for a complaint was made and, therefore, no admonition could be given.

Of the 250 rejections of requests for complaints wherein extrajudicial statements had been made, in only 3 instances, or 1 percent of this category, were the reasons for such rejections the fact that the statement was not admissible because of Miranda and evidently insufficient evidence without such statement for the issuance of a complaint.

There were 357 defendants against whom complaints were issued even though no extrajudicial statement was obtained. Seventy-nine defendants of this group were not in custody at the time the request for issuance was made.

In the category containing 359 defendants wherein requests for complaints were rejected and no extrajudicial statement had been obtained, 224 defendants had been given the Miranda admonition. However, of this group of 224 defendants given the Miranda admonition, the reasons for the rejections of 106 of these matters was because of insufficient evidence or insufficient connecting evidence.

However, the argument that might be made that if the Miranda admonition had not been required in these 106 instances a confession or admission might have been obtained which would have satisfied the necessary connecting evidence is very weak, since it could be based only upon speculation.

I believe that the only valid conclusion that can be drawn is that police officers are complying with the new rules required by Miranda and that the extrajudicial statements which they are obtaining from defendants who have been arrested since the Miranda decision are admissible in evidence. There has been no decrease in the percent of complaints issued to those rejected or in the percentage of admissible extrajudicial statements obtained as compared to the Dorado Survey that was conducted in December, 1965. So it appears from this limited survey that we are in no worse a position with regard to the problems involved in processing cases because of the new ground rules laid down by Miranda than we were with the rules prescribed by Dorado.

It should be noted that since neither of these two surveys attempted a correlation with pre-Escobedo cases wherein confessions or admissions were obtained, it cannot be determined what effect these decisions are having upon the police departments' efforts in solving crimes. We only obtain those requests for complaints wherein the police officers are satisfied that they have sufficient evidence to establish the corpus and sufficient connecting evidence regarding the particular suspect. We cannot tell from this present survey how many cases we are not even seeing from the police agencies.

PRELIMINARY STAGE

There were survey forms completed on 665 defendants processed in the preliminary stage. Five hundred ninety-nine, or 90 percent, of these defendants were held to answer. This compares favorably with the 1965 figures published by the California Bureau of Criminal Statistics which show that 81 percent of the felony complaints issued resulted in felony filings in the Superior Court for Los Angeles County.

Of these defendants who were held to answer, 160 had made a confession, admission, or other statement which was admitted in evidence. Evidently, these 160 extrajudicial statements that were admitted in evidence involved defendants who were arrested subsequent to the Miranda decision or the statements did not come within the Miranda rule.

There were 16 defendants who were held to answer where their extrajudicial statements were offered but not admitted in evidence. Fifteen of these statements were rejected because of Miranda. We can only speculate as to whether lack of this additional evidence will reduce the chances of obtaining convictions when these 15 cases are tried in the Superior Court.

It is interesting to note that in the preliminary hearings of 422 defendants, or 70 percent of the total defendants that were held to answer, no confessions, admissions, or other statements were offered in evidence. This would indicate that most of the cases processed through the preliminary stage do not require extrajudicial statements for success in holding defendants to answer.

Complaints affecting 66 defendants were dismissed during the preliminary stage. With regard to 6 defendants, or 9 percent of these dismissals, there was an extrajudicial statement offered which was not admitted in evidence because of Miranda. However, 4 of these 6 dismissals involved complaints filed prior to the Miranda ruling.

There were also 6 dismissals where there had been an extrajudicial statement that was admitted in evidence.

It would appear from this survey that even though there were 6 cases where the extrajudicial statements offered were not admitted because of Miranda and the complaint was dismissed, that this problem will not continue in the future since the confessions and admissions now being obtained do comply with the Miranda rules.

The Miranda ruling does not appear to be affecting our success in prosecution at the preliminary stage.

TRIAL STAGE

There were completed survey forms returned on 678 defendants processed in the trial stage.

I would like to again caution against projecting the results obtained from this survey of the trial stage for the purpose of seeking a valid prognosis of future trial matters since almost all of these defendants were arrested and the complaints issued before Miranda was returned. The cases that will be reaching the trial stage from complaints issued after Miranda may well exhibit a different picture.

A total of 649 defendants had trials or entered pleas of guilty. There were 273 defendants that were convicted by jury or nonjury trials and an additional 273 defendants that were convicted by entry of pleas of guilty. One hundred three defendants were acquitted by jury or non-jury trials.

A comparison of convictions by trial and by pleas of guilty to acquittals shows an 80.4 percent conviction rate. The conviction rate computed on the same basis for fiscal year 1964–65 for this department was 90.6 percent. A reason for this significant difference may be that in 22 of the acquittals there were confessions or admissions excluded because of Miranda and the trial deputies evaluated these statements as being necessary for conviction. If the trials of these 22 defendants had not been lost, then a conviction rate of 87.5 percent would have been obtained which is closer to our normal average rate. Since each of these 22 cases was filed prior to Miranda, we can anticipate that this same problem will not occur when cases filed after Miranda reach the Superior Court.

Altogether there was a total of 40 defendants who had made a confession or admission that was not admitted in evidence and who were acquitted. However, only 31 of these extrajudicial statements were excluded because of Miranda and as indicated above only 22 were deemed necessary for conviction.

The significance of confessions or admissions in obtaining convictions is subject to varying conclusions. Of the 82 defendants who were convicted by trial, where an admission or confession was introduced in evidence, only in 33 cases, or 40 percent of this category, did the trial deputy feel that the statement was necessary for conviction.

There were 71 defendants who had made a confession or admission or other statement which was not admitted in evidence and who were convicted anyway as well as 120 defendants who made no extrajudicial statements but were still convicted. Of the 273 defendants who pleaded guilty, 173 had made a confession or admission, but the trial deputies indicated that only in 34 of such pleas was the extrajudicial statement necessary for conviction.

This indicates that in only 67 instances, or 10 percent of the 649 defendants having trials or who pleaded guilty, did the trial deputy feel that the confession or admission was necessary for conviction.

With respect to the 995 P.C. motions, it is difficult to draw any conclusions from this small sample, but out of 29 such motions, 19 were granted. However, in only 5 instances was an admission or confession excluded where the deputy felt the statement was necessary for a conviction. Also, since these complaints which were attacked by 995 P.C. motions were pre-Miranda, it is difficult to conclude that there will be a problem in the future.

Although it would appear that the Miranda decision is causing some problems in the prosecution of the current cases which were filed prior to the delivery of this decision, it would not appear that the Miranda decision should create any significant difficulties in the prosecution of future cases.

Memorandum to: Lynn D. Compton, Assistant District Attorney.
From: Earl Osadchey.
Re Results of survey of the effects of the Dorado decision on complaints, city preliminaries, and trials sections (week surveyed, December 13–17, 1965).
Date: January 4, 1966.

Pursuant to your request I have supervised Law Clerk Steve Trott in the compilation of the material submitted by the Complaint, City Preliminary, and Trials Sections, regarding the effect of the Dorado decision upon the District Attorney's operation.

The attached summary sheets were prepared by Mr. Trott from the questionnaire forms returned by these various sections. I wish to caution anyone who seeks to draw a firm conclusion from this material by pointing out that the sample used in this study was comparatively small and that there appeared to be some misconception on the part of the deputies that filled in these forms as to what was desired. Many of the forms were incomplete or inconsistent and Mr. Trott attempted to resolve these problems by seeking out the deputy who filled in the form. However, this was not always possible because the name of the deputy who completed the questionnaire was not required on these forms. Also, the questions asked may not have been comprehensive enough to base definite conclusions as to the results which were obtained. Because no correlation has been attempted by this study with the processing of such cases prior to the Dorado decision, an evaluation of the comparative effect of this decision is not possible.

With these considerations in mind, I wish to point out some of the highlights of this survey.

COMPLAINT STAGE

In the complaint stage there was a total of 616 defendants in this sample of which 40% had made a confession or admission. Seventy-one percent or 438 complaints were issued of which number 46% involved a confession or admission. However, of the 178 rejections, only two of such rejections were predicated upon the reason that there was insufficient evidence without the confession or admission and that such confession or admission was inadmissible because of Dorado. This means that in this small sample only 1% of the complaints which were rejected were because of the problems presented by Dorado. Only 26% of the 202 complaints issued, wherein a confession or admission was involved, were evaluated by the issuing deputy as requiring such admission or confession in order to sustain a conviction. However, in each of these cases it was determined by the issuing deputy that Dorado had been complied with.

We might speculate that because 74% of the cases that were rejected did not involve a confession or admission that the main reason for such rejection was because defendants are now being informed of their right to remain silent and this causes difficulty in investigating the crime and obtaining sufficient evidence for conviction. I believe that the only valid conclusion that can be drawn is that police officers are complying with the ruling laid down in Dorado.

PRELIMINARY STAGE

In the preliminary stage there were 363 defendants processed. This survey questionnaire did not ask the question as to whether the defendant was held to answer and therefore the effect of the confession or admission which was offered and not received in evidence is not known. In any event there were only two confessions or admissions which were offered in evidence and not received and those were excluded for reasons other than the Dorado problem.

There were 52 cases where defendants had made a confession or admission and this evidence was not offered at the preliminary hearing mainly because of the office policy of not offering such evidence if it is not necessary during this stage of the procedure.

There were 139 defendants processed through preliminary hearings against whom a confession or admission was received in evidence. Whether opposition to such introduction because of Dorado increased the length of time of such preliminary hearings is not ascertainable from this small check but may be a contributing factor to the congestion of the calendar in the Municipal Court.

If any conclusion can be drawn from this small survey it may be that the Dorado ruling has had little effect upon our success in prosecution at the preliminary stage.

TRIAL STAGE

In the trial stage of 318 defendants processed, 96 pled guilty. In 51% of these guilty pleas the defendant had made a confession or admission. Therefore, it would appear we obtain as many pleas of guilty accompanied by a confession or admission as we did without such additional evidence.

Of the 222 defendants who had either court or jury trials 85% were found guilty. Of those found guilty there were one-third who had made an admission or confession. Admissions were present in 45 of those guilty verdicts and in only two of these matters were the admissions excluded because of Dorado. The trial deputies indicate that in only three of those cases where they obtained a guilty verdict did they feel that the admission was essential in order to obtain such conviction.

There were no court of jury acquittals in which a confession was admitted. There were no acquittals in any case where there was a confession even though one confession was excluded because of Dorado.

There were four acquittals in cases where an admission was excluded but there were also seven acquittals wherein admissions were admitted.

Again because of the limited sample and the limited nature of the questionnaire it would be difficult to arrive at any significant conclusion except to venture the view that Dorado is not presenting a difficult problem in the prosecution of current cases.

If there is any further information or explanations of these figures that you desire, please let me know.

STATEMENT BY DISTRICT ATTORNEY EVELLE J. YOUNGER IN RE DAN CLIFTON ROBINSON

We have now tried the murderer of Lewis Grego three times. Grego was shot by confessed-murdered Dan Clifton Robinson in a robbery on February 3, 1962, at the Fox Hills Country Club. The first trial, Robinson was convicted and sentenced to death. The Supreme Court reversed because of an error in instructing the jury that Willie Hickman, a co-defendant, who did not appeal and is serving a life sentence, was an accomplice. Again, Robinson was tried and this time, the jury gave him life. He appealed and the District Court of Appeals reversed because the police did not advise him of his rights before he confessed. This time, the District Attorney was forced to go to trial without the confession and the jury acquitted him. The confession was voluntary and admissible under the law as it then existed. The defendant now goes free because the law was changed after the crime. The result is a by-product of the Supreme Court's tendency to change the ground rules and apply the new rule retroactively. Ironically, Robinson, who was the trigger man, now is free. His two accomplices (Willie Warner Hickman and Fred Guliex) are in prison, one serving a 20-year maximum, the other serving life.

Is there anything further?

Mr. TAMM. May I say something with regard to the increase in arrests, sir? I don't think this is really the key to law enforcement. I wonder as to the increase in court convictions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The what?

Mr. TAMM. Whether there is an increase in convictions. There is an obvious increase in arrests, because there is more crime today and there are more people, and, as we become more and more an urban Nation and the people come closer and closer together, obviously, as crime increases, arrests are going up. As population increases, arrests are going up. But the arrest is not really the criteria. The finding of guilt or innocence is the criteria, and this is what I think is the effect of the Court decision.

Senator McClellan. How about the lack of solution, failure to find a solution? Is that on the decrease for the number of crimes reported?

Mr. Tamm. The statistics, the available statistics that I have seen, yes, sir.

Senator McClellan. As I recall, out of the number of crimes reported, those that were resolved, or a solution found and arrests made, are on the decline percentagewise.

Mr. Tamm. I think this is true. The most recent statistics, as I say, that I have seen have been in the District of Columiba.

Senator McClellan. The population is rising; crimes are rising.

Mr. Tamm. And solutions are going down.

Senator McClellan. The solving of crimes ratiowise is decreasing, and the number of convictions is declining.

Mr. Tamm. That is correct, sir.

Senator McClellan. Any other questions? If not, we thank you again, very much, for your presence. The committee will now adjourn. As early as it can be conveniently arranged, the subcommittee will schedule another series of hearings. I cannot at this time predict how many series of hearings we may hold. From time to time we may be able to report out a bill, or bills, but I rather think there will be hearings on the overall problems from time to time by this subcommittee during this session of Congress. At an early date we hope to hear the Attorney General again, and have his views on a number of bills pending before us, but I cannot announce any definite time as of now.

Thank you. The committee stands adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 4:35 p.m., the committee adjourned, subject to the call of the Chair.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

TUESDAY, APRIL 18, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Hon. John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Ervin, Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

The Chair will make a brief statement.

Today, the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures resumes hearings on proposed legislation to combat the rising tide of serious crime in this country.

On March 15, and subsequent to the last series of hearings conducted by this subcommittee, the FBI released its annual report on crime statistics which shows that in 1966 there was an 11-percent nationwide increase in major crime as compared to the number committed in 1965. It also showed that crimes of violence increased at substantially the same rate.

The Metropolitan Police Department recently announced that there were 2,631 serious crimes reported in the District of Columbia in February of this year—an increase of 633 or 31.7 percent above the number reported the month of February 1966.

Many other significant statistics could be cited to establish that we are moving swiftly toward a crisis with respect to lawlessness in this country and to emphasize the imperative need for legislative action.

There is, however, no longer any doubt about the gravity of the problem with which we are confronted. The Congress recognizes this, the President—the executive branch of the Government—is aware of and concerned about it, and I believe it is time for the Supreme Court to become cognizant of the prevailing conditions relating to law enforcement.

A number of bills dealing with crime and criminal procedures have already been introduced in the Senate, 17 of which have been referred to and are now pending in this subcommittee—including some that were submitted by and introduced at the request of the administration.

The subcommittee is undertaking to study and process these bills with due deliberation and proper expediency. For the next 3 days, we will hear testimony on a number of these measures. The testimony will be primarily directed to those bills listed in the notice of these public hearings given on April 12, a copy of which appeared in the Congressional Record of that date on page S. 4917 as follows:

NOTICE OF PUBLIC HEARING BY THE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate and other interested persons, I announce the beginning of the second series of hearings by the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Committee on the Judiciary. Attorney General Ramsey Clark will resume his testimony on Tuesday, April 18, 1967, at 10 a.m., in Room 2228, New Senate Office Building. The hearings will continue through Thursday, April 20.

The testimony will be directed primarily to the following bills which are now pending in the Subcommittee:

S. 674, to amend title, 18, United States Code, with respect to the admissibility of confessions—Senator McClellan.

S. 675, to prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses, and for other purposes—Senator McClellan.

S. 798, to provide compensation to survivors of local law enforcement officials killed while apprehending persons for commiting Federal crimes—Senator McClellan and Senator Scott.

S. 917, to assist State and local governments in reducing the incidence of crime, and for other purposes—"Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967"—Senator McClellan, by request.

S. 1194, to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the inferior courts ordained and established by the Congress under Article III of the Constitution in criminal prosecutions involving admissions or confessions of the accused—Senator Ervin.

S. 1333, relating to the admissibility in State courts of certain evidence—Senator Ribicoff.

We have scheduled as our first witness the Honorable Ramsey Clark, the Attorney General of the United States. At our previous hearing, Mr. Clark testified in support of S. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967, and other bills that have been introduced at the request of the administration.

Today, the subcommittee will hear Attorney General Clark's further testimony on these measures and, if time will permit, may interrogate him and seek his advice and counsel regarding other measures pending before the subcommittee.

Do my colleagues have any statement or comment before we proceed?

Senator MCCLELLAN. General Clark, when you appeared before us earlier you had a prepared statement particularly supporting S. 917, the Safe Streets bill, that we will refer to. Have you any additional statement that you care to make on this measure before we proceed with the interrogation?

STATEMENT OF HON. RAMSEY CLARK, THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Attorney General CLARK. No, sir; I do not. I would only say that the administration hopes that the committee can give this most important measure its fair and speedy consideration.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well. Have you seen a copy of the notice which was placed in the Congressional Record, listing the bills to which the testimony would be primarily directed at these hearings?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. We have six bills to which we hope principally to direct the testimony. Do you have any prepared statement with respect to these six or any of the other bills?

Attorney General CLARK. No. sir; we do not. We can respond to questions regarding them, and, if it would please the committee, we can submit a report on any, where it would be helpful.

Senator McCLELLAN. I believe you have a written request for a report on them, General Clark, and you may, at your convenience, respond to those requests.

(The material referred to was subsequently submitted as follows:)

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 19, 1967.

Hon. JOHN L. McCLELLAN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request, I am pleased to submit these views concerning:

S. 674, to amend Chapter 18, of the United States Code, with respect to the admissibility in evidence of confessions;

S. 675, to prohibit wiretapping by persons other than duly authorized law enforcement officers engaged in the investigation or prevention of specified categories of criminal offenses;

S. 678, to outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates.

S. 674 provides that a confession shall be admissible in evidence if it is voluntarily given. It would also legislatively overrule the decision in Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), in which the Supreme Court held that if the arresting officer fails to comply with Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure requiring presentment of an arrested person "without unnecessary delay" any confession obtained during the period of "unnecessary delay" shall be excluded.

S. 674 would amend Title 18 by adding a new section 3501 entitled "Admissibility of Confessions". Subsection (a) provides for an initial determination by the trial judge as to whether the confession was voluntary and, if found voluntary by him, submission of relevant evidence on the issue to the jury. It also provides for an instruction that the jury may give such weight to the confession as it feels it deserves. Subsection (b) lists five specific factors which the trial judge is to consider in determining the issue of voluntariness. Subsection (c) provides that a confession shall not be inadmissible solely because of delay in presentment if the confession is found by the trial judge to have been made voluntarily. Subsection (d) is concerned with confessions made, without interrogation, to persons other than police officers and non-custodial confessions.

A review of S. 674 indicates a conflict with the 1966 decision by the Supreme Court in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436. That case holds that the prosecution may not use statements obtained during custodial interrogation unless there has been adherence to specific constitutionally protected procedural safeguards based upon the privilege against self-incrimination. Such safeguards are in addition to the application of the traditional test for voluntariness and are designed to protect against the potential for coercion inherent in custodial surroundings. If S. 674 is intended to dispense with the procedural safeguards established by Miranda or if it is designed to modify the constitutional standard of voluntariness, it would be in conflict with current constitutional requirements.

Miranda requires that before custodial interrogation can take place, the suspect "must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used as evidence against him" and "that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation" and "that if he is indigent a lawyer will be appointed to represent him." The case also indicates that a suspect may waive his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel.

Subsection (b) of S. 674 requires the trial judge in ruling on voluntariness to consider all the circumstances surrounding the giving of the confession including the five listed factors. Several of the listed factors deal with matters encompassed within the warnings required by Miranda. For example, 3501 (b)(3) requires the judge to consider "whether or not such defendant was advised or knew that he was not required to make any statement and that any such statement could be used against him." Similarly (b)(4) requires consideration of "whether or not such defendant had been advised prior to questioning of his right to the assistance of counsel."

Subsection (b) only requires that the trial judge "shall take into consideration" such factors. Miranda, on the other hand, imposes a constitutional requirement that such warnings be given prior to any interrogation. If subsection (b) is intended to dispense with the requirement that such warnings be given and to substitute a flexible standard that the presence or absence of such warnings need only be considered on the issue of voluntariness, it fails to comply with the mandate of Miranda and would be deemed unconstitutional. Only if the Miranda requirements are read into subsection (b), or as a constitutional gloss to be added to the bill, would this provision survive constitutional attack. In such case, however, there is a serious question whether subsection (b) does anything more than restate existing law regarding voluntariness.

Subsection (c) would overrule the Mallory decision. Under that subsection a confession otherwise voluntary would not be barred solely because of delay between arrest and arraignment. But under subsection (b)(1), the trial judge in determining voluntariness is to consider the time elapsing between arrest and arraignment.

Prompt arraignment of arrested persons is necessary in a free society which values the fair administration of criminal justice. The decision in Mallory, excluding confessions obtained during a period of unnecessary delay between arrest and arraignment, is designed to withdraw the incentive which law enforcement officers may have to delay arraignment. It is intended to encourage them to bring an arrested person promptly before a judicial officer. It discourages prolonged incarceration and interrogation of suspects without giving them the opportunity to consult with friends, family or counsel.

An outright repeal of Mallory would withdraw the encouragement for law enforcement officers to arraign suspects promptly. It would leave the "without unnecessary delay" provision of Rule 5(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as a rule without any remedy.

There is an additional reason why legislative action dealing with the Mallory problem would be unwise at this time. The decision in Miranda v. Arizona was rendered on June 13, 1966. That decision obviously may have implications for the Mallory problem. In my judgment, it would be premature to take legislative action with respect to Mallory until we have had more experience with the Miranda requirements and see their impact on the course of future decisions under Rule 5(a).

I believe that we are all agreed that the present state of the law on wire interception is unsatisfactory. Legislation is required. Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 605) is inadequate, and many legislative proposals on the subject have been considered over the past twenty years, including S. 675. While S. 675 has merit, it does not go far enough in safeguarding individual privacy. Wiretapping should be allowed only in national security matters, with a total restriction imposed in all other cases.

Of necessity, when a line is "tapped" a large mass of material is intercepted and recorded, the great preponderance of which has no relationship whatever to the purpose of the tap. A tap cannot be selective and must record all that goes over the wire. It is unlike a search warrant where an officer must specify what he is searching for. As Justice Brandeis suggested more than forty years ago, wiretaps are more serious infringements of privacy than general warrants.

Viewed in this light, wiretapping—whether by private individuals or public officials—should be generally prohibited. The needs of law enforcement can be met without reliance on such large-scale intrusions on personal privacy. At the very least, proponents of judicially authorized wiretapping have a heavy burden of proof to meet to justify such intrusions, a burden which has not been met. Only when the national security itself is at stake, when the society itself is threatened, can such activity be justified.

S. 928, (the proposed Right of Privacy Act of 1967) in my opinion best meets the standards I believe necessary in this area. It also prohibits electronic eavesdropping which is an equally serious privacy problem. After consideration of all pertinent factors, the Department of Justice favors enactment of S. 928 in lieu of S. 675.

S. 678 is a bill to outlaw the Mafia and other organized crime syndicates. I certainly wholeheartedly support the basic aim of this bill. Complete eradication of these corrupt syndicates, which prey on society and systematically subvert the processes of justice, is a goal we all share. Unfortunately I cannot agree that S. 678, if enacted, would accomplish its purpose.

This bill would make knowing and willful membership in the Mafia, Cosa Nostra, or any similar racketeering organization a federal offense punishable by imprisonment of up to twenty years and a fine of up to $20,000. Various factors are listed as relevant for consideration by a jury in determining membership or participation in the outlawed organization or as showing knowledge of the purpose or objective of such organization. In addition to problems of proof which would be involved in its enforcement, this measure raises a number of constitutional issues of substantial magnitude. Serious questions would be posed under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the privilege against self-incrimination and possibly the First Amendment. These problems would insure extensive litigation. Because of this I would prefer to rely on existing law which as detailed below appears to be generally adequate.

There are numerous Federal penal provisions dealing with activities generally associated with organized crime. In addition, 18 U.S.C. 371 makes it unlawful to conspire with another to violate any Federal law. Taken together the offenses described by present law are applicable to almost every activity in which the organizations listed in the proposal would be engaged. While no present statute would apply to membership alone, the conspiracy statute prohibits the conspiratorial activity associated with membership in such an organization.

Your efforts in support of the passage of anticrime legislation have been outstanding. I appreciate them as I do your sponsorship of S. 917, the proposed "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967", S. 916, legislation to establish the United States Corrections Service, S. 676, "To amend Chapter 73, Title 18, United States Code, to prohibit the obstruction of criminal investigations of the United States" and S. 677, "To permit the compelling of testimony with respect to certain crimes, and the granting of immunity in connection therewith." These proposals, if enacted, would be extremely helpful in combating organized crime.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report and the enactment of this legislation would be in accord with the Program of the President.

Sincerely,

RAMSEY CLARK,
Attorney General.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the chairman yield?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. There is another pending bill, S. 1033, National Courts Assistance Act on which hearings are being started this morning. Inasmuch as this concerns matters which we are discussing today, would the Attorney General submit an analysis of that bill, together with relative coverage of that bill compared with this bill, S. 917, and any additional comments that you would like to make?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir. We would be happy to do that.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Insofar as that bill is not pending before this subcommittee, we would not want to usurp the jurisdiction of another subcommittee. Would that be for the purpose of making comparisons and of ascertaining whether there are overlapping provisions?

Senator HRUSKA. Yes, Mr. Chairman. It does deal with court structure and law enforcement agencies. This is also part of the material that is dealt with in S. 917.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

(The material referred to was not received for inclusion in this record.)

Senator MCCLELLAN. For the benefit of my colleagues to get the procedure here somewhat coordinated and have a continuity of the Attorney General's testimony, I suggest we take up these bills one at a time. And since he has already given a prepared statement on S. 917, I think we should proceed with that proposal and then when we conclude questions on it, we may turn to some of the other bills. I will proceed in that manner.

The Chair has a number of questions on this "safe street and crime control" bill. This is an innovation in the field of Federal assistance to States and localities to deal with crime. The bill has a number of facets which I think should be carefully examined, analyzed, and considered to the end we make it legislation that will be most effective in carrying out the general theme and general objectives of this bill. I will ask a number of questions and if my colleagues at any point during my interrogation have a question along the same line, I will be happy to yield. The important thing is to keep this record in continuity so it will be more instructive as one reads it.

Is the need for this legislation, General Clark, predicated upon the fact that our streets are today unsafe?

Attorney General CLARK. That is certainly a part of the predicate, Mr. Chairman. The act recognizes the very great need we have to perfect all the elements of law enforcement in every jurisdiction in the United States to provide for the public safety.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The crime conditions throughout the country are what necessitates, or are what suggest the necessity for legislation in this field, that is correct, is it not?

Attorney General CLARK. I think the provision in itself is desirable. Certainly crime conditions in the country today make it absolutely necessary.

Senator MCCLELLAN. When we speak of safe streets, we are speaking primarily, I suppose, of the metropolitan areas. But crime in this country today is not confined to the streets alone, it also extends into rural areas as well, does it not?

Attorney General CLARK. That is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. But when we speak of safe streets we make it all embracive to include the whole crime spectrum, do we not?

Attorney General CLARK. That is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How will this legislation help create safe streets or control crime in this year, 1967?

Attorney General CLARK. It will first give law enforcement the encouragement that will arise from the fact that the Congress has said we must go forward with this major new Federal program to help State and local law enforcement protect the public. It will also provide them with an opportunity to engage in the planning that is necessary to the successful execution of innovations and new programs in police and in corrections and in courts that can move toward that goal.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, it stimulates hope and gives some reassurance or some assurance to law enforcement agencies throughout the country that finally we are going to try and give them some help?

Attorney General CLARK. It shows two things. First, it shows congressional commitment to support law enforcement broadly with financial resources and guidance. Second, if enacted and if funds are appropriated in accordance with the administration request, it will create broad opportunities for title II action programs in the days ahead. It will also permit continuation of research and development under title III, which is a continuation of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

Senator McCLELLAN. Assuming we move reasonably expeditiously in the enactment of this bill, how long after its enactment before you feel you would be able to start making grants? I am speaking primarily of grants for planning.

Attorney General CLARK. To take the easiest part first, we would continue title III. We could implement research grants in a broader way. We would hope planning grants could be undertaken in a matter of months after authorization and appropriation. We feel it is important to have all the leadtime possible for planning. That is one of the reasons we are concerned with securing early passage of this bill.

Senator McCLELLAN. I understand. And it might take months after the bill is passed before you actually begin to carry out any plans. I was talking about making grants to get planning underway. Do you think it would take months after the bill was enacted?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. I think realistically it will be a matter of several months before we could hope to secure applications, review applications, approve applications, and make grants on the basis of them. But planning can be done expeditiously. A good illustration of this, I know, is the massive work the District of Columbia Crime Commission, which in a period of 12 months made this intensive and comprehensive survey of criminal justice in the District of Columbia. That shows what can be done in a short period of time.

Senator McCLELLAN. Assuming this bill passes around the middle of the year, we finish legislative processes and get it enacted and signed by the President by the middle of the year, do you think it will be near the first of next year before planning grants could be made? You have said the plans have to come in for approval. I would hope if this bill were a law by Labor Day, you would be able to approve planning grants within a few months?

Attorney General CLARK. Shortly thereafter we could approve some planning grants. Some districts are already engaged in planning and plans could come right in.

Senator McCLELLAN. Some are almost ready?

Attorney General CLARK. Some are ready and partially executed. Some are in various stages of development; yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Was that due to the assistance given under the—— Attorney General CLARK. Law Enforcement Assistance Act. No, sir. Due primarily to the initiative of your better police departments.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have asked for $50 million, I believe, for planning. Do you think that amount is adequate?

Attorney General CLARK. We are anxious to move forward as fast and as effectively as we can. We feel, however, that this is a major opportunity the Federal Government will have to make a significant difference in the quality of State and local law enforcement.

We think, therefore, it is essential there be very sound and careful planning before we go forward. This is a major Federal Government program. Accordingly, I think we need leadtime for planning. We think that out of the $50 million, that $30 million for planning will probably be adequate to develop plans in the jurisdictions that will come forward under this act in anticipation of title II action programs.

Senator McCLELLAN. How many jurisdictions? I think those are limited to population centers of 50,000 or more, entities or combination of entities having populations of 50,000 or more. Is that correct?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. How many separate plans or entities filing plans do you anticipate within the first 12 months after the funds become available for planning grant purposes?

Attorney General CLARK. Both title I and II are limited to jurisdictions with populations of 50,000. Our statistics indicate that this will comprehend about 80 percent of the people of the country and about 73 or 74 percent of the ful-time policemen in the country.

Senator McCLELLAN. What percent is that?

Attorney General CLARK. About 73 percent of the full-time policemen in the country and about 80 percent of the people; all the people are in these jurisdictions with populations in excess of 50,000. We find by the more recent estimates there are about—this is the 1965 Rand McNally estimate and it can be checked—about 550 counties with more than 50,000 people and about 385 cities.

Senator McCLELLAN. So you anticipate some 385 applications?

Attorney General CLARK. No; I do not think that that would necessarily follow. That is the total number of cities with populations of more than 50,000. There are 550 counties. The counties, of course, would include these cities by and large. So, there is very considerable overlap between the two. We would hope that a very high proportion of the total eligible would apply. In addition, of course, States can apply on behalf of the jurisdictions that are not eligible because of the population limitation.

Senator McCLELLAN. Then a State could, in its application, as I understand you, embrace all of the areas or a number of smaller towns which would not qualify otherwise, except that the State embraces them in one overall plan?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. It could embrace all or some. Those otherwise ineligible could also combine themselves for purposes of planning so several counties, each with a population of less than 50,000 who when combined had more than 50,000, could join in a single application.

Senator McCLELLAN. What factors, in your judgment, have caused the lawlessness that has become a serious problem of national significance?

Attorney General CLARK. Oh, I think the factors——

Senator McCLELLAN. I am referring to the preamble of the bill which refers to the "lawlessness that has become a serious problem of national significance."

Attorney General CLARK. I think the causes are as many and as varied as all the dynamics of our society. There are the ancient ones that have always caused people to do wrong, human weakness and ignorance. I think Plato said that poverty was the mother of crime. I think we know today from statistics there is more truth in that than logic itself might indicate.

I think we know ignorance, lack of education, discrimination, lack of opportunity, the number of things that cause crime are just limitless.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, how do you explain the fact that you have less ignorance and less poverty in the country today than ever before and yet crime continues to increase?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I would not prescribe more ignorance and poverty as the cure. I think, as I say, there are many causes and that these are among them. That to the extent that there is more crime there are other causes that are added to them. But ignorance and poverty themselves are relative things. And the poverty of rural Texas or North Carolina or Arkansas might be quite a different phenomenon than the poverty of a ghetto or central city where thousands of people live within a single city block.

And our urbanization has contributed to crime. The greater numbers of people that we have, all of these things contributed to cause crime. I think crime measures the character of a people.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, I may be wrong. I think these are all contributing factors, there is no doubt, but I do not think the continuous recurring increases in crime can be attributed primarily to ignorance and poverty. We have had those things with us always, even on a greater scale than we have now. Yet, as we improve those situations crime continues to increase. So there must be some other factor that is very potent in this development, as well as these two. We all have different ideas about it. I think it helps to eliminate poverty and to educate our people. That is most commendable and most desirable. But that alone is not going to eliminate the crime problem.

How about it, do you regard all crime—this is also taken from the preamble—as "essentially a local problem that must be dealt with by State and local governments?"

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think our country politically has always preached local law enforcement and fortunately we have always practiced it. I hope we always will. There are about 425,000 full-time law enforcement officers in the country. Of these, only about 23,000 are in the Federal Establishment. I think that is as it should be. That is not to say the Federal Government has no responsibility. Of course, it does. We are vitally and directly involved in the prosecution and control of crime in the United States. Looking at the thing in proportion, while there are 400,000 in prisons, only 19,000 are in Federal prisons which is less than 5 percent. That, too, is consistent with our tradition and our philosophy. That is the way we should keep it.

That is the reason why this bill is, in my judgment, an appropriate way the Federal Government can really make a major difference in the quality of criminal justice in the United States, because in this way it provides to State and local law enforcement the resources and guidance to build excellence in each of the 40,000 police jurisdictions in the United States.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, I asked you simply to emphasize two areas of criminal activity in which the primary responsibility rests in the Federal Government. Crime is primarily a local problem and local responsibility. However, crime has become so prevalent I think it has become of national interest. Therefore, action must be taken. But I wanted to emphasize primarily the problems of organized crime. It is difficult for local crime enforcement officials to combat organized crime that crosses the State line and has a network of interstate operations that a local community maybe would have difficulty in dealing with. Do you agree with that?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, I certainly think Federal responsibility in the area of organized crime is of higher magnitude than with respect to other crime. I think we cannot overemphasize the Federal effectiveness there. On the other hand there may be little we can really effectively do in cities or States where local law enforcement will condone organized crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Of course, you have to have a great measure of cooperation with local law enforcement officials. In that area especially there must be cooperation between the Federal authorities and local authorities.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. And in the area of national security there is not a whole lot local law enforcement can do.

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is primarily, I would say, the responsibility of the Federal Government.

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would this bill have any substantial impact, if enacted, on either organized crime or national security?

Attorney General CLARK. It would certainly have a substantial effect on organized crime because it would provide the opportunity for localities and States to move in with new techniques and new efforts to help combat organized crime.

In the national security field, except for what you might call police arrest help, something like that, this is an area the Federal Government has handled by itself and this bill is not really directed to that problem.

Senator McCLELLAN. Referring to the provisions in section 102. that no unit of local government or combination of such units shall be eligible for a grant unless it has a population of not less than 50,000, do you think that is too rigid and inflexible or do you think there has to be a cutoff somewhere and that 50,000 is the point at which you feel it would be expedient for the Federal Government to undertake to grant assistance?

Attorney General CLARK. Our judgment is that 50,000 is the population level. In section 102 we are only talking about planning grants and there are several things that bear there.

First, there is only so much planning that a small outfit can do. I think the average per capita police for the Nation is about 1.8 per thousand, so that in a jurisdiction of 50,000 you would be dealing ordinarily with a police force of less than 100 men. How much planning is really feasible there? Also, when jurisdictions become that small there is need for coordinated planning with other jurisdictions. It is very desirable to keep pressure on for such coordinated planning in those areas.

Third, planning for such coordinated jurisdictions should not be a very expensive item and therefore is something they can come forward with themselves.

Senator McCLELLAN. I want you to understand, Mr. Attorney General, I am trying to analyze this bill so that when we go on the floor with it and get to debating it, we will have some answers in the record from sources of authority to questions I am confident would be asked at that time if we did not cover them now. The purpose is to get a complete analysis of this bill and how it will operate. So I ask these questions.

Would not this result in a multiplicity of plans in one State or one county which could well be ill-conducted or even be inconsistent.

Attorney General CLARK. Are you still talking about the 50,000 limitation?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes. I just gave you an explanation as to why I am questioning into this. I think we ought to analyze this bill so we will have answers and so we will have facts upon which to base our recommendations.

Attorney General CLARK. I think the 50,000 limitation reduces the number of applications and therefore reduces the multiplicity if that was the direction of your question.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right. How can a unit or local government such as a city of 50,000 or 75,000 people adequately plan relative to all facets of administration or of criminal justice when it ordinarily has within it jurisdiction only one phase of this activity; that is, police. Courts are county. Correction is county and State. Prosecution is county. How can a city prepare much of a plan when they only have control of the police and do not have control of these other facets.

Attorney General CLARK. I think it is very important that the interdependence and the interrelationships between the police, courts, and corrections be carefully recognized and particularly by the people involved in each of these three activities. Therefore, we think it desirable, where reasonable, to have them plan together because they are engaged in different stages in the same process in a sense. If as a practical matter they cannot do it, then plans that provide for only certain aspects of the process of criminal justice are acceptable. But we would like to know that an effort was being made, where reasonable and where possible for joint planning to be engaged in because it would be more productive.

Also, another observation I should make is that the variety of our jurisdictions across this country is immense. We find many cities operating major jails, major court systems, as well as their police departments.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, it seems to me it will be better, as you say, and we can express the hope that they will, county government, municipal government, these different political units, cooperate and submit a plan together.

If we can persuade them to do that, I take it it will eliminate some difficulties that may be encountered otherwise. That is what I wanted to emphasize, that a lot of interests within the areas of a county may submit joint planning. That might be even true for some court jurisdictions in judicial districts and so forth.

Have you had any inquiries or comments or complaints from smaller cities, smaller jurisdictions, about their being left out of this program?

Attorney General CLARK. We have not had any of any dimension, Mr. Chairman. I think that the House Judiciary Committee has received testimony from several organizations that are representing the smallest jurisdictions, at least a part of their membership, who have indicated some feeling that the 50,000 limitation would handicap the smaller jurisdictions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They feel like, well, they are being ignored. I would not say discriminated against. They feel they would like to be included.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right. They would like to have the opportunity to apply directly regardless of size. But the degree of that expression has been very limited. We have heard very little.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, you have the same problem with counties. A county may have the courts but it may not have the police establishment like a municipality.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right. It varies, not only State to State, but within a State. In California the largest sheriff's office in the country is the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Office. But, in San Francisco, on the other hand, all the sheriff's office runs is the jail. The variety is just enormous.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What I am trying to emphasize is that it is going to require a lot of coordination at the local level—counties, municipalities and States—to get maximum results from this act if it becomes law. There is at lot to be done at the local level where the planning responsibility rests.

Attorney General CLARK. That is exactly right. For this law to be effective these jurisdictions have to coordinate.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you think, then, it might be more effective and desirable, for example, to require all local plans to conform to a statewide plan with possible exceptions where the State refuses to act or in the case of a large metropolitan area, either in one State or encompassing a multiplicity of State areas. In other words, if we could do it, would it be better to require a statewide plan where there are no large metropolitan areas?

Attorney General CLARK. I think that such a requirement would be much too burdensome, Mr. Chairman. It could result in very lengthy delays before a plan could be perfected. And also it overlooks the primary responsibility that local jurisdictions have had in police work.

Typically, throughout the country, the local police department has secured no assistance from State government—financial or supervisory. State government experience in local police work has been quite limited. More than 75 percent of all State police are highway patrolmen and in many States the highway patrol is really all the State police do and that is as much traffic control as any other function. So that local law enforcement is the primary place of focus for the police.

Now, for corrections, on the other hand, to a very considerable degree in most jurisdictions, the State tends to be the place of focus. What we really need is flexibility.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is there any assurance the State is going to make a plan in the field of corrections, let us say?

Attorney General CLARK. We hope each State will make a plan that will be comprehensive to all parts of criminal justice in the State. But the plan need not include all jurisdictions in it. We think that in most States, the State government has primary responsibility for corrections and for courts. That is where planning should be predominant.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am thinking about a State like mine. My thinking is we would get better results if we had a statewide plan as opposed to plans from the four or five or six counties or cities in my State that would be eligible under this 50,000 population criteria. Assuming they all make plans. Unless there is coordination between them and liaison between them, those smaller entities, it seems to me, will not get the full benefit of this legislation. That is my judgment. At the moment, I don't know how to establish it or require it by law.

I think, to get the full benefit we must have some kind of State-coordinated plans.

Attorney General CLARK. I agree a State plan is necessary to get the full benefit. On the other hand, to require a compulsory State plan involving local law enforcement would create many problems. I would assume a lot of localities have more police than the State has. New York City, for example, has 28,000 policemen. Not until recently did the State establish an office with two employees to work with local law enforcement and advise them on how to run their business. The place where the State would be the most effective in the police area is in setting standards and providing training opportunities for local police in your smaller jurisdictions—where there is not the opportunity or sufficient manpower to engage in either. I would suspect a lot of local police departments have much greater experience in law enforcement work than the State itself does.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would think that is true. I am not insisting and not trying to insist it would be the best all around for every State. I was thinking about sufficient flexibility to permit it to be done. In some areas maybe it should be encouraged to be done that way.

Attorney General CLARK. It should be encouraged in every area, I believe, because these jurisdictions have to know each other, these jurisdictions have to work and cooperate with each other and with the State government. It should be encouraged everywhere. Whether it can be made mandatory, this is a different question.

Senator McCLELLAN. I was not insisting it be made mandatory. But when the bill is marked up, I would like to see if we can strengthen it in this respect.

Now, some States already have entities which have made plans. Would they get assistance at once or would they have to wait until 1969? You said some of those plans were ready.

Attorney General CLARK. I am reasonably confident some of our most advanced police departments and other criminal justice jurisdictions have plans that would be presently adequate. We have not sought funds of dimension that would provide the opportunity to go forward with those on a large scale at this time. The reason is we think it is so important to administer this act efficiently and effectively to encourage all jurisdictions to come forward, particularly those that have got the furthest to go, that a period of time be devoted primarily to planning so we can move forward intelligently and we would be more effective than if we were to go forward piecemeal.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you ask them to hold their plans?

Attorney General CLARK. They will go right forward. Their stake in local law enforcement and their investment in local law enforcement would be much greater than ours. We would assume they would go forward in the public interest at all times.

Senator McCLELLAN. The $50 million you are requesting, do you regard that as realistic? Suppose you could get as much money as you consider absolutely necessary to get this act firmly underway after the first of the year following its passage, how much would you request? Do you think the $50 million is enough?

Attorney General CLARK. We believe it is a realistic figure if we are to wisely plan and expand these Federal funds. I think it is more important we do it right because we are beginning a new program that has immense promise. We do not wish to try to do too much too soon—we have had this experience from September 1965 in grants through the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, but it has been limited only to grants to a relative handful of the 40,000 police jurisdictions.

We think time, and it is not much time we are talking about, will prove more profitable than haste.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am not interested in spending a lot of money, but in this area I would be willing to make whatever expenditures are necessary to get results. I appreciate what you are saying, that this is entering into a new program, a vast program, an extensive program. I would not want to see waste occur or any inefficiency bog it down because we try to go too fast. I agree we ought to move as expeditiously as we can. In my judgment if we make a bad mistake in this program, if we find we are not getting results after all the emphasis placed on it, if we learn the program does not function as we planned, and the crime rate continues to rise, we will be confronted with a more serious problem than we now have. I hope we can establish a program under an act that will pretty much assure its success if legislation can assure its success.

Has any tentative determination been made as to what part of funds made available for the first year will be used for improvement grants under titles I and II, and how much for research and education grants under title III? Have you made any allocation of those funds as yet?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir. We planned on approximately $20 million for title III and $30 million would be almost all for title I planning grants and a few title II action grants. The primary gain will result from the action grants. We would move more into high gear with title II grants in next year when jurisdictions already had a plan.

Senator McCLELLAN. As I understand you, there would be $30 million for titles I and II and $20 million for title III?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Now, title III is research and education grants?

Attorney General CLARK. Research, demonstration, and special project grants.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Title III does not have training?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, some demonstration and special training projects would be covered. It is the Law Enforcement Assistance Act continued, and we have engaged in a broad training grant program under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, we can handle this when we get to appropriations. But I will be concerned about proper distribution of these funds and where the money goes. But we can settle that in appropriations.

Your idea of how the first $50 million will be spent, is that $30 million will be spent under titles I and II, and $20 million under title III?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. That will give us almost a threefold increase in the Law Enforcement Assistance Act plus $30 million for plans in fiscal 1968.

Senator MCCLELLAN. With respect to planning grants, how long a period of time will recipients have to make their applications, is there any deadline on that?

Attorney General CLARK. No. We will have looked at the jurisdictions and planning that has existed before they come forward, the size and complexity of the problems of the jurisdiction. We would hope they could all complete, even the biggest, most complex, complete their plans within a year. We would hope some would complete their plans in a matter of 3 months or less, maybe. When I say complete their plans, of course, planning is an ongoing function. We hope they will all be planning from now on, but complete their plans so they will be eligible for title II in 1969.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Section 201 provides it is the purpose of this title to authorize grants to States and units of general local government for new approaches and improvements in law enforcement and criminal justice.

Does the use of the word "new" exclude grants for approaches and improvements that are not new?

Attorney General CLARK. No, sir; it does not. We hope to emphasize innovation and the use of the best proven techniques. We think this is needed in criminal justice. But what we want is the best and where the best is not new, that is still acceptable.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What significance does the word "new" have, then?

Attorney General CLARK. These are the general purposes of the bill and it is a matter of emphasis and priority. We hope that many jurisdictions will move forward with innovations and new techniques, but we are certainly not going to scrap everything being done.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That does not exclude help and assistance in the fields where there are already established and proven successes?

Attorney General CLARK. No, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Could you give me an example of a grant under section 201(a), "public protection, including the development, demonstration, and evaluation of methods, devices, equipment, and design to increase safety from crime in streets, homes, and other public and private places."

Give me an example of a grant under that section. Let us analyze this as we go along.

Attorney General CLARK. All right. The grants are actually made under section 204, and 201 just decribes in general terms the purposes of the grants.

Illustration of grants relating to 201(a) would include, for instance, many of the items that were described in the President's Crime Commission Report. Computer use, new techniques and communications, walkie-talkie radios for policemen, all the more recent developments in scientific uses among police departments. It can involve new techniques deploying manpower, tactical squads, things like that that have been developed. So there would be just an unlimited number of illustrations you could use, and we would hope the police departments would come forward with a number that we have not thought of yet.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I note subsection (b) starts off with "equipment." Is that a duplication or why is it necessary to have it in both?

Attorney General CLARK. I imagine we will find some of those words repeated through a number of items. The list is intended to be comprehensive, and we did not want to overlook anything. I think we are interested in techniques and in the utilization of science in law enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I cannot see any difference in the two, (a) and (b). What is it? I do not see a bit of difference.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the purposes for which grants may be made under (a) include public protection against crime generally, and is not aimed primarily at equipment relating to the improvement of the police department or other law enforcement and criminal justice agencies.

Subsection (b), these are just general——

Senator MCCLELLAN. You have everything in (b) included in (a). That is the question I asked you.

Attorney General CLARK. I do not really think so, but these are just general descriptions. Subsection (a) is primarily talking about devices and other public protection methods; (b) is primarily talking about equipment used by law enforcement and criminal justice agencies. It would include equipment for courts, corrections, and police functions.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They seem to be about the same. I just wondered if these sections could not be rewritten into one to avoid any confusion. That would be something we could think about. That was the point I wanted to call your attention to. You might be able to help us to get it as concise as we can.

Subsection (c), "manpower, including the recruitment, education, and training of all types of law enforcement and criminal justice personnel." That seems to be different. That deals with personnel, does it not, training and personnel? That would be training given policemen, special training, is that correct?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. About 90 percent of your police budgets on the average go to personnel. It is a service, a profession. People give to its success. Certainly manpower, quality of manpower, standards for manpower, training, are primarily important.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Subsection (d). Give us an illustration under that.

Attorney General CLARK. The police, as well as the courts and corrections, need to be efficient.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Courts need to be efficient?

Attorney General CLARK. Courts, corrections, police all need to be efficient. We deal with them in great numbers. We are growing in everything we are doing and management and organization improvement in police departments are essential to their effectiveness. So that management studies for corrections, for courts, and for police to know we have the most effective organization for the particular jurisdictions are essential to their performance.

So, the purpose of this act is to provide funds to be sure that is so.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right. Subsection (e), "operations and facilities for increasing the capabilities and fairness of the law enforcement and criminal justice, including the processing, disposition, and rehabilitation of offenders."

What do you mean by a "facility for increasing the capability and fairness of law enforcement and criminal justice"; what kind of a facility would increase the fairness and capability of law enforcement?

Attorney General CLARK. It could be any of a number of things. It could be a halfway house. It could be a community detention center that would provide opportunity for vocational training for a young fellow to continue in high school or work on a job.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would that mean construction?

Attorney General CLARK. Construction is limited under section 203 in title II.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Does this mean construction?

Attorney General CLARK. The facility parts would refer to construction or remodeling or doing something with facilities.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It does include construction.

Attorney General CLARK. All of section 201 describes the purposes for which grants may be made under title II. Grants are not in fact, made under 201 but under 202 and 203. Construction grants are covered by 203, but the facility involved has to be innovative in its purpose.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I understand that the actual grant is not made under section 201, but is made under section 203. My question was, do the purposes for which grants may be made under subsection (e) include the construction of facilities?

Attorney General CLARK. That is one of the purposes of the act. Section 201 is the general paragraph stating the purposes for which grants can be made. To really find out about your grants for facilities you have to look over at section 203.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Subsection (f), "community relations, including public understanding of and cooperation with law enforcement and criminal justice agencies." Give us an illustration of this type grant.

Attorney General CLARK. Certainly one of the major needs of the public in law enforcement today is confidence and close identification with law enforcement officials. Good community relationships between police and public.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Give me an example of a grant program that will do that.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, some illustrations would be some of the grants that have been made under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act. Major police departments, such as the city of Memphis, have undertaken training of their police personnel in how they should act toward the community to insure and inspire confidence and respect so that they can work effectively with the citizens that they are hired to protect.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would that not come under educating a policeman?

Attorney General CLARK. It is a phase of education.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would that not come under training a policeman?

Attorney General CLARK. It is a very important phase of education and training.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now we come to the next one, subsection (g), "public education relating to crime prevention, including education programs in schools and community agencies." That is to try to reach the public?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What kind of program would you have in mind that you would give a Federal grant for?

Attorney General CLARK. This could involve taking police officers into the high school classes or junior high school classes to talk to the students to explain to them their duties as policemen and their functions as policemen. Perhaps to engage in recruiting programs with them to help build understanding and respect between the community and the police.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think it is very well to do that and I do not see any reason why they cannot do it. But I do not see why they have to have a special program for this. All they have to do is to go into the schools and present their program. Why does the Federal Government have to step in and finance it? You can have a policeman go to a school and talk to the students. I do not see much expenditure in that. I do not see why they have to have a Federal grant. The local police could have this type program any time they wanted to.

Attorney General CLARK. This would not be limited to the illustration I gave. We have to educate our young people to understand that the police are there for their protection and are their friends. The police have to understand this as well. It requires time and money and manpower, and the problem is that the police, most police departments, are short handed right now.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You are going to give them more policemen and you are going to give them more pay.

Attorney General CLARK. They need both.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you feel that this public education program would be justified?

Senator ERVIN. If I might inject, I would like to state that in North Carolina the State highway patrol has a program which it still maintains. They have a very personable and eloquent State highway patrolman who is available to go before civic groups, any kind of groups who will hear him explain highway safety laws and the necessity for observing them. He, I think, is a full-time man. That is all he does.

Attorney General CLARK. That sort of thing is very beneficial to the public and law enforcement alike. We ought to be sure we are investing enough in it because it can make a major difference.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do the public schools anywhere offer these programs to their students now without Federal aid? It seems to me that it should be elementary in public schools to teach honesty, integrity, and law observance. Are we falling down in this area in this country today, do you think?

Attorney General CLARK. I would say we could use a little more of it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I would agree with you.

Senator HRUSKA. On this point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. By community relations in section (f), do you mean those community relations committees that meet and attempt to understand law enforcement and criminal justice agencies?

Attorney General CLARK. No. This primarily contemplates police-community relations and involves teaching and training of policemen themselves in community relations and also the community.

Senator HRUSKA. It does not say training policemen. Rather, it says community relations. Training policemen is taken care of in another subsection—subsection (c). Of course, public education with reference to public education programs in schools and community agencies is in subsection (g). I do not understand community relations. So often there are community relations committees with the poverty and other programs. I thought that was what you were defining.

Attorney General CLARK. No. This is a much narrower approach. We are talking here of community relations for justice purposes and certainly police community relations. It is one of the major problems today and it will be more of a problem in 10 or 15 years, we see very clearly. This is something different. This is a present problem we are addressing ourselves to, to endeavor to help with now.

Senator KENNEDY. On the question of police-community relations, I understand that under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, money for this aspect of law enforcement has been utilized extremely effectively. This has been the kind of community relations worked out between the police and community and has been extremely helpful in the field of law enforcement.

Attorney General CLARK. It has been extremely helpful. They are essential.

Senator KENNEDY. You say this section would be utilized in trying to further this effort which is being initiated at the local level in law enforcement?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, this has been implemented through the Law Enforcement Assistance Act to the point where we have given more than 15 grants to police departments for community relations. Many major police departments are developing an overall plan. For its operation to be successful it has to be concerned with direct efforts toward community relations.

Senator KENNEDY. This has helped establish greater confidence in law enforcement personnel and provides a greater sense of security in the community as well. These have been the results.

78-433 O—67——25

Attorney General CLARK. Those are two results you would look for that have been secured in this sort of activity.

Senator KENNEDY. So, you would give this section a degree of priority?

Attorney General CLARK. This is an important section; yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Give us some illustration of what you have experienced under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act as to community relations programs. Give us some illustration of where you have experimented with this type grant and give us some of the results.

Attorney General CLARK. The grants have been made. We can give you police departments, and the amount of money itemized if that would be helpful for you. The grants have helped these police departments to train their officers in an awareness of complete police community relations. This was done long before the Law Enforcement Assistance Act was passed. I remember Chief Parker of Los Angeles Police Department describing his technique with movies, and so forth, training his officers for good community relations, to be contantly aware that community relations are important and to so conduct themselves in the performance of their duty to secure the respect and confidence of the community. This requires thought and requires training. That is the purpose of these courses.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, I do not disagree with that aspect of it. They should be instructed and trained in the matter of understanding that they have a responsibility in community relations, but I do not see why you have to spell it out in education and training. Those two words cover it. Certainly you do not spell out target practice and things like that, how to make out reports, you do not spell that out.

It seems to me training and education would be sufficient to embrace all these things referred to insofar as appropriate to develop a policeman, training and equipping him to perform his duties. I am not arguing with you, but it does seem to me you are getting so many things here and spelling out every detail so perhaps you ought to include target practice and calisthenics and other things, which would make better policemen.

Attorney General CLARK. We need that too. There are just seven little general paragraphs here. I do not believe we have overstressed community relations by specifying it because it is needed. Not only local police departments but police departments in major cities of the country today realize community relations are important.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am not arguing with that. Do you propose to use grant money to finance so-called police review boards?

Attorney General CLARK. If police departments came to us with a comprehensive plan, including police review boards, it might be approved, yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You would not do it except when a police department initiated it, is that right?

Attorney General CLARE. That is right. There are no plans under here to institute police review boards.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, you hear a lot of suggestions from groups that establish their own police review boards.

What I am trying to find out is, are you going to spell this thing out to restrict grants to law enforcement agencies or are you going to use these funds for other groups that may be organized by communities to spend money in that area?

Senator KENNEDY. Is it not true that these community relations programs have been initiated at local levels and have been requested by these police departments?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. There are really locally initiated requests for some kind of assistance. As I understand it, Chicago, Atlanta, and my own city of Boston recently requested and were given grants for the implementation of such programs. The need for this type of program, which is a relatively new kind of approach, has been especially evident over the course of the last few summers. And there is certainly an increasing degree of need for and acceptance of these programs.

But, as I understand, these requests issue from the local level and are not directly initiated at your level.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. Let me say I think there is a need for profound police-community relations as well as police awareness of the great need we have in all the major police departments in this area. We do not make grants except on the basis of applications. If an application does not come in, nothing happens. If an application does not include a request for police-community relations programs, no funds are made available for that purpose. Because of the importance of this area we have made known our willingness to the police departments that we will make grants for these community relations programs.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They apply how?

Attorney General CLARK. They have an interest and they apply for a grant for improved community relations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Have you had any requests under the Law Enforcement and Assistance Act for grants to set up police review board committees?

Attorney General CLARK. I am not aware of one.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you think the police departments will ask for grants and want to establish a police review board and ask for funds for that purpose? I am talking about citizens review boards, rather than one established in the framework of the police department.

Attorney General CLARK. We are looking for comprehensive plans. I think unquestionably many of the comprehensive plans will provide for a variety of techniques and review of police disciplinary action. Some include police-civilian review boards. Whether they will be old or new or whether they will ask for Federal funds for that purpose or not, I do not know.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Is there any authority which permits you to give a grant to a citizens police review board, established by citizens of the community, rather than a board that may be established and may be under the jurisdiction of the municipal government?

Attorney General CLARK. If it was not under the Government, I do not know what jurisdiction it would have. If it was just a bunch of people it would have no authority that I could see.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You are not seeking that authority?

Attorney General CLARK. No.

Senator MCCLELLAN. So, it would have to be governmental action you would respond to; in other words, the application would have to come from a government entity?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there is some authorization for nonprofit corporations under title III. We can grant research and development for training and things.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Under section 302 it says:

> The Attorney General is authorized to make grants to, or enter into contracts with, institutions of higher education and other public agencies or private organizations to conduct research, demonstrations, or special projects which he determines will be of regional or national importance or will make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice.

Do you think under these broad terms you would be authorized to make grants out of these funds to a citizens review board created by a group of citizens in the community?

Attorney General CLARK. As far as just pure authorization is concerned, if the standards of section 302, as you read them, were made we could make grants. I am not sure what they review, what they do; I am not sure I understand it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You know what I am talking about, some kind of board set up to review the actions of the police. I am asking if a private group of citizens, a nonprofit organization, say, sets up a board like that and for that purpose come to you for a grant. Do you have authority under this bill as it is now written, to make that grant?

Attorney General CLARK. To qualify it would have to be of regional and national importance or make a significant contribution to the improvement of law enforcement and criminal justice. From the way you describe it, I do not know what contributions they would make.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The answer is that you have the authority, but you are not likely to use it; is that correct?

Attorney General CLARK. We would have the authority if it met the standards, yes; but the way you describe it I do not think it would be likely at all.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Then, there would be governmental authority. I have no objection toward any community, municipality, county, or State, where it feels it is needed in its community. There is no objection. But I am concerned. I do not want to authorize or fund programs here simply to assist some group of dissenters who are more or less antagonistic toward the police in the community, and who insist or demand there ought to be a review of all complaints, screened through their organization, who would come to the Federal Government to get money to carry on their work. I do not want us to fall into that sort of trap.

Attorney General CLARK. I just cannot visualize that happening. I do not want to exclude, however, all private organizations from any potential grant under the act.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Give me an illustration of the private organization to which you would grant assistance.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, in areas of research and education there are private organizations which might be able to make a better contribution; which have more experience, maybe; a scientific research agency which had the experience and background to give them the opportunity to do more than anyone else could do in the same amount of time. And if these were excluded we would be excluding many opportunities for advancement of law enforcement.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am not implying that we exclude all research agencies who are competent and have capability. I am not implying that at all. But I think we need to look at this language and try to make certain we are not just opening the gates for grants to be made anywhere for anything at any time. We have got to watch this and be a little careful about the language here.

I invite your attention to this. Maybe you could help revise the language of the bill so it gives us better assurance the authority is to be exercised only for the prospect of benefits flowing from them. It is not a question of suggesting that is the intent at all. Once you get this law, if anything is in there for someone to get money, I expect you are going to be asked for the money.

I want to be sure there is some fortification here if it can be spelled out.

With reference to section 202, does this mean that the applicant must expend 5 percent more each year to qualify for a grant?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, it does.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think that is too restrictive?

Attorney General CLARK. Our judgment is that the interest and the effort and commitment of local jurisdictions are essential to the effectiveness of this act. And therefore that should be shown by an increased effort financially. The annual increase in investment for criminal justice in the United States is about 5 percent; this is a national average. We would seek to at least maintain that average of increased investment at the local level. I do not think that is enough; I do not think it really affords them an opportunity to keep up, but we would call for that 5 percent as a base and over and above that Federal funds under title II would be available up to 60 percent for action programs.

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, I am not saying this is not highly desirable if we can induce them to do it. That is not the point. But if assistance is premised on the basis of their spending 5 percent more in law enforcement in each year, then it seems to me a community could not make its plans beyond 1 year. Or if it would make plans beyond 1 year and then the 5-percent increase was not forthcoming from the fiscal resources, then the plan would have to be canceled or suspended or discontinued right in the middle of it. Do you anticipate you will have some problems that way?

Attorney General CLARK. No, actually I think the requirement would compel a jurisdiction to look down the road a bit further because it would realize it is embarking on a commitment that will fail if it does not maintain its level of advanced investment.

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes, I can understand it is easier to look down the road 5 or 10 years and make plans. But many plans are made in a municipality in which the mayors change and other officers change every 2 or 3 years. It would be difficult for one administration to commit another administration on how it is going to spend its money.

Attorney General CLARK. That is a political risk we have in this country even with Congress. But we have to go forward with the hope the programs will be carried out.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I would like to see it. I am not opposing it. I am talking about the problems you may encounter if you adhere to that too rigidly—if the community has to increase law enforcement expenditures by 5 percent each year. A municipality may be responsible only for the police and can increase its police budget by 5 percent. If the municipality entered in a statewide plan, then the State would have to spend 5 percent more each year. I assume that each entity in that plan would have to spend 5 percent more for that part of the plan which it administers. The State is responsible for State government. The municipality would have to spend 5 percent more for that part of the plan it is responsible for and if the municipality failed or the State failed then would the whole plan fail?

Attorney General CLARK. Let me point out first that the provisions on line 10, page 6, give some flexibility the first year.

Then let me say we have looked at 25 or 30 cities over a period of 3 or 4 years past, and most of them in recent years even without the Federal incentive, would have qualified because they would have been above the required 5-percent increase. Let me say we start out with the hope it can be done. We can change it next year or the following year if it is too onerous a burden.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may have two or three communities that go together and supposing one community falls down on the 5 percent and the other two communities are able to make it. What would happen there?

Attorney General CLARK. That would be quite difficult. The other two would have to see if they could make it alone.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I can see problems in this area.

Attorney General CLARK. It is complex.

Senator MCCLELLAN. This is not a simple bill. It will not be simple to administer, either.

Attorney General CLARK. It is a difficult problem. It will be a challenge in its administration.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, I have a number of other questions but there are other Senators here and I would like to suspend my interrogation and let them have the opportunity to ask you some questions before the noon hour. I have a number of questions I want to go through but I want to present the opportunity for any of my colleagues who have a question.

Senator Kennedy, do you have any questions?

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to ask the opinion of the Attorney General on the question of confessions. Could I get the benefit of his——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me say this. I am not going to object. I undertook this morning to set up a sort of priority on this bill, S. 917, and I am trying to keep the testimony in continuity with respect to each bill.

Senator KENNEDY. During the course of the 3 days of hearings that were held a short time ago the question of confessions came up. Knowing the very strong and carefully considered opinions that a number of members of this committee have on this question, I would hope that we could return to this subject at a later date. On that understanding, then, I will certainly direct my attention to the Safe Streets Act. I, for one, would like to see the act moved expeditiously. I, for one, believe we have had extremely compelling testimony in the report of the President's Commission on Crime. Obviously this legislation is a primary responsibility of this committee. I think that is why the questioning this morning is so important. Thus far the questioning has been very helpful to me and I am sure that it has been helpful to the other members of the committee.

So, if we could get some indication from the chairman how he would like to proceed.

Senator McCLELLAN. Senator, I announced this morning at the beginning of the hearing I would try to give preference to the safe streets bill with the idea that after we have all concluded questions on this bill, we would take up the other bills and go through them one at a time.

Senator KENNEDY. With the Attorney General?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes, indeed. I want to ask him questions, too. I thought, Senator, we could make a better record this way.

Senator KENNEDY. I appreciate that. I agree with the chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. I gave priority to the safe streets bill. That is the one the administration is vitally interested in and I am trying to be accommodating to the Attorney General in that respect. Very well, if that is satisfactory, we will proceed. Senator Kennedy, do you have any questions?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, I do, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Senator KENNEDY. I understand, Mr. Attorney General, that the Nation spends $7.1 billion on research for the Defense Department; $2.4 billion for NASA; and $1.41 billion for the Atomic Energy Commission. I was wondering if you have any estimate of what the Federal Government is spending on all programs of research, innovation, and experimentation in the fields related to law enforcement and criminal justice. Do you have any idea?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, nothing is done in this country in the criminal justice field which would compare with the expenditures for research and development in the areas you mentioned. The best illustration of that would be the fact we spend only a little more than $4 billion for all of the processes of criminal justice in all jurisdictions of the United States, Federal, State, and local. Just about $2.8 billion of that is for police law enforcement. About $1,030 million is for all of our correctional activities, State, local, Federal. Something over $300 million is for courts and prosecutors.

So you can see we spend only a tiny part of our national wealth and production for criminal justice. One of the underlying theories of this bill is that is not enough. Another theory of the bill is the greater part of what we do spend has to go to research and development to insure that we sufficiently utilize the facilities we have for crime detection and public protection. Actually, the estimate of the actual amount of money would be difficult, except to say it would be measured probably in the millions, maybe tens of millions, but surely not above that.

We secured the first year under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, $7,249,000 for the entire program. We secured an additional $1,000 more in the current year or $7,250,000. Only a fraction of that goes to research and development. That would be proportionately proper but we need more resources for research and development. It will make a big difference in the quality of law enforcement when we do that.

Senator KENNEDY. You give the approximation of funds which could be usefully spent on research and development, in response to a question earlier by Senator McClellan on the current legislation.

I know there have been a number of estimates made as to the amount of money that could productively and usefully be spent in the field of criminal research. As I understand it, your best estimate would be that between $20 and $30 million could be used this year in this area?

Attorney General CLARK. We would seek approximately $20 million for such purposes under title III. That would be $20 million of the $50 million. That would be an almost threefold increase over the fiscal year in which we have had experience under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act. We feel we could efficiently and beneficially use that much. We think a substantial part would go to scientific research and development.

Senator KENNEDY. How do you see this research developing next year, with the $300 million request coming up? On the safe side, how would your research program develop? I am trying to find out the priority you place on it.

Attorney General CLARK. We place the highest priority on research. The $300 million for fiscal 1969 would be devoted in much higher proportion, however, to title II action programs than would be the case in fiscal 1968 where only $30 million would go to title I planning and title II action programs. Most of that is for planning. Even so, we would expect an increase in title III, which includes our research potential. It would probably at least double in the folowing year. There would also be some potential for research under the action programs in title II where police departments would be the proper research agent.

Senator KENNEDY. I know you and your Department have given a good deal of thought to the recommendations of the President's Commission as to how this research can best be organized and how it can be developed to make the most useful contribution.

I know the President also referred in his message to the Congress to two different ways in which he thinks it can be most usefully developed. I wonder if you would give us your own idea of how these funds should be appropriated and spent in order to achieve the results you desire.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. I think we need flexibility. We need to apply the limited funds that we have to the places where our experience is the greatest. We need to be sure we do not have a single power strand of research that is divorced from the scientific community.

Let me give an illustration. Some of our major grants for research should be to universities which can tap the experience and expertise of scientists in those areas.

On the other hand, I think we should feel free to go to the aerospace industry as Governor Brown did in California and learn as much as we can about the occurrence of crime in major communities. I think we need to go to places such as the University of Wisconsin, which has evidenced leadership in corrections, and gain not only from their experience but give them the opportunity to add to it, to the benefit of the country because they have been down that road.

As I say, we need flexibility. We need to know. We are tapping all the resources that are available.

Senator KENNEDY. Now, the President's Crime Commission recommended the establishment of a national research institute and the development of regional research institutes at universities. This has been an area in which I have had some interest. I wonder if you could evaluate these recommendations which were made by the President's Crime Commission and which the President discussed briefly in his message to Congress.

Attorney General CLARK. There has been recurrent interest both in the national institute and regional and research centers for a period of time. I think, and I should say that title III, and also section 405, I believe, of the act would authorize the Justice Department itself to involve the Government in direct research programs so that you have the legal basis and the capability there for Federal research itself. But I think on the basis of our present learning that flexibility will offer the most rewards. We need to know that we are reaching the people who have been in the field.

Just take communications. If we tried to set up our own research in police communications, which is so vital because the policemen need to arrive promptly at the scene of an accident or to make an arrest; if we went out and tried to undertake to develop communication equipment and train people to do research in the field, we would be years getting up to the point where people experienced in the field already are. This is true also in computer work. These are complicated problems and people with major experience in the field already have the potential for what we need. We need to be able to tap those sources.

Senator KENNEDY. Is there any reason why this could not be achieved through a national institute of criminal justice?

Attorney General CLARK. I do not know if that is just a name. If that were a name given under title III, that is exactly what it would mean. If national institute for crime means more than that, we would have to see what to see what it involved.

Senator KENNEDY. I spelled it out in S. 992, which is a bill I introduced in February. The bill fits very closely to the findings of the Crime Commission, and the institution was mentioned briefly during the President's message. I would appreciate, perhaps at a later time, receiving from you your views on that particular legislation, as well as on S. 993 which provides for establishment of regional criminal justice academies.

I am interested in your observations as to whether these bills would meet the goals outlined by the Commission and the President, and whether they would be achieved equally well through title III of the safe streets bill. From a practical point of view I am not completely convinced that the general type of research provided for in title III represents the best approach. I am wondering if we should not be more specific in outlining and providing for our research needs. The National Institute of Criminal Justice and the regional criminal justice academies which I have proposed represent such an approach to a more specific congressional mandate in this field.

Attorney General CLARK. That would certainly be something well worthwhile and we would hope it would be done in the context of title III. We would hope that it would not cause any significant delay in enacting this legislation. Programs under titles II and III have to be coordinated. The research and development grant program provides an anchor and foundation for the action grant program.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I request your comments on those two pieces of legislation. Thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, you gave some figures for overall national expenditure in the police field and you mentioned the figure of $4 billion. What is that for?

Attorney General CLARK. A little over $4 billion is the estimate contained in the National Crime Commission report for all of the processes of criminal justice. Of that, about $2.8 billion is for State, local and Federal police. About $1,030 million is for Federal, State and local corrections—all your prisons, all your jails, all other public involvement in prisons and corrections. Something over $300 million is the gross national expenditure for the criminal aspects of court activities plus prosecution. It is amazing how little it is when you consider the importance of the work.

Senator HRUSKA. Does $50 million go very far against such a corpus?

Attorney General CLARK. It is interesting to see how it goes. Let me skip to 1969, if I might. With a corpus of $4 billion, if you have the 5 percent increase required by the bill (which has been the national average) an increase of $200 million will be required before Federal dollars are available.

If you then have $300 million available for grant purposes on a matching basis, this would involve up to 60 percent to match to $200 million more from the States and local jurisdictions to be added to the $300 million that would mean an increased investment in that year of $700 million to be added to the base of $4 billion. In 1 year the increase would be three and a half times greater than our experience at the present time.

Senator HRUSKA. Was there any thought given to the idea of a Governor's veto over this particular type of Federal grant?

Attorney General CLARK. It is a subject that can hardly escape your attention in this general area today and it was considered. It is our judgment that the justification for that is much more difficult to find in law enforcement than in other areas. And the reason primarily is that law enforcement has been basically a local function. Police expenditures by local governments are about 2½ times police expenditures by States. The average State does not give any financial support to local law enforcement. It has really no experience in local law enforcement. The average State does not have an office to coordinate the activities of local law enforcement. There is no real basis for the Governor of a State in the exercise of his functions to say that a particular program is not sound since he has no experience in the field.

Senator HRUSKA. But are not, the cities and counties and all of their activities, creatures of the State legislature? They obtain their powers, tax bases, and a number of things from the State legislatures. And, of course, the Governors often play a vital role in these functions. The attorneys general of the States have general supervision of all major criminal prosecutions and the trials. There is a very close supporting relationship between States and cities. For example, how can it be said that New York City is free and clear of State government and does not have any close ties or relationship in law enforcement. I cannot follow that reasoning.

Would you have a comment on this? It is not limited to New York, but, generally, I cannot see any difference between this field and any other fields.

Attorney General CLARK. I guess that police activities were the first function of cities if not of government itself. It has been a function we have left to the cities in this country. New York City provides an illustration. There are 28,000 policemen there. The annual budget of the New York City Police Department exceeds the budget of the U.S. Department of Justice by $400 million. As far as I know the State does not provide any funds for police protection in New York City. They supply no advice. Only last year they established an office in the State government involving one man and one staff assistant. What can they contribute to the mighty police department of New York City, which has protected the people for generations.

As far as the powers of the State attorneys generals are concerned, the average attorney general of a State exercises no significant criminal powers. Many have no legal authority in this area. Those that do have common law powers find it difficult to use them. A rare exception is the State of California where there is a department of justice but its functions, too, are limited. It tends to be on the prosecution side, rather than to involve police protection. And it exercises no control over the local district attorneys in their handling of prosecutions.

Senator HRUSKA. Your bill emphasizes that we are prosecutors of cases.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Those claiming to be in the law enforcement part of justice make up a very small percentage.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, very small.

Senator HRUSKA. In many of the Middle Western States the Attorney General prosecutes all appeals from trial courts and in many instances participates in the prosecution of cases and trials in State district courts.

Attorney General CLARK. There would be no need for a Governor veto there because he would be directly involved, presumably.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, when we experience breakdown in a city police force due to either civil commotion or massive civil disobedience, the Governor steps in, does he not?

Attorney General CLARK. He has to sometimes, unfortunately.

Senator HRUSKA. In thinking of the Governor, I wonder if the fear of bypassing the State in a program of this kind would not grip the heart as much as other programs which they have discussed so vigorously.

Attorney General CLARK. My judgment is that it would not because police departments are old-line agencies with which the Governors have had a very minimal experience, connection, and relationship.

Senator HRUSKA. I do not know if you have convinced me. I just wanted to ascertain from you whether that had received any thought.

Such questioning is going to be raised on the Senate floor because there are many Governors who say you cannot be partners with the Federal Government.

The Federal Government is dealing out this money and after it becomes a substantial amount the municipality is hooked. If municipalities do not substantially comply with the plan, that money can be withdrawn and they have no alternative. They must run that department the way the Attorney General says they must, pursuant to that plan. Control then slips away from the municipality and goes into the Attorney General's Office.

Is that not about the size of it?

Attorney General CLARK. No. Not at all. That would be both a violation of the mandate and spirit of section 408. I think as a practical matter the Attorney General will not run the police department because they will not let him and because he does not want to. He would not even if he could do so.

And the amount of money contributed by the Federal Government will be a small fraction of the total investment and it could hardly be the controlling part.

Senator HRUSKA. You can go as high as 60 percent of these budgets for administrative improvement. The expenditure of 60 percent is a big percentage.

Attorney General CLARK. Sixty percent of the increase above 105 percent the first year, 110 percent the next year, 115 percent——

Senator HRUSKA. It is only to an improvement component which this 60 percent applies?

Attorney General CLARK. That is all.

Senator HRUSKA. Will it not in due time be a sizable amount?

Attorney General CLARK. It will become a large sum in some cases in due time.

Senator HRUSKA. Now you refer to section 408 which states that nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over any police force or agency of any State or local law enforcement and criminal justice system.

That is a most noble statement made in good faith. Yet the preceding section says:

> Whenever the Attorney General, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to a grantee under this Act, finds that, with respect to any payments made under this Act, there is a substantial failure to comply with—
> (a) the provisions of this Act—

And (b) and (c).

Considering the vast discretionary power invested in the Attorney General in this act and its overwhelming discretion in connection with this program, any aspect of the plan that has been submitted and approved must be OK'd by the Attorney General. Thus, if he feels it is being maladministered and not substantially complied with, he will say, "Sorry, boys, the show is over. No more money."

Would that constitute control and supervision in your judgment? It is well intended and filled with the spirit of wanting improved law enforcement service and all of its processes, but is it not a pretty compulsive situation?

Attorney General CLARK. No. I think it is necessary to the integrity of the act that its provisions be complied with and its regulations be complied with and the plans submitted be complied with. Otherwise, the very purposes of the act fail.

Senator HRUSKA. Exactly. As soon as that control is shifted over from the local or State level, it finds its way into the Department of Justice and the purposes of this act would fail; but there they would be controlled and supervised. Apprehensions are being raised about this aspect of it.

Attorney General CLARK. In my judgment, in view of the nature of how police departments function and the extent of the Federal contribution, the fears are unfounded.

Senator HRUSKA. They were not unfounded in a number of Governors this past year in the field of aid to dependent children, a field in which I had 8 years of personal experience.

They were not unfounded in medicare or the administration of the water and sewage for municipalities with their requirement of community planning. And in the field of education, the cry is becoming bigger and more vigorous as time goes on. More and more, the prerogatives of local schools are being taken away from them on the threat that unless they do thus and so, the plan will not be complied with and no more checks from Washington, D.C.

This is not my invention. This record has been made in other committees of this Congress. This is becoming increasingly well known.

I am confident it will not happen with the first $50 million. But what about the $300 million level? How long will that $300 million level obtain?

Attorney General CLARK. In my judgment, it will probably increase if the program is successful as we hope, at least for several years and then level off, and, hopefully, terminate at some time.

Senator HRUSKA. Do you think it will terminate if it reaches as high as $1 billion a year?

Attorney General CLARK. I think that depends on many factors. We cannot meaningfully predict now. In the last analysis, it involves the amount of resources which local and State revenues can contribute to law enforcement.

Senator HRUSKA. There are some 200 Federal aid grant programs now. The history of this country does not record many programs of a comparable nature having gone out of existence.

Would it reach as high as $1 billion in the near future?

Attorney General CLARK. This is speculation, but I think that it is conceivable that it may.

Senator HRUSKA. Then no longer would it be a relatively small percentage of expenditures by the communities.

Attorney General CLARK. It would still be less than that part of the iceberg now above the water.

Senator HRUSKA. But still a part.

Attorney General CLARK. That is State and local governments part.

Senator HRUSKA. That is the part of their's, subject to the winds of political activities and political philosophy.

Attorney General CLARK. Currents of the water are stronger than those of the air.

Senator HRUSKA. Yes; they are.

Now, repeatedly in the bill we do have specific references to section 204(a)(2). These plans shall "incorporate innovations and advanced techniques and contain a comprehensive outline of priorities for the improvement and coordination of all aspects of law enforcement and criminal justice dealt with in the plan * * *."

Repeatedly, we come across the concepts of innovation, advanced techniques, and new and novel things. But what would be new in Butte, Mont., might be old hat in Brooklyn, N.Y., would it not?

Attorney General CLARK. It might be that way, and it could be just the other way.

Senator HRUSKA. It could be. When you use the words "innovations and advanced techniques," do you mean in a given community or in the world of——

Attorney General CLARK. No. It would be innovative in the jurisdiction applying.

Senator HRUSKA. To the particular jurisdiction?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir.

Senator HRUSKA. That would be helpful, indeed.

Attorney General CLARK. If it is new, it is also something that should be tested and we would want to be cautious about using it.

Senator HRUSKA. Was that interpretation given to innovations and research in the Law Enforcement Assistance Act?

Attorney General CLARK. There is a different problem there because Grant Act emphasizes research and development. In title II we are talking about action programs for police departments, and obviously the interest in seeking innovations and research is primarily to develop strength in ongoing institutions through grants. That is the primary concern.

Senator HRUSKA. There you would resort to newness in innovations and techniques of criminal justice as opposed to——

Attorney General CLARK. I am not sure I follow you.

Senator HRUSKA. Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, would you consider something new if it had never been applied in Kansas City and the application was from Kansas City?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, of course, is not an action grant program. It is a demonstration program, a pilot program, and a research and development program.

Senator HRUSKA. Even Kansas City would like a demonstration on how to maintain a better police department at times. They need it now.

Attorney General CLARK. For that reason in title II the purposes for which Federal grants may be made are defined broadly enough to cover activities of the entire department. Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, grants have been made, not to supplement ongoing activities, but to provide demonstration, pilot, and research potentials.

It might help you to read page 16, line (h), which I think is in line with my interpretation.

Senator HRUSKA. How is it used?

Attorney General CLARK. It is 501(h), which defines "innovative function."

"Innovation function" is a function which will serve a new or improved purpose within the particular law enforcement and criminal justice system into which it is introduced.

Senator HRUSKA. Yes, that is helpful as it distinguishes between the present act and this bill.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, actually, innovative function was not an important concept in the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

The direction there was toward research, toward development, toward demonstration; whereas, title II here is a broad support program for all activities of law enforcement, and we want to be sure that they are innovative and forward looking and so forth in their total approach.

Senator HRUSKA. You have testified that $20 million will be devoted to title III out of $50 million requested; and $30 million to titles I and II, if and when this becomes law. When this amount becomes larger, say $300 million, what would be the division between those two categories?

Attorney General CLARK. I think we would want to continue to watch carefully, because surely we will have a better judgment later than now. Right now, of the $300 million we ask for, for fiscal 1969, we would allocate more than $40 or $50 million to title III in fiscal 1969. But I think we can make a much better judgment about that later than now. It will depend on how the applications come in from the police departments and how efficiently we are able to work with them and go forward with the grant program; and how productive we have been in title III with the activities that have already been undertaken.

Senator HRUSKA. What is the level of expenditure in the Law Enforcement Act?

Attorney General CLARK. $7,250,000.

Senator HRUSKA. That is your appropriation. Is it also your expenditure?

Attorney General CLARK. $10 million is authorized for 1967 and we have $20 million, I believe, authorized for next year.

Senator HRUSKA. Is that your authorization of appropriation?

Attorney General CLARK. Authorization.

Senator HRUSKA. It is seven and a half appropriation?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. For this year.

Senator HRUSKA. And is there a backlog in the applications for further grants from this source?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. We have a good supply of applications on hand, some of which carried over from last year. Some of these we have turned down. Part of the reason some were turned down was because the allocation of money for these did not seem rather as high as always.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator, would you yield?

Senator HRUSKA. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Attorney General, would you submit to this committee a complete report and breakdown of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act administration showing the amount of funds you received, how it was expended, grants made, amounts thereof, and to whom.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, we will. We have just distributed to the Congress, dated April 1, the Annual Report of the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance, and I think that may contain the information you seek.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I would like to make that an appendix to this record, because it has been referred to. Maybe the report you already have will give a substantial part of this information. We will select representative excerpts to be made part of the record.

Attorney General CLARK. We certainly will.

(The excerpts of the report referred to are as follows:)

REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONGRESS ON ACTIVITIES UNDER THE LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1965

April 1, 1967

I. AUTHORITY

A. The Law Enforcement Assistance Act - General

The passage of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 ("LEAA") constituted a national commitment to the proposition that crime can and must be controlled. The Act authorized the Attorney General to provide direct financial assistance to state and local agencies engaged in law enforcement, administration of the criminal law, correction of offenders and prevention and control of crime. Thus, a federal effort to help reduce crime and to make this nation safer for its citizens joined long-standing federal assistance programs in the fields of education, health, public welfare, housing, and employment.

LEAA began as a modest, experimental effort. It was designed to foster new approaches, new resources, and new capabilities for dealing with crime and criminals. The quest for innovation was not limited to the police function, for the Congress recognized that virtually all parts of the criminal justice machinery needed study and improvement. In recognition of these needs, the statute authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to, or contract with, public or private non-profit agencies to improve training of personnel, advance capabilities of law enforcement bodies, and assist in the prevention and control of crime. The Act also authorizes the Attorney General to conduct studies, render technical assistance, evaluate the effectiveness of programs carried out, and disseminate knowledge gained as a result of such projects.

The LEAA legislation was conceived as part of a larger and comprehensive program to increase federal participation in the nation's efforts to cope with the rising incidence of crime. Described by the President as a "creative federal partnership," it has involved the establishment of two Presidential commissions, intensification of federal law enforcement programs, development of a variety of crime-control legislative proposals, six-fold expansion of FBI training facilities for local law enforcement, and the launching of significant new correctional programs. Within the context of this larger program, and its strategy of unified collaborative action, LEAA was designed to make a many-sided contribution, but one largely centering on direct help and enlightenment to state and local law enforcement agencies.

B. Summary of LEAA Provisions

The Act was passed in September of 1965 with authorization for a first-year appropriation of up to $10 million. The President signed the law on September 22, 1965. Late in October 1965, a fiscal 1966 appropriation of $7.25 million was approved which became available for obligation on November 1, 1965. The fiscal 1967 appropriation was also $7.25 million.

As amended, the Act contains 11 sections which may be summarized as follows:

Section 1 cites the Act by name.

Section 2 authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to, or to contract with, public or private non-profit agencies for the establishment, improvement, or enlargement of programs and facilities for training of state and local law enforcement, correctional, and crime prevention personnel.

Section 3 grants similar authority for the support of projects designed to improve capabilities, techniques, and practices of state and local agencies engaged in law enforcement, administration of criminal laws, correction of offenders or crime control and prevention.

Section 4 authorizes the Attorney General to reimburse the heads of other departments or agencies for the performance of any of his functions under the Act, and to make appropriate delegations of his powers thereunder.

Section 5 contains directions to the Attorney General for the administration of the program, including a requirement, wherever feasible, that grant recipients contribute money, services, or facilities for carrying out projects.

Section 6(a) authorizes the Attorney General to make studies and to cooperate with and assist state, local, or other public or private agencies in matters relating to law enforcement organization, techniques and practices, and the prevention or control of crime, and section 6(b) authorizes him to collect, evaluate, publish and disseminate relevant information and materials.

Section 7 makes clear that nothing contained in the Act shall be construed to authorize federal direction, supervision, or control over the organization, administration, or personnel of any state or local police force or other law enforcement agency.

Section 8 authorizes the Attorney General to appoint technical or other advisory committees as he deems necessary and prescribes limits on the compensation of members.

The remaining three sections of the Act define the length of the program (as amended--to fiscal year ending June 30, 1970), authorize appropriation of funds for its implementation (as amended--up to $10 million for first year; $15 million for second year; $30 million for third year; and no specific figure for fourth and fifth years), and require submission of an annual activities report to the President and the Congress.

78-433 O—67——26

C. Second-Year Amendments

Based on first-year experience and plans for program expansion, as blueprinted in the President's 1966 Message on Crime, amendments of the Act were submitted to the Congress for action at its last session. These included an extension of the Act's duration from 3 to 5 years, specific appropriation authority beyond the first year, and legislative approval of (i) direct scholarship and fellowship assistance, (ii) awards for outstanding law enforcement service, and (iii) extension of National Defense Education Act loan forgiveness provisions to students accepting employment in law enforcement agencies. Only the 2-year extension and appropriation authorizations were acted upon (P. L. 89-798), the latter providing a $15 million authorization for the current fiscal year and $30 million for fiscal 1968.

II. DEVELOPMENT AND ORGANIZATION OF PROGRAM

A. Organization

For several months prior to legislative authorization and appropriation, a small complement of Department personnel was assigned to plan for the establishment of an office and recruitment of personnel to implement the Act. An Office of Law Enforcement Assistance ("OLEA") was constituted within the Office of the Attorney General, and on October 14, 1965, Mr. Courtney A. Evans, former Assistant Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, was appointed by the Attorney General as Acting Director of the new Office.

A table of organization was established for OLEA, providing for 15 professional and 10 clerical positions. This level was substantially achieved by the end of the first year (fiscal 1966), the professional complement reflecting a diversity of background and experience among the substantive fields within the Act's concern. It has since continued to provide the staff core for administration of the program and its expanding responsibilities.

Since October 1965, OLEA has been located in the Home Loan Bank Board Bldg., 101 Indiana Ave., Washington, D.C. In August 1966 a revised LEAA Grant Guide was published to meet the rising demand for information and to provide guidance to grant applicants. The LEAA Grant Guide (Appendix 4) contains information on the program, grant eligibility, application procedures, rules for administering grants as well as the text of LEAA, and a suggested outline for the submission of preliminary proposals.

The statute authorizes the appointment of advisory bodies to assist in the implementation of the Act. In recognition of the fact that LEAA is an affirmation of a federal-state-local law enforcement partnership and to insure that state and local viewpoints receive adequate expression in the administration of LEAA, advisory panels composed of outstanding law enforcement and correctional experts have been established. A 15-member Law Enforcement Advisory Panel, a 10-member Corrections Advisory Panel, and a 5-member Interim Criminal Justice Advisory Panel have contributed greatly to the effective operation of the LEAA program.* Grant proposals are reviewed at periodic panel meetings at which time the panels provide guidance on substantive matters raised in the proposals and also address general questions of program policy and priority.

B. Program Objectives and Techniques

The Act's role in the effort against crime, and resulting federal partnership with state and local governments, has been seen as an experimental venture--in the words of the President, "to provide an infusion of ideas and support for research, for experiments, for new programs." Department strategy, therefore, has taken two courses:

(a) The support of individual studies, projects, or demonstrations designed to obtain needed information or produce and test new models, procedures, and approaches to law enforcement and criminal justice problems which hold promise and value for other agencies and localities. These are exemplified by the typical demonstration, research, or training grant approved in the first and second years of program operation.

(b) The stimulation of wide-scale improvement efforts in areas of special need. These are typified by the series of "special grant programs," formulated toward the end of the first year and substantially expanded in fiscal 1967, under which modest grants are made available to significant numbers of applicants for specifically defined purposes. The "need" rationale has also been present in some of the larger individual grants, particularly in training, where program concepts of innovation and unique design have been somewhat tempered to permit serious gaps in services to be remedied on a state-wide or regional basis. In purusing assistance of this type, the Department has tried wherever possible to support the type of efforts which would strengthen the capacity of state and local agencies for self improvement and self-sustaining efforts after an initial infusion of federal aid; hence, the focus in most of the special programs on new mechanisms for improvement or new programs where none existed before.

Promising avenues in both of the foregoing areas, i.e., support of innovative demonstrations and research on the one hand and "seed money" for wide-scale improvement efforts on the other, have been identified even within the modest budget resources now available under the Act. The translation of these strategies into specific components of the LEAA program is detailed in Section III of the Report.

*See Appendix 3 for lists of advisory panel members.

The five special programs now operative provide aid for (a) state planning committees in criminal administration, (b) state-wide police training and standards systems, (c) state-wide in-service correctional training systems, (d) police-community relations programs in larger metropolitan departments, and (e) police science degree programs in colleges and universities.

C. Grant Criteria and Standards

On individual demonstration and test projects, the Department has adhered to a set of standards and criteria designed to emphasize and implement the Act's "experimental-new methods" focus and its character as a demonstration rather than a subsidy effort. Briefly, these criteria call for projects embodying (i) new techniques and approaches, (ii) an action orientation, (iii) value to the nation as a whole, (iv) relatively short duration, (v) modest fund requests, (vi) a substantial grantee contribution, (vii) program balance in relation to the total LEAA effort, (viii) a potential for continuation after grant support ends, (ix) broad community sponsorship, and (x) some plan for objective evaluation of results. These are not rigid requirements or policies, nor do they apply to all types of projects, but have been viewed rather as having application in most situations presented for LEAA support.

Generally, a maximum period of two years' support has been set for grant projects, and a budget range from $15,000 to $150,000 has been established. These, too, are guidelines rather than limits, but they serve to assure that no single grantee will receive a disproportionate measure of support and that the program will be able to address the wide variety of needs and functions operative within the nation's crime control institutions. Similarly, the Department has sought, in screening and evaluation of projects, to achieve balance and proportion between urban and rural needs, and among the several basic types of activity: training, demonstrations, technological projects and developmental studies. The number of approved grants is now sufficiently large to begin to reflect this desired balance and Departmental goals in this respect will become even more apparent by the end of fiscal 1967.

As regards the special grant programs, specific criteria and requirements have been developed for each of the programs now operative. These indicate the conditions of eligibility, level of support available, program objectives, etc., and are tailored to the nature and goals of the particular program. Since the efforts supported under those programs will, in cumulative effect, provide the "experimental-new methods" focus required of LEAA programs rather than the design of the individual projects, the general criteria outlined in the preceding paragraphs are largely superseded by the applicable special program criteria.

III. PROJECT ASSISTANCE TO DATE

A. General - Extent of Aid

Since its creation, LEAA has provided $11.7 million in direct financial assistance for the support of 194 projects involving police, courts, corrections, and the over-all administration of criminal justice. The average duration of grants and contracts was 12.5 months and the average award amount, exclusive of a small number of OLEA-conducted dissemination and technical assistance projects, was $61,050. Summarized by fiscal year activity, the record is as follows:

	Fiscal 1966	Fiscal 1967 (9 mos.)	Total to Date*
Funds awarded:	$6.96 million	$4.75 million	$11.73 million
Projects supported:	83	111	194

The bulk of the foregoing effort has occurred since the Department's first annual report to the President and the Congress, i.e., since April 1, 1966. At that time, the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance, after six months of operation largely involving the organization and staffing of a new operational unit, had made 23 grant and contract awards totaling $2.2 million in assistance funds. For this reason, and to provide a complete perspective of the LEAA effort, the discussion which follows will describe all assistance activity to date (including the earlier projects) with special commentary, where relevant, on first and second year activity and other developmental phases of the program. As regards the first year of operations--an 8-month effort dating from appropriation authorization--it will be noted that all of the fiscal 1966 appropriation available for project assistance was obligated against approved awards.

Although the LEAA program has been one of experimental and demonstration proportions and thus has no specific mandate or structure for geographical allocation, awards have now been made to grantees in 47 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. Grantee contributions to the costs of these projects, as reflected in approved applications, exceed $5 million. Set forth below are percentage distribution breakdowns for projects by substantive field, by nature of project, and by type of grantee:

Substantive Field	Awards	Monies
Law Enforcement (police)	69	68
Corrections (probation, parole, institutions)	12	15
Criminal Justice (courts and prosecution)	6	7
General Studies, Planning and Crime Prevention	13	10
	100%

*These figures are inclusive of a small group of supplemental awards on previously approved projects and allocations for "technical assistance" and "dissemination projects" (for direct execution by OLEA) approved in fiscal 1967. See Appendix 2 grant lists.

Since the appropriations include expenses of program administration, funds available for support of grant, contract, and other assistance projects have been less than the $7.25 million annual appropriation, i.e., $6.9 million in fiscal 1966 and $6.7 million in fiscal 1967, the lower amount in 1967 deriving from increased administrative costs of 12-month program operation.

Nature of Project	Awards	Monies
Training	46	31
Operations Improvement	41	59
General Studies, Planning and Crime Prevention	13	10
	100%
Type of Grantee
Governmental (state, local, county)	52	56
Educational (colleges and universities)	34	30
Private Agency (research organizations, professional associations)	14	14
	100%

The involvement of law enforcement agencies in projects supported to date is considerably greater than that indicated by the percentages for types of grantees. Over 80% of the project awards to non-government grantees (e.g., colleges, universities, research and professional organizations) involve projects in which grantees are collaborating with specific law enforcement agencies, have been designated as grant recipients by such agencies, or involve direct services to law enforcement agencies or their personnel.

It will be noted that the preponderance of assistance funds has been allocated to projects involving police activity and the police function. This major focus has been consistent, we believe, with Presidential and Congressional intent. It is deemed sound in light of the larger scope and expenditures of law enforcement agencies,* the problems of public safety now confronting police departments, other federal aid currently available for corrections (manpower development, vocational rehabilitation, and mental health programs in the Departments of Labor and Health, Education and Welfare) and considerable self-stimulated activity within the legal profession in the criminal justice field.

While appropriations for the two fiscal years during which the Act has operated have remained constant ($7.25 million per year), a few differences in program direction merit comment. In fiscal 1966, 83 separate projects were approved involving average award amounts of $83,830; in fiscal 1967 with more than 70% of assistance funds obligated, over 100 grant and contract projects have already been approved. Award amounts average $41,177,

*The most recent and only thorough state costing study of criminal justice administration expenditures (state, county, and local) indicates allocation of 70% for police services, 6% for courts and prosecution, 23% for corrections, and 1% for miscellaneous auxilliary services (1965, New York). National estimates of public expenditures (state and local) for law enforcement and related functions (3.9 billion in 1964) indicate approximately 61% for police, 22% for corrections, and 17% for courts and prosecution (Bueau of Census, Division of Governments).

a considerably lower figure than for 1966, due primarily to the advent of the LEAA "special grants" designed to provide seed money support to large numbers of agencies. Additionally, two other program emphases have required less support in the current fiscal year. These were (i) the substantial number of studies developed in collaboration with the President's Crime Commissions (National and District of Columbia) to fill gaps in knowledge and provide the basis for formulation of LEAA program judgments, and (ii) a concentration of grant projects in the District of Columbia to provide the program's one demonstration of what a comprehensive assistance effort in one locality might achieve. In both cases, second-year award levels have been substantially below first-year allocations.*

Project proposals and applications have, throughout the period of LEAA operation, substantially exceeded resources. The Department had, as of the Report date, received over 600 requests for funds aggregating, inclusive of those on which awards were made, in excess of $45 million. A heavy percentage of these were received in the first year with some diminution as LEAA program materials narrowed the range and better delineated those areas and conditions under which proposals would be entertained. While it is true that funding has not been suitable for perhaps a majority of these by virtue of non-conformity with program criteria or project weaknesses, it has also been true that many worthwhile efforts could not be assisted in view of priorities which had to be established for allocation of LEAA's limited funds.

B. General - Scope of Aid

The scope of the Act is broad. It comprehends all facets of the law enforcement and criminal administration process. Yet within the constraints of the LEAA budget, virtually every major kind of need facing law enforcement has been addressed and received some attention--ranging across such areas as training and professional education; application of science and technology to law enforcement; experimentation with new operational methods and techniques; studies to fill gaps in knowledge and develop new answers, models and insights; efforts in crime prevention and crime prevention education; and strengthening of public understanding, support and cooperation. The Department has been able not only to provide support to individual studies and projects but, in the current fiscal year, to stimulate wide-scale improvement efforts in selected areas through small grants available to large numbers of agencies--a feature usually associated with larger subsidy programs.

*See Appendix 1, p. 15, for list of 1st year D.C. projects (14 projects--$1.5 million). Most of these, and all of the demonstration efforts, are still in progress. Only two additional awards have been made in the current fiscal year ($.2 million).

To illustrate the LEAA effort as really a complex of diverse programs and the level of funds allocated for each thus far, the following breakdown is instructive:

By Substantive Area	Millions
Law Enforcement	8.0
Corrections	1.7
Criminal Justice	.8
General crime prevention, studies, and planning	1.2
	11.7

By Type of Activity
Training - law enforcement - general recruit and in-service	1.1
Training - law enforcement - command and management	.7
Training - law enforcement - special subject*	.3
Training - law enforcement - higher education	.5
Training - corrections (all levels)	.7
Training - criminal justice (all levels)	.3
Operations - law enforcement - general	1.8
Operations - law enforcement - info and communications system development	1.7
Operations - law enforcement - scientific and technological research	1.2
Operations - law enforcement - community relations and public support	.7
Operations - corrections	1.0
Operations - criminal justice	.5
General crime prevention and program coordination	.4
General studies (including their dissemination)	.8
TOTAL	11.7

While the foregoing categories present problems of classification, as would any similar group, their itemization helps lend meaning to the scope of effort implied by the concept of "law enforcement assistance."

C. Training and Professional Education--Law Enforcement

Professional personnel expertly trained for their work are, as in other callings, crucial to the effectiveness of law enforcement institutions. Aid for training and education, a mandate under Section 2 of the Act, has received particular attention. Program effort in this major field of concentration has focused on four broad areas: (a) general recruit and in-service training; (b) command and management training; (c) higher education for personnel; and (d) specialty and special subject training--most notably in the area of police-community relations.

*Including police-community relations.

In all, 89 training projects have received LEAA support and it is conservatively estimated that direct training for over 21,000 personnel will be made possible by these efforts. This is exclusive of ancillary training functions served by many LEAA operational demonstrations and the impact (in some cases quite broad) of projects limited to curriculum development or the production and distribution of training manuals and films for use by others. Of these training grants, 75% have been in the law enforcement field, providing the most comprehensive range of professional education support of all program areas.

1. General Recruit and In-Service Training. Numerous individual demonstrations have been launched in this area plus a special grant program available to any State for the development or operational expansion of state-wide police training and standards systems. These include:

--closed circuit television training available to all law enforcement officers in South Carolina

--open circuit television training available to all law enforcement officers in Georgia

--mobile unit training for smaller cities and rural communities in New Jersey

--regional training institutes for all law enforcement officers in Wyoming

--regional training center instruction--basic and advanced--for New York law enforcement officers

--quarterly training conferences for county and municipal police in Kentucky

--four-week training courses for supervisory level officers in Arkansas

--specialized in-service courses for law enforcement personnel in Oregon-Southern Washington

--in-service training for all departmental levels in the District of Columbia (executive, supervisory and line)

--academy and roll-call television training in Wilmington and surrounding communities

--cadet training integrated with the "cooperative college" plan in Cincinnati

--development of new state-wide police training and standards systems in Wisconsin, Kentucky, Maine, and Vermont (special grants).

--expansion of existing state-wide systems in Connecticut, Oregon, Washington, Texas, Ohio, Massachusetts, South Dakota, and Illinois (special grants).

2. Command and Management Training. This has always been viewed by the Department as a priority area for upgrading the quality of law enforcement, correctional and criminal justice performance. Given limited resources, few would question the special impact offered by training directed to the agency commander or key administrator which can then be translated to the remainder of the organization through (i) supervision and training directed to subordinates and (ii) institution of operational and administrative improvements based on the training experience. The growing size and complexity of the law enforcement mission, as well as societal and technical changes which bear on its function, make it essential to provide training opportunities to enable top-level and middle-management personnel to function effectively. A variety of such projects has been supported:

--top-level executive and management training for large city police chiefs at the Harvard Business School (to be repeated in fiscal 1967)

--management training courses for chiefs and command personnel on state-by-state bases (3 grants--Florida, North Carolina, Pennsylvania)

--a regional command training college for the New England State Police forces (Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont)

--regional executive training courses by the International Association of Chiefs of Police (east coast, west coast and southern states) and by Michigan State University (north central states)

--expansion of on-going management and command training courses at leading regional training facilities

(a) Northwestern Traffic Institute, Chicago (doubling capacity of 5 short courses)

(b) Southern Police Institute, Louisville (doubling capacity of basic 12-week course) and;

(c) Southwestern Law Enforcement Institute, Dallas (25%-50% increase in capacity of 4 and 12-week courses).

3. Higher Education for Law Enforcement Personnel. In a nation where college education has become the norm for all skilled disciplines, the importance of college-level training for law enforcement personnel has received increasing recognition--most notably within the police field itself. LEAA has therefore sought to support higher education opportunities in law enforcement on both the graduate and undergraduate levels through programs developed in appropriate balance with other training expenditures.

Recognizing the importance of adequate pre-entry education to police professionalism, the hope that state and local law enforcement will attract increasing numbers of college-trained people and a growing trend toward at least junior college education as a standard achievement in the American educational system, the Department moved promptly to develop degree education opportunities for officers in-service and new career candidates. Twelve months ago there were 30 states in which there were no existing junior colleges, colleges, or universities which offered a degree program (2 or 4 year) in police science or law enforcement. Today, stimulated by LEAA special planning and development grants, programs are being developed in 15 of these states and will, in most cases, become operative this fall. In 6 others, new programs will reach parts of the State not adequately covered by existing programs or will provide new types of degrees (e.g., 4-year degree in states which previously had only a junior college program). Continuation of this special program will make possible not only coverage of all "have not" states but offer limited assistance to other states in adding new degree programs to reach regions or population centers of the state where needed.

In addition, and on a pilot basis, LEAA has sponsored a program of graduate fellowships for in-service personnel with leadership and top administrator potential. This will permit a year of study leading to the master's degree in police or public administration for 30 law enforcement officers across the nation. The program will be initiated at 3 universities currently offering such degrees--eastern, central, and western U. S. institutions--commencing September 1967. It will offer the general range of stipend and educational expense support provided by comparable fellowship programs under the National Defense Education Act and the National Science Foundation and National Aeronautics and Space Administration programs. If successful, support will be expanded to other graduate program universities in future years.

A further advantage of the LEAA investment in higher education is the benefit it offers to other forms of police education, i.e., the existence of strong police science departments with qualified full-time faculties in the nation's 2 and 4-year colleges offers law enforcement a unique resource for quality in-service instruction, consultation, and research which can be provided to local police departments to strengthen their own activities. This may take the form of institutes, special courses, command seminars, or other assistance that might not otherwise be available, thus making the degree program schools valuable centers for increased professional excellence.

4. Special Subject Training--Police-Community Relations. Although a number of general training projects supported under the Act have included special course offerings, grants for specific types of in-service training have also been made to meet particular needs or gaps in personnel skills. Most prominent among these have been a cluster of LEAA police-community relations training grants, virtually all of them directly to and conceived by law enforcement agencies. These include training programs for police personnel in four cities (Newark, Washington, New Orleans, and Pittsburgh) and two special efforts--an institute in Hawaii involving criminal justice and welfare groups as well as police and a 1-month training course in Puerto Rico for command personnel of major U. S. cities with large Puerto Rican population groups. In addition, at least half of the LEAA "special grants" to large city departments for police-community relations planning and development efforts--of which there are now 18--include training as a major component.

Other grants with special purpose training goals are the LEAA-supported efforts to develop a radio communications officers manual (Associated Public Safety Communications Officers), a series of pamphlets explaining the legal and constitutional responsibilities of law enforcement officers (University of Pennsylvania Law School) and juvenile officer training provided under two school resource officer demonstration projects (Tucson and Minneapolis).

D. Law Enforcement - Operations Improvement

The second major area of LEAA program focus--mandated under Section 3 of the Act--is support for projects designed to test, develop and study new and improved methods and techniques for crime control and improvement of the capabilities of criminal justice agencies. The Department has supported a variety of efforts in this area with a total of 88 grants and contracts, representing $6.7 million in LEAA assistance funds. Of these, 90% have related to the law enforcement (police) function. The action programs, studies, and experiments supported under Section 3 constitute the Act's chief instrumentality for providing immediate, tangible assistance to state and local law enforcement agencies in their efforts against crime. They are discussed below in five major classifications, i.e., general demonstration projects, development of information and communications systems, other scientific and technological research, police-community relations, and studies and research.

1. General Demonstration Projects. Twenty-four general demonstration projects, representing $1.47 million in assistance funds, have received support. These include:

--experimentation in Los Angeles County with helicopter utilization for routine patrol operations

--computerized deployment of police patrol in St. Louis based on service call and preventive call needs

--computer simulation and modelling in New York City for determination of organizational needs, allocation of resources and effect of changing conditions on police department operations

--development of computerized crime prediction data banks in Philadelphia to aid in deployment of resources and formulation of action strategies for crime suppression.

--experimentation with placement of specially trained juvenile officers in junior high schools of Tucson and Minneapolis to work on crime prevention, law enforcement education and with teachers, counsellors and others in problem youth situations.

--police-conducted burglary and robbery prevention programs in Des Moines for owners, managers, and employees of local businesses

--video-tape recording of suspects in Miami (sight and sound) as demonstration in improved police identification techniques over traditional "mug-shot" file

--overhaul and improvement of police procedures for handling juveniles in Syracuse and development of early referral services on pre-delinquents.

2. Development of Improved Law Enforcement Information and Communications Systems. Help in providing police with modern and efficient information and communications systems has emerged as a priority area for LEAA "operational assistance." This is confirmed by both Departmental and National Crime Commission studies and the law enforcement world's self-assessment of needs. Thus far, 11 grants have been made and financial support in the amount of $1.72 million has been provided. Projects receiving support include:

--development of an integrated state-wide criminal justice information system in California to meet combined needs of police, courts, and corrections and serve as a national model.

--development of a model state-wide law enforcement information system in Ohio linking all state, county, and municipal police departments

--development of model metropolitan area law enforcement information systems in Phoenix, Arizona, Cincinnati (Hamilton County), Ohio and the District of Columbia

--development of a model police communications system in the District of Columbia

--development of integrated police information system in Los Angeles featuring correlation and retrieval capability for crime investigation data

--preliminary information and communications system improvement studies in Boston

--support for the FBI-administered national law enforcement information system (NCIC) in (a) the project's design and study phases, and (b) a current pilot test program, putting 15 state and local agencies "on line" for the stolen auto, wanted felon, and identifiable stolen property files to be initiated.

On information and communication system projects, LEAA support has been limited primarily to developmental and design work utilizing capabilities offered by modern systems analysis, data processing and computer sciences. This emphasis on original planning, analysis, and design will continue with expansion of support to new metropolitan, state and regional complexes. With a potential need for development of modern information systems for every state and major metropolitan complex, LEAA program levels have necessarily required selective support for those proposals deemed most sound and technically complete. Applications have continued to exceed budget allocations, even with allowance for regional and other pooling efforts and development work now underway solely on local initiative.

This LEAA role in aiding states, urban complexes and regions in the development of basic plans for new systems is consistent with both the "seed money" concept of federal support and resources now available under the Act. It helps provide state and local agencies with master plans and first-stage developmental support which can then be assessed in terms of cost, value, and need and accepted for financing and execution with local resources. Such support has precluded, with the exception of the FBI National Crime Information Center test project, the financing of equipment costs on anything but a nominal scale. The information system development grants are somewhat similar to "special grant programs" initiated in other areas. In many, innovation is regarded as less critical than stimulation of needed improvement in information system capabilities which incorporate modern methods and concepts so that states and communities can be helped in advancing from "have not" to "have" status.

3. Other Scientific and Technological Research. The informed opinions of scientists and law enforcement experts express a present and growing need for application of modern science, systems analysis, and technological know-how to law enforcement problems and operations. The legislative history of LEAA indicates that support for such projects is in keeping with the high priority accorded to the research function.

Aid in the development of information and communications systems and the application of systems analysis and operations research techniques to police work has been previously described. Other "science and technology" projects have also been funded. These have focused, in addition to general study efforts and important opportunities for dialogue between the scientific and law enforcement communities, on a cluster of specific crime solution techniques, hardware development work and laboratory capabilities improvement. Projects supported include:

--a comprehensive survey, using a team of systems analysts and scientists, of applications of science and technology to law enforcement and criminal justice problems and operations (now completed and to be reflected in the National Crime Commission reports)*

--a national survey of crime laboratory facilities, personnel, and training needs by the College of Police Science in New York

--arson research at the Washington State University (identification of accelerants in fire remains)

--developmental work, co-funded with the Atomic Energy Commission, in cataloging and forensic identification of substances through neutron activation analysis

*Includes important study components dealing with court operations, correctional programs, and total criminal justice system analysis as well major focus on police operations.

--developmental work in automatic license plate scanning equipment and retrieval systems for wanted-car identification

--two national symposia to introduce and interest the scientific world in law enforcement problems (June 1966 in Washington and March 1967 in Chicago)

--comparative evaluation of the techniques of mass source spark spectrometry and neutron activation analysis for identification of criminal evidence at the University of Virginia

An important point of departure for future programming will be the findings and recommendations of the comprehensive survey recently completed with cooperation of the Department of Defense (via its contract with the Institute for Defense Analyses) reflected in a special science and technology chapter in the report of the President's Crime Commission. This effort, commended by technologists from the President's Science Advisory Board, has suggested a much more ambitious program in a wide variety of areas along with specific mechanisms for implementation.

4. Police-Community Relations and Public Support Projects. Because civil disorder and large scale public violence stemming from rapidly changing social conditions has come to the fore as perhaps the greatest problem confronting law enforcement and public safety in our larger cities, the LEAA program has moved vigorously to assist with training, operational programs, and public education efforts designed to foster citizen understanding and support for law enforcement and to improve police-community relations.

A total of 27 awards have been made, some of which were previously mentioned in discussion of law enforcement training projects (pp. 12-13 supra). Viewed in total perspective, these projects include:

--a national consulting service for metropolitan police departments in community relations conducted by their own professional association (International Association of Chiefs of Police)

--specialized training institutes in police-community relations for police personnel officers, police-community relations unit heads, and training officers conducted by the largest university police science department in the nation (Michigan State University)

--demonstration training courses for police officers in human relations, community understanding, and citizen communication in 4 cities--New Orleans, Newark, the District of Columbia, and Pittsburgh

--pilot short course institutes aimed at community relations and minority group understanding in Hawaii (involving community personnel along with police) and Puerto Rico (involving command personnel from major U.S. cities with large Puerto Rican population groups)

--a demonstration police-community relations program seeking in three major cities to test new approaches which would utilize the influence of major professional and business interests and minority group associations (Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights)

--18 small grant awards for planning and development funds to improve, expand and test new community relations training and operational programs in the nation's larger cities (cities of 150,000 or more--there will be 25 such grants before fiscal year-end). Recipients thus far include police departments in Boston, Richmond, Wichita, Gary, New Haven, Tucson, San Jose (Calif.), Omaha, St. Louis, Flint, Rochester, New York City, Dayton, Kansas City (Kan.), Elizabeth (N.J.), Oklahoma City, Des Moines, and Peoria, (Ill.).

Although accomplished with modest funds (under $1 million) the Department considers this an important start in addressing a major law enforcement problem and--in so doing--responding to needs and programs as proposed and developed by the police agencies themselves.

5. Law Enforcement Studies and Research. The development and productive use of new knowledge has been an important goal of the LEAA program. Working in close cooperation with the President's Commission, support has been given to a number of studies and surveys designed to assist in better understanding the nation's crime and law enforcement problems and to provide the factual basis for LEAA program planning and Commission recommendations. In areas where serious gaps in knowledge exist, the first step in an "action" program must be to gather facts and map solutions--hence the important and interdependent role of both study and demonstration efforts in the quest for operational improvement. the LEAA major study efforts (some of which are mentioned elsewhere) include:

--two studies of police-community relations (one a general survey of many cities by Michigan State University and the other an intensive 2-city effort by the University of California)

--pooling, consolidation and regionalization of police services (Public Administration Service, Chicago)

--cooperation between law enforcement and other agencies of municipal government (Illinois Institute of Technology)

--examination of police recruitment problems (Century Research Corporation)

--survey of the nation's correctional facilities, personnel and services (National Council on Crime and Delinquency)

--public survey measurement of the incidence and nature of unreported crime (National Opinion Research Center and Bureau of Social Science Research)

--study and analysis of police precinct operations in three cities, including impact on the citizen and his attitudes (University of Michigan)

--illicit traffic in narcotics and drugs and law enforcement methods for control and suppression (Arthur D. Little, Inc.)

--study of the "professional criminal" (Brandeis University)

--study of the characteristics of criminal offenders, both adult and juvenile, in the District of Columbia (Stanford Research Institute)

--study of felony court case processing in the District of Columbia (CEIR, Inc.)

--regional study of the office of sheriff (University of Mississippi--southern United States)

--major police organization and management problems--structure, specialization, development of resources, etc. (California State College at Los Angeles)

--police laboratory needs--equipment, manpower and training (College of Police Science, New York City)

--national survey of successful field operations programs and techniques of police agencies (Bio-Behavioral Research, Inc.)

--development of measurement and testing techniques to determine community tension and violence potentials for preventive action and agency planning (Rice University)

--study of critical factors in parole success and failure (University of California at Berkeley)

Most of these have been published or will be otherwise incorporated in the reports of the two Presidential Crime Commissions thereby achieving wide-spread dissemination of findings and results.

E. Corrections

A second major LEAA program area has been corrections--probation, parole, community services, institutions. Here, with much smaller expenditures than in law enforcement (about one-fourth as large), a nevertheless varied and promising program in both training and research-demonstration has been supported. Projects include:

1. Training

--series of 1-week national training institutes for top correctional administrators (state directors, superintendents, and wardens of major institutions)

--a long course regional training effort (17 central and midwest states) for middle-management correctional personnel and training officers (also includes graduate internships and short institutes)

--1-month executive training courses for correctional administrators (below state director rank but at key administrative level)

--development of training films, slides, filmstrips, curriculum materials, etc., to enrich training effectiveness (3 different grants)

--demonstration in the western states of new techniques of in-service training--traveling teams, college instructor residencies at institutions, and university-based seminars

--training materials development for correctional work in outlying and semi-rural areas

--short institute for mid-western states on management and treatment of the mentally disordered offender

--development of correctional training film on jail and the misdemeanant, including modern treatment techniques and practices

--presentation of short training institutes to acquaint college students with correctional careers

--two regional development efforts in correctional training; one a comprehensive study (New England Board of Higher Education) and the other a planning conference (Southern Regional Education Board)

--national program of training institutes for upper and middle-management probation personnel

In addition to its sponsorship of individual correctional training programs, OLEA has established a special grant program to develop comprehensive state-wide training systems for correctional personnel (parole, probation, and correctional workers). Three grants have already been made (Missouri, Kansas, and Rhode Island) and many others will be processed before the close of fiscal 1967.

2. Agency Improvement and Demonstrations

--a national survey of correctional systems, personnel, facilities, programs, workloads and financing designed to evaluate existing programs against new standards and directions in rehabilitation programs

--a 2-year comprehensive jail work-release program in Seattle

--a pilot demonstration in Denver relating to diagnostic and probation services at the misdemeanor court level

--establishment in Rhode Island of a model residential treatment facility for juvenile offenders as an alternative between probation supervision in the home and commitment to a state training school

--a model planning and research unit for correctional departments in the District of Columbia

--a misdemeanant offender rehabilitation project in Detroit featuring pre-release remedial education, job training, and family services

--a 2-year study and analysis of critical factors affecting the success and failure of adult parolees for development of improved parole methods and techniques

--development and testing in California of probation system models, programmed for computer, to aid in prediction of probation outcome, selection of programs, and agency decision making

In all, 23 correctional projects involving $1.7 million in awards have been approved to date. As in law enforcement, a training emphasis on administrative and management personnel, encouragement of state-wide in-service training systems, and a preference for regional as opposed to local training efforts has guided LEAA programming. On the operations side, a continuing focus on adult as opposed to juvenile corrections (in recognition of other aid available for the latter) and on community-based programs (work release, residential treatment, offender probation, particularly with respect to jails and misdemeanor court services) has provided major direction in project selection. Because of the program's modest resources, stress has been placed on areas and techniques relatively untouched by other corrections-related federal aid programs.

F. Criminal Justice

The smallest LEAA program area relates to courts, prosecution, and the criminal justice process. Applications have been fewer in this area and, despite OLEA receptivity and increasing attempts to stimulate worthwhile projects, grant output has been low. Even here, however, promising projects have been supported. These include:

--a 5-state training project offering 1-week institutes and development of state manuals for new prosecutors

--development of criminal law advocacy training films for prosecutors, defense counsel, and law students

--"student prosecutor" projects giving third-year law students trial experience in the actual prosecution of misdemeanor cases

--support for two detoxification center demonstration projects designed to steer the public intoxicant outside of the normal (and largely ineffective) prosecutive process (jail confinement, prosecution, fine, and release)

--support for a citizen's information service designed to demonstrate how minor family offenses and citizen complaints can be effectively handled outside the criminal justice process

--a conference of minor criminal court judges to define problem areas, needs, and suggested solutions for misdemeanor court problems

--data extraction and computerization of felony court records for study of case handling, identification of problem areas and development of recommendations for improvement

--training institutes for tribal judges in Montana coupled with law student internships on Indian reservations, in county prosecutors' offices, and in probation and police agencies

It will be recognized that several of these grant projects link with correctional and law enforcement as well as criminal justice concerns. Additionally, projects now in advanced stages of processing will experiment with (i) regional prosecutor offices (staffed by full-time professionals) to cover the rural and small population areas usually served by part-time prosecutors; (ii) modern systems analysis and automated data processing techniques to improve case handling and operational effectiveness of courts and court systems dealing with large numbers of offenders.

G. General Crime Prevention and Citizen Education

Despite the considerable attention to programs directly involving law enforcement and criminal justice agencies, it also has been possible to provide LEAA support for promising experiments in general crime prevention. These include:

--a national "lock your car and home" campaign of million dollar dimensions which will draw on the contributed time and services of the nation's advertising media and their clients (The Advertising Council with Criminal Division, Department of Justice)

--3 projects to develop and present course units to school children in crime prevention, respect for law and the role, value, and importance of our law enforcement institutions (Cincinnati junior high schools with police department, and University of Cincinnati, Maryland State Board of Education with selected elementary and secondary schools and Des Moines vocational high school course)

Many other LEAA projects, discussed elsewhere, have important preventive and citizen education dimensions, e.g., the "school resource officer" projects, police-community relations efforts, police-sponsored courses in property and business crime prevention, and measurement of community tension levels re potential outbreaks of public disorder.

H. The Special Programs

The "special grant" program format has assumed a major dimension in over-all LEAA activity. Nearly one out of every three grant awards has been under these programs which were designed to stimulate wide-scale improvement efforts through modest grants made available to large numbers of applicants. The first grants were approved in the last quarter of fiscal 1966 (7 grants--3 program areas). Five special programs are now operational and a total of 64 awards, amounting to $1.1 million in assistance have been made. The five special programs, briefly outlined, are:

1. State Law Enforcement Standards and Training Systems. This program offers support for development of state-wide police training and standards systems where non-existent (30 states--up to $15,000 for planning grants) and for the strengthening of those now in operation (remaining states--up to $35,000 for program expansion grants). The development of such systems--administered by legislatively authorized commissions, boards, or other agencies and charged with establishment and implementation of minimum, statewide training requirements (recruit, advanced, supervisory, etc.) and selection standards for police officers--is a significant movement in law enforcement today.* LEAA's 12 grants to date have set four states on the road to development of such systems (Wisconsin, Kentucky, Maine and Vermont) and have enabled 8 states to add new or expanded programs to their existing systems (Connecticut, Oregon, Washington, Texas, Ohio, Massachusetts, South Dakota and Illinois). The "standards and training grants" are a cornerstone for LEAA aid to recruit and in-service training for police officers. Increased aid levels are contemplated for program expansion efforts in the coming fiscal year (up to $50,000 with some scaling for size of state).

*At least 28 states now have legislatively authorized agencies administering police standards and training systems, almost half by virtue of statutes enacted within the past three years.

2. State Planning Committees in Criminal Administration. The goal of this program, announced in March of 1966 by letter to each of the State Governors, is to stimulate the establishment of state committees or bodies to assess local problems and plan integrated law enforcement and crime control programs spanning all areas of criminal justice activity (police, courts, corrections, citizen action, etc.). The need for such coordinated study and planning has long been recognized and most recently identified by the President's Crime Commission as a necessary condition for effective criminal justice improvement. LEAA funds (up to $25,000 in grant aid matched by equal state contribution in funds, services, or facilities) have thus far helped support the establishment and operation of 10 such committees--Wisconsin, Minnesota, West Virginia, Michigan, New Jersey, California, Iowa, Massachusetts, Florida and New York. Applications are under development in several other states which have established such offices.

3. Development of Degree Programs in Police Science. This program offers support for the establishment of college or university degree programs in law enforcement and police science in states or population centers where not now existent ($15,000 planning stage--$25,000 first-year support). To date, 21 grants have been made thereby insuring that 15 states will have at least one junior college, college, or university offering such a degree curriculum where none existed before and enabling six other states to expand coverage in terms of major population centers not presently served or types of degrees (2 or 4 year) not currently available. States in which higher education institutions have received degree development grants include Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Hawaii, Idaho, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nevada, Oklahoma, North Dakota, Illinois, Alabama, Oregon, Ohio, Utah, New Jersey, Texas, Iowa and Missouri.

4. Police-Community Relations Programs in Metropolitan Police Departments. This special program, instituted last summer, has received considerable law enforcement attention and support. It makes modest grant aid available (up to $15,000) to all metropolitan departments serving populations in excess of 150,000 for the planning and development of new efforts and programs in the area of police-community relations. These may relate to training or operations, to specific demonstrations or comprehensive plans, or to establishment of new organizational structures or mechanisms for police-citizen cooperation and communication. Eighteen grants have thus far been made to major departments throughout the country--Boston, Massachusetts; Richmond, Virginia; Wichita, Kansas; Gary, Indiana; New Haven, Connecticut; San Jose, California; Omaha, Nebraska; St. Louis, Missouri; Flint, Michigan; Rochester, New York; New York City; Tucson, Arizona; Kansas City, Kansas; Dayton, Ohio; Elizabeth, New Jersey; Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; Des Moines, Iowa; and Peoria, Illinois. This low-cost stimulus has supplemented LEAA's larger grants in police-community relations and helped spur central city departments in metropolitan areas serving more than 22 million citizens to reexamine and redouble efforts in maximizing citizen support for, understanding of, and cooperation with the law enforcement function.

5. State-Wide In-Service Training Programs for Correctional Personnel. This program, instituted in October of 1966, contemplates the development of comprehensive state-wide training programs for correctional personnel, particularly those serving in line and lower supervisory capacities. Requiring (i) collaboration between all major state correctional agencies and a selected college or university and (ii) development of a system covering all personnel within the correctional process--parole, probation, community treatment, institutions--aid is available for initial planning and development (up to $15,000) and for first-year operations (up to $40,000). Three grants (Missouri, Rhode Island, and Kansas) have already been made and many more will have been processed by fiscal year-end.

6. New Efforts. New special programs are projected to meet other areas of law enforcement need: (i) The Department is about to launch a program of special grants (up to $15,000) to stimulate the establishment of full-time planning units in medium-sized police agencies at the municipal, county and state levels (programmed for 50 to 70 grants). The value of such units has received increasing recognition from law enforcement authorities and units now exist in virtually all of the larger departments but are relatively scarce in medium-sized agencies. (ii) A special effort to support the acquisition of audio-visual training equipment and materials for departments too small to have training units or officers will provide the first LEAA program of direct aid to small police departments. (Most small department support to date has been through the medium of regional and state grants providing services to many agencies.) This new program will provide low-cost in-service and roll-call training facilities for up to 1,000 small departments (matching contribution basis).

I. Technical Assistance

Despite limitations in resources and the kind of staff strength needed for extensive direct assistance activities, important steps have been taken to meet the Act's authorization for technical assistance services.

LEAA has begun to bring grantees together to enable them to exchange experience, obtain guidance, and generally avoid duplicative and misdirected activity. Thus:

(1) Last October, representatives of the state planning committees met at the University of Maryland (both grantees and prospective applicants) to discuss their work and problems.

(2) Earlier this month, OLEA brought together all project directors of its management training grants to discuss problems and better ways of structuring their programs.

(3) Similar meetings are contemplated with police science degree program directors and police-community relations project directors.

(4) An informal newsletter for police-community relations grantees has been initiated.

Additionally, a number of LEAA grant and contract projects are designed to provide "technical assistance" to law enforcement agencies. These include, for example, the grants to:

--the Associated Public Safety Communications Officers to develop, publish, and disseminate to all police departments a handbook on public safety radio systems

--the International Association of Chiefs of Police for a national consulting service on police-community relations programs

--the League of Kansas Municipalities for the dissemination of a law enforcement handbook to all Kansas peace officers

--LEAA's several training materials grants (films, slides, etc.)

Many study grants now in final stages of completion will serve technical assistance functions, e.g., suggested new police field operations techniques resulting from the survey of 2,200 police agencies for successful programs, action recommendations of the study efforts on pooling of police services, police-community relations, police organization and management, etc.

J. Dissemination

It was contemplated that technical assistance and dissemination activities would be built primarily on the basis of findings, data and models resulting from LEAA-supported projects.* Since few projects have been completed, it has not yet been possible to exploit the full potential of the LEAA technical assistance and dissemination function (Section 6 of Act).

LEAA's major dissemination investment for the current fiscal year is an important one--that of insuring the widest possible consideration for and utilization of the findings, recommendations and other output resulting from the work of the two Presidential crime commissions--most notably that of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice of which 40,000 cover report copies have been distributed to state and local governors, legislators, mayors, county heads, police chiefs, judges, correctional administrators, educators and civic leaders (National Crime Commission Dissemination Project 67-19 and D. C. Crime Commission Dissemination Project 67-20).

Apart from the intrinsic value of these landmark crime study efforts, the results of more than $1.4 million in LEAA-supported study projects (14 different grants and contracts) will be reflected in the Commission's report volumes--indirectly and by partial reference in the cover report and more directly by extended summary or textual reproduction in the Commission's eight task force and appendix volumes, LEAA dissemination support here constitutes, in effect, the publication and transmission to the nation of its first completed study projects.

*Although discussed separately, it will be noted that technical assistance and dissemination activities are closely related, often interdependent, and sometimes difficult to separate.

In addition, the following informational activities have been undertaken:

1. OLEA has financed separate publication of important materials (e.g., the LEAA-supported national survey of corrections and correctional agencies, a comprehensive police-community relations manual distributed to urban departments, and a new riot control manual developed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in collaboration with the staff of the National Crime Commission).

2. All LEAA grantees are required to submit at least 25 copies of their final project reports and, in many instances, larger quantities have been authorized for broader distribution. At present, the LEAA library contains 20 completed reports which, to the extent not previously disseminated, are made available to interested groups or individuals on request.

3. Grant lists which include pertinent data and short descriptions of all projects funded have been issued periodically and are widely disseminated. These lists are revised and reissued at least quarterly and special subject lists have also been prepared (e.g., "special grant" awards, police-community relations awards, etc.).

4. A substantial segment of professional staff time has been devoted to reports on and discussion of the LEAA program at professional meetings, symposia, etc. Also, on completion of first year activities, OLEA held a unique briefing meeting for representatives of concerned national organizations to report on progress and activities and to solicit reaction to the program (August 1966). In attendance were directors or key personnel of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, National Sheriff's Association, U.S. Conference of Mayors, National Association of Counties, National League of Cities, American Correctional Association, National Council on Crime and Delinquency, and National Commission on Correctional Manpower and Training.

K. LEAA Coordination with Other Federal Programs

OLEA has had an active record of contact, collaboration and exchange of information with other federal assistance programs. This includes:

1. Distribution of notices to other federal grant agencies (Labor, HEW, OEO, HUD, etc.) of (i) all projects pending with the Attorney General for final action and (ii) recent grant awards. Although other programs circulate periodic grant lists, few provide notices on a pre-award project-by-project basis.

2. Briefing meetings, conducted last summer by OLEA, on its first-year program and activities for the benefit of key administrators of other grant programs. In attendance were representatives of the National Institute of Mental Health (HEW), Department of Labor, National Aeronautics and Space Administration, National Science Foundation, Office of Economic Opportunity, Vocational Rehabilitation Administration (HEW), Office of Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Development, and Office of Education (HEW).

3. LEAA has engaged in the following cooperative efforts:

--Labor. Grant to evaluate and provide consulting services to MDTA training programs (New York, Miami, Oakland, Los Angeles, and St. Louis) designed to help disadvantaged youths qualify for police service (also involves Office of Education)

--AEC. Joint funding with AEC of contract work by General Dynamics for developmental research in cataloging and in forensic use of neutron activation analysis to identify criminal evidence.

--NASA. Arrangements for a NASA technology utilization team to visit all OLEA "science and technology" grantees, review their projects, and then probe the extensive NASA science data bank for extraction of research and knowledge which might be of assistance to the LEAA grantees.

--VRA-HEW. Joint funding with the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration of a regional institute for southern states on manpower and training needs in corrections.

--VRA-HEW. Two LEAA correctional grant projects include, and were negotiated to involve, a contribution of local VRA staff services needed for the treatment portion of the project (Denver misdemeanant probation services and Rhode Island juvenile treatment facility).

--Defense. OLEA's comprehensive survey of applications of modern science and technology to law enforcement and criminal justice problems was arranged through the offices of the Department of Defense under its exclusive services contract with the Institute for Defense Analyses.

--Other. LEAA grantees are encouraged to utilize other federal aid and services, and have incorporated in their projects components provided by federal vocational education funds, OEO Vista Volunteer services, and the U.S. Employment Service.

OLEA has also made extensive contact with other federal aid programs to learn about their operations and explore cooperative activities. These include the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Office of Education, and the Office of Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Development. For example, at OLEA request, the Commissioner of Education designated a representative to participate in planning and review activities on the LEAA special grant program for development of college degree offerings in police science. Also, the Department has availed itself of the regional audit facilities of other agencies in arrangements for audit of grant and contract projects (Department of Health, Education and Welfare and Department of Defense).

IV. ADMINISTRATION

A. Staff and Advisory Panels

The LEAA program has been administered with an authorized staff complement of 25 positions (15 professional and 10 clerical) which includes supporting budget, fiscal review, and information office functions. The full staff complement (supplemented by the equivalent of one or two positions from part-time expert and consultant help) was achieved at the beginning of fiscal 1967 and has since been maintained. In spite of the fact that the second year appropriation (7.25 million) was the same as for fiscal 1966, the longer period of operation (12 months as opposed to 8 months in fiscal 1966), new grant monitoring, dissemination and technical assistance responsibilities not operative in the first-year program, and the trend toward greater numbers of smaller individual awards (60 percent more grants than in fiscal 1966) have strained staff resources, and will require early supplementation.

Office structure involves a division of work among grant managers in law enforcement, corrections, and criminal justice who are directly responsible to the OLEA Director. These are backed up by grant specialists, administrative and dissemination personnel. In addition, a pool of general program assistants has provided flexibility for the small OLEA staff operation--permitting them to assume more or less regular responsibilities in a particular program area while handling special assignments as dictated by program workloads.

OLEA now has two regularly constituted review panels--law enforcement and corrections. Each of these has met three times and the last two meetings involved a review of all pending grant applications except "special program" proposals. On projects classified as "science and technology" efforts, a sub-panel of the law enforcement panel has met with OLEA's science and technology consultants (from the Institute for Defense Analyses group) for grant review purposes. In criminal justice, the area of smallest program activity (12 grants), the Department has vested review functions in an ad hoc interdepartmental group of criminal justice professionals (Assistant Attorney General for Criminal Division, Director of Office of Criminal Justice, Chief of the Executive Office for U. S. Attorneys, and Director of President's Crime Commission Criminal Justice Task Force). A slate of candidates for a formal criminal justice panel, staffed by outside experts and professionals (prosecutors, judges, law professors, ancillary experts), is being finalized for an expanded criminal justice grant effort.

B. Grant Processing and Review

Under the LEAA review process as now constituted, potential grantees are encouraged to submit project ideas as brief preliminary proposals (3-4 pages) to permit an OLEA expression of project interest and appropriateness before expending the time and effort required to develop, document, and submit a complete application.

A number of proposals not within grant criteria or budget allocations are identified at this time, although even here grantees are given the opportunity to develop a formal application and obtain advisory panel review if they so desire. On projects deemed suitable for development, correspondence, telephone discussions, grantee visits to OLEA offices, and site inspections by OLEA staff are utilized to consult with applicants, raise questions as to completeness and budget adequacy, and evaluate applicant capabilities. Final applications are then submitted for advisory panel review and, where favorable, prepared for submission to and award action by the Attorney General. Award files contain both program and budget analyses for the Attorney General, staff recommendations, and the results of advisory panel review.

Commencing in October 1966, the Attorney General established a formal policy of panel review for all individual demonstration and training projects (a procedure which had previously been adhered to after the establishment and initial organizational meeting of each panel). The five "special grant programs" have been submitted for panel approval of program specifications and consideration of the total number of grants and amount of funds to be allocated to each. Based on this general approval, specific applications have been handled through staff negotiation and review and direct referral for award action. This was in recognition of the standard formats prevailing for these small grants and the fact that conformity with program specifications and application requirements was essentially a staff-level function.

On completion of award action, grantees are furnished with a Statement of Award and a copy of the application as approved, accompanied by pertinent special conditions and appropriate forms and instructions concerning fund requests and grant administration.

Although pre-award visits have not been possible on all applications, it is estimated that in at least 80 per cent of all individual demonstration and training projects a personal conference and review at OLEA or grantee offices has been possible.

C. Grant Conditions and Administrative Safeguards

Current LEAA grant conditions embody a number of administrative safeguards. They prescribe, for example, that (i) grant funds may be expended only for purposes and activities set forth in approved project plans; (ii) funds may not be obligated prior to the effective date or subsequent to grant termination dates; (iii) travel expenses must in general conform to those appropriate for the federal government and in no event exceed the grantee's established and consistently followed policies; and (iv) certain fund uses may not be considered, e.g., items not part of the approved budget, purchase or construction of land and buildings, dues to organizations or federations, entertainment expenses, etc.

There are also other administrative rules, including requirements for (a) written approval from OLEA for major project changes, (b) accounting for all project income with return of unexpended balances at project termination, (c) susceptibility of all funds to audit and right of government inspection and access to grantee records, (d) application of grant conditions to third party (subcontractor) organizations involved in the project, (e) preservation of public rights to copyrightable materials and patentable inventions resulting from LEAA-funded efforts and (f) applicability of the Title VI provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (non-discrimination in federally-supported programs). Grantee report requirements are described in the next section.

D. Grant Monitoring, Completion and Audit

At the September 1966 LEAA appropriation hearings (Senate subcommittee--fiscal 1967) detailed questions concerning LEAA grant processing, review, monitoring, payment, reporting, fund accounting, and audit procedures were raised. Written answers were submitted for the record and these constitute a comprehensive record of LEAA monitoring and audit activities.*

1. Grantee Reports. Present procedures require that all grantees submit quarterly expenditure reports, quarterly progress reports, a final financial report, and a final project report, the latter due 90 and 75 days, respectively, after the project completion date. The quarterly reports, involving simple formats, have been particularly valuable in providing the Department with perspective as to the actual administrative experience of its several projects. Final submissions contemplate a detailed financial accounting of the project and a comprehensive narrative report, suitable for dissemination to interested parties, of the findings, conclusions, and accomplishments of the project. Special instructions are available for final report preparation. More comprehensive description and documentation is, of course, required for individual demonstration and test projects than for the small "special grants."

2. Project Monitoring. The OLEA staff has, notwithstanding a growing backlog of grants-in-progress, been able to maintain a good level of project monitoring. All quarterly financial reports are reviewed and each quarterly progress report is reviewed and responded to by the appropriate program monitor. In addition, over 160 grantee site visits have been made (pre- or post-award), usually combined with negotiation visits to other applicants or inspections of more than one grantee.

A visit to every grantee has not been possible. However, the majority (and all large projects) have been visited locally at some time and virtually all others have involved at least one personal conference with OLEA staff in Washington. The OLEA "technical assistance" conferences which bring together clusters of grantees in related project areas have provided additional opportunities for examination of project progress.

3. Project Completion. As of April 1, 20 grants and contracts had been completed, i.e., had reached project termination dates. Only one of these had received full final audit and a small number (five) were retired on "desk audit" (--mostly "fixed price" contracts or small grants with only a few budget items where verification of expenditures could be made by correspondence). On completed grants, the grantee is accorded 90 days for closing accounts and for submission of its final financial report and detailed cost schedules. Since most first-year award activity occurred in the last quarter of fiscal 1966 and most grant projects extend for a year or more in duration, few projects have reached this stage; hence, the small number of audited grants. Also, a number of projects have received extensions to compensate for initial delays or permit additional work. It has been OLEA's experience that most grantees underestimate the lead time required to commence project operation.

4. Final Audit. LEAA audit arrangements involve use of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare's grant audit office and the Defense Contract Audit Agency's audit facilities, both of which maintain regional offices not now feasible for the Department under the small volume of work required for LEAA projects. In each case, after the grant or contract is referred for audit, the Department must secure a spot on the agency's audit schedule which in most cases involves some waiting period. The Department anticipates prompt and efficient service under these arrangements but recognizes the necessity of integrating its modest audit n needs with the larger programs administered by these agencies and the attendant schedule adjustments required to serve this purpose.

E. Grantee Contributions

The Act contains no specific matching formulas or grantee contribution levels to qualify for grant assistance--a not unusual feature for small programs of experimental and demonstration proportions. It does, however, require grantee contributions--in cash, services, or facilities--wherever feasible and the Department has sought to maximize such participation in grant negotiation. Some of the special programs were structured to require matching fund support or a grantee investment at least equal to that of LEAA (e.g., special grants for state planning committees and police standards and training systems). In other situations, OLEA has reviewed fund requests on an individual basis, requiring contributions appropriate to the type of project, the grantee's available resources, and the dimension of aid involved. Viewed collectively, grantee contribution levels have been substantial. By conservative estimate and based only on items which are assigned dollar costs in grantee contribution estimates, more than $5 million in grantee investment has been provided for the $11.7 million in LEAA awards thus far approved. Substantial grantee commitments such as the real costs of providing large numbers of salaried personnel with time off to engage in training projects are not ordinarily reflected in these contributions and yet have definite impact on current grantee budgets and resources.

V. ASSESSMENT AND FUTURE PLANS

The LEAA program has had a wide and varied impact in terms of program coverage, types of projects supported, and diversity of recipients. In a manner perhaps unusual for a program of this size, major law enforcement and criminal justice agencies, universities, research organizations, and professional associations across the nation have started work on projects of varying scope and dimension under the stimulus of LEAA aid.

Since the vast majority of projects remain to be completed, reliable assessment of the initial LEAA effort cannot yet be undertaken. Indeed, the possibility must be accepted that the program, with present resources, may not yet have achieved the "critical mass" necessary for the institutional change and improvement it was designed to spur. With estimated expenditures by all agencies of criminal justice at approximately $4.3 billion per year and the public cost of crime totaling far in excess of that amount,* it is clear that LEAA, even with the most imaginative utilization of resources, could hope for but limited results with the aid made available thus far.

Nonetheless, on the basis of activity to date, we believe the program has demonstrated a genuine value and achieved substantial results and impact. This contribution has these dimensions:

(a) In its own right, the program has made possible a variety of projects that will aid and advance law enforcement capabilities. In varying degree these will set standards, provide models, produce knowledge, and establish facilities (information systems, training centers, etc.) badly needed for a more effective response to the crime problem. Because this problem is so critical, the LEAA stimulus to movement and positive change in a field where change comes slowly may have been worth many times its dollar cost.

(b) The LEAA program has served as an excellent laboratory and preparation for the kind of massive grant-in-aid partnership contemplated by the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. It has given the Department broad experience and perspectives in the methods and techniques of federal assistance, the problems and dilemmas of grant program administration, and the type of "client" it serves in dealing with state and local law enforcement. LEAA could have limited its activities to a few areas (e.g., training only), concentrated its funds accordingly, and perhaps have made a greater impact in such areas. Instead, it chose to address a wide range of the goals set for it and, in so doing, became involved in such diverse concerns as higher education; civil rights, as reflected in the community relations problem; the behavioral sciences; advanced computer technology; research and demonstration design; and many others. This experience has been invaluable.

(c) Finally, LEAA has been a moving force, though not the only one, in a process that has been preparing law enforcement to examine its problems and move vigorously toward their resolution. Our demands for "new approaches," "innovative projects," "carefully > defined plans," and high standards in projects submitted for assistance have undoubtedly caused work, and perhaps some hesitation, but on the whole they have been accepted. Law enforcement today is progressive and aware of its responsibilities. It wants new solutions, new competence, and progress--certainly in greater degree than was apparent ten or even five years ago. This type of climate is an indispensable condition to the progress envisioned by LEAA and legislative programs to follow.

Virtually every large police agency has had some contact with OLEA during its 18 months of operation. This is also true of law enforcement's professional associations, many local governmental units, and hundreds of other groups interested in law enforcement and its problems. Similar links have been established with the world of corrections, despite a considerably smaller program investment. Progress was perhaps impeded by a dilemma which faced the LEAA program from the beginning. This was the launching of a demonstration program (with demonstration-size funding) in a nation that expected more and had only partial understanding of the program's limitations. With the necessity for rejecting aid in three out of four requests submitted, it was clear that a great measure of frustration was in store for law enforcement as it responded to the Act. Nevertheless, it is believed that a basic understanding of the problem has been communicated to our constituency.

Past experience has indicated the critical importance of a substantial expansion of the "research and development" effort assigned to LEAA if it is to play an effective role in dealing with the nation's crime problem. It has shown also the Act's inability to respond to existing needs which require national subsidy support for our crime-fighting institutions. Both of these problems have been incorporated in plans for the future and are embodied in legislation now pending before the Congress--the proposed Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. Under this legislation, the experimental work of LEAA would be continued, expanded, and combined with a companion program for grant-in-aid support reaching into all states and localities willing to join with the federal government in increasing local investment and commitment to law enforcement and criminal justice activities. An initial appropriation of $50 million has been requested for this program, approximately $20 million of which will be allocated to essentially LEAA-type activities. Substantial and rapid growth beyond this is contemplated in the years ahead. With the experience of the past 18 months behind it, and the comprehensive and concrete range of improvement recommendations formulated by the President's Crime Commission to draw upon, the Department is hopeful that this expanded dimension in the war on crime will signal a new era of effective response and remedial action.

In conclusion, the Department believes that a good start has been made to meet the intent of Congress and the Administration in establishing a law enforcement assistance program. It is prepared to continue to prosecute the work of the past 18 months and to do so on whatever level the Congress may deem appropriate. It is hoped that such efforts will demonstrate, in increasing degree, tangible accomplishments and measurable victories in the ultimate goal of our labors--reduction and neutralization of crime and increased safety for the American public.

FISCAL 1966 PROJECT LISTS

(December 1, 1965 to June 30, 1966)

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
OFFICE OF LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE

LIST OF APPROVED PROJECTS

FISCAL YEAR 1966

First-Year Grant and Contract Awards Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 (PL 89-197)

The following pages contain a complete list of projects approved under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 ("LEAA") during the first year of program operation (fiscal 1966). These include a short list indicating only recipient and amount and a more comprehensive list organized under the following headings:

I. Law Enforcement - Training Projects
II. Law Enforcement - Agency Improvement
III. Corrections Projects
IV. Criminal Justice Projects
V. General Studies and Surveys
VI. D. C. Comprehensive Program
VII. Special LEAA Programs

This grouping is based on the main substantive areas of program coverage--law enforcement (police), criminal justice, and corrections, with a special section relating to general studies and projects spanning more than one substantive area. Because of a special program effort focusing on a comprehensive range of experimental programs in one area--the District of Columbia--all D.C. projects have been grouped together although they individually relate to and could have been listed under the various substantive headings. Grants awarded under three special LEAA programs have also been grouped separately although classifiable under appropriate substantive headings.

Each project listing contains the name and location of the award recipient, the type of assistance award (grant or contract), the amount of the award (to nearest $100), date of approval (by month) and a short project description. By footnote contained on the first page of each section listing, cross-references to related projects listed elsewhere or other relevant classifications have been provided.

A total of 83 LEAA projects were approved in fiscal 1966 aggregating $6,957,911 in assistance awards and involving obligation of virtually all funds authorized for that purpose. These awards went to grantees or contractors located in 30 different states. The average duration of grant awards was 14 months and the average award amount, exclusive of the special D.C. projects and a comprehensive science-technology survey contracted through the Department of Defense, was $71,500 ($83,830 with all projects included).

Briefly, the Law Enforcement Assistance Act authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to, or contract with, public or private non-profit agencies to improve training of personnel, advance the capabilities of law enforcement bodies, and assist in the prevention and control of crime. The Act also authorizes the Attorney General to conduct studies, render technical assistance, evaluate the effectiveness of programs undertaken, and disseminate knowledge gained as a result of such projects. Police, courts, corrections, and other mechanisms for the prevention and control of crime are all within its scope.

The LEAA legislation was conceived as part of a larger and comprehensive program to increase federal participation in the nation's efforts to cope with the rising incidence of crime. Described by the President as a "creative federal partnership," it has involved the establishment of two Presidential commissions, intensification of federal law enforcement programs, development of a variety of crime-control legislative proposals, six-fold expansion of FBI training facilities for local law enforcement, and the establishment of bold and significant correctional programs. Within the context of this larger program, and its strategy of unified, collaborative action, LEAA was designed to make a many-sided contribution, but one largely centering on direct help to state and local law enforcement agencies.

The Act was passed in September of 1965 with authorization for a first-year appropriation of up to $10,000,000. The President signed the law on September 22. Late in October there was approved an appropriation of $7,249,000 which became available for obligation on November 1, 1965.

Evaluation of first-year assistance project has centered on the "experimental - new methods" support role conceived for LEAA by both the Administration and the Congress. Departmental grant criteria, with some departure for special program efforts and flexibility appropriate to different substantive areas, have emphasized (i) new techniques and approaches, (ii) an action orientation, (iii) value to the nation as a whole, (iv) relatively short duration, (v) modest fund requests, (vi) a substantial grantee contribution, (vii) program balance in relation to the total LEAA effort, (viii) a potential for continuation after grant support ends, (ix) broad community sponsorship, and (x) some plan for objective evaluation of results.

APPENDIX 2

FISCAL 1967 PROJECT LISTS

(July 1, 1966 to April 1, 1967)

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
OFFICE OF LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE

LIST OF APPROVED PROJECTS

Fiscal Year 1967 (to 4/1/67)

Second-Year Grant and Contract Awards Under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act of 1965 (PL 89-197)

The following pages contain a complete list of projects approved to date under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act ("LEAA") during the current year of program operation (fiscal 1967) through April 1, 1967. These include a short list indicating only recipient and amount and a more comprehensive list organized under the following headings:

I. Law Enforcement Projects - Training
II. Law Enforcement Projects - Operations Improvement
III. Corrections Projects
IV. Criminal Justice Projects
V. General Studies and Surveys
VI. Special LEAA Programs
   (a) state planning committees in criminal administration
   (b) police science degree program development grants
   (c) police-community relations planning and development grants for metropolitan agencies
   (d) state law enforcement standards and training system grants
   (e) state-wide in-service correctional training system grants

This grouping is based on the main substantive areas of program coverage--law enforcement (police), criminal justice, and corrections, with a special section relating to general studies and projects spanning more than one substantive area. Grants awarded under five special LEAA programs have also been grouped separately although classifiable under appropriate substantive headings.

Each project listing contains the name and location of the award recipient, the type of assistance award (grant or contract), the amount of the award, length of project, date of approval (by month) and a short project description.

A total of 111 new LEAA projects were approved in fiscal 1967 to date, aggregating $4,277,532 in assistance awards. In addition, $499,061 has been allocated for supplemental grant awards and dissemination and technical assistance projects under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act (see last portion of short list).

Combined with first-year (fiscal 1966) awards, this makes a grand total of project support under the Act in the amount of $11,734,504 and covering 194 separate projects. These awards have gone to grantees or contractors located in 47 different states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. The average duration of grant awards has been 12+ months and the average award amount for all projects, including a $.5 million science and technology survey and a $.4 million national crime information center test project is $61,117.

Briefly, the Law Enforcement Assistance Act authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to or contract with public or private non-profit agencies to improve training of personnel, advance the capabilities of law enforcement bodies, and assist in the prevention and control of crime. The Act also authorizes the Attorney General to conduct studies, render technical assistance, evaluate the effectiveness of programs undertaken, and disseminate knowledge gained as a result of such projects. Police, courts, corrections, and other mechanisms for the prevention and control of crime are all within its scope.

TOTAL NEW PROJECT AWARDS APPROVED TO DATE IN FISCAL 1967: $4,371,911

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, could there also be included any complaints from the State and local areas that have experienced a termination of funds?

Attorney General CLARK. There have been no actual terminations of any funds authorized.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, if any complaints concerning the administration of the act have been made, I would be interested in seeing them. My own impression is that this has been one of the best administered grant programs in the Government.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, that would not reach the point this Senator was bringing out because title III and the Law Enforcement Act does not involve operations. That is for research and development.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator HRUSKA. In the area dealing with the control and supervision, the language from section 204(a)(2) refers to improvement and coordination of all aspects of law enforcement and criminal justice.

That gets back to the source of the police chief's authority. He must go to the State statute to see if he has authority. Then when he gets to the matter of making application to you, he also has to include the court system and the prosecutor's system.

I wonder if the State government would not be very, very sensitive about having somebody coming in and requesting to rearrange what the State has set out to enforce the law within its boundaries.

Attorney General CLARK. Section 204(a)(2) requires a plan to contain a comprehensive outline of priorities for the improvement and coordination of all aspects of law enforcement and criminal justice dealt with in the plan.

In other words, obviously, we want a comprehensive statement of everything that is dealt with in the plan. There is, however, no requirement that all law enforcement and criminal justice agencies be dealt with in the plan. We also want them to coordinate however. And I think this is more in line with what you are addressing yourself to. We do want them to coordinate their plan with other plans and other functions not covered by main plan, but related to it.

Senator HRUSKA. A sheriff would be impudent to tell a county judge how to run his department, or a county attorney of the county how to run his department, or the city police how to run their department in his county.

In trying to get cooperation and coordination, maybe the chief of police would state to the sheriff, "You go and peddle your papers and I will peddle my papers." Mind, that is not any fancy. We have things like that facing our community in my home State and in other fields that have required the necessity of going beyond the State board. Because we are on the Missouri River and take in some of Iowa we get into matters of discipline and higher relations. That is why I questioned what this means, all aspects.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would the Senator yield at this point?

Senator HRUSKA. Surely.

Senator MCCLELLAN. This is off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Senator McCLELLAN. We will stand in recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon at 12:30 p.m., a recess was taken until 2 p.m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Present: Senators McClellan (presiding), Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hruska, and Thurmond.)

Senator McCLELLAN. We will resume.

Mr. Attorney General, section 202(a)(2) provides that not more than one-third of any grant should be expended for compensation of personnel. Does that mean that not more than one-third of any grant can be used to increase the salaries of policemen or law enforcement officials?

Attorney General CLARK. The one-third limitation applies to either increasing the salary of personnel or adding personnel for whom you pay additional salaries—with the exceptions that are stated.

Senator McCLELLAN. Certainly none of this money is to be used to pay present salaries?

Attorney General CLARK. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are not going in and pick up the tab for present expenses, since grant funds can be used only to improve—therefore, it can go for an increase in salary.

Attorney General CLARK. It can go to an increase in salary for personnel presently employed or it could go for additional personnel.

Senator McCLELLAN. But it could not be used to pay part of a salary without an increase.

Attorney General CLARK. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. The purpose of that is to enable municipalities, and so forth, to increase their police forces?

Attorney General CLARK. No. The purpose of the limitation is to direct most of the Federal money to research, to training, to equipment, to things that police forces are not as likely to do for themselves.

Senator McCLELLAN. But this is set apart here for salaries, is it not?

Attorney General CLARK. It is a limitation. It says that not more than one-third of the Federal grant can be used for salaries, which would involve increases in present salaries or additional personnel salaries, with the exceptions of training and personnel performing innovative functions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Training expense is not included in this item, is it?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. It is excepted.

Senator McCLELLAN. Training and education come under another category.

Attorney General CLARK. This limitation applies to all of the grants under 204, under title II, but there is an exception to it; the limitation does not apply to compensation for personnel for time engaged in conducting or undergoing training programs. Lines 1 through 4 on page 5.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, while they are undergoing training, going to school or taking special courses, you could pay more of their salary?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. The one-third limitation would not apply?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, a municipality may say, "We have 45 policemen here, and we want to send them to school." They would be scheduled to take a course of perhaps 6 weeks. You could say, "Well, all right, in addition to the 30 percent we have already allowed you for increased salaries for additional personnel, we will pick up the tab to send these policemen to school."

You could do that?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. The limitation would not prevent you from doing that?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is not a very big restriction, is it?

Attorney General CLARK. When you consider that 90 percent of the average police department budget is for salaries, you can see that it is a fairly significant factor. We thought it was necessary.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, this 30 percent applies only to increased expenditures, not expenditures that are normal, not——

Attorney General CLARK. There would be no Federal funds available for present salaries.

Senator McCLELLAN. Can you explain just how the requirements of section 202(a) will operate. May these requirements under subsection 202(d) be completely and entirely waived by the Attorney General? I think we pretty well covered how they will operate under 202(a). But under section 202(d), can those requirements be completely waived by the Attorney General?

Attorney General CLARK. Section 202(d) in its proviso beginning on line 10 of page 6, provides the flexibility that Senator Hruska was inquiring about earlier. It says that if the Attorney General is of the opinion that the requirements of this section constitute an unreasonable restriction on an applicant's eligibility, that the requirements may be reduced where there had been substantial and extraordinary amounts expended in the base period.

The reasons for that are that a police department may have made a very, very substantial increase in the base year. We see this, from time to time, where a police department will increase its expenditures 30 percent in 1 year.

Now, if they happen to increase 30 percent in the base year 1967, it could be much more difficult for them to add 5 percent over that to qualify for a grant in 1968 in comparison with the city that had made no increase in 1967.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, are we going to average it out? If this year the city, the entity, agency of government, spends 10 percent, next year it could spend less and then come within the 5-percent requirements.

Attorney General CLARK. No. It probably would not be averaged. I think you would have to look at each one on its merits. I think most——

Senator McCLELLAN. Then I say the discretion would be with you and it could be averaged out.

Attorney General CLARK. The discretion is in the Attorney General, and it could be, in effect, averaged.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, a police department may increase its expenditures, say, this year, by 10 or 15 percent in order to get the additional personnel it needs, and next year it maybe could not increase 5 percent over that 15 percent of this year. So, under those circumstances, it is within your discretion, to say "Very well, since you have done so much already this year, we will not expect you to expend 5 percent more than you did last year."

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. Under the language of the bill as presently written, it applies—the exception applies only to the first year, to the period over the base year. So 2 or 3 years down the road, you would not have that flexibility.

Senator MCCLELLAN. It only applies to the first year.

Attorney General CLARK. That is my recollection. I am trying to read that now. I believe that is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am not sure that I understand what this first part of section (d) means. It is not clear to me.

Attorney General CLARK. The part beginning on line 6?

Senator MCCLELLAN. Yes.

Attorney General CLARK. That provides you determine the base expenditure. It provides that the base expenditure represents the operating expenses for the last fiscal year completed before January 1, 1968.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That means that it would be the amount they expended in fiscal year 1967.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right, it is the fiscal year——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Fiscal 1968; we are in the fiscal 1967 year now.

Attorney General CLARK. We are in the Federal fiscal year. But this refers to their fiscal year which is not necessarily the same as the Federal.

Senator MCCLELLAN. This refers to their fiscal year, not the Federal?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir. So it would be their fiscal year that ends before January 1, 1968, and the theory was——

Senator MCCLELLAN. The fiscal year that ends before January 1, 1968?

Attorney General CLARK. That is right. That will be a budget that will be unaffected by this bill because the budget was prepared in a period before this bill was introduced in the Congress so they would not——

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, they have a year in contemplation of this bill, to increase their budget or make plans. If they do not want to increase their budget the base will be lower. It would seem to me that would discourage them from increasing their budget this year because if they are going to use that as the base, they will say, "There is no use in getting the base any higher."

Attorney General CLARK. The base is fixed. The base was fixed in their budgets and was determined before this bill was submitted to the Congress. The year in question would have to end by December 31, 1967, which means it had to begin on or before January 1, 1967. The bill was not introduced until about March 8.

Senator McCLELLAN. What does this January 1, 1968, mean?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it means that is the last date before which their fiscal year—their 12-month period must have been completed. So that means the budget was probably approved 18 months before that date.

Senator McCLELLAN. It may need some clarification.

Section 202 restricts expenditures of grant money for salaries to one-third. If, as you are quoted, I believe, 85 to 95 percent of law enforcement budgets are now for personnel, and I believe that is what you stated here today, is not this restriction unrealistic?

Attorney General CLARK. No; I think not for several reasons. First, it is only 30 percent, 33 percent of the Federal funds. It does not apply to the local funds that will be added as an increment to the preceding year's budget.

Second, it is our experience and judgment that we need to encourage police departments more in areas other than in salaries. If 100 percent were available for salaries, some police departments might come in with nothing but a request for police salary increases, and that would not accomplish what we need to do with this act.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, it does not only apply to salary increases, but it also applies to increasing personnel. I think many police departments are absolutely understaffed today.

Attorney General CLARK. I think that is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think one of the reasons why they are understaffed is because the low pay is not a very attractive incentive. So if we want to strengthen the police departments, is this not an area where very substantial aid is needed?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes; I think it is. But I do not think it is an exclusive need, and it is our judgment that one-third of the Federal funds for more police or better pay for police provides an adequate balance between the need for better pay and the need for the Federal money to go into the other purposes that have been described.

Senator McCLELLAN. What are the other restrictions or limitations for other purposes? Are any other spelled out in the bill?

Attorney General CLARK. There are several others. There is one that we have discussed on physical facilities.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is it 33⅓ or 30 percent? One-third. This 33⅓, now of all the money that is planned to be received, what are the limitations percentagewise on the other items in the plan?

Attorney General CLARK. There are—I do not think of any other percentage limitations except in the area of—well, the three percentage limitations on the Federal contribution are the 90 percent on planning, the 60 percent on actions, and the 50 percent on construction. These do not pertain to a proportion of the Federal grant, however. They are the amount of the Federal share in proportion to the contribution by the State.

I think another way of putting the significance of the one-third limitation might be this: Suppose that the police department had first made its 5-percent increase, and then it wants to go 5 percent above that, and a Federal matching grant of 50 percent is authorized. That means that the city has put up the first 5-percent increase in order to qualify. It then puts up 2 percent as its match for the 3 percent that the Federal Government puts up. The applicant, however, can only spend one-third of the Federal contribution of 3 percent or 1 percent for salaries. So that means in those circumstances that potentially 8 percent of the 10-percent increase may go for salaries; only 2 percent of this 10 percent is restricted. In other words, 80 percent of the increase can be spent on salaries. This figure almost receives the 90-percent average proportion of law enforcement budget which goes for salaries.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you foresee the approval of plans that embrace only an increase of personnel and salaries for personnel—a simple plan from a municipality saying, "We need 25 more policemen, and we need to increase their salaries." Would a plan like that get approval? Would it be eligible?

Attorney General CLARK. I doubt that it would.

Senator McCLELLAN. Why? That may be their greatest need.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it would almost have to be their only need before that would be sufficiently comprehensive in its outlook.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, we have to keep this in mind, too. We can spend any amount of money for this or anything else, but we do know that there are times when appropriations are not up to the level of budget requests, and it may very well be that you will not have funds at all times to accommodate completely every plan that may be submitted.

If a community decides in applying for a grant, "We have got to have more policemen; our policemen are underpaid; we have got to offer an incentive to get recruits for the police force"; if that is the greatest need of the community, and they submit a plan for that, then do I understand you to say that the plan would not be approved because it did not include a lot of other things that you think they might need.

Attorney General CLARK. I think it unlikely that a police department, with all of its budgetary items and needs, will come in with a plan that has no increase for any purpose except salaries.

Senator McCLELLAN. I do not say just salaries. I said increasing the number of personnel, number of policemen. Two things.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, that is more salaries rather than more salary. It is still for salaries, and nothing else, and I would doubt, while it is theoretically possible that a police department would have really surveyed its needs very carefully if that is all it came in with.

Senator McCLELLAN. When they come in asking for equipment, they can hope for approval in that field, can they not?

Attorney General CLARK. Certainly.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think there might be instances where they will make application for a lot of equipment that perhaps they could get along without; and instances where they need personnel more so than they need the new equipment. These are going to be matters that are going to present problems to you from time to time.

I see Senator Hruska has returned. He had not quite finished, and Senator Thurmond did not get a chance this morning to ask any questions. I am going to defer again at this point and let you finish, Senator Hruska, and then let Senator Thurmond have an opportunity.

Senator HRUSKA. I shall not take too long because I want to be sure we cover questions from the Senator from South Carolina.

We were discussing at one juncture this morning the $20 million for title III. Inasmuch as you have pending applications, and there are some current projects, and because this bill ties into and will take over the activities of the present LEA activities, there is every reason to suppose there will be no loss of momentum in that field. Title III is ready to go and it will continue its stride, will it not?

Attorney General CLARK. That is exactly right. In fact, I think we can step it up with this reauthorization.

Senator HRUSKA. Step it up.

Attorney General CLARK. With an authorization.

Senator HRUSKA. On the basis of your experience with the type of application, then, you will be able to accelerate your program approvals.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator HRUSKA. That would sound reasonable, would it not? Are you providing a summary of the backlog among other data?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir. We have these books here now.

Senator HRUSKA. Would you supply the information for the record?

Mr. Attorney General, during the discussion of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act in the Senate, I called for the application of science and technology to the problems of the criminal justice system. This is reflected in an exchange of letters between the Attorney General and myself, and they appear in the committee report on that LEA Act, with some remarks I made on the floor. Both of them called for a broad-scale scientific study into the root causes of crime.

What progress has been achieved in bringing an application of technology to the crime problems in line with the concept advanced at that time?

Attorney General CLARK. I think we have made some substantial progress, both through the Crime Commission studies and the Law Enforcement Assistance Act grants. There have been a variety of grants that have gone to science and technology and its applications to law enforcement. I think we can see high potential from these in a variety of areas. They include such things as use of different types of vehicular equipment, and employment of vehicular equipment, computerization and communications.

Senator HRUSKA. The chapter on science and technology in the President's Crime Commission's report expands somewhat on this very same idea. But as far as I know, they did not conduct a study or go into depth on the matter.

Could we expect such a study to be undertaken under this new arrangement with this new agency that is being formed?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there has been considerable study to date, and when the volume on science and technology that accompanies the basic report of the President's Crime Commission comes out, that will be available in full. These involve both their staff study and related studies plus LEA studies that were complementary to their mission.

In addition, we would expect to support expanded studies of this type in the future.

Senator HRUSKA. It is such material that could be used as a basis or partial basis for new or additional grants? Would that not follow?

Attorney General CLARK. That would be our great hope, yes.

Senator HRUSKA. The assistance under title II is in the form of grants only. Have you given any consideration to loans, long-term low interest loans, as an additional means of assistance and especially where capital improvements are involved?

Attorney General CLARK. We have studied it some. Our feeling was that at this time we want to move forward as fast as we can. We did not want to involve techniques that would inhibit expansion of effort, that we did not want to emphasize facility improvement or capital construction because of the time that it takes, and the great expense that it involves and, therefore, we have not included any loan techniques in the present bill.

Senator HRUSKA. It would not necessarily require emphasis, but it seems that with a complete grant, the process of weaning away the hopeful expectation that one of these days we can get away from this kind of a program and put the localities and the communities on their own.

It is just that much further removed where there is a complete grant rather than at least some loans in some categories.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the grant in the facilities area would be limited to 50 percent. In the program action area it would be limited to 60 percent, and to cause local jurisdictions to plan now to repay those later would probably inhibit their own expansion at this time, that we feel is so desirable.

Senator HRUSKA. In section 203, would there be contemplated the idea of correctional institutions, that would serve a regional purpose rather than just a particular political subdivision such as a city or a county?

Attorney General CLARK. Probably not, because the key language here in determining eligibility begins on line 20 where it refers to facilities which fulfill a significant innovative functon. It is not the purpose of 203 to supply funds to build a new jailhouse in every county or a new prison in every State. The only thing that will be financed here are facilities that fulfill significant innovative functions.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, in many parts of the Nation there are relatively small counties, sometimes there are compact cities, and there are many of them within a given area. Few of them can finance or support a decent correctional institution. I am not referring to a jail in the sense of being purely custodial in nature, but a modern type of correctional institution wherein there would be educational facilities, corrective facilities, and places for diagnosis and so on. The concept being to have on such regional institution built to serve the area and, therefore, be able to have something that is much more constructive, efficient, and effective.

Would this be an innovation?

Attorney General CLARK. If it were conventional except for its service areas it would probably not be considered to fulfill a significant innovative function. It is not that we do not recognize the great importance of the type of facility that you are talking about, because they are terribly important. It is because the purpose of this bill is not to engage in a broad construction program for corrections across the country. It is not to provide new prisons, new jails for all of the jurisdictions of the United States.

We hope that the States will tend to predominate in the corrections field because that is where the greater flexibility and capacity really is.

But the funds here are not designed to build these institutions for all the States. The concept of the facilities grants here is that they must be really significantly innovative and new types of facilities or an addition to a facility or reworking an old facility or remodeling something in a way that is really significant and new.

Senator HRUSKA. Could you give us an example of what an innovative building would be within that description you have just given?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there are several that we might think of. It could be that as we try to consolidate our police management that we need some new concept for precinct offices that keep police close to the people so they identify with them and people know them. So it may be there is a new type of police substation that is not the type that we were building in 1910; that does not disperse your management and make inefficient your police but keeps them close to the people where they may be called——

Senator HRUSKA. That is not new. Hasn't the precinct police house or police station been with us for 75 years? Is that something new?

Attorney General CLARK. I would say we have had them a lot longer than that. But the type I was describing might be new.

You know, there is nothing new under the sun if we want to look at it in the broadest sense, but there are new types and new techniques of housing police or temporarily quartering them or having places for their vehicles in precincts.

It does not mean you have to have a chief of police out there or a precinct captain; what I have in mind would bring more efficient management and better deployment of personnel. At the same time you would have a precinct identification or an area identification facility that will be helpful to you.

In corrections it might involve a YMCA willing to devote one wing of a floor to a work-release program. This might involve an innovative remodeling of that wing so that you could have guards to police, and you could have security features in the windows and things like that. That part of that facility could then be used in connection with a corrections program.

But that is the type of innovative technique that we are thinking about, rather than just a broad construction program, a new city hall, a new police station, a new jail.

Senator HRUSKA. Whatever it is that you will build, I presume you will develop architectural and technical standards much like Hill-Burton does in hospitals and FHA does in its sphere of influence. Wouldn't you have to develop those?

Attorney General CLARK. I would think we would; yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Title III is silent as to patent rights flowing from research grants. What is the policy of the Department of Justice in regard to patents until we get a solid U.S. patent policy in that field such as that which we passed last year in the Senate?

Attorney General CLARK. We would intend to follow here the policy that has been adopted by the executive branch generally at this time.

Senator HRUSKA. I would like to know what that is. They have a lot of policies.

Attorney General CLARK. Basically we would try to reserve rights to the patents to the public that has paid for them where that seems feasible. There would be an option, however, in the administration of the program.

Senator HRUSKA. One of our big troubles is the many departments in the executive department, many agencies, and most of them have different ideas on the subject. That is why we are trying to legislate. I hope we will be successful.

If the Government puts some money into a research effort, and therefore, it automatically becomes the Government's patent, we might get into a field of controversy on that for many good and sound reasons.

What is the nature and the size of the organization which the Director of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice Assistance will command?

Attorney General CLARK. We would seek about 120 positions for fiscal 1968, and this would include the positions that we presently have for law enforcement assistance. It would include an implementation of that staff for title III.

Senator HRUSKA. How many are in the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance now?

Attorney General CLARK. There are 20 in that.

Senator HRUSKA. Twenty.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir; 25, I believe.

It would include them the new section set up primarily for planning, and the beginning of the force for title II.

Senator HRUSKA. What would be the balance? When we get into the $300 million level of expenditure, what can you envision by way of a staff?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it is awfully hard to estimate at this time. I think we will know a lot more about that when we come back to the Congress for appropriations at the beginning of the next session. I assume that there would have to be a further substantial increase.

I think it is terribly important that we have a staff adequate to be efficient and effective in the administration of the act, and we want enough this year to give us a basis for full action under title I and at least a skeletal force for title II so we can move forward effectively there in the following fiscal year.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the Director have the status of an Assistant Attorney General?

Attorney General CLARK. The bill provides that he would be level 4 which is the same level as an Assistant Attorney General.

Senator HRUSKA. Is there some special reason for calling him Director instead of an Assistant Attorney General? Is that a counterpart of Mr. Hoover as FBI Director?

Attorney General CLARK. It is a distinction that we have historically made in the Department between the law services and the services that involve other than law. In immigration, in prisons, in corrections, in community relations service, in investigation, we have called the various heads of those departments or agencies directors.

Senator HRUSKA. They are professional in the traditional style, is that the idea?

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct. The Assistant Attorneys General have been legal officers—the head of the Civil Division, the head of the Criminal Division, the head of the Office of Legal Counsel.

Senator HRUSKA. In section 405(b), at the top of page 13, the Attorney General is authorized to collect, evaluate, publish, and disseminate statistics and other information on the condition and progress of law enforcement and criminal justice in the several States.

Isn't that what we now have in the FBI uniform crime reports?

Attorney General CLARK. Only partially. This is much more comprehensive in what it would permit. This is what we have in the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, and it is terribly important because one of the major problems in law enforcement is being sure that all the jurisdictions have the opportunity to know the experience of others and have the best information that is available.

Senator HRUSKA. I do not quarrel with the necessity for it. I just wondered as to its place here, because I thought that was being done by the FBI under direction of the Attorney General. Is that the way it is handled now, insofar as the uniform reports are concerned?

Attorney General CLARK. Oh, yes. This would not contemplate any change in those any more than the Law Enforcement Assistance Act did. There are many statistics that are not included in those. There is much collection, evaluation, and publication that goes beyond the uniform crime reports.

Senator HRUSKA. Do the Uniform Crime Reports include Federal offenses?

Attorney General CLARK. They are the reports from the local jurisdictions to the FBI.

Senator HRUSKA. They do not include the Federal jurisdiction of crimes or offenses.

Attorney General CLARK. That is correct.

Senator HRUSKA. There has been some discussion as to whether or not we should get into this area. I would presume that would be one of the facets that would be open to you under this bill, am I correct?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

We have a fairly highly developed statistical accounting for the Federal crimes, because that is what we are living with and dealing with. So we are generally quite familiar with those.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, we have about 26 Federal investigative agencies, and the FBI is only one of them, so we have a long ways to go.

Attorney General CLARK. The FBI is about—they have about 6,600 agents. There are about 23,000 investigative agents in the Federal Establishment. I think there is a great value in the—not necessarily arguing for the precise allocation of authority that we have now, but I think there is great value in the dispersal of investigative responsibility that we have. I do not think it would be compatible with our principles of government to have only one investigative agency for the whole Federal Government. I also think that there is very considerable efficiency in an agency with the responsibility for enforcing a particular law to have its own investigative resources.

Senator HRUSKA. Of course, a consolidated report would be very helpful, would it not?

Attorney General CLARK. We need to know at all times what is happening.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, those are all the questions I have now. I have some others that are of a minor nature, but I would like to defer to whoever else wants to ask questions.

I should like to observe at this point that the Attorney General has been testifying enough that he can recognize a devil's advocate when he sees him now and then. In part my questions were in that role, Mr. Chairman.

Some of the questions I asked were in line with suggestions that have been made to me, and others I invented and contrived myself. But it is with that spirit and with that thought of bringing out the good and the bad that I have been interrogating you, and I hope you will understand the spirit in which I have done it.

Attorney General CLARK. Absolutely, very penetrating, and I appreciate it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Thurmond.

Senator THURMOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, as I understand it, the grants that would be made under this bill if it became law would not be according to a formula necessarily, but each application would be passed upon by the Attorney General's Office, and approved or disapproved or amended, as the case may be.

Attorney General CLARK. I think that is basically correct. There is a formula and planning requirement for title II grants but we would have to pass upon them. Title I grants for planning and title III grants are more specific-item type of grants.

Senator THURMOND. Well, if you have to build up a tremendous staff, how many more people do you plan to add to administer this law?

Attorney General CLARK. We would seek approximately 120 positions for fiscal 1968.

Senator THURMOND. What would be the objection, if the Federal Government wishes to help in this field, to providing the Federal funds to the Governors of the States and letting them do this job?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think it would lose the great opportunity that we have now to really improve the quality of criminal justice and law enforcement because we have professional people involved in direct contact with each other, and we have the experience of the Crime Commission study; we have the experience of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

The Governors have not been involved in this field generally. A great many of them even today still have no commission or planning group looking at the problem. There would be loss of time and delay, and I also feel that there is more to the Federal function than collection of taxes, that there is responsibility to see that the funds collected are expended wisely for purposes determined by Federal elected officials.

Senator THURMOND. What is it that the Federal Government can do that the States cannot do if they have the funds? For instance, if you wanted to provide training, the FBI can provide instructors to train law enforcement officers; that is one thing that is being done now, I believe.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right. Thousands of them.

Senator THURMOND. When I was Governor of South Carolina, I remember we sent a number of officers of the State to take those courses, which were good courses.

Attorney General CLARK. But it is not on a national——

Senator THURMOND. What is it that the Federal Government can do that the States cannot do? Section 408 states, "Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over any police force or other agency of any State or local enforcement and criminal justice system."

I believe you stated that it was not the intent of the Justice Department to exercise any control over the police force of any State; is that correct?

Attorney General CLARK. Or city, that is correct.

Senator THURMOND. That is correct, is it not?

Well, what can the Federal Government do that the States cannot do if they had the money?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the States have done very little, by and large, and have shown, you know, no general activist interest in this area. On the other hand, the Federal Government has been in liaison, in communications and coordinated effort with local law enforcement for years and years. There is a Federal responsibility in determining how Federal funds should be expended, and that should be done through Federal administration.

There is the experience of the Crime Commission reports. There is the experience of the 49 other States that would not be as available to the Governor of a single State, if there is no one there to help correlate and bring it together.

Senator THURMOND. Well, the FBI does that now, does it not?

Attorney General CLARK. Only to a very limited extent.

Senator THURMOND. I used to get reports when I was Governor, FBI reports, which gave information which was very helpful. Have we discontinued that?

Attorney General CLARK. I do not know what type of reports that you are referring to. There are many types of reports that the FBI compiles. They have a monthly magazine, but they also engage in thousands of training programs in localities throughout the country each year. But they do not have a grant program. They do not administer funds. They do not involve themselves in but a tiny fraction of the things that this bill contemplates.

Senator THURMOND. The Federal Government could offer training—after all, the training of these law enforcement officers is very important, is it not? That is one of the keys to this situation, is it not?

Attorney General CLARK. Standards and training of law enforcement officers are of the highest importance.

Senator THURMOND. Highest importance.

And if the Federal Government wishes to provide the training, that would take care of that, would it not? You are doing that now to a certain extent, but you could do it on a broader scale, could you not?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the training is much more complex than that. Major police departments should have their own training programs. A State should provide training programs for jurisdictions not large enough to take care of their own.

There should be, for continuing educational and improvement purposes, police science and training programs in colleges in every State in the country, but half of the States still do not have them.

This is the type of thing this bill would seek to do.

Senator THURMOND. Well, is there any reason why the States cannot provide these courses in colleges——

Attorney General CLARK. Well, they have not.

Senator THURMOND (continuing). If they have the funds to do it? What does the Federal Government intend to do that the States are not doing in this field? That is what I am trying to get at.

The FBI is now helping to train and some colleges offer law enforcement courses now, and you intend to expand that, do you not?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes; we have already assisted about 20 colleges in 15 States that have never given courses in this field before.

Senator THURMOND. And you propose to provide Federal aid to assist in the cost of those courses. But what would you do otherwise? Can they not get information from you to set up those courses in the colleges? Should your duties just be offering advice and training to the State?

You cannot control them, you cannot supervise them, you cannot direct them; you admit that here.

Attorney General CLARK. That would be inconsistent with our principles. We would not want to.

I also do not think we are the big training offices for all State and local law enforcement. I do not think that is the function of the Federal Government.

We want to encourage broader based training than that. We want every police department to have high quality training built into its regular program so they do not have to come to Washington or some Federal center or other places for it, but it has to be a comprehensive approach.

Senator THURMOND. Could not the Federal Government hold some training courses in each State, or in each region?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, we do now.

Senator THURMOND. You bring in certain officers and train them and let them go back and train others.

Attorney General CLARK. We do now, but it is not nearly enough. The FBI holds training sessions in every State in the Union every month.

Senator THURMOND. Under this bill the Attorney General would have the power to withhold funds if he saw fit, would he not?

Attorney General CLARK. Withhold Federal funds if the——

Senator THURMOND. If certain conditions are not met?

Attorney General CLARK. An application for a grant might not be approved. There is also under certain limited conditions the power to terminate a grant under section 411.

Senator THURMOND. Are you not going to develop here the same tensions and the same pressures and irritations that now are going on between HEW and the States? You know the tensions now existing between HEW and the States, do you not?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. This——

Senator THURMOND. Of course I am speaking of the guidelines that were set up which went further than any Supreme Court decision, which went further than the civil rights law itself, and which is causing so much trouble now.

78-433 O—67——32

Is this not injecting the Federal Government into a new field of activity and can you not foresee that eventually this will end up with Federal control of law enforcement even though you say in the bill that you do not have the right to supervise, control, or direct?

That is standard phraseology in the other laws, but they are exerting Federal control anyway. HEW is doing it.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, that would be for someone else to decide. But I do not think that that is a problem here at all. We have not heard that complaint from anyone in local law enforcement. We are involved in a mutual and cooperative venture, and, as far as I know, the relationships have been of the highest order. I do not know of any friction that exists. I do not anticipate any will arise, and I think the analogy to school desegregation is really not pertinent.

Senator THURMOND. It is not school desegregation. It is the matter of withholding funds after the applicant complies with the law and the decisions, but through their arbitrary manner in which they administer those funds the agency withholds them because they claim the applicant does not meet certain guidelines which go beyond the law and the Supreme Court decisions. While you are Attorney General it might be a different situation. But suppose you get an Attorney General who will be arbitrary, like the man administering the school funds is now proving to be arbitrary. Can you not foresee where there will be great tensions here between the Federal Government and the States, and it will be a seesaw as to whether they are going to get funds or not?

The Federal Government—or the administering agency—might determine that a department did not have enough policemen of a certain race or enough people for some other reason. Can you not foresee all kinds of problems that will arise in the law enforcement field just like they are now arising and are existing today in the fields of education and the health?

Attorney General CLARK. I can see problems arising in any activity of man. I can see them arise if the State tried to take over local law enforcement or tried to direct it.

I think we have to have confidence in the public officials, and if there is a Federal responsibility and a Federal function, we have to go forward and assume that the law will be complied with.

I really think the risk in this area is minimal.

Senator THURMOND. There is no question about the fact that we have more crime today than we have ever had and steps should be taken to remedy this situation. I am wholeheartedly with you on that, and I commend you for your interest and your zeal. I want to work with you all I can, and if this bill could be amended in certain particulars, then maybe I could support it. But I get very concerned when I see more and more power being given to Washington to go into new fields of activity. Whenever there are funds involved I have seen the experience of withholding these funds and threats to withhold them.

We have had it in my State over and over again in the last few years, withholding funds and threats to withhold funds.

Senator HRUSKA. Will the Senator yield? Is that under title VI of the Civil Rights Act?

Senator THURMOND. Yes.

Senator HRUSKA. Are you speaking of the section which provides that Federal grants must be dispensed in such a way that they will not offend against State standards of discrimination, race, color, or racial origin? Is that the section that the Senator speaks of?

Senator THURMOND. Yes, sir.

Senator HRUSKA. That certainly is an area where there has been a lot of tension. I want to identify it for the record.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Will the Senator yield?

Senator THURMOND. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Since this issue has come up, and I have already asked you privately, I will ask you now, would you have any authority under this bill, with respect to plans involving personnel or police departments generally, to require a planning entity to have a ratio of police personnel according to race corresponding to the racial population of the area covered by the plan?

For example, here is a community where 50 percent of the population is Negro and 50 percent is white. Would you be able to say under this bill, "You have got to have 50 percent of your policemen colored, otherwise you get no money and the plan is no good"?

I am asking you if under the bill you would have that authority? That will bring out the issue one way or the other.

Attorney General CLARK. Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 would apply to expenditures made under this bill when it became law, and any discrimination that was engaged in in connection with the functions covered by this bill would be in violation of that act and subject to its terms.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, if this bill is enacted into law, then——

Attorney General CLARK. Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Senator MCCLELLAN (continuing).——would be applicable, and you could make that requirement.

Attorney General CLARK. We would be——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Just as you have stated.

Attorney General CLARK. We would be required by the law to see to it that funds expended under this act were not used to further discrimination.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is a general statement. I want to know——

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN (continuing). Can you require such a ratio be followed under this act based upon title VI of the Civil Rights Act? Can you say to them, "Your plan is no good with respect to your personnel, your application for funds for salary, for personnel or increasing personnel unless you bring your personnel, your police personnel, up to that standard or ratio as reflected by the community population"?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there are two lines that we ought to pursue on this. One is that if there were discrimination, then title VI would apply, and we would not have discretion. We would have to comply. We would have to comply with title VI.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am sorry, we have to recess a few minutes while we go and answer a rollcall vote, Mr. Attorney General. But when I come back, I would like for you to be able to answer me yes or no. Can you require it?

Attorney General CLARK. Let me think about the question then please, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. All right, review the question. I would like to get a yes or no answer, and settle it.

(Whereupon, a short recess was taken, after which the hearing was resumed.)

Senator MCCLELLAN. While we are waiting for Senator Thurmond, I believe I will have inserted in the record at this point, without objection, the pertinent provisions of title 42, section 2000d, The Public Health and Welfare (Civil Rights Act of 1964). Let it be inserted in the record at this point for the information of people who are interested in this particular statute now that the Attorney General has testified on it.

(The document referred to is as follows:)

EXCERPTS FROM TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, THE PUBLIC HEALTH AND WELFARE (CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964)

CH. 21 FEDERALLY ASSISTED PROGRAMS 42 § 2000d—1

SUBCHAPTER V.—FEDERALLY ASSISTED PROGRAMS

§ 2000d. Prohibition against exclusion from participation in, denial of benefits of, and discrimination under Federally assisted programs on ground of race, color, or national origin.

No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance. Pub. L. 88-352, Title VI, § 601, July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 252.

§ 2000d—1. Federal authority and financial assistance to programs or activities by way of grant, loan, or contract other than contract of insurance or guaranty; rules and regulations; approval by President; compliance with requirements; reports to Congressional committees; effective date of administrative action.

Each Federal department and agency which is empowered to extend Federal financial assistance to any program or activity, by way of grant, loan, or contract other than a contract of insurance or guaranty, is authorized and directed to effectuate the provisions of section 2000d of this title with respect to such program or activity by issuing rules, regulations, or orders of general applicability which shall be consistent with achievement of the objectives of the statute authorizing the financial assistance in connection with which the action is taken. No such rule, regulation, or order shall become effective unless and until approved by the President. Compliance with any requirement adopted pursuant to this section may be effected (1) by the termination of or refusal to grant or to continue assistance under such program or activity to any recipient as to whom there has been an express finding on the record, after opportunity for hearing, of a failure to comply with such requirement, but such termination or refusal shall be limited to the particular political entity, or part thereof, or other recipient as to whom such a finding has been made and, shall be limited in its effect to the particular program, or part thereof, in which such noncompliance has been so found, or (2) by any other means authorized by law: Provided, however, That no such action shall be taken until the department or agency concerned has advised the appropriate person or persons of the failure to comply with the requirement and has determined that compliance cannot be secured by voluntary means. In the case of any action terminating, or refusing to grant or continue, assistance because of failure to comply with a requirement imposed pursuant to this section, the head of the Federal department or agency shall file with the committees of the House and Senate having legislative jurisdiction over the program or activity involved a full written report of the circumstances and the grounds for such action. No such action shall become effective until thirty days have elapsed after the filing of such report. Pub. L. 88-352, Title VI, § 602, July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 252.

§ 2000d–2. Judicial review; Administrative Procedure Act.

Any department or agency action taken pursuant to section 2000d–1 of this title shall be subject to such judicial review as may otherwise be provided by law for similar action taken by such department or agency on other grounds. In the case of action, not otherwise subject to judicial review, terminating or refusing to grant or to continue financial assistance upon a finding of failure to comply with any requirement imposed pursuant to section 2000d–1 of this title, any person aggrieved (including any State or political subdivision thereof and any agency of either) may obtain judicial review of such action in accordance with section 1009 of Title 5, and such action shall not be deemed committed to unreviewable agency discretion within the meaning of that section. Pub.L. 88–352, Title VI, § 603, July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 253.

§ 2000d–3. Construction of provisions not to authorize administrative action with respect to employment practices except where primary objective of Federal financial assistance is to provide employment.

Nothing contained in this subchapter shall be construed to authorize action under this subchapter by any department or agency with respect to any employment practice of any employer, employment agency, or labor organization except where a primary objective of the Federal financial assistance is to provide employment. Pub.L. 88–352, Title VI, § 604, July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 253.

§ 2000d–4. Federal authority and financial assistance to programs or activities by way of contract of insurance or guaranty.

Nothing in this subchapter shall add to or detract from any existing authority with respect to any program or activity under which Federal financial assistance is extended by way of a contract of insurance or guaranty. Pub.L. 88–352, Title VI, § 605, July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 253.

Senator HRUSKA. Mr. Chairman, I have a question. May I ask it at this time?

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may proceed.

Senator HRUSKA. And I would be glad to defer to Senator Thurmond as soon as he returns.

Mr. Attorney General, there are some pending bills in the field of regulating more or less strictly the use of ownership of firearms. I know, of course, that the Department of Justice has its official position. I would like to ask you quite frankly, is it conceivable that the Department of Justice in approving applications and approvals for plans would have authority to say, "We would look upon this plan with much greater favor if your municipality had a certain type of firearm control ordinance"? Would that follow? Would you have that authority? Would there be a likelihood of that happening?

Attorney General CLARK. It is difficult to conjure up all the situations that might arise. The problem seems very remote to me. I think—at least as I understand your question—the type of firearms control that a city or State may have is a local or State political judgment that only they should make.

Senator HRUSKA. I understand that.

Attorney General CLARK. It would not be appropriate at all—it has really never occurred to me—to do that sort of thing under this law.

Senator HRUSKA. Yet we did have an example. I have been told of certain housing code enforcement programs where people on the Federal payroll had been known to go to the municipal governing body and say, "You would fare much better in this area if you had a housing code of a certain kind." I just wonder if it is good taste and if it is something to which exception could be taken. I just wonder if in the future some Attorney General, not quite constituted like you, might send out minions to say to municipalities or to States, "Now, if you had a certain kind of gun law and a certain type of registration law, you would get along a lot better with your police department." Is that conceivable, Mr. Attorney General?

Attorney General CLARK. Anything, of course, is conceivable. I guess constant vigilance is the only protection that we have against such activities. It does not seem likely at all to me. If a person had that inclination, I suppose he would use anything that he had at his command to try to bring his will to bear. But it seems very remote to me, and it does not seem related to this bill.

Now, it may be there could be particular types of applications that would relate to firearms themselves which would raise questions about the appropriateness of a Federal grant—even that seems very remote and unlikely.

Senator HRUSKA. Could it be an element in one of these master plans? You have a master plan involving all aspects of law enforcement and criminal administration, and the Department of Justice has declared itself very, very strongly in this field of gun control legislation.

Could it be conceivable that in a master plan coming from a State or from an area or a region, interjection of that kind of condition might enter into the thing?

Attorney General CLARK. No, I do not think so. There are many areas where we have clearly defined positions that we would not endeavor to impose such positions on the States and local governments through this bill. It would be inappropriate for us to do so.

Senator HRUSKA. My city happens to have a handgun registration ordinance, and has had it for many years. There are other cities in America that do not have such gun registration. Do you think my city of Omaha might fare a little better in an application for funds under this thing than some other city that did not have any such gun registration ordinance?

Attorney General CLARK. No. I would think that would be irrelevant.

Senator HRUSKA. You would think it would be irrelevant.

Attorney General CLARK. Ordinarily that should be irrelevant.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you yield at that point?

Suppose the President of the United States says to the Attorney General, "Mr. Attorney General, it is the policy of my administration that no plans be approved unless they meet certain conditions," as they have been outlined here by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. What would happen then?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, that could not happen for quite a few years, but should that ever happen at some distant time in the future, the Attorney General would be in the position of having to decide whether to follow——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Be in a position to resign if he wanted to.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator HRUSKA. Would he be a free agent to that extent?

Attorney General CLARK. I am glad I will never have that problem.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, it is just a thought along this same line, and I thought I would explore it with you a little bit.

That is all I have now.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Can you answer the other question I asked you with a direct yes or no? I think it can be answered that way.

The question I asked you was about the requirement of a ratio of personnel with respect to the races.

Attorney General CLARK. I really think that an essay type answer is an only fair answer for me to give, because I think it is important that we really understand each other on the subject and that I explain fully the way I see it.

I am inclined to think that the only issue is whether discrimination has been practiced by the jurisdiction applying for funds. If it has, then title VI applies, and we would have to act accordingly.

If it has not, if there had been no discrimination, then I do not think that the number of Negro or Puerto Rican or Mexican-American on the police force is likely to be a factor in granting or denying any particular application in a region.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Can it be? Can it be under this bill?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, in theory, it could be, in a very limited way only, however. I think so.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is it.

Attorney General CLARK. But I think a fuller explanation is of much greater value to the committee. The reason it can be is if there is a city of a million people and it has got 400,000 Negroes and it has got no Negro policemen, then I think we have to wonder how effective our Federal funds might be, how wisely spent the funds might be under these circumstances and we have got to——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Attorney General, I am not opposed to having Negro policemen.

Attorney General CLARK. I understand.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I just use this because in my judgment these things are involved in this legislation. Now, we might just as well face them and give the answers for the record, because I believe there are plenty of cities where according to the ratio of population, colored and white, there are far more white policemen than there are Negro policemen.

Attorney General CLARK. I think that is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Now, would you be authorized to say, "Well, you have got to bring up the ratio on your police personnel, you have got to bring it up so it will compare with the population ratio before you are eligible, before we will make you a grant under this bill"?

Attorney General CLARK. I think we would find that every major city in the country has a smaller proportion of Negro policemen to population than whites. I think we would find that in nearly all of these jurisdictions, if not all, a conscious effort is being made because of the practicalities of law enforcement to qualify and train and recruit more Negro police officers. I think that is true in the South, in the North, in the West, and every part of the country.

I think these men are doing their best, and for us to impose some arbitrary formula that is unrealistic and would not work, would hardly accomplish the purposes of this bill.

It is much more important to civil rights that we have good law enforcement, this is not an employment measure. This has not been a problem under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act, and I do not think it will be a problem under this bill. I cannot, however, say that there is no case that I can imagine in which we would not feel some duty to urge, encourage, as the bill says, hiring of more Negroes or Mexican-Americans or Puerto Ricans.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, I appreciate that. But the point is—and I think many of them, maybe most of them, are doing exactly what you are saying, and there are no objections from my standpoint. But my point is that there may be one that has not done that. Another thing that has to be taken into account, I think, is that there are applicants who are not eligible, I mean who would be competent to assume these duties and to perform these duties but have not yet been trained or have not the opportunity to be trained as policemen.

Attorney General CLARK. Or just do not want to be.

Senator McCLELLAN. What I mean is that a community should not be penalized and a plan rejected simply because they have not already attained that level of nondiscrimination, if you want to put it that way, that you think the law contemplates—the statute that we referred to here, title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

I would hate to see a community penalized because it had not yet reached that level.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think that would be self-defeating from the standpoint of the purposes of the bill.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think so, too, and I do not think that should be the policy or become the policy in the administration of this act.

Very well, Senator Thurmond. I apologize. I asked that while you were out of the room.

Senator THURMOND. That is all right.

Mr. Attorney General, if this law did pass, do you think the Attorney General would have the right to withhold funds if there were not a racial balance in the law enforcement personnel? I want to make my position clear. I do not think you have the right, but I am wondering what you think.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think this is the same question that we have just discussed really, and my answer would be the same.

Senator THURMOND. You think you would have the right to withhold funds or not?

Attorney General CLARK. I think that title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 might require us to withhold funds.

Senator THURMOND. You think there would be a power to withhold funds?

Attorney General CLARK. Where it was felt that there had been discrimination in employment.

Senator THURMOND. Who would determine whether there had been discrimination?

Attorney General CLARK. The director of this agency.

Senator THURMOND. The director. So one man, one man sitting in Washington, could determine whether or not the State or subdivision gets funds from this agency.

Attorney General CLARK. He would determine that in accordance with the general compliance techniques that have been utilized by the agencies under title VI. Really our experience has been that this is not a practical problem in this area.

Senator THURMOND. I am not speaking about discimination. I mean to bring about a racial balance. Do you think you or any Attorney General would have the right to withhold funds to bring that about?

Attorney General CLARK. There is no general power here to use this act for the purpose of bringing about racial balance in every police department in the country. That is not the purpose of this bill at all.

Senator THURMOND. Would the Attorney General have the right to do so?

Attorney General CLARK. He would have the power in circumstances of discrimination.

Senator THURMOND. Suppose you have an Attorney General—not you but someone else—who said, "I am going to make them bring about a racial balance down there in that police department" in such and such a city. Would he have the right to withhold funds to do that? If you had a director and he said he was going to do it if he could, could he do it under this law?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, he might be involved in some inherent discrimination, I would say. He probably would if he tried to do it because he is going to find—I think you will find this is not a practical problem in law enforcement; that law enforcement generally has found it difficult to attract and recruit and develop Negroes and Mexican-Americans and Puerto Ricans in communities where they are in substantial numbers.

Senator THURMOND. Well, when they were passing the civil rights law of 1964, Mr. Humphrey and others said the idea was not to bring about any racial balance either. But HEW is working toward that end. In my State any child can go to any school he wants to. But that does not satisfy them. They are telling them they have got to get more of the minority race in the white schools to get funds.

We contend there is no authority of law or court decision to do it.

Under this bill, if you had a director who says, "I am going to require racial balance in law enforcement," would he have the right to withhold funds to bring that about?

Attorney General CLARK. I think if there are gross racial imbalances amounting to discrimination in a particular jurisdiction that he could withhold a grant to it.

Senator THURMOND. Do you think he could do it? You think he could withhold funds?

Attorney General CLARK. If there had been discrimination, if there was discrimination, in hiring in the jurisdiction.

Senator THURMOND. I did not say discrimination. I just said racial balance. There is a big difference between the two.

Attorney General CLARK. There sure is.

Senator THURMOND. That is the very point I make to you. Discrimination is not the point. Racial balance is the point I am making.

Suppose you had a director who says, "I am going to bring racial balance down there in the police department" in such and such a city.

Attorney General CLARK. And no other city?

Senator THURMOND. Well, one or more cities if he decided to do it. Suppose he said, "I am going to have a blanket policy that throughout the whole Nation then there has got to be a racial balance in these law enforcement departments." Would he have the right to withhold funds under this bill?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think—you know, it is just hard to visualize. This is not analogous to the school situation at all. The police departments are seeking all over the counrty to attract Negroes because they need them.

Senator THURMOND. I understand that. I am fully aware of that.

Attorney General CLARK. And if you agree that is the fact, then you can understand that to compel what is impossible is a useless thing.

Senator THURMOND. That is not the question I asked you though. I am trying to get your construction of this bill which you submitted to the Senate, to know whether your director would have the power to withhold funds to bring about a racial balance in the police personnel in one or more cities or political subdivisions in this country.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there is no general power sought in this bill to vest the power to cause racial balance in police departments.

Senator THURMOND. There is no power sought. I understand that, but does the bill grant the power? Does this bill contain such power if your director saw fit to exercise it?

Attorney General CLARK. There is no general power to that effect here. The thing I am trying to keep clear is that there can be situations where particular jurisdictions have made an inadequate effort, and where their effectiveness is impaired, where some encouragement can and should be given that they do this. I think that power is vested by the bill.

Senator THURMOND. You understand I am not talking about discrimination.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, I understand.

Senator THURMOND. I am talking about integration or talking about racial balance. We have taken the position under the present law, and the Supreme Court decisions, that you do not have the right to bring about a racial balance or do not have the right to bring about full integration. All the law does is to prevent discrimination. We admit that under the decisions and the statutes you cannot have discrimination. But that is far different from bringing about full integration, and I gave you the illustration that now the HEW is trying to get schools to haul children from one place to another specifically to bring up the racial balance in schools.

I am asking you here under this bill, coupled with title VI of the civil rights law, would your director have the right to withhold funds if he wanted a racial balance brought into the personnel of the police department in order to accomplish that?

Attorney General CLARK. I do not believe that he would have the general power to require racial balance across the board in all criminal justice jurisdictions. I do think where, in his judgment, there was an inadequate effort that impaired the effectiveness of law enforcement and made the expenditure of Federal funds through this grant unwise—because of that he would have the power to withhold them.

Senator THURMOND. So you think the director would have the power to withhold Federal funds then if he felt there was not a proper ratio?

Attorney General CLARK. I do not think his judgment would be based on ratio. I think his judgment would be based upon the circumstances and efforts made by the jurisdiction to secure Negro personnel if that were the case. It would be a part of your police-community relations problem. If there is an obvicus inadequacy here, if the job that is being done and the funds being sought for the job to be done would not contribute to the end of public safety, why then, Federal funds would be withheld.

Senator THURMOND. You think he would have the power to withhold, in his judgment, in such a case?

Attorney General CLARK. Under the circumstances I indicated; yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. Now, under this proposed legislation could Federal money be obtained to purchase guns and other types of weapons for a police department?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. In other words, the city of New York could apply to you for Federal money to buy their guns to be given to the policemen there?

Attorney General CLARK. That could be included in their request; yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. What is the purpose in that? Why can't the State or city furnish weapons the same as the Federal Government?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, within the scope of the bill if they asked us for funds for that purpose it would presumably be because there was some need that had not been fulfilled. It would have to be after a 5-percent increase on a 40–60 maximum matching basis, but it would be their judgment as to the priorities.

Senator THURMOND. That would be on the basis that the city of New York would not be able to provide their policemen with guns and, therefore, they would have to trot to Washington with their hat in their hand and beg for funds.

Attorney General CLARK. There is no difference between guns and training and extra pay. There are many purposes for which the Federal moneys could be expended.

Senator THURMOND. Do you recommend such as that? Why do you feel that is sound? Why not let each subdivision in each county furnish the policemen with their own guns? We have no money here except what came from the taxpayers of New York and other States, and we are running as big a defiicit here in Washington as any State in the Nation, in proportion to its wealth. The Central Government in Washington is worse off financially than any State in this Nation, and why should we be called upon to provide weapons and guns to the police department of any city in this Nation?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, we feel there is a need for the Federal Government to help, and we think that it should help through additional resources, and we think the jurisdiction should determine initially through their application the priority that they give to their various needs, and if among those priorities should be guns, that is what they think is their greatest need at this level.

Senator THURMOND. All right. Then would that apply to caps and clothing?

Attorney General CLARK. It can apply to any need of a police department or a corrections agency or a court.

Senator THURMOND. You have got a bill here then in which any police department of any city in this Nation can ask Washington, our Government, to help to supply uniforms and clothing to their policemen; is that right?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, that is a peculiar way of thinking about it. But they could come out that way. We require, however, that they have spent 105 percent before they are entitled to anything from the Federal Government. We would look at the whole budget together. Why in the world they would take out of all their budget uniforms and put it in the Federal part? Whether they could get the funds when they actually sought them for such a limited purpose or not is another question. But these funds would be available for any need of a police department that met the qualifications.

Senator THURMOND. Would that include shoes, too?

Attorney General CLARK. It could include shoes; yes.

Senator THURMOND. Well now, suppose the Federal Government said to the police departments over the country, suppose your director says, "Now, I think the policemen will look handsomer, better, and appear more disciplined if they all used blue uniforms and black shoes, and we are going to withhold funds unless you buy blue uniforms and black shoes."

Would your director have that authority to do that?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think we would start looking for a new director about that time.

Senator THURMOND. I know, but that is not the question. I am visualizing some Attorney General other than Mr. Clark now, someone who might succeed you some day and be arbitrary. Would your director have the right to withhold funds if the police departments did not use the color uniform he wanted or the color shoes or the quality of uniform or shoes that he wanted them to use?

Attorney General CLARK. He has to have broad discretion, and in theory he would probably have that discretion under the bill.

As a practical matter, the opportunity to exercise it would be very limited. The police are an independent type of person, and I just do not think that is a real possibility.

Senator THURMOND. But you think he would have that authority?

Attorney General CLARK. Yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. Well, then, would your director also have the authority to say that, "We don't think a Colt is a very good pistol. It doesn't get results, and, therefore, we are not going to give any funds unless you buy Smith & Wesson pistols."

Would your director have the authority to withhold funds unless they used Smith & Wesson pistols?

Attorney General CLARK. I think if some police department sought Federal funds for a type of weapon that we thought was dangerous or unreliable or otherwise defective, that we would have a duty to withhold funds.

Senator THURMOND. So the Director would have the authority to withhold funds as to the kind of weapon or the quality of weapon that the city police department or the State law enforcement agency would purchase?

Attorney General CLARK. The probability of an exercise of discretion like that is very, very slight. It depends, unless——

Senator THURMOND. I am not saying how he would use this discretion, Mr. Attorney General. I am just asking, I am trying to get at the authority the bill gives, whether he would have the authority.

Attorney General CLARK. The bill gives broad discretion.

Senator THURMOND. It gives broad discretion.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. So your director would have the right to withhold funds if he saw fit unless a policeman used the kind of weapons that he said they must use or use the kind of uniforms that he says they must use or use the kind of shoes that he said they must use.

Attorney General CLARK. No. I think that really is very remote. It is necessary under the bill to give broad discretion. But if it came to the specificity you are talking about, such an exercise of discretion would probably violate section 408 itself. It is so unreal.

Senator THURMOND. It is not contemplated, but is it possible?

Attorney General CLARK. I would say when it reaches the level that you have now reached with shoes and uniforms and guns and all these oher things there would begin to be control of the police department, and there would be a violation of section 408 of the act, and, therefore, it would be in violation of the act.

Senator THURMOND. Well, I took up each one separately, and you said he would have the authority, and then I summarized it and lumped it together, and now you say you do not. What is your position?

Attorney General CLARK. My position is as stated that the case you pose would be clearly arbitrary, when you add them up the way you do—in fact, any one by itself would seem highly arbitrary to me and so unrealistic as to not be a possibility.

Senator THURMOND. Who is going to control whether he is arbitrary or not? He makes the final decision, does he not?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, there are lots of checks and balances that we have in the system, and one is we would hope he would always try to accomplish the purposes of the act, and if he proceeded the way you indicated, I think the act would break down.

Senator THURMOND. That is not the question. I asked you who would call his hand if he became arbitrary.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, perhaps, with you Senators up here, you would help and there would be an Attorney General and other people.

Senator THURMOND. That is not it. I mean in the executive branch. Suppose you had a director under you or some other Attorney General who was arbitrary, and he was trying to bring about conformity in every way, shape and form, just completely arbitrary. Now, who is above him to correct him?

Attorney General CLARK. We worked for these 19 months under the Law Enforcement Assistance Act. There is complete discretion in the director there. He can grant or not grant. There are no criteria or standards set whatever, and we have not had any complaints of any type that you raise.

Senator THURMOND. In other words, he does have the discretion but you do not think he would be arbitrary, is that it?

Attorney General CLARK. I do not think he would be arbitrary, and I think if he endeavored to exercise his discretion as you have indicated he would not last very long.

Senator THURMOND. But he would have the power, he would have the discretion, to act.

Now, would any of this Federal money go to help pay the salaries of law enforcement officers, policemen, and others?

Attorney General CLARK. To their salaries?

Senator THURMOND. Yes.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. Some of it could go directly into salaries, up to one-third of the Federal funds.

Senator THURMOND. In other words, then if this bill passes, the city of Philadelphia, the city of Chicago or New York, for example, can draw from the Federal Government from the funds that are available up to one-third of the cost of the policemen's salary.

Attorney General CLARK. No, it would not be nearly that much. It would be up to one-third of Federal funds available and granted. The Federal funds——

Senator THURMOND. I say insofar as the funds are available.

Attorney General CLARK. Yes. But you said one-third of the policemen's salaries. You have to start with the base expenditure. You have got to add 5 percent to that. Those are all local payments. Over and above that the Federal match is 60 percent of the increment over 105 percent the first year. Now you are not going to have a very large increment there. But only one-third of that 60 percent could go to the salaries themselves, and that would always be a tiny fraction of the total salary expenditures.

Senator THURMOND. What do you figure that would amount to in the average law enforcement officer's salary?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, we can work a hypothetical if you want to. Let us take a jurisdiction with a 100 base so 90 percent of it is for salaries. That would mean 90 goes to salaries. Let us say that they propose to increase law enforcement expenditures by 10 percent during this year. That first 5 percent has to be their money. Two of the remaining 5 percent has to be their money, so that means 1 percent of the Federal 3 percent could go to salaries. That is 1 percent on a base of 110, which is one one-hundred-and-tenth of the total law enforcement budget.

Senator THURMOND. How is that?

Attorney General CLARK. Assuming that the applicant put his original 90 percent into salaries plus 90 percent of his 7 percent share of the increase in his budget, 1 Federal dollar would go into salaries for approximately every $96 of local money. At the same time the rate of new investment for law enforcement purposes would have been doubled.

Senator THURMOND. So that if a man got $500 salary a month, about $5.50 of that would be from the Federal Government?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it would all come through the police department. He could not tell which was which.

Senator THURMOND. Yes, I understand. But that is about the contribution that would be made by the Federal Government.

Attorney General CLARK. On this hypothesis, that is right.

Senator THURMOND. Now, would this $5.50 on the $500 salary, say, just offhand, would that go to increase the policemen's salary or would that go to relieve the local community because they were not able to pay that amount?

Attorney General CLARK. Not only would they have had to maintain their own level of investment; they would have had to increase it 5 percent before they got their first Federal dollar.

Senator THURMOND. So this Federal money then that goes into salaries of personnel would mean additional salaries for the law enforcement officers and it does not relieve the local political subdivision of any expense in that connection.

Attorney General CLARK. That is true. In fact, it would require some additional local contribution.

Senator THURMOND. In fact it would require additional local money.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator THURMOND. So the theory then that the Federal Government is stopping in to help with the expense of law enforcement from the standpoint of paying law enforcement officials then goes out of the window, does it not?

Attorney General CLARK. The theory is that the Federal Government will help the locality by more and better law enforcement.

Senator THURMOND. To do what?

Attorney General CLARK. By more and better law enforcement.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Attorney General, I am one of those who does not believe that the Federal dollar can do everything. In my judgment there are some things that can be done by this Congress that would improve law enforcement in this country much more than any Federal dollars that we could appropriate.

The able chairman of the subcommittee has a bill now on confessions and Senator Ervin has one—I believe I joined both of them on bills on confessions—to provide that a confession, so long as it is voluntary, would be admitted in evidence even though a lawyer was not present, and even though a man had been held a few minutes or a few hours too long.

I fully believe if we can pass a bill to that effect in this Congress it would do more than any other one thing to stem the crime in this country.

These criminals know the rules today. They are mighty smart, and they know when they are caught that they can ask for a lawyer immediately. They do not have to confess, and the law enforcement people tell me that about nine-tenths of them can be apprehended and they will confess.

But since this decision of the Supreme Court was handed down they won't confess. So you can see the great handicap this decision of the Supreme Court is having on this matter.

There is another thing that I think the Congress could do, and that concerns another bill, H.R. 3, that the chairman of this subcommittee and I worked on for several years back, and it passed the Senate. The bill passed the House one night and then it was delayed a couple of days, and then was defeated by one or two votes. This proposal would prevent Federal preemption of the fields of State jurisdiction, such as the Steve Nelson case in Pennsylvania, where Federal law will strike down State laws, even though there is no provision in Federal law providing for that, and even though there is no inconsistency to such an extent that they both cannot stand.

Then, the other thing I think that has to be recognized by the Supreme Court is that the rights of society have to be paramount to the rights of the individual, even if he has to suffer.

These are things that I think go to the heart of the crime problems, and these are the things that do not require money.

There are some things I think the President can do. Take the draft card burnings—quick apprehension and quick trials and quick punishment would have a very fine effect in this country.

I had checked about the flag burnings. It is a violation of the Federal law to burn a flag in the District of Columbia, but it does not seem to be nationwide, and I am having that researched further. That is a matter that certainly ought to be pursued vigorously.

Another thing, if the President would expose to the public the FBI records of some of the agitators and demonstrators like Martin Luther King, Stokely Carmichael, and others, and let the public see just who they are and what they are, and the elements they are connected with, I think it would kill their influence overnight.

I think there are a lot of things the President can do that would prove more effective than asking for Federal dollars to hand out in a political way, particularly if you get a director who wants to be political and who wants to create attention by withholding such funds.

There is another thing the President can do, and that is to stop catering and showing favortism to special groups. That does not take any money either.

The rising crime rate is a vital question here that I think demands urgent attention, but the urgent attention that I feel it demands is action by the President and action by Congress more than just Federal money.

I just wanted to mention those things to you because that is the way I feel about it. I am not saying I would not support any kind of bill that is offered here. But this thing of going down to the States and giving out Federal money with a lot of strings attached and giving the administration the power to withhold funds from police departments and getting everybody in the departments obligated to the Federal Government can be a powerful political hammer in the hands of any administrator. You have that hammer now in the HEW and they are using it. I know they are using it because I have seen it used in my State.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well.

Mr. Attorney General, I wanted to ask you one question before we quit today. I have a few more and we will proceed a little longer. Do you have to go any particular time?

Attorney General CLARK. No, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. We will proceed a while longer.

I want to be sure and get an answer to one question before we recess today, and I will ask you now while I am thinking about it: Assuming this bill is enacted into law in its present form or substantially so, in other words, like you want it generally, how long do you think it would be before there would be any impact, before we would be able to see any results, consequences, from it with respect to the increase in crime in this country?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think we would badly deceive ourselves if we thought that there is any easy formula that would bring about an immediate and significant reduction in the amount of crime.

I think that the perfection of law enforcement can make a substantial difference, and I would think that after a period of a few years with this great new effort that we would have a significantly higher quality of police and corrections and judicial efforts in the country, and I think you could measure it.

But in the long run it will take much more than just that. I think we owe it to ourselves as an end in itself to perfect criminal justice in this country, and I think we will be repaid many times over for that effort, but it will not change the character of our people or their capability to commit crime where there is a will. It will make it more difficult for them.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, the objective of this bill is to make the streets safe. When are we going to begin to get any results from it? That is the objective. When are we going to begin to realize the objective?

The only way I can see to realize this objective is by a reduction in the crime rate. Let us just stop and see what are we going to get out of this bill, if enacted, and when the fruits of it are going to begin to flow. I do not think the public is going to be misled or get the impression that if we pass this bill, then they are fully protected and all crime is going to disappear.

I want to analyze it and see what we can reasonably expect, assuming it is enacted into law.

What would be your prognostication?

Attorney General CLARK. I think we could reasonably expect to have a higher order of public safety and a more effective police, corrections, and courts in a matter of a few years. I am not prepared to say that we could hope to have a great reduction in crime. That involves too many other factors.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Then it is kind of a misnomer if it is not going to reduce crime, is it not?

Attorney General CLARK. I think not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If it is not going to make the streets safe?

Attorney General CLARK. I think crime control is the responsibility and the function of the police, and corrections, and courts, and that is what this bill is about.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If it does not reduce crime then it is not controlling it much, is it? If we get the kind of control we want we will reduce crime.

Attorney General CLARK. That is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have before us a bill with the title, "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." It carries with it an implication that we are going to get some very good results from it. I would like to know how soon, in your estimation, we are going to get these results and what you anticipate they will be. If you can, give us something more specific than what you have.

78-433—67——33

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think we will get results as soon as the Congress acts on this bill. I think there will be results of the type that I described near the beginning of our hearing. I think it will be in two immediate ways: First, the realization by the law enforcement community that the Congress is committed to their assistance will make a big difference.

Second, I think the expansion, the implementation under title III of the potentials of the Law Enforcement Assistance Act will make a big difference.

But for us to sit here and say that there is going to be a great reduction in crime and that the streets will be safe everywhere for everyone would be to promise more than reason tells us we can expect from this or any other legislation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you agree with me that it will be some, possibly, 5 years from the date of the enactment of this law before you will actually begin to get any obvious, noticeable, apparent results from it so far as its impact on crime in the streets?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it is hard to notice crime on the streets in the first place. You notice it——

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is the title you have given this bill. I have been using the title of it because people think in terms of titles, "Well, we are going to have safe streets now. We have a law. We are going to have safe streets, a lowering in crime."

Let us just analyze it and see what it really means, let the record reflect what it means.

Attorney General CLARK. The bill, I would hope, would make a difference long before 5 years. On the other hand, our task of perfecting our criminal justice agencies will take longer than that. It is an endless process. We need to begin now and we need to begin in a massive way, and we need to begin with great vigor.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In what way will this improve the efficiency of the courts?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, it provides, I think particularly with the Federal Judicial Center bill, on the Federal side it provides, an opportunity for the courts both in terms of training their own people and in terms of the new techniques in docket handling, to offer greater efficiency in adjudication.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I do not follow that, I cannot follow that. You mean you train clerks, the law clerks, the clerk of the court, the bailiff? How is it going to affect the quality of court decisions?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, the quality of court decisions will be affected primarily in the training given judges under the institutes and other things that could be designed under the act, and also by relieving them of some of the burdens of administration which gives them the time to devote their intelligence to cases before them.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You think the quality of their decisions now is impaired by the fact that they have to give some time to administration?

Attorney General CLARK. I think judges are just like other people in that if they are overworked their judgment is not as likely to be as good as if they had a reasonable amount of work to deal with.

Senator HRUSKA. Would the chairman yield?

Senator McCLELLAN. I hope some of the recent court decisions were not due to the fact that some judge had been overworked and that threw him off the track. I hope we are not implying that.

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think if we study the facts we would find that case backlogs are much more harmful than confessions. I think we can demonstrate statistically that more people who have committed crimes go free because of delay through backlog several times over than are ever involved in confessions problems.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, is it the purpose of this bill to get more judges so they can keep up with the docket better? I do not see that in the bill.

Attorney General CLARK. That is not the major purpose of this bill, no.

Senator McCLELLAN. There is nothing in the bill to give more judges, is there?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I think you could say if you get more judges—we were talking about the one-third limitation, that can go for salaries of new judges. I doubt that it is likely to. I think we have to find better techniques.

Senator McCLELLAN. This bill does not provide it. You would have to pass a statute in the States increasing the number of judges. You cannot do it on the basis of this bill.

Attorney General CLARK. That is true of every grant to be made under this bill. It has to be based on application authorized by State or local law.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, Mr. Attorney General, what I am saying is this bill gives no authority to appoint a new judge or establish new courts in any way, does it?

Attorney General CLARK. It gives no authority to apply for any of the other purposes of the bill. It all requires the authorization of the local jurisdiction.

Senator McCLELLAN. I understand that, but I am talking about Federal courts. There are no other Federal courts provided in this bill, so the Federal courts can catch up with the dockets.

Attorney General CLARK. No, I did not understand you were talking about Federal courts.

Senator McCLELLAN. I was talking about Federal courts first. There is nothing in the bill and, of course, the bill does not authorize or say to the States or the municipalities. "You have got to increase the number of judges or you have got to establish more courts," does it?

Attorney General CLARK. No, or that you have got to have more policemen or anything else.

Senator McCLELLAN. Are you saying you would have the authority to tell a municipality or tell a State jurisdiction that "You have to establish another court otherwise we will withhold funds from you?" Do you say you would have that authority under this bill?

Attorney General CLARK. Well, I was not saying that, but if that is your question I could address myself to it.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right.

I ask you the question: Does the bill authorize it?

Attorney General CLARK. I think that where there is a comprehensive plan that clearly showed that there is a great imbalance between the numbers of police and the number of courts and that the courts were unable to prosecute cases that it would be improvident for us to spend more money for more police when people could not be put before a court and given a trial and convicted or acquitted and, therefore, that we would make——

Senator McClellan. You can say then "Unless you establish some more courts in your States you get none of this money," is that right?

Attorney General Clark. We could certainly encourage that balance that is greatly needed.

Senator McClellan. If that is in the bill I certainly shall seek to amend it so that you cannot do it, because I do not think you should have that power.

Very well.

Senator Hruska. Mr. Chairman, I think that power is inherent in this bill. Any plan before it is effective must be approved by the Attorney General.

Senator McClellan. I am saying if the power is there, I wanted him to say so. I do not want it in there.

Senator Hruska. And it leads back to the series of questions I asked this morning that without the Governor's approval of the plan and the entry of these people into the State, you are going to reach a blind alley because if the Governor is not in favor of increasing the judges in his own State, then there is a complete block there that will result in nothing. And yet we have a denial here of any provision which would call for a Governor's approval of a plan, which I think, is very close to the heart of the problem.

Senator McClellan. Mr. Attorney General, I do appreciate your appearance. It is obvious that we cannot get through today, after taking the time to go and vote and come back. We have other witnesses scheduled tomorrow and the next day, so I won't ask you to come then because we want to accommodate them since they are coming. At some future time or convenient day as early as we can get you, we will resume your testimony. In the meantime, may I earnestly urge you to weigh some of these questions and consider how we might eliminate some of the provisions of the bill which have some potential consequences that I do not think we want to grant. I think we want to modify this bill some to keep it confined to the purpose which, I think, is intended. I ask you to do that. I want to cooperate. I want to help you get a good bill. I am not trying to sabotage this bill.

I want us to help you get a good bill, but I do think we have got to go through the bill and weigh these provisions and put some safeguards in it in the proper places.

Thank you very kindly.

Attorney General Clark. Thank you, sir.

(Whereupon at 4:20 p.m., the subcommittee adjourned to reconvene at 10 a.m., on Wednesday, April 19, 1967.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:10 a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan, Kennedy of Massachusetts, Hruska, and Thurmond.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The committee will come to order.

I understand some other members will be present later, but I do not want to delay the hearing so we will begin now.

This morning our first witness is Judge Grumet. We welcome you. I believe you are chairman of the New York State Commission on Investigation?

Mr. GRUMET. That is correct; I am the present chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I see you have a brief prepared statement.

Mr. GRUMET. Yes. I would like to read it, with the committee's permission.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You may read it, but first, would you identify yourself more fully, and then, if you like, read your statement.

STATEMENT OF JACOB GRUMET, CHAIRMAN, STATE OF NEW YORK COMMISSION OF INVESTIGATION; ACCOMPANIED BY MYLES J. LANE AND JOHN W. RYAN, JR., COMMISSIONERS

Mr. GRUMET. Before I read the statement, I would like to say that the New York State Commission of Investigation is bipartisan and has four members. Three of those four members are present here this morning, and I would like to introduce my colleagues.

On my left is Commissioner Ryan, of Buffalo, formerly chief justice of the city court of Buffalo.

On my right is Commissioner Myles J. Lane, who was formerly U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York.

All of us have spent many years in law enforcement, and three of our members are former judges.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We welcome you gentlemen. We appreciate your interest in this matter and your cooperation. We think that our country faces danger from the crime menace. I think it is going to take the cooperation and joint efforts of many forces in this Nation to successfully combat this evil. I personally, and I am sure I can also speak for the committee and the Congress, am very grateful to each one of you who has been willing to come here and testify, to give us the benefit of your experience and your counsel. Thank you very much.

Now, you may proceed.

Mr. GRUMET. Our commission is deeply concerned with proposed legislation in the Congress dealing with the very important subject of wiretapping.

In our third annual report, issued in February 1961, we stated that "criminal law enforcement in New York State has been dealt a crippling blow" by Federal court decisions relating to wiretapping. The decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Benanti v. United States thrust law enforcement officials and judges of our State courts squarely on the horns of a most vexing dilemma. As you know, by the way of dicta in the Benanti case, the Supreme Court indicated that wiretapping under New York law was illegal and in violation of the Federal Communications Act.

As a result of this decision, many judges and law enforcement officials in our State, understandably, refuse to perform an act which, though authorized by State law, has been described as illegal by the Supreme Court of the United States. The public safety and public welfare and important investigations dealing with organized crime and official corruption have suffered.

This commission and others expert in the problem of law enforcement, presented strong and convincing proof that legal wiretapping, pursuant to court order, and I emphasize that, "pursuant to court order," and the use of evidence thus obtained, is an absolutely indispensable law enforcement weapon in the fight against organized criminal activities, racketeering, and official corruption. Furthermore, it has been clearly demonstrated that there is no substitute for this investigative procedure in dealing with such cases. In that regard, we refer you to the transcript of our commission's public hearing concerning the wiretapping dilemma which was held in New York City on April 5 and 6, 1960. We should like to quote but one statement of the testimony given at that hearing by Mr. Frank S. Hogan, district attorney of New York County for over 25 years, to emphasize the importance of wiretaps. Mr. Hogan said:

> Wiretapping is a powerful investigating weapon in the field of labor racketeering where the criminals' cunning and the victims', the businessmen's fear, would otherwise combine to conceal crime and make a mockery of law enforcement.

Mr. Hogan goes on to say:

> Our files are full of cases where, but for wiretaps, some of the worst racketeering offenders might well have gone unpunished.

In the years following our public hearing, the need for wiretapping for law enforcement purposes has been proven repeatedly.

Now, almost a decade since the Benanti decision, the damaging situation still prevails. The Congress has failed to act on necessary remedial legislation which has been introduced.

Mr. Chairman, as you have just pointed out, when crime has increased to such alarming proportions as to become recognized as a most serious nationwide problem, paradoxically, persons both in and out of public office, who lack firsthand knowledge in dealing with the difficult problem of law enforcement, are demanding abolition of all wiretapping. Speaking in the name of "civil liberties," they completely disregard the compelling rights and interest of the public to be protected from the lawless acts of criminal elements. Such persons consistently fail to distinguish between illegal wiretapping and that carried on by law enforcement officers pursuant to law and court order, for the public good. They seek to create the impression that abolition of the latter will somehow eliminate the evils of the former. Nothing could be further from the truth. Moreover, much confusion and unjustifiable concern is being created by gross distortions and misstatements of fact concerning the use of wiretaps.

On March 7, 1967, a letter was sent to the chairman of this commission, signed by former U.S. attorneys for the Southern District of New York, which district, undoubtedly, is one of the largest and most important in this country. This letter urged the enactment of legislation to permit wiretapping pursuant to court order by both Federal and State enforcement authorities.

This commission fully supports the views expressed by these experienced gentlemen and we strongly urge the adoption of their recommendations. In brief, we respectfully propose that the Congress consider legislation which would accomplish the following:

(1) Prohibit all unauthorized wiretapping, with stringent penalties for violators.

(2) Legalize court-authorized wiretapping and the use of wiretap evidence by the States, where State law so permits.

(3) Permit court-authorized wiretapping by Federal law enforcement authorities, subject to the approval by the Attorney General, in specified areas of major crimes and organized crime.

Such legislation, with appropriate safeguards, would resolve existing confusion and difficulties. It would also be of immense aid to effective law enforcement. Above all, it would provide society with immeasurable protection against serious criminal invasions into its safety and security.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Judge Grumet.

Do either of you gentlemen wish to make a statement, Judge Ryan, Judge Lane?

Mr. LANE. No, sir.

Mr. RYAN. No, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. Or, to add anything?

In your conclusions, Judge Grumet, you make recommendations as to the kind of legislation you feel appropriate in this field. Do your recommendations in any way conflict with or do they support S. 675, the bill now pending before this subcommittee with respect to wiretapping?

Mr. GRUMET. I think, generally speaking, we support that bill. There may be one or two minor things, but——

Senator McCLELLAN. In principle, you support it?

Mr. GRUMET. In principle, we definitely support it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Now, do you have any suggestions of any modifications or any specific amendments to offer for our study?

Mr. GRUMET. I am looking at the bill now. There is one that I think I have in mind that I might mention, and that is, if I recall correctly, the bill provides that there must be a showing that other means could not be used to obtain the evidence. I don't know where to find it at the moment, but I recall reading it.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is at the bottom of page 9, I believe.

Mr. GRUMET. Thank you very much, Senator.

Subdivision 3 of 8(c).

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. GRUMET. Where the reference is to the fact that no other means are readily available for obtaining that information.

Senator McCLELLAN. Readily available—not necessarily excluding all other means, but whether they are readily available. I would take that to mean, that it would be the intent of this section, whether or not you could, by a practical use of other means, obtain the information as easily as you could by wiretapping. Of course, you might be able to get the information in the course of 6 months or more by some other means but readily means comparable, as I would interpret it, to the use of wiretapping.

Mr. GRUMET. The only hesitation I had about it was that it might, if there must be a showing that other means are not readily available, then it might result in litigation which would hamper the efforts of the authorities.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, we do not want that. But still, at the same time, I would not want any loose administration of this law.

Mr. GRUMET. No.

Senator McCLELLAN. But have it very strictly observed. It is not to become a catchall for promiscuous use. I want to see this law strictly observed with the courts adhering to the spirit and intent of it in granting the orders. I am not for promiscuous wiretapping in any sense, but I do believe that it is an indispensable tool, particularly in fighting organized crime, and some specific crimes.

We recently had a kidnaping case, I believe it was out in California, where a little boy was kidnaped and I think they paid $250,000 ransom. Fortunately they were able to comply with the kidnaper's request. They were fortunate, I guess in being able to provide the ransom demanded and did it promptly, and were able to get their little child back unharmed.

Now, who would say that to catch some scoundrels like that kidnaper you should not use wiretapping? People that prey upon the lives of innocent children in order to exact a ransom in money are the lowest scum of humanity, in my judgment. To deny the use of wiretapping to catch somebody where a little child's life is in danger, under those circumstances, would be depriving ourselves and law enforcement agencies of a very vital tool. I may be wrong, but those are my views.

Mr. GRUMET. Senator, I might add that very frequently in order to collect the ransom and communicate with the victims, they have got to use a telephone.

Senator McCLELLAN. Surely.

Mr. GRUMET. And as you just pointed out, the authorities would be prevented from listening in on these conversations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. They could not tap the telephone at the home if you barred it, and if they did tap and pursued the clue that they got from the tap, that evidence would be excluded from the trial of the case, according to the Supreme Court holdings.

Now, that is going to the extreme. Every defendant charged ought to have a fair trail, but to say that we cannot use the same tools and the same weapons that the criminals use in organized syndicates to commit a crime, that we cannot use the same means to detect their crimes, is to deprive society of the protection that it is entitled to have. I could be wrong in my views, and I would be glad to have your comments.

Mr. LANE. I have a simple formula.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Sir?

Mr. LANE. I have a simple formula of my own, and that is that sometimes the telephone can be used as a weapon, and I believe that where you can use the telephone to commit a crime, or a wire to commit a crime, you should be able to use that wire to either detect or prevent that crime. It is that simple.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, if a robber goes out and uses a pistol to put his victim in a state of fear so he must submit to his demands, why cannot a policeman, when he goes to arrest the robber, put a gun on him and say, "Halt."

Mr. LANE. Precisely.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What are you going to do, take the pistol away from the arresting officer and let the robber have one? It is just about that simple. Are you going to let the criminal use a means of communication and deny that means of protection to the officer?

Mr. LANE. That is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think if we continue to favor every criminal in this country, turn him loose, call him a sick man, say all we can do is treat him instead of punish him, we are going to encourage more crimes. We are moving pretty swiftly already to a state of chaos.

Mr. LANE. It has been the experience of all enforcement officers that I know, all district attorneys, that organized crime uses the telephone for the two principal crimes that make for the treasury of the underworld; that is, gambling and narcotics. There is no other way in which you can combat gambling and narcotics rackets without the telephone, and anyone that says it can is not very familiar with this particular area. Can all district attorneys, all police enforcement officials be wrong, and one or two persons with no experience be right? We feel that insofar as organized crime is concerned, particularly in those two areas—narcotics and gambling—there is no weapon that you can use to stop this except permitting legalized wiretapping.

Senator MCCLELLAN. When wiretapping was in operation in New York, before the Supreme Court decision that you have referred to here, the Benanti case, was it an effective tool?

Mr. LANE. Extremely effective.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Extremely so?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have here a statement from the Attorney General as reported in a news article: "As for wiretapping, it is his view that they are neither desirable nor efficient," the article says. "The country pays more for the use of a wiretap than it secures in terms of public protection." These remarks are attributed to the Attorney General.

What have you got to say about his comments?

Mr. LANE. Well, let me give you one of our experiences and I think that will best answer the question.

We had complaints from the dean of Cornell University about some gambling in Ithaca, so we sent our agents up there, and, one thing led to another. This started with gambling on football games. We put one or two wiretaps in and we got information which enabled us to get certain leads and for the next 6 or 8 months we put our agents out on these leads. Now, I think it was on October 23, 1959, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon that we had a simultaneous raid by 400 State police in conjunction with our commission. In these 19 counties in the upper tier of New York State I think they must have hit 50 or 75 towns and cities.

They picked up 130 or 140 gamblers, professional gamblers. They picked up $100,000 in cash on the tables. They hit four banks; that is, gambling banks. For the next 6 weeks we put our accountants on this material. We were able to project what the gambling was in those 19 counties. This is organized crime. We projected that they were doing, in the period of 1 year, in those 19 counties, a business of $500 million—$500 million, of which they made a profit of $50 to $100 million in 19 counties.

Now, we got that through our wiretaps. As a result of those wiretaps we discovered people that would use the telephone in connection with this gambling business. In other words, you cannot have professional gambling unless you get the morning line from somewhere, and that is usually out in the West, either in Chicago or Minneapolis. Big gamblers, when they want to lay off any bets, lay them off either in Kentucky, New Orleans, or Miami. To do that they must use the telephone. They also have a system of projecting or sending out the race results within a few minutes after a race.

As you know, they use the so-called catcher-pitcher way of doing this. They have somebody stationed at the track and they give a signal to someone at an open phone outside the track who will telephone the results down to Maryland where they then send it over the entire country. You cannot do that unless you use the telephone.

That would give you one example of the way the telephone is used.

We have found in our business that they use the telephone many other ways in other crimes. But the telephone is the most important instrument of organized crime in getting the money for the rest of their businesses.

Mr. GRUMET. Senator, I would like to add to what the commissioner just said. In answer to the statement you just quoted, by Attorney General Clark, I referred before to the letter which was addressed to your committee.

Senator MCCELLAN. This letter will be printed in the record at this point.

(The letter referred to follows:)

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 10, 1967.

Hon. WILLIAM A. PAISLEY,
Chief Counsel,
Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedure,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PAISLEY: Enclosed herewith is a copy of a letter directed to Senator McClellan from all the former United States Attorneys for the Southern District of New York supporting court-approved wire tapping and electronic eavesdropping.

You might be interested in a word about each of the signatories to this letter. They are:

Charles H. Tuttle, for 65 years a member of the Bar of the State of New York, over 50 years a member of the Board of Higher Education of the City of New York, and senior partner of the New York law firm of Breed, Abbott & Morgan.

James B. McNally, Justice of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York.

John F. X. McGohey, United States District Judge of the Southern District of New York.

Irving H. Saypol, Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

Myles J. Lane, member of the New York State Investigation Commission, and partner of the New York law firm of Schwartz & Frohlich.

J. Eward Lumbard, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Paul W. Williams, Special Assistant Attorney General of the State of New York in charge of the Saratoga and Columbia County Investigations, former Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and counsel to the New York law firm of Cahill, Gordon, Sonnett, Reindel & Ohl.

S. Hazard Gillespie, former President of the New York State Bar Association, Chairman of the Moreland Commission to Investigate Public Welfare in the State of New York, and partner in the New York law firm of Davis Polk Wardwell Sunderland & Kiendl.

Yours sincerely,

S. HAZARD GILLESPIE.

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 7, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedure,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLELLAN: The undersigned being all the former United States Attorneys for the Southern District of New York now living urge on the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate immediate clarification of Federal law relating to wire tapping and electronic eavesdropping.

The commission of crimes on a national scale and the infiltration of legitimate business by criminal elements are heavily dependent on telephonic communication. Without the means of meeting crime effected through such communication, law enforcement officers are handicapped to a point where their proper pursuit of the protection of society is virtually impossible to carry out. At the same time we recognize the importance to society of protecting the individual in his rights to privacy in the use of his telephone. A proper balancing of the two considerations is essential.

Without considering the merits of the individual bills such as S. 634 and S. 675 introduced in January 1967 and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and without presuming to draft specific language, we strongly recommend amendment of Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act (48 Stat. 1103, 47 U.S.C. 605 (1934)) in keeping with the following principles:

> One: make it unlawful and punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment of not more than ten years, or both (see Section 1362, Title 18, United States Code), for any person to willfully intercept or attempt to intercept any wire communication, or to electronically listen to or record a conversation without the consent of at least one party to the conversation, unless authorized by a Federal judge on application of the Attorney General, or any Assistant Attorney General of the Department of Justice specially designated by the Attorney General, when such authorized interception or recording may provide evidence of an offense against the laws of the United States. (This procedure would make it possible for a United States Attorney, the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other enforcement arm of the Government through the intervention of the Attorney General's office and court approval to effectively combat the commission of crime in our modern society.)

Two: make appropriate exception to permit the attorney general of any State or the principal prosecuting attorney for any political subdivision, if authorized by statute of that State, to make application on a showing of probable cause to a State court judge for leave to intercept wire communications and electronically listen to or record a conversation when such action may provide evidence of the commission of any crime or conspiracy to commit a crime.

Three: provide for suppression of any evidence obtained by wire interception or electronic eavesdropping except that obtained by authorization of the Federal or State judiciary and to authorize the use of the later in any court or grand jury proceeding.

Four: provide for method of prompt reporting to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts and to the Attorney General of the United States by any State or Federal judge who has granted or denied leave to intercept or record with the purpose of informing the Congress of the volume of interception and recording which occurs during the period of a year.

We believe a proper protection of the individual in his privacy and of society against the commission of "modern" crime compels immediate enactment of legislation consonant with these principles.

Yours respectfully,

CHARLES H. TUTTLE (1929–1930),

JAMES B. MCNALLY (1944–1945),

IRVING H. SAYPOL (1950–1951),
Supreme Court New York County, New York, N.Y.
MYLES J. LANE (1952),

S. HAZARD GILLESPIE (1959–1960),
New York, N.Y.

Mr. GRUMET. This letter by the eight U.S. attorneys who cover a period, I believe, of over 30 years, eight U.S. attorneys for the southern district, which, as you well know, is the largest district in the country, in the southern district of New York, and these gentlemen, I think, represent all the U.S. attorneys, and they were appointed by Presidents, Hoover, Roosevelt, Truman, and Eisenhower, representing both parties, and their experience, going over a period of 30 years are—I think, is a complete answer to the Attorney General, who, I say, with the greatest respect, has not had the experience in this particular field that these men have had.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, the policemen out on the firing lines, the prosecutors, and those who have got to detect the crimes, apprehend the criminals, and fight the case in court say they need this tool, is that correct?

Mr. GRUMET. That is correct; that is right. And I might add that with all due respect to the Attorney General and the judges, those who have not had the actual experience in fighting organized crime just do not comprehend the problem.

Senator McCLELLAN. Now, the Attorney General is quoted as saying, "Furthermore, illegal surveillance with devices that invade the privacy, contribute to a disrespect for the law."

I rather think, on the contrary, that properly used under court order, as you apprehend the criminal, you command a real respect for the law from that source, perhaps more respect than existed before he got caught.

Mr. GRUMET. It should be emphasized we are advocating wiretapping pursuant to court order. In other words, a judge must pass on this before a law enforcement officer is permitted or authorized to tap a wire.

Senator McCLELLAN. Under this bill the court keeps control on it. The judge can set the time it can operate, he can require a report to him on the progress being made, he could do anything to keep absolute control of it, to see that it is not abused.

Mr. LANE. We had another situation in New York where through a wiretap we got information that a certain well-known racketeer got control of the whole bingo business in New York. You know, where they have bingo for charities or for veterans organizations and so forth. He not only got control of it, but he also started a lobby. He financed a lobby to get the law changed in his favor. And we found out where the charity bingo might take in $50,000, he was getting probably $48,000 of the $50,000. We got that through a wiretap.

We also found out through a wiretap that in certain situations in New York that there was connivance between some of the racketeers and some certain members of the police departments. Through our investigations we were able to clean that up. In one situation we found that a man in the real heart of the police department was giving out information to these racketeers whenever there would be a raid, a police raid. After we found that out we gave it to the police commissioner, who was very thankful. The police got rid of this man. We could not have discovered this without use of wiretaps.

Senator McCLELLAN. So, when properly used, it is very fruitful?

Mr. LANE. I would say definitely yes, Senator. I think it is indispensable.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see the Attorney General further says, "We spend too much time on incidentals. We worry too much about wiretaps and confessions and not enough about the excellence in police work." What is your comment on that?

Mr. GRUMET. I would like to comment on that.

Of course we all subscribe to excellence in police work, as the Attorney General puts it, and some of those who argue against wiretapping and the admissibility of confessions, use that as an argument and say that this is a method which is used as a substitute for effective police work.

Now, as important as good police work is in solving crime—and I do not by any means minimize it—there are many cases where the best police work in the world would not help, in the absence of wiretapping and reasonable interrogation of a suspect or a prospective defendant. This is particularly true, Senator, in homicide cases where the principal witness—as I have often said to a jury—where the principal witness has been eliminated by the hand of the defendant. And, I speak from experience, because I might tell you that for 6 years I was in charge of the homicide bureau in the district attorney's office in New York, and under my supervision we handled literally hundreds of homicides, and I know something about taking of confessions and how important they are.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Would you submit a brief statement for the record giving your background and your experience? I suggested that you do that in the beginning, I don't think you understood fully, but will you submit it for the record?

Mr. GRUMET. We try to appear modest.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I appreciate that, but some of those who oppose your views do not appear modest. I would like to compare experiences of those who are testifying as to different viewpoints on this subject.

Mr. GRUMET. Speaking for myself—and I will let my colleagues speak for themselves—as I said at the outset, we have had many years in law enforcement. My own career in law enforcement began back in the early 1930's when I was assistant U.S. attorney in the southern district, and where I pointed out, Mr. Lane was U.S. attorney, but after me, he is a younger man. Thereafter I was connected with the Dewey rackets investigation and served in the district attorney's office under Thomas E. Dewey and Mr. Frank S. Hogan, and as I have already explained, I was in charge of the homicide bureau where we had about 12 assistants who did nothing else but handle homicide cases, and where we took any number of confessions and where, I might point out, but for the confessions we would never have solved the case, and we took those confessions with full protection, I might point out, to the rights of the defendants. We vere very careful about that, and we issued warnings to these defendants long before the Supreme Court passed on the Miranda case.

Thereafter, by appointment of the Governor of our State, I was a judge of the court of general sessions, which is now the Supreme Court of the State of New York; and since 1958 I have been a commissioner of investigations of the State of New York.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much, Judge Ryan?

Judge RYAN. I was for 6 years assistant district attorney of Erie County, which includes Buffalo, N.Y. I was for 9 years chief city judge of Buffalo, and I resigned from that position to become a commissioner on the commission of investigations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Lane?

Mr. LANE. I was with the Department of Justice, Senator, for I believe about 12 years before I became U.S. attorney for the southern district of New York. While I was the U.S. attorney, I tried the 16 Communists which you may recall took about 10 months. Then I tried Frank Costello and I successfully convicted him. I have tried many criminals, many racketeers. Then I was a member of the judiciary committee of the county bar association in New York. From 1958 until the present I have been a member of this New York State Commission of Investigations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Gentlemen, what would be your comment about the scales of justice today, whether under present conditions and court-imposed restrictions on police interrogation they balance as between the rights of the individual and the protection necessary and to which society has a right to and deserves?

Mr. LANE. I think it is way out of balance, and it is tipped, in my opinion, in favor of the person who commits a crime.

One little point, Senator, that I might mention, maybe it is an aside, but I think that it has a bearing on your question. That is, in New York City we have over 50,000 known addicts. I don't mean users, I mean addicts, which represents, I think, close to 50 percent of the entire narcotic problem in the United States. We have a very good Treasury group in New York, they do a marvelous job——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Are you talking about the Federal Narcotics Bureau?

Mr. LANE. Yes. They do a very good job. But, they do not come anywhere near being able to solve the problem.

Now, 98 percent of our addicts are heroin users. That has been our experience. Heroin is not manufactured in this country. It comes from abroad. The United States, in a sense, is responsible for the heroin problem, that addiction problem in New York City, and yet it has done nothing about it and the people of the city and State of New York are saddled with it.

Now, if we cannot use wiretapping to try to curb or stop this thing, maybe the Senate and the Congress are not doing their duty because they are leaving New York City and New York State at the mercy of these narcotic addicts. Our own experience has taught us, a good deal of the crime that is committed is committed by addicts who are trying to get money to buy more of the stuff.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is, as peddlers?

Mr. LANE. That is right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The peddler ordinarily is an addict himself?

Mr. LANE. Seven out of 10 are, Senator; seven out of 10 of the addicts are peddlers, the other three are not.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And they have to prey on other victims in order to support their own appetities?

Mr. LANE. That is right. We had a narcotics hearing in New York not so long ago and we found out that as far as the female addicts were concerned, they get the money from shoplifting and prostitution. As far as the male addicts were concerned, they get their money from everything from using guns to killing people. Here is a city that is saddled with 50 percent of the narcotic problems in the United States. Yet we are told that we cannot use legal wiretapping today and curb this thing. We think it is a complete injustice.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How long has this restriction been imposed on you by that decision?

Mr. LANE. The Benanti case was in 1957; 10 years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. For 10 years. Prior to that time what was your experience with wiretapping? I assume if you use it now the evidence is held invalid, the court will not sustain the case or will not permit the admission of it because of the Benanti decision?

Mr. GRUMET. I think after all that New York law permits it at the present moment and they use it, some district attorneys use it, some have refrained from using it, but I think it is still being used.

Senator McCLELLAN. But if they introduce any evidence——

Mr. GRUMET. It is a Federal crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is a Federal crime, and they cannot disclose it, so whether they use it or not, they are tremendously handicapped.

Mr. GRUMET. That is right.

Senator McCLELLAN. They may get information and be able to identify people who are committing crimes but they cannot use the information they get in the prosecution of those that are guilty.

Mr. GRUMET. They still use it in many cases to obtain leads, and they may not divulge it, but I think it is high time——

Senator McCLELLAN. If it ever got to the Supreme Court, any clues you followed up as a result of a wiretap, or information that came by wiretap would be held invalid, would it not?

Mr. GRUMET. I think it is high time that the prosecutors should be able to use it in States where the State laws permit it, without feeling that they themselves are committing a crime.

I want to add one point——

Senator McCLELLAN. Some judges do refuse to grant the order now, do they not?

Mr. GRUMET. That is correct, some judges do; and that is an anomalous situation. You have judges that won't sign the order, and you have judges who do sign the orders, because as I say, the laws of the State of New York, the constitution of the State of New York permits it and we should have the privilege by Federal law, if the State wants it—that is all we are saying—if the State of New York wants it, let's have it.

Senator McCLELLAN. That is what we are trying to provide in this bill, exactly what we are providing. There are States that do not need wiretapping laws, or do not have organized crime of any consequence, and they do not need it.

Mr. GRUMET. As a matter of fact, indicating how the people of New York feel about it, through their elected representatives, I think I wrote you a letter to that effect, there was a bill put into the last legislative session which just adjourned, providing for a prohibition against wiretapping. It went to a vote in the assembly, which is the lower house of the legislature, and the bill was defeated, 2 to 1. Now, that is an indication of how the people of the State of New York feel.

Senator McCLELLAN. The people of the State of New York feel, and the law enforcement officials of the State of New York feel, that wiretapping is an essential and indispensable tool to effective law enforcement in certain areas of crime, is that correct?

Mr. GRUMET. That is right.

There is one other point I wanted to make. You asked about the scales of justice, and of course you put your finger on the basic question here, which is a question of maintaining a proper balance between the rights of the individual as against the rights of society, and I think that in recent years the scales have tipped against the rights of society.

Now, to give you some idea of the problem, last night in going through some of my papers, there was a report in the New York Times, I think 2 weeks ago, the beginning of April, indicating that there has been a substantial increase in the number of homicides in the city of New York, 149 since the beginning of the year, so I computed it—one every 16 hours, we get a homicide in the city of New York.

Senator McCLELLAN. How much was that an increase over the year before?

Mr. GRUMET. A substantial increase over the year before. As a matter of fact I have a quotation here from the chief of detectives of the city of New York who says we have 30 unsolved murders this year, the highest we ever had for a 3-month period in recent years. I believe in answer to your question, I believe that the year before there were 119 as against 149.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question at this point?

Senator McCLELLAN. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. I am wondering if you can draw any conclusion on the relationship of wiretapping to the increase in homicides. As I understand it there are States where all electronic surveillance is proscribed but which do no worse, and perhaps better, in controlling crime than States which permit bugging and tapping. There is no question about how unfortunate the increase in crime has been, but I am trying in my mind to see whether there is any relationship between this increase and the use of bugging and tapping.

Mr. GRUMET. Senator, I would relate wiretapping to organized crime. When I am talking about homicide, I would rather relate that to what I call custodial interrogation, in other words, the opportunity—I am sorry you were not here when I mentioned that, the opportunity to question a suspect or a prospective defendant, a reasonable opportunity to be afforded to the authorities.

I relate that to homicide, rather than wiretapping. In the area of organized crime, there wiretapping is important, but I did not intend to connect the increase in the number of homicides and unsolved homicides to wiretapping, but rather to the opportunity to examine a suspect.

Commissioner Lane reminds me, I was talking about confessions.

Senator KENNEDY. You do not see a relationship between the possibility of wiretapping and solving homicides?

Mr. GRUMET. In homicides, no, not too close a relation. And the reason for that is, that as a result, and I mentioned before, that I was in charge of the Homicide Bureau in New York for many years and handled hundreds of homicides and prosecuted many myself, wiretapping was not too frequently used if at all, in investigating homicides. The important thing in connection with the homicides is to get an opportunity to talk to the man who we feel knows more about it than anybody else, as I said before, if he is the defendant, having eliminated the principal witness for the State, the principal witness is dead, and sometimes it is a question of two people, the victim and the defendant who know all about it, and if you do not have a reasonable opportunity to talk to him, that is why in the New York County District Attorney's Office we had a system whereby lawyers—all of us were lawyers—and perhaps that is the better system, I think it is the better system, under Mr. Hogan, we were on call 24 hours a day. In other words, any time during the night, in the middle of the night we were called out and we supervised the questioning of—rather than the police. And as I said before to Senator McClellan, we saw to it that the rights of the individual are fully protected, he was warned about the fact that anything he said may be used against him, that he had a right to remain silent. It is true, he may not have been given the complete warning that is now required by Miranda v. Arizona.

Senator KENNEDY. And you think that additional warning in some way infringes upon effective law enforcement?

Mr. GRUMET. Does what?

Senator KENNEDY. In some way makes the task of law enforcement and law enforcement personnel more difficult?

Mr. GRUMET. If the onus is on the State to suggest to him that he ought to have a lawyer and perhaps provide one, then, of course, as you well know, any lawyer would be out of his mind to advise this man to say anything.

Senator KENNEDY. Those are his rights, are they not, under the Constitution?

Mr. GRUMET. He has a right to remain silent. About whether or not those are his rights under the Constitution, I am not so sure. He has a right to remain silent, he does not have to say anything, he should be warned, we have been doing that for years.

Senator KENNEDY. You say you have been doing that for years. What additional advice would a lawyer give that you would not give?

Mr. GRUMET. A lawyer give?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. GRUMET. I just said that the lawyer would tell him to keep his mouth shut.

Senator KENNEDY. Doesn't he have a right to remain silent?

Mr. GRUMET. Without even knowing—what?

Senator KENNEDY. Did you tell him that, too?

Mr. GRUMET. Tell him to keep his mouth shut?

Senator KENNEDY. Did you tell him he could have the opportunity to keep his mouth shut?

Mr. GRUMET. I told him he had a right to remain silent, he didn't have to say anything, anything he said might be used against him, and we made a stenographic record of that.

Senator KENNEDY. So, actually what you told him was about the same as that which a lawyer would tell him?

Mr. GRUMET. I don't follow you. A lawyer would tell him, "Don't say anything," that is his lawyer talking to him, "Don't say anything."

Senator KENNEDY. And what would you say?

Mr. GRUMET. I would tell him he had a right to remain silent, but I didn't say, "Don't say anything." I said, "If you want to talk, I will be glad to listen."

Senator KENNEDY. All right.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you know of anything in the Constitution that says before a policeman can interrogate a witness, someone suspected of a crime, that he has to offer to provide him with a lawyer, if he knows one?

Mr. GRUMET. No. And as a matter of fact, before the Miranda case the American Law Institute, which is headed by very eminent law professors, provided for a very reasonable opportunity which is referred to in the Supreme Court decision as custodial interrogation, and I might point out——

Senator KENNEDY. Did they adopt that position?
Mr. GRUMET. What?
Senator KENNEDY. Did they adopt that position?
Mr. GRUMET. Who?
Senator KENNEDY. The American Law Institute.
Mr. GRUMET. They adopted that position, but now they are reviewing it because of the Miranda case.
Senator KENNEDY. It is my understanding that that was brought out in May, prior to the Miranda decision, and it was not adopted by the American Law Institute.
Mr. GRUMET. Well, it was proposed. Now, I——
Senator KENNEDY. That wasn't the question. I am asking you whether it was adopted.
Mr. GRUMET. Well, you may be right. Prof. Herbert Wexler, who was head of that, certainly I heard him myself, propose that the authorities get an opportunity to talk to a suspect or a prospective defendant.
Senator KENNEDY. You raised the point so I think it is important for the record that you show it.
Mr. GRUMET. I think the record should, by all means, be accurate.
Senator MCCLELLAN. It was not rejected?
Mr. GRUMET. No.
Senator MCCLELLAN. The Supreme Court rejected it by the Miranda decision before they had a chance to act on it, isn't that true?
Mr. GRUMET. That's right. And I might point out that the father of the Attorney General, himself, voted in favor of custodial interrogation.
Senator MCCLELLAN. The father of the Attorney General?
Mr. GRUMET. That's right, Mr. Justice Clark, he voted for it.
Senator KENNEDY. However, as I understand it, it was not adopted. And, I would appreciate the help of the chairman on this. It was initially suggested by the witness that his position reflected the attitude of the American Law Institute; I think it is important to show for the record that it was debated but not adopted.
Mr. GRUMET. Well, I think the record has already shown that. I went along with that, if that is your recollection.
Senator KENNEDY. Now, with regard to that, we are on the question of the Clark decision, I think——
Mr. GRUMET. Pardon me, Senator. It is not the Clark decision. Mr. Justice Clark was one of the dissenting judges, it was a 5 to 4 decision.
Senator KENNEDY. Excuse me. I meant to say Mr. Justice Clark's separate opinion, and, of course, he did not join the majority. But I think it would be a misconstruction of his opinion in that decision to say that he rejected flatly the basic findings of the Miranda decision. His position was much more limited. He said—and I am reading his own words—that:

> Such a strict Constitutional specific inserted at the nerve center of crime detection may well kill the patient. Since there is at this time a paucity of information and almost a total lack of empirical knowledge of the practical operational requirements * * * by the majority, I would be more restrained lest we go too far too fast.

I think anytime we refer to Mr. Clark's opinion in that decision, it is important that we consider exactly what he was saying. I don't believe Mr. Justice Clark's opinion reflects a position that is opposed to the fundamental principles underlying Miranda, and if that case were to come up again today, I would not be suprised if the decision would be 6 to 3, instead of 5 to 4, but that is my own opinion.

Mr. GRUMET. That is a matter of opinion—that is a matter of opinion.

Senator KENNEDY. That is right.

Mr. GRUMET. That's a matter of opinion, and I might point out that since the decision was 5 to 4 and that is not the only decision in this particular area, we have one judge who swings the pendulum you just read from Mr. Justice Clark's decision, he said something about killing the patient. Now, who was the patient?

Senator KENNEDY. This is the question. Whether the patient, since the Miranda decision, has been killed. I certainly have seen no evidence that the patient is even suffering.

Mr. GRUMET. Well, I think it is too early, Senator, to say whether or not the patient has been killed. And you have got to admit that that is very strong language for the judge. The judge says you might kill the patient, and I am not prepared to say, I wouldn't even use that language, that the patient will be killed, but you have got the chief of detectives, and I want to give you a quote from the chief of detectives of the city of New York who has to handle hundreds of homicides every year. He says—and this is his quote, not my language—he says:

> We are convinced that court rulings emphasizing that those questioned by the police have a right to a lawyer while talking to us are responsible for our inability to solve more murders as quickly as we used to.

That's the chief of detectives of the city of New York.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think we ought to read the first paragraph of the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Clark, and I think it will set the record straight. He says:

> It is with regret that I find it neccessary to write in these cases. However, I am unable to join the majority because its opinion goes too far on too little while my dissenting brothers do not go quite far enough. Nor can I agree with the Court's criticism of the practices of police and investigatory agencies as to the custodial interrogation. The material it refers to as police manuals are, as I read them, merely writings in this field by professors and some police officers. Not one is shown by the record here to be the official manual of any police department, much less in universal use in crime detection. Moreover the examples of police brutality mentioned by the court are rare exceptions to the thousands of cases that appear every year in the law reports. The police agencies, all the way from the municipal and state forces, to the Federal Bureau, are responsible for the law enforcement and public safety in this country.
> I am proud of their efforts which in my view are not fairly characterized by the Court's Opinion.

I would say he dissented very much to the majority opinion, on the basis of that.

Let me ask you one or two other questions.

You refer in your statement here to a "third annual report," issued in February 1961, where you stated that criminal law enforcement in New York State has been dealt a crippling blow by the Federal court decision relating to wiretapping.

Do you have a copy of that with you?

Mr. GRUMET. I don't have a copy with me, but I will be glad to send you one.

Senator McCLELLAN. I will be glad to have it made an exhibit to your testimony.

Mr. GRUMET. Well, as a matter of fact, now that you mention it, we might also send you the transcript of the proceedings during which District Attorney Hogan and other district attorneys and law enforcement officials testified to the same effect, including, I believe, the police commissioner of the city of New York.

Senator McCLELLAN. Now, you have testified specifically here on wiretapping, with respect to the necessity for it in organized crime and in narcotics peddling, I believe.

Mr. LANE. Well, that is part of organized crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. What?

Mr. LANE. Narcotics is one of the two principal crimes utilized in organized crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. You say in your statement here, Judge Grumet, that public safety and public welfare and important investigations dealing with organized crime and official corruption have suffered, meaning or speaking as a result of the Supreme Court action in the Benanti case. Is that correct?

Mr. GRUMET. That is correct. And that is, I might say, almost the unanimous opinion of all law enforcement officers who have had any experience in this field, and I mentioned before, some of those officers.

Senator KENNEDY. Are you familiar with Vincent Piersante, who was the chief of the detectives in Detroit?

Mr. GRUMET. No, Senator; I'm sorry. I would not be familiar with him.

Senator KENNEDY. I understand that he was not only Detroit's chief of detectives, but one of the outstanding law enforcement officers in the country, and he has reached some rather different conclusions which might be of interest to you.

Mr. GRUMET. Thank you very much.

Senator McCLELLAN. On the question of an order being granted for wiretapping by court, after due hearing and so forth, do you think there should be an appeal from that order if the judge refuses to grant the order?

Mr. GRUMET. No. If the judge refuses to grant the order, I would not.

Senator McCLELLAN. You think we can entrust the discretion——

Mr. GRUMET. To the judge.

Senator McCLELLAN. To the judge to whom it is presented?

Mr. GRUMET. Yes, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. Now, let me ask you your experience in New York with respect to any abuses of your State law authorizing wiretapping. Do you have any instances, any cases that you can cite, where there have been abuses of that law?

Mr. LANE. I cannot recall any, and I believe, in talking to Frank Hogan, who was the district attorney of New York County, as I remember his testimony before us when we had our wiretapping hearings, he said he could not recall any abuse. I am talking about "abuses," by the police. There have been abuses by individuals, as you know. Private investigators have used it.

Senator McCLELLAN. I am talking about abuse of the law relating to wiretapping. Abuse of the law, of course, is present in all walks of life.

Mr. LANE. None by public officials that we know of.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am talking about the procedures. Have there been any abuses of procedures, any complaints of abuse of them, that you know of?

Mr. LANE. I do not recall any.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Of course, there is an abuse if a policeman goes out and undertakes a wiretap without a court order, but that would be a violation of the law under the bill I have introduced.

Mr. GRUMET. I want to emphasize, if it already has not been said, that some people have an idea that if this law were passed there would be indiscriminate use of wiretaps. No such thing——

Senator MCCLELLAN. It would be a crime for any unauthorized person to tap wires. There would be more protection under this bill than there is now.

Mr. GRUMET. There would have to be a showing of reasonable or probable cause that a crime was being committed, and then the judge signs the order, as far as the invasion of that person's privacy is concerned. I say that, and frankly the minute anyone is suspected of committing a crime or about to commit a crime, as would appear in the order, his privacy is immediately invaded and that has to be. A man crossing the street against the light has his privacy invaded by a policeman putting his hand on the man and taking him back to the sidewalk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Any arrest is an invasion of privacy, is it not?

Mr. GRUMET. Or any investigation has to be an invasion of privacy. We are an investigatory agency, we are investigating people right now and to a certain extent we have to invade their privacy when we have to ask for their record or ask them to come in. They may have a dinner engagement or something else that might conflict with it, and they say that they have and that this is an invasion of their privacy.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How about when an income tax agent comes down and says, "Let me see your books," is that an invasion of your privacy?

Mr. LANE. With a proper search warrant, you can go in that person's house, and I see no difference between that and getting a wiretap order.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Suppose you listen through the keyhole and hear something you can use later, is that an invasion of privacy?

Mr. LANE. I don't believe so.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Under the court's holdings, it would be one, if you carry this thing to its logical conclusion.

Mr. LANE. There is one thing I think the public has a misconception of, Senator, and that is, as to the number of wiretaps. If you talk to the average person on the street that reads about the wiretapping business in the papers, they think everybody's wire is tapped. When Frank Hogan appeared before us a few years ago in New York County, he gave us some figures. As I recall he said that in a 10-year period they had something like over 700,000 complaints of crimes and in that 10-year period they only had 700 wiretaps. That is a very small percentage. That would be about 70 wiretaps a year that they used, yet you read some of these writers and they let you believe that everybody's wire is tapped. That would be an average of about 70 a year out of some, I guess, around 70,000 complaints a year.

Senator McCLELLAN. You make reference, Judge, in your statement, to "Speaking in the name of 'civil liberties,' they completely disregard the compelling rights and interest of the public to be protected from the lawless acts of criminal elements."

Do you agree with me that civil liberties, so-called civil liberties, and individual rights today are being exhalted to the detriment of the protection of society?

Mr. GRUMET. I will repeat what I said before. There has to be, the basic issue here is maintaining a balance between the rights of the individual and the rights of the public, and I think that the rights of the public are being disregarded. I think that the rights of the individuals, although they should be fully protected, are not paramount. I say the rights of the public are paramount and when an individual interferes with the rights of the public, then of course his right to privacy ends, and I think the public has a right to question him and to invade his privacy to a certain extent, within limitations, and with proper safeguards.

Senator McCLELLAN. You made reference to the fact that there were attempts to repeal the New York State law authorizing wiretapping.

Mr. GRUMET. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. How recent was that?

Mr. LANE. This last session of the legislature.

Senator McCLELLAN. This year?

Mr. LANE. This year.

Senator McCLELLAN. 1967?

Mr. LANE. About a month or two ago.

Senator McCLELLAN. Notwithstanding the attitude of the Supreme Court, and its ruling in the Benanti case that evidence so obtained is invalid and cannot be used, notwithstanding that, the people of New York, through their representatives in the legislature, have recently refused to repeal the statute——

Mr. LANE. It was by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. GRUMET. Two to one.

Mr. LANE. I think it was 2 or even 3 to 1.

Senator McCLELLAN. I pointed out a while ago that there are some areas where wiretapping may not be needed. It may not be needed in all of the States. There may be no organized crime and it may not be necessary, but in some areas—and I would think in yours, especially so in yours—where organized or syndicated crime is a fact, where they definitely operate, and where they make use of the telephone to carry on the criminal activities, that the same privilege should be granted to law enforcement officers under proper supervision to use that same instrumentality for detection purposes.

Mr. GRUMET. That gets back again to giving the States that want it the right to use it, and New York State is one of those.

Senator McCLELLAN. This pending bill does that.

Mr. GRUMET. Exactly.

Senator McCLELLAN. I would be glad to have you gentlemen further review S. 675 and submit any comments or statements about it with respect to any changes that you feel might be important.

Now, as to the confession bill, S. 674, you have touched on that briefly in your prepared statement. I would be glad for you to further review that bill and submit any further comments that you may have for consideration on that.

Mr. GRUMET. Thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Are there any further questions?

I have an editorial here from the Progress Bulletin of Pomona, Calif., on the subject of wiretapping.

Without objection I will have it printed in the record at this point.

(The editorial referred to follows:)

[From the Pomona, Calif., Progress Bulletin, Mar. 14, 1967]

WIRETAPPING JUSTIFIED

The Republic has survived in freedom for 178 years under a Constitution that permits police to intrude on private property, search through private papers and effects and confiscate evidence under authority of court-issued warrants.

Hence it is a little difficult to understand the horror that is aroused among some people by the idea of legalized wiretapping or eavesdropping in criminal investigation.

Wiretapping and other forms of electronic eavesdropping such as "bugging"—planting of hidden microphones—are merely extensions of the traditional form of search and seizure of evidence, without which law enforcement would be crippled. It is strange that the law is being asked to foreswear the use of these technological aids but not others. Such thinking logically would deny police the use of high-speed cars and two-way radios.

There have been police abuses even under the Constitution. In recent years, court decisions refining the rules governing the scope of warrants, the admissibility of evidence obtained by means of them and the use of confessions have strengthened the safeguards surrounding the rights of suspected persons. There is no reason why these rules should not be equally applicable to information gained by electronic means.

Nonpolice abuse of this new technology is another matter entirely. Without question, the unauthorized eavesdropping of private conversations should be prohibited by law, just as is the unauthorized physical intrusion into private homes.

This prohibition should cover not only private citizens, nonpolice investigators and "industrial spies," but also agencies like the Internal Revenue Service which has been accused in the past of bugging rooms where taxpayers and their lawyers conferred.

President Johnson, however, wants Congress to pass a total ban on wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping except in cases involving the national security.

A bill introduced by Sen. John McClellan of Arkansas would allow wiretapping (but not bugging) by court order in federal investigations of a limited number of crimes and would also legalize the use in state courts of wiretapping evidence obtained in accordance with state laws.

Testifying before a Senate Judiciary subcommittee holding hearings on the subject, Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the U. S. Court of Appeals recommended that the bill be broadened to induce electronic eavesdropping as well as wiretapping and that their use be authorized in the investigation of any federal crime.

"To the great majority of Americans," he said, it is unthinkable that law enforcement should remain as impotent as it is today."

What it comes down to is this: Either we, the people, trust our police and our courts or we do not. Or if we do not trust them, either we exercise ultimate control over them, through our legislators, or we do not.

But if we have been able to trust them in the matter of physical search and seizure of criminal evidence, it is not clear just what terrible danger is now posed by permitting them a more remote form of this power.

Indeed, the danger may lie in doing the opposite.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, gentlemen, thank you very much.

Senator KENNEDY. May I just ask one final question.

In what do you think bugging ought to be allowed? Only organized crime, or other areas, too?

Mr. LANE. Bugging or wiretapping?

Senator KENNEDY. Both.

Mr. LANE. I am not so sure, I don't care much for bugging at all. There may be others that do. My personal opinion is that we should be permitted, and when I say "we," I mean law enforcement officials, to use wiretaps with reference to certain crimes that we find the underworld engaged in. The two particularly that I had reference to are gambling and narcotics. Before you came here, I expressed my theory which is that where you can use a wiretap to commit a crime, you should be able to use the wire to detect or prevent it. Bugging is a little different. I have not had too much experience with bugging. As a matter of fact, in bugging you do not use the bug to commit a crime. As, for instance in tapping a wire. My thought is that as far as gambling and narcotics are concerned, at least in our experience in New York, we have found that we could not have completed them without the use of wiretapping. We do not use them promiscuously. We use a few wiretaps to get leads and from then on our investigators go out and follow up the leads.

Mr. GRUMET. As a matter of fact, this may be of interest to you. I have a copy here of this morning's New York Times and the headline reads: "Bugging reported to yield evidence for milk inquiry. Hogan now said to change his approach as the result of the information gained." So, apparently the district attorney is using it, although I, too, with Commissioner Lane, have not had any experience with bugging, and I draw a distinction between that and wiretapping.

Senator KENNEDY. If you use the wiretapping to develop the leads, how do you go to court and get an order for authorization? That is, what basis for a warrant do you have if your purpose is to get a tap to obtain leads before you have any probable cause?

Mr. LANE. I think I gave an example of that. We received a complaint from the dean of men at Cornell about some gambling in football, on the scores, you know. So, we sent our agents up there and they had an investigation and they found it went further than that. On the basis of what they found, we went into court and got the wiretap order. As a result of that, our investigation took about 6 or 8 months and we found that this whole thing involved organized crime. It went from New York to Minneapolis and Chicago, to get the daily line on horses. Also, there is a service they have out there to give you the spread on point scores in football and we have found that the layoffs on big bets went to Kentucky, Miami, and New Orleans. After 6 or 8 months, with about 400 State police, we conducted simultaneous raids in 19 counties; and in those raids they picked up, I think, about 150 who were involved in this gambling. Also $100,000 in cash. On the basis of the material they picked up, projected by our accountants, we figured they were doing about a $500 million business just in those 19 counties. This all resulted from these leads that come from the wiretapipng.

Senator KENNEDY. It is your own personal feeling that this could not have been done without those wiretaps?

Mr. LANE. Yes, Senator. I feel it could not have been done without the wiretapping. With respect to professional gambling and horses and so forth, I do not believe a gambler could stay in business unless he has got the place to lay off bets, usually out of State, and also to get the morning line. Also there is a system that they use where they send the race results within a minute or two after the race all over the United States, and they have to do that by telephone, too.

Mr. GRUMET. Senator, I might add that we have been faced again and again this morning with reference to your question about what you have to show, that this must be done and should be done by court order. We are against all wiretapping without specific authorization in our State by a justice of the supreme court. I hope you fully understand that.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. GRUMET. Thank you, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Judge Wren. Will you have a seat, please, sir.

Judge WREN. Thank you.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much for responding to the committee's invitation to come and testify. We appreciate your cooperation.

Do you have a prepared statement?

Judge WREN. Senator, I did have. With apologies, I made some last minute changes on it, and my secretary has not yet had an opportunity to get it out here to me. The one I have before me has many marginal notations. I do have a prepared statement as such to read into the record with your permission.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, you may proceed with it.

Give us your background, please, sir.

STATEMENT OF LAURENCE T. WREN, JUDGE, SUPERIOR COURT, FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ.

Judge WREN. At the present time I am judge of the Superior Court of the State of Arizona. I've been on the bench for a period slightly in excess of 5 years. Prior to that I was 6 years in the county attorney's office, as the prosecutor.

I would like at the outset, Senator, to thank you for the privilege of appearing before your committee. I read in an Arizona newspaper, in the Law Journal, the purpose of these subcommittee hearings, and your proposals as to legislation and constitutional amendments, and the matter immediately gained my intense interest.

I would also like to thank you for your very fine and informative letter and enclosures of the Congressional Record on the Miranda case. I must confess, after reading it, I feel like I'm here to learn, rather than to impart any knowledge of our famous, or perhaps infamous, as the case might be, Miranda decision. The record was certainly replete with a very knowledgeable account of your full knowledge as to the problems.

I did note, however, that my primary concern with the Miranda rationale was only lightly mentioned in your statement and in your recommendations.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You were the trial judge in the Miranda trial?

Judge WREN. I was the trial judge of the second Miranda trial, the retrial.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The second, not in the first one?

Judge WREN. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well.

Judge WREN. I was callel to Phoenix from the northern part of the State to sit on the retrial of Miranda. I would like to add, gentlemen, that it was quite an experience. The retrial itself portrays my concern with its doctrine, and the problems which the Supreme Court decision places before us.

A jury was finally impaneled and immediately thereafter sequestered at the demand of defense counsel, Mr. John Flynn. He thereupon filed a motion to suppress certain evidence, as he is entitled to do under both Arizona and Federal law. And what followed, gentlemen, was a 9-day game of constitutional chess, during which time the jurors, during the 9 days, heard only 6 hours of testimony.

The rules of this game were so complex and the publicity on the excluded confession so intense that the jury was locked up in a motel room where they had no access whatsoever to the news media.

The attorneys and I worked long into the night researching the great web of constitutional law that each question and each answer of each witness led us into. The motion to suppress contained far more than the singular confession the U.S. Supreme Court had struck down in its consideration of the first Miranda trial and it delved deeply, very deeply into what we refer to in Arizona as that vast, dark, and completely mysterious cavern known as the fruit of the poison tree. What other evidence in the hands of the prosecutors had been tained by the unlawful confession? That is, in any way, his attorneys argued, had the verbal or tangible evidence directly or indirectly been derived from the original statement.

Mr. Justice Warren, writing for the majority in the Miranda opinion, stated that this case "presents a graphic example of the overstatement of the need for confessions and that there was adequate evidence left to convict in the Miranda case."

He further stated in Miranda "That the victim of the rape had identified her assailant."

Senator MCCLELLAN. What?

Judge WREN. Had identified her assailant. That is, she had identified Miranda in a police lineup, and he implied that justice would triumph without the use of his confession. This statement, gentlemen, is what more or less fired my resentment.

The victim's identification fell squarely back into the exclusionary rule. She had been completely unable a few minutes before to pick him out of a police lineup. The identification of Miranda came only after he had confessed in her presence that she was the girl he had raped. Nothing of the original evidence in the first trial was therefore left.

Miranda would have gone free on his second trial, because of the exclusionary ruling, on an instructed verdict of acquittal had not the county attorney's office, 1 week before the second trial, literally stumbled onto a statement made by the accused to a woman with whom he had been living at the time of the rape.

The complexities of the constitutional precepts governing her testimony were unbelievable and here, gentlemen, is my concern with the principle of the unlawful confession.

Now, Flynn's argument, that is her defense attorney's argument, was that the statement was made to her while he was still in jail and that he was unlawfully incarcerated because the arrest followed the illegally obtained confession; that the unlawful confession could not therefore constitute probable cause for the arrest; that the police had therefore placed him in the position of needing bail and a lawyer, and that his subsequent admissions to the woman, therefore, were the product; that is, the poisoned fruits of the first unlawful confession.

Senator McCLELLAN. May I inquire, just for information, was the alleged confession to her, I believe she was his common law wife, was that the relationship that presumably existed?

Judge WREN. Did this relationship exist?

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that the relationship that presumably existed between Miranda and this woman?

Judge WREN. Arizona does not recognize a common law marriage. The papers immediately tagged her as the common law wife——

Senator McCLELLAN. I noticed it in the press, I didn't know, and I ask for clarification.

Judge WREN. Under Arizona law there is no disqualification to her testifying against Miranda because, for the privilege to be exercised, there has to be, in effect, a legal marriage, and Arizona does not recognize a common law marriage. But there was a so-called common law——

Senator McCLELLAN. Was the statement to her, the confession to her, before or after the one he made to the officials?

Judge WREN. It was made the following day, it followed it.

Senator McCLELLAN. The following day? Is it not a part of the so-called poisoned fruit?

Judge WREN. This is what her attorney argued and very forcibly so, and his argument had a great deal of tenacity under our decisions. Again, this is one reason the trial took 9 days.

Senator McCLELLAN. What will happen when it goes to the Supreme Court the second time, if it follows the rule laid down in the first case, would it have to again reverse the decision or delete the material?

Judge WREN. There is a lot of argument pro and con on that proposition, Senator. The rationale of Miranda is restricted to police exploitation, in other words, interrogation by a police officer, not a lay person.

I drew the line on this point, too, but of course, Counsel Flynn had a strong argument that the environment was produced by the police, that he was unlawfully in jail and therefore it was police exploitation, rather than individual exploitation.

Senator McCLELLAN. What I am pointing out is that the confession he was convicted on the second time was a confession made by the accused after the first confession which the Supreme Court had held would be invalid if it followed the precedent set in the Killough case. In other words, under the previous decision and the precedent set in that, they would probably hold that this second confession was not acceptable. I don't know how you resolved that in trying the case.

Judge WREN. Had the second confession been given to a police officer, there is no question but that it would have had to be excluded, but all of the cases dealing with the proposition talked about police exploitation of the first confession.

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, do you think because there was no probability of police exploitation associated with the second confession that it may be held to be valid?

Judge WREN. I so ruled, because the police had not sent her there for the purpose of getting the confession; he, in fact, had sent for her. Nor, had the police in any way sat in on the conversation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is a fine distinction made here upon which there is a probability or a hope that the second conviction will be confirmed.

Judge WREN. That is correct, sir; and there is a very good possibility that it would be reversed.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Go ahead.

Judge WREN. I think, to realize the full import of the Miranda doctrine, too, one has to read the Wong Sun case in San Francisco which deals with evidence gathered pursuant to an unlawful arrest, and where a very fine thread was followed to exclude verbal and tangible evidence gathered after the confessionary statement.

Now, again, Mr. Justice Warren made the statement in Miranda, and this is the one that I feel gives the full import of it:

> That unless and until such warning and waiver are demonstrated by the prosecution at the trial, no evidence obtained as a result of interrogation can be used against him.

Justice Clark, of course, interpreted it the same way as I did, when he dissented. He said that, "failure to follow the new procedure requires inexorably the exclusion of any statement, as well as the fruits thereof."

Now, in the retrial, as I just indicated in response to your question, I restricted the application of this fruit of the poison tree doctrine to direct as distinguished from indirect police exploitation of the confession.

Gentlemen, I presented the retrial in some detail to illustrate my concern.

Miranda was convicted at the second trial, and, in a way, this was unfortunate, because it lends credence to the Supreme Court's statement that without the confession to police there was still adequate evidence. Time magazine tossed off the damage done by the exclusionary rule in Miranda by pointing out that he was convicted again on a retrial; that there was still enough evidence to convict. Any many courts might well have split the hair the other way and acquitted the defendant; holding that the confessionary evidence was the product of police activity.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Was the second confession known at the time of the first trial?

Judge WREN. No, it was not. It was not known by anyone until just shortly prior to the second trial. She suddenly became angry with Miranda over his threat to take his baby away from her because she had a child by another man while he was in prison, and for this reason her testimony suddenly came forward.

Senator KENNEDY. Had they questioned her before that?

Judge WREN. To my knowledge, Senator, as brought out at the trial, there had been no questioning or examination or interrogation of her at all until 3 days before the second trial.

Senator KENNEDY. Was there any particular reason she was not questioned before that?

Judge WREN. This was not mentioned, I do not know. I assume that they felt she would offer nothing in evidence against him because she had been living with him for a period of several years, three or four, I believe.

Senator McClellan. Proceed.

Judge Wren. When the verdict was finally in, I suddenly realized, with complete amazement and infinite disgust, that we had dealt, not at all, during that 9-day trial with the basic question of guilt or innocence. Not once had this question been even a part of our thorny legal arguments and motions. In fact, the trial, had a very ironical twist on that point. Miranda himself took the witness chair, in the absence of the jury, of course, and, while testifying that his second confession was tainted by the first, admitted on cross-examination, that he had, in fact, raped the girl.

Senator McClellan. He admitted that in chambers?

Judge Wren. No, this was in open court, in the witness chair with the jury being absent, of course. He was testifying on the question——

Senator McClellan. Out of the presence of the jury, of course they have a different terminology, but it was not in the presence of the jury, he admitted to the trial court that he did, in fact, rape the girl?

Judge Wren. This was on a hearing on the admissibility of his statements to the so-called common-law wife, that is, to the woman with whom he had been living.

Senator McClellan. It was admitted under oath, before the court which tried the case?

Judge Wren. Yes, that he had raped the girl.

Senator McClellan. Yes.

Judge Wren. And of course the question was immediately asked by me and others, and was discussed rather extensively; can you imagine the utter consternation and complete dismay of the 12 jurors had they acquitted Miranda and then read later in the newspapers that he had confessed in the witness chair.

I knew the newspapers in Arizona would be asking the question—does this type of thing create the increased respect for law enforcement officials which the Miranda principle is said to do.

I know that the hue and cry of Miranda has created an out and out bitterness in Arizona in many circles. His release might also have been rather hard on an unknown future victim because he had a history of sex offenses, and yet, in spite of all this, the Supreme Court opinion admitted that the 2-hour interrogation preceding his confession had not been unreasonable and was free of coercion in its historical sense.

I agreed with what this committee has stated, or certain members of this committee have stated, that the standards of the proof of guilt which have been voiced in the Congressional Record are more than adequate to protect the rights of the accused, and that the enunciation of such utopian principles as "no man is above the law and no man below it," used to justify our recent excursions into new constitutional interpretations do not alter this basic premise.

Some say the Supreme Court is dedicated to the proposition that confessions should be outlawed. I personally, gentlemen, would rue the day that Justice White's dissenting prediction in Escobedo would come true. We all know that interrogation is the age-old tool of the investigator. Many law officers feel that there is no stronger or more reliable evidence than the voluntary confession. And I used the word "voluntary" in its normal Websterian sense, which I feel that the drafters, our ancestral drafters of the fifth amendment were doing when they insulated confessions against their production on the whipping post or in the stockades.

I do not seriously quarrel with the doctrine of Miranda in the sophistication of police station interrogation, in other words, a formal interrogation. But when the technicalities of the courtroom are moved beyond the police station and into the police car, my quarrel then becomes alive.

I would like to demonstrate this by a brief analogy to a case which I sat on in Florence, Ariz., one Cozzie Jones, who also received some national attention. The officers in an outlying precinct had received word that a known convicted killer from back East, an escapee, was in a vehicle whose description they also had, and that he had just kidnapped a man at gunpoint. At approximately midnight the officers located the vehicle with Jones inside. They had also been warned that the occupant of the vehicle, the driver, was armed and dangerous. He was asked his name, and admitted that he was Jones.

They then asked him where the gun was and he said it was in the back seat. One of the officers thereupon said, "Where is Quast," the name of the individual he supposedly had kidnaped a short time before. Jones then admitted that he had kidnaped him and then he had killed him, and he led the officers to the spot where the body had been dumped at a desert trash dump.

Prior to the trial of this case a motion to suppress all this evidence was heard by me, and it was agreed by the county attorney's office that it would have to be granted because the principles of Miranda were not followed at the scene of the arrest and prior to the question: "Where is Quast?" The full impact of Miranda struck me when I realized the fear that these officers had out there at midnight, with a known killer, who had a gun, and who admitted in response to one question as to the whereabouts of a kidnap victim that he had killed him and dumped the body. Not only the admission that he had killed a man, but also the evidence of the finding of the body at the city dump, had to be excluded from the record, or from introduction into evidence, because clearly here was the fruit of the first poisoned statement.

Senator McCLELLAN. Because of the Supreme Court decision in what case?

Judge WREN. The Miranda case.

Senator McCLELLAN. And you had to dismiss the case and explain—

Judge WREN. This was this last January.

In addition to that, the formal interrogation which followed it by several hours in the police station had also to be stricken from the evidence and not used because under Westover, a companion case to Miranda, it was a part of this poisoned fruit doctrine.

I noted also an analogous case in the People v. Allen, reported in a New York supplement. There police officers went to the defendant's home to arrest him for the rape of his mother-in-law. In the presence of the defendant and his wife, without giving Miranda's fourfold warning, the police asked if Allen had raped the complainant. Denying the rape, Allen admitted having had intercourse with her but maintained that she had consented. He was then arrested and taken to police headquarters.

Supreme Court Judge Sobel, in holding the incriminating statement inadmissible, found irrelevant that only a single routine question was asked and held that the defendant had been questioned during a time when he was being deprived of his freedom in a significant way.

The question was designed to elicit a response that might have incriminated him and under these facts the Miranda warning was required.

Judge Sobel also found unimportant that the question was asked prior to arrest, since the defendant was not at such time free to go. He interpreted the Miranda case and he was right, but the claimed analogy to FBI practice falters here. Now, the taking of a confession at the commencement of investigation, I feel, has become a dangerous tool to successful prosecution. Heretofore it was an aid to solving crimes. Now it is a deterrent. If tossed out on a technicality any tangible evidence following it is also likely to be thrown out.

I was told recently by a very prominent and successful defense attorney in Arizona that he would actually rather defend a self-confessed criminal than one who had not made any incriminatory statement to the police. Why? Because the forensic, physical evidence which the officers had is easier to suppress, because the getting of such evidence in nine out of 10 cases follows the confessionary statement and is in some way related to it.

Now, gentlemen, when you place the doctrine of Miranda and Won Sun in the hands of very competent defense counsel, like John Flynn, Lee Bailey, Ed Williams, Percy Forman, you are rendering a conviction based on police interrogation or even in part on police interrogation well nigh impossible. And it is for these reasons that the strict mandates of the Miranda doctrine should be emasculated as not bearing directly on the issue of guilt or innocence and as not being compatible with the problem involved.

That was all of my prepared statement, Senator.

Senator McClellan. Thank you very much.

Where was this other case that had to be dismissed?

Judge Wren. The Jones case?

Senator McClellan. Where was that?

Judge Wren. Florence, Ariz. The case in itself was not dismissed. Because of a mental factor he had been committed to the State hospital. This mental factor also produced his incarceration in the State prison at the recommendation of psychiatrists. Had defense counsel so desired his acquittal would probably have been assured.

Senator McClellan. Would you say the precedents established in the Miranda and other cases, such as Escobedo and Mallory, have made it more difficult to convict the guilty?

Judge Wren. Well, I don't think there is any question about it, that it has handicapped a great deal the prosecution in those areas where such cases come into play. Of course, you, when you mention Escobedo, I have no quarrel with the Escobedo decision as such, when based on those particular facts. I think it is another area where a good case makes bad law. It is the expansion of the Escobedo case or doctrine by California when they followed it in the Dorado case that I quarrel with.

I don't have any quarrel with Mapp v. Ohio on the facts of that case, because it was a case of police brutality, but it is the highly technical situation, of nonformal interrogation in the field such as Miranda encompasses that I quarrel with. Theoretically it is applicable even to a traffic citation.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Like all of us, you are opposed to police brutality or in the extortion of a confession or an incriminating statement.

Judge WREN. Yes, on that point, yes. But in the 6 years I spent in the county attorneys office, and in the many more hours that I spent discussing these questions and problems with other prosecutors in Arizona, I have never come across a single case of police coercion on a confession, not one.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me ask you——

Judge WREN. That is, coercion in its traditional sense, not as enunciated by Miranda.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me ask you, in this second trial of Miranda—the defendant was placed on the witness stand by his own counsel in support of a motion pending before the court?

Judge WREN. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And it was in support of a motion on his behalf?

Judge WREN. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That he testified. And, upon examination by the court or by the district attorney——

Judge WREN. By the district attorney in cross-examination.

Senator MCCLELLAN. He admitted to the court——

Judge WREN. Yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN (continuing). Admitted to the trial judge under oath that he did rape the woman?

Judge WREN. That is correct.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What kind of a system of justice have we in this country, where, under those circumstances, a man can go free?

Judge WREN. Of course, Senator, in fairness to the defense here, this type of a hearing has long been required and allowed in many courts.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I am not objecting to that, I can understand that. I can well understand that it should have been heard out of the presence of the jury, no question about that. But I am showing the advantages the defendant has when he can walk into the court and look the court in the face and say, "Oh, yes, I raped her, what are you going to do about it?" Must the court turn him loose on a technicality, thus freeing him to rape somebody else?

Judge WREN. Of course, the same thing would be true in normal out-of-jury-hearing on the voluntariness of a confession.

Senator MCCLELLAN. True.

Judge WREN. In other words, the guilt or innocence really on a normal voluntary hearing is not pertinent——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Let me ask you this: What is the objection to permitting the trial court to ascertain, in the manner in which you were hearing that motion, from all of the circumstances that attended an incriminating statement or a confession and weighing it to determine whether under all of the facts it was voluntary or not? What is wrong with that procedure?

Judge WREN. I see nothing wrong with it. I see nothing wrong with incorporating the Miranda doctrine into it to that extent, so long as it does not absolutely exclude the confession. I believe this is the position taken by Justice Clark in his dissent when he states this is one of the factors which should be considered on the totality of the circumstances as to the voluntariness of the confession.

Senator MCCLELLAN. After hearing all of the testimony the trial judge concludes that there was no evidence to sustain a claim of coercion or intimidation, or that the statement was involuntary, then if he permits it to go to the jury and tells the jury "weigh it, give it such weight as you think it is entitled to under all the circumstances," what is wrong with that in our system of justice?

Judge WREN. Senator, I agree that that should be the law.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That has been the law until this Miranda decision, hasn't it?

Judge WREN. That is correct, at least in the States with which I am familiar.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That has been the law.

Now, what is wrong about that? What about that is unfair to a defendant?

Judge WREN. We are talking about the question of basic guilt or innocence under the historical test, there is nothing wrong with it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Isn't that what we ought to be doing, determining the guilt or innocence?

Judge WREN. This is what we ought to be doing; yes.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Shouldn't that be the chief objective of a criminal trial?

Judge WREN. That is correct. In fact, the defense attorney in the Miranda case admitted to me afterward, he said, "In a way I goofed this case, for I forgot about the jury. I forgot about the question of guilt or innocence and a proper presentation on that point because I became so wrapped up on getting it dismissed on constitutional questions." But of course, the constitutional issues have an important bearing.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I take it you would support the confessions bill which I have introduced. I have never talked to you about it, I don't know your position, I am just asking you.

Judge WREN. I support the language of it, Senator, but I don't feel that it would change anything.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you think the court would hold it unconstitutional, is that what you mean?

Judge WREN. No, because there is nothing unconstitutional in a sense, about our present law on confessions, although most of it is derived from the common law and from a doctrine of stare decisis, rather than from specific enunciations of our legislators.

But the thing is that the Miranda doctrine is itself based upon the proposition of voluntariness. This is replete throughout the opinions in both the majority and the minority, and of course, in Johnson v. New Jersey, they enunciated that it was based on the voluntary doctrine, but they were ruling on the question of its retroactivity. So, to merely state that these principles shall be considered by the judge, as you have proposed in S. 674, and later by the jury as bearing on the question of voluntariness, does not and would not, I feel, change the Supreme Court's position on Miranda, because they have stated that failure to advise the accused of his right to a lawyer is something that would absolutely bar the confession and they also state that this has a direct bearing on the question of voluntariness; that the coercion may result from psychological as well as physical pressure.

Senator McCLELLAN. The bill proposes that the jury take that into account, it doesn't say that they are bound, they may take into account whether he was advised that he might have an attorney, but it doesn't preclude the testimony just because he was not so advised.

Judge WREN. I understand this, Senator, but as long as the Supreme Court has Miranda on its books and wants to follow it, they could and probably would follow it, I feel, without in any way declaring that this is not a valid proposition.

Senator McCLELLAN. They might find some pretext to get around it.

Judge WREN. I think as long as the fifth amendment is in its present form, and as long as we have the——

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think we have got to revise that?

Judge WREN. I think that the only way that the Miranda doctrine can be emasculated is to spell out what the fifth amendment means or to set out specifically that the Miranda doctrine is not applicable to a fifth amendment confessionatory statement.

Senator McCLELLAN. It may be highly improbable in this instance, but it becomes a very common practice for some Supreme Court Justices to change their minds.

Judge WREN. Whether it would have this effect or not on the Supreme Court, I don't know, but legally I don't think that S. 674 would have any effect. Of course, it is applicable only to the Federal courts, No. 1; and secondly it merely sets forth——

Senator McCLELLAN. But, if it is applicable to the Federal courts, and should a State legislature pass a comparable statute, the Supreme Court would have to sustain if it sustained the Federal statute, I assume.

Judge WREN. That would probably be correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. That would probably be correct. I don't know whether we can say it would be correct or would not, but if the Federal Government practices something and the Court holds the Federal statute to be constitutional, I assume that a like State statute actually would be held constitutional; would it not?

Judge WREN. Yes; I think that probably follows.

Senator McCLELLAN. Let me ask you another question. Do you know the past criminal record of Miranda?

Judge WREN. He had a history of sexual problems.

Senator McCLELLAN. What?

Judge WREN. Sexual problems, sexual deviant behavior, based in part on psychiatric reports and in part on prior arrests. It did not deal, I believe, with a felony, but it did deal with a misdemeanor on some sex offense, the exact nature of which I do not at this time recall.

Senator McCLELLAN. Had he not also been convicted in Tennessee under some statute?

Judge WREN. I don't know as to an actual conviction on a sex offense, but he had been picked up before and he had been investigated and psychiatric tests, if I recall correctly, were made on him.

Senator McCLELLAN. Again, he was not a total stranger to court procedures, after arrests and interrogations?

Judge WREN. I couldn't answer that. I am sure he had been in court before, but just how much advice they had given him, I don't know, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. Judge, as I understand the Escobedo case, the holding was to the effect that an accused is entitled to a lawyer in a police station, that he is entitled to legal counsel and legal advice while he is being held in a police station?

Judge WREN. I don't believe Escobedo goes that far. In Escobedo the accused had already retained counsel. Escobedo was a sixth amendment case, not a fifth amendment. In other words, Escobedo went to the proposition that the accused had already had counsel and requested counsel, was entitled to have him and, you see, there was an actual request made there. It wasn't a question of being warned under his fifth amendment rights.

Senator KENNEDY. Nonetheless, he was entitled to counsel at that time?

Judge WREN. At interrogation?

Senator KENNEDY. At interrogation.

Judge WREN. Yes, sir.

Senator KENNEDY. And Miranda says he is to be notified of that right?

Judge WREN. That is correct.

Senator KENNEDY. Is this the point where you distinguish between what you find acceptable and what you find objectionable?

Judge WREN. No, Senator. I'm sorry, perhaps I did not make myself clear. I have no quarrel with the warning question being given, I have no quarrel that this is an accused's right. Perhaps he should be informed of it. But my quarrel is that it goes way beyond merely being considered a part of the overall picture, of whether the statement is or is not involuntary, and rendering it per se an involuntary statement and excluded in evidence, because I don't think it in any way deals with the competency of the evidence or the question of guilt or innocence of the accused. Take for instance, an interrogator. An interrogator who would use third-degree methods to obtain a confession and deny their use later in court, would also prevaricate and lie as to the giving of the warning question. Miranda accomplishes very little of its intended purpose.

I don't think commonsensewise we could say that Miranda would in any way detract from that. The Miranda doctrine is too difficult to use in the field. Again, I don't have any real quarrel with it, or its use in a sophisticated police station interrogation, but to require an officer in the field facing a gun and perhaps fear, to have to give the warning questions before he can ask any type of question that might bring forth an incriminating statement, is, to me, going too far. I don't think—and the issue in the Miranda case itself did not deal basically with whether or not it should be given—it dealt with the fact that when it is not given and whether this would in any way keep the confession out by per se rendering it involuntary, in other words, the issue between the majority and the dissenting judges in Miranda was not, as I read it, "should we give the warning question?" All agreed, the dissenters agreed, that this is one of the rights, and perhaps he should be advised of it, but not to make it within the exclusion rule.

That is my thinking as well.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you, Judge, thank you very much.

Mr. Wilson—is Mr. Wilson present, Orlando Wilson?

(No response.)

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Robert W. Johnson.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Johnson, will you come forward. Senator Mondale hoped to be here to introduce you in person. However, other commitments prevented his doing so. Instead he has asked that this letter of introduction be placed in the record, and I so direct.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
April 19, 1967.

Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures,
New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Through this letter I would like to introduce to this Committee Mr. Robert Johnson, attorney for Anoka County, Minnesota. He is accompanied by Mr. Cecil Hegarty of the city of Anoka Police Department. I know both of these men personally. My knowledge of their backgrounds and accomplishments leads me to believe that they have a valuable contribution to make and that their testimony will be of benefit to the Committee.

I appreciate the fact that they have been called as witnesses.

Sincerely,

WALTER F. MONDALE.

You may identify yourself and proceed.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT W. JOHNSON, COUNTY ATTORNEY, ANOKA COUNTY, MINN.

Mr. JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My name is Robert Johnson. I am county attorney of a surburban county of Minneapolis and St. Paul. I have been county attorney since 1950.

In addition to that, I am chairman of the Minnesota Municipal Commission that passes on annexations and corporations, mergers, this type of thing for the State of Minnesota, primarily dealing in the metropolitan area.

I have been chairman of the Governor's Advisory Council on Children and Youth for 6 years, which relates in part to activity that has to do with prevention of crime.

Anoka County is a surburban county and I was very interested in hearing the testimony this morning that this——

Senator MCCLELLAN. What kind of county.

Mr. JOHNSON. A suburban county.

This is quite a change of pace from what you have heard so far this morning, because we don't deal in thousands, we deal in hundreds and less than hundreds, where New York and other places are dealing with much larger numbers.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have someone with you that you can identify?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Cecil Hegarty is with me. He is an investigator for the city of Anoka.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How long have you been an investigator?

Mr. HEGARTY. Four years, but I have been with the police department 12 years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You have been a policeman for 12 years?

Mr. HEGARTY. Twelve years.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Do you have a prepared statement, Mr. Johnson?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have a prepared statement which has been duplicated and each of the committee members has a copy of it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Rather than read it in its entirety, I would simply summarize it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well. Let the statement be printed in the record in full and we will be glad to have you summarize it, Mr. Johnson.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Robert Johnson follows:)

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MR. ROBERT JOHNSON

Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee on the Judiciary, it is a privilege to have an opportunity to testify before you in regard to this very vital and critical matter.

By way of background so that you can better evaluate my testimony, I will identify myself first as being Robert Johnson from Anoka, Minnesota. I am County Attorney of Anoka County and have been County Attorney since 1950. Anoka County is a part of the Minneapolis-St. Paul metropolitan area. We are adjacent to both Hennepin and Ramsey Counties—Minneapolis being located in Hennepin Co. and St. Paul in Ramsey Co. Mpls.-St. Paul are the core cities. In the year 1950, Anoka County had a population of 35,579; in the year 1960, 85,816; and our estimate now as of Jan. 1, 1967, is 140,000. The governmental structure within our county is: we have 5 cities, 9 villages, 7 townships—the cities & villages vary in size from about 300 to 27,000. The townships vary in size from about 500 to 2,000. Our police departments within the county vary from townships without even so much as a Constable to cities with a police force of about 20. The County Sheriff's office has 25 deputies. In 1950 the Sheriff had 2 deputies in addition to himself to take care of the police work in the county as far as the county responsibility. Some of the townships have one and two constables who are merely on call. The villages by and large have either constables or part-time policemen who work at a regular job in the daytime and then work in the evening as a part-time patrol officer. One of the villages has a police department made up of a chief and 3 part-time officers. Of the 4 cities, one has 2 investigators who have had some training in investigating. Three have investigators who have merely been assigned this responsibility but do not have any formal training and one of the cities does not have an investigator at all. In the Sheriff's Department the table of organization calls for 8 investigators. At the present time he has 3 and only one of the 3 has any type of formal training in the field of investigation or detective work. At the present time the Sheriff is contemplating adding 5 more investigators who he will attempt to recruit from the patrol and obviously, they will come into the force without any training in the field of investigation or detective work.

As you can readily see, our problem is very great. The incidents of crime in our suburban area have been alarming in the amount of increases and our ability to cope with this problem is, to say the least, very limited. The problem indeed is so complex that it is a little difficult to know just where to start explaining. In order to bring some order to the approach of this question, I will list the matters that I will discuss, not necessarily in their order of importance:

(1) The need for training
(2) The availability of training
(3) The practical considerations in making training available to the different departments
(4) The problems we are having in operating under the existing Supreme Court decisions
(5) Efforts that we are making to cope with the problem
(6) Suggestions that we are making to the committee which would be helpful to us.

No. 1: the need for training, of course, is self-evident. All you have to do is examine the information I have given you and with your knowledge of the law and the rights of the individuals under existing cases and the complexity of responsibilities that a police officer has in today's sophisticated society, the need for training is so overwhelming that it is self-evident. Perhaps this would be a place, however, to review just briefly with you what is expected of a police officer in the suburban area, which is somewhat different from the responsibility that a police officer has in a larger department such as Mpls. or St. Paul or one of the other metropolitan police forces where they have these various degrees of specialization. I am sure you gentlemen recognize that the Supreme Court decisions have placed tremendous responsibility on the patrol officer that he previously did not have. Perhaps the best way to illustrate this would be to speak of specific cases confronting patrol officers so that you can better understand the complexity of their responsibility—

One day about 2 in the morning in January, 2 of our patrol officers were making a routine check of a liquor store that has been burglarized 4 times in the last year, and as they approached the building they noticed a hand disappear from the roof of the building and within a few seconds saw 2 men running away from the building and off into the woods. They radioed for help and pursued the individuals on foot, apprehended one of them in the woods at about 2:30 that AM. The other one surrendered to one of the other squad cars that answered their call for help. Here you have the demonstrated need for keenness of observation of the officers as they approached the building because, obviously, had they not seen the hand, there would be some question as to their right to arrest these 2 people who they saw running across the field. Then you move into the psychological tension of the chase in not knowing if the men were armed or not, the pressure of self-preservation, together with the competitiveness of the situation. When they finally apprehended one individual, then under the Miranda case, of course, they were required to give the suspect his warnings and this would have to be very carefully and accurately given to the defendant. Not only that, they would have to create a situation in which the defendant understood what was being said to him and able to intelligently waive any rights he had. Mind you, this is 2 AM and 2 big burly policemen with their guns drawn and under this type of a setting, they then have to be able to handle this in such a way that psychologically they have acclimated the individual apprehended into a frame of mind where he can intelligently and calmly waive any rights he might have relating to any confessions or admissions he might make under the circumstances. Now those same 2 men very well within their same tour of duty may be called upon to settle a domestic quarrel between a hysterical wife and a drunken husband, handle some obnoxious and difficult teenagers, be called upon to render first aid with loving care and tenderness to someone who was injured—yes, even possibly deliver a baby—be called upon to investigate and report on neglect and dependency matters, handle a complaint relating to mistreatment of animals and the whole gamut of human behavior, of course, that they could be called upon to make judgments on and handle.

I guess what I am trying to establish is that this man we call a patrol officer must be a highly trained, very able, dedicated and resourceful person if we are going to carry out the mandates and directives of the Supreme Court. Let it be perfectly clear that I can understand the logic of the Supreme Court and its majority opinion but the ability to implement this type of logic is very limited.

If the patrolman makes a mistake at any one of several very critical areas as he is apprehending a criminal or alleged criminal, this mistake can not only result in a failure of prosecution but can result in substantial criticism to himself for his failure to have carried out his responsibilities. The results of these responsibilities are many and varied. Not the least of which is a very severe morale problem. It is much easier for the officer just to not see the problem and not address himself to an attempted solution to the problem because he certainly feels and rightly so that with the emphasis the way it is today, really he goes on trial as soon as he makes any kind of an arrest. So that in order to avoid controversy or any problem it is much easier for him to just not see whatever it is. Pick off the simple ones and avoid the complicated ones and all will be well.

The need for training, gentlemen, is very great. There are quite a number of training courses available. The State of Minn. through the Crime Bureau conducts a number of regional training sessions covering different areas and responsibilities in police work. Mpls. and St. Paul both have training schools. Hennepin County chiefs of Police have a training school. But these are inadequate to meet the needs of this type of a community such as Anoka County. The larger departments in the county take advantage of these training sessions. Of necessity there are several major weaknesses. First, your part-time policeman is not going to be able to take advantage of this. Your one and two man police departments are not going to take advantage of this. Your local communities are not prepared to release these men for the schools nor to pay the cost of attending, the cost being, of course, primarily the time that these men must be off from work. In this regard and a little aside, one could say that the community is at fault and should assume this responsibility and if they do not want to assume it, it is just too bad.

Well, in this regard I would further identify myself as chairman of the Minn. Munic. Comm. I have been on the commission for 8 years and conducted hearings throughout the state, mostly in the metropolitan area relating to annexation, incorporation, merger and detachment. Through these hearings you begin to pick up the tremendous number of problems confronting a community who are newly formed and becoming urbanized. If you visualize a group of people who have formed a government and are starting from scratch, you can just run down the list of water, sewer, roads, sidewalks, recreation, zoning, planning, building codes, fire departments, and police then just becomes one of a great multitude of responsibilities that they are assuming to provide for themselves. I suppose basically we always think the other guy is honest and as we form together we sort of assume we are not going to have any problem in our community because everyone loves everyone. At any rate, it is an American tradition that you can take care of yourself. It used to be we had our dog and our gun and I guess this was kind of a law enforcement officer on your own. It is a little difficult for a community, which is a group of people, to recognize the problems inherent in policing under today's set of rules that we have to go by. As a result, policing is kind of far down the list when it comes to establishing a substantive program for this responsibility. A community really is no different than you or I individually. We sort of respond to the need as it develops, so I suppose that if a community would have an experience of a heinous crime or just as certain leaders in the community would be subjected to some criminal element, then the community would get on the move and chances are that in this type of emotional reaction you would have an extreme reaction and this is what I fear most. That is that if we in law enforcement are unable to provide adequate and proper police protection, the public after experiencing a series of indignities and the criminal element are going to cause the pendulum to swing to the other extreme where we end up with a police state.

The other aspect of the training program is that criminal laws have been changing so rapidly that it is really a week by week basis in which you can determine what rights you have and don't have. For example, when the Miranda case came down in June last year we had cases pending which were handled properly prior to that time but did not come up for trial until after that time. We then could not prosecute them because the proper warnings had not been given prior to making the confession. This goes to the matter of training patrol officers and investigators, and in the absence of having this on-going, in-service training at the department and patrol level, you get this delayed training where these officers are proceeding on the basis of what they had been previously trained or taught to be the law and had not had occasion to be informed to the contrary because of the lack of training of any on-going, in-service kind.

The third concern I have is that training programs are basically lecture programs, and the men who are in the police departments attending these lecture programs are not experienced in taking notes from lectures and as a result they retain but very little of what they hear. It is my opinon that the training programs have to be designed in such a way that those attending are able to understand and retain enough to make it usable. It is my impression that this is not the case with the training programs we have. They are better than nothing, but the point is, they are not getting the job done in the type of detail necessary to keep up with the sophisticated rules the Supreme Court has enunciated.

The problems that we experience in our county of operating under the existing rules have been quite substantial. Let me just by way of passing before I get into specific instances and cases involved make my observation that the full impact of these rules on the effectiveness of law enforcement and successful prosecutions has not yet been experienced. We have a public defender system in Minnesota newly instituted and reasonably effective. There is no question in my mind that as time goes on, if the technical rights are strictly adhered to and pursued in depth in each case, our rates of successful prosecution will be cut in half. We have had in addition to this observation that the worst is yet to come, let me illustrate specific instances of cases where we have failed in prosecution or are likely to fail because of the rules we have to proceed under.

The instances which I cited earlier relating to the attempted burglary at the liquor store when these two individuals were informed of their rights under Miranda, they both indicated an unwillingness to talk and of course immediately upon having expressed this unwillingness to talk, we were forbidden from having any further conversation with them about the matter.

Last fall a specific case we had—a young man was apprehended in another jurisdiction by a patrol officer for careless driving and as he radioed in to have a license check on the car he found that it was a stolen car. He then noticed on the seat alongside the driver that there was, among other things, a notarial seal for Anoka County, so he started inquiring of this individual on various matters he may have been involved in and failed to give the man his Miranda warning. The man confessed to a burglary in our county in a general way. The officer then realized he had something more than a misdemeanor on his hands and took him to the police station, where he was given his Miranda warning in its complete detail. He then again confessed to the crime in Anoka County. We charged him and under a motion to suppress the evidence came out that he had made the admission of this crime prior and it was then the "fruit of the forbidden tree" theory and as a result we were unsuccessful in the prosecution of the case.

We had a situation come up a few weeks ago—we had a man who committed a felony and was racing away from the scene and the police officer was pursuing him and the police officer shot the man. A bullet went through his kidney and liver and the officer rushed up to him and was administering to his wounds and wiping the blood away and at the same time reciting the Miranda warning to him as he lay in this prone, critical condition. The officer was surely doing what he should do, but I think it is kind of illustrative of a frantic mind functioning in a terribly tense situation.

Increasingly we are running into the situation where the individuals who have been apprehended are refusing to give a statement and refusing to talk. Unfortunately, almost exclusively, these individuals are "con wise"—those previously involved in crime. As I have understood from reading just about everything I can find on the subject, the total motivation behind the rules of criminal law that we are caused to operate under is to protect the innocent man or to certainly prevent the possibility of some poor innocent individual being talked into confession to a crime for which he is not guilty. The thing that is emerging from all of this is that those individuals we try to protect through this type of Supreme Court decisions are the types now giving us statements. A person not previously involved in a crime will very readily talk to us. It is the recidivist who really is the menace to society who has taken advantage of the rules. So we are really not accomplishing as a society the very thing we have set out to accomplish. No responsible law enforcement officer wants to convict an innocent man and no responsible law enforcement officer objects in the least to informing the man who previously has not been at odds with the law of all of his rights, even to the point of overlooking his transgressions and helping him out of his particular problems, whatever they might be. I have seen this happen many times. So the problems of working with the rules are extremely great and they are hurting us and will hurt us a lot more before we are through.

The fact that the policeman is the man on trial, at least as it appears in the minds of some of the people, was so dramatically illustrated to me a few months ago when I was in Juvenile Court and the young man who was before the court on questioning said, and the officer verified—at the time the car full of teens was stopped because of his erratic driving and it was discovered they had been drinking. This young man then said, "Copper, you didn't ask the questions, you answer them. You have no right to arrest me. You better watch your step on what you are doing to me because you are the one who is on the spot—not me!!"—words to that effect and as a matter of fact quite a bit stronger. Now this young man was not a habitual delinquent. He was not one of our better citizens but he was not a habitual delinquent either. When I asked him where he had picked this up he said well among other places he had been told this in a class in high school. And then he said of course he has read the paper that the police don't have any right to question individuals and that they better know what they are doing and not arrest him, etc. I just give this by way of example that this is the sort of thing our young people are picking up, and we are in for a lot more trouble before this is over.

What efforts are we making to cope with the problem? For the past two years our office has had monthly meetings with the Chiefs of Police of the county in order to discuss our situation and problems and attempt to solve the problems. For the past 1½ years, our office has had weekly two hour discussion sessions with the investigators of the Sheriff's office and for the last 3 months for the entire county. We discuss on a case by case basis the different matters that have come up within the county and use this as a case study approach to point out in retrospect what should have been done and how matters should have been handled and to review the Supreme Court decisions as they come down almost weekly in interpreting the law in various ways. Hopefully then, they will transmit this information to the men in the department. In addition to this, I have mentioned earlier, the various training sessions are available. At the present time the Univ. of Minn. has legislation before the Legislature to develop a police academy, and I happen to be on the committee for the Univ. academy. We have a state committee that has been formed by the Governor to have a $25,000 grant with matching funds from the state to make a study of the problems of apprehension, prosecution, sentencing, and corrections.

The approach—again coming locally—our approach in the County Attorney office has been met with enthusiastic response on the part of the police. In addition to these weekly meetings we have met with various departments in which we discuss search and seizure, arrest, probable cause, etc. One of the departments has set up monthly meetings which we attend in going into these same matters. These efforts we are making are perhaps feeble at best, but nonetheless, it is the recognition on our part of the problem and addressing ourselves to the best of our ability to seek out a solution.

Suggestions as to approaches to this problem—

In the first instance, I am satisfied that there has to be an in-service training program developed that can be taken to the departments within the municipalities. The regional training programs serve a purpose, but you cannot keep up with the changes in the law and you cannot really localize the approach in a manner that is understandable by the average police officer so that he can put into practice those things which he has learned.

The discussion approach on a department by department basis has proven very satisfactory and helpful to us. The men are not as fearful of being embarrassed and as a result participate in the discussions. They ask questions and make contributions to the discussions at a local level that they understand and can then apply. It would seem to me that a method should be devised where communities such as Anoka County would be able to get assistance to set up a permanent in-service training officer or officers operating out of the County Attorney office where he, together with the County Attorney or his representative, can meet weekly with the various departments to discuss their problems and bring to them the changes in the law, bring to them solutions to their problems in light of the current Supreme Court decisions, and above all, bring to them the techniques of investigation as science might tend to develop them, receive from them suggestions as to how the county law enforcement responsibility could better be carried out, what facilities they would want the county to provide, and the whole broad cross-section of things that would come out in this type of give and take discussions. It is my impression that this officer should work out of the County Attorney office because as you know, there is a certain amount of jealousy between all police departments. If he were attached to the Sheriff's office, you would have to overcome this type of interdepartmental jealousy in order to get the proper reception for this man. It is my impression that where all of the cases in the nature of gross misdemeanors and felonies are prosecuted by the County Attorney, the effectiveness of the law enforcement officer and the evidence he has received is no better than the prosecuting attorney's willingness to proceed under the facts he brings to him, the way in which he has acquired those facts, and the whole complete case as it is presented. If it be the prosecuting attorney's final judgment on how these things should be presented, then it seems he should be the one to direct the training process so that the facts are collected and presented in a manner that at least in his judgment would justify a prosecution.

Another approach to this whole matter of in-service training would be the development of program learning techniques used in education. The use of visual aids and the modern teaching methods where each officer at his own pace could take a course in whatever subject he might need—I am thinking specifically of the one where with visual aids you receive a lecture on tape with a viewer and at the conclusion of a certain unit you are asked questions and you answer them and you cannot go on to the next unit until you have demonstrated the fact that you have absorbed and learned what is presented to you in that session. The problem with this, of course, is that there would have to be a constant updating of the information contained in the lectures.

STATISTICS

It is impossible in a presentation like this to be comprehensive to the extent of covering the total problem as it exists. We daily experience frustrations as a result of the Supreme Court rulings. It is imperative in order to preserve our way of life that very drastic steps be taken to upgrade the quality of law enforcement, to reinstill public respect for law enforcement officers, to develop this in such a way that communities such as Anoka County, who have not developed the art of federal program craftsmanship are able to participate. I am sure you are well aware that by the time these well meaning programs see the light of day, they become so complicated and so full of, I suppose, ideas and prejudices, that a community such as our county is unable to draft a proposal that would be acceptable. Those governmental units that are large enough to hire this type of skill are able to take advantage of the federal program and the rest of us are not. Still, our need is much greater. It is only when those who are drafting the guidelines that must be followed in order to qualify for funds have a full realization and appreciation of the problems of suburban communities that we will have guidelines prepared which will be meaningful to us and under which we can qualify.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

It is apparent that the general public do not respect the police. It is evident in many ways. We see it in the courtroom. The policeman's testimony is often given little more weight than the testimony of a criminal or his buddies. We see it in the refusal by people to assist the police. You see it in the riots where the mobs turn on a policeman when he is trying to make an arrest. Most of all, we see it when we are trying to recruit men for the department. Recruiting is so very difficult because the respect and prestige is down. There are many other examples that illustrate the point that people in general have lost respect for the police.

The majority of the population is under 25 years of age. We should look to this age group to determine what qualities of character they respect. Once we have determined what impresses this group, we should determine if there is some way we can use this information to help develop respect for our police.

This young group respects:

1. The man who is the outstanding athlete.
2. Physical strength.
3. Shooting skill.
4. Daring—bravery.
5. Physical appearance.
6. Intellect.
7. Artist—exceptional talent.

This is but a limited list.

I would propose that Anoka County would be provided with a training officer and the facilities to carry out the training. Every police officer in the county should be required, in addition to regular training programs, to be trained in judo, karate, weight lifting, gymnastics, and shooting. This should be repeated as often as necessary to keep them reasonably proficient. From the Anoka County police officers (different departments), judo and karate teams should be picked. They would give demonstrations to various school assemblies and service groups. Hopefully, they would give these demonstrations at schools yearly. One or more shooting teams should be picked. They would be available for demonstration shooting. Possibly a film, using team, should be made of their shooting prowess. This could include all types of shooting to make it interesting. This film would be made available to schools for assembly programs. Using these and perhaps other such demonstration techniques to develop a receptive audience, a well trained speaker should then give a short, effective, entertaining speech developing the theme that the police are a highly trained and reliable group of men. Awards should be designed and given which would be for heroic acts—humane acts—outstanding and dedicated acts which would tend to cause people to respect the police.

This type of positive approach would not only cause the general public to respect them but would cause the policeman to have respect for himself. The internal benefit would be very great indeed.

We desperately need—first, your understanding; second, your concern; third, your willingness to do something about our problems. I appreciate very much the opportunity I have had to appear before your committee. Thank you.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before I would start summarizing, I would concur in a statement made by the judge who just preceded us here. And as I develop the case for the suburban county, I think it would become very evident to the committee that my concern is directed at the problem of the policeman who is out in the field.

Miranda, as you are taking it into the police station, is one thing, but Miranda out in the middle of the woods at 2 o'clock in the morning, after having given chase to a criminal, is an entirely different matter.

I think it reached its point of—and I mentioned this in the statement, but I would use it as a digression before going into the statement—I think it reached its point of indicating how kind of frustrated police officers are about this in a case that happened in Columbia Heights, one of our cities, about a month ago.

A policeman was giving chase to a narcotics addict who had used a false name in order to obtain a prescription. The policeman was attempting to arrest this individual, and this individual fled from him. The officer fired two warning shots, asked him to halt, and he did not halt, so the policeman then shot and wounded him. The shot went through a part of his liver and kidney, and the man was in very critical condition.

The officer rushed up to this man and pulled out his handkerchief, and was sponging the wound, and while sponging the wound, recited the Miranda warning, which, in my mind, indicates a total lack of understanding of really what Miranda says.

Miranda not only says you recite the Miranda warning, but that the defendant understands it, and this is the part of Miranda that is so difficult in the field and that the police are finding terribly frustrating and a morale factor. The police force is suffering greatly as a result of it.

Well, now to get back to the presentation as it relates to our problem.

I would identify first Anoka County. I have talked about it as being suburban and adjacent to Minneapolis and St. Paul.

When I first was county attorney in 1950, we had 35,000 people. Actually, 35,579 people. Then in 1960, it was 85,000 people, and now in 1967 it is estimated to be 140,000 people.

The governmental structure of the county varies. We have five cities, nine villages and seven townships. They vary in size, about 300 to as many as 27,000. The townships vary in size from about 500 to 2,000.

The police departments in the county vary from no police, no constable, to the fee system constable, to the part-time constable, to the part-time officer, to the one-man police force, to the 20-man police force.

Now, this becomes very significant as you look at the Safe Streets Act that has been proposed. I will get into that later as we talk about it.

This creates, of course, a great problem, if you try to be as sophisticated as the Supreme Court has us try to be in these matters. You win and lose these lawsuits or your success and failure and prosecutions are based on that first contact. You win or lose it right at that point when the patrol officer first meets the man on the street. If he fails to give the warning, you are out, regardless of what happens. The fruit of the forbidden tree follows and you are unable to get a successful prosecution. You are unable to bring justice, if I may use that word in a general way.

Let me digress again and then I will come back. One thing occurred to me yesterday as I was listening to the Attorney General testify. He was talking about statistics and perhaps I am being very elementary and very naive in this whole process, but I must say this, that statistics really in this whole field of the ability to detect and have successful prosecutions is very misleading. The FBI statistics refer generally to cleared cases. Now, cleared cases can mean different things to different chiefs, and I know from my own experience. The reporting process has with it an inherent problem that the success of the chief of police relates to the ability as he is able to administer or control crime within his jurisdiction. So, you have a locked-in almost conflict in this whole reporting process.

I could give you example after example where we have cleared from two to as many as 250 cases out of which you would not be able to get more than one successful prosecution because of this situation. Not that I am saying that you should prosecute him 50 times, that's not my point. My point is that Miranda is not an inhibition because you have "cleared" as many cases. These cases are cleared because these people, once they were caught, said, "Well, in spite of Miranda, we will give you the whole facts." Then they reveal everything and this very often is done without the benefit of Miranda.

I'm not saying this very well, but I think you get the gist of what I am saying. Statistics, if there are to be statistics, and certainly we must have them, must be based upon a clear and concise definition of what it is that is to be reported.

I would like to just quickly go into the six subdivisions, if you want to call them that, that I want to talk about.

First, there is a need for training; second is the availability of training; third is the practical considerations in making training available to different departments; fourth is the problems we have in operating under the Supreme Court decisions; the fifth is the efforts we are making to cope with the problem; sixth is the suggestion we are now making where the law could be made helpful to us.

Now, the need for training in the suburban area is very great. Your larger police departments are sophisticated, they have their own training program, but based upon my own experience as a municipal commissioner, these new communities that are developing have a host of governmental problems.

Each municipality has problems concerning zoning ordinances, streets, water, the whole gamut of problems with services that a community is to provide. Police is just one of them, and so in the struggling process they have a minimum budget and they hire a man as a policeman and then he becomes their police force. A one-man police department. That man cannot leave the community to go and take a training session. Training somehow has to be brought to him. That man does not have a supervisor to turn to, to assist him and answer the questions that he has that would relate to Miranda and other court decisions, and so this man actually should be a more competent policeman than even the routine policeman that you get in a sophisticated police department. But the thing works against itself.

You hire a man without training because you are on a minimal budget and he has to be the chief, the supervisor, the investigator, the patrol officer, and the whole business and he has no one to turn to for his direction. This is the policing that you get in the suburban areas. Then you impose the Escobedo case and the Miranda case on his judgment and hold him to this high degree of sophistication the court refers to, that the FBI has been functioning under for years. This is not comparing apple for apple, it is comparing apples with dried apricots because the FBI functions in an entirely different area. They function in an entirely different type of case. They do not have the on-the-scene-type of problems. The policeman has to be a very complex individual.

I will use a specific example. This was back in December of last year. There is a liquor store that is out a way from everywhere that has been burglarized four times in the last year. The squad car pulled up there and detected a man coming down off the roof. A few seconds afterward, there were two people running away. The two big burly policemen gave chase and caught one of these men out in the middle of the woods. They then, you see, had to go from the psychological position of self-protection—and if you have ever been in this situation, policemen gave chase and caught one of these men out in the middle of the night, you don't know whether these people are armed or not armed—you are in a kind of a psychological position of a chase and immediately upon getting him, you not only have to recite the warning to him, you have to psychologically handle that man in such a way that he understands the warning.

This is a part of Miranda that is very often overlooked. All of a sudden the officer must then become a pacifier. Then, within a half an hour he must go and handle a domestic; he has to be compassionate to someone relating to an accident; he has to have first aid training; he probably gets involved in picking up some animals; and he might have to go out and help deliver a child. A man who is an extremely complex person is the type policeman that particularly is required in the suburban areas, because this man has to be all things.

Your larger police organizations are departmentalized and he does not have to be all things.

My point is that the suburban officer is the man who does not have the training because the community is not able to give him this training. Even though we have the regional type of training, as we do in Minnesota—and they are doing a creditable job, the crime bureau does have these regional schools—a community can't afford to let a policeman go for a week or 2 weeks, because there is no other law enforcement officer there.

I don't want to take too much of the committee's time but there are these things that I feel so strongly about that I will just move quickly into them.

We have in our county attorney's office started 2 years ago holding weekly training sessions for investigators, 2 hour training sessions. We have the men come into our office on Friday mornings and we sit and talk about cases and we critique the cases—probable cause—did you give a proper warning—searches and seizures. It seems to me that this is terribly important, because after all we have to go into court with these cases and we feel that it is important for the police officers to know what we are thinking.

We are not, of course, training in the total sense of doing this job in the way it should be done, I'm sure. But this is our effort to try to get at it. We cannot have much success in the one-man department or in the part-time police department. We cannot carry out training programs for the constables, who are out in the field, because they have other jobs and do other things.

It seems to me that it would be important under the safe streets bill for recognition to be given to the suburban communities because they, too, need help.

I realize that in the drafting of the bill you get a broad general language where we may be qualified, but we are not trained in the art of, what do you call it, grantsmanship, this Federal grantsmanship or whatever it is. I've been through some of this, but we do not have the ability and skill to put something together that is new and innovative, that meets the criteria that is set up by some bureaucrat. As a result, the assistance goes to the larger and more sophisticated departments who can hire a man with this grantsmanship ability who can put together the brochure that is necessary to get the grant to do the job. Thus, although our need may be generally recognized in the act, in practical application we will be left out.

We know that we have a problem and if there is some way to include in the bill a provision that the Federal authority who had this responsibility would go to suburbia and would say pull your chiefs together and we will sit down and talk about how to get at your problems; and then put us through this maze of bureaucracy in order to get some help. This is the type of thing that we think is terribly important.

Senator McCLELLAN. Does not this provide that for any city of over 50,000 population?

Mr. JOHNSON. No question about it.

Senator McCLELLAN. And they may very well make application and get grants?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; I understand that.

Senator McCLELLAN. What do we need to do further?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think what we need to do is the type of thing that will bring it to the level where we are in a suburban community. We need to sit down with the authorities and relate our problem and not have to come up with this draft before anyone will sit and talk to us about what the problem is. We're not gifted that way——

Senator McCLELLAN. You want counsel before you undertake the plan?

Mr. JOHNSON. This is right. There is a provision in the bill for a planning grant requiring this type of grantsmanship. I don't know what this entails, but I have been through this on 701. I have been chairman of a committee in the State of Minnesota for 2 years relating to the Job Corps. We had what we thought was an eminent committee of professional and lay people and we have gone through 2 years of this. Each time there is a change of personnel, there is a change in the guidelines and you go back and do it over again and you change it again. We have been a bridesmaid about six times and this is the type of thing that you get frustrated from because it takes a special know-how. So, if we had counsel, sir, who recognized our problem and then would assist us to move into a grant program, I believe smaller communities would benefit.

Now, let me move into two other areas and then I will turn it over to Mr. Hegarty.

One of the things that has distressed me a great deal in the years that I have been county attorney is the lack of respect for the police officer. He is not as respected today as he was when I first started in this business of being county attorney. As you address yourself to this problem, you try to think in terms of why and try to do something about it. So, this is what we have done. We have sat down, a group of us who are in law enforcement, and noting that in our particular county the majority of our population is under the age of 25, we tried to determine a common denominator that these young people would tend to respect. This gets very homely and perhaps naive but nevertheless I think it has some significance. The factors that they respect the most relate first to, perhaps, physical prowess—the athlete, the star athlete, no matter what his particular profession is. They would respect the man who has expert marksmanship. They would respect the person who has command presence. While there are other common denominators, these were what occurred to us. We felt that perhaps we should take a page from the Green Berets or the Marine Corps or the FBI itself, and set up a training program.

All policemen in Anoka County, for instance, would have to go through a judo course or a karate course or something of this sort, and out of this we would pick an elite corps, four or five or whatever was receptive to this type of training and put on a series of demonstrations in the schools of that judo ability, that weightlifting or that gymnastic ability or whatever it happened to be so that these kids who are at the assembly programs would look to the police as being someone that they could admire and they would associate policing with this type of person. There is nothing new about this, this is kind of turning the page backward, because they used to do this.

The second is, if we could have a very complete regional shooting range, rifle range, pistol-rifle range, where you would have all of the shooting facilities that one could have and you then could train an elite corps. As you know, the FBI does this, they have their trick-shot artists and all the rest. Why not develop a film of all of this with local policemen and show the film, not in the fearful sense, but in the sense that there is professional competency in these men, and that they are able to do all these things young people do respect and recognize.

You see what we're doing now, we send a policeman out to speak to these groups in school, and he is not a proficient speaker. The toughest audience in the world to talk to is a bunch of kids. You can demonstrate to them, but to talk to them is a difficult thing, so you send a man out at his worst and not at his best and this could tend to break down the respect for law enforcement.

This type of homely, practical thing we think could be effective in reinstilling a respect for policemen, not fear, but the respect that an elite type of corps could command. The policeman today, time and again they are telling us, are just not seeing crime. They are just looking the other way, reasoning, why should they, because if they see it, there is a tendency that if they make a mistake, if they don't give the right kind of a warning, that if they have been wrong, and they are a little unsure of themselves, then they and not the suspect are going to end up on trial.

Senator McCLELLAN. What you are saying is that the policeman is being placed under conditions that frustrate them very much.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very much so.

Senator McCLELLAN. And they feel that they will be the ones to be tried?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, Mr. Hegarty can tell you about this. This is what they tell me and we are down at the level where we work with them on a day-to-day basis.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, we have transformed the criminal prosecution to a challenge of integrity and competency of the police?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is right, sir. What has happened is that it used to be that the policeman's word was more respected, but today, if you are on a one-to-one basis, on a par, there is not that same sense of respect. This is unfortunate. This is going to take a long time to bring back.

Senator McCLELLAN. How do you account for that? Have the qualities of our policemen, their integrity and conscientiousness and sense of duty, has it so deteriorated as to warrant this distrust of them?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, I don't think so. I think the problem is simply that an attempt to enforce the law under its now sophisticated state is such that they are not able to do it and time and again they are caught being wrong in the technical sense, and as a result of that you get this gradual deterioration, and it tends to kind of impugn their integrity because it carries with it the implication that the policeman arrested someone that should not have been arrested.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do you think that does damage their incentive?

Mr. JOHNSON. No question about it.

Senator McCLELLAN. There is no incentive any more to go out and risk their lives?

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no question about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I don't know whether it is in Mr. Hegarty's prepared statement or not, but it has reached the point at the school where all morning they would have a lecturer on a matter and that afternoon they would have a different lecturer on the same subject and the man in the afternoon would not agree with the man in the morning and so the officers come away as confused as they were before.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Confusion compounded.

Mr. JOHNSON. To illustrate that, under Miranda, the Supreme Court, in talking about what you are supposed to tell the defendant, has two different versions. One says that you can have an attorney, one says you may have an attorney. You have those two, but in another area there are three versions. And that is, whatever you say would be used against you, whatever you say can be used against you, whatever you say can and will be used against you. Now, those three versions are in there, and as you look at the little cards the policemen have in the jurisdiction concerning the Miranda warning you will find the words vary. Now, the problem is that as you vary the words on when you can have an attorney, perhaps saying, you can have an attorney appointed when the case goes to court, you can slip into that and there is a mistake. Mr. Hegarty will give you an example of a two-page recitation that they give to a suspect as to his rights under Miranda, and as you read it technically, in the office, it doesn't quite do the job. With that, I will close.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I note the time; we will not be able to finish maybe before lunchtime. How long will you take, Mr. Hegarty?

Mr. HEGARTY. I will make mine as short as I can, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Very well, we will proceed. I have a luncheon engagement at 12:30, but I can be a little bit late.

Mr. Johnson, I forgot to ask you, are you familiar with the other bills the committee is considering, the confession bill, particularly?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. And the crime control bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What is your position on those?

Mr. JOHNSON. My position is totally favorable. I can understand what the judge was talking about as to whether or not the confession bill would change the Miranda case, I can understand what he was talking about, but I think it is terribly important that you enunciate the principles in the bill, and if the court wants to wrestle with it, that's fine, they can.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The court suggested that this may be an area where the Congress should act.

Mr. JOHNSON. That's right. I am just wholeheartedly in favor of what you have proposed, because it relates to some of the problems that I have talked about, out in the field. The mere technical omission of some act which had nothing to do with the voluntariness of this man's statement——

Senator MCCLELLAN. Nothing to do with his guilt or innocence.

Mr. JOHNSON. Nothing to do with his guilt or innocence, should not be a controlling factor.

Miranda as it is being interpreted, is hurting us badly and I think that the bill relating to confessions will be very helpful.

The safe streets bill, by all means. I would urge the committee to put in some sort of accompanying recitation relating to suburbia and suburban problems. I believe this would be helpful to us and would be greatly appreciated.

As to the third bill relating to wiretapping. we have not had any experience with that. I can readily understand the need for it and I certainly wholeheartedly endorse the proposition as set forth. I do so in a legal sense, not as a practical thing, but as I have studied and read these cases, and I think I have read just about everything there is to read about it, I wholeheartedly endorse the bill and am in favor of it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

What has been the effect of these decisions in your jurisdiction? Is it more difficult now to get convictions of those who are really guilty, and has it shackled efforts of law enforcement officials and police in their investigation and interrogation processes?

Mr. JOHNSON. No question about it. Let me merely make one additional observation that I probably should have made earlier, and that is that we have not felt the full impact of Miranda.

Senator McCLELLAN. You have not felt——

Mr. JOHNSON. We have not felt the full impact by a long way.

Senator McCLELLAN. What do you mean?

Mr. JOHNSON. There are parts of Miranda that the defense counsel have not taken full advantage of, that if they really come to grips with this we are going to be stymied very much more so than we are at the present time.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, the Miranda decision if fully exploited by defense attorneys and by defendants, and by the criminals, can give you far more trouble than it has thus far, is that what you are saying?

Mr. JOHNSON. No question about it. We took a young fellow into our office 2 or 3 months ago who had done a fair amount of defense work. Last week I was talking to him and I said, "What would be your feeling now if you went on the outside and started defending? He said, "Mr. Johnson, in good conscience I really don't think I could do it because now I can see the weaknesses in the prosecutions' presentations that I just didn't realize were there before and, as I would be able to exploit those, I couldn't live with myself." That was his comment to me.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, the potential mischief in the Miranda decision has not yet fully blossomed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Absolutely not.

Senator McCLELLAN. It is going to get worse as time goes on, is that your judgment?

Mr. JOHNSON. No question about it.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. Hegarty, this is off the record.

(Discussion off the record).

Senator McCLELLAN. We will, then, stand in recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the subcommittee stood in recess until 2 p.m. that same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator McCLELLAN (presiding). We will proceed.

Mr. Hegarty, do you have a prepared statement?

Mr. HEGARTY. Yes.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do we have a copy of it here?

Mr. HEGARTY. Yes; you should have.

Senator McCLELLAN. Very well, will you give us your background? Maybe you did already.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Cecil Hegarty follows:)

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MR. CECIL HEGARTY

Honorable Chairman and distinguished members of this committee, my name is Cecil Hegarty. I am a detective on the Police Dept. in the city of Anoka, Minnesota, a community of 12,000 people in a metropolitan area of over one million.

I am here voluntarily in the interest of law enforcement and its problems in our community, in an attempt to relate to you information which will be helpful in giving direction of a positive nature that we may better work with some of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court. I am not here for the purpose of and do not intend to argue or debate decisions by the Supreme Court. For this reason I have a prepared statement for this committee.

Let me first tell you that we keep in our office a file which is full of subjects who are active in crime at the present time. In fact, some of these individuals are very mobile and are known to be active in communities other than our area such as Chicago, Kansas City and Denver. I tell you this to illustrate that we do have a large known criminal faction. Also that this by no means covers the criminals known to all of the Suburban cities in the Metropolitan area of St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minnesota, of which we are only a part.

To give you an illustration of the handicap set about in the Miranda decision, let me tell you about a situation in which a burglar alarm was set off on Christmas Eve Dec. 24, 1966. The squads arrived at the scene in time to see a certain vehicle leaving, so turned around and gave chase and in so doing momentarily lost sight of the vehicle, since the driver of same turned off his lights. Shortly after picking up the chase again the subject again eluded the squads by turning off his lights and four or five miles later the auto was found in a snow bank and the subjects had fled. I had the owner of the auto come to my office, who incidently had spent many years off and on in the state institutions because of burglary convictions. I told him what I suspected him of and warned him of his rights against self incrimination under the Miranda Decision and he immediately refused to say anything other than deny any implication and state that he was a hundred and sixty miles from here and some one must have used his car.

Since no officer could identify him as being in the car and the lack of physical evidence to link him to the scene of the crime—you must keep in mind that when he said he didn't want to talk further, I had to stop talking to him and forfeit any possibility of a lead from him. We still have his car impounded but the case has never been solved. I don't think I should have been able to browbeat this individual in questioning him, but I would like to have had some freedom in talking to him further in hopes that something in conversation with the individual would have led us in a successful direction to investigate further for a solution and conviction in the crime.

Another case in 1966 was the attempted burglary of a jewelry store in which two burglars from Kansas City invaded our community and were spooked from the scene by the squad. A description of the vehicle was broadcast over police radio and the vehicle was stopped in another village some five or six miles away and brought back to our city. At this time they were warned of their rights against self incrimination according to Miranda, and refused to say anything, thus eliminating the possibility again of coming up with some small clue that might lead us to evidence for a proper charge. We ended up by keeping these parties out of circulation for approximately a week by charging them with "Destruction of Private Property". They pled guilty to this charge and paid thirty-five dollars in damages for destruction caused to the door in the burglary attempt, and were released again to prey on society for which they have so little respect.

I would like to present to the committee for its analysis a seventeen page statement which I took from a subject on March 9, 1967. In the zerox copy of this statement you will find at least two full pages pertaining solely to the subject's rights against self incrimination according to the Miranda Decision. The names of the subjects involved have been blocked out for the protection of same. The County Attorney did not feel this warning was adequate, and the County Attorney is here, maybe he would like to tell you why. Nine or ten burglaries were cleared up in this statement taken from one of the burglars involved. The probable reason for the admissions of all these burglaries is that these individuals were young and unfamiliar in comparison to one who is con wise. My real reason for making this statement available to the committee is to make you aware first hand to the extent that a detective in the field must go in order to safeguard the criminal from society. Although this individual has pled guilty in district court and these burglary cases have been cleared, we are not often this fortunate.

I feel that the criminal has become braver since some of the recent supreme court decisions, and I base my reasoning on the fact of increases in crimes and decreases in the percentages of crimes that are solved. Also the fact that the perpetrator is less willing to talk to the police and is ready in my opinion, to hide himself against self-incrimination after being advised of his rights in accordance with the Miranda decision.

I have had 13 and 14 year old kids sit and say, "Look, cop, I'm going to tell you nothing, haven't you heard about the rights I've got?" This type of conversation was rare two or three years ago.

Another interesting case was one in January of 1967 in which we received a call from a doctor that a man had been shot in his home. When we arrived on the scene we found a man sitting in his living room in an easy chair, semi-unconscious, with what appeared to be a shotgun wound in the stomach. His wife was present, very intoxicated, fighting and ordering the police officers from the house. The gun was missing, she stated that we would never find it. According to Miranda, the warning against self incrimination must be given and the defendant must knowingly and intelligently waive his rights against self incrimination. How, under these circumstances, does the person intelligently waive his rights—the court in Miranda did not say how this was to be accomplished.

Another problem with Miranda is that if a constable or untrained officer in a small village some distance away, should pick up some one and question the party about a crime in our jurisdiction without giving the Miranda warning and the party makes certain admissions, believe me this case is blown out the window. So along this line where there are communities that do not have funds to train officers there should be some type of State or Federal funds to assure that this is done. Decisions from the Supreme Court are coming down so fast that in a department the size of ours where we only have sixteen officers, only one or two can be spared at one time to go to any type of police training school, thus the officers are never up to date on all the important Supreme Court decisions, since we do not have the funds for in-service training programs. The problem in education of Police Officers in the suburban cities such as ours are unequivocal in their differences as to the city of Minneapolis. If my information is correct and I believe that it is, Minneapolis Police Dept. has received a $125,000 Federal grant to put a policeman in each public school in an attempt to get to the juvenile problem at that level and thus thwart the possibility early of many youngsters getting into trouble. I can imagine the friends that the federal government could make in cities such as ours if they were this liberal with our city government. Training is a great financial problem in the suburban city since the patrolman who is unequivocally the first to arrive on a crime scene, what he may say to a suspect without the proper Miranda warning is your case or is not your case today. In a school which I attended last week Oliver Schroeder, Dean of Western Reserve Law School of Cleveland, Ohio, said that there is no doubt in his mind that an efficient police officer should have quite an extensive amount of training in the law. This then means that salaries must be raised considerably if we are going to be able to attract this type of person or encourage people already in law enforcement to go out and get this training. I truly hope some of you people on this committee can be of influence in this area.

Let me give you an example of the increase in crime in our city. In Jan. and Feb. of 1966 we had eleven burglaries—in Jan. and Feb. of 1967 we had 27 burglaries. This is an increase of well over 100%. Number of those Jan. & Feb. 1966 crimes that were solved were 0. Number of those Jan. & Feb. 1967 burglaries that were solved were 3.

One reason for the increase may be the low morale of the patrolman on the beat or in the squad, because of the small financial reward he gets he fails to see or detect crime while it is taking place.

The sharpest rise in crime in the U.S. is occurring in small cities and suburbs of big cities, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover revealed in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports for 1966.

The report showed these increases in major crimes compared with 1965: Cities below 10,000 population, 14 per cent; suburban areas, 13 per cent; cities with more than 100,000 persons, 10 per cent. For major crimes the rates of increases were: Murder, 9 per cent; aggravated assault, 10 per cent; forcible rape, 10 per cent; robbery, 14 per cent. Assaults in which a gun was used rose by 23 percent.

A surge in crimes committed by youths was reflected in arrest statistics, 1 per cent fewer adults having been arrested last year than in 1965, while arrests of persons under 18 were up 9 per cent. The crime-solution rate for the nation was 25 per cent in 1966, down from 26.3 per cent in 1965.

Offenses in city of Anoka, Minn.

Burglary	61	87
Larcenies	268	380
Auto theft	35	43
Assaults	16	29

Burglary	2	8	15	12
Larcenies	13	15	18	22
Auto thefts	2	3	5	5
Assaults	2	0	6	1

My fervent hope is that this committee can give direction through some sort of legislation which will help to overcome these many problems either on the local level or the federal level.

Thank you for your attention.

Senator McCLELLAN. You may proceed with your summary.

Mr. HEGARTY. The reason for my appearance here today is to make the committee aware that just because we are not a large city doesn't mean we have no great problems.

The Supreme Court decisions as of late have created a very hampering situation to work with, especially the Miranda decision, as far as I am concerned in my field.

To further let you know that we do have a criminal element, we have a large file of known criminals who are active, not only in Minneapolis, but also the suburban area.

Senator McCLELLAN. How far are you out of Minneapolis?

Mr. HEGARTY. We are 18 miles out of town.

I am going to skip part of my statement, some of these illustrations I have used—factual cases and get on.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see you give some illustrations there. I did not have an opportunity to read your statement. If you will give one of them, at least——

Mr. HEGARTY. I would like to make an illustration as to a case that is serious to us as far as Miranda is concerned in that in January 1967 we received a call from a doctor that a man had been shot in his home. When I got on the scene shortly thereafter I found the victim sitting in an easy chair in the living room with what appeared to be a shotgun wound in his stomach or his abdomen. The lady of the house was very intoxicated—quite wild—ordering the police out of the house, kicking some of the officers.

I want to state further this was not a slum area. These were quite influential people.

It appeared offhand, when you looked at it, that it probably was an attempted suicide, but at the same time there wasn't any gun visible.

It is hard to understand how anyone could inflict a self-inflicted wound in the abdomen with a shotgun and then have enough strength to do away with the gun. The wife did make a statement to us that we wouldn't find anything.

I bring up the illustration for the fact that Miranda says a suspect must knowingly and intelligently waive his rights against self-incrimination. Miranda didn't provide for any situation like this, where you have a hysterical, drunken woman and you have what looks like an attempted homicide. In such a situation how could we inform her intelligently and with her full understanding, that she was waiving any rights in case she had been a party to the shooting, and that certainly is what it looked like with the gun missing.

Here we are in the field trying to work with the Miranda decision. Luckily, in this situation, the party lived for about 4 days and made a deathbed confession as to the self-inflicted wound. If he had not regained consciousness how could we have incarcerated her as a possible suspect in the shooting in her condition and then get her to knowingly waive her rights so that we would be able to talk with her?

I have another instance, a Xerox copy of a statement taken in March 1967. I think the committee has copies of it.

This is to let you see what we go through working in the field, when we are trying to work with the Miranda decision. The suspects were apprehended by another small department in another county, 8 or 10 miles from ours, but also in a metropolitan area and in the largest county in population in the State of Minnesota.

I am going to start with the question:

Talking to Detective McMullen over there. Before you talked to him, did he tell you about your rights against self incrimination?
A Yes.
Q That you had a right to remain silent?
A Yes.
Q That you had a right to have an attorney present during anything that you told him?
A Yes.
Q And that if you couldn't afford an attorney and you did appear in court, they would appoint one for you?
A Yes.
Q And he also told you that any time that you—that he talked to you that you had a right to have an attorney present?
A Yes.
Q And did you talk to him knowing full well that these were your rights and you did have a right to remain silent?
A Yes.
Q You did this of your own free will and accord?
A Yes.
Q I picked you up over there about 5 o'clock P.M. yesterday, March 8, 1967, do you recall this?
A Yes.
Q You told me several things on the way back in the squad car?
A Yes.
Q Before you told me anything, do you recall me warning you of your rights against self incrimination?
A Yes.

Q And those rights I told you were that you didn't have to tell me anything, that you had a right to remain silent, you had a right to counsel, you could contact an attorney, you had a right to have an attorney present while you were talking to me and that if you couldn't afford an attorney, we would get one for you, do—did you understand this at that time?

A. Yes.

Q. And you knew full well that you were waiving your rights against self incrimination before you did say anything?

A. Yes.

Q. Then do you recall I talked to you a little later last evening?

A. Yes.

Q. And again warned you of your rights, do you recall this?

A. Yes.

Q. And do you recall again that you talked to me and told me certain things that were self incriminating, knowing full well that you had a right not to this?

A. Yes.

Q. This morning we went out to—on the Dayton Road, I think it's called—between Champlin and Dayton. Chief Hoagland, myself, you, and you directed us out to the location of a safe that had been dumped along the road out there in a ditch, a ltte dump. Do you recall this?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you do this of your own free will? And accord?

A. Yes.

Q. Knowing full well that you didn't have to take us out there?

A. Yes.

Q. We did recover that safe and you and the other boys pointed its location out to us, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And then after coming back with the safe, recovering it, I talked to you again at approximately 11 o'clock AM and advised you of your rights again against self incrimination from a sheet that I'm showing you now here, a sheet of paper, which you have signed in the presence of myself and Sgt. Rollins. You were full well aware that you did not have to sign this, that you waived your rights against self incrimination voluntarily?

A. Yes.

Q. As an officer of the law, it is my duty at this time to inform you that since we are taking a recorded statement that will be transcribed into typewritten form—to warn you again of your rights against self incrimination, you have a right to remain silent and you do not have to say anything unless you choose to do so. Anything you do say will and may be used against you in a court of law. You have a right to consult a lawyer and to have a lawyer with you during any questioning. If you cannot afford a lawyer, one will be appointed for you by the judge when you appear in court. Knowing these things are you still willing to go ahead and give us this statement?

A. Yes.

That point, Mr. Chairman, is the end of the warning. I just bring it out because you can see to what length we have to go before we can discuss a crime with an individual. This individual did waive his rights against self-incrimination but you have to remember that his age is 19. He is not a professional convict, criminal. He has not been through the mill. He waived his rights because he wanted to get something off his chest.

Because of his confession we did clear up about nine or 10 burglaries. But at the same time after all this waiving, the county attorney who sits alongside of me, who was to prosecute these cases, was somewhat critical of the statement, that maybe we didn't go far enough with the Miranda warning, and I stop here so that he can comment and tell you why he feels this way.

Senator McCLELLAN. All right.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, it is this language bit that I was talking about this morning. If you will note the last part of the second page, one of the warnings that was given, is that you have a right to consult a lawyer during the period of questioning. If you cannot afford a lawyer, one will be appointed for you by the judge when you appear in court.

This is not exactly what they said in Miranda. The implication that can be drawn from this, is that, if you can't afford the lawyer you won't get one until you go to court.

Senator McCLELLAN. I see your point.

Mr. JOHNSON. That's the point.

Senator McCLELLAN. That probably would not hold up with all the warning given.

Mr. JOHNSON. Might very well not. On page 1 the warning alludes to the same thing and it says that if you can't afford an attorney and you did appear in court, they would appoint one for you. Again, it is going to the future and this is the type of thing that I talked about this morning. I mentioned that the different types of so-called Miranda warnings—I have three of them here and they are all different.

Senator McCLELLAN. Would you file those three different ones and identify them, the source of them?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator McCLELLAN. Do that, please, sir. That will be printed in the record at this point.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will hand them to the reporter.

Senator McCLELLAN. Identify them sufficiently so we can understand them.

Mr. JOHNSON. The larger page is one that is used by the city of St. Paul. The other one, the plastic covered one is one that we have used in our county. The other paper one is used in one of our other jurisdictions in the metropolitan area, I am not sure which one.

Senator McCLELLAN. Will you mark them 1, 2, and 3 in the order you referred to them so the record will be clear?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

The first one I identified will be identified with a one with a circle around it.

The second is the plastic-covered one which I can't mark and the third one I will mark with a three with a circle around it. There are others.

The one that we talked about, that the city of Anoka was using up until the time of this particular statement was taken is different again from these three.

Senator McCLELLAN. So there is a fourth one that you no longer use?

Mr. JOHNSON. That's right.

Mr. HEGARTY. It is not only those four. Whatever a particular jurisdiction interprets Miranda to mean that is reflected in the warnings.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, the police departments and law enforcement officials are undertaking to interpret the decision as best they can and they come up with these different interpretations. From this we can see that the full fruit of this Miranda decision, the evil of it, has not yet been thoroughly demonstrated. The potential evil of it is going to continue to appear and be demonstrated by such illustrations as you are giving here.

All right, proceed.

C.N. 723 585.

SAINT PAUL POLICE DEPARTMENT

WRITTEN STATEMENT

Date 4-4-67. Time 11:21.

I, David E. Knutson, Age 19, DOB November S, 1947, address 631 3rd Ave. S.W. Marital status single, phone 259-1309.

Educated at Rochester St. Jun. Col., Sophomore, have been advised of my rights to protection against self-incrimination to wit:

1. I have the right to remain silent and to refuse at any time to answer any questions asked by a Police Officer. DEK
2. Anything I say can or will be used against me in court. DEK
3. I have a right to talk with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with me during questioning. DEK
4. If I cannot afford a lawyer, one will be appointed for me by the judge when I appear in court and I may remain silent until I have talked to him. DEK

The above statements have been read to me and I understand what they mean. I have initialed each paragraph to show that I have read it. David E. Knutson.

I am giving this statement voluntarily to Lt. R. L. Highbeig whom I know to be a member of the St. Paul Police Department. No threats or acts of force have been made against me nor have any promises of any kind been made to me.

MIRANDA WARNING

1. You have the right to remain silent.
2. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law.
3. You have the right to talk to a lawyer and have him present with you while you are being questioned.
4. If you cannot afford to hire a lawyer, one will be appointed to represent you before any questioning, if you wish one.

MIRANDA CARD

Before a suspect in a case is questioned he must be warned, as follows:

1. You have the right to remain silent.
2. Anything that you say can, and will, be used against you in Court.
3. Before answering any questions you have a right to consult an attorney and to have him with you during our interrogation.
4. If you are unable to hire an attorney, one will be appointed by the Court to represent you.
5. Do you understand what I have just told you?

Mr. HEGARTY. My real reason, Mr. Chairman, for making this statement available to you is so the committee can see at first hand what we are using in the field. This is an actual case where the individual has now pled guilty in the District Court and these several burglaries have been cleared up. I think it tends to show the committee how we are protecting the criminal against society. I think it is just that plain. And I think that is who we are protecting. I don't think we are doing a great job of protecting society.

I feel that the criminal has become much braver in his acts since the recent Supreme Court decision in Miranda and a couple of others. His chances of being caught probably have not changed a great deal, but his chances of being convicted have changed considerably. It is not just the adult criminal we are talking about. We are talking about the delinquent child, 13 or 14 years old that has gotten the word about how the police can't talk to you. It is not unusual now——

Senator MCCLELLAN. What is your experience with them now? What is your personal experience with them?

Mr. HEGARTY. This is what I was going to state. It is not unusual now to pick up kids shoplifting or this type of thing and bring them into the station to talk to them and quite quickly get the remark from them, "Look, cop, haven't you heard about my rights? I am not going to talk to you."

I am talking about children—these are 13, 14-year-old kids. Two or three years ago this was a pretty rare thing. I think because of the Supreme Court decisions, that respect for law enforcement has declined considerably.

I don't think that the quality of the policeman has declined—in fact, I think it probably is better than it was. But there is no question but that the Supreme Court has scared the policeman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you have something to say about the improvement of the quality of justice not helping to enforce the law and prevent crime? It is kind of a useless improvement, is it not?

Mr. HEGARTY. This is true.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The purpose of the law is to protect society, is it not?

Mr. HEGARTY. This is my understanding of it. I am a little bit apprehensive about whether we are really doing that today.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Today, the kind of justice we have in this country is not affording the protection to society that it is entitled to and as time marches on that protection seems to be getting less, we feel, instead of stronger. We are confronted with this situation and the question is how to limit it.

All right, proceed.

Mr. HEGARTY. I am going to skip over some of the rest of my statement because some of it concerns the service training program. The county attorney did a fine job of covering that except that I do want to mention, along the lines he was talking about, the governmental red-tape in order to get financial help in training.

I am aware that the city of Minneapolis got $125,000 in Federal grants last year from the police department to put officers in different public schools to sit there like a counselor. The policemen are there to handle any delinquent problem or act by these kids.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What funds did they get that out of?

Mr. HEGARTY. I will have to get that for you and submit it for the committee.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Law Enforcement Assistance Act funds?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am pretty sure you are right.

Mr. HEGARTY. The funds were spent for the extra staff to have a police officer in the public schools like student counselors would be.

I only bring this up to let you know that I am sure you can make our city government pretty happy if you could channel some of this in their direction. We are not the size of Minneapolis.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Have you fought for it?

Mr. HEGARTY. No, because I am not in the administrative capacity within the police department. I am a detective.

Senator MCCLELLAN. What would you do with the money if you had it?

Mr. HEGARTY. I think this is a start right here, what we are talking about. Policemen in the public schools to help counsel these children to keep them from becoming——

Senator McCLELLAN. To protect the teacher?

Mr. HEGARTY. Absolutely not.

Senator McCLELLAN. What has become of the old system where the teacher taught children the fundamentals? And the home where they are supposed to be taught, I thought, a little bit about morality and taught proper conduct and human relations? What has happened to that?

Mr. HEGARTY. I wish I had the answer, Senator.

Senator McCLELLAN. We are talking about poverty and ignorance being the cause of crime. Well, beginning with the history of the country, we had far more poverty then than there is now and less education than there is now and yet there is more crime now than ever before. So I do not think we can just nail it down to those two factors.

Mr. HEGARTY. We know, of course, too, Mr. Chairman, that whether it had any deterrent or not it was done and we had less juvenile problems in those days where the teacher did have a little room off to the corner some place and used the paint stir stick to let them know that he did have some authority. I am not so sure that is being done any more.

I attended a detective training program in Minneapolis all last week and, along the same line, one of our speakers. Oliver Schroeder, dean of Western Reserve Law School of Cleveland, Ohio, said unless we can get more extensive training in the law to law enforcement officers, that our already mounting problem was going to be worse.

To conclude my statement, I would like to give you just a few statistics. This is taken from the report of FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. The sharpest rise in crime in the United States is occurring in small cities and suburbs of big cities. This is from the 1966 crime report, uniform crime report.

The report showed that in major crimes, compared with 1965, in cities below 10,000 population, the increase was 14 percent.

Suburban areas, 13 percent.

Cities with more than 100,000 persons, 10 percent.

For major crimes the rates of increases were: Murder, 9 percent; aggravated assault, 10 percent; forcible rape, 10 percent; robbery, 14 percent.

Assaults in which a gun was used rose by 23 percent. A surge in crimes committed by youths was reflected in arrest statistics, 1 percent fewer adults having been arrested last year than in 1965, while arrests of persons under 18 were up 9 percent.

The crime solution rate for the Nation was 25 percent in 1966, but down from 26.3 percent in 1965.

To compare a little bit with the city of Anoka, these offenses don't sound very large unless you compare it with the population we have, 12,000.

In 1965 we had 61 burglaries in the city of Anoka and in 1966 we had 87 burglaries.

We had 268 larcenies committed in 1965 and 380 in 1966.

We had 35 auto thefts in 1965 and 43 auto thefts in 1966.

We had 16 assaults in 1965 and 29 assaults in 1966.

I only have tabulated comparable to 1967 January and February.

Now, to show the increase, starting already this fiscal year, in January and February 1966, we had 10 burglaries committed.

In January and February 1967, we had 27 committed.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that due to the inefficiency or lack of vigilance on the part of your police establishment?

Mr. HEGARTY. Absolutely not.

Senator McCLELLAN. What do you attribute it to?

Mr. HEGARTY. The bravery of the individual committing the act. He doesn't think that confinement is nearly as possible for him as it was a year or two ago.

Senator McCLELLAN. In other words, as the prospects of detection, apprehension, and punishment decrease, the rate of crime increases?

Mr. HEGARTY. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that your observation?

Mr. HEGARTY. Absolutely.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that what your statistics demonstrate?

Mr. HEGARTY. Yes, they do.

You can read the other two or three entries. I just made this comment to show you how the increase is taking place. It's pretty rapid.

My fervent hope is that this committee can give direction through some sort of legislation which will help to overcome these many problems both on the local level and the Federal level.

I have a copy of an article that may not be pertinent here, but I would like to read it to the committee. It is a copy of a newspaper article.

I think one of our problems in securing the right people in law enforcement is salaries. You certainly can't get anybody who is going to have much dedication if you can't pay a decent wage, and this is pretty much true across the nation.

This article, from a local newspaper is as follows: "Ditch Digger Declines Low Pay of Police."

Recently, a police chief in a northern city was seeking applicants for his department. In his search for qualified personnel, the chief came across an individual who was then employed digging ditches. The man had 13 years' experience on different police departments, and the chief interviewed him as a good prospect.

The worker admitted that he would like to work for the chief, but in order to do so, he would have to take an almost $1,500 cut from his yearly salary as a ditchdigger. As a result, he declined the opportunity to apply for a position as a patrolman and resumed his shoveling.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Policemen are very much underpaid for the risks they take, for the responsibilities they have, for the skills they are required to have. That is one of the reasons, one of the principal reasons that I introduced this overall bill for safe streets and crime control. I am not convinced that is one that will contribute much to better enforcement of the law, except as we give training to policemen, better train them and pay them better so we can get a higher quality, higher type and better educated people into the service. I think that it will make a substantial contribution.

But if we cannot interrogate suspects and some policeman happens to stumble just a little in some ritual that is supposed to be used and by reason of that the guilty is turned loose, that will not develop strong law enforcement and will not improve conditions that now exist very much, if any.

Mr. HEGARTY. I want to comment, Mr. Chairman, the patrolman, the fellow who has to meet this problem every day and make that initial contact——

Senator MCCLELLAN. The patrolman on the beat?

Mr. HEGARTY. Right. This individual who is of very high caliber, a very high-caliber individual but at the same time he is ignorant as to the requirements of the Miranda decision, as many of the rest of us are.

In fact, it is quite evident many attorneys are and so are the courts, because they are interpreting the thing differently from one place to the next. You can understand a fellow's reserve in saying anything.

The policeman on the scene may have a good statement from the suspect that would be admissible in court. But, he tells the fellow, don't talk to me, I don't want to talk to you. Talk to the detective when we get down to the station.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How can he make a thorough investigation into a crime if he has to tell the prospect or the suspect, do not talk to me? How can he make an investigation? He could give a lead and he would be able to help.

Mr. HEGARTY. This is where the Miranda decision hurts us, Mr. Chairman. This is not an interrogation situation when the patrolman meets the suspect on the street or has him in the squad car, as far as I understand it, or what I would like to believe was meant in Miranda. I would like to believe the interrogation takes place in the police station when the detective sits down with this fellow in a smoke-filled room. This is where I would like to feel the interrogation takes place, not when the patrolman meets a suspect out in the street.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Well, they take the suspect to the police station and I do not see anything in the Constitution or know of anything in the Constitution stating that you cannot ask questions until you get him in the police station.

Mr. HEGARTY. No.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think if the policeman is alert and on the job and vigilant, he can ask whatever questions appear to him at the time, the answer to which might be helpful and might give him information on how to proceed, what to do next, what to pursue or what not to pursue. I do not understand that a citizen of this country does not have some obligation to cooperate with law-enforcement organizations. I know you cannot make him testify against himself. But that is all the Constitution says. You cannot make him give testimony against himself in a criminal case. But when you are out investigating the circumstances of a crime where it is committed, I do not understand not being allowed to ask questions. Of course, you cannot make him talk but I do not understand that you cannot ask him questions. If he does answer, whether he has a lawyer or not—if he wants to answer a question when he is interrogated, I do not interpret the Constitution as preventing such interrogation. I may be all wrong about it, but I do not believe that the police officer investigating a crime, or trying to detect a crime, or apprehending someone who is possibly guilty of the offense, actually has to give the suspect a recitation of his rights before he asks him a question.

A lot of these suspects are repeaters, such as Miranda was, from the testimony we heard here. Think how absurd it is. I think it is absurd and ridiculous to the extreme that Miranda could walk into court, under direction of his counsel, take the witness stand and under oath say, yes, I raped her, and, in effect, what are you going to do about it? Go free. Free to rape another one. If that is justice in the American system of jurisprudence it needs some remedy.

Do you have any further comments?

Mr. JOHNSON. I appreciate the opportunity to come here and share with you our problems. We are looking to you for help and assistance.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If I have my way about it you are going to get some help. I appreciate very much your cooperation. I hope in the course of these hearings to make a thorough record from the standpoint of police, and anyone who wants to testify on behalf of the criminal element that you ought not to ask them to answer questions, we will hear that also. Let us make a record here and let the Congress weigh it and undertake legislatively to determine whether we should do anything about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to say that prior to Miranda, in all the good conscience that I have, there is no one that I know of in the county of Anoka that has ever been prosecuted and at a later time we discovered that they did not commit the crime. I think we have the ability to administer justice and I want that to be perfectly clear.

Senator MCCLELLAN. In other words, no injustices were committed as far as you know.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

One of the things that people do not understand when you talk about this matter of justice, is that actually there are several different levels on which this justice or judgment is made.

The policeman at the apprehension role makes a judgment. Very often this policeman, certainly in minor crimes, makes a judgment that this individual is not a menace to society and takes him home or maybe gives him a lecture and sends him on his way.

When it comes to our level at the prosecution, as we examine the mitigating circumstances relating to this man, what he has done, we do not prosecute every crime that comes to our attention, because oft times it is that man who steals because he needs that crust of bread. He has no previous crime record—no previous record, and there is an excellent prospect for him to be rehabilitated. A great many crimes are not prosecuted at that level for that reason and that is not just in Anoka County. That is throughout.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That is not our problem. That is not what we are talking about.

Mr. JOHNSON. I just want the general tone to be that this is not some kind of contest. We are trying to administer justice and we do it now and we will continue to do it.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you kindly. Thank you very much.

Mr. HEGARTY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Orlando W. Wilson, will you come forward, please.

Mr. Wilson, will you identify yourself for the record, please?

STATEMENT OF ORLANDO WINFIELD WILSON, SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE, DEPARTMENT OF POLICE, CITY OF CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. WILSON. My name is Orlando W. Wilson. I am superintendent of police at Chicago, Ill.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Before we have your biographical sketch, I will ask you to examine it and insert it in the record.

That will be printed in the record in full.

(The biographical sketch of Mr. Wilson follows:)

Senator MCCLELLAN. You have a prepared statement?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, I have, Mr. Chairman.

I feel obliged, first of all, to apologize to you, appearing before you with a cold.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have that much in common.

Mr. WILSON. It was my intention to read this brief statement if I may and then respond to any questions which you might care to put to me.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will be very glad to have you read it, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appear before you today in support of three bills—Senate bill No. 674, regarding the admissibility of confessions as evidence in criminal trials, Senate bill No. 675, the "Federal Wire Interception Act," and Senate bill No. 917, the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967." These three bills which, at first glance, appear very dissimilar are in fact quite similar in one very important respect—they are all aimed at reducing and containing that blight upon society which will otherwise overwhelm us—crime. I would like to comment briefly on these bills in numerical sequence and then I understand you gentlemen may want to ask me specific questions on any or all three of them which I will be happy to answer to the best of my ability.

The first bill, No. 674, relates to confessions. Prior to 1964, the Supreme Court of the United States had settled upon what I thought to be a fairly reasonable standard with regard to the admissibility of confessions in State courts. This standard was commonly referred to as the "voluntary-trustworthy" test. Under this test the court would determine two things on the specific facts in each case. First it would decide if the confession was voluntary—did the defendant give it of his own free will. If he did, the mandate of the fifth amendment, against coerced confessions was satisfied.

Second, the court would decide if the confession was likely to be the truth. The whole justification for our system of criminal justice is to get at the truth and trustworthiness is of course a proper matter of concern with regard to all evidence. If the court found the confession to have been both voluntary and trustworthy it was admitted—it was as simple as that.

But the Court has now changed the rules and I might add justified the change under the same Constitution that had supposedly dictated the old voluntary-trustworthy standard. Under the Escobedo case in 1964 and the Miranda case last year, decisions as to the admissibility of confessions are no longer made on the basis of the specific facts in each case. Decisions are now made in accordance with the arbitrary rule that police must advise the defendant that he may remain silent and may have an attorney before he is asked any questions. If the police don't so advise the defendant, the confession is inadmissible regardless of whether it was voluntarily given and regardless of whether it is the truth. All of this is done on the peculiar theory that releasing criminals will in some manner protect the rights of the innocent.

As I understand it, Senate bill No. 674, if enacted will merely codify the voluntary-trustworthy standard. I have some reservations concerning the effect that the enactment of this bill would have on future Supreme Court decisions. The Court held that this standard was insufficient in the Miranda case, by holding that the police advice system was required under the Constitution. It would appear that no action of Congress short of a constitutional amendment would have the desired effect. I am something of an optimist, however, and I think that this type of enactment might indicate to the Court that the people of the United States are tired of the Court turning criminals loose, are tired of being afraid to leave their houses after dark and are fed up with the kind of reasoning that puts the individual liberties of one confessed criminal above the welfare of our whole society. I sincerely hope so.

Senator McCLELLAN. I have expressed the opinion that if one of the justices changes his mind it would have a salutary effect.

Mr. WILSON. Although they are very obvious to anyone involved in any kind of law enforcement or investigative work, I want to give you some small indication of the effect of the Miranda decision on law enforcement. The Miranda decision virtually precludes any interrogation by the police. We must advise an arrestee that he may remain silent and that he may have a lawyer—at State expense if necessary. If he can afford a lawyer and he contacts one, the lawyer will tell him to keep his mouth shut. If he can't afford a lawyer, we have no means; that is, the Chicago police, to provide him one so we have to forget about questioning him. In either case, the result is the same—no interrogation. There are those who say that any crime can be solved without interrogation. I would like to state unequivocally that this is simply not so. This business about "rubbing red pepper into some poor devil's eyes" is a lot of nonsense. We're talking about questioning—not third degree. There is no substitute for questioning. Even in the relatively few cases where incriminating evidence is found at the scene of the crime the evidence rarely speaks for itself. The testimony of someone, or an admission by the accused, is usually needed to tie the evidence to the accused and to make the physical evidence relevant as proof.

I have a favorite quotation from the 1958 case of Trilling v. United States which reflects my thoughts on this matter as follows:

> At least one of the prime functions, if not the prime function, of the police is to investigate reports of crime or the actual commission of crime. The usual, most useful, most efficient, and most effective method of investigation is by questioning people. It is all very well to say the police should investigate by microscopic examination of stains and dust. Sometimes they can. But of all human facilities for ascertaining facts, asking questions is the usual one and always has been. The Courts use that method.

The next bill that I would like to comment upon is Senate bill 675, the Federal Wire Interception Act.

As a local law enforcement officer my main interest in this bill is in section 5(b). That section would authorize the attorney general of a State or the principal prosecuting attorney for any county or city to intercept wire communications upon court order, so long as the State had a statute permitting such activity. As I understand it the section would give congressional approval to State statutes similar to the one that New York now has. With this type of authorization I am confident that other State legislatures would adopt similar laws.

I might tell you at this point that Illinois has the most restrictive law in this area of any jurisdiction in the United States. In Illinois it is unlawful for a person to record a conversation which he himself is a party to. It is unlawful for a police officer to monitor a telephone conversation between a citizen and a kidnaper even if the citizen requests it. Hopefully, the Illinois legislators would look upon the passage of this bill, 675, as an indication of the type of law that our citizens want and are entitled to.

The remainder of my remarks on this bill relate to the need for court-supervised wiretapping with regard to the fight against organized crime.

It is my firm conviction that organized crime poses a greater threat to the American way of life than even communism. And it is my further belief that we will make no substantial inroads against organized crime without the use of electronic surveillance. The police are very successful at arresting the local narcotics peddler, the runner for the gambling organization, and the prostitute; but they never seem to have much luck with the higher-ups. The bosses don't engage in any activity that is readily detected by the police. They commit crimes such as conspiracy and they employ their henchmen to do the actual dirty work. As a result the police must be satisfied with arresting the pimps, the prostitutes, and the runners and the addict-pushers while organized crime grows stronger and stronger because the driving force behind it—the kingpins—go untouched.

You may ask if court-supervised wiretapping would have any effect on this problem. I believe it would. The recent report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice indicates that the Commission agrees with me. The report states at page 201:

> Members of the underworld, who have legitimate reason to fear that their meetings might be bugged or their telephones tapped, have continued to meet and to make relatively free use of the telephone—for communication is essential to the operation of any business enterprise. In legitimate business this is accomplished with written and oral exchanges. In organized crime enterprises, however, the possibility of loss or seizure of an incriminating document demands a minimum of written communication. Because of the varied character of organized criminal enterprises, the large numbers of persons employed in them, and frequently the distances separating elements of the organization, the telephone remains an essential vehicle for communications.

Thus the telephone is essential to the higher-ups in organized crime—they use the telephone as an instrument of criminality. It seems to me that law enforcement should have the same opportunity to intercept and use this evidence as it has with regard to other more tangible evidence. The Constitution provides that a search may be made with a judge's authorization—a search warrant. This bill only seeks to apply that same principle to electronic searches.

Finally, I want to talk about Senate bill No. 917, the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act.

This act provides that the Attorney General may make grants to State and local governments for law enforcement planning, for the development of new approaches and improvements in law enforcement, and for research and the development of special projects.

Such grants could be used to cover a part of the costs of those things that police departments across the Nation sorely need but can't afford, ranging from the development and acquisition of specialized equipment, to less tangible things such as training, operations research, and studies in police-community relations.

The contemplated appropriation for this program is $50 million for the first year. Although this may sound like a great deal of money, the sum begins to shrink in size when you consider the fact that it costs well over twice that amount to run the Chicago Police Department for 1 year and it becomes a mere pittance when you consider that burglaries alone cost the citizens of the United States an estimated $284 million in 1965. I haven't even begun to mention the actual cost to society of other serious crimes and the loss of some 10,000 lives through willful homicides that none of us would even attempt to evaluate in terms of money, in that same year.

Law enforcement is presently entering a new era. We are desperately seeking the knowledge necessary to first understand and then solve the problems confronting us. The general caliber of police administrators has risen to a point that I would have certainly not anticipated a few years ago. It would be shameful, and perhaps disastrous, if we were to waste the desire and ability of the present administrators by failing to provide them with the necessary resources with which to progress.

We in Chicago have been fortunate in that we have had the type of city administration that has provided the police with every possible bit of support, monetary and otherwise. Since 1960 we have almost completely motorized our patrol force, we have installed a whole new communications system that allows us to provide police service in a matter of seconds, we are introducing electronic data processing into every possible phase of police work, and our police-community relations programs are beginning to demonstrate their usefulness.

Other cities have not been so fortunate and have fallen behind. We in Chicago have progressed. We can see our progress in the reduced crime rate. But progress is an elusive thing. Our national population is increasing and crime is increasing about five times more rapidly. We must take significant strides to merely hold our own and then we must accomplish even more before we can state that we have progressed.

I am in hopes that the program contemplated under Senate bill 917 and other similar programs will provide law enforcement with the means to make those additional strides that we can call progress toward the reduction of crime.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would be glad to respond to any questions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you, Mr. Wilson.

In discussing the purpose of this safe streets and crime control bill we keep referring to law enforcement and criminal justice. It is designed to make justice and the administration of criminal laws more equitable and more efficient. Will we not omit a very important area if we do not try to deal with the improvement of justice at the top as well as at the arresting level?

Mr. WILSON. I agree with you completely, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. What has law enforcement gained when officers apprehend the guilty and then they are turned loose on some, maybe dubious, technicality?

Mr. WILSON. I feel there is something terribly wrong with the administration of criminal justice in this country. I hope Congress can do something to rectify this condition.

Senator McCLELLAN. I think maybe we have come to the point where we will have to do one of two things. I am trying to take the moderate approach and simply let the Congress declare how voluntary confessions may be received in evidence in the trial of a criminal case.

Now, I think that is a moderate approach to the problem. It still leaves the matter in the hands of the court to weigh the totality of circumstance and, in other words, it is what we have done all through these years in our system of jurisprudence. Just return to what was and has been the procedures under the same Constitution——

Mr. WILSON. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. —before somebody decided that it was wrong to interrogate a suspect without providing a lawyer. But if we cannot enact this moderate bill, then there are two other courses open, as I see it.

One is a constitutional amendment, which is a cumbersome process—I do not know whether you could get two-thirds of both Houses of Congress to pass a resolution and submit it and get three-fourths of the States to ratify it. The third, most drastic step, would be to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the courts.

We have a provision in the Constitution which would permit the Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. That is a harsh remedy. I do not want to see that done.

But we have these alternatives. Or we have the fourth alternative, to do nothing, and leave conditions as they are.

Mr. WILSON. If they would leave conditions as they were, we could live with them.

Senator McCLELLAN. But if we leave them as they are, what?

Mr. WILSON. Our society cannot survive, in my judgment. We are operating under an accusatorial system and in my judgment an accusatorial system cannot operate effectively without questioning.

The alternative is to adopt the inquisitorial system of France and some of the European countries, in which a magistrate would direct questions and require answers. The questioning that the police have been privileged to engage in in the past, in my judgment, is an inherent part of our accusatorial system and the system will fall if we are denied questioning suspects.

Senator McCLELLAN. It has been said by some that the fact that guilty criminals are turned loose has no impact on the increase in crime in this country. What is your comment about that?

Mr. WILSON. Well, I cannot prove this statistically beyond the fact that over the past several decades the crime rate has been spiraling all out of proportion to the growth of our population.

Now, how to prove how much of this grows out of restrictions that have been imposed by the Supreme Court, what other factors may have been involved, would be very difficult.

But certainly, in my judgment, the restrictions the police are operating under is one factor that has played a part in the spiraling crime rate.

Senator McCLELLAN. If it does not have any impact, it appears to me our theory of punishment for crime is wrong. The only purpose in punishment is to deter, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

Senator McCLELLAN. Certainly that is the prime purpose of it. I wonder if anyone can rationalize the fact that in his retrial Miranda went before the court, under oath, and with the advice of counsel, told the trial judge, "Yes, I raped her. What are you going to do about it?" Is that calculated to cause respect for law and order?

Mr. WILSON. Not in my judgment.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that calculated to restrain one so inclined in his passions to go out and rape? What will be the impact on such individuals who have such inclinations? It would not restrain them in my judgment.

Mr. WILSON. I agree.

Senator McCLELLAN. The other impact is, if he can get by with it, so can I. Does that not tend to increase the crime rate in this country?

Mr. WILSON. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. The way I rationalize it, it does. I do not know any other way. I am going to be interested in anyone who wants to testify that this has no impact at all. I will be interested in listening, getting their logic and reasons to fortify that statement.

That signal you heard was the signal for a rollcall vote. I have to suspend for a few moments, and I will come back just as quickly as I can. Some other Senators may come and they may want to ask you something, if you do not mind waiting. We will take a 15- or 20-minute recess.

(Short recess taken.)

Senator McCLELLAN. Mr. Wilson, through the interruption of this rollcall vote I had to make, I lost my place here with respect to interrogating you.

I would like to have you emphasize your views with respect to wiretapping. That is quite controversial. I take the position, and I think you point that out, that actually, the principle is the same as the search warrant.

Mr. WILSON. Right.

Senator McCLELLAN. The administration takes the position that no one should wiretap except the Federal Government and that only in national security cases. I don't think anyone could oppose wiretapping when national security was definitely involved.

I am speaking now with respect to external threats to our survival. However, I cannot see a great deal of difference in external threats and internal threats if the degree of danger is important.

The way I view this crime situation, as I think you mentioned here in your prepared statement, is that we are really in more danger from crime bosses than from communism. Therefore, there is an internal threat, and it seems to me that, if the use of this instrumentality in connection with an external threat to our security can be justified, we can justify it in some cases to protect us from internal dangers.

I would like to have you comment on this. In the most recent kidnaping case I know of, a young boy was kidnaped and within a day or two the parents paid a $250,000 ransom, I believe it was. Fortunately, they were able to pay. Fortunately, they were able to make contact and pay the ransom and get their child back unharmed.

But I wonder who could conscientiously oppose a court order to tap the wire in that home, the telephone there or anywhere else where they thought there might be a call coming in from the kidnaper.

Mr. WILSON. I concur with you completely, Mr. Chairman. I feel threats to our domestic security are more serious than the threats to our national security.

I have little fear that anyone is going to invade our country. No foreign country is going to invade our country; but we have, as a cancer in our society today, organized crime that we simply are not able to deal with effectively and, in my judgment, will not be able to deal with effectively until we are authorized under court supervision to engage in wiretapping and electronic surveillance.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Do you regard the risk of abuse of any serious consequence when it is done under the surveillance of a court?

Mr. WILSON. We hear a great deal about the right of privacy. I don't care who taps my telephone, even in police matters. Even in police matters, I don't think there are any conversations that I carry on at home or in my office that would be jeopardized if the whole world might listen to the telephone conversations. The police are simply too busy to listen to backyard gossip, what a teenage daughter might be saying over the telephone to her boyfriend or activities of this sort.

Senator MCCLELLAN. You can walk out here on the street and see everything more plainly than by listening in on the conversation. I think it is silly to think a policeman would take time from his important duties in law enforcement to listen to such slush on the telephone—let us call it a nicer name. Let us call it such romance on the telephone. It just does not make sense.

Mr. WILSON. I agree.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have had testimony here from authorities in New York where they have the law and they testified that there is far more abuse under the conditions where there is no effective law against wiretapping, far more abuse, more promiscuous wiretapping, than there is under a wiretap law administered under the strict supervision of a court and only after there is a showing made of a probability of a crime being committed or having been committed.

Any other comments you wish to make?

I will ask you to wait a few moments. Another Senator indicated that he was coming down and particularly Senator Hruska would like to ask you some questions. If you will be kind enough to wait a few moments we will see if Senator Hruska comes.

Will you come around, Justice Musmanno?

They tell me you were scheduled for tomorrow but you arrived today. We appreciate your arriving today rather than the day after tomorrow. We are so glad you are here. We all have problems keeping our dates.

Judge MUSMANNO. I cannot tell you how grateful I am that you will hear me this afternoon.

Senator MCCLELLAN. If you will give us a little background statement along with your identity now, we will be very pleased to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF HON. MICHAEL A. MUSMANNO, JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Judge MUSMANNO. Mr. Chairman, my name is Michael A. Musmanno, M-u-s-m-a-n-n-o, senior associate justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Shortly after the war I was appointed by President Truman as a judge at the International War Crimes Tribunal where I presided over what was known as the greatest murder trial in history, the Einsatzgruppen case.

I have written a number of books, one of them is entitled "Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

I am tremendously concerned about decisions which we are receiving from the highest Court in the land, and I would like to direct myself particularly to one decision which has stirred up a great deal of discussion, controversy in some circles, and including myself, distress.

No respectable doctor would prescribe for a patient he has not seen, for a disease he has not diagnosed, or for symptoms he has not appraised. Yet the Supreme Court, in the Miranda decision, has written out a prescription to apply in all criminal cases regardless of the nature of the malady or the circumstances which fractured the bones of society. In many instances the prescription does not at all coincide with the nature of the malignant disease and, in consequence, many cancerous criminals and pestilential psychopaths are stalking the streets of the Nation, polluting the communities through which they move, endangering the lives and the well-being as well as the property of the law-abiding public. Maniacal killers, degenerative rapists, and vicious robbers are being released in the name of the law, simply because of the prescription of the Supreme Court does not fit the disease.

In the Miranda case, the Supreme Court said that no matter what the circumstances might be, regardless of the individuals involved, irrespective of the background, intelligence, education, or lack of it, of the person questioned, and, regardless of the particular circumstances in the particular case, the person who wishes to freely speak about the circumstances may not speak or be listened to unless he first drinks from the bottle of medicine which contains four pharmaceutical specifics; namely, that he has been warned he is not compelled to speak, that what he says may be used against him, that he is entitled to have an attorney and if he is indigent the State must supply him with legal counsel.

I do not say there is anything inherently wrong about that prescription but the Supreme Court has said that, no matter how healthy a person may be, no matter how willing he is to talk, he may not talk unless he downs a couple spoonsful of the indicated antitoxin. A man may dash into a police station shouting, "I shot my wife!" Before the police inquire into how and why he shot his wife, they must take down the medicine bottle and pour out the four wonder drugs and force him to drink. Of course, by this time the wife may die, any possible accomplices may escape, and society itself will suffer, but this is of no consequence as against the indespensable swallowing of the preventive potion prescribed by the Supreme Court.

Justice Clark in his dissenting opinion carries my feeling even further, and probably so. He says:

> Such a strict constitutional specific inserted in the nerve center of crime detection may kill the patient.

The patient being the long-suffering public.

Last February I was shocked as was the rest of the country to read in the newspapers of a man called José Suarez, who was freed in Brooklyn, N.Y., after he had confessed to stabbing to death his wife and five children, ranging in age from 9 months to 5 years. Suarez was released because the police, before receiving his confession, failed to administer to him the paregoric prescribed in Miranda. This case so shocked me that I called the judge in the case, Justice Michael Kern of the Supreme Court of New York. He told me that it revolted him to put this "animal" as he called the killer, on the street, but in the face of Miranda, he could not do otherwise. He referred me to the able District Attorney, Aaron E. Koota, and I asked Mr. Koota to send me a memorandum on the case, which he graciously did. This memorandum revealed the following:

Jose Suarez lived with his common-law wife and five children at 301 Hooper Street, Brooklyn. On April 27, 1966, the wife and the five children were found dead at that address. The detectives took Suarez into custody and asked him about the deaths. He denied knowing any of the victims and even denied living at 301 Hooper Street. The dead woman's brother-in-law was brought to the police station, and identified the defendant as the husband of Maria Torres. Suarez said he did not know the brother-in-law. He even refused to acknowledge the identity of his own mother and sister when they were brought to the police station. A receipt for payment of a hotel room was found in Suarez's pocket and the detectives recovered blood-stained clothing from the room. He was taken to the morgue and shown the bodies of his wife and his son, Joseph, Jr. He denied ever having seen them before and he was returned to the police station. Fifteen minutes after arriving at the police station he called for the Spanish interpreter and said he wanted to tell what happened. He then told how on April 23 he had gone to the movies with his wife and two of the children. When he returned home, he got into an argument with his wife who called him "bad names" and stabbed him on the leg with a knife. He took the knife away from her and stabbed her about the chest "I don't know how many times." He then cut and stabbed the baby, Joseph, Jr. and all the others. He admitted the ownership of the blood-stained clothing.

Now all this occurred before the Miranda decision. Suarez confessed on April 27, 1966. The Miranda decision came down on June 13, 1966.

The police could not look into a crystal globe in an effort to determine what the Supreme Court was going to say in a case the police had never heard of and had not yet been decided. But the Supreme Court declared in the case of Johnson v. New Jersey, decided June 21, 1966, that the Miranda prescription was to apply to all untried cases, regardless of the dates of the confessions.

One has to walk a precarious tightrope which stretches from illogicality to non sequitur in order to make any sense out of Miranda effective chronology. The Constitution declares that Congress shall pass no ex facto law which, of course, is proper and just. No one should be punished for an act which was not a crime when committed. But the Supreme Court, in the Miranda case, has in effect rendered an ex post facto decision against the police and all those endeavoring to prosecute crime. Now if it be argued, and I would not quarrel with that kind of argument, that it would not be just to deny to an accused person the benefit of a law passed for the benefit of all accused, even though the law was enacted after the commission of the alleged wrongful act, I must ask why did the Supreme Court limit the application of the Miranda criterion only to untried cases? If it was wrong to deny Suarez, who confessed in April, 1966, a law passed in June 1966, shouldn't the Supreme Court, in logic, justice, and propriety require the law to apply to those who had already been tried and convicted as they did in the Gideon case? The answer, of course, is that the Supreme Court is not required to be logical.

You may note that I have said that I have spoken of a law "passed" by the Supreme Court. I use that term advisedly because no student of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court can possibly exclude the hypothesis that the Supreme Court has entered into the legislative field. I am not being disrespectful when I say that the court has become a super-Congress. What we are doing here today would suggest that the times have brought about a reversal of the plan of the original builders of our constitutional form of government. Instead of the Supreme Court interpreting laws passed by Congress, Congress is now passing on the judicial legislation of the Supreme Court.

I do not mean to say that the Supreme Court has not at times legislated wisely. I must confess that I have rejoiced in some of the legislative enactments of the Court, but, as a lawyer, I am compelled to say that it is not a question as to whether the Supreme Court legislates wisely. As a student of the law, I would say that the Supreme Court has no right to legislate at all.

That the Supreme Court legislated in the Miranda case is evidenced by the statement in the majority opinion which speaks of the newly created requirements as "the principles announced today" and the "system of warnings we delineate today." Justice Harlan, joined in by Justices Stewart and White, said in his masterful dissent:

> I believe the decision of the Court represents poor constitutional law and entails harmful consequences for the country at large. How serious these consequences may prove to be only time can tell.

Justice Harlan said further:

> Legal history has been stretched before to satisfy deep needs of society. In this instance, however, the Court has not and cannot make the powerful showing that its new rules are plainly desirable in the context of our society, something which is surely demanded before those rules are engrafted onto the Constitution and imposed on every State and county in the land.

I trust that my remarks may not be interpreted as in disrespect of the Supreme Court. I respect it without reservation and, of course, as a citizen, to say nothing as a justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, I am bound by its decisions. This, however, does not mean that I may not or should not point out wherein I believe it is in error. Indeed, the dissenting opinions in the Miranda case go much further than I have gone in their criticism of the majority opinion which unfortunately was supported by only five of the nine Justices. Justice White, joined in by Justices Harlan and Stewart, said:

> In some unknown number of cases the Court's rule will return a killer, a rapist, or other criminal to the streets and to the environment which produced him, to repeat his crime whenever it pleases him. As a consequence, there will not be a gain, but a loss, in human dignity. The real concern is not the unfortunate consequences of this new decision of the criminal law as an abstract, disembodied series of authoritative prescriptions, but the impact on those who rely on the public authority for protection and who without it can only engage in violet self-help with guns, knives, and the help of their neighbors similarly inclined. There is, of course, a saving factor: the next victims are uncertain, unnamed, and unrepresented in this case.
> Nor can this decision do other than have a corrosive effect on the criminal law as an effective device to prevent crime. A major component in its effectiveness in this regard is its swift and sure enforcement. The easier it is to get away with rape and murder, the less the deterrent effect on those who are inclined to attempt it. This is still good commonsense. If it were not, we should posthaste liquidate the whole law-enforcement establishment as a useless, misguided effort to control human conduct.

That is strong language, Mr. Chairman, and justified.

It is ironical, and I might even say a mockery of the law, courthouse, and justice, that the decision intended by the Supreme Court to protect the innocent from unjust accusation and save them from improper convictions should bear the name of the dangerous criminal, Ernest Miranda. The Supreme Court has made the Miranda decision a lighthouse in the law but it does not emanate light. Indeed, it projects shadows concealing rocks and shoals which endanger the ships of law enforcement.

Who is Miranda to enjoy the distinction of having his name immortalized, almost heroized, in a decision proclaiming supposed principles of justice, saving from harm the guiltless and the ensnared? On March 3, 1963, Ernest Miranda, 23 years of age, kidnaped an 18-year-old girl and forcibly raped her near Phoenix, Ariz. Ten days later he was arrested and taken to a police station where the victim picked him out of a lineup. Two officers then, in daylight and without any threats or promises, questioned him. In a short time Miranda gave a detailed oral confession and then wrote out in his own hand and signed a statement admitting and describing the crime. This is the confession the Supreme Court declared illegal. There could be no question the confession was voluntary, nor could there be any doubt that the defendant, who had had a ninth-grade education, knew what he was doing. Yet, because the police had not forced on him a drink of the potion, the prescription for which the Supreme Court had not yet drafted, this felonious, brutal outlaw was released. Who benefited by the decision of the Supreme Court? Society? The police? Law and order? The courts? How about the victim who had had subjected to the most ignominious torture that can be visited on a young girl?

There could be no doubt about Miranda's guilt when he was released, but if anyone would say, how do you know he was guilty, he could also have been innocent; that question has now been conclusively answered. Miranda was tried again and incidentally, while serving a term for robbery. This time, even without a confession, he was found guilty of kidnaping and rape. This is the robber, kidnaper, and rapist, now an inmate of the Arizona State penitentiary, whose name illumines the decision which is supposed to protect society, as well as the individual, but whose principal accomplishment is that it has thrown chaos and bewilderment into the battalions of law enforcement.

The Miranda decision is the Dred Scott decision of the 20th century, fettering the police in their efforts to protect society from violent criminals as the Dred Scott decision fastened the shackles of slavery on a substantial portion of the human race.

Not only has the Miranda decision bewildered the police, it has confused the courts. In November 1966, two small boys (ages 7 and 13) were found dead in a refrigerator in a house occupied by several people, including a woman called Wilma Eperjesi, this is in Fayette County, Pa. Miss Eperjesi was taken into custody by the police. She denied any knowledge as to how the fatal refrigerator occurrence came about and was released. Later on, the police came to the house to make an investigation as to a possible accidental cause for the two deaths. While the police were in the house, Miss Eperjesi called one of the police, whom she knew, into a room and confessed that she had closed the door on the two boys who died. On that confession, she was charged with the crime. Her attorney petitioned the court of Fayette County to suppress the confession and the court did so on the basis of Miranda. The Commonwealth appealed to our court and we reversed the lower court's decision. I wrote the opinion. In it I said:

> Once an utterance falls from the lips with extemporaneous naturalness, there is no way to declare it nonexistent. To order the nullification of such a statement would be like ordering one to reattach an apple to the limb from which it has fallen, not because of limb-shaking or tree climbing, but in consequence of the fruit's ripeness.
> When a policeman is investigating a crime or supposed crime it is his duty to note everything, listen to every voice, and study every object which may enter into a reconstruction of the untoward event, whose unknown origin he is seeking to ascertain. Trial courts should not impede officers in the fulfillment of their sworn duties. To so impede them is to imperil the safety of society. A person who has already killed, robbed, or burglarized, may repeat his violence. Thus, it is imperative that the policeman question all persons in the immediate territorial and chronological area of committed violence in order to take whatever precautions may be necessary to prevent a repetition of violence.

I endeavored in my opinion to distinguish the Miranda case, but I believe that if the defendant had appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court might well, under the Miranda decision, have declared the confession illegal because the policeman did not acquaint her with the four criteria of the Miranda decision.

The Miranda case cannot help but hinder policemen in the performance of their duty. To restrain a policeman from listening when statements are voluntarily made, even though it may later develop that that person is a suspect, is like restraining a policeman from drawing his pistol when someone in his vicinity brandishes a firearm. The list of policemen killed by criminal suspects is a long one, not the least prominent of this tragic aspect being the one of Policeman J. D. Tippit shot down in cold blood when he apprehended Lee Harvey Oswald to question him concerning the circumstances surrounding the assassination of our beloved President Kennedy.

Imagine that policeman saying if he could talk to Oswald—"Before you speak, I want you to know that you can have an attorney. Before you speak or I can listen to you, I want you to know that if you don't have an attorney, we must get you one and we dare not question you." This man armed with a pistol and rifle and heaven knows what other weapons. That is what the Miranda case would have provided for in that disgraceful, shameful page of our history.

The lower court in the Eperjesi case said that once Miss Eperjesi mentioned "refrigerator" the policeman should have told her she had the right to remain silent. I won't go into my opinion here in detail, but I remember that the lower court ruled that when she said she closed the door on the refrigerator, that the policeman should not have put any other questions and that it was wrong for him then to ask her, "Do you know that the two boys were in that refrigerator?"

I say if he had not asked that question, he should have received the booby prize of the year. It was the most natural question in the world; but under the Miranda case, he wouldn't have been permitted to ask that obvious, natural, logical, demanding question.

It would be additionally bad reasoning not to ask the questions because the woman could have known about the refrigerator incident without being criminally involved.

Apart from the criminality involved, we have accidental deaths and the police should inquire, and they should investigate, and they should interrogate. You can't wait until the lawyer arrives in order to get this information which may help to prevent other crime.

Miss Eperjesi could have known how the fatal occurrence came about, without being a participant in it. To have told her at this moment that she did not have to speak, might well have caused her to believe, on the hypothesis that she was only a witness, that even as a witness she should not speak.

To require policemen to stop investigating just when they happen upon a clue, which may lead to solving a crime, and further protect society, would be like telling a deep-sea diver to surface when he sees the first sign of the sunken ship he is seeking. To compel policemen not to listen to volunteered statements while investigating a homicide, is to put stoppers in their ears and require them to snap handcuffs on their wrists. Police have the sworn duty not only to protect society from crime but also, by ascertaining how much heartrending accidents occur, to assist in preventing the closing of refrigerator doors and the spilling of scalding water on infants.

Of course, all this has nothing to do with third degree methods. The majority opinion in the Miranda case devoted considerable space to a discussion of coercion in the obtaining of confessions. I cannot state too emphatically my abhorrence of a coerced confession. No language can be strong enough, no invective can be forceful enough, no epithet can be sufficiently castigatory to condemn an utterance torn form unwilling lips or taken from a tongue forced into babblement from application of the scourge of whip or torture. But that is not what we are talking about here. An involuntary confession is about the most worthless document that can be found in the length and breadth of the land.

No court will permit into evidence a confession which is written with a captive hand.

We are talking here about voluntary confessions, which the Supreme Court has outlawed unless a certain ritual is followed. I say that it is a stultification of commonsense to say that one cannot listen to a confession that is spoken with a willing tongue and a free spirit in the temple of truth, with the light of reason streaming through the open windows of an unrestrained conscience.

Senator McClellan, in his magnificent speech on the Senate floor on January 25, 1967, told of a self-confessed murderer in Columbus, Ohio, who was released because of the Miranda decision, he told of a robber who killed a hotel clerk in Seattle, Wash., but because of a confession, which, incidentally, was corroborated by other evidence, he was released on the basis of the Miranda decision.

In Evansville, Ill., a murder admitted his crime, but, because the prosecutor had not followed out the ritual of the Miranda decision, the State had to be satisfied with a manslaughter verdict. The able district attorney of Brooklyn, Aaron E. Koota, has stated that since the Miranda decision 96 out of 239 persons, suspects in homicide, robbery, felonious assault, and rape cases refused to make statements. In the past, refusals ran only about 10 percent. Mr. Koota declared:

> Most all these men will walk the streets as free men. These vicious crimes may never be solved. Recent Supreme Court rulings have shackled law-enforcement agencies, making it possible for vicious criminals to escape punishment.

It is not for me, Mr. Chairman, to tell you about the tide of crime in America rising like engulfing waves, of the heroic efforts being made by law-enforcing agencies, and of the impediments which hamper them in their valiant endeavors. You have made your own scholarly research, you have had highly competent men testify here on the subject. I can only say that I am alarmed when so conservative a newspaper as the New York Times, in an editorial entitled "Murderers at Large," declares:

> It would be an act of supreme judicial irresponsibility toward society to extend the present valid rules to the point where even freely given confessions were unusuable as evidence.

All this leads me to recommending to this distinguished committee that it approve of legislation which will have only one criterion with regard to confessions; namely, voluntariness. This voluntariness is to be ascertained from all the attendant circumstances. I believe that the trial judge, outside the presence of the jury, should hear evidence on the voluntariness of the confession. If he decides there was any element of coercion, promise or deception which led to the confession, he will be empowered to rule out the confession, even though the accused received the varying admonitions enumerated in the Miranda decision. The judge's decision in this respect will be final. If, on the other hand, he is persuaded the confession was voluntarily given, he then will permit both the prosecution and the defendant to introduce evidence before the jury supporting their respective contentions. He will then instruct the jury on the voluntariness. If twelve citizens chosen from all walks of life, being persons of good character and armed with the common sense one acquires in honest living, conclude the confession was voluntary, then it should be accepted as evidence in the case, otherwise not.

Obviously, I enthusiastically approve of Senate bill 674 and respectfully urge its enactment into law.

Senator McCLELLAN. Justice, I thank you most sincerely for giving us a very, very strong statement, one that should have an appeal to and persuade anyone who reads it.

Judge MUSMANNO. Thank you.

Senator McCLELLAN. I deeply appreciate it.

I only hope there will be other jurists who do not have a temptation to be timid in this area to help those of us who are trying to get the justices back on the track.

It grieves me when I think about the Suarez case you referred to, and I referred to others in speeches, and sit here today and hear testimony that Miranda admitted under oath and in court that he did rape the woman. There are those who are free today, who are guilty and who have confessed to their guilt and free simply because of the illogical injustice of the Miranda decision.

Now, what is your judgment about the impact on the crime rate in this country, when it becomes obvious and known throughout the criminal community that they are being freed, notwithstanding their guilt—their confessed guilt—of heinous crimes?

Judge MUSMANNO. I was a little bit surprised that the preceding witness, a very able police officer seemed to be a little reluctant to state whether this Miranda decision had any impact on the criminal element in the United States. There is no reluctance on my part to say that criminals have become emboldened, they have become encouraged, they have become further contemptuous of law and order because of the decisions handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring that before they can be even questioned about something, which obviously is within the purview of their knowledge and may prevent further crime, that they are entitled to tell to the police, representatives of the government, "I am not inclined to talk now, or let's wait a while."

Senator McCLELLAN. Well, you have heard me state here this afternoon the approaches to the problems that have been suggested—one, this moderate bill—I think it is a moderate bill. This will simply return us to the traditional system and procedures with respect to confessions that has prevailed in this country since the founding of our Government. This is S. 674, the bill which you have so strongly endorsed.

Then there is the constitutional amendment, which is cumbersome.

Judge MUSMANNO. I hope we don't have to come to the constitutional amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McCLELLAN. Or, you can limit the jurisdiction of the appellate courts. No one really wants to do that. That is harsh. The fourth alternative is to do nothing. If we do nothing, this Miranda decision will continue to prevail and become a precedent that must be followed by law-enforcement officials, and, as you point out, under no circumstance does it mitigate or excuse the failure to follow the decision.

Judge MUSMANNO. It is evident from what the Supreme Court said in the Miranda case, that if a professor of criminal law, who obviously would be familiar with the elements of voluntariness, would say, "I am going to confess to a crime, don't bother me with any admonitions, I want to tell you I did this," and he then confessed to a heinous crime, the Supreme Court would say, "No, no. Peremptorily, that man must be released because the magic phrases were not uttered.

Senator McCLELLAN. The courts are trying to protect the criminal element in this country, those who are engaged in habitual crime, the repeater. Don't you think this type person knows his rights pretty well?

Judge MUSMANNO. Yes, sir; indeed, very well.

Senator McCLELLAN. Knows it better than some courts, I expect. They get good counsel.

Judge MUSMANNO. Yes, indeed. You spoke about some judges being timid and unfortunately that is true.

Senator McCLELLAN. I appreciate that. They come here and testify on an issue where they are in disagreement with the court—as you came here to testify—you respect the court, I do, we all do. But if we cannot speak out and call attention to what we conceive to be the errors of the court and thus try to influence the change that is necessary by speaking out and giving the reasons why we think the court is in error——

Judge MUSMANNO. I never go by that beautiful, magnificent, marble building of the Supreme Court, with the flag flying, without the intensive urge to remove my hat, especially when I see those magnificent words, "Equality Under Law."

But this equality should apply to society as well as to the individual. What I started to say, Mr. Chairman, was that our chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, John C. Bell, would never be accused of timidity. And when he learned I was coming here, he asked me to convey to you, the chairman, his respects and then he asked me if I would submit to the chairman a statement which he prepared and which he would like, and I would be happy to see, placed in the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. Is that the chief justice of your supreme court?

Judge MUSMANNO. Yes, John C. Bell, Jr. He would like to have his statement included in the record.

Senator McCLELLAN. That will be printed in the record at this point. Please express to the chief justice our appreciation of his interest and of the contribution he is making to our difficult task here. Thank you kindly.

(The statement of John C. Bell, Jr., follows:)

STATEMENT OF JOHN C. BELL, JR., CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA

It is a matter of both common and Judicial knowledge that an appalling and brutal crime wave is sweeping our Country and is increasing six times more rapidly than our population, and I am sure that I speak for a great many Judges when I say that we are firmly convinced that our law-abiding Society is in great need of further protection by public authorities and especially by our Courts. Even before the recent astonishing decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, which so greatly limited and restricted police interrogation and the admissibility of confessions by murderers, rapists and other dangerous criminals, law-abiding citizens were and have been deprived of adequate protection of the Law, and every person accused of crime has been not only adequately but overly protected by the Courts. This is crystal clear from the following rights which are granted an accused: (1) In a criminal trial there is no mutual exchange of evidence. A defendant does not have to inform the State the names of any of his witnesses or his evidence, while the State must list its witneses on the Bill of Indictment; (2) a defendant does not have to take the witness stand and no comment or unfavorable inference can be drawn or argued therefrom; (3) a defendant can be convicted only if the State proves his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, which is defined to be a doubt which would restrain a reasonable man from acting in a matter of importance to himself; (4) a defendant's confession (or confessions are) is not admissible in evidence (a) unless and until the corpus delicti has been proved, and (b) the State has proved that his confession was voluntary; (5) a defendant is presumed to be innocent, no matter how many terrible crimes he may have previously committed; (6) if a defendant has never been convicted of crime he can place in evidence his good reputation and that alone can be sufficient to justify his acquittal; and (7) a defendant cannot be convicted if one, just one, out of the twelve jurors believes that the State has not proved he is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Furthermore, after a jury's verdict of "guilty" a defendant can always appeal for a new trial, alleging a violation of his Constitutional rights, or an error of law in the trial of the case, or a prejudicial error in the Court's charge, while after a jury's verdict of "not guilty" the State has no right of appeal and no right to a new trial no matter how strong and overwhelming the State's evidence was, or how many and flagrant errors the trial Judge committed against the State.

I am convinced, as are also four members of the Supreme Court of the United States and countless trial Judges, that the decision in the leading case of Miranda v. Arizona—which expressly overruled two prior and by necessary implication many prior decisions of the Supreme Court and adopted new and additional tests, standards, and conditions for the further protection of all persons accused of crime, including the most hardened and brutal criminals—has greatly weakened the already inadequate protection of Society. Moreover, it is unsupported by the language or the spirit of the Constitution or by prior Court precedents. Miranda and its kindred successors will, without the slightest doubt, greatly reduce the number of confessions and thereby gravely jeopardize the safety, security, protection, and general welfare of all law-abiding citizens which are of paramount importance in every civilized society.

For these reasons, I urge—and in this Statement I am expressing my own views and convictions and do not know the views of the other members of this Court—the Congress and also the Supreme Court of the United States to substantially change or modify the principles, tests, and conditions laid down in Miranda v. Arizona and permit the introduction into evidence of confessions which were voluntarily and without deception or coercion made by a defendant or by any person suspected or accused of a crime.

I enclose, as an appendix, brief quotations from the Dissenting Opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, with whom Mr. Justice Stewart and Mr. Justice White joined, in Miranda v. Arizona, which unequivocally support my views. It is noteworthy that Mr. Justice Clark went even further in opposing the new pro-criminal tests laid down in Miranda.

APPENDIX

Mr. Justice HARLAN in his dissenting Opinion said, inter alia, of the majority's Opinion:

". . . [it] in practical effect wipes out all confessions."

". . . the aim in short is ultimately to discourage confession at all."

"This requires a strained reading of history and precedent."

"Of course, the limitations imposed today were injected by necessary implication in case after case. What the Court largely ignores is that its rules impair, if they will not eventually serve wholly to frustrate an instrument of law enforcement that has long and quite reasonably been thought worth the price paid for it. There can be little doubt that the Court's new Code would markedly decrease the number of confessions."

"We do know that some crimes cannot be solved without confessions, that amply expert testimony attests of their importance in crime control and that the Court is taking a real risk with Society's welfare in imposing its new regime on the Country."

"One is entitled to feel astonished that the Constitution can be read to produce this result."

"Thirty States opposed these new restrictions and no State in the Country has urged this Court to impose the newly announced rules, nor has any State chosen to go nearly so far on its own."

"In conclusion, nothing in the letter or the spirit of the Constitution or in the precedents squares with a heavy-handed and one-sided action that is so precipitously taken by the Court in the name of fulfilling its Constitutional responsibilities."

Mr. Justice WHITE in his dissenting Opinion, in which Mr. Justice HARLAN and Mr. Justice STEWART joined, ably and wisely pointed out the fallacies inherent in and the dangers to Society resulting from the Opinion of the majority Court in Miranda v. Arizona. For brevity's sake, I shall quote only two sentences from his Opinion:

"The most basic function of any government is to provide for the security of the individual and of his property. Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 455.

". . .

"Without the reasonably effective performance of the task of preventing private violence and retaliation, it is idle to talk about human dignity and civilized values."

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Hruska.

Senator HRUSKA. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman, but I would join you in your expression of gratitude and appreciation for this very splendid analysis and comments on the Miranda case.

Judge MUSMANNO. Thank you. Thank you. I am honored that you did get here during some of my presentation. I highly appreciate what you just said, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

Senator THURMOND. Justice Musmanno, I would like to commend you for appearing here today and presenting a magnificent statement.

I wish every judge in the United States could read this statement. I wish every Congressman could read it, and I hope the Supreme Court members will read it. I feel that your appearance will be most helpful and will be very valuable to this subcommittee.

Judge MUSMANNO. Thank you, Senator.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Mr. Wilson, Senator Hruska, I believe, would like to ask some questions. Thank you for waiting.

Senator HRUSKA. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for that consideration. It does happen, as I told you privately, that action on the floor demanded my presence there on two subjects in which I was very keenly and directly involved and interested.

Thank you, Mr. Wilson, for being patient and waiting.

Mr. Wilson, you have had considerable experience working with the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance. Your department is a grantee under the program that office administers. Could you describe what your experience has been in this regard?

Mr. WILSON. Our experience, Mr. Senator, has been a satisfactory one.

We feel that the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance has given fair consideration to all proposals that we have submitted and have been helpful in the drafting of proposals that we have discussed with them.

For example, I have been notified by telephone, although I have not yet received the documentary support of this, that a proposal for the grant of $150,000 has been approved to enable us to undertake quite an ambitious program in the area of operations research, in which we will provide a task force of selected command officers to plan the general area of study, with law enforcement assistance providing salaries for technicians, salaries that are simply beyond the capacity of the Chicago Police Department to handle by themselves.

We feel that this project, which may require 2 or 3 years for its consummation, will provide, not only for the Chicago department but for other departments in the country, information on the police manpower allocation and the development of more sophisticated programs and techniques in dealing with our problems.

Senator HRUSKA. We sometimes hear of redtape in dealing with governmental agencies. What is your experience with so-called redtape in this connection?

Mr. WILSON. I am glad you mentioned it.

Senator HRUSKA. Perhaps I should have characterized it differently than redtape. After all, when public affairs are administered, certain conditions must be complied with; certain things must be verified and so on. Can you give us any suggestions in that regard?

Mr. WILSON. This is a matter of concern to me, not only insofar as the Office of Law Enforcement Assistance is concerned, but also in the Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967. It would be very simple if they would just roll up a barrel of money at the corner of my desk and say, "Go ahead and spend it."

From my viewpoint, this would be highly desirable. I can recognize, as you do, that in public affairs controls must be exercised. But I would like to cite a couple of incidents where, because we didn't have the barrel of money at the right hand to undertake the things at the time I felt they should be undertaken, other action had to be resorted to.

Police service is a service that operates with a certain measure of urgency. That is, we are confronted with situations that require action now. We can't wait.

Last year, we were considering a personal radio and had contemplated requesting an appropriation of over $2 million to expand the backbone of our system, so that personal radios with a power output of a watt and a half would be able to communicate with our communications center. We discussed this problem with some scientists at Illinois Institute of Technology Research Institute and we entered into a contract with them to resolve this problem. They felt that it would be possible to develop a system of transponds—a device the policeman could carry when he left his car, a device, part of the transceiver in the car, which would enable the officer, if he were several blocks removed from his car to receive any messages that were dispatched over his car radio, and in turn to activate the car radio and send the message with a 25-watt output, no matter how far he was from the car—that is, a matter of three, four, or five blocks; the advantage being, that we would save $2 million in our backbone expansion.

I was certain that we could have gotten enough money from OLEA to undertake this contract. But I was also aware that if we did this, and the contract we entered into with IITRI was, I think, in October last year, that it would probably have taken us 4 or 5 or 6 months to get the project underway. It so happened that there were some funds in our budget, and I took those funds and put them to use. We now have prototypes in operation and we have had them for some time, within a matter of 6 months. In other words, the problem was solved by about the length of time it would take, normally, to get these funds.

Senator HRUSKA. You mean by presenting an application to the OLEA and getting it processed, justified, verified, and confirmed?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, I don't say this critically, but I do state it as a fact.

Another example, the President's Crime Commission recommended that the police utilize community service officers to deal with tension situations in more hazardous police districts. In preparation for this summer, we appointed in our districts a community service sergeant. In six of our districts, we appointed six cadets who were indigenous to these districts, that is six to each of six districts. But we needed more cadets than we had available.

I would have liked at this time—and this is a month ago—to have been able to go somewhere and get enough money quickly so that we could have put those cadets on the job, have them trained and in operation before spring. We can't do this through our budget. This was a need that was not anticipated last fall. It came upon us suddenly—the idea really coming from the President's Crime Commission.

But we had no place to turn to get this kind of money. Here was involved, for the number of cadets we would have liked to have had, maybe $300,000 or $400,000.

I mention these two examples to emphasize my feeling that in some way there should be a provision for speeding up decisions. I don't know whether the law, as drafted, authorizes the Attorney General to delegate his responsibility of decision to State agencies.

For example, many States, including Illinois, have committees appointed by the Governor to deal in this area. And, perhaps, if the Attorney General was authorized to delegate some of this decisionmaking to that level, that we might be able to expedite the operation. There is a need in police service, I am convinced, for expediting it.

I am not qualified, really, to say how this should be done.

Senator HRUSKA. The bill does establish several objectives for which Federal assistance would be made available to the State and local governments.

Do you have a list of priorities in your own mind, in your own department, in your own experience, assuming that only limited amounts of Federal funds would be available under this bill?

Mr. WILSON. Well there are many uses that we could make of the Federal funds. The particular choice would be dependent in part on the size of the funds available.

For example, one of the lowest priorities in our building construction program for the Chicago Police Department is the construction of a new police academy. I put it at the bottom because I feel that the quality of the academy is determined by its staff rather than by the building it is housed in. And that, from an operation viewpoint, it is more important to get at an earlier date area headquarters and some new district stations rather than to go into construction of a police academy. If we could get support for the construction of an academy, this I would give a high priority to.

Senator HRUSKA. Are you familiar with the text of the bill? Title I pertains to planning grants. Title II provides for grants for law enforcement and criminal justice purposes.

Are you familiar enough with the bill's provisions to be able to express a judgment as to whether the Department of Justice under such an arrangement would become a partner in the administration of your department in connection with the granting of money under this program?

Would not the Department have to pronounce judgment on the projects you propose? Would it have to form judgments on its own part as to whether or not your recommendations should receive greater priority than some other recommendations? Have you examined the bill in this regard?

Mr. WILSON. Well, not quite, but I do not interpret the provisions of this act as being, as providing for conditional grants in aid. I do not think this concept is encompassed in the bill.

However, certainly, if someone has the responsibility of deciding on the soundness of the proposal, they must make the decision. I don't see how you can avoid it.

Senator HRUSKA. That would go even to priorities, would it not?

Mr. WILSON. I would think so.

Senator HRUSKA. Do you think someone in the Department of Justice can determine a priority better than you can in your department?

Mr. WILSON. No. But I don't think the bill says they will.

Senator HRUSKA. It says the plan must be approved. Suppose they say of the priorities you have, well, cadets are fine, but we think it is more important to raise salaries of the people now on the force. They could make that decision, could they not?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, they could.

Senator HRUSKA. They would have the power to make it.

Mr. WILSON. I presume they would.

Senator HRUSKA. Maybe they will say the cadets are more important than the personal radios. Maybe it would comport with your idea and maybe it would not. But they would have the power to do that under this bill.

Mr. WILSON. As I interpret it, they would. On the other hand, I think they are men of good will, men of sound judgment, men who are interested in the objectives of the bill; and if it is wisely and courageously administered, I think it will do good. I am not worried about the hazards that may lurk within it.

Senator HRUSKA. Well, I will agree that they are dedicated men acting in good faith, and men who are striving to do the right thing, However, I doubt very much, Mr. Wilson, that too many people will go along on the proposition of their knowing more about the priorities in your police department than you do.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I don't think the bill says that they do.

Senator HRUSKA. It says they shall be the judge of what kind of program you are going to have. You can develop a plan but they have to approve it. If they do not think it is wise or judicious, they will not have to approve it.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose this is a risk we have to take. I don't know how you are going to oppose it.

Senator HRUSKA. Is there some way we can describe in terms of the law the purposes for which a given amount of money should be used? And then have that money available to men like yourself in charge of very big and important departments—it would not be a barrel of money and it would not be granted indiscriminately. It would be granted conditionally, but on a wider basis than a discretionary power to act upon a particular blueprint plan. Would an arrangement of that kind be feasible in your judgment?

Mr. WILSON. Who, if you have such an arrangement, would decide that the request made was a sound one?

Senator HRUSKA. The terms of the law. The law could describe categories of activities within a police department to which Federal money can be devoted. For example, it could be for communications and men. You would get your radios if you thought radios were first priority. It could be for additional personnel or it could be for increasing salaries up to a given point. But you would exercise your own good judgment as to the priorities and how the money should be devoted.

Do you think that would make sense in the situation like this, to get away from the delay that you speak of in connection with your personal radios or cadets?

Mr. WILSON. The administration of such a law is an extremely difficult one. I think it would be even more difficult to formulate the type of law that you have in mind unless you completely oversimplify it.

For example, you might merely provide for 50 percent of the police budget be paid by the Federal Government without any conditions. I am not sure that we would make as much progress in the improvement of the quality of police service in this country under such a provision as we would if we operated as planned in the proposed bill.

Senator HRUSKA. Your department is one of the original 15 participants in the FBI's National Crime Information Center. Could you make a brief reference to it and how it is coming along?

Mr. WILSON. It is coming on very well. We are one of the first departments that had random retrieval files for persons wanted and stolen property, and it was logical that this department with, I think, 14 or 15 others, should be selected to participate in the program that is being developed by the FBI.

Senator HRUSKA. That random file, that is one of those big storage wheels, and they sometimes call it random access, do they not?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct. It provides immediate response to an inquiry in miliseconds. And by feeding into the files of the computer in Washington, D.C., information on automobiles that are stolen and persons who are wanted on felony warrants, we are able to get our information in so that inquiries made anywhere across the country would result in the recovery of stolen Chicago cars and wanted Chicago criminals. It works excellently. We have examples of makes almost every day of the week.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. No questions for this witness, Mr. Chairman.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We have one more witness.

Mr. Greenhalgh, I notice you have a statement. Would you identify yourself. Do you wish to read your statement, Mr. Greenhalgh?

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM W. GREENHALGH, PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, MONTGOMERY COUNTY COUNCIL OF MARYLAND, AND CHAIRMAN, PUBLIC SAFETY POLICY COMMITTEE, METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON COUNCIL OF GOVERNMENTS

Mr. GREENHALGH. First of all, Senator, arrangements were made this morning that I was to substitute for the speaker coming tomorrow, for the National Association of Counties, Judge Curry. He is ill and will not be here.

Senator McCLELLAN. We can put his statement in the record at this point.

(The statement of Charles E. Curry follows:)

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COUNTIES BY CHARLES E. CURRY, PRESIDING JUDGE, JACKSON COUNTY, MO., BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, U.S. SENATE, ON THE SAFE STREETS AND CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1967, S. 917, APRIL 20, 1967

Mr. Chairman, I am Charles Curry, Presiding Judge of Jackson County, Missouri and a member of the Board of Directors of the National Association of Counties. At the National Association of Counties recent Legislative Conference, the "Safe Streets and Crime Control Act" was our Crime Committee's principle item of study. The basic conclusion reached by our Committee's deliberation is very aptly set forth in S. 917, Findings and Declarations Section, which is as follows:

> "Crime is essentially a local problem that must be dealt with by state and local governments. But sustained and substantial national assistance is necessary to aid these governments in coping with lawlessness that has become a serious problem of national significance."

Therefore, the National Association of Counties endorses S. 917 as a very necessary item in implementing the foregoing Declaration of Purpose.

Unquestionably, one of the principle conclusions of the Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice's Report is the need for an unparalleled effort to improve the coordination and cooperation of our literally thousands of agencies dealing with the problem of crime prevention and crime control. Such is absolutely essential if we are to devise and implement the new procedures, methods, and programs necessary to adequately confront our crime crises. To proceed with the same fragmented approach we are now burdened with, is unthinkable. The legislation you are presently considering, S. 917, does recognize this need, however, in our view, fails to adequately provide for it. The legislation does provide the Attorney General with a "sense of direction" in this area of cooperation and coordination by such phrases as—

> "and to encourage coordination in planning, operations, and research by law enforcement and criminal justice agencies throughout the Nation."
> "encourage plans which encompass the entire metropolitan area, if any, of which the applicant is a part;"

However, with the expertise in the field of "grantsmanship" that our local governments have now developed and with the pressure now being exerted on our local officials to do something more about the crime problem, we are confident that a stronger Congressional mandate is necessary than presently exists if we are to obtain the coordination and cooperation we desperately need.

Unless there is this strong requirement for coordination and cooperation, we are confident that once the legislation is enacted, many, if not most eligible local governments will feel compelled to apply for planning funds without waiting to devise what in the long run would be a much more desirable cooperative arrangement to handle planning on a multi-governmental basis. We recognize the desirability of providing administrative flexibility and we feel our recommended amendment would provide for this. The basic change we suggest relates to the critical element of planning and organizing for an improved and increased effort to control crime. Planning can be the basis for accomplishing the coordination or pooling of activities that is so vitally necessary in metropolitan areas and among rural counties. Planning can encourage and facilitate the improvement of intergovernmental cooperation of our local law enforcement and criminal justice agencies.

In our view, the establishment of a population factor as the criteria for eligibility in Title I (Planning Grants) will hinder a coordinated-cooperative approach rather than stimulate it. It is our recommendation that the legislation be amended by the inclusion of the following section:

> "With regard to grants made pursuant to Section 102. other than those to states. the Attorney General shall in the absence of substantial reasons to the contrary, require that such grants be made to combinations of units of general local government composing at least an entire county."

We are not suggesting the county government be the only unit eligible for a planning grant. What we are saying is that the planning for crime control should encompass more than the "core central city". It should encompass the core central city, its surrounding suburban communities and those law enforcement and criminal justice functions of the county which, geographically speaking, are applicable to the entire county. Crime respects no political boundaries. It is not an insular program.

In that some persons might understandably view our recommendation as a parochial one, I should like to make several observations which support the merit, feasibility and acceptability of the county, as the planning unit for crime control. Simply stated, the county is an acknowledged unit of established local government providing the largest possible area within which one can base planning activity. Secondly, politically speaking, most people can relate to a county-wide approach to the problem. Counties are deeply involved in crime control as evidenced by the fact they employ approximately 56,000 persons in the area of police protection and 32,000 persons in correctional institutions and last year spent approximately $625,000,000 for these two categories, not to mention their many other direct and indirect related activities.

Additionally, our country's welfare efforts are administered on a county-wide basis. Our welfare programs are totally concerned with that segment of society whose social and economic status makes them most susceptible to a life of crime. This fact is especially clear with respect to the young and it is at their age where most criminal careers begin. It is essential that our planning be more than how better to apprehend and convict the criminal. We must make preventive activity an essential part of our planning and programs and our country-wide welfare programs must be structured and coordinated with local government overall crime prevention efforts. Our proposal for county-wide planning would not require merger of programs or Police Departments nor would it preclude individual local agencies from qualifying for grants under Title II and III, as long as they had participated in a county-wide planning effort. It merely requires that through a planning process, they relate to each other.

The question may well be raised as to why stop with a single county, why not "require" the entire metropolitan area to plan together. Quite frankly, we feel that from a practical and political viewpoint, county-wide planning is the maximum we can expect at this time. This does not rule out multi-county cooperative activity where it is feasible, but at this stage in the development of crime control, we feel a county-wide approach should be the minimum. Besides, 60 percent, or 130 out of our 219 SMSA's are within a single county.

RURAL AMERICA

There are 2,483 counties out of a total of 3,049 having a population of less than 50,000. One fourth of our nation's population live in these counties and crime is increasing there. The section on "Rural Arrest Trends", in the Uniform Crime Reports for 1965, shows that in rural areas, murder and non-negligent manslaughter inceased 19.2% over 1964 and aggravated assaults increased 6%. In the same time period, with the exception of auto theft, offenses against property also increased. Stolen property crimes increased 15%; fraud—9%; violations of narcotic drug laws—27%. Criminal homocides for youths under 18 years—47% and forcible rape in this same age group increased 22%. One fourth of all Americans living in rural areas should not be arbitrarily excluded from federal assistance for better law enforcement programs.

We appreciate the fact that counties under 50,000 could join together to provide a basis of 50,000 thereby qualifying for a planning grant under the bill as now written. The concept of a multi-county cooperative arrangement in our sparcely populated areas is certainly something to be desired and encouraged, a fact that we endorse and support. In the area of industrial development, health, education and a number of other governmental activities, multi-county planning is now often a practical and feasible approach. However, we seriously question whether the requirement of planning for law enforcement and criminal justice on such a large geographical basis in our rural areas is, at this time, a feasible one. We would recommend that whenever a county government of any population provides law enforcement services on a county-wide basis, including subcontracting with incorporated municipalities or that the planning activity to be financed by a grant is directed toward that objective, then such county should be considered eligible for a 90% planning grant. The need for this exception is extremely important to counties presently under 50,000, but subject to burgeoning advance of a metropolitan population or suffering a particularly acute crime control problem. This would, of course, require additional funds, a fact recognized by our NEXT recommendation.

INCREASED AUTHORIZATION

Unquestionably, crime is a problem which must be recognized on a national scale to the same extent as are such problems as air and water pollution, health, education and welfare. Like poor health or polluted streams, crime will keep costing and costing—unless we move massively to control it. S. 917 authorizes $50,000,000 for the fiscal ending June 30, 1968 with an anticipated request of $250,000,000 more for fiscal year 1969. In our view, those amounts are inadequate and fail to recognize the high priority we must assign this problem if we are to successfully confront it. The National Association of Counties recommends that at the minimum, the authorization be increased to $150,000,000 for the first year, with corersponding appropriate increases for the authorization for fiscal year 1969.

DETENTION FACILITIES

One of the most important areas in the whole subject of crime and its control and prevention, as President Johnson pointed out in his Crime Message, is the problem of juvenile delinquency—or more realistically—juvenile crime. Fifteen year-olds commit more crime in this country than any other age group. Sixteen year-olds follow a close second. More than 50 percent of the arrests for burglary are for youths under eighteen.

In this respect, NACO feels the provision for construction type grants under Title II is vital.

National statistics alone indicate that juveniles will be most strongly affected by any new methods this Title may stimulate. Yet, juveniles, the source of future criminals, are the most discriminated against in our present system of criminal justice. The national survey conducted by the President's Crime Commission found that in 93% of the country's juvenile court jurisdictions, covering 44% of the population, there is no place for the pre-trial detention of juveniles other than a county jail or police lock-up. In 1956, over 100,000 juveniles were confined in adult institutions—presumedly because no separate juvenile facilities existed. I don't think I must elaborate on the harm done to a youthful offender by being thrown into a typical adult detention facility. Certainly, this is not rehabilitation, but stimulation to further crime, further hardening against the law and society.

As national statistics indicate, the problem of separate facilities is most acute in smaller counties with limited and strained budgets. Additionally, these youthful offenders, following a national migration pattern, often end up in our larger cities as adult criminals, another reason to not ignore our rural areas. Even more undesirable, is placing abandoned, neglected or runaway juveniles in adult detention facilities, a practice pursued in many smaller communities without shelter facilities under their welfare departments.

We call these problems to the committee's attention for this reason. I would desire the members to take a closer look at this Title to consider making it more explicit with regard to providing for juvenile detention facilities. We cannot over estimate the importance of this one aspect in the development of a criminal mentality. The most important area of crime prevention and control today is the rehabilitation of the juvenile offender. We feel this area is important enough for Congress to spell out these dangers and explicitly provide for separate detention facilities for juveniles and for specific amounts to be allocated for such facilities. This would serve to direct Congressional intent to the high priority this type of construction should have with regard to the "innovative function", mentioned in Section 203 (a). The Juvenile Delinquency Prevention Act of 1967, (S. 1248) recognizes the importance of this problem and proposes grants for the prevention, treatment and control of juvenile delinquency. But we do not feel that the existence of this proposed legislation, not yet scheduled for a hearing in the Senate, should preclude this committee from including provision for the construction of juvenile detention facilities in S. 917. We urge the committee to consider the relationship of the juvenile to the crime committed in our society, and to not take a chance that federal assistance will not be available for detention facilities.

SUMMARY

In summary, we feel that the effective response to this legislation at the local level will be spontaneous and appreciated, and that if a program of this dimension is authorized and funded, and that the continuing integrity and responsibility of local governments to solve this problem is respected, we can expect to soon start making the kind of impact on this problem that will be necessary if we are to adequately confront it. Finally, I would urge that Congress do all it can to assure that this new grant in aid program be flexible and that it encourage and not stifle local response to local problems by complicated application procedures and inadequate appropriations. Local governments directly need the planning, research construction, etc. assistance money provided for in this legislation. It appears to be the only way at this time that local governments will be able to bear the burden that lies ahead.

We appreciate the opportunity of presenting our views.

Thank you.

Mr. GREENHALGH. There are only two points that the National Association of Counties would like to make: that the county should be the basic planning unit under S. 917, and the Association would appreciate if you would give more consideration for more money than the original grant.

Senator MCCLELLAN. The bill is confusing as to municipalities and counties, is it not? There are four or five areas where the county would have jurisdiction and responsibility, whereas the municipality would not, as I see it.

Mr. GREENHALGH. On the record, I am county councilman from Montgomery which is a suburban county near the District of Columbia. We have had that problem already about certain municipalities within the framework of our county.

Senator MCCLELLAN. I think we have got to study this bill.

Mr. GREENHALGH. They just wished me to bring that to your attention.

My credentials, briefly, are as follows: I am a former U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia. I have had 8 years as Federal prosecutor, both through the main Justice Department and also in the District. I have been for the last 4 years director of the legal internship program at Georgetown Law Center, which is a university-oriented public defender for the District of Columbia.

I am a full professor at Georgetown, professor of criminal procedure.

I also come before you as an elected public official in the capacity of very much testifying in support of S. 917.

I think this is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation that I have seen on the Federal horizon for many, many years. I testified in support of OLEA when it came through here in 1965. I feel even more desperately now that this legislation should go through.

I think it is probably helpful with regard to why we need this legislation, and I would like to read just a short statement with regard to this point.

Mr. Chairman, members of the Judiciary Committee, I am indeed privileged today to be permitted to address myself to the Safe Streets and Criminal Control Act of 1967 (S. 917), which, I contend, is fundamental to the improved administration of criminal justice in the United States. Though somewhat delayed in its appearance on the American scene, it represents a timely effort to bring relief to a field of the law in which some of us have frustratedly been laboring for several years. As an elected official in a local self-governing community, I submit that this legislation is essential to the Nation's welfare.

History is always helpful as to the necessity of legislation. In that regard, perhaps a rapid glance at relatively recent Supreme Court decisions is the most critical area of law enforcement affecting Federal and State criminal procedure can assist us. In the late 1950's, 1960's and, for that matter, up to the present time, the Supreme Court of the United States has embarked on a series of decisions in the fourth amendment pale which have greatly influenced law enforcement in the Federal system.

Starting approximately in 1958, it began to lay down new guidelines to Federal officers by reinterpreting the law of probable cause for making an arrest without a warrant and for the issuance of an arrest and search warrant. Such landmark cases as Roy Jones, Giordenello, Draper, Henry, Rios, Cecil Jones, Wong Sun, Ventresca, Hoffa, all have become courthouse weapons in the daily battles fought in the Federal arena. Also, in 1958, the Court, again relying on its Federal supervisory power, enunciated a further rule of exclusion of evidence in the Miller case by holding that a Federal law enforcement officer in making an arrest with or without a warrant or executing a search warrant in fixed premises must announce his authority and purpose before breaking and entering.

During the period while the Court was busily engaging in its Federal restatement of constitutional law pertaining to the fourth amendment, most of the States were equally as busy ignoring these rules of exclusion because of Wolf decided in 1949. Then in 1961 came Mapp and throughout the land nothing was heard in State law enforcement circles except wailing and gnashing of teeth. Thus, the Supreme Court specifically held that by applying the same constitutional standard forbidding unreasonable searches and seizures, the exclusionary rule as used against the Federal Government since Weeks in 1914 was thereby enforceable against the States through the 14th amendment.

Subsequent decisions since Mapp, such as Fahy, Stoner, Preston, Clinton, Aguilar, Beck, Standord, One 1958 Plymouth Sedan, James, Riggin, Schmerber, and Cooper have merely incorporated Federal standards of reasonableness in light of the "fundamental criteria" laid down by the Supreme Court applying the fourth amendment. The only exception of fourth amendment federalization was Ker in 1963 which held that the States did not have to follow the Miller case since the Court was merely interpreting a Federal statute and not the Constitution. But the Supreme Court has not yet completed its reintegration of the fourth amendment. In the mill at the present time are McCray, decided 5 to 4 two weeks ago—(sufficiency of probable cause), Hayden (evidentiary search), Wainwright (point of arrest) and Sibron (constitutionality of "stop and frisk" law). This last case when decided, will undoubtedly have considerable impact in six States and others where such legislation is contemplated.

To date, resistance by some of the States to Mapp borders on intransigence. Others have grudingly endeavored to live with it, but do not follow the Supreme Court with decisional uniformity. Yet a few apply it and its progeny as the law of the land. Primary culpability in defiance thereof almost universally rests with the trial courts, who cannot bring themselves to exclude otherwise admissible evidence predicated on lack of probable cause or unreasonable search and seizure. They believe that the criminal is not to go free because the constable has blun-dered. Thus, if the trial courts refuse to compel sanctions, neither do the prosecutors, and as a natural consequence State law enforcement officers see no reason to comply. I mean this last sentence very much.

As one who has lectured to law enforcement organizations, prosecutors' offices and defense associations in Virginia, the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Delaware since 1958, it is my opinion that it is imperative that local law enforcement officers be trained to work within the framework of these fourth amendment decisions.

The Safe Streets and Crime Control Act of 1967 provides the mechanism by which specialized training in the law of probable cause and search and seizure can be made possible. It envisions planning grants, innovative training programs and capital grants for such critical projects as police academy centers. I heartily endorse this legislation as one more weapon in the domestic war on crime.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much. Any questions, Senators?

Senator HRUSKA. I have no questions.

Senator THURMOND. I have no questions.

Senator McCLELLAN. Thank you very much.

The Chair wishes to put in the record a letter from Samuel W. Barrow, of Rockville, Md. It is quite interesting and points out that 4 years ago, 1964, he established a shopping center out in Rockville. He lists the number of stores and the nature and kind of stores that are in the shopping center and the size. Since that time, 1964, every store has been held up, burglarized, or robbed at least twice, and some at least four times. The bank has been held up three times and the A. & P. Store was set on fire.

The letter goes on to protest that they pay $19,000 taxes a year and yet have had to hire policemen after hours and have special cars to protect their property.

I think that is a reflection of conditions in this country, and the courts as well as the Congress must act to give some needed assistance to law enforcement.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

ROCKVILLE, MD., April 17, 1967.

Senator J. L. McCLELLAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR McCLELLAN: As you are a Member of the Committee on Appropriations of the District of Columbia, I should like to bring to your attention a definite personal experience on Crime within five miles of the Capitol of the United States, on the District Line in Prince George's County, Maryland.

My partners and I have built a shopping center known as the Southern Avenue Shopping Center on Southern Avenue at Chesapeake Street. This center contains an A. & P. Store, a Dry Cleaner, a People's Drug Store, Humble Esso Service Station, Southern Maryland Bank and Trust Building, a Beauty Parlor, Barber Shop, Liquor Store and a Miniature Race Track. We opened this center in March 1964. Since that time, every store has been held up, burglarized or robbed at least twice and some at least four times. The Bank has been held up three times. The A. & P. Store was set on fire.

The local police cannot give us any assistance. They claim to be understaffed and also lack jail space if they could make arrests. They do, however, suggest that we might possibly hire their police, when off duty, to act as armed guards!

When private citizens find it necessary to protect their own properties, by the use of personally hired armed guards, while paying taxes of more than Nineteen Thousand Dollars, per year, it seems high time that something is done to Protect Law Abiding Citizens (who pay their taxes, and contribute to every citizen's endeavor) from the Criminal Elements of their neighborhood.

We will appreciate anything you and your committee can do to assist us in maintaining an orderly business establishment.

Yours very truly,

SAMUEL W. BARROW,
Trustee, Southern Avenue Shopping Center.

Senator MCCLELLAN. That concludes today's hearing. We will come back in the morning and we will resume at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 5:05 p.m., the subcommittee recessed, to reconvene on Thursday, April 20, 1967, at 10 a.m.)

CONTROLLING CRIME THROUGH MORE EFFECTIVE LAW ENFORCEMENT

THURSDAY, APRIL 20, 1967

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL LAWS AND PROCEDURES,
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:15 o'clock a.m., in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, Senator John L. McClellan (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McClellan (presiding), Ervin and Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Also present: William A. Paisley, chief counsel; James C. Wood, assistant counsel; Richard W. Velde, minority counsel; and Mrs. Mabel A. Downey, clerk.

Senator MCCLELLAN. We will proceed.

Mr. Cahn, will you please identify yourself for the record?

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM CAHN, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF NASSAU COUNTY, STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. CAHN. My name is William Cahn. I am district attorney of Nassau County, N.Y., which is a suburban community of over a million people, and is often referred to as the bedroom of organized crime.

I would like to state at this time that it is my pleasure and privilege to testify before this committee with regard to the problem of wiretapping.

Senator MCCLELLAN. How long have you been a practicing attorney?

Mr. CAHN. I have been a practicing attorney since 1949. At the present time, I am president of the New York District Attorney's Association and I am vice president of the National District Attorney's Association. I have been district attorney of Nassau County since September of 1962. In January of 1950 I was appointed an assistant district attorney and served in that capacity until my appointment and election as district attorney. In 1954 I formed and headed the Nassau County District Attorney's Rackets Bureau. Most of my work, therefore, was concerned with the investigation and prosecution of organized crime. In all, I have spent well over 17 years in the field of law enforcement.

Senator MCCLELLAN. Are you representing your association as well as yourself?

Mr. CAHN. Yes, sir; I represent both the National District Attorney's Association and the New York State District Attorney's Association. And, I speak as the district attorney of Nassau County.

Mr. McClellan. You are speaking for the association, as well as yourself?

Mr. Cahn. Yes, sir.

Senator McClellan. Very well. Proceed.

Mr. Cahn. Let me state at the outset, my strong recommendation that the Congress enact legislation banning wiretapping by private persons and permitting official wiretapping by law-enforcement officials pursuant to court approval and control. The proposed Senate bill which is presently before this subcommittee for consideration; that is, bill No. S. 675, with certain changes hereinafter discussed, would effectively accomplish the desired end.

It is my considered view that new provisions of law are necessary so that there will be available to the forces of law enforcement, those investigative and prosecutory devices which are indispensible in the war on crime.

The present state of the law of wiretapping is that wiretapping by State law enforcement officials and divulgence of the wiretaps as evidence in court, does not violate the U.S. Constitution; but, according to various judicial decisions, including some rendered by the U.S. Supreme Court, it does offend against section 605 of the Federal Communications Act.

Senator McClellan. When you say it is not unconstitutional, has the issue ever been decided squarely by the Supreme Court, in reference to authorized wiretapping?

Mr. Cahn. Yes; I believe that there have been decisions by the Supreme Court.

Senator McClellan. How long ago?

Mr. Cahn. As far back as in the 1950's, Senator McClellan.

Senator McClellan. I do not know whether we may be sure that they would so hold again.

Mr. Cahn. I am a district attorney, sir, and not a prophet. I could not say.

Senator McClellan. But, so far the constitutionality has been sustained?

Mr. Cahn. That is correct, sir.
