AUDIOVISUAL MATERIALS

INTRODUCTION

The 1990 edition of the Child Abuse and Neglect and Family Violence Audiovisual Catalog contains descriptions of 350 videos, films, slides, multimedia packages, and other audiovisual materials. Most items listed in this volume were produced after 1984; however, a few date back to the early 1980's. The materials included are intended for a broad range of audiences, from children and parents to professionals working in such areas as child protective services and law enforcement.

The catalog was developed cooperatively by the Clearinghouse on Child Abuse and Neglect Information and the Clearinghouse on Family Violence Information. To help keep us informed of new products to include in future updates of the catalog, please send suggestions to:

How To Use This Catalog

The Child Abuse and Neglect and Family Violence Audiovisual Catalog is divided into two main sections. The first section includes detailed descriptions of the audiovisuals, arranged alphabetically by title. If an item is part of a series, it is listed alphabetically under the series title, with the series title appearing first in bold print, and the title of the individual item underlined. Please note that any titles or series titles beginning with a numeral (for example, 60 Minutes) are sorted to the front of the alphabetical listing. Each main entry lists the producer, medium, year of release (if known), purchase or rental cost, and distributor's name and address. Other relevant information is mentioned, such as format and running time for a video. A brief abstract is included, followed by a list of the audiences for which the item is intended.

The second section consists of the following indexes: product type, subject, audience, and distributor. Only titles are provided in the indexes.

The product type index lists titles by medium, under categories such as films, games, records, theater performances, and videotapes.

The subject index lists titles under terms (descriptors) that reflect the specific subject matter of the item, for example, spouse abuse; the primary purpose of the material, such as professional training; and special characteristics of the item, such as "public service announcement."

Descriptors are selected from the Child Abuse and Neglect and Family Violence Thesaurus. Items can be listed under a maximum of four subject headings, as appropriate.

The audience index groups titles by the populations for which the audiovisuals are intended, such as abused children, teenagers, parents, teachers, and other professionals.

The distributor index lists titles under the sources from which they are available.

This program examines several cases involving alleged incest situations. A mother and son go underground to circumvent a court order giving custody to the father, whom the mother alleges has sexually abused the boy. The father is interviewed, and his attempts to find his son are discussed. Another father in prison for sexually abusing his teenage daughter is also interviewed. A third case report shows a 10-year-old girl testifying against her father in an actual courtroom trial; the youngster uses anatomical dolls to describe the molestation.

This news report examines a case of a battered woman who, after enduring many years of terror and abuse, contracted with a third party to have her abusive husband murdered. Interviews with the wife, her children, her lawyer, and others involved in the case show how difficult it can be to present the facts about years of abuse in a courtroom situation. Since murder for hire is considered the worst form of premeditated murder, the battered wife received a lengthy sentence; efforts to obtain clemency from the governor are described.

This report examines the results of the McMartin preschool case in Manhattan Beach, CA, where a 3-year jury trial resulted in not-guilty verdicts for Raymond Buckey and his mother Peggy McMartin Buckey. The long history of the case is reviewed, including a controversial letter sent to parents by local police at the outset of the case and the methodology used to interview the children at Children's Institute International. Problems in prosecuting the case are detailed, such as discrepancies in the testimony of different child victims. Raymond and Peggy Buckey are interviewed and maintain their innocence. Several children who testified at the trial discuss how they felt about the verdict and how the lengthy proceedings affected their lives.

This news report investigates several cases where families were falsely accused of child maltreatment by Florida's Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services (HRS). A case is followed through the courts in which a misdiagnosis of venereal disease led HRS to remove 2 children from their home; the parents are eventually vindicated and regain custody of the children, but only after court sessions lasting several months. Another parent is interviewed who found his name on the HRS list of confirmed child abusers after he had been declared innocent in a court hearing.

The package of 4 films explores the problem of sexual assault between people who know each other. In each film, the interaction between a young man and woman in an ordinary situation reveals attitudes that contribute to rape: mixed messages and poor communication skills; unrealistic expectations and sex role stereotypes; and peer pressure and double standards. The final film offers practical strategies to prevent acquaintance rape. The package includes a program guide, fact sheets, and posters for prevention and community education programs.

MVR Hall
Ithaca, NY 14853

The videotape presents a series of simulated interviews designed to accompany the Star (Statewide Network for Abused Runaways) Buddy Training System, a training program developed to help workers in runaway programs deal with abused or neglected youth. The interviews are keyed to 3 specific units of the curriculum: Assessment and Identification, Reporting and Advocacy, and Therapeutic Intervention. The Assessment and Identification interviews focus on Alex, a new arrival at the shelter, whom workers suspect of having been sexually abused; the scenes illustrate a model interview in which information is gathered without leading questions using an empathetic approach. The Reporting and Advocacy interviews are with a boy who has been physically abused by his father; the worker prepares him for his first encounter with child protective services, and the CPS worker further prepares him for the CPS process. The Therapeutic Intervention interviews are with an older teenager who has left her abusive mother and is making a life for herself; working with strengths and abandoning old negative patterns are stressed.

The reliability of child testimony and the credibility of a child witness in a sexual abuse case is discussed, where the child's intelligence, capacity, and ability to tell the difference between the truth and fantasy are of crucial concern. The discussion is from a roundtable at the February 1985 National Symposium on the Child Victim of Sexual Abuse. It is suggested that with skilled, effective interviewing techniques, it is possible to obtain credible testimony from any child. A credibility interview should be structured to determine the child's mental age versus his physical age, the age-appropriateness of the child's level of suggestibility, the child's motivation for disclosure, and the consistency of his story.

The crucial intake interview in sexual abuse cases is discussed, from a roundtable at the February 1985 National Symposium on the Child Victim of Sexual Abuse. Participants suggest that those initially involved with a child victim must be knowledgeable about sexual abuse and child development; a multidisciplinary approach seems to work most effectively. In addition to collecting information about the case, the initial interview should ensure that the child has some knowledge of what has occurred. The initial interview can help evaluate the credibility of the child, and assess the degree of trauma and vulnerability of the child. Problems with conducting a comprehensive interview without leading the child and jeopardizing court acceptability of the information are discussed. A model program in Huntsville, AL, is described.

The constitutional questions in videotaping of child witnesses in sexual abuse cases are reviewed, from a roundtable at the February 1985 National Symposium on the Child Victim of Sexual Abuse. Problems of leading questions by interviewers and their admissibility in court are explored, and the reliability of videotapes for evidence and decisionmaking is discussed. It is emphasized that the goal of taping is to reduce the stress of the situation for the child, but the purpose of the tape (investigative or for evidence) should be kept clear from the outset. The constitutional rights of the defendant in relation to videotaped testimony of the victim are discussed. The idea of live television hookups for trials is presented as an alternative to pretrial videotaping. It is suggested that live testimony might be more appropriate for some children and should always be considered.

Children of alcoholic parents present their views of what it is like to live in such a family in a way that can draw out the problems of similar children and their parents. The message of abuse and neglect is not just in what the children say but also in how they say it - and in what remains unsaid yet apparent in their nonverbal presentation.

This audiocassette explores the issues raised when children testify in child abuse trials. Studies over the past 10 years show that children remember traumatic experiences even at a very young age. Prosecutors, lawyers, and researchers explain how children are cross-examined, the accuracy of a child's testimony, the myth that children are not competent witnesses, and the problems facing sexually abused children when they testify in a court system designed for adults.

The purpose of the video is twofold: to alert parents to the problem of child abduction and sexual abuse and to help parents to train their children to escape an attacker. Three abductions are dramatized: a teenage girl stalked and grabbed by 2 men in a car, a girl tricked into leaving the playground with a man who says her mother has been in an accident, and a boy who is lured into a conversation with 2 men and grabbed away from his mother. The scenes are interspersed with facts about abduction, sexual abuse, and the inability of the correctional system to handle the problem. The 3 incidents are then repeated as they might have occurred if the children had been trained to attack and flee. Detailed instruction is presented with techniques that parents can teach children to use to break away from an attacker. Fourteen different types of attacks and escapes are enacted by a child and attacker. Teaching tips are included. Also presented are explanations of 7 vulnerable areas of the body that a child can attack to hurt an attacker. It is concluded that the only advantage children have when attacked is the element of surprise; if they can surprise and cause pain to the attacker, they can flee to safety.

The video is designed to train child welfare workers, supervisors, and psychologists in the use of anatomically correct dolls to investigate sexual abuse.

The program assumes no prior experience in the use of dolls, but reassures viewers that they do not need to be experts to use the dolls effectively. Emphasis is on getting a complete account of the child's experience in order to ensure protection. Police, physicians, and other professionals who come into contact with abused children would also benefit from the video. A detailed facilitator's manual is included.

Persons with developmental disabilities can be prime targets for abuse; this 2-part program explains how to recognize and avoid sexually threatening or abusive situations. Students learn they do not have to participate in any type of physical contact that does not feel good to them. Protective strategies, including how to choose a safe person to report to, are illustrated through dramatizations. Discusses recognizing and reacting assertively to sexual exploitation in a close relationship with friends, dates, or relatives. The potential for sexual abuse among acquaintances and strangers is examined, and appropriate protective behaviors are taught.

This program about feelings, emotions, and child abuse includes 3 videos and a detailed instructional guide designed to help professionals presenting the 3-part/3-day program in schools. Written under the guidance of experts in the field, the films feature stars that children will recognize from television. The first video is about 7-year-old Michele, who is playing house in her room and doesn't answer her mother's call. Her angry mother goes to get her, but is startled by what she hears and sees. The film helps children get in touch with their emotions and feelings and sets the stage for the rest of the program. The second film is about Brian, an 11-year-old victim of emotional and physical abuse. He is visited in the middle of the night by his future son, who helps him to understand that unless things change Brian, too, will be an abuser. In the final video, 12-year-old Karen finds that her best friend Jessica is being sexually abused by her father. Karen trusts her own father and seeks his advice. The program not only teaches all children about healthy relationships and feelings versus abuse, but it also reaches out to children who may themselves be abused.

This film provides audiences with insight into how a loving and caring parent can become abusive. The Australian-made drama shows that abusive parents are not always monsters, but rather can be "normal," middle class people, like the mother in the film. Overburdened with parenting and unnoticed by her husband, family, and friends, she loses control.

The videotape demonstrates that allegations of sexual abuse of developmentally disabled persons can be investigated and that protection of the victim and prosecution of the offender can be achieved. Excerpts from 3 forensic evidentiary interviews with victims are shown to illustrate appropriate interviewing techniques. The basic interview format includes a period of establishing rapport with the victim and determining the victim's developmental level. The subject of the alleged sexual abuse is then introduced, with anatomically correct dolls available to the victim as needed. A narrator points out different techniques used and reactions of victims to illustrate the investigative process. All cases presented eventually resulted in successful court intervention, 2 with convictions of the perpetrators and all with steps taken to protect and counsel the victim further.

The kit is designed as an aid for use in investigations of child sexual abuse with victims aged 3 to 12. The core component of the kit is the Child Assault Investigation Book, a comprehensive workbook to be used by a child during a detailed interview; when completed it is admissible as court evidence. The book introduces the child and investigator, explains the purpose of their talk, and tests the child's reliability as a witness. The difference between "o.k. secrets" and those that are not is explained. Use of the book, with its EZ-4U robot and accompanying colored pens, crayons, and stickers, provides a common, hands-on activity for the child and the investigator. The kit includes 7 workbooks with crayons, etc.; a "Blue Magic Bag" with easily learned magic tricks to further reduce interview barriers; a durable suitcase to hold all materials; and a videotape detailing the use of the book and magic tricks and how to approach the interview.

This public awareness film addresses the problem of sexual abuse and the hearing impaired. A 30-year-old hearing impaired woman tells of her childhood incest experiences in American Sign Language with English voice-over. She was placed in numerous foster homes where she was abused by foster brothers and fathers. She did not realize what incest was until she was 30. Also assaulted by a stranger, she explains the difference between rape and incest.

The video is designed to offer children the confidence and knowledge they need to stay home alone. Tracy comes home from school, calls her mother, and wishes she had someone to talk to or that she could be like the lady on TV commercials whose house talks back. Suddenly, the house comes alive and begins its lessons: the bread box gives Tracy tips on how to protect her key; the telephone teaches how to use it in emergencies and manage nuisance callers; the mail slot in the door teaches not to let strangers in the house; and the smoke alarm teaches how to handle a fire. When the afternoon is over, Tracy is confident that she can take care of herself.

The film depicts 4 cases of elder abuse ranging from willful neglect to financial exploitation to physical attack. The families involved represent various social, cultural, and economic backgrounds. One woman, pushed to the threshold of her patience by the difficult behavior of her aunt, seeks outside assistance to diffuse an explosive situation. An elderly couple in ill-health suffers financial abuse from a daughter and son-in-law. A third case describes an elderly immigrant victim of financial exploitation who is assisted by a community support group. Physical abuse is the topic of the final vignette about a loving mother who must turn to the judicial system to deal with her alcoholic son. The film is sensitive to both the victims and the stress suffered by those who care for the elderly.

This sexual abuse prevention skills program for preschool and early elementary school handicapped children follows recent research on child sexual abuse prevention combined with expertise in special education. The program includes 55 11-by-17-inch picture lesson panels with simple drawings on one side and implementation information on the other. Major concepts of sexual abuse are discussed, such as the recognition of family, friends, familiar people, and strangers; types of touch; body parts; and who and how to tell about abusive encounters. Male and female anatomically correct dolls are included for demonstration and role-playing activities to reinforce concepts taught by the panels. A Post-Instruction Test of 21 picture panels is provided to measure individual comprehension. The Teacher's Guide provides background information on sexual abuse, as well as implementation information. Guidelines for conducting parent workshops are also included. While this program is primarily for children with language difficulties, the Teacher's Guide includes suggestions for adapting the program for children with other disabilities or for the able bodied.

This dramatization shows 3 teenagers who cope with life despite trouble in their families.

Segments focus on living with an alcoholic parent, living with quarreling parents, and coping with abuse. It is argued that there are some family crises that no one should have to live with, and for which help must be sought.

The films discuss the dynamics underlying family trauma, and show how teens can cope to survive the stress created by violence in the home. A leader's guide is included.

Presented by a teen theater group, this sexual abuse prevention and awareness vehicle outlines various types of sexual abuse that teens might encounter and offers solutions. Three vignettes portray a girl who is nearly the victim of her father's business partner, a girl who is raped by a "salesman" whom she lets into her home, and near-incest between a girl and her father. All vignettes have happy endings, but narrators point out that real-life situations may not be solved as easily. Other abusive situations are briefly shown: trading gifts for favors, date rape, and physical attack. Teens are encouraged to think, to go with their instincts, and to tell trusted adults. Connections between substance abuse and sexual abuse are also explained.

Projective Storytelling (PST) Cards are an effective assessment and treatment tool for professionals to use with physically and sexually abused children. Twenty-five 8 1/2-by-11-inch cards present drawings of recognizable situations to which most children and victims of abuse can relate. The cards are intended to elicit spontaneous discussion about feelings, attitudes, and real-life experiences. The cards do not rely on a rigid or restrictive scoring system, and provide a flexible tool for clinicians who prefer a hands-on, intuitive approach.

This live puppet show is presented in 2 parts to teach children skills to prevent or interrupt the cycle of child abuse. Puppets are used to discuss physical abuse, sexual abuse, medical neglect, and environmental neglect. The puppets and a facilitator increase children's awareness of maltreatment in a nonjudgmental manner, identify people that can help children if they have a problem, and outline methods children can use to approach adults when they need to talk. The complete package includes a training videotape, an audiotape with puppets' dialogue and background music, and a user's manual.

The film is an introduction to spouse abuse suitable for health care professionals, educators, and the general public. Repercussions of wife battering from the point of view of the husband are discussed. A dramatization explores the isolation and regret that a husband feels after his wife has taken legal action and left him. It is concluded that what the husband calls, "a little shoving and a couple of slaps," is truly criminal assault.

The film demonstrates that most male child molesters are themselves molestation victims. In documentary style, detained adolescent molesters explain how similar acts during their childhoods drove them to become victimizers. It is suggested that the best way to prevent future abuse is to identify and counsel young men such as these, and to treat molested children who could be viewed as potential offenders. Successful treatment programs are discussed. Increased awareness and education among children, parents, law enforcement personnel, and other mandated reporters is called for as a solution.

This program explores the causes, characteristics, and possible solutions to family violence, and documents the effects on individuals and on society as a whole. Various segments examine the incidence of violence in American families; motivations involved in child maltreatment; problems faced by battered women; and the phenomenon of adolescent abuse and teenage runaways. Also discussed are the relationship between intimacy and violence; legitimate punishment for children; and society's fascination with violence. Role playing is used to portray conflict. A teacher's guide is included.

The video shows the effects of emotional abuse, offers strategies for getting help, and provides a guide for teachers dealing with emotionally abused children.

Dramatizes the story of Jessica, who is in pain because her angry mother has shouted at her and tormented her again, and Robert, who seems invisible to his parents except when they are angry with him. Their unhappiness eventually comes to the attention of their teacher. Jessica does not accept the help of the teacher and ends her day still in anger and pain. Robert ends his day with more understanding of his situation after he agrees to talk. With encouragement from his teacher, he comes to learn that he is not alone, that talking about his feelings is not a betrayal of his family, and that it is not his fault that his parents are not happy.

A growing number of children are witnesses in legal cases, especially those involving sexual abuse; this film is designed to help judicial and legal personnel better understand the impact this experience has on the young. A dramatization of relevant portions of a criminal court trial shows how to make the courtroom environment less intimidating for children. Acknowledging that children can be reliable and competent witnesses, the video demonstrates how to most effectively elicit their testimony and accurately establish the truth regarding alleged events.

This video is designed to educate adults about child sexual abuse and its effects. A true story of a woman who experienced sexual abuse as a child is reenacted. The production opens with the voices of several adults describing their recollections of earlier sexual abuse; behind the voices are still photographs of children, families, and homes. The story of the woman, for whom violent physical and sexual abuse at the hands of her father, uncles, and brother began when she was 16 to 18 months old, is also illustrated with still photographs. She shares her experiences as she discovers that her own adopted children were abused by their father. The ultimate message is one of strength growing out of the pain. Suggestions are offered on how to get involved: join a local organization, report suspected abuse, and support prevention and education programs for children and adults.

Viewers learn about how abusers use "special promises," threats, and guilt to keep incest a secret. A dramatization of a case shows youngsters that incest does happen to other children, that the problem must be communicated to an adult, and that in spite of intimidation it is always important to tell a trusted adult.
