From the Director

This 1991 issue of the Bureau of Prisons Facilities book is intended to provide current information about Bureau of Prisons facilities throughout the Nation to members of the criminal justice and academic communities, as well as others who require this information.

The Bureau's growth in recent years has made it even more important for the agency to distribute up-to-date information about its institutional operations. All information contained in this book was current at the time of printing; however, the pressures of crowding and the need for flexibility in institutional missions can cause changes from time to time in the utilization of specific Bureau facilities. For that reason, readers with a need for current, accurate information about a specific institution may wish to contact the appropriate regional office, listed on pages 7-8, to confirm the information they are seeking.

As the Bureau works to better serve its constituencies in all areas of the criminal justice system, academia, and society in general, we are seeking suggestions for new ways to improve our outreach. Readers should feel free to submit their comments and suggestions to the Bureau's Office of Public Affairs, 320 First Street, NW., Washington, D.C. 20534.

Federal Bureau of Prisons

History of the Federal Bureau of Prisons

On May 14, 1930, President Herbert Hoover signed legislation establishing the Federal Bureau of Prisons within the Department of Justice. The goals of this new Bureau were to ensure consistent, centralized administration of the Federal Prison System, professionalize the prison service, and provide more progressive and humane care for Federal inmates.

During the first century of American independence, there were virtually no Federal prison facilities. Most sentenced Federal offenders were incarcerated in State prisons and county jails. After the Civil War, the Federal inmate population began to rise. To remove the increasing burden of housing Federal offenders from the States and counties, Congress enacted legislation in 1891 authorizing the construction of three Federal penitentiaries. In the 1920's, a women's reformatory, a youth facility, and a detention center were added to the Federal Prison System. Those early Federal prisons were operated under the authority of the Justice Department and supervised by the Superintendent of Prisons and Prisoners.

By the late 1920's, new Federal laws such as the Volstead (or Prohibition) Act led to a sharp increase in the number of Federal prisoners, thereby causing overcrowding in the handful of Federal prisons that existed at that time. Beyond the problem of overcrowding, the administration of Federal prisons was inconsistent and haphazard, because most wardens were political appointees who tended to operate with considerable independence. The overcrowding and lack of central direction inhibited the Federal Prison System from responding effectively to advances in correctional philosophy that stressed the classification and individual treatment of inmates.

To address those problems, a Special Committee of the House of Representatives on Federal Penal and Reformatory Institutions met in January 1929. Acting on the Committee's recommendations, Congress passed a series of laws in 1930, establishing the Bureau of Prisons to manage and regulate all Federal prisons, authorizing the construction of several new facilities, establishing a new Board of Parole, providing for medical treatment of Federal prisoners by the Public Health Service, and introducing other reforms.

The first Director of the Bureau of Prisons was Sanford Bates, who served from 1930 to 1937. Bates previously had been Commissioner of Corrections in Massachusetts, and was a leading prison reformer of his time. His successors, all of whom were career employees of the Bureau, were James V. Bennett (1937-1964), Myrl E. Alexander (1964-1970), Norman A. Carlson (1970-1987), and J. Michael Quinlan (1987-present).

During the early years of the Bureau's existence, it built or acquired several new institutions, ranging from minimum security prison camps, to the maximum security penitentiary at Alcatraz, to a large hospital for Federal prisoners in Springfield, Missouri. This expansion relieved overcrowding and, coupled with administrative reforms, enabled the Bureau to offer inmates more satisfying living conditions, more opportunities for meaningful work, vastly improved educational and vocational training programs, and better recreational opportunities. It also helped the Bureau to implement an innovative system for classifying offenders and developing specific programs for their rehabilitation, which, with modifications, remains a primary element in the treatment of Federal offenders.

Another important advance was the formation, in 1934, of a wholly owned Government corporation, Federal Prison Industries, Inc. Federal Prison Industries was set up to provide paid employment to inmates, primarily in the manufacture of products for use by the Federal government, and to offer vocational training and other education programs. Also known by its trade name, UNICOR, it continues to be an indispensable component of the Federal Prison System.

Throughout its history, the Bureau has been at the forefront of the development and implementation of improved correctional concepts. It has built new institutions and reconditioned older ones to comply with modern standards in prison design. It developed facilities to provide extensive diagnosis and treatment to meet the unique needs of youthful offenders. It pioneered in the development of "community corrections" facilities to help prepare inmates for their return to society. It devised a sophisticated administrative remedy procedure to permit inmates to initiate formal reviews of their complaints or other problems. The Bureau works closely with the National Institute of Corrections, which was established to provide advisory and technical support to State and local correctional agencies throughout the country.

The Bureau has also been dedicated to professionalizing its staff. Very early in the Bureau's history, it placed its staff under the authority of the Civil Service system, to ensure that hiring and promotion would be based on merit rather than political patronage. It developed an extensive training program in the 1930's, and, by the early 1970's, began to open specialized staff training centers at various locations around the country.

After the initial flurry of new prison construction in the 1930's, the inmate population leveled off and the Bureau entered a period where it opened very few new institutions. From 1940 through the early 1980's, the number of inmates held fairly steady—between 20,000 and 25,000. Since the early 1980's, however, the inmate population has soared to well over 60,000. This dramatic rise in the inmate population is presenting the Bureau with some of the most difficult challenges in its 60-year history, and necessitates the opening of many new institutions and intensive staff recruitment. Today, more than 19,000 staff members at 67 institutions carry out the Bureau's mission of maintaining safe, secure, and humane correctional institutions and implementing correctional programs that strive for a balance between punishment, deterrence, incapacitation, and rehabilitation.

How To Use This Book

This is the 9th edition of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' annual Federal Correctional Facilities. A number of categories of information are provided for each facility, most self-explanatory. If a category is omitted, it is not applicable at that institution.

The Security Level section identifies the security level assigned to a particular institution and whether that institution serves males or females. The Bureau ranks institutions into security levels based on the evaluation of seven security features—the presence of external patrols, gun towers, security barriers, or detection devices; type of housing; internal security features; and the inmate-to-correctional officer ratio, with each feature weighted in order of importance to institution security. Similar facilities are then placed in one of five groups—minimum, low, medium, high, and administrative. Administrative facilities house inmates of varying security needs or have specialized functions such as medical or mental health treatment.

A custody classification system is used to determine the security needs of a specific inmate by evaluating factors such as the severity of offense, length of incarceration, other charges, type of prior commitments, history of escape attempts, or history of violence. In addition, precommitment status, public safety factors, and management concerns such as population balance and judicial recommendations are also used when determining the level of supervision and institution assignment. Four custody levels—community, out, in, and maximum—are used, and efforts are made to assign inmates to appropriate facilities as close to their homes as possible.

Rated Capacity is the number of inmates the institution was designed to hold; Population, March 31, 1991, is the number it actually held as of that date.

The UNICOR category identifies any Federal Prison Industries operations at the facility and the number of inmates employed.

In addition to the staff listed under Medical Services, most institutions rely to some degree on contract medical services to meet specialized needs. The Federal Prison System also includes a number of facilities that specialize in medical or mental health treatment; inmates who require more intensive levels of care are transferred to these facilities. To serve the increasing numbers of inmates who are entering prison with severe drug problems, the Bureau has established several pilot intensive drug treatment programs, discussed in more detail later in this publication.

Accreditation Status indicates whether an institution is accredited by the Commission on Accreditation for Corrections. The process of accreditation provides an additional level of assurance that Federal prisons offer decent living conditions, provide adequate programs and services, and safeguard inmate rights by ensuring compliance with the more than 400 standards developed by the Commission. Currently, 53 facilities are accredited or are in the process of receiving accreditation. Additionally, the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Missouri, and the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minnesota, are accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

In addition to the particular institutions discussed in this publication, the Bureau of Prisons contracts for the operation of approximately 300 halfway houses (or Community Corrections Offices) for offenders who are within 30-180 days of release. Community Corrections Office locations are listed in the back of this publication.

The Bureau of Prisons, which is part of the United States Department of Justice, has its headquarters or Central Office in Washington, D.C. The staff of the Central Office are responsible for the control and coordination of all the activities of the agency. Major functions include planning, policy development, management of manpower and other resources, budget development, monitoring the quality of programs and services, and coordinating the activities of the Regional Offices and institutions.

In addition to these management functions, Central Office staff have primary responsibility for public information activities, legal and legislative affairs, and relations with Congress and policymaking administrators in other Government agencies, as well as private organizations.

Central Office staff carry out such functions as adjudicating appeals for inmates and employees, directing research and evaluation projects, designing automated information systems, managing environmental health and safety programs, and conducting management-employee relations with the sole bargaining agent for Bureau employees, the American Federation of Government Employees (AFL-CIO) Council of Prison Locals.

Regional Offices

Through regionalization, which began in 1973, issues and decisions have been more quickly addressed, administrative procedures have been streamlined, the development of community resources has increased, and there has been greater responsiveness by the Bureau of Prisons to community and institution concerns. The U.S. Parole Commission has established regional offices in the same cities, providing easier, more effective coordination with the Bureau.

Staff in the Regional Offices include a regional director, deputy regional director, and administrators in such areas as human resources management, education, health services, financial management, unit/case management, correctional services, psychology services, facilities development and operations, food service, and community corrections. The multidisciplinary staff maintain close contact with all facets of Bureau operations.

Regional Office staff offer management and technical assistance to institution and community corrections personnel. They conduct workshops, conferences, and specialized training programs, give technical assistance to State and local criminal justice agencies, and contract with community agencies to provide offender placement in community corrections centers.

In 1990, to keep pace with the Bureau's rapid expansion, reorganization from five to six regions was approved by Congress. The new Mid-Atlantic Regional Office became fully operational in 1991.

Staff Training Centers

Staff training is an integral part of Bureau of Prisons staff development. To ensure uniformly high quality staff training, the Bureau opened its first Staff Training Center in 1971 at the Federal Correctional Institution, El Reno, Oklahoma. Since then, the Center has been located in Atlanta, Georgia; Dallas, Texas; and Denver, Colorado.

In 1981, the Bureau established its current Staff Training Academy at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, Glynco, Georgia. The Staff Training network also includes a Management and Specialty Training Center in Aurora, Colorado, a Food Service and Trust Fund Training Center at the Federal Correctional Institution, Fort Worth, Texas, and a Paralegal Training Center in Dallas, Texas.

The Bureau of Prisons is one of more than 50 Federal agencies that conduct training at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center. A 3-week "Introduction to Correctional Techniques" course is required of all new employees within 45 days of joining the Bureau. All employees must pass the academic, firearms, and self-defense portions of the program to be retained as employees. Other courses offered at FLETC include week-long bus operations and locksmithing courses.

The Management and Specialty Training Center offers supervisory, occupational specialty, and management classes for all levels of Bureau staff. Training is also provided in trainer skills for a wide range of institution-based training courses.

The Food Management and Trust Fund Training Center opened in June 1985 to provide training in food service and commissary operations to Bureau staff.

The Paralegal Training Center opened in November 1989 to provide a 1-year training program for new Bureau paralegals.

The National Institute of Corrections, the training/technical assistance arm of the Bureau of Prisons, provides training to State and local correctional personnel at the National Academy of Corrections, Boulder, Colorado, and at the Glynco facility.

Washington, D.C., MDC—1,000 beds, scheduled for completion in 1993.

Bureau of Prisons Drug Programs

Recent surveys indicate that up to 44 percent of all offenders in the Federal Bureau of Prisons have significant drug abuse histories. The Bureau's multitiered approach to drug treatment consists of Drug Education, Centralized Counseling Services (outpatient), Comprehensive Programs, Pilot Programs, and Transitional Services.

The first level of drug abuse programming available to Federal inmates is the Drug Education Program—a nonresidential, information-oriented approach that offers limited treatment opportunities. This program is considered “mandatory” for all inmates who have a substance abuse history related to their offense.

Centralized Counseling Services (outpatient) are available to inmates who continue to live and work in their regular institutional housing units. They participate in group and individual counseling, self-help groups, and specialty seminars at a centralized location. These services are available throughout their incarceration.

The Comprehensive Program was designed for inmate volunteers who have a moderate to severe level of drug abuse and have completed a Drug Education Program. This program is unit-based and involves extensive individual and group counseling and assessments over a 9-month period.

The Pilot Programs use approaches that are similar to the Comprehensive Programs, but involve a more intense level of treatment over a longer period of time. Currently there are three Pilot Programs in the Bureau: FCI Butner, North Carolina; FCI Lexington, Kentucky; and FCI Tallahassee, Florida.

The first 6-12 months following release from incarceration are the most critical in an inmate's adjustment back into society. All inmates completing Comprehensive or Pilot Programs are required to participate in aftercare services upon release. The Transitional Services Program consists of up to 6 months in a Community Corrections Center with specialized aftercare treatment, followed by 6 months of aftercare in a community services program.

The Federal Bureau of Prisons has entered into an interagency agreement with the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) to conduct a long-term follow-up evaluation regarding treatment outcomes for program participants. The information should prove invaluable in guiding treatment program development and resource allocation in the future.

Bureau of Prisons Education and Literacy Programs

The Bureau of Prisons has long recognized the importance of educational programming, both as a means to use time while incarcerated in a positive manner and to enhance postrelease employment opportunities and positive lifestyles. Literacy is the Bureau's highest-priority education program. All Federal prisoners who do not have a verified high school diploma or general education development (GED) credential must enroll in a literacy program for 120 days. They may opt out after the mandatory period, but if they fail to achieve the required standard they cannot be promoted above the entry level in Federal Prison Industries or institution jobs.

The Bureau's mandatory literacy program began in 1982. The 6th grade was the initial mandatory literacy standard; it was increased to the 8th grade in 1985 and to the 12th grade or high school/GED level in 1991. It is estimated that approximately 45 percent of all Federal inmates do not have high school/GED credentials at the time they are admitted to prison. The importance of the mandatory GED standard can be measured against the reality that most employers require a high school or equivalent credential for entry-level jobs. Approximately 7,000 Federal prisoners will complete their literacy programs and will take the GED test during 1991.

The Federal mandatory literacy program has served as a model for approximately a dozen States, which have established mandatory literacy standards ranging from the 5th to the 12th grade level.

A wide variety of other programs are available for those Federal prisoners who have completed their high school education. These include training in about 40 different occupational areas, continuing education programs, and postsecondary courses offered by local technical schools, community and junior colleges, and 4-year colleges and universities. An increasing number of institutions have initiated half-day work/education programs supported by individual career plans for inmates. These are designed to structure inmates' education programs to enhance their performance on work assignments while incarcerated, and their chances of employment after release.

A wide variety of wellness and leisure activity programs are also available. Library services support all education/leisure activity programs.

In 1990, Federal prisoners accounted for 84,000 separate course enrollments, which involved more than 2 million instructional hours.

Community Corrections

The direction and focus of community corrections in the Bureau of Prisons are changing to meet the pressures of increased population, new legislation, and legislative mandates for more restrictive correctional applications. The Bureau is taking a proactive approach in developing viable residential and nonresidential, sanction-oriented alternatives to institutionalization to meet the demands of sentencing reform and to reduce costs.

The Bureau's Community Corrections Branch is responsible for the development and implementation of policies and procedures related to the administration of community corrections contract facilities nationwide. In addition to the community corrections professionals located in the Bureau's Central Office in Washington, D.C., each of the six Regional Offices has a regional administrator and several management center administrators who oversee the activities of 33 Community Corrections Offices (CCO) located in major metropolitan areas.

Each CCO has a community corrections manager who is responsible for the development, administration, and routine oversight of residential and nonresidential services provided through contractual agreements. These services include traditional prerelease, short-term detention and confinement, juvenile and adult boarding, and nonresidential home confinement programs such as electronic monitoring. Programs and services are facilitated through contractual agreements with intergovernmental agencies at the Federal, State, county, and city levels, and through contracts with private agencies.
