About CASA

Each year in the U.S., nearly 400,000 children are part of a real-life courtroom drama. They have committed no crime, but have been abused, neglected or abandoned by their families. It is up to a juvenile court judge to decide where these children will spend their future. Sometimes that future gets lost in a child welfare system that is overburdened and understaffed. As a result, many children spend a childhood in limbo, moving from one foster home to another until they reach 18.

In 1991, more than 28,000 men and women spoke up for these children in juvenile court as Court Appointed Special Advocates, or CASA volunteers. They provided millions of dollars worth of service for some 91,000 displaced children. They interviewed the child. The parents. Teachers. Doctors. Relatives. They tried to find the information necessary to help judges make more appropriate placement decisions — taking into account the special needs of each individual child. Their goal for these children: safe, secure and permanent homes.

Today, there are more than 520 CASA programs serving abused and neglected children in 49 states. They are known by a variety of names, but share a purpose. The National CASA Association was established to support these programs. NCASAA provides training, start-up grants, conferences, technical advice, newsletters and resource materials to help CASA programs Speak Up For Children.

A LOOK AT CASA ACROSS THE COUNTRY

There are 520 CASA programs in 49 states.

Approximately 28,000 men and women are CASA volunteers.

Last year, these volunteers spoke for an estimated 91,000 abused and neglected children in court.

New CASA programs start at the average of four per month.

Program Listings

An asterisk (*) denotes that a program is a member of the National CASA Association.

Note: National CASA adds new programs to the directory listings when the program begins assigning volunteers to cases.
