We also support the concept, included in the Eilberg bill (H.R. 94, Sec. 5(C)(3)), of permitting a grand jury witness's attorney, or other spokesman on the witness's behalf, to disclose his or her testimony and the identity and contents of any documentary information submitted to the grand jury. It appears clear that existing law permits the graund jury witness to disclose what he wishes and probably permits the grand jury witness to select a non-lawyer spokesman.[15] However, it is not clear in view of the pretrial rules promulgated by the American Bar Association in its Standrads Relating to Fair Trial-Free Press, Standard 1.1, and the similar American Bar Association Code of Professional Reponsibility D.R. 7–107(A)(B) and (C), which, in general, prohibit an attorney from disclosing any matter about the grand jury that is not a matter of public record; and the rule adopted by 89 of the 94 United States district courts which prohibit a lawyer from making extrajudicial statements "if there is a reasonable likelihood" that the information "will interfere with . . . the due administration of justice."[16]

However, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has voided this rule on grounds that it violates the First Amendment rights of attorneys to prohibit them from making any statement unless those statements pose "a serious and imminent threat" of interference with the fair administration of justice. Chicago Council of Lawyers v. Bauer, 552 F. 2d 242, 249 (7th Cir. 1975), cert. denied sub nom. Cunningham v. Chicago Council of Lawyers, 427 U.S. 912, 96 S. Ct. 3201 (1976). Recently, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit upheld an order prohibiting attorneys involved in a criminal case from "mingling or being in the proximity of the press" in or near the courthouse.[17]

What we are trying to point out here is that in some district courts, lawyers cannot even be in "the proximity of the press" to discuss a criminal case; in some courts they may only tell the press that which is a matter of public record; in some courts they may give the press information as long as it is not prejudicial (whatever that means), and in some district courts they may talk freely except for information which will pose a "serious and imminent threat" to the operation of the grand jury.

Many witnesses may not be articulate enough to tell their side of the story to the public or they may be ill or be incarcerated and thus do not have easy access to the press. Therefore, they may wish to select someone to speak on their behalf.

The ability of a grand jury witness to tell his story to the public should certainly not depend on his educational level or his familiarity or lack of familiarity in dealing with reporters. The basic question should be whether he wishes his testimony to be disclosed. If so, then he should be able to select the method by which the public obtains this information. This selection should not be made for him by the American Bar Association or the courts.

If, under the federal rules, the witness has the right to say anything he wishes about his grand jury testimony—regardless of how prejudicial it may be or what type of a threat it may pose to the administration of justice—then certainly it only seems fair to permit his attorney to make the same statements without becoming enmeshed in a whole range of conflicting, confusing and probably unconstitutional ethics codes.

It was this argument, involving a prisoner who asked his attorney to speak for him, which persuaded the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit to issue its rule.[18]

Therefore, we strongly support the concepts embodied in Mr. Eilberg's bill that the witness, a non-lawyer spokesman for the witness, or his attorney, at the witness' election, should be able, if he wishes, to disclose anything concerning the witness' appearance before the grand jury.

PUBLIC CRITICISM BY GRAND JURORS OF GRAND JURY OPERATIONS

We come to a much more difficult situation when we deal with information disclosed by grand jurors themselves.

The argument, as we understand it, is that the grand jury is only able to function if it can be certain that the names and testimony of witnesses are kept secret, because public disclosure might discourage witnesses from cooperating with the grand jury. "The secrecy of grand jury proceedings is to encourage witnesses to testify without fear of retaliation and to protect the independence of the grand jury." [19]

Another argument is that many innocent persons are identified during grand jury testimony by witnesses and that this information is frequently erroneous and its publication could be damaging.

Of course, the realities of the current systems are so inconsistent with these arguments that it is difficult to justify any secrecy at all for a number of reasons:

(1) Grand jury information can be given by a witness voluntarily, permitting the press to use his or her name.

(2) It can be given voluntarily by a witness who declines to permit his or her name to be used.

(3) It can, of course, be leaked by the government or by others.

(4) The identities of witnesses and/or the questions asked of them can be publicly disclosed in motions to quash orders to show cause, in contempt hearings, in immunity proceedings and in other formal court proceedings which arise as the result of grand jury activity.

This brings us back to our original concept that most grand jury secrecy simply makes litle sense. In addition, there is the argument that grand juries are really puppets of prosecutors and that grand jury investigations therefore can be conducted in a manner highly detrimental to the interests of the defendant or the state. For example, a potential defendant may be from a political party opposing that of the prosecutor—or, on the other hand, the potential target of the grand jury investigation may be a friend or political ally of the prosecutor.

Therefore, it seems reasonable for Congress to formulate at least a rule permitting a grand juror to make a general assessment of the operation of the grand jury either during the course of the grand jury or afterwards.

Did the Watergate grand jury feel, for example, that President Nixon was being protected for too long or did the Watergate grand jury feel that the prosecutor, under enormous political pressures, put undue pressure on the grand jury in making its report? What about the grand jury in the Berrigan case? The Gainesville Eight case? The Chicago Seven case? Shouldn't a grand juror be permitted to give the public his or her assessment of the behavior of the Executive branch official—the prosecutor—who presented the evidence to them? Or should prosecutors and fellow grand jurors be given complete immunity from any public accountability in their handling of this most important function? We think, quite simply, that a grand juror should be able to say as one grand juror did say to a reporter in Memphis, "I think this grand jury investigation was a whitewash."

There are now, as this Committee knows, a spate of books on the Watergate investigation which disclose some information about the grand jury investigation of Watergate. Furthermore, the Senate Watergate hearings, which were conducted while the Watergate grand jury was still in sessions, produced volumes of information identical to the information taken by the grand jury.

But, ironically, the Watergate grand jurors have been told by former Chief U.S. District Court Judge George Hart that they will go to jail if they discuss any aspect of the grand jury investigation with the press and the public.

Or, as Judge Hart said, the oath of secrecy "will follow you to your grave."

It should be remembered that the original Watergate indictments were for breaking and entering—and no more. We do not know to this day whether certain of the original grand jurors suspected that there was more to this matter than a simple case of alleged "extortion" against an employee of the Democratic National Committee—which was the explanation given by the Justice Department prosecutor in response to a question from the U.S. Court of Appeals.

The prosecution against the Berrigans, for example, was grounded substantially on the testimony of a cell-mate whom the government had placed with the Berrigans in order to obtain their confidence and to later testify before the grand jury.

Did any grand juror feel that this was a proper course of conduct for the government? Did certain of the grand jurors have questions as to the veracity of this witness, and how did the government prosecutor respond, if at all, to these queries? And what about the grand jury which indicted former Governor Connally, who was acquitted? Were they intimidated, cajoled or improperly persuaded to rely on the testimony of a single witness who said he had seen the alleged transaction take place from a distance of 100 feet? Would it not be of extreme importance to the public to be told now whether the grand jury in New York knew that a former agent of the FBI was perhaps behaving properly when he supervised break-ins under the orders of his superiors?

Unless we open the government prosecutor and the grand jury to some modicum of public accountability by the citizens who serve on the grand jury panel, we are going to continue the protective shield of secrecy which permits the many abuses which have resulted in the bills before this House and these hearings.

There is simply no reason why the prosecutor and the grand jury itself should not be in some way subjected to evaluation for their official performance. If history is any guide, the more there is secrecy and less accountability in government means the more there is opportunity for political corruption and abuse.

PUBLIC ACCESSIBILITY OF COURT PROCEEDINGS RELATED TO GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

Grand jury proceedings, of course, frequently move from the secrecy of the grand jury room into what we believe should always be a public court room. The most common proceedings are challenges to the composition of the grand jury,[20] motions to quash subpoenas [21] motions to hold witnesses in contempt,[22] and requests for immunity.[23]

Once the grand jury leaves its cloistered room and seeks the help of the courts, it is our position that all proceedings and documents relating to them should be publicly available immediately.

There is fundamentally no difference between a court hearing involving a grand jury and a hearing involving any other type of case.

Certainly prosecutors could argue, for example, that permitting the public to attend an immunity hearing would embarrass or intimidate the witness. But the prosecutor could also make the same argument about a recalcitrant witness in a trial and that would not mean that we would have secret trials.

Furthermore, the grand jury is a somewhat amorphous body with some attributes of independence, at least in theory, some attributes of being an arm of the court and some attributes, at least in practice, of being an arm of the Executive Branch. While its unique position might militate in favor of some secrecy, certainly once grand jury proceedings reach the conventional forum of the Judicial Branch, we cannot have secret court proceedings. While the grand jury is, of course, inquisitorial in nature—an argument in favor of its secrecy—a court hearing on contempt is a conventional adversary hearing where due process attaches.

Here again, we find ourselves in a situation where public accountability of the courts for their handling of grand jury proceedings is virtually subject to the arbitrary whim of the Judicial branch.

If the government feels that it wants the public present, in a contempt hearing, for example, then the public is admitted, even if the grand jury proceedings are still continuing and the information sought might be prejudicial to innocent third parties.[24]

In another jurisdiction, however, the contempt proceeding will be closed to the public on the grounds that the grand jury is still in session and that innocent third parties could be harmed by the information sought to be disclosed.[25]

The Supreme Court, to confuse matters even further, has indicated that the standard by which to judge whether a contempt proceeding should be open is not whether the grand jury investigation is being impeded but whether the witness wants the hearing open.[26]

Therefore, we think Congress has both the constitutional and public policy obligation to insure that all information about court proceedings relating to grand jury proceedings be available—and that the public and the press are not subject to the arbitrary and perhaps the politically motivated decision of a judge in one jurisdiction, a prosecutor in another jurisdiction, a potential defendant in a third jurisdiction, a witness in a fourth jurisdiction, the interest of a third party in a fifth jurisdiction, and so on.

It is our position that, subject to the national security exemption discussed previously, all federal indictments should be immediately available to the public and the press in their entirety upon being returned—except for those indictments sealed until the defendant is in custody.

We had thought that this was the law.[27] But we have had three recent cases which indicate that courts are beginning to take a second look at this question.

Very recently in a baby selling case in Washington, we had a criminal complaint (the misdemeanor equivalent of an indictment) sealed under District of Columbia rules, which are similar to the federal rules. The judge, the prosecutor and the defendants thought that there was certain information in the criminal information which would be embarrassing to certain named parties, who were in this instance, unwed mothers.[28]

The judge ruled that the privacy interest of the unwed mothers was superior to the public's right to have access to the complete criminal information. He therefore sealed certain portions of the information which might have been used to identify the unwed mothers.

It was the position of the Washington Post Company and this Committee, which appeared in that case, that the criminal information—like the indictment—is the fundamental document upon which the jurisdiction of the court is based, and that any restriction on its public availability violates the First Amendment rights of citizens to know how their courts operate.

It was also argued by our Committee and The Post that sealing the indictment would naturally lead to secret pretrial and trial proceedings, because it would be futile to seal the criminal information in order to protect the unwed mother while subsequently disclosing her identity in the trial.

We, of course, sympathize with the problems faced by many innocent persons who are drawn into the criminal justice process, either as defendants who may be wrongly accused and subsequently acquitted, or as witnesses who may suffer embarrassment or other damage.

But if the privacy of the unwed mother warrants a secret indictment, then what about the privacy of the rape victim or the privacy of the robbery victim, or the privacy of family members in intra-family assaut cases? Finally, of course, what about the organized crime witness who fears not humiliation, but, perhaps, death?

No one, of course, forces the prosecution to present a case to the grand jury, nor does anyone force the prosecution or the grand jury to return the indictment. But once the indictment is returned, we are then involved in a most formal type of judicial proceeding. To permit—as happened in the baby-selling case—the prosecutor and defendants to rewrite the indictment, putting in what they want the public to know and leaving out what they don't want the public to know, is the grossest type of censorship.

We would like to stress that this took place under a local rule identical to the Federal Rule in a federal court established by this Congress.

We have indications that this "privacy" argument is gaining favor with other courts seeking to restrict access to what should be publicly available information in criminal and civil cases.

The Oklahoma Supreme Court recently upheld an order prohibiting publication by the Oklahoma media of the identity of a juvenile who appeared in a public court proceeding. The Oklahoma Supreme Court said that public identification of the juvenile would violate his "privacy" right to be rehabilitated. Fortunately, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the order.[29]

The Virginia Supreme Court has recently upheld the criminal conviction of The Norfolk, Va., Pilot for allegedly violating the "privacy" rights of a state court judge by disclosing that the judge was under investigation by a State Commission on Judicial Ethics.[30]

Last month, the Massachusetts Supreme Court upheld an order sealing a civil complaint—which is the equivalent of an indictment—and all other documents in a routine business squabble between a bank and the State Banking Commission. The Court said that release of the information in the complaint would violate the bank's right to privacy.[31]

There is also a mechanical problem with release of indictments. In Texas recently, the U.S. District Court clerk devised a bureaucratic filing routine which meant that in some cases the press could not have access to an indictment until almost 24 hours later. The problem was eventually cured.

While we understand a delay may be necessary in cases of sealed indictments, where there is a danger that the defendant may flee, we see absolutely no justification—once this matter is brought to Congress' attention—for the Congress not to insure that indictments or copies of indictments be made available immediately to the public and the press when they are returned in open court. If the district courts are worried about Xerox fees, perhaps Congress could help them out.

TRANSCRIPTS SHALL BE AVAILABLE UPON INDICTMENT

We think that whatever arguments there may be for secrecy of the grand jury, they evaporate when the grand jury has handed down its indictments. The grand jury has finished its work. The testimony is complete. The documentary materials have been collected, and the matter now goes to court.

California, in an effort to make the grand juries more accountable, releases the complete transcript of the grand jury proceedings 10 days after an indictment has been handed down.[32] We would urge the Congress to pass an amendment to the Federal Rules following the California practice.

To whatever objections are raised to this proposal, we would simply answer that we are unable to find in the legal literature any suggestion that California's law enforcement system is less effective than the federal law enforcement system.

Therefore, until it can be shown that California's practice of public accountability has in some way hindered its law enforcement process, we would argue that the transcripts should be made public in their entirety, which would, of course, mean that the behavior of prosecutors would be a matter of public record for citizens to judge for themselves.

We realize that this is a somewhat novel suggestion for the federal system, and we can expect, I assume, some objections from the Department of Justice.

It was the Department of Justice, we remember, that handled the so-called political indictments of the Nixon years, and if the abuses disclosed by that period require safeguards of public accountability, the Department of Justice has brought it upon itself.

Currently, there is no requirement that grand jury proceedings be recorded, and mandatory recordation, as in H.R. 94, is a valuable improvement.

Currently, under the Federal Rules, grand jury transcripts are kept secret except when selected portions are released for trials.[33]

There are many reasons for the Congress to decide that grand jury transcripts should be open. Public availability would permit the public to decide whether the evidence before the grand jury warranted an indictment or whether the information was weak and the grand jury was improperly persuaded by the prosecutor, or whether the evidence was strong but the prosecutor persuaded the grand jury to hand down an indictment for a lesser crime.

Public availability would mean that the public could judge for itself whether, in the Agnew case, the evidence actually showed more serious crimes but the defendant was permitted to plead "no contest" to a lesser crime.

It would show, for example, in the case of former Attorney General Richard Kleindienst, whether it was improper, based on the evidence before the grand jury, for the U.S. District Court judge to permit him to plead guilty to a misdemeanor.

It would allow the public to decide whether immunity was necessary or not and whether subpoenas for certain persons were necessary. In short it would give the public and the press the means—as it has in California—to decide on the fairness, effectiveness and honesty of the grand jury and the prosecutors.

We come to a more difficult situation when the grand jury declines to indict. It is our opinion that a strong argument can be made that a grand jury which declines to indict may have been as abused as a grand jury that did indict. The difference, of course, is that there is no defendant, in the view of the grand jury, even though a serious crime has occurred. Still, grand juries which do not indict may have received very valuable testimony on the operation of law enforcement bodies or other agencies of the government and may have been subjected to improper prosecutorial tactics in order to discourage indictment.

There, we would suggest that grand jury transcripts may be released upon a majority vote of the grand jury or they may be released if the court thinks that there is a substantial public interest to be saved.

Certainly Congress could conclude that a grand jury transcript leading to no indictment under some circumstances contains information which would be of value to the public. The question is not the indictment, but the process of the grand jury. That is why we are here.

The press' main function is to report how government operates and how it reaches decisions—not how it reaches only those decisions which lead to indictments.

While we would prefer that all transcripts be public, we think that at a minimum transcripts leading to indictments should be public and the grand jury and the judge ought to have the latitude to release transcripts when no indictment is handed down.

Grand Jury Reports

One aspect of the grand jury that has been completely overlooked by all of the bills is the traditional but infrequently used grand jury report—generally a report by the grand jury on a matter of governmental consequence evaluating the performance of government officials but declining to indict.[34] The most famous case is the suppressed report on the unindicted co-conspirator in the Watergate case. But other examples are the grand jury's censored assessment of the Internal Revenue Service spying operations,[35] the grand jury's suppressed report on political pay-offs which in part led to the indictment against Governor Mandel [36] and the suppressed grand jury report on Kent State.[37]

The case law in this field is very confusing. Even if the grand jury seeks to release the report, a single judge can stop that release, and the standards for this judicial decision are vague, if not wholly arbitrary.[38]

A few cases in which objections have been raised to releasing the grand jury report seem to indicate that the report could be released if the subject matter of the report is government activity and if the content of the report does not "unreasonably" damage an individual's reputation.[39] In effect then, the decision to release or not to release is as long as the chancellor's foot, and we disagree with giving the courts this unbridled censorship power over grand jury reports.

We would suggest that the grand jury, by majority vote, could release the report and that except for a clear and present danger to the national security of the United States, no federal court could suppress the report.

The current case involving the New York Times is a perfect example.[40] The grand jury handed down a report critical of a Miami newspaper's articles on the IRS. The newspaper then appeared at a secret hearing and successfully urged the judge to suppress the report. A competing Miami newspaper moved to have the report released in its entirely.

At this point, Seymour Hersh, a reporter for the New York Times, obtained a copy of the report, which he published. The judge then decided to release a highly edited version of the report and issued an order to show cause why Arthur Ochs Sulzberger, the publisher, Mr. Hersh, and A.M. Rosenthal, the managing editor, should not be held in criminal contempt for publishing the report; and, in addition, issued an order to show cause why Mr. Hersh should not be required to disclose the identity of the person who gave him the report—a subject we will address later in this testimony.

Grand jury reports have had a time-honored place in our system. As the late Chief Justice Vanderbilt of New Jersey said:

"Thus grand jury presentments of public affairs serve a need that is not met by any other procedure. The grand jury provides a readily available group of representative citizens of the county empowered, as occasion may demand, to voice the conscience of the community. There are many official acts and omissions that fall short of criminal misconduct and yet are not in the public interest. It is very much to the public advantage that such conduct be revealed in an effective, official way. No community desires to live a hairbreadth above the criminal level, which might well be the case if there were no official organ of public protest. Such presentments are a great deterrent to official wrongdoing. By exposing wrongdoing, moreover, such presentments inspire public confidence in the capacity of the body politic to purge itself of untoward conditions." [41]

The Congress has given the grand jury the power to hear witnesses, issue subpoenas and write the reports. By virtue of what sacred right or what constitutional right do the courts of the United States have power to suppress from the public view the results of Congress' grant of authority to the grand jury? Because it will embarrass a newspaper? Because it will embarrass a politician?

There is, of course, always the danger that the grand jury may be politically motivated and that the report therefore would unfairly endanger a persons' reputation. But that is precisely the defect which is possible with any grand jury proceedings, and that does not mean that a judge should be able to decide whether an indictment should be released.

Either the grand jury is an institution of government and its operations, methods and decision should be made as public as possible, (bearing in mind some minimal protections for its operations), or the grand jury is completely a creature of the prosecutor or completely a creature of the courts and under some doctrine unknown to us has no authority to address the citizens of the community unless the courts approve.

PUBLIC AVAILABILITY GRAND JURY INFORMATION—STANDING AND NOTICE

Both under the very restricted current system and under the system we would propose for more public information about grand juries, we foresee the possibil-lty of "standing" problems when members of the public or the press seek access to information or to proceedings improperly sealed by courts.

The argument of a few courts has been that an order directed at a clerk to seal the names of grand jurors, or an order directed at attorneys forbidding them to comment cannot be challenged by the public or the press because the order does not run against the public or the press.

While two courts of appeal have ruled that the press does have "standing" to challenge orders against third parties which result in restricting the availability of criminal justice information,[42] one of those courts—the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit—appears to have reversed itself.[43]

It seems absolutely clear to us that the public and the press have a direct interest in the public availability of information about the grand jury process and that Congress should protect this interest by requiring the federal courts to grant "standing" to litigate this type of secrecy.

A second procedural problem we run into is that courts will without notice summarily seal information about the criminal justice system and the information will remain sealed for weeks or even months while the press is litigating the constitutionality of the gag order.

While this litigation proceeds, the information remains secret and generally there is no record in the Court of Appeals indicating with any particularity the reasoning of the Judge. This means that we are, in effect, forced to delve into the mind of the Judge for all the unarticulated reasons which might justify the gag order.

We suggest that the Congress take the approach of the American Bar Association which last August adopted a set of rules designed to give the public and the press "due process for criminal justice information." [44]

Under the ABA rules, the Judge must (1) give the public and the press notice that he intends to impose the gag order on criminal justice information; (2) must give the public and the press an opportunity to object, either by written comment or by a hearing where objections can be raised with or without counsel; and (3) must make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law showing that there is a compelling reason to deprive the public of the information.

In short, all the rights in the world to challenge secrecy in the courts are of little use if we don't have the right to challenge illegal orders, or if the censorship can take place in such secrecy that the press doesn't even know when and where it has happened.

Under the current situation, a reporter may not even know that a gag order has been imposed; or he may arrive at the courthouse to find the courtroom locked or the papers sealed. Then, it may take weeks after the fact to vindicate the public and the press' rights to obtain the information. The first rule of effective censorship is to impose the censorship in total secrecy. This "due process" procedure is suggested as the first necessary weapon to challenge this type of unconstitutional action.

As Mr. Justice Clark said:

"A responsible press has always been regarded as the handmaiden of effective judicial administration, especially in the criminal field. Its function in this regard is documented by an impressive record of service over several centuries. The press does not simply publish information about trials but guards against the miscarriage of justice by subjecting the police, prosecutors, and judicial processes to extensive public scrutiny and criticism." [45]

We think it necessary and proper for Congress to demonstrate its responsibility by extending the public's right to know about its government to include the grand jury system.

PROTECTION FOR CONFIDENTIAL NEWS SOURCES AND UNPUBLISHED INFORMATION—INTRODUCTION

As you may know, The Reporters Committee was established in 1970, initially in response to the wave of subpoenas being issued by the grand juries under the control of the Justice Department in an attempt to discover the confidential news sources of news reporters.

Over a period of 18 months, the Department served more than 150 subpoenaes for confidential and other unpublished information from newspapers and television stations.

The press resisted these subpoenaes and this resistance resulted in what we consider a most unfortunate 5–4 Supreme Court decision from a trilogy of cases—Branzburg v. Hayes (confidential news sources of illicit drugs), In re Pappas (confidential news sources in a potential civil disorder) and U.S. v. Caldwell (confidential news sources inside the Black Panther movement).[46]

The four-justice plurality opinion ruled that the First Amendment did grant some protections to the press.

"Without some protection for seeking out the news, freedom of the press could be eviscerated." [47] "News gathering is not without its First Amendment protections, and grand jury investigations if instituted or conducted other than in good faith, would pose wholly different issues for resolution under the First Amendment . . . We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limit of the First Amendment . . ." [48]

However, Mr. Justice White, who wrote the plurality opinion, decided that the state had a superior "compelling interest" in discovering the information obtained by the newsmen than the interest it had in protecting the public's right to know information obtained by reporters from confidential news sources.

The plurality opinion appeared especially concerned that the three newsmen were eyewitnesses to the manufacture of illegal drugs, to illegal arms possession by a militant organization and to a verbal threat to the life of the President.

The fifth and deciding vote was cast by Mr. Justice Powell, who took a somewhat narrower view.

While upholding the subpoenaes in these three cases, he said that the First Amendment interest would prevail if the information sought was "remote and tenuous," and if the news person could show that there was no "legitimate need of law enforcement." [49]

Mr. Justice Powell said that, "The asserted claim to privilege should be judged on its facts by the striking of a proper balance between freedom of the press and the obligation of all citizens to give relevant testimony with respect to criminal conduct. The balance of these vital constitutional and societal interests on a case-by-case basis accords with the tried and traditional way of adjudicating such questions." [50]

We, in the press have relied very strongly in the lower federal and state courts on Mr. Justice White's protection for the collection and gathering of news and Mr. Justice Powell's argument for the "balancing test" to assert that the court does give some recognition to the importance of protecting confidential information.

However, the prosecutors and judges against whom we frequently litigate concentrate on other sections of the opinion:

"We are asked to create another (testimonial privilege) by interpreting the First Amendment to grant newsmen a testimonial privilege that other citizens do not enjoy. This we decline to do . . ." [51]

To complicate the situation even further, Mr. Justice White cities with approval the approach taken by the Attorney General's Guidelines for the protection of newspersons subpoenaed by the Justice Department.[52]

These Guidelines basically take a "balancing test" approach. The Department is first required to attempt to negotiate with the press and then to take into consideration the seriousness of the crime, whether the information sought from the reporter is directly relevant to the investigation, whether the subpoena is for specific information or is a fishing expedition into news organization files and whether there are alternative sources for the information other than the reporter.[53]

To add to the confusion, most state supreme courts and lower courts which have considered reporters' privilege problems have followed the "balancing test." The most notable exception is in libel cases which are unique because the reporter is the defendant.

[53] 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 et seq. (1976).

The Branzburg decision was quickly picked up by U.S. attorneys and then by state and local prosecutors. Meanwhile, a series of meetings had taken place between the Justice Department and various press organizations which resulted in the promulgation, first by Attorney General Mitchell and later by Attorney General Richardson, of the Justice Department Guidelines.

According to the Justice Department, during a 26-month period between March, 1973, and May, 1975, the Department issued 75 subpoenas to 105 newspersons. Of these, 22 subpoenas, or almost one-third, were issued without the approval of the Attorney General, which is required by the Justice Department's own Guidelines.

In the 54 subpoenas approved by the Attorney General, according to the Justice Department, 42 were issued to willing news persons and 12 were issued to reporters who opposed testifying.

However, we have no way of knowing whether these statistics are accurate, and no way of verifying whether, in fact, the 42 subpoenas were more or less agreed to by the newspersons voluntarily or whether threats or other coercion were used to obtain the reporters' consent.

This is because the Department has repeatedly declined to identify the reporters subpoenaed or their news organizations.

As a result, we are unable also to confirm that the Guidelines have been followed, such as the requirement that there be no alternative sources of the information or that the information was directly relevant to the investigation of a serious crime.

As a footnote, we think that this Committee ought to obtain the identities of the subpoenaed news reporters in order to verify the Justice Department's assertion.

In the 18-month period from May 1975 to November 1976, the Justice Department served 42 subpoenas, some of them involving more than one news reporter. The Department states that 36 of these subpoenas were agreed to by the reporters or the news organizations. The Department says "the records are silent" on the remaining 6 subpoenas. But relying on what the Department says is "the reliable recollection of those involved," there was only one unwilling reporter.

The Department says that 3 of the 42 subpoenas were issued without the prior approval of the Attorney General in violation of the Justice Department's Guidelines.

Once again there is now way to evaluate whether, in fact, the subpoenas involved "willing newsmen" when issued by an agency of the Government which has broad antitrust, tax, and other criminal and civil jurisdiction over the operation of news organizations.

Congress made one major effort to address the subpoena problem during hearings held in 1974 and 1975 on shield law legislation for the press. At that time this Committee supported an absolute privilege bill—drafted by the American Newspaper Publishers Association—protecting confidential sources and unpublished information obtained during the course of legitimate newsgathering activities.

We still adhere to that position but it has become perfectly clear that there is no hope of any type of substantive shield law being passed because the press itself is now sharply divided on the issue.

There are those, like this Committee, who favor an absolute privilege. There are those who favor a qualified privilege somewhat on the lines of the balancing test. Finally, there are those who oppose any substantive Congressional legislation in this field on the grounds that any Congressional statute would undermine the First Amendment.

We continue to believe that news reporters have an absolute privilege under the First Amendment to withhold from government the identity of their news sources and the content of unpublished information. We think that the press is independent and that the public must have the confidence to feel that when it talks to a news reporter, it is not talking to the FBI or to a grand jury, based on the whim of a government prosecutor. When one considers the resources of the federal government—18,000 FBI agents, 94 U.S. district courts with the power to convene grand juries and 94 U.S. Attorneys offices plus thousands of marshals and other law enforcement agents in the Department of Treasury and the Secret Service, etc.—we think there is virtually no instance where the government, with its wiretapping, subpoena and search and seizure powers, cannot find the same information from non-press persons it wishes to discover from a news reporter if it wants to.

All too often, the first person the government decides to subpoena is the news reporter when certainly he or she should be the very last to be called on, if at all.

But government is frequently lazy and, of course, the reporter is the easiest person to pursue. His or her name is on the story. As frequently happens, he or she may not have the financial resources to litigate, or he or she may work for a news organization which is either apathetic or simply doesn't have the money to hire an attorney.

Even larger news organizations frequently think twice about subpoenas when one remembers that the cost of litigating the Caldwell case was more than $150,000 and that it is not unusual in subpoena cases for costs to routinely run from $25,000 to $40,000.

Virtually all of the news organizations agree that substantive shield law legislation is unlikely and we are not, at this time, going to renew that dispute. What we are going to do is to offer your Subcommittee some practical ways to give at least minimum procedural protection to news reporters without in any way jeopardizing the substantive protections of the First Amendment.

NOTCE OF SUBPOENAS

We think that any subpoena for testimony and documents served on a recognized member of the press for information obtained during news gathering should not be returnable prior to 7 days after the service of the subpoena. Frequently, a subpoena will be served on a Monday, returnable on a Wednesday, for example. The First Amendment case law in this field is quite complex, is newly developing and in many ways is inconsistent.

It is virtually impossible under a deadline pressure of 24 or 48 hours for even the most experienced attorney in this field to do an adequate research job to decide whether the subpoena should be resisted, and, if so, what the argument should be in favor of quashing it.

Considering the importance of the First Amendment interest here, we think that Congress ought to insist that there be at least sufficient time for the reporter or news organization to find an attorney and for the attorney to evaluate and protect that interest.

In addition to permitting news reporters and news organizations sufficient notice of subpoena efforts to obtain information in their possession, there is at least one major area we have become aware of where government has by secret subpoena attempted to obtain the identity of confidential news sources—subpoenas to the telephone company to obtain copies of the home and office telephone calls of newspersons or news organizations.

We have discovered just here in Washington that the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Company has complied with government subpoenas for all the long-distance home and office telephone records of columnist Jack Anderson; the home telephone records of Mr. Anderson's associate, Les Whitten; the office telephone records of the Washington bureau of the Knight-Ridder Newspapers; the office telephone records of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch Bureau; the office telephone records of the New York Times Bureau; the home telephone records of St. Louis Post-Dispatch Washington Bureau Chief Richard Dudman; and the home telephone records of New York Times Washington correspondent David Rosenbaum.

In all cases, the subpoenas were served secretly upon the telephone company, which complied with them and did not notify the newspersons and news organizations so that they had no opportunity to argue that the subpoenas were improper.

Subsequently, The Reporters Committee, the news organizations and newspersons mentioned above, and a number of other news reporters and editors filed suit against AT&T, arguing that the telephone company or the Justice Department should be required to give notice.[54] We argued that telephone toll records are, in effect, a profile of a reporter's contacts and permit the government to identify confidential news sources in violation of the First Amendment.

AT&T and the Justice Department have opposed this suit and so far they have won a decision in their favor in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. The case is now on appeal.

We think that when Congress authorized the Federal Communications Commission to permit the telephone company to maintain toll records of subscribers such as news organizations—whose toll records contain protected First Amendment information—that Congress never intended, either under the First Amendment or under the regulatory powers, for AT&T to conspire with the government or any other party to secretly disclose confidential news sources.

Therefore, we think that Congress ought to require 7 days' notice to any news organization or newsperson whose toll records are to be subpoenaed by a grand jury. This would give the news organizations and newspersons an opportunity to oppose the subpoena in court.

Also, it has come to our attention that the government has been obtaining copies of telegrams and cables, both domestic and foreign, sent and received by news organizations. Therefore, we would suggest a similar notice provision for news organization wire communications subpoenaed by grand juries from domestic and international cable carriers.

In the last session of Congress, there were at least two bills in the House, H.R. 3655, introduced by Mr. Koch, and H.R. 9165, introduced by Mr. Harrington, which would have provided for notice of seizure of news media phone records and a similar bill in the Senate, S. 1612, introduced by Mr. Nelson.

In the current session of Congress there are five bills designed to protect news media telephone records: H.R. 215, introduced by Mr. Whalen; H.R. 214, introduced by Mr. Kastenmeier; S. 14, introduced by Mr. Mathias; and H.R. 1985, introduced by Mr. Koch; and a House bill which would protect both telephone records and cable traffic, H.R. 433, also introduced by Mr. Koch.

PRIVILEGE

We think there is no question that Congress ought to take this opportunity to construct some strong procedural protections, consistent with the First Amendment, for news reporters and news organizations who are served with subpoenas for confidential news sources and other unpublished information.

In making a motion to quash a subpoena issued by any federal grand jury to any news organization or newsperson for information obtained during the course of news gathering, we think the courts should be required to recognize the First Amendment interests involved; should be required to recognize the state shield law, if any; should be required to recognize any state court interpretations of state free press privileges; and should require the Justice Department to obey the Attorney General's Guidelines.

That is to say, rather than asking Congress to pass a shield law interpreting or implementing the First Amendment, Congress could leave the First Amendment substantively to the courts. Under its power to amend the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Congress could require the federal courts to impose procedural protections consistent with First Amendment interests.

THE FIRST AMENDMENT AND THE FEDERAL COURTS

While the great majority of federal courts have recognized the First Amendment interests of journalists in both civil and criminal cases,[55] a few courts have gone so far as to rule that the Branzburg case absolutely precludes a journalist from asserting the First Amendment in any form to protect news sources:

"Are plaintiffs as representatives of the news media to be afforded different treatment from the rest of the public under First Amendment guarantees?

"The Court finds that Branzburg v. Hayes . . . does not give this protection to reporter sources and thus forecloses plaintiff's First Amendment claim."[56]

We had another instance where a U.S. district court in West Virginia ruled that a journalist could not assert a First Amendment privilege for information not obtained in a strict confidential relationship.

In a sense, these courts have denied the press its "standing" to assert the First Amendment. We think that it is possible for Congress to suggest that the courts give due deliberation to the First Amendment interests by a statement of policy in the Act about the importance of confidential news sources—without actually imposing a substantive shield law.

As indicated by the D.C. District Court's opinion, federal courts may feel themselves free to completely ignore a First Amendment claim if Congress is silent.[57]

But should Congress want to give some guidance, either in the form of a policy statement or a statement of intent in the legislative history of this Act, we feel that it might discourage courts such as the District Court for the District of Columbia from summarily closing the courthouse door on the First Amendmnt.

We should like to emphasize that we are not advocating a federal shield law. We are advocating procedural guidance on "standing," consistent with other procedural limitations Congress has inserted in the Federal Rules.

STATE SHIELD LAW

We think that reporters and news organizations should be able to invoke their state shield law before a federal grand jury in making a motion to quash a subpoena. Twenty-six state legislatures[58] have decided that the public interest is better protected by granting a state shield law privilege to reporters in those states reporting news to the citizens of those states. There is, we submit, a very strong state interest in protecting these newspersons and this interest is easily defeated by simply arranging for the newsperson to be called before a federal grand jury.

To permit, as has happened four times in California, a federal grand jury to subpoena a reporter merely in order to avoid the state shield law is to do nothing but give the federal government a veto over the state legislature's determination.[59]

There is little agreement among the circuits, and even among various cases within each circuit, as to when privileges embodied in state law must be applied by the federal courts.[60] In civil cases governed by Rule 43(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, federal courts generally follow the state law on privileges unless there exists a federal statute or rule to the contrary.[61] In diversity cases, courts with few exceptions have held that state law on privileges must be followed in the federal court.[62] In federal question cases, some courts have held that the state law must be followed,[63] while others have held that it will be followed where the state law of privilege serves substantial state interests and is not overridden by any strong federal policy.[64] In all three cases in which the question of the applicability of a state newsman's privilege law in a federal court has been raised, the courts followed the state law.[65]

In criminal trials governed by Rule 26, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, federal courts generally will not apply state law on the privilege of witness,[66] though one circuit has held to the contrary.[67] Rule 26, however, by its terms is not applicable to grand jury proceedings, and no federal court has previously decided the question of whether or to what extent a privilege embodied in state law is binding on a federal court in the context of a grand jury proceeding.

In the most closely analogous contest—a proceeding to enforce an IRS summons in an investigation likely to lead both to criminal prosecution and civil liability[68]— the privileges established by state law, at least insofar as they are not in conflict with any established federal law or public policy, are controlling.[68] No federal law or policy requires disregard of a newsman's privilege under state law. Indeed, the Supreme Court in Branzburg v. Hayes, while refusing to create "a virtually impenetrable constitutional shield, beyond legislative or judicial control," to protect newsmen's sources, strongly indicated that a state newsman's privilege law should be respected in federal courts:

There is also merit in leaving state legislatures free, within First Amendment limits, to fashion their own standards in light of the conditions and problems with respect to the relations between law enforcement officials and press in their own areas. It goes without saying, of course, that we are powerless to bar state courts from responding [to] their own way and construing their own constitutions so as to recognize a ne[wsm]an's privilege, either qualified or absolute.[70]

The lack of any federal law or policy against protection of the confidentiality of news sources is in sharp contrast to the strong state policies in favor of such protection within their respective boundaries. No fewer than twenty-six states have enacted legislation affording some measure of protection against compelled disclosure of newsmen's sources, and eleven of those statutes have been enacted or broadened within the past six years. One federal court of appeals, discussing two of these state statutes (Illinois and New York), recently stated that they "reflect a paramount public interest in the maintenance of a vigorous, aggressive and independent press capable of participating in robust, unfettered debate over controversial matters, an interest which has always been a principal concern of the First Amendment . . ." [71]

Allowing federal courts to override a state shield law in the context of grand jury proceedings will effectively nullify the attempts by the state legislatures to protect this "paramount public interest" within their respective borders. The premise of shield laws—that an assurance of confidentiality will encourage the flow of information to the public and advance the cause of truth—is undermined by any substantial exceptions to the applicability of the privilege. Even if a federal court could override the state law in a criminal trial, however, there is a special reason to require that the state law be honored in the context of a grand jury proceeding.

Almost any crime committed in the United States today raises, at least at the initial stage of the investigation, the possibility that a federal or state law may have been violated, and a federal or state grand jury investigation thus may be initiated.[72] A refusal to apply a state shield law in a federal grand jury proceeding, therefore, will effectively negate the purpose of the privilege in every situation where a potential news source has information involving possible criminal conduct. Furthermore, it is commonplace for state and federal grand juries to undertake simultaneous investigations of the same alleged criminal conduct. To allow a federal court to override a state privilege in such circumstances thus would enable a state grand jury to obtain through cooperation with federal authorities, precisely what the state legislature has intentionally denied it. This happened recently in California.

In conclusion, we think that Congress should extend to the professional news reporter the same privilege it has extended to the practice of other professions protected by state privilege laws in the federal courts. Surely the dissemination of news and ideas to the public is as honorable and important in our society as litigating automobile negligence claims. But while state attorney-client privilege can be pleaded in automobile negligence claims cases in federal court, the state newspersons' privilege cannot be pleaded under any circumstances.

STATE FIRST AMENDMENT PRIVILEGE

Similarly, if there is a state common law or specific state interpretation of federal First Amendment or of the state equivalent, we think that the federal courts should be made to recognize the state privilege.

[72] The range of federal statutes which might be applied to criminal conduct punishable primarily under state law includes use of the mails, 18 U.S.C. § 1341; interstate transportation of proceeds of crime, 18 U.S.C. § 1961–1963; interstate conspiracy, 18 U.S.C. § 2101; and interstate flight to avoid apprehension, 18 U.S.C. § 3182.

The reason we are making this suggestion is that we have three recent decisions—from Florida, Virginia, and Vermont, which have no shield laws—stating that the state equivalent of the federal First Amendment extends some privilege to newspersons.[73]

It is our contention that if the states of Florida, Virginia, and Vermont, through their state Supreme Courts, extend a privilege to their newspersons, then Congress should require the federal courts to recognize this state interest in federal courts.

We think, as in the case of the state shield laws, that the news reporter ought to be able to elect to plead whichever privilege he thinks will give him the strongest protection.

This is similar to the civil rights acts, where a state citizen can use the state court to file either a federal or a state civil rights claim depending upon which act he feels provides him with the most protection.

Therefore, we merely suggest that the federal courts be required to give newspersons the same election when faced with one of the most serious assaults on their rights to pursue their profession free from interference by the government.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S GUIDELINES

We are concerned, and we assume the Justice Department is concerned, that its own Guidelines have been broken when it issues subpoenas to the press. We consider this an especially serious problem because the Supreme Court said in Nixon v. U.S. that published regulations such as the Guidelines have the force of Federal law.

Therefore we think it would be advisable for the Congress to require that any Federal grand jury subpoena to a recognized member of the press be accompanied by a signed statement from the Attorney General confirming that all the requirements of the Guidelines have been followed, especially because the Guidelines themselves provide that the Attorney General must personally approve any subpoena to the press, after ascertaining that all the requirements have been met.

MOTIONS TO QUASH SUBPOENAS TO THE PRESS

If the trial judge turns down the motion to quash the subpoena, he then has under the federal rules the power to summarily hold the reporter in criminal or civil contempt and incarcerate him immediately.[74]

Here, we think there are several essential safeguards which Congress ought to include in any grand jury reform proposal.

First, that any newsperson or news organization has "standing" to appeal a denial of a motion to quash the subpoena. As you know, the Federal Rules, and interpretations of the circuits, vary on the appealability of interlocutory party and interlocutory third-party appeals in criminal litigation.

There are some courts that take the position, as this Committee takes, that a denial of a motion to quash a subpoena for testimony or for documents is a final judgment or decree and therefore is appealable on the merits. But there are some courts which take the position that there is no appealable judgment until the reporter has actually been held in contempt. This means, of course, that the reporter can be in jail while we are seeking stays and appeals even though, ultimately, the appeals court may quash the subpoena.

Therefore, in line with this problem we make two suggestions: First, that Congress statutorily confer "standing" upon any news organization or news reporter who seeks to appeal a denial of all or part of a motion to quash a subpoena seeking information obtained during the course of news gathering.

Second, that immediately upon filing the notice of appeal—seeking review of the denial of the motion to quash the subpoena—that the judgment be stayed pending disposition by the United States Court of Appeals; and that upon filing a notice of the Court of Appeals' decision in the United States Supreme Court, that the judgment be stayed pending disposition by the Supreme Court.

In short, we think that a news organization or news reporter should be free from jail until his case is heard on the merits; and that he should not have to suffer incarceration for asserting a privilege which is utilmately upheld.

[74] Fed. R. Crim. p. 42.

If the appeals on the motion to quash are turned down on the merits, then of course we have the situation where the reporter will appear before the grand jury and be asked questions.

Many reporters feel, as Mr. Caldwell felt, that merely appearing in secret before the grand jury will undermine their credibility with their news sources because their news sources have no way of knowing with any authenticity that their identity or other confidential information was protected.

Mr. Eilberg's bill offers one solution to this problem. It gives the witness who appears before the grand jury a complete transcript of his or her testimony and, we assume, that the witness is free to show this transcript to anyone.

Another solution would be to permit the news reporter, at his or her discretion, to appear before the grand jury in a proceeding open to the public and the press. The grand jury could ask its questions. The reporter could answer or not answer particular questions. The sources involved and the world at large could judge for themselves whether the reporter has carried out his obligation to protect his source.

While this may appear to be a somewhat novel solution, it is no more novel than Mr. Eilberg's suggestion that the transcripts be available to the world. In addition, under conventional grand jury practice, if a witness refuses to answer a particular question or series of questions, he is then called before the judge, generally in open court, and the questions are read aloud. Furthermore, even under current practice, a witness is free to disclose his testimony before the grand jury. Therefore, we see no reason not to permit public authentication of what in fact already exists.

If the reporter refuses to answer particular questions, then a contempt hearing is held. If the judge holds the reporter or news organization in contempt, we think, once again, as in motions to quash the subpoena, that the judgment of contempt should be automatically stayed on appeal pending disposition in the court of appeals; and that, should the court of appeals rule against the reporter, the judgment of contempt should be automatically stayed pending appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court and its disposition of the case.

Once again, we think that the news reporter should not be sent to jail until it is finally decided that he improperly asserted his First Amendment privilege.

Here we think that Congress should make one very important change in the Federal Rules. A number of reporters have been held in criminal contempt for a good faith assertion of their First Amendment privilege to protect information obtained during the course of news gathering.

Criminal contempt is a punishment with a definite sentence attached. Once a criminal contempt judgment has been handed down, the reporter may serve his sentence in jail regardless of whether a Court of Appeals subsequently rules that the questions asked of him were protected by the First Amendment or whether the information sought is necessary.

In fact, we have a case precisely like that now pending before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.[73] The Department of Justice is seeking to send two reporters from the Charleston, West Virginia, Gazette to jail for six months for criminal contempt for refusing to disclose information to a federal court, even thought the case for which the information was sought is now completely over. The government is relying on the Shillitant[74] case for this protection.

It had always been our assumption that mere silence—asserted under a good faith claim covered by the First Amendment—could never be the subject of a criminal contempt because a criminal contempt is, as the Supreme Court has said ever since Gompers,[75] "punitive" while civil contempt is "remedial".

We had always assumed that, when reporters were subpoened, that the government sought contempt in a "remedial" fashion in order to obtain the information. But now we have a situation in West Virginia in the federal court and two recent cases in California in the state courts[76] where judges are imposing criminal contempt as punishment for exercising the First Amendment rather than using the contempt power to obtain information.

Recently the United States Court of Appeals ruled in Zweibon v. Mitchell[77] that former Nixon administration officials are not liable for civil damages for conducting illegal surveillance activities, if the former officials thought at the time that they were acting in good faith under what was current law. And two years ago the Supreme Court gave virtually complete immunity under Section 1983[80] to state prosecutors who intentionally violated a criminal defendant's constitutional rights.

If the federal courts are going to immunize government officials for good faith exercise of unconstitutional powers then certainly a news reporter should be granted equal protection when he or she, in good faith, asserts the First Amendment.

The alternative, of course, is civil contempt which means that the reporter stays in jail until he discloses the information or until the grand jury term ends. But federal grand juries have a life of eighteen months[81] and that can be extended by order of the court.

We have seen reporters serve as long as 46 days in a state jail[82] and as long as 18 days in a federal jail under civil contempt sentences. In the federal case in California, instead of serving in the country club atmosphere of Allenwood—as the Nixon administration criminals have served—this reporter served his time in a six by six isolated cell on Terminal Island.

We have recently had a case in California where a judge ruled that incarceration of news reporters for longer than 15 days was "punitive." The judge reasoned that if reporters were willing to spend 15 days in jail to protect the principles of the First Amendment, that it was quite likely they would stay there for an indeterminate period of time and never disclose their sources; and therefore he ruled that civil contempt was converted into criminal contempt after the 15-day period.

Based on this case and on the determination of news reporters to protect their sources, we think that Congress ought to limit any civil contempt penalty imposed on a news reporter for a good faith assertion of his First Amendment privilege to no more than 15 days.

If the reporter serves the 15 days, he or she of course can be called up before the grand jury again and put through the same charade. Therefore, we think that Congress should bar any subsequent attempts to ask the news reporter or news organization substantially the same information that resulted in the civil contempt order.

Grand Jury Leaks

The first part of this testimony was concerned with the public availability of grand jury information and the second part was concerned with the protection of news sources.

These two problems converge when a reporter is called before a grand jury to disclose the source of a grand jury leak. If news reporters have to risk going to jail—even for 15 days—as the price of informing the public about the operations of the grand jury, then this system is an effective prior restraint on publication for many reporters.

While there may be many news reporters who are willing to go to jail in order to report news to the public, there may be many who do not wish to make this sacrifice and will choose instead simply not to publish the story. We don't think that it is fair or constitutional to ask a journalist to go to jail or pay a heavy fine as the price for doing his job.

Furthermore, even under current law, the requirement of secrecy is not imposed on the press but is imposed on the grand juror and prosecutor, etc. Therefore, it is not the reporter who is violating the law. Our suggestion is—in line with Near v. Minnesota and New York Times v. United States—that it can be no crime for a news organization or newsperson to obtain government information for publication, unless it can be shown as in other circumstances, that the publication of the information poses a "clear and present danger" to the national security of the United States.

You may remember that a number of reporters—Fred Graham from CBS, Richard Cohen from the Washington Post, James Polk, then with the Washington Star, and others—were ordered by the U.S. District Court in Maryland to show cause why they should not be held in contempt for refusing to disclose the sources of their information involving the grand jury investigation into the tax violations committed by former Vice President Agnew.

In this case, the Vice President alleged that the release of the information violated grand jury secrecy rules and also violated his right not to have the government release prejudicial information. Certainly other lawyers may find other statutes which might be used to attempt to discover grand jury information sources of the press.

Therefore, we think that the way to handle this problem is simply to recognize a general defense for the possession or publication by newspersons of grand jury information, except information which is a "clear and present danger" to the national security.

ATTORNEYS FEES

Even if Congress implements the First Amendment by granting to the public and the press the information it ought to have about the operation of the grand jury—and even if the Congress grants to the press the procedural protections for confidential information we have suggested to protect the First Amendment—we still have the situation where inventive prosecutors and judges will improperly attempt to steal informotion or attempt to force reporters to disclose information.

Any knowledgeable editor or reporter who foresees this type of litigation knows that it can easily cost a minimum of $25,000 or more in legal fees. While many publications may be willing to spend that kind of money to defend the First Amendment, there are many that cannot because they do not have the resources, and other who will not for other reasons. Furthermore, freelance writers and investigative reporters—and reporters employed by news organizations who do not feel the expenditure can be made—simply don't have the financial resources to defend themselves.

Now Congress has passed more than 60 laws[83] granting attorneys fees to private citizens who successfully defend constitutional interests—such as the Civil Rights Attorneys Fees Act of 1976—and a host of statutory rights, such as the Clean Waters Act, the Clean Air Act, Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, etc.

We certainly think that the public's right to know how its government operates is entitled to the same financial treatment as the public's right to a clean stream.

Therefore, we think it is extremely important that Congress provide for the payment of reasonable attorneys' fees and costs for any news person or news organization which successfully litigates a case (1) to obtain information to which the public is entitled from the grand jury or related court proceedings and (2) for successfully defending all or part of a grand jury subpoena seeking confidential sources or other unpublished information sought by grand jury subpoena.

This Committee was founded on the theory that one can't put a price on the First Amendment. In view of all the other interests which receive attorneys' fees and costs for protecting important public rights, we only ask equal financial treatment to guard the public's right to obtain information about the government and evaluate its performance. Thank you.

The Reporters Committee would like to express its appreciation for invaluable aid in preparing this testimony to Allan Adler, Charles Sennet and Richard Kaye of the George Washington University Law Center · Kevin Allen of the University of California at Los Angeles Law School; and Renee Fox of Catholic University Law School. These students are on the staff of The Reporters Committee and volunteer their time as part of a clinical internship project.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Landau.

Mr. LANDAU. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we should like to thank you for this invitation to talk about H.R. 94 and the other bill now pending before the Subcommittee on Grand Jury Reform.

My name is Jack Landau, and I am a reporter for the Newhouse newspapers in Washington, and director of the reporter's committee, and an attorney admitted to practice law in the State of New York. I have previously introduced the members of our staff.

[83] See Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240, 95 S. Ct. 1612 (1975), n. 33.

Our committee is a legal defense and research fund of working reporters which offers free legal advice to reporters, news editors, and photographers who have faced and continue to face such problems as subpenas, gag orders, and other threats to first amendment guarantees of freedom of the press.

Our belief is that the most fundamental protection of a free society is the right of independent press to inform the public how its Government is operating, and the grand jury is a Government institution.

As opposed to some of the other groups that have testified here, one major part of our testimony is devoted to public information reforms. We think from the volume of information you have received in your past hearings that the time has come to let some sunshine into the grand jury room. We are trying in this testimony to strike a balance between the right of the public to hold accountable this institution and the legitimate needs of the grand jury.

We did this by starting with two goals. First, we think the Congress ought to provide more information to the public about decisionmaking processes in the grand jury, because it is such a powerful body and one of the least accountable institutions of Government.

Second, we think that Congress ought to provide more protection for confidential and other public information sought by grand juries and members of the press.

We, along with the guild and other press representatives who you will invite, believe that we were constitutionally designed to be an independent and free institution and were not designed to be an official investigative arm of the Government, whether it be the legislative branch here, the executive branch, or any arm of the judicial branch, including the grand jury.

We have a number of provisions, which I will run over very quickly. They are listed in the index.

On the question of accountability, we think there are a few things that the committee might bear in mind. First of all, an enormous amount of information comes out of grand jury investigations from a number of sources. As you know, current law says that grand jury witnesses can release information.

Second, when you have an immunity hearing, a motion to quash a subpena, all of that is supposed to be held in open court, or at least, according to the rules, in different courts.

Third, probably the most common way that we can find is that the Government prosecutor frequently leaks information to the press. The Attorney General recently took note of that in a press conference, and we are including in our testimony excerpts of his remarks. But we come down to two problems. One is that the Government really is in charge of deciding most of the time what the public knows about the grand jury. It is our belief, and I hope it is the subcommittee's belief, that the Government isn't supposed to control what the public reads by its own behavior.

It should be noted prosecutors are political officials, especially local U.S. attorneys, and such officials decide what the public shall or shall not read about the grand jury and is information by Government handout.

So the rest of the suggestion that we make in the following testimony is based on an argument that the grand jury in its current secrecy really is permitting the executive branch to hide its views from any public accountability, and I gather it was the abuses which started the movement from the subcommittee to start its hearings. We will take some of the suggested procedures seriatim.

I think one problem is that grand jurys are public servants. That is their job. In many districts, under the rules, we cannot define the identity of the persons selected to serve on grand jurys. This is not true in a number of States. In California and Florida, for example, they routinely publish the names and addresses of the grand jurors who serve on panels.

Second, as you know, in existing law grand jury witnesses have a right to disclose their testimony. We are pleased that Mr. Eilber's bill would continue that right.

We do have a problem with attorneys. Many grand jury witnesses are not articulate people, and as in the case of Holder v. Banks in front of the Supreme Court several years ago, they may want to pick somebody to speak for them to the press, such as their attorney.

Now, we have run into a very, very complicated problem here, because the American Bar Association rules and the rules of 89 of the 94 district courts prohibit attorneys from talking to the press and saying anything that may be—I forget the exact language. I think we quoted it—but anything which might prejudice—I believe that's it—which might prejudice the trial.

Well, if the grand jury witness says something that might prejudice the trial, it would seem that he should be able to talk through his spokesman in any way he wishes, even if that is a lawyer.

So we may have an article III separation of powers problem because of the court's supervisory powers over the bar.

But I think, certainly, Congress has the jurisdiction to step in and tell the Federal courts that lawyers for witnesses who want their testimony disclosed should be permitted to talk to the press freely.

Another problem we have, and one you might want to address yourselves to, is the question of whether grand jurors should not be able at some point to give their general assessment of how the grand jury was handled.

As you know, you take probably the most well-known example, all of the information or a great deal of the information being submitted to the Watergate grand jury was repeated in the Senate Watergate hearings while the Watergate grand jury was was still in session, and when the Watergate grand jury were not in session, Judge Hart, I think, in his traditionally colorful language, said they would take the information to their graves and they may not talk to anyone.

Now, it seems to me that if you are interested in attempting to cure the alleged abuse of the system that one way to do it is to permit the grand jury, perhaps during the investigation or perhaps afterwards, to stand up and say, as one grand juror did in Memphis—"I think this is a whitewash. I don't think we were given all the evidence." Or as the story in the New York Times pointed out today, "I believe the Judicial Committee has found that a prosecutor intimidated the grand jury into handing down an indictment after the grand jury initially refused to hand down the indictment."

Once the grand jury is finished with its work, certainly, these people are citizens and are serving a very important public function, and I can't see what the objection of the Justice Department would be except to protect itself from criticism to permit the grand jury witness to talk about it.

We have another problem which we might be able to deal with better on the staff level, but there is an enormous confusion in the cases on the question of whether contempt hearings are always open or sometimes open or not open at all, or whether immunity hearings are open, whether motions to quash are open, and I think that once the grand jury leaves it place, its room, and goes into a judicial forum, which is an advocate hearing with a stenographic transcript and lawyers for both sides and due process, that the public certainly ought to have an absolute right to attend, because we also now get into the question of having judiciary misbehavior and public accountability.

For clarification purposes, we had always assumed that the entire text of indictments would always be public immediately upon their release.

We had a recent case in Washington in the District of Columbia, the local court here, which has the identical rules of the Federal court, where they excised portions of the indictment in order to protect the reputation of some unwed mothers under a privacy theory.

We think that you might be able to clarify this situation by statute, simply by making a flat rule that these indictments must always be open and available to the public and the press.

Perhaps the one suggestion here that we make that might be most helpful and where we have the most experience. We suggest, and I think one of the witnesses has suggested this to you in the past, that the Federal system adopt a system of releasing the entire transcripts of grand jury proceedings after indictment.

We haven't done any exhaustive study of the California system. We have called up several professors in California who deal in this field, and they didn't feel that there is any public criticism about the California system.

As a matter of fact, one law professor said that the California prosecutors think that the Federal system is somewhat barbaric.

But, at any rate, the grand jury has its testimony and, at that point, it seems that the public could be able to monitor the behavior of the prosecutor and behavior of the grand jury.

Now, I know there are innocent persons being hurt, and I would just point out that it is a problem with the entire criminal justice process that innocent people are indicted, and people find themselves pulled into trials and their lives put on record.

I will only say that if the people of the State of California get this information, there might be serious question here as to why citizens of the United States should not have this information.

We come to a touchy subject on the question of whether, assuming that the transcript is of some value after indictment, why in perhaps selected cases trnscripts might not be of value when there is no indictment.

We discussed that in our written statement. We do have one last problem on public information, and that is the question of grand jury reports.

Under the law today, as we understand it, the district court virtually has an unbridled censorship over the grand jury report. They can suppress it for a number of different reasons, if it is unfair to an individual, if it appears to be prejudicial.

We include in our testimony, I think, a very persuasive comment by the late Chief Justice Vanderbilt in New Jersey, when he talks about the grand jury as opposed to the indictment. A report process serves the conscience of the community, when a group of citizens can get together and investigate Government problems without necessarily having to find a crime.

We have a situation in Miami, which is a perfect example of this probem. A newspaper in Miami published a story several years ago alleging that the Internal Revenue Service was engaged in some improper spying activities on citizens. A Federal grand jury in Miami did an investigation of that allegation and drew up a report which it asked the judge to make public.

The report, we discovered later, criticized the newspaper rather soundly for what it said was irresponsible reporting.

The judge, as a matter of fact, contacted the newspaper and several other people and, on motion of the newspaper, sealed the report.

The newspaper in question in Miami came in and argued the report should be opened. While all this was going on, Mr. Seymour Hersh, who is a reporter of the New York Times, got ahold of the report and published it.

He was then served with an order to show cause why he shouldn't disclose the source of the information.

Mr. Sulzberger, the publisher of the Times and Mr. Rosenthal and Mr. Hersh were all served with letters to show cause why they shouldn't be held in contempt for publishing this grand jury report.

That is where this case is now. It has been delayed twice so far. But I think that if Congress gives the grand jury the right to draw up these reports and to talk to each other as fellow citizens, it is the sheerest arrogance of a Federal judge to assert himself and stops the citizens of the community from getting this information.

We have a technical problem that arises in a number of these cases in the criminal justice process, where the courts have said the press doesn't have a standing to bring a case.

The argument in some courts is that the order, for example, not to release the names of the grand jury runs against the court clerk, not against the press.

We would suggest that in some way, either through a statement of legislative intent, perhaps, that Congress make it quite clear that the public and the press have a legal interest in the availability of information which should be publicly available and, therefore, their complaints cannot be dismissed for lack of standing.

I will now turn to the question of confidential news sources, in which the guild went over in some detail—

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Landau, we are running behind a little bit. If you could wind up in a minute or two, we do have questions for you from the subcommittee.

Mr. LANDAU. Yes, sir.

We agree with the provision for notice. We would like to point out to you that we have evidence on the record in American Telephone & Telegraph Co. giving secret access to news media telephone records.

The home office of Jack Anderson, the home office of one of his associates, the home office telephone records of the New York Times were also given access to, and there is a lawsuit pending on this question.

Also, there is subsequent information from the cable traffic from both domestic and foreign carriers that was subpenaed. All of this information is turned over to the Government without any notice to the news organizations, so it has no way of litigating the propriety of the subpena under the first amendment.

So we would suggest that we extend the provisions in the proposed bill to cover not only the information in the possession of the news organization and report, but information in possession of the telephone company or the cable company.

We think that without getting into the subject of debate that the guild pointed out where there is a disagreement in the press on shield laws, that Congress could, under Federal rules, take a big step in protecting the press by requiring the Federal courts to recognize the shield laws of 26 States who have them.

These are States where State legislatures have said that for their citizens and reporters they believe the shield law is an adequate and necessary protection.

It could be done, as I said, without getting into the substantive debate. We agree with the guild about the Justice Department guidelines. One way, perhaps, to handle this would be to require a subpena to be accompanied by a written statement that the guidelines are to be followed.

In effect, that is supposed to happen, because the Attorney General is supposed to personally authorize every subpena but, as the Guild pointed out, the Justice Department's own statistics show that in about 30 percent of the subpena cases in an 18-month period, they violated their own guidelines because the U.S. attorneys did not ask for permission to file them.

Mr. EILBERG. After you finish your sentence, could we ask you some questions, please?

Mr. LANDAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. We have the testimony, and we will read it carefully.

Mr. Landau, one of the provisions in H.R. 94 would provide for the criminal penalties for violations of grand jury secrecy, but would exempt newsmen acting in an official capacity.

I assume you favor this?

Mr. LANDAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. Under the Caldwell "right to every man's evidence test," prosecutors are free to call newspaper men and to seek information about their confidential sources, as you have noted.

Are any statistics kept as to whether or not there has been an increase in such subpenas?

Mr. LANDAU. This dispute started on the Federal level. We had about 150 subpenas served in 1969 and 1970. Then I believe it was in the middle of 1970 the first Justice Department guidelines came down: The Justice Department's own statistics, I think, show that in the 18-month period between 1973 and 1975, there were 109 newspersons subpenaed to testify and then, I believe, they recently did a workup of the latest statistics to show that that has dropped to somewhere around 50 in the last year and several months.

But one problem with the statistics which we bring to your attention is that the Department claims that most of these people are willing, that they sort of quietly say "We don't mind the subpena," but they decline to identify either the name of the news reporter or the name of the news organization.

We have no way of knowing in a situation where the Justice Department exercises such vast control in the investigating of tax matters and antitrust matters and other matters which affect newspapers and broadcasters, of how willing the agreement to testify was.

So we would urge you, perhaps, to ask the Justice Department to identify the names of these news reporters, so that at least we will have more accurate statistics.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you know what has been the success of the Reporter's Committee in opposing such subpenas?

Mr. LANDAU. The last major problem we had was in California about a year or several months ago, where a radio reporter was held in contempt four different times, and I believe served 16 days in jail in a 6 by 6 cell for refusing to turn over copies of the SLA tapes, and that is a very curious situation, because California has a shield law, and we have, for your information, the testimony of the California law enforcement authorities who say in their testimony, that they knew they couldn't get this tape for the State grand jury because of the California shield, so we went to talk to the Federal prosecutor and he issued the subpena for us and got the tape eventually because a newsman went to jail.

Mr. EILBERG. I am not sure you have answered the question. What has been the success of the reporter's committee?

Mr. LANDAU. You mean statistically?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. LANDAU. I think we win more than we lose, Congressman.

Mr. EILBERG. One constant complaint made by grand juries is "trial by newspapers." It is argued that just as prejudicial publicity can only occur with willing prosecutors, so also such publicity cannot occur without willing reporters.

What voluntary efforts are there by reporters, and should there be any efforts by reporters, to police such potential abuses? I say this in the context of so many people whose reputations are ruined by, let's say, some irresponsible conduct at various times and places.

Mr. LANDAU. That, of course, depends upon the individual reporter or editor. That is not a determination for the government to make. This prejudicial publicity specter has been raised since Sheppard v. Maxwell, and I would only urge you to consider that perhaps the most massive publicity that one could imagine was the Watergate cover-up defendants who were tried and convicted in Washington, and the Supreme Court 2 weeks ago refused to listen to their complaint. They were able to get impartial people on the jury.

So I would suggest that if they could obtain a fair trial and they were able to get fair and impartial people on the jury, I can't envision any other situation involving the justice process which would be challenged on the sixth amendment grounds.

Mr. EILBERG. One question constantly raised is, who is the press? Who should, therefore, be entitled to increased confidentiality protections? In the 1972 decision, a newspaper by the Black Panther Party, was considered to be "press" for the purpose of applying a first amendment limited privilege.

Does the committee or you yourself have an opinion as to who should be included in this category of the press?

Mr. LANDAU. This is a question that was discussed extensively at the Kastenmeier hearings, with all various kinds of bizarre things be thrown out, including the Mafia.

I think, as a matter of fact, we have had, in my experience, only one case where it was questionable as to whether a person was a reporter. I think it is a question of common sense. We do think, for example, that people who are authors, who work on their own, who spend substantial amount of time writing and researching for the public, are covered, but you can get into just numerous variations of who qualifies for the privilege.

Mr. EILBERG. You don't think that question can be answered?

Mr. LANDAU. I think it is a question of a reasonable man standard. Has this person substantially through a portion of their professional life devoted it to the dissemination of news?

Mr. EILBERG. At a recent ABA luncheon, Fred Graham stated that it was the reporter's committee position that the press had not only a right but a duty to report investigations and indictments and criticize dismissals and acquittals.

What do you believe the effect of this would be on the public perception of a person's presumption of innocence, that is, that one is not to be considered guilty until proved so beyond a reasonable doubt?

Do you see any conflict?

Mr. LANDAU. I agree with what Fred said, which is why a great deal of the first part of our testimony is devoted to trying to get this type of information out to the public.

It is very subjective. Is a person presumed guilty when indicted? Is a person presumed guilty, even though he is acquitted on a technicality?

I think that is sort of outside the realm of objective determination.

I just don't know how you would deal with this type of a problem, because it occurs at every step of the criminal justice process.

When a person is arrested, many people assume guilt.

Mr. EILBERG. Let me expand on the idea that one is innocent until proven guilty. If in court proceedings one is relieved of the charge under whatever circumstances, do you think the press still has the right to go ahead and criticize, even though there has been an official court action taken?

Mr. LANDAU. Oh, yes. I think you could probably find cases where you would want to do an analysis of why the judge directed the verdict for dismissal, because the defendant was his brother-in-law, or whatever.

Mr. EILBERG. Would it be extending your position too far by saying or suggesting to you that you see no limit to what comment might be made subsequent to any court action?

Mr. LANDAU. There is a limit. Of course, there are liberal laws which are very healthy and strict.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish?

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Landau, I want to thank you for your testimony, generally, and, perhaps, single out, specifically, your section on grand jury reports, because I don't remember that being covered by other witnesses.

I gather it is your view that we should have an opportunity for far greater publicity to grand jury reports, and could you tell us what your recipe is for the procedure? How would you go about it, making public a certain grand jury report? What would be the safeguards?

Mr. LANDAU. I would think you start with the assumption, that they be available in all cases. We did have this controversial case in Maryland in 1970, where the grand jury handed down a report which eventually involved the Mandel administration and it was suppressed.

You start with an assumption, at least that the grand jury has some semblance of independence from the prosecutor and from the court.

If the grand jury is a group of citizens empowered by Congress to investigate such problems and comment and criticize, then it seems to me that Congress ought to protect the rights, because the right won't have any meaning if they are going to sit and do their investigation, issue their subpenas under the power you have given them, write their report under the power you have given them, and then the judge can step in and say, "I'm sorry, I don't like it. You don't have any right to talk to your relatives."

It seems to me you are talking, in a sense, about their first amendment right which, to a great degree, has been implemented in the Federal rules.

Whether you allow release of reports by majority vote or two-thirds vote of the grand jury, whether you give the courts unlimited power, we suggest not, but perhaps that would be in an area of exploration. But it would seem to me, however, the burden ought to be extremely difficult for persons who want to suppress, and they ought to have a reason.

As I say, if it is true innocent persons may be hurt, well, that is the problem with the whole system; innocent people are hurt from the very beginning to the very end.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Landau, I was going to ask you your opinion on how effective is incarceration for civil contempt in obtaining testimony from a witness?

In your one recommendation, you say that Congress ought to limit civil contempt penalty to 15 days. I wonder if that provision answers my question?

Mr. LANDAU. You are dealing with individuals. You are dealing with a profession that has to take a certain amount of Government abuse, and probably has to expect a certain amount of Government abuse to do its job.

We had a reporter in California who sat in jail for 46 days, and he never released the testimony. We have had other reporters who feel they don't want to go to jail, and they fight the case through and then they lose.

We had a case in New York with the only reporter involved at Attica. The only reporter inside of Attica allowed at Attica, because he was a reporter trusted by the inmates, and immediately was called in front of the grand jury and forced to tell his testimony, and later called in front of the trial.

I think it depends on the reporters. Many of them have gone and will go to jail. Others won't. I don't think that we can ask going to jail as the price to do your job. You don't ask somebody else to go to jail to perform their function.

Certainly, the first amendment didn't envision when it says there shall be no Government regulation, there can be no higher incident of regulation than to throw people in jail.

Mr. FISH. Why do you think that?

Mr. LANDAU. Mainly, because there is, of course, a substantial amount of dealing with personalities. Some guys will say they are willing to go to jail for years, and other people will say they aren't.

But we did have a case in California recently involving four reporters who were held in contempt, and the California courts ruled that after 15 days the contempt became criminal rather than civil. They thought 15 days indicated that they would spend a very long, if not indeterminate, time in jail, rather than release their sources, so the California court set the 15-day limit, and it is based on that case. It is the only case I can give you for that, where we have that kind of a finding by the court that we selected the 15 days.

Mr. FISH. What is the purpose of incarceration, just because the individual was found to be in contempt of the court, or it is really an effort to get them to talk, get them to testify?

Mr. LANDAU. We also thought up until recently, Congressman, that you could not be held in criminal contempt for assertion of the constitutional privilege. However, we are involved in a remarkable litigation with the Justice Department now, in which the Justice Departments is trying to throw in jail for 6 months two reporters from Charleston, W. Va., who have refused to disclose information to a judge, even though the proceeding for which the information is sought has been over for a year.

They want to call those reporters in criminal contempt and throw them in jail for 6 months, and they cite the Shilitani case as precedent for that. In view of this problem we think that the Congress can simply make a statement that the Federal courts may not hold newspersons in criminal contempt for good faith assertion of constitutional privilege to protect news sources.

I mean, if you are going to protect the government officials from civil liabilities for unconstitutional actions because they reasonably thought the actions were legal at the time, you certainly can protect the news reporters from criminal liabilities for a good faith assertion of a constitutional privilege.

Mr. FISH. Do you think any good faith assertion in the first amendment privilege would be available to a member of organized crime?

Mr. LANDAU. I don't know. That is the question that was asked at the Kastenmeier hearings, when the Mafia question became involved.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall?

Mr. HALL. Mr. Landau, if all of the propositions that you and others have indicated should be written into the law, do you not effectively do away with the grand jury, as we have known it to exist over the centuries in this country?

Mr. LANDAU. No; in the 17th century in England the grand jury was the creature of the crown, because it liberated the public, and the high sheriff used to chase the grand jurors through the forest because they wouldn't bring the indictments down. So they gave them secrecy to give them a source of independence. But what has happened under the current system, under the Federal rules, is that the government prosecutor now has complete control of the grand jury, almost the way they did in the 17th century. And we maintain that if you are interested in trying to preserve what you consider the traditional role of the grand jury and its independent, you will limit the abuse that the government prosecutor can impose on a grand jury, by making it publicly accountable.

Mr. HALL. What is your position on abolishing the grand jury?

Mr. LANDAU. We have none, sir.

Mr. HALL. Do you think the grand jury in this country has served its purpose, as it was originally instituted to serve such a purpose?

Mr. LANDAU. I don't have any answer for that, sir.

Our job is to deal with the institutions as they are set up.

Mr. HALL. But, in effect, you are saying to do away with a lot of the secrecy that we have heretofore enjoyed with grand juries; is that what you have stated?

Mr. LANDAU. It hasn't apparently crippled California grand juries to release full transcripts.

Mr. HALL. They have abolished the grand jury in Great Britain; have they not?

Mr. LANDAU. I believe they have.

Mr. HALL. Do you know what procedural process they use now to go through the indictments?

Mr. LANDAU. I assume they go by information.

Mr. HALL. Do you see any reason why that would not work in this country?

Mr. LANDAU. I'm sorry; I have to apologize. We haven't done any research on matters other than the bills, and bills presume there would be grand jurors.

Mr. HALL. You are not stating that members of the press should enjoy any higher degree of recognition of grand jury information than any person or citizen; are you?

Mr. LANDAU. I think it is our position that persons engaged in news-gathering do enjoy certain protections under the first amendment that are not enjoyed by persons who are not engaged in bringing these ideas to the public.

Persons who are admitted to the bar are given special privileges.

Mr. HALL. The first amendment rights are available to all citizens of this country, aren't they?

Mr. LANDAU. That gets into the problem, who can assert the privilege?

But I don't think there's any constitutional impediment to recognize the importance of the dissemination of news, just as there is no constitutional impediment with the practice of law or practice of medicine.

Mr. HALL. Is it your understanding that a judge of a court under no circumstances would have a right to disallow grand jury testimony from being made public?

Mr. LANDAU. I believe in California they do have a provision, wherein, under certain circumstances, the transcript can be sealed until the end of the trial, and then at the end of the trial the transcript is opened, and the standard in California code is the court determines that if there is a reasonable likelihood that all or any part of the transcript may prejudice the defendant's right to a fair trial, that portion may be sealed until the trial is completed.

Mr. HALL. Do you find fault with that?

Mr. LANDAU. I only find fault with the premise, as I suggested earlier to the chairman, that in the Supreme Court's action in the Calley case and the Watergate cases, that one can make any firm assumption that newspaper stories will make it impossible to find 12 impartial jurors.

Mr. HALL. Do you think that allowing testimony to be released to the public under certain circumstances, affect the probability of a fair trial, on the merits?

Mr. LANDAU. Not based on the facts, sir.

Mr. HALL. I understood you mentioned the Watergate defendants which, of course, is an excellent series of events to allude. But where you have an event that occurs in a small territory, small area, rural area, wholly unlike the matters that we heard from Watergate can't you see in the smaller areas, where the releasing of this testimony would be of great damage to people who have been indicted and coming up for trial.

Mr. LANDAU. This was the problem the Supreme Court had last year and came to the conclusion in that case that despite the fact this was a small community and an extremely horrible crime, I believe involving six members of one family killed, and there was convergence of the press all over the place, they said in that case that the defendant had not shown with any specific evidence that it would be impossible to find a fair jury and, therefore, they struck the prior restraining order down.

I would mention the Calley case to you, because I think Calley is an excellent example.

There is a case that was tried on a military base in a very restrictive circumstance, certainly, among people who are extremely interested in the subject matter as opposed to the general public, and they said he was able to obtain on impartial courts-martial jury trial. The Supreme Court denied certiorari.

Mr. HALL. One final question. I am looking at the sheet here that indicates all of the steering committee. I notice ABC is not on it.

Mr. LANDAU. Howard K. Smith is on it, although he is in Washington.

Mr. HALL. I'm sorry. I overlooked that.

Thank you.

Mr. LANDAU. Mr. Chairman, can I take your time for 30 seconds more?

Mr. EILBERG. Go ahead, Mr. Landau.

Mr. LANDAU. We have a very big problem paying for this litigation, not the reporter's committee, because we are tax exempt, but the cost of the Caldwell case was $150,000, and the Boston Globe case ran over $30,000.

You have passed laws permitted persons who defend the public interest to get reasonable attorney's fees and costs, if they succeed. We would urge you to consider amending the code to permit news reporters to be able to collect reasonable attorney's fees and costs if they successfully litigate on behalf of the public to obtain information out of the criminal justice system, including the grand jury, and if they successfully defend all or part of a subpena. This would be an enormous help.

Many of these reporters, I think, give in, because they simply can't afford it.

In publications that are small, like small rural weeklies, they can hardly afford to lay out $50 or $60,000.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Landau, do you feel that the subject of attorney's fees, even in this special case, would be appropriate subject for grand jury reform or, indeed, the subject that is within our jurisdiction?

Mr. LANDAU. I think it is within your jurisdiction, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Landau, I want to compliment you for an extremely well-organized and thoughtful statement and, if I may, I would like to say that the questions here of the members do not necessarily reflect their attitude with respect to the case involved. I was trying to think through how what you have said is in conflict with one of our previous constitutional rights, it seems to me, and that is the right to confront your accuser.

It seems to me that throughout all this we set up a situation where the person who is engaged in press activities, or says he is engaged in press activities, can indicate that he has all sorts of information without indicating who he has got the information from, and I was wondering if you had any thoughts on how he could protect an individual who may be having all this information thrown at him or her. when he doesn't have any way to find out where the information is coming from.

Mr. LANDAU. I would say a number of libel cases, including the recent case against Jack Anderson, that is exactly what happened.

They published information based on a confidential source. The person who was the subject of the article filed a libel case. He made a motion in pretrial discovery and forced him to testify in the district court and ordered him to testify and the court of appeals ordered him to testify.

I believe they finally resolved it by prevailing upon the source to release the identity, and I believe the case went to a jury last year, but this happens frequently.

We now have a case in Idaho where they have found very heavy judgment against a newspaper article. They refused to reveal the confidential source.

Mr. HARRIS. Do you agree with that?

Mr. LANDAU. Do I agree with the libel law?

Mr. HARRIS. With regard to how it is applied as it comes in conflict with notions of confidentiality of sources.

Mr. LANDAU. I think that the reporters and the news organizations should not have to disclose their news sources, whether it is in a libel case or in front of a grand jury, or in front of a congressional committee.

In the libel law you get into very technical problems. We do have, of course, an instance when a circuit court judge very eloquently stated how a person can prove his case if the reporter is the only person who knows the information.

Mr. HARRIS. You talked about the Watergate cases here before. Who was "Deep Throat"?

Mr. LANDAU. Excuse me, sir?

Mr. HARRIS. I said, I was wondering who "Deep Throat" was. Mr. Landau, could you tell the committee that?

Mr. LANDAU. You better ask someone else. I don't know.

Mr. HARRIS. In your opinion, and with your experience as a court reporter with respect to the grand jury, where do those leaks usually come?

Mr. LANDAU. I think we say in our testimony that substantial amounts of information come from Government. I think this is especially true on the local level, where the U.S. attorney uses this as a steppingstone to political office, either State or Federal office, and generally, as we understand it from our sources, they find it convenient when it suits their purposes, to get the story out and, of course, that means that they get out what they want out.

The public reads what the Government wants it to read, and there is no accountability.

Mr. HARRIS. It is your opinion and experience that a substantial amount of information from the secret grand jury investigation is often leaked out by the prosecutor?

Mr. LANDAU. In various ways. There are various techniques to do it without technically violating rule 6(e) because the prosecutor generally takes the statements before you go in front of the grand jury, for example.

Now, rule 6(e), I don't think technically prohibits the prosecutor from saying, "I can't tell you what Joe Brown said in front of the grand jury, but I have the statement," that type of thing, and that doesn't fall under the rule, and there are various other techniques to do it.

Mr. HARRIS. It was your testimony, I think, also that the making of the proceedings of the grand jury more public would give the grand jury more backbone. Was that one of the points?

Mr. LANDAU. I think it certainly would stop the prosecutor from abusing his discretion I believe you have testimony where Mr. Goodwin, in charge of the political grand juries of the Justice Department in 1973 or 1974, gave out statistics of 134 grand juries involving political dissident groups in 100 cities.

Obviously, this was not all for loyal purposes. It would make the prosecutor publicly accountable. It would produce the kind of information that the Times produced in their story this morning.

Mr. HARRIS. Even if the prosecutor had complete control over who he selected or substantial control over who was selected and not selected for the grand jury?

Mr. LANDAU. I don't think he has substantial control now.

Mr. HARRIS. I didn't suggest he did, but I was suggesting——

Mr. LANDAU. They used to.

Mr. HARRIS. But that doesn't happen anymore.

Mr. LANDAU. I think you changed the rule now, that it has to be done by voter lists and a wheel. But the extraordinary thing about it is you put all the voters' lists in the list and you can be present when the wheel is turned, and you can see them pull the slip out, but you can't see the name.

Mr. HARRIS. I guess we had testimony before the committee that indicated that at least one gentleman who had testified, he had been on the grand jury, I think he said, 15 or 16 times. But I didn't know how come his name came up on that wheel so often.

Mr. LANDAU. Maybe he voted a lot.

Mr. HARRIS. He didn't indicate he understood his responsibilities. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Landau, just for the record, are you a member of the bar?

Mr. LANDAU. The State of New York, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. That was quite obvious.

Your testimony indicated a legal background.

Mr. LANDAU. We extend our appreciation to the law student staff also.

Mr. EILBERG. Our next witness is Prof. Leon Friedman of Hofstra University School of Law, who is testifying on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union.

TESTIMONY OF LEON FRIEDMAN, HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, HEMPSTEAD, N.Y.

[Prepared statement of Prof. Leon Friedman follows:]

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION ON H.R. 94, H.R. 3736 AND OTHER BILLS ON THE FEDERAL GRAND JURY—PREPARED BY PROF. LEON FRIEDMAN, HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

On behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, I appreciate the Committee's invitation and the opportunity to comment on the H.R. 94, H.R. 3736 and other bills relating to reform of the federal grand jury. The American Civil Liberties Union, a nationwide organization with 280,000 members, has been especially concerned about the requirements of the due process and the use of fair procedures in the criminal justice system. Since so many questions have recently arisen on grand jury practice, it welcomes the attention this Committee and the sponsors of the reform bills have given to these problems.

Over the past ten years the grand jury has received considerable attention from Congress, the courts and the legal community. We can certainly understand why this occurred. The grand jury is the most powerful instrument in the criminal law today. Other legal institutions are hedged and limited by numerous safeguards that protect citizens rights: a policeman cannot stop a person to frisk him for weapons without a "founded suspicion." A person cannot be searched or arrested without "probable cause." Once arrested, he cannot be bound over for trial without reasonable cause to believe that he committed a crime. He cannot be convicted without a jury finding beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty. And strict rules on the need for competent and legally admissible evidence apply at the trial.

A grand jury operates under none of these constraints. It may look anywhere without justifying or announcing the scope of its inquiry. It can subpoena witnesses from thousands of miles away, give them only a few hours notice of their obligation to appear and demand the production of truckloads of personal documents. It has no probable cause limitation in its operations. The Supreme Court held in Davis v. Mississippi, 391 U.S. 721 (1969) that the police cannot arrest 24 men who vaguely resembled the person they were looking for and then take their fingerprints to match against fingerprints found at the scene of the crime. This is true because the police did not have probable cause to arrest all 24 to begin with. But a grand jury can simply subpoena all 24 people in that situation, and demand fingerprints, blood samples, handwriting and voice samples (United States v. Dionisio 410 U.S. 1 (1973)) or stand them up in a line-up (See United States v. Melvin, 550 F. 2nd 674 (1st Cir. 1977).

It may consider illegally-seized evidence which is absolutely inadmissible at trial. (See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974)). It may bring a lawyer or doctor or priest or spouse into the grand jury room, and try to get one of them to breach a confidence. Since the client, patient, penitent or other spouse is not present to object, the privilege may be lost, and even if the evidence is not admissible at trial, a grand jury may presumably indict on the basis of privileged information. See United States v. Mayday, 405 F. Supp. 854 (E.D.N.Y. 1975).

BACKGROUND

Other witnesses before this Committee have gone into the historic origins of the grand jury in England. I would like very briefly to show the changes in the institution in the United States over the past 100 years.

In the nineteenth century the grand jury achieved its greatest successes as the principal weapon against municipal corruption. The familiar picture of the fighting grand jury, led by its honest foreman, defying corrupt prosecutors, policemen, and city officials to bring evil politicians to justice had much basis in fact. Many members of the Tweed gang in New York—including Mayor A. Oakley Hall, Boss William Tweed and ten other persons—were indicted in 1871 and later convicted for fraud because of the efforts of a runaway grand jury working without the assistance of the district attorneys office. In 1886 thirteen aldermen in New York City were indicted by a reform-minded grand jury for selling street-car franchises to the highest bidder. In Cincinnati in 1906 a grand jury investigated and indicted political boss George Cox for perjury and mishandling of city funds after the regular courts refused to look into the matter. St. Louis rid itself of its corrupt political bosses though a series of indictments handed up by an investigating grand jury that took ten years looking into charges of bribery and fraud by leading city officials.

Lincoln Steffens in his famous book The Shame of the Cities has written about the clean-up of Minneapolis then under the control of Mayor "Doc" Ames through the work of a grand jury which ignored the public prosecutor and secured indictments against many of the Mayor's lieutenants.

Moving into our own era, a New York City grand jury issued a report in 1935 calling for a special prosecutor to be appointed for the sole task of investigating organized crime and the connection between racket leaders and law enforcement officials. The special prosecutor was needed, the panel said, because of the lack of cooperation between the District Attorney and the grand jury in this area. After the District Attorney refused to select a prosecutor acceptable to the grand jury, Governor Herbert Lehman stepped in and appointed Thomas E. Dewey who proceeded to secure indictments against a number of crime leaders, thereby launching his own political career. Dewey was one of the great boosters of the grand jury for the rest of his public life.

It is important to note in almost all of these cases that the grand jury was using its subpoena authority and its secret inquisitorial powers not against the people but against the government. It was always thought of as a people's panel, either voicing the people's complaints about what government was not doing or not doing right or doing in an illegal fashion. When the grand jury performed its ordinary criminal function, of investigating common crimes and returning indictments, its powers were hedged in with various procedural restrictions protecting the rights of both potential defendants and the witnesses who appeared before the panel.

It was true that most grand juries could roam at will even in the criminal area, look into virtually any area they chose, and did not have to disclose what charges they were investigating or who was the target of the inquiry. The Supreme Court wrote in 1906:

"We deem it entirely clear that under the practice in this country, at least, the examination of witnesses need not be preceded by a presentment or indictment formally drawn up, but that the grand jury may proceed, either upon their own knowledge or upon the examination of witnesses, to inquire for themselves whether a crime cognizable by the court has been committed; that the result of their investigations may be subsequently embodied in an indictment, and that in summoning witnesses it is quite sufficient to apprise them of the names of the parties with respect to whom they will be called to testify, without indicating the nature of the charge against them." Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 65 (1906) In other cases the Supreme Court held that a witness could not object to the materiality of any question (Nelson v. United States, 201 U.S. 92, 114 (1906).) nor challenge the constitutionality of the law that was supposedly violated, Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 279 (1919).

Some states insisted that the grand jury must have probable cause to believe that a crime had been committed before it could call or interrogate witnesses, and others strictly limited the juries' area of investigation to the boundaries set out by the presiding judge.

In almost all jurisdictions there were other safeguards. Throughout the nineteenth century, it was clear that hearsay or otherwise incompetent evidence could not be used as the basis for an indictment.

"In your investigations you will receive only legal evidence, to the exclusion of mere reports, suspicions and hearsay evidence. Subject to this qualification, you will receive all the evidence presented which may throw light upon the matter under consideration, whether it tend to establish the innocence or the guilt of the accused. And more: if, in the course of your inquiries, you have reason to believe that there is other evidence, not presented to you, within your reach, which would qualify or explain away the charge under investigation, it will be your duty to order such evidence to be produced. Formerly, it was held that an indictment might be found if evidence were produced sufficient to render the truth of the charge probable. But a different and a more just and merciful rule now prevails. To justify the finding of an indictment you must be convinced, so far as the evidence before you goes, that the accused is guilty in other words, you ought not to find an indictment unless, in your judgment, the evidence before, unexplained and uncontradicted, would warrant a conviction by a petit jury." Charge to Grand Jury, 30 Fed. Cas. 992, 993–994 (Case No. 18, 225) (C. C. Calif. 1872).

Secondly, the Supreme Court's decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547 (1892) established that witnesses appearing before grand juries had the widest transactional immunity protecting them from incriminating use of their testimony as to any transactions they were questioned about. Congress and many states followed the Counselman case by passing generous immunity statutes which have lasted until very recent years.

Thirdly, federal and many state grand juries eventually rejected the rule that only the prosecutor's case could be presented to them. Many panels would hear the potential defendant and his witnesses who might explain away damaging evidence and thus foreclose return of an indictment. The grand jury proceeding was thus "judicialized" and transferred into a preliminary trial in which the grand jury would weight conflicting evidence and possibly save the defendant from the trouble of a public trial.

Lastly, the grand jury thought of itself as independent of the prosecutor's office and very often behaved accordingly. Since the prosecutor was, in a number of cases, the very target of its investigations, the jurors were not likely to be dominated by the district attorney when he presented indictments for common crimes to them. Grand jury panels would often demand that other witnesses be brought before it or that investigations proceed in another direction. In a large percentage of cases they would not indict on the prosecutor's say-so. In some states, the prosecutor was not allowed into the grand jury room for any purpose, even to conduct the questioning. Even where it was permissible for the prosecutor to examine witnesses, as in the federal courts, the panels often resisted, and judges had to charge grand jurors that they must allow the prosecutor into their room. Thus a Tennessee federal judge told the grand jury in 1872:

"Emmons, Circuit Judge. Gentlemen of the Grand Jury: I am informed by the district attorney that some difference of opinion exists between you in reference to his right to be present and aid you in the examination of witnesses, and give you his advice as to the law. I cannot understand the source of such a doubt on the part of jurors long resident in Tennessee, where, alike in the federal and state court, the practice has been uniform for that officer to assist and advise the grand jury in its labors." In re District Attorney of United States, 7 Fed. Cas. 645 (Case No. 3925) (C. C. W. D. Tenn. 1872).

In March 1900 the foreman of a New York grand jury told the court: "We claim the right . . . to examine certain witnesses in our own way and without the presence of any members of the staff of the District Attorney." This difference of opinion on the prosecutor's function is a reflection of the skepticism of nineteenth century America toward authority in general, a skepticism that was the citizen's greatest protection against oppression by the government. It is hard to believe that many grand juries today would insist on pushing a prosecutor out of their room.

In the past fifty years many changes have taken place in the institution of the grand jury, changes which have greatly increased its potential for harm to the citizens.

First, the composition of grand juries changed dramatically. More and more states established "key-man" systems of selection under which the local sheriff, judge or some other official or jury commissioner would determine the list from which the members of the panel would be picked. They tended to be white collar workers, professionals, older or retired men who had a law and order orientation. In New York City during the 1930's and 1940's a screening committee of ex-grand jurors belonging to the local grand jury association would nominate candidates (who had to be over 35 years old and own at least $250 in property) who would be selected by a six-man board composed of four judges and two city officials—the mayor and the county clerk. An upper limit of 1,200 qualified grand jurymen were picked for the pool in New York County and many would serve again and again on panels.

This kind of inbreeding made the grand jury into a special interest group with its own outlook and orientation. The members formed clubs, published their own magazine, met socially throughout the year and exerted a powerful influence on state legislatures and local district attorneys. In the process the grand jury became far removed from a people's panel, no longer composed of the peers of potential defendants whom it might indict.

The change in composition occurred at the same time that the authority of the grand jury increased enormously. The extraordinary powers that the grand jury possessed as political superviser spilled over into its functions in the criminal process. The requirement that only competent legal evidence could be the basis for an indictment virtually disappeared, reaching its culmination in the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Costello, 350 U.S. 359 (1956). That decision held that hearsay evidence and only hearsay evidence could be the basis for an indictment. This meant that federal courts would no longer inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence behind the return of a true bill. Thus the grand jury became the final judge of what evidence it would hear and how much would be required for an indictment. So long as a grand jury was "legally constituted and unbiased" as the Supreme Court said, its indictments must be upheld in the courts.

The irony of this development is that the grand jury's powers increased while the grand jurors control of the institution itself was weakened and displaced on to the prosecutor.

In the typical case, the grand jury hears only the evidence presented by a prosecutor and then quickly endorses the indictment prepared by him. In a recent case in New York, a federal grand jury indicted 42 draft resisters in one day, and then indicted 60 more the next day in a three-hour period, an average of 3 minutes per indictment. United States v. Daneals, 370 F. Supp. 1289 (W.D. N.Y. 1974).

Prosecutors also feel free to tell the grand jury any story they wish—no matter how unsubstantiated or prejudicial—to get them to return an indictment. In one recent case in the Third Circuit, the following statements were made:

"During the grand jury proceedings, the prosecutor informed the grand jurors that they would not hear testimony from a key government informer because 'he would be putting himself in danger in coming to Philadelphia, because the proposed defendants in this case, if you see fit to indict, are connected with organized crime and could harm him.' Appellant claims this remark was inflammatory and prejudicial, and that the indictment returned by the grand jury was, therefore, infirm.

We view as improper prosecutor's comment connecting appellant with organized crime. However, we find the impropriety not to be of constitutional dimension nor serious enough to invalidate the indictment." United States v. Riccobene, 451 F. 2d 586, 587 (3d Cir. 1971).

In other cases, defendants are asked to appear before grand juries for the purpose of obtaining incriminating statements from them. In a case in the District of Columbia, a defendant spent two weeks in jail and then was taken before the grand jury where the prosecutor asked him immediately about certain admissions he had made when arrested. When he repeated his answers, he was then indicted. Three judges dissenting in an en banc hearing said about this appearance:

"No doubt it would be a boon to prosecutors if they could summon before a Grand Jury a person against whom an indictment is being sought and there interrogate him, isolated from the protection of counsel and presiding judge and insulated from the critical observation of the public. But there is a serious question whether our jurisprudence, fortified by constitutional declaration, permits that procedure.

Mere interrogation before a grand jury may harm the accused as much as mere interrogation at a trial. Even if he makes 'no direct incriminating statement, there is no way to know whether in fact his appearance was incriminating in the minds of some or all the members of the Grand Jury. United States v. Digrazia, 213 F.Supp. 232, 243 (N.D.Ill. 1963). His having been brought there may arouse suspicion. His manner and voice may arouse suspicion. Because grand jury investigations are secret, as we said in Powell he is 'insulated from the protection of counsel and presiding judge and insulated from the critical observation of the public.' Though he may be unqualified, as Short was, to decide for himself what questions to answer, he must decide at his peril. If he answers incriminating questions he may make it certain, as Short did, that he will be indicted. And testimony before the grand jury may be used, though Short's was not, to impeach his testimony at trial. If he refuses to answer questions that are not incriminating, he may be guilty of contempt." Jones v. United States, 342 F. 2d 863, 867–63 (D.C. Cir. 1964).

Thus under the cloak of secrecy, which was supposedly an important check upon prosecutorial pressure, district attorneys found they could more easily intimidate a defendant or sway a grand jury into returning a true bill. They prepare the indictments themselves, present cases in less than an hour, make prejudical remarks with no challenge possible by the injured parties. A federal district judge in California openly admitted that the "principle of secrecy was developed to protect the King's counsel and to permit the Prosecutors to have influence with the grand jury, and in modern times it is still useful for the same purpose." United States v. Smyth, 104 F. Supp. 283, 289 (N.D. Cal. 1952).

Grand juries have become more pliant in this century for a variety of reasons. The penal code has become more complicated, the legal rules on evidence more difficult and panels do not have access to experts who could afford them some independence from the prosecutor. The distrust of governmental authority that existed through much of the nineteenth century has largely disappeared. Instead of an institution which was representative of the local community, skeptical of, and antagonistic to authority, restricted in its powers, and concerned about the rights of the people, we now have a narrowly based panel, dominated by the prosecutor with the widest possible power to jeopardize the personal liberties of all citizens.

It was inevitable that an institution with such great prestige, which operated in secrecy and had such enormous power would be used for illegitimate political purposes. In the days of cold war hysteria beginning in 1947 many suspected Communists were brought before investigating grand juries on short notice, deceived as to the purpose of the panel's inquiry, asked incriminating questions and then subjected to summary contempt sentences for refusing to answer. In New York, a grand jury subpoenaed certain union officials who had signed the non-Communist oath required by the Taft-Hartley Act. When they refused to testify about their Communist affiliations the grand jury issued a presentment accusing them of falsely filing the affidavits. See In re U.E., 111 F. Supp. 585 (S.D. N.Y. 1959).

In a case that outraged Judge Learned Hand, the wife of William Remington, a former New Deal official who was accused of perjury for denying any Communist affiliation, was brought before a grand jury, questioned for many hours until she was tired and hungry, deceived as to the scope of her privilege not to answer, and then browbeaten into giving statements incriminating her husband. Judge Hand described the situation:

"I agree that, when faced with a patently unwilling witness, the grand jury was free to press her cross-examination hard and sharp; truth is more important than the sensibilities of the witness. Moreover, people will always differ as to the point where legitimate pressure end and improper coercion begins. I can only say that for myself the examination went beyond what I deem permissible. Pages on pages of lecturing repeatedly preceded a question; statements of what the prosecution already knew, and of how idle it was for the witness to hold back what she could contribute; occasional reminders that she could be punished for perjury; all were scattered throughout. Still she withstood the examiners, until being much tried and worn, she said: 'I am getting fuzzy. I haven't eaten since a long time ago and I don't think I am going to be very coherent from now on. I would like to postpone the hearings. * * * I want to consult my lawyers and see how deep I am getting in.' This was denied, and the questioning kept on until she finally refused to answer, excusing herself because she was 'tired,' and 'would like to get something to eat. * * * Is this the third degree, waiting until I get hungry, now?' Still the examiners persisted, disregarding this further protest: 'I would like to get something to eat. But couldn't we continue another day? Or do I have to come back?' Thereupon there took place what I quote in the margin, and what proved to be the coup de grace, after which she made a full disclosure of what she knew: a very large part of it what Remington had told her during their marriage and before they separated in January 1947." United States v. Remington, 208 F.2d 567, 571–72 (2d Cir. 1953) (L. Hand, dissenting)

Hand considered this action illegal:

"Even though the testimony so extracted had not so largely consisted of privileged communications, I should have hesitated a long time before I let an indictment stand that depended upon it. Especially important is the fact that the examination was ex parte and without the presence and control of a judge or any other impartial official, to pass upon objections made by an opposite party, or intervene ex proprio motu to protect the witness. The privilege against self-incrimination itself arose because of the abuses of the 'ex officio examination' in the 17th century in the Star Chamber and the Ecclesiastical Commission, where there was no judge, and which was in camera after the model of the Holy Office itself. Save for torture, it would be hard to find a more effective tool of tyranny than the power of unlimited and unchecked ex parte examination." Ibid. 571–73.

In the years since the McCarthy days, there has been an even further deterioration in the protection of personal rights before the grand jury.

(1) Paradoxically legal advances in other areas opened up the opportunity for the grand jury to be used as an anti-libertarian device. In the period since 1950 many restraints were imposed on Congressional committee investigations which had tried to question politically unpopular figures or gather intelligence on their operations. The Supreme Court's decisions in United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41 (1953), Deutch v. United States, 367 U.S. 456 (1961) and Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749 (1962) severely restricted the efforts of the House Un-American Activities Committee and the Senate Internal Security Committee to bring witnesses before them to obtain information or incriminating statements from them. There were some who saw the chance for the grand jury to inherit that function.

(2) In the years since 1950, many agencies of government have increased their surveillance not only of radicals and politically-unpopular figures but even of leading members of the opposition party and many ordinary citizens. At the same time certain law enforcement agencies trying to obtain other information saw the need for a legal institution that could subpoena documents and compel testimony of unwilling witnesses and, better still, obtain them in secret. The grand jury served that purpose precisely. See Levinson v. Attorney General of United States, 321 F.Supp. 984 (E.D. Ia. 1970) for an example.

(3) It may also serve another function. Through the greatly-expanded use of informers, wiretaps, and electronic bugging devices, law enforcement agencies of the government could gather extensive information on the movements and actions of many of its opponents. Armed with this information, there is a great danger that they could use the grand jury not to discover what they did not know or confirm what they already knew, but to trap witnesses into making incriminating statements or to lay the basis for perjury charges or contempt citations. In their article in the Nation on this problem Frank Donner and Eugene Cerruti have suggested that this is one of the purposes of Guy Goodwin's grand juries. The institution then becomes a truly inquisitorial body with no other function than the Star Chamber had in the sixteenth century—to trap witnesses into incriminating themselves.

(4) The interchange of information between a grand jury and other government investigators or between two separate grand juries increased enormously, aided by the great technological advances in information gathering and storing. There are many cases in which a grand jury investigation may be initiated in the tax or antitrust fields supposedly in order to obtain indictments, but the information obtained by the government is then used in civil actions against the parties. A question has been raised with respect to the government's good faith in these investigations. See United States v. Pennsalt Chemicals Corp. 260 F. Supp 171 (E.D. Penn. 1966). In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, 239 F.2d 267 (7th Cir. 1956), People v. Di Napoli, 27 N.Y. 2d 229 (1970).

(5) In recent years, there has been a significant erosion of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination. The Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 marked the most serious effort to restrict the scope of witness immunity in many hears. Instead of granting wide transactional immunity to witnesses before grand juries, which has been the rule since the Counselman case, the federal government has utilized limited use immunity, providing merely for no incriminating use of the particular testimony given.

PRESENT ABUSES

Over the past years a number of specific abuses in grand jury proceedings have been identified. Some of these abuses are the subject matter of the bills now before this Committee. Some abuses are dealt with by all the pending bills, others by some bills and not by others, and some abuses are not covered at all. I propose in my testimony to outline all of the abuses that concern us and to discuss how they are dealt with by the pending legislation.

I would like to say a preliminary word about the proposal to eliminate the grand jury altogether.

We do not believe that the grand jury should be abolished by constitutional amendment. Once we begin tinkering with the Bill of Rights by rewriting it, we are concerned that other rights will also be changed or watered down in the process. We have done well with the specific wording of the first ten amendments for the past 186 years and we should be reluctant to start a process of change.

Secondly the grand jury can be reformed to serve its historical purposes. In the 1690's Lord Chief Justice Somers called it "the security of Englishmen's lives,"—a buffer between the king's ministers and the citizens. New safeguards are needed as well as a revitalizing of the layman's role in grand jury proceedings. We need more citizen participation in the criminal justice system and more decision-making authority by those serving. Thus abolition is not necessary.

Finally all the alternatives to a grand jury system are not necessarily desirable. It is true that preliminary hearings have many protections which the current grand jury procedure lacks. But if the grand jury is abolished, the alternative to its investigating function is the grant of subpoena power to the prosecutor,—a feature of some jurisdictions which do not regularly use the grand jury. This would be a very undesirable development.

Thus our recommendation would be to deal with the abuses directly instead of abolishing the entire institution.

The abuses which have been identified fall into four separate categories which I will discuss in turn.

A. Rights of Witnesses

1. Transactional vs. use immunity.—We endorse the proposals in both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 to return to transactional immunity and abolish use immunity in the federal system. The potential abuses in the current system has been outlined by numerous witnesses. In an accusitorial system of justice, there is something instinctively wrong in requiring witness A to testify about the crimes of witness B and then requiring witness B to incriminate witness A. The prosecutor and the police need only produce the names of witnesses vaguely connected with the commission of crime and through the "ping-pong" use of the current immunity law, he can steam-roll over the Fifth Amendment rights of the witnesses he calls.

Secondly it is almost impossible to determine whether later prosecution of a witness who is given use immunity was tainted by evidence secured as a result of the immunity grant. Prosecutors are required to show that "no testimony or other information compelled under the order [granting immunity] (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information) may be used against the witness in any criminal case. . ." 18 U.S.C. § 6002. But it is difficult if not impossible to trace all the steps by which a prosecutor obtains his evidence.

Finally the grant of use immunity and its effect may not be understood by the grand jury itself. In a recent case in the Second Circuit, United States v. Hinton, 543 F. 2d 1002 (2nd Cir. 1976), a witness was granted use immunity and then testified concerning her involvement in the crime under investigation. Other evidence was later introduced concerning the crime. The grand jury which heard the immunized testimony indicted the witness. It was instructed to disregard the immunized testimony and weigh only the later evidence introduced by the prosecutor. But lay jurors find it very difficult to play this kind of mental gymnastics which the Supreme Court has condemned in other contexts.

See Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964); Bruton v. United States 391 U.S. 123 (1968). The Second Circuit reversed the conviction in this case noting,

"We believe that as a matter of fundamental fairness, a Government practice of using the same grand jury that heard the immunized testimony of a witness to indict him after he testifies, charging him with criminal participation in the matter being studied by the grand jury, cannot be countenanced." 543 F. 2d at 1010.

Clearly ths kind of abuse in grand jury procedure should be eliminated. This situation could not arise if transactional immunity were the rule since the witness could never be prosecuted concerning the transaction involved.

I might add that many states, including New York, have full, automatic transactional immunity for all witnesses appearing before the grand jury. The prosecutors in those states have had no difficulty investigating crime and convicting those responsible.

2. Consensual Immunity.—We endorse the proposal found in H.R. 3736 (but not in H.R. 94) that a person may not be granted even transactional immunity against his will. In this instance we believe in strict construction of the constitution right at stake. The Fifth Amendment says that "no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." These words should mean what they say, namely that no person should be required against his will to testify about his own criminal acts. We are reminded by Leonard Levy in his brilliant book on Origins of the Fifth Amendment how long and difficult was the fight to gain the right against self-incrimination. John Lilbourne and his compatriots suffered torture and imprisonment to establish this most important right. But recently it has been narrowly interpreted to encompass only the right to be free from criminal prosecution as a result of giving testimony.

Recently lawyers called as witnesses before grand juries have been granted immunity in the criminal investigation but their immunized testimony can be used as the basis to disbar them by bar grievance committees. See In re Daley, 549 F. 2d 469 (7th Cir. 1977). A witness who is immunized but loses his job or his professional license or his respect in his community is not getting the rights which the Fifth Amendment promises him. The decision to exchange testimony for immunity should be his and not the government's.

From a law enforcement point of view, forcing immunity on a witness is seldom desirable. When he introduced H.R. 3637 Rep. Conyers quoted Peter Richards, an experienced federal and New Jersey prosecutor, about forced immunity:

"We don't like to do it because we have found that it normally does not work. The situation where a witness refuses to cooperate in the first place, then comes into the grand jury and changes his mind and cooperates and tells you the truth and gives you something valuable is extremely, very, very, very rare. I don't think I've ever seen it happen, as a mater of fact." 123 Cong. Rec. E 859 (daily ed Feb. 22, 1977)

We also agree that immunity should not be granted unless a majority of the grand jury votes to do so. If we believe in the independence of the grand jury and the need for citizen participation in the criminal justice system, we should act according to our beliefs.

3. Judicial Control of Immunity.—If consensual immunity is not adopted, at a minimum we would endorse Representative Ellberg's proposal that the grant of immunity be subject to judicial control. Thus instead of the prosecutor deciding whether immunity should be granted, the judge should do so taking into account the following factors:

(1) does the witness face the danger of foreign prosecution because of his testimony

(2) the relevance of the testimony

(3) the legitimacy of the investigation by the grand jury

(4) the need for the testimony at issue.

4. Warnings to Witnesses.—The Supreme Court held in United States v. Mandujano 425 U.S. 564 (1796) that full Miranda warnings were not necessary for witnesses before a grand jury. And in United States v. Wong 45 U.S.L.W. 4464 (May 23, 1977) and United States v. Washington 45 U.S.L.W. 4465 (May 23, 1977) it held that no warnings of any kind were constitutionally necessary. These decisions permit, indeed require, that Congress pass new laws specifying that witnesses be told of their rights and warned of the dangers concerning their testimony.

Last year Congress amended Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to require that persons pleading guilty to a crime be told of the rights they are surrendering. There was some initial objection to this proposal until it was pointed out that the warnings would take about 60 seconds of time, hardly a significant drain of time.

Similarly, telling grand jury witnesses of their right to remain silent, and their right to counsel, letting them know of the scope of the grand jury's inquiry and warning them of the fact that they may be under investigation and their testimony can be used against them involves little time or effort and can protect against some of the abuses described previously.

We therefore endorse the proposals in H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 requiring such warnings.

I would add one other warning to the list. In a recent case in the Sixth Circuit, United States v. Doss, 545 F. 2d 548 (6th Cir. 1976), a witness had already been secretly indicted for certain crime. He was called before the grand jury and asked questions related to those charges without knowing he was already indicted. When he denied involvement in the crimes, he was indicted for perjury. The Sixth Circuit reversed that conviction. Certainly a witness deserves to know that he has already been indicted for the crime that he is being questioned about.

5. Subpoenas to Witnesses.—This committee has already been told about the many abuses connected with the service of grand jury subpoenas. Witnesses have often been served with subpoenas early in the morning requiring their appearance before a grand jury within two hours. This happened in the Ellsberg investigation in Los Angeles, in the Susan Saxe investigation in New Haven and in many other instances. Other witnesses have had to travel great distance to appear before a grand jury on little notice, as in the Fort Worth Five case. In a recent case in New York City a corporation and its president were ordered to produce certain documents "forthwith," that is, immediately in response to a grand jury subpoena with no opportunity to consult with a lawyer, In re Nwanu, 421 F. Supp. 1361 (S.D.N.Y. 1976). The FBI agent who served the subpoena told an employee that he had to hand over the records to him on the spot or he would be held in contempt. A federal district court set aside additional subpoenas after some material had already been handed over. There have been other instances when FBI agents have served subpoenas which may not even have been authorized by the prosecutor involved.

H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 justly require one week's notice before a witness must testify or produce documents. He may move to quash in the interim before the district court for the district in which he resides or was served. If the witnesses appearance at a grand jury proceeding would create a substantial and unnecessary hardship because of the distance or financial or other burden, the subpoena may be quashed. The subpoena may also be quashed if the grand jury is inquiring into the same events that another grand jury has already investigated and no additional, newly discovered evidence has been produced.

The subpoena must also describe the rights of the witness, the scope of the investigation, whether the witness is himself under investigation and the criminal statutes involved.

We applaud and endorse all these proposals.

We also endorse the idea in H.R. 3637 that a majority of the grand jury must affirmatively vote to issue a subpoena. There have been instances in which grand jury subpoenas have been issued to persuade or force witnesses to testify after they refused to speak to FBI agents. The grand jury subpoenas became in effect, FBI subpoenas despite the fact that Congress has consistently refused to grant such power to that agency. They occurred in the New Haven and Kentucky investigations into the radical feminists groups. A federal district court recently quashed a grand jury subpoena because he found it has a pretext to require disclosure to the FBI. See In re Stolar, 397 F. Supp. 520 (S.D.N.Y. 1975).

We believe that the prosecutor should be required to sign all subpoenas and to show that a legitimate, criminal investigation is underway and that the testimony or material sought is required for the investigation. The Third Circuit established such criteria in the Schoefield case (486 F. 2d 85 (3d Cir. 1973)) and 507 F. 2d 963 (3d Cir. 1977) and the Schoefield criteria should be enacted into law for the entire federal system.

7. Counsel.—We also endorse the proposal that counsel be permitted to accompany a witness into the grand jury room. The ABA has endorsed this proposal, eight states have laws permitting counsel in the grand jury room and others are considering it, and many prosecutors such as John Van de Kamp—the Los Angeles District Attorney—think it is a good idea. I have alluded to previous examples of prosecutorial over-reaching in the grand jury room such as in the Remington and Jones cases. The presence of counsel would prevent such occurrences. Furthermore, since witnesses now consult often with their counsel outside the grand jury room, it might very well facilitate grand jury proceedings by cutting down on the time-convening trips inside and out.

A special report of three committees of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York endorsed this idea three years ago. The report noted:

It must be recognized that the grand jury inquiry is a critical stage in a criminal proceeding, since an indictment often results in a loss of reputation and employment, regardless of the ultimate outcome at trial.

Almost any grand jury witness is at a distinct disadvantage because, he is questioned by the prosecutor himself, who is free to cross-examine the witness in whatever manner he chooses and who may be more interested in obtaining impeachment testimony and perhaps a separate perjury indictment as a result of the testimony, than in obtaining information. Clearly, a lawyer could effectively assist a client who elects to testify in lessening the risk of such a result by suggesting a more considered response, or no response at all. Also, his mere presence would render the witness more relaxed and the prosecutor less intimidating. And his presence would eliminate delays occasioned by the necessity for the witness to leave the grand jury room repeatedly to consult counsel. 29 The Record 464, 471 (May/June, 1974)

However, we do not believe that the limitations on counsel contained in H.R. 94 are neccessary. The idea that counsel will disrupt the proceedings and make a shambles of grand jury operations is a myth. I was co-author of a study on courtroom disruption prepared by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, called Disorder in the Court. We found that courtroom disruption was practically non-existent, and that lawyers were rarely responsible for what minor disorder did occur. If the lawyers do misbehave, there are ample professional sanctions to deal with them. The answer to misconduct is appropriate punishment not the denial of the Sixth amendment rights of a witness.

Lawyers appear before Congressional committees and administrative agencies and do not disrupt proceedings. We recommend that lawyer presence be permitted in the grand jury room and the extent of their involvement be established by local district rules.

The need for counsel in the grand jury room has been underscored by a recent case in the Seventh Circuit, United States v. Kopel, 21 Cr. L. 2141 (April 19, 1977). In that case the Court of Appeals held that the prosecutor could introduce into evidence grand jury transcripts that showed that a witness went outside to consult his lawyer. This evidence was relevant to show that later perjury by the witness was knowing and deliberate. If the movement of a witness outside the grand jury room to consult his lawyer can be used against him, it is all the more important that counsel be at his side.

8. Civil Contempt.—The outrages connected with use of the civil contempt power have been amply documented. There have been cases where a person has been subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury within two hours. Once he arrives he is asked certain questions which he refuses to answer on Fifth Amendment grounds. He is granted use immunity and asked the questions again. If he refuses again, he is brought before a judge and with fifteen minutes notice, held in a civil contempt. See In re Grand Jury Investigation (Bruno) 545 F. 2d 385 (3d Cir. 1976). If held in civil contempt, the witness may be refused bail on appeal. He may stay in jail for the life of the grand jury, up to 18 months (see The New York Times, March 2, 1973, p. 39) and may be brought back before the grand jury to be asked the same questions again, facing the same penalty.

Because the proceedings are "civil" rather than "criminal" the defendant loses many of his due process rights. He may not get the notice required for a criminal charge, the standard of proof may be different, his right to counsel is not certain, he is not entitled to a jury but he is subject to a much stiffer sentence than a criminal contempt charge would bring.

Some courts have already begun the process of requiring that civil and criminal contempt be treated the same way. See United States v. Alter, 482 F.2d 1016 (9th Cir. 1973) In re Sadin, 509 F. 2d 1252 (2nd Cir. 1975) and In re Grand Jury Investigation (Hartzell) 542 F. 2d 166 (3d Cir. 1976). But the process must be completed by legislation. We believe that adequate notice must be given—at least 10 days. A majority of the grand jury must approve the citation. A maximum of six months should be imposed. Bail should be allowed unless "patiently frivolous" and no reiterative contempt should be allowed.

9. Protection of First Amendment rights.—Neither of the bills presently before this committee focus on the specific protection of First Amendment rights. Of course to the extent that the grand jury must vote on subpoenas and the grant of immunity and that the prosecutor must show that a legitimate criminal investigation is underway in accordance with the Schofield criteria, there may be protection against the violation of First Amendment rights. But we believe that more specific provisions are necessary.

We know that, in the past, grand jury witnesses were often asked questions about the exercise of their First Amendment rights. Witnesses before the Boston grand jury investigating the Pentagon Papers in 1971 were asked questions about the books and magazine they read and about their opinions on who possessed the Pentagon Papers. The Tucson grand jury in 1970 asked witnesses about everyone who visited a certain house in a two year period and about all conversations with those people. Other witnesses were asked about all their travels in the United States and about all their meetings with any individuals associated with SDS. Other witnesses before grand juries in New Haven and Kentucky were asked specific questions about the people they associated with in radical feminist groups. The Donner and Cerruti articles in the Nation in January 1972 and November 1973 outline many of these abuses.

These questions are clearly improper invasions into protected First Amendment activities. Grand juries should not be permitted to ask questions about protected First Amendment areas, such as the political affiliations of witnesses, what demonstrations they attended and what political activities their friends are engaged in. Even if there is some colorable connection between such questions and certain criminal activity, the government must show a compelling reason for any inquiry it is making. And it must be made to show that the need for such information far outweighs the chilling effect of this encroachment on First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court laid down such requirements in restricting legislative investigations. In Gibson v. Florida Legislative Committee, 372 U.S. 539, 570 (1963) the Court said "an adequate foundation for inquiry must be laid before proceeding in such a manner as will substantially intrude upon and severely curtail or inhibit constitutionally protected activities or seriously interfere with similarly protected associational rights."

Furthermore any witness who is selected to appear before a grand jury because of exercise of his First Amendment rights needs protection. Such a connection should provide a strong presumption of impropriety. There is a strong suspicion that many witnesses called before the New Haven and Lexington grand juries were called because of their radical feminist political associations and with a view to inhibiting the exercise of their First Amendment rights. This may also have occurred in the recent investigation into the Puerto Rican Socialist Party. Adequate protections should be written into law against asking questions relating to the exercise of First Amendment rights and against subpoenaing witnesses because of their political associations.

10. Other rights of witnesses.—There are other important rights for witnesses contained in the bills before this committee which we endorse. We certainly approve of the provision prohibiting questioning of a witness based on illegal wiretaps. We also approve of the proposal in H.R. 94 and H.R. 3637 permitting a witness to examine and keep a transcript of his remarks before the grand jury and allowing him to appear before the grand jury again to explain his testimony. We also endorse the idea that a witness should have access to any previous statements made to the government before he testifies before the grand jury.

We also endorse the proposal not to bring before the grand jury any witness who notifies the prosecutor that he intends to invoke his Fifth Amendment rights.

B. Rights of Defendants

1. Need for competent and admissible evidence.—The Supreme Court's decision in Calandra underscores the need to revise the existing rules on the quality of evidence submitted to the grand jury. The idea that illegally seized evidence or privileged information or even hearsay should serve as the basis for an indictment is inconsistent with the dictates of the due process clause and is counter to the fair and efficient administration of the criminal justice system. If only incompetent or inadmissible evidence is available to the prosecutor, then the case should not go to trial since good evidence would have to be introduced then. If the prosecutor has competent and admissible evidence but presents only hearsay or illegal evidence to the grand jury in order to prevent discovery by the defendant in his case, such tactics should not be permitted. Judge Jack Weinstein condemned this practice, calling it "pernicious" in United States v. Arcuri, 282 F.Supp. 347 (ED. N.Y. 1968) aff'd 405 F.2d 691 (2d Cir. 1968).

Either way there is no excuse for permitting indictments only on the basis of evidence not admissible at the trial. H.R. 3637 contains a requirement for competent and admissible evidence (§ 3330A(a)). This provision is not an innovation in the law. It is borrowed almost verbatim from the New York Criminal Procedure Law, § 190.65. New York has had such a requirement for many years. It permits the weeding out of bad cases at an early stage of the proceedings and saves time for courts, prosecutors and defendants who would otherwise proceed to trial. See People v. Jacob, 55 App. Div. 2d 961 (2d Dept. 1977).

2. Recording Minutes and Making them Available to Defendants.—Another important protection needed is a requirement that all grand jury testimony be recorded and that all grand jury minutes be made available to a defendant after an indictment is returned. California has such a provision (Cal. Pen. Code, Sec. 938 and 938.1) and New York provides for it in certain situations. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law, § 210.30. Prosecutors working under it have endorsed this approach. See testimony of John Van de Kamp before Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, September 28, 1976.

Full disclosure of the prosecutors case is not only desirable for due process purposes but it encourages guilty pleas and may thus further the efficient administration of the criminal justice system.

Obviously the prosecutor must also disclose exculpatory material to the grand jury as well as to the defendant in accordance with Brady v. Maryland.

3. Opportunity to Appear before Grand Jury.—New York has another provision which this committee should consider. Under New York Criminal Procedure Law 190.50(5)(a) a person has a "right to appear before such grand jury [considering criminal charges against him] as a witness in his own behalf, if prior to . . . indictment . . . he serves upon the district attorney . . . a written notice making such request . . ." Often a potential defendant can persuade the grand jury to dismiss or indict on a lesser offence. New York has operated well with this provision and it should be considered by this committee.

4. Prohibition on resubmission.—New York also prohibits the resubmission of evidence to a new grand jury after the refusal of another grand jury to indict without the permission of the court. N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 190.75(3). Both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 contain similar provisions and we endorse this idea.

5. Preliminary examination.—We also approve of the proposal that a preliminary hearing be held even if a grand jury indictment has been returned. An independent judicial inquiry into reasonable cause to hold a person for trial is desirable. And the rush of prosecutors to indict in order to avoid a preliminary examination should not be allowed.

6. Prohibition on securing further evidence.—It is black letter law that a grand jury cannot be used to secure further evidence after an indictment has been returned. Yet many cases arise in which accusations are made of improper use of the grand jury for that purpose. T[illegible] specific prohibition against such misuse would therefore be desirable.

C. Grand Jury Structure and Procedure

1. Rights and Powers of Grand Jury Members.—Other provisions of the pending bills deal with the basic structure of the grand jury itself and the rights and powers of grand jury members.

The idea that grand jury members should be informed of their duties, rights, authority and powers is so obvious and necessary that no objection can be raised to it. We also endorse the proposal that grand jury members actually vote on the activities carried out in their name. The grand jury should affirmatively vote to subpoena witnesses and documents, to grant immunity to a witness or hold him in contempt. These are powers which the grand jury used to exercise. We should not carry forward the myth that a subpeona eminates from a grand jury if its members have had notthing to do with it.

2. Independent Grand Jury Inquiry.—One provision of H.R. 94 does give us pause. Section 3330 allows each federal grand jury to request a special attorney to act in lieu of a federal prosecutor to conduct investigtions of and indict persons violating federal law. The possibility of runaway grand juries indicting persons in the community whose views it disapproved of is a real danger. In the 1950's alleged Communists were the target of such juries and in the 1960's southern grand juries indicated civil rights workers appearing before them, who were victims of the official abuse of power. We think a better proposal is found in H.R. 3736 which permits a special attorney to be appointed for violations of law by government officials only.

This committee should also consider the appointment of a special counsel to the grand jury to obtain legal advice, even if he could not conduct investigations or indict. I recall one instance of a grand jury chairperson complaining to me about the legal advice a U.S. attorney had given her grand jury about the degree of evidence necessary to indict. She had no place to turn to get advice on the matter and her grand jury indicted over her objection. Since the prosecutor is an advocate for a cause, his ability to render impartial legal advice may be compromised.

In New York, many indictments have been overturned because erroneous or incomplete legal advice has given to the grand jury. See People v. Ferrara, 82 Misc. 2d 270 (1976); People v. Kinnicut, 83 Misc. 2d 229 (1975); People v. Lawson, 84 Misc. 2d 24 (175). With an independent legal adviser, such problems would not arise.

3. Secrecy provisions.—We also endorse the imposition of criminal penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy. Once again New York State has such a provision, Penal Law § 215.70 although it is seldom enforced. Obviously provision must be made for the appointment of a special prosecutor to enforce this prohibition since prosecutors are often the worst offenders as a recent New York State investigation report has indicated.

This Committee and the sponsors of the bills in question must be commended for their difficult and skillful work in trying to deal with the abuses which have tainted the work of this important institution.

Mr. FRIEDMAN. My testimony is for the record, and I would like to take 5 minutes to summarize a few points which some of you have already raised.

I think if we start all over again we would not establish the grand jury system, if you think a little bit about it. There are all kinds of historical pressures that have occurred here, but the idea that a witness can be called in before a secret group, asked questions without warnings, not told whether he is the target of that investigation, have no one at his side to help him, and be able to be thrown in jail in 15 minutes' notice if he didn't answer the questions in the proper way, all of that does not lend itself to the kind of criminal justice system that we think should be set up. It is just that we have this very long historical tradition that a grand jury is a good thing.

It can be traced to the Earl of Shaftsbury case—in fact, the Whigs who defended the Earl of Shaftsbury immediately came and took over control of the English Government after 1688. The grand jury was such a useful device in Revolutionary War days, the grand jury was a wonderful device for attacking municipal corruption the 19th century, and fighting prosecutors like Tom Dewey, that took them over and used an independent grand jury as a steppingstone for national office, all of that comes to us and comes to people who went to law school and working lawyers and was a tremendous historical warrant for the fact that it is a wonderful institution.

It is only recently that we have come to take a second look at this institution without this wonderful historical pedigree that we all bring it it.

I am shocked at occasionally reading a case in which some particular abuse of grand jury procedure has been outlined, and the judge says, "We all know a grand jury is the protection of the Englishmen's lives. It is the security of American citizens." Then you allow this abuse because of this stamp that it has with respect to the wonderful things that it did over the last 300 years.

If we thought about prosecutors having these powers without a grand jury being present, no one would allow it for a minute. But the fact of the matter is that the grand jurors do not, in effect, serve as a restriction on prosecutor power for the most part. It is very rare that they will stand up to the prosecutor and say, "Hey, I don't like the way you asked that question. It is an improper question. Give the witness a chance to respond." Or, "Shouldn't we tell the witness what it is we are looking for and that he is a target of our investigation?"

Grand juries do not do that, and as a result of it we have got to the point where many diverse groups have come before this committee and certainly applaud what this committee is trying to do with respect to the grand jury operation.

I think the first thing to do is to try to look at the institution without the historic justifications that have often been given to it.

Second, I think we should take a look at what the States have done in terms of grand jury reform. I think three-quarters of the reform proposals in the bills, in H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736, have models in the States, as Mr. Landau indicates, in California where they permit the transcript to be made public immediately after the indictment.

There are eight States that allow counsel in the grand jury room right now, and those States have been able to function with their grand juries without too much difficulty.

New York, where I practice, have four or five reform proposals. There is complete transactional immunity for all witnesses that appear before the grand jury. Only legally competent and legally admissible evidence may serve as a basis for grand jury indictment. You cannot resubmit to a grand jury after it has refused to return an indictment without the permission of a judge.

A defendant has an opportunity to appear at his own request. He has an absolute right to appear if he wants to, to give his side of the story, and New York grand juries have functioned for years under these kinds of protections.

Prosecutors get indictments, the grand jury system does not collapse as a result of these kind of reforms, and I am just surprised when I see Judge Lacey and the Justice Department officials coming up before this committee last year and saying, "Well, this grand jury can't function with all these kinds of restrictions on them in terms of the contempt procedures."

There is written into rule 42(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure all kinds of protections for criminal contempt, and it is possible to function under those proposals without any difficulty, and there seems to be no reason not to lend the basic due process rights that apply to a criminal contempt citation for a civil contempt citation. Call it "civil," but it doesn't mean that all the due process protection should not apply.

I think it is most important to try and do something about witness protection in the light of the recent Supreme Court cases.

In United States against Jacobs, which is a 2nd circuit decision in which the 2nd circuit tried to lend some witness protection to witnesses appearing before a Federal grand jury in its supervisory control over the administration of criminal justice, and there the Supreme Court has said that there is no constitutional protections, practically, for witnesses in terms of warnings, that they have to be given.

Therefore, it really is incumbent upon Congress in amending the Federal rules and on passing this kind of legislation to at least set up some basic protections for witnesses.

I would just say to look to the States to see the kind of protection that they have been trying to give to witnesses in different areas.

Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Professor Friedman, you have given a particularly lucid statement. I wish we had more time to listen to you, because we could learn a lot by doing so.

Your statement is part of the record, and I have just a few questions.

As you know, one of the issues we are considering is the proposed change to rule 6(e) to allow administrative agencies to assist Government attorneys in the grand jury record. You have already testified in opposition to this change before the criminal justice subcommittee.

Could you summarize now your objections?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. Very briefly, if a criminal tax investigation is undertaken and the IRS agents are allowed in the regular course of the investigation to check into ground jury testimony and to find out what was said and help the U.S. attorney in the preparation of the case before the grand jury, it seems almost impossible to imagine that won't be used in the course of a civil tax investigation, as well.

The IRS and the Justice Department pursuing a civil tax investigation simply should not be able to use the grand jury as a device to do so. This applies in SEC investigations, as well. There may be a securities fraud investigation, some of the SEC may be loaned over to the Justice Department to check on that. Will that serve as a basis for an SEC civil action?

It could happen in any number of other areas.

In an antitrust investigation, where a criminal investigation may occur, and will that testimony, with the enormous power of the grand jury to unearth it be able to be used in a civil proceeding, as well, when normally all you have is the civil discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure?

If there is a proper showing, proper safeguards in an individual case, that is okay. But it really should be done on an individual basis rather than carte blanche power being given to the specialized agents to come over and participate in a criminal investigation, and then to use their knowledge as a basis for civil investigations, as well.

Mr. EILBERG. Arguments made against grand jury reform in general state that abuses are a result of improper use of the system and not the system itself.

For example, last year former Attorney General Levy stood here and said that grand jury problems can be minimized by selection of honest, qualified prosecutors, and there are no legislative reforms that could provide adequate protections of abuse of government attorneys that are in power.

Would you comment on this.

Mr. FRIEDMAN. We all want top-flight U.S. attorneys, and we want good men and women in those positions, but it seems to me that the whole theory of the Bill of Rights and all of the protections of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is that we want institutional safeguards as well, and when these problems keep recurring again and again. I heard Jonathan Goldstein speak at a bar association meeting in New York, and he has done preeminent work in uncovering corruption in New Jersey, and he was describing to us how he starts a grand jury investigation. He said:

> I have a hunch. I just have a feeling in my bones that there is something wrong in this area. So I go and subpena the bank records. I want to be sure that the persons whose records we are subpenaing dont' know about it, because the minute he knows about it, something is going to happen. So I investigate the bank records and then I get to somebody else and I grant some immunity.

And it was quite a debate in the bar association meeting, because we were working lawyers and were shocked with the idea that here is a good prosecutor, and he is certainly very capable, but he thought nothing at all about this very secret use of the grand jury subpenaing all kinds of bank records without anybody knowing about it, and not giving the person a chance to complain about it, getting all this information, which he probably shouldn't have, and his answer is, "I won't use information I shouldn't have."

It seems to me this is an awfully sad situation when we can't rely on the well-meaning prosecutors. We need some kind of institutional safeguards, as well.

Mr. EILBERG. Finally, at this time, you seem to oppose restricting the role of counsel in the grand jury room. We did this to avoid making the grand jury an adversarial proceeding and to resolve the problem of frivolous prosecution, we mandate a prompt preliminary hearing. If all proceedings are to be recorded, how can restricting the role of counsel tied to a prompt hearing be sufficient?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. I don't oppose your general proposal. I am all for counsel in the grand jury room. My concern was, you shouldn't tie the hands of counsel in the grand jury room. I think the idea that he should only advise the witness and only whisper in the witness' ear—I thought that was somewhat restrictive. I would like to comment on that.

I was co-author of a study that the city bar association had done on disorder in the court in which the problem of courtroom disruption came about, and everybody was worried about lawyers getting to court and using it for political speechmaking. The city bar association, with a grant from the Ford Foundation, did a 2-year study on this, and we found there was very little disruption, and whatever there was was easily controllable, and the existing rules on contempt, on bar association discipline, and whatever—I think concern about a lawyer in the grand jury room disrupting the proceedings is, by the same token, controllable in other ways. It is not necessary to restrict the kind of advice, the kind of participation that the lawyer can have.

In Minnesota they allow the lawyer in the grand jury room and they have had no difficulty in that kind of an operation.

Mr. EILBERG. Unfortunately, in my experience of having been an assistant district attorney, I have seen a great many lawyers operate, sometimes in questionable ways. I am afraid that when you allow them to speak in a way that you suggested, it can not be controlled, I just couldn't see some lawyers sitting still and participating quietly without being disruptive and prolonging the proceedings indefinitely. That would be my concern.

Mr. FRIEDMAN. I think maybe this would be answerable on a district-by-district basis, and give the lawyers a chance to operate and see what happens. But I think getting them in there is the first step and a very important one to perform.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Following that, Professor, during the last Congress the Justice Department took the position that counsel for a witness in a grand jury room would violate grand jury secrecy and making the witness less willing to testify when the counsel represents any subsequent witnesses.

Would you care to respond?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. There is a lot of litigation on these points. Taking the last one first, on joint representation, that exists today without the lawyer being in the witness room. There are recent cases that I read on the plane today, and there were two or three cases, even fairly recently, in which that problem arises.

So it is going to arise whether the counsel is in the grand jury room or not. He represents a defendant or co-defendant or group of witnesses who go before the grand jury and then come out. That would occur no matter what happens with this legislation. If he goes in the grand jury room, it is not going to change in any way. The courts have developed various procedures trying to deal with joint representation, and that is not a problem that only relates to counsel's presence in the grand jury room.

As far as the Justice Department position that is going to make witnesses less willing to talk, as I say, there are eight States that have it already. It is going to probably be passed in New York this year, as well. Those States can still investigate crime and get indictments and still operate with their criminal justice system.

Every time there is an innovation in the criminal justice system some prosecutor is going to say it just doesn't work; it can't work.

The fifth amendment, when it was established, probably made it more difficult for prosecutors to operate. There is certainly enough cases of abuse. I have outlined some in my testimony about what happens to a witness in a grand jury room so that counsel really would be desirable in the future.

Mr. FISH. Professor, your statement is 39 pages, and I did not have a chance to read it. Like you, I flew in this morning. I look forward to reading it very much. It looks like one of our more comprehensive presentations.

Am I correct that you are submitting this on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. That's correct.

Mr. FISH. Are you in a position to tell the committee what has happened in the British experience since they abolished the grand jury?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. They have a totally different system, actually. They do use preliminary hearings. They use a magistrate and preliminary hearing for the most part. There is some opportunity for compelling testimony, documentary compulsion, before the trial. They handle it, for the most part, by using the preliminary examination or preliminary hearing as a substitute for the grand jury function.

The grand jury really does two things. It investigates and it indicts, and the whole theory about the indicting function is there should be someone looking over the prosecutor's shoulder to make sure he is not forcing someone to go to trial without reasonable cause to believe that they committed a crime. That is what a magistrate is supposed to do, and that is what he does in the system. I'm not sure how to handle all the subpena problems. You compel testimony and you compel documentary production. But I believe it is also connected with a magistrate, the use of the preliminary magistrate.

California, for example, did not use a grand jury statement for all purposes, and they also rely primarily on a preliminary examination, that kind of procedure, officially.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall, do you want to ask any questions now?

Mr. HALL. No.

Mr. EILBERG. We will recess very briefly to answer this rollcall.

Will you have any questions later?

Mr. HALL. I could ask him one question now.

What are the eight States that have adopted the rule of allowing attorneys in the grand jury room?

Mr. FRIEDMAN. I know Minnesota is one.

Mr. HALL. You can get it for me later.

Mr. FRIEDMAN. Yes.

Mr. HALL. They tell me we have it here.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much. Thank you for coming.

[A staff study on those States that allow counsel in the grand jury room may be found in app. 6 at p. 1571.

Mr. EILBERG. We will recess for a brief period.

[Brief recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. Let the meeting come to order.

Is Mr. Tobin present? This is Patrick Tobin, Washington representative of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

We welcome you, Mr. Tobin, and we congratulate you at the outset for having put together a very comprehensive statement, and it has to be widely read.

TESTIMONY OF PATRICK TOBIN, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE, INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION

[The prepared statement of Patrick Tobin follows:]

STATEMENT OF PATRICK TOBIN, WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE, INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION

My name is Patrick Tobin. I am the Washington Representative of the 60,000-member International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU). The ILWU, the bulwark of democratic trade unionism on the West Coast of the United States, represents workers from San Diego, California, to Seward, Alasaka, and, in addition is the largest single union in the State of Hawaii.

Our interest in the grand jury system reflects our longstanding commitment to the principles of the Bill of Rights. Like the framers of that document, we believe that government officials cannot be trusted to behave honorably and fairly. James Madison and his illustrious generation may have learned this lesson from their study of classical history and philosophy. We have learned it from nearly five decades on the waterfront.

Over the years, the ILWU and its individual members have repeatedly been attacked by a prosecutorial establishment more interested in serving employers than the public interest. We have seen crimes against our people, including murder, ignored, and crimes alleged to our people blown into huge conspiracies. We have seen the United States law enforcement apparatus devote two decades and no one knows how many taxpayer dollars to an unsuccessful attempt to drive our union president off the waterfront, a malicious prosecution United States Supreme Court Justice Frank Murphy was eventually to call a "monument of man's intolerance to man."

Not once during these long years of the government's legal harassment did the grand jury provide the protective "shield for the innocent" that our country's founders intended it to offer. It did not because it could not. The modern grand jury, especially for working people, is structurally "rigged" to constitutionally malfunction. "Rigged" is a strong word, but, as we hope to show in the testimony that follows, it is the only word that adequately describes the due process perversion that is our federal grand jury system.

1949: THE GRAND JURY AND HARRY BRIDGES

The confrontation that truly opened ILWU eyes to the abusive potential of the federal grand jury system came some 28 years ago.

The case involved Harry Bridges, the ILWU president. The time was the early stages of the Cold War. The place was San Francisco, and the political background is best explained by the 1945 words of United States Supreme Court Justice Frank Murphy:

> For more than a decade, powerful economic and social forces (had) combined with public and private agencies to seek the deportation of Harry Bridges, who came to this country in 1920 from Australia. Emerging from the Pacific Coast maritime strike of 1934 as a recognized leader in that area, Bridges incurred the hatred and hostility of those whose interests coincided directly or indirectly with the vicious and inhuman practices toward longshoremen that Bridges was combatting. His personal viewpoint on certain matters also antagonized many people of more conservative opinions; agitation for his deportation arose. Industrial and farming organizations, veterans groups, city police departments and private under-cover agents, all joined in an unremitting effort to deport him on the ground that he was connected with organizations dedicated to the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.[1]

In 1939 the government attempted to railroad Bridges out of the country through the Immigration and Naturalization Service bureaucracy on the grounds that Bridges was a Communist Party member. The attempt failed. A few years later, the government tried again, and for a second time the government was rebuffed. Then, in April, 1949, the Department of Justice sent a special prosecutor to San Francisco to open a grand jury investigation into violations of the naturalization law, a mandate which translated rather crudely, as everyone knew, to "get Bridges."

Bridges was indicted the next month on essentially the same grounds on which he had been vindicated twice earlier, but federal prosecutors denied that they were subjecting the ILWU leader to triple jeopardy.

"We have new evidence which has never been presented before," one of the prosecutors told the San Francisco Chronicle May 26, 1949.

"The very nature of the testimony before the Grand Jury," said another prosecutor two days later in the San Francisco Examiner, "is of such an overwhelming character that were Bridges to learn its full significance, he might make up his mind to travel fast and far."

Interestingly, at the very time the government was doing its best to convince the public that it had an air-tight case against Bridges, federal prosecutors were wildly scrambling for evidence to support their "overwhelming" case. Shortly after the indictment against Bridges was returned, over a dozen ILWU members were subpoenaed before the same grand jury that had indicted him.

The subpoenaed ILWU members had been approached, not long before their subpoenas were served, by Immigration Service agents and asked about internal ILWU politics and if they would testify against Bridges. All had refused.

There were several motives behind the subpoenas. One was to intimidate those who might be inclined to speak out in Bridges' defense. The government wanted to serve warning that every Bridges' supporter faced the prospect of a grand jury subpoena and character-assassinating newspaper headlines tying them into "subversion" on the waterfront. Another was to create splits within the union ranks. After some witnesses appeared, the government violated grand jury secrecy and described the witnesses to the press either as "friendly" or "unfriendly." A "friendly" designation by the government, of course, meant that the witness had testified against Bridges—and could never be trusted by his union brothers again. The violation of grand jury secrecy involved here was bad enough. Even worse was that the prosecutors capriciously—if not maliciously—mislabeled the witnesses' testimony.

On June 2, 1949, for instance, federal prosecutor Joseph Donohue told the San Francisco News that one subpoenaee had been a "satisfactory witness" for the government. The witness' attorney immediately issued a statement denying that his client had testified against Bridges, whereupon Donohue reiterated to the papers that the witness' testimony "was very satisfactory and important to the Bridges case."

The witness himself was not free to comment. Government attorneys had forced him and all the other subpoenaed witnesses who had appeared before the grand jury to take an oath of witness secrecy.

"Every witness who has appeared before the Grand Jury," prosecutor Donohue told the San Francisco Chronicle May 31, "has been sworn not to reveal the testimony he has given to those who may ask any witness what his testimony on any subject may have been."

Such an oath was then and is now completely improper, but when ILWU attorneys ignored it and asked Donohue's grand jury witnesses what the prosecutor was up to inside the grand jury room, Donohue threatened the lawyers with prosecution for witness tampering.

After several ILWU members had appeared before the grand jury, attorneys for 11 others went to court June 3 to get their subpoenas quashed. The lawyers made a number of objections, pointing out that:

—Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure does not force secrecy on grand jury witnesses, —that the witnesses had been subpoenaed to supply evidence against a person already indicted, —that since the subpoenas to their clients did not indicate what crime was under investigation, they were unable to intelligently advise their clients on their best legal course of action, —that the questions witnesses were being asked were fishing expeditions into the witnesses' political beliefs and labor union activities.

For proof on this latter point, the ILWU attorneys asked the court to release the transcripts of the grand jury interrogation of the witnesses who had already testified. The court refused both this request and the motion to quash the subpoenas. The government, in the defense's only victory, did agree not to require the witness secrecy oath.

Six days later, after the subpoenaed witnesses appeared, prosecutor Donohue was back in the press.

"The investigation is ended. There will be no more indictments," Donohue told the Chronicle. Then he added, perhaps without thinking, a comment that totally corroborated the defense charge that the post-Bridges, indictment grand jury activity was all a ruse to build the case against Bridges.

"Today's session," Donohue said in wrapping up the grand jury's work, "was one of the more successful and the evidence conclusively establishes the allegations of the indictment."

Bridges' lawyers continued to challenge the validity of the indictments. They charged that the grand jury panel was unrepresentative. Over half of it was comprised of either businessmen, professionals or by their wives, hardly an understanding sounding board for a trade union leader whom the business leaders of San Francisco had spent the past 15 years villifying. The composition challenge, though, failed. The indictment held.

The case against Bridges went all the way to the United States Supreme Court, which smelled a politically motivated prosecution and threw it out. The ILWU, of course, was grateful that the Supreme Court, was able to see through the prosecutorial misconduct involved, but seeing through prosecutorial misconduct is the grand jury's job. If the grand jury had done its job, it would have saved the ILWU hundreds of thousands of dollars and countless hours that could have been better spent organizing to improve waterfront working conditions.

The unchanging grand jury

The state of American law has changed dramatically since 1949. Segregation is no longer legal. Rubber hoses are no longer a permissible police interrogational prop. Advances have been made seemingly everywhere—except the grand jury chamber.

It is safe to say that the grand jury system has not come a long way since the controversy that swirled around the 1949 grand jury that indicted Harry Bridges. Bridges is now nationally recognized as one of the giants of the 20th century American labor movement, but the grand jury procedures that placed him and the ILWU under such great strain a generation ago are still jeopardizing the security and liberty of trade unionists today. A look at the current status of the grand jury abuses that the Bridges case highlighted so well makes this point painfully clear.

Multiple jeopardy.—The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution states that no "person shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb." The spirit of this provision was viciously violated when the government had Bridges indicted on charges that two previous Immigration bureaucracy proceedings had not been able to make stick.

That spirit was similarly violated between 1972 and 1975 when U.S. attorneys targeted three successive grand jury investigations against the striking East Coast bus drivers of United Transportation Union Local 1699. The stated rationale for each investigation differed, but the underlying purpose was always to prove UTU members guilty of something, anything. The government never did indict any UTU strikers, but its steady stream of subpoenas did sap union strength and morale. Local 1699's strike ended in defeat, and the striking workers all lost their jobs.[2]

Multiple grand juries on the same or related charges place their targets in "multiple jeopardy." H.R. 94's proposed Section 3330B(e)(3) which mandates that courts quash subpoenas when "the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction or transactions . . . under consideration by another grand jury which failed to return an indictment based on such transaction . . . and there is no additional, newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry" should narrow the government's ability to "get" particular targets by focusing continual, draining grand jury probes against them.

The manipulation of grand juries by federal agents: In the 1949 Bridges case, Immigration Service agents approached ILWU members at their homes and workplaces and tried to trick or scare them into providing intelligence on fellow workers' political activities and testifying against their union president. When these ploys failed, the agents had the men subpoenaed before a grand jury, knowing full well that the men's reputations would be stained by the sensationalistic newspaper headlines that were sure to result.

In 1976, a federal grand jury indicted Alex Markley, an organizer for the United Electrical Workers (UE) and Antonio Suares of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (IBEW) on explosives charges. The two had been involved in a peaceful and successful strike waged by UE Local 259 against a Springfield, Mass. company.

The indictment was based on the testimony of an Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Bureau (ATF) undercover agent, and immediately after it was returned, Markley and Suares were arrested and held incommunicado while ATF agents offered them a deal. If the two trade unionists agreed to spy on the local labor movement for ATF, the government would go easy on them.

In other words, the ATF agents had enlisted the grand jury as a partner in an intelligence-gathering scheme. The agents wanted a grand jury indictment which they could use—and did use—as a club to threaten Markley and Suares into becoming informers. The two indicted men refused the ATF offer, and the government didn't go easy on them. Earlier this year the two were convicted on the basis of the ATF undercover agent's testimony. Their conviction is now under appeal.

Stopping such manipulation of the grand jury by federal agents is a difficult legislative task to accomplish. Certainly, H.R. 94's proposed Section 3330B(d) which establishes grounds on which those subpoenaed can challenge "punitive" and "oppressive" subpoenas would help prevent federal agents from using subpoenas to harass witnesses who do not give government agents the answers they think they ought to get.

But the ultimate protection against the manipulation of grand jurors by federal agents, be they from Immigration, ATF or the FBI, is the integrity of the grand jurors themselves, a point we will discuss further below.

Leaking grand jury material to smear witnesses: Through the proceedings of the 1949 Bridges grand jury, prosecutors repeatedly made highly inflammatory and prejudicial statements about Bridges and other ILWU figures to the press. Such illegal prosecutorial leaks are still a grand jury fixture today.

The more notorious the case under grand jury investigation, the more devastating a prosecutorial leak can be. The Detroit federal grand jury investigation into the 1975 disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa is a case in point. To discover Hoffa's whereabouts, federal prosecutors adopted a strategy of subpoenaing anyone with the remotest of links to the case to the grand jury. Widespread publicity seemed to follow each subpoena. One New Jersey Teamster, Stephen Andretta, was subpoenaed to Detroit apparently after a New Jersey convict told the government that someone had told him that Andretta was involved. On the basis of this twice-removed hearsay, Andretta was ordered to Detroit, his name linked to the Hoffa case notoriety and his reputation forever stained. Andretta, it bears mentioning, has yet to be officially charged with any involvement whatsoever in the Hoffa case.

H.R. 94 makes violations of grand jury secrecy criminal offenses. As worded, Section 1512 could be invoked to penalize prosecutors who ruin people's good names with the unauthorized disclosure of grand jury material. In candor, however, we are not very optimistic that this section will be any more effective in curbing prosecutorial leaks than the court's existing contempt remedy.

From our experience, moreover, we fear that prosecutors might invoke these secrecy penalties to improperly harass witnesses or their counsel. As noted in the Bridges case, the prosecution improperly forced grand jury witnesses to take an oath of secrecy, then threatened ILWU Lawyers with prosecution when they attempted to uncover what the government was trying to hide.

We do not oppose the H.R. 94 secrecy provision, but we feel that if it is enacted, Congress should closely monitor its actual application.

Use of the grand jury to collect evidence against a person already indicted: The subpoenas served on ILWU members after Harry Bridges was indicted 28 years ago were, as the government subsequently admitted, intended to gather further evidence against the ILWU president. This abuse is one of the few unsavory grand jury practices that federal courts have moved to prevent. Several court cases over recent decades have affirmed that collecting evidence for the trial of a person already under indictment is not a proper grand jury activity. H.R. 94's Section 3330B(d)(1)(A) would codify these rulings.

Lack of notice on subpoenas: Back in 1949 ILWU lawyers noted that they could not represent their subpoenaed clients' interests adequately when the subpoenas did not notify them of the crime under investigation. The subpoena situation hasn't changed an iota.

Not only is the 1977 grand jury witness not told why he or she has been subpoenaed, but he or she is frequently not even given enough time to find counsel. We totally support the provision of H.R. 3330B(b) that lists the information each subpoena must carry. We are concerned, however, about a possible loophole in the protection offered by (a) of this same section. Under this paragraph (a), a subpoenaed witness' right to seven days between the service of the subpoena and the scheduled grand jury appearance could be lifted by the court upon a showing of special need by the government. There must be an inviolate minimum time between the service of a subpoena and its return date. Subpoenas that demand a witness' immediate appearance effectively deny a witness of most all the other grand jury rights guaranteed by H.R. 94. Three days should be the absolute minimum.

Access to transcripts: In the 1949 Bridges case, ILWU lawyers were unable to prove their contention that improper questions were being asked inside the grand jury chamber because the court would not give witnesses transcripts of their testimony.

H.R. 94's Section 3334 would enable witnesses to see copies of their own testimony and also gives indicted defendants the right to all relevant material that was presented to the grand jury. Both these provisions, combined with the requirement of Section 3333 that "all grand jury proceedings" be recorded should discourage badgering and harrassive prosecutorial interrogations.

Composition of grand juries: The law surrounding the selection of federal grand juries has become considerably more democratic since 1949 when Harry Bridges, outspoken advocate of workers' rights, faced a grand jury composed predominantly of people who hadn't the slightest idea of what Bridges had spent his life fighting for. Yet working people are still systematically underrepresented on grand jury panels, largely because grand juror service does not accommodate the needs of working people.

The standard grand juror fee, for instance, is $20 per day. For a person with a comfortable income, the loss of income grand jury service will mean is at worst an inconvenience. For an average working person strapped with bills, the difference between a regular day's wage and the daily grand juror fee can mean a family financial crisis. Grand jurors forced to worry about the money they are not earning by serving on grand juries are grand jurors who will frequently be absent and who, when they do appear, will feel pressured to get the grand jury's business over with quickly. This is not, needless to say, the atmosphere we want to be fostering inside the grand jury chamber.

Working people who serve on grand juries also have something else to worry about: their jobs. Amidst the hullabaloo over the great civic achievement of the Watergate grand jurors, little notice was paid to the fact that one of those grand jurors lost her job because of her long grand jury service.

None of the omnibus grand jury reform bills before this Congress address the question of grand jury composition, although there have been bills in past Congresses that called for higher fees and juror job security guarantees. The ILWU would certainly not want Congress to hold its consideration of other valuable pending reforms before it considers the composition question, but we do believe that improving grand jury representation is an integral aspect of grand jury renewal.

We would propose, as a first step towards broadening grand juror composition, that this subcommittee undertake a major survey of federal grand juror composition. If this study finds, as we feel it will, a systematic underrepresentation of working class people, the need for remedial steps will be obvious.

Trumped-up indictments: Indicting individuals on flimsy evidence has been the classic form of grand jury abuse—and the most ironic. If the authors of the Bill or Rights had one particular abuse in mind when they wrote the grand jury into the Constitution, it was their fear that, without a grand jury check, prosecutors would unjustifiably force people to stand through the ordeal of a trial.

In the hysterical climate of the early Cold War, the government had little trouble indicting Harry Bridges. Our political climate is more rational today, but behind the grand jury's closed doors, trumped-up indictments are still commonplace.

In 1969, for example, the Justice Department took a 36-year-old anti-racketeering law designed to combat extortion schemes by bogus trade unionists and began to apply it against workers in legitimate strike situations. In at least five different strike situations over the next three years, strikers were indicted for violations of the Hobbs "Anti-Racketeering" Act. In one incredible instance, a strike by New York Fur, Leather and Machine Union workers who had struck a dry cleaning company that fired all its workers who signed union cards was described as a "conspiracy to extort a labor union contract," and seven trade unionists involved in the strike were indicted for extortion.

Congress had never intended strikes for legitimate union objectives like better wages and working conditions to be considered "extortion," and the courts dismissed the Nixon Administration's Hobbs Act prosecutions one by one. If the Justice Department's strained Hobbs Act interpretation were allowed to stand, wrote Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart in 1973, then "the worker who threw a punch on the picket line, or the striker who deflated the tires of his employer's truck would be subjected to a Hobbs Act prosecution and the possibility of 20-years imprisonment and a $110,000 fine." [3]

But the court dismissals did not erase the newspaper headlines that screamed "extortion" and "racketeering" when the indictments were originally returned against the innocent trade unionists. Nor did the dismissals compensate the individuals involved for the anguish the indictments meant for their families.

Another example of trumped-up indictments—post-Nixon—is the case of The Washington Post pressmen, members of the International Printing and Graphic Communications Workers Local 6. In October, 1975, the District of Columbia's U.S. Attorney's office began a grand jury investigation into allegations made by the management of The Washington Post that its pressmen had "destroyed" the Post pressroom when they walked out on strike October 1. In July, 1976, after a long, drawn-out grand jury investigation, the D.C. U.S. Attorney's office had 15 strikers indicted on a variety of very serious felony charges, ranging from rioting to grand larceny to assault with a dangerous weapon. The charges carried a total of 268 potential years in jail. Newscasts blared the news of the indictments, and the Post management, which had already used the strikers' alleged criminal activity as a justification for hiring permanent non-union replacements to take their strikers' jobs, had seemingly been officially vindicated.

Nine months later, however, the government, rather than go to trial on the heavy felony charges against the 15 strikers, dropped every single felony charge pending and accepted pressmen guilty pleas of a handful of minor misdemeanors, many of which were for disorderly conduct.

If the government's case were so weak that prosecutors were willing to drop all felony indictments against the pressmen in exchange for misdemeanors that carried not one-twentieth of the potential jail time, then the strikers should never have been indicted on the felony charges to begin with. Because of the government's grand jury gamesmanship, the 15 strikers, their wives and children lived day and night for the nine months following the indictments with the prospect of lengthy jail terms hanging over their heads.

The only indictments that should be returned are those that the government is prepared to prove in a court of law. Neither a subsequent jury acquittal nor the dropping of an indictment by the government itself can undo all the harm caused by a trumped-up indictment.

Once reform that would make some prosecutors think twice before asking a grand jury to return an indictment the evidence doesn't warant is H.R. 94's Section 3368. This assures an accused of the right to a preliminary hearing even after an indictment has been returned. At this open courtroom hearing, the government would have to convince a judge, with normal rules of evidence in effect, that there is sufficient reason to make the accused stand trial. This preliminary hearing provision could result in the effective dismissal of many unfair indictments.

But its passage would still allow unfair indictments to be returned, and that is a situation that a society dedicated to due process cannot condone. Our only ultimate protection against the return of unfounded indictments is the grand juror panel. Informed, serious-minded, independent-thinking grand jurors are essential to the constitutional viability of the grand jury.

No reasonable person could quarrel with this last observation, yet we have a grand jury system that encourages the existence of confused, day-dreaming, rubber-stamping grand jurors. In fact, inside the grand jury chamber, prosecutors are free to mislead jurors by introducing hearsay, concealing relevant evidence and making irrelevant, prejudicial asides.

H.R. 94 takes several steps towards remeyding this pathetic situation. First, Section 3329 stipulates that courts must rigorously inform incoming grand jurors of their duties, rights and responsibilities. This is essential. Few citizens realize that the grand jury is supposed to shield the innocent against unwarranted government prosecution.

But even the most eloquent charge by an impaneling judge will not make average citizens into Bill of Rights tigers. It is one thing for average citizens to be told that their task is to shield individuals from manipulative prosecutors, quite another for grand jurors to actually do the shielding. Modern prosecutors are very sophisticated, and those who turn this sophistication to improper ends do not stop and give grand jurors advance warning of their intentions. Their manipulations can be subtle, and grand jurors, no matter how brilliantly charged by a sensitive judge, will seldom be equipped to see past the subtleties.

Grand jurors need to be trained, not just charged. They need to understand the elements of prosecutorial misconduct and how abuses can be prevented. Such training should be provided by independent attorneys, perhaps local bar association representatives selected by the court. These independent attorneys could give grand jurors a better sense of the job that needs to be done and the confidence necessary to do it.

There are other protections society can, and H.R. 94 does, give grand jurors. Prosecutors, under Section 3329(c), would be obligated to give grand jurors all exculpatory evidence in their possession. Prosecutors, under Section 3329(e), would not be allowed to bring a case a first grand jury has no-billed before a second grand jury unless new evidence is unearthed. Most importantly, prosecutors who attempt to bulldoze grand jurors are liable to be "fired." By asking their supervising judge to appoint an independent special prosecutor under Section 3330, grand jurors would be able to remove misbehaving prosecutors.

These three H.R. 94 provisions can be described with one phrase: common sense. Arguing against the prosecutorial disclosure of exculpatory evidence means arguing for keeping grand jurors in the dark about relevant evidence. Arguing against a ban on grand jury "forum-shopping" means arguing for subjecting an accused to continual legal harassment even though a panel of his or her peers—the grand jury—has already decided that the government has no case. Arguing against the grand jury option of having an obstructive prosecutor removed means arguing for the option of prosecutors obstructing the grand jury's search for truth.

Other reforms, however, are also needed.

Under current rules, the grand jury is a dumping ground for evidence. Prosecutors can use evidence in the grand jury room that they couldn't use either before a judge at a preliminary hearing or before a trial jury in an open court of law. There seems to be a double-standard in operation here. Don't grand jurors deserve the same "clean" evidence that judges and trial juries must be given?

Even a little improper evidence can go a long (and wrong) way inside the grand jury chamber. For instance, a prosecutor's off-hand presentation of some unsubstantiated hearsay evidence against an accused may prejudice the grand jurors and turn the tide in favor of a true bill that would not otherwise have been returned. Improper evidence is improper inside the grand jury and out, and the only way to insure its absence in the grand jury process is to have courts dismiss indictments tainted by such "dirty" evidence. If the government feels that it has a legitimate need to use evidence ordinarily inadmissible at the trial stage, such as hearsay summaries, it should first be necessary to get court permision.

These evidentiary reforms, which are included in H.R. 3736, will serve notice to prosecutors that grand jury proceedings are every bit as crucial to justice as trials.

Another reform that would advance the same ends is the requirement that prosecutors obtain explicit grand juror approval before they issue subpoenas, begin contempt proceedings or offer immunity in the grand jury's name. Mandating grand juror votes on such issues would encourage grand jurors to pay closer attention to grand jury proceedings and remind them that it is they, not prosecutors, who have responsibility over what takes place inside the grand jury chamber. By forcing grand jurors to take a more active role in grand jury decision-making, as proposed by H.R. 3736, we foster independent and responsible grand juror conduct.

Given the 100-year history of trumped-up indictments against trade unionists, future politically motivated prosecutions appear an unavoidable prospect. What we can avoid, however, is the grand jury's status as a rubber-stamping panel that will accept anything the prosecutor brings before it, no questions asked. By giving grand jurors the tools with which they can act independently, by introducing some standards of fairplay inside the grand jury room, we believe the grand jury can stop malicious prosecutions.

The intimidation of defense counsel.—When ILWU attorneys tried to expose prosecutorial misconduct in the Bridges, case, the government threatened them with witness tampering charges.

Pressure on grand jury defense attorneys, if anything, seems to have increased since then. Over the last two years, the cry of "multiple representation" has grown into an extremely popular prosecutorial cover for the intimidation of defense lawyers.

Multiple representation is common in labor cases. One attorney, paid by union funds, will represent or advise several union members. There can be, admittedly, problems in mutliple representation situations. For this reason clients have to understand the potential conflicts that may arise and give their informed consent. Once this informed consent has been given, however, once the client has decided that he or she wants to be represented by a particular attorney, then the defense relationship is a proper one.

In some past multiple representation cases, prosecutors have made objections to the multiple representation involved on good faith grounds. But in others, it is clear that the government is objecting not because it is sincerely concerned about the witness(es)' best interests, but because the government doesn't like the entirely legal advice counsel may be providing.

The most dismal example of this is the Post pressmen case already mentioned above. At the beginning of the nine-month grand jury investigation into the pressmen strike, 19 pressmen called before the grand jury invoked the Fifth Amendment. The government charged that the one attorney advising the 19 witnesses was helping to keep criminals at large and demanded that he be dismissed from his multiple representation. The government made no effort to hide its hope that the witnesses' new attorneys would advise their clients not to invoke the Fifth.

The prosecution's attempt to purge the pressmen lawyer did not make it past the Court of Appeals, which overturned a lower court ruling favorable to the government on narrow, procedural grounds. But while the government was not able to force the pressmen attorney off the case, its pressure on that counsel did produce the desired result. The pressmen witnesses did testify, a move that turned out not to be in their best interests at all. As a result of the testimony from them and the pressmen witnesses who followed them into the grand jury chamber, the government was able to fashion the trumped-up felony indictments already discussed above.

The interests of the government and an attorney's client do not necessarily coincide in our adversarial system of justice, and we feel that the record in this and other cases demonstrates that the government will not hesitate to force certain witness behavior by pressing a witness' counsel.

That is why we are especially apprehensive about one particular clause in H.R. 94 that, in our view, would give prosecutors still another means to intimidate hard, but clean-fighting defense attorneys. That clause, part of Section 3330A which gives grand jury witnesses the right to counsel inside the grand jury room, a reform we support wholeheartedly, gives the court the power to "remove" attorneys who "unduly" delay or impede grand jury proceedings.

We see nothing but mischief arising from this provision. We see prosecutors clamoring for the dismissal of defense attorneys on the shakiest of grounds, and we see judges, many of whom are former prosecutors and not particularly sensitive to the problems of defense representation, readily acceding to their requests. We see, in short, a cowed defense bar.

Courts already have the power to find unruly defense attorneys in contempt. It has been said by some that this contempt power is rarely used and thus an ineffective deterrent. ILWU lawyers would certainly be surprised to hear this. Two of them spent six months in jail for contempt around the Bridges case. Their offense was too strenuously fighting the government's attempted railroad of Harry Bridges. If courts have the power to punish defense attorneys who challenge government misbehavior, then certainly there is nothing to stop them from punishing defense attorneys for defense misbehavior.

Use of the grand jury to break worker solidarity: The right to strike is a fundamental freedom. Where workers are not free to struggle effectively for decent working conditions, then "freedom" exists only for those who can afford it.

Our basic democratic freedoms depend, in the end, on relationships of trust. Freedom of the press, for instance, demands a trust between reporter and source, and that is why journalists so preciously guard the confidentiality of their work. Similarly, the trust between attorney and client is a fundamental building block of the right to a fair trial. The corresponding trust behind the right to strike is the trust between individual workers. In the labor movement, we call this trust "solidarity."

When workers don't trust each other, the united action that a strike requires is impossible. Once this trust is broken, a strike is lost. This is a truism of labor relations, the reason why anti-labor employers are always on the look-out for ways and means with which they can divide their workers against themselves.

When it comes to dividing workers against themselves—union-busting, if you will—a grand jury dominated by a labor-baiting prosecutor has few peers, a fact of life the ILWU learned in the Bridges case. After Bridges was indicted in 1949, prosecutors tried to split ILWU ranks by subpoenaing members before the grand jury, then implying that their testimony had betrayed their fellow trade unionists. Actually, the prosecutors didn't have to leak material to the press to raise suspicions about the subpoenaed workers. Just by grilling them behind the grand jury's closed doors, the government had created mistrust in union ranks. Had the subpoenaed unionist told the truth or lied to save his own skin? His fellow workers could never know for sure.

Right from the start of the government's grand jury investigation of the alleged October 1, 1975 pressroom "destruction," the striking pressmen had charged that the Post was greatly exaggerating some minor damage in order to divert public attention from the unfair management labor practices, such as training strike-breakers to take over pressmen jobs, that had provoked the strike—and its accompanying bitterness—in the first place. The government totally ignored the pressmen charges.

"As was only proper," the U.S. Attorney responsible for the investigation, Earl Silbert, recently explained, the grand jury during this investigation restricted its investigation to the damage and destruction at the Washington Post. It did not, because it would have been improper to do so, investigate or pry into any labor dispute that was existing between the Washington Post and the members of the Union."

Instead, federal prosecutors spent the first nine months of the strike calling 88 pressmen before the grand jury, some for multiple appearances. How much of their testimony the government actually needed was doubtful. The Post management had earlier supplied the government with numerous identifications of those the post alleged to be responsible. What the subpoenas did do was place the striking pressmen in a cruel, double-bind situation. Answering the prosecution's questions inside the grand jury chamber would mean cooperating with an investigation they saw as loaded against them. Their words could be twisted and manipulated to indict their fellow workers or even themselves.

The answer to the subpoenaed pressmen's dilemma used to be an invocation of the Fifth Amendment. But today, unlike 1949, the Fifth Amendment protection no longer effectively exists. It has been "immunized" away.

Under the current "use" immunity, witnesses can be ordered to answer the questions the government wants answered or be held in contempt and jailed if they refuse. In strike situations like the pressmen's, immunity forces workers to choose between breaking the solidarity of their strike by answering questions behind the grand jury's closed doors or going to jail.

This emasculation of the Fifth Amendment protection is a particularly crushing blow against the right to strike. While journalists can cite reporters' privilege, defense lawyers the attorney-client privilege and clergy the priest-penitent privilege, "union solidarity" is not a legally recognized privilege.

Nor should it be. Workers don't want to be treated as a special case. Workers just want the right all Americans had when the Bill of Rights was adopted: the right to remain silent. Strikers who are forced to testify and thus cripple the solidarity of their strike are, to paraphrase the Fifth Amendment, bearing witness against themselves in a most basic way.

In our eyes, the dubious benefits of involuntary, forced immunity are far outweighed by its dangers. We support the provisions of H.R. 844 and H.R. 3736 that would make immunity conditional upon the consent of the witness to be immunized.

CONCLUSION

Last week's distressing Supreme Court rulings in the Washington and Wong cases make it plain once again that if we are to have grand jury reform, the Congress must take the initiative.

Fortunately, there is no shortage of reform proposals pending. But how should these reforms be judged? We feel strongly that every reform proposal must be measured against a yardstick that takes the grand jury's Bill of Rights mandate seriously. Will a particular change help grand jurors reach a fair judgment free from government manipulation? Will a proposed change reduce the likelihood of prosecutorial misconduct? These are the first questions the Congress should ask about the many reform proposals now before it.

Some have no patience for these questions. They look at reforms designed to curb prosecutorial misconduct, and all they can see are procedural loopholes through which all sorts of organized criminals will squirm.

No group is more concerned about organized crime than ours.—Few groups have done more to fight organized crime than ours has. Forty-three years ago we drove the mob off the West Coast waterfront, and it hasn't been back since. But we know that you don't fight organized crime by ignoring the Constitution and giving the government a blank check to operate as it pleases. We know that when those in positions of official authority are given unaccountable power, the kind of power that prosecutorial control over the modern grand jury provides, the crimes these officials can commit in the name of justice are "organized," too, and no less threatening to a free society than the exploits of organized crime.

We know this because over the past generation, we have seen federal prosecutors turn grand juries into fearsome anti-labor weapons. Strikebreaking is no longer just the province of employer-hired goons, provocateurs and spies or injunction-happy magistrates. In fact, for a trade unionist subpoenaed by a U.S. attorney, the grand jury chamber may as well be a corporate boardroom.

The situation demands reform, and the ILWU, with the reservations and additions we have noted above, supports H.R. 94 and its goal of a dynamic, fair-minded grand jury system.

Mr. TOBIN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We appreciate your efforts in this whole area of grand jury reform. We think they will make a major contribution to the strengthening of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Our union represents 60,000 workers in five States on the Pacific coast. We also represent sugar workers and pineapple workers in Hawaii and a variety of other workers in the State of Hawaii.

Today I am submitting for the record a fairly detailed analysis of a grand jury horror story from our own union's past, to get the grand jury back on its proper course.

It is impossible to read through texts on labor history without tripping over accounts of criminal trials that never should have taken place, cases where antilabor prosecutors were able to convince grand juries to indict union militants on flimsy, manufactured, just plain irrelevant evidence.

Fortunately, the manipulation of the grand jury process against labor is not confined to history books, as many workers from many different parts of the country have disclosed over recent years.

One need not look any further than Washington, D.C. for example.

On October 1, 1975, the printing pressmen of the Washington Post went on strike. Management quickly charged the strikers with having destroyed its presses and, indeed, the U.S. attorney's office almost immediately began a grand jury investigation of the incident. The investigation lasted 9 months. It completely ignored exculpatory material the pressmen offered to introduce and ended by indicting 15 strikers on very serious felony charges, carrying a potential of 268 years in jail.

The union charged the indictments were deliberate exaggerations of some minor pressroom damage. The government denied that, but 9 months later, just past April, the Government dropped every single felony indictment pending against the strikers in return for pressmen's pleas on minor misdemeanors like disorderly conduct.

If the Government's case against the pressmen strikers was so weak that the prosecutor was willing to drop all pending felony counts rather than go to trial and try to prove them, then the felony indictments never should have been returned in the first place.

The 15 strikers and their families had to live days and nights for the 9 months following the indictments with the prospect of lengthy jail terms hanging over their heads. It is because of instances like these that more and more working people see the grand jury chamber as nothing more than an extension of the corporate board room and a place ready to give workers a raw deal.

The ILWU feels that H.R. 94, the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, will make a major contribution toward ending the grand jury abuses so evident today.

We do feel, however, that certain changes in the H.R. 94 are in order.

The most basic is the addition of a clause to the bill's immunity section making all grants of immunity dependent on the consent of the witness to be immutized.

The current involuntary, forced immunity means workers subpenaed before the grand jury can be forced to choose between becoming an informer in the eyes of their fellow workers and themselves, or going to jail for contempt. This is the kind of choice that American citizens should not have to make.

There are some clauses in H.R. 94 that we feel should be deleted.

While H.R. 94 allows a witness to bring counsel into the grand jury chamber, a reform we endorse enthusiastically, it also severely limits this right to counsel. For instance, an attorney would not be allowed to address the grand jury under H.R. 94. We feel this absolute prohibition against attorney participation is extremely unwise. Lay people may not always be able to express themselves clearly to a panel of grand jurors. If the grand jurors want a clarification of what a witness is trying to say, they should be able to ask the witness' attorney for one.

Thus, we are for allowing a witness' attorney to address the grand jury upon the grand jury's approval.

Another clause in H.R. 94 disturbs us even more. This section gives to the court the power to remove defense attorneys who unduly delay or impede grand jury proceedings. We fear that these very vague words would be invoked to punish defense attorneys who aggressively defend the interests of their clients. This clause should be deleted totally.

If defense attorneys misbehave, let the courts find them in contempt. That is deterrent enough.

One final point. Those who speak against grand jury reform, against the sort of procedural changes included in H.R. 94, usually cite organized crime as a justification. They look at reforms assigned to curb prosecutorial misconduct, and all they can see are procedural loopholes through which all sorts of organized criminals will escape. No group is more concerned about organized crime than ours. Few groups have done more to fight organized crime than ours has; 43 years ago we drove the mob off the west coast waterfront, and it hasn't been seen since. We know that you don't fight organized crime by ignoring the Constitution and giving prosecutors a blank check to operate as they please. We know that when those in positions of official authority are given unaccountable power, the kind of power that prosecutorial control over the modern grand jury brings, the crimes that these officials can commit in the name of justice are organized, too, and no less threatening to a free society than the exploits of organized crime.

The grand jury situation demands reform, and the ILWU, with the additions and deletions noted earlier in our written testimony, support H.R. 94 and its goal of a dynamic, fairminded grand jury system.

Once again, we would like to thank you, Mr. Chairman, for providing us with this forum, and I will try to answer whatever questions anyone has.

Mr. EILBERG. We thank you for the trouble you have gone to in preparing the summary statement, and your longer statement will be made part of the record, without objection.

Mr. TOBIN. Thank you.

I have one other document I would like to submit, and I didn't bring it with me. Our convention, recently held in Seattle, in April, adopted a resolution on grand jury reform, and I would like to be able, if I could, to submit that later for the record.

Mr. EILBERG. Indeed, by all means, let us have it.

INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S & WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION, 22D BIENNIAL CONVENTION, SEATTLE, WASH., APRIL 18-22, 1977

STATEMENT OF POLICY ON GRAND JURY REFORM

The grand jury system, according to the framers of the U.S. Bill of Rights in 1791, was intended to serve as the people's watchdog to make sure that prosecutors didn't bring people to trial on flimsy charges. Nearly two hundred years later that intent has given way to a system whereby the fundamental rights of Americans can be and are routinely flaunted by federal and state grand juries.

Grand juries are used as a vehicle to harass trade unions and break the solidarity which is basic to successful strike action. By manipulating grand juries, prosecutors have forced strikers to stand trial on trumped up charges, to discredit labor leaders, and routinely ignore the breaking of laws by management.

Grand juries now facilitate the very overzealous and politically motivated prosecutorial conduct they were intended to prevent. Prosecutors can subpoena anyone at any time, and don't have to give a reason why. They can interrogate subpoenaed witnesses on virtually anything they choose, and such witnesses don't have the right to have counsel present. Witnesses are subject to an array of intimidating tactics, including being jailed indefinitely without ever having been charged, tried, or convicted of a crime.

Justice Department prosecutors and FBI agents have in recent years used federal grand juries to force political activists to testify about private relationships, attorneys about their clients, reporters about their sources, and strikers about their unions.

There are a number of bills now in Congress to curb the most reckless abuses of the grand jury system. We support those legislative efforts designed to restore citizen control and governmental accountability in the grand jury system. We urge the prompt passage of comprehensive grand jury reform legislation.

We join with groups like the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Lawyers Guild, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the American Friends Service Committee, the Meat Cutters Union and the National Organization for Women in supporting the efforts of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuses, which since 1973 has worked to break the grip which prosecutors have over the grand jury process.

Mr. TOBIN. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Just a couple of questions at this time, because of the time pressures we are both under.

One of the arguments made against allowing counsel in the grand jury room is that it would destroy the investigatory power of the jury in cases where counsel represents more than one witness or organization, such as a union and a witness.

Does the union ever pay for counsel for grand jury witnesses?

Mr. TOBIN. In the ILWU, the union pays attorneys' fees upon membership approval. The person to be represented always has the right to choose his attorney.

Our feelings is, every grand jury witness should have the right to have the attorney present during interrogation. We have a recent case of a man in San Francisco who was a dispatcher in local 10, the longshore local. The man was black, and two witnesses said that he had tried to extort money from them. He was dragged before the grand jury. His counsel could not enter with him, and he was finally charged with perjury by the grand jury. He is now spending a year in jail, yet he was never tried or convicted on the extortion accusation that brought him before the grand jury in the first place, to us, this sort of case makes it obvious that witnesses need assistance in the grand jury room. We don't think that allowing counsel inside in any way hampers the proper investigatory power of the grand jury.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you believe that such a payment for counsel interferes at all with the investigatory power of the jury or limits a witness's freedom to testify?

Mr. TOBIN. The witness would have the right to decide whether he wants the same counsel as, say, several other people. If he doesn't, he should then have the choice of another attorney. If he wants an attorney in the grand jury room, we believe he should have the right to have one. If he doesn't that is also his choice.

Mr. EILBERG. I take it there are no bad marks given to that witness who refuses union counsel.

In other words, there are no recriminations of any sort?

Mr. TOBIN. Our union has never forced an attorney on anyone. When it comes to the grand jury, the prosecutors are the ones who do the forcing.

Mr. EILBERG. You indicate that compulsory immunity does not, in fact, secure any evidence that consensual immunity does, and it has marginal efficiency.

Obviously, many judges and prosecutors disagree.

What evidence do you have on the ineffectiveness of immunity to secure evidence?

Mr. TOBIN. We believe that, first of all, the fifth amendment guarantees a man the right to remain silent. We believe that right should not be interfered with by legislation, judges, grand juries, or anyone else. If a witness says he does not want to tesify, he should have the right not to testify.

Mr. EILBERG. You say it is ineffective anyway.

Mr. TOBIN. Yes; I think "forced" immunity has been ineffective. I am not that familiar with evidence of its effectiveness. I know of no organized crime witness, the type of witness the present immunity law was designed to be effective against, who was immunized against his will and then testified.

Mr. EILBERG. We have been told in many cases involving organized crime, or nonpolitical prosecutions, like bank robbery, valuable evidence has been obtained.

Do you believe there are any types of crimes or circumstances that would justify the use of coerced testimony, assuming the transactional immunity is restored?

Mr. TOBIN. We are for the prosecution of criminals and crime. Our members are probably more victim of it than any other group in society. But we feel that those rights guaranteed by the Constitution should not be tampered with in an effort to get evidence. Where valuable evidence has been obtained with immunity it has been obtained because the witness wanted immunity from prosecution. In other words, the immunity used in these cases was consensual.

We believe the proper investigation by responsible U.S. attorneys or others should be able to find enough evidence in criminal cases without abusing the fifth amendment right of the Constitution.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Tobin, thank you very much. We appreciate your attendance.

Mr. TOBIN. Thank you very much.

Mr. EILBERG. Before I introduce our final witness, I am aware there is at least one person in the audience who would like to have something placed in the record. Any others that may want to supplement their statements that have already been made, or have contributions to put in the record, our counsel would be glad to review any such statements for possible inclusion in the record.

Our last, but not least witness, is Mr. William Thompson of the National Council of the Churches, New York, N.Y.

We welcome you, and we apologize for keeping you waiting so long.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM P. THOMPSON, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, NEW YORK, N.Y.; ACCOMPANIED BY DEAN KELLEY, EXECUTIVE FOR RELIGIOUS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Mr. THOMPSON. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I shall just very briefly summarize my testimony orally.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, your statement will be made part of the record, and would you be good enough to summarize it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am happy to do that.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM P. THOMPSON, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.

My name is William P. Thompson. I am the President of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., a cooperative agency of thirty national religious bodies of the Protestant, Anglican, and Eastern Orthodox traditions in the United States, aggregating over 40,000,000 members.

I do not purport to speak for all of those denominations or for each of their members, but for the Governing Board of the National Council of Churches, a representative body of 250 members selected by the member denominations to determine policy for their ecumenical work together, including the expression of ethical and moral concern on matters of public importance such as reform of the grand jury system.

I am also the Stated Clerk of the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., a member denomination of the National Council of Churches with 2,660,000 members in the United States. "Stated Clerk" is the venerable title my denomination uses for the chief executive officer of its highest governing body, and I have held that position for eleven years.

Prior to that time, I practiced law for more than twenty years, including active service in the United States Army during and after World War II in the course of which I served on a number of courts-martial and also as an Assistant Prosecutor of the major Japanese war criminals including General Hideki Tojo. Thus I have some sense of the prosecutor's responsibilities and the difficulties of fulfilling them without violating the rights of persons.

Since my years in law school, now more than thirty-five years ago, I have had the personal conviction that the grand jury should be abolished in this country as it has been in England where it originated because it is so readily subject to abuse by overzealous prosecutors. I consider the filing by the prosecutor of an information containing the charges, which it then becomes his duty to prove, to be a far more responsible model and one far less fraught with potential for abuse. The method of preliminary hearing in open court under the regular rules of evidence, with counsel for defendants present, and enjoying the right to cross-examine witnesses and to present evidence for the defense—as already provided in a number of states—seems to me a better and fairer way to determine whether or not a citizen should stand trial.

But that is not the view I am here to present. The Governing Board of the National Council of Churches did not reach the issue of whether the grand jury should be completely abolished or simply reformed. It addressed itself rather to the principles that should guide the operation of the grand jury system we now have, a system mandated in the Fifth Amendment of the Bill of Rights, but over which the Congress has wide latitude for modification as to composition and procedure.

Some observers may wonder why the churches should express concern with what to those observers may seem to be legal technicalities in which most church representatives probably have little training or expertise. In my view, the way our system of justice functions—or malfunctions—is of deep concern to every citizen. It is of particular concern to Christians who have been instructed to identify with the poor and oppressed, those most often charged with offenses. The law is too important a part of our lives to be left solely to practitioners of law. It is a matter in which everyone properly has an interest, and one not to be pursued solely by persons acting in dispersion as individuals, but by organizations through which a number of individuals can focus and express that interest. Such organizations include, where appropriate, their churches and cooperating associations of churches.

The churches have a history of deep concern for justice, a history far longer than the history of this country, going back to the days when Jesus Christ fell afoul of the law—or at least of the authorities who purported to administer the law—and died upon a cross as the result of a gross miscarriage of justice, in which the authorities did not even follow their own canons of proper procedure. In subsequent centuries, thousands of Christians were imprisoned, exiled, or executed by Roman imperial authorities, often without benefit of the "due process of law" which Rome even then had developed to a high degree.

Later on, history records impartially that church leaders not only advanced human understanding of justice, but also on occasion perverted it. But in every era there have been church leaders who sought to improve and extend the administration of justice and to minister to and seek redress for, the victims of justice.

In these latter days, a broader understanding of justice has taken shape under the rubric of "human rights"—the ideal of "certain inalienable rights" with which all persons are "endowed by their creator," and which governments cannot give or take away, but are called to respect and effectuate. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted in 1948 by the United Nations "as a common standard of achievement for all people and all nations."

In 1963, the General Assembly of the National Council of Churches adopted a policy statement on human rights, which in some respects is even broader than the Universal Declaration, particularly in spelling out the basic rights to "due process of law" to which all persons are entitled.

A few weeks ago—on May 5, 1977, the Governing Board of the National Council of the Churches of Christ, meeting in Cincinnati, adopted a "Resolution on Grand Jury Abuse" in which the Board urged application of the principle of due process to the operation of the grand jury. Thus the Board rejected the contention that "due process of law" does not apply in the grand jury room—supposedly before jeopardy attaches. Rather, the Board responded to the contention that important rights can be and often have been lost, even at this "preliminary" stage. "Due process of law" is designed to protect the rights of persons, and where persons can lose those rights—at any stage—it should be possible for the aggrieved person to invoke "due process."

Where the proceedings of the grand jury (all too often) do not seem to be preliminary to subsequent indictment and prosecution but rather an end in themselves—that is, a "fishing expedition" carried on by the prosecutor apparently to harass and intimidate dissidents or to obtain evidence usable against persons may be impaired. Some spend months in prison for civil contempt without ever being charged with a crime, others have their lives disrupted or their reputations impaired by "leaks" to the press from prosecutors' offices—the very opposite of what the grand jury was supposedly designed to accomplish, namely the protection of citizens against whom the available evidence is inadequate to prosecute!

When these things happen, people are hurt. When people are hurt, the churches are concerned. Motivated by that deep concern for suffering human beings, the churches have a right, indeed many would insist, a duty to speak out, not necessarily to offer technical solutions but to call attention to unjust conditions and to the human suffering for which specialists can then perhaps find a suitable remedy. Ours is a moral and humane concern, not a technical one. For the reason, I shall not attempt to address some of the technical differences between the various bills before the subcommittee, but will try to express what I understand the Governing Board to propose in genuine reform of the grand jury system.

As the Governing Board sees the situation, the grand jury is an amalgam of two somewhat incompatible models: it is an adjunct of both the judicial and the executive branches, it has both accusatory and inquisitory functions, it both evaluates evidence and investigates. If Congress could separate these two models and adopt one or the other, much of the confusion would be eliminated. As the Governing Board says, "It is the Governing Board's firm conviction that the use of the grand jury's powers as an instrument of investigation in support of law enforcement rather than as an evaluator of evidence already gathered is a distortion of this quasi-judicial function.

The prosecutor is placed in a dual role where it is impossible to avoid a severe conflict of interest. He enters the grand jury room as an advocate, seeking to persuade the jurors that he has sufficient evidence to obtain an indictment. In order for the jury to evaluate the evidence, however, they must often obtain an explanation or interpretation of the law alledgedly violated. To obtain this, they turn to an arbiter—the same prosecutor who has presented the evidence! Conscientious and professional as he may be, he would need superhuman skill to do justice to both roles.

It would seem obvious common sense to separate these two essentially incompatible roles and to provide the grand jury with special counsel (perhaps comparable to the law officer in a court martial), whose role would be not to submit evidence or call and examine witnesses, but to assist the grand jury in understanding the law and applying it to the evidence brought before it by the prosecutor.

The grand jury would then more clearly be an arm of the judicial branch, and its powers would then not be as readily pressed into service for law enforcement investigations, which is essentially an executive function. (This is not to say that grand juries do not have investigative powers, but such powers should be directed chiefly to matters which the ordinary law enforcement agencies are not well fitted to pursue—such as corruption within government itself—where the appointment of special counsel is often particularly necessary because of the political environment within which most prosecutors normally must operate.)

The most palpable and appalling abuses of the grand jury flow from this confusion of roles and models. Because of his dual function, the prosecutor often comes to think of himself as the proprietor and manager of the grand jury, and the grand jury often comes to think of the situation in the same way, since the prosecutor usually determines what cases they will consider, what witnesses they will hear, what laws they will apply. Increasingly, the prosecutor may be tempted to think in terms of "his" grand jury, of its powers as "his" powers, and to use it accordingly as more and more of a "rubber stamp" for what he wants to do.

From this "proprietorship" of the grand jury it is but a short step to a kind of general "monitorship" of the whole community, in which the prosecutor employs the powers of "his" grand jury—always in ostensible pursuit of heinous crimes such as bombings or bank-robberies—to comb through the dissident elements of the community, calling hundreds of witnesses before the grand jury whose only offense may be an affinity for unpopular ideas, whose only information of value to the prosecutor is more and more names for wider sweeps of the dragnet. By this device, in recent years some prosecutors have been seining the anti-war movement, the Black movement, the Vietnam Veterans Against the War, the Native American movement, the women's movement, and now it apears, the Puerto Rican and Chicano movements.

The Governing Board observed: The use of the grand jury's powers to harass and pursue political dissendent is a departure from its proper constitutional function, and is a great threat to public order, lawful government, and true domestic security.

Because two of the staff employees of one of its member denominations are now incarcerated for refusing to testify before a grand jury in New York City, the Governing Board has become keenly aware of the possible mis-use of the grand jury's powers, and urges that these powers be curbed, or rather re-directed to their proper use. It recommended: That churches and ecumenical agencies support legislation designed to enhance the rights to due process of law, freedom of association, effective legal counsel, the presumption of innocence, and the privilege against self-incrimination of persons subpoenaed to testify before grand juries.

It is ironic, even tragic, that dozens of persons have spent months in prison in the past few years—though accused of no crime, never having been tried, certainly not convicted—simply for refusing to aswer questions before a grand jury. It is precisely that type of punishment without due process of law that grand juries should prevent rather than perpetrate. The justification often given is that "the witnesses have the key to their own cells" . . . and have but to answer the prosecutor's questions to be released. Imprisonment is calculated to make reluctant witnesses tell what they know about a crime—assuming that they know something. Hardened criminals are usually not persuaded to talk by imprisonment; it is a mark of merit for them to suffer for their silence; indeed, if they were to divulge information to stay out of jail, they might well have much more to fear from their associates in crime than a few months in prison.

It is not the hardened criminals, nor even those with knowledge about crimes, who are the main victims of the modern grand jury, but often idealistic members of ethnic groups or dissident movements who for reasons of principle or loyalty refuse to name their associates—who in most instances have no connection with any crime. They are the ones who sit in jail rather than betray their friends, victims of an ancient device which has become reminiscent of the Star-Chamber Neck-lock or the Inquisitorial Triangle.

The basic design was developed by the Church—alas!—for use in correcting heretics, and has three deadly elements. A suspect is summoned by the authorities and required to take an oath to tell the truth (the oath ex officio mero). (1) If the witness refuses, he or she can be punished for recalcitrance; (2) If the witness answers falsely, he or she can be punished for violating the oath; and (3) If the witness admits to having committed a crime, he or she can be punished for the crime. There is another alternative of course: (4) The witness could protest innocence or ignorance, but that was often not acceptable, and was treated as the first element, recalcitrance.

The Church eventually renounced the use of the Inquisitional Triangle, only to see it adopted by the Crown, which applied it to suspected traitors through the Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission. It was in resistance to these special courts of the Crown that the privilege against self-incrimination was developed; the grand jury should be the staunchest guarantor of that privilege. Instead, the grand jury has become its gravest adversary. We see in it the three elements of this ancient trap, scarcely concealed by modern trappings: (1) The witness can be sent to prison for contempt of court if she[1] or he refused to testify; (2) The witness can be punished for perjury if she or he testifies falsely; (3) If the witness claims the privilege against self-incrimination, she or he can be granted "immunity" from prosecution and compelled to testify—again under threat of imprisonment.

The form of "immunity" now being given protects the witness only from the "use" of her or his own words in court to convict her or him of crime, but evidence of the same crime ostensibly obtained independently of the witness's testimony can be used to convict her or him, despite the grant of so-called "use" immunity, so the outcome is the same as in the grimmest days of the Holy Office.

"Transactional" immunity is, of course, to be preferred (as the Governing Board indicated in a footnote), whereby the witness is protected against prosecution for the entire "transaction" or crime about which she or he testified. But even more to be preferred is a situation in which the privilege against self-incrimination in The Bill of Rights means what it says, and no forced trades are pressed upon the witness. He or she is not told, "Here is something just as good as your constitutional right not to be a witness against yourself; you must take it and tell us all you know." The alternative is not the equivalent of the constitutional right, but in a way its opposite. One is compelled to be a witness against himself or herself; he or she is simply not punished for the crime confessed (transactional immunity) or for the confession (use immunity). That is not really what The Bill of Rights provides.

The Bill of Rights, it seems to me, means that a person may remain silent, unless he choose to peak, about anything that might lead to his incrimination out of his own mouth. Therefore, I would tend to support the proposed provision for immunity which requires the witness's consent. That is the only way to eliminate one side of the Inquisitorial Triangle and let the witness go free, as the Bill of Rights meant he should be free. Certainly the grand jury should not be the setting for catching the witness in that ancient trap; rather its role should be to protect the witness against it.

The Governing Board also expressed concern about the right to legal counsel in respect to the grand jury, and desired that it be effective legal counsel. I'm not sure what all that means, but it seems to me that, at the very least, it means legal counsel in the grand jury room. I think counsel might reasonably be limited to advising the witness, as in Congressional committee hearings, but then there is no need for a special provision for counsel's dismissal by the court, since the court already has adequate contempt powers to discipline errant lawyers. This provision tends to create a presumption that witness's counsel will cause trouble, whereas in the states that already have this provision, no such trouble has emerged. The dismissal provision is therefore superfluous and prejudicial.

It should not even be necessary to add that witnesses are entitled to adequate notice in a subpoena to appear before a grand jury. Seven days is a minimum, I should think, and should not be subjected to reduction on motion of the government.

Subpoenas, in fact, should be issued by the grand jury, or with their knowledge and consent, if they are as they should be, the grand jury's subpoenas and not the prosecutor's. The grand jury should know and understand the course and purpose behind the prosecutor's presentation of evidence and not be simply a passive audience for his manipulation.

Grand jurors should be given adequate instruction by judges to prepare them for the high responsibility they hold on behalf of, and in protection of, the whole citizenry. The grand jury has a noble history. If this great instrument for the protection of the accused cannot be reformed so that it will perform the functions a democracy should expect of it, then we may need to consider its abolition rather than permitting it to be used to infringe upon our liberties.

HUMAN RIGHTS—ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, DECEMBER 6, 1963

Christians believe that man is made in the image of God, that every person is of instrinsic worth before God, and that every individual has a right to the fullest possible opportunities for the development of life abundant and eternal. Denials of rights and freedoms that inhere in man's worth before God are not simply a crime against humanity; they are a sin against God.

Christians also share with people of other faiths and of goodwill in deep concern for the dignity of man, and in profound respect for the unalienable rights with which he has been endowed by his Creator, including life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Therefore, we welcome the 15th Anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted without dissent December 10, 1948, by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

We are gratified at reports of the broad influence of the Declaration on the formulation of constitutions in numerous new nations. We are heartened by its practical implementation in helping to assure the rights of refugees, of other handicapped persons, and of oppressed minorities in many parts of the world. We rejoice in the universal acclaim that the Declaration is actually, as the United Nations General Assembly in 1948 declared it to be, "a standard of achievement for all peoples and nations."

We are deeply concerned, however, that while the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a standard for affirmation, the world has been far too slow in translating the standard into programs of action. We call to mind, for example: the denials of racial equality, in all regions of our own country, in many parts of the world, and, in a particularly vicious form, in the Republic of South Africa; the limitations on political freedoms in the still unliberated areas of Africa, as well as in the totalitarian societies in other parts of the world; and the denial of religious liberty both by avowedly atheistic governments which seek to eradicate all religious influences and by other dictatorship which hinder or even persecute specific religious groups—usually minorities.

We are convinced that the standard set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights must be more rapidly and more fully achieved in policies and practices. The distance and the importance of the ultimate goal do not permit a leisurely pace in this revolutionary world. The time is now.

We note that the United States, which gave outstanding leadership in developing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, has as yet failed to ratify a single international convenant in the field of human rights. We believe that the people of our churches and our nation must be more seriously concerned with policies, programs, and practices for human rights in our own country and around the world—now.

CONCERNS OF THE CHURCHES

We call to mind statements and actions on human rights by the World Council of Churches and its Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; a comprehensive declaration on human rights by the Federal Council of Churches in December 1948; pronouncements, resolutions, and actions of the National Council of Churches and its constituent bodies; Papal Encyclicals, especially "Peace on Earth" by Pope John XXIII in 1963; and prophetic words and acts of the Jewish community on such issues through the years.

We recall specifically policy statements of the National Council of Churches devoted in whole or in part to human rights including: "Approval of a Draft Article of the Proposed International Covenant of Human Rights," November 1951; Religious and Civil Liberties," October 1955; "Toward a Family of Nations under God—Agenda of Action for Peace," June 1960; "Freedom of Association," December 1960; "Christian Responsibility for World Community," December 1960; "The Status of Women," June 1963. We note also, since its founding, the National Council's persistent efforts for racial justice, including its sharing in an historic inter-faith national Conference on Religion and Race in early 1963, and the whole Council's commitment in the establishment of a special Commission on Religion and Race with an urgent mandate for action.

With continuing and increasing Christian concern, the General Assembly of the National Council of Churches now sets forth this comprehensive statement on human rights.

Some General Principles

Religious beliefs and their derivative moral obligations are at the center of the Christian concern for human rights.

All men are God's creatures and have personal worth to him. All men, and Christians in a particular way, are responsible to God, to love him and serve him; to obey God as the Lord of the conscience; to regard other persons as their neighbors whom they should esteem and love as themselves.

As persons have such inherent worth, they also have inherent rights and responsibilities. Every right with which man is endowed by his Creator involves a corresponding responsibility to use this right wisely and generously for constructive ends with due regard for the similarly God-given rights of others. Society must also respect these God-given rights and make provision for their realization.

All the rich gifts which God imparts to men should be available without discrimination as to creed, race, color, sex, birth, nationality, economic or social status. So the National Council of Churches has denounced and reaffirms its denunciation of patterns of segregation as contrary to the will of God for human brotherhood. The Council more strongly than ever urges the churches to find new and appropriate means of moving toward a racially inclusive church in a fully integrated society.

Religious liberty and indeed religious faith are basic both historically and philosophically to all our liberties. Thus religious and civil liberties are interdependent and indivisible.

A responsible society, according to our Christian faith, is one in which freedom is practiced by men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold political authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and to the people whose welfare is affected by it.

In accord with these principles we set forth certain of the more specific rights which we believe are due to all persons and will make for the building of the responsible society. Among the rights that are due to all persons without discrimination as to creed, race, color, sex, birth, nationality, or economic status, are the following:

General Rights Due to All Persons

General rights due to all persons because of their personal worth and inherent dignity include:

Freedom of religion and conscience, embracing rights to hold and to change faith, to express it in worship and practice, to teach and persuade others by the sharing of viewpoints in mutual respect, and to conduct religious education of children.

Freedom to marry by mutual consent and the right to protections of a minimum age of consent and a registered marriage.

Freedom of speech, press, inquiry, including expression of economic, political, and social opinions.

Freedom of peaceable association, assembly, and demonstration.

Freedom to petition government for redress of grievances.

Freedom from arbitrary arrest, arbitrary or secret imprisonment, police brutality, mob violence, intimidation, cruel or unusual punishment, and from any attempts to manipulate or tamper with human personality through drugs, hypnosis, isolation, duress, or other means of "brainwashing."

Political and Civic Rights

The right to full participation of the person in political and civic life, including the opportunity:

To vote by secret ballot, with alternative choices;

To organize peaceful politicl activity;

To be a candidate for public office;

To participate in any branch of government; to serve without discrimination in the Armed Forces, or on grounds of conscience to be excused from such service;

To receive such benefits of social welfare, health, community and other services as are provided by governments at all levels;

To enjoy equality before the law, including protection by the police; the right of an accused person to a prompt, fair, and public trial; the right of counsel; the right to be confronted with written indictment, evidence, and witnesses against him; the right to present evidence and witnesses on his own behalf and to cross-examine other witnesses; the right to have the judgment of his actions depend on an evaluation of facts in the light of law, by due process, such as by impartial judges or an impartial jury of his peers.

ECONOMIC RIGHTS

The right to participate in the economic life of the community, including the opportunity:

To earn a standard of living adequate to promote the welfare and security of the individual and family; to work in decent and healthful conditions, and to have free choice of employment, for just compensation, with protection against unemployment;

To receive, when absence of opportunity for work or other unavoidable causes prevent employment, a proper standard of relief payments from public sources;

To obtain employment solely on the basis of ability and character;

To acquire vocational, professional, or job training or apprenticeship solely on the basis of ability and character;

To receive equal pay for equal work;

To gain promotion in employment in accord with ability, experience, and character;

To own property;

To engage in an individual business enterprise or a profession;

To form voluntary economic organizations such as corporations, cooperatives, and labor unions;

To engage in social action on economic issues.

SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

The right to take part in the social and cultural life of the community, including the opportunity:

To have wholesome living space, necessary for the health and welfare of persons and families;

To move within a country and to leave and return to one's country;

To obtain education and training;

To make use of cultural and recreational opportunities and facilities;

To enjoy privacy, protected against invasion of personal or family life by unreasonable searches or seizures, such as wire-tapping, interception of mail, electronic eavesdropping, or other forcible or surreptitious interference;

To enjoy freedom of association with other persons regardless of racial or other distinctions;

To have access to social welfare, health and other community services;

To share equally in the use of public transportation;

To receive equal service from businesses and persons serving the public—such as stores, theaters, hotels, and restaurants.

TO THE CHURCHES

Persistence in the denial of human rights being more than a crime against humanity—even a sin against God, and practice of these rights being a partial fulfillment of the Great Commandment to love God and one's neighbor as one's self, there are divine imperatives upon Christians and churches:

To promote acceptance and observance of these requirements of human rights; to encourage the state fully to recognize these rights in law and enforcement and observance of law; to go beyond the legal standards and to seek vigorously to realize these rights, particularly when they apply within their own fellowship; to support and encourage members and ministers in conscientious endeavor to achieve these goals; at the same time, to seek solutions in a spirit of Christian reconciliation; to serve as a challenge to, and as the conscience of, the community—local, state, national, and international.

Another particular responsibility of the churches is to point out and help prepare people for the hazardous struggle for human rights at home and around the world. Difficult and uneasy as is the present, the prospect for the future is one of even more tensions, tougher trials, and more severe testing of all our proclamations for human rights. Developments in science, technology, and automation pose growing perplexities as well as potentialities. At least for a time many gaps and tensions will increase between those who have more and those who have less. We are entering continuing crises which offer more judgment or grace than most of us can yet anticipate. We must think and act in ways which will open toward the future in order to escape disaster in our nation or destruction in our world. Under the Sovereign Lord of history, our churches call upon our members and other peoples to be dedicated anew to the cause of man and his dignity and rights. This means we must prepare ourselves in mind and spirit, in customs and laws, for these difficult times of testing but also of possible larger achievements in human rights.

The National Council of Churches, while noting with profound satisfaction the broad recognition and influence of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights during its first fifteen years, recommends that the churches participate fully in endeavors to encourage study and action for human rights at this time of Anniversary and after, in order that through this and succeeding years the achievement of human rights may be accelerated for all mankind.

TO THE NATION

Our nation, which has claimed such high value for the unalienable rights of persons, at this moment of history is called to bring our practices more fully into accord with our proclamations, within our country and in the world community. This is the challenge to our people and to our government to achieve moral and spiritual integrity.

Concerned for the human rights of all, we must give partcular attention to the denial of rights on the basis of race or color and to the correcting of such injustices. Those among our citizens and in our government who are struggling so hard and constructively for the realization of these rights are the human basis of hope in our nation dedicated to justice and fuller opportunity for all.

On a planet growing so small, human rights are indivisible. We must be constantly mindful that our human relations and international relations are taking place for good or for ill in a world of nations consisting mostly of peoples of color.

The quality of life in our own nation and our actions in international declarations and covenants, now more than ever, must represent in actuality our professed concern for the worth and dignity of all men.

In the growing world community, we see a ferment among all peoples, but especially among many of those who have long been concerns of our churches' missionary outreach. Among the newer nations has come most dramatically the revolution of increasingly realized expectations. Our nation can and should take increasing leadership in such constructive revolution. To do so our nation must throw its full weight behind the efforts of the United Nations to put the high expectations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights into practice. This means leadership-in-partnership with other nations concerned for world order and human dignity, values and rights. We believe that our nation can and must make its rightfully contribution, along with others, by helping to develop international agreements such as the draft Convention on Human Rights and by ratifying others already in existence, such as the conventions for the political rights of women; for consent, age, and registration of marriage; against genocide, against slavery; and against forced labor.

Now, therefore, the National Council of Churches urges the renewed dedication of our citizens and our government to the manifold concerns for human rights within our own country and in the growing world community and thus to larger measures of justice and freedom making for more peace on earth.

RESOLUTION ON GRAND JURY ABUSE, ADOPTED BY THE NCCC GOVERNING BOARD, MAY 5, 1977

The Grand Jury is envisioned in American law as a protector of citizens from unwarranted prosecutions. It is for this reason that its proceedings are secret and it has compulsory process for summoning witnesses.

However, in recent years there is evidence to indicate that its great powers have sometimes been misused to harass and intimidate political dissidents, including the anti-war movement, the activist student movement, the Native American movement, the black movement, the trade-union movement, the Roman Catholic peace movement, the feminist movement, and now seem to be aimed at the Chicano and Puerto Rican movements as well.

Since the October 1976 meeting of the Governing Board of the NCCC, several persons connected with the Hispanic ministries of the churches have been subpoenaed to testify before grand juries ostensibly inquiring into terrorist bombings, and some have gone to prison rather than divulge the names of persons they felt had been working with the church in good faith, lest they in turn be subjected to investigation.

Congress has never given the Federal Bureau of Investigation subpoena powers, yet agents today routinely threaten uncooperative persons with subpoenas from a grand jury, and often indeed serve such subpoenas upon them.

It is the Governing Board's firm conviction that the use of the grand jury's powers as an instrument of investigation in support of law enforcement rather than as an evaluation of evidence already gathered is a distortion of its quasi-judical function. The use of the grand jury's powers to harass and pursue political dissidents is a departure from its proper constitutional function, and is a great threat to public order, lawful government, and true domestic security.

Therefore, the Governing Board of the National Council of Churches, in its continuing concern for human rights, including due process of law, freedom of association, the privilege against self-incrimination, the presumption of innocence and the free exercise of religion, adopts as its own procedure and urges upon the churches and ecumenical agencies the following course of action:

1. That churches and ecumenical agencies support legislation designed to enhance the rights to due process of law, freedom of association, effective legal counsel, the presumption of innocence and the privilege against self-incrimination[1] of persons subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. As well as the problem of grand jury abuse, there are attempts by other Government agencies to intervene in the internal affairs of the churches. A full policy statement based on careful consideration of the legal ramifications needs to be developed. The Governing Board therefore also urges:

2. That each member denomination of the NCCC designate one person to keep in touch with the developments in this area and to represent it in developing a full policy statement on the subject of governmental intervention in the internal affairs of churches for presentation to a later session of the Governing Board.

In the meantime, church agencies, members and employees may well find themselves in the position of responding to inquiries by Government agencies. Until the adoption of a full policy statement, the Governing Board of the NCCC adopts as its own procedure and urges adoption of the same by the member communions:

3. That, if and when any employee of a church or church agency is approached by government investigators (on matters related to that church or agency), the inquiry be handled by the senior officer available (with appropriate legal advice);

4. That the investigators be asked to state specifically in writing what information they want, their authority for seeking it, and whether it can be or has been obtained in any other way;

5. That the church or agency make contact with specialists in the ecumenical community, such as the Committee on Religious Liberty of the National Council of Churches, and seek advice of legal counsel familiar with church-state law to determine what information, if any, can properly begiven in response to the inquiry;

6. That churches and ecumenical agencies not divulge names of contributors, members, constituents, or any persons or groups with whom they have been working in a relationship of confidence and trust;

7. That churches and ecumenical agencies not divulge without benefit of legal counsel and consent of persons concerned personnel files, correspondence or other confidential and/or internal documents or information;

8. That churches and ecumenical agencies not divulge without benefit of legal counsel and consent of persons concerned travel or expense records;

9. That the churches and ecumenical agencies inform any persons in their employment or membership about whom inquiries have been made that such investigations are in process;

[1] Though this is supposedly afforded by the grant of "use" immunity, the fuller "transactional" immunity that was formerly granted more adequately guards the privileges.

10. That churches and ecumenical agencies give moral and material support (including continuing salary to employees) for those members and employees who for reasons of principle refuse to testify before a grand jury and risk jail rather than expose others to harassment—even if some consider their refusal unwise or unnecessary;

11. That churches and ecumenical agencies make particular provision to insure and protect the freedom of association and exercise of advocacy by members and staff in their ministries and relationships with social action agencies and oppressed and alienated groups.

12. In addition the denominations are urged to develop internal policies appropriate to their own polity and ecclesiology which will clarify their understanding of the meaning of confidentiality of communications within the fellowship and in the ministry of the church, so as to safeguard the relationship of confidence and trust that is essential to the existence and functioning of the church.

13. Churches which adopt the above recommendations should be aware that they, or their members, may be faced with the risk of civil penalties, including citations for contempt of court, in their effort to establish judicial recognition of the churches' right not to breach the relationship of confidence and trust which is essential to the functioning of the religious community.

Mr. THOMPSON. With me is the Rev. Dean Kelley, who is staff executive for religious and civil liberty of the National Council of Churches.

You have indicated that my written statement will be admitted in the record. There are attachments to it, one a policy statement adopted by the general assembly of the National Council and the other, a resolution adopted by the governing board.

Mr. EILBERG. They also will be made part of the record.

Mr. THOMPSON. I mentioned the resolution, Mr. Chairman, since I noticed that on your motion, it has already been included in the Congressional Record as of a week ago.

Mr. EILBERG. It struck me as very interesting. You would have no objection to its being admitted?

Mr. THOMPSON. None at all.

Let me begin by saying something of the role in which I testify. I am President of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A.

I happen to be at the midpoint in a 3-year term in that office.

The National Council of Churches is a cooperative agency of 30 national religious bodies of Protestant, Anglican, and Eastern Orthodox traditions in this country. They aggregate something over 40 million members.

I do not purport to speak for all of those denominations or each of their members. I do speak for the governing board of the National Council of Churches, which is a body made up of representatives chosen by the national religious bodies. This is a body consisting of approximately 250 members. My testimony will be based particularly on the resolution to which you just alluded.

I am also the stated clerk of the general assembly of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., one of the member churches of the National Council of Churches. This church has some two and two-thirds million members in the United States. The term "stated clerk" is curious to some. It simply means that I am the permanent officer of the highest governing body of that church. I have held that office for eleven years.

Prior to that time I practiced law for more than 20 years, including active service in the U.S. Army during and after World War II, in the course of which I served on a number of courts-martial, both as trial judge advocate and as defense counsel. And I also served as an assistant prosecutor of the major Japanese war criminals, including General Tojo. Thus I have some sense of the prosecutor's responsibilities and the difficulties of fulfilling them without violating the rights of persons.

My written text anticipated the question which Congressman Hall put to one of the witnesses this morning.

Since my years in law school, now more than 35 years ago, I have had the personal conviction that the grand jury should be abolished in this country, as it has been in England, where it was originated for the purpose of protecting persons who were accused. I feel that it's so readily subject to abuse by overzealous prosecutors, as experience has demonstrated in this country, that its usefulness is no longer there. I am not here to present that view; obviously, that is a personal view. I am here to elucidate the positions taken by the governing board in the resolution with which you are familiar.

The governing board did not reach the issue of abolition. It was concerned with how the grand jury system might be improved and it recognized that Congress had wide latitude for the modification of the composition and procedure of the grand jury system without abolition, recognizing that the grand jury is guaranteed by the Constitution.

In that resolution, the board urged application of the principle of due process to the operation of the grand jury. Thus, the board rejected the contention that due process of law does not apply in a grand jury room, supposedly before jeopardy attaches; rather the board responded to the contention that important rights can be and often have been lost, even at this preliminary stage.

Due process of law is designed to protect the rights of persons, and where persons can lose those rights at any stage, it should be possible for the aggrieved person to invoke due process.

We have attempted to set out the concerns of the charches which relate particularly to the fact that persons who have limited opportunity for legal advice and counsel become the victims of the grand jury process. This is particularly true of persons in closely-knit ethnic and racial groups who have in recent years become the objects of fishing expeditions on the part of the prosecutors.

In many cases these persons come before the grand jury with genuine fear and they recognize that if they respond to the questions put to them they will be seen by their peers to have informed upon them, to have betrayed them. The result is that persons who have no knowledge of criminal activity at all are frequently placed in prison as a result of failure to testify.

We recognize that the system which we are complaining about really is very reminiscent of the religious courts of the Middle Ages. We have here an ingenious device which was developed by the church itself for correcting heretics. There were three elements in the inquisitorial triangle. The suspect was summoned and the authorities required that suspect to take an oath to tell the truth and, first, if the witness refused, then he or she could be punished. Second, if the witness answered falsely, he or she could be punished for violating the oath. And, third, if the witness admitted having committed a crime, he or she could be punished for that crime. There was, of course, the other alternative; the witness might protest innocence or ignorance, but that, too, was not acceptable and was treated in most instances as but a variation of the first element: recalcitrance.

The church eventually renounced the inquisitional triangle, only to see it adopted by the Crown. It was applied to suspected traitors through the star chamber and the court of high commission. It was in resistance to these prerogative courts of the crown that the privilege against self-incrimination was developed.

The grand jury should be the staunchest guarantor of the privilege. Instead the grand jury has become its gravest adversary, and we see the three elements of that ancient trap scarcely concealed by modern camouflage. First, the witness can be sent to prison for contempt of court if he or she refuses to testify. Second, the witness can be punished for perjury, if he or she testifies falsely. Third, if the witness claims the privilege against self-incrimination, he or she can be granted immunity from prosecution and compelled to testify again under threat if imprisonment.

The governing board has indicated its preference, of course, for transactional immunity. But whatever type of immunity is granted, it is an alternative to a constitutional right and we submit it is not the equivalent of that right. It is a subversion of that right. It is for that reason that we feel the witness should be guaranteed the right to remain silent unless he or she chooses to speak. In our judgment, the only way that is possible under pending legislation is by the consent provision of one of the bills.

I do not wish to go into the detailed analysis of these bills. That is set out in the written testimony. We are concerned that unless the grand jury system is made to work more effectively, we shall eventually be faced, obviously, with the alternative of its abolition.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Thompson, for a very fine statement and very forceful one.

I observed sometimes we do some things over here in Congress where, perhaps, which we would like to do better; but it becomes sometimes a matter of getting half a loaf but moving in the right direction.

We can't move entirely in the right direction. I just hope that you will understand that, as we move not only with this legislation, but with so much other legislation.

Mr. THOMPSON. I certainly recognize that, and I commend your own bill as a step in the right direction.

I personally feel it does not go far enough.

Mr. EILBERG. I appreciate that.

Can you explain to us what effect the resolution by the National Council of Churches has actually, as compared to theoretically, on the activities of individual churches?

You explained the hierarchy and whom you represent. I am wondering to what extent this flows down and to what extent it is binding or what influence does it have?

Mr. THOMPSON. Let me respond to your last question first. It is not binding upon any of the member bodies. This particular resolution, because it contains guidelines, is really addressed to the individual members of the churches, particularly those in positions of responsibility, who may be faced with the task of advising subordinates who are confronted with that situation.

It is for their advice and for use in developing their system, and it is widely distributed and available to them.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you happen to know whether your position has been considered by any other religious organization outside your group, for example, the Catholic bishops? I am just curious in passing, as to any activity by other religious groups?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is activity in other religious groups, but this particular resolution has been adopted so recently that I doubt that any formal consideration of it has been given by other groups.

Mr. EILBERG. The resolution suggests that there shall be a right to effective legal counsel for persons subpenaed to testify before the grand jury.

One argument made against giving a right of counsel, is that one lawyer might wind up representing any number of people in a group. If he was present in a grand jury room, then the witness would, therefore, know that his or her testimony would be immediately transmitted back to others. The witness would thus be effectively precluded from offering needed testimony to the grand jury.

Do you see any danger in this, and how would you comment on that situation?

Mr. THOMPSON. If the presence of counsel in the grand jury room is abused in the sense of counsel's not respecting the confidentiality of testimony given there, the court certainly has power to discipline the attorney.

Mr. EILBERG. Only if the court learns about that!

Mr. THOMPSON. Of course. Beyond that, I think the right of the witness is protected as the preceding witness suggested here, by the choice of other counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Thompson, we could go on for quite a period, but I think we will have to end here.

We appreciate your contribution very much. We find this statement by the church group a significant development, and we understand this is the first time that your organization has entered into the criminal justice area, and from our point of view, we congratulate you for that movement and for coming here today.

Mr. THOMPSON. Thank you very much. We have long been concerned about the moral and ethical implications of public issues. This is perhaps the first time we have entered into the field of the administration of justice in quite this way.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you so much.

The subcommittee is adjourned.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES CRITICIZES GRAND JURY SYSTEM

(By Janis Johnson)

The National Council of Churches governing board has attacked the grand jury system as riddled with abuses and urged its 31 member denominations to resist efforts by governmental investigators to obtain confidential information from church files.

The unanimous action by the 150 delegates to the semi-annual meeting of the board in Cincinnati, completed yesterday, stemmed from a grand jury probe into purported links between a military Puerto Rican independence group and a controversial Hispanic social activist organization funded by the Episcopal church.

The federal investigation of bombings believed to be the work of the military FALN has led to the imprisonment on contempt charges of two women lay ministers of the Episcopal church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs. They went to jail rather than testify before the grand jury. They have denied knowledge of the FALN or its members but said their resistance was "on principle."

In January Presiding Bishop John M. Allin voluntarily allowed the FBI into the Episcopal Church Center's office in New York for a week to look at non-confidential Hispanic commission files. He took this action after a subpoena served first on Bishop Milton Wood, church executive for administration, was withdrawn.

Officials of other churches have conceded they are uninformed on the implications that similar actions against their files would raise about religious liberty and separation of church and state.

In one resolution passed without dissent the governing board expressed "deep concern" over the jailing of the women "as a matter of great significance to all member churches of the National Council." It directed council president William P. Thompson to appoint a commission to meet with Bishop Allin and "aid him in securing the early release of the two women, to restore their salaries and to pay their legal expenses."

In a resolution on grand juries, pending development of a more thorough policy statement, the council declared that "the use of the grand jury's powers to harass and pursue political dissidents is a departure from its proper constitutional function (to protect citizens from unwarranted prosecutions) and is a great threat to public order, lawful government and true domestic security."

The statement listed a binding procedure for council agencies and urged member churches, which have about 40 million members, to adopt the same course of action.

FBI Maneuvers Land—Two Behind Bars

The March 2 New York Times headline was brief: "Woman Surrenders to Federal Officers in Terrorism Case."

For the surrendering woman, Raisa Nemikin, and her co-worker who was to "surrender" a week later, Maria Cueto, that simple headline cut like a knife. It meant that, instead of vindication, their five-month struggle against FBI intimidation had brought them a "terrorist" label—and probably at least 14 months in jail courtesy of a federal grand jury.

The chain of events that put the two women behind bars started innocuously enough last November when FBI agents appeared at the Episcopal Church's New York office. Cueto worked there as the director of the Episcopal National Commission on Hispanic Affairs, Nemikin as the Commission secretary.

The agents told the women that they were after information about the FALN, a mysterious terrorist band credited with some 50 bombings over the past three years. The FALN claims to be acting in the name of Puerto Rican independence, but every major independista group has denounced its bombing campaign.

Cueto and Nemikin were asked about a man named Carlos Torres, a former Commission member in whose Chicago apartment the FBI had found what it dubbed a "bomb factory." The agents asked the two women what they knew about Torres. They answered, explaining that they knew nothing either about the FALN or Torres' connections to it. That should have been that, but it wasn't.

Over the next week, the FBI agents returned for more questioning and, at one point in a two-hour grilling, accused Nemikin of being uncooperative. Two days later, agents served her church superior with a grand injury subpoena demanding samples from every typewriter in the Episcopal building plus the complete personnel files of Cueto and Nemikin.

The Episcopal official complied—much to the dismay of the two women who had become convinced that the FBI was on a fishing expedition into privileged church affairs. They felt that, by linking the FALN with the church's Hispanic Commission by the grand jury subpoena, the FBI was smearing the Commission as a terrorist front.

Nemikin and Cueto, both Puerto Rican, also felt that the FBI was trying to discredit the Puerto Rican independence movement and harass its Episcopal Church supporters.

In early January, Cueto received another FBI surprise: A grand jury subpoena demanding that the church turn over all its records, documents, notes, etc., relating to the Hispanic Commission from 1970 to 1977, including the names and addresses of all persons who had been involved with the Commission as well as a list of all meetings, conferences and convocations sponsored by the Commission, wholly or in part, and the names and addresses of all persons attending these meetings.

Cueto and Nemikin were appalled. For seven years they had worked to build the trust of the Hispanic community in their efforts. If they turned over the name of every person they had ever had contact with—essentially what the FBI wanted—what would happen to their credibility? How could people be expected to trust a church project that was, in effect, an intelligence gathering arm of the FBI?

Episcopal clergy and lay people moved to quash the subpoena. New York Bishop Paul Moore called it "an invasion of the confidentiality necessary to the effective working of a religious body." But the top Episcopalian hierarchy refused to challenge the subpoena. Instead, Presiding Bishop John Allin, in return for the formal dropping of the subpoena, turned over everything the government wanted voluntarily.

Meanwhile, Cueto and Nemikin themselves appeared before the grand jury, after several postponements, in mid-February. Both refused to testify and challenged the propriety of the FBI-inspired grand jury subpoenas.

But their challenge fell on deaf ears. Both were immunized, then found in contempt after they refused to answer sweeping questions about the FALN and the Hispanic Commission.

Jailed in early March, Cueto and Nemikin could remain there until the grand jury term expires in May 1978. At that time, they may be resubpoenaed before another grand jury and reincarcerated.

The only thing that will free them before next spring is a show of citizen outrage. The Committee of Concerned Church Persons Against Grand Jury Abuse (475 Riverside Dr., Rm. 1700A, N.Y., N.Y. 10027), which holds that the misuse of the grand jury in this case represents an attack on "the relationship of trust and confidence upon which the existence of the believing community exists," is now working to build that citizen pressure.

One of the least pleasant surprises in the Cueto-Nemikin case outlined above has been the conduct of the federal district court judge who found the two women in contempt, Marvin Frankel.

Frankel's name should sound familiar to grand jury reformers. His 1975 New Leader magazine article on grand jury reform was widely praised and won him the reputation as the district court judge most sensitive to grand jury abuse.

In the Cueto-Nemikin affair, however, Judge Frankel's rulings have ignored some of the very abuses his magazine piece criticized, and his new see-no-evil posture has legislative implications.

The Grand Jury Reform Act, H.R. 94, sponsored by Rep. Joshua Eilberg proposes to curb immunity abuse by establishing standards which judges can evoke to strike down immunity orders meant to trap grand jury witnesses behind bars.

But if the pressure-cooker atmosphere of a politically inspired grand jury investigation is enough to make a sensitive jurist like Judge Frankel lose sight of civil liberty, will his less sensitive colleagues actually follow legislative standards and refuse improper government immunity requests?

Congressman John Conyers, Jr., has answered that rhetorical question by including in his H.R. 3736 a provision for consensual immunity. This would give the witnesses to be immunized, in addition to the courts, the power to reject immunity traps.

What To Do When the FBI Knocks—A Primer for Pastors

(By Dean M. Kelley)[1]

On November 18, 1976, two agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation visited the Episcopal Church Center in New York City, national headquarters of the denomination, to obtain information about one or more members of the National Commission of Hispanic Affairs (NCHA). Explaining why they came, the agents said that correspondence from the commission had been discovered during an FBI search of an apartment in Chicago rented in the name of Carlos Alberto Torres. The same search turned up materials suited for the making of bombs, the agents said along with literature of the Fuerzas Armadas Liberacion Nacional (FALN), a self-described Puerto Rican terrorist group. Either by its own claim or by official attribution the FALN has been connected with some 58 bombings in the past 32 months, including the January 1975 bombings of Fraunces Tavern in New York City, in which four persons were killed and 55 injured. Torres is now considered a fugitive; the FBI wanted to know anything that might help find him.

The agents met first with Bishop Richard Martin, coordinator of the church's programs for minorities, and then interviewed Maria Cueto, then executive director of the NCHA, and her secretary, Raisa Nemikin. In separate interviews lasting several hours, the two women identified a photo of Torres, and explained his service on the Theological Committee and the Theological Development Task Force of the commission. According to their account, they answered all questions put to them within the limits of their knowledge, and they believe the agents were satisfied with the results of the interrogation.

Four days later, however, agents reinterviewed the two women, with the approval of Bishop Martin and his superior, Bishop Milton Wood. No attorney was present. On this occasion Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin declined to answer further questions, and [Ms. Cueto was threatened with a grand jury supoena]. Early in January, both women were subpoenaed to appear before a Federal grand jury in Manhattan, but again they refused to answer questions. They gave several grounds for their silence, the main one being that by responding they would violate the confidence and trust of persons working with the Hispanic Commission. Early in March 1977 the court rejected their claims and, when they once more refused to answer, imprisoned them for contempt of court. At this writing they are still held in the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

On their first visit to the Church Center, the FBI agents asked permission from Bishop Wood to take samples of the imprint of various typewriters. In the belief that refusal would imply lack of trust in the employees of the center, Bishop Wood approved the request. Later in November some eight or nine FBI agents were admitted to the premises after working hours, observed only by a custodian with poor sight. Critics of this action contend that no one can be sure what the agents search, what they saw, what they obtained. According to The New York Times, there is some evidence that files wholly unrelated to the Hispanic Commiseion were searched. Bishop Wood has denied that the agents inspected any records other than those of the NCHA.

In its November visits the FBI, according to Bishop Wood, had asked for "any travel or meeting expenses that Mr. Torres might have in connection with the church that might give them some information as to his whereabouts or leads." The bishop said that the information furnished to the agents was "quite public, which you can get here or can have for the asking." When the agents came back about the first of December asking for more information, the church, on the advice of counsel, requested a subpoena "for the protection of all those concerned at that point." In response to the subpoena, the information requested for the years 1974–1976, which Bishop Wood claims was "nonconfidential," was turned over to the court.

Early in January Presiding Bishop John M. Allin was served with a subpena requiring (in the words of Bishop Wood) that he supply the grand jury with the "same kind of information for the years '70 to '73 which had already been supplied for the years 1974–76." According to other sources, the information requested included personnel files, lists of members and associates of the Hispanic Commission and minutes of meetings. The Presiding Bishop's attorney persuaded the United States Attorney to withdraw the subpoena in return for the voluntary submission of material described by the church as "public" information. The material included: the names of commission members since its beginning in 1970; dates and places of all commission meetings since its founding; travel accounting records for persons who were being investigated in connection with the grand jury proceedings; biographical material which had been prepared and supplied by these persons; a list of all grant recipients in the Hispanic program since its inception; employment application forms "which contained no confidential information"; and samples of typewriter and copy-machine impressions.

Bishop Allin agreed to pay fees for attorneys chosen by Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin. On March 15, however, he issued a statement characterizing their refusal to testify as "against the policy of the church." They were placed on "leave of absence" and their pay was suspended, on the ground that their inability to perform their duties resulted from actions of their own choice—that is, their decision to go to prison rather than answer questions about persons connected with the commission.

Abuse of Power?

Anyone familiar with the case will understand that the foregoing is a bare-bones outline of a complicated series of events. Even without additional details, however, it will be clear why the episode has generated a several-sided controversy. Inevitably, questions both of fact and of principle arise. Are the two women obstructing justice, or are they heroically defending their own rights and ours against abuse? Have the FBI, the prosecutors, the grand jury and the courts exceeded their powers, or are they merely doing their plodding best to safeguard the public against the violence of urban terror?

At this writing the best answer to these questions is that no one really knows. The two women have not always articulated their positions as clearly as one might hope, and the rhetoric of some of their supporters has been more indignant than informative. At least one ruling in the case was based on Government evidence which the court kept secret. In short, enough facts are available to fuel a raging debate, but not enough for partisans on any side to end the debate by demonstrating the truth of their own view.

But what about the role of the church? Here, it seems, the problem is not the absence of agreed facts but disagreement on what the facts mean. According to unnamed church officials cited by The Times, the "vast majority" of Episcopalians see no dilemma. Fanatic bombers threaten innocent lives; duly constituted law enforcement bodies must act against them; the church has a duty to help. On such grounds Bishops Allin and Wood find themselves unable to understand why the women withhold testimony—unable, therefore, to support their cause. Other responsible churchpeople, including Bishop Paul Moore of New York and former Presiding Bishop John Hines, have been critical of their colleagues' position.

What is important here is the future. If the churches, as one hopes, continue to seek empowerment of the oppressed, churchleaders can expect to encounter such incidents again. The present controversy rises in large part out of an excess of innocence; it points up the need of churchpeople to achieve greater empathy with their allies in the struggle for social justice, greater sophistication about the ways in which that struggle can bring them into conflict with "duly constituted authorities."

In the abstract bishops and vestrypeople, pastors, elders and church bureaucrats may understand that the guardians of law and order are often also the overzealous protectors of the status quo, and that the pursuit of felons can be used, intentionally or otherwise, for the suppression of dissent. But nothing in their life experience prepares them for midnight visits by the FBI, or for the possibility that the quest for a violent criminal may be conducted in ways that do injury to rights and values at least as important as effective law enforcement.

If we are not to learn such lessons by hindsight, an effort of imagination is needed. We should remind ourselves that the churches have sinned more often by undue conformity than by defiance and that some of the best pages in our history record our predecessors' principled stands against kings and emperors and other powers. Even in the post-Watergate, post-Viet Nam era, knowing what we now do about CIA plots and FBI break-ins, we need not be cynical about the US Government, but surely we should be vigilant and skeptical—and well-informed.

In the present context Christians have a special need to be informed about newly controversial aspects of the grand jury system. In the 1950's Congressional investigating committees were the weapon of choice for "exposing" alleged or real Communists and rendering them virtually unemployable. Against the anti-war movement in the '60's, prosecutors favored the use of conspiracy indictments to link such supposed plotters as the Spock-Coffin defendants, the Chicago Seven and the "Catholic Left" at Harrisburg. But the backlash against McCarthyism has made Congressional investigators more circumspect, and most of the jerrybuilt conspiracy indictments failed at trial. Hence the new reliance on the compulsory processes of the grand jury.

Unholy Inquisition

There are many reasons why the grand jury has come into favor with the FBI and with certain prosecutors. Grand jury proceedings are, of course, secret. A witness appears alone; he/she can obtain legal advice only by requesting permission to leave the chamber. Few grand jury members have any conception of their own powers, or of the proper limits to be set on a prosecutor's zeal. Finally, heavy sanctions are available. Lying to a grand jury risks the penalties for perjury. If the judge backs the prosecutor—and most judges do, often almost automatically—silence can bring a jail term for contempt of court, a sentence that can last as long as the life of the jury (18 months or longer), and can then be renewed when the next jury is convened.

Though employed amateurishly in earlier decades, these grand jury powers were brought to a state of systematic effectiveness by Guy Goodwin of the Internal Security Division of the Department of Justice under Richard Nixon. Setting out to apprehend the "Weathermen" and other threats to the Republic, he subpoenaed Leslie Bacon all the way from New York to Seattle to tell what she knew about bombs set off in the Capitol in Washington (D.C., not the state). Other persons, supposed to know something about such crimes, were called before grand juries, often distant from their homes, sometimes with only a few days' or hours' notice.

A perceptive article by Judge Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis in The New Leader (Nov. 10, 1975) makes vividly clear what can happen at this stage. (Ironically, it was Judge Frankel, a highly respected jurist, who sent Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin to jail.) The article cites actual questions put to a witness by an Internal Security prosecutor before a grand jury in Tucson, Arizona:

"Tell the grand jury every place you went after you returned to your apartment from Cuba; every city you visited, with whom and by what means of transportation you traveled, and who you visited at all of the places you went during the time of your travels after you left your apartment in Ann Arbor, Michigan in May of 1970.

"I want you to describe for the grand jury every occasion during the year 1970 when you have been in contact with, attended meetings which were conducted by, or been any place when an individual spoke whom you knew to be associated with or affiliated with Students for a Democratic Society, the Weathermen, the Communist party, or any other organization advocating revolutionary overthrow of the United States, describing for the grand jury who was present and what was said by all persons there and what you did at the time that you were in these meetings, groups, associations or conversations."

A subpoenaed witness can ask the court that impaneled the grand jury to quash the subpoena, but courts are usually loath to do so. A witness can claim one of a few very narrow privileges against answering (confidentiality of communication between lawyer and client, priest and penitent and, in some jurisdictions, physican and patient or husband and wife). A witness may also assert the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, but at that point he/she may first be given immunity against prosecution deriving from that testimony and then ordered by the court to answer the questions, under pain of contempt of court. One major problem with this kind of immunity (it is called "use immunity") is that even though it forbids direct use of a person's testimony against him/her, it can furnish leads to other ways of building a case. Obviously, then, its effect is to cancel out, or at least to weaken severely, the Constitution's ban on self-incrimination.

Witnesses sometimes appeal to the First Amendment, arguing that their right to freedom of association will be abrogated if they are compelled to tell the names of others with whom they have been associated in quite innocent activities. For experience has shown that the persons named may then be subjected to investigation, and their neighbors, employers, fellow employees and friends may be interrogated by the FBI, sometimes in intentionally embarrassing ways. The courts, however, have not been very receptive to such claims.

And there is still another pitfall: A claim of right or privilege not to answer may be asserted too late. Courts have often ruled that by answering seemingly innocuous questions ("What kind of work do you do?") one has waived any right to refuse later questions in the same line of investigation ("For whom did you agree to print handbills urging a boycott of General motors?") To guard one's rights, then, the only safe course is to give only one's names, address and serial number and refuse to answer substantive questions until the court has ruled on one's claims. If the court denies the claims, as it often does, the only way to avoid violating one's principles may be to go to jail.

Despite the evident potential for abuse of these coercive powers, to the person on the street (or the bishop in his office), the very name of the grand jury evokes favorable associations. There are historical reasons for this attitude. As recently as Watergate, "runaway" grand juries have helped expose official wrongdoing. At its earliest introduction, in England in the 12th century, the grand jury was obviously an improvement over trial by ordeal, and on some occasions it served to check the arbitrary use of royal power.

In our own history, grand juries were often bulwarks for the colonists against the wrath of royal governors, most famously in 1743 in the case of John Peter Zenger, a newspaper publisher who criticized the governor. The governor sought to have Zenger indicted for libel, but two grand juries refused. Prior to the Civil War grand juries in the North often refused to indict persons charged with violating the Fugitive Slave Law. But these very examples point to the ease with which the grand jury is politicized, and its considerable, little-supervised powers turned to less noble purposes. After the Civil War, for instance, terrorist activities by the Ku Klux Klan often went unpunished because Southern grand juries would not return indictments.

Another widespread misconception which helps validate the grand jury in the popular mind is the belief that it functions as an arm of the judiciary rather than as an instrument of the executive. In this view the grand jury simply weighs the evidence brought to it by the prosecutor to determine whether there is a sufficient basis ("probable cause") to justify putting a citizen on trial for his/her life or liberty. This some believe, also justifies grand jury secrecy, so that, if no indictment is returned, no one's reputation is impugned.

The difficulty is that this is only one theory (or ideal) of grand jury functions—and it is not the theory under which the FBI, most prosecutors and most courts are now acting. In current practice grand juries are considered to have investigative responsibilities as well as evaluative. Prosecutors ardently favor this theory, judges back them up, and jurors themselves almost invariably go along. The consequence is an enormous increase in the powers of government over citizens.

Much of that power accrues to the FBI. Congress has repeatedly refused to give subpoena powers to the bureau, but when it is working in sympathetic collaboration with a prosecutor, its agents can threaten recalcitrant witnesses with a grand jury appearance. Not only can they so threaten, but they frequently have and still do; witness the case of Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin.

No one questions the importance of law enforcement in society, or the need of law enforcement agencies to act with authority. To understand the very real conflict of values under study here, however, one must distinguish between legitimate and illegitimate uses of power. Obviously the police, prosecutors and courts are simply doing their job when they pursue lawbreakers, especially those who commit acts of violence. Even in such cases, of course, the vigor of their pursuit must be tempered by concern for due process of law. But the real difficulty rises because these same agencies of government tend to lump together with criminals all persons whose opinions or styles of life challenge the established order.

In the long run such persons may contribute to the well-being of society, as did the agitators for abolition of slavery, the rights of labor, women's suffrage and the civil rights of minorities. But when their ideas are new and controversial, they are a source of trouble and disruption, regardless of how law-abiding and peaceable their efforts for change may be; and in the eyes of the law's custodians they are not only objects of suspicion but proper targets for harassment and intimidation. Usually, moreover, there is widespread public support for such attitudes, and never more so than when (as sometimes happens) a movement for social change is afflicted by the presence of a lunatic fringe of fanatics willing to use violence to compel public attention. The syllogism goes like this: The FALN demands independence for Puerto Rico; FALN members are terrorist bombers; therefore all who advocate an independent Puerto Rico are violent criminals, and any great concern for their civil rights is misplaced.

A. Plenitude of Targets

Few of us would consciously endorse such logic—or deny that despite its faults it has subliminal power. The trouble is that even fewer understand how often such logic has been and is being invoked in our own day, specifically in support of unchecked, wide-ranging grand jury activities that observe few if any limits on the use of the jury's coercive powers. Such tactics have been employed against the antiwar movement, the student radical movement, the American Indian movement, the Chicano movement, the left-wing Roman Catholic movement, the feminist movement and others.

It is worth noting that despite all the indictments that have resulted, there have been few convictions. The principal effect, whether so intended or not, has been disrupting these movements, sowing divisions within them, draining their energy, sopping up their money and diverting them from the entirely legitimate work they want to do. Quite apart from the erosion of our liberties and the harm done to individuals, this represents a social cost, a loss of ideas and pressures we need.

But how, more precisely, does it work? Always in ostensible pursuit of perpetrators of heinous crimes, the prosecutors and the FBI summon anyone thought to have any association with a possible suspect ("X") to get information about the person's whereabouts, or information connecting the person with the crime. So much is certainly legitimate law enforcement activity. But then the questioning turns to third parties, though still in reference to the suspect: "Who else was connected with X?" Eventually it may (more often does) come to focus on targets having only the remotest relation to X: "Who else belongs to this organization of which you and X were members?" At this point—when the prosecutor demands names and more names of persons who might have some information about the suspect—the inquiry becomes a fishing expedition, catching many innocent fish.

But if the fish are innocent, what do they have to fear? It is here that bishops and other ultra-respectable persons must use their powers of imagination. What is to be feared is what has often happened: the destruction of relationships, organizations and movements that have a right to exist. Witnesses, especially from minority communities, know perfectly well what they have to fear: Only the obloquy, calumny, suspicion and ostracism that often attach to persons thought to be either criminals or, worse, delators, informers, "stool-pigeons." When one of my associates enters the grand jury room, I have no way of knowing what goes on. Did he/she give them my name? What did she/he say about me? Will the FBI be looking into my affairs, my bank account, my past associations and activities? Nothing the witness says afterward can completely dispel the suspicion that he/she told everything and that, even if all was innocent, it may cause trouble anyway. It would be good if everyone could have confidence in the safety of the innocent from official abuse, but history, and the life experience of the poor and oppressed, do not encourage such confidence. We tend to associate rough, prolonged grillings with the Gestapo or the KGB. But there are some among us who know of such things from personal experience in America.

In the Cueto-Nemikin case, exactly these themes are being played out in the community, and this despite the principled stand the two women appear to have taken. It may well be that their sacrifice was irrelevant, on the likely assumption that the FBI had already obtained the names of persons and organizations connected with the Hispanic Commission. According to one source, NCHA records have furnished "leads" for investigations in New Mexico, California, Colorado, Florida, Ohio, Washington, D.C. and Texas. Episcopal bishops in Puerto Rico, Chicago and Colorado have been visited. Episcopal clergy and parishes in Puerto Rico, California and Colorado have been investigated. In short, because of the search for one fugitive who belonged to the commission for less than one year and who reportedly attended only a handful of meetings, all persons who worked with the NCHA in any capacity are under suspicion and subject to investigation as possible FALN members or sympathizers.

It needs no imaginative effort to grasp the devastating effect this can have, since the devastation is already happening. Credible information suggests that not only Hispanic but other minority communities are drawing away: "You work with the Episcopals and what happens? They give your name to the FBI." It does not greatly matter whether the FBI and the prosecutors intend these effects (out of a general purpose to intimidate "radicals"), or whether the intimidation is a side effect of an overzealous, overhearing disregard for the rights of citizens. Regardless of purpose, the effects do occur.

In the present instance, it is sadly ironic that the effects have occurred in the context of an effort by the church to make contact with an alienated population.

By its too-eager, too-innocent collaboration with the FBI, the Episcopal leadership has frustrated the threshold task of any such mission, the establishment of a relationship of trust. Instead of proving itself worthy of confidence, the church now appears to many minority persons as a naive or callous "stool pigeon."

A Posture for the Church

Rather than dealing only in hindsight judgments, however, this review should issue in some sort of guidelines for the future. An immediate caution: No set of guidelines can be complete, not only because circumstances differ radically from case to case, but also because in many areas the law is confused. Competent counsel is needed, not necessarily from "radical lawyers" but certainly from attorneys familiar with the territory.

At the outset there is a question of the church's attitude toward its own relationship with the civil power. It was not too long ago or far away that the civil arm had no jurisdiction over the employees of the church, and that the church could offer sanctuary even to nonemployees sought as criminals if they reached its premises. In present-day America the churches would not make such claims, but the historical reference is a useful reminder that the churches are not simply subagencies of the state. They need not, for instance, simply acquiesce when, as in the present case, a court takes upon itself the right to define which activities of a church are properly "religious." (The court said the activities of Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin were to be classified as "social work" rather than any form of "religious" ministry.) At the very least, the First Amendment right of free association is not made weaker when it is coupled with the freedom of religion the amendment also guarantees.

In the nature of things, it is at the beginning of an inquiry that crucial mistakes are most likely. In consequence, several church bodies have already notified their employees that governmental investigators are to be referred to the senior officer of the church for any information about the organization, its present or past employees or other institutional matters, so that secretaries, receptionists, accountants, etc. are not placed in the position of having to respond.

And how should the "senior officer present afloat" respond? The preliminary response once made by the General Counsel of the National Council of Churches to an inquiry from the Internal Revenue Service offers one model. In substance, he replied:

"The relationship between churches and government is a very sensitive one, and a church body is protected by the First Amendment as no other kind of institution is. I am sure neither you nor we would wish to make any missteps here because of haste or carelessness. Many of the legal guidelines are not clear on such matters, and we want to preserve the right to get clarification from a court before taking any steps we might later regret. So if you will particularize in writing what exactly it is that you want, and your authority for asking it, we will review your request and determine what we can appropriately let you have. If at some point we reach a difference of opinion, then we can let the court decide."

This stance, constituting neither defiance nor instance acquiescence, is probably the most prudent course. Another model was offered by a church leader who took a stand in the doorway and said, "No farther!" (The official rather hoped that the governmental agency would challenge him; it did not.) Either strategy would in most cases be preferable to the open-door posture resting on the view that "we have nothing to hide."

Whether the church has anything to "hide" hardly defines what is at issue; in a free country government agents do not have unlimited right of access to the private affairs of citizens, their organizations or—a fortiori—their churches, regardless of the agencies' purposes in demanding such access. Before questions are answered or files are opened, other considerations must be met. What will this do to employees and constituents? What precedents will it set for other churches? What has been the pattern of Government actions in similar situations? (The question is of special pertinence where a grand jury has been or may be convened.)

Suppose that the first strategy has been adopted, the Government has stated its inquiries in writing, and the church leaders must then decide their response. According to The Times, Bishop Allin has now adopted the view, previously urged by some legal authorities, that the church will not in the future turn over personnel files without the permission of the persons concerned; the initial response will be, "Sorry, we don't give that out." The grounding for this can be that personnel files are the joint property of employer and employee.

With respect to information about contributors, again the NCC practice may offer guidance. When asked for correspondence with contributors, the NCC declined on the ground that it considers the correspondence confidential and the identity of contributors not to be divulged. If the IRS were to ask whether a named person gave a claimed amount in a given year, NCC would answer yes or no; it would not supply such names on its own motion.

Who Owns My name?

What about lists of members? The Supreme Court has found that the mere providing of names may indeed be a sensitive matter, when it upheld the refusal of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to divulge its membership list to the state of Alabama (NAACP v. Alabama). In some circumstances, the Court held, freedom of association requires anonymity.

Since law enforcement also has its claims, such an argument would not always prevail. And yet it will be well for church leaders, and for all citizens, to grasp a principle repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court: The freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment have a preferred position in our society. They cannot be abrogated by government except for compelling reasons, and—Mr. Justice Brennan often adds—after a showing by government that those reasons cannot be served in any other way. Here the Court is acting most clearly in our tradition, instructing us in the care and preservation of our liberty. The churches should be no less vigilant.

At the very least, then, they should not lend their cooperation to wide-ranging "fishing expeditions" that will bring innumerate persons under investigation solely through their connections with the church. Surely it will seldom, if ever, occur that the only or the best route to the apprehension of presumed criminals will be to track them to the church. Hence, when agents demand names, church leaders may well decline to comply until a showing has been made, preferably in adversary proceedings, to the effect that the information is genuinely needed and that other leads cannot be obtained in other ways. It should be demonstrated that the benefits disclosure may bring to society in terms of effective law enforcement outweigh the damage that may be done to legitimate interests of the church and its members (see 8 Wigmore Evidence, section 2285 at 527, McNaughton ed., 1961).

It may be granted that several levels of membership exist. Presumably, those who have been elected or selected to leadership positions can be said to have accepted a relatively high degree of visibility. Membership on an official body, such as the Hispanic Commission, may be public information to a greater degree than rank-and-file membership in the church itself. Of even less formal status would be those constituents or "seekers" who come only briefly within the ambit of the church. In general these levels of association with the church should be subject to disclosure in proportion to their eminence.

But even here circumstances alter cases. Church leaders should be knowledgeable enough, and commonsensical enough, to discern when (as in the case of the NAACP in Alabama) known association with a particular body may mean trouble, so that the presumption should be in favor of confidentiality rather than disclosure. In such cases the church should not simply hand over lists but should at most simply answer factual questions: "Was X a member in 1976?" "Yes, he was," or "No, he was not." Anything beyond this would arguably be excessive entanglement of government in the affairs of religion.

Defending his own policy with regard to the recent incidents, Bishop Milton Wood reportedly declared that, "In general, church programs can't be made confidential. The General Convention requires this. This is not Watergate." One wonders, in the first place, whether confidentiality is not more important in the life of the church than the bishop holds, and whether the General Convention can have meant to imply, "in general," church business is government business.

It may well be, for example, that communications or other kinds of information may be freely shared with church members but are not intended to be divulged to others. Consider the example of a church-sponsored study of attitudes among members toward teen-age drug abuse. The study is meant for the use of the church, but its compiler (and the respondents) may very well object to its disclosure to prosecutors pursuing drug abusers, lest members who had expressed opinions be thought to have evidence worthy of official investigation. A church that does not have confidential information of this and other kinds may well question its relevance.

Secondly, and more centrally, it appears that Bishop Wood has learned the wrong lesson from Watergate. The criminals in the original and related Watergate cases were not the officials of the Democratic National Committee, or Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist, or the journalists and others whose telephone lines were tapped. The crimes committed were not those of private citizens wrongfully frustrating their government. No, the criminals acted on behalf of Government officials, in most cases under color of the authority of our Chief Magistrate; and their crime was precisely the seeking of information, by illegal means, that the Government had no legal right to obtain.

Many observers have concluded that the Bill of Rights was never more at risk than during the period before the crimes associated with Watergate were exposed. The lesson to be learned is not new but a platitude: Vigilance is the price of liberty. In practical terms church officials must learn to respect their own rights, the rights of their constituents and their employees. When the agents of government come calling, their demands must be examined with care. It is not intransigence but respect for liberty which suggests the need for the churches to keep government at a distance, to offer poised and reasonable resistance against inroads on their privacy and their mission. It is hard to think of a better place to make a stand on the First Amendment than at the door of the church.

1973 GRAND JURY
OF THE COUNTY OF TULARE,
Visalia, Calif., July 6, 1974.

Honorable Judge JAY R. BALLANTYNE,
Judge of the Superior Court, County of Tulare, Visalia, Calif.

DEAR JUDGE BALLANTYNE: When you impaneled us as the Tulare County Grand Jury in February of 1973, you charged us to investigate all areas of county government. I was amazed but highly pleased when you appointed me as the Foreman. That position I held with pride and gusto for a year, until February of 1974, when I resigned.

Internal conflict and turmoil arose, my motives and actions were questioned, so I resigned in order that peace and harmony could prevail among the majority of the panel.

In the beginning, the area of government that caught my attention, came as the result of many complaints from maligned and abused citizens in the field of "Law and Order". The methods of the courts, the police, the Highway Patrol and the office of the District Attorney were the basis for my zeal as an investigator for the distraught.

Also, as the Foreman, who by tradition has been accorded the honor, responsibility and opportunity of expressing himself personally as to the fairness and credibility of our system of government, I took certain liberties which seemed perfectly valid and normal. I did not know that the establishment would become so irate over my concern for fair play.

The press was generally belligerent and the Editor of the Fresno Bee attacked me editorially, questioned my ability as a leader, my knowledge, my veracity; and by innuendo, he intimated that I was trying to manipulate my Grand Jury. His comments said that the District Attorney should have the green light to run court trials as long as he wishes, forget the long suffering jurors who have to listen through legal pomp and maneuvers, and by all means forget the taxpayer, who pays the bill.

Would not justice be served if someone had the intestinal fortitude to say this case can be handled in a couple of weeks instead of three months? It appears to me that some lawyers like long, drawn out trials, especially if a Hollywood flavor exists. I was told that Grand juries are the "watch dogs" of our system and I still think we need them in that capacity, but their general utility and usefulness is being undermined by the intelligentsia.

I did not seek membership on the jury and I certainly did not ask to be designated its foreman. As a public servant most of my life, I take my oaths and obligations very seriously. At $4 per day and 5 cents a mile for traveling around the county to committee meetings and investigations, a person must be dedicated to say the least. My creed comes from the Sage who said, "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

Only the rich, the retired and the self-employed can afford the luxury of being on a Grand Jury and our lawmakers keep it that way, so that the average citizen, the poor, the common man, the laborers and the dependents of the social order have little or no chance of being selected to serve on a Grand Jury. It is, indeed, a system of government by clique selection. Somebody in Sacramento should wake up and change the procedure for Grand Juries, as the system will collapse as the people, the final judges, will have lost all their faith in the system, as it now exists.

I lament the erosion of individual freedom, the inroads of the police state and the passing of our great form of government due to greed, lust, rule by clique and the bending of laws to suit individuals in power. Justice is often meted out by the rule of economics, rather than by right or wrong.

Among the many obligations listed in your book of instructions to jurors is Section 919 of the code, which admonishes us to inquire as to the welfare of all prisoners and the conditions and management of public prisons, prisoners' rights, their indictments and counsel, etc. The only way to investigate a prison is from the inside and not by being shown through the facility on a given day and eating roast beef for lunch in the trustees mess hall. I chose to go to jail. Suffice to report here that it is quite a transition from being a free man one minute and then the next minute being a 'non-person' on the way to prison. I notice some of the Watergate culprits are given time to go home and change clothes before beginning their terms, but from the Dinuba Justice Court I was accorded no opportunity to go home to get medicine that I regularly take, nor tooth powder and general tolletries and saving supplies. Justices of certain courts show little or no compassion, often shoot from the hip and some have been observed in great anger when aroused by a recalcitrant litigant. This type of justice leaves something to be desired.

In my observation of the county jail, I find the sheriff basically following the rules of the system, poor food, little meat, lots of starch, no vitamins, no fresh milk, no doctor, but plenty of smoking tobacco, little or no exercise, few books to read and little or no training for rehabilitation. I feel strongly, as have other grand juries of the past, that the jail should be converted to a Department of Corrections, as the sheriff has plenty to do without running a jail and trying to rehabilitate criminals or improve the lot of the ignorant, the poor employment risks and the alcoholics. The jail is generally clean, well ventilated and a pretty good looking building, especially from the outside. We need laws that some help be extended to released prisoners as the private sector will not hire and will hardly take a work application from an ex-convict. Public works, a half-way house, or the like may save an unfortunate from being a repeater.

Prospective jurors should be selected from the wide spectrum of our society, not only from the upper class. Everyone should be given a chance to serve, and a jury need not be 12 persons. I firmly believe that 6 normal, intelligent and observant citizens can render a fair and just verdict.

Now, to some specifics. I went to jail, as you know, and for some very specific reasons, to study, to visit and listen. After several years of watching court trials, and especially for the year as Foreman of a Grand Jury, I wanted to visit and confer with the accused and the condemned. I am now convinced that the District Attorney and his operatives often play games with the taxpayers money, by manipulation, intrigue, plea bargaining, inordinate use of stool pigeons, informers and fall guys in order to come up with a conviction. Generally, the philosophy that prevails is that it is whether you win or lose that counts, and not how you play the game.

I lament that the sheriff has to use stool pigeons who play the role of addicts and who collect evidence for many months, and then pull a gigantic "raid" and come up with hundreds of victims arrested en masse. Many are innocent, maligned and their reputations ruined. If a man is caught in an illegal sale or use of narcotics, why wait for months and pick him up in a raid? If illegal trafficking is going on, he should be arrested on the spot. The Board of Supervisors could well look into the appropriations that finance the use of inordinate subterfuge.

I would like to comment on several trials that I studied and observed in action. The Walker trial. There were weeks of preliminary hearing before a Justice of the Peace in Porterville, the Grand Jury was bypassed, and finally an indictment was issued naming two suspects. The most likely suspect on whom a guilty verdict could be obtained was an ex-convict from Illinois. Plea bargaining, legal maneuvers galore, a sick prosecutor, the hiring of a private lawyer, which cost the taxpayers in excess of $5,000, and then after several months the case was finally given to the jury. Vote your conscience the judge told them, but remember that the man on trial for his life is a liar, or words to that effect. How weird.

The Ramon Mendoza case. This young man was found guilty after three trials. Several jurors told me that there certainly was a shadow of doubt that Mendoza did the knifing. I had dinner in a holding tank with Mendoza and ate at the same table. He did not know who I was as I had been booked earlier. I listened to his story after Judge Jacobus sentenced him for murder. I'm convinced that the District Attorney used cruel and inhumane evidence in order to get a conviction. A Chicano has little or no chance to get a fair trial in our social order as the jurors are generally 98 percent Anglo and biased to begin with, and I have heard many, many times, "I'm not prejudiced, but there are too damn many Mexicans in the county . . ." This sort of philosophy has got to be abated. Fair play is fair play, regardless of color, race, creed or sex.

While I did most of my study in the field of "law and order", the police and the court system, I also had many complaints about unfair tax assessments. The rich and the favored in the establishment are apparently given benefits where tax assessment doubts exist, while some of the dissidents are harassed to the point of exasperation. Since at least 1969, when the then Foreman, Richard Keeffe, wrote in his letter to Judge John Locke that there were various inequities in property assessments, particularly in the Three Rivers area, each Grand Jury has been confronted with these unusual assessments in the Three Rivers area. Some have tried to make in-depth studies—all to no avail as the presiding clique generally ruled with the Court House Clique. There are always those who feel that high values on one particular sale determines what the assessment should be on the surrounding property, regardless of the income that the property can produce.

The assessment system as we now know it is a vestige of the Dark Ages and desperately needs overhauling and to be brought into the 21st Century. To do that we will need lawmakers who have vision and foresight, and it is high time that we elect bright young men and shelve the old line "ward heeler" types that seem to prevail today. Income should be the factor that determines what a property should be assessed and not someone's idea of what the market value is. A restored Model T Ford might be worth $3,000, but it is not worth a dime if no one will buy it. Can you imagine a pasture that doesn't have any cows, not saleable or usable for agriculture, not zoneable for commercial or a trailer park and producing no income, being assessed for as high as $10,000 per acre. Ridiculous.

Mr. Raymond Stivers and his associates have been fighting for years against exorbitant assessments and some of the litigants are in danger of losing their property by delinquent tax foreclosure. Many have shown that their property is higher in assessed valuation than property in downtown Visalia and on Mooney Blvd. Strange indeed.

Zone changes, assessments and land use factors are vast fields of controversy and clear guide lines are needed for a more content and stable society. With zoning, the issue is generally decided by who is seeking the zone change, rather than that it is a good thing for the greatest number of citizens.

A case in point is the granting of a zone change by the Board of Supervisors to a Dinuba subdivider, on a 15 acre parcel into lots of less than 1 acre, less than a mile from the city, especially after the Dinuba Planning Commission, the Dinuba City Council and the Tulare County Planning Commission recommended denial, and called the zoning inept, unsuitable and dangerous to the subterranean water supplies and not in the public interest. With arrogance and contempt for other legally constituted bodies of government, the Board of Supervisors unanimously passed the rezoning permit for the subdivider. How strange.

Finally, Your Honor, I will bring my personal observations to a close, although I could write a book. I wish to express concern for our poor people in their desire for recreation. With inflation rampant, gas shortages and crowded areas where people gather, it is of the utmost urgency that our park and recreational areas be enchanced and expanded, and not only those around the Visalia area. The Pixley Park needs attention, and the Kings River Park, on the drawing boards for the better part of a decade, should have our Supervisors' undivided attention. I'd still like to know why and how the park was shifted from the R.B. Oliver Bridge area on Mountain View Avenue (Ave. 416) to a less favorable site with no entrance and no exit after the State of California, the Commission of Parks and Recreation, and anyone that knew anything about parks recommended the original site. The next grand jury could look into that, I tried and could get nowhere. The whole thing is a sorry mess.

The poor people have no lobby, the poor cannot afford to play golf (and by the way there is no shortage of golf courses), their children need to romp and play someplace, as federal and state monies are available. It is in poor taste to use federal revenue sharing funds to enhance a police state by hiring more police and sheriffs to ride up and down county roads, lanes and pathways, trying to impress the public, wasting gas, rubber, polluting the air with fumes in the guise that they are protecting the citizens. Does a fire engine patrol the area looking for fire, or are stations strategically located to be available when needed? The Patrol is one of the big jokes of law enforcement, and we need legislators to look into the effectiveness of the Patrol. When I see a couple of officers riding around looking askance at motorcyclists, long haired teenagers and acting like Gestapo agents, I do not wonder why the gap between the law and our people is widening, rather than coming closer together. Where is the cop on the beat, greeting the taxpayers with a smile and waving his arm in protection, rather than with a threat. We need an enlightening crusade, to bring law and order to the people, and not to see how far we can develop a rift, and alienate our people by arrogance, snobbishness, and the vigilante complex that many of our officers have, especially against minorities and our long haired progeny.

Most sincerely,

E. A. "DUTCH" GLANZER,
The Late Foreman.

[Whereupon, at 12:50 p.m., the hearing adjourned.]

GRAND JURY REFORM

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP
AND INTERNATIONAL LAW
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 9:30 a.m. in room 2237 of the Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Joshua Eilberg [chairman of the subcommittee] presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Holtzman, Hall, Fish, and Sawyer.

Staff present: Garner J. Cline, Arthur P. Endres, Jr., and Martin H. Belsky, counsel; Peter Regis, legislative assistant; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

Before you begin, Mr. Civiletti, I must express my sense of outrage that Attorney General Bell is not here today.

The fact that he has deliberately absented himself from these hearings is a discourtesy to this subcommittee, an affront to the Congress of the United States, and an abdication of his responsibility as the chief law enforcement officer of the land.

This is no slight to you, Mr. Civiletti. We welcome your presence here today.

We had repeatedly suggested to the Attorney General that we thought you should accompany him to these hearings because you are responsible for the actions of all Federal prosecutors.

But this issue is of paramount concern to the Nation, to the Congress, to the courts, and—I would have thought—to the Department of Justice.

It demands the personal involvement and active participation of the Attorney General, himself.

Last year, under a Republican administration, former Attorney General Edward H. Levi personally presented the Justice Department's position to the subcommittee.

The absence of Attorney General Bell is exceedingly curious, because he has not hesitated, up to now, to speak out on this issue—in other places.

Let me set out the record for you:

At Mr. Bell's confirmation hearings in the Senate on January 12, 1977 he was asked a series of questions about proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system.

Mr. Bell said that he would support many grand jury reforms, although he expressed some concern about some proposals.

Specifically he stated, and I now quote:

> There need to be some safeguards built into the—Federal grand jury—system . . . I know there are some abuses in the grand jury system. I have an open mind and I am prepared to do something to make it better. . . .

The very next week I wrote the Attorney General expressing my pleasure at his testimony and offering the assistance of my staff to work with his staff in reviewing my bill H.R. 94.

In that letter I told Mr. Bell:

> To insure closer cooperation in the future, I would like to respectfully recommend that you designate a staff person to meet as promptly as possible with subcommittee staff on grand jury reform issues, and to arrange a convenient time for your testimony before the subcommittee.

Thereafter I had several opportunities to meet the Attorney General informally. Each time he stressed his personal interest in the grand jury issue, and urged that staff-to-staff contacts be made.

On Sunday, February 13, Mr. Bell was on national TV, on "Face the Nation," and was asked about Federal grand jury reform.

The American Bar Association, you will recall, had already passed a resolution supporting most of the reforms in H.R. 94, and was about to vote on more extensive grand jury proposals.

During that telecast Mr. Bell said he would ask the ABA—quote—

> To let me study it. If I have an opportunity, I would say that I just became Attorney General, and I would like to study this question.

The next day, the Attorney General got that opportunity. He went before the ABA's House of Delegates and said—and I quote him again:

> . . .I am told you are going to consider some grand jury reform. I hope, that as a courtesy to me . . . that you would put off any decision . . . until I could have a chance to study it. I won't delay you. Certainly by the next meeting of the House, I would be able to take some position . . . if you will give me that much. I will appreciate it, and I will guarantee you I will be ready by the next meeting of the House.

Because of these expressions of the Attorney General's personal interest in grand jury reform, I directed staff to begin work on our hearings and to work out a schedule to give the Attorney General an adequate opportunity to prepare for them.

Instead of beginning with the administration position, as is our usual procedure, the staff was told to schedule other witnesses first to give the Attorney General more time to put together his position on this matter.

This fact was, of course, communicated to the Attorney General. Meetings were held about policy issues and about an appearance date for Mr. Bell.

The subcommittee staff met repeatedly with Justice personnel. I met with Ms. Wald, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of congressional liaison, to review the issue, to reiterate the need for cooperation, and to emphasize the importance of the Attorney General's participation.

I was, therefore, totally surprised that, in response to my personal request to the Attorney General that he come up here to testify, I received a short letter—almost a form letter—from Ms. Wald that, "The Attorney General has designated Assistant Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti to be the Department's spokesman" at these hearings.

I promptly contacted Justice Department representatives to express my concern over the Attorney General's refusal to appear, and I followed this with a four-page letter to Mr. Bell explaining precisely why I believed it essential that he, personally, present the Justice Department's position.

On June 13, the Attorney General responded, and again I quote:

I believe an Attorney General should speak out on issues of concern to the Department of Justice in various appropriate forums, as the opportunities present themselves, without necessarily incurring an obligation to appear before Congress personally to present these views.

In other words, Mr. Bell seems to be saying that he can talk to the media and interest groups, but that he doesn't have to talk to Congress on those selfsame issues.

Mr. Bell is willing to make statements, but he is not willing to subject himself and his views to detailed questions and, yes, challenges.

As I have said, this is an insult to this subcommittee and to the Congress. It is equally insulting to the American people.

The citizens of this Nation elect their Congressmen to, among other things, oversee the executive branch—and this includes questioning administration officials about the ways that our laws are to be enforced.

Yet the Attorney General apparently believes that he should be exempted from this kind of possibly critical evaluation.

I must say that Mr. Bell's position is not totally consistent. During these first months of the 95th Congress, he has personally testified, or is scheduled to personally testify, on FBI oversight—parole—criminal code reform—and wiretapping, before Subcommittees of both the House and Senate.

Just a week ago today, the Attorney General testified at oversight hearings on the federal judiciary.

In other words, Mr. Bell, a former appellate judge, appears to have been more interested in issues surrounding his former employment than in issues surrounding his present responsibilities.

The issue of grand jury reform is one of national interest and concern.

The ABA is about to vote in August, pursuant to the delay the Attorney General personally requested, on detailed proposals to establish standards for grand jury practices.

The National Council of Churches, the National District Attorneys' Association, the American Newspaper Guild, civil liberties groups, the Grand Jury Federation, the Judicial Conference, and others, have all taken official positions.

Recent law review, newspaper, and magazine articles have all described our review of alleged abuses and proposed reforms.

Recent cases in State and Federal courts—including the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Mandujano and in United States v. Washington—have all reviewed, and often criticized, present grand jury practices.

As I stated in my June 8th letter to the Attorney General, it is disturbing, and even incongruous, that:

. . . A Republican Administration would consider our hearings of sufficient importance to send the Attorney General himself as a witness and a new Democratic Administration, pledging close cooperation with a Democratic Congress, would not.

[The following letters were submitted for the record:]

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 8, 1977.

Hon. GRIFFIN B. BELL,
Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: It was with great concern and disappointment that I received notice that you would not be attending our June 22, 1977 hearing on grand jury reform proposals.

The Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law has been undertaking a comprehensive review of the Federal grand jury system for over two years. The importance of this issue has been demonstrated by the numerous requests of judges, lawyers, citizen groups, state and local government officials, Federal, state and local legislators, and others to appear. In most cases, we have been able to accommodate them and they have testified at our hearings or have submitted statements for our record. That this issue is of paramount concern not only to the public and Congress, but also to the Department of Justice is demonstrated by the fact that your predecessor, former Attorney General Edward H. Levi, personally presented the position of the previous Administration to the Subcommittee last year.

I was, therefore, more than somewhat surprised that, in response to my personal request to you to personally testify, I received a short note from Assistant Attorney General Patricia Wald that "the Attorney General has designated Assistant Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti to be the Department's spokesman" at our hearings. This note was particularly disconcerting in light of the extensive discussions and communications I have had with you and your staff and that my staff has had with the Department of Justice as to working together on the issue of grand jury reform and in setting a date for your testimony.

I feel it necessary to recite the history of our discussions and to restate the importance of your personal attendance at our hearings.

1. At your confirmation hearings on January 12, 1977, you were asked a series of questions about proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system. You stated then that you would support many provisions of a grand jury reform bill, although you expressed some concern about providing an unrestricted right to counsel in the grand jury room. Specifically, you stated: "There needs to be some safeguards built into the [Federal Grand Jury] system . . . I know there are some abuses in the grand jury system. I have an open mind and I am prepared to do something to make it better. . . ."

2. On January 18, 1977, I wrote you expressing my pleasure at your testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on the need for grand jury reform. I offered the assistance of my staff to work with your staff on review of my bill, H.R. 94. I specifically stated: "To insure closer cooperation in the future, I would like to respectfully recommend that you designate a staff person to meet as promptly as possible with Subcommittee staff on grand jury reform issues, and to arrange to convenient time for your testimony before the Subcommittee."

3. Thereafter, I had the opportunity to meet you informally immediately after your confirmation. You told me of your personal interest in the grand jury issue and urged staff to staff contacts be made.

4. On Sunday, February 13, 1977, you were asked on a nationwide "Face the Nation" broadcast about proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system. The American Bar Association, which had already passed a resolution supporting most of the reforms in H.R. 94, was about to vote on more extensive grand jury reform suggestions. You stated that you would ask the A.B.A. "to let me study it. If I have an opportunity, I would say that I just became Attorney General, and I would like to study this question."

5. On February 14, 1977, you went before the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association and said:

"One last thing I would like to say to you is that I have just gotten into the office—it has been a harried if not a harassed life—I know you have a lot of important things you are going to consider here, and I am told you are going to consider some grand jury reform. I hope that, as a courtesy to me, something I would deeply appreciate, is that you would put off any decisions where you are going to change any of our fundamental institutions, where you are going to do anything that might affect the rights of individuals, until I could have a chance to study it. I won't delay you. Certainly by the next meeting of the House, I would be able to take some position on these things. I don't know what issues may be voted on. I have got my book, as a member of the House of Delegates, and about that time I was designated as Attorney General, I became a media event and I have never had a chance to look at the book.

"But if you will, if you will give me that much, I will appreciate it and I will guarantee you I will be ready by the next meeting of the House."

6. Because of these expressions of personal interest in grand jury reform, I directed staff to begin work on our hearings and to schedule other witnesses to allow more time for you to work on a Justice Department position. Staff met repeatedly with Justice personnel; and I met with Ms. Wald, to review the issues and reiterate the need for cooperation and for your personal involvement with the issue, as you had indicated. The date for your testimony was then scheduled, after consultation with your office and Congressional liaison.

7. During the first months of the 95th Congress, you have personally testified or are scheduled to personally testify on FBI oversight, the parole system, criminal code reform, and wiretapping, before subcommittees of both the House and Senate. Surely, grand jury reform, about which you have expressed such a deep personal interest, is of equal importance to these issues.

The issue of grand jury reform is one of national interest and concern. The A.B.A. is about to vote in August, pursuant to the delay you requested, on detailed proposals to establish standards for grand jury practices. The National Council of Churches, the National District Attorney's Association, the American Newspaper Guild, civil liberties groups, grand jury federations, the Judicial Conference, and others have all taken official positions. Recent law review, newspaper, and magazine articles have all described our review of alleged abuses and proposed reforms. Recent cases in the state and Federal courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Mandujano and United States v. Washington have all reviewed, and often criticized present grand jury practices.

To restate my request made on May 2, 1977, "because of the importance of the subject matter of these hearings and the need to obtain the most complete views of the Department of Justice. . . , I would appreciate your personal appearance before the Subcommittee." It would be incongruous that a Republican Administration would consider our hearings of sufficient importance to send the Attorney General himself as a witness and a new Democratic Administration, pledging close cooperation with a Democratic Congress, would not.

Sincerely yours,

JOSHUA EILBERG.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 13, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and the International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letter of June 8 concerning your upcoming hearings on grand jury reform.

One point made forcefully in that letter is the seriousness and importance of the hearings' subject matter. I share your view that the issues related to grand jury reform are profoundly significant.

For that reason, I have asked Benjamin Civiletti to be my spokesman, and the Department of Justice's spokesman, on this subject. As Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division, Ben is charged with performing duties, along with this assignment, of great importance to the Department.

It is true that I too have spoken out on this subject—on February 13 on "Face the Nation" and on February 14 before the ABA House of Delegates. I believe an Attorney General should speak out on issues of concern to the Department of Justice in various appropriate forums, as the opportunities present themselves, without necessarily incurring an obligation to appear before Congress personally to present these views. During the beginning of any new Administration, many cabinet officers, including myself, are required to act personally as a spokesman for the Department until their assistants are officially in place.

Now that most of my assistant attorneys general have been confirmed, I am striving to make the Department work more efficiently by delegating important responsibilities including appearances before Congress to those assistants most knowledgeable in the area who have my trust and confidence. Ben Civiletti is my personal choice to appear at this hearing and present the Department's views.

Very best regards.

Yours sincerely,

GRIFFIN B. BELL,
Attorney General.

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 28, 1977.

HON. GRIFFIN B. BELL,
Attorney General, Department of Justice,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I have just been informed that it is still the intention of the Department of Justice to present its position on H.R. 94 and other grand jury reform proposals through the testimony of Assistant Attorney General Civiletti.

I would like to reiterate my personal request that you attend the hearings to present the position of the Department and the Carter Administration.

I have detailed the reasons for my request in my letter of June 8th, which I am attaching.

We are looking forward to hearing from you tomorrow. The hearing commences at 9:30 a.m. in room 2237 Rayburn House Office Building.

Sincerely,

JOSHUA EILBERG.

Attachment.

Mr. EILBERG. You may proceed, Mr. Civiletti.

TESTIMONY OF BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. CIVILETTI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate your expressions just given with regard to your view and the committee's view regarding the importance of the matter before you and particularly the appearance of the Attorney General.

I am not here to debate or to make representations with regard to that appearance.

I do not want to let my silence in that regard seem as if I acquiesce in all of the things which you have said.

The Attorney General early on in February began working on grand jury reform analyses, and I think some time in March—I may be mistaken, it may have been early April—assigned, as is typical with major legislation, assigned a chief person responsible for meeting, coordinating, and conducting an extensive study. The Attorney General allocated—his office allocated at that time those—and hard choices they were—those matters as to which physically he would be able to, testify personally. With 18 subcommittees and 11 full committees, of course, it is impossible for the Attorney General to appear before every important committee, and on every important piece of legislation.

Each committee, and each committee chairman, rightfully so, feels that their matters are of extreme importance. And I understand that fairly early on you were advised of that circumstance, and you rightfully persisted in bringing to the Attorney General's attention the fact that you considered and the committee considered this matter to be such that his personal appearance would be necessary.

The Attorney General, I think, responded to those assertions in saying in effect that allocations of time were unfortunately necessary and that he intended and had designated me to testify.

This is all I have to say on that subject.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Civiletti, on that subject, you are aware that the subcommittee had a hearing scheduled 1 week ago today, at which time the Attorney General was scheduled to testify before another subcommittee of this committee.

Do you have any idea how that priority was decided—that he would appear before some other subcommittee rather than this one?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think it does not at all relate to the timing sequence. I think it rather relates, as I said, to the initial assignments and scheduling priorities as to which matters, of all the important matters that he receives, he can testify to personally and which he determines, although he will follow very closely and approve and review what is done, someone else physically will express his views and the views of the Department and hopefully competently.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you know how he arrived at those priorities, that he should personally testify at hearings on parole, oversight hearings on the Federal judiciary, hearings on wiretapping? Do you have any information as to how those priorities are established?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. I think they involve probably a lot of factors, including other commitments that were made before that, meetings that are underway, trips out of Washington, things of that sort, as well as the individual merits of the particular hearings, the subject matter, the testimony.

Mr. EILBERG. I must observe, that I have had numerous personal contacts with the Attorney General and I believe that we had a substantial commitment from him to appear before this subcommittee. So I really cannot accept your response as an answer for the Attorney General.

Mr. CIVILETTI. May I proceed, sir?

Mr. EILBERG. You may read the statement or summarize the statement, whatever is your preference——

Mr. CIVILETTI. I would like to—I will certainly serve your wishes—I would like to read a portion of the full statement and submit the remainder for the record.

It is rather long and I don't wish to occupy your time simply by reading. I would much prefer to in due course respond to your questions, if I can, and perhaps summarize some points in the testimony which are more fully elaborated on in the text.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection then, the statement will be made a part of the record, and please proceed in your own way.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Benjamin R. Civiletti follows:]

STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I am pleased to be here today to present for your consideration the views of the Department of Justice on H.R. 94, a bill to "reform" the federal grand jury.

At the outset, let me confirm the Attorney General's and the Department of Justice's overriding interest in preserving and protecting the fundamental rights of all citizens in the administration of justice and in the delivery of criminal justice. Many of our proposals made to this Congress have demonstrated that deep commitment and additional proposals and reviews to those ends are underway. Our most important government institutions and systems are designed and have evolved to guarantee constitutional rights, preserve balance and maintain a free and independent society.

Beyond clear constitutional rights, we welcome and support improvements to any aspect of the federal system of justice which permit it to perform its functions better, more effectively, and more responsibly. In particular, we welcome and support improvements to the grand jury system, and we commend and appreciate the efforts of this Committee and its Chairman, Congressman Eilberg. The grand jury system is a particularly pertinent subject for attention because it is a bulwark of our criminal justice system functioning under the sound superintendence of the federal courts for two hundred years as an integral and indispensable part of that system.

Proper consideration of improvements in the grand jury system yields many different and stimulating ideas for change whether legislative, judicial or administrative. The Department of Justice has studied and reviewed proposed improvements in the grand jury system in this light and will continue to do so. We are convinced that few systems are perfect. On the whole, we believe the federal grand jury system is sound. It has served well throughout the history of our Republic, and continues to serve, as an effective, fair and essential institution for the investigation of criminal activity and the initiation of complaints or charges, which begin our adversarial system of guilt or innocence to be determined in a fair trial on the merits.

That is not to state or even suggest that we reject or ignore points or improvements to the grand jury system raised by provisions of H.R. 94; nor is it to deny that some abuses of the grand jury system have occurred, although we may not always agree on specific cases. It must be remembered that federal grand juries conduct tens of thousands of investigations each year. The fact that, on rare occasions (and I am unaware of any basis for alleging that their incidence is other than rare), some error or alleged abuse occurs within that system is not sufficient to condemn the system. Likewise we cannot assure that abuses of the grand jury will not occur in the future; so long as there are human frailties involved as a part of that system, just as with any other institution, occasional abuses may be inevitable. Of course, no abuses are excusable and all are regrettable. We share your deep interest to eliminate the occurrence of grave error and to preserve the function and integrity of the grand jury process.

We are committed to join and cooperate with Congress and this Committee in your strenuous efforts and our mutual goals to provide the public the best and soundest criminal justice system obtainable and fair and just persons to serve it.

The Department of Justice is committed to many of the principles of improvement which underlie provisions of H.R. 94 and which have been suggested by others. For example, a prosecutor has a duty to disclose to the grand jury any substantial evidence of the innocence of a putative defendant known to the prosecutor; a prosecutor should not recommend to the grand jury nor sign an indictment returned by the grand jury if the evidence presented is legally insufficient; a prosecutor should not present to the grand jury evidence known to him or her to be unconstitutionally obtained; a prosecutor should not use a grand jury to procure evidence for preparation for pending trial; prosecutors should not harass or unreasonably delay witnesses; all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded; arguments impermisible at trial should not be made to a grand jury; prosecutors should scrupulously preserve grand jury secrecy; the court's charge to the grand jury should be full and complete and available to the grand jury in writing for referral, among others.

At the same time, we must bear in mind that the grand jury system has the purpose and duty to investigate criminal action without fear or favor and to lawfully pursue evidence no matter how deeply hidden, cleverly disguised or powerfully resisted. We oppose those proposals on statutory provisions which would seriously weaken the institution of the grand jury or impede or impair the fair administration of criminal justice.

Let me now advise you in greater particularity of the Department of Justice position with respect to some of the more significant provisions in H.R. 94.

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

Section 2 of the bill would amend 28 U.S.C. 1826, in part so that the present eighteen-month limit on confinement for civil contempt would be reduced to six months; and also so that a witness who had once been held in civil contempt could not be confined again, either for civil or criminal contempt, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide information concerning the same transaction.

In return for the substantial benefits of order, liberty, and peace that it confers upon its citizens, our society also imposes upon them certain basic obligations such as the duty to perform service as a juror and to testify truthfully when summoned before a court, grand jury, or other lawful proceeding. Viewing the matter in this context, the Department of Justice opposes any substantial weakening of the present civil contempt remedy as inimical to the public interest. The power to compel citizens to testify, as the Supreme Court has often noted, is one of the most important and necessary powers of government in an ordered society. E.g., Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U.S. 52, 93 (1964). To do justice, the government must frequently depend upon the contempt process with respect to persons who refuse, for reasons other than a legally recognized privilege, to perform their civic duty under law to provide evidence with respect to a possible violation of federal criminal laws to a grand jury or court. In our view, it does not necessarily follow that, because a witness has been confined for six months, the witness will not finally relent and testify. On the other hand, the present eighteen-month maximum period of confinement permitted for civil contempt under 28 U.S.C. 1826 is, we agree, beyond what is necessary to assure that the civil contempt mechanism have ample opportunity to achieve its purpose of securing the witness's compliance. Accordingly, we favor a reduction of the maximum period of confinement allowed for civil contempt purposes to twelve months.[1]

We are, however, opposed to the bill's proposal for restrictions on confinement for criminal contempt for subsequent refusals to testify involving the same transaction. This would lead to the intolerable result that a witness could refuse to testify before a grand jury, suffer a brief confinement for civil contempt, obey the order and testify, and then subsequently refuse to testify at trial, and the trial judge would be powerless to do anything about the contempt. In our view, the existing laws relating to the use of criminal contempt, as interpreted by the federal courts, operate fairly to balance the rights of the witness and the rights of society and to guard against any attempt to abuse the limited successive contempt power.[2]

WITNESS IMMUNITY

Section 3 of the bill would amend the present compulsion of testimony provisions in 18 U.S.C. 6001 et seq., which provide for prohibition on direct or indirect use of compelled testimony or information, and would reinstate the law on this subject essentially as it existed prior to 1970, so that a witness compelled to testify would receive a complete "transactional" immunity from prosecution merely be adverting generally to a particular offense. The bill would also condition the granting of immunity upon the court's need to be satisfied that various circumstances were present including a finding by the court that the proposed immunity recipient's testimony or information "may be necessary to the public interest".

The "use immunity" approach under 18 U.S.C. 6001 et seq. the constitutionality of which was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1972 Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, has distinct advantages to society over the "transactional" immunity approach. First, it eliminates the conferring, upon a witness who has committed a criminal offense, of unnecessarily broad immunity against any criminal liability at all, and substitutes only the protection from use of compelled testimony required by the Constitution. Thus, unlike "transactional" immunity, the "use immunity" process does not create the risk that a witness, who is subsequently and independently found to be more deserving of prosecution than originally thought, will be absolutely immune from prosecution despite the existence of such independent evidence. Second, "use immunity" removes the incentive for a witness to give wide-ranging but incomplete and shallow testimony. "Transactional immunity" encourages such testimony, while failing to encourage complete candor, specificity, and detail, for it provides absolution for every offense touched upon, however lightly. A witness compelled to testify under the 1970 statute, and thereby afforded "use immunity" no broader than constitutionally required, legally stands to gain little or nothing by his testimony and lacks motivation to withhold or to fabricate evidence.[3]

[1] This does not mean that a court is required to keep a recalcitrant witness in confinement for up to the maximum permissible period under the statute. A court is free to conclude at any time that further incarceration of a recalcitrant witness will not cause the witness to relent and testify, and, upon such grounds, to release the witness from confinement.

We also oppose the bill's proposal to require that a court be satisfied, and not only the Department of Justice, that the granting of immunity may be in the public interest. This is to involve the judiciary in prosecutive policy and functions and poses serious constitutional questions under the separation of powers. Deciding the uses to be made in the public interest of immunity grants as prosecutive tools requires the Department of Justice to bring to bear, upon a frequently complex set of facts, all of its experience, information, and judgment, in weighing such factors as the seriousness of the crime that the witness will be used to prove, his own culpability in that crime, the potential otherwise for prosecuting the case, and others. Such appraisals are inappropriate to the judiciary and, incidentally, would often disqualify the judge involved from presiding or continuing to preside at the trial of the case.[4]

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

Section 5 of the bill would create criminal sanctions to protect grand jury proceedings from improper disclosures, a concept which the Department of Justice supports. The section establishes two levels of offenses. Under subsection (a), it would be made a petty offenses, punishable by a maximum of six months in prison and a $500 fine, for anyone knowingly to disclose any matter occurring before a federal grand jury. Subsection (b) would punish the same conduct of knowing disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury by up to five years in prison and a $20,000 fine, if the disclosure was made with the intent to secure compensation, to affect the actions or decisions of the grand jury, to affect further legal proceedings against a witness, or to affect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of the investigation.

Subsection (c) exempts from both offenses disclosures authorized by law, that is, disclosures to or by an attorney for the government in the performance of his duties, judicially authorized disclosures, and disclosures by witnesses[5] and their counsel[6] of matters concerning the witness's appearance before the grand jury.

Subsection (d) exempts from the petty offense provision disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

Subsection (e) exempts from the felony offense provision disclosure by any representative of the press, broadcasting or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

Under present law, the only criminal sanction available for a disclosure of grand jury matters in violation of Rule 6(e), F.R.Crim.P., is contempt. Because

[3] The contrary allegation that testimony compelled pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6002 is "less reliable" than testimony compelled from a witness who has been granted "transactional" immunity, which was contained in the statement of Richard Gerstein on behalf of the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association submitted to this Subcommittee on March 17, 1977, was based on the proposition that "use immunity can be a subtle invitation to perjury. . . . Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him." However, this premise is inaccurate. Under 18 U.S.C. 6002, a witness' compelled testimony may not be utilized to impeach him. E.g., United States v. Frumento, 552 F. 2d 534 (3d Cir. 1977) (en banc). Thus, the conclusion of the American Bar Association's Criminal Justice Committee with respect to the inferior reliability of "use immunity" compelled testimony is without foundation. Indeed, for the reasons noted above, quite the contrary is the case.

[4] The Department of Justice is aware that some apparently favor a proposal to bar a grant of immunity unless, among other things, the witness himself consents. See H.R. 3736. Such a proposal would mean, in effect, an end to immunity and borders upon the irresponsible. Not only would such a law encourage attempts at intimidation (to induce the witness not to consent), it would reflect the indefensible view that criminal justice is to be measured by the often distorted values of accomplices and associates of accused wrongdoers (the class of persons to whom, typically, immunity is extended). Organized crime and official corruption would certainly prosper if the government were ever forced to play by those rules.

[5] The bill defines "disclosure by a witness" to allow any other person to disclose matter that was learned from a witness.

[6] Under Section 7 of this bill counsel for a witness could be permitted inside the grand jury room, and counsel would be authorized to make disclosure of what transpired in the grand jury. The Department is opposed to both of these provisions, for the reasons to be given in discussing Section 7 of the bill.

of the legal problems associated with contempt actions, the Department of Justice supports the concept of enacting legislation specifcally to punish the unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

In our judgment, however, the approach taken in H.R. 94 is not entirely satisfactory. In particular, we suggest that the distinctions in terms of intent embodied in the bill with respect to the gravity of the offense may not be justified. While acting with bad intent is often a basis in crimianl law for imposing or increasing the penalties for certain conduct, intent has little relevance to a prohibition designed to preserve the secrecy of grand jury information. For example, a breach of secrecy for money would not necessarily be more serious than a breach of secrecy otherwise motivated. Nor would a disclosure for the purpose of affecting a legal proceeding be necessarily more harmful than a disclosure with the idea of causing some public scandal or bringing a prosecutor or grand juror into disrepute. All things considered, we suggest that a unitary offense be created which would eliminate the element of certain specific intent associated with the improper disclosure; any knowing disclosure in violation of the secrecy prohibition should be punishable. Because the offense would be new and there is not showing as yet of the need for felony treatment, we think it should be graded as a misdemeanor, punishable by up to one year in prison and a suitable fine.

EXCUSING WITNESSES WHO PLAN TO INVOKE THE FIFTH AMENDMENT

Section 6 of the bill would prevent a witness from being taken before a grand jury if the witness notified the attorney for the government in writing that he intended to exercise his Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. The government attorney would be forbidden to disclose to the jurors that the witness had invoked the privilege, unless the witness was granted immunity.

The duty of a citizen to testify is so absolutely vital to the administration of justice that the law has not permitted the Fifth Amendment privilege to be asserted in advance of a legal hearing. Every witness has a duty, first to take an oath or affirmation, and then to tell what he knows, in answer to each and every question, up to but not beyond the point of possible self-incrimination. United States v. Brickey, 426 F.2d 680, 688 (C.A. 8, 1970), cert, 400 U.S. 828 and cases cited therein.[7]

The provision assumes that the witness knows the precise questions to be asked of him, and also in an accurate judge as to the availability, as to those questions, of a Fifth Amendment privilege. Neither assumption is warranted.

SUCCESSIVE GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

Section 6 of the bill also provides that if a grand jury "has failed to return an indictment," no subsequent grand jury investigation of the same subject matter could be initiated unless a court found that new evidence had been discovered.

We concur in the principle underlying this proposal that persons should not be needlessly subjected to the potential ordeal and harassment of a second grand jury investigation after a first grand jury has concluded on the merits that an indictment should not be returned. Indeed, codification of such a principle could tend to cause the government to conduct its initial grand jury investigations more thoroughly and thus could operate in many instances to the public's advantage. Accordingly, we would not be opposed to legislation which provided that, if a grand jury determined on the merits—e.g., by voting a "no bill"—not to return an indictment, no subsequent grand jury investigation based upon the same subject matter could be initiated unless a court found that new evidence had been discovered.

There are, however, a number of problems with the proposal as drafted in the bill. The proposal assumes that the failure to indict always reflects a determination by the grand jury of lack of probable cause, after all the government's evidence has been presented. However, a grand jury which does not indict frequently does not make such a determination. A grand jury may fail to indict for want of time to hear all the evidence before its discharge, or for various other reasons having nothing to do with the merits of the case. For example, the investigation could indicate the existence of venue in another district where the case might more properly be instituted. Certainly, such inconclusive action should not prevent subsequent grand jury investigation and indictment.

[7] If a witness refuses to answer a question on the basis of a privilege, and a judge determines that the privilege is improperly invoked, he may order the witness to answer. A court does not have to accept an assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege at face value; and a witness must claim his privilege as to each individual question asked so there can be individualized rulings; a blanket refusal to answer questions constitutes contempt. Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479 (1951); Enricht v. United States, 212 F. 2d 702 (C.A. 10, 1954).

DUTY OF PROSECUTOR TO PRESENT EXCULPATORY EVIDENCE

Section 6 of the bill would require the attorney for the government to "periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant."

The Department supports the principle and follows in practice the standard that if a prosecutor is personally aware of significant evidence which directly negates the guilt of a subject or target of an investigation, he or she should, and we think uniformly does, present the evidence to the grand jury for its consideration. It serves no interest, and indeed would be improper, for a prosecutor to seek and indictment as to which he has not a reasonable and sound prospect of a guilty verdict at trial. But this is a far different proposition from that in the bill, which acknowledges no distinction of kind or degree between the grand jury and trial stages.[8]

But adoption of this provision for grand juries, which as written in H.R. 94 goes beyond even the present duty of the prosecution to present exculpatory evidence at trial, see United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), would be unwise and inconsistent with the nature of the grand jury's function to determine, under a probable cause rather than a reasonable doubt standard, whether criminal charges should be brought against a person. To impose a duty upon a prosecutor to apprise the grand jury of all material that is conceivably exculpatory would convert the grand jury process into something akin to an ex parte trial on the merits, and would assuredly lead to a plethora of defense motions to dismiss the indictment or to suppress the testimony of a particular grand jury witness based on the contention that the prosecutor had not sufficiently complied with the obligation to disclose facts that "might" have tended to affect the witness's credibility or to negate guilt.

In general, the full presentation of exculpatory matter is properly reserved for the trial. However, in accordance with the principle earlier expressed, the Department of Justice will adopt in the United States Attorneys' Manual binding regulations or guidelines which will instruct prosecutors to disclose to the grand jury any significant evidence of the innocence of a putative defendant that is personally known to the prosecutor.

NOTIFYING POTENTIAL TARGETS OF INVESTIGATIONS

Section 6 of the bill would require the attorney for the government to attempt to notify a potential target of a grand jury investigation a reasonable time before seeking an indictment in order to afford that person an opportunity to testify before the grand jurors, if so desired by them. The notification would not be required if the government could prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice "would result" in the flight of the person, endangerment to other witnesses, or undue delay.

The Department of Justice believes that in the vast majority of grand jury proceedings, such a notification to a potential target is unnecessary and, in regard to many investigations, would be unwise. Only rarely, such as in a case in which the evidence of probable guilt turns upon the testimony of a single, arguably unreliable, witness, might the grand jury desire to hear the testimony of the potential target before deliberating whether to return an indictment. Yet, if the requirement to notify all potential targets were made a general rule, we foresee the prospect of substantial litigation revolving around the exercise by the government of any necessary exceptions to the notification requirement. In our view, the good faith determination by a United States Attorney that notification in any given case should not be made ought not to be the predicate for the drastic remedy of a motion to dismiss the indictment.

[8] Under the bill's proposal, for example, the prosecutor would be obliged to apprise the grand jury of every prior conviction and prior inconsistent statement of a witness of which he was aware (and conceivably, although it is unclear under the bill, of which the government as a whole was aware) that might tend to affect the witness's credibility. So onerous a requirement would overturn longstanding law and practice. e.g., United States v. Gardner, 516 F. 2d 334, 338–339 (7th Cir.), cert. denied 423 U.S. 861 (1975), and confuses the limited role of the grand jury as a determiner of whether to bring charges, not a determiner of guilt.

Second, we believe that the standard in H.R. 94 that notification "would result" in any of the consequences listed in the bill is too strict. It would seldom be possible for the government to aver that notification "would result" in such harmful action, yet experience teaches that notification to a suspect of the existence of a grand jury investigation into his activities would frequently cause the suspect to flee or take other measures, such as the destruction of evidence, preparation of a false alibi, or intimidation of witnesses, designed to thwart the investigation.[9] We point out that today notification is sometimes deferred even after a grand jury indicts. Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure vests discretion in courts to seal indictments until defendants are in custody or have given bail. In making the determination to seal an indictment, courts do not generally require an affirmative proof that the defendant will flee; rather, those decisions are made on the basis of a realistic possibility, under all the circumstances, that flight might occur.

Although, for the foregoing reasons, we are opposed to this aspect of H.R. 94, we have no objection to the principle of affording notification and an opportunity to testify to a target of a grand jury investigation whenever such notification seems appropriate and can be made without unduly jeopardizing the investigation or prosecution. In our view, recognition of the necessary flexibility to the government that must be extended in these situations, as well as the desirability of avoiding litigation about the matter, lead to the conclusion that the issue is one best handled through specific regulations of the Department. At my request, the Department of Justice is currently working toward an affirmative proposal to amend the United States Attorneys Manual so as to allow the opportunity for such notification and possible appearance of the individual[10] in the exceptional case.

SPECIAL ATTORNEY FOR THE GRAND JURY

Section 6 of the bill would also authorize courts, upon a majority vote of the grand jurors, to appoint a special attorney to assist a grand jury in an independent investigation. A special attorney could be appointed if the attorney for the government was unable impartially to assist, refused to assist, or hindered or impeded the grand jury in its independent inquiry. The special attorney would be empowered to sign indictments an to conduct all phases of a criminal prosecution arising from the grand jury's inquiry.

We are strongly opposed to this legislation. This provision poses serious threats to equal treatment and protection of individual rights. To sever the grand jury's traditional ties with the executive branch of the government carries the direction that the grand jury should act according to its own notions of what federal statutes mean and what federal prosecutive policy should be. The propose legislation would set up a miniature executive branch of government consisting of a special lawyer answerable to no one and it would allow such miniature branches to spring up from time to time throughout the United States.

In our view, the proposal for a non-executive branch prosecutor is unconstitutional. Beyond that, it would work substantial injustice in subjecting persons to a myriad of disparate prosecutive standards without control.[11]

COUNSEL FOR WITNESSES IN THE GRAND JURY ROOM

Section 7 of the bill contains a proposal to allow a witness to have counsel accompany him into the grand jury room. The court would be required to appoint counsel for any witness financially unable to retain counsel. Counsel would be authorized to "advise the witness" but not to "address the grand jurors or

---

[9] We note that H.R. 94 is deficient in enumerating the kinds of harmful results that "would" flow from notification. Although the bill mentions flight, endangerment of other witnesses, and undue delay, it fails to include the destruction or falsification of evidence, types of obstruction of justice that could commonly occur following notification to a potential defendant.

[10] Obviously, such an appearance would have to be pursuant to a waiver of the target's Fifth Amendment rights. The target would not be compelled to appear.

otherwise take part in the proceeding before the grand jury." The court would be empowered to remove counsel and order the witness to obtain new counsel if counsel exceeded his proper role in the grand jury room or if removal and replacement were necessary to avoid undue delay or obstruction of the grand jury proceeding. A witness's counsel would be authorized to disclose matters occurring before the grand jury while counsel was in the grand jury room with the witness.

As you know, Rule 6(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure reflects the prevailing practice and tradition in the federal criminal justice system that a witness may not be accompanied by counsel into the grand jury room. The Attorney General is firmly of the view, as am I, that this rule is necessary to preserve the grand jury as an effective investigatory institution.

The Department of Justice opposes this fundamental change for the following reasons in summary:[12]

First: Grand jury fact-finding will be severely impaired and impeded because lawyers will lawyer—that is, object, move to strike, and insist on question rephrasing; also client-witnesses will consult and look to the lawyer on every question. Witnesses at trials and in other evidentiary proceedings are not permitted to consult with their counsel before responding to questions exception in rare instances. The grand jury should have the full and frank testimony of the witnesses in his own words.

Second: Witness counsel in the grand jury room, appointment and removal, will cause delay. More importantly the motions, petitions, refusals to respond, all requiring judicial interventions and hearing, will cause enormous delay and convert probable cause determinations to adversarial proceedings akin to a trial of guilt or innocence on the merits.

Third: This proposal provides further opportunity for breach of grand jury secrecy which everyone abhors.

Fourth: The largest beneficiaries of counsel for witnesses in the grand jury room will be those most closely associated with the most serious and most profitable criminal violations who will have counsel provided by their associates or who can afford their own. Indigents will obtain appointed counsel. The vast bulk of honest Middle Americans will not seek the expense of counsel simply to be a fact witness before the grand jury.

Fifth: Technical deficiencies on small points relating to third party witnesses will be utilized by defendants to attack sound indictments and complicate and impair trial proceedings.

NOTICE OF RIGHTS IN GRAND JURY SUBPOENAS

Section 7 of the bill would also require, in part, that in serving a grand jury subpoena the witness shall be given adequate and reasonabe notice of: (1) his right to counsel, (2) his privilege against self-incrimination, (3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation, (4) whether the witness's own conduct is under investigation, (5) the substantive criminal statutes involved, if known at the time of the issuance of the subpoena, and (6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

With respect to the first three items, the Department of Justice supports the proposal. Certainly, there is no difficulty in advising every witness of his right to have counsel available outside the grand jury room for limited appropriate consultation during his grand jury appearance. And adequate warning of his "privilege against self-incrimination"[13] is a reasonable added protection to individual witnesses.[14] With respect to the duty to advise a witness of the subject matter of the investigation, so long as the notice is sufficiently general,

[13] We assume, however, that a defendant would not have standing to move to suppress the testimony of a witness (other than his own testimony) on the ground that such warning was inadvertently omitted.

[14] As the Supreme Court recently observed in United States v. Washington, —— U.S. —— (decided May 22, 1977), it is a fact that for many witnesses the grand jury "engenders an atmosphere conducive to truth-telling," by virtue of the setting whereby the witness is brought before a "body of neighbors and fellow citizens" and placed under a "solemn oath." This truth-engendering atmosphere of the grand jury is sufficient in our view to dispel the concern that the giving of such a warning will frighten non-target witnesses and lead to grand juries being deprived of testimony that otherwise would be offered. Such warnings, moreover, serve the public's perception of fundamental fairness and, as will be discussed shortly, would be served wholly to meet any contention by a witness, barring extraordinary circumstances, that his Fifth Amendment rights were overborne by the grand jury.

there is little basis for concern that the proposal will lead to unintended litigation. And such notification, which most witnesses receive today in any event, is useful in that it may enable the witness to refresh his memory as to the events being investigated in preparation for his appearance, thus aiding the grand jury in its inquiry.

The Department of Justice is, however, strongly opposed to that part of the bill mandating advance warning as to whether a witness's "own conduct is under investigation". Last year this Department suggested that consideration of provisions of this kind await decision in the cases of United States v. Wong and United States v. Washington, in which certiorari had been granted by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided these cases in favor of the government on May 23, 1977. Because the Wong case was resolved on a narrow ground, only the decision in Washington is relevant to the issue posed by the bill.

The defendant in Washington had been subpoenaed to testify before a local grand jury in the District of Columbia investigating theft of a motorcycle. After being sworn, the defendant was advised (in effect) of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, but he was not told that he was a suspect in the theft or that he was a potential target of the grand jury's investigation.

Following his indictment, the defendant filed a motion to suppress his testimony before the grand jury. The trial court and the court of appeals held that the testimony should be suppressed, on the ground that the movant was entitled to have been warned that he was a potential defendant.[15] The Supreme Court reversed. The Court declined to determine whether any warning as to Fifth Amendment rights was constitutionally required for grand jury witnesses. It held, however, that a witness who has been given such a warning has no constitutional right to a further warning concerning his potential defendant or "target" status.[16]

But beyond the constitutional issue the Court, in a paragraph clearly pertinent to this aspect of H.R. 94, indicated that such "target" warnings would serve no legitimate objective, whether or not other warnings were given. The Court stated:

> [W]e do not understand what constitutional disadvantage a failure to give potential defendant warnings could possibly inflict on a grand jury witness, whether or not he has received other warnings. It is firmly settled that . . . witnesses who are not grand jury targets are protected from compulsory self-incrimination to the same extent as those who are. Because target witness status neither enlarges nor diminishes the constitutional protection against compelled self-incrimination, potential defendant warnings add nothing of value to protection of Fifth Amendment rights.

In light of the Court's reasoning in Washington, with which we concur, the Department of Justice is opposed to that part of the bills' proposal that would require warning a subpoenaed witness whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury.

We also believe that the proposal goes too far in mandating notice of "the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of subpoena." Listing such statutes and giving "target" warnings would, apart from other factors, likely generate considerable post-indictment litigation as to the adequacy of the warnings, particularly if the grand jury developed evidence of criminality that was not clearly foreseen when the witness was called. One troublesome question in such litigation would be whether the test is properly objective or subjective; in any event, it would be difficult to establish whether consideration of a particular violation by the grand jury was known or unknown at any given point in time during the investigation.

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

Section 7 would permit a court to quash a subpoena or transfer a grand jury proceeding into another district where it might properly have been convened if the court finds that the movant-witness's appearance would "impose a substantial and unnecessary hardship on such witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding."

[15] The appellate court also found error in the fact that the Fifth Amendment warning was given in the presence of the grand jurors, who may have drawn an adverse inference from an invocation of the privilege. The Supreme Court rejected this argument.

[16] The Court, by way of analogy, pointed out that even the Miranda case, requiring warnings in the "presumed psychologically coercive atmosphere of police custodial interrogation," does not require that the subject be given any special warnings about being a potential defendant.

The proposal is bottomed on the proposition that the convenience of a witness should, at least on some occasions, be permitted to supersede the convenience of the grand jurors, the federal prosecutor, and the other witnesses who might be called, But a witness ought not to be able to select his grand jury forum based upon considerations of his own convenience. Such a proposition is contrary to the "longstanding principle that the public has a right to every man's evidence", irrespective of personal hardship, a principle "particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings." See Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 668 (1972); Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273 (1919). A transfer could waste the work of one grand jury and cause considerable delay before another grand jury could take up the investigation.

There is an even more fundamental objection to this proposal, Questions of venue are not mere matters of legal procedure; they involve "deep issues of public policy." United States v. Johnson, 323 U.S. 113, 276 (1944). Venue is a matter of the public's interest and the Sixth Amendment rights of criminal defendants; witnesses as such do not fit into the scheme of things. Thus, a transfer of a criminal prosecution under Rule 21, F. R. Crim. P., is predicated upon motion of the defendant, and while the convenience of the witnesses is an important consideration, the witnesses have no standing to ask for a transfer. Carrying this over to the matter under discussion, a grand jury inquiry should not be transferred at the behest of a witness when such a transfer could, for all that is known, be disadvantageous to the prospective defendants.

Courts control grand jury subpoenas and should be especially sensitive now to the potential for abuse of process. Furthermore, the government does not generally have any motivation for causing witnesses any hardship; the government is seeking to win the cooperation of witnesses to testify at trial. There is simply no need for creating elaborate machinery to prevent some exceptional happening. Legislation of this kind might prompt more witnesses to try to avoid what may very well be a burdensome duty to testify, but one that society must ask of its citizens if it is to maintain an effective criminal justice system.

Section 7 of the bill contains a related proposal that would vest concurrent jurisdiction to hear and determine any motion relating to a grand jury subpoena in the district court for the district in which the subpoenaed person resides or was served, in addition to the district in which the grand jury is sitting. In effect, this proposal would allow subpoenaed persons to litigate motions to quash in a district other than that from which the grand jury process emanates.

Again, the convenience of witnesses cannot be thus served without wreaking a prohibitive cost and delay upon the system as a whole. A challenge made by a witness to a grand jury subpoena on almost any conceivable ground (e.g. relevance or oppressiveness) will require the court to learn the background of the grand jury's investigation in order to assess the witness's claim. In practical terms, this will often necessitate a physical transfer of the records to such court. The delays and expense involved in only one such transfer are considerable. When it is appreciated that a complex fraud or antitrust investigation may involve subpoenaing scores of witnesses in large numbers of districts, the prospect of giving each of them an opportunity to contest the grand jury's process in a court of his residence or place of service would lead to delays, costs, and inefficiencies of staggering proportions that could wholly impede a grand jury's investigation. The proposal is simply unworkable. Here, as elsewhere in our criminal justice system, the convenience of witnesses must yield to a greater societal good.[17]

GRAND JURY RECORDING

We favor mandatory recordation of all testimony in grand jury proceedings, but we believe the present provision goes too far. Currently, recording of grand jury proceedings is permitted but not required by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Recordation, in varying degrees, is the practice in many districts. Recordation also provides a measure of protection against unduly coercive or other improper interrogational tactics. And it preserves testimony for defense impeachment purposes at trial. Under the Jencks Act, 18 USC 3500 and prevailing case law, a defendant is entitled to a copy of the prior statements of the prosecution witnesses who testify against him at trial, as well as any exculpatory evidence within the possession of the government. Recording the testimony of grand jury witnesses insures that this testimony will be available for either of these purposes.

[17] We note that, to a certain extent, the obligations of witnesses to respond to Federal process are compensated by existing laws which reimburse the witness for travel and per diem expenses. Not presently compensated, however, are travel and per diem expenses in connection with hearings on motions to quash grand jury subpoenas, as well as expenses associated with the transfer and assembly of records subpenaed by a grand jury. In our view this is a matter meriting consideration and rectification by the subcommittee.

The bill's proposal to require recordation of all interchanges between the attorney for the government and the grand jurors when no witness is present, however, raises distinctly different considerations. At the outset, it should be noted that safeguards already exist for controlling prosecutorial misconduct. As an attorney, the prosecutor is held to conform to the highest professional standards of an officer of the court, a member of the bar of a State, and an employee of the Department of Justice. For any misconduct in office, he is accountable to the court, the State bar association, and this Department.

Moreover, any incremental protection which might be afforded the accused by requiring that all grand jury proceedings be recorded must be balanced against the disadvantages of a blanket recordation requirement. Chief among these is the likelihood that such a requirement would promote increased litigation over the conduct of grand jury proceedings. In our view, to permit such litigation, aimed at the suppression of evidence or the dismissal of an indictment, as to any unintentional error or omission in the oral presentation by the government attorney of the technical nuances of criminal law [19] would be clearly inappropriate. At the same time, the occurrence of deliberate prosecutorial misconduct would certainly be extremely rare, yet it would be unrealistic not to assume that frequent requests would be made for disclosure or for judicial review of the grand jury's proceedings upon the mere speculation that misconduct may have taken place.

Lastly, we are concerned at the impact of a "blanket" recording requirement, such as that proposed in H.R. 94, upon the grand jurors themselves. The proposal in the bill would require recordation of the comments not only of the government attorney but of the grand jurors among themselves or to the government attorney made during the course of the investigation and prior to the grand jury's "secret deliberations." Such a requirement might well operate to inhibit communications by members of the grand jury and thus would have an undesirable chilling effect on proper inquiry and discussion.

For the reasons indicated earlier, however, the Department would not be opposed to a recording requirement similar to that presently pending before the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States as a proposed amendment to Rule 6, F.R.Crim. P., as follows:

Rule 6. The Grand Jury.

(e) Recording and Disclosure of Proceedings.—(1) Recording of Proceedings. All proceedings during which a witness is present shall be recorded stenographically or by an electronic recording device. An inadvertent failure or any recording to reproduce all or any portion of a proceeding shall not affect the validity of the prosecution. The recording relating to any indictment returned by the grand jury, or any transcript prepared therefrom, shall be filed under seal with the clerk of the court.

The Department is also opposed to that aspect of the bill that would repeal the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. 3500, in favor of a provision entitling the defendant, except for good cause shown, to pretrial discovery of the grand jury testimony of the witnesses to be called by the prosecution at trial. Under 18 U.S.C. 3500, prior statements of the government's witnesses may not be revealed to the defendant until after the conclusion of the witness' testimony on direct examination; Rule 16, F.R. Crim. P., further implements this restriction on pretrial discovery by expressly providing that discovery of grand jury testimony is not authorized thereunder. Any relaxation of this salutary restriction would create real hazards for the safety of the government's witnesses in certain cases, by prematurely notifying the defendant of their identity. The Congress in 1975 specifically rejected a proposal, which would have had a similar impact, to require the government in advance of trial to disclose the names of its witnesses to the defendants, subject to a "good cause" exception. We believe that rejection was wise.

We are, however, not opposed in principle to the proposal in H.R. 94 to permit a witness, under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, to obtain a copy of the transcript of his own testimony before a grand jury. But, unlike the bill's provision, which would confer an absolute right upon the witness, we consider it essential that the government have the right to prevent or delay the witness' access to the transcript upon a showing to the court that to provide the transcript might impede the investigation or result in injury or death to any person or property. We are concerned that, in certain instances, pressure may be focussed upon a witness who has testified before the grand jury by persons under investigation to obtain a copy of the transcript so that the potential targets of the investigation may learn of the progress of the investigation and take steps to frustrate it, or to intimidate the witness to change his testimony, or not to testify, at trial.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION AFTER INDICTMENT

Section 9 of the bill would entitle a defendant to a preliminary examination when charged with any offense other than a petty offense, notwithstanding the fact that an indictment had been returned.

The proposal is in direct conflict with 18 U.S.C. 3060(a), enacted in 1970, and is without a substantial purpose since, after an indictment is returned, there is no function to be served by a preliminary hearing. The preliminary hearing is designed to benefit a person who has been arrested but not yet formally charged by indictment or information. The sole function of the proceeding is to determine whether there is probable cause to hold the arrestee for grand jury action. 8 Moore's Federal Practice, § 5.102. Even if the arrested person prevails at the preliminary hearing, that does not prevent a grand jury from subsequently indicting him. 18 U.S.C. 3060(d).

Since the only mission of a preliminary hearing is to test probable cause, it is settled law that, once probable cause is determined by another means such as the return of an indictment, a preliminary examination is inappropriate. E.g., United States v. Farries, 459 F.2d 1057, 1061–1062 (3rd Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1114.

Since the bill does not purport to alter the present nature of the preliminary examination itself,[10] it is difficult to perceive the rational underlying the proposal that an accused person be entitled to a preliminary hearing after being indicted. In short, the bill would create another cumbersome layer of pretrial proceedings in criminal cases, for no apparent reason. As noted in Sciortano v. Zampano, 385 F.2d 132, 133, (2nd Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 906:

> A post-indictment preliminary examination would be an empty ritual, as the government's burden of showing probable cause would be met merely by offering the indictment. Even if the [magistrate] disagreed with the grand jury, he could not undermine the authority of its finding.

APPENDIX I

SPECIAL ATTORNEY FOR THE GRAND JURY

The Constitution of the United States knows only one executive power, that of the President, whose duty to "take care that the law be faithfully executed" includes the duty and the power to execute them according to his construction and understanding of those laws. Corwin, The President: Office and Powers 100 (1948). As the Supreme Court recently declared, "the Executive Branch has exclusive authority and absolute discretion to decide whether to prosecute a case." United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 693 (1974). Moreover, even before the Nixon case, it was settled constitutional doctrine that a grand jury is powerless to return an indictment without the concurrence of the attorney for the government. E.g., United States v. Cox, 342 F.2d 167 (5th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 391 U.S. 935. Accordingly, the proposed legislation would vest powers in the grand jury and its special counsel which are not the Congress' or the courts' to give.

[10] See Rule 5.1, F.R. Crim. P.

In addition to being invalid, the bill's proposal is unsound. Under the legislation, questions regarding the legality of a person's conduct might be answered in different ways by different grand juries; there would be no single standard in use by all. The special counsel could also exercise discretion, for example to confer immunity on a witness, in a manner inconsistent with the criteria in force for the executive branch. A consequence of breaking up the executive power in order to make grand juries independent is, in short, to make the ideal of equal justice for all persons impossible of achievement. Enforcement of the criminal laws is not a mechanical task. To the contrary, in discharging this executive branch function, the Department of Justice must construe statutes and legal precedents, make legal and factual judgments, formulate policy to guide the United States Attorneys uniformly in all the various districts. This governing power is derived from the electorate. No person should have to answer to criminal charges lodged by a grand jury upon the advice of an attorney not within the executive branch and indeed not subject to any control, when other citizens similarly situated would be spared such jeopardy in the ordinary course. There are thus in our view compelling legal and practical reasons militating against this proposal.

COUNSEL FOR WITNESSES

The sole purpose in calling a witness before the grand jury is to elicit from him whatever facts he knows that may be pertinent to the grand jury's investigation.

If a witness had counsel at his side and was permitted to consult him before answering questions, in our view the factfinding process would be severely impaired because of the tendency for the witness to become dependent upon, and to repeat or parrot responses discussed with the lawyer, rather than to testify fully and frankly in his own words. For similar reasons, we point out, witnesses at trial and in other proceedings are not permitted to consult with their counsel before responding to questions, save in rare instances.[30]

We recognize some advocates for the proposal rely on some state experience; we believe that reliance is misplaced.[31]

The fundamental change proposed would transform the federal grand jury proceedings into proceedings of an adversarial nature inconsistent with the function of the grand jury as a charging (rather than a guilt-determining) body. The result of such a proposal would be substantially increased delays, which are ill-affordable in our criminal justice system.

At the core of our deep-seated concern in this respect is our belief that counsel for the witness will act—inevitably even if not intentionally—in a manner that will disrupt and delay the grand jury's investigation. It is naive to expect that counsel for a witness facing a grand jury will fail to do everything in his power to seek to protect his client from questions that he regards as irrelevant, overboard, or in some way technically defective; evidentially that is the function of an adversarial lawyer and it is to be anticipated that most lawyers representing grand jury witnesses, if given the chance to accompany their client into the grand jury room, would seek zealously to perform that function. While the bill attempts to limit counsel's role by precluding him from addressing the grand jurors, nothing in the bill appears to prevent counsel for a witness from making objections to comments or questions to the prosecutor. And, even if that opportunity were to be withdrawn, counsel could still as a practical matter speak through the witness. In this way, objections predicated upon various rules of evidence and procedure that have been held inapplicable to grand jury proceedings could be raised, and, unlike in a courtroom or before a congressional committee, there would be no official present, such as a judge or committee chairman, to rule authoritatively on such objections. To deal with any obstreperous witness would require a break in the proceedings in order to obtain the aid of a court to control the witness under penalty of contempt; and we believe that the incidence of problems of this kind would mushroom if the long-established prohibition against having counsel present in the grand jury room was abandoned. Similarly, we doubt the practicability of the provisions in the bill for replacement of counsel if the proceedings were unduly delayed or impeded. To begin with, the very act of seeking a judicial hearing on the matter would likely consume several days; and it is our belief that courts would be extremely reluctant to order a witness's counsel removed or replaced for a breach of the bill's provisions. There is, in addition, at least in the case of a witness who has retained his own counsel, a substantial constitutional difficulty in ordering the witness to obtain other counsel against his wishes.

[30] A witness may be permitted to confer with counsel with regard to whether or not to invoke the Fifth Amendment. The infrequent instances in which such advice is needed as to a grand jury witness are met by the witness's right, without prejudice, to leave the room for a brief period for that purpose.

[31] As one of the reasons given for favoring a proposal for witness's counsel in the grand jury room, Mr. Richard E. Gernstein, appearing before the Subcommittee on Mar. 17, 1977, on behalf of the ABA Criminal Justice Section, noted the alleged problem-free experience of eight States—Arizona, Illinois, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Washington—with the practice. Following this representation (which Mr. Gernstein acknowledged was not based upon "any large sampling or empirical research") the Department of Justice surveyed the United States Attorneys in these States. A summary of the survey is set forth in Appendix II herein. In general, it showed that in nearly all of the eight States substantial limitations, either of law or practice, exist with respect to the right of counsel for a witness to be inside the grand jury room. Thus, in at least one of the States, this practice is permitted only with respect to a one-man grand jury. In many of the States, moreover, the law allows counsel for a witness only under special circumstances such as where the witness is a target of the investigation, has waived his privilege against self-incrimination, or has received statutory immunity. In a number of the States in which the practice exists the grand jury is not commonly used; rather the prosecutor institutes criminal charges by information. In sum, the experience of the eight States cited by Mr. Gernstein is no predicate for concluding that the practice could be successfully adopted by the federal criminal justice system.

Beyond the problems of interruption and delay that would be caused by letting counsel for witnesses into the grand jury room, a further important concern arising from this proposal relates to impairment of the secrecy of grand jury proceedings, which exists in large part for the benefit of the witnesses themselves. Not infrequently, particularly in investigations of organized crime, business frauds, antitrust violations, and other white collar offenses, one attorney represents several potential witnesses. At times counsel is retained, by the very business, union, or other organization whose activities are under investigation, to represent all persons connected with the group. In such situations, the individual witness may possess relevant information and be willing to cooperate with the investigation. Understandably, however, he may desire that his cooperation not become known to his employer, fellow union members, or others whom he knows his attorney represents or with whom the attorney has been associated. The problem should not be underestimated. Recently the Special Watergate Prosecutor, in his report to the Congress, noted that multiple legal representation—several witnesses being represented by one attorney affiliated with an organization—operates "in many cases" to preclude a witness from "giving adequate consideration to the possibility of cooperating with the Government." Report, Watergate Special Prosecution Force, p. 140. This view has also been echoed by other commentators.[22] The courts have been cognizant of these difficulties, but thus far have not generally required separate representation for fear of interfering with a witness's right to counsel of his apparent choice.[23]

In our view, this problem has become so acute that congressional action thereon is necessary to deal with it. We strongly recommend that this Subcommittee include in any legislation that it processes calling for changes in the grand jury system an absolute prohibition of counsel (or counsel associated in practice with such counsel) simultaneously representing more than one witness before a federal grand jury.

Absent such a solution being adopted, the point to be made with respect to H.R. 94, is that the problems of witnesses who have counsel representing other witnesses before the grand jury or representing the organization whose activities are under investigation would be exacerbated considerably if counsel were allowed to accompany the witness into the grand jury room. Under the present system, in which counsel remains outside the grand jury room, the witness, while able to disclose as much of his testimony as he chooses, retains the important right to conceal the extent of his cooperation or the fact that he was required to supply evidence against others. Were the practice changed to admit counsel into the grand jury room, the witness in such a situation might feel less free to testify. As a practical matter, he could not bar his attorney from the grand jury room without his action being given the worst possible interpretation by those who might wish that the investigation be thwarted.

Cole, Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should be Stopped (1976), an article distributed by Mr. Cole as Chairman to the members of the ABA Criminal Justice Section; remarks by Richard J. Favretto, Deputy Director of Operations, Antitrust Division, Department of Justice on May 3, 1977, before the Chicago Bar Associations Spring Antitrust Symposium entitled "The Perils of Multiple Representation in Criminal Antitrust Proceedings." We are providing the Subcommittee with a copy of each of these publications and urge their incorporation into the Subcommittee's hearing record.

There are two other subsidiary aspects of this proposal that we find troublesome. The first is the proposal to mandate the appointment of counsel for indigent grand jury witnesses. This proposal could cause substantial delay and be a source of litigation, by virtue of the fact that courts in many instances would have to conduct an inquiry into the person's ability to pay; moreover, appointed counsel might not be immediately available on the date when the grand jury wishes to hear the witness's testimony. The anomaly of this requirement can be exposed by noting that the law does not, save in exceptional circumstances, permit much less require the appointment of counsel for witnesses at trial. The proposal for appointment of counsel for grand jury witnesses, few of whom, we point out, are even in serious jeopardy, is, in short extravagant and unnecessary.

Second, we are disturbed at the bill's proposal to authorize a witness's counsel to disclose matters that occurred before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room. A witness, we agree, should certainly not be placed under an obligation of secrecy. But the reasons for giving the witness a freedom to disclose (primarily to permit him to consult with counsel and with associates about his grand jury testimony; see Advisory Committee Note to Rule 6(e), F.R. Crim. P.) in no way apply to his counsel. Like the attorney for the government, a witness' counsel should be under an obligation of secrecy. If the witness's interests might be served by the disclosure, counsel can advise the witness accordingly; but the choice should remain with the witness.

APPENDIX II

LAW AND PRACTICE IN STATES REPRESENTED AS PERMITTING COUNSEL IN THE GRAND JURY ROOM

1. Arizona

Based on information received from Michael D. Hawkins, United States Attorney, Phoenix, Arizona.

1. The Rules of Criminal Procedure in Arizona (Rule 12.6) allow for persons under grand jury investigation to be accompanied by counsel in the grand jury. The rule provides for summary expulsion if counsel communicates or attempts to communicate with anyone other than his client.

2. Witnesses not the subject of the investigation may not have counsel present in the grand jury room.

3. Since as a matter of office policy, subjects of grand jury investigation are not ordinarily subpoenaed, there has been little actual experience with counsel in the grand jury room.

2. Illinois

Based on information received from Frederick J. Hess, United States Attorney, East St. Louis, Illinois, and Samuel K. Skinner, United States Attorney, Chicago, Illinois.

1. A relatively new Illinois statute allows counsel to accompany a witness into the grand jury room only in two situations. Counsel may accompany a witness who has already been charged with an offense, and counsel may accompany a witness against whom the State is seeking indictment. 38 Ill. Rev. Stat. § 112–4B.

2. Not only is the statute narrowly drawn, but the statute is of little consequence when it does apply, because the tendency is to subpoena targets only toward the conclusion of an investigation. Targeted witnesses will usually invoke their privilege against self-incrimination, so that the presence of counsel serves no real purpose.

3. United States Attorney Skinner has found that state prosecutors are concerned over the new statute. He has heard complaints from Cook County prosecutors focussing upon white-collar type crimes that counsel do attempt to avoid the limitation in the statute that there be no participation except for advising the witness. Even when action is taken to stop counsel's overt participation, certain counsel have advised the witness in "stage whisper" fashion, audible to the jurors.

4. Mr. Skinner advises further: "Each head of the "white collar" financial crime divisions [in the Cook County State's Attorneys Office] stated that [he] would object to any enlargement of the scope of the Illinois statute."

3. Kansas

Based on information received from E. Edward Johnson, United States Attorney, Topeka, Kansas:

1. While Kansas law allows counsel in the grand jury room, Mr. Johnson is not aware of any broad-based support for that rule among state prosecutors.

2. There is no "one-man" grand jury in Kansas, but there is a procedure under Section 22-3101 et seq of the Kansas statute whereby certain prosecutors in the State can institute a criminal investigation in a proceeding conducted before a State judge.

4. Michigan

Based on information received from Philip Van Dam, United States Attorney, Detroit, Michigan.

1. Mr. Van Dam writes, "Mr. Gerstein's comments are not quite correct in that they suggest a broader allowable participation of counsel for a witness than actually exists." Although correct in regard to one-man grand juries, Mr. Gerstein's comments do not reflect the practice in regard to a citizens' grand jury.

2. Under Michigan law, counsel for a witness before a citizens' grand jury is not allowed in the grand jury room, except when the witness has been ordered to testify under a grant of immunity. Michigan Compiled Laws Annotated 767.19e.

3. Since Michigan enacted the provision for citizens grand juries, the one-man grand jury has fallen into disuse.

4. In practice, then, the only time counsel is allowed in the grand jury room in Michigan is when a witness before a citizens' grand jury has been immunized.

5. The counsel for the witness is sworn to secrecy. As far as Mr. Van Dam knows, the presence of counsel has not been disruptive but has aroused apprehensions when one attorney represents multiple witnesses.

5. Minnesota

Based on a letter received from the United States Attorney's Office, Minneapolis, Minnesota:

1. The grand jury is not commonly used in Minnesota. Grand jury indictment is required only in cases of first degree murder, public corruption, and treason.

2. Minnesota law, effective July 1, 1975, allows for counsel in the grand jury room only if the witness waives his privilege against self-incrimination.

3. There has been little actual experience with counsel in the grand jury in Minnesota since the grand jury is not commonly used and since witnesses who are concerned about having counsel will not want to waive their privilege against self-incrimination in advance.

4. Mr. Gerstein's statement that counsel can address the grand jury in Minnesota is erroneous. Counsel is specifically prohibited under Minnesota Criminal Rule 18.04 from participating in the grand jury proceeding beyond advising the witness.

6. Oklahoma

Based on information received from Nathan G. Graham, United States Attorney, Tulsa, Oklahoma.

1. Oklahoma, by statute, allows one attorney to be present as counsel for a witness in the grand jury room.

2. The primary method of charging offenders in Oklahoma is by means of informations. Grand juries are not often used.

7. South Dakota

Based on information received from William F. Clayton, United States Attorney, Sioux Falls, South Dakota.

1. The statutes of South Dakota do not provide for counsel in the grand jury, but do provide that grand juries may hear only legally admissible evidence. In this context, it has been customary for some prosecutors in South Dakota, under ground rules agreed to in advance, to permit witness's counsel in the grand jury room.

2. Mr. Clayton believes that counsel in the grand jury room could prove disruptive and could cause delays in unusual investigations, e.g., of activities (like the Wounded Knee incident) charged with passion or strong feeling.

8. Washington

Based on information from Dean Smith, United States Attorney, Spokane, and J. Ronald Sim, United States Attorney, Seattle, Washington.

1. It is rare that a grand jury is used in Washington. Thus the fact that the State of Washington permits counsel in the grand jury is of virtually no significance in considering a proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury under federal law.

2. In general, criminal prosecutions are instituted in Washington by means of informations signed by the prosecuting attorney. Historically, grand juries have been used only in public corruption cases. There have been only two state grand juries of record used in the Western District of Washington; while Washington law allows for inquiry judges to conduct grand jury type proceedings, inquiry judges are not commonly used either.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I am pleased to be here today to present for your consideration the views of the Department of Justice on H.R. 94, a bill to "reform" the Federal grand jury.

At the outset, let me confirm the Attorney General's and the Department of Justice's overriding interest in preserving and protecting the fundamental rights of all citizens in the administration of justice and in the delivery of criminal justice.

Many of our proposals made to this Congress have demonstrated that deep commitment and additional proposals and reviews to those ends are under way.

Our most important government institutions and systems are designed and have evolved to guarantee constitutional rights, preserve balance, and maintain a free and independent society.

Beyond clear constitutional rights, we welcome and support improvements to any aspect of the Federal system of justice which permit it to perform its functions better, more effectively, and more responsibly.

In particular, we welcome and support improvements to the grand jury system, and we commend and appreciate the efforts of this committee and its chairman, Congressman Eilberg.

The grand jury system is a particularly pertinent subject for attention because it is a bulwark of our criminal justice system functioning under the sound superintendence of the Federal courts for 200 years as an integral and indispensable part of that system.

Proper consideration of improvements in the grand jury system yields many different and stimulating ideas for change whether legislative, judicial, or administrative.

The Department of Justice has studied and reviewed proposed improvements in the grand jury system in this light and will continue to do so.

We are convinced that few systems are perfect. On the whole, we believe the Federal grand jury system is sound.

It has served well throughout the history of our republic, and continues to serve as an effective, fair, and essential institution for the investigation of criminal activity and the initiation of complaints or charges, which begin our adversarial system of guilt or innocence to be determined in a fair trial on the merits.

That is not to state or even suggest that we reject or ignore points or improvements to the grand jury system raised by provisions of H.R. 94; nor is it to deny that some abuses of the grand jury system have occurred, although we may not always agree on specific cases.

It must be remembered that Federal grand juries conduct tens of thousands of investigations each year. The fact that, on rare occasions—and I am unaware of any basis for alleging that their incidence is other than rare—some error or alleged abuse occurs within that system is not sufficient to condemn the system.

Likewise, we cannot assure that abuses of the grand jury will not occur in the future; so long as there are human frailties involved as a part of that system, just as with any other institution, occasional abuses may be inevitable.

Of course, no abuses are excusable and all are regrettable. We share your deep interest to eliminate the occurrence of grave error and to preserve the function and integrity of the grand jury process.

We are committed to join and cooperate with Congress and this committee in your strenuous efforts and our mutual goals to provide the public the best and soundest criminal justice system obtainable and fair and just persons to serve it.

The Department of Justice is committed to many of the principles of improvement which underlie provisions of H.R. 94 and which have been suggested by others.

For example, a prosecutor has a duty to disclose to the grand jury any substantial evidence of the innocence of a putative defendant known to the prosecutor.

A prosecutor should not recommend to the grand jury nor sign an indictment returned by the grand jury if the evidence presented is legally insufficient.

A prosecutor should not present to the grand jury evidence known to him or her to be unconstitutionally obtained.

A prosecutor should not use a grand jury to procure evidence for preparation for pending trial.

Prosecutors should not harass or unreasonably delay witnesses.

All testimony before the grand jury should be recorded.

Arguments impermissible at trial should not be made to a grand jury.

Prosecutors should scrupulously preserve grand jury secrecy.

The court's charge to the grand jury should be full and complete and available to the grand jury in writing for referral, among others.

At the same time, we must bear in mind that the grand jury system has the purpose and duty to investigate criminal action without fear or favor and to lawfully pursue evidence no matter how deeply hidden, cleverly disguised, or powerfully resisted.

We oppose those proposals on statutory provisions which would seriously weaken the institution of the grand jury or impede or impair the fair administration of criminal justice.

I will now turn to the more significant provisions on which I will have more direct comment.

With regard to recalcitrant witnesses, which is provided for in section 2 of the bill and would amend title 28, U.S.C. 1826, we support in part that provision.

We agree that 18 months is maybe too long a time for civil contempt in an effort to have the witness come and testify, to allow him time to reflect on that duty which all citizens have to give evidence.

And we have recommended to the committee in our view that the period be not 6 months but 12 months.

We also recommend strong support for the principle that S. 1826 prohibits any successive 12-month commitments for civil contempt.

That is the Department's view. We think that is sound law. And, therefore, we don't disagree that there ought to be any express terms which would in the statutory language prohibit a circumstance wherein someone who was called before a grand jury on a legitimate inquiry is asked questions, refuses to answer on grounds which are not privileged or recognized by the law, he is then committed by the court under the civil contempt, serves at the court's discretion, serves, let's say, 11 months, and then is released, then a year later or 9 months later he is called back in, the same questions are asked, and he refuses to answer those questions; rather than being subject to another 12-month period, we suggest the law is firm, we suggest that appropriately within the bill that such successive incarcerations for any period in excess, cumulatively, of 12 months is unnecessary and unlikely to produce the desired result that the witness give the testimony which is required by law.

We suggest that with regard to criminal contempt, which is an entirely different matter, that the bill be silent, that we not interfere.

And I know of no prior interference with the district courts' broad discretion with regard to criminal contempt which is, as we all recognize, a concept of punishment and would not apply in the ordinary refusal circumstance.

It would have to be an aggravated situation with a showing of vile disrespect or whatever, as in the whole range of criminal contempt processes.

With regard to witness immunity, section 3 of the bill, it is slightly, we suggest, different in focus than grand jury, but not inappropriate to be considered at the same time that grand jury improvements are to be considered.

Our view there is that we are better served, that is the administration of justice is better served, by "use" immunity rather than "transactional" immunity.

And those reasons are stated in the testimony generally.

Unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information, section 5 of the bill, in general we support that provision wholeheartedly. We think it is extremely important.

The abuse of grand jury secrecy, given the right of individual witnesses, and the important right that they have their right to freedom of speech, and given the important duty and right and fervent pursuit of freedom of the press by the press, and with those two as proper and lawful rights to preserve, other than that we feel that any other leaks, disclosures, are a great threat to the peace, the reputations, to the standing of individuals and are one of the most unfortunate consequences or abuses of grand jury proceedings, and how they occur is difficult to determine.

Some people suggest that it is the witnesses. Some people suggest that it is the prosecutors from time to time. Other people suggest that it is the personnel related to the grand jury.

Some suggest it is the grand jurors themselves.

But I think that this will give us, this provision will give us a proper tool in order to try to reestablish sound grand jury secrecy.

We do suggest that rather than have a double standard, so to speak, dependent upon the intent, that the offense of disclosures be a misdemeanor offense, and that initially at least, since this would be a new crime, in the arsenal of Federal crimes, that any knowing disclosure be subject to a misdemeanor penalty since the real risk is not so much the motivation of the discloser, but the disclosure itself.

And with regard to section 6 or that part of it which relates to excusing witnesses who plan to invoke the fifth amendment, we think that that is unnecessary and therefor we oppose it.

We certainly can sympathize with an attitude that would try to design a method wherein it could be done in writing. However, we think that is very difficult to accomplish and we believe that the present system, since it does relate not simply to an appearance but it relates to a court's proper determination when the occasion arises as to the legitimacy of the assertion of the fifth amendment right, that the questions asked do probe into an area which may tend to incriminate, and it is very difficult, if not impossible, to determine that type of issue without in fact posing the specific questions and followup questions to the witness rather than expressing to him the general subject matter through a letter and response method or through some other, perhaps more convenient but less substantial way.

Section 6 of the bill addresses successive grand jury investigations. I think we support that in principle. But we point out that merely because a grand jury considers a particular matter and then does not indict, does not mean that the grand jury has absolved the subjects involved in that matter or has made a determination on the merits that there is no justification for prosecution.

Rather, there are innumerable reasons for a grand jury to stop its proceeding altogether, to halt it, or to transfer it, and we suggest rather that if the real intent and purpose is that if a grand jury has considered on the merits facts to establish or not establish probable cause to believe that there is evidence which shows that the defendant has committed a crime and has determined, based on those facts, on the merits, that no crime, no probable cause exists, in that instance there should not be second and third and fourth bite at the apple of the grand jury by prosecutors unless there is additional evidence developed or determined through investigation or disclosure of new evidence. So that if there has been a determination on the merits, we would suggest that there be no successive grand juries, as we think is the thrust of the provision and, therefore, we support that thrust in principle.

With regard to the duty of the prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence, we have no disagreement in principle.

We suggest it could even be stronger, but use a different method.

We disagree with two parts of this provision in section 6, and that is the breadth of its language and, second, perhaps the consequences of a failure to live up to a full meaning of its terms. The great difficulty in the federal system since we are all considered one government, and you are exposed to that difficulty, I guess, as much as anyone else—I am sure constituents believe that you have your fingers on all sources of information and are all-knowing—that it is sometimes extremely difficult with the best efforts to discover what information lies in so many different areas of the Government.

The assistant U.S. attorney presenting a bank robbery case indictment through his best efforts may not have either the capacity or knowledge or ability to produce an employment application for Veterans' Administration jobs which may be in a Government file, or a Government agency in some place and which may be exculpatory.

So that we suggest with regard to the prniciple of the duty of the prosecutors to present exculpatory evidence, that that principle be adopted, but that the full presentation of exculpatory evidence, and the breadth involved, be preserved for the trial on the merits, and the Department of Justice adopt in the U.S. Attorney's Manual a binding regulation which will disclose to the grand jury any significant exculpatory evidence that is known to the prosecutor.

By that we mean personally known. And that would include his office or any of the assistants within it.

Mr. EILBERG. Excuse me. We will have to recess at this point and vote. We will be right back.

Mr. CIVILETTI. All right, sir.

[Recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

Mr. Civiletti, I am most anxious that we do complete the summary of your testimony. And would ask all of the members to try to refrain from asking questions during your summary.

But I feel constrained to make an objection at this point with regard to your suggestion about U.S. attorneys and the U.S. Attorney's Manual.

Do you really believe that the manual would be effective, irrespective of the character or integrity of the Attorney General or top officials of the Justice Department at any given time?

In other words, we are contemplating legislation which would hopefully tend to minimize people with evil motives from committing wrongdoing. And this is a very serious problem to my mind. And I am inclined to reject your proposal of relying on a manual for that reason.

I would like to get your reaction to that.

Mr. CIVILETTI. My reaction is that we deal with systems and procedures, and we deal with basically legislation or manuals or rules with an assumption that people are honest and have integrity. The best rules, the best legislation, if you have dishonest people, people with no integrity who lie and cheat, it won't matter what the legislation says, or what the rules are. The system won't work with dishonest people.

Mr. EILBERG. But the rules are much clearer when we have legislation. And there is some control.

Mr. CIVILETTI. My view is that your oversight responsibilities which are heavy and thorough are not dependent upon any particular piece of legislation. That they as much go to published and issued U.S. Attorneys Manuals which are directives from the Department, policies of the Department, the manner in which they allocate resources without regard to any particular piece of legislation.

Mr. EILBERG. Please proceed.

Mr. CIVILETTI. All right, Mr. Chairman.

I think I left off on the subject of exculpatory evidence and now move to notifying potential targets of indictment. We are opposed to that provision. We think it is unworkable as an absolute requirement.

We do feel, however, as I refer to it at greater length in the testimony, that it is appropriate under certain circumstances and those circumstances would largely be when there is no danger of flight, no danger of coercion of other witnesses, no danger of destruction of evidence, no danger of an ongoing investigation being jeopardized, that in those circumstances, on a voluntary basis, a punitive target of the subject, ought to be given an opportunity to testify on a waiver, of course, of his rights and being subject to examination by the prosecutor before the grand jury.

As to special attorneys for the grand jury, which is the subject matter of section 6, we are extremely concerned with that idea and opposed to its implementation through legislation. Because we feel that it would threaten equal treatment and equal rights to have ad hoc individual attorneys appointed throughout the 94 U.S. attorneys' districts without requisite training, without supervision, without being subject on a continuing and regular basis through coordination with the Department of Justice and with the policies and principles, which this Congress reviews, and it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible to control, and would result in, I think, a great unevenness in the administration of justice at least to the extent that it is involved with the grand jury process.

Section 7 and perhaps the most dramatic change or fundamental change proposed by that section is counsel for witnesses in the grand jury room, at least as far as the federal system is concerned, we are opposed to that. The essential basis of the opposition is that we feel the grand jury process in principle by design and duty is an investigatory, charging or discharging body. It is not a trial on the merits. It is not an adversarial proceeding. It is not an open hearing. And that counsel for witnesses in the grand jury room would definitely present and change that fundamental purpose and design from what I just stated it to be, to a minitrial, to an adversarial proceeding which is, we believe, unnecessary and undesirable.

There are five principal points in opposition to this provision, with regard to counsel in the grand jury room which I have stated on page 18 of the testimony. And I will not stop here to repeat those principles.

They are further elaborated on in the appendix, which is attached to the testimony.

Notice of rights provisions in section 7 of the bill would require, I believe, six notices to be uniformly made with regard to testimony. We support and commend and think workable, despite prior positions of the Department, the first three notice provisions—right to counsel, right to the privilege against incrimination, and the statement of the subject matter of the grand jury investigation. We oppose the remaining two specified ones and the general catchall one because we think in a great many instances, at the beginning of the investigation, and midway through the investigation, it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine if particular criminal statutes are involved or whether many criminal statutes are involved. And, of course, in the criminal law, the statement of notice becomes an essential right and provides for challenges if we mention the bribery statute and find that it is dead at the end of the investigation, it may be turned into extortion or some other related crime.

Section 7 deals with several subjects under a general heading that I refer to as rights of grand jury witnesses. We suggest here that the fragmentation of grand jury proceedings, of motions to quash, is largely detrimental to the administration of justice, that it is a better scheme to have one judge or at least one court and one district where appropriate, handle all such motions, become familiar with them, become familiar with the proceedinsg, and familiar with the local situation familiar with the grand jury matters and, of course, the grand jury is under the supervision of that court.

But we are sensitive to the inconvenience, to the lack of compensation and the hardship which are afforded by subpenaing witnesses to, say, Los Angeles, involving alleged activity in Los Angeles for those witnesses and citizens who may be domiciled in Washington, D.C., or Chicago or somewhere else.

We suggest that the provisions for compensation, for travel compensation, be enlarged, and be enlarged in two ways: First, that they include the transportation of any documents, papers, records, matters of that kind, which are necessary in connection with the testimony; and second, would be enlarged to provide, which they don't provide now, that on challenges to such subpenas, motions to quash and other things, that witnesses who are asserting such challenges be paid the same travel allowance, the same per diem rates that they are paid when they are testifying without challenge.

Mr. EILBERG. How would you facilitate lawyers for such witnesses, members of their families, who come and visit them, to meet with their clients or relatives and so forth?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Well, as you know, Mr. Chairman, in trials themselves, many witnesses are from out of state. Many parties are from out of state. They are sued in different areas and the jurisdiction rests in different areas. I have found in most instances with clients when I was in private practice, who are witnesses or parties, I had little difficulty in obtaining counsel familiar with the subject matter in the jurisdiction in which the proceeding was pending, and engaging him to represent my client.

Mr. EILBERG. Are you saying there are no abuses in this area where Justice Department personnel do not bring their witnesses from great distances?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. I am not suggesting that there may not be instances in which certain facts or activities may be looked upon as abuse.

What I am saying is that just because a grand jury proceeding is being conducted in one place in connection with this activity, and that investigation reveals evidence that may be very important, it does not mean that if you subpena people in this case, involving antitrust, that you have abuse if you subpena records or people from California, Texas, New York or anywhere else.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you automatically assume that the transfer to the distant jurisdiction is based upon the situs of a situation even where there had been no events in that situs that would justify that jurisdiction?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Then, I think the empaneling of the jury in that place is highly questionable. There has to be some nexus with the district in which the grand jury is empaneled in order to give it any kind of commonsense.

Mr. EILBERG. Please proceed. And excuse me for interrupting.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Thank you.

Grand jury recording is a subject which we have some slight disagreement with, but in general, I think we favor the provisions of the bill. We support and recommend that there be amendments to the Jencks Act under title 18, section 3500, if necessary, to permit subject to opposition, to permit upon request witness for the grand jury to obtain their testimony a reasonable time after the request, and again, so long as it does not jeopardize the investigation through coercive activity, destruction, or perhaps as importantly, if not more importantly, does not jeopardize the investigation or harm individuals by the dissemination of that testimony in a flagrant and abusive manner. And that is the risk we are prepared to agree with the committee on, that perhaps the need to have the testimony, and review it, is stronger and greater than the risk to those innocent people who may suffer from its full release.

Preliminary examination after indictment, section 9 of the bill, we are opposed to that because we believe it is without purpose. That is the very issue, that the grand jury determines, and is a secondary proceeding, and we think that many of the pretrial proceedings of a trial on the merits are focused and appropriately focused intensely on the assurance that a defendant who is innocent in the law, and all defendants are presumed innocent, has his full day in court with only proper evidence received against him and corrective action is taken by the court in those involved and substantial proceedings.

So that on both grounds, the preliminary examination to the extent we understand it as described in the bill is not warranted.

I think I have touched on, I hope I have, all of the important provisions I have addressed in my testimony.

So, that would conclude my presentation.

Mr. EILBERG. We thank you for your statement, and we have a great many questions.

In appendix 2 you refer to the laws and practices in States as permitting counsel in the grand jury room. In every single case, I believe, in that appendix, you give as the basis of the information, the U.S. attorney in that district.

The question arises, was an effort made to get an opinion from the State officials or the attorney general of the State, districts within the State? Why did you go to the U.S. attorney to determine what the State laws is?

Mr. CIVILETTI. We go to the U.S. attorney because they are members of the Department of Justice. They are governmental employees. And they would be—it would be like you going to a member of your staff or your counsel to get information on questions. And they are, of course, hopefully, competent lawyers, and I believe as the appendix indicates, they consulted with State lawyers in the particular States. And there is no dispute as to many of the statutory provisions.

This appendix, as indicated, was simply in order to present another side of the information to some of the assertions that were made by other witnesses before the committee.

Mr. EILBERG. I observe that our staff has made a study of these States also, and in many cases they came up with different responses. That is why I asked you the question.

Without objection I will put the study of our staff in the record,[1] and suggest that—there is a question in my mind as to the validity of the statements made in appendix 2.

Mr. CIVILETTI. They contain both—I am assuming your staff view is this also, that they contain not only the statutory provisions, but I am sure they express viewpoints, opinions, and understandings which may well differ.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Civiletti, in my opinion the reason you are here today representing the Justice Department is that the Attorney General would not subject himself, personally, to standing up for the positions which you have been compelled to advocate here this morning. In short, I confess that I am disappointed.

All my fears and apprehensions have been confirmed. Your statement is a virtual restatement of prior positions of the Justice Department—total opposition to all reform. Despite repeated public statements by the Attorney General for reforms, increasing evidence of abuses, and mounting support for legislative change, the Justice Department continues to be concerned only with retaining its prosecutorial functions without constraint and continues to ignore the need to insure preservation of the grand jury as a shield to protect citizens from potential governmental abuse.

Mr. CIVILETTI. This testimony is supported by, and is approved by administration. And, therefore, I think that remark is not exactly——

Mr. EILBERG. What is exactly correct is that the Domestic Council presented a series of recommendations, which recognized our bill and agreed with the points of our bill, to the President of the United States and the President decided not to go with the recommendations of the Domestic Council and to go with the position of the Attorney General.

That, I think, is an accurate statement, Mr. Civiletti. And I ask you to deny that, if you can.

Mr. CIVILETTI. The statement is inaccurate in that it says or suggests that, that there were hard lines presented by the Domestic Council as a body or approved as a unit. Certainly you would expect that the Justice Department conducted an openminded review, heard viewpoints from whomever they could, and had healthy discussions about the wisdom of one or more provisions and were not of a monolithic mind concerning any particular issue.

The same is true of the Domestic Council as well as many other offices with which we consulted within and without the Department. And then agreements were reached and determinations made which we felt balanced all proper considerations and were the most suitable and worthwhile, which I have tried to present in some form to you.

Mr. EILBERG. I have on numerous occasions detailed the moderate reforms proposed in H.R. 94. Many witnesses have criticized the bill as not going far enough, for example, in not eliminating compulsory immunity or in not eliminating use of hearsay, irrelevant or unconstitutional evidence, or in limiting the role of counsel to advice only. I believe H.R. 94 is a good bill—making changes but not making drastic, possibly detrimental changes.

The organized bar has proposed detailed standards very close to my proposed reforms. Many States have passed or are considering bills to reform their State grand jury laws.

Citizen groups, like the National Council of Churches, have urged reforms. Businessmen have indicated concern with grand jury practices. All are looking to this subcommittee and the Justice Department for cooperative efforts to work out legislative changes.

From early statements by the Attorney General, we were all encouraged that this cooperative effort would be made. We were all wrong! For that, I am not only deeply disappointed, but also saddened.

Without objection I would like to enter into the record at this point the summary prepared by subcommittee staff of the positions advocated by you and the Department so that those Members of Congress who wish to, may have the opportunity to briefly read what you support and what you oppose and to judge the quality of the statement that I have just made.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE POSITION

SUPPORTS

Reduction of maximum confinement for civil contempt from 18 months to 12 months, instead of 6 months proposed by H.R. 94.

Criminality penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information, but believes that uniform penalties should be prescribed regardless of motivation for disclosure.

Does not oppose prohibition on successive grand jury investigations, but only if a "no bill" is presented.

Requirement (by administrative regulation not by statute) that prosecutor present exculpatory evidence, but only "significant evidence . . . personally known to the prosecutor."

Advising witnesses in the subpoena of the right to counsel, the privilege against self-incrimination and the subject matter of the grand jury investigation but not whether he is a target, or the criminal offenses to be investigated.

Recordation of testimony of witnesses but not comments of prosecutor or grand juror.

Allowing witnesses to have transcript of their testimony, but only "under such conditions as the court deems reasonable."

OPPOSES

Elimination of reiterative contempt.
Return to transactional immunity.
Judicial review of immunity applications.
Counsel in the grand jury room.

Providing targets with notice and opportunity to testify before the grand jury in all cases, and believes that such issue would be better handled through administrative regulations, allowing notice to, and testimony of, target where "appropriate."

Special attorney for the grand jury.

Allowing witnesses to use "forum non conveniens" as a basis for motion to quash a grand jury subpena.

Preliminary examination after indictment.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I disagree with your statement, of course, as I have tried to elaborate in my written and oral testimony. And I think it is—I have not seen what you are going to submit in the record. But I am sure I will have a copy of it in due course.

Mr. EILBERG. We will be glad to give you a copy. And you will have it in short order.

I do have an extensive series of questions to ask. If for some reason we cannot cover them all I will submit them to you for later response.

I would like to give the other members of the subcommittee an opportunity to be heard. And we will try to go by the 5-minute rule. And I now call on Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My first question concerns the recalcitrant witness and the Department's belief in 12 months, that 12 months is preferable to 18 months. I wonder, is this based on any history of lengthy incarceration matched up against the success of getting the witnesses to testify?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No.

Mr. FISH. Well, then on what basis was it——

Mr. CIVILETTI. Simply a matter of judgment. How do you pick 6 instead of 12, 8 instead of 10? It is a matter of judgment as to the amount of time, with the court's full discretion to choose, to allow 30 days, 60 days, 90 days, as to the time within which he thinks, the court that is, thinks it proper for a particular witness to consider the duty to testify and change his opinion where he has no legal right to withhold evidence.

Mr. FISH. It would be helpful in picking a period for incarceration to know what is prudent to be successful, as far as the period of incarceration in the past.

Mr. CIVILETTI. It varies depending upon the individual and the nature of his reason for refusal to testify. I don't think there is any way to predict whether 12 months will be best for one witness, or at what point he will decide that he must disclose the evidence, or feels prison confinement is so distasteful to him that his freedom controls his disposition.

Mr. FISH. On the subject of successive grand jury investigation, section 6, you recognize, of course, in your statement that persons should not be needlessly subjected to potential harassment. And to avoid this, only in a situation where the grand jury determines on the merits, that this should be done.

Wouldn't it be possible for a prosecutor who wished to harass an individual simply to see that the grand jury does not vote on the bill,, so that he could see it is not done on the merits?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Is that a possibility?

Mr. FISH. How could you deal with that potential abuse?

Mr. CIVILETTI. By the statement I have put in here. Any determination on the merits, not necessarily exclusively no-true bill.

If an investigation shows that there is no promise to it, that the claims of wrongdoing albeit very serious and grave, in effect have no evidence to substantiate them, the grand jury determines at that time to close the investgiation. If in a situation of this kind, they do not go to the trouble or difficulty of an indictment because the charges are so clearly nonsupportive and they enter in their book, in their trial proceeding book, investigation closed, we would suggest that that would be appropriate to constitute a closing on the merits, a determination on the merits that the investigation should not be continued.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you know how many no-true bills have been entered?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes. In 1976 a little over 23,000 indictments were returned; 123 no-true bills were reported. I do not know and do not have statistics to present to you the number of investigations which were closed without a true bill and without an indictment.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you believe that those numbers are really significant?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think they are extremely significant.

And I think that the people who were subject to those 123 occurrences would agree that they were very substantial and significant.

Mr. EILBERG. We believe that is a paltry number.

Mr. CIVILETTI. That is an interesting question, because we would be happy, if we determined that we had 10,000 no-true bills? With 10,000 grand jury proceedings in which people were put before the grand jury, they gave of their time and effort and had elaborate proceedings, documents presented, and at the end there was no-true bill, would that show a better system of justice?

Mr. EILBERG. You seem to insist that you want to continue with a rubber stamp grand jury. That is the way it appears to me.

Mr. FISH. How many grand juries were followed by a second grand jury involving the same target witness? Do you have that figure?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Same target witness?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I don't have that figure. And it depends upon whether you mean on the same subject matter allegation or on a different allegation.

For instance, IBM may have had 14 grand jury proceedings on the same subject matter, antitrust violations. And yet they may have been all different facts and circumstances and relations.

And con artists and white collar criminals are frequently investigated on a series of unrelated, other such acts.

So, it is very difficult to determine that particular item.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will take a brief recess.

[Recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. At this time, my final question goes to the notice of rights of grand jury witnesses. You spoke favorably about this on page 19 of your testimony, about rights enumerated 1, 2, and 3. And then you get to rights 4, whether the witness' own conduct is under investigation.

It seems that the objection to that is based on the lack of a constitutional right, and your testimony relies heavily on the Washington case. It seems to me it is a matter of playing favorites, and an individual can be told whether or not his conduct is the subject of a grand jury investigation, not just the fact that he is a witness.

Aside from showing a lack of constitutional right, what is the objection of letting this individual know that his conduct is under investigation?

Mr. CIVILETTI. The objection goes beyond the reference to constitutional rights. I think, frankly admitted by all of us, that the bill generally, and all of those things with which we agree, go far beyond constitutional rights and none of these provisions of new additional safeguards or protections are constitutionally mandated under at least all recent interpretations of the Supreme Court.

The objection is two-fold. One, as you know, and I know, when we begin an investigation we have sometimes fairly concrete allegations as to the subject matter but no identification of individuals.

Other times, frequently, we have allegations as to certain individuals which are totally wrong. So that very frequently during the course of the investigation, initiation, a third of the way through, even a half of the way through, sometimes even two-thirds of the way through, there is no distinct knowledge on the part of the grand jury nor on the part of the government that that witness' particular conduct is within the thrust of the intended investigation of criminal activity.

Most frequently, the witness is unrelated to the criminal activity and is a witness of facts, be they oral facts or documentary facts and is asked to disclose those facts to the grand jury.

So that, as a practical matter, though it is very difficult, in most investigations even half of the way through, to ask or to determine at that stage of the investigation, as to a particular witness, is he a target or is he not?

Second, and of course you don't want to promise, we don't and you don't, any thing with regard to notice, rules, statutory provisions, that we can't live up to, to the extent humanly possible—when you get toward the end of the grand jury session ordinarily the subjects or targets, so to speak, in the vast majority of grand jury investigations are never subpenaed before the grand jury, never would appear before the grand jury.

The independent evidence, independent of their own testimony, has either established or failed to establish the probable cause necessary for the return of the indictment. To formally notify a prospective subject that he is under investigation at that end session, we feel is unnecessary because he is under very little, very little misapprehension in any significant investigation that he may indeed be a target.

And, of course, it is not a situation where you are in effect surprising anyone. We all know what our conduct is. We all know what our actions have been. We all know whether we have extorted someone, whether we have bribed someone, whether we have stolen a car. So the witness, if he is in a situation where he has committed criminal actions, he is aware of his risk, although the Government may not be fully aware that he, in fact, is the criminal.

In drug circumstances, for example; in many drug investigations we have information as to a distributor of drugs from one source or another. And during the course of the investigation, people who are related to that distribution will—inquiry will be made of them, they will be subpenaed before the grand jury; they will give evidence with regard, perhaps, to that distribution. And in a fair number of cases that have come to my attention in the last 5 months, we later find that the next stage of the investigation or after a more thorough presentation of witnesses to the grand jury, that one of those early witnesses is the very one who although not a distributor was a wholesaler of the drugs, and, of course, concealed that, and presented a very narrow point of view to the grand jury. So, essentially, we think that it is impossible to abide by the rule as a practical matter.

Mr. FISH. It seems to me that if you don't know that the witness would be subject to the investigation, then obviously you cannot so advise him. And if he is not called anyway, that is another category. But, I think the provision has to be with regard to witnesses that are subpenaed.

On page 21, of the legislation, where it says: "Four, whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury"; would you have language such as, if known by the Government or when known by the Government?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I don't see the problem that we are addressing, the weakness or the unfairness involved. If a person has committed unlawful acts and knows himself, which I assume if rational, he or she would know that he has engaged in conduct which is either illegal, dramatically illegal or probably illegal, he is fully aware of the risks that he is under.

If he is engaged in no such conduct, then he is free.

Mr. FISH. The Government knows it; he knows it. Then why not say so?

Mr. CIVILETTI. But we don't know. We don't know what is in his mind.

Mr. FISH. If you don't know, obviously, you can't tell them.

Mr. CIVILETTI. But we have a duty, if this condition is imposed, we would have a duty to try to discover that as to every defendant who is indicted—everybody would raise a motion that we knew, and had not given him such notice. It would require hearings to determine what was in the mind of the prosecutor on every such occasion.

And I don't think that is in our best interest in the administration of justice or of citizens who are free and innocent citizens.

Mr. FISH. That is all I have, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. Yes. I happen to agree with your position on most of these points, Mr. Civiletti. One that I, however, have to take some exception to is your position on the indictments. You are entitled to preliminary examinations in Michigan after indictment. And while it may be somewhat duplicative, it is the first and maybe the only opportunity to evaluate to any extent what kind of a case he is facing from the Government. And particularly for his lawyer to make that evaluation. He may be very well advised. But as you know from your experience, very often a criminal defendant is not really fully advised by his own counsel.

It seems to me that it gives the counsel a chance to evaluate the Government's case because he might not be allowed to get copies of the grand jury minutes, and also to engage, then perhaps, in some meaningful plea bargaining or to pursue the thing further.

I just don't agree with your position on the elimination of the preliminary exam on the basis that it is totally duplicative of the grand jury because the defendant does not get exposure to the grand jury and neither does his attorney.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think that is a distinction which you bring up, and the distinction seems to me not to go to the direction or the thrust of a preliminary examination to determine probable cause; it goes more, as you express it, to a feeling that there ought to be a disclosure to the defendant of a different kind than exists today.

And I think that really is better addressed through, as we have done from time to time, through modification of the disclosure or discovery rules in the criminal process as to what a defendant ought to receive fairly promptly after indictment, so that he may prepare meaningful motions in the trial process and also prepare for the trial of the case.

I am not suggesting that we turn to the civil discovery procedure which has many, many problems. But I am suggesting that if the main idea is to give an opportunity to the defendant and his counsel to learn more of the subject and scope of the case against him, and what it consists of, that a preliminary examination would be not, perhaps, the best way to do it. As you may know from the Michigan practice—and other States have a great many preliminary examinations before indictment to determine whether they should be held over for those felonies or not—what develops is a superficial preliminary examination where the Government puts on, one witness who lays out the elements of the crime.

Of two, documents, and that is sufficient to meet the standard of most preliminary examinations. If the effect is to, or if the desire on the defendant's part and his counsel's part is to, learn the case, that desire is thwarted, and we go through an exercise of fairly meaningless procedure.

Mr. SAWYER. But the defense counsel is entitled to subpena these witnesses. So it is a better way of going through discovery, rather than interrogatories, and depositions on different days, and so forth. You get it all over in one afternoon.

I know it is a practice in Michigan. And, of course, we don't use grand juries anywhere to the extent that the Federal Government is mandated to use them. We would only use them in complex cases.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I believe you have a special procedure in Michigan, a one-man grand jury.

Mr. SAWYER. Yes. And that is perhaps why I agree with your objection to counsel being in the jury room, because under our one-man grand juries, that is permitted. And it is hard to do, if you are trying to accomplish these things. But I know as a matter of practice, that whenever it is intended to defend a case or at least a preliminary judgment is made to defend the case, as opposed to pleading the case, a preliminary examination is uniformly demanded, and for the purpose of giving defense counsel, really, a feel or an evaluation of the case, so he can make a judgment, and then advise his client.

So, I don't see what your objection is to this, to have available at least on request a preliminary examination after an indictment.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Well, as I stated, we saw it as a duplicative process. We were not focusing from the language of the bill on it developing into a disclosure proceeding for the benefit of an examination by defense counsel of the nature of the case for proper considerations, for a trial on the merits or plea bargaining, or whatever. And I have some, not having any experience that you address, I have some difficulty in determining whether or not a preliminary examination whose focus is not to determine probable cause, perhaps, but it is to determine the essential elements of the case, the essential nature of the case, whether that is best handled through a small adversary proceeding where counsel calls witnesses, cross-examination, which would be a new innovation in Federal law, or whether handled by simply what is in a good many cases an open file practice, where defense counsel comes and examines the U.S. attorney's file in the case, and learns in 2 hours what we have.

Mrs. SAWYER. Even getting the grand jury minutes you know, very often the witness will not be asked questions that you would have liked to have asked to find out what his response would have been. And in Michigan maybe it is designed for just that, just a determination of the fact that a crime was committed, with probable cause to believe that the accused is the party involved.

But it is run on a little more of a full-fledged basis. The district judges, which are the lower court judges there, require a pretty good admissible showing before they do that. It is rare that they will dismiss. But they do on occasion.

And they do require a substantive showing. And certainly it is a valuable thing, I think, not in cases where you are going to plead, but in cases where you are trying to evaluate whether to go to trial or not.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Today in Federal practice, in a good many cases, and particularly in substantial cases, I think that part of motions to suppress, motions to dismiss the indictment, motions to obtain grand jury testimony, are utilized in much the same fashion as evidentiary hearings before a court in a proceeding to determine not so much exclusively whether it is a dismissible matter, but in the course of that thing, to educate the defense counsel.

Mr. SAWYER. I have no further questions.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Ms. Holtzman.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

With respect to the Department's proposed 12-month term for recalcitrant witnesses, I believe you said in your testimony that you felt there was a greater likelihood that somebody after 6 months would rethink the position on silence and decide to speak.

I wonder if——

Mr. CIVILETTI. I am sorry, I missed the key point, that I have testified that——

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I believe you testified in substance that a 12-month period was preferable to 6 months because in that extra 6-month period of time you had an additional chance that a witness might decide to speak.

Mr. CIVILETTI. No; I did not testify to that. I said that is a matter of—a difficult matter to determine.

I said it is a matter of judgment on individual circumstances. I think perfectly, it is permissible for a court to determine after 30 days, 15 days, or to determine that after 8 months, depending on the nature of the circumstances whether a witness is likely to purge himself under civil contempt and discover and determine that it is in the best interests of the country and everyone else to give evidence which he has no legal right to withhold.

I did not—what I am saying is I did not define the magical mark where someone 6 months in and does not testify, suddenly because he is 8 months in he is going to testify.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I did not mean to imply that. But there must be something about that additional six months that leads you to believe that the witness will no longer not be recalcitrant.

I wonder if you have any statistics to suggest that anybody who has been incarcerated for civil contempt for 6 months has thereafter decided to go before the grand jury and answer questions.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I don't have any statistics that I am aware of. I do know that witnesses—I have a dim recollection—I believe that witnesses who have been incarcerated for long periods of time under civil contempt, and by long to me that would be 8 months, 9 months, 10 months, have perhaps not exclusively through confinement, but through some other factors influencing them, have determined to testify after those periods of time.

It is not an empty proceeding. If it were totally empty altogether then I think the thrust of the logical arguments would be to have no contempt proceeding, to allow anybody to take independently, and determine individually when to testify and when not to.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. But I don't believe that is the logical conclusion of the point I am making. The Supreme Court decided that it was not constitutional for a judge to imprison somebody for criminal contempt for more than 6 months without calling a jury.

What I am saying is that if the Justice Department is coming here to say that it opposes a 6-month limit and proposes instead a 12-month limit, I think it should be in a position to state that there is some evidence to warrant that 6-month additional period.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think that is not capable of such evidence. The Congress in 1970 decided in its wisdom after receiving evidence that 18 months is appropriate. I cannot challenge that 18-month determination. I can only give you our best views and judgments, and you can determine what you believe is appropriate.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Thank you.

Turning a moment to the issue of permitting a change of venue with respect to witnesses who are imprisoned for civil contempt, do you favor those portions of the bill?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I am sorry. You will have to refer me to the provision of the bill which you are addressing.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. It is page 2, section B–1.

It is my understanding that at the present time there is no provision for a change of venue for somebody held in civil contempt. The bill provides for such relief in cases of need or hardship.

Have you taken a position on those provisions? I would say personally that I think they are very desirable and I have included them in my bill.

Mr. CIVILETTI. We took no—as I recall—we took no position with regard to that in my testimony. With regard to a change of venue.

It seems to me offhanded, and the Department did not take a position on this, it seems to me that a change of venue would certainly be appropriate in certain circumstances, and the compulsion of the thing, in my mind this compulsion would apply regardless if you are here or you are there or 50 miles away.

So that personally I can see no reason for not committing and allowing a change of venue to be closer to human considerations which involve third parties that are not directly involved in the contemptuous act.

I am not—I am not certain if that is permissible at the present time. I do know that the Bureau of Prisons in the federal system from time to time in cases of family circumstances, in cases of illnesses and treatment, in cases of potential abuse and other things do have what I consider to be a positive attitude toward changes.

Whether or not it ought to be an absolute right, I don't know.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I think the provision says upon a showing of need or hardship.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I don't have any quarrel with that personally.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Thank you.

I know that you have taken a position in your testimony that the Justice Department is opposed to allowing counsel for the witness to enter the grand jury room.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I wonder if you have had an opportunity to review the book that has been written on the subject of grand jury reform by Judge Marvin Frankel.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I have read excerpts of that book.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Judge Frankel suggests that the right to counsel in the grand jury room ought to be granted. He says, and I quote from the book:

> We have considered the argument that a lawyer for a witness would delay the grand jury's work. The argument is not weightless. The remedy, however, in the grand jury as elsewhere, is not to deny altogether the assistance of counsel which is often the result of barring the lawyer for the witness from the grand jury room. The remedy is to regulate the counsel's role—a kind of control familiar and effective in the courtroom, legislative hearings and administrative proceedings. It would require a combination of remarkably ineffectual prosecutors and judges to defeat the efficacy of such supervision.

Mr. CIVILETTI. We disagree with that view expressed by Judge Frankel. The Department of Justice does. And I think the Supreme Court advisory committee on rules does as well, and almost all Federal district court judges.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Is the objection that the lawyer in the grand jury room would obstruct the proceedings?

Mr. CIVILETTI. There are five specific objections that I highlighted on page 18 of the testimony.

One of them is that counsel will, as he has a duty to do, and primarily his first duty, represent his client. And although he would have a limitation on his conduct as it is mandated in the proposed legislation, he would have great freedom through objections, rephrasing, et cetera, et cetera, hearings, instructions not to answer, and we would develop—we would develop a situation where there would be much delay, and obstruction, and continuations.

Mr. EILBERG. How would you differentiate between the role of the attorney with the witness in the grand jury room as compared with the role of an attorney with a witness before a congressional hearing?

Mr. CIVILETTI. As you know, Mr. Chairman, neither before a congressional hearing, an administrative hearing, or a court trial does any witness have a right to consult with his client after every question, nor does he have the right to object, instruct the witness not to answer without such penalties as are provided for.

Mr. EILBERG. What is your basis for that?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think that is universal law. I have never seen a lawyer stand alongside of a witness on that witness chair under oath and be allowed to consult with that attorney before answering questions.

Mr. EILBERG. What about the witness before a congressional hearing?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Before the congressional hearing?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. CIVILETTI. The chairman is there. The committee is there to conduct the proceedings.

If the witness is reading simply the statements of counsel, to instruct the witness to only consult with counsel on privileged matters, to only consult with counsel on confused questions.

I don't think that it would be—it would be my judgment, I don't know this, that you would not tolerate from a factual witness that you were inquiring, a simple parroting of that counsel's views or testimony through the mouth of the witness, his counsel's viewpoints, opinions, retailored facts, nor would you tolerate a lawyer objecting to your questions, telling you to rephrase them, saying that they were irrelevant or immaterial, instructing the witness not to answer.

So you have an immediate control right at the time of the hearing without adjourning and going to the full House, for instance, as an example, and debating whether or not a particular question or series of questions or line of questions were appropriate or not appropriate.

Mr. EILBERG. In our bill we would require the transcript of whatever was said to be made a part of the record which could be immediately brought to the judge, certainly in the same building, and perhaps just a few feet away.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Can you imagine with 23,000 indictment proceedings, the enormity of the number of questions ruled upon by a judge in that instance, the number of hearings that would have to be held?

We just think it is unnecessary and very unwise.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think you have raised a very important point. And I was going to go through that with Mr. Civiletti, because I think that there are some things that really should be clarified.

In the first place, I think that Judge Frankel is correct, that with respect to the question of obstructing the proceedings, it would take a great deal of ineptness on the part of the judges and the prosecutor to allow obstruction to take place.

Let's go back to your first objection—that lawyers may insist on rephrasing questions.

Isn't justice served by requiring questions to be stated clearly to the witness?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Certainly.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Suppose the prosecutor asks a question that is incomprehensible. Is justice served by not having that question clarified?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. No.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Don't you think that would benefit the proceedings?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. That is like saying, when do you stop beating your wife?

Ms. HOLTZMAN. No, it's not. I say to you that this is something that could benefit the proceedings.

Mr. CIVILETTI. That's not the sole objection. That was an example of the type of conduct that counsel can enter into. Counsel for the witness in the grand jury room has no separate interest to see that that grand jury proceeding continues directly and expeditiously and favorably.

He has his own exclusive right and duty to protect his witness as his witness deems it correct to be protected. If he can delay the proceeding, if he can object to every question, if he can ask for rephrasing, if he can instruct the witness not to answer, it doesn't so much depend upon the artfulness of the question as it does the subject matter.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. We are not talking about the same provision of the bill. The bill in section C does not permit the lawyer to address the grand jury under any circumstances.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I didn't say anything about addressing the grand jury.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. He should ask the witness to——

Mr. CIVILETTI. He addresses the prosecutor and says, "I object to the question," or he tells the witness to say, "We object to the question, refuse to answer; please restate it."

Ms. HOLTZMAN. It says that he can do nothing but discuss the questions with the witness. That is how I interpret it. And therefore, it seems to be that justice is served by allowing counsel to say to the witness, "This question is not clear, and if you answer it, you will either trap yourself or you will not be able to give a proper answer."

I think in those kinds of cases that we are really talking about having counsel assist the functioning of the grand jury, not obstructing the proceedings.

Mr. CIVILETTI. We just disagree on that issue.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Well, since the counsel cannot object vocally——

Mr. CIVILETTI. The bill does not say that. That is your interpretation.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Let's say that we make it clear that the only words counsel could utter would be to the witness, and not loudly enough that it would obstruct the hearings in any manner, would your position change?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. No.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. You would still be opposed to it?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. On what grounds?

Mr. CIVILETTI. First, we think that the grand jury and the witness in a probable cause examination are entitled to frank, responsive answers in the witness' words to the questions asked.

There are only two occasions—one principal one—that I know of in which legal advice is necessary concerning the grand jury examination. One is, of course, the assertion of the fifth amendment privilege, which is easily provided by the present system.

And the second is that there is a privilege, such as attorney-client, in which there is a right for refusal to answer.

Otherwise for witnesses—and I am not talking about defendants, witnesses—if there is a certain assumption that they can hear and understand, and if they don't know the question or whatever, they can say, "I don't understand the question, I don't know what you are asking me."

So that I see no—even assuming all of these things, assuming all the lawyer does is sit with the witness and communicate on questions—I see no need substantively for the counsel to advise the witness after every question. It is not done in any other proceedings of any other kind, be they public or private.

And also, I think it is a further risk and breach of the grand jury secrecy provisions, because the bill does not provide for prohibition of disclosure by counsel.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Right now, if the witness tells the counsel what went on in the jury room, counsel would then be informed. And counsel is then bound——

Mr. CIVILETTI. I am not sure of that.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. The witness is not bound.

Mr. CIVILETTI. That is an entirely different thing. The witness is clearly not bound.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Is his counsel?

Mr. CIVILETTI. The counsel is bound by all ethical rules and considerations. He cannot have a press conference concerning grand jury testimony. He cannot——

Mr. HOLTZMAN. But he is subject to contempt. Isn't that correct?

Mr. CIVILETTI. That is not correct. He could be subject to disbarment for doing it.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. I am not talking about the ethical rules.

Mr. CIVILETTI. If you will throw out the ethical rules, then you will have a lot of trouble.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. We are talking about laws in addition to ethical rules. We have laws governing our conduct aside from ethical rules. And that is what I am talking about. As a matter of law, this person is free to say what happened in the grand jury room.

Mr. CIVILETTI. The witness is.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. And his counsel.

Mr. CIVILETTI. And his counsel is, as far as statutory law, but not as far as ethical law.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Those ethical principles would still govern him in the grand jury room.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes, but the primary ethical principle is service of the client, exclusively, and not the grand jury, not the court, not anyone else.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. If the ethical principles work outside of the grand jury room there is no reason they can't work inside as well.

Mr. EILBERG. It seems to me you are establishing a double standard, one for prosecutors, one for all other lawyers.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I hope not.

Mr. EILBERG. Why do you say prosecutors are more trustworthy than other lawyers?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I don't mean to suggest that they are more trustworthy. What I mean to suggest very strongly is that their duties are entirely different.

Of course, they coincide in many respects. They are both governed by the same code of ethics. But the duty imposed on the prosecutor is substantially greater than it is on defense counsel.

Now, the prosecutor represents the Federal Government, and should be beyond reproach. His duty is a concern for the entire administration of justice, and not for particular indictments of a particular prosecution or a particular defendant. An individual lawyer's primary responsibility is directed on the contrary, almost solely to the individual client and his circumstances.

Mr. EILBERG. But his standards should be no less ethical.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I would hope so. I would hope that would be true. But he has no greater interest, he has no greater duty than that particular client under ethical principles and guidelines, certainly.

But the prosecutor's duty, his role, his function is substantially greater. He is bound by not only all of the intricacies of the law, but all of the policies of the Government in doing his duty to preserve justice and the entire system.

And with regard to—his conduct, he is subject to—directly subject to not only simple ethical codes, but he is an officer of the U.S. Government, he is an officer of the State government, he is an officer of the court, and he conducts himself before those 23 witnesses, and all these bodies have great latitude in whatever direction, suspension, penalty they want to impose for the conduct by the prosecutor.

The same latitude is not available to control private lawyers.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you comment on this question—namely—that in case after case, the U.S. attorney is enthusiastic, perhaps overenthusiastic, that many of these prosecutors are really running for political office, and that there are other elements present in the U.S. attorney's decisions which do not necessarily assist his proper professional role?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I would not think that that was the general practice, no. Nor do I concede that simply running for public office or holding office is a disqualification.

Mr. EILBERG. You don't feel that any Federal attorney has or does use the Federal attorney's office for advancement of his public image in terms of running for political office later?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No. I think that people are tall and short, and bright and not so bright, and some have big egos and some not.

And——

Mr. EILBERG. And some are ethical and some are not ethical?

Mr. CIVILETTI. That is right.

Mr. FISH. On page 3 of your testimony, Mr. Civiletti, it starts off:

> The Department of Justice is committed to many principles for improvement which underlie the provisions of H.R. 94, and which have been suggested by others,

And then you give examples—many of the responsibilities of the prosecutor. And my question to you is: How do you see that the prosecutor lives up to these standards? What monitoring systems do you have to see that he lives up to those standards?

Mr. CIVILETTI. There are numerous monitoring systems. First, whatever he does, he does before 23 witnesses in the grand jury room; 23 people who are free to go to the court at any time when they feel there has been any misconduct, any harassment, any oversteppings, or whatever. I think that ought to be exercised.

Second, he is under the supervision of the U.S. attorney, who has been confirmed and found to be suitable, competent, of high integrity by the Senate and by the President, and by the court with whom he practices generally.

Any misconduct, any impropriety or mistakes made in the appointment of the assistants are continually rectified by removals, discharges, and the rest.

Third, any number of defendants and some witnesses, a good many witnesses have counsel, they communicate with counsel extensively before they go into the grand jury room, and they communicate with them in the debriefing session.

And counsel is looking for any means to properly represent his client. If there is related to counsel a circumstance of impropriety, wrongful argument, abuse, or whatever, there would not be a moment's hesitation for such counsel to file a petition, bring a proceeding, either before the court administering the activity, or before the Bar Association.

Fourth, we have in the Justice Department an Office of Professional Responsibility, and we periodically receive in the criminal division and other divisions a complaint about a particular course of conduct, either from an individual involved, from counsel, from the press, from some other source or from Congress, concerning the conduct of a particular person in a particular situation.

In each instance, that conduct is investigated, reviewed. Many times the investigative agencies do it. Other times affidavits are taken, personal interviews are conducted, and a determination is made as to whether the complaint is warranted or unwarranted, and whatever remedial action is necessary.

Those are some of the provisions for safeguards.

Mr. FISH. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. You have expressed your belief that the Department can and will police itself without legislative reforms. In a recent case, U.S. v. Litton Systems, a Federal district judge in Alexandria described how Federal prosecutors threatened indictment unless Litton would agree to make a civil monetary settlement of a Government claim, despite the fact that one grand jury had investigated the matter and did not return an indictment. When Litton refused, the prosecution presented hearsay evidence to a second grand jury and secured an indictment. The judge saw this as a clear abuse of prosecutorial discretion. What sanctions, if any, were taken against the prosecutors involved in response to this abuse?

Mr. CIVILETTI. That matter I am fairly familiar with. The holding of the court—Judge Bryan, I think it was—was that the interplay prior to the grand jury action, second grand jury action, the interplay by the prosecutor and defense counsel in discussing an alternative to criminal indictment, a reopening of civil proceedings so that fraud evidence could be produced to see whether or not in that proceeding the Government and the public could be saved somewhere near $20 million in submarine construction—was an appropriate remedy rather than indictment—the judge held that it was inappropriate to hold such discussions with the threat of indictment over the head of the defendant in this case, Litton, and that, therefore, the proceedings should not go forward.

The judge did not address in the holding any conduct before the grand jury whatsoever. What he said, as an aside, was that after 18 months of investigation and a full presentation of evidence, he thought it unwise—and I think it probably colored and influenced his decision—he thought it unwise at the expiration of that first grand jury to go back with a second grand jury and summarize the evidence as a matter of efficiency, which had been presented periodically over 18 months, and summarize that in a very much shorter period of time.

In that particular instance the first grand jury expired without ever having considered the merits of the indictment or nonindictment. It expired by its term.

The second grand jury was impaneled to pickup where the first one had left off. And an effort was made to accelerate by summarizing the prior testimony and presenting it and allowing the grand jury to examine it. The heart of the Litton case, and why it was proceeded, was the viewpoint within the Department of Justice on the facts presented and reviewed by it, that the proposal with regard to the alternative civil proceedings had been first presented, encouraged by defense counsel, and that we were responding to that request, and considering it and reviewing it.

The court, based on the evidence that it heard, I think, on paper, without the witnesses before it, determined that that was not so, that it appeared to the court that that was the prosecutor who had proposed the alternative and used the potential of indictment as an unfair advantage and club in order to get Litton to reopen the civil matter and relitigate on the issue of fraud.

Mr. EILBERG. So no sanctions were taken?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Well, it's on appeal right now. It's under consideration for appeal right now.

Mr. EILBERG. The case is to be prosecuted?

Mr. CIVILETTI. We are not convinced, despite the opinion that all of the facts were disclosed to the court.

Mr. EILBERG. You have testified from your recollection and opinion, and I read now from the opinion in the record, where the judge said:

> When prosecutorial discretion is abused, dismissal of the indictment is warranted.

And the court also says:

> There is further evidence of the cynical view that has been taken of the grand jury, namely [as a] mere echo of the office of the United States attorney.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I have read the opinion.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you agree with those statements?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No, I don't agree with the statement that it's a mere echo of the U.S. attorney's office.

Two matters have been presented not long ago on very sensitive matters by U.S. attorneys with the Department's knowledge, and the grand jury in both cases returned no-true bills. If the grand jury had been a rubber stamp of the U.S. attorney's office, I think that indictments would have been sought or obtained or evidence brought forth in that instance.

Mr. EILBERG. So what policy standards or procedures have been established by the Department and made binding, not just as instructions to U.S. attorneys, as to the variety of subjects, such as the granting of immunity, preserving grand jury secrecy, notice of witnesses, repeated instructions to grand juries to secure indictments—what does your manual include?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I cannot respond in a very brief way. The issuance of immunities involve very close safeguards. They all must be reviewed by me personally. The U.S. attorney has no authority to issue them, or any assistant, without such a careful check and review. Subsequently, of course, they go before the court. The detailed contents of the grand jury instructions and commitments are in title IX of the U.S. attorney's manual, beginning with page 1, and they involve over 44 pages of instructions, including all kinds of restrictions, limitations.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you provide that to us?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I would be happy to, yes.

Mr. EILBERG. When was it put together?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Well, of course, it has been—it has been in existence since when I was an assistant U.S. attorney in 1960. At that time it was a small book. Now it is a multivolume production, and I think these chapters were approved in January of 1977 by my—by my predecessors. And that manual is the one to which I made reference and will provide to the committee if the committee is interested in it, the precise language that I would suggest in those provisions which I have suggested in my testimony I feel are in need of revision to comply with the principles, some of the principles, in the ABA standards.

Mr. EILBERG. Are the provisions in that manual binding?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Do they touch on the subjects that I have referred to—immunity, preserving grand jury secrecy?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Notice to witnesses?

Mr. CIVILETTI. No.

Mr. EILBERG. Warning of rights?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Repeated submissions to grand juries to secure indictments?

Mr. CIVILETTI. I think they touch on that, since the law permits now the presentation of matters to a successive grand jury if the attorney determines that there is new evidence that the grand jury improperly did not find an indictment, that somehow they were inflamed by their own passions in the community. For instance, in some circumstances different geographic areas are reluctant to indict certain members, certain groups, whatever the facts are, because of their predilections. And in those instances, it's perfectly acceptable to go to a second grand jury. So that what I have suggested here as the Department's position, and our approval of this bill's provisions with regard to prohibiting successive grand juries would be a sharp departure from prior conduct and from the present law. And hardly amounts to the Department laboring and producing a mouse.

Mr. EILBERG. What is the Department's policy with regard to the issuance of press releases?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Neither at the time of investigation, at the time of grand jury proceedings, at the time of trial, or post-trial, should the U.S. attorney be issuing press releases.

Mr. EILBERG. Where does that appear?

Mr. CIVILETTI. It's in the manual. But it's not in the grand jury section entirely. Just that part relating to grand jury secrecy would be in the grand jury section.

Mr. EILBERG. Are those provisions binding with regard to issuing releases, press conferences?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Certainly they are binding. You can't detail, just as in legislation we cannot detail every circumstance. There is followup regulation. There is a law with a measure of sound judgment, and integrity.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you know of any case where a U.S. attorney or assistant U.S. attorney was reprimanded or given any punishment of any kind for violating the provisions against releases and press conferences?

I say that because I come from the State of Pennsylvania. And there are many lawyers in the State that believe that—there are U.S. attorneys issuing such releases, engaging in this kind of practice.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Myself, since I have been in office, I cannot talk really in depth about particular matters that I did not pay attention to when I was in private practice. But since I have been in office, I have been extremely concerned, not necessarily with the U.S. attorneys, but in those instances when it may have related to U.S. attorneys with grand jury release, with information, with hearings.

We have, for example, conducted private investigations concerning leaks, leaks involving the CIA investigation, leaks involving the ICC investigation, and expressed to whatever U.S. attorneys may have been involved, and there have been many of them, the absolute requirement that they do everything within their power to prevent such leaks. And I am opposed, and is the Department, to any kind of special treatment associated with the office.

Mr. EILBERG. You know of no situation where a U.S. attorney has been chastised for such conduct?

Mr. CIVILETTI. Well, the difficulty is in determining whether the conduct, in fact, occurred. They have been warned, they have been chastised in the sense that we have said that, indications that a leak may be from their office and we want them to take every effort and we won't tolerate that kind of conduct.

And that may play a part in some of the, which I am not directly involved in, it may play a part in some of the removals or changeovers of U.S. attorneys.

Mr. EILBERG. Another question. Last year H.R. 1277 provided for a penalty of 6 months and a $500 fine for violations of grand jury secrecy. Witnesses, including judges and prosecutors, testified that this provision was not strong enough as it did not cover third party groups or leaks made that would affect later trial proceedings.

Therefore, our new bill establishes an added penalty of five years in prison and $20,000 applicable to third parties. Yet, you oppose this provision and suggest only a misdemeanor offense. Under our bill you would have ability to use or not use the felony offense.

Why do you insist that all violations are the same, that there are not degrees of potential seriousness of this kind of violation?

Mr. CIVILETTI. That is a very fair question. I think the answer is the feeling was that the great harm is the disclosure itself. And that the motivation is irrelevant. And therefore, although it has set up difference degrees, and it may address culpability, but it doesn't do anything more to preserve the real harm that we are trying to avoid or to preserve the safety against the harm which we are trying to preserve. The provision serves to confuse, to make the law less enforceable because its harshness would be so great, and we would be better off in testing the waters for the first time with the new crime with the uniform readily understandable misdemeanor provision.

If, in your judgment, you decided and determined that the present law was what you thought was more adequate, I think that is a matter of judgment. This is not an absolute area that we are supporting. We support the principle fully. It is a matter of degree and we just give you our best advice with regard to it.

Mr. EILBERG. I just don't understand your position on this point. And——

Mr. CIVILETTI. Does it make any difference if someone hates you or someone wants to do you in, that they disclose improperly and under the penalty of the provisions, matters that come before the grand jury, to do you great damage, if that is the motivation, or if they are paid $5,000 to do it? What is the difference? You suffer anyway.

It seems to me there are distinctions drawn, with some wisdom, in regard to culpability in other areas but here the real harm is your suffering and the tampering with the system, not whether or not it is hateful or not hateful or misguided or not misguided. It ought to be prosecuted and we agree with that.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer?

Mr. SAWYER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just—having practiced 28 years, and having been a prosecutor for 2 years, I want to compliment you on your testimony. I think you have handled yourself beautifully. And I feel much more secure with you as the head of our Criminal Justice Division.

Mr. CIVILETTI. Thank you very much.

Mr. EILBERG. Ms. Holtzman, do you have anything else?

Ms. HOLTZMAN. If I may, just a brief question.

I didn't notice in your written testimony whether or not you commented on the provisions of the bill regarding instructions by the court to the grand jury about the rights and powers of the grand jury.

Mr. CIVILETTI. It may have been the appendix. We did comment on that. Our attitude was that those instructions ought to be given and generally we are in support of the principles that they ought to be full and complete; they sought to be in writing; there ought to be supplemental ones if the grand jury needs them. And we feel very strongly about it.

We go further than that and feel that any advice given by the assistant U.S. attorneys ought to be subject to the same kind of petit jury formal instructions that are given and that at any time during the course of the proceedings, if the jury wants more instructions or advice with regard to the law, they ought to go to the court.

Mr. EILBERG. We will be submitting questions.

Mr. FISH. One area that we didn't cover this morning, many of our witnesses have testified about the use of the grand jury for political purposes. This is still a real problem. And we will be submitting questions directed at that issue.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I would like to make one brief comment with regard to that.

It is too easy to say there will be no political prosecutions in this administration and that, of course, in the true sense, a political prosecution is a very serious matter, but it has happened before. And therefore, the potential of it happening again somewhere may exist.

But we have to distinguish between investigations which seemingly affect a particular group, criminal investigations that seemingly affect a particular group such as the Lion's Club, such as the Catholic Archdiocese in Baltimore, not because the group is being prosecuted, but because people acknowledge, members of the group, participants in the group, have committed very violent crimes.

Naturally, as in any investigation, it is the people with whom you associate and communicate who have evidence of admissions, who have knowledge of the circumstances, who may have relevant evidence. Therefore, sometimes when pursuit and inquiry is made in the natural avenues of investigation it gets mixed up by others with the idea that the group has certain trusted and legitimate freedoms and therefore although we are investigating a crime, we are accused of violating, so to speak, an attitude or philosophy and that is not so, although it sometimes can be alleged that it is so.

We firmly believe that regardless of an individual's association, no matter how strong your beliefs, you cannot commit criminal acts and then masquerade behind a political or social or economic or religious front no matter how genuine the group's activities.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Civiletti, our time has run out this morning. And rather than call another hearing, we are very anxious to give you a set of questions, which I hope you will respond to.

Mr. CIVILETTI. I will be delighted to direct my attention to them immediately. And thank you very much for allowing me to appear here today and present these views of the Department of Justice.

[The following information was submitted by the Justice Department:]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., November 23, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Enclosed are the answers of the Department of Justice to the grand jury questions you posed as a sequel to my testimony on H.R. 94 on June 29, 1977. In addition, we understand it is your Subcommittee's intention soon to mark up H.R. 94, and in that regard your Subcommittee staff has solicited the Department's comments upon those parts of the bill not addressed in my statement or in the enclosed answers. Our comments on these matters are also enclosed.

Please be assured that we stand ready and willing to work with the Subcommittee during its processing of H.R. 94 if desired.

Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI,
Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division.

RESPONSE TO REQUEST OF SUBCOMMITTEE STAFF FOR COMMENTS ON OTHER ASPECTS OF H.R. 94

1. IMMUNITY

Section 3 of the bill provides, in part, that a person required to give testimony under a grant of immunity "may not be indicted for any offense" by the same grand jury before which he testifies. (Proposed 18 U.S.C. 6003(d)).

The provision is apparently intended to codify the rule in United States v. Hinton, 543 F.2d 1002 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, —— U.S. —— (1977), in which the Second Circuit held that it would be unfair ordinarily for the grand jury that has heard the immunized testimony of a witness to then indict the witness, even though based upon independent evidence, for participation in the matters under investigation. However, the Second Circuit subsequently announced an important exception to the Hinton doctrine where the indictment is for contempt or perjury. Langella v. Commissioner of Corrections, 545 F.2d (2d Cir. 1976). The court observed (id. at 823):

> In United States v. Camporeale, 515 F.2d 184, 189 (2d Cir. 1975), we affirmed "the settled practice of permitting the same grand jury which heard the witness to file an indictment charging him with perjury. Having had the opportunity to observe his demeanor on the stand, it was in a superior position to determine whether there were reasonable grounds to believee that he was deliberately giving false [immunized] testimony. The grand jury's knowledge of a witness' prior criminal record, furthermore, should not preclude its filing the indictment, which merely represents a charge." We think similar considerations warrant having the same grand jury return the indictment for criminal contempt,[8] especially where, as here, the charged offense involved refusal to answer, not any crime revealed in the immunized answers.
> [8] In United States v. Hinton, 543 F.2d. (2d Cir. 1976), this court held that it was reversible error for the same federal grand jury which heard Hinton's immunized testimony in 1973 concerning narcotics transactions to indict her in 1975 for violating federal narcotics laws. We noted that Hinton's appeal did not involve perjury or contempt. Id., 1010 n. 9.

Even as limited by the Second Circuit, the Hinton doctrine in our view is open to serious question since it establishes a conclusive presumption and denies to the government any opportunity to prove that an indictment was founded on wholly independent evidence. If, however, the Subcommittee determines to incorporate the Hinton rule into H.R. 94, the provision should be amended to recognize the exceptions, which accord with the fact that the Fifth Amendment and 18 U.S.C. 6002 afford an immunized witness no protection against prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order to testify. Accordingly, we suggest adding to the bill the language "except for an offense involving perjury, giving a false statment, or otherwise failing to comply with the order."

Section 3 of the bill provides, in part, that a court shall not order a person to testify under a grant of immunity if the court finds that the person is in danger of being prosecuted, or subjected to penalty or forfeiture, by the government of another country on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may be ordered to testify, unless the court also finds that the person has been provided adequate safeguards to minimize such danger. (Proposed 18 U.S.C. 6003(b)).

It is an open question under case law whether or to what extent the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination applies in respect to a possible foreign prosecution. See Zicarelli v. New Jersey Investigation Commission, 406 U.S. 472 (1972); In Re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 410 U.S. 914 (1973). It has been held that a witness is not protected against the law of a foreign state which makes the very act of testifying a criminal offense; the Fifth Amendment protection is concerned only with the use of the content of compelled testimony. In Re Grand Jury Proceedings, 532 F.2d 404 (5th Cir. 1976). (Although couched in "transactional" immunity terms—a matter on which we continue to lodge the strongest objections—we understand the pertinent provisions of H.R. 94 to embody this principle and to cover only the content of compelled testimony).

As suggested in In Re Grand Jury Proceedings, supra, the issue is perhaps one of international relations rather than constitutional law. Nations may be required to moderate the exercise of their enforcement jurisdiction in consideration of such factors as the relative importance of the competing interests involved and the nationality of the individual. It would not seem appropriate for a nation to have to forego testimony in an extremely important case if the witness was one of its nationals and the possible foreign offense was a relatively minor one. The proposal in the bill itself reflects a view that the witness's right should not be absolute but should yield if the risk of foreign prosecution is minimized. Under the circumstances, we suggest that enactment of this provision would be premature in the absence of further judicial delineation of the scope of the Fifth Amendment privilege; the provision may well confer more protection than the Fifth Amendment requires. Moreover, the entire matter is one that the courts themselves can handle very much as the proposal contemplates even assuming applicability of the Fifth Amendment to a foreign prosecution; legislation on the subject would seem unnecessary.

Section 3 of H.R. 94 would, in part, repeal subsection (c) of 18 U.S.C. 6005(c), which requires the district court to delay the issuance of an order to compel testimony in a congressional proceeding for up to twenty days upon the application of the Attorney General.

One purpose of the Congress in enacting the provision was to give the Department an opportunity to review the prospective grant of immunity and to express to the Congress (or the committee involved) any concerns that the Department might have about it of which the Congress might not be aware. Another purpose was to afford the Department more time than the ten days allowed under 18 U.S.C. 6005(b)(3) to obtain an indictment, lodge evidence with the court, or otherwise prepare to handle potential complications arising out of the compelled testimony. The purposes are as valid today as they were in 1970.

It would seem clear that an Attorney General would not seek any delay under the statute without being convinced that a grant of immunity to the witness could involve serious hazard o the public interest. To our knowledge, the Department has availed itself of a twenty-day delay in only one matter. See Application of United States Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, 361 F. Supp. 1270 (D.D.C. 1973). There is certainly a danger that a committee of the Congress might seek to compel testimony without being aware of a planned investigation or prosecution of the witness or of other information on the Department has about the witness, and that an immunity granted too hastily might have regrettable consequences. In these circumstances, we believe that 18 U.S.C. 6005(c) is a safeguard against precipitous action which the Congress, in its own interests, would be unwise to repeal.

4. SIZE OF GRAND JURY

Currently, under 18 U.S.C. 3321 and Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, a grand jury consists of 16–23 members, 12 or more of whom must concur in finding an indictment (thus 12 is considered a quorum for grand jury action).

Section 4 of H.R. 94 would amend 18 U.S.C. 3321 to reduce the size of the grand jury to 9–15 members and to require that at least 9 members be present and two-thirds of those present concur in finding an indictment. The proposal is very similar to one approved by the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules of the Judicial Conference.

The Department in the past has favored a reduction in the size of the grand jury and we continue to do so. Apart from the financial savings to be realized, reducing the size of the grand jury should improve the quality of its deliberative process, since responsibility will not be so diffused and the number will not be so great as to militate against each juror's active participation. Cf. Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 100 (1970). Moreover the requirement that at least two-thirds of the jurors concur in an indictment should more than compensate for the reduction in the absolute number of those who today must concur; the judgment of six out of nine or ten out of fifteen voting grand jury members would seem at least as reliable as the judgment of twelve of twenty-three such members. Weighed against this is the fact that a reduction will, to an extent, lessen the number of citizens who can be engaged in the criminal justice process. On balance, however, we are of the view that the interest in improving the quality of grand jury deliberations outweighs other considerations, and we therefore support the enactment of section 4 of the bill. It is suggested, however, that the section be revised to amend the appropriate parts of Rules 6(a) and (f), F.R.Crim.P., as well as 18 U.S.C. 3321.

1. The Participatory Role of Grand Jurors

The question is what should be the participatory role of grand juries.

The principal functions of the grand jury are to investigate for facts involving violations of federal criminal laws, to receive and evaluate information and evidence relating to possible violations of the federal criminal laws, and to determine whether probable cause exists from the evidence received that particular individuals violated the federal criminal laws and thus should be charged by indictment so that guilt or innocence can be determined by an adversary trial on the merits. In carrying out that responsibility, it is expected that the grand jurors will be active participants in the proceedings and not passive observers. Accordingly, grand jurors should ask probing questions of the prosecutor and, under appropriate circumstances, they should similarly inquire of the witnesses who appear before them.

An instance such as you describe in which an attorney for the government allegedly "bristled" and "stopped" a grand juror from putting a question to a witness would not be in accord with common civility and respect for the rights of grand jurors. However, a prosecutor must be careful that improper inflammatory or abusive questions are not forced on witnesses by grand jurors. During the actual taking of testimony, moreover, it is sometimes wise to request the grand jurors to hold their questions of the witness in abeyance until the attorney for the government has completed his examination and thus explored the relevant facts by proper questioning. This procedure is calculated to prevent the injection of prejudice or unfairness into the proceedings as well as to insure that the witness' testimony will be more orderly and comprehensible to the grand jurors.

2. Self-Regulation—United States v. Litton System

The question is what sanctions have been imposed by the Department against the prosecutors involved in United States v. Litton Systems.

Since the Department has appealed the district court's ruling, any detailed discussion of this case would be inappropriate. However, as I pointed out in my testimony before the Subcommittee on June 29, 1977, the district court's opinion reflects, in our judgment, a fundamental misunderstanding of the relevant events. Since it is our belief that no prosecutorial misconduct whatever was involved in that case, the imposition of sanctions against Department personnel would obviously be unwarranted. The alleged misconduct if any did not involve the internal grand jury proceedings but rather the prosecutorial determination of whether appropriate civil proceedings were a proper alternative to seeking grand jury determinations.

3. and 31. United States Attorneys' Manual

The questions ask for the Department's policies, standards, or procedures relating to: 1) granting immunity; 2) preserving grand jury secrecy; 3) notice to witnesses; 4) warning of rights; and 5) repeated submissions of proposed indictments to grand juries.

These policies, standards, and procedures are discussed in the context of our responses to other specific questions herein. See items 4, 7, 9–12, 14, 15, 17, 20, and 22–27.

You also ask whether the policies and standards contained in the Manual are "made binding, not just instructive, on U.S. Attorneys."

The policies, standards, and procedures contained in the U.S. Attorneys' Manual are issued pursuant to the Attorney General's statutory authority to "supervise all litigation" and to "direct all United States Attorneys . . . in the discharge of their respective duties." 28 U.S.C. 519. Hence, as directives of the Attorney General, the provisions of the Manual are binding on Department of Justice employees and any Departmental employee (including U.S. Attorneys and their assistants) who disregarded such instructions would be subject to discipline. The guidelines are, however, designed for effective internal administrative purposes only and are not intended to nor do they legally confer judicially enforceable rights on third parties.

4. "Target" Warnings

You ask what the Department's position is with respect to the handling of "target" witnesses.

I indicated in my testimony before the Subcommittee on June 29, 1977, that, although the Department of Justice is opposed to legislating potentially litigable provisions relating to target witnesses before federal grand juries, the Department was at that time in the process of developing guidelines with respect to the treatment of targets. Those guidelines, which go substantially beyond the requirements of the law, have recently been approved and promulgated in the United States Attorneys' Manual. Department of Justice personnel have been instructed to advise target witnesses[1] of the following matters: (1) the general nature or subject matter of the grand jury's inquiry (to the extent that such disclosure does not compromise the progress of the investigation or otherwise inimically affect the administration of justice); (2) that the witness may refuse to answer any question if a truthful answer to the question would tend to incriminate him; (3) that anything that the witness does say may be used against him; (4) that the grand jury will permit the witness to step outside the grand jury room to consult with counsel if he desires; and (5) that his conduct is being investigated as a possible violation of federal criminal law. See, U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.250. Similarly, the Department has instructed its attorneys not to compel targets to appear before the grand jury to testify about their involvement in the crime under investigation without first securing the approval of the responsible United States Attorney (U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.251); that under normal circumstances requests by targets personally to testify before the grand jury should be given favorable consideration (U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.252); and that under normal circumstances a target should be excused from testifying before the grand jury if the target and his attorney state in writing that the target will refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds (U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.254). Moreover, Department of Justice prosecutors are officially encouraged, in appropriate cases, to notify targets before indictment in order to afford them an opportunity voluntarily to testify before the grand jury. (U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.253.)

5. Right to the Presence of Counsel

You ask how the provisions of H.R. 94 relating to counsel accompanying the witness into the grand jury room could in any way interfere in grand jury investigations.

Recent history and current events underscore the fact that in order effectively to combat insidious and complex criminal conspiracies, white-collar criminality, organized crime and political corruption, it is imperative that the public have a forceful means of ferreting out the truth no matter how deeply hidden, cleverly disguised, or powerfully resisted. It is our strong belief that permitting counsel to accompany witnesses inside the grand jury room would seriously undermine the efficiency and efficacy of the grand jury as an investigatory institution and would create more problems than it would eliminate.

As I pointed out in my testimony before the Subcommittee in June, there are five principal reasons why we believe that the law should not be changed to permit counsel to accompany witnesses inside the grand jury room. In sum, they are as follows: 1) the presence of counsel will impair and impede the fact-finding process due to the inevitable interposition of technical objections and because of the risk that the witness' answers will be in the words of his lawyer rather than his own; 2) resolution of even obviously unfounded objections by counsel will cause inordinate delays because in each instance the proceedings will have to be held in abeyance while the lawyers search out a judge to rule on counsel's objections; 3) the physical presence of counsel will increase the likelihood of breaches of grand jury secrecy; 4) the "reality" of multiple representation will make it much more difficult for grand juries in multi-party conspiracies to discover the true involvement of the higher-ups; and 5) technical deficiencies on small points relating to third party witnesses will be utilized by defendants to attack sound indictments and complicate trial proceedings.

The suggestion that the foregoing problems are imaginary because "there have never been any problems" in the eight states which permit counsel to accompany witnesses into the grand jury room is simply not persuasive. For example, Congressman Sawyer has indicated that on the basis of his experience, which is not insubstantial, counsel in Michigan's one-man grand juries are "practically uncontrollable: and there "is practically no way that you can prevent an attorney from obstructing [the proceedings]." See also April 27, 1977, testimony of Hon. Frederick B. Lacey at 34. Moreover, as pointed out in the appendices to my formal statement of June 29, 1977, there are substantial limitations, in either law or practice, on the right to counsel inside the grand jury room in those few states where the practice is permitted. In addition, there are significant differences in the role played by the federal grand jury, with its constitutional predicate, and the role played by most state grand juries. Hence, the limited experience of a few states which permit counsel in the grand jury room under varying but nevertheless limited circumstances is not, in our view, persuasive evidence that the practice could successfully be engrafted onto the federal criminal justice system.

Since in our view it has not yet been shown that the present system of permitting a witness to consult with counsel outside the grand jury room is either unfair or unworkable and since altering the present system to permit counsel physically to accompany the witness inside the grand jury room will raise the serious problems discussed above, the "counsel-in-the-grand-jury-room" provisions of H.R. 94 are unnecessary as they are unwise. The enactment into law of these provisions would deal a serious blow to effective law enforcement.

6. The Presence of Counsel

You suggest that the Department establishes a "dual standard—one for prosecutors and one for all other lawyers"—and you ask why we "say prosecutors are more trustworthy than other lawyers."

This question is framed in the classic mode of "when did you stop beating your wife? We establish no double standard and we do not suggest prosecutors are more trustworthy than other lawyers. Prosecutors are compelled by law to perform different duties than private counsel. Private counsel have an absolute and overriding duty to their client. The public prosecutor has a duty to the Government to prosecute vigorously but an equal duty to see that justice is done in accordance with elemental fairness and due process.

For these reasons and those summarized in the previous answer, we do submit that the presence of counsel in the grand jury room would be undesirable. However, we do not base this opposition on the theory that prosecutors are more trustworthy than defense lawyers. Our position simply recognizes that the prosecutor and the defense lawyer play different roles and that defense counsel's normally acceptable conduct has no place in the grand jury room. Defense counsel is an advocate who properly owes to his client the duty to serve as his champion with courage, devotion, and zeal, according to law. Unless the grand jury proceedings were perceived to be conducted for the benefit of his client, such an advocate would ordinarily find it appropriate to interpose technical objections to grand jurors' questions and to otherwise object to the conduct of the proceedings on any possible procedural ground. Moreover, even though the law might not fully recognize such objections in the context of grand jury proceedings, the defense lawyer would be inclined nevertheless to raise such objections. In a trial setting, for example, it is a not uncommon and much tolerated practice for lawyers to ask witnesses questions that are legally questionable in order to elicit a certain answer and obtain the certainty of a court ruling even if such answer is ordered stricken from the record and from the jury's consideration. There is no reason to believe the grand jury context will evoke any different behavior from defense counsel nor to doubt that within the broad term "advise" counsel will do everything possible with courage, devotion, and zeal to further his client's interest.

7. Statutory Notice Requirements

The question is why existing law with respect to subpoenas, immunity, and contempt should not be altered to provide for specified minimum notice requirements with "shortened periods if good cause is shown by the Government."

The government acts pursuant to short notice only when time is of the essence. To shift the burden to the government to prove to a court in every such case that time is needed of the essence would simply inject another time-consuming procedural step into the process and ipso facto defeat the government's interest in acting speedily, e.g., to prevent destruction of records or the flight of a witness. It must be remembered that the court plays a direct and important role in connection with subpoenas, immunity, and contempt proceedings and, hence, a United States District Judge is available to redress any undue hardship or unfairness associated with proceedings conducted after short notice to a citizen. Moreover, with respect to forthwith subpoenas, the Department has recently adopted an internal policy of self-restraints: such subpoenas are to be used only when swift action is important and then only with the prior personal approval of the United States Attorney. (See U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.230). It is submitted that when viewed in the light of the Department's self-restraint, the absence of widespread abuse, and the direct supervision of the courts, the notice provisions of H.R. 94 are unnecessary and would be productive of needless litigation.

8. Recordation of Comments by Prosecutors and Comments Among Grand Jurors

The Department of Justice favors mandatory recordation of all testimony before the grand jury, but we are opposed to provisions which would also require recordation of interchanges between the attorney for the government and the grand jurors. You ask, if these are not recorded, what guarantee exists that irrelevant, prejudicial or other information will not be conveyed to jurors or discussed by them.

Attorneys for the government are instructed by the Department of Justice about proper conduct before the grand jury (U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.015) and they are expected to conform to those instructions as well as to all other relevant standards of conduct as stated in statutes, rules, court decisions, codes, canons, or other standards of professional conduct. If one presumes that prosecutors and grand jurors are not honorable people who will misbehave at every opportunity, then perhaps some sort of limitation, such as the proposed recordation requirement, would be justified. However, we do not share that presumption and we oppose the recordation requirement because it would very likely inhibit free and frank discussions among grand jurors and thereby have an undesirable chilling effect on proper inquiry and discussion.

More fundamentally, however, the Department opposes this proposal because it will substantially further a most undesirable trend in the criminal law—the search for procedural error. As Judge Lacey, the Chairman of the Grand Jury Subcommittee of the Supreme Court's Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules, said in his testimony before your Subcommittee on April 27, 1977, resourceful defense attorneys will feel constrained to move for disclosure of all grand jury proceedings so they can assure themselves that no error took place before the grand jury. This in turn will lead to time-consuming in camera inspections of often voluminous grand jury transcripts, the examination of motions, and the hearing of arguments by already overburdened district judges. This burden is one the federal criminal justice system can ill afford to bear. Until it can be demonstrated that the proposal's benefits, which we regard as incremental at best, outweigh its detriments, the dialogue of prosecutors and grand jurors should remain off the record.

9. and 12. Comparing Use Immunity with Transactional Immunity

The questions are whether the Department has made or intends to make a comparison of the results achieved under the relatively new use immunity statute with the results achieved under the former transactional immunity provisions, and whether the Department intends to monitor the results of approved immunity applications.

The Department is attempting to learn as much as possible concerning the circumstances surrounding orders to compel testimony under 18 U.S.C. 6001–6004. At present each authorization to seek such an order is accompanied by Form CRM–167 (Witness Follow-Up Report), which must be completed and returned to the Department whether or not the order is utilized. A copy of Form CRM–167 is attached for your information. The Form will provide a basis for evaluating the true extent of the use of such orders and provide some basis for evaluating the quality of the results derived from compelling testimony.

It is, however, not clear how the Department could, as a practical matter, make a valid empirical comparison as to the reliability and usefulness of testimony obtained under the current use immunity statute with the reliability and usefulness of testimony obtained under the former transactional immunity provisions. It would appear that, in order to make such a comparison, it would be necessary, inter alia, to determine how much information witnesses actually withhold under the respective types of immunity, a determination that would generally be very difficult to make. Although empirical data is probably unattainable, logic tends to support the thesis that the reluctant witness who is compelled to testify will say no more than he has to if but a single admission gains him full immunity from prosecution. Conversely, if the extent of the witness's protection from prosecution is dependent upon the extent of the information he provides in his testimony, the witness will be motivated to volunteer as many details as possible, since this makes it less likely the government could meet its heavy prosecutive burden of establishing an independent source for its evidence. Accordingly, we believe that the testimony resulting from the current use immunity statute is generally much more truthful, detailed, and credible than that which would be forthcoming from a transactional immunity statute.

WITNESS FOLLOW-UP REPORT

(To be completed, signed, and returned as soon as:
(a) compulsion of a witness's testimony has been completed, or
(b) it has been decided not to use the authorization to obtain a compulsion order.)

Name of Witness (last name first)_____
Date of Authorization_____
WRU USE ONLY—WRU #_____
Proceeding_____ District_____
Violation (title and section)_____

(1) Was the authority to seek an order of compulsion used? ——Yes ——No
(a) If the authority was not used, what was the reason for not using it?
(i)__Witness did not assert his privilege.
(ii)__Witness's testimony was found unnecessary.
(iii)__Other (describe)_____
(b) If the authority was used:

10. Departmental Guidelines on Immunity

In response to your request, a copy of the Department's guidelines for processing immunity applications, promulgated on January 14, 1977, is attached herewith.

11. Statistical Information on Immunity

The question calls for a statement of the Department's overall plans for gathering and maintaining statistical information about immunity grants.

See the answer to questions 9 and 12. It is contemplated that the information in the follow-up reports, which are required by the guidelines, will eventually be processed by means of a computer. The forms for such reports have, however, only been in use since mid-April of this year. Our present thinking is that more information should be collected before computer analysis is undertaken.

12. Follow-Up Reports on Immunity Grants

The response to this question is given in answer to question 9.

13. Preliminary Examination After Indictment

The question is why H.R. 94's proposal for a preliminary examination after indictment is opposed by the Department.

In short, we oppose this provision of H.R. 94 because it would unnecessarily add yet another layer to the already cumbersome pretrial proceedings in criminal cases. The purpose of a preliminary examination is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant committed it. F.R.Crim.P. 5.1(2). Most preliminary hearings are routine matters with but one or two witnesses to establish basic probable cause and are not by any means a full presentation of the prosecution "case".

Since the grand jury, by returning an indictment, has already performed this function, a subsequent probable cause determination would be redundant unless one presumes that grand juries routinely act capriciously. If, as Congressman Sawyer indicated at the hearings, the proposal is designed to afford defense counsel an opportunity for pretrial discovery, via cross-examination of some of the government's witnesss, beyond what is available today under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, we believe that this issue should be addressed directly through a proposed amendment to those Rules rather than indirectly and cumbersomely through the creation of a new and largely duplicative pretrial hearing procedure. The further suggestion raised in support of the preliminary examination proposal, that this approach would eliminate the need for "mini-trial" would simply be moved from the suppression hearing to the preliminary examination.

14. News Media Leaks

You ask "what procedures, standards, or guidelines have been established by the Justice Department to limit leaks by U.S. Attorneys and their assistants?"

The Department has promulgated formal regulations strictly limiting the kind of information relating to both civil and criminal proceedings which Department personnel can properly release to the news media. See 28 C.F.R. § 50.2 (1976). In sum, the guidelines preclude the release of information which is intended or might reasonably be expected to influence the outcome of a pending or future trial. Department personnel are also expected to comply with applicable canons of ethics and other standards of professional responsibility.

Insofar as grand jury leaks are concerned, attorneys for the Justice Department are specifically precluded by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure from disclosing such information to non-governmental personnel except as authorized by the court. When the occasional transgression does occur, it is a matter of utmost concern to the Department. Attorney General Bell has most vehemently stated his abhorrence of any prejudicial leaks and has ordered internal Department investigations to try to determine any violation. The Office of Professional Responsibility plays an important and continuing role in the Department's efforts to assure there are no such abuses.

Of course neither defendants nor witnesses nor even witnesses' counsel are within the grand jury secrecy prohibitions and much of what might appear to be an improper leak is accumulated information collected by resourceful reporters and printed in non-attributable form to protect the identity of the reporter's sources.

15. Penalties for Unlawful Breaches of Grand Jury Secrecy

Section 5 of H.R. 94 would make unlawful breaches of grand jury secrecy punishable, depending upon the intent, either as felonies or as petty offenses. The Department has suggested that Section 5 be revised to create a unitary offense punishable as a misdemeanor. The question calls for an explanation as to why the Department would not want discretion in certain cases to proceed either on a felony or on a petty offense basis.

Although there is much merit in the fundamental approach now taken in Section 5 of H.R. 94, we adhere to the view that the bill would be considerably improved by having only a single misdemeanor offense created.

Our concern is that the distinctions drawn in the bill are not wholly rational and thus leave too much latitude to the prosecution. In general, we doubt that the receipt of compensation should be made the gravamen of a felony offense for breach of grand jury secrecy. The real thrust of the offense—a thrust that might be lost sight of by focussing upon compensation—lies elsewhere. If, for example, a prospective defendant paid to learn the identity of an informant witness, the payment would not necessarily make the situation more serious than if the disclosure had not been compensated. Whether or not compensation is involved, the essential damage done to the criminal justice system is in the breach of grand jury secrecy itself. Witnesses frequently are compelled to furnish incriminatory or otherwise sensitive information to a grand jury, perhaps under an assurance that the witness's cooperation will remain secret unless criminal prosecution is undertaken. Breaches of grand jury secrecy, for whatever motive or intent, inevitably tend to discourage witnesses from cooperating with the government.

In our judgment a misdemeanor provision (allowing for imprisonment up to one year) would afford a generally sufficient deterrence to improper breaches of grand jury secrecy. If a breach of grand jury secrecy is committed with a corrupt purpose, the activity will often be punishable at a felony level as an obstruction of justice. For the present, and until experience can be had with a statute like that proposed in Section 5 of H.R. 94, the Department much prefers creating a misdemeanor offense that applies to any deliberate breach of grand jury secrecy without regard to motivation.

16. Presentation of Exculpatory Evidence

The question is what measures the Department has taken to insure that United States Attorneys present exculpatory evidence to grand juries, and how "exculpatory evidence" is defined for such purposes.

The Department recognizes that public confidence in the criminal justice system will be diminished if an appreciable number of indictments are returned which will not support a successful prosecution. Since there is no purpose or interest in returning indictment if an acquittal is expected at trial, if exculpatory evidence exists which is of such persuasive force as to make such a result reasonably likely, common sense and basic fairness would dictate that any decision to go forward with the prosecution should be made by the government and the grand jury with a full awareness of such exculpatory evidence. Accordingly, the Department has recently adopted a formal policy governing the presentation of exculpatory evidence to the grand jury. The relevant provision of the U.S. Attorneys' Manual provides in pertinent part as follows: "[W]hen a prosecutor conducting a grand jury inquiry is personally aware of substantial evidence which directly negates the guilt of a subject of the investigation, the prosecutor should present or otherwise disclose such evidence to the grand jury before seeking an indictment against such a person." See U.S. Attorneys' Manual § 9–11.334.

It is submitted that the Department's policy formulation is the fairest and the most workable of the known alternatives. To require the presentation to the grand jury of all information, direct and indirect, which could conceivably be of benefit to the prospective defendant would tend to make a grand jury investigation more like a trial than the probable cause-determining proceeding it was intended to be. The Brady-Agurs standard is difficult enough to apply at trial and, as Judge Lacey pointed out in his testimony, the grand jury stage is not the time to apply such a difficult standard. See Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963); United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976). Moreover, as Judge Lacey suggested in his statement, the legislative encapsulation of any such standard would place a tremendous and unnecessary burden on the courts. It is submitted that the Department's approach strikes the proper balance between fairness to the accused and the public's interest in efficient grand jury proceedings.

17. Invocation of the Fifth Amendment Privilege Against Compulsory Self-Incrimination

The question asks for the Department's policy with respect to advance assertions of prospective grand jury witnesses of an intention to refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds.

The relevant section of the U.S. Attorneys' Manual (§ 9–11.254) provides in pertinent part that if a "target" of the investigation (as defined in § 9–11.250) and his attorney state in writing, signed by both, that he will refuse to testify on Fifth Amendmen grounds, the witness should be excused from testifying unless the United States or the responsible Assistant Attorney General insists on his appearance. In determining the desirability of insisting on the appearance of such a person, consideration should be given to the factors which justified the subpoena in the first place, i.e., the importance of the testimony or other information sought, its unavailability from other sources, and the applicability of the Fifth Amendment privilege to the likely areas of inquiry. (See § 9–11.251 supra.) Consideration should also be given to whether a claim of privilege made in the presence of the grand jury would be likely to prejudice the witness in the eyes of the grand jurors. An absolute prohibition on calling a witness before a grand jury who has indicated his intention to invoke the Fifth Amendment would be excessive since, among other reasons, it would deny the government the right to obtain a judicial review of the propriety of such invocation in response to a particular question.

18. Statistical Information and Reports

Your Committee previously requested statistical information about grand jury practices, much of which was determined to be unavailable. The questions are whether such statistical information will be kept in the future, and whether the Department foresees difficulty in meeting the reporting requirements at pages 29–30 of H.R. 94.

The availability of statistical information requires that the basic data be recorded in each United States Attorney's Office, and that all the information be put together and maintained in a retrievable form. The Department does keep various kinds of statistical information now; and the system is reviewed from time to time with the purpose of making changes to improve administrative control and to serve other needs.

With some difficulties and certain changes in existing practices (see the response to question 9), the Department would be able to meet most of the reporting requirements at pages 29–30 of H.R. 94, the bulk of which pertain to grants of immunity. About 95 percent of the grand jury investigations undertaken each year are accounted for in the felony case statistics set out in the Attorney General's annual reports to the Congress.

With regard to the particular reports required by the bill, section 9(b)(2) is inappositely phrased in that it refers to the "number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General." The United States Attorney, not the grand jury, is the sole authority empowered to seek approval of an application for statutory immunity. Moreover, under section 6003 (not 2003) of title 18, not only the Attorney General, but the Deputy Attorney General and any designated Assistant Attorney General, may approve such applications.

Section 9(b)(6) of the bill may ask for the impossible in seeking a report on the "number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity." It would be very difficult if not impossible to determine whether an indictment or a conviction resulted from particular testimony. Presumably, what is sought is information of the number of convictions, no-bills, etc., resulting from proceedings in which testimony obtained under orders granting immunity was given.

With respect to section 9(b)(7), no data bank system for grand jury information exists or is contemplated.

19. Potentially Improper Uses of Grand Jury

Four questions are asked about potentially improper uses of grand jury subpoenas.

A and B. The first two questions concern situations in which the attorney for the government discloses grand jury information to Federal investigators, such as Internal Revenue Service agents, in order to obtain their expert assistance in the investigation. The principal question raised is how such situations will be handled administratively to prevent a civil use being made of evidence obtained under grand jury subpoenas.

Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, as amended by Public Law 95-78, effective October 1, 1977, grants specific authority to attorneys for the government to disclose grand jury information, as deemed necessary, to government personnel assisting them in enforcing federal criminal laws. The amended Rule requires government attorneys to provide the courts promptly with the names of government agents to whom disclosures are made; and agents are expressly prohibited under the Rule from making any use of disclosed material other than to assist government attorneys enforce federal criminal laws. The amended Rule specifically provides that knowing breaches of grand jury secrecy may be punished as contempts of court.

The legislative history of the amendment notes that most grand jury proceedings are based upon investigations conducted by federal agents, who often work along with grand juries and serve government attorneys afterward, even during the course of trial. The amendment rests upon a conclusion that "[t]here is no reason for a barrier of secrecy to exist between the facets of the criminal justice system upon which we all depend to enforce the criminal laws." S.Rep.No. 95-354, 95th Con., 1st Sess. 6 (1977).

Disgressing for a moment to respond to a subsidiary question, there is a clear dichotomy between civil tax cases and criminal tax cases. Civil tax cases are generally designed to collect taxes that should have been paid (with penalties). Criminal tax cases are instituted to impose penal sanctions for violation of criminal laws. An intelligence division agent within the Internal Revenue Service is responsible for criminal investigations; a separate kind of agent—a revenue agent—is responsible for civil investigations. Normally, the criminal investigations involve potential civil liability but the civil aspects are put aside and held in abeyance until the criminal aspects are exhausted. A conviction can usually be used to prove essential facts in a related civil tax case.

The Department does not see a need for setting up administrative barriers to the use by United States Attorneys and other government attorneys of the provisions of amended Rule 6(e). Controls would, of course, be put into effect should experience demonstrate a need for them; but the Rule itself seems to exert adequate control. Thus, having to give the courts the names of agents receiving grand jury information should serve as an effective reminder to the government attorney and the agent of the limitations upon this respective authority and of the possibility he or the agent will have to answer for any subsequent breach of grand jury secrecy. The government attorney will want to protect himself and his agent; and the agency will want to be able to negate any claim that it acquired evidence improperly. There are many reasons why this Department would not tolerate an abuse of the much-needed authority to obtain expert assistance in grand jury investigations. Not the least of these is the vital importance of grand jury secrecy to law enforcement. There have been pressures in recent years to erode the tradition of grand jury secrecy, and it would invite such erosion for the Department to do less than rigidly adhere to the rules.

C. The question is whether a grand jury subpoena may properly be used to gain the attendance of a witness simply for an office interview; whether grand jury subpoenas are often used for such a purpose; and why they would be so used.

Grand jury subpoenas are issued pursuant to Rule 17 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. It is improper to issue subpoenas under the Rule, whether grand jury or trial subpoenas, to compel a witness's appearance for a private interview, although, if accomplished in a non-coercive manner, there is nothing wrong with taking the occasion of the witness's appearance to talk with him privately. See, e.g., Durbin v. United States, 221 F.2d 520 (D.C. Cir 1954); United States v. Standard Oil Co., 316 F.2d 884 (7th Cir. 1963). These cases and others involving misuse of subpoenas have been called to the attention of the United States Attorneys in Departmental publications, and the law on the point is clear.

There are many reasons why a government attorney might want to question a witness in the office, notwithstanding that the grand jury proceeding offers him a full opportunity to do so. A major reason would be to expedite the proceedings, which are often conducted under a tight schedule. Time may be saved in various ways by interviewing the witness in advance of his appearance. The interview might enable the attorney to go directly to the essential points with the witness in the grand jury room; or the interview might be used to allay the concerns the witness expressed to an investigative agent; or the purpose could be to obtain from the witness investigative leads, which federal agents could pursue immediately. Otherwise a purpose of the office interview might be to ascertain whether the witness intends to invoke his privilege against self-incrimination; and, if so, to enable the attorney to decide upon the proper course to take in such circumstances. Again, there is no impropriety in conducting a preliminary interview; the impropriety lies in subpoenaing a witness without contemplating his actual appearance before the grand jury. This does not mean that the witness's appearance should never be dispensed with. If the witness offers his cooperation and wants to leave as soon as possible—a situation that arises frequently when business records are subpoenaed—it may be appropriate to excuse the witness if no real benefit is to be derived by taking him before the grand jury. This is part of a larger role a government attorney will perform for the grand jury. See United States v. Kleen Laundry and Cleaners, Inc., 381 F. Supp. 519 (E.D.N.Y. 1974). Thus, a government attorney will excuse subpoenaed witnesses from time to time, or postpone their appearance, to avoid hardship or serious inconvenience. By no standard, however, is it proper to compel a witness to appear when the grand jury will not be in session or to try to expedite matters by pressing a witness unwillingly to submit to an office interview. We feel sure that the United States Attorneys are fully aware of the impropriety of any such action.

D. The question is whether it is proper for federal agents to "threaten" prospective witnesses with grand jury subpoenas if they choose not to cooperate with the agents.

The answer is no, if a real threat is involved. But this answer must be understood in perspective. There is nothing amiss in an agent pointing out that the alternative to a failure to cooperate with him may or will likely be a compelled appearance before a grand jury (if that is indeed the situation), just as it has been held wholly proper, and not to violate an ensuing consent to search, for an agent truthfully to advise a person that if he declines consent a search warrant will be obtained. See United States v. Faruolo, 506 F.2d 490, 495 (2d Cir. 1974).

Although most federal cases are not investigated by grand juries but by trained investigative agents, if an investigative agency cannot complete an investigation, e.g., because it lacks compulsory process, the plainly appropriate governmental course is for the grand jury to use its process to complete the investigation. Even in those cases in which a grand jury may undertake a major investigative role, investigative agents normally assist under the direction of the United States Attorney. The emphasis of an investigative grand jury is often on speed in ascertaining the leads and subpoenaing the essential evidence, before the defendants act to defeat justice or before something dangerous occurs. Thus, if an investigative agent has cause to question a person in a pending felony investigation, it follows that a grand jury would have cause to question that person directly. While the Department does not approve of witnesses being threatened—that not being a very good way to win the cooperation of essential witnesses and, in general, poor public relations for a governmental agency—investigative agents have a duty to be truthful and we cannot criticize the agents for pointing out the actual alternatives.

Moreover, it should not be assumed that a person who refuses to answer questions for an investigative agent will not cooperate with the grand jury. It is not unusual for crucial witnesses in important federal investigations to be reluctant or unwilling to cooperate initially. This is so for many reasons, such as a concern over possible reprisal, or a concern over the hardship of having to go to court several times. Some witnesses are pleased to cooperate if they can have subpoenas that show they did not volunteer information.

There are undoubtedly witnesses who feel unfairly treated or threatened by investigative agents who explain the alternatives involved. This is regrettable. But, again, the fact is that an investigative agent must acquire the information from the person for eventual use by the grand jury, or the grand jury must get it from the person directly. The agent is not acting for himself; nor does the grand jury use its subpoena for the agent's benefit. Nor can an investigative agent simply walk away from a witness and avoid the problem. The government would be justly criticized from every quarter if it accepted a witness's initial refusal to talk to an investigative agent as the end of the matter. The grand jury, and ultimately society itself, would never tolerate that.

20. Superseding Indictments

The question is whether there is any objective way of determining that a second or subsequent grand jury proceeding with respect to a person already under indictment is for a valid purpose and not engineered as a means of preparing for trial under the existing indictment.

As a general matter, the good faith of a government attorney in instituting a second or subsequent grand jury inquiry into a case will be obvious: it will be reflected in the return of a new indictment containing a substantial change from the old one (e.g., correcting a legal deficiency, altering or adding to the charges, or naming additional defendants or coconspirators). The government then usually has the pending indictment dismissed.

Ascertaining good faith in this context, as in others, is not a novel or impossible endeavor for the courts or the Department. There have been substantial issues raised, either by subpoenaed witnesses or defendants, causing judges to conduct careful inquiries into the basis for grand jury subpoenas. See, e.g., Beverly v. United States, 468 F. 2d 732, 742–744 (5th Cir. 1972) (and cases cited therein).

21. The Speed Trial Act and H.R. 94

The question calls for an appraisal of H.R. 94 in relation to the purposes and provisions of the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. 3161 et seq.

The Speedy Trial Act reflects the determination of the Congress to mandate speedier trials. At the time the Act was enacted, it was taking almost a year for the typical Federal prosecution to get to trial. The situation had to be remedied for reasons beyond the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial. Swift punishment was deemed essential in deterring criminal activity; thus, the Speedy Trial Act had the purpose expressed in its title "of reducing crime and the danger of recidivism by requiring speedy trials." (Public Law 93–619). See Remarks of Sen. Ervin, 119 Cong. Rec. 3263–3265 (1973).

It seems clear that the complex of procedural commands contained in H.R. 94 could be used by witnesses with the result that grand jury proceedings would take much longer than they do now. Putting to one side the time limits in the Speedy Trial Act, the Department continues to be concerned that H.R. 94 runs counter to or at cross-purposes with the Act. Whereas the Act would speed the process up to benefit society and criminal defendants, the bill would slow the process down to benefit witnesses. Being dependent upon these witnesses, the Department would hardly suggest that their interests be ignored; but, in general, no new procedural step or basis for pretrial litigation can be implemented without a resulting diminution of the interest in speedy trials.

H.R. 94 would create new procedures that would delay trials. Section 3 would involve judges in a wholly new kind of discretionary review of grants of immunity from prosecution. Today, while judges review the form of immunity applications, they have no discretion to deny an immunity order application that is in proper form. Section 6 would create a mechanism whereby grand juries might obtain non-governmental counsel. Section 9 would require preliminary examinations to be conducted after indictment—a wholly new and unnecessary procedural layer. Section 7 would generate potentially complex and time-consuming litigation over the venue of grand jury proceedings, requiring judges to weigh all sorts of factors beyond what they would currently consider.

But the Department's concern is not altogether with new procedures in parts of H.R. 94. We are concerned also with the increased potential for pretrial litigation. As more requirements are legislated, more possibilities arise for complaint. Motions to quash that would be considered frivolous today would become de rigeur under H.R. 94. A witness who wants to resist a subpoena can be expected to raise every possible defect in it, and every new requirement for subpoenas allows for new complaints. The results can hardly be calculated. Certainly there would be more motions to quash. Moreover, if a witness appeared under a subpoena and subsequently was held in contempt or prosecuted for perjury, there would be occasion again for arguing defects in the subpoena. If the court found a defect, it would be faced with the difficult legal problem of determining the effect to be given the error or omission. Federal courts would be shouldered with expanded litigation and be so much less able to try cases speedily.

A separate question is whether H.R. 94 could work a miscarriage of justice by preventing compliance with the Speedy Trial Act. The answer to this may depend upon the facts one is willing to hypothesize and the way one interprets the legislation. The Speedy Trial Act is very complex, and there has as yet been relatively little judicial experience with the Act.

Since the Speedy Trial Act does not operate until formal criminal procedures are begun, a grand jury would not always have a time limitation to meet. The Act poses a problem for a grand jury when a person has been arrested and held to answer. Currently, indictment must be returned within 45 days of arrest; the limit changes to 35 days in July, 1978, and to 30 days in July, 1979.

H.R. 94 contemplates that, as a norm, witnesses will be allowed a week before having to appear under a grand jury subpoena, another week between a refusal to testify and an order pursuant to a grant of immunity, and three days between another refusal to testify and contempt proceedings. The bill favors releasing a witness held in contempt during the pendency of an appeal. It can thus be seen how short a time a grand jury might have, especially if it did not get started promptly after arrest. Then, too, it is not always possible to serve all the witnesses at the same time. In a more complicated case, one witness may be subpoenaed to supply information allowing for the subpoenaing of another witness. The problem of delay caused by one witness can be exacerbated by every successive witness. In addition, if the case is not patently a single venue case, a motion to transfer the proceedings could cause considerable delay.

If a United States Attorney receives a report of an apparent Federal violation and (as will often happen) does not want to take any action prior to indictment, the grand jury will not need to comply with the Speedy Trial Act. Therefore, by avoiding arrests, the Act could be avoided. But that would not generally be practicable, nor would it seem an appropriate policy. The Department attaches the same value to speedy trial as does the Congress, and for that reason we have urged your Committee to weigh very carefully the potential delays involved in H.R. 94 against the paramount interests meant to be served by the Speedy Trial Act.

Since probable cause must exist to hold a person to answer, and since that probable cause can be established by hearsay, which is also usable in a grand jury proceeding, it may appear that indictment will always be possible after arrest, even if only a minimal presentation can be made to the grand jury. Such a generalization is erroneous. An indictment is sought not on the basis of probable cause alone, but only when there is sound reason to believe a conviction (requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt) can be obtained. Moreover, if an essential witness balks at grand jury process, especially if the witness had been formerly cooperative, the grand jury will not want to indict, nor would the government want an indictment with the evidence at risk.

All things considered, we see much in H.R. 94 that militates against speedy trial in the general sense and that could cause serious difficulties in meeting the time limits set by the Speedy Trial Act.

22. Advising Witnesses of Statutes Possibly Violated

The question is whether the Department's views on Section 7 of H.R. 94 allows for sufficient information to be given the witness in the subpoena to enable him to refresh his recollection and to make an intelligent decision about seeking legal counsel. The question relates specifically to our objection to requiring that subpoenas cite the criminal statutes thought possibly to have been violated.

The Department supports, it should be emphasized, the requirement in H.R. 94 that the subpoenaed witness be notified of the subject matter of the investigation in general terms. This should enable the witness to refresh his recollection in preparation for his appearance, and it should also enable a witness to decide whether to obtain the advice of an attorney.

It would be most unwise, except in rare instances, for a witness to base a decision about seeking counsel on the citation of statutes. Citations might be of help to an attorney but not usually to a layman. Citing statutes in subpoenas could be misleading, for, as we have indicated, the grand jury may develop evidence of criminality that was not foreseen initially. To avoid argument over whether the grand jury knew of the particular violations when the subpoenas issued, the natural tendency would be to cite all possible criminal statutes, and the whole requirement would almost certainly be an occasion for litigation.

23. Prosecuting Witnesses Compelled to Testify

This question concerns the propriety of granting immunity to two witnesses and then prosecuting both, using each one's compelled testimony against the other.

To my knowledge, no such situation has ever occurred or is likely ever to occur. Department guidelines concerning the use of compelled testimony (a copy of which is being supplied to you; see question 10) prohibit the prosecution of a person for an offense or offenses first disclosed in or closely related to his compelled testimony without the express written approval of the Attorney General. The situation posed by the question, while hypothetically feasible under use immunity, conflicts with Department policy, which discourages the use of prospective defendants as witnesses. The guidelines place a burden upon a federal prosecutor to justify such a prosecution to show (a) the unusual circumstances surrounding the prosecution, (b) the method by which he will be able to establish the government's affirmative burden of proving that all the evidence necessary for a conviction was in the hands of the Government before the defendant testified and was not the result of focusing investigation upon him because of his compelled disclosures, and (c) how he will affirmatively show that no other "non-evidentiary" use has been made or will be made of the compelled testimony in connection with the proposed prosecution (for example, having the prosecution handled by an attorney unfamiliar with the substance of the compelled testimony).

24. Effectiveness of Immunity Grants

This question again concerns statistical information bearing upon the effectiveness of using grants of immunity.

As indicated in response to question 9, the Department is in the process of gathering information concerning the outcome of all orders to compel testimony. Until a substantial number of the Follow-Up forms have been completed, returned and analyzed, conclusions about the information obtained via orders compelling testimony would be speculative.

25. Processing of Immunity Applications

The question is whether an expedited handling of immunity applications requires any special approval within the Department.

The answer is no. The system is designed so applications will be handled expeditiously when that is necessary.

A period of two weeks is the time normally required for authority to seek compulsion orders. In the case of trial (as distinct from grand jury) witnesses, there is often much less advance notice. Where it is necessary to do so, an authorization to seek an order to compel a witness to testify at a current trial is processed on an emergency basis. No official determines whether a particular application justifies such treatment; emergency handling is not based on the type of case involved but solely upon the exigencies of time with respect to the proceeding for which the order is required.

26. Explaining Immunity to Witness

The question concerns the necessity for giving a witness detailed information about a prospective grant of immunity and whether the Department would oppose a "statutory requirement that all aspects of immunity" be explained to witnesses "in great detail."

The Department is opposed to the creation of such a statutory requirement primarily because of its tendency to engender litigation. Regardless of the witness's understanding, it is the fact that the government cannot use a compelled witness's testimony against him in a subsequent criminal proceeding. When the witness asserts his Fifth Amendment right, the government has the option to respect it or to seek an order to compel him to testify under a statute that prohibits the government from thereafter using the testimony or its fruits against him. If the government elects to compel his testimony, the witness has no lawful choice but to testify; educating him fully about the extent of the protection that use immunity or the Fifth Amendment affords, so as, e.g., to inform him of the possible consequences of a refusal to obey the order, is not a sole prosecutive function but rather is clearly the primary responsibility of the witness's attroney and the court.

A statute requiring notice by the prosecutor to the witness concerning all aspects of immunity would create the slight benefit of additionally educating the witness at the expense of burdening the government with litigation on the issue whether the statute has been complied with.

27. Showing That Compelled Testimony was Used

The question concerns the administrative handling of prosecutions of witnesses who were compelled to testify under grants of use immunity, and reflects a concern that witnesses may not be able to show the use that had been of the compelled testimony.

The compelled witness, as indicated in answer to question 23, will seldom be prosecuted. Indeed, we are aware of only two instances in which a witness was sought to be prosecuted following a federal grant of use immunity. See United States v. Hinton, 543 F.2d 1002 (2d Cir. 1976); United States v. Henderson, 406 F. Supp. 417 (D.Del. 1975). In the event of prosecution, moreover, the Supreme Court, in Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, has cast upon the government the affirmative "heavy burden" of establishing that neither the testimony nor its fruits has tainted the prosecution. Thus, the witness need not go forward with any evidence to show lack of use of his compelled testimony. The federal courts, in addition, have construed the government's burden of proof in a manner highly protective of the defendant-witness. See, e.g., United States v. McDaniel, 482 F.2d 305 (8th Cir. 1973) (vacating conviction of a witness, who previously had testified pursuant to a state grant of immunity, notwithstanding the existence of sufficient untainted evidence to support his conviction, because the prosecutor had read a transcript of the witness's compelled testimony, albeit without being aware that it had been compelled).

In respose to your question as to Department standards governing such prosecutions, Department guidelines do cover certain recurring situations—for example, where a compelled witness is awaiting sentencing or is to be prosecuted on the basis of independent evidence—to insure that compelled testimony is sealed and not used directly or indirectly to the detriment of the witness.

28. Opening Grand Jury Proceedings to the Press

We are asked to comment upon testimony given on behalf of the Reporter's Committee for Freedom of the Press that grand jury proceedings should be more open, in order to insure public accountability.

In our judgment, it is a matter of fundamental importance to the criminal justice system, especially in preserving the vitality of the investigative type of grand jury, that grand jury proceedings be kept secret to the fullest practicable extent. There are many reasons for the tradition of grand jury secrecy. Grand jury secrecy is maintained primarily: (1) to encourage witnesses to testify freely; (2) to minimize the risks that prospective defendants will flee or use corrupt or violent means to thwart investigations or escape conviction; (3) to safeguard the grand jurors themselves and the proceedings from extraneous influences and pressures; and (4) to avoid unnecessary disclosures that may make persons appear to be guilty of misconduct without their being afforded adequate opportunity to challenge the accusations. See, e.g., United States v. Proctor & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677 (1958); In re Grand Jury January 1969, 315 F. Supp. 662 (D. Md. 1970). It must be recognized, too, that witnesses may be compelled by grand jury process to tell things they would not voluntarily disclose. It is particularly fitting under such circumstances that the compelled information be kept confidential unless the exigencies of public justice require disclosure.

The concept of public accountability is a sound one but is at this stage far outweighed by the above considerations. Furthermore the indictments returned by a grand jury are, of course, made public, and the trials of the charges are public. It is in these results primarily that the grand jury proceedings cannot be made more open without sacrificing one or more of the interests mentioned above which the tradition of grand jury secrecy has served to protect.

29. The Independence of the Grand Jury

Under Section 6 of H.R. 94 (at pages 13–14), any person would be authorized to make a written request of the attorney for the government to be allowed to testify before a grand jury, and the attorney for the government would have a duty to submit the request to the grand jurors for final determination. The Department does not support this provision, and the question is whether the provision is necessary in order to accord the grand jury a proper independence.

In performing its function of protecting citizens against unfounded criminal charges, the grand jury derives its independence from several sources. Under the constitution, only a grand jury can lodge felony charges, and there is nothing to command a grand jury to return an indictment. The grand jurors are not governmental employees but rather members of the general public, chosen under 28 U.S.C. 1861 "at random from a fair cross section of the community." The proceedings of a grand jury are conducted in secrecy in part to safeguard the members from extraneous pressures and influences. See Rule 6(e), F.R.C.R.; United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677 (1958). To insure the independence of the grand jurors, Rule 6(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure forbids anyone other than the jurors to be present when the grand jury deliberates or votes. See also 18 U.S.C. 1507. Under such circumstances, a grand jury is a highly independent body.

But a grand jury is not independent in every respect. It must depend upon the court for authority to issue and enforce subpoenas and for its tenure (unless it is a special grand jury); and it must depend upon the government for basic legal counsel, the structuring of its investigations, and the approval of its indictments. A grand jury proceeding is a cooperative venture, involving court, prosecutor, and grand jury, each with a constitutionally based independence and complementary powers. See United States v. Chanen, 549 F. 2d 1306 (C.A. 9, 1977) (and cases cited therein).

The government attorney bears a heavy responsibility in a grand jury proceeding to screen out unreliable evidence. Coppedge v. United States, 311 F.2d 128 (D.C. Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 946 (1963); United States v Chanen, supra. A person seeking to testify before a grand jury might feel deeply about the importance of the information he has to offer; yet, such information could be highly objectionable and legally inadmissible. While it is true that grand jury proceedings are not vitiated by the receipt of inadmissible evidence, this rule has been fashioned in the overriding interest of preserving the grand jury proceedings from disruptions and the many restraints applicable at a trial on the merits. See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974). If all sorts of information of dubious legality or credibility were received by the grand jury, it would not provide that objective assessment of the merits of the government's case that our criminal justice system really needs.

Furthermore, United States Attorneys reject numerous complaints each year as being obviously without merit. Such complaints are often pressed insistently by persons lacking an appreciation of the limits of federal criminal law. No useful purpose would be served by allowing such persons to press their complaints with grand juries; indeed to permit such a result would be a potentially very costly and wasteful practice.

30. Advising Grand Jurors of Their Rights and Duties

The question is whether the Department supports the provisions of H.R. 94 to require judges to give grand juries certain standard instructions at the time of impaneling.

The Department supports the basic idea and most of the specifics. In fairness to the courts, in our view judges now in nearly all instances give appropriate instructions to newly impaneled grand juries, but it is correct that such instructions are not uniform and we therefore favor enactment of standardized requirements.

Our support for the provisions at pages 12–13 of H.R. 94 is, of course, limited by what we have said about other parts of the bill. We have no objection, then, to subparagraphs (1), (3), (4), (7), (8), and (9) of the proposed new statute. We object to subparagraph (2) because of our objection to the corresponding substantive provision, and we have practical problems with subparagraphs (5) and (6).

To require the impaneling judge, under subparagraphs (5) and (6), to mention the subject matter and the statutes involved in the prospective investigations might be beneficial if the grand jury was going to consider but one or two cases. Most grand juries consider a large number of cases, however. Also, the public mention of the subject of the investigation in general terms might allow some persons to identify the specific matter to be investigated, with a possible sacrifice of interests protected by the tradition of a grand jury secrecy. All in all, we do not see any predominating reason for requiring a judge to give the "instructions" contained in subparagraphs (5) and (6), which do not pertain to the rights, duties, and powers of the jurors.

31. U.S. Attorney's Manual

You ask whether the provisions of the United States Attorneys' Manual regarding grand jury practice are binding.

As we elaborated in our answer to your question number three, supra, United States Attorney are indeed bound by these Departmental policies.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., January 14, 1977.

To: Heads of offices, divisions, and bureaus, and United States Attorneys.
From: The Attorney General.
Subject: Guidelines relating to use of statutory provisions to compel testimony or production of information

I am attaching guidelines and appendices dated January 14, 1977, relating to the compulsion of testimony or production of information pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003. Please take whatever steps are necessary to assure their implementation.

As is the case with the United States Attorneys' Manual, these materials provide only internal Department of Justice guidance. They are not intended to, do not, and may not be relied upon to create any rights, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by any party in any matter civil or criminal. Nor are any limitations hereby placed on otherwise lawful litigative prerogatives of the Department of Justice.

This Memorandum supersedes Criminal Division Memorandum No. 595, as supplemented.

GUIDELINES RELATING TO USE OF STATUTORY PROVISIONS TO COMPEL TESTIMONY OR PRODUCTION OF INFORMATION

1. These provisions apply to all cases in which testimony or production of other information is to be compelled pursuant to the provisions 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003.

COMMENT

These guidelines concern the utilization of the principal federal statutes pertaining to compulsion of witnesses to testify or provide other information, despite their assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination (18 U.S.C. 6001–6003). The heart of the statutory scheme, section 6002, provides:

> Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to . . . a court or grand jury of the United States, . . . and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; but no testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such tesimony or other information) may be used against the witness in any criminal case, except a prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order.

Although similar provisions are set forth, redundantly, for drug cases in 21 U.S.C. 884, the Department will rely upon the Title 18 provisions for all cases.

The statutory provisions represent an accommodation between competing interests: the government's need, on the one hand, to obtain testimony that may be necessary to the public interest, and the witness's right, on the other hand, to withhold his testimony by asserting his Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination. The power to compel testimony of witnesses has long been held in Anglo-American jurisprudence to be a legitimate imperative of government (see, e.g., Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972)), but equally fundamental to our system is the proposition that no person may be compelled to incriminate himself. In enacting these statutes, Congress recognized that some crimes can be proved only by witnesses who are themselves implicated, and that it may be necessary to compel them to testify in order to obtain the conviction of other participants.

The statutes require a district judge, upon motion by a United States Attorney, to order a witness to testify or provide other information, notwithstanding his Fifth Amendment privilege. The witness is not "immunized" from prosecution or given any benefit he would not otherwise have. The only consequence as far as he is concerned is that no testimony or other information compelled under the order, or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information, may be used against him in a subsequent criminal prosecution. This leaves him in the same position as if he had not been compelled to testify. He may still be prosecuted for perjury, giving a false statement, or failure to comply with the order, and even for the transaction concerning which he testified. See United States v. Henderson, 406 F. Supp. 417 (D. Del. 1975).

In upholding the constitutionality of the statutory provisions, the Supreme Court found that the prohibition concerning the direct or indirect use of the compelled testimony in any criminal prosecution of the witness adequately met the Fifth Amendment proscription against forcing a person to serve as a witness "against himself." Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972). See also United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974); Zicarelli v. New Jersey Investigation Comm's, 406 U.S. 472 (1972). The Court emphasized, however, the absolute nature of the use prohibition, and placed a heavy burden on the government to prove in any future prosecution of the witness that is evidence was derived independently of the testimony that the witness provided under compulsion.

The statutes provide the government with an important and effective device for obtaining needed testimony, and they have, under appropriate circumstances, significant advantages over former "transactional immunity" statutes in that they provide no gratuity to a testifying witness, they encourage the giving of more complete testimony by proscribing use of everything the witness relates, and they still permit a prosecution of the witness in the rare case where it can be shown that the supporting evidence clearly was obtained only from independent sources.

While the Department encourages the use of these statutes, their use will be authorized only when it appears that the public interest may be best served thereby. In order to preclude misuse of orders to compel testimony, and to avoid jeopardizing prosecutions of defendants or potential defendants in on-going cases or investigations, these guidelines set forth uniform standards and procedures to be followed prior to filing motions for such orders. Included in Appendix A is a series of forms and sample pleadings.

2. An attorney for the government may request authorization, from the Assistant Attorney General with responsibility for the subject matter of the case, to apply for an order, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6003, compelling a person to testify or provide other information when, in his judgment, it may be necessary to the public interest to obtain such testimony or information and the person has refused or is likely to refuse to provide such testimony or information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination. The request for authorization shall contain sufficient information to permit the Assistant Attorney General, and the United States Attorney for the district in which the motion for the order is to be made, to make an independent judgment regarding the public interest and the likelihood of the refusal to testify.

COMMENT

18 U.S.C. 6003 makes it clear that a compulsion order should not be sought by the government without the judgment that two conditions exist: first, that the testimony or information sought may be in the public interest, and second, that the person to whom the order will be directed has refused or is likely to refuse to provide the testimony or information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination. That judgment must first be made by the attorney for the government initiating the process to obtain the compulsion order, and must thereafter be concurred in by the appropriate Assistant Attorney General and the United States Attorney for the district in which the motion for the order is to be made.

Although motions to the court for compulsion orders under 18 U.S.C. 6003 must be made by the United States Attorney for the district in which the court is sitting, requests for authorization to apply for such orders may be initiated by any Department of Justice attorney. A request ordinarily should be in writing, using the departmental form developed for the purpose (see Appendix A1,) but under exigent circumstances an oral request and oral justification may be submitted, with the written materials to follow as soon as possible.

Requests initiated by Assistant United States Attorneys must be approved either by the United States Attorney or, in his absence, by a senior supervisory assisant, and should be sent to the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division which will forward them to the appropriate Assistant Attorney General.

Requests initiated by attorneys assigned to a litigating division of the Department should be sent to the appropriate Assistant Attorney General, with a copy transmitted to the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division. The attorney initiating the request need not obtain the approval of the United States Attorney for the district in which the proceeding will be conducted prior to submitting the request. He must, however, send an informational copy of the request to the United States Attorney (see Appendix A2), and take whatever other steps are necessaery to facilitate review of his request by the United States Attorney. The United States Attorney, as soon as possible after his receipt of this informational copy of a request for authorization, should inform the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division of any objection he may have to the approval of the request. This procedure is advisable since the United States Attorney must, under the statute, personally conclude that it is necessary and desirable to seek a compulsion order in his district. All departmental attorneys should allow for sufficient time and consultation as may be necessary for the United States Attorney to discharge his statutory responsibility.

The Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division has been authorized to approve requests for authorization in cases and proceedings arising under the laws within the purview of that Division and in cases in which divisional jurisdiction is in doubt. 28 C.F.R. 0.175. Assistant Attorneys General in charge of the Antitrust, Civil, Civil Rights, Land and National Resorces, and Tax Divisions similarly have been authorized to approve requests with respect to cases and proceedings within the cognizance of their respective Divisions, subject to the condition that no such authorization may be given unless the Criminal Division has first indicated that it has no objection to the proposed compulsion order. This condition is designed to minimize the danger of inadvertent interference with current criminal investigations or prosecutions, most of which fall within the jurisdiction of the Criminal Division. The Assistant Attorney General with jurisdiction over the prosecution, however, has the primary responsibility for approving the application. Upon receipt by the Criminal Division of a request for its acquiescence—or of a direct request for Assistant Attorney General Authorization— the Witness Records Unit will request the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and such other federal law enforcement agencies as may be appropriate, to conduct a search of investigative files concerning the witness and to report thereon to the Criminal Division. Except in the most imperative circumstances, the Criminal Division will defer its approval until the Federal Bureau of Investigation has reported the results of its file search.

If a request for authorization is approved by the Assistant Attorney General, a written authorization will be sent to the attorney initiating the request (see Appendix A3) or, when time is critical, a written authorization will be sent by a facsimile transmitter or by teletype or an oral authorization will be telephoned and confirmed by teletype.

It is expected that in particularly sensitive cases the Assistant Attorney General whose authorization is sought will consult with the Attorney General or Deputy Attorney General in the course of his review of the request and its supporting documentation.

3. In determining whether it may be necessary to the public interest to obtain testimony or other information from a person, the attorney for the government should weigh all relevant considerations, including:

(a) the importance of the investigation or prosecution to effective enforcement of the criminal laws;

(b) the value of the person's testimony or information to the investigation or prosecution;

(c) the likelihood of prompt and full compliance with a compulsion order, and the effectiveness of available sanctions if there is no such compliance;

(d) the person's relative culpability in connection with the offense or offenses being investigated or prosecuted, and his history with respect to criminal activity;

(e) the possibility of successfully prosecuting the person prior to compelling him to testify or produce information; and

(f) the likelihood of adverse collateral consequences to the person if he testifies or provides information under a compulsion order.

COMMENT

This section contains guidelines for attorneys for the government, and those whose approval they must secure, in deciding whether it may be necessary to the public interest to compel the giving of testimony or information in a particular case. The considerations listed here are not intended to be all-inclusive or to require a particular decision in a particular case. Rather, they are meant to focus the decision-makers' attention on factors which probably will be controlling in the vast majority of cases. Of course, the significance of the presence or absence of any one or more of these factors in a particular case is a matter to be determined by the decision-maker.

(a) Seriousness of offense and importance of case.—Although the Department encourages the use of compulsion orders as a means of obtaining necessary evidence in appropriate cases, it will not routinely or indiscriminately authorize requests to be made for such orders. For this reason, an application for authorization to seek a compulsion order should not be made unless the testimony or information desired concerns the commission of a serious crime or successful prosecution of the case is otherwise important in achieving effective enforcement of the criminal laws.

(b) Value of the testimony or information.—Under 18 U.S.C. 6002, testimony or information provided under a compulsion order cannot be used, directly or indirectly, in a prosecution of the person who provides it, except a prosecution for perjury, making a false statement, or failing to comply with the compulsion order. Although the person may still be prosecuted on the basis of independent evidence for any offense about which he testifies, in practice, the government's burden of proving the independent nature of its evidence is so great that successful prosecution usually would be extremely difficult. Consequently, under the circumstances of many cases, use of the statute will effectively preclude a future prosecution of the witness for the matters to which his testimony relates. Accordingly, since the giving of testimony or information under a compulsion order may foreclose enforcement of the criminal law against a person otherwise subject to prosecution, a compulsion order should not be sought without a careful assessment of the probable value to the government of the testimony or information.

It is of primary importance that there be good reason to believe that the testimony or information would, if true, be helpful to the government. If possible, the attorney for the government should obtain an indication of the potential witness's probable testimony from the witness or his attorney. If this is not possible, the government attorney should make an assessment based on other information available to him, such as the relationship between the witness and the defendant, the witness's role in the offense, and the statements the witness may have made to others about his knowledge. The government attorney can then weigh the anticipated testimony in terms of the case at hand. In doing so, he should consider whether the testimony will be credible, whether it will materially assist the investigation or prosecution, and whether substantially the same benefit can be obtained from someone else without resort to a compulsion order. Taking all these factors into account, together with any others that may be relevant, the government attorney can then judge the strength of his case with and without the person's testimony.

(c) Likelihood of prompt and complete compliance.—Orders to compel testimony must be predicated upon the conclusion that the testimony sought to be elicited may further the public interest; they are not to be procured solely to make possible the securing of a perjury or contempt conviction against the witness. However, recourse to the procedure is not to be avoided simply because the witness might lie or disobey the order. Nevertheless, in assessing the value of a person's anticipated testimony, the attorney for the government should consider whether the testimony will be promptly and fully forthcoming if a compulsion order is issued. The witness might refuse to comply with the order, for example, or his testimony might be less than candid and forthright. In the first instance, the government attorney would have to consider whether to seek a contempt citation and whether such a course would provide an effective remedy. (A short review of the applicability of civil and criminal contempt sanctions appears in Appendix B). In the second instance, it would be hazardous to use the witness at all, even though he might recant if subjected to a perjury prosecution. In either event, delay might hinder or thwart the underlying proceeding and the compulsion order would be of little value.

(d) Relative culpability and criminal history.—In determining whether it may be in the public interest to compel the testimony of a person who has violated the law, it is also important to consider the degree of his culpability relative to others who are subjects of the investigation or prosecution, as well as his history of criminal involvement. Of course, because of the difficulty of prosecuting a witness for matters relating to his compelled testimony, in the absence of unusual circumstances it would not be in the public interest to compel testimony of a high-ranking member of a criminal enterprise in order to convict one of his subordinates, nor would it serve the public interest to compel the testimony of a person with a long history of serious criminal involvement in order to obtain the conviction of someone else on less serious charges. In this connection, it is also important to consider whether the person has a background of cooperation with law enforcement officials, either as a witness or an informant, and whether he has previously been the subject of a compulsion order or has escaped prosecution by virtue of an agreement not to prosecute—information that may be available by telephone from the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division. Finally, consideration should be given to the relationship between the witness and the person against whom his testimony is sought. Only in exceptional circumstances will authorization be granted to compel the testimony of a witness who is a close family relative of the defendant on trial or of the person upon whose conduct grand jury scrutiny is focusing.

(e) Conviction prior to compulsion.—Recognizing that it is preferable as a matter of policy that an offender formally incur liability for his criminal conduct, and recognizing the difficulty in prosecuting a witness for matters relating to his compelled testimny, the attorney for the government should consider the possibility of securing the witness's conviction before asking the court to compel his testimony. In some situations there may be time to prosecute the witness before compelling his testimony; in other situations a witness may be willing to enter a plea of guilty to all or some of the charges in lieu of being prosecuted.

In a case in which the attorney for the government is considering the appropriateness of an agreement to terminate a prosecution against a potential witness in return for a guilty plea to fewer than all charges, in addition to weighing the considerations usually involved in deciding to accept a plea, he should also make a careful assessment of any offer of testimonial or other cooperation by the person with whom the agreement is to be made. A difficulty with any agreement involving the testimony of a witness is, of course, that the defense may argue to the jury that because the witness made a "deal" with the government his testimony is inherently suspect.

If the witness can be convicted as a result of prosecution or the entry of a plea of guilty prior to the time his testimony is needed, the witness may no longer have a Fifth Amendment privilege with respect to the testimony sought. In such a case it would be unnecessary to resort to the compulsion statutes in order to obtain his testimony. If some areas of the testimony sought still would be covered by a Fifth Amendment privilege, however, the compulsion statutes may be employed to obtain the necessary testimony.

It should be noted that conviction prior to compulsion will reduce the likelihood that the defense will seek to suggest to the jury that the compelled testimony is suspect because the witness has been "granted immunity" for his criminal acts. As noted below, such arguments should be countered in any case in which a compulsion order has been employed, but a particularly strong argument can be made if the witness already has been convicted for his conduct.

(f) Adverse consequences to witness.—The attorney for the government should consider the possibility of harm to a witness who testifies pursuant to a court order, bearing in mind that retaliation against the witness may take economic as well as physical forms. The attorney for the government should consider making use of the government's Witness Protection Program in situations in which there is a real danger that a witness may be harmed as a result of his testimony. (See Departmental Order OBD 2110.2.) Also available to deter abuse of witnesses are the obstruction of justice statutes (18 U.S.C. 1503 and 1510) which prohibit attempts to influence or intimidate witnesses and retaliation against witnesses.

4. In determining whether a person has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide other information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, the attorney for the government shall make an independent judgment regarding the availability of the privilege under the circumstances and shall be prepared to contest the assertion of the privilege if he believes it to be unfounded.

COMMENT

One of the two prerequisites to an application for a compulsory order is a judgement that the subject of the order has refused to testify, or is likely to so refuse, on the basis of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Requests for authorization should be made only when there is a reasonable expectation that the witness will assert his privilege against self-incrimination, or when he has already done so, and when there also is a reasonable expectation that the application of the privilege may be recognized by the court. In this connection, the attorney for the government should not automatically accept at face value an assertion of the privilege. Rather, he should make an independent judgment, based on the law and the facts of the particular case, as to whether the privilege is available. If he believes that there is no sound basis for invocation of the privilege under the circumstances, he should take appropriate steps to have the validity of its assertion determined by the court before seeking a compulsion order. The authority to apply for a compulsion order should be used only when the expectation of its necessity proves to be correct.

5. Upon receipt of authorization from an Assistant Attorney General, the United States Attorney for the district in which the order is to be issued may file a written motion pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6003 to obtain a compulsion order.

COMMENT

Section 6003 of Title 18, United States Code, requires a court to issue a compulsion order upon proper motion of the United States Attorney. The sole function of the court is to ascertain that there has been compliance with the statute; the court is not empowered to inquire into the merits of the application. In re Kilgo, 484 F.2d 1215, 1219 (4th Cir. 1973). Accordingly, once departmental authorization has been obtained, the matter of actually seeking a compulsion order lies in the discretion of the attorney for the government. A motion for a compulsion order should be made in writing (an example of an appropriate section 6003 motion, which may be modified to conform to local district court practice, appears in Appendix A4; a sample compulsion order appears in Appendix A5) and may be made ex parte. Such a motion may be made prospectively in order to avoid undue disruption of trial or grand jury proceedings at a later date, if the attorney for the government is satisfied that the witness will not testify voluntarily.

Any attempt by defense counsel or counsel for the witness to challenge the validity of a compulsion order should be vigorously opposed. In particular, government attorneys should oppose requests for affidavits concerning the authenticity of signatures on departmental authorizations. Compliance with such requests would place an unnecessary burden on the Department in such cases and in other situations requiring approval by a departmental official who is not present in the district. In any event, neither the compulsion statute nor the pertinent regulations require an Assistant Attorney General's authorization to be in writing.

Should the attorney for the government be confronted with a witness who, having previously testified pursuant to a court order, seeks to assert his privilege at a subsequent ancillary proceeding or at a second trial involving the same matter concerning which the witness had earlier testified, the United States Attorney may move for an additional compulsion order. The letter of authorization from the Assistant Attorney General will be sufficiently broad to constitute the requisite approval for the additional order, thereby eliminating any delay incident to litigating the availability of the privilege (cf. Ellis v. United States, 416 F.2d 791 (D.C. Cir. 1969)) or requesting additional authorization. Where more than six months have intervened since the date of the letter of authorization, an additional inquiry to the authorizing Assistant Attorney General and to the Witness Records Unit must be made to determine that during the interim no other matters pertaining to the witness have come to the Department's attention which would make the compulsion order undesirable. Similarly, any substantial change in the information contained in the original request for authorization should be brought to the attention of the Witness Records Unit.

6. In a case in which the person who is the subject of a compulsion order is awaiting sentencing, the attorney for the government should ensure that the substance of his compelled testimony not be made known to the sentencing judge.

COMMENT

This guideline is intended to forestall claims by witnesses who testified under compulsion that their sentences were adversely influenced by the substance of their compelled testimony. The safest way to avoid such a claim is to defer taking the compelled testimony until after the witness has been sentenced. If it is not possible or desirable to postpone the sentencing, the attorney for the government should attempt to ensure that the substance of the compelled testimony does not come to the attention of the sentencing judge before the imposition of sentence. This guideline does not apply, of course, if the witness himself requests that the substance of his compelled testimony be brought to the court's attention prior to sentencing.

7. In a case in which a person is to testify or provide other information pursuant to a compulsion order:

(a) if it then appears that the public interest may warrant a future prosecution of the witness, on the basis of independent evidence, for his past criminal conduct about which he is to be questioned, the attorney shall:

(1) before the witness has testified or provided other information, prepare for the case file a signed and dated memorandum summarizing the evidence then known to exist concerning the witness, and designating its sources and date of receipt;

(2) ensure that all testimony given, or information provided, by the witness be recorded verbatim and that the recording or reporter's notes, together with any transcript thereof, be maintained in a secure location and that access thereto be documented; and

(3) maintain a record of the nature, source, and date of receipt of evidence concerning the witness's past criminal conduct that becomes available after he has testified or provided other information; or

(b) if it appears that the public interest may not warrant a future prosecution of the witness, on the basis of independent evidence, for his past criminal conduct about which he is to be questioned, the attorney for the government shall:

(1) ensure that all testimony, or information provided, by the witness be recorded verbatim; and

(2) maintain a record of the nature, source, and date of receipt of evidence concerning the witness's past criminal conduct that becomes available after he has testified or provided other information.

COMMENT

These guidelines are intended to ensure the integrity of any future prosecution of a witness who is compelled by court order to testify or provide other information.

The provisions of subsection (a) should be followed when, on the basis of the information available at the time the testimony is to be given or the information is to be provided, it is anticipated that a future prosecution of the witness, for any prior offense about which he is to be questioned, may be in the public interest. In the event of future prosecution (except a perjury, false statement, or contempt prosecution based on the compelling of the testimony), the government must be in a position to demonstrate convincingly that its evidence was developed independently of the witness's compelled testimony or of information derived therefrom. The government will also have to show that it has made no "non-evidentiary" use of the testimony or its fruits, such as a decision to focus on the witness as a potential defendant. For these reasons, it is essential that a record be maintained of all untainted evidence against a witness who is compelled to testify, that his compelled testimony be maintained in a secure place, and that access to such testimony be documented. Unless these steps are taken, it may prove impossible to establish the purity of the government's case in a future prosecution of the witness.

The provisions of subsection (b) should be followed when, on the basis of the information then available, it does not appear that a future prosecution would be in the public interest. The precautions are lessened to reflect the lesser likelihood of prosecution, but still help assure that a future prosecution could be initiated on the basis of demonstrably independent evidence.

8. In a case in which a person testifies or provides other information pursuant to a compulsion order, the attorney for the government shall oppose any requested defense instructions and defense arguments to the jury that seek to suggest that the witness's testimony or other information is suspect because it was compelled.

COMMENT

A witness who is compelled to testify under 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003 is not "granted immunity" as would have occurred under the former "transaction immunity" statutes, nor is he thereby provided any other inducement to testify. Nevertheless, it is not uncommon to encounter defense requests for jury instructions depicting such a witness as the recipient of a benefit, one whose testimony may have been colored thereby, and therefore one whose testimony should be weighed with special circumspection. Such instructions should be opposed. A witness whose testimony is compelled after asserting a Fifth Amendment privilege is substantially in no different a position than an ordinary reluctant witness who is compelled by legal process to testify without asserting a privilege—both are testifying under threat of contempt and both have nothing to gain and everything to lose by testifying falsely. There is no reason to treat the testimony of one as more suspect than that of the other, and the standard instruction on the credibility of witnesses in general is ordinarily sufficient for either situation. See, e.g., United States v. Holmes, 453 F.2d 950 (10th Cir. 1972); but see United States v. Leonard, 494 F.2d 955, 961–62 (D.C. Cir. 1974); United States v. Demopoulos, 506 F.2d 1171, 1179–80 (7th Cir. 1974).

There will be situations, of course, in which the testimony of a witness may warrant a special instruction for reasons independent of its being compelled. For example, an instruction on accomplice testimony may be warranted in many such situations. In other situations, however, it may not be. In responding to requests for such instructions, care should be taken to point out that compulsion of an accomplice's testimony is not the situation for which the standard accomplice instructions were originally designed. Although the voluntary testimony of an accomplice who has turned on his former associate may warrant special scrutiny, the rationale for such special scrutiny would usually not apply to the compelled testimony of an accomplice who does not wish to take the witness stand.

In addition to defense arguments in support of cautionary instructions, defense arguments to the jury may often exploit the popular misconception that has been fostered by the term "immunity," as colloquially applied in this context, by suggesting that the testifying witness has "sold out" to the government. As noted previously, this situation can be ameliorated if the witness has been prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced before he testifies. In cases in which it is not possible to prosecute the witness prior to eliciting his testimony, the attorney for the government should counter any defense attacks on the witness's credibility which unfairly suggest that a "deal" has been made between the witness and the government and should point out that the witness was compelled, not induced, to testify.

9. In a case in which the attorney for the government has been authorized to apply for a compulsion order, the attorney shall, immediately upon conclusion of the proceeding, report in writing to the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division whether the compulsion order was obtained and used, the outcome of the use of the order, and the location of any recording, reporter's notes, or transcript of the compelled testimony.

COMMENT

The follow-up report required under this guideline is intended to facilitate identification for departmental attorneys of persons who have been the subject of a compulsion order, of the result of the use of the order, and of the location of the transcript, recording, or reporter's notes of the testimony. A form for such a report will accompany the letter of authorization sent by the Assistant Attorney General (see Appendix A6); it should be completed and returned to the Witness Records Unit immediately upon the conclusion of the proceeding.

10. After a person has given testimony or provided information pursuant to a compulsion order, an attorney for the government shall not initiate or recommend prosecution of the person for an offense or offenses first disclosed in or closely related to, such testimony or information, without the express written authorization of the Attorney General.

COMMENT

In Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), the Supreme Court stressed that the constitutionality of 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003 was tied to a "sweeping proscription of any use, direct or indirect, of the compelled testimony and any information derived therefrom" against the witness—including use as an investigatory lead. 406 U.S. at 460. One appellate court has suggested that "such use could conceivably include assistance in focusing the investigation, deciding to initiate prosecution, refusing to plea bargain, interpreting evidence, planning cross-examination, and otherwise generally planning trial strategy." United States v. McDaniel, 482 F.2d 305, 311 (8th Cir. 1973).

In seeking to prosecute a person who has been compelled to testify, the government has "the affirmative duty to prove that the evidence it proposes to use is derived from a legitimate source wholly independent of the compelled testimony." Kastigar v. United States, supra. As a matter of departmental policy, in cases where the witness is to be charged with an offense either first disclosed in or closely related to his compelled testimony, prosecution shall not be initiated unless the Attorney General personally authorizes the prosecution. This requirement does not apply to cases where a defendant is being tried for an offense unrelated to his compelled testimony.

The attorney for the government should transmit his request for authorization through his supervisors to the appropriate Assistant Attorney General. In his memorandum requesting approval for prosecution of the witness, he should indicate (a) the unusual circumstances which justify prosecution, (b) the method by which he will affirmatively establish either that all evidence necessary for a conviction was in the hands of the government prior to the date of the defendant's compelled testimony or that it came from sources independent of the witness's testimony and was not the result of focusing an investigation on the witness because of his compelled disclosures, and (c) how he will show affirmatively that no other "non-evidentiary" use has been or will be made of the compelled testimony in connection with the proposed prosecution (for example, by having the prosecution handled by an attorney unfamiliar with the substance of the compelled testimony).

The general ban on use of compelled testimony of course does not apply to perjury or false statement prosecutions directed at false testimony given while testifying under compulsion, or to contempt prosecutions for failure to comply with the compulsion order. Such offenses are not prior events about which the witness is compelled to testify; rather they are new offenses arising out of the failure to comply with the compulsion order itself. Accordingly, Attorney General authorization is not required in such cases.

In weighing the public interest in prosecuting a person for an offense first disclosed in, or closely related to, his compelled testimony, the attorney for the government should take into account, inter alia, the importance of encouraging free and full disclosure by witnesses whose testimony is compelled. He should also take into account the extent to which the potential defendant had testified freely and fully in compliance with the order. Since a major advantage of the compulsion statutes as opposed to the old "transaction immunity" statutes is that they encourage more complete testimony (under the former the more information a witness reveals the more difficult it is for the government to prosecute him on the basis of demonstrably independent evidence, while under the latter a witness could reveal just enough to acquire blanket immunity against prosecution and then profess to remember no more), less than complete testimony should not appear to be rewarded by a declination of prosecution in a case where independent evidence clearly exists and the situation otherwise warrants prosecution.

11. The provisions of 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003 are not to be used to compel testimony or production of other information on behalf of a defendant except in extraordinary circumstances where the defendant plainly would be deprived of a fair trial without such testimony or other information.

COMMENT

Arguably, under 18 U.S.C. 6001–6003 it is possible for the government to apply for an order compelling the testimony of a defense witness. The statute does not limit itself to prosecution of government witnesses, and it is conceivable that an attorney for the government might feel that a particular defense witness's testimony "may be necessary to the public interest." However, there are both legal and practical reasons why the government has not sought to compel the testimony of a reluctant defense witness and why it should not do so.

It is well established that neither the courts nor defense counsel have a legal or constitutional right to use such a statute, or to force the government to use such a statute, to compel the testimony of a defense witness. Earl v. United States, 361 F.2d 531 (D.C. Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 388 U.S. 921 (1967); Morrison v. United States, 365 F.2d 521 (D.C. Cir. 1967); United States v. Jenkins, 470 F.2d 1061 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 920 (1973); Cerda v. United States, 488 F.2d 720 (9th Cir. 1973); United States v. Berrigan, 482 F.2d 171 (3rd Cir. 1973); United States v. Ramsey, 503 F.2d 524 (7th Cir. 1974); In re Kilgo, 484 F.2d 1215 (4th Cir. 1973); United States v. Allstate Mortgage Corporation, 507 F.2 492 (7th Cir. 1974); United States v. Bautista, 509 F.2d 675 (9th Cir. 1975); United States v. Alessio, 528 F.2d 1079 (9th Cir. 1976); but see United States v. Morrison, 535 F.2d 223 (3rd Cir. 1976). The defendant's Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process must yield to the witness's Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination (Earl, supra) and to the executive branch's authority to decide whether to prosecute a case (Alessio, supra; United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974)).

As a practical matter, a requirement that the government seek to compel the testimony of defense witnesses would place the government in an intolerable situation. It is safe to assume that once the government, at the court's or defense counsel's request, were required to seek a compulsion order to obtain the testimony of a defense witness, it would be inundated with further such requests. Certainly, the government could not grant them all, since such orders would seriously jeopardize future prosecutions of the witnesses. Nor could it give reasons for denying such requests without possibly jeopardizing other investigations and prosecutions. Moreover, in many instances the government would not know what a witness's testimony would be; thus the government would have no basis for concluding that compulsion of his testimony might be in the public interest.

Consequently, attorneys for the government should oppose attempts to use the compulsion statutes on behalf of defendants. The concern that the jury might not hear potentially exculpatory testimony because of this policy can usually be met by careful screening of cases; in a situation where the prosecutor realizes that a potential defense witness will exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, he has discretion as to whether he should proceed with the case in view of his estimate of the truthfulness, materiality, and exculpatory nature of the potential testimony.

The "extraordinary circumstances" exception to the policy against compelling the testimony of defense witnesses is intended to provide for unusual cases in which the defendant plainly would be denied a fair trial unless he had the benefit of compelled testimony. In Earl v. United States, supra, at 534, then Judge Burger observed in a footnote that a due process problem might exist if the government compelled the testimony of a prosecution witness but refused to compel that of a defense witness in the same case. This issue has rarely arisen, but in United States v. Alessio, supra, where it did, the court apparently agreed that the government's refusal to compel the testimony of a defense witness might constitute a denial of due process. In that case, however, the court ruled that the defendant was not deprived of a fair trial by the government's refusal because the proffered defense testimony would only have been cumulative. In view of these authorities, an attorney for the government faced with a defense request for a compulsion order in a case in which the prosecution has used compelled testimony should oppose the request unless the defendant makes a convincing demonstration that the extraordinary circumstances of the case make the testimony sought essential to assure him a fair trial.

APPENDIX A

FORMS AND SAMPLE DOCUMENTS PERTAINING TO ORDERS TO GIVE TESTIMONY OR TO PROVIDE OTHER INFORMATION

The use of compulsion orders is a valuable means of securing needed testimony that otherwise would be unavailable. In order to assure that in appropriate cases authority to apply for such orders is granted promptly upon request, government attorneys must exercise care to provide Assistant Attorneys General with the necessary information and to follow the procedures established by the Department. The following forms and sample documents are designed to facilitate such efforts.

All requests for authorization to apply for compulsion orders shall be made on the form attached as Appendix A 1, which should be sent to the Witness Records Unit of the Criminal Division. Detailed information should be provided concerning the proposed witness's identity and role in the offense, together with an explanation of how the compulsion of his testimony may be necessary to the public interest. There must also be included the witness's FBI record, or an explanation of why it is not included, and available local criminal records, as well as information concerning federal or local charges known to be pending against the witness. Where the witness is awaiting trial or sentencing, or where his case is on appeal, the requesting attorney should attach a statement explaining what actions he will take to avoid having the compelled testimony taint any subsequent proceeding. The request shall also identify those federal and local law enforcement officials contacted regarding the compulsion request, and include a statement of any opposition they have to the request.

The summary of the witness's anticipated testimony should include any proffer which has been obtained concerning the nature of the witness's testimony. This summary should also discuss the legal basis for an assertion by the witness of a Fifth Amendment privilege. Assistant Attorneys General have received requests for authorization in a number of cases in which no substantial reason to expect the assertion of a Fifth Amendment claim was apparent, and the lack of explanation has caused unnecessary delays.

Requests for authorization should be made only when there is a reasonable expectation that the witness will invoke his privilege against self-incrimination; they should not be made merely as a form of "insurance" to cover a remote contingency. However, if there is reason to believe that a recess would not be allowed at trial for the purpose of obtaining authorization to seek a compulsion order, the authorization should be requested prior to trial. In this connection, it is recognized that, despite efforts to anticipate the invocation by a witness of his privilege against self-incrimination, there will be extraordinary instances necessitating the processing of a request for authorization to compel testimony more rapidly than the normal processing time of two weeks. Where the time within which the authorization decision must be made is one-to-three days, departmental attorneys should submit their requests, labelled "Emergency Request," to the Witness Records Unit via the GSA teletype connection with the Criminal Division or the commercial teletype receiver no. 710–822–907 located in the Criminal Division. Where the time involved is less than one day, requests may be submitted by telephone to the attorney-in-charge of the Witness Records Unit at 739–4594.

He will assure that all available information is brought to the immediate attention of the appropriate Assistant Attorney General, as well as such other departmental personnel as may be necessary. He will also assure the prompt communication of the authorization decision to the requesting attorney. After receiving authorization pursuant to an oral request, the requesting attorney should promptly send to the Witness Records Unit a confirmatory, written request for authorization on the form attached as Appendix A 1.

Under Gelbard v. United States, 418 U.S. 41 (1972), a witness called before a grand jury may refuse to testify, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 2515, despite a compulsion order, if the interrogation is based on the illegal electronic interception of the witness's communications. Accordingly, the completed form should reflect any information with respect to any electronic interception of the witness's communications of which the requesting office is aware. When such an interception has occurred, a report thereof should be attached to the request.

The form also requires a separate listing of all other witnesses for whom orders to compel testimony have been authorized in the case or investigation, or with whom agreements not to prosecute have been made. This listing should include an explanation of the role of each of these witnesses in the matter under investigation.

In addition to the information specifically required, any other information concerning the witness or the proceeding in which the witness is to testify, which might be of assistance in evaluating the request, should be furnished.

APPENDIX B

ENFORCEMENT OF ORDERS TO GIVE TESTIMONY OR TO PROVIDE INFORMATION—CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CONTEMPT

The refusal of a witness to testify or to produce other information subsequent to the issuance of an order of compulsion under 18 U.S.C. 6002 is punishable by contempt. The Supreme Court has admonished the district courts to consider first the feasibility of effecting compliance with compulsion orders through the imposition of civil contempt, under 28 U.S.C. 1826. " 'The judge should resort to criminal sanctions only after he determines, for good reason, that the civil remedy would be inappropriate.' " United States v. Wilson, 421 U.S. 309, 317 n. 9 (1975), quoting Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364, 371 n. 9 (1966).

1. CIVIL CONTEMPT.

28. 28 U.S. 1826, a codification of existing practices, was enacted in 1970 to provide a statutory basis for the application of summary civil contempt powers to reclacitrant witnesses. The purpose of the statute is to secure the testimony of other evidence through the creation of an incentive to compliance for the witness, not to punish the witness by imprisonment. When the witness complies with the order, he must be released. Thus, confinement is limited to the life of the court proceeding or the term of the grand jury, but in no event may be confinement exceed eighteen months.

Section 1826(a) provides that, upon the refusal of a witness without just cause to testify or provide other information, as ordered, in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States, the court may order the witness confined summarily. However, section 1826(a) cannot be invoked simply upon the refusal of a witness to testify before a grand jury; the witness in such a case must be brought before a judge and ordered to testify, and he must then refuse to comply with the order.

Section 1826(b) prohibits granting bail during the pendency of an appeal from an order of confinement if the appeal appears to be frivolous or taken for delay. An appeal from a confinement order under this section is to be disposed of "as soon as practicable" but not later than thirty days from the filing date. These provisions lend a certainty to the sanction consistent with the urgent public need to obtain testimony. See United States v. Coplon, 339 F.2d 192 (6th Cir. 1964). Thus, the statute, itself, affords a sound predicate for government opposition to an application for bond pending appeal in such instances.

2. CRIMINAL CONTEMPT.

Where it is appropriate to impose punishment upon a recalcitrant witness, the court may invoke the provisions of 18 U.S.C. 401 and Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 42(a) provides for summary punishment of the contempt "if the judge certifies that he saw or heard the conduct constituting the contempt and that it was committed in the actual presence of the court," while Rule 42(b) requires notice and a hearing for contempts not committed in the presence of the court.

In United States v. Wilson, supra, the Supreme Court upheld contempt convictions summarily imposed under Rule 42(a), in a case where two witnesses refused to testify during a bank robbery trial despite having been ordered by the trial court to do so pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6002. The Supreme Court distinguished the refusal of a witness to testify before a grand jury—where the proceeding may be interrupted while the witness is afforded notice and a hearing under Rule 42(b)—from refusal to testify at a trial. In the latter instance, the Court observed, there is a need for a swift summary decision: "The face-to-face refusal to comply with the court's order itself constituted an affront to the court, and when that kind of refusal disrupts and frustrates an ongoing proceeding, as it did here, summary contempt must be available to provide the recalcitrant witness with some incentive to testify." 421 U.S. at 316. "Where time is not of the essence, however, the provisions of Rule 42(b) may be more appropriate to deal with contemptuous conduct." Id. at 319. See also Harris v. United States, 382 U.S. 162 (1965).

Criminal contempt is punishable under 18 U.S.C. 401 by fine or imprisonment. Courts may not impose both a fine and imprisonment, nor a fine coupled with probation. Mac Neil v. United States, 236 F.2d 149 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 912 (1956). While case law limits summary punishment under Rule 42(a) to imprisonment for six months, there is no maximum set for punishing criminal contempt after notice and hearing under Rule 42(b). See e.g., United States v. Sternman, 415 F.2d 1165 (6th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 907 (1970) (three years' imprisonment). Indeed, so that an adjudication of criminal contempt not be deprived of efficacy where the contumacious witness is already serving a sentence for another criminal offense, that sentence may be interrupted to compel the witness to serve an intervening contempt sentence. United States v. Liddy, F.2d 669, 672–673 (D. C. Cir. 1974) cert. denied, 420 U.S. 980 (1975).

Bail for a defendent found in criminal contempt of court is controlled by the provisions of Rule 46, F.R.Cr.P.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you for your statement.

The subcommittee is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 12:20 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

GRAND JURY REFORM

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 9:35 a.m. in room 2237, Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Joshua Eilberg [chairman of the subcommittee], presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Hall, Fish, and Sawyer.

Also present: Garner J. Cline, Arthur P. Endres, Jr., Martin H. Belsky, counsel; Peter Regis, legislative assistant; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order. This is our fifth, and possibly our last, hearing on H.R. 94 and other bills to reform the Federal grand jury system. After receiving the testimony of our witnesses today, and collecting reports, letters, and submissions for inclusion in our record, we intend to proceed to markup of H.R. 94 at the earliest possible time, probably early in the next session. Comprehensive grand jury reforms will be considered—and, I believe, approved—by the House of Representatives during the 95th Congress. Hopefully, the Senate will also consider, review, and approve grand jury reforms.

There is therefore a real possibility of comprehensive grand jury legislation in the near future—the first reforms in the history of our Republic.

As our hearings and recent events demonstrate, such reforms are essential to restore the true purpose and function of our grand jury system. During our hearings, witness after witness—citizen, prosecutor, and judge—all noted abuses of the grand jury and the politicalization of that body. Of course, these witnesses differed in their recommendations. Most suggested legislation; some relied on judicial controls; others indicated that in-house formulation of policies would be sufficient.

I believe it is Congress' role to establish the standards and procedures for the grand jury and all other judicial proceedings. We cannot rely on a case-by-case determination to insure protection of an individual's rights or to guarantee the independence of a grand jury. We cannot rely on a case-by-case determination of issues by judges who are already overworked and who do not have any guidelines as to how to resolve these issues. We should and can detail the responsibilities of the prosecutor and the standards for the courts—by legislation.

That legislation is needed has been demonstrated by the recent action of the American Bar Association. At their annual meeting, the ABA recommended that legislation be enacted to insure grand jury fairness and independence. The recommendations closely parallel the provisions in my bill, H.R. 94.

First, the ABA, and H.R. 94, provide for a right to counsel in the grand jury room—whose role would be limited to an advisory one—and provide for procedures to deal with abuses and conflicts of interests by these lawyers;

Second, the ABA and H.R. 94, provide for a return to transactional immunity and for standards for the courts to consider and then apply in approving or disapproving immunity grants;

Third, the ABA and H.R. 94 set limits on the maximum period of confinement for civil contempt for refusal to testify or supply evidence;

Fourth, the ABA and H.R. 94 establish a new crime of unlawful disclosure of grand jury information—leaks;

Fifth, the ABA and H.R. 94 would require detailed instructions to grand jurors of their rights and duties;

Sixth, the ABA and H.R. 94 grant basic rights to grand jury witnesses and targets—such as adequate notice and an opportunity to testify—with certain limitations; and Seventh, the ABA and H.R. 94 require an accurate transcript or recording of all grand jury proceedings except deliberations.

For the convenience of the Members of the subcommittee and the Congress, I have placed all the ABA recommendations in the Congressional Record and have also placed in the record the numerous articles, editorials, and comments urging enactment by us of these reforms.

Our witnesses today should present varied views on these and other grand jury reforms.

The Honorable William A. Sessions is a U.S. District Judge, for the Western District of Texas, appearing in behalf of the District Judges Association of the Fifth Circuit. Judge Sessions and the Fifth Circuit Conference have been extensive research on the Federal grand jury and have submitted a detailed memorandum.

Gary Naftalis is a former assistant U.S. attorney in New York City and presently in private practice. He is co-author, with the Honorable Marvin Frankel, of a recent book on the grand jury. I must note that I have carefully read this book. It is not only informative as providing the necessary background to the whole grand jury reform issue but also helpful as suggesting and documenting needed reforms.

Rod Sager is also a former assistant U.S. attorney, for Virginia. He has had extensive experience with Federal grand juries and, in fact, was involved in a unique grand jury investigation that he will describe.

The Honorable Bruce Babbitt is the attorney general of Arizona.

And, General Babbitt, the order in which the names appear here reflects only the order in which the information was received in our office that witnesses definitely would appear; it has no other meaning.

General Babbitt has been involved in extensive statewide grand jury investigations and has publicly described the benefits of and protections needed for such investigations.

David Rein is a practicing attorney long involved in grand jury reform issues and is here today in behalf of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse. The coalition has been very active in documenting grand jury abuses and in detailing and justifying needed reforms.

I welcome our witnesses today and am confident that their testimony will be of great benefit to us in our deliberations next session.

Because the House is terribly busy at this time—in these closing weeks—we are suggesting that the witnesses give shorter statements rather than use the longer ones they have submitted although we want to hear everything you know.

Before proceeding with our first witness, I would like to introduce our colleague, Mr. Sawyer—Congressman Sawyer of Michigan.

Mr. SAWYER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I wonder if I may just make a brief statement since this is one of the few areas in which I and the chairman disagree.

We have, in fact, heard some horror stories on grand juries, but I'm sure we've heard horror stories and occasional abuses of almost every function we have in the Government. And I don't think that these few isolated horror stories, when we think of the numbers of grand juries that are operating throughout the country, merit destroying or severely weakening a jury which is a very useful investigative tool any more than abuses of a former President might indicate we should strip the President of his powers to function.

While I have been very short in tenure of experience in Congress, I spent 30 years as a practicing trail lawyer and chairman of a 52-man law firm, fellow in the American College of Trial Lawyers, and director of the International Academy of Trial Lawyers—several others. I served some 2 or 3 years as prosecuting attorney in a 450,000 person county, and I may be the only person in the United States who has only tried 10 first degree murder cases, five on one side and five on the other, and it's the only kind of case I never lost.

I have had experience representing defendants in price-fixing and antitrust cases—corporate defendants—whereas I was on the other side of the fence, and they were being paraded through grand jury proceedings and engaged in briefing and so forth.

So, I think I speak from a warm background out in the field as opposed to sitting in Congress. And I, personally, was tremendously impressed and totally agreeing—substantially in total agreement—with the testimony of Judges Lacey and Mr. Civiletti who have appeared before this committee. So, while the chairman has his point of view, certainly supported by some facts, I wish for the record to be clear that I do not make the same observation as the chairman in this area.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. I take this opportunity to thank Mr. Sawyer. He has worked closely with us over this year and he's worked on the subcommittee; certainly we can afford to disagree. I know that we'll come out with some agreement.

And, without further ado, we would like to get to this witness, Attorney General Babbitt.

TESTIMONY OF HON. BRUCE BABBITT, ATORNEY GENERAL, STATE OF ARIZONA

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Chairman, committee members, I very much appreciate the chance to be here. I must say this is the first time I've ever been ahead of a U.S. District Judge; in general I won't draw any inferences from that. It is a pleasure to be here.

Arizona has had a great deal of experience with grand jury work, and, I think, also a great deal of history of interaction between the legislative, the judicial, and the executive in shaping the laws that control grand juries.

I was interested in the chairman's comment that legislation does have a role in specifying how grand juries work. That has been the case in Arizona; there the legislature has taken a very active role, reforming and defining by legislation what the function of the grand jury is.

Likewise, historically, the courts have been much closer to the grand jury than is the case at the Federal level; the courts have actively supervised the grand jury proceedings in a way that I will describe shortly.

The other general observation, on the other hand, is that there is renewed interest in the grand jury system in Arizona. Contrary to many national trends toward abolishment of the grand jury, we have gone in precisely the opposite direction. Largely, because in recent years, our State has been plagued with tremendous problems, organized crime, white-collar crime, political corruption, and massive frauds.

In 1975, at my request, the State Legislature created a statewide grand jury with broad, statewide jurisdiction. The State grand jury act explicitly recognized the investigative function of the grand jury and strengthened the powers of the grand jury—subject to careful judicial supervision.

I might add—very briefly I would like to talk about two or three areas where our experience may be of some assistance to you. First one——

Mr. EILBERG. Could you summarize your statement and not read it?

Mr. BABBITT. Absolutely.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection we will receive your formal statement into the record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Babbitt follows:]

STATEMENT OF BRUCE E. BABBIT, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF ARIZONA

I am pleased to have the opportunity to appear before this Subcommittee. Your hearings into the functioning of the Federal grand jury system are indeed an important and historic undertaking.

I share the views of many committee members that during the last decade, the grand jury system has on occasion been badly abused by the Justice Department, and I agree that changes can be made to reduce the chances of such abuse in the future.

At the same time, I believe that we must take great care to assure that changes are truly necessary and that they do not have unintended adverse effects. My specific concern lies with the investigative function of the Grand Jury.

Arizona has endured nearly two decades of massive criminal frauds and associated violence that has attracted national attention. Many of our problems are wel known; the details are not important to this analysis. In dealing with these problems, we learned a great deal about the use of grand juries in the criminal justice system.

The centerpiece of our reform effort has been the creation of a statewide grand jury with broad jurisdiction to investigate and indict cases involving fraud, extortion, securities and tax violations, narcotics, labor racketeering, political corruption and all the related areas that come within the general definition of white collar crime and organized crime.

In the past two years, we have learned a great deal about the extreme difficulties of prosecuting these crimes. The most important lesson is that these crimes are seldom detected and almost never prosecuted without a grand jury equipped with broad investigative powers. The asssitance of the investigative subpoena of the grand jury is a power not usually possessed by prosecutors or by police. But it is indispensable to detecting "paper crimes." The broad investigative reach of our state grand jury has been strengthened and confirmed by court tests.[1]

I would like to address just three of th areas covered by H.R. 94, areas which relate to the investigative function and areas in which our own experience may be of some value.

The best and most important single feature of H.R. 94 is the requirement of Section 8 that a complete written transcript be kept of both testimony and arguments of counsel, excluding only the actual deliberations of the jury. Much of the grand jury abuse of the past decade can be traced to the traditional hands-off attitude taken by Federal courts toward their grand juries. Many Federal prosecutors have kept no transcripts of grand jury proceedings. Without a complete record, there is no effective way that judges can control prosecutors who pressure and abuse witnesses. Likewise, without a written record there is no way for a judge to review the record to assure that at least some modicum probably cause underlies the indictment.

In Arizona, court rules require a complete transcript of testimony and arguments.[2] Arizona trial courts routinely review these transcripts to rule on defense challenges of procedural irregularities including prosecutorial misconduct. Not infrequently, indictments are remanded because of procedural errors. The result has been the development by major prosecution offices of written guidelines that conform closely to the standards developed by case decisions. These standards proscribe any attempt by a prosecutor to impair the grand jury's deliberative function. As a result, Arizona has not had the problems of grand jury abuse encountered at the federal level.

The best answer to abuse of grand jury procedures is judicial supervision. The grand jury is a quasi judicial body; it should function as such and its proceedings should be subject to court scrutiny much as an appellate court reviews the activity of a trial court. If Federal grand juries can be brought under the effective supervision of the courts, many of the detailed procedural matters treated in H.R. 94 could appropriately be left for the courts to evolve by rule-making based on the results of review. I believe this approach is superior to freezing detailed grand jury procedures into statutory form.

I do not share the reservations expressed by the Justice Department about transcribing arguments to the jury by the prosecutor. There is ample evidence that some prosecutors do abuse witnesses and pressure the jury in their arguments, and it seems entirely appropriate that judges should have the means to control such conduct. Frivolous challenges will inevitably be made by defense counsel, but in our experience the courts have generally sorted out the good from the frivolous expeditiously and with a fair degree of consistency.

There are two provisions in H.R. 94 which I believe will seriously and unjustifiably impede the investigative function. The first and most difficult issue is the provision of Section 7 granting the right to counsel in the grand jury room.

It is an unfortunate fact that unscrupulous or unwitting lawyers are willing to represent, directly or indirectly, multiple defendants in both civil and criminal litigation in situations which pose serious conflict problems. And there are lawyers willing and able to suborn the system by orchestrating a defense for the principal defendant by advising and sometimes coercing other defendants into a pattern of cooperation that is often against their individual best interests.

In Arizona, court rules allow counsel in the grand jury room for targets, but not for witnesses.[3] We cannot point to specific instances of abuses on the part of counsel, but only because we have structured major cases so that no more than one related target is subpoenaed before the grand jury in any case. This procedure has real drawbacks in some types of cases, and even our Arizona rule is troublesome. Were the rule extended to witnesses, we believe the situation would become intolerable.

One may fairly question why we are so sure that a problem exists when we cannot point to specific cases of abuse. In nearly every complex case prosecuted by our office, a lawyer has been involved—and usually indicted. This includes land fraud cases, swindles involving securities, financial institutions and insurance.

To say, as the ABA apparently does, that conflict and multiple representation problems can be resolved by simply reiterating that such practices are prohibited by the canons of ethics is not convincing.

Section 7(d) of H.R. 94 anticipates and attempts to deal with the problem by authorizing the court to replace a lawyer where "necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded."

This section does not add anything to the inherent power already possessed by the court. The problem is that neither inherent power nor statutory power are adequate to deal with subtle and largely undetectable efforts of unscrupulous lawyers to suborn the grand jury process. I do not mean to impugn the generally high standards of the legal profession. It is simply a fact that the most successful and highly organized criminals are the most likely to attract the few unscrupulous lawyers that are present in the profession.

The second area of specific concern is the provision of Section 9 requiring a preliminary hearing, in addition to the present Fifth Amendment requirement of a grand jury indictment for all infamous crimes. The clear effect of this will be to turn the present two step criminal process into a three tiered proceeding. In complex paper cases this extra step, interposing an additional adversary proceeding, will burden both prosecution and courts to the breaking point.

Our office has prosecuted and is presently prosecuting complex fraud cases, often involving the reconstruction of several years of business transactions and accumulated financial records. These cases routinely require a year or more of investigation by many investigators and lawyers aided by the grand jury's subpoena power. The investigation is then followed by months of accounting testimony before the indicting grand jury. After indictment, this type of case will then require several months of trial time.

In Arizona a preliminary hearing has become a species of mini trial which can drag out for weeks even in relatively uncomplicated cases. In our experience, complex paper cases cannot be effectively handled through the preliminary hearing route.

Absent the strictures of the Fifth Amendment, many federal cases would probably be more suitable for a preliminary hearing than grand jury action. I believe that in many types of cases both prosecutors and defense counsel would generally agree that the preliminary hearing is a superior alternative.

But in some areas, particularly complex financial cases, the preliminary hearing, as a form of mini trial, is not feasible. The large case involving multiple defendants, scores of witnesses and literally rooms of paper is a new phenomenon that presents special problems. Few jurisdictions outside the Federal government have experience in this area. The apparent lack of objection from many states to the preliminary hearing proposal of H.R. 94 should not be interpreted as endorsements based on experience with this type of prosecution.

For these reasons, I strongly endorse the passage of House Resolution 60 which would eliminate the requirement of a grand jury proceeding and give Congress the authority to test separately both the indictment and the information procedures.

The comparative merits and drawbacks of the preliminary hearing and the grand jury indictment have not been exhaustively studied, largely I think, because of the lack of extensive comparative experience at the Federal level. The best approach, in my view, would be to amend the Fifth Amendment to give Congress the authority to specify by statute either the indictment or the information, or both, as the proper way to commence a criminal proceeding. Congress can then experiment with both methods, compare their acceptability in different types of cases, and make reasoned distinctions based on actual experience.

Mr. EILBERG. Please proceed.

Mr. BABBITT. There are three areas where I think we have some experience that might be of help to you.

First, with respect to the requirement of a written transcript of the proceedings, we have that requirement by law in Arizona. It extends to witnesses and to counsel alike, excluding only the deliberations of the grand jury. I recommend it without reservation.

The transcript requirement ties the conduct of the proceedings to the supervision of the judiciary—makes it absolutely necessary. I am quite surprised at the way the Federal grand juries are run—without any real possibility of review by the judges—since there are no transcripts required. I believe it perfectly appropriate to make transcripts available to defendants. The transcript also serves as the basis of a great variety of challenges to procedures under which the grand jury is conducted.

If there is one fundamental reform, which would be most effective in curing the problems, it is judicial review. Judicial review not only corrects abuses, it prevents them from happening in the first place. All our lawyers go to the grand jury with a written script and set of procedures to make certain that the record will be free of error. The transcript requirement does chill the proceeding in the sense that it requires rigorous decorum, extremely careful conduct of the case by counsel, who know that judicial review will follow with a remand for any substantial irregularity.

Second, I would summarize briefly the requirement that counsel be allowed in the grand jury room. Arizona has taken an intermediate position here. Our law says that counsel may accompany only targets to the grand jury.

I must tell you that we have real reservations about the requirement of counsel for targets. It's a real problem in practice, not because of disruptions in the grand jury room. The law clearly says that if a lawyer creates problems he is summarily expelled. There have been a few occasions where that happened—the prosecutor simply goes to a judge and gets an order expelling the lawyer. The lawyer does not create problems in the grand jury room.

However, we have been unable to find answers to the problems that are created by unethical, corrupt lawyers orchestrating the testimony, reporting back, coercing potential defendants. I don't think some of the testimony on the problem has been candid enough. The American Bar Association counters the problem by saying it will reemphasize the Canons of Ethics. But the problem is that in virtually every major grand jury case we've initiated in the last few years—financial frauds, insurance frauds, land frauds, murder—there has been a lawyer involved in the crime itself. Most of our major indictments, it seems, include lawyers as defendants. That's the kind of lawyers we're dealing with. Ethical admonitions are simply not adequate deterrants.

We have attempted to handle this problem by structuring grand jury proceedings so that we do not generally call more than one potential defendant to testify, thereby minimizing the chance for lawyers to orchestrate testimony.

For these reasons I have tremendous reservations about extending our counsel rule to witnesses.

The third area where we've had some experience is with the preliminary hearing proposed by H.R. 94. I think most prosecutors—and all defense lawyers in Arizona—would tell you that in the vast majority of cases, the preliminary hearing is the better alternative. It's a better alternative for two reasons: first, the prosecution doesn't need the grand jury; and, second, there's no question that the adversary open preliminary hearing provides certain advantages for the defendant, which they shouldn't be denied unless there is some compelling reason. And most cases probably don't need the investigative function of the grand jury.

That leads me to conclude that the fifth amendment ought to be modified. Given the effective preliminary hearing device, given the historical changes since 1781, I support without reservation House Joint Resolution 60, which would modify the fifth amendment and give Congress the power to prescribe which of the two procedures is appropriate in which cases. That is what the Arizona legislature has done.

My concern with H.R. 94 is what I would call a two-tier requirement: Grand jury indictment—preliminary hearing—trial. It's going to be unworkable in complex cases. Most of the problems that I'm talking about today arise out of complex cases. Those are, increasingly, the areas prosecution is focusing on.

We routinely handle cases involving 1 to 2 years of investigation, usually involving two or three lawyers, maybe six or eight investigative personnel. Then we take that case to an investigative grand jury, principally for use of the subpena power to get records and to shape the case up with testimony. That may go on for months.

We have a 6-month grand jury session. We had a case last spring that consumed the entire grand jury session. After indictment we go to trial, and, routinely, those cases can take literally months to try. If Congress interposes a preliminary hearing in that process, the Federal criminal prosecution effort will be protracted even more.

It's a severe problem; we'll grind the system to a halt. A preliminary hearing is the ideal route for 95 percent of the cases. The other 5 percent, the complex cases, are serious problems. We must address the question whether it is appropriate to simply start stacking one proceeding on top of another, instead of eliminating the grand jury outright in those cases where its investigative functions is not required.

Thank you for your attention. If you have any questions, I would be happy to respond.

Mr. EILBERG. We appreciate it, and appreciate your summarizing your statement, as many witnesses as we have.

You have referred to one of the bills that has been introduced. We've introduced four different proposed constitutional amendments to eliminate the requirements of an indictment for infamous crimes. The Arizona Constitution allows the State to proceed by way of information or indictment. How is it determined and what standards have been established as to when the prosecutor proceeds by way of indictment or information?

Mr. BABBITT. In the case of the Attorney General, the legislature debated that very extensively. The legislature gave us access to these special grand juries for specified categories of offenses—the statute defines jurisdiction in terms of organized crime, white-collar crime, multicounty offenses—which automatically limits us to the investigative type cases. Any other type of case we must take by preliminary hearing.

That distinction is not made at the local prosecutor level.

Mr. EILBERG. In those cases you have said, you would proceed by indictment rather than by preliminary hearing, I take it.

Mr. BABBITT. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. H.R. 94 provides that a witness may request to testify or present other evidence to the grand jury. The Arizona Criminal Code provides that a witness or defendant may ask to have witnesses examined on his behalf. Has this ever been used in State grand jury investigations and has this ever, either pursuant to a grand jury or prosecutorial investigation, led to a withdrawal of the prosecution?

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Chairman, we do have a statute that allows witnesses for targets or potential defendants to ask to testify before the grand jury. It is entirely discretionary with the grand juries as to whether or not they want to hear him. The grand jury has responded to some requests by targets in some cases. We do get "no bills," and we have, on our own, dropped investigations.

I think the cause and effect relationship is difficult to trace, but I think I can say, yes, there are cases where a defendant, taking the initiative in getting testimony before the grand jury, has probably contributed to either dropping the investigation or to a "no bill."

Mr. EILBERG. In other words, what are the statistics on this point?

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Chairman, there aren't; I could give you statistics as to "no bills," and possibly as to how many investigations were dropped, but it's very difficult to correlate that to defense initiated testimony before the grand jury. Numbers are extremely small. The number of "no bills" is very small, because we normally don't take a case to the grand jury unless we are a long ways down the road. I view an investigative grand jury as a very serious matter. It's got to investigate, but it had better not be doing it in the absence of something approaching probable cause.

Mr. EILBERG. One of the concerns raised by many prosecutors is that the grand jury is necessary to allow the prosecutor to subpena witnesses and evidence. As you know, Congress has consistently refused to give direct subpena power to the FBI or to prosecutors, and, as a result, the grand jury is used.

Under Arizona law, the prosecutor can, on his own or at the request of the grand jury, subpena witnesses. Could you describe for us how the process works, what reviews are made as to this subpena power, and whether you believe this has led to any abuses?

Mr. BABBITT. We have not had abuses. We have grand jury subpena power; the prosecutor has unilateral authority to issue the grand jury subpenas. The grand jury does not vote on subpenas, the court does not review them in advance.

The protection is, of course, that they are returnable to the grand jury. At that point, everything is of record. A witness who has been subpenaed may move to quash his subpena, thereby triggring judicial review. As to the scope of the subpena, the courts have interpreted it very broadly.

I think it's a very workable system. I think there are real drawbacks to a grand jury on voting on the subpenas. It's very difficult to conceive of how a grand jury can be educated in advance of testimony as to the reach of the invstigation.

Again, in my view, the key is having the subpena returnable of record with a right of review.

Mr. EILBERG. H.R. 94 provides that detailed instructions be provided to the grand jurors of their rights and duties. Arizona law provides that on advice of the prosecutor the court is to charge the grand jury on its duties and rights. Have you established any procedures or standards as to what should be included in a charge?

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Chairman, we have—or, more accurately, the court has. At the commencement of each grand jury proceeding, the court reads a very lengthy charge to the jury. It recapitulates the function of a grand jury—all of the applicable law—with emphasis on their ability to call witnesses and their responsibilities.

Mr. EILBERG. H.R. 94 provides for standards and procedures for judicial approval of immunity grants. This has been opposed as an infringement on "prosecutorial discretion." In 1975, your criminal code was amended to provide that a court can deny requests for immunity if it states the reasons in writing.

Could you describe for us any illustrations where the court has denied an immunity request and what problems, if any, this judicial approval mechanism has caused?

Mr. BABBITT. I think this procedure has worked well in Arizona, requiring the prosecutor to go through the court for an immunity grant. Immunity requests are not frequently made. I think there are two reasons for that. The first is we are very careful about requests for immunity.

We never ask for them for the purpose of simply fishing. I think that is where the problem has come up with the Tucson Federal grand jury and others. I think our courts would step in if there weren't a clear statement on the record justifying the request. Secondly, we don't make any judicial requests for immunity. And the reason for that is that a cooperative witness will often testify under an informal grant of immunity from the prosecutor in the form of a written statement of our intention not to prosecute.

So, we have been very careful about the immunity request. The judicial review of that, I think, is entirely appropriate.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer, we have just a few minutes.

Mr. SAWYER. Just a few questions.

Was Jim Zagel your chief assistant down there?

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Sawyer, he was indeed. I called him the day after the election and said, "We've got some problems; I must have your help." He came out to be my first assistant for approximately 6 months. He made an extraordinary contribution to the people of Arizona.

Mr. SAWYER. A very impressive young man.

Mr. BABBITT. Mr. Zagel, Ms. Holtzman, and I were all classmates—a distinguished class in some respects.

Mr. SAWYER. In Michigan, in the State courts, the prosecutory system, we proceed in almost all of the cases by complaint and warning, and then with preliminary examination, and I recognize that the Federal prosecutors are stuck with having to go through a grand jury for routine things where you don't need them, rather than just rubberstamp run through that you've got enough evidence to prosecute. And I agree with you that that is really an encumbrance imposed by the fifth amendment. It seems to me that preliminary examination right, which can either be waived or exercised by the accused, is a much more satisfactory procedure in anything but the cases where you need a grand jury for investigative purposes. I suppose that you agree with that?

Mr. BABBITT. I absolutely agree with that. It seems to me that that's the fundamental issue in much of this discussion—no question.

Mr. SAWYER. And I suppose, too, the area proceeds as we do, in 99 percent of the cases that you are going to give immunity. You either plea bargain or give prosecutory immunity, in effect, or agree to accept a certain plea, recommend a certain sentence, to the court if they cooperate as opposed to not.

Mr. BABBITT. The chances of getting useful testimony out of compelled immunity are pretty risky, and, normally, we don't go that route. In some cases, however, compelled immunity is certainly necessary and appropriate.

Just a small footnote, one reason the preliminary hearing route is superior in many cases—and even in some complex cases—is because of the need to preserve testimony. We take the possibility that a witness may be murdered. We may take even a complex case to a preliminary hearing in order to preserve testimony by cross examination. But, certainly, in routine cases it's a preferable alternative in my view.

Mr. SAWYER. Under Michigan law you're required, even with a grand jury indictment, to go to preliminary examination following, and it's used for that purpose, too, preserving the testimony—which isn't much good if it's just in the grand jury. How do you feel about the reduction of the 18-month maximum incarceration for refusal to testify down to 6 months?

Mr. BABBITT. We have not had a lot of experience in that area. I suppose I'm less concerned about reduction from 18 months to 6 months than I am about the prohibition of any future incarcerations. I think the 6 months to 12 months is entirely liveable, provided that some discretion remains for using the contempt power in subsequent proceedings. I read that bill as prohibitive in subsequent proceedings.

Mr. SAWYER. That's all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Sawyer.

General Babbitt, just—I'm sorry.

Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. If I may ask one question, Mr. Babbitt: Can you not envision a situation where a person would rather take 6-months imprisonment rather than tell a grand jury what he knows, as opposed to an 18-month incarceration, he might be more inclined to talk if he had something beneficial for a grand jury.

Mr. BABBITT. Certainly many witnesses will weigh very consciously the length of the term as against the disadvantages of testifying. I think it is fair to say that if you reduce it you will lose some testimony that you might otherwise get, probably not a lot. I don't know where the balance point is.

Mr. HALL. Are we out of time?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. HALL. I believe that's all. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. General Babbitt, we thank you for your contribution, and you are excused.

Mr. BABBITT. Thank you Mr. Chairman and committee members.

[Recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order. We are pleased this morning to have U.S. District Judge, the Honorable William B. Sessions, from El Paso, Tex.

Judge Sessions, welcome.

TESTIMONY OF HON. WILLIAM S. SESSIONS, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE, WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS, EL PASO DIVISION

Judge SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I hasten to correct my middle initial; it is "S". I think the "William B." comes from William Bill, which I was called as a boy, and there are some who persist in it; but by name is William Steele.

Mr. EILBERG. Let the record so indicate.

Judge SESSIONS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I additionally, in response to the committee's earlier inquiry, gave my written testimony and filed it back some time in August. I did not file the original because I was not certain that I would ever actually appear before the subcommittee, and I will now tender it and a signed copy of the original statement.

I recognize the committee has other matters they want to proceed with. I intended full well all along to simply submit myself for questioning by the subcommittee on the expectation there might be things you would want to discuss, and you could easily read the testimony which I have given in writing. There are, I think, several things which you should know.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Sessions, I take it, then, that you're not planning to read this statement?

Judge SESSIONS. If that is favorable with the committee. If the committee chooses; but I assume that you prefer that I not.

Mr. EILBERG. You've put an awful lot of work into it—some 44 pages worth—but I'm afraid that it would take a great deal of time to read it.

Judge SESSIONS. No; my testimony itself is some 15 pages. There is an addendum to it, Congressman Eilberg, which is the result of rough briefing—which you have—which I simply supplied for the committee because I thought you would be entitled to have the result of my own efforts back some years ago.

Mr. EILBERG. As to my own personal preference, I would prefer that you would summarize and go ahead, if you would do that. We generally leave this to the discretion of the witness; how he would like to proceed.

Judge SESSIONS. Well, let me indicate this. I, of course, appear here at the behest of——

Mr. EILBERG. You don't have to read your statement, Judge. As a matter of fact, we prefer that you summarize it, but we leave it to the discretion of the witness.

Judge SESSIONS. Thank you.

It might be purposeful at this stage to say that I am here at the behest of president of the District Judges Association of the Fifth Circuit, the Honorable James Lawrence King. He was kind enough to appoint me as chairman of the legislation committee of the District Association, and, in that capacity, I appear.

I hasten to tell you that although I circulated my remarks among the District Judges Association, I would have to put a disclaimer on it. I have received no response from any judge in the negative; however, I do not presume that each of those judges agrees with the statement that I make here in my testimony.

The second point to observe is that since the time of submission of my testimony, several significant things have happened, each of which, I'm sure, the committee and the Chairman are aware of.

Mr. EILBERG. Just so we get the record straight, you're not going to read a statement; is that correct?

Judge SESSIONS. I will not read it, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. That being the case, without objection, the statement will be made part of the record.

Judge SESSIONS. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Judge Sessions follows:]

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM S. SESSIONS, U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE, WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS, EL PASO DIVISION

I am a United States District Judge from the Western District of Texas sitting at El Paso, appearing before this Subcommittee as the Legislation Committee Chairman of the District Judges Association of the Fifth Circuit. I was appointed to chair that Committee by the Honorable James Lawrence King on June 1st of this year. The District Judges Association of the Fifth Circuit has a membership comprised of all but two or three of the 85 active and senior trial judges of the Fifth Circuit.

While the District Judges Association has expressed its general disagreement with H.R. 94 in its present form, (a copy of which was forwarded to each member of the Congress), the comments I make concerning specific parts of the legislation are my own and are not necessarily the views of all, or even a majority, of the Judges of the Association.

I wish to express my deep appreciation to your Chairman, Congressman Joshua Eilberg, for honoring the request of the Association's President, the Honorable James Lawrence King, that a representative of the Association appear before the Committee and express the views of the Association. The pursuit of equal justice under law must be our unflagging cause, because law is the cornerstone of our liberty.

I was appointed to the Federal Judiciary in December of 1974. Prior to that time, I was the United States Attorney for the Western District of Texas at San Antonio from July of 1971 until December of 1974. From August of 1969 until July, 1971, I served as Chief of the Government Operations Section of the Criminal Division in the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C.

My active experience and knowledge of Federal grand jury operations stems from my supervision of grand jury investigations conducted by attorneys of the Government Operations Section in cooperation with various United States Attorneys investigating violations of law involving the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, the Obscenity Statutes and the Selective Service Act. Thereafter, in my capacity as U.S. Attorney, I supervised and conducted grand jury proceedings in the Western District of Texas including a year-long grand jury investigation into political corruption in Duval County, Texas.

While there are many elements which must be analyzed by this Committee in making its decision concerning the worthiness of this proposed grand jury legislation, the testimony I give here today can properly be construed as encouraging the Committee to preserve and enhance the ability of a grand jury to serve as an investigative grand jury, thereby enabling it to perform its investigative function within the protective confines prescribed by the United States Constitution. No other investigative structure is better equipped to insure the protection of the Constitutional rights of the witness and of the accused than is the grand jury.

The well chosen words of the former United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, Whitney North Seymour, Jr., in his book United States Attorney, 1975, graphically illustrate the importance of the investigative grand jury:

"The third major source of prosecutions consists of cases initiated within the United States Attorney's office itself, sometimes in cooperation with one of the Federal investigative agencies. These cases are often the most important Federal criminal cases, and their success depends largely on the staff's strength and experience. Notable recent examples of this type of prosecution include the indictment of former Vice President Spiro Agnew by the U.S. Attorney's office under George Beall, in Baltimore; prosecution of public officials and organized-crime figures by the U.S. Attorney's office under Herbert Stern and Frederick Lacey, in Newark; and conviction of state and local public officials in Illinois by the U.S. Attorney's office under James Thompson in Chicago. The primary investigative tool in these cases is the grand jury."

In 1973, the Honorable William J. Campbell, a former United States Attorney of the Northern District of Illinois and former Chief Judge of the Northern District of Illiniois, published an article in Volume 64, No. 2 of The Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology of the Northwestern University School of Law entitled "Eliminate the Grand Jury". His article prompted me to undertake a good deal of research and I have enclosed my notes as an attachment to this testimony. I invite your perusal of the writings, both "pro" and "con", on the problems posed by this type of legislation. I would additionally invite your attention to an article by Cornelius W. Whickersham, Esquire, of the New York Bar, in the December, 1965 issue of the American Bar Association Journal (Vol. 55, Page 1157) entitled "The Grand Jury: Weapon Against Crime And Corruption".

In his opinion in "In Re Grand Jury Subpoena To Central States, Southeast And Southwest Areas Pension Fund, August Term, 1963, et. cet. 225 F.Supp. 923, the then Chief Judge William J. Campbell stated:

"The grand jury contrary to what seems to be the prevailing general belief is an integral part of the judicial arm of the Government and is not a mere tool of the prosecutor. The United States Attorney, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other branches of the Department of Justice are integral parts of the Executive Branch of the Government. The grand jury, being part and parcel of the Judicial Branch of Government, is subject to a supervisory power in the courts, aimed at preventing abuses of its process or authority. However, in as much as the United States Attorney's Office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are not part of the Judicial Branch of the Government, they are not in the performance of their executive functions, by reason of our Constitutional separation of powers system, subject to the supervisory power of the courts. This is properly as it should be."

In all branches of government, there are those who would abuse their power and authority and embarrass and frustrate the ideals of good government. Abuses of power and authority by grand juries and prosecuting attorneys, however, are not necessarily symptoms of weakness in the system or the law.

Accordingly, this distinguished Subcommittee has an awesome responsibility to insure that it does not mortally impair the ability of the investigative grand jury by constructing an impenetrable protective shield around the law breaker, and thereby frustrating the ability of the prosecutor to enforce the laws enacted by the Congress of the United States.

In commenting on the various sections of H.R. 94, I will at times refer to the position of the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules of the Judicial Conference of the United States, the Honorable J. Edward Lumbard, Chairman, the testimony before this Subcommittee by the Honorable Frederick B. Lacey, on April 27, 1977, and the testimony before this Subcommittee by the Honorable Benjamin J. Civiletti on June 29, 1977.

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

H.R. 94 amends Section 2A of 1826 Title 28 to limit to six months the maximum possible time to be served for contempt upon refusal to comply with a Court order to testify or produce records (1826(b)(2)) after a 72-hour notice of hearing (1826(a)(3)). The Section further bars a second confinement (1826(b)(3)) (new 18 USC S 403).

I join the Advisory Committee and Judge Lacey in opposing a reduction of the maximum period of confinement for contempt and barring a second confinement, agreeing that "a witness, granted immunity, nonetheless can frustrate a grand jury inquiry by refusing to testify" and that "reduction of sanctions is not in the aid of public interest overall." Additionally, I believe that adoption of such a section invites contempt by minimizing punishment, frustrates investigations of sophisticated, multi-member enterprises and/or corrupt activities, political and otherwise, and facilitates the ability of such enterprise to put forward a "scapegoat" whose testimony may be essential to such an investigation. To suggest that such will not be the case if the contempt sanction is reduced seems to ignore history.

IMMUNITY GENERALLY

Without commenting further on immunity, it seems that Section 3(b) of 6002 requiring that "No order . . . shall require any witness to testify . . . prior to the day one week . . . after the order was communicated, and Section (c) providing for notice and right to counsel in a proceeding challenging such order invites challenge to the grant of immunity as well as adding a potentially heavy burden to the existing monumental judicial workload.

NUMBER OF GRAND JURORS, ETC., SEC. 3321(A)(B)

I concur in the view of Judge Lacey and the Advisory Committee that the reduction in size of the grand jury and the accompanying provsions pose no real problem.

VIOLATIONS OF GRAND JURY SECRECY

Section 1512 of H.R. 94 provides criminal sanctions for violation of grand jury secrecy which meet the approval of the Advisory Committee and Judge Lacey. I would join Judge Lacey, however, in his expressed concern over the provision contained in Section 1512(c)(3) that would allow disclosure by a witness who has appeared before the grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witnesses testified. This provision appears to allow an attorney who jointly represents two or more grand jury witnesses (or potential defendants) to disclose to each of his clients the testimony of the other or others, and, for that matter, would permit disclosure to the public at large, thus providing for wholesale violations of the secrecy of the grand jury.

SEC. 3329 RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURY AND ATTORNEY FOR GOVERNMENT

H.R. 94 would amend Section 6(a), Chapter 215 of Title 18, United States Code, by adding a new section which requires the Court, when empaneling a grand jury to give instructions, among others, concerning:

(1) The subject matter of the investigation. (3329(a)(5)), and,

(2) The criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is empaneled. (3329(a)(6)).

I recommend the deletion of Section 3329(a)(5) and (6) because of the difficulty or impossibility of the Courts complying with the two requirements. Except in the cases of Special grand juries, summoned and serving under 18 USC S 3331, et seq., it would be impractical or impossible to instruct the grand jury as contemplated in these provisions. A court would be required to summarize for the jury the entire criminal code unless the Court were to call the grand jury back before each session, and, after inquiring of the United States Attorney what matters he intends to present to the grand jury, instruct the grand jury concerning the applicable statute. As I observed earlier in the quote from Judge Campbell's opinion at 225 F. Supp. 923, though the grand jury is subject to the supervisory power of the Courts, the "United States Attorney's Office . . . (is) not part of the Judicial Branch of the Government" and is not "in the performance of its executive functions, by reason of Constitutional separation of power system, subject to the supervisory power of the Court." Inquiry by the Court into the nature and extent of an investigation as a predicate for instructing the grand jury under the proposed sections, might seem to invade a forbidden area. In any event, the United States Attorney routinely instructs the grand jury concerning the applicable statutes and this function should not be imposed upon the courts.

This Section requires the U.S. Attorney to take reasonable steps to notify any person that evidence will be presented against that person and that a presentment or indictment will be requested. The U.S. Attorney would also be required to notify a potential indictee of his right to testify or present evidence before the grand jury. This notice is required unless the attorney for the Government "can prove to the satisfaction of the Court that notice would result in the flight of a person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution".

At the present time, the Speedy Trial Act (Public Law 93-619) allows no greater than 45 days from arrest to indictment and will ultimately allow no greater than 30 days. In a complicated conspiracy case, even under the most favorable circumstances, it is extremely difficult for the United States Attorney to coordinate and prepare the presentation of the matter to the grand jury in that short period of time. To additionally encumber the Government with the burden of proving to the Court the Government's feeling that the person would flee or endanger other witnesses, hangs another "albatross" around the neck of the United States Attorney. Further, the burden on the Courts in processing and hearing the requests of the United States Attorney would be considerable and counterproductive. This procedure would also seriously endanger the secrecy of the grand jury proceedings.

Aside from the potential problems it creates for the United States Attorney and the Courts, this Section seems to invite a defendant to take action detrimental to his best interest and the ends of justice. In response to notification, a potential defendant might flee, interfere with an investigation, interfere with witnesses, or destroy or secrete evidence, or any combination of these four. I agree with Assistant Attorney General Civiletti of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice in his testimony supporting the principle of affording notification and an opportunity to testify . . . but only when such notification seems appropriate within the discretion of the U.S. Attorney and can be made without unduly jeopardizing the investigation or prosecution.

SECTION 3329(c) REVEALING EXCULPATORY EVIDENCE

Section 3329(c) requires the Government's attorney to "periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant."

Judge Lacey expressed his concern about this section "because it raises so many problems which will ultimately be laid before the Courts." Mr. Civiletti observed that to "impose a duty upon a prosecutor to apprise the grand jury of all material that is conceivably exculpatory would convert the grand jury process into something akin to an ex parte trial on the merits, and would assuredly lead to a plethora of defense motions to dismiss the indictment or suppress the testimony of a particular grand jury witness based on the contention that the prosecutor had not sufficiently complied with the obligations of disclosing facts that 'might' have tended to effect the witness's credibility or to negate guilt." I concur with the observations of Judge Lacey and Mr. Civiletti and would observe further that such a requirement is incompatible with the mandate of the Speedy Trial Act.

SECTION 3330 A COUNSEL

H.R. 94 amends Section 7(a), Chapter 15 of Title 18, United States Code, to allow every witness subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury to have available assistance of counsel in the grand jury room. It further provides for appointment of counsel under Section 3006A of Title 18 and allows counsel to remain in the jury room during questioning of the witness whom he represents. The Court has the power to remove the attorney if it finds that counsel violates the rule and addresses grand jurors or otherwise takes part in the proceedings.

Judge Lacey and Assistant Attorney General Civiletti have clearly articulated the debilitating problems which may arise if this section is enacted. Currently, any witness testifying before a grand jury is entitled to seek counsel outside the grand jury room before answering any questions propounded to him. To suggest that a witness will be abused and questioned in an unlawful manner or dealt with in an unconstitutional manner is to suggest that the United States Attorney, sworn to uphold the Constitution, will violate his oath.

The requirements of the Speedy Trial Act make it increasingly difficult to complete the grand jury presentation in a timely fashion. The most difficult cases to present are conspiracies, which require extensive preparation before presentation of the grand jury. It is in these very cases, where multiple defendants are involved, that counsel's presence in the jury room would most seriously impede the expeditious conduct of the investigation. If the grand jury investigation is forced to yield to inventive tactics and devices utilized by counsel to frustrate the proceeding to which his client is called as a witness, then justice will neither be served nor done.

Section 3330B requires, except when the Court finds special need, that no subpoena may require any witness to testify or produce other information before one week subsequent to the service of the subpoena.

It further requires the Government to produce information upon the service of any subpoena to give notice of seven items, including "the subject matter of the grand jury investigation."

Once again, the testimony of Judge Lacey and Assistant Attorney General Civiletti clearly bring into focus the problems that would be created by the enactment of this section. In addition to their concern, my experience teaches me that prior notice, of any sort, often invites and sometimes insures the "loss or destruction" of subpoenaed records.

SECTION 3333 RECORDINGS OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

This section provides for a complete and accurate stenographic or electronic recording of all grand jury proceedings except deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel. The proceedings to be recorded include the Court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and other comments or charges, all introductory comment made by the Government attorneys, witnesses and their counsel (although 3330A(c) provides that counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in the proceedings before the grand jury); and all interchanges between the grand jury and the attorneys (unspecified).

In addition to the caveats of Assistant Attorney General Civiletti concerning these "blanket" recording requirements and those comments of Judge Lacey on the cost factor, I believe the Committee must keep in mind that the purpose of a grand jury is to find probable cause for, and to return indictments, and to conduct appropriate investigations. Because this is the historic right of a grand jury, evidence, not competent at trial, may well be introduced for the grand jury's consideration and discussion. Section 3333, when coupled with required subpoena notice, the presence of witnesses' counsel in the grand jury room, and the Court's various instructions, might well create a climate so intimidating to the grand jurors as to make their meaningful participation in the grand jury's processes impossible.

SECTION 3332 AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS AND OTHER STATEMENTS

I concur with Judge Lacey's position approving Sections 3334 (a) and (b) insofar as these Sections allow a person subpoenaed to testify before the grand jury to examine previous statements he has made and any prior grand jury testimony he may have given. I also concur in the position of the Department of Justice urged by Assistant Attorney General Civiletti opposing the aspects of Section 3334 that would effectively repeal the Jencks Act, 18 USC § 3500. As Judge Lacey notes, competent counsel will routinely move for the production of "all of the grand jury testimony", thereby requiring the court to review and determine materiality, etc. In addition to the extremely burdensome problem of review, this process may ofttimes require later refusal by the Court in the case. Once again, the requirements of this section seem totally incompatible with the mandate of the Speedy Trial Act. Additionally, the provisions of 3334 (c) (2) portend yet another monumental pre-trial burden for the Courts, impairing the ability of the Courts to meet the mandate of the Speedy Trial Act.

SECTION 3368 PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

Section 3368 mandates that a defendant is entitled, unless waived, to a preliminary post-indictment examination. From the wording of Section (a), it is unclear to me whether the Congress intends that the preliminary examination be conducted by the District court or that a preliminary examination must be had (possibly before a magistrate) when a defendant is charged with an offense that must be tried by the District court.

Regardless of the interpretation of the language, I believe the Congress should look carefully at the cost and manpower requirements of this Section, as the preliminary hearing required therein needlessly duplicates the effort of the grand jury in arriving at probable cause for the return of an indictment. Whether a District court judge or a magistrate is required to hold such a preliminary examination, the judge's time consumed in such a mini-trial, the additional manpower required by the United States Attorney's office to staff the hearing, the requirements of Government agents to be off the job and in the courtroom, the cost of reporters, transcription, and of associated personnel, appear to be monumental and totally unjustified. The observations of Judge Lacey and Mr. Civiletti in this regard are well reasoned.

I. PURPOSE OF GRAND JURY

In Re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283, 284 (E. D. Pa., 1933),

"The inquisitorial power of the grand jury is the most valuable function which it possesses today and, far more than any supposed protection which it gives to the accused, justifies its survival as an institution. As an engine of discovery against organized and far-reaching crime, it has no counterpart. Policy emphatically forbids that there should be any curtailment of it except in the clearest cases."

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury: Sleeping Watchdog or Expensive Antique?, Lewis Watts, Jr., 37 No. Car. L. Rev. 290, 291, 292 (1959).

"The grand jury has served two basically different but related functions.

"One is accusatory. The grand jury considers the bill submitted by the solicitor; if it finds probable cause, it makes the formal accusation of crime which brings the defendant into the criminal court. The chief reasons for retaining the grand jury as an accuser historically was to protect defendants from unjustified prosecution at the hand of an overzealous prosecutor in the days before our public prosecutions of today. A few speak of the protective function of the grand jury, but most writers think of it as an integral part of the jury's accusatory procedure.

"The other function is investigatory or inquisitorial. In the beginning the jurors inquired among themselves for knowledge of crime committed within the county. Later they sat as an inquest and heard witnesses in this regard. Also, the grand jury served as a kind of supervisor of the local government machinery, apparently with the power to make necessary investigations."

This next information comes from the case styled Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962).

"This body has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious, and oppressive persecutions; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused, whether the latter be an individual, minority group, or other, to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will. Particularly in matters of local political corruption and investigations is it important that freedom of communication be kept open and that the real issues not become obscured to the grand jury. It cannot effectively operate in a vacuum. . . . The necessity to society of an independent and informed grand jury becomes readily apparent. . . ."

II. History of the Grand Jury

United States v. Olmstead, 7 F. 2d 756 (W.D. Wash., 1925), at page 758.

"The grand jury is of ancient origin; it goes back many centuries. It is said the institution existed among the Saxons. By the Constitution of Clarendon, the grand jury was recognized, if not established. It originated when there raged a conflict between the rights of the subject and the power of the crown. Its object was to secure to the subject the right of appeal to his peers under the immunity of secrecy before he could be brought to trial. It was at first a body which not only arrested, but which tried, public offenders. It was at the time of the settlement of this country an informing and accusing tribunal only. It is a distinct, independent body, and must act free from influence, fear, favor, affection, reward, or hope thereof proceeding from, or without, the court. The Constitution of the United States, as well as the constitutions of all the states show it is adopted as a means of protection as well as a necessary aid to public justice. The grand jurors being sworn officers of the court, the presumption is that the indictment was found only upon proper evidence and before the court would, under any circumstances, enter upon an investigation, it must appear by strong, positive proof that the inhibitions of the law had been violated and the presumption overcome."

The following information is from a comment entitled The Grand Jury: Its Present Day Function and Correlative Powers in Volume 29, Fordham Law Review, page 152 (1960).

"The grand jury was created in the common law courts as an instrument of the crown in order to expand the power of king over the feudal courts. Shortly thereafter, it developed into an independent body which inquired into all crimes committed or triable within its jurisdiction. In this capacity, it served a dual purpose; (1) to indict and present for trial persons believed guilty of a crime; and (2) to protect innocent persons from unwarranted prosecution. Protection of the innocent was insured by a requirement of strict secrecy, established early in the history of the grand jury. Later, the grand jury assumed an additional role of investigating into and reporting on public matters, encompassing such subjects as abusive market practices, horseracing, and maintenance of bridges, highways, and public property. Misconduct of public officials was another important subject of inquiry."

III.—Grand Jury's Scope and Powers

Initially, probably one of the better places to start in terms of the information we have gathered is in the xeroxed portions of the power sections of the article entitled The Federal Grand Jury by Lester B. Orfield, 22 Federal Rules Decision at page 343 (1958).

The following information comes from the case Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273 (1918), at page 281.

"It is clearly recognized that the giving of testimony and the attendance upon court or grand jury in order to testify are public duties which every person within the jurisdiction of the government is bound to perform upon being properly summoned, and for performance of which he is entitled to no further compensation than that which the statutes provide. The personal sacrifice involved is a part of the necessary contribution of the individual to the welfare of the public. The duty, so onerous at times, yet so necessary to the administration of justice according to the forms and modes established in our system of government, is subject to mitigation in exceptional circumstances; there is a constitutional exemption from being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against oneself, entitling the witness to be excused from answering anything that would tend to incriminate him. . . . [Page 282] A defendant is not entitled to challenge the authority of the court or of the grand jury, provided they have a de facto existence and organization.

"A defendant is not entitled to set limits to the investigation that the grand jury may conduct. The Fifth Amendment and the statutes relative to the organization of grand juries recognize such a jury as being possessed of the same powers that pertained to its British prototype, and in our system examination of witnesses by a grand jury need not be preceded by a formal charge against a particular individual. It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime. As has been said before, the identity of the offender, and the precise nature of the offense, if there be one, normally are developed at the conclusion of the grand jury's labors, not at the beginning.

"And, for the same reasons, witnesses are not entitled to take exception to the jurisdiction of the grand jury or the court over the particular subject-matter that is under investigation. In truth it is in the ordinary case no concern of one summoned as a witness whether the offense is within the jurisdiction of the court or not. [Page 283] At least, the court and grand jury have authority and jurisdiction to investigate the facts in order to determine the question whether the facts show a case within their jurisdiction."

The following information comes from the case United States v. Cox, 342 F. 2d 167 (5th Cir), cert. denied, 331 U.S. 935 (1965).

"The requirement of the signature of the United States Attorney on an indictment is for the purpose of evidencing joinder of attorney for the United States with the grand jury in instituting a criminal proceeding in the Court. Without the signature there can be no criminal proceeding brought upon an indictment." [Page 172]

"A federal grand jury has the unquestioned right to inquire into any matter within the jurisdiction involving violations of law and to return an indictment if it finds a reasonable probability that a crime has been committed. This it may do at the instance of the court, the District Attorney, the Attorney General or on its own initiative, from the evidence it may gather or from knowledge of its members." [Page 175]

"The United States Attorney cannot, except in an advisory capacity, inquire into the merits of whether indictments should be found and returned in particular cases being considered by the grand jury. Only the grand jurors themselves have that power. It would be grossly wrong for it to be usurped. Moreover, that is practically impossible, because 'no person other than the [grand] jurors may be present while the grand jury is deliberating or voting.' Rule 6(d), F. R. Crim. P. The responsibility of finding and returning an indictment rests solely on the grand jurors." [Page 176]

The following information comes from the case People v. Sears, 273 N.E. 2d 380 (Ill., 1971), at page 391.

"The grand jury, prior to return of an indictment, is subject to the supervisory power of the court where questions of the court's process are involved."

The following information comes from the case styled United States v. Corallo, 413 F. 2d 1306 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 958 (1969).

In here we will be discussing the requirements of the grand jury in giving warnings to each witness.

[Page 1328] "In the Grand Jury room, Motto and Fried were separately warned that they had a right to remain silent, that the Grand Jury was investigating the offense of using an interstate facility to further the state crime of bribery of a municipal official, that each was the subject of the investigation, and that he had a right to consult with an attorney. They were also asked whether they had attorneys present. . . . Finally, they were told whatever they said might be used against them. . . . These warnings were completely adequate."

The following information comes from the case styled Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960), at pages 215–17.

"Ever since Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, was decided in 1887 it has been the rule that after an indictment has been returned its charges may not be broadened through amendment except by the grand jury itself. In that case, the court ordered that some specific and relevant allegations the grand jury had charged be stricken from the indictment so that Bain might be convicted without proof of those particular allegations. In holding that this could not be done, Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the Court, said:

"If it lies within the province of a court to change the charging part of an indictment to suit its own notions of what it ought to have been, or what the grand jury would probably have made it if their attention had been called to suggested changes, the great importance which the commonlaw attaches to an indictment by a grand jury, as a prerequisite to a prisoner's trial for a crime, and without which the Constitution says 'no person shall be held to answer,' may be frittered away until its value is almost destroyed." 121 U.S. 1, 10.

"That after the indictment was changed it was no longer the indictment of the grand jury who presented it. Any other doctrine would place the rights of the citizen, which were intended to be protected by the constitutional provision, at the mercy or control of the court or prosecuting attorney. . . ." 121 U.S. 1, 13.

The Bain case, which has never been disapproved, stands for the rule that a court cannot permit a defendant to be tried on charges that are not made in the indictment against him. See also United States v. Norris, 281 U.S. 619, 622.

The following information comes from Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855 (1966), at pages 869–70.

"In general, however, the Court has confirmed the trial court's power under Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to direct disclosure of grand jury testimony "preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding.' [This information is on page 870.] In United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 234, the Court acknowledged that 'after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it.' In Proctor & Gamble, supra, the Court stated that 'problems concerning the use of the grand jury transcript at the trial to impeach a witness, to refresh his recollection, to test his credibility . . .' are 'cases of particularized need where the secrecy of the proceedings is lifted discreetly and limitedly,' 356 U.S., at 683. . . .

"These developments are entirely consonant with the growing realization that disclosure, rather than suppression, of relevant materials ordinarily promotes the proper administration of criminal justice."

The following information comes from the case styled Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956).

"A defendant in a criminal case in a federal court may be required to stand trial and his conviction may be sustained while only hearsay evidence was presented to the grand jury which indicted him. An indictment based solely on hearsay evidence does not violate the 5th Amendment. In the exercise of its power to supervise the administration of justice in the federal courts, this Court (Supreme Court) declines to establish a rule permitting defendants in criminal cases to challenge indictments on the ground that they are not supported by adequate or competent evidence."

Further information on the scope and the powers of the federal grand jury in a more detailed form (with cases also footnoted therein) is contained in the article Federal Grand Jury by Lester B. Orfield, 22 Federal Rules Decisions, pages 343–463, 1958. Part of this article has been xeroxed and is within this file. The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury: Bulwark of Prosecutorial Immunity? by Michael K. Williams. Comment, 3 Loyola of Chicago L. J. 305 (1972) at pages 309–310.

"American courts set forth five reasons for secrecy that 'bear little similarity' to their traditional purpose of assuring the protection of the citizen from oppressive prosecution. These reasons are:

"(1) To prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated;

"(2) To insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors;

"(3) To prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it;

"(4) To encourage free and untrammeled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes;

"(5) To protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt."

In Crowley v. United States, 194 U.S. 461, 475 (1903), the Supreme Court said: "The indictment embodies charges made by grand jurors, and the signature of the United States Attorney merely attests the action of the grand jury, whereas an information rests upon the responsibility of the attorney representing the government, and imparts an investigation of the facts by him in his official capacity." "The grand jury is a creation of the Fifth Amendment and is not wholly identifiable with any one of the three traditional branches of government. . . . The prosecuting agency may not use for its own purposes the processes available to the grand jury."

United States v. Steel, 238 F. Supp. 580 (S.D. N.Y., 1965), (at page 582) the U.S. Attorney decides whether to present matters to the grand jury, it is the grand jury alone that determines by vote whether to return an indictment. There is a "strong presumption of regularity according to deliberations of findings of grand jury's." (At page 583) If a second grand jury returns an indictment where a first grand jury returned a no true bill, "this furnishes no basis for drawing the inference that the succeeding grand jury which did return the indictment acted without evidence. . . ."

The following information comes from the case styled United States v. Kysar, 459 F. 2d 422 (10th Cir., 1972), pages 422–23.

"We conclude that prosecution on a subsequent grand jury indictment returned after dismissal of complaint by Commissioner for failure to show sufficient evidence to detain the defendant was not barred by earlier dismissal. If the indictment is fair upon its face and properly found and returned, the trial court cannot look behind the indictment to determine if it is based on inadequate or incompetent evidence."

"Where the grand jury is summoned, impaneled and sworn by the court, it is essentially independent of court control and the court cannot peremptorily require an indictment by the grand jury nor prevent the presentment of an indictment except by summary discharge. Where the grand jury was impaneled to investigate local milk industry with the view of determining whether indictments on anti-trust laws should be returned, instructions that the jury must vote either to indict or not to indict and might not take an adjournment for summarization of the testimony taken was a clear invasion of the grand jury's powers."

"The county attorney has a duty to avoid presenting incompetent witnesses in evidence against one under grand jury investigation. He is not only the custodian of the state's security, but is also the guardian of the rights of one under investigation. [At page 1104]. The court may examine and excuse any of the jurors for bias or prejudice or other legal grounds, going to qualifications which shall be deemed expedient, but that does not mean he shall act arbitrarily or from malice or favoritism [thus, grand juries are truly representative of the people]."

The following information comes from the case styled In Re National Window Glass Workers, 287 F. 219 (N.D. Ohio, 1922), at page 220.

"The process by which witnesses are compelled to attend a grand jury investigation is the process of the court, and not of the grand jury or of the district attorney, and the court has a supervisory duty of seeing that its grand jury and its process are not abused or used for purposes of oppression and injustice."

The following information comes from the case styled In Re Grand Jury Investigation, 32 F. R. D. 175, appeal dismissed, 318 F. 2d 533 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed per stipulation, 375 U.S. 802 (1963), at page 183.

"As for criminal proceedings, so long as the motivating purpose of the grand jury investigation is not the accumulation of evidence for a pending criminal case, the Government may use evidence incidentally acquired in the course of a legitimately instituted grand jury in the pending criminal case. [Thus, the defendant seems to be raising an argument against grand juries that the government at times uses grand juries only to accumulate evidence in a pending criminal case.]"

The following information comes from the case styled In Re Dionisio, 442 F. 2d 276 (7th Cir., 1971), rev'd on other grounds, 410 U.S. 1, (1973), at page 281;

". . . the grand jury is not required to have a factual basis for commencing an investigation and can pursue rumors and clues which further investigation may prove groundless. The grand jury does not need probable cause to subpoena witnesses. But that is not to say that the grand jury may misuse its subpoena power to effect a seizure which in other contexts would be violative of the Fourth Amendment."

[Page 279–80] "The Government argues that it is premature to consider these Fourth Amendment claims because the witnesses' remedy, if any, lies in the exclusion of the evidence at trial if one ultimately ensues. The argument is not persuasive. . . ."

IV.—Articles Against Grand Juries

The following articles comes from Beauchamp Brogan's Criminal Procedure—Should the Grand Jury System be Abolished?, 45 Ky. Law Journal 151, 152, 154–157 (1956).

"Under the present English system (this article was written in 1956; the grand jury in England was abolished in 1933), any person may prefer a bill of indictment charging an indictable offense, provided the accused has been committed for trial or that the bill is preferred by the direction or consent of a judge of the High Court. The bill becomes an indictment when signed by a proper officer of the Court, who must be satisfied that the requirements for filing have been met. This provision gives the prosecutor an opportunity of getting a decision of the examining magistrate overruled if he is not satisfied. Most charges, however, are made by magistrates who have conducted the preliminary examination. (The author seems to favor the present English system. This article then states seven different arguments against grand juries.)"

[Page 154] "First, it may be suggested that there is no reason for a second hearing, provided a full and adequate hearing is given by the magistrate. The grand jury, in general, follows the advice of the prosecutor in acting on charges brought before it. Where two hearings are held, there is unecessary delay in the administration of justice. Witnesses must appear at both hearings and again must be dragged before the trial court in case the accused is indicted. Much time usually lapses between the preliminary hearing and the empaneling of the grand jury. This can be detrimental to both sides. If the accused is innocent and the charge dismissed, he may have been made to wait in jail for long periods of time. On the other hand, the delay also hurts the prosecution. Witnesses may be moved from the jurisdiction of the Court and cannot be found. It is estimated that about 20 percent of the cases originally instigated have to be dropped for lack of witnesses."

"Second, the elimination of the grand jury for the purpose of returning indictments would save the public much money. When the accused is committed to jail for several months preceding the calling of the grand jury, he is an expense to the community. The cost of the services of the prosecuting attorney, the members of the grand jury, and all who are involved in the grand jury system must be taken into account. And, after several months the position of the accused is probably the same had no grand jury been called. In short, if the time is ripe for trial, nothing can be lost by proceeding. Following the preliminary hearing, the action by the grand jury is a duplication of effort.

"Third, the grand jury poses a burden on citizens who must leave their jobs to serve as jurors.

"Fourth, an argument can be made against the lack of an opportunity for the accused to be heard. The grand jury is supposed to return an indictment if in its judgment the evidence is sufficient to justify a trial. But how can it determine validly such sufficiency if the accused may not present rebutting evidence.

"Fifth, it might be argued that the prosecutor avoids responsibility by getting the grand jury to return "no bills." If he does not wish to prosecute a case, he can present it in such a way that the grand jury will probably not return an indictment.

"Sixth, the abolishment of the indictment might actually reduce the number of persons brought to trial. It is true that a grand jury eliminates many cases before a trial is held. But it is also true that many cases go to trial that would not have if the accused had been given an opportunity to defend himself before the grand jury.

"Seventh, a current defect in the present grand jury system is the inability to amend an indictment."

The following information comes from an article entitled Should the Grand Jury System be Abolished?, George Lawyer, 15 Yale Law Journal 178 (1905), at pages 180–181.

"The first, and probably the paramount objection (to grand juries) lies in the fact the free man may be held to answer for a felony, as a suspect, in secret proceedings. He may never know he is under suspicion until apprehended as a criminal after indictment. The evidence on which the indictment is based is presented to the jurors without notice to the party against whom the accusation is made. The ex parte statements of witnesses, who may be influenced by malice and revenge, are sufficient to brand the most innocent citizen with the foulest crime. And the accused is unheard!"

[Page 182] "A further serious objection (to grand juries) is that the inquisition is frequently made the instrument of extortion. It is quite immaterial whether the suspected person be guilty or innocent. If innocent, his fears are worked upon. He dreads the permanent disgrace of a charge, however unfounded it may be. It means, at least, a blight to his own hopes and the humiliation of his family. . . . If the party be guilty, there is still a deeper motive for compromise."

The following information comes from an article entitled Information or Indictment in Felony Cases, R. Justin Miller, 8 Minnesota Law Review, 379 (1924), at page 381.

"There is today nothing any more dignified or impressive about the indictment to justify its preferment than the historically less important information; and so far as effectiveness is concerned, men guilty of murder have been just as effectively hanged, following prosecution upon informations in appropriate jurisdictions, as has ever been true in jurisdictions where prosecutions for murder are possible only upon indictments. The indictment is a declaration by grand jury that a certain person has committed a crime, contrary to the law of the land. The information is exactly the same thing, except that the declaration is made by a duly authorized officer such as an attorney general or a district attorney. In the absence of any express constitutional limitation, a prosecution initiated by an information 'is due process of law and violates none of the constitutional rights of the accused.'"

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury Menace: The Unreasonable Rule of Secrecy, Arthur H. Sherry, 48 Virginia Law Review, 668 (1962), at page 684.

"An effective, useful and functioning grand jury system has demonstrated that its operations have not been impaired by requirement of compulsory disclosure of the evidence taken in support of an indictment. None of the dire forebodings of the defenders of grand jury secrecy have been borne out. In the light of this experience, and since it is self-evident that disclosure is far more compatible with a just, fair and equitable administration of justice than the policy of secrecy, it seems plain that there is no rational basis for the opinion that complete grand jury secrecy is indispensable. Liberal as some courts may be in permitting inspection of the minutes for the purpose of impeachment or in the case of 'particularized need,' the prevailing, traditional policy of secrecy is an anachronism that has long outlived any real necessity. Let the defendant have or make a copy of the transcript as a matter of right. Justice requires no less."

The following article is entitled Grand Jury: Sleeping Watchdog or Expensive Antique?, Louis Watts, Jr., 37 North Carolina Law Review 290 (1959), at page 295.

"The successful New York grand juries (of the 1930's) are taken from "blue-ribbon" panels which are carefully screened. It seems unlikely that the New York jurors selected in another manner would have been so consistently effective. The question has been raised whether an attempt to duplicate the "blue-ribbon" selection might not result in the same group of men being called with onerous frequency. [Page 296] A doubt has been voiced as to the effectiveness of "blue-ribbon" jurors as investigators in smaller communities where jurors would likely be friends or acquaintances of public officials whose administration might be subject to investigation."

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury Practice in the 1970's, David Foster, 32 Ohio State Law Journal, 701, (1971), at page 701.

"In addition, the witness must walk into the grand jury room alone facing, in the secrecy of those chambers, questions of prosecutor and grand juror without the protection afforded by counsel or by presence of the court. Without the help of his lawyer the witness may be led into discussions of privileged communications or into admissions which he would not have made if he had been refreshed on the basis of all the facts. He cannot object to questions that are leading, double-edged, or otherwise improper in form. Only parts of documents, or only one document of a series, may be shown to him. He cannot demand that he be allowed to explain or to controvert facts brought out before the grand jury. He may not be cross-examined to bring out full and complete facts.

"In these circumstances the average individual testifies under considerable mental stress. He may forget facts that under more favorable circumstances he would readily recall. Through suggestions of the prosecutor and grand jurors he "recalls" matters of which he actually has no knowledge. He gives incomplete answers. He may tend to tell the grand jurors what he believes they wish to hear. To relieve the pressures upon himself he may make irrelevant accusations about the conduct of third persons. . . ."

[Page 702] "The grand jury remains a blunt, crude instrument of brute power. Its unparalleled investigatorial powers are admittedly of vast importance to the government in anti-trust cases. But, it has lost the counterbalancing characteristics which made those powers tolerable—the protection of the innocent accused against unfounded accusation.

"To summarize, a grand jury has no necessary functions to perform in an anti-trust case since the case can proceed without it. Moreover, it has no logical function to perform since the layman's view of the propriety of conduct in question is not really of compelling concern to the Anti-trust Division. But the grand jury does have one improper function. It provides an opportunity for secret, backroom-type interrogation without counsel present which would seem to violate the policy which underlies Miranda v. Arizona."

The following information comes from the article entitled The California Grand Jury: Vestige of Aristocracy, Patricia Mar, 1 Pacific Law Journal 36 (1970), at page 37, Legislative Efforts at Reform.

"Assembly Bill 459 would have split the civil and criminal functions of the grand jury by establishing two grand juries for each county. One grand jury would be concerned with investigating governmental affairs in the county, while the other would consider and return criminal indictments."

At page 58, "The Need for Legislation. It is unlikely that a grand jury that is truly representative of all segments of the community will be selected unless the criminal indictment and criminal investigative functions of the grand jury are separated by creating two grand juries. As long as a grand jury indicts and also watches over the county governmental affairs, judges will continue to select grand jurors with an eye for the latter function."

At page 47. "Constitutional issues and grand jury selection.—The method by which California grand juries are selected is susceptible to challege as violating the constitutional right to equal protection and due process under the 14th Amendment. First, selection procedure raises the question of racial discrimination when it results in total exclusion or gross underrepresentation of minority groups. Second, and related to the first, is the question of whether California grand juries are discriminatory against not only minority group defendants, but all low-income persons because of an economic class discrimination in the selection procedure."

The following information comes from an article entitled The Initiation of Criminal Prosecutions by Indictment or Information, Raymond Moley, 29 Michigan Law Review 403 (1931), at page 404.

"Professors W. A. Mikell and E. R. Keedy in the preparation of the draft for the Code for the American Law Institute likewise reviewed the entire subject and came to conclusions similar to those of Dean Miller. These conclusions summarized are:

"(1) The use of the information provides a more expeditious procedure.

"(2) It is less expensive, not only in the saving of the cost of grand juries but in the lessened burden which is imposed upon the other agencies of law enforcement.

"(3) It makes possible a more efficient disposition of cases; not so many unsuccessful prosecutions are initiated. Less energy is required of judges, jurors, and prosecutors, and unnecessary duplication of effort is largely eliminated. Speed, economy, and efficiency were thus the claimed advantages derived from the use of the information."

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury: Bulwark of Prosecutorial Immunity?, Michael Williams, 3 Loyola of Chicago Law Journal 305 (1972), at pages 310–311.

"When looking at the question in terms of the protection of the accused from the abuses of the prosecutor, secrecy seems detrimental in that the secrecy rules may allow the prosecutor to act with impunity before the grand jury. The grand jury would not, therefore, be able to perform its function of 'standing between the accuser and the accused.' Affidavits and oral testimony of grand jurors are normally the only means available to a defendant to show that his indictment resulted from undue influence of the prosecutor over the grand jurors rather than from evidence presented. If the court refuses to admit such testimony, the grand jury may be a "skirt" behind which a malicious prosecutor can hide to prosecute unjustly an accused."

The following information comes from an article entitled Comment, Evaluating the Grand Jury's Role in a Dual System of Prosecution: An Iowa Case Study, 57 Iowa Law Review 1354 (1972), at page 1358.

"The grand jury represents unnecessary lay interference in law enforcement."

[At page 1364.] "The survey indicates that few Iowa grand juries independently perform the special investigative duties assigned to them by statute. In two-thirds of the counties surveyed, the grand juries have not initiated such an inquiry in the last five years. Even in those counties where the survey revealed that grand juries have initiated some investigations, most investigations are initiated by county attorneys. Thus, although grand jury investigations of the statutorily enumerated circumstances have occurred in a majority of the counties surveyed, county attorneys appear to have assumed the responsibility for initiating such grand jury investigations."

[At page 1365.] "One explanation for the grand jury's failure in initiating investigations is that the county attorneys are preempting any need for such action by fully assuming the responsibility for initiating needed investigations. An alternative explanation is that the grand juries are unresponsive to need for investigation because they are not accountable to the public for their acts or omissions. Both of the possible explanations for lack of initiative by Iowa grand juries constitute reasons for transferring the grand jury's duty to investigate in enumerated circumstances to the county attorney."

[At page 1366.] "A county attorney's decision not to prosecute a person who has been arrested or is the subject of a complaint does not bar a grand jury from investigating and indicting a person. In actual practice, no grand jury review of the discretionary decision by county attorneys to forego prosecutions is possible if grand juries do not know when the county attorney has made such decisions. The county attorney learns of the commission of crimes from law enforcement officials and complaining parties, then informs a grand jury in his county only if he decides to give them the information because he wants to prosecute by indictment."

The following information comes from an article entitled The Grand Jury: True Tribunal of the People or Administrative Agency of the Prosecutor?, James P. Shannon, 2 New Mexico Law Review 141 (1972).

"Recent critics of the grand jury have questioned whether it has been used to harass dissident groups and unfriendly witnesses who appear before it."

The following information comes from an article entitled The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment, Melvin P. Antell, 51 American Bar Association Journal 153 (1965), on page 154.

[On page 154 it is said] "It simply is not true that the grand jury system protects the individual from oppression; indeed, it has a far greater potentiality as an instrument of oppression."

"It is no less absurd to place these same well-intentioned people on a grand jury, charge them with the duty of enforcing hundreds of laws, almost none of which have they even heard of, protecting individual liberties, and keeping a watch on the general level of morality and efficiency of government. Yet, our present system requires precisely this.

"In short, the only person who has a clear idea of what is happening in the grand jury room is the public official whom these twenty-three novices are expected to check. So that even if a grand jury were disposed to assert its historic independence in the interest of an individual's liberty, it must, paradoxically, look to the very person whose misconduct they are supposed to guard against for guidance as to when he is acting oppressively.

[Page 155] "Often their restiveness finds expression when one of the number will say 'let's indict him anyway.' The insistence is upon action, on getting things done. If a man has behaved badly he should be punished—not just for violating the law, but for misbehaving. Personal standards of conduct supplant those established by the legislature and each grand juror looks for a way to suppress what is unacceptable to him.

"The other area in which grand juries function has to do with maintaining vigil over the conduct of public officials.

"It is really unthinkable that there could be a productive grand jury investigation that has not been preceded by a prolonged period of study and preparation by a prosecutor's office. The so-called grand jury "investigation," therefore, is really nothing more than a review of the prosecutor's predigested evidence and a ratification of his conclusions. Thus viewed, the presentment power is only a device whereby a prosecutor may popularize his own law enforcement philosophies and direct attention to the inadequacies of other government officials.

In answer to the article written by Antell, Cornelius W. Wickersham wrote an article in 51 American Bar Association Journal, on page 1157, (1965), entitled The Grand Jury: Weapon Against Crime and Corruption. This article is more or less in rebuttal to the article by Mr. Antell. The article by Wickersham is possibly of some use. As it is somewhat lengthy, it has been xeroxed and is contained within the file given to you with "Grand Jury" written across the front of it.

The reason the Wickersham article was xeroxed is because it is an article in rebuttal to another article and it does make some good points in relation to the articles or arguments against the grand jury.

The information following is from an article entitled Defendant's Right to An Unbiased Federal Grand Jury, Joseph W. Bartlett, 47 B. U. Law Review 551 (1967), at page 552.

"Objections to grand jury practice frequently point with alarm to the power of the grand jurors to consider matters which could not be introduced in a trial before a petit jury and to consult in an overly intimate fashion with the prosecution."

[At page 555] "Moreover, even if one should be able to assert successfully bias and prejudice under Rule 6, [Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure] it appears the accused must show that, of the normal complement of twenty-three grand jurors, a sufficient number were infected with bias so that there did not remain twelve unbiased grand jurors concurring in the indictment. It has been suggested that if bias is shown on the part of one or more jurors they have the capacity to infect the entire panel, but several courts have read Rule 6 as imposing this apparently crushing burden on the movant.

"In short, little comfort can be found in the Federal Rules or complimentary statutory authority for the notion that grand jury bias is a viable basis for quashing a federal indictment."

The following information is from an article in 10 Oregon Law Review, page 101, entitled A Survey of the Grand Jury System by Wayne L. Morse, dated 1931.

Page 101 states that "Accusations that the grand jury is merely a rubber stamp for the district attorney, the use of which enables him to escape his responsibilities and to cover up his inefficiencies, are frequently made. Some attack the grand jury as being a relic of medievalism, cumbersome, slow, inefficient, and costly. An institution that has outgrown its usefulness."

"On the other hand, the defenders of the grand jury proclaim it to be one of the bulwarks of our liberties, a protector of the innocent, a training school for citizenship, the people's weapon for preventing abusive practices by public officials."

"For the most part, however, the debate has hinged upon subjective value judgments. Such esoteric conclusions are of little assistance in any program of reform which aims to place the administration of criminal justice on a more scientific basis." [Morse's statistical study involves the study of 7,414 grand jury cases involving 21 states in an attempt to reveal that the grand jury isn't necessary and is merely a rubber stamp. Also, in part 2 of his article, he relies upon the information obtained from 545 judges in response to questions posed by him.] On page 154, he says: "The advocates of the indictment method sometimes argue that the grand jury system protects innocent persons from suffering the publicity of a public trial. But the statistics set forth in his report show that there is little difference between the opinions of the prosecutors and grand juries as to what should be done with the cases. It would, therefore, seem to follow that they agree as to who are innocent persons. Thus, if the honesty and integrity of our prosecutors in performing their public duties can be relied upon, it would seem to follow from these statistics that innocent persons would be as well protected under the information method as under the indictment method."

In "Part 2, Continued," the third section of his article, which begins on page 295, Wayne L. Morse states, on pages 344–45, "The advantages accredited to the information system can be classified for the most part under four points: efficiency, speed, economy, and the fixing of responsibility." On page 353, Morse continues, "Many judges—especially those in indictment states—fear that it is dangerous to give one man, the prosecutor, practically complete power in the initiating of criminal prosecutions. Probably these judges are influenced by the historical traditions behind the grand jury system. Undoubtedly, in the times when the masses suffered from the tyrannies off an absolute monarchy, [continuing on page 354] the accusing jury was truly a bulwark of liberty and a protection for the innocent. But today, under representative government, the argument that the people have much to fear from the information system, because it gives the prosecutor too much power, no longer holds good, and is highly tinged with emotional connotations."

On page 356, Morse states: "The need of coordination in the criminal law machinery is imperative. The devices which can be used to escape responsibility need to be carefully scrutinized. The grand jury is such a device; it is not a continuing body, it is subject to comparatively little control, and a weak or corrupt prosecutor can always make use of it as an aid in helping him shirk and shift his responsibilities. But under the dual system, where the grand jury is seldom used, the prosecutor must stand or fall upon his record and he cannot use the grand jury as a scapegoat.

The following information comes from an article entitled Comment, Legality of the Grand Jury Report, 52 Michigan Law Review 711 (1954), at page 713. The article mentioned several instances in which grand juries would not indict someone, but who would, nevertheless, in a report state malicious things about certain peoples or groups.

". . . in none of these instances was a group or an individual charged with an offense against the criminal law of state or nation, nor was the report intended to serve as the basis for such a charge. While it is indisputably the function of the grand jury to present and to indict for violations of the law of its jurisdiction, serious question may be raised about grand jury reports which go beyond this in censuring individuals and groups for conduct which, however blameworthy, cannot for one reason or another be made the basis of criminal sanction. The legality of reports of this nature has been commonly tested in two ways: (1) by a motion to expunge from the records of the court such portions of the report as are alleged to be both defamatory and outside the province of the grand jury, and (2) by an action for libel against one or more of the grand jurors themselves."

The following information comes from an article entitled Note, American Grand Jury: Investigatory and Indictment Powers, 22 Cleveland State Law Review 136 (1973). The information herein is on page 155.

"Specifically, this examination of the grand jury system demonstrates that: (1) grand juries do not act independently of the prosecutor; (2) prosecutors initiate cases of at least the same or better merit than those commenced by grand juries themselves; (3) the quality of cases presented by the prosecutor would not decrease if the indictment were abolished; (4) the facets of due process present in a purely judicial proceeding which guard and protect the rights of the accused are absent from grand jury proceedings; and (5) the speedy administration of criminal justice as guaranteed by the Constitution is delayed by prosecution via the indictment.

"It is concluded and recommended, therefore, that the grand jury indictment be abolished in all cases, both federal and state, and replaced by a uniform preliminary hearing followed by the prosecutor's information.

"While it is recommended that the indictment be abolished, it is not suggested that the grand jury itself be dissolved. It has been outlined that the American tri-partite form of government requires the existence of a quasi-judicial investigatory body. The grand jury serves this purpose. Additionally, should the indictment be abolished, the investigatory powers off the grand jury should be retained . . . ."

The following information comes from an article entitled The Federal Grand Jury, by Leonard B. Boudin, 61 Georgetown Law Review (1972), page 1. The general premise of the article is that: "The grand jury can play a significant role through vital protection from governmental oppression and lawlessness but not without major reform in its current use, because the traditional role of the grand jury as the arbiter of government prosecution has been eroded by recent government practice and Supreme Court decisions to a status as merely another weapon in the government's fact-finding arsenal. On page 35, in his conclusion he states:

"Present grand jury policies no longer serve a useful purpose. Denying a witness or de facto defendant counsel before the grand jury, preventing pre-trial disclosure of grand jury minutes to the defendant, and refusing to quash an indictment based on incompetent or illegal evidence, are all holdovers from a time when the grand jury was or was believed to be the people's shield against governmental tyranny. But the grand jury has changed radically in function. It is no longer a group of peers sitting to protect citizens; instead, it is an arm of the state, more powerful than ever before, serving the ends of the prosecution. The only result of the present policy is to deprive defendants of the full exercise of their rights, and to force them to undergo what may be needless, expensive, embarrassing, and hazardous trials.

"The greatest hope for reform lies in strong remedial legislation aimed at eliminating the various abuses detailed above, for courts tend to cling steadfastly to precedents. Statutory rights should be created to provide for counsel before the grand juries; to provide for full disclosure of the minutes of grand jury proceedings after the proceedings are concluded and prior to trial; to provide that grand jury inquiry end upon securing an indictment, so that the grand jury cannot be used by the prosecutor as an evidence-gathering tool; and to require that no indictment be returned except upon legal and admissible evidence, with the provision that one not so based shall be quashed. This legislative reform might well re-establish the grand jury as the guardian of individual rights. With less secrecy and more accountability to the public, the grand jury could better fulfill its responsibility of making an initial determination of probable cause and become a fairer stage in our criminal justice system."

The following information comes from The American Criminal Law Review, Volume 10, at page 671, from an article, (a symposium) entitled The Grand Jury, written in 1972. The symposium consists of five parts by a number of authors; any information to come will be from the article entitled Demythologizing the Historic Role of the Grand Jury, at page 701, by Helene E. Schwartz. The purpose of her article is merely to raise the level of awareness of the existence of pressure, abuses, and manipulation by determined partisans upon the grand jury as a vulnerable institution. Mainly in her final section she cataloged some of the ways in which the grand jury, as the shield against political persecutions, can and has been circumvented and suggests how historic abuses are being used today. Included in her catalog of abuses are the following:

"(1) The political persuasion of the Judge.—The ways in which a judge may influence a grand jury are so varied that the mere fact of his partisanship, even when covert, may affect the outcome of its deliberations. The judge's bias may extend to a particular political party. The most overt manifestation of a judge's political feelings is often his charge to the grand jury." [That information was contained on page 750.] Interestingly enough, on pages 752 through 755 she talks about Judge William Campbell, Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, who is the author of the abolition of the grand jury article, and his methods of conveying his political beliefs or his beliefs as to how a case should be handled to the grand jurors. She gives an example of a case where in spite of the opposition of the Attorney General, Campbell was determined to see the demonstrators indicted. (2) Number two in her catalog of abuses is the Intimidation of Grand Jurors. She says that: "Unfortunately, however, intimidation of grand jurors has not ceased in America; it has merely become more subtle. A judge, for example, may interfere with the right of a grand jury independently to determine whether or not to indict by refusing to discharge the grand jury. A judge may also thwart a grand jury's determination to indict by prematurely discharging it." [That information was contained on pages 755 through 756.] On pages 758 and 759, she also discusses that the grand jury can be manipulated through the machinations of a prosecutor. (3) Number three in her catalog of abuses is Packed Panels. "The parallel today to this practice is that most grand jurors are white, middle-class men, conservative in outlook and with little concern for protecting the rights of their fellow citizens." [That information is on page 759.]

(4) Number four under catalog of abuses is Multiple Grand Juries. ". . . legal advisors ultimately achieved victory by changing venue and presenting the same facts to a second grand jury." [Page 761] (5) Number five, the Use of Misdemeanor Charges is stated in pages 763 and 764. (6) Number six [page 764] Another abuse which negates the function of the grand jury to protect the accused is a change of venue. (7) Number 7 [page 765] is Insufficient Evidence to Try. The likely conclusion is that the government is using the hovering threat of indictment and possible trial as a means to silence agitation against a particular law or policy. Pages 766 and 767 deal with improper presentments by the grand jury; she seems to feel that the unsolicited comments of the grand jury which accompany the indictment are often unnecessary and libelous, for which there is no protection afforded the accused. And, in conclusion, on page 769, she states:

"As this study has shown, the grand jury has exhibited a lamentable willingness to return indictments in the political cases arising out of these controversies, and to allow itself to become a tool for personal vengeance, as in the case of Aaron Burr. This is not to say that there have never been times when the grand jury successfully acted as a buffer to prevent persecutions, but merely that it is unreliable and overly vulnerable to both overt and subtle manipulation by determined partisans."

[On page 770] "Abolition of the grand jury is not the answer. Even the most conservative among us recognize that 'the myth that "ours is a government of law, not men" is infinitely cherished, and it is infinitely hollow.' Constitutional provisions are therefore subject to evolution by interpretations which change as swiftly as does membership on the bench of the Supreme Court. Facing the likelihood of narrowed protections at the secondary (trial) level, it would be foolish indeed to abandon the primary barrier between the accused and the accuser, the grand jury. In this age of conflict, it is infinitely more important that the traditional shield be reenforced; that it not continue to degenerate into a mere shibboleth, lauded as a protection when in reality it is not."

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury Secrecy, Richard Calkins, 63 Michigan Law Review 455 (1965), at page 461.

"First, the rule of secrecy concerning matters transpiring in the grand jury room is designed primarily as an aid and protection to the grand jury not the witnesses appearing before it. A witness is not a confidential informant; he must consider his testimony subject to all the obligations of oath required in any judicial proceeding. In revealing damaging evidence before the grand jury, the witness must expect that such evidence will be disclosed at trial. Therefore, any hesitancy that a witness might have in divulging harmful evidence before the grand jury ordinarily would be based upon a fear of the eventual necessity of giving that same evidence in open court rather than the fear that, having once given such harmful evidence, his grand jury testimony might be divulged. Disclosure of the prior testimony will not unduly discourage free statements by witnesses before the grand jury.

"Second, that disclosure of a witness's grand jury testimony cannot cause any fear of retaliation or embarrassment that is not already created by the testimony given in open court. Normally such disclosure will only affirm that the same damaging evidence was given before the grand jury.

"Third, a policy of continued secrecy concerning grand jury testimony will have little deterrent effect on the defendant who seeks to tamper with or suborn witnesses at his trial. If an unscrupulous party wishes to tamper with a witness's testimony, he will do so regardless of whether the minutes are made available to him.

"A person, assured that his grand jury testimony will remain forever inviolate, could testify to one thing before the grand jury and to something entirely different before the petit jury. And, unless the subsequent testimony ran counter to that which the prosecution wished to obtain, there would be no way for the defendant to submit the contradiction to the jury."

V.—Articles in Support of Grand Juries

The following information is from an article entitled The Grand Jury Under Attack, by Richard D. Younger, Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science, Volume 46 (1955). In Part I, on page 26, speaking in regard to a talk given by Justice James Wilson, it is said:

"Wilson stated that he saw in the grand jury more than a body set up merely to seek out law violators. He viewed it as an important instrument of democratic government, 'a great channel of communication between those who make and administer the laws and those for whom the laws are made and administered.' Elaborating upon his statement, Justice Wilson pointed out that all the operations of government and all its officers came within the view of grand juries, giving them an unrivaled ability to suggest public improvements and expose corruption in government."

[In Part II of Younger's article, on page 41, the following information is contained] "As early as 1872 the Wisconsin Supreme Court decided that the Fourteenth Amendment did not prevent states from ceasing to use the indictment, but the question remained a point of controversy [continued on page 42] until the United States Supreme Court settled it in 1884. The test case arose in California when Joseph A. Hurtado challenged his murder conviction on the ground that he had come to trial on an information rather than a grand jury indictment. The high court gave the judicial green light to states which desired to get rid of the grand inquest. Citing the Wisconsin decision with approval, the justices announced that "due process of law" included any system of prosecution which preserved liberty and justice and was not limited to indictment by a grand jury. Justice John M. Harlan's vigorous dissent stated the case for those who believed that indictment by a jury of his neighbors was the right of every American citizen."

[The citations to the Wisconsin and U.S. cases are as follows: Rowan v. State, 30 Wisconsin 129 (1872) and Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884). Harlan's dissent contained therein may be of interest!]

abuses, Judge Yerkes observed, 'The divided yet powerful and also combined responsibility of the secret session of the grand jury . . . has worked out great problems of reform and correction.' He pointed out that abolition of the grand inquest would leave the accused citizen completely at the mercy of 'an unjust or unwise judge or district attorney,' or subject to contrivances of an unscrupulous prosecutor. Judge Yerkes dispelled the often repeated idea that because the United States was not ruled by a tyrannical king, grand juries had ceased to be necessary as guardians of individual liberty. He explained that tyrants even more irresponsible than the despots of old sought to dominate local, state and national governments. Giant business monopolies restless of legal restraints and party bosses who did not hesitate to break judges and create courts took the place of tyrannical monarchs as a danger to freedom in the United States. Against such ruthless forces Judge Yerkes saw grand juries as powerful agencies of the people, challenging businesses or boss domination of government. At a time when many legal scholars advised abandoning the grand inquest as an archaic relic of the past, the Pennsylvania judge saw what they had failed to see, that there were enemies of freedom in America which demanded the watchful eye of the grand jury if the American people were to control their government."

[Continuing on page 49] "Publisher George Haven Putnam recognized that inquests could be slow and unwieldy bodies which frequently tried the patience of judges and prosecutors, but he did not believe it was fair to judge the institution solely on that basis. Democracy did not necesarily mean efficiency. It meant a careful concern for the rights of persons who had been arrested as well as the ability of citizens to initiate investigations of abuses in government and make officials responsible to them. After serving on grand juries in New York City over a period of thirty-five years. Putnam became convinced that no other institution provided such a degree of popular participation in government. He recognized that during their term of office the jurors acted as the representatives of the people of the county and in that capacity could call before them all public officials, high or low. When such bodies ceased to sit, the cause of popular government had suffered a severe blow."

[The following information is from Part III of Younger's article, on pages 224–225.] "Today, the most important aspects of the grand jury are its democratic control and its local character. Governmental power has to a large extent replaced all other threats to democracy in the United States. The increasing centralization of government authority and the growth of a huge bureaucracy in no way responsible to the people, has made it vitally necessary to preserve the grand jury. It often serves as the citizens' only means of checking on political appointees or preventing illegal compulsion at the hands of zealous law enforcement officials. At a time when centralization of power in Washington has narrowed the area of democratic control, grand juries give the people an opportunity to participate in government and make their wishes known. In 1951, the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee warned Americans not to rely upon the central government to control racketeering and organized crime in the United States. The committee advised the people to use their local grand juries to attack conditions in their own communities. Citizen panels have demonstrated repeatedly in the past that they could protest effectively in the name of the people against centralized authority. Today, grand juries remain potentially the strongest weapon against big government and the threat of 'statism.'"

The following information is from an article entitled Note, The Grand Jury—Its Investigatory Powers and Limitations, 37 Minnesota Law Review 586 (1953), on pages 606 and 607.

"Since the grand jury is an institution born and nurtured in common law, it lacks in many ways the tools necessary for investigations in a modern society. Nevertheless, the grand jury is better endowed than the other investigative organs of government which are in some manner more limited in inquisitorial power than the grand jury. For instance, the public prosecutor may inquire into criminal matters but is in most jurisdictions without the aid of subpoena and contempt powers. A magistrate on the other hand has subpoena power but his investigations are limited generally by a specific charge and necessity of probable cause that a definite crime was committed by a designated person. Legislative committee investigations are at least formally limited by the requirement that they be made as a basis for future legislative action, whereas special administrative investigation board and commissions are generally confined to inquiries regarding specific irregularities."

[Continuing on page 607] "Further, all these investigatory bodies are more susceptible than the grand jury to obstructionist tactics such as perjured or evasive testimony and attacks on jurisdiction and scope of inquiry. Some states, realizing that the common law type of grand jury cannot continue to meet the competition of other investigatory agencies, have made rapid progress in providing the grand jury with the powers it needs in order to carry on modern day investigations. The grand jury has been permitted to use stenographers, utilize fully the office of the district attorney, initiate investigations on its own motion, and consider hearsay evidence. But there is room for improvement such as permitting the grand jury to employ its own counsel, accountants and detectives. Even if it should be considered that an extension of the present grand jury power is undesirable, a complete and thorough codification of these powers is needed and would be welcomed in most jurisdictions."

In an article entitled Analysis of Criticism of the Grand Jury, by Jerome Hall, Volume 22, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology (1931-32), on page 692, the author, in criticizing the method of statistical formulation used by Professor Raymond Moley in his study of criminal prosecutions, makes some good rebuttal arguments to the statistics used by Moley which were also used as a part of the smaller study conducted by Mr. Morse. So for purposes of statistical rebuttal the Hall article can be useful for that purpose.

Further, on page 694, in Footnote 5, Mr. Hall criticizes the statistical method therein used by Morse as creating arbitrary classifications and on page 694 states:

"Yet, because of the technique employed one gets the impression that the bringing of a criminal action is a particular, methodical, clock-like operation; it ignores complexity of factors, psychological, economic, and political, that condition all prosecutions."

The following information comes from an article entitled Grand Jury Proceedings: The Prosecutor, the Trial Judge, and Undue Influence, comment by Roger T. Brice, in 39 University of Chicago Law Review (1972), page 762.

"Because the grand jury is generally thought to be a safeguard against unwarranted criminal charges, grand jury indictment has a more serious impact on the accused than does accusation by information. While a state's prosecutor acting alone may be suspected of political or personal motives, the public generally gives greater credence to the pronouncements of the grand jury, whose members are drawn from—and presumably represent—the community. Whatever the final outcome of his case may be, indictment can cause the accused loss of employment, lessening of community respect, and an expensive, time-consuming legal battle."

[Page 764] "But grand jurors today lack the intimate knowledge of community activity possessed by grand jurors of pre-urban society. They also lack the investigative tools now necessary to find evidence of crime. Allowing professional investigative agencies to gather relevant facts and present them to the grand jury through the prosecutor has increased efficiency in investigation and decision making periods. At the same time, however, it has made the modern grand jury a generally more passive instrument than its precursors. Grand juries now conduct their investigations almost exclusively within the confines of the grand jury room, rely almost entirely on the prosecutor to determine the subject matter and general direction of the investigation, and seldom issue documents unrelated to some specific criminal activity or malfeasance in office.

. The relative decline in importance of the grand jury as an independent investigative body underscores the continued importance of its remaining function: determining probable cause. The grand jury's independent judgment of probable cause serves as a basic check on prosecutorial discretion. Although there are agencies better able to detect crimes and to accuse individuals of having committed them, the grand jury is the only institution that can shield one wrongfully accused from the power of the state to bring individuals to trial."

[Page 767] "The powers of the grand jurors counterbalance and compliment those of the prosecutor. Grand jurors may extent or broaden the scope of the investigation, call for the production of witnesses and documents, question witnesses, and request legal advice from both the prosecutor and the judge. The power of the grand jury relative to that of the prosecutor is augmented by forbidding the prosecutor to comment on the weight or sufficiency of the evidence and by barring him from the grand jury room during the actual deliberations in voting."

[Page 769] "If the prosecutor has engaged in behavior that is likely to have had such a strong effect on the grand jurors that they would have been unable to make an independent judgment, any indictment or report returned by the grand jury will be quashed or expunged regardless of whether the defendant can prove that the prosecutor's behavior did, in fact, result [continuing on page 770] in prejudice. Although these prohibitions do not affect the influence inherent in a well-prepared case, they free the grand jury from overt prosecutorial pressure to indict. If the defense attorney [continuing on page 771] does manage to discover specific acts of prosecutorial behavior that are proscribed by the undue influence doctrine, he may nevertheless be faced with substantial difficulty in proving his contention."

[Page 781] "The grand jury exists to protect individual citizens from oppression by the state. The major danger inherent in the system is that it may easily be converted into a tool of prosecutorial oppression if the prosecutor and the trial judge do not conform their behavior to the standards of procedural fairness evolved by the appellate courts. Although these standards seem adequate to control prosecutorial behavior, several jurisdictions have severely reduced their effectiveness by excluding evidence of prosecutorial misbehavior and by refusing to extend the protections of the undue influence doctrines to the prosecutors' public statements."

[Page 782] "To protect the major remaining function of the modern grand jury—making an independent determination of probable cause for bringing suspects to trial—the grand jurors must be shielded from overbearing influence by the prosecutor. The undue influence doctrine requires that indictments be quashed when the prosecutor behaves in a manner that is presumed to influence the grand jurors' evaluation of the facts. This doctrine is well adapted to protect the independence of the grand jury's investigation from the prosecutor. Two changes in the courts' application of the doctrine are necessary, however, to make it truly effective. First, the grand jurors should be allowed to testify to acts of the prosecutor that may constitute undue influence. And second, the doctrine should be extended to the prosecutor's public statements, which may undermine grand jury independence to the same extent as direct statements to the grand jurors."

The following is from an article entitled A Layman Looks at the Grand Jury, by Robert H. Rawson, 4 Western Reserve Law Review 19 (1952). On page 22, the author states:

"If the present grand jury system is to be effective as a means of citizen participation in the administration of criminal justice, however, certain improvements should be seriously considered. The charge that the grand jury, in its function of holding hearings in felony cases, tends to be a mere rubber stamp for the prosecutor would be deprived of some of its force if independent counsel were readily available to the jury. At present, the prosecutor is the sole legal advisor of the grand jury. Only in certain extraordinary circumstances can the jury secure the services of counsel other than the prosecutor. In its report our grand jury recommended that independent counsel be readily available. The mere availability of such counsel would be an incentive to the prosecutor's office to function so effectively as to make it unnecessary to call upon independent counsel. The prosecutor should welcome the opportunity to secure independent corroboration for a legal ruling which he may have given the grand jury but upon which the jury might want an independent opinion. The theoretical independence of the grand jury would become more real if it could turn to someone other than the prosecutor for legal advice."

[Pages 26 and 27] "One of the objectives of the secrecy statutes is to protect witnesses. Yet the list of witnesses subpoenaed is apparently available to newspaper reporters. They know in advance who is to appear before the grand jury and frequently publicize the fact. Under such circumstances the witnesses have little protection."

It is generally agreed, however, that the grand jury has not been able to exercise effectively this power of investigation. If the grand jury, therefore, is not to sink into "innocuous desuetude," vigorous steps must be taken to strengthen it. One of the most effective steps would be to free the grand jury from what seems to the layman to be an excessive dependence on the prosecutor."

[Page 31] "Some of the means of strengthening it suggested in this article, it is believed, would require changes in the law. These include providing for independent counsel, making funds available to the jury, changing the quorum in voting requirements, and, if not existing under present law, specifically giving the jury authority to conduct broad investigations and to submit written reports of its work. Other of the proposals for strengthening the jury require no legislation. These include tightening the enforcement of the secrecy statute, placing before the foreman the statements used as a basis for questioning witnesses, clarifying for the jury the weight of the evidence necessary for an indictment, improving the indoctrination of the jurors, and topping the practice of turning over to the prosecutor the voting records of the jurors. These objectives can be attained by cooperative action by the court, the prosecutor, and the grand jury."

From an article entitled Note, Powers of Federal Grand Juries, 4 Stanford Law Review 68 (1951); the author on page 70 states:

"It is said that in practice the United States attorney manages the proceedings of the grand jury. He selects, and in large part questions, the witnesses who appear before the grand jury. He determines what matters shall be considered, and the order of their presentation. Only rarely will a grand jury consider matters other than those presented by the United State attorney.

"The grand jury relies on the guidance of a United State attorney because of practical and legal limitations on the investigative abilities of a body of private citizens. In early days, the citizens who composed a grand jury could directly investigate community conditions, and make accusations based on their own knowledge. But modern crime is more complex. Expert assistance—counsel, investigators, accountants—is necessary to effective investigation. No existing statute or case authority allows a grand jury to seek assistance on its own. It is expected to rely upon the United States attorney's office, which can supply the investigative aid. Money is a restraining factor. The grand jury budget characteristically covers only fees of jurors and witnesses. This discourages any direct hiring of counsel and investigators. In addition, time is needed. Jurors are ordinary citizens, unskilled in criminal investigation, who devote only a limited part of their time to jury duties. These are powerful practical factors compelling reliance on the United States attorney's office."

In the case of In Re Presentment of Special Grand Jury Impaneled January 1969, 315 F. Supp. 662 (D.C. Md., 1970), on page 675 it said:

"The common law powers of a grand jury clearly include the power to make presentments, sometimes called reports, calling attention to certain actions of public officials, whether or not they amounted to a crime. The reasons for allowing such presentments or reports were eloquently stated by Chief Justice Vanderbilt, In Re Presentment by Camden Grand Jury, 10 N.J. 23, 89A. 2d 416, 443-444 (1952), as follows: "We are not unaware of a respectable body of authority in other jurisdictions that frowns on the exercise by the grant jury of its common-law right to make presentments of matters of public concern unaccompanied by indictments. In some of these jurisdictions the powers of the grand jury are governed by statute and the problem there is solely one of statutory construction, but such is not the case here. The practice imported here from England three centuries ago as part of the common law and steadily exercised ever since under three successive State Constitutions is too firmly entrenched in our jurisprudence to yield to fancied evils. If presentments of matters of public concern were found necessary in the public interest in the relatively simple conditions of English and colonial life three centuries ago, how much more essential are they in these days when government at all levels has taken on a complexity of organization and of operation that defies the best intentions of the citizen to know and understand it. What is not known and understood is likely to be distrusted. What cannot be investigated in a republic is likely to be feared. The maintenance of popular confidence in government requires that there be some body of laymen which may investigate any instances of public wrong doing. . . .

" 'Thus grand jury presentments of public affairs serve a need that is not met by any other procedure. The grand jury provides a readily available group of representative citizens of the county empowered, as occasion may demand, to voice the conscience of the community. There are many official acts and omissions that fall short of criminal misconduct and yet are not in the public interest. It is very much to the public advantage that such conduct be revealed in an effective, official way. No community desires to live a hairbreadth above the criminal level, which might well be the case if there were no official organ of public protest. Such presentments are a deterrent to official wrongdoing. By exposing wrongdoing, moreover, such presentments inspire public confidence in the capacity of the body politic to purge itself of untoward conditions.' "

In the case of the United States v. American Medical Association, 26 F. Supp. 429 (D. D.C., 1939); 28 F. Supp. 752 (D.C. D.C., 1939); 10 F. 2d 703 (D.C. Cir., 1940); 130 F. 2d 233 (D.C. Cir., 1942), cert. denied, 308 U.S. 599, 84 L. E. 502, 60 S. Ct. 131; cert. denied, 310 U.S. 644, 84 L. E. 1411, 60 S. Ct. 1096; 317 U.S. 519, 87 L. E. 434, 63 S. Ct. 326 (1943), on page 430 it is said:

"Considerations of public policy demand a lasting secrecy. Jurors are thereby inspired with assurance of security in discharging their important duties and restrained from impeaching their findings. Witnesses are encouraged to truth and frankness. Innocent citizens are protected against the stigma of complaints which upon investigation fail of presentment or indictment. Then, too, many courts have stressed as another reason for secrecy that it prevents an accused from securing testimony that the government expects to use against him at the trial."

The following information comes from an article entitled The Propriety of the Grand Jury Report, by J. Hadley Edgar, Jr., 34 Texas Law Review 746 (1956), at page 754.

"The three reasons for requiring this secrecy are: (1) To allow the grand jurors to perform their duties in confidence and without fear of retaliation by the accused or another interested party. (2) To obtain maximum disclosure by witnesses who would otherwise be reluctant to testify. But, so long as only the conclusion of the grand jury, rather than the witnesses names or their testimony, is published in the report, attainment of this objective is unimpaired. (3) To protect those who are under investigation from irreparable damage if no indictment is found. Absolute protection would prohibit all methods of communication by the grand jury."

The following information is from an article entitled From Indictment to Information—Implications of the Shift, by George H. Dession, 42 Yale Law Journal 163 (1932). On page 164 it is said:

"His successor in office, George Z. Meddalie, added with particular reference to federal grand juries: '. . . in many sections of the country Washington is regarded more or less as a distant agency. Unless the people through their own representatives are able to voice the local sentiment concerning the law, and the local sense of justice, they will feel decidely insecure, and the Grand Jury is the particular body that breathes the spirit of the community.' "

[That quote came from the article by George Mendalie, entitled Grand Jury's Value—Presentments—Fraudulent Bankrupts, 1931 in No. 9, The Panel, No. 2, at page 16.]

[The following information is on page 165 of the Yale article.] "However, accumulations of data on those points which did lend themselves to the method—i.e., speed, economy of operation, efficiency and rubberstamping, even in the artificial sense in which these had to be defined in response to the exigencies of the data—are apt to be quite disproportionately influential. Here, as elsewhere, the imponderable encountering the ponderable is likely to be honored chiefly in gesture. In the whirl of discussion eddies coming to being, sweeping together those tangible, measurable particles of data into masses which catch the focus of attention, relegating the incoherent intangibles to the out-of-focus. It is the familiar process by which, under compulsion of a feeling that the mind must be made up regardless, a problem susceptible of varied pose is transformed into a set of conventional issues which can be answered on the data at hand. Attention on both sides to date has, moreover, been concentrated on the alleged shortcomings of grand juries."

[The above statement was given in reference to the statistical study done by Moley in the article entitled The Initiation of Criminal Prosecutions by Indictment or Information, 29 Michigan Law Review 403, pages 410 through 412, specifically, and written in 1931. That's the end of the information from the Yale Law Journal article.]

Judge SESSIONS. Since the time of submission of my testimony in August 1977, of course the House of Delegates has met at the ABA meeting in Chicago, and, of course, the chairman has noted their action in connection with their own recommendations.

Additionally, my brother, the Honorable Judge Frankel, has written his book, along with his illustrious colleague. That book was only recently available to me. I have read it, and with great interest—as has the chairman, I'm sure.

Additionally, of course, there has been a good deal of notoriety attached with H.R. 94, and I would say this only as a characterization of my remarks here today. I respect the efforts of this committee to do what it feels compelled to do concerning the reform of grand jury procedures. My fondest hope in your struggle is that in doing so you will not impair the absolutely essential investigative ability of the grand jury. I, along with Congressman Sawyer, join in noting that there are abuses and there will be abuses in all halls of Government, but the abuse does not dictate that you impair or emasculate any given branch of power, and particularly the grand jury in it's investigative stance, Mr. Chairman. That, to me, would be critical.

I do not presume to have great expertise, but I do have strong feelings about the correctness and the rightness of what our forefathers did in insuring the availability of grand jury indictment. You know, and I know, that it is not necessary for a Federal prosecutor to proceed by indictment unless it is insisted upon—or waived or not waived—by a defendant. So, we have discussed briefly this morning with Mr. Babbitt the right of preliminary examination. Of course, if a charge is brought and the defendant is charged and requests, he has an absolute right to a preliminary hearing within ten days of his being charged unless the matter is presented to a grand jury.

And, as Congressman Sawyer notes, for the most part that's the way matters are handled unless the matter proceeds to the grand jury.

So, many of these things that are routine and handled by a U.S. attorney in a routine fashion, obviously, need not be presented to a grand jury. But it is in its stance as an investigative body that I believe the subcommittee is thoughtful and very careful in proceedings so as not to impair those rights and those obligations.

I came simply to respond to the committee, any questions that it might have, and I am here for that purpose and I'll do my best to respond to any questions that you might have.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Judge Sessions. You've obviously done a lot of work on this matter and the subcommittee is indebted to you. In fact, Congress is indebted to you.

Judge SESSIONS. Thank you, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. In your statement, I'm advised, you say that you believe not that there have been, in fact, abuses of power and authority by individuals in relation to grand juries. However, you continue that these are not the result of weaknesses in the system or law.

Could you describe to us what kind of cases you received involving grand jury abuses?

Could you, also, describe what action, if any, you and other judges in your district have taken in your supervisory role over the grand jury to lessen abuses?

Judge SESSIONS. All right. In the first question, those cases where I have, in fact, received notice of abuse, I have received none at all. Now, you know that I am formerly a U.S. attorney, and you know that I am formerly with the Department of Justice, and I have heard, infrequently, of occasions where procedures were recommended in connection with Drug Enforcement Administration cases—that the Department recommended the bringing of targets before grand juries for harrassment purposes. It was not termed harrassment, but it, essentially, was that. I have never seen it, I have never heard of it actually being done.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge, may I interrupt?

I don't know the exact line before me, but counsel advises me that you state that, in fact, there have been abuses of authority—you refer to the fact that there have been, in fact, abuses of power and authority.

Judge SESSIONS. Oh, I simply accept that there must have been, but I know of none personally. I know of no cases that have been brought before the El Paso Division of the Western District of Texas and none before any judge in the Western District of Texas regarding grand jury abuse. I know of none.

Mr. EILBERG. So that you could not tell us more about what should be done about these abuses since they're not in your direct knowledge.

Judge SESSIONS. I don't know that I could respond to the question generally; I could say that I've had none, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose the section in H.R. 94 limiting to 6 months the maximum term to be served for contempt. The ABA is now supporting, and the Justice Department has agreed to, a 12-month maximum term.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. Could you comment on this proposal?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, my general opinion—feelings—are compatible with those of Mr. Babbitt. I'm not certain what effect a 6-month or a year sentence would have. I know that I would join him again in saying that it is likely that any witness who is under great pressure from external forces not created by the grand jury to not testify, might well be persuaded that his best interest lie in not testifying and yielding, rather, to being imprisoned for a period of 6 months, particularly if it ends up being coupled in legislation with the inability of that matter being presented again to a grand jury, or of his being presented again to a grand jury, and held in contempt upon appearance and subsequent refusal to testify.

I would think that it would be unfortunate if, in those cases particularly involving systematic organized criminal activity, that a potential defendant were able to opt for a 6-month term of imprisonment rather than being compelled to testify.

Mr. EILBERG. The law provides for criminal contempt, that avenue is open; we don't attempt to preclude that in the bill.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. So I would raise the question: What is so vital about being able to have a longer period of incarceration for civil contempt, and reiterate that incarceration—when the government attorney can proceed through criminal contempt and provide the rights and privileges to the witness or the defendant?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, not to disparage any rights that would be available, or any procedures that would be available in connection with criminal contempt, you know, of course, that the procedure there is greatly lengthened, and a man is, of course, entitled to a jury trial in that procedure.

And, again, the purposes of the investigation might well, itself, be compromised; I do not know. The circumstances under which it can take place, Mr. Chairman, are varied. But I will say this, that it is a much more difficult procedure, not that when you are imprisoning somebody for their exercise of the right to silence, and they have taken that right and, understand, under a grant of immunity, it is a serious matter. And I don't mean to in any way detract from the right of trial by jury; it simply is much more difficult.

Mr. EILBERG. Now, judge, you oppose, in H.R. 94, the provision providing for judicial approval of immunity grants, including a hearing with notice and the right to counsel. We've been told repeatedly by witnesses that motions challenging immunity grants are filed today. In any case, where immunity is nonconsensual, why would immunity standards provide extensions of such hearings and increase work loads?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, of course the——

Will you give me the section, please?

Mr. EILBERG. Certainly. Take your time.

Judge SESSIONS. Could you give me the section of the bill?

Mr. EILBERG. Page 6 of your statement at the top. Do you want the section of the bill?

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, sir. Is it section 6003?

Mr. EILBERG. 6002—page 5 of the bill.

We'll give you a copy.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, sir; I have that. Here, again, you're talking about the entire bill on immunity generally and the right of a witness to be represented by counsel in challenging an order of confinement. Or, are you talking about immunity in general?

Mr. EILBERG. Immnuity in general.

Would you like for me to repeat the question?

Judge SESSIONS. No, I'm familiar with the question. Several things relate here.

First of all, on page 6 of the bill, line 7—that is in section 6002—it indicates that:

> No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

Thereafter it talks about the "communication to the witness of any order under this part," and the right to counsel.

I presume that under that particular section, when a witness chooses not to testify that there will be not simply an immunity-type hearing, but that there would be an extended type hearing that would take—might well take extensive time in a one-judge court in a division, which most of the courts are, of course, in this country. You might well have an impairment of an entire grand jury investigation for an indefinite period of time in that circumstance.

Mr. EILBERG. My question is that we know that there are hearings being given today.

Judge SESSIONS. That is correct.

Mr. EILBERG. And my question really is, What's wrong with providing standards for those hearings?

Judge SESSIONS. I would say there would be nothing wrong with providing standards for those hearings. I would say that, as a timing factor, it could be a tremendous problem.

Mr. EILBERG. Taking the time of the judge.

Judge SESSIONS. Well, of course, the bill itself, Mr. Chairman, incorporates a number of additional responsibilities for it, and each of those adds to a considerable burden already carried and not the least of which is to speed trial requirements.

Mr. EILBERG. You complain in your statement about the requirements of H.R. 94 that "The grand jury should be told the subject matter of investigation and the criminal statutes involved." I would like to point out that these requirements only apply when such information is available, and to the extent available at the time of the summoning of the grand jury. With such limitation, are you still opposed to this provision?

Judge SESSIONS. Probably. I didn't state it as clearly as I could have. My main concern there, Mr. Chairman, was this: a grand jury, in a normal session—not in any special session—might be undertaking a number of investigations in a number of areas. For the court to require, then, of the U.S. attorney about each of those matters which he intends to present, and each law under which he intends to present it, and then explain to the grand jury the various laws that are being the subject of the grand jury investigation at that time, is a very burdensome thing.

On the other hand, if it is a special investigation of some sort, or if there is——

Mr. EILBERG. Would you explain, sir?

Judge SESSIONS. On the other hand, if it is a special investigation of some sort, or a special grand jury, obviously the court could easily carry that out with no problem.

Mr. EILBERG. You complain about H.R. 94's provision that a potential indictee be told of his right to testify or present evidence because you believe it could cause speedy trial problems. As I see the Speedy Trial Act, the 45-day rule only applies after an arrest: As most grand jury procedures occur prior to arrest, how could there be speedy trial problems?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, there well could be in connection with, for example, a normal drug conspiracy case if you had 20 people who were targets in a sizable drug conspiracy. It normally takes approximately 45 days for that matter even to reach grand jury after an arrest; and under those kinds of circumstances, it could well impede the ability to get to not only the indictment, but subsequently to trial on time.

Mr. EILBERG. That would be in a noninvestigatory proceeding.

Judge SESSIONS. Sir?

Mr. EILBERG. That would be in a noninvestigatory proceeding.

Judge SESSIONS. Well, no; what could happen is, those matters are not—well, yes, in your sense; I agree with that. I would agree with that; yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. Just one or two questions.

I just want to concur in the judge's observation, that while heard these horror stories, again, 30 years of extensive trial practice in both the eastern and western districts of Michigan, where in the eastern part—together with the State—we have some three grand juries in operation all the time—always one in the western district. So, over the period there have been a lot of them, and I haven't heard of any abuse either with the grand jury.

I'm sure that when you take the number of grand juries that are in operation in the United States at all times, it's awfully minimal, although you can single out a few—make them sound like national disasters.

In your experience, do you have any feeling about why a defendant would be prejudiced at all by the presence of the ex parte system of minimizing? It just doesn't seem to me the defendant would have any legitimate objection of being granted immunity.

Judge SESSIONS. If you're speaking of circumstances about which General Babbitt spoke, that is informal immunity as opposed to a formal grant of immunity.

I can conceive of circumstances where a defendant in a large criminal conspiracy—where he has a number of people who are working with him, and he has been the one who has been tagged, and the arm has been put on his shoulder to come to testify—and he has been granted immunity, I can understand great indecision on his part as to whether he would take the grant and testify or suffer contempt and go to jail. I can envision very easily a great fear and trepidation on the part of that witness to accept immunity and testify.

Mr. SAWYER. But I wonder—I'm just curious—because I've listened to the discussion on this, and I don't see any legitimate reason why a defendant who was going to be immunized has to have an opportunity to be heard and test his immunization. I would recognize he may have some very practical, but not legally cognizable, reasons as to why he would prefer not to be immunized. But his legal rights certainly aren't—could not be—impaired by the granting of immunization.

Judge SESSIONS. Well, I would agree.

Mr. SAWYER. That's all I have.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge, you complained about a requirement that exculpatory evidence be made available to the grand jury.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Again, I note that the Speedy Trial Act would not apply until after the arrest, and most grand jury investigations lead to indictments which precede arrest.

On the merits, it is presently the ethical responsibility of prosecutors to produce exculpatory evidence to the grand jury—detailed in ABA Standards on the Prosecutory Function—why is this anything more than legislative enactment of the standard?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, I think it's a matter of timing, Mr. Chairman. As you know, Brady v. Maryland requires production of exculpatory material, and by the time the Government rests its case—closes its case in chief. It must be supplied by that time. And if it is not, of course, then the prosecution suffers the ultimate possible pain and penalty of losing its prosecution totally for failure to comply.

If you get into—in a grand jury forum—a circumstance beyond the simple finding and seeking of probably cause and, in the investigative stance, get into the presentation of materials that you may have at that time—or, possibly should have at that time—that are exculpatory in nature, I think, as Judge Lacey observes, you can convert the grand jury proceedings into a minitrial. It is not an adversary proceeding; it is not a guilt or innocence proceeding; it is a probably cause proceeding. And I would question the advisability of it, particularly when there will then come into question what materials were actually available and what were not available.

I believe that a conscientious prosecutor, discussing with the grand jury matters which he believes will impair the prosecution, is the custom rather than the exception. If the prosecutor has a problem with his own view as to whether or not the indictment should be returned, then the chances are the prosecutor will discuss that with the grand jury, and it will probably include, basically, exculpatory material. But, as to the requirement that it be furnished at that particular stage, I would think that the committee would be better advised not to do it.

Mr. EILBERG. On the same subject, presently motions are filed pretrial complaining about the failure to present exculpatory evidence. Would not H.R. 94, by this requirement, decrease the number of such motions filed later and, thus, lessen delay?

Judge SESSIONS. It could, obviously, if the material was there. It involves, of course, a myriad—or an indefinite number—of motions or matters because of questions, whether or not it was available at that time. It well might not be available to prosecutors at the grand jury proceedings.

I would go back, Mr. Chairman, again to the purpose—the bedrock purposes—of the grand jury, and that is not basically an adversary proceeding but a probably cause proceeding to see whether or not an indictment should be returned at all.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge, I disagree, of course, with your objection to our provisions providing for counsel in the grand jury room.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. With the exception of some Federal judges, a few prosecutors—and some members of the subcommtitee may wish to correct me as far as my recollections are concerned—and some others, there is substantial agreement that providing for counsel in the grand jury would lessen disruptions, speed up the investigatory process, provide a check on improper prosecutorial actions, and, generally, insure fairness. The ABA, by vote of over 2 to 1, has recently endorsed H.R. 94's provision providing for the presence of counsel to give advice only. Both the ABA recommendations and my bill would provide for removal of disruptive counsel and counsel who might have a conflict of interest.

I must say that I cannot quite understand why you and the District Judges Association oppose this provision. Would you explain?

Judge SESSIONS. First of all, as far as the right to counsel, it is a cherished right, and nobody disputes the aid to any person in his time of need—to have counsel there. When you go into a grand jury room, however, and if you have that right to counsel, you have the right to counsel of your own choice. And if, in fact, that counsel for some reason becomes disruptive or goes beyond the powers enumerated in the bill, it may be necessary for the court to act to remove him—which is one circumstance that might arise. If the court were to do that, does he deprive the witness of the right to counsel of his own choice?

That's one small part; that's not the major cause of my concern. The major cause of my concern arises from a conflict of interest, Mr. Chairman. There are, again, circumstances where there are multiple potential defendants, or there are witnesses who may have corporate counsel, or may have counsel whose real interest is not, necessarily, that of the particular witness who is a prospective defendant. And to allow—and to require—counsel to be there in the grand jury room, where you are seeking only probable cause—to see if there is probable cause—invites what you are allowing to happen if a counsel may reveal to his clients and is not bound by the secrecy that traditionally follows the grand jury. And one of the provisions of your bill, of course, relates to secrecy.

Again, counsel for the witness has the ability to facilitate that without any problem at all.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. Judge Sessions——

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall, would you yield for just a moment? Would one of the members be kind enough to make a motion that we have unanimous consent for photographs to be taken?

Mr. SAWYER. I so move.

Mr. EILBERG. That motion is granted.

Excuse me, Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. Judge, if you will turn to page 12 of this bill, which is section 3329 dealing with the "'Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for Government," where it speaks of the impaneling of a grand jury, you will find listed 9 subjects that a judge charges a grand jury concerning its duties, and obligations. Of the 9 listed—appearing on pages 12 and 13—how many of these subjects do you charge when you impanel a grand jury?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, No. 1, No. 3, No. 4, No. 7, No. 8, and I would put the catch-all No. 9. There are a number of things about which the grand jury is instructed, most specifically concerning the nature of its own obligation.

I invariably, Mr. Congressman, inform a grand jury that the indictments which may be returned, if any, are not the indictments of the prosecutor, of the U.S. attorney; that they are, in fact, their indictments if they are returned at all, and they must, individually, make up their own mind as to whether or not there is probable cause; and that they should not hesitate if they have question, or if they are hesitant, to express that in the grand jury; and that, in fact, when an indictment is returned, the court needs to know that when 20 or 23 votes of those people are noted, each of them, individually, has done that.

Now, there are other general instructions that I give, but——

Mr. HALL. I understand.

No. 6, which you did not indicate that you instructed on, with reference to "the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known"——

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALL [continuing]. "At the time the grand jury is impaneled," and drawing upon your experience as a Federal district attorney, and as a Federal judge, have you had situations arise where at some point during the grand jury investigation matters came up that were not know, to you as a district attorney when that grand jury was first impaneled?

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, sir, very definitely. It is routine.

Mr. HALL. If a court had to instruct a grand jury on the law and the statutes involved, could that not become an insurmountable task and slow the processes of a grand jury?

Judge SESSIONS. I don't think there's any question but what it could, depending upon what statutes were involved. As U.S. attorney in my own particular district I followed the procedure, always, myself, individually, and required the assistant U.S. attorneys to do so, to always inform the grand jury of the exact statute on which they were proceeding at that paricular time if they knew.

And investigative grand jury, as you note, may welcome information on additional violations that relate to matters not known at that time.

Mr. HALL. And do you, under the provisions as set out in this act, contemplate that that would call upon the court at that time—whenever it was made known to him that additional matters were being brough up before the grand jury—to stop the proceedings and go into No. 6 and tell the grand jurors what the criminal statutes are or what might be involved in addition to what you had already instructed them at the beginning?

Judge SESSIONS. Well, in all likelihood, the court would not know unless the court instructed the U.S. attorney or the foreman of the grand jury that if, in fact, the matters being investigative went beyond the statutes which were explained that they should inform the court.

Now, Judge Campbell, you know, as I noted in my testimony, long ago talked about the nature of the grand jury. Of course, the court appoints it, but it is basically executive in its function, and there is always the problem about the separation of powers—invading the province of the grand jury.

I don't object, you understand, to the carrying out of No. 6. I think it is simply extremely burdensome and probably not necessary at all.

Mr. EILBERG. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. I just call attention—our opinions may very well vary—but as I read section 3329, page 12, it says that upon impanelment the court shall do these various things. And it's not the intention of this bill, as I view it, for the judge to keep advising the grand jury as to laws that are enacted or that come to his attention.

Please proceed.

Mr. HALL. All right.

Judge SESSIONS. If I might respond, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Of course.

Judge SESSIONS. Again, you note the words, "upon impanelment." Again, a grand jury is impaneled to act for 18 months, which, again, leave the court wide open as to what they might choose to investigate or any of the various codes—United States Code, et cetera.

It seems to me that the provision should be eliminated altough, as I say, I think it's incumbent upon the U.S. attorney, when he has knowledge of a particular statute, to inform the grand jury of exactly under which statute he is proceeding.

Thank you.

Mr. HALL. All right, continuing, if——

Excuse me just a minute.

Judge SESSIONS. I understand.

Mr. EILBERG. We have another minute or two; the second bell has not rung.

Mr. HALL. All right.

I have a few more questions, Mr. Chairman, if I may wait until we get back from the vote to proceed.

Mr. EILBERG. If Judge Sessions will be kind enough to remain until after the recess.

Judge SESSIONS. Yes, I will.

[Recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order, and as we left Congressman Hall was proffering some questions.

Congressman Hall.

Mr. HALL. Judge, I think we were discussing No. 6 of H.R. 3329, and it was indicated by the chairman of this subcommittee that it was not the intention of H.R. 3329 that the court would find it necessary to charge a grand jury other than when that grand jury was impaneled, which I'm glad to know.

Now, one or two things further, we have a provision in this law dealing with a witness having a lawyer in a grand jury room with him during the interrogation. As it is now, he is entitled to representation outside——

Judge SESSIONS. That is correct.

Mr. HALL. The grand jury room.

I cannot help but think of some lawyers that you and I know in Texas, and some who are out of Texas, who could make a shambles of a grand jury investigation if they were allowed to sit in the grand jury room with a witness, by constant interruptions, because the court is not present, although—the district attorney would be present.

But can you see any good—and I mean that literally—concerning the overall proceedings of the grand jury, to have an attorney in the grand jury room with the witness at all times?

Judge SESSIONS. Obviously, for the witness himself, the presence of counsel would be a great comfort. I think anyone appearing before a grand jury could well be comforted by the fact that his attorney was there. I think, however, the need of the grand jury—and the problems are, I think, likely to arise from the presence of counsel, some of which we have discussed—outweighs the need for presence of counsel. I would think a U.S. attorney or assistant U.S. attorney would be derelict—and I have read some cases where the court, where the U.S. attorney, has refused to allow a witness to exit the grand jury room and talk with counsel, but I believe any U.S. attorney or assistant U.S. attorney would be derelict—in disallowing any witness at any time to step outside to talk with his counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you yield?

Mr. HALL. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Does the judge know of any cases where any U.S. attorney has been censored for any conduct like that?

Judge SESSIONS. No; I have only read—and I apologize for not being able to give the citation—of a U.S. attorney who refused—it was probably in Judge Frankel's book where I read it—refused to allow the witness to exit the grand jury room, but insisted that he answer, and instructed the grand jury foreman to discuss it with him, and he did, and they did not allow him. I think it was in Judge Frankel's book; you have the co[illegible]her here and he may be able to allude to it. But I know of none, personally; no, sir.

Mr. HALL. Don't you think that if the grand jury proceedings were transcribed in its entirety, that that would go a long way toward getting into fraudulent actions on the part of the district attorney or assisant, in not allowing a person to consult with his attorney outside of the court room?

Judge SESSIONS. I would think, obviously; again, the record would be there for review, and when records are available for review, it tends to require anybody—or tends to straighten anybody out and take those conservative actions they should probably take. I would think, yes.

I don't agree with the recording of all grand jury testimony, and you know that I don't; but my view of it is more on both the cost and the availability of the transcript.

Mr. HALL. I think that any proceeding of that nature should be transcribed, as it is a hearing—whether it be a pretrial matter, which are not transcribed in the easern district of Texas, and I don't think would be in your district either unless requested by the parties. But I certainly believe the transcription of grand jury testimony would go a long way toward doing away with some of the evils that we are talking about, however fraught we may be with those evils and whether or not it's something that is not as prevalant as we might understand it is.

Now, you mentioned one thing a moment ago that I differ with you, and that is dealing with exculpatory statements in the grand jury proceeding. Now, you indicated—and rightfully so—that, the purpose of a grand jury, is to deal with probable cause, which is correct. But in looking back over about 30 years of practice in the State and Federal courts of Texas and Louisiana, I can envision some instances where, if the exculpatory statements of a witness or a prospective defendant had been allowed before a grand jury, that it might have—probably with some degree—have mellowed the basis for probable cause, and maybe a grand jury would not have indicted that person.

As you and I well know, when a district attorney is seeking an indictment, he is not going to volunteer anything that is going to hurt his case. That is commonsense. I know that, and you know that.

But I do believe—and I know in the State proceedings—that if the district attorney introduces a statement, that he's bound by those exculpatory statements that are in that statement that goes before a court or jury. And, in many instances, exculpatory statements are so powerful that a basis for probable cause might be diminished.

I understand you don't desire to get into the adversary proceeding in a grand jury hearing, but don't you think that the introduction of exculpatory information may be of value to a group of men or women sitting there trying to determine whether to return a bill of indictment against this individual?

Judge SESSIONS. Oh, I would have to agree that, undoubtedly, that if they were acting as a petit jury it would be very helpful, and it probably would be helpful in the grand jury on whether or not to return an indictment.

But I think, at the same time, the effect of it and the problem for the court dealing with those exculpatory statements that were made—reviewing the records, going back in, making of motions—filing of motions—by counsel to review those—I think those burdens are a very great burden, and the question comes as to whether or not it is all given—at what stage it is properly given—and whether the indictment is effective if afterward there was more exculpatory material found.

I think it is opening a "can of worms," but I agree with you. Yes, obviously, if a grand jury had the exculpatory material that a petit jury might receive, they might not return an indictment, just like a petit jury might not find guilt. But that is not the purpose, again, of the grand jury.

Mr. HALL. It's not the purpose of the grand jury solely to return a bill of indictment either.

Judge SESSIONS. Well, that is correct, but its function is to see whether or not there is probable cause to believe reasonably there has been a crime committee. That is the purpose of it. It is an accusatory body, and that is its function, and we reserve the other function—that is guilt or not guilt—to a petit jury, trial by one's peers.

But, again, I would have to agree with you, Congressman, that obviously it could affect them, it could be meaningful. A U.S. attorney who knows that he is going to reveal those matters—which he must under the law—if he goes to indictment and there is an indictment returned, and he himself feels the exculpatory revealed is so great, he knows that at some place he is going to pay the price for not giving it and the chances are he will.

Mr. HALL. It would be better from the standpoint of a defendant and overall justice, to get that issue out of the way at the very beginning.

Judge SESSIONS. That could well be, sir, but I would not advise doing it.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge, I respect you very much, and the Congressman from your district is well represented. We have some basic disagreements—really basic—as to what the grand jury role is. I think it should also be a place of protection against an overly zealous district attorney or administration. I mean, you seem to completely ignore that or minimize that. It's just the basic different conception of the purpose of the grand jury.

Judge SESSIONS. Oh, I don't—We haven't addressed that particular portion of it at all, Mr. Chairman. I would have to agree with you that an overly zealous, hammering, prosecuting U.S. attorney can be a very unfortunate thing. I think that that is a problem we have not yet discussed, and if you choose to, I'll be pleased to.

Mr. EILBERG. All right, I would like to hear your reaction to that question. What responsibility does the grand jury have to the community as a whole rather than to the district attorney?

Judge SESSIONS. First of all, the U.S. attorney is appointed by the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate. He is appointed for a 4-year term although he may not serve it out. He has, I think, the often quoted responsibility to strike hard blows though not unfair or foul blows. He has an obligation to present those matters to the grand jury which he believes will bring to their attention the possibility of crimes that have been committed.

In an investigatory grand jury he may conceivably have outside political interests, and I understand that. He must ignore those. His responsibility is not to strike political blows, but his responsibility is to bring to the attention of the grand jury the possibility of commitment of crime.

Now, if he, through his office, pushes—shoves——

Mr. EILBERG. If I may interrupt. You've already said you're not aware of any U.S. attorney being abusive in any way.

Judge SESSIONS. No; but you were predicating your question upon an overzealous grand jury—pardon me, an overzealous prosecutor; and I was saying if they do exist, if there is one, it is not proper for him to be in that capacity.

He does not participate in their deliberations; therefore, he does not, outside of the deliberations, set a stage that will enforce his own views purely for improper purposes. If he believes an indictment should be returned, that he should respond, he should not force and he certainly should not be overzealous.

Of course, the question of over zealousness is a relative analysis.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Sessions, we're indebted to you for your very sincere, clear comments this morning. We're glad you came, and thank you very much.

Judge SESSIONS. Mr. Chairman, you have honored me by allowing me to come and speak with you, and I appreciate your allowing the time. Thank you. It's a pleasure to meet with you.

May I be excused?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes, sir.

Judge SESSIONS. Should I deliver this to the secretary? To whom should I deliver it?

Mr. EILBERG. Right over here.

Judge SESSIONS. I have signed a copy, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you again.

Our next witness will be Mr. Sager, former U.S. attorney for Virginia.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, may I just make a legislative inquiry?

Mr. EILBERG. Certainly.

Mr. SAWYER. I read Mr. Sager's statement, and it seems to me—and particularly with respect to a named U.S. district attorney there—that proposing to take his testimony in a public hearing would violate rule X(k)(5)(A) of the House Rules, which, in effect, says: "If the committee determines that evidence through testimony is investigative, hearing may tend to defame, degrade or incriminate any person, it shall be able to receive such evidence and testimony in executive session."

And, as I read the testimony of Mr. Sager, it most certainly does that.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I agree. I certainly agree with Mr. Sawyer that it could be.

Mr. EILBERG. Well, the question, that I have just discussed with counsel, is if the witness does not relate his experiences with names, then it would not be—I would suggest that the witness talk about the problems without naming the individuals, or at least naming the experiences as much and identify them in an identifiable way. Is that in agreement?

Mr. SAWYER. I just presumed he was going to give the testimony in this way.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. I question the circulation of the testimony today. In other words, do members of the press presently in the room already have a copy of this?

Mr. EILBERG. Since there is—I can't answer that question. I don't know that the statement itself relates any answers that would be meaningful in connection with individual names other than the fact that he feels that the individual has done a wrong thing.

If it's the wish of the subcommittee, I'd be glad to close the meeting.

Mr. SAGER. Mr. Chairman, I'd be happy to refrain to making any reference to that particular name. That will not disrupt my presentation.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, either by name or by identifiable, personal experiences, that could be easily identified.

Mr. EILBERG. I think—If I may, Mr. Sager, we are interested in getting the fullest possible benefit of your testimony, and if we keep the meeting open excluding information that might be useful to us in preparing this legislation or reviewing the legislation, I don't think that we're acting in the national interest.

Do I have a motion that we close the meeting?

Mr. SAWYER. I so move.

Mr. EILBERG. Any objection?

Mr. SAGER. I did not intend to mention his name during the actual presentation.

Mr. EILBERG. There's nothing wrong with that, but its certain that the Chair is interested in everything you have to say or wish to say.

We will pause and ask the public, obviously not wishing to offend anyone, we will have to ask everyone to leave during this portion of the hearing.

I'm advised there has to be a rollcall vote on this. All of those in favor please say aye.

[Chorus of ayes.]

Mr. EILBERG. Oppose nay.

[No response.]

Mr. EILBERG. The ayes have it, then, I assume. Mr. Sawyer, Mr. Fish, Mr. Hall voted on it—as I have.

This is not to be taken as a criticism of you, Mr. Sager.

[Recess, the open hearing to reconvene following a closed session.]

[On November 3, 1977, the subcommittee voted to open this session and to include Mr. Sager's testimony as part of the hearing record. The committee also voted to supply the Department of Justice a copy of the transcript and to allow them to respond. Mr. Sager's testimony; the letter to the Department of Justice, and the Justice Department's response follow:]

GRAND JURY REFORM
Closed Session

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP,
AND INTERNATIONAL LAW
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 11:25 a.m. in room 2237, Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Joshua Eilberg (chairman of the subcommittee), presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Hall, Fish, and Sawyer.

Also present: Garner J. Cline, Arthur P. Endres, Jr., Martin H. Belsky, counsel; Peter Regis, legislative assistant; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sager, we have received and read your testimony. It's most fascinating. We look forward to hearing from you.

Mr. BELSKY. We have a staff member present from Congressman Harris' office, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Is there any objection to allowing a staff member from Mr. Harris' office to be here? He's on the subcommittee.

[No objection was heard.]

She may stay.

Mr. SAGER. Is it permissible for my wife to remain so that I won't have to explain everything to her on the way home?

Mr. EILBERG. If you don't mind, we'd prefer that she not be here.

Mr. SAWYER. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I wouldn't have any objections to his wife being here, because it's obvious he's said all the same things to her at one time or another.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you bring your wife back in. We are sorry if we have caused you any embarrassment. We did not intend to do so. We're most anxious to have your contribution. You have had extraordinary experience, according to your statement, and, frankly, we wish that you'd just not be inhibited but just let us have it.

Please proceed.

Mr. SAGER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF RODNEY SAGER, FORMER U.S. ATTORNEY FOR VIRGINIA

Mr. SAGER. As I indicated at the beginning of my written statement, my background includes serving almost 7 years as an assistant U.S. attorney.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, since you're not reading your statement, the statement will be made part of the record—without objection.

Mr. SAGER. Well, I'm going to paraphrase my statement.

Mr. EILBERG. That's fine, but we just have to have the statement on the record. You just proceed in your own way.

Mr. SAGER. Thank you, sir.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Sager follows:]

STATEMENT OF RODNEY SAGER

THE POWER TO DESTROY

MEMORANDUM ON THE GRAND JURY

Introduction

For almost seven years, I served as an Assistant United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia; and, for two of those years, I served as Senior Assistant in charge of the Richmond, Virginia, office. During this time, and incident to my responsibilities in this position, I personally attended and/or supervised approximately 100 separate grand jury sessions, which return approximately 1,000 criminal indictments. Additionally, I participated in and supervised numerous investigatory grand jury sessions giving rise to major fraud indictments. In such capacity, I participated in the direct examination of literally hundreds of individual witnesses before the grand jury.

One of my major responsibilities during the last several years of my association with the Justice Department was the responsibility of overseeing major fraud investigations. The last grand jury of this nature which I supervised was that leading to the nationally publicized indictment of Allied Chemical Corporation regarding Kepone poisoning within the State of Virginia. In addition to this experience within the Department, I also have served as a law clerk to a federal district judge and as an attorney in private practice with substantial participation in defense of criminal cases within the State of Virginia.

Perhaps more important than all of the above, I had the sobering experience of being a witness subjected to approximately 15 hours of interrogation and harassment by one of the Department's most publicized prosecutors, Guy Goodwin. That experience alone enables me to speak to the workings of our historic system with an insight that appears to be totally lacking in the presentments of Departmental officials opposing grand jury reform. It is imperative that the truth be known as to the actual daily functioning of the present federal system.

The "power to destroy" is herein offered upon my experience as a law clerk, a prosecutor, a defense attorney and a witness. The context of these remarks accepts the unfortunate truism that the prosecution and conviction of everyday street crime, including drugs and violence, is difficult at best. While the typical bank robber and drug pusher may not be initimidated by interrogation, there is a group of investigations, sometimes referred to as political or white collar, wherein our system has clothed the prosecutor with the overwhelming power to destroy.

H.R. 94—GENERAL REMARKS

I have reviewed with interest previous Departmental submissions to this committee including the testimony of individuals such as former Attorney General Edward B. Levi. I am disappointed that many of the remarks from persons opposing reform are predicated mainly upon theory and historic perspective and conveniently avoid the realities of the everyday functioning of federal grand juries throughout the country. Examples of theoretical references include phrases such as, "the grand jury functions as a barrier to reckless charges," and "the grand jury is both a sword and a shield." Of particular interest, is the following statement of Mr. Levi:

For centuries, the grand jury has operated as the voice of the citizenry in the criminal justice system. It is this which has accounted for its historic vitality, and it is the "independence, alertness, and common sense" of the grand jurors themselves which must ultimately be relied upon to prevent the erosion of this important institution.

The Department of Justice has a special responsibility with respect to the grand jury. Like the traditional role of the grand jury itself, the responsibility is twofold. As the prosecutorial agency of the Federal Government, the Department needs the effective investigative mechanisms which the grand jury can provide. But the Department also has the duty to preserve and protect individual rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The simple fact is that today's system clothes a prosecutor with virtually unbridled power. The historic comments compared to the realities of today show that the so-called functions of a grand jury in being a protector of individual's rights is meaningless. To the contrary, the person protected by this system is the prosecutor. In my approximately 1,000 indictments, I had no more than five no-true bills, and in those instances, the negative action was specifically requested by my office. In complicated investigations involving witness examination, grand jurors yield almost completely to the will, advice and actions of the prosecutor.

Of extreme importance is the "little treated" situation of the young lawyer who becomes a federal prosecutor and finds himself in an awesome position of power. A lack of experience and a lack of empathy produces a number of prosecutors who many times unwittingly take advantage of the situation in which they have been placed. The over-aggressive prosecutor is a reality of this system and ironically is created by the very same grand jury system that was meant to protect against such a happening.

Many times I have overheard well meaning prosecutors brag about raking witnesses over the coals, causing witnesses to sit and wait for long periods of time to teach them lessons, and how they ridiculed and destroyed certain witnesses before a grand jury proceeding. One individual in particular has been the target of numerous publications detailing his numerous abuses of the system, yet he remains with impunity on the federal payroll. Guy Goodwin is an example of what our system breeds, and, yet, the Department, who speaks of protecting witnesses, continues to protect Guy Goodwin. The question can only be asked of the well meaning representatives from the Justice Department—why?

I will be pleased to respond in detail about the abuses I have seen and of my confrontation with Mr. Goodwin, but I do not wish to unduly lengthen this written presentment. With respect to H.R. 94, my feelings, where appropriate, are as follows:

Recalcitrant Witnesses § 1826(2):

This section reduces maximum confinement for refusal to comply with the provisions therein to a period not to exceed six months. From past experiences, I would suggest that there would be a number of witnesses that would be content to serve only six months in exchange for failure to testify. Simply speaking, this particular provision is too lenient to achieve the needed purposes of obtaining testimony, and I would accordingly request the committee to reconsider and increase the provision to at least twelve months confinement.

Witness Immunity § 6002:

The thrust of this section is of course to grant "transactional immunity" where "use immunity" now exists. The issue is a difficult one to address, as the present use immunity with proper safeguards does seem to have an additional incentive for truthful testimony by a witness. As an extra incentive for a witness to cooperate, assuming the Congress passes this provision granting transactional immunity, would be to allow for the prosecution of obstruction of justice in addition to the listed areas of perjury, giving a false statement, or for otherwise failing to comply with the court order. Perjury is difficult, at best, to prosecute and prove, and a skilled witness can be evasive and therefore not give meaningful testimony after his grant of transactional immunity. Under those circumstances, there might well lie a proper charge of obstruction of justice for purposes of prosecution and would therefore set forth the additonal incentive of which I have made reference.

My office on a number of occasions was frustrated by difficult witnesses wherein we found that the restricted area of perjury or giving false testimony did not technically or literally apply, but where the broader range offered by obstruction of justice did in fact have meaning and application. An amendment, therefore, to this issue would be meaningful in light of the results sought to be achieved by the granting of transactional immunity.

Violations of Grand Jury Secrecy § 1512(c)(3):

It is unclear by the present language allowing an attorney to publicly disclose matters concerning his client's testimony as to whether the historical client/attorney privilege controls; that is, whether this section allows the attorney to so disclose with or without the consent of the client. To avoid misinterpretation, language should be added stating that such disclosure can only be made by the attorney upon the written consent and permission of his client. This brief addi- so disclose with or without the consent o fthe client. To avoid misinterpretation, and conflicts and would enure without question to the benefit of the witness.

A brief additional thought might be to impose a 30 or 60 day time limit during which no such disclosure could be made, so as to allow an investigatory session to proceed with other material witnesses without exposing a particular area then under investigation. There are instances where premature disclosure by a witness or his attorney might adversely affect the ability of the grand jury to obtain meaningful testimony on a given point from other sources.

Rights and Duties of Grand Jury and Attorney For Government § 3329(b)(2)(B):

This section refers to giving notice to so-called "target defendant" so as to allow him the opportunity to testify and present evidence. This section does not, however, distinguish between the normal situation wherein an indictment is based solely on the testimony of government agents as opposed to the so-called investigatory grand jury where individual witnesses other than government agents are subpoenaed, I am advised that the intent of this committee is to limit the notice provision to the latter situation. It is therefore imperative that language be added to this section so as to avoid misunderstanding and the attendant problems of a court ruling that notice must be given in all situations. Needless to say, such a notice required in all situations, would be oppressive and literally unworkable.

Appearance of Counsel With Witness Before Grand Jury § 3330A:

Allowing the presence of counsel within the grand jury is excellent and is a long overdue safeguard both for the rights of the witness and for protection against the over-aggressive prosecutor. Past experience clearly indicates that the presence of such an individual will have a meaningful impact upon the conduct of the prosecutor. A clear example is my recent appearance before a Virginia state grand jury session as counsel for a client under investigation. During the course of that proceeding, one of the prosecutors began laughing at my client's testimony and, in fact, responded with a joke and a critical comment. A brief exchange between the two of us brought an apology from him and quickly terminated the improper and unneeded conduct in line of inquiry. I might add that my appearance in no way hampered the investigation of the state grand jury and, in fact, expedited same inasmuch as I could confer immediately with my client rather than him leaving the grand jury room for every needed conference with his attorney.

I do have a suggestion with respect to subparagraph (d). Giving the court power to remove an attorney under certain circumstances. The current draft refers to removal and replacement where necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are "not unduly delayed or impeded." Under normal interpretation, such language does not address itself to the situation where one attorney seeks to represent numerous clients as to the same investigation before a particular grand jury. Federal courts in some instances have reversed criminal convictions, holding that such dual representation is tantamount to ineffective assistance of counsel. Likewise, federal law allowing the appointment of counsel in indigent cases speaks to the issue that only one attorney can be appointed per client. Under these circumstances, additional language should be added that the attorney shall not represent more than one client in the same general investigation.

Subpenas § 3330B(c)(1):

I must take issue with this one section granting district courts with concurrent jurisdiction as to motions to quash a given subpena. Briefly speaking, I would suggest that such a procedure might well be disruptive of the entire process and is not warranted by the rare situations that might give rise to an abuse allowing for the granting of such a motion. The only exception might be a severe medical condition wherein such a procedure would have meaning. Other than this point, I would yield to the arguments submitted through the submissions of other witnesses to this committee.

Recording of Grand Jury Proceedings; and Availability of Grand Jury Transcripts and Other Statements §§ 3333 and 3334:

Other than allowing the presence of counsel within the grand jury room, these two referenced provisions are perhaps the most outstanding additions that can be made to our system. Indeed, the single most sobering impact that can be had upon a prosecutor is the knowledge that every word he utters within the grand jury will be recorded. The present system is full of gross abuses. Transcription is not required, and where required, the prosecutor has the authority at will to tell a court reporter when to cease transcription. It is the rule rather than the exception that prosecutors give detailed background information to grand juries about individual witnesses which comments are never recorded. Such comments include telling grand jurors that certain witnesses are "crooks," "con-men," "members of organized crime," "hostile," and "liars," just to name a few. Grand jurors are captive audiences to such traumatic dialogue from their legal advisor. So programed, it is no wonder that they are robbed of their individuality and impartiality and that they greet the witness with hostility and with a predetermination as to his role in the drama already set forth by the prosecutor.

Likewise, the availability of the written transcript and record to a particular witness will also serve to curb the improper actions of some prosecutors. Additionally, such availability will allow a particular witness to calmly review his testimony, refresh his recollection, and perhaps even correct the record as to errors or misunderstood questions and related responses. Can anyone deny the fairness of such a procedure?

Underscoring the need for these provisions is my own personal experience as a witness which is in addition to my observations as a prosecutor. For approximately 15 hours, I was exposed to ridiculous and harassing questions by Guy Goodwin of the Department of Justice with respect to a wiretap inquiry at Richmond, Virginia. Initially, I was a friendly witness prior to the grand jury session. I made the mistake, however, of criticizing Goodwin's actions within my district to his superiors in Washington, even before he began his grand jury inquisition. Immediately after my first objection to his conduct, he became aggressive and hostile, not only towards me, but towards the entire staff in Richmond. It was obvious that his superiors in Washington did not wish to acknowledge their mistake regarding his presence and conduct in Richmond. Numerous complaints from my office were literally ignored and only given surface treatment by responsible individuals within the Department of Justice.

During and after the referenced grand jury investigation by Godwin, I was given permission by the federal district court to review my testimony before the grand jury. Notwithstanding that provision, the Department refused to allow me access to the transcripts in question. It is patently obvious that they did not want documented for the public record the improper conduct of one of their own. Even after the investigation was terminated and the announcement made that there would be no indictments, the Department continued to deny me access to those documents which I had requested for the purpose of documenting and underscoring my previous complaints against Goodwin of prosecutorial misconduct and his related abuse of the grand jury system. The conspiracy of silence had manifested itself, and it was crystal clear that the "sword and shield" was solely that of Guy Goodwin and not that of the people who were supposed to be protected by the system which the Department continues to support.

I will be pleased to make available to this committee the numerous letters and complaints which I forwarded to the Department, along with advising you of the other complaints of which I was personally familiar. Once again, it can only be asked to the Department why they have refused to allow the documentation of improper conduct against one of their own. In all fairness, I must add that all of this took place under the administrations of Edward H. Levi and Harold Tyler, although they, too, had announced a sincere public desire to expose abuses and protect society.

The passage of these two provisions, along with the allowance of counsel in the grand jury in an of themselves will bring back to our system the stability which the original founders of the grand jury concept had envisioned.

This section indicates that an indicted individual is entitled to a preliminary hearing. Under current practices, such a hearing is conducted by a magistrate who is to determine whether or not probable cause exists for the then pending complaint. Your draft does not suggest what would happen after an indictment should such a magistrate find a lack of probable cause. If it is contemplated that a magistrate has the authority to dismiss an indictment under such circumstances, then I must take issue with this section unless there is some recourse or appeal to the district judge for a second hearing on the point.

Additionally, the present practice allows the government agent to summarize the evidence therefore admitting hearsay. Assuming such a practice would continue, part of my concern would be relieved inasmuch as full-blown preliminary hearings could disrupt the entire criminal and judicial process. With the many protections already offered by this resolution, and with the obvious fact that harmful publicity has already been generated by an indictment, then I would say little merit is achieved in the requirement of a preliminary hearing at this stage. Little could be gained under those circumstances.

My position as to this section is, of course, predicated on the assumption that the other safeguards in the bill will be passed including the early release of grand jury information as to witnesses and who will be called by the prosecution at trial. I would suggest to you that a probable cause for preliminary hearing based on the summary testimony of an agent reveals little and, in fact, would reveal less than that which eventually would be forthcoming under the previously-cited provisions of this proposed act.

CONCLUSION

It has been my desire throughout this written presentation to be as objective as possible as to H.R. 94 and grand jury reform in general as based upon my own personal experiences. I must agree with the well-expressed statements of others that the grand jury should not be turned into a "mini trial" and that its secret proceedings were never meant to be an adversary procedure, but rather an investigative process to protect the innocent while bringing wrongdoing to the surface. My purpose herein is a deep desire to see that the innocent are indeed protected and that the "shield" for such protection be returned to their possession.

If this committee wishes to see a clear situation of the type of wrong that H.R. 94 is meant to correct, then I would suggest you attempt to get from the Department of Justice the voluminous transcripts of the Richmond, Virginia, wiretap investigation of late 1975 and early 1976, wherein you will have first-hand evidence of what in fact was a grand inquisition. In that investigation, Guy Goodwin, supported by his superiors, was allowed to accumulate thousands of pages of testimony and spend literally thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of dollars, of taxpayers' money in a whirlwind investigation which produced little more, if anything, than that which had already been discovered by a prior investigation by the Richmond United States Attorney's Office.

It was obvious in Richmond that once you disagreed with a person such as Guy Goodwin you became a target of his over-aggressive and abuse style. His conduct was identical to that quoted by numerous other individuals in many publications prior to his arrival at Richmond. Such is a clear example of the "power to destroy" wherein a prosecutor can literally attack anyone at will. Faced with a dilemma, it is obvious why the Department eventually terminated the investigation without any indictments. Because of his actions, the original wrongdoer, being a local police officer, not only remains unpunished, but continues at his daily activities with the Richmond Bureau of Police. The respect that many of us within my own office had for the Department of Justice was literally destroyed by their actions in this case, and I personally resigned from my position partially as a result of the despair and frustrations I felt because of those events.

I highly commend Congressman Eilberg and all other members of this committee and supporting staff for their courageous efforts in seeking and promulgating needed reform. The time has come for our system to again have meaning and to stand as true bulwark against oppression. I urge action on this measure, and I stand ready to be of assistance in any way that I can.

Respectfully submitted,

RODNEY SAGER.

Mr. SAGER. For almost 7 years I served as an assistant U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Virginia. I might point out that by departmental statistics, the Eastern District of Virginia is one of the most active in the United States with respect to criminal indictments and presentments.

In addition to serving as an assistant U.S. attorney, I served as a law clerk with a Federal judge, and I'm now beginning my second year in private practice.

Also, I was a senior assistant; that is, in the eastern district there are three full-time staffed offices, and I was in charge of the Richmond division, office of the eastern district of Virginia for the last 2 years of my tenure with the Government.

One of my major responsibilities as an assistant U.S. attorney, especially in my later years of this association with the Department of Justice, was to oversee major grand jury investigations. As a matter of fact, the last grand jury I personally supervised prior to my resignation was the Allied Chemical Corp. Kepone probe which I supervised and participated in as to all phases of its investigation including the subpenaing and examination of witnesses. Additionaly, I had three other special attorneys working under me.

I would point out, also, that I've had the experience of being a witness in a grand jury—for almost 15 hours—with respect to an investigation by a particular departmental prosecutor.

So, I am here today to try to offer my testimony based on experiences as a law clerk, a prosecutor, a defense attorney, and as a witness.

Now, I think that as we comment on H.R. 94, and in light of some of the previous remarks that I have heard it is important to point out that the overwhelming majority of your grand juries are not investigatory grand juries, but rather ones where agents just appear, summarize testimony, and you have an indictment. These are the ones that have often been referred to as your rubber-stamp indictments. These are where 20 or 30 indictments on a particular day are returned from the same grand jury hearing based upon a 3- or 4-minute summary of evidence.

So, we begin by looking at a small percentage of grand juries that are so-called investigative in nature.

I have reviewed in particular the previous testimony of former Attorney General Edward Levi, and also the prepared remarks by the Department of Justice when he was Attorney General. I notice with interest that most of the remarks made by him and presented by the Department in many of their submissions deal with historic perspective and theory.

I'm here to suggest that, the simple fact is today our system clothes the prosecutor with virtually unbridled power. It's interesting to note from the historic comments that the so-called functions of the grand jury is to act as a protector of the individual's rights. I would respectfully suggest that in modern day practice that term is completely meaningless. To the contrary, the person protected by the modern-day grand jury is the prosecutor.

While I was an assistant U.S. attorney, I attended or supervised grand juries that returned approximately 1,000 criminal indictments. I had no more than five no-true bills in those 7 years, and, I might add, we asked for those no-true bills.

With respect to the so-called investigatory grand jury in all such situations the grand jurors, as far as my experience has been, yield almost completely to the will, advice, and actions of the prosecutor. I mention here—and I won't speak to it in any great length—about the young prosecutor who has little past experience but finds himself clothed with awesome power. As such, without controls, it is very simple for even a well-meaning prosecutor to take advantage of such a situation.

It's ironic that the grand jury that was meant to protect against an overly aggressive prosecutor is the same system that has, in fact, brought into being the overly aggressive prosecutor.

Now, let's talk about some specifics. I recall with interest the comments that there have been very few reports to the courts—such as the testimony from Judge Sessions and other individuals—with respect to abuses. Well, there are two outstanding reasons why that does not occurr: No. 1, when you do have a grand jury stenographer in the grand jury room—which, I might add, is not required by today's system—the prosecutor has full authority to tell the grand jury stenographer what to take down and what not to take down. And, my friends, you'd better believe that if the prosecutor has some strong words to say about a witness, he advises the court reporter to cease the transcription. So, those words are not a part of any record. Second, when you speak in terms of the written record, where in a written record does it show what the prosecutor did with respect to a question? Did he yell? Did he raise his voice? Did he stomp around the room? Did he throw papers down in front of the witness? And this, of course, is when there is a court reporter in the grand jury room.

The simple fact is we're talking about a fraternal organization. That fraternal organization is the Department of Justice, and most of the U.S. attorneys and assistant U.S. attorneys, who work within that framework and within that fraternal concept, follow the concept that if one is attacked, that most must come to his aid.

I'll touch on a little bit later and perhaps in more detail—if the committee so likes—the particular experience I had in having to testify 15 hours in front of a Federal grand jury. The reason I had to so testify is I made the mistake of calling the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice and suggesting they remove a special prosecutor in the Richmond area.

Up until that point I was a friendly witness for the Government. Within 24 hours of that point I all of sudden became labeled a hostile witness to the Government and a threat to its organization.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sager, if I may interrupt. I think the chairman is of the opinion that the members have read your statement, so we get the innuendos, and we've gotten many of the points you have already described. We would like to get the maximum benefit of your time. I don't want to control you, but I just want you to know this.

Mr. SAGER. Let me, then, proceed. I've commented on several provisions of the bill. I have not spoken to all of the issues.

The first one I touched on very briefly is the recalcitrant witness aspect, the 1826 section. I did not spend much time here. I simply suggested—as others have done—that 6 months might well, indeed, be too lenient a period of time with respect to confinement of the witness if he refuses to testify. As a prosecutor I have seen individuals that would be more than willing to serve 6 months if they did not have to give testimony. And, of course, I have opted for a 12-month compromise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you did suggest earlier the possibility of criminal contempt, but I'm not sure that the bill doesn't negate such a proceeding, because it says in mandatory language "shall not serve more than 6 months." But it's an open-ended question, and I just bring it up—as far as my reading is concerned.

As to the witness immunity section of the bill, I am fully familiar with the pros and cons of use immunity and transactional immunity. I have indicated some feelings that perhaps use of immunity provides more incentive for—an incentive to testify. However, I have suggested that should you go through with the transactional immunity, that in my experience threat of perjury, while it sounds very strong, is almost meaningless because it is extremely difficult to prove, and that, possibly, one might consider adding "obstruction of justice" as an allowable prosecution against an individual who might give "peripheral testimony" or conveniently forgets items, or other such types of evasions.

With respect to violations of grand jury secrecy, 1512(c)(3), it's unclear—and I go by the written word—as to whether the historic attorney-client privilege applies, and I think everyone assumes that it does apply; but the language in the statute specifically indicates that the attorney may disclose matters that occurred before the grand jury. I would suggest that you might consider adding in there, "upon the written consent of his client," so there will be no misunderstanding about whether or not there is an attorney-client privilege.

I believe somewhere in your bill you do speak of written consent, and if you speak of it in one instance, I think you should speak of it clearly in the other.

"Rights and duties of the grand jury, the attorney for the grand jury." It is not clear from the bill as to whether or not a target defendant is one that falls in the class of testimony where it is summarized by the agent as opposed to investigative grand jury. I understand the intent of the committee is that it applies only to the investigative grand jury. That being the case, it should be written in, as there really isn't any distinguishing factor in our present system between a regular and investigative grand jury unless you specifically call a special grand jury. This is so because we currently use regular grand juries as investigative grand juries in most situations.

And I would suggest that if notice is required to the 1,000 individuals we indicated, by means of the so-called regular grand jury then, obviously, that would make the system literally unworkable.

Mr. FISH. Excuse me, did you refer to A1 of the bill?

Mr. SAGER. Yes, sir, I'm referring to section 3329(b)(2)(B)—as in boy—"Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for the Government."

Mr. FISH. Thank you.

Mr. SAGER. Some sections I didn't comment on because I have no differences with the committee whatsoever—or suggestions.

I believe this begins on page 12, "Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney."

"Appearance of counsel with witness before the grand jury." I suggested that this provision is excellent, and is a long overdue safeguard both for the rights of the witnesses and protection against the overly aggressive prosecutor.

I might add an additional experience that I had most recently, to appear with a client at a special Virginia State grand jury session, which now allows counsel in the grand jury room under their so-called investigative grand jury. They have two separate grand jury systems in Virginia.

By being with the witness in the grand jury room several things were accomplished. In one instance the prosecutor began to belittle the witness and started cracking some jokes. After a very brief exchange between us, the prosecutor calmed down, apologized, and continued with a meaningful line of inquiry. Second, I was able to confer with my client and, therefore, expedite—and I must emphasize "expedite"—the investigation; because, frankly, had I been at that grand jury session and not have been allowed to enter the room I would have done one of two things as a defense attorney: I would have either advised my client to take the fifth amendment to every question asked, or I would have advised my client to get up and come into the hall and confer with me after each and every question.

And I might say—I forgot to put this in my paper, but the grand jury takes a dim view of witnesses who get up and leave the grand jury to confer with their attorney—which is a right that is granted to them—and it is a sign to the grand jury, "Does the witness feel he has to hide something, because he keeps running out of the room." And when he goes out of the room often, grand jurors become rather impatient. And if they weren't mad at him to begin with, I can assure you that they are very irritated with him at that point.

I do have one suggestion with respect to this. You have some language here that counsel can be removed if he impedes the proceedings. I spoke with Mr. Belsky briefly about this. It is my suggestion, and I think it is crucial—I think it will serve to answer challenges to this section—that you write in a provision that an attorney may not represent more than one defendant as to the same investigation.

This limited representation is a fact in Federal law with respect to court appointment of attorneys for indigent clients. Unless the statute has been changed since I last read it, it says the court will appoint only one attorney per client with respect to indigent cases. This is, perhaps, the only area of concern and conflict that I can see as to this section. And there are Federal decisions that have reversed cases where lawyers have represented more than two or more defendants jointly, and it has happened in my own court.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sager, have you completed the section of your remarks dealing with appearance of counsel?

Mr. SAGER. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. May I suggest it is now 11.45, and we have so many things that we must do, and with the permission of the subcommittee, I would like to curtail your summary at this point for the purpose of asking a few questions. I may also add that we have a number of questions that we would like to ask you that we would like to submit in writing to you, if you'd be kind enough to respond to them. That would be most helpful to us all.

So, is that agreeable to you?

Mr. SAGER. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Now I would like to mention to the subcommittee, counsel advises me that when we go into questions, that these do not become part of the record unless the subcommittee votes and decides to do that. Any testimony taken with regard to Mr. Goodwin is not exposed to the public without the express approval of the subcommittee.

With that explanation, the first question I would like to ask, Mr. Sager is: Would you summarize as best you can your experience with Mr. Goodwin and your experience as a witness in the grand jury room.

Mr. SAGER. The situation with respect to Mr. Goodwin—as brief as I can make it—involved a situation where some FBI agents failed to report accurately their findings with respect to a wiretap involving a single—local Richmond—police officer.

The Richmond office discovered the so-called improper conduct, and the inquiry was begun at the request of the U.S. attorney at that time. There were two inquiries: One against the local police officer for the wiretap, and one with respect to the FBI agents. It was determined—it was not my decision, but it was determined—that the initial inquiry with respect to the FBI be by a grand jury with the purpose of making it public, which is obviously and completely contrary to what happened.

I handled only the police officer's phase of it since I was considered a material witness to the other phase of improper conduct by the FBI. That investigation took nearly two weeks, and a detailed written report was submitted by the U.S. attorney to Washington by Mr. Cummings who had been in contact with Mr. Thornberg.

It's ironic that, primarily at my suggestion, Mr. Cummings finally prevailed upon the Department of Justice to send a neutral prosecutor into Richmond because the morale of the FBI agency had dropped to such an all-time low that we found it difficult for any of the assistants to have any cooperation on other cases. And we felt like since he had finished the report, that someone in Washington should make a decision as to the alternative choices that he had laid out in his written report.

Several days later an individual showed up whom I had never heard of by the name of Guy Goodwin, with an associate by the name of Merkle. I was in charge of the Richmond office, and extended to him all of the courtesies of the office.

During the several-day period of time, he would take me from my activities and we would sit down in a room and he would start asking questions. Well, his questions became so ridiculous that they began to defy my imagination and logic as a prosecutor with 6 years of experience. I mean he wanted to know everything that my office had done from day one including where the hour and second hand on the clock was at every moment.

Finally, I had some words with Mr. Goodwin, suggesting to him that I could not comprehend what in the world he was trying to do, that if, in fact, someone felt there was a violation all he was doing was ruining any good evidence. I'm afraid, because of some righteous indignation, I called Washington.

The U.S. attorney at that time, Mr. Cummings, had not been in office more than three weeks, or a month, and had no previous criminal experience. He really—didn't know what was happening.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Cummings?

Mr. SAGER. Yes, sir.

I managed to make my way up the line of telephones, I guess, to Mr. Thornberg who became rather indignant that an assistant U.S. attorney would call complaining about one of his own men in Washington.

The next day came around, and Mr. Goodwin indicated that he was going to "get" me if it was at all humanly possible. Then he said to me, "Mr. Sager," he says, "You complained a little bit, and I want to protect you." I said, "Protect me? What do you mean 'protect' me?" He said, "Well, I want to advise you of your rights." I said, "Man, you've got to be crazy."—in rather polite language.

He had also convinced the U.S. attorney he was going to protect the Richmond office by taking this new course of procedure. I proceeded to continue to answer all of his questions after I was told by officials in Washington that no one in my office was suspected of any improper conduct whatsoever, and that this was just Mr. Goodwin's way of handling things and "you should go along with it," that Mr. Thornberg himself, as he—Thornberg—stated to me, had been advised of his constitutional rights in an investigation several years prior, and there was just nothing to it. So I said, "OK." I didn't want to lose my job, so we put up with it.

So the questioning went on, day, after day, after day—By the way, I said, "Mr. Goodwin, I don't mind answering any questions, but I tell you what, let's put them on a tape recorder, let's have a stenographer in, or let's have someone else in."

"Mr. Sager, I've never heard of such a request in my life." And he says, "Under no circumstances will I conduct my investigation with a tape recorder on."

I said, "I have nothing to fear for what I have to say, Mr. Goodwin."

To make a long story short, there was no tape recorder, there was no transcript from this pre-grand jury encounter. About the only thing that was gained was, after several more complaints, I came to Washington and had several different assistant attorney generals sit in on later phases of the so-called interrogation; all of this time we were told, "We just want to get all of this, and we don't want it on the record because we don't want 'Jinck's Act' material."

I'm sure everyone is familiar with what "Jinck's Act" material is; that is a written report or statement of a witness that has to be turned over to a defendant at a trial

I said, "Okay, you don't want 'Jinck's' material."

So, this fiasco kept up. Then for no reason whatsoever he started going to the grand jury. I said, "What is the purpose of the grand jury?"

"We want to conduct an independent investigation."

So, he started a so-called independent investigation. The next thing I know he said, "We want you to testify." I said, "I've already given you on the outside 15 hours of testimony, which you and your associate have written down in detail. I'll swear to it; I'll sign an oath to it. What do you want me in the grand jury for?"

"Well, we want to make it part of the record."

I said, "Well, you didn't want to make it part of the record before."

So, we went in the grand jury, again and again and again, and, for about the 18th time, he advised me of my rights. There was an obvious concerted effort by Goodwin to get me to take the fifth amendment, which I would not do.

There may have been 50 witnesses, give or take, by the time he got through with his so-called investigation grand jury blitz in Richmond, Va. He even went so far as to subpena the defense attorney of the primary defendant, the Richmond police officer. The defense attorney, being a former judge, told me that Mr. Goodwin threatened to have him locked up by comment made to his secretary if he didn't show up for the grand jury; that when he got into the grand jury room Mr. Goodwin asked, "Do you have the wiretap equipment?" Whereupon, the fellow laughed in his face—from what I gather—had a few choice words for him, and left the grand jury room.

The witnesses reported to me, grand jurors reported to me, and court reporters reported to me, that 90 percent of Mr. Goodwin's effort through the entire investigation was directed at trying to get evidence to inculpate Rodney Sager with respect to improper activities of the FBI.

Despite all of this, the Department of Justice kept saying, "Just put up with it."

I might add Goodwin and his associate were thrown out of the office once, by the U.S. attorney, because of their conduct. He went throughout the U.S. attorney's office and said, "We don't trust any assistants in Richmond, everything here is going to be done top secret." Newspaper reporters were asked to testify, police as far away as Charlottesville, Va., were brought in and asked to disclose names of informants.

Finally, I went to the district judge with a number of complaints—and this is rather interesting—the ruling was made that I could have access to my grand jury transcripts; and I must have access to them if the Department ever called me back in to the grand jury.

I had been called in three times, the U.S. attorney was called in three times and testified for approximately 7 hours, and another assistant who had worked on this same case with me was called in and testified almost 7 hours. So, the staff of the U.S. attorney's office were being witnesses.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you characterize the nature of your testimony during your 15 hours in the grand jury room?

Mr. SAGER. Well, first he started off by advising me of my rights in the grand jury room—which was not required by the law pursuant to the attendant circumstances—which he had done on numerous occasions before, and which he continued to do in the grand jury room. And I don't have to tell you what a grand jury might think when a prosecutor sits and starts advising you of your rights—in front of a grand jury.

First, he asked me to summarize everything that happened from day one with respect to my offices—overseeing or investigation of this wiretap matter. It took me about an hour to summarize what I could recall. And then he went over every single item—point, by point, by point, by point. And the second time we went in he started over on the same thing—point, by point, by point. The third time he started out all over the same thing.

As an example, when I was trying to determine what had happened with this wiretap, I called two agents in the office and said, "I want to know what the truth is about this case, because a reporter has provided me information that you have not." Mr. Goodwin wanted to know why I didn't have a court reporter in my office transcribing an interview between myself and those FBI agents, individuals whom I interview almost every day of a given week.

There was an error in a written submission to my office in that the second corrected submission was stronger that the first. Consistent with past practices we allowed the FBI to correct their report. Mr. Goodwin thought that was just outright conspiracy. He wouldn't accept the fact that agents come into the U.S. attorney's office daily and make corrections to reports where there are errors. We obviously don't want incorrect items in a report. I'm just talking about the so-called 302's that we use merely for investigative aid purposes; it doesn't go anywhere, but are used only for internal information purposes.

And it was this type of constant badgering, over and over and over again; and I might say, I can make any human being in the United States look bad before a grand jury with this type of questioning: "What did you say 4 days ago at 3:10 in the afternoon? And how can you not tell us exactly what you said?" I mean, just constantly. And, of course, he'd stand up once in a while and walk around. Guy Goodwin is a very mild mannered individual; he's not one of the so-called screaming, overly aggressive individuals in the vein. But he just sits there and just asks broad, sweeping questions that have no relevance whatsoever and are virtually impossible to answer. And whe he does raise his voice—which the transcripts do not indicate—it's like, "How could you allow someone to tear up a piece of paper? That had to be a conspiracy." Why did you do something on such-and-such a date?" after we'd testified 15 times why it was done and, in fact, that it was normal practice for the office to do such.

So, those are just several examples that come to mind.

As a matter of fact, that following all of this, I had written numerous letters to the Department of Justice complaining, and asked for my transcript. I said, "Now, certainly why don't you give me my transcript and I'll point out the grand jury abuses; I'll point out the misleading statements that this man has made with impunity to the grand jury."

To this date, I have never gotten my transcript. Why? The investigation was eventually closed, and there were no indictments.

When an individual is willing to give an affidavit, has testified or is allowing himself to be subjected to interviews, you don't put him in the grand jury. I mean, that is a rule of practice that we follow with precision, unless he was criminal and we were afraid that he might vacilate, and we needed to lock him in and put more pressure on him in the absence of a sworn affidavit.

He subpenaed the defense attorney. That is unheard of. He had no reason to subpena the defense attorney for the grand jury.

I might add, he gave immunity to the wrong FBI agent during the course of his investigation—which was just comical at the time.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sager, are you reading from a summary of your statement?

Mr. SAGER. I made a summary which I forwarded to the Department.

Mr. EILBERG. Might we also have a copy of that summary? And, again, that will be on a confidential basis so that it could not be released without agreement of the subcommittee.

Mr. SAGER. Yes, sir.

I'll tell you a real horror story. Goodwin was examining one of the FBI agents, and Goodwin had the FBI file, and in the FBI file was a brown envelope that was to contain a receipt for a certain item. This receipt was not in the envelope for the simple reason it had been returned by another agent at a previous time.

Goodwin handed the file to the FBI agent—as it was related to me—and said: "Is there a receipt in that envelope? Tell the grand jury why the receipt isn't there."

Can you imagine?

The agent, not knowing where the receipt is because someone else had turned it over, and the impact on the grand jury——

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sager, we're running out of time. I'm sorry. This is all very interesting; we'd like to have you for hours, but time simply doesn't permit it.

I'm simply going to ask my colleagues if they have any questions at this point.

Mr. Fish?

Mr. FISH. No.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes, I do.

Were you indicted?

Mr. SAGER. No, sir. I might add that the Allied Chemical Kepone grand jury probe which I headed was subsequent to this probe.

Mr. SAWYER. Apparently, the grand jury didn't follow Mr. Goodwin very far. I assume they handed down a no-true bill.

Mr. SAGER. No, sir; they did not hand down a no-true bill. The investigation was terminated by a higher-up in Washington.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, in any event, you know, if I were voting here based on what I heard, I certainly would vote to hand down an indictment on Goodwin; you certainly sold me on that. I've had the unpleasantness over many years of running into a lawyer—not necessarily a prosecutor—who may have shared some of these characteristics.

And I do think you've made a contribution here. You do have the rare experience of not only having been on both sides of the fence, but also a witness—which very few of us have had the opportunity of being.

But during the 7 years that you were active as an assistant U.S. district attorney, did you abuse the grand jury in an investigative way?

Mr. SAGER. I think, in hindsight, there are things that I did that I would have done differently, in some instances.

Mr. SAWYER. Were you aware of—within the Western District of Virginia, if that's the correct district——

Mr. SAGER. Eastern district.

Mr. SAWYER. Eastern district—of abuses going on regularly in grand juries by the U.S. district attorney's office?

Mr. SAGER. Well, sir, the answer would depend on how you define "abuses." I was aware—I observed—situations where prosecutors, off the record, told grand jurors that certain witnesses were crooks, that they were con men, that they were expected to be evasive in their responses to questions, that—not to pay attention to anything that they might have to say. I have been in the grand jury when the prosecutor, off the record, joked with the grand jurors about the testimony of the particular witness.

And let me say, I have never seen an instance in my district where the grand jury refused to follow the suggestions of any assistant U.S. attorney. And I might suggest, also, that it's not the grand jury that conducts these investigations. They sit back, and out of 20 to 23 grand jurors, I don't think that four or five ever ask questions with respect to a detailed investigation.

Mr. SAWYER. Of course, in the regular proceeding, almost all State courts run through rubberstamp ones as a practical matter. U.S. district attorney's issue a warrant and proceed without the benefit of a grand jury. They have the power to proceed without warrant of a grand jury.

Mr. SAGER. Well, in the Federal system that is not exact——

Mr. SAWYER. I know that's not true except that if you run through a rubberstamp to get away from it, but in most State court proceedings—in most States that I'm familiar with—they only use grand juries, really, for investigative purposes when they convene—when it's kind of an event. And, usually, they operate by warrant of complaint—warrant in filing information for a preliminary hearing—so that—you know—the fact that the prosecutor can make the unilateral decision as to whether or not to prosecute is not an unusual situation. The usual situation is where he rubberstamps it through a grand jury or where he does it without a grand jury.

Mr. SAGER. Yes, sir, but with respect to the grand jury system, that is not the way that the system was meant to work when it was established many, many, many years ago.

Mr. SAWYER. That might be, but in the State, most all States—at least States I'm familiar with, and I probably shouldn't say most all, but many of the States—only convene a grand jury if they really need subpena power, for all practical purposes. And a prosecutor, unilaterally, makes the decision to proceed with the prosecution, based on the evidence he has. And that is a practical matter that is probably true in 90-odd percent of the Federal prosecutions where they merely let the agent do the same thing, that a grand get a rubberstamped 30 in a day, and——

Mr. SAGER. That's entirely correct.

Mr. SAWYER [continuing]. So that is there anything so unusual that in an investigative grand jury, which is really convened—as you know and I know—to get subpena power? That is the big thing you get out of an investigative grand jury that you don't have otherwise.

Mr. SAGER. No; you get something more than that. You get the opportunity to get a witness alone without his counsel, in a room in front of—what is it, 19 to 23 individuals? And you can rant and rave to your heart's content with that witness without anyone, really, ever having any idea about what's going on inside that grand jury room.

Mr. SAWYER. Did you rant and rave when you conducted a grand jury?

Mr. SAGER. No, sir, but I raised my voice at witnesses. I've told witnesses, frankly, that I thought they were lying to the grand jury.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, one thing—you know—with the statement that you made, I'm in favor of a full transcript of the hearings, by your raising the additional question that that doesn't show the inflections or the facial grimaces, or other things that don't go into a printed record. But isn't that true of every trial judge operating with a jury—and a petit jury, when you go on appeal? Judges can say things 15 different ways, as you know, and have a tremendous impact on the jury, and it doesn't show in the printed record. And yet——

Mr. SAGER. That is not exactly correct, sir. There are two phases to that question that are entirely different from the grand jury: one, what a judge says is all on the record for appeal purposes; and, second, there have been many instances where the attorneys have been diligent in pointing out and placing objections into the record about the comments of the judge—they way he has placed himself in trial, even his voice fluctuation—and has carried such issues on appeal to the court of appeals. The witness in the grand jury has no such opportunity.

And that is why these so-called abuses are not reported to the judge. Where is he going to see them? Most of the witnesses that go into the grand jury room never ask for an attorney anyway. Furthermore, let's not fool ourselves that by allowing counsel in the grand jury that we're going to do anything extraordinary with respect to slowing down the process.

But even without counsel in the grand jury room, a sobering impact on any prosecutor is that every word he utters will be a record. And I'm here to tell you——

Mr. SAWYER. I don't disagree with that.

Mr. SAGER. I'm here to tell you that I have observed and heard, and personally witnesses, on numerous occasions, prosecutors saying to the court reporter, "That's enough; this is off the record."

Mr. EILBERG. Would the gentleman yield?

We have two other witnesses scheduled, and we have a very brief time in which to continue. If you have additional questions, Mr. Sawyer, unless there's something you must have right now, would you submit them to the witness so that he may respond to them?

Mr. SAWYER. Surely, I'd just like to ask one more question.

Supposing the prosecutor, through—if we take as an example our friend Goodwin, let's assume he got an indictment out of this thing, what does it profit him to get an indictment, let's say unethically or whatever, if he then has the pleasure of trying a case in open court to a petit jury with a judge and another lawyer; he hasn't gotten himself much has he?

Mr. SAGER. Oh, yes he has. First of all, Mr. Goodwin prosecuted very, very few of his cases. He was a circuit rider. His prosecutions were left to others. He got his indictments and disappeared. Contrary to the experience that 95 percent of all indictments end in convictions,

I understand that 75 percent of Mr. Goodwin's indictments were either dismissed before ever going to trial, or reduced—which indicates, without any question, that individuals were indicated without the least scintilla of evidence.

Second, depending upon the individual's reputation, he has ruined somebody in the public eyes. If I were indicted, and the case was thrown out tomorrow, the stigma that would attach to what happened to me would never be erased in my community.

Mr. SAWYER. But the record in the national statistics indicates, then, that—thank goodness—we're blessed with a very, very minimal amount amount of "Mr. Goodwins;" right?

Mr. SAGER. That is a fact with respect to indictments such as that; but, sir, this is just one of many examples, I understand, that has been pointed out.

Mr. SAWYER. All right, I yield.

Mr. EILBERG. We're very much indebted to you. We could spend hours with you, but we can't. And we thank you very much for your contribution here today. I'm sure you made a contribution to the subcommittee and to whatever the subcommittee and the House might do.

Mr. SAGER. May I just say that I did not want my testimony today, in any way, to sound as a vendetta against Guy Goodwin. I have tried to be honest and forthright with my comments on my 8 years, now, of experience, and I would like that experience and my comments to be taken in that vein—anything I have to say about Goodwin is only as an example of a situation that can arise.

And I'm certainly pleased, I might add, and as my written comments show, that the other two strong areas of the bill were the requirements of recording of all proceedings and the availability of grand jury transcript.

Mr. EILBERG. You will let us have a summary of your evaluation of the Goodwin situation.

Mr. SAGER. What summary, sir?

Mr. EILBERG. In your statement you were referring to notes involving your experience with——

Mr. SAGER. I had a letter, that a year later I tried to recall some deals. We can get it Xeroxed. I'll be happy to let you have a copy of it.

And I would like to congratulate the committee and Mr. Eilberg for their efforts. I think this movement and this measure is long overdue.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Sager.

Thank you, Mrs. Sager, for being here.

Mr. SAGER. Thank you very much. I'll have copies of the document forwarded to the staff.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you.

Re Richmond FBI Wiretap Investigation.

Hon. HAROLD R. TYLER, JR.,
Deputy Attorney General, Main Justice Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JUDGE TYLER: As you can tell by the attached letter which was prepared back in July of 1976, I had debated the usefulness of additional correspondence. Inasmuch as the local bureau of police continues to protect the original wrongdoer, I must, as a matter of conscience, forward this letter to correct the record once and for all prior to your departure. The recent promotion of the involved Richmond police officer after all the federal agents had been disciplined is an insult that cannot be ignored. Why your office refuses to take appropriate action is a perplexing and troublesome mystery. Justice has certainly suffered as a result thereof, most of which must be attributed to Guy Goodwin who remains on the federal payroll.

Notwithstanding these problems, I nevertheless wish you the best in your new endeavors.

Very truly yours,

RODNEY SAGER.

Re Richmond FBI Wiretap Investigation.

HON. HAROLD R. TYLER, JR.,
Deputy Attorney General,
Main Justice Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JUDGE TYLER: It is with the greatest of respect for you as an individual and for your position as Deputy Attorney General of the United States that I reply to your letter of June 17, 1976. My conscience compels that I respond to what I believe to be major errors contained therein. I trust you will give this your mature consideration.

Your second paragraph suggests that one-half of our personal conference of April 13, 1976, was devoted to my allegations of misconduct directed against Mr. Goodwin. Such was not the case. Of approximately one hour and 20 minutes, I would suggest that less than 15 minutes in total was devoted to Goodwin and Merkle. Your Associate, Mr. Giuliani, had instructed me that I was not to document any complaints against these men at this meeting, but that I could make reference to Goodwin in explaining certain of our actions within the Richmond office. These are precisely the guidelines that were followed in the conference. In fact, Judge Tyler, you stated on at least two occasions during the meeting that you would not have handled the investigation in the manner in which Goodwin did and that a former law clerk of yours had previously been extremely critical of Goodwin's conduct as a Justice Department official. While I was critical of Goodwin during my recitation. I can assure you that there was no attempt to document allgations at this meeting, especially in light of your Office's refusal to allow me access to my grand jury testimony, which you said access has been approved by the Court.

Your letter next suggests that Goodwin and Merkle were the individuals who were primarily responsible for uncovering misconduct of Richmond FBI Agents. Such a statement is completely and totally erroneous and wholly contrary to the facts as they exist. The so-called "misconduct of the FBI Agents" was initially uncovered by myself along with the assistance of another Assistant United States Attorney in the Richmond office on June 27, 1975, long before Goodwin and Merkle were ever dispatched to Richmond. A detailed report was immediately given to Mr. Cummings, the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, who, shortly thereafter, empaneled a Richmond grand jury to probe this area. Mr. Cummings advises me that at all times during this initial probe he was in direct contact with Richard Thornburgh, your Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. The referenced grand jury investigated the matter thoroughly, resulting in Mr. Cummings presenting a detailed memorandum to Mr. Thornburgh containing specific suggestions as to courses of action that should be pursued.

With respect to the Richmond police officer involved in the alleged wiretap, my office was preparing to take criminal action against him, and, in fact, informal plea negotiations had begun. Goodwin did not appear until after the above events occurred, and the net results of his worldwind blitz is that on one has or will be charged by the Federal government, including the original wrongdoer—the subject police officer. Perhaps it would please you to know that that individual has recently been promoted to Acting Lieutenant on the local police force!

Whoever has advised you that Goodwin is responsible for doing anything other than jeopardizing the Richmond case has unfortunately distorted the truth as it exists. It would appear that Mr. Thornburgh should correct the record, as I am advised that he directly supervised Goodwin's handling of the Richmond case for a substantial period of time. At any rate, your advisors have not been candid with you as to the true and accurate facts in this matter.

You next invite me to bring forth additional information as to alleged misconduct against Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle. I am sure you recognize the difficulty in searching back almost one year to pinpoint such areas, especially since Goodwin, with approval from Mr. Thornburgh, removed all of the original records from our office. This is further complicated by the continuing refusal of the Department to allow me access to my grand jury testimony. Nevertheless, I invite your attention to the following areas of suggested misconduct, prosecutorial abuse, and/or professional malfeasance:

1. All substantive statements given by me in Goodwin's grand jury were previously given and available without the necessity of Goodwin's 15 hours of harrassment: Such conduct served only to obscure the salient facts involved, wasted taxpayers' money, and produced nothing original. What, then, was its purpose?

2. The harrassment by Goodwin of a United States Attorney, William B. Cummings, by subjecting him to over seven hours of grand jury testimony and badgering, when, in fact, he had always been a friendly witness: There was no purpose for him to be taken before a grand jury and therein mistreated.

3. Over six hours of grand jury cross-examination of Assistant United States Attorney David A. Schneider regarding his assistance in uncovering the referenced conduct when, in fact, he likewise had previously been a friendly witness who had already given a detailed deposition as to the facts: Again, such grand jury behavior would serve only to ruin Mr. Schneider as a potential witness for the government. What purpose was served and how can Goodwin's conduct herein be supported.

4. Mr. Goodwin's subpoenaing to the grand jury of a defense attorney representing the Richmond police officer: This lawyer was a former judge of a court of record within the State and at all times a distinguished member of the Virginia Bar. David Meade White, the gentleman in question, advised me that Goodwin badgered his secretary and impuned his integrity by asking him in the grand jury without any supporting facts as to whether he possessed certain wiretap equipment. Since no action has ever been taken against this former judge by Goodwin, his questions must have been without factual support and, therefore, highly unprofessional and belittling. Such an act in and of itself would warrant immediate reprimand.

5. Goodwin's giving of immunity to the wrong FBI agent: Such a grossly negligent act in a case involving serious and far-reaching issues would again suggest professional incompetence warranting immediate reprimand.

6. Information that Goodwin misled and deceived the grand jury by asking FBI Agent Del Roberts to produce a receipt for certain equipment from a file handed him in the grand jury by Goodwin when, in fact, such receipt was absent from the file and had been given to the previous grand jury through another witness: Such conduct, if accurate, is inexcusable.

7. Guy Goodwin causing a Federal Treasury Agent in Richmond to be censored by his inspectors because he exercised his constitutional freedom in sending a letter to the editor of a Richmond newspaper referencing the then pending investigation: The individual is Fred Denham, and he was acting solely and exclusively as President of the Federal Criminal Investigators Association and not as a local agent. If this allegation is accurate, then it is a throw-back to totalitarian government.

8. The published and reported articles indicating that over 50 percent of Goodwin's previous indictments in other cases have been dismissed prior to trial: Such a record would suggest gross incompetence and must be used as background in reviewing the Richmond situation.

9. Comments of various United States Attorneys criticizing Goodwin's conduct with respect to matters of which they were personally aware: I have offered these names before and was shocked to hear that my complaint was dismissed by Shahen without their having been contacted as to their knowledge of Goodwin. I again offer the names of the Honorable Stan Pitkin, John Goldstein, Sid Lezack and certain of his Assistants, the Honorable Robert Rusk, and the Honorable Whitney North Seymore, Jr.; as to Merkle, the Honorable Robert Rusk, John Boyd, and William Deachman.

10. Slanderous statements by Goodwin that he did not trust any of the Assistant United States Attorneys in the Richmond office, along with his advising secretaries at Richmond to keep matters from me and other members of the staff: Can such conduct be condoned?

11. Goodwin's abuse of his authority by questioning Assistants in the Richmond office as to whether I had complained about his actions: This was in no way material to his criminal investigation and served only to intimidate other Assistant United States Attorneys as to matters with which it was not his responsibility or authority to investigate.

12. Consant harassment of myself by Goodwin which began immediately after I had offered constructive criticism as to his conduct. This reactive conduct underscores his poor judgment and abuse of discretion.

13. The reported conduct of Goodwin and Merkle referencing their repeated attempts to force law enforcement agents to disclose the names of their informants before the grand jury: Such conduct is highly irregular. Should it be condoned?

14. Goodwin's accumulation of thousands of pages of grand jury transcripts which, I am sure, caused the taxpayers, with all costs taken into consideration, in excess of $100,000.00 without even the original wrongdoer being indicted: Without access to the records, I can only suggest from my observations coupled with my own in-depth grand jury experience that Goodwin learned little, if anything, that was not originally reported by the first grand jury. It would appear that even successful prosecution of the original wrongdoer may have been severely jeopardized if not made impossible by such tactics.

15. A letter of August 28, 1975, from William B. Cummings to your office, copy enclosed, documenting a threatened assault to his person by Merkle on August 27, 1975: Such letter also underscored certain of Goodwin's improper conduct and behavior. Copies of the letter also went previously to Mr. Thornburgh. Nevertheless, no action was ever taken as to Goodwin or Merkle. One can only ask, "Why not?"

16. Mr. Goodwin's highly-improper directive and warning to myself and Mr. Schneider in August of 1975 that we were not to discuss facts of which we were personally aware with any of the defendant's attorneys: Such a directive was in total contravention of the law and again suggests incompetence and/or abuse of prosecutorial authority.

17. Mr. Goodwin's constant refusal to allow me to record or transcribe those sessions where he interrogated me at length prior to the grand jury: His statements that he did not want Jencks Act material were completely contradicted by his requiring my appearance and testimony at numerous grand jury sessions thereafter. Within the grand jury, he attempted to use his unverified notes to impeach my testimony, which, in essence, made him a witness without being sworn. Such conduct again is unprofessional, irregular and improper.

18. A letter to Mr. Thornburgh from me dated September 3, 1975, copy enclosed, suggesting at that time improper conduct by Goodwin: No response was ever received to that communication, and, apparently, no action was taken to correct the areas of concern. In light of Mr. Goodwin's previous track record, one again must ask, "Why not?"

19. An article printed in the January 1973 Juris Doctor magazine which I supplied to you previously and which documents numerous areas of prosecutorial misconduct as to Goodwin: Any of the matters so suggested, if accurate, would warrant disciplinary action. These matters of necessity should have been incorporated into any investigation of my complaints as they strengthen the credibility of my allegations. Indeed, any of them substantiated should warrant immediate discipline.

20. The printed statement of Whitney North Seymore, Jr., a former United States Attorney from New York, that Goodwin had conducted "free-wheeling" grand jury investigations with "little apparent regard for the rights of witnesses" and leaving behind him "a trail of outraged government and private lawyers": Such a strong indictment must surely corroborate the complaints from Richmond and in and of itself deserves serious consideration.

In conclusion, I again ask for you to supply me with my grand jury testimony so that I may underscore additional areas of what I feel to be improper prosecutorial conduct. As to the above-stated matters, I can assure you that they are a result of only a brief reflection by me of the events that occurred in the summer and fall of 1975. Since I am no longer employed by the government, I can only emphasize that my interest is to have the record reflect the facts accurately and fairly. As you know, on my own initiative and without suggestion of anyone else. I voluntarily took a polygraph test which clearly and unequivocally cleared me of any improper conduct with respect to the alleged FBI coverup. I have no reason, therefore, to bear a grudge or to contrive meaningless accusations. My desire is that justice will be done, and I, accordingly, hope that you review this letter with an open mind and an impartial attitude.

Respectfully yours,

RODNEY SAGER,
Former Senior Assistant U.S. Attorney.

Richmond, Va., November 12, 1977.

Re Enclosure of Seven-page Letter For Inclusion in the Congressional Testimony of Rodney Sager as to H.R. 94.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI,
Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CIVILETTI: Pursuant to our telephone conversation of November 9, 1977, I am enclosing herein a letter of July 11, 1976, to Harold Tyler and a cover letter thereto of January 17, 1977, which said letter and comments are being made a part of my referenced Congressional testimony. These, while referred to in my testimony, had not been forwarded to Congressman Eilberg at the time of his November 3, 1977, letter to you containing my unedited transcript. This seven-page letter is forwarded to enable you to have access to the entire record for purposes of your response to the Committee.

I want to sincerely thank you for personally speaking with me by telephone about the Goodwin fiasco in Richmond. It was meaningful and encouraging that you have taken under advisement my request to meet with you personally in a final effort to resolve the problems that affect me, the Richmond United States Attorney's Office, and Guy Goodwin. Your consideration is requested upon my seven years of commitment to the Department of Justice. Underscoring my request and sincerity is an enclosed resume revealing my credentials for your use and information. Also enclosed is an August 29, 1975, memorandum which in and of itself exonerates me of any improper conduct, as well as a letter of May 31, 1976, to Michael Shaheen, Jr., depicting my utter frustration with the then existing Office of Professional Responsibility. I apologize to you for the righteous indignation expressed in that letter to Mr. Shaheen, but the substance of same is offered in response to your question as to whether there has ever been a full hearing before that Committee. Obviously, the answer is "no".

My specific requests in summary form, as related during our conversation, are as follows:

1. Requested clearance to cooperate with Richmond area prosecutors as to their investigation into the original Richmond wiretaps matter;
2. To meet with you personally in an atttempt to have the happenings at Richmond fairly and impartially reviewed;
3. To have my previous complaint against Guy Goodwin as to professional misconduct fully heard, and to have access to the entire record of his investigation at Richmond in order to document my complaints; and
4. To review my grand jury transcripts (permission previously having been granted by the Court) in order to clarify same and to further document the record.

In conclusion, I would like to again thank you for your sincere attention to these problems. A great injustice has been committed by the prior administration in this matter and in other matters as to protecting Goodwin, and it is with optimism and hope that I look forward to the possibility of working with you toward the common objective to correcting same. Your administration now has the opportunity to correct these past injustices and to gain meaningful experience and insight therefrom in making the Department of Justice truly responsive to the citizens of this great country. With these objectives, I look forward to meeting with you personally in the near future.

Respectfully yours,

RODNEY SAGER.

Enclosures.

P.S. Bill Grey, who was Executive Director of United States Attorneys during these problems, had the opportunity then to review most of the facts as an impartial observer. I spoke with him recently, and he is willing to discuss the matter with you if you so desire. As your know, he is now the United States Attorney for Vermont. He was reviewing the record and had personnally spoken to Goodwin, myself, and others within the Department just prior to my resignation in 1976.

Mr. SAGER. And I would like to congratulate the committee and Mr. Eilberg for their efforts. I think this movement and this measure is long overdue.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Sager.

Thank you, Mr. Sager, for being here.

Mr. SAGER. Thank you very much. I'll have copies of the document forwarded to the staff.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you.

[Whereupon, at 12:05 p.m., the closed session was adjourned.]

NOVEMBER 3, 1977.

Re Attached testimony of Rodney Sager, Esquire.

Mr. BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI,
Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CIVILETTI: On October 13, 1977, the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, considering H.R. 94, heard the testimony of Rodney Sager, Esquire. A motion to go into Executive Session to receive his testimony was approved—to allow the Subcommittee to hear the testimony and to determine whether it should be included as part of the record. Today, the Subcommittee voted to open the session and include Mr. Sager's testimony as part of the published record on H.R. 94 and other bills.

The Subcommittee also voted to supply the Department of Justice, and through the Department, Guy Goodwin, Esquire, within the Department, a copy of the transcript and the formal statement of Mr. Sager and to provide an opportunity to respond if so desired. The response would be limited to Mr. Sager's testimony of a particular investigation in Virginia involving Mr. Sager and Mr. Goodwin.

I am, therefore, transmitting with this letter a copy of the relevant portions of the transcript of Mr. Sager and his formal statement and inviting you to forward a copy of the transcript and the statement to Mr. Goodwin in your office and provide him an opportunity to discuss with you whether or not a response should be forthcoming.

The staff of the Subcommittee is presently editing the hearing transcript and we would like to complete the editing process by the end of November. Thus, if any response is to be made, we would like to have it within the next two weeks. In addition, we have never received the Department of Justice's formal comments on H.R. 94, nor the response of the Department to questions submitted at the time of the testimony. We would like these documents, as well, no later than two weeks from today.

Thank you again for your cooperation. If there are any questions concerning this matter, please feel free to contact the Subcommittee Counsel, Martin H. Belsky, at 225-5727.

Sincerely,

JOSHUA EILBERG, Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., November 28, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your letter of November 3, 1977 transmitted to me a copy of the testimony of Mr. Rodney Sager before your Subcommittee and requested my response thereto. I welcome the opportunity to fully and completely respond to former Assistant United States Attorney Sager's accusations regarding the investigation conducted by attorneys of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice into allegations of illegal wiretapping by a member of the Richmond, Virginia police and into allegations of misconduct by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in their concealment of this crime.

Mr. Sager's charges of harassment and grand jury abuse are unfounded, and I respectfully submit that an attempt to mount an argument for grand jury reform based upon the testimony of this witness is ill conceived. The charges made by Mr. Sager were thoroughly investigated by the Department's Office of Professional Responsibility and by former Deputy Attorney General Harold Tyler and found to be groundless. I am enclosing letters stating their conclusions in this regard by Mr. Michael Shaheen, Director, Office of Professional Responsibility and former Deputy Attorney General Harold Tyler. This case has also been reviewed by me and I agree with the conclusion of Judge Tyler that there is "absolutely no merit" to Mr. Sager's accusations.

The circumstances of the investigation in Richmond, Virginia, were unusual. The Department of Justice conducted a criminal investigation of agents of its own investigative branch, and during the course of this investigation alleged questionable conduct on the part of Assistant United States Attorney Sager, the Government's principal witness to the alleged wrongdoing of the agents, was suggested by information provided by the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents. Admissions made by Mr. Sager, but later retracted, supported the questionable conduct which consisted generally of (1) discussing destruction of an incriminating Federal Bureau of Investigation Headquarters document; (2) discussing false evidence to replace the wiretap equipment seized by the agents and improperly returned to the suspect in the wiretapping case; (3) discussions with Federal Bureau of Investigation agents about changing the contents of Federal Bureau of Investigation documents in a manner which concealed their original efforts to cover-up their discovery of an operational wiretap; (4) agreeing with the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents to delay the required reporting of the wiretap case to the Department of Justice: (5) telling the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents that he had not reported all of their misconduct to the United States Attorney; and (6) agreeing with the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents to urge the United States Attorney that it was unnecessary to report the agents' misconduct to Federal Bureau of Investigation Headquarters in Washington and to take no criminal action against the agents.

As a result of these charges of misconduct on the part of Mr. Sager and his conflicting and contradictory statements regarding them, any criminal prosecution of the agents was rendered impossible. At the conclusion of the grand jury proceedings in this case, the prosecutive merits of the case were reviewed by officials of the Department of Justice, including then Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division, Richard L. Thornburgh. Prosecution of the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents was thoroughly considered and Assistant Attorney General Thornburgh in a memorandum to Attorney General Edward Levi in January 1976, concluded that the prosecution of the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents for their misconduct "was compromised by the conduct of the Assistant United States Attorney involved" as it has been described herein. Assistant Attorney General Thornburgh also concluded that "contradictory" and "conflicting" testimony of Mr. Sager rendered him a witness upon whom a successful prosecution of the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents could not be based. However, the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents were disciplined and Assistant United States Attorney Sager was notified of the intention of the Department of Justice to initiate administrative proceedings against him to reach a determination as to his questioned conduct and the appropriate sanctions if his actions were found to be official misconduct. Mr. Sager's resignation followed.

Mr. Sager makes numerous groundless accusations of misconduct on the part of the attorneys of the Criminal Division who were assigned to this investigation. However, his principal complaint seems to be that he was singled out for harassment and advised of his rights by attorney Goodwin as a means of retaliation in order to "get" Mr. Sager. This is not the case. The Criminal Division attorneys began a new grand jury proceedings in this case when it was learned that members of the United States Attorney's office who had handled the original grand jury had allowed it to become hopelessly "tainted" by permitting unauthorized persons, the very agents under investigation, to be present in the grand jury room during the testimony of a witness. Since under the law any indictment returned by this grand jury would have been invalid it was necessary to begin anew with a fresh grand jury. In preparation of the new grand jury inquiry, it was necessary to interview Mr. Sager regarding previously undisclosed details of an almost five hour conversation he had with the accused Federal Bureau of Investigation agents on the night he learned of the agents' concealment of the local wiretap. According to the agents it was during this five hour conversation that many of the alleged acts of misconduct by Sager occurred. During the first interview Mr. Sager made admissions to the Departmental attorneys which appeared to corroborate certain of the allegations of misconduct on his part which had been previously reported by the agents. As a result it appeared that he may have been involved in the effort to conceal the criminal activity of the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents. It was therefore necessary to treat both the agents and Mr. Sager as possible subjects of the investigation, advising them of their rights and dealing with them in an arms length manner. The decision to advise Mr. Sager of his rights at this time was one that was concurred in by officials of the Criminal Division as a necessary prerequisite to further questioning of Mr. Sager.

As you can see from the facts set forth above, there was a valid basis for the Criminal Division's decision to advise Mr. Sager of his rights at this juncture of the investigation. Thus, the act of doing so was not done merely as an act of retalation by Goodwin as Mr. Sager testified before your Subcommittee. In his testimony before your Subcommittee, Mr. Sager stated that Goodwin told him that Goodwin "was going to get me" and then added "you complained a little bit, and I want to protect you," apparently by advising him of his rights. (Page 17, Transcript of Testimony of Rodney Sager before the Subcommittee, October 13, 1977.) This testimony has been emphatically denied by both attorneys who jointly conducted all inteviews of Mr. Sager. Mr. Goodwin and Mr. Merkle also deny Mr. Sager's similar statement, quoted in the Richmond Times Dispatch, October 20, 1977, that Goodwin "said he was going to get me and my assistants and make us part of the conspiracy."

Mr. Sager also complains to your Subcommittee that interviews of him by Departmental attorney Goodwin were conducted for fifteen hours and consisted of "ridiculous" questions which had to do with "everything that my office had done from day one including where the hour hand was on the clock," (page 16, Transcript of Testimony of Rodney Sager before the Subcommittee, October 13, 1977). This allegation is without merit. The interviews of Mr. Sager attempted to recreate previously undisclosed details of the almost five hour meeting between Mr. Sager and the Federal Bureau of Investigation agents on June 27, 1975 during which had occurred many of the improper acts of Sager which the agents had reported. In addition the interviews attempted to learn the details of subsequent meetings of Mr. Sager with the agents and with various members of the Richmond police Department involved in this case.

To recreate the details of these lengthy meetings required a substantial amount of interview time. Contemporaneous records of the attorneys involved indicate that the interviews of Mr. Sager totalled, not fifteen hours as Mr. Sager claims, but approximately eight or nine hours over a period of three weeks. Present during the last half of these interviews in addition to Mr. Goodwin and Mr. Merkle were Deputy Assistant Attorneys General of the Criminal Division. These officials also deny that any improper questioning of Mr. Sager occurred during his interviews. In regard to his grand jury testimony, Mr. Sager complains that the questioning consisted of "broad sweeping" and repetitious questions that had no relevance to the inquiry being conducted. Reviews of the grand jury transcriptions of Mr. Sager's testimony disclose that this is not the case. While the questioning was probing and detailed it was entirely proper under this facts of the investigation and was necessitated by contradictions between statements made in his earlier interviews and his grand jury testimony. These were the express findings of former Deputy Attorney General Tyler who reviewed the transcripts and found "absolutely no merit" to Mr. Sager's claim of abuse. Judge Tyler's letter dated June 17, 1976 to Mr. Sager is attached hereto.

You may also find illuminating the observations of the Honorable Robert R. Merhige, Jr., United States District Court Judge in Richmond, Virginia. As related to Mr. John Dowd of the Criminal Division, Judge Merhige's opinion was that Mr. Goodwin and his associate Mr. Merkle had conducted themselves in a "highly professional" manner throughout the investigation and were "a credit to the Department of Justice." A copy of Mr. Dowd's memorandum of February 12, 1976, reflecting Judge Merhige's comments is attached.

A review of Mr. Sager's testimony before your Subcommittee reveals other charges regarding the manner in which this investigation was conducted which compel emphatic disavowal. After the case was assigned to Departmental attorneys, Mr. Sager was, as a result of his status in the investigation, denied access to the results of the investigation conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Departmental attorneys and the grant jury. Thus he is not in a position to judge the propriety of the decision to grant immunity to certain Federal Bureau of Investigation agents who had invoked their Fifth Amendment rights. His complaint to your Subcommittee that Mr. Goodwin gave immunity to the wrong Federal Bureau of Investigation agents (page 24, Transcript of Testimony of Rodney Sager before the Subcommittee, October 13, 1977), is thus a judgment based on incomplete facts. At you know, no immunity under Title 18, United States Code, Section 6602, et seq., can be granted without the authorization of the appropriate Assistant Attorney General. In this case, the immunities granted by the Court were granted only after former Assistant Attorney General Richard L. Thornburgh of the Criminal Division had reviewed the facts relative to the immunity requests and had approved the grant of immunity. Since Mr. Thornburgh was presented the facts and approved the immunity, I cannot conclude that Mr. Goodwin committed any error in seeking the immunity.

Mr. Sager also attempts to find some misconduct in the subpoenaing of a defense lawyer before the grand jury, (page 23, Transcripts of Testimony of Rodney Sager before the Subcommittee, October 13, 1977). However, the investigation had developed some information that the missing wiretap equipment which had been improperly returned by the agents to the policeman was given to the lawyer. As a result he was requested to testify whether he had possession of the equipment. Although he originally declined to answer claiming an attorney-client privilege, he provided the desired information after a conference with United States District Court Judge Robert Merhige who advised the lawyer that an attorney-client privilege did not protect the disclosure sought by the Government. I concur in the Court's determination of this matter and find no misconduct in the Government's effort to make this inquiry.

In an apparent effort to discredit the investigation conducted in this case, Mr. Sager states that Mr. Goodwin's prior cases consisted of indictments without a "scintilla of evidence," since seventy-five percent of Mr. Goodwin's previous cases were dismissed or reduced. (Page 31, Transcripts of Testimony of Rodney Sager before the Subcommittee, October 13, 1977.) In the same manner that previously published reports erroneously state that Goodwin has returned 400 indictments which were largely unsuccessful, Mr. Sager misspeaks the true facts. According to Departmental records, Mr. Goodwin and attorneys under his supervision have participated at trial or grand jury in only 108 cases where indictments were obtained.

In eleven of these cases the defendants are still fugitives, thus there has been no disposition in these cases. In the ninety-seven cases. In the ninety-seven cases disposed of, seventy-four resulted in convictions of some or all of the defendants. These figures indicate not only that Mr. Sager's figures are erroneous, but that cases prosecuted by Mr. Goodwin have been based on sufficient evidence to convict. As a former trial prosecutor with extensive personal experience before Federal grand juries, I can assure you that these grand juries do not return indictments without a "scintilla of evidence," but in fact seriously and carefully consider the sufficiency of the evidence before returning indictments.

No further purpose will be served by additional comments on the testimony of Mr. Sager other than to again advise the Subcommittee that I have reviewed the investigation conducted in this case and I concur in the conclusion previously reached by the Department's Office of Professional Responsibility and by former Deputy Attorney General Tyler that Mr. Sager's complaints about Mr. Goodwin are "absolutely without merit."

I regret that the time and energy of your Subcommittee and its staff have been expended in the pursuit of testimony of such ephemeral value to your inquiry as that of Mr. Sager. However, I am sure you will agree that the circumstances surrounding Mr. Sager's involvement in this case are, in fact, a strong argument in support of the grand jury's investigative power because, without the grand jury, the problems concerned might not have been reviewed.

I appreciate the opportunity to provide you with the Department's views on this matter.

Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI.

Criminal Division.

U.S. DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., June 17, 1976.

MR. RODNEY SAGER,
Assistant U.S. Attorney, Eastern District of Virginia, Richmond, Va.

DEAR MR. SAGER: This refers to your letter of May 31, 1976, to Michael E. Shaheen, Jr., Counsel, Office of Professional Responsibility, in which you criticize his office's review of your complaint against Department attorneys Guy Goodwin and Robert Merkle.

Your letter of January 21, 1976, to me charged Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle with misconduct in their handling of the Richmond, Virginia Police and FBI Wiretap Case. You complained that Mr. Goodwin abused his prosecutorial authority, and more specifically, "willfully misused the Grand Jury." As I recall, in spite of instructions to the contrary, nearly half of our April 13, 1976, conference was devoted to your allegations of misconduct directed against Mr. Goodwin.

Both this Office and the Office of Professional Responsibility participated in the review of your complaint, a review which included, but was not limited to, an examination of grand jury transcripts and statements from Department attorneys Goodwin and Merkle. An examination of this material does not in any way support your allegations and, in fact, demonstrates that both Department attorneys conducted themselves properly throughout this entire difficult investigation. In fact, contrary to a recently published article, which accuses Mr. Goodwin of trying to cover up for the FBI, as you know, Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle were the ones who were primarily responsible for uncovering the misconduct of the FBI agents.

In any event, I have read your allegations, I have heard you describe them, and I have reviewed this matter in detail on several occasions and I find absolutely no merit to your complaints. I agree entirely with Mr. Shaheen's decision.

However, if you have additional information that was not contained in earlier correspondence to this Office or raised at the April 13, 1976, conference and which bears on your allegations of misconduct against Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle, then Mr. Shaheen and I have no objection to your bringing such information to our attention.

If no such information is available, Mr. Shaheen and I will consider this matter closed.

Sincerely,

HAROLD R. TYLER, Deputy Attorney General.

MR. RODNEY SAGER,
Assistant United States Attorney, Eastern District of Virginia, Richmond, Va.

DEAR MR. SAGER: This is in reference to your letter of January 13, 1976, in which formal complaint was made against Department attorneys Guy L. Goodwin and Robert W. Merkle. Shortly after this complaint was received, an inquiry into this matter, including a review of grand jury minutes, was conducted to determine whether there was any basis to these allegations.

This inquiry has been completed. Our review of its findings indicates that these allegations are without merit and that Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle's conduct during the Richmond wiretapping investigation was not improper.

In my letter of March 17, 1976, I indicated that the Deputy Attorney General or I would be available to consider your allegations in conference. Because these matters were in fact raised at your April 13, 1976, conference with the Deputy Attorney General, I have made my determination on Messrs. Merkle and Goodwin's conduct in consultation with the Deputy Attorney General and members of his staff, and I find that no useful purpose would be served by holding an additional conference on this matter.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL E. SHAHEEN, JR., Counsel.

Mr. GUY L. GOODWIN,
Attorney, General Division, U.S. Department of Justice,

DEAR MR. GOODWIN: On January 13, 1976, Mr. Royney Sager, Assistant United States Attorney, Eastern District of Virginia, filed a complaint against you and Mr. Robert W. Merkle alleging improper conduct in the handling of the Richmond wiretapping investigation. We requested an inquiry into this matter to determine whether there was any basis to these allegations.

This inquiry has been completed. Our review of its findings indicates that these allegations are without merit and that Mr. Merkle and you conducted yourselves in a professional manner throughout the investigation. Deputy Attorney General Harold R. Tyler, Jr. and I have confidence in Mr. Merkle and your abilities to carry out your prospective responsibilities with the Department.

Sincerely,

Mr. ROBERT W. MERKLE,
Attorney, Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice,

DEAR MR. MERKLE: On January 13, 1976, Mr. Rodney Sager, Assistant United States Attorney, Eastern District of Virginia, filed a complaint against you and Mr. Guy L. Goodwin alleging improper conduct in the handling of the Richmond wiretapping investigation. We requested an inquiry into this matter to determine whether there was any basis to these allegations.

This inquiry has been completed. Our review of its findings indicates that these allegations are without merit and that Mr. Goodwin and you conducted yourselves in a professional manner throughout the investigation. Deputy Attorney General Harold R. Tyler, Jr. and I have confidence in Mr. Goodwin and your abilities to carry out your prospective responsibilities with the Department.

Sincerely,

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

FEBRUARY 12, 1977.

Memorandum to: Richard L. Thornburgh, Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division.
From: David M. Dowd, Special Attorney, Criminal Division.
Subject: Allegations against Guy L. Goodwin and Robert Merkle.

Mr. Giuliani asked that I convey the following information to you. On February 11, 1976, I had occasion to speak with the Honorable Robert R. Merhige, Jr., United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Virginia in Richmond, Virginia, concerning scheduling matters in the Small Business Administration fraud and corruption cases. At the end of our conversation Judge Merhige indicated he was aware that Assistant United States Attorney Rodney Sager had made certain allegations of improper conduct against Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle concerning the investigation of certain Federal Bureau of Investigation personnel and Mr. Sager in Richmond, Virginia. Judge Merhige stated that Mr. Sager had come to him to complain to him about Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle but the Judge refused to hear him. At that time Mr. Sager told the Judge he was going to file a complaint with the Department of Justice against Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle. The Judge advised Mr. Sager against filing the complaint.

In addition, the Judge advised me that based upon his observations, Messrs. Goodwin and Merkle had conducted themselves in a highly professional manner throughout the investigation. He stated that they were gentlemen for whom he had high respect and in his judgment were a credit to the Department of Justice. I told the Judge I was aware of the matter. I asked him if I could convey his remarks to you, Mr. Shaheen and Mr. Giuliani. The Judge stated he hoped that I would and hoped his observation would be of assistance to you in resolving this matter.

"WITCH FINDER" UNDER INVESTIGATION

(By Jack Anderson and Les Whitten)

Back in the bad old days of Watergate, a briefcase-packing, circuit-riding prosecutor traveled around the country hunting subversives. In the process, Guy Goodwin hurried from place to place indicting people for their political beliefs. We called him Richard Nixon's witch finder.

Justice Department source say he supervised about 100 grand jury investigations in 36 states. He returned more than 400 indictments. There was one trouble; few of the indictments stuck. The rare convictions were often for minor offenses, having nothing to do with the subversive activities Goodwin was investigating. Goodwin sought contempt and perjury indictments when he couldn't make a better case.

Now the witch finder himself is under investigation. Charges have been brought against him behind closed doors on Capitol Hill. The most devastating testimony has come from a former Justice Department colleague and ex-assistant U.S. attorney for Virginia, Rodney Sager.

The testimony was taken in the strictest of secrecy by a House Judiciary subcommittee. Sager cited abuse after abuse by the hit-and-run Goodwin. "His prosecutions were left to others," said Sager. "He got his indictments and disappeared."

Normally "95 per cent of all indictments end in convictions," Sager reported. But Goodwin seemed unable to distinguish between violent, bombthrowing revolutionaries and peaceful, antiwar activists. No more than 25 per cent of those Goodwin indicted were ever convicted, Sager charged.

This "indicates without any question," he said, "that individuals were indicted without the least scintilla of evidence." Innocent people can be "ruined," he warned, by careless indictments. "If I were indicted and the case thrown out tomorrow," he said, "the stigma that would attach to what happened to me would never be erased in my community."

Yet despite Goodwin's "numerous abuses of the system," Sager declared, "he remains with impunity on the federal payroll . . . The Justice Department, which speaks of protecting witnesses, continues to protect Guy Goodwin. The question can only be asked of the well-meaning representatives from the Justice Department—why?"

Goodwin is an improbable witch finder, an impeccable, subdued, handsome man with styled gray hair and a soft voice. Testified Sager: "Guy Goodwin is a very mid-mannered individual. He's not one of those so-called screaming, overly aggressive individuals. But he just sits there and just asks broad, sweeping questions that have no relevance whatsoever and are virtually impossible to answer."

Here are a few of the "horror" stories that Sager recalled from his personal experience with Goodwin:

Goodwin "went so far as to subpoena that defense attorney of the primary defendant" in a Richmond, Va., case. Goodwin even "threatened to have him locked up . . . if he didn't show up for the grand jury." Inside the grand jury room, Goodwin demanded whether the attorney had any "wiretapping equipment." Recounted Sager: "The fellow laughed in his face . . . had a few choice words for him and left the grand jury room."

During the same investigation, Goodwin granted immunity to the wrong witness. Sager considered this to be "just comical" but also concluded it was a "grossly negligent act . . . (that would) suggest professional incompetence."

When Sager criticized Goodwin's performance, the witch finder tried to indict him. As Sager recalled this startling development: "He said to me, 'Mr. Sager,' he said, 'you complained a little bit, and I want to protect you.' I said, 'Protect me? What do you mean protect me?' He said, 'Well, I want to advise you of your rights.' I said, 'Man you've got to be crazy.' "

Nevertheless, Goodwin went ahead with an investigation of Sager and actually hauled him before a grand jury. Sager recalled that Goodwin's questions "were so ridiculous that it would defy my imagination and logic as a prosecutor with six years of experience." The grand jury found no misconduct by Sager. He responded by filing charges against Goodwin, but these were ignored by his superior, then-Assistant Attorney General Richard Thornburgh. So Sager quit in disgust. "I'm disappointed and disillusioned," he said.

Goodwin is now keeping in the shadows, but he is still keeping an eye out for witches in the Justice Department's Internal Security Section.

Footnote: Goodwin refused to take our calls for his comment.

THE DAY OF THE PROSECUTOR

(By Jack Anderson)

The post-Watergate crusade against corruption has spurred aggressive prosecutors across America to enforce the law with a vengeance. It is the Day of the Prosecutor.

Some don't always wait for a crime to occur. They organize a task force, select the "bad guys" and crack down. They sometimes conduct what one prosecutor described approvingly as "investigation by terrorism." Suspects are harassed; witnesses are intimidated; the uncooperative are jailed for contempt.

Some prosecuting attorneys use grand juries to hound victims and compel their associates to testify against them. Witnesses can be subpoenaed and interrogated under oath. Those who refuse to answer questions can be cited for contempt; those who lie can be indicated for perjury.

Unfortunately, this has perverted the original purpose of the grand jury, which was established to protect innocent citizens from overzealous prosecutors. The grand jury was supposed to consider the prosecutor's charges in secret, weed out the irresponsible accusations and permit only substantive charges to reach open court.

Now the grand jury, like the appendix, has lost its function and no longer filters out the poison. Raw, unsubstantiated allegations not only reach open court but the open press. The derogatory information is sometimes leaked by the prosecutors.

Martin G. Holleran, former executive director of the New Jersey State Commission of Investigations, told prosecutors at a closed-door seminar that every Justice Department task force should have "a special grand jury impaneled exclusively" for its use. "You can use this grand jury as an investigative and intelligence-gathering tool by calling organized crime figures" before it. This tactic, he acknowledged, "is subject to cries of harassment. . . . But so be it: that is the way it goes."

Many lawmen were elated over the 1974 Supreme Court ruling that allows evidence seized in violation of the Constitution to be used in grand-jury proceedings. As Maryland Judge Charles E. Moylan Jr. observed ruefully: "The prosecutor can burn the Bill of Rights seven days out of seven and bring the fruits of unconstitutional activity to a grand jury. No court in the country has the power to look behind what the grand jury considers or why it acts as it does."

Not only are aggressive prosecutors using grand juries to harass alleged wrongdoers, with little real regard for constitutional activity to a grand jury. No court in the country has the power to look behind what the grand jury considers or why it acts as it does."

Not only are aggressive prosecutors using grand juries to harass alleged wrongdoers, with little real regard for constitutional rights and guarantees; they are also sending suspected criminals to prison without a trial.

Martin Holleran explained to his fellow prosecutors how to do it. Simply grant the suspect immunity so he can't plead the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination, Holleran advised. Organized crime figures, he said, have "a code of silence." Therefore, they usually "refuse even to give their addresses" and place themselves in contempt. "They have the key to the jailhouse door in their own pocket," he said.

No doubt many of these witnesses belong behind bars. But if they can be put in prison without a trial, every citizen suddenly is in jeopardy. As one troubled prosecutor put it: "That's totalitarian. It offends me."

Rodney Sager, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney for Virginia, warned a House Judiciary subcommittee behind closed doors: "The simple fact is today our system clothes the prosecutor with virtually unbridled powers. It's interesting to note from the historic comments that the so-called 'function of the grand jury' is to act as a prosecutor of the individual's rights. I would respectfully suggest that in modern-day practice that term is completely meaningless. To the contrary, the person protected by the modern-day grand jury is the prosecutor."

Citing his own experience as a prosecutor, Sager testified that grand jurors "yield almost completely to the will, advice and actions of the prosecutor." He cautioned that "the young prosecutor who has little past experience finds himself with awesome power, and it is very simple for even a well-meaning prosecutor to take advantage of such a situation."

Again drawing on his own experience, Sager said: "I observed situations where prosecutors, off the record, told grand jurors that certain witnesses were crooks, that they were con men, that they were expected to be evasive in their responses to questions and not to pay attention to anything that they might have to say.

"I have been in the grand-jury rooms when the prosecutor, off the record, joked with the grand jurors about the testimony of the particular witness. . . . You get the opportunity to get a witness alone without his counsel. And you can rant and rave to your heart's content with that witness without anyone, really, ever having any idea about what's going on inside the grand-jury room."

Explained Sager: "The prosecutor has full authority to tell the grand-jury stenographer what to take down and what not to take down. And, my friends, you'd better believe that if the prosecutor has some strong words to say about a witness, he advises the court reporter to cease the transcription, so those words are not a part of any record."

The former prosecutor summarized his own testimony in these blunt words: "It's ironic that the grand jury, which was meant to protect against an overly aggressive prosecutor, is a system that has, in fact, brought into being the overly aggressive prosecutor."

Mr. EILBERG. Let's open the meeting.

Our next witness is David Rein, a practicing attorney with the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, together with Ms. Mary Emma Hixson, Director of the Coalition.

We welcome you again to our subcommittee to hear your expressions, and we regret that you've had to wait so long. And we regret also that out time is so limited. So please try to give us a summary of your remarks.

Do you have a statement there, by the way? Was there a statement?

Ms. HIXSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to move that the statement be included in the record. We'll make a brief oral statement at this time.

Mr. EILBERG. The statement will be made part of the record together with all of the material that you have.

Ms. HIXSON. Thank you.

[The prepared statement and accompanying materials of Ms. Hixson follow:]

STATEMENT OF THE COALITION TO END GRAND JURY ABUSE

(Presented by Mary Emma Hixson, Director and David Rein, President, Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse)

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this subcommittee, on behalf of the 21 national bar, civil liberties, labor, religious and women's organizations that comprise the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, I thank you for the opportunity to testify before you this morning. My name is Mary Emma Hixson, and I am the Director and staff counsel of the Coalition. With me today is David Rein, our Coalition president.

The Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse began its work in April, 1973, and in the years since then we have learned a great deal about both the democratic potential and the frightening perversion of the contemporary federal grand jury. We have traveled extensively from coast to coast, met with critics and defenders of the grand jury status quo, digested literally thousands of pages of articles, depositions and briefs and followed closely every major—and many minor—controversial grand jury proceedings of recent years.

We have also followed closely, of course, the progress of this subcommittee under the able leadership of its chair, Rep. Joshua Eilberg. We commend this panel for its serious and painstaking examination of the federal grand jury system, an examination that has lasted four years and produced a wealth of information on virtually every aspect of our modern grand jury problem. But now, as the first Congressional voting on grand jury reform proposals in American history nears, it is time to take a step back from the voluminous and valuable evidence this subcommittee has collected and ask a very basic question: what does it all mean?

In this, our second appearance before this subcommittee, we would like to attempt to answer this question by highlighting the three major themes that weave their way through the mass of material this panel has accumulated. We feel that the evidence brought before this subcommittee demonstrates beyond a doubt that:

I. Grand jury reform is necessary because the deeply flawed institution that is our modern grand jury poses a serious threat to the rights and liberties of American citizens.

II. The arguments against grand jury reform advanced by the Department of Justice and other apologists for the grand jury status quo have been totally unconvincing.

III. Our society will pay a heavy price if the Congress chooses not to reform the grand jury.

We hope that our discussion of these themes—and our specific legislative suggestions which will follow—will help subcommittee members cut the complex issue of grand jury abuse down to a manageable and resolvable size.

I. Grand jury reform is necessary because the deeply flawed institution that is our modern grand jury poses a serious threat to the rights and liberties of American citizens.

One hundred and eighty-six years ago, the grand jury was incorporated into the Constitution of the United States as part of the Bill of Rights. The purpose of the grand jury to that generation of 1776 was self-evident: to protect citizens from the zeal or malice of government prosecutors. No person, those early Americans believed, should be forced to stand through the ordeal of a trial unless a panel of fellow-citizens—the grand jury—first determined that there was sufficient evidence to warrant further prosecution.

Our republic's first citizens did not write the grand jury into the bill of Rights because they considered every prosecutor a tyrannical ogre. They did so because every prosecutor, no matter how conscientious and upright, faces a decision that a democracy cannot afford to leave in one person's hands, the decision to prosecute an accused. Some 149 years after the Bill of Rights was adopted, United States Attorney General Robert H. Jackson restated the Framer's problem:

Law enforcement is not automatic. It isn't blind. One of the greatest difficulties of the position of prosecutor is that he must pick his cases, because no prosecutor can even investigate all the cases in which he receives complaints.[1]

[1] Robert H. Jackson, "The Federal Prosecutor," Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology. Vol. 31 (May–June, 1940), 5.

The dilemma presented by this "picking" process, Attorney General Jackson continued, is clear:

If the prosecutor is obliged to choose his cases, it follows that he can choose his defendants. Therein is the most dangerous power of the prosecutor: that he will pick people that he thinks he should get, rather than pick cases that need to be prosecuted . . . It is in this realm—in which the prosecutor picks some person whom he dislikes or desires to embarass, or selects some group of unpopular persons and then looks for an offense, that the greatest danger of abuse of prosecuting power lies. It is here that law enforcement becomes personal, and the real crime becomes that of being unpopular with the predominant or governing group, being attached to the wrong political views, or being personally obnoxious to or in the way of the prosecutor himself.[2]

For the authors of the Bill of Rights, the grand jury was the institutional answer to this dilemma. It would shield the accused and serve, as one commentator exulted in 1785, as "a great security to the citizens against vindictive prosecutions, either by the government, by political parties or by private enemies."[3]

But the grand jury no longer plays this noble role. The evidence this subcommittee has heard over its years of hearings makes this assertion incontrovertible. This is not to say that every indictment, every subpoena that emanates from a federal grand jury is tainted by abuse. It is to say, however, that under current grand jury procedures, prosecutors can and have used the grand jury to "embarrass persons they dislike, can and have used the grand jury to look for offenses against those whose only "real crime" is being "unpopular with the predominant or governing group." In those cases where a prosecutor is out to "get" a person or group, the modern grand jury does not provide the protection the Bill of Rights intended. Indeed, the modern grand jury facilitates the "getting."

This modern grand—and the modern grand jury controversy—did not exist in the pre-World War II world of Attorney General Robert Jackson. In 1940, there was no tumultuous grand jury "issue." While a few observors did rail at grand jury abuses, the abuses they described—rubberstamping grand juror panels, leaks that injured innocent people's reputations—were the same abuses that had been bothering Americans since the days of Thomas Jefferson, and there was no sense of urgency to their attacks.

The real burning issues of civil liberty in those days were to be found elsewhere in the criminal justice system. "Rubber hoses" and the "third degree" were still standard operating procedure in many police headquarters across the country. Suspects were convicted on the basis of illegally seized evidence, and the poor, who could not afford attorneys, sometimes were convicted on the basis of hardly any evidence at all. Political dissidents, meanwhile, were being attacked by and, in turn, were attacking the growing threat to the exercise of First Amendment freedoms posed by legislative anti-subversive panels like the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC).

These injustices were all the subject of heated debate, and, especially as the nation tumbled through the '60's, they were gradually brought under control or eliminated. But what was not eliminated were the motives that prompted these injustices in the first place, and what we have found is that the zeal and malice of politically motivated government officials that led to the beating of suspects and legislative inquisitions have reappeared cloaked in the mystery and secrecy of grand jury proceedings. In other words, as our society has tightened its controls on government misbehavior, the grand jury has evolved into the joker in our criminal justice deck, the one niche in our criminal justice system where the constitutional safeguards taken for granted everywhere else do not apply.

In the name of the grand jury, prosecutors and the federal agents with whom they work now claim the authority to traipse through people's lives—without any explanation or justification—and force the production of any and all testimony and documents they choose. Those who resist these intrusions face the threat of an indefinite contempt confinement.

To set this situation back into constitutional order, grand jury reformers have come before Congress. Congress is a fitting forum for it is the Congress that provided the spark for the grand jury abuse of recent years, the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970. This ill-advised legislation created, among other things, limited "use" immunity and thus stripped Americans of the Fifth Amendment's historic protection against over-reaching government pressure. But the grand jury's transmogrification from a shield over to a threat against people's liberties cannot really be reduced to a specific date or event. The grand jury's deterioration is a continuing process. In the early years after the passage of the 1970 Act, for instance, the Department of Justice's Internal Security Division used the grand jury to disrupt and harass Nixon Administration "enemies" by forcing individual political activists (and journalists, scholars, etc.) to give testimony that the government could use to harass or indict their friends and colleagues. That was bad, but as time has worn, prosecutors have gone further still with their grand jury powers. Increasingly, they use the grand jury not merely to fish through people's public and private lives, but to force already targeted suspects to produce the evidence that will be used to convict them.

One of the most recent grand jury controversies, the grand jury investigation of the Church of Scientology begun two months ago is a significant example. In the course of this grand jury activity, which followed July 8 FBI raids on church property in Los Angeles and Washington that the courts have since ruled illegal, prosecutors have frankly conceded to defense counsel "that they are now placing citizens believed by them to be guilty of crimes directly on the witness stand and threatening them with contempt and prison unless they give over to the U.S. Attorney they very evidence which the U.S. Attorneys themselves are certain will directly convict them of crime."[4]

We do not intend to detail here every sorry case of grand jury abuse we have encountered over the four and a half years of our existence. We and others have already described specific incidents in previous testimony, and, of course, the literature dealing with these abuses has reached awesome proportions.[5] These case histories of abuse powerfully dramatize the bankruptcy of our modern grand jury system.

Discussing individual cases of abuse, however, is not the only way to dramatize the bankruptcy of the grand jury system. The system's failure can be exposed quite graphically merely by listing the supporters of the grand jury status quo—or, more accurately, merely by noting the absence of supporters.

Who supports the grand jury status quo anyway? This question deserves a serious answer.

Are legal scholars satisfied with the contemporary grand jury? Not at all. Some of the most impressive witnesses this subcommittee has heard have been legal academicians: Prof. J. Anthony Scott of Rutgers University School of Law, Prof. Leon Friedman of the Hofstra University School of Law and Prof. Shelvin Singer of the Chicago Kent College of Law. Their testimony has been critical, and, more importantly, representative of their profession.

What about the organized bar? How does it feel about the grand jury system? We do have a number of organizational indications. The National Legal Aid and Defender Association, the legal voice of the nation's poor, the National Bar Association and the National Conference of Black Lawyers, the nation's two premiere associations of Black attorneys, the National Lawyers Guild and the Criminal Section of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America are all members of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse. The National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers has testified in favor of reform legislation before the Senate and held special seminars on the dangers of the modern grand jury.

Local bar associations, including the prestigious Association of the Bar of the City of New York, have endorsed proposals for serious grand jury reform. Finally, of course, the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association has endorsed sweeping grand jury reform recommendations, including the abolition of "use" immunity and the right to counsel inside the grand jury chamber.

Shifting from the bar to the pulpit, the story is the same: overwhelming reform sentiment. The United Methodist Church considers reforming the current grand jury so essential that it has made the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse a project of its Board of Church and Society. Many other denominations have since joined the Coalition's reform effort—the Jesuit Office of Social Ministry, the Church of the Brethren, the Unitarian Church—but the most striking indication of how the nation's religious community feels about the grand jury came this past May 5 when the Governing Board of the National Council of Churches unanimously voted to support legislative reform efforts.

Who speaks for the grand jury status quo? The albor movement? Three International union conventions—the International Printing and Graphic Communications Union and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters in 1976 and the International Longshoreman's and Warehouseman's Union in 1977—have passed reform resolutions. In addition, endorsers of the Coalition include the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America and The Newspaper Guild as well as union officials from unions like the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers and the Distributive Workers of America. Still other unions like the International Typographical Union have published critiques of the grand jury status quo in their newspapers and magazines.

Who speaks for the grand jury status quo? The business community? More and more business leaders are expressing outrage at modern grand jury practices. "You need due-process protections in grand jury proceedings just as much as in a trial—or more," said one business official in a recent Wall Street Journal article devoted to business critiques of the grand jury.[6] Most recently, General Motors, the nation's largest corporation, has denounced the manipulation of the grand jury process by agents of the Internal Revenue Service.

And how does the press feel about all this? The two leading organizations representing American reporters, the above-mentioned Newspaper Guild and the Reporters Committee for Fredom of the Press, have alreeady testified before this subcommittee and urged the enactment of strong reform legislation.

Many of the nation's daily newspapers have editorially gone on record for changes in current grand jury procedures. An incomplete list is sufficient to give an idea of the geographic diversity of editorial reform sentiment: Wisconsin State Journal, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Palm Beach Post, Christian Science Monitor, Orlando Sentinel Star, Louisville Times, Evansville Post, Charlotte Observor, Boston Globe and Austin American-Statesman. Nor have other branches of the media ignored what is seen as the grand jury "problem." News documentaries have been broadcast on network and local levels. Even a popular detective series has devoted an hour to a dramatic critique of the grand jury system.[7] Viewers responded to this episode of The Rockford Files, according to NBC, in unprecedented numbers. They were appalled to learn that every indignity the show portrayed was entirely permissible under existing grand jury law.

Who, then, speaks for the grand jury status quo? Essentially, only those who are connected to it: prosecutors, judges, grand juriors. But even here the support is far from universal. Those grand jurors, for instance, who support the status quo are usually found in situations where grand jury panels are not particularly representative of their communities, which means on the state level. In many states, grand jurors are either selected by law enforcement officials or allowed to volunteer. Either way, these grand jurors may serve many terms on a grand jury and eventually come to reflect very closely the views of the prosecutors who come before them. On federal grand jury panels, where juror selection is random, though not as representative as they should be, grand juriors are much more likely to look at the current system with a sharper eye. This subcommittee has already heard a very moving critique of current grand jury procedures from one such grand juror, William Gloege. There are many others like him.

Critics of the grand jury status quo are also found in prosecutorial ranks and on the bench. The chairman of the special ABA grand jury committee that brought a reform proposal to the attention of the House of Delegates was Richard Gerstein, a respected Florida prosecutor. The most recent book-length call for grand jury reform, The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial, was written by a sitting federal judge, Marvin Frankel, and a former prosecutor, Gary Naftalis.[8]

But we will readily admit that the majority of prosecutors and judges (most of whom are former prosecutors) in the federal system would be content to freeze the grand jury at its 1977 status quo. We readily admit this fact because it supports our contention that the grand jury system needs a thoroughgoing overhaul. No one, after all, enjoys having their conduct subjected to close scrutiny. That the prosecutorial establishment—and the prosecutorial establishment virtually alone—is happy with the modern grand jury suggests strongly to us that the grand jury is not watchdogging prosecutorial conduct as tightly as it should.

The argument could be made, of course, that the prosecutorial establishment, headed by the Department of Justice, opposes grand jury reform not because it does not want an effective watchdog looking over its shoulder, but because it has reached the well-reasoned conclusion that grand jury reform is unnecessary. Accepting this argument, however, would mean assuming that the nation's legal scholars, bar and religious leaders and many of its labor, business and press representatives are (1) hopelessly naive characters who do not know the first thing about the administration of justice, (2) dangerously clever characters out to conceal their own criminal activity behind a smokescreen of grand jury reform, or (3) both. Accepting this argument also means assuming that the prosecutorial establishment has perfectly valid reasons for opposing grand jury reform. This assumption simply cannot be made.

The Department of Justice does not have valid reasons for opposing grand jury reform. The arguments for the status quo that prosecutors and allied judges have advanced are either contrived, misleading or utterly abhorrent to our nation's democratic ethos, as we hope to show in the following discussion.

II. The aruments against grand jury reform advanced by the Department of Justice and other apologists for the grand jury status quo have been totally unconvincing.

There is no one argument against grand jury reform, but there are certain contentions that appear over and over in anti-reform testimony and literature. We would like to give each of these arguments its own consideration.

Anti-reform argument #1: there is no abuse

The most common argument—we might label it, for convenience's sake, the "stonewall" position—holds that we do not need reform because we do not have abuse, or not much of it at least. Former Watergate Special Prosecutor Charles Ruff has told this subcommittee that much of the reform legislation before it is "an overreaction to problems more illusory than real." [9] Federal Judge Frederick B. Lacey warns against enacting broad reforms "to cure the one-in-a-thousand case." [10] New Jersey First Assistant Attorney General Robert Del Tufo deems it "sheer folly" to hamstring prosecutors with reforms introduced "because of a figment of fear that government itself may run amuck." [11]

The official Department of Justice position has been slightly more restrained. "On the whole, we believe the federal grand jury system is sound," Assistant Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti stated June 29. "That is not to . . . deny that some abuses of the grand jury system have occurred, although we may not always agree on specific cases." [12]

Looking back over recent history, it might be more accurate to say that the Department of Justice seldom, if ever, agrees with reformers that the grand jury system has been abused in "specific cases." Certainly it is true that the Department has never publicly admitted that any one of the many people jailed for refusing to give testimony or physical evidence to a federal grand jury system has been abused in "specific cases." Certainly it is true that the Department has never publicly admitted that any one of the many people jailed for refusing to give testimony or physical evidence to a federal grand jury has ever been wronged. In fact, the government will sometimes go to absurd lengths to avoid admitting that an injustice has been done. In November, 1976, for instance, Rutgers University Prof. Philip Shinnick was found in contempt and confined in the name of a Scranton, Pa., federal grand jury for refusing to supply handwriting exemplars and fingerprints as subpoenaed. Two months later, U.S. Attorney S. John Cottone dropped the subpena, noting that there was no longer a need for Shinnick's "evidence," and the professor was freed. Interestingly, Shinnick's incarceration had begun only after a half-year courtroom battle to quash his subpena had failed.

During all that time, the government had continually stressed that Shinnick's compliance with the grand jury subpoena was of utmost importance. Why did that compliance suddenly become unimportant? No mystery here. What happened between Shinnicks' confinement in November and his release in January was that Shinnicks' incarceration became an embarrassment for the government. On December 31, nationally syndicated columnist Tom Wicker of the New York Times wrote a strong denunciation of Shinnick's treatment. His article was followed by a longer analysis in the January 11 Washington Star. Rather than attempt to justify the unjustifiable, the Justice Department simply had Shinnick released without receiving an iota of the "evidence" it had formerly argued was so essential.

The Justice Department's unwillingness to attempt to defend its grand jury procedures in the Shinnick case was no aberration. We have looked in vain through Department testimony and briefs for prosecutorial rebuttals to citizen charges that FBI agents routinely use the grand jury's subpoena power to compel behavior they otherwise cannot legally compel. We have searched without success for any official answer to charges that IRS agents aim grand jury subpoenas against their targets in order to sidestep the protections suspects are accorded under normal IRS administrative summonses. We have yet to see the Department address the charge that witnesses are purposely called before the grand jury to try to induce them to commit perjury.

Justice Department officials do not try to defend these practices. Instead, they assert that since their grand jury conduct does not violate any grand jury law of the land, no abuse has been committed.[11a]

This argument is fairly ingenuous. The reason why reformers have come before Congress is not that prosecutors are breaking existing grand jury law, but that under existing law, injustices are possible and plentiful. Thus, to define grand jury abuse as engaging only in conduct that the courts have censured, as the Department of Justice so defines it, is to paper over the injustices of the modern grand jury system.

Let us be more specific. When five Los Angeles antiwar activists were subpoenaed to Tucson, Arizona, in December of 1970, told to tell prosecutors the who, what and where of every antiwar meeting they had attended for the previous year and then jailed when they refused, their confinement was upheld by the courts as legal under existing grand jury law. Their confinement may have been "legal," but can we define it as "just"?

When 23 members of the Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW) were subpoenaed from Miami, where they were planning demonstrations around the 1972 summer political conventions, to Tallahassee 500 miles away, they protested, but their subpoena challenges were disregarded. Later, after some VVAW members had been indicted for bombing conspiracy, a trial jury acquitted them on all charges. But the jury's verdict did not undo the damage that had been done. The VVAW's plans to express its opinions at the conventions had been sabotaged by wild subpoenas and newspaper headlines based on trumped up bombing accusations that could not stand up in open court. Was the VVAW abused by the grand jury system? Not according to the law of the grand jury status quo.

When Jill Raymond, a Kentucky feminist, was subpoenaed before a Lexington federal grand jury in 1975 because she exercised her legal right not to answer FBI questions, no law was broken. When Raymond subsequently refused to answer grand jury questions, was found in contempt and spent the next 14 months in a series of Kentucky county jails so unsuitable for female prisoners that one of them did not even have a matron, the government did not behave illegally. Raymond, it is worth noting, had not been then and has not been since either formally accused, tried or convicted of any criminal activity. Is she the victim of grand jury abuse? The court says "no."

[11a] Even when the courts have held that an abuse has taken place, the Justice Department is loathe to admit, let alone correct, any wrongdoing. We were particularly struck in this regard by Assistant Attorney General Civiletti's oral testimony before this subcommittee. Asked by Rep. Eilberg about the recent Litton Industries case in which Federal Judge Albert V. Bryan, Jr., called the government's grand jury conduct "a serious abuse of prosecutorial power," Civiletti refused to acknowledge that anything improper had occurred.

When federal prosecutors in Detroit called Michigan State Supreme Court Justice John Swainson before a Detroit grand jury amidst widespread newspaper headlines about a bribery investigation and grilled him with vague and ambiguous questions, no law was broken. Indicted for bribery conspiracy and perjury before the grand jury, Swainson was tried late in 1975. He was found innocent of having anything to do with the bribery, yet convicted of lying to the grand jury. The verdict meant that Swainson was guilty of lying about a crime that never took place or, to put it another way, that Swainson's only crime was manufactured inside the grand jury chamber. Was Swainson a victim of our grand jury system? Not legally.

When Pedro Archuleta, a community organizer from a poor New Mexico county, was approached by FBI agents in November, 1976, he told them that, without his lawyer present, he was not going to answer questions that he felt were designed to link him with bombings in New York and Chicago. The Bureau responded by having Archuleta subpoenaed to a Chicago grand jury. Archuleta challenged that subpoena, and when the Chicago judge with jurisdiction patiently sat down to consider the challenge, impatient Justice Department officials had Archuleta subpoenaed before a different federal grand jury in Manhattan, where he was immunized and jailed June 30 for refusing to answer grand jury questions. Legally, Pedro Archuleta has not been wronged by the grand jury system, but only a legal mind trained by the Spanish Inquisition could believe that Archuleta's rights have been scrupulously respected.

We could go on with examples, but we think this partial list drives home our contention that the only way grand jury abuse can be described as "illusory" or a "figment of fear" or a "one-in-a-thousand" case is to ignore behavior that a democratic society cannot tolerate.

Anti-reform argument #2: grand jury abuse is already under control

It is the Justice Department's failure to recognize the injustices of our modern grand jury system that makes its second major argument against reform—we can regulate ourselves—so ludicrous. Until the Justice Department gives some indication that the wholesale subpoenaing of citizens and their effects will not be countenanced as a law enforcement strategy, our nation's jails will continue to be stocked with Pedro Archuletas and victimizations like Judge Swainson's will continue to raise eyebrows and fears.

Even if the Justice Department did begin to admit that not every subpoena was conceived in good will and ethical professional judgment, there still would be ample reason to suspect the Department's ability to police federal grand jury proceedings. That ample reason comes directly from the Department's own statistics on the subpoenaing of journalists.

The Department has had internal guidelines on the issuance of subpoenaes to reporters since 1970. These rules are intended, or at least billed, as the Department's means of protecting the First Amendment rights of journalists. By the Justice Department's own admission, these guidelines are violated with, if not impunity, regularity. Between March, 1973, and May, 1975, of 70 cases which involved subpoenas to journalists, only 57 went to the Attorney General's office for review, as required by the guidelines.[12a]

The reality, however, is worse than the numbers indicate, as The Newspaper Guild President Charles Perlik has already pointed out to this panel. Those who are subpoenaed in direct violation of the Justice Department's journalist guidelines cannot use a prosecutorial failure to follow the guidelines as a legal basis on which they can have their subpoenas quashed. KPFW-FM station manager Will Lewis in Los Angeles was found in contempt in 1975 and jailed for refusing to turn information subpoenaed in direct violation of the Justice Department guidelines.[13]

We are not proposing that the Justice Department's existing guidelines be scrapped, merely noting that those prosecutors most likely to take advantage of the broad prerogatives the grand jury system offers are the prosecutors least likely to pay any attention to guidelines. For guidelines to be effective, it must be clear that those who step over the bounds of acceptable conduct will pay the consequences.

This is not the case. The Justice Department's internal ethics bureaucracy has not been able or willing to fully investigate complaints of abuse and take suitable action against errant prosecutors, and the Rodney Sager controversy is a distressing case in point.

Rodney Sager was no normal victim of grand jury abuse. In fact, at the time of his victimization, he was a U.S. Attorney in Richmond. Last year, while Sager was conducting an investigation of FBI misconduct, the Justice Department sent down from Washington to assist him Guy Goodwin, the prosecutor whose activities in the early 1970's became the symbol of everything wrong with the grand jury.[14]

Goodwin's conduct in Richmond soon disturbed Sager, who concluded that he had no choice but to move to have Goodwin removed from the case. Goodwin, however, had other ideas. He called Sager himself before the grand jury and grilled him for 15 hours!

An incredulous Sager responded with a long complaint to the Justice Department that charged Goodwin with "gross professional misconduct and gross abuse of the grand jury system." According to columnist Jack Anderson, the complaint was dismissed by Department ethics czar Michael Shaheen after only a perfunctory examination. Sager quit government service in disgust last June.[15]

Perhaps more than any other grand jury controversy of recent memory, the Sager case presented the Department with an excellent opportunity to speak out against grand jury abuse. The complainant was a respected U.S. Attorney. The accused abuser was one of the most notorious prosecutors in the country. Yet the Department threw the complaint out without even seriously considering it. If the Department of Justice will not seriously consider a charge of grand jury abuse from one of its own, what hope is there for the average citizen? More importantly, what hope is there for the citizen expressing unorthodox views, the person most in need of protection?

In our constitutional scheme of things, of course, our liberties are not supposed to be dependent on the Justice Department's interest in protecting them. We have the right to go before the bench and petition for constitutional relief. Some prosecutors claim that the existence of this judicial remedy makes legislative reform superfluous. Asserted a National District Attorneys Association spokesman before this panel last April:

Restrictions contained in the legislation, in large part, are unnecessar ybecause the federal courts have demonstrated both the willingness and the power to prevent oppression of the individual by the government.[16]

There is no doubt that one part of this statement is true. Courts do have the power to prevent oppression, but it is equally true that they have not exercised this power on grand jury matters. There are exceptions, to be sure. We think immediately of cases like the 1975 decision in which a New York District Court judge ruled, after FBI agents had subpoenaed an attorney who had refused to give them information about his client, that "(j)ust as the grand jury is not meant to be 'the private tool of (the) prosecutor,' it should not be allowed to become an arm of the FBI."[17] Or the 1976 case where the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals threw out a perjury conviction that had been obtained after the government called an already indicted man before a grand jury and interrogated him about the crime in question. Judge George Edwards likened that government conduct to a "revival of the Star Chamber."[18] But such decisions are few and far between, and, significantly, ignored by other courts. Thus, scores of subpoenas issued upon FBI initiative have been challenged and not quashed since the 1975 ruling noted above. Moreover, while some lower courts have tried to safeguard the rights of grand jury witnesses, the Supreme Court has, invariably, thwarted their efforts on appeal. In each of the last three major grand jury cases brought before the Supreme Court—

In sum, the courts have not prevented grand jury abuse. Sums up California Supreme Court Justice Stanley Mosk: "Unfortunately, to date courts have been loathe to shine the revealing light of due process analysis into the secret recesses of the grand jury room." [20] Assistant Attorney General Civiletti's smug assurance that "safeguards already exist for controlling prosecutorial misconduct" cannot and should not be taken seriously. [21]

Anti-reform argument #3: reform will wreak havoc in the War Against Crime

The best defense, the old adage goes, is a good offense, and the Justice Department has taken this wisdom to heart. Department spokesmen and friends have devoted much of their defense of the grand jury status quo to an attack on the proposed reforms.

We are told by San Diego D.A. Edwin Miller that:

". . . proposals contained in H.R. 94 will be detrimental or completely eliminate the grand jury's ability to investigate and uncover political corruption, massive white-collar or consumer-oriented fraud and organized criminal conduct." [22]

New Jersey prosecutor Robert Del Tufo sternly lectures that:

". . . the net effect of the proposed legislation is to deprive government of the ability to fulfill its primary mission, to protect the citizen against criminal attack in his home, his place of business and on the streets." [23]

Reforming the grand jury, in other words, will wreck the War Against Crime. It is truly amazing how often this assertion is made. But repetition does not make make truth, only evidence does, and anti-reform prosecutors have not presented any evidence that indicates either that the existing grand jury procedures under attack make any positive contribution to crime-busting or that changes in them would paralyze law enforcement.

The debate over immunity reform demonstrates our point quite well. Prosecutors contend that the federal immunity now in existence—that is, limited immunity that can be imposed against a witness' will—is absolutely essential to the fight against crime. Reform porposals to change this current immunity law in any way have been met with fierce prosecutorial opposition. H.R. 94's substitution of "transactional" for "use" immunity, say New Jersey's Del Tufo, "would substantially impair the grand jury's function." [24] Assistant Attorney General Civiletti says that H.R. 3736's proposal to make immunity orders conditional upon the consent of the witnesses to be immunized "borders upon the irresponsible." [25]

Our position is that it is these frenetic defense of forced, "use" immunity that "border upon the irresponsible." For a New Jersey prosecutor like Del Tufo to claim that substituting "transactional" for "use" immunity would "substantially impair" the grand jury effectiveness against crime is incredible. Surely Del Tufo must be aware that across the Hudson River from New Jersey lies a land where "use" immunity that can be imposed against a witness' will—is absolutely State, and before Del Tufo, or anyone else, can expect reasonable people to believe that "use" immunity is essential to crime-busing, he will have to show some evidence that indicates that New Jersey prosecutors have had more success in combatting organized crime than New York prosecutors. He does not and he cannot present that evidence because it does not exist.

The defense forcing immunity onto unwilling witnesses is equally specious. We are told that vast organized crime conspiracies can only be broken if the government has the power to force one conspirator to testify against others.

"The concept of forced immunity has been approved by the U.S. Supreme Court and to change the process would destroy the grand jury system," Assistant Attorney General Civiletti has said. "If we allowed immunity on a consent basis, no one involved in a case would testify, they'd just keep the information to themselves." [26]

The facts are quite different. Forced immunity is not indispensable to the war on crime. It would be more accurate to say that the power to forcibly immunize mobster witnesses is meaningless. Indeed, the Department of Justice has yet to identify a single case where a mobster, forced inside a grand jury room and immunized against his will, has given testimony that led to the conviction of a mob higher-up!

The plain truth is that forcing mobsters to testify with immunity does not make them talk, and prosecutors, when they talk "shop" among themselves, admit as much.

Peter Richards is one of our nation's prosecutoral experts on immunity. In August, 1976, when the Cornell University Institute on Organized Crime held a seminar for state and federal prosecutors, Richards was selected as the lecturer on the immunity field. As the deputy attorney general in charge of the New Jersey Division of Criminal Justice's Special Prosecution Section and a former special attorney in the U.S. Justice Department's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, Richards certainly came with the proper credentials.

Smart prosecutors, Richards told his audience of over 100 prosecutors, do not force immunity onto mobster witnesses against their will. Before taking witnesses before the grand jury, they first try to gain their cooperation.

The initial step in this process, Richards explained, is meeting with the prospective witness in an informal, off-the-record interview to find out what he knows. This step is crucially important. Without knowing if a mobster has testimony of value to give, a prosecutor can never rationally determine whether society's best interests would be served by immunizing or prosecuting the prospective witness.

Why would any self-respecting mobster talk to a prosecutor in an informal interview? Because the prosecutor holds a trump card, the threat of prosecution. The prosecutor, said Richards, must go out and build such a strong case against a prospective mobster witness that the mobster will realize that the only way he is going to avoid a sure conviction and prison term is by accepting a grant of immunity and testifying.

If a prosecutor doesn't secure a mobster witness' cooperation, Richards told his prosecutorial audience, "if you stick him in a grand jury cold without knowing what you're going to get, it creates really bad problems."

"Giving him immunity in the grand jury," Richards continued, forcing him to testify by court order over his clear objections—we don't like to do it because we have found that it normally does not work. The situation where a witness refuses to cooperate in the first place, then comes into the grand jury and changes his mind and cooperates and tells the truth and gives you something valuable is extremely, very, very, very rare. I don't think I've ever seen it happen, as a matter of fact. If the witness won't come around beforehand, sticking him in the grand jury cold is not going to do you much good.[37]

H.R. 3736's consensual immunity proposal, then, is not some radical new departure that will hamstring prosecutors, but rather a sensible measure that codifies the existing practice of effective organized crime prosecutors. By so codifying the immunity procedure that brings the results that a democratic society wants—the prosecution of organized criminal activity—the enactment of a consensual immunity statute would prevent the manipulation of immunity for purposes a democratic society cannot tolerate. Making immunity consensual would make it impossible for the government to trap people into jail by forcing them to respond to questions they cannot in good conscience answer.

Consensual immunity would also help prevent perjury traps. Peter Richards, for example, cites only one general exception to his rule-of-thumb that a prosecutor should not immunize witnesses against their will, and that exception is when the government is certain that the witness in question will testify falsely and be prosecuted for perjury.

The Justice Department, significantly, never publicly uses this very real perjury-trap dimension as a justification for forced immunity, and for good reason. The only purpose of every piece of immunity legislation ever enacted has been to facilitate the gathering of information otherwise unobtainable. The grand jury chamber was never intended to be a place where crime is created.

Forced, "use" immunity, in sum, is ineffective in doing what it is supposed to do—obtain valuable anti-crime information—and effective in doing what it was never intended to do—trap people prosecutors don't like into jail or perjury.

[37] Speech before Cornell Institute on Organized Crime, 1976 Summer Seminar Program. August 10, Ithaca, New York.

This description could be applied, with equal relevancy, to many of the other unique grand jury prerogatives that prosecutors so ardently defend: the ability to quiz witnesses outside of their attorneys' presence, to not inform witnesses why they have been subpoenaed or whether they are targets of the investigation, and so forth. These prerogatives do not help place sophisticated organized criminals behind bars. The government gains nothing by not telling an organized crime witness what crime he is suspected of committing. The mobster witness already knows the crimes that he has committed. Against a cleverly constructed organized crime conspiracy, the prosecutorial power to sidestep due process safeguards via the grand jury is a crime-busting wash-out. An example: the Jimmy Hoffa disappearance case.

Former Teamster President Jimmy Hoffa disappeared July 30, 1975 from the parking lot of a suburban Detroit restaurant. Law enforcement officials quickly concluded that the disappearance was a result of organized crime foul play and began a massive investigation. Within a week after the disappearance, the FBI and prosecutorial officials involved decided to use the grand jury to break the case.[28] On August 13, the government began preparing a list of people to bring before the grand jury, and the grand jury activity itself started September 2. It continued almost daily until early November, then later resumed until over 100 witnesses had been called.[29]

Prosecutors stated quite frankly that they were using the grand jury as "an investigative tool." Stuck without concrete leads, the government simply scattered subpoenas on anyone it felt might have information. Then Detroit U.S. Attorney Ralph Guy described the strategy as "just hoping for a good lead."[30]

One of the early witnesses brought before the grand jury was the reputed Detroit underworld figure the press had been told was behind Hoffa's disappearance. Hauled before the grand jury September 8, this witness invoked the Fifth Amendment and was sent on his way, a sequence of events that raised serious questions about why the government had called the witness to begin with. The government must have realized that any defense lawyer who did not advise the widely heralded suspect, who was under indictment in an unrelated case, to invoke the Fifth would be guilty of legal malpractice. Just as certainly, since the subpoenaee was a prime target of an investigation that had yet to produce any tangible evidence, the government must have realized that it was not prepared to overcome the witness' Fifth Amendment invocation with even a grant of limited immunity. The conclusion is inescapable that the witness was called chiefly to show the press and public that the government was working hard to break the case—or, if one is less charitably inclined, to provide a scapegoat for the government's failure to unearth Hoffa's abductors.

There were other witnesses who also refused to testify. One was Charles O'Brien, Hoffa's foster son who was reputed to have been somehow involved in the abduction. Before he went before the grand jury, O'Brien had spent several hours answering FBI questions. He declined to answer questions during his grand jury appearance because he felt that the FBI might be trying to trick him into a perjury indictment. Another witness, Stephen Andretta, refused to testify in December, 1975, after being subpoenaed to Detroit from New Jersey, because his lawyer had been hospitalized and was not available to advise him. The court found Andretta, who had been immunized, in contempt and kept him in contempt and confined even after his lawyer had recovered and Andretta was answering grand jury questions.

All this fancy grand jury maneuvering by the government failed to advance the investigation, and as witnesses continued to pour through the grand jury's doors, there were murmurs of discontent. As The New York Times reported:

"Some Federal officials in Washington felt that officials in Detroit went to the grand jury too fast before amassing any useful information. 'You don't solve a murder in the grand jury,' a Washington official said."[31]

That official's wisdom has been vindicated by the utter failure of the Hoffa grand jury-powered investigation: you can't solve a murder in the grand jury. Unfortunately, in the eyes of the federal law enforcement officials in the Hoffa case, the opposite view—that you can do anything inside the grand jury room—prevailed. For them and too many of their colleagues, the grand jury has become a crime-busting deus ex machina, and they have substituted a dogmatic faith in subpoenas and immunity orders for the time-honored gumshoe legwork that actually solves crimes.

But some will say that the Hoffa case is a misleading example and that the modern grand jury, as presently constituted, can be effectively employed to crack criminal conspiracies. For these people, Watergate stands as the grand jury success story of our times. Dare we tamper with the grand jury and lose its ability to bust conspiracies such as Watergate? New Jersey prosecutor Robert Del Tufo put this attitude in blunt terms last April:

In short, the vitality of the grand jury system was plainly demonstrated by its response to executive arrogance. Should this proposed legislation be enacted, it is inevitable that the grand jury's ability to respond to similar assaults on our democracy will be substantially diminished.[32]

But the grand jury history of Watergate, far from showing a system at peak operating efficiency, shows a system grievously out of whack, a system totally at the mercy of the prosecutor who directs its every move. During the Watergate grand jury's first investigation, that directing prosecutor was Earl Silbert, now U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia. We now know, thanks to an extensively documented report by Charles Morgan, Jr., former director of the Washington office of the American Civil Liberties Union, that Silbert's grand jurors never had a chance at getting at the truth behind the Watergate break-in. The prosecution portrayed "G. Gordon Liddy as the man with ultimate responsibility for the crime when there was every indication to the contrary." Morgan's recital of leads not followed, key witnesses not called and important areas of questioning not pursued paints a frightening picture of how a prosecutor can guarantee that an investigation will reach a prefigured result.[32a]

Silbert's grand jury indicted Liddy, Howard Hunt and their CIA-trained Cuban friends. A trial jury subsequently convicted the bunch, and there the entire Watergate affair would have remained if one of the defendants had not decided to "spill the beans" in early 1973. On the basis of James McCord's startling revelations, Congress empowered a Special Prosecutor to get to the bottom of Watergate. That prosecutor, Archibald Cox, made headway, not by aimlessly throwing subpoenas at anyone remotely connected with the scandal, but by patiently gathering evidence to present to the grand jury. Cox did not have to force immunity onto unwilling witnesses. The witnesses immunized during the Watergate affair wanted immunity. They were willing to trade immunity for testimony because they feared the consequences of not testifying—a long jail sentence for their Watergate role—more than the threat of contempt confinement.

There was one uncooperative witness in the Watergate affair, Gordon Liddy. Liddy served 18 months for contempt. He totally refused to speak and the confinement did not break his will. Watergate, of course, was solved without Liddy's testimony. His incarceration is a sterling example of the futility of forced immunity.

Watergate also demonstrates the importance of insuring grand jury independence against executive branch domination. Archibald Cox was fired in October, 1973. The entire investigation would have been paralyzed were it not for the incredibly angry response of the American people, a response that forced then President Nixon to name a new prosecutor of independent stature. Had it not been for that pressure, Nixon would have been able to appoint a more trusted, and malleable, figure to succeed Cox. That puppet special prosecutor could have hamstrung the grand jury in the same sorts of ways as Earl Silbert had.

H.R. 94's provision that gives grand jurors the right to obtain their own independent counsel is one way we can prevent prosecutors beholden to powerful political interests from strangling the prosecution of official corruption.

One final point about the current grand jury's alleged indispensability in the War Against Crime. Sometimes the exercise of the prerogatives that prosecutors now enjoy inside the grand jury room does lead to convictions that might not otherwise be obtained. But in these cases it is crucial to note whether the conviction was the conviction that best served society's interests.

We will take the case of Roy Mandujano as an example. Mandujano's name is familiar because his case went all the way to the Supreme Court. In May, 1976, the high court refused to overturn Mandujano's conviction for perjury, with [32] Del Tufo, op. cit., p. 4.

[32a] Charles Morgan, Jr., "A Report to the Special Prosecutor on Certain Aspects of the Watergate Affair," June 18, 1973.

Chief Justice Warren Burger ruling that the failure to notify a grand jury witness of his or her right to silence and an attorney is not a deprivation of constitutional rights.

Mandujano, a San Antonio bar owner, had been suspected by the government in 1973 of drug-dealing, but he was not, by anyone's definition, a major operative. In March of that year, a police undercover agent asked Mandujano where he could get drugs. Mandujano made some phone calls, but no sale was ever made. Later, on the basis of the agent's testimony, Mandujano was brought before a grand jury and asked if he had ever discussed a drug sale. Confused, scared and ignorant of the government's evidence against him, Mandujano, who could not afford an attorney, perjured himself. He is now serving a 25-year sentence. The government never did nab any of the drug wheeler-dealers who stood above Mandujano.

Could things have been different? Could the real drug king-pins have been apprehended? Let's explore that possibility. What if, instead of concealing from Mandjuano the evidence gathered against him, the government had warned him strainght-forwardly when he was subpoenaed that he was under suspicion for drug-dealing. What if, instead of denying Mandujano an attorney, the government had guaranteed that he have one. It seems likely that if Mandujano knew the government had a case against him and had an attorney with whom he could discuss his predicament, he might very well have been willing to bargain his testimony against big-time San Antonio drug dealers for lenient treatment on his own drug offense charge. The government, of course, would have lost its perjury conviction against Mandujano if it had given him warnings and an attorney, but it might have achieved something far more important, a serious blow against San Antonio drug traffic.

Grand jury reform, then, will not cripple the legitimate war on crime. It might even help.

Anti-reform argument #4: delay

A favorite argument against H.R. 94, H.R. 3726 and other grand jury reform bills is that reforming the grand jury will so delay grand jury proceedings that the system will collapse from the inefficiency of it all.

Federal Judge Frederick Lacey's pessimistic prediction is typical:

"I predict that this legislation if passed will at least double the amount of time judges currently are spending on their criminal calendars." [33]

Adds the Department of Justice, opposing the grand jury witness right to counsel reform provision:

"Witness counsel in the grand jury room, appointment and removal, will cause delay. More importantly the motions, petitions, refusals to respond, all requiring judicial interventions and hearings, will cause enormous delay and convert probably cause determinations to adversarial proceedings akin to a trial of guilt or innocence on the merits." [34]

Two observations are in order here. The first is that "delay" is in the eyes of the beholder. Any due process safeguard can be attacked on the grounds that it causes delay. Forcing police to obtain search warrants before they raid homes causes delay, examining trial jurors for bias causes delay, allowing post-conviction appeals causes delay. In fact, the entire criminal justice tradition that has evolved over the past millennium of Anglo-American experience has unquestioningly produced delay. Questions of "delay" obviously cannot be examined isolated from questions of "justice." While justice delayed is justice denied, serving justice, not saving time, must be the goal of every democratic criminal justice system.

More fundamentally, however, we question the prosecutorial assumption that the current grand jury system operates efficiently without delay. While apologists for the grand jury status quo continually raise the spectre of a reformed grand jury system sinking in the quicksand of procedural litigation, the reality is that the grand jury system is already neck-deep in litigation.

Some striking, but typical, evidence: the case of Maria Cueto and Raisa Nemikin, two Episcopal Church employees who have refused to testify before a Manhattan federal grand jury investigating bombings credited to a tiny band called the "FALN." What happened when the government decided it needed Cueto and Nemikin's testimony? Was the government able to get its grand jury questions answered quickly efficiently? The following chronology will answer these questions:

[33] Lacey, op. cit., p. 15.
[34] Civiletti, op. cit., p. 18.

Nov. 18, 1976.—FBI agents visit Episcopal New York City headquarters and are referred to Cueto and Nemikin. The two answer questions.

Nov. 19, 1976.—FBI reappears to question Nemikin, apparently dissatisfied with her original answers.

Nov. 22, 1976.—FBI again interrogates Nemikin. Agents threaten her and Cueto with grand jury subpoenas.

Jan. 7, 1977.—Cueto and Nemikin receive subpoenas for Jan. 10 and 14 grand jury appearances, respectively.

Jan. 10, 1977.—Because Jan. 7 was a Saturday, Cueto was not able to find an attorney. She requests a postponement. Court refuses request and jails Cueto for contempt when she refuses to take oath.

Jan. 11, 1977.—Friends find Cueto lawyer and court releases her.

Feb. 14, 1977.—After more than a month of litigation over the constitutionality of a related subpoena duces tecum for church records, Cueto and Nemikin appear before grand jury and refuse to testify on First, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Amendment grounds.

Feb. 18, 1977.—Nemikin granted immunity, but still refuses to answer grand jury questions.

Feb. 26, 1977.—Federal judge finds Nemikin in contempt and allows two days for appeal.

Feb. 28, 1977.—Appeal denied.

March 1, 1977.—Nemikin incarcerated.

March 4, 1977.—Judge immunizes Cueto, who still remains silent.

March 5, 1977.—Judge finds Cueto in contempt.

March 7, 1977.—Appeal denied.

March 8, 1977.—Cueto incarcerated.

From the time the government first decided that Cueto and Nemikin had information that should be extracted by the grand jury to the time the government had them jailed for refusing to supply that information, a period of three and a half months passed. Their long, torturous grand jury route is not exceptional. In fact, Pedro Archuleta, the New Mexican activist first approached by the FBI at the same time and for the same matter as Cueto and Nemikin, was not confined for his refusal to cooperate with a federal grand jury until June 30, over seven months later!

Will delays become longer and more frequent when and if grand jury reforms are enacted? It is hard to see how. The current state of grand jury law does not prohibit witnesses from challenging subpoenas, immunity or contempt orders. It just dooms their litigation to failure and encourages prosecutors to continue using the grand jury in ways calculated to raise the litigational resistance of individuals and groups who feel that their constitutional rights are being violated. Not to litigate would be an admission that the government is behaving honorably, and that is an admission abused people will not, understandably, make.

Reform, however, holds out the promise of decreasing delay because it will give individuals run through the grand jury wringer a fighting chance to win their court challenges.[34a] Once chastened by a few court setbacks, prosecutors will no longer cavalierly issue subpoenas without thinking about the consequences. As the number of abusive subpoenas subsides, so will the litigation challenging them. Judge Lacey's calendar will not be so crowded after all.

The "delay" argument against reform is at its silliest when applied to the proposal that counsel be allowed to accompany witnesses into the grand jury room. Currently, witnesses must ask permission to see their attorneys, who must, in turn, wait outside the grand jury room while their clients are testifying. A witness' trips back and forth for counsel can take up enormous amounts of unnecessary time. In Detroit, last year, a witness excused himself 1,203 times to see his attorney outside the grand jury door.[35] The government's refusal to allow attorneys to accompany their clients into the grand jury room are directly to blame for this delay.

Anti-reform argument No. 5: beware of defense attorneys!

To prosecutors opposed to grand jury reform, no figure is as loathsome as the defense attorney, not even the grand jury contemnor. At August's ABA convention in Chicago, Attorney General Griffin Bell hinted none too subtlely that [34a] We refer here particularly to reform provisions of H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 that instruct the courts to quash subpoenas whenever witnesses can show that the subpoenas are unreasonable, oppressive, irrelevant, etc. There can be no meaningful grand jury reform until subpoenas are so controlled.

the campaign to put lawyers into the grand jury chamber was a barresterial plot to drum up new clients, "a lawyers' relief act," he called it. That same idea was brought before this panel last April by Carl Imlay, the general counsel of the Judicial Conference. Imlay charged that permitting counsel inside the grand jury room would not only do no good, but actually work "to the considerable detriment of the defendant (who is paying legal fees all the while)."

Defense lawyers are even likely, added Imlay, to disrupt orderly grand jury proceedings by refusing to waive grand jury hearings because of their "interest in enhanced fees based on time sheets."[36]

Against this image of the depraved, fee-hungry defense counsel, the Justice Department posits the noble prosecutor that none but the guilty need fear:

". . . the government does not generally have any motivation for causing witnesses any hardship; the government is seeking to win the cooperation of witnesses at trial."[37]

Somehow, we doubt that there is anything more ennobling about working as a prosecutor than as a defense attorney. Indeed, given the constant crossover between defense and prosecutorial ranks, the notion that prosecutors, as a group, are saints and defense attorneys sinners is rather comical. Do prosecutors check their ethics at the courthouse door when they leave a U.S. Attorneys office to enter private practice? Are defense attorneys who enter government service outfitted with a shining suit of ethical armor before they are allowed into a grand jury room?

The prosecutorial attack on the character of the defense bar cannot be taken very seriously as a manifestation of a dangerous prosecutorial mindset, a mindset that considers justice a mortal combat between the forces of good—the prosecution, of course—and the forces of evil—the accused and their counsel. To prosecutors with this world view, the ends justify the means, and anything the defense does in response is based on the vilest of obstructionist motives. It is this attitude that fuels grand jury abuse, and one example among many is the grand jury litigation around Seymour Gopman.

Gopman is a veteran Miami labor lawyer who, for the past six years, has clashed repeatedly with local federal Strike Force prosectuors. There is a long, complicated history behind these clashes, which need not detain us here, but suffice it to say that there is no love lost between Gopman and Florida federal prosecutors. What we should note here, however, is how the government has extended its distaste for Gopman to those who have spoken out in his defense.

Last year, for instance, prosecutors served a broad subpoena on Gopman's law firm's records. After the papers were turned over, the government charged that Gopman had not turned over everything ordered and moved to have him found in contempt. In the course of the litigation around this motion, secret grand jury material came to press attention, and Gopman was subjected to unfavorable media attention. The court subsequently denied the government's contempt motion, and Gopman, in turn, moved to have the prosecution held in contempt for violating grand jury secrecy. To investigate Gopman's charges, another judge appointed a respected local attorney, Stanley Meyers, as Special Attorney.

Meyers concluded that the prosecution had violated grand jury secrecy, and for that finding found his own character viciously attached by the prosecutor involved. How viciously? We cannot say because there is no longer a written record of the prosecutor's remarks. U.S. District Judge Sidney M. Aronowitz, who ruled against Gopman's challenge after the previous judge in the case took responsibility for the grand jury leak, ordered the prosecutor's "intemperate statements" stricken from the record this past April 5.[38]

The prosecutor's vituperative remarks against the Special Attorney were the last straw for Gopman's counsel, William Meadows, Jr., the former head of the Justice Department's Miami office and Florida Circuit Court Judge. On April 20, 1977, he wrote Attorney General Bell a long letter tracing the long history of conflict between Gopman and the prosecutor who had attacked Special Attorney Meyers and concluded:

"It would be unreasonable to expect a Department Attorney who has been accused of misconduct during an investigation and forced to defend his conduct before the court to dispassionately exercise prosecutorial discretion toward the persons who caused these unusual steps to be taken." [39]

On July 6, Assistant Attorney General Civiletti replied for Attorney General Bell. That he refused to acknowledge any substance to Meadows' complaint was not particularly surprising. What was surprising—and disturbing—was the threatening tone Civiletti addresses to Meadows, himself a former federal prosecutor! After dismissing Meadows' allegations as "totally unfounded and unfair," Civiletti went on to write:

"There has been a growing tendency among certain members of the defense bar to employ the tactic of attacking the professionalism and integrity of Government attorneys without any factual basis for their accusations. As you know, that tactic is prohibited by the Code of Professional Responsibility and has been condemned by the courts." [40]

Then, to leave no doubt that Meadows himself was one of these unprofessional attorneys, Civiletti added:

"The able, dedicated and honest attorneys who work for the Justice Department know that we will not tolerate departures from the high standards upon which we insist, but they are also entitled to expect that the Department will respond firmly to lawyers who make unfounded accusations against them. Your letter affords me a clear opportunity to fulfill that obligation." [41]

It is in statements like these that the Justice Department's "them-against-us" zeal exhibits itself most clearly. Such an attitude is just one more compelling reason why protections are so desperately needed inside the grand jury chamber.

Anti-reform argument #6: the grand jury is not an adversary proceeding

Besides asserting that the pending grand jury legislation is unnecessary, dangerous and disruptive, apologists for the grand jury status quo have also attempted to stake out a more philosophical position against grand jury reform.

The first of these philosophical musings holds that since the grand jury is not a forum where guilt or innocence is battled out, enacting reforms to protect the rights of grand jury witnesses is patently ridiculous. Reforms would only make the grand jury a minitrial and force wasteful duplication. The trial before a petit jury is the adversary stage of our criminal justice system, and it is here, we are told, that safeguards should be and are guaranteed.

To witnesses who have been trapped into perjury through a prosecutor's clever grand jury interrogation, the contention that the grand jury is not an advesary proceeding probably would not strike a responsive chord. Nor would it for reporters ordered before a grand jury and asked to reveal their sources on pain of jail or political activists given no explanation why their grand jury appearance has been demanded and grilled about their activities and friends.

The grand jury, to be sure, does not determine guilt or innocence, but the determination it does make—whether or not to make an accused stand trial—is a fundamentally important one. As an important decision, a decision that causes irreversible injury, the decision whether or not to indict must be reached fairly.[41a] But in our modern grand jury chamber, prosecutors are now free to manipulate a grand jury determination unfairly. There is no justification for this. The absence of a defense presence throughout grand jury proceedings cannot be used as a justification for allowing one side of an adversarial relationship, the prosecution, to treat the other unjustly.

Anti-reform argument #7: current grand jury procedures are historically tested

Reformers are warned over and over that we must not tamper with grand jury procedures now in effect because they have stood the test of time. In 1974, for instance, the Supreme Court justified its refusal to apply the exclusionary rule to grand jury proceedings in the Calandra case by asserting that applying [39] Letter to Attorney General Griffin Bell from William A. Meadows, April 20, 1977.

[40] Letter to William A. Meadows from Assistant Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti, that rule to the grand jury would constitute a bold, new departure in constitutional theory. The leading contemporary constitutional historian in the United States, Leonard Levy, disagreed—strongly:

". . . for over half a century the exclusionary rule (has) barred grand juries from using evidence derived from illegal searches and seizures. To talk about an 'unprecedented' or a 'proposed' extension of the exclusionary rule, as if its application to grand-jury proceedings was novel, broached judicial perjury." [42]

Levi's point—that it is the government that has tampered with the historical grand jury—has been echoed by other historians. As Prof. Leon Friedman explained to this subcommittee June 1, the hearsay evidence that prosecutors routinely present before grand jurors today was not considered proper fodder for grand jurors all throughout the 19th century.[43]

But it is the immunity question that best illustrates the incompatibility of current undemocratic grand jury practices with the grand jury's historical tradition. Before 1954, there was no way a 20th century prosecutor could neutralize a witness' invocation of the Fifth Amendment before a grand jury with a grant of immunity. Immunity was then strictly a regulatory phenomenon, and the only immunity laws on the statute books covered the activities of regulatory agencies like the ICC. This absence of an immunity law applicable to criminal proceedings proved to be an important safeguard during the anti-communist hysteria of the early 1950's. By invoking the Fifth Amendment, the targets of witch-hunting grand juries put at least a modicum of space between themselves and their inquisitors.

In fact, this safeguard was so effective that the red-hunting zealots of the day took steps to eliminate it. In 1954, at the height of Cold War frenzy, the first 20th century immunity law applicable to criminal matters was passed.[43a] This act extended the applicability of immunity only to "subversive" crimes like espionage. Immunity was not extended to most criminal offenses until 1968 and not extended to all federal criminal offenses until the 1970 passage of the Organized Crime Control Act. That same act created "use" immunity and, in doing so, ignored the spirit of the Supreme Court's Counselman decision which deemed unconstitutional anything less than full, transactional immunity.[44]

In the field of immunity, then, just as in the fields of hearsay and illegally seized evidence, the prosecutorial grand jury prerogatives that grand jury reformers are fighting today are perverse additions to, not historical aspects of, traditional grand jury procedure.

Anti-reform argument No. 8: the government has a "right to everyman's evidence"

A reader of recent government briefs and Supreme Court decisions could very easily conclude that our entire Constitution is built around the notion that the government has a "right to every man's evidence." This doctrine is exclaimed whenever prosecutors' attempts to forcibly subpoena or immunize information out of witnesses are challenged.

The Constitution, however, nowhere speaks of the government's "right to every man's evidence." Instead, it speaks of the right of every person not to be forced to bear witness against himself or herself. A generation ago, Supreme Court Justice William Douglas called this right "the right of silence." [45]

We hold, with Justice Douglas, that the Fifth Amendment means just what it says: that people cannot be forced to do themselves harm out of their own mouths. Harm, moreover, springs not just from admitting acts that can be construed as criminal, self-incrimination, but also from being forced to make statements that would subject an individual to the scorn or "infamy" of his or her community, self-infamation.

Certainly, there is no historical doubt that throughout the 17th and 18th centuries in England and its American Colonies, self-incrimination and self-infamation were considered twin evils. This conception underlined the Fifth Amendment and shaped the thinking of early United States jurists, as a fascinating 1802 case made plain.

[45] Ullmann v. U.S., 350 U.S. 445 (1956).

The case involved an old, blind Pennsylvania man, who had apparently been a Tory sympathizer during the Revolutionary War. On a local election day, the old gentleman appeared at the appropriate polling place to vote, but the registrar, an ardent patriot, refused to register the poor man unless he first answered what would have been embarrassing questions about his pro-British past.

The question infuriated the blind man's son, who had accompanied his father to the polls. He lunged at the registrar, precipitated an altercation and was subsequently indicted for his disruptive behavior. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, however, dismissed the indictment, explaining that the registrar had absolutely no right to ask the old man the questions that had enraged his son. Said the court:

". . . the true meaning of the constitution and law is, that no question shall be asked a person, the answer to which may tend to charge him either with a crime, or bring him into disgrace or infamy." [40]

Still, the right-to-every-man's-evidence doctrine is not a figment of the Justice Department's imagination. It does have a heritage in Anglo-American law. How can that be? Isn't there a glaring contradiction between the government's right to evidence and the citizen's right to silence? The government maintains that there is, that there is no right to silence that can override the government's need for information inside the grand jury chamber.

But, despite this government assertion, there is no contradiction here. The government's right to evidence simply means that no citizen has the right to obstruct justice by withholding evidence of criminal activity. Obstructing justice in such a way is a crime. There are various criminal statutes that address this crime, and penalties have been ascribed to them. As is the case with any crime, no person can be subject to these penalties unless first proved guilty in a court of law, and the burden of proof, as always, is on the government. It must be able to present evidence and witnesses who will testify that the accused is obstructing justice. This evidence, of course, cannot be forced out of the accused.

If the government cannot prove that a witness is interfering with justice, then it has no business using the subpoena-immunity-civil contempt process to punish him or her for silence. This is what the right of silence should guarantee. But today it doesn't. By forcing immunity upon a silent witness, the government can have him or her jailed indefinitely without ever having to prove him or her guilty of committing a crime.

The right to evidence is no justification for allowing the government to march through people's lives in search of information they do not want to provide. Just as the right to free speech does not protect fraudulent advertising, the right of silence does not protect obstructing justice. But in each case, the crime must be proved, not merely asserted, by the government.

Anti-reform argument No. 9: Reforms give witnesses before the grand jury rights that they enjoy nowhere else in the criminal justice system

We cite this argument, which is sometimes dredged up to attack allowing counsel in the grand jury room, merely to show how far grand jury apologists will go to justify the grand jury status quo. This argument holds that since a witness does not have the right to consult with counsel at trial before answering each question, a grand jury witness should not have this right either.

This argument falls rapidly apart under any sort of serious scrutiny. At a trial, there are very strict rules of relevancy that govern the questions a witness may be asked by either the prosecutor or defense counsel. At a trial, there is a judge present to ensure that questions asked of any witness do not go beyond the proper boundaries. There is no such mediator present in a grand jury room to protect a witness from totally irrelevant, vague or harassing questions.

It is also totally erroneous to assert that witnesses at trial are not allowed the presence and advocacy of counsel. Witnesses at trial do in fact enjoy the right to representation by counsel. Perhaps the most current example is the increasing tendency on the part of prosecuting witnesses in rape trials to retain their own counsel to ensure their protection from questions concerning their previous sexual experience posed by defense counsel in an attempt to discredit the witness in the eyes of the jury.

Such counsel for the witness has an active role and will approach the judge at any point to raise objections to specific questions or a line of questioning which affects the rights of the witness.

[40] Commonwealth v. Gibbs, 3 Yeates, 429, 432.

But what makes this Justice Department argument absurd is that grand jury witnesses already have the ability to consult their attorneys after each question, only they must leave the grand jury room after each question to do so!

III. Our society will pay a heavy price of the Congress chooses not to reform the grand jury

Prosecutors have spoken ominously—and, as we have shown, unjustifiably—about the dangers of enacting grand jury reform legislation. We would be remiss if we did not point out to this subcommittee and to the Congress as a whole that grave dangers lie ahead should Congress decide not to reform the grand jury system.

In 1970, only a miniscule percentage of the American people knew much about the grand jury. But that is no longer the case. Since then, seven years of publicized grand jury controversies have given millions of citizens a frightening glimpse at what may go on behind the grand jury's closed doors. Many Americans now know that grand jury witnesses surrender their constitutional birthright when they enter the grand jury room. They know that inside the grand jury chamber prosecutors can wield awesome, unaccountable power. Many of these Americans consider a grand jury subpoena an invitation to an inquisition, and, given that invitation, they will refuse to attend, they will go to jail rather than cooperate with an institution that infringes upon their righs.

This feeling is not limited to a few radicals or stubborn reporters. It is widespread among broad sectors of our society, and every time a person is jailed for the "crime" of silence, every time someone's reputation is ruined by a grand jury fishing expedition, every time a perjury trap is laid inside the grand jury chamber, this sentiment spreads a little more.

It has already spread quite far. Last May, when the National Council of Churches enacted its grand jury reform recommendation, it also called upon all member denominations to "give moral and material support (including continuing salary for employees) for those members and employees who for reasons of principle refuse to testify before a grand jury." With those words, the National Council of Churches is calling on the national religious community to support civil disobedience against the grand jury.

As long as the grand jury system is not reformed, civil disobedience to grand jury orders will become more and more frequent. The number of contemnors will increase, the amount of litigation will increase, citizen distrust of the criminal justice system will increase.

Finally, as long as the grand jury system is not reformed, the lives and reputations of who-knows-how-many people will be ruined by what can go on inside the grand jury room. We say that not one more person must suffer an injustice at the hands of grand jury power. We say that not one person should have suffered an injustice at the hands of grand jury power because the grand jury was written into the Law of our land to prevent injustice. We say that it is long past the time for Congress to act.

LEGISLATIVE SUGGESTIONS

As previously stated, we view H.R. 94 as an important reform bill. There are, however, certain provisions in the bill which we feel are both unnecessary and potentially dangerous. In this section of our testimony, we would like to identify these sections and also offer a few additions to the bill for your consideration.

1. Counsel in the grand jury chamber

There has been a great deal of confusion over the role that counsel for a witness should play before the grand jury. The present language of H.R. 94, which explicitly limits counsel to advising witnesses, appears to have been drafted to disarm the Department of Justice and other critics of reform who have opposed allowing counsel into the grand jury room on the grounds that witness attorneys would be disruptive. Yet it is abundantly clear now that the Justice Department will oppose counsel despite the restrictive language of H.R. 94. language which was not in H.R. 1277, its predecessor in the last Congress.

This continued Justice Department opposition can only be explained to our satisfaction by realizing that the disruption issue is a phony one. What is bothering prosecutors is not the possibility of disruption, but the loss of prosecutorial maneuvering room that will result once defense attorneys are allowed inside the grand jury chamber. With defense counsel on hand, prosecutors so inclined will no longer be able to play on the legal ignorance of grand jurors and stage inquisitorial interrogations.

While the present language of H.R. 94 does not change the attitude of Department of Justice prosecutors—who will oppose a counsel provision no matter how it is drafted—it does make a great deal of difference to the defense bar. Under the current language of H.R. 94, as opposed to the language of last year's H.R. 1277, defense counsel will enter the grand jury room muzzled, unable to speak to anyone but the witness even if the grand jury wants to hear from counsel.

H.R. 94 would also subject defense counsel to removal from the grand jury room at the whim of the court. This clause is a clear interference with the Sixth Amendment right to counsel of one's choice and it places an unholy power in the hands of the district court judge. Courts already have the power to discipline and control unruly attorneys with contempt procedures. We do not see why this additional defense attorney removal clause is necessary or desirable.

We urge a particularly close examination of the language used in this section. A district court judge would be authorized to fire defense counsel to "insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded". We suggest that the use of the words "delayed or impeded", broad language lacking objective standards to guide the court, invites abuse.

An additional, subtle problem exists in connection with subsection (d) which raises the issue of how the witness' counsel can delay or impede the proceedings if she or he is not also in violation of subsection (c). Subsection (c) virtually prohibits all activities of counsel except advising the witness. Therefore, by a deductive argument, delaying or impeding the proceedings must refer to periods when counsel and witness are conversing. To find an attorney guilty of delaying or impeding, there would presumably have to be a determination that said conversations were overly long and conducted in bad faith. This raises the issue of intent, exactly the kind of nebulous area drafters of legislation should avoid.

We suggest that this subcommittee strike out lines 10–22 on page 20 of H.R. 94 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The role of such counsel shall be the same as that of counsel for a witness before a committee of Congress.

This change would effectively give control over the defense attorney's role to grand jurors in the same manner as members of Congressional committees control a committee witness' attorney. To totally prohibit a defense counsel from addressing grand jurors is not the way to foster the spirit of grand jury independence.

IMMUNITY

As we have previously addressed the issue of immunity at length, we need only note here that simply adding "Consent of the witness to the guidelines proposed in Section 6003(c) would eliminate much of the problem of grand jury abuse.

TESTIMONIAL PRIVILEGES

One of the most serious abuses which takes place inside the grand jury chamber is the coercion of privileged testimony. The privilege violated may be obvious, as in the case of an attorney forced to testify about a client, or it may involve a confidential relationship which is not clearly estabilshed as privilege, such as the right of a law minister to preserve confidential information obtained through the course of her or his ministry. In order to preserve the sanctity of the confidential relationships so vital to a democratic society, we would suggest that on page 23 of H.R. 94, subclause (E) at line 18 be re-lettered as (F) and that the following language be inserted in lieu thereof as sub-clause (E):

(E) compliance with the subpoena would not impair or disparage the right of any person to counsel of her or his choice or of any other legal confidential relationship (even though no privilege exists).

This language was suggested originally by Prof. Melvin Lewis of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and is, we believe, an excellent approach to a tricky problem. It would empower the district court judge to determine if compliance with a subpoena would require a witness to violate a confidential privilege that society should protect.

CONTEMPT HEARINGS

For a recalcitrant witness before a grand jury, the contempt hearing is the first and only opportunity to establish a legitimate basis for a refusal to testify. Even under the reform provisions of H.R. 94, a witness would still face a six-month deprivation of liberty for a refusal to testify, a fact that makes the contempt hearing a critical and crucial stage in the criminal justice process.

Present procedures, however, guarantee that the contempt hearing is only a formality. Contempt hearings may be held on only a few hours notice, and, in that brief time, a witness must obtain counsel, if that has not already been done, and counsel must prepare the case.

The proposal in H.R. 94 that a witness be given 72 hours notice before a contempt hearing is insufficient. In many instances the defense needs to subpoena witnesses for its case. Seventy-two hours is not enough time to make the proper arrangements.

Moreover, by giving a judge the opportunity to shorten the notice upon a showing of special need by the prosecutor, H.R. 94 further undercuts a witness' right to a meaningful contempt hearing. "Special needs" come easily to prosecutors and, we are afraid, to far too many judges. We propose that lines 18–22 of page 2 be stricken and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

"(3) No hearing under this subsection shall be held unless ten days notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order, except where the court finds special need upon a showing by the attorney for the government or a special attorney appointed under this title or where the witness waives her or his right to ten days notice, but in no event shall any hearing be held under this subsection unless five days notice is given to the witness."

Five days is the minimum amount of time in which a recalcitrant witness can expect counsel to prepare an adequate case for the witness' refusal to testify. Additionally, witnesses need time to set their personal lives in order before their contempt hearings. They need time to prepare themselves and their families for the possibility of a long incarceration: Is it unreasonable to take these human practicalities into consideration? We think not. A civil contemnor, after all, has not been convicted or even tried for a crime.

SUBPOENA NOTICE

For a witness subpoenaed before a federal grand jury, or ordered to turn over documents or exemplars, response to the subpoena is necessarily inconvenient and disruptive to the ordinary conduct of home and business. H.R. 94 would greatly ameliorate this situation by requiring seven days between the witness' receipt of the subpoena and compelled appearance and/or production. But by allowing a district court judge to reduce this period to any minimum upon a potentially arbitrary determination of "special need", this provision severely undercuts the effectiveness of the excellent seven days requirement.

We suggest that the same purpose can be better achieved by adding a new clause to § 3330B of H.R. 94, inserting a commo after the word "subpena" at line 6 of page 21, and adding: . . . but in no event shall any subpena be returnable in less than seventy-two hours from the date of service of the subpena.

Seventy-two hours is the minimum amount of time to allow a witness to arrange her or his affairs at home or work to allow for a possibly lengthy grand jury appearance, to collect documents subpoenaed to make any travel arrangements required by the appearance, and to consult with counsel if desired. Any lesser period of time, such as forty-eight hours, would mean that a witness subpoenaed on a Friday could be compelled to appear on a Monday, having had no opportunity to consult with counsel or arrange business affairs.

A witness forced to drop everything in an almost immediate response to a grand jury subpena is likely to be too harassed, confused and worried to be a valuable witness.

BAIL

If a witness is found in contempt for a refusal to testify and if bail is denied, as is customary in contempt cases, the witness must sit in jail pending a determination of the appeal. Requiring the appeal's court to act within 30 days is absolutely necessary in a civil contempt situation, but the requirement itself is useless without some sort of enforcement clause. We suggest that the language proposed by Rep. Holtzman in H.R. 406 would best solve this enforcement problem. This language could be incorporated into H.R. 94 by adding a new sentence after the word "appeal" at line 5 on page 4:

"If the appellate court shall fail to dispose of the appeal of a person who remains imprisoned within 30 days, the person shall automatically be released on her or his personal recognizance pending disposition of the appeal."

CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT

How grand jury contemnors have been forced to spend their confinement time should be an important consideration in grand jury reform. Witnesses have been incarcerated for as long as 14 months in miserable county jails which are not permitted to hold convicted felons for periods longer than twelve months. There is absolutely no justification for incarcerating a civil contemnor under worse circumstances than a person actually convicted of a criminal offense.

The facilities in which civil contemnors are incarcerated should be as uniform as possible and should be federal facilities equipped to handle long-term prisoners. We find no basis at all for H.R. 94's stipulation that such federal facilities must be located within 50 miles of the court ordering confinement and suggest that this requirement be stricken. Proximity to the courts has not been a concern to district court judges in the past who have ordered witnesses confined in county jails as much as 100 miles from their courthouse when there were adequate federal correctional facilities within a few miles. Neither should it be a concern now, for, if it is, contemnors will continue to be forced to serve time in miserable county jails unfit for this purpose.

DEFENSES TO CONTEMPT

While H.R. 94 establishes violations of the federal wiretap law as a defense to any action brought against a witness under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, or section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, it does not establish a defense for violations of other statutes or constitutional rights which are equally important. Accordingly we suggest that lines 10–17 at page 4 be stricken and the following substituted:

"(b) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a grand jury of the United States shall not be punishable under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, if the question asked or the request for information is based in whole or in part upon evidence obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States."

STANDARD OF EVIDENCE

The standard of evidence necessary to indict is of major importance. Presently, indictments may be based on anything from hard evidence to hearsay to extraneous remarks by the prosecutor. The deterrent value of the exclusionary rule is therefore attenuated; it always will be attenuated as long as law enforcement officials know that evidence obtained illegally can form the basis of any indictment.

H.R. 94 addresses this issue quantitatively by requiring that evidence be "sufficient" to form a basis for indictment. We think that the better approach is to address the specific nature of the evidence—the quality of the evidence on which grand jurors may base an indictment. We suggest that lines 10–11 at page 13 of § 3329(a) be striken and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

(7) the necessity that an indictment be based on evidence that is legally sufficient, competent and admissible.

GRAND JURY SIZE

H.R. 94 proposes a reduction in the size of federal grand juries from the traditional 16–23 members to 9–15. This proposal, while well-intentioned, has serious drawbacks. For one, it will mark a setback in the long struggle to make grand jury panels representative of the communities they are supposed to serve. A large panel provides the potential of a fuller cross-section of the community.

A smaller panel may well be of "one mind" and not provide the variety of background and opinion that is necessary for a true "people's panel." At a time when the independence of grand jurors is in grave danger, it makes no sense to us to present prosecutors with a potentially more pliable group of grand jurors. We suggest that this would be the ultimate result of the provisions in Section 3321 and consequently we suggest that this section be omitted from H.R. 94.

SPECIAL ATTORNEYS

The grand jury has historically served to protect the citizenry in two ways. First, it protects individual citizens by preventing prosecutors from bringing an accused to trial on trumped-up charges. Secondly, it protects the citizenry at large by preventing prosecutors from covering up official crime and corruption.

To perform this second function, grand jurors need the freedom to investigate government misconduct. We support the "special attorney" section of H.R. 94 in this regard. It would enable grand jurors to "fire" prosecutors who are impeding official corruption probes. The language of H.R. 94's special attorney proposal is, however, dangerously broad. It would allow grand jurors to obtain a special prosecutor and independently investigate any possible criminal conduct they desire.

It is not the grand jury's task to "solve" crimes that have nothing to do with official misconduct. Investigating such crimes is the job of the executive branch, which should not be allowed to misuse the grand jury for that purpose.

GRAND JUROR DECISIONMAKING

In keeping with the intent of grand jury reform legislation to restore the time-honored independence of grand juries, we believe that grand jurors themselves should vote on whether to issue subpoenas, grant immunity or press contempt charges. There is nothing to stop the grand jurors, of course, from taking a prosecutor's advice on these matters, nor should there be. It is vitally important, however, that grand jurors be aware that theirs is the authority and theirs the ultimate decision.

Witnesses before this subcommittee have recounted at length how prosecutors routinely issue subpoenas about which grand jurors have no knowledge. Many times, prosecutors subpoena witnesses directly into their offices instead of the grand jury chamber. Forcing prosecutors to obtain prior approval of witnesses to be subpoenaed would end these abuses. We suggest that this subcommtitee make the following changes in H.R. 94 to allow for grand jury decision-making:

For subpoenas—strike lines 24 and 25 at page 20 and lines 1–6 at page 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) A subpena summoning a witness to appear and testify before a grand jury of the United States, or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury, shall be issued only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury, and such subpena may not be returnable on less than seven days notice, except with the express consent of the witness or upon a showing to the court by the attorney for the government of special need, but in no event shall any subpena be returnable in less than seventy-two hours from the date of service of the subpena."

For contempt—amend § 1826(a)(1) by inserting the following between the words "may" and "apply":

". . . only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury that such refusal was without just cause . . ."

For immunity—add a new subclause to § 6003(c)(4) as follows:

"(F) there is an affirmative finding by twelve or more members of the grand jury that such testimony or other information sought to be obtained by the witness is necessary to the public interest;"

REITERATIVE CONTEMPT

No person should be jailed more than once for a refusal to answer the same questions. This is the intent of H.R. 94's prohibition against reiterative contempt confinements for grand jury contemonors.

We fear, however, that under H.R. 94's present wording which bans reiterative confinements in the course of grand jury investigations into the "same" transactions, prosecutors would be albe to force reiterative contempt confinements by making some fine distinction between the subject matter of the grand jury investigation in question and a previous investigation. We propose that Section 1826(c) at page 3, line 19, be amended by inserting the words "or any related" between the words "same" and "transaction" and that this change also be made in Section 403 at page 5, line 7, and in Section 3330B, page 24, at lines 4 and 10.

Introduction

Welcome to the grand jury.

We know that you intend to do your best to become a conscientious grand juror, and we have designed this booklet to help you in that effort.

Who are we? We are the former grand jurors, lawyers, judges, legislators and just plain citizens who have joined together to form the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse. We think we know what it takes to make a grand jury work well—if only because our experiences have shown us so many work poorly.

This booklet is a guide for both local and federal grand jurors, not an exhaustive examination of the grand jury system. We have tried to discuss grand jury issues that are likely to affect grand jurors on all levels, but some important aspects of grand jury procedure do vary markedly between jurisdictions. If you are ever in doubt which procedures are applicable to your grand jury situation, check with your panel's legal advisors. For those of you who would enjoy delving deeper into the grand jury process, we have included a list of valuable readings and sources.

We don't expect you to accept every word of this booklet unquestioningly. In fact, the primary point we hope to make in the pages that follow is that meaningful grand jury action is impossible unless grand jurors have the courage and wisdom to question and think for themselves.

The Historical Background

The trust reposed in grand juries is of great and general concernment. To them is committed the custody of the portals of the law, that into the hallowed dome no injustice may be permitted to enter. They make, in the first instance, the important discrimination between the innocent and the guilty. To the former, they give a passport of security; the latter they consign to a final trial by a traverse jury.—James Wilson, early U.S. Supreme Court Justice, 1790

Most historians trace the grand jury's origins back to 12th century England, a time of bitter power struggles between the crown and its baronial and clerical rivals. In the 1160's, King Henry II, alarmed by noble and church control over large portions of England's judicial system, moved to consolidate his royal political power by creating the forerunner of our modern grand jury, a series of 16-member panels directly answerable to the crown.

The representatives of the local populace selected to serve on the King's panels were obligated to uncover and "indict" lawbreakers. Their indictment was tantamount to a modern conviction. Those poor souls indicted by these early juries could only prove their innocence by successfully undergoing an impossible "trial by ordeal"—plunging a hand into boiling water, for example—without sustaining an injury.[1] The jurors didn't have an easy time of it either. They could be and were fined heavily if they didn't return the indictments the king sought.

King Henry's grand jury was not, of course, the model for the grand jury incorporated into our Constitution in 1791. Between Henry II's rule and the American Revolution, the grand jury had evolved, at least in theory, into a source of people's power against the king, thanks largely to one celebrated 17th century case. The case involved the Earl of Shaftesbury, a troublesome political opponent of the then reigning monarch, Charles II. In 1681 Charles brought treason charges against the Earl before a London grand jury, but the grand jurors, unexpectedly, refused to indict. Worse yet from the King's perspective, they demanded the right to meet in secret session, free from crown interference.

In the short run, this show of grand juror independence was futile. The King simply took his charges to a different and more pliant grand jury panel. But the Shaftesbury uproar did wrap the grand jury system in an aura of popular sovereignty, and it was this spirit that English emigrants to the American colonies took with them. In 1735, for instance, a grand jury twice refused to indict a New York printer, John Peter Zenger, for libeling the royal governor, and later, during the pre-Revolutionary War years, grand juries repeatedly refused to return the indictments sought by royal authorities. By the Revolution's end, the grand jury was firmly implanted in the colonial mind as an indispensable citizen protection arbitrary authority.

In the new nation

Liberty to the first citizens of the young American republic meant, among other things, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, the right to a trial before a jury of one's peers and the right of every accused to a grand jury indictment. When the Bill of Rights was ratified midway through George Washington's first term, the grand jury stood as the first clause of the Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger . . .[2]

There was no mystery behind the grand jury's inclusion in the Bill of Rights. The people who won our independence were well aware that a government could manipulate the criminal law to punish its critics—and they were determined to prevent that kind of oppression from rearing its head in their new nation. Making a person stand trial, they realized, was in itself a penalty of sorts, an emotionally and financially draining ordeal that even an evetual verdict of not guilty could ever erase. No citizen should suffer this experience, the authors of the Bill of Rights felt, unless an independent panel of citizens, the grand jury, decided that the evidence warranted bringing an accused to trial. A free people, after all, could not allow the government to decide whom to bring to trial. The danger that politically motivated or overzealous prosecutors would subject the innocent to trial on trumped-up charges or whitewash the crimes of the guilty was just too great.

Setting a poor example

Our early leaders were not demigods sent from Mt. Olympus. With their noble and eloquent words, they were only reflecting the widespread public conviction that the people could not afford to trust the individuals who led them. This skepticism about power was well-founded, as some of the first officials of the new republic soon set about demonstrating. Almost from the start of our nation's existence, there were federal officials who looked to the Constitution not for inspiration, but for loopholes—of which the grand jury seemed an inviting example. Grand jury procedures were then, as now, ill-defined, and among the first to exploit the opportunities this situation offered were federal judges. Instead of instructing newly impaneled grand jurors on their historic responsibility to return impartial decisions, some members of the federal bench charged grand jurors with diatribes against their political enemies. Supporters of Thomas Jefferson, before he became president, were the frequent victims of this improper judicial pressure. These grand jury attacks taught Jefferson a lesson, but the wrong one. Years later, when Jefferson himself was president, he ignored the decisions of two grand juries that had refused to indict his archenemy, Aaron Burr, and had a third grand jury, packed with Jeffersonians, convened. Predictably, this third panel returned the indictment Jefferson so desperately wanted. Burr was later acquitted.

These inauspicious beginnings set the grand jury pattern. Grand juries, especially on the federal level, came to spend more time rubberstamping prosecutorial decisions than vigilantly watchdogging prosecutorial conduct. There were exceptions, particularly during the latter 1800's and early 1900's when grand juries successfully exposed municipal corruption—often over roadblocks set by local district attorneys—in city after city. One such city was Minneapolis where, in 1902, grand jurors hamstrung by the foot-dragging of the corrupt county prosecutor spent their own money to hire private investigators. In short order, the grand jury compiled enough damning evidence to chase the city's crooked mayor out of office.

Such heroism was not, however, the rule. The grand jury's record remained, on the whole, an uninspiring one, so much so that the majority of states entering the union after 1850 opted to do so without constitutionally mandating the right to a grand jury indictment.

In the states where a grand jury indictment is not required before an accused can be made to stand trial, the accused are now brought to trial on the basis of informations, formal written charges filed by prosecutors against individuals suspected of criminal activity. These charges must be heard by a magistrate at an open courtroom session called a preliminary hearing. At this hearing, the accused is entitled to an attorney, and strict rules of courtroom fairplay apply. After the government presents its case against the accused, the defense can challenge it or present its own. There is no citizen input during a preliminary hearing. The magistrate alone decides whether or not the evidence presented warrants bringing the accused to trial.

Many find the information process an attractive alternative to the grand jury indictment. In 1931 a blue-ribbon presidential commission recommended the abolition of the grand jury on the federal level and its replacement by informations.[3] By 1948 England, the birthplace of the grand jury, had done just that.

Our federal government has not followed suit, at least partly because abolishing the grand jury would require an exhausting effort to amend the Constitution. Similarly, while only a minority of states require a grand jury indictment before an accused is brought to trial, no state has completely abolished the grand jury indictment as a method of initiating criminal prosecutions. But the questions raised by the grand jury abolition movement remain. Are grand juries an anachronism? Is it realistic to expect a panel of citizens unversed in the law to rigorously oversee prosecutorial conduct? Do government prosecutors, in fact, really still pose a threat to our basic freedoms that must be vigilantly guarded against?

These are questions that every serious grand juror must face.

THE ROOTS OF PROSECUTORIAL MISCONDUCT

The prosecutor has more control over life, liberty, and reputation than any other person in America. He can have citizens investigated and, if he is that kind of person, he can have this done to the tune of public statements and veiled or unveiled intimations. Or the prosecutor may choose a more subtle course and simply have a citizen's friends interviewed. The prosecutor can order arrests, present cases to the grand jury in secret session, and on the basis of his one-sided presentation of the facts, can cause the citizen to be indicted and held for trial. He may dismiss the case before trial, in which case the defense never has a chance to be heard. While the prosecutor at his best is one of the most beneficient forces in our society, when he acts from malice or other base motives, he is one of the worst.—Robert H. Jackson, U.S. Attorney General and Supreme Court Justice, 1940.

The founders of our nation considered prosecutorial misconduct a menace 200 years ago. It remains a menace today. In 1976 a New York State legislative committee, after studying only recent New York court records, found 100 instances of prosecutorial misconduct.[4] There is no reason to believe that New York prosecutors are any worse or any better than prosecutors in other states or in the federal system. Undoubtedly, similar laundry lists of misconduct could be drawn for every judicial subdivision in the United States.

But why? Are people who become prosecutors inherently insensitive to the Bill of Rights? Of course not. But prosecutors do occupy a special and central position in our criminal justice system which subjects them to pressures and lures that encourage behavior a free society cannot tolerate. While no prosecutor is immune from these pressures, many can and do perform their jobs fairly and rigorously despite them. Some, however, cannot.

Protecting citizens from this latter category of prosecutors is your most difficult responsibility as a grand juror. Your task will be a great deal easier once you understand why prosecutors sometimes, as Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson succinctly put it a generation ago, "pick people they think they should get instead of cases that need to be prosecuted."

One: The prosecutor is a political animal.

Whether elected or appointed, prosecutors are neck-deep in politics. They have constituencies or superiors to please—sometimes both—and the decisions they do or do not make as prosecutors can make or break their own future careers, as well as the careers of their superiors, colleagues, friends or rivals. Over the years, countless prosecutors have built ladders to higher office out of the grand jury chamber, some with the patient, plodding work that produces solid grand jury indictments, others with shortcuts that generate more headlines than convictions. The bigger the case, the greater the temptation to manipulate the grand jury process. Faced with pressure from the community to "do something" about some particularly heinous crime, an ambitious prosecutor has everything to gain by widely scattering subpoenas on anyone even remotely connected to the case as proof that something is being done. The resulting media coverage is sure to keep the prosecutor's name in the news—and shatter the reputations of the people subpoenaed.

Two: The prosecutor is no more free of personal bias than any other member of our society.

Prosecutors, like all of us, are products of a social order still flawed by discriminatory attitudes of many kinds, and, for some, overcoming these attitudes is a real problem. One prosecutor might feel that people of certain backgrounds or beliefs are not to be trusted or that others must be trusted. Another prosecutor might be horrified when a striker throws a punch on a picket line, but unmoved by an allegation of white collar crime. Other prosecutors might have compiled a personal "enemies' list" of people who have dealt them real or imagined wrongs. Prosecutors may, in short, be unable to distinguish between people they dislike and people who have committed crimes.

Three: For prosecutors, overzealousness is an occupational hazard.

The prosecutor's job is to make sure that the perpetrators of crime are brought before the bar of justice, and this is a heavy responsibility to bear, too heavy for some prosecutors. These prosecutors begin to see themselves as the community's only defense against the relentless march of crime and lose all sense of proportion. Minor incidents become serious crimes. Serious crimes become rationalizations for ignoring basic rules of decency. Persecution, not prosecution, becomes the order of the day.

Whenever ambition, bias or zeal take command, grand jury abuse of some sort is almost a given—except when grand jurors exercise the check on prosecutorial misconduct they are supposed to provide. Unfortunately, spotting misconduct is not always easy. Indeed, the entire structure of the modern grand jury process is geared to make you see things a prosecutor's way. As confident as you may be that your grand jury panel would never let a manipulative prosecutor get to first base, the said truth is that grand jurors not only frequently let overzealous or politically motivated prosecutors get past first base, they often find themselves cheering as the prosecutors near home plate.

The Grand Jury's Boss

Any experienced prosecutor will admit that he can indict anybody at any time for almost anything before any grand jury.—William Campbell, U.S. District Court Judge, 1972

Why do grand jurors, as Judge Campbell notes and experienced observers agree, invariably do what prosecutors want them to do?

Essentially because prosecutors control the grand jury process. This control is nowhere mandated by the law. Prosecutors can't legally force grand jurors to do anything. What prosecutors do control, however, is information. Grand jurors see and hear whatever prosecutors want them to see and hear.

It is the prosecutor who generally determines which witnesses will appear before the grand jury. In fact, prosecutors may bring any witness they choose into the grand jury chamber. This sweeping prerogative derives from the grand jury's status as a "creature of the court." As such, grand jurors have access to judicial compulsory process authority, which means that a person can be ordered to appear before a grand jury. These orders to appear are called subpoenas, and although the power to subpoena does not belong to prosecutors, it is the prosecutor who almost always has witnesses subpoenaed to the grand jury.

Besides subpoenaing anyone they choose before a grand jury, prosecutors can also subpoena anything. In a normal, non-grand jury setting, prosecutors cannot have a person's home searched and personal possessions seized unless they can convince a judge that there is enough indication of wrong doing to justify a search warrant. But if a prosecutor before a grand jury wants to get hold of someone's personal papers, all that prosecutor has to do is have the papers subpoenaed. The person must either produce the papers inside the grand jury chamber or face a penalty for contempt of court.

There is virtually nothing that a prosecutor can't bring before a grand jury. At a trial, illegally seized material—items police have improperly expropriated—cannot be introduced as evidence. In the grand jury chamber, a prosecutor may introduce illegal evidence, even without informing the grand jurors of its illegality. The same situation holds for what is called hearsay evidence. Hearsay—asking a third party to testify to what an eyewitness saw or heard instead of asking the eyewitness directly—cannot be introduced, with some exceptions, during an actual trial. But prosecutors on the federal level and in many, although not all, states may ask a grand jury to return an indictment solely on the basis of hearsay evidence.

While prosecutors may bring anyone or anything they choose before a grand jury, they may also withhold any information they want. If there is evidence that would tend to show an accused's innocence—exculpatory evidence, in legal jargon—the prosecutor is not obliged to share this evidence with the grand jury. Nor does a prosecutor have to let an accused present exculpatory evidence directly to the grand jury.

The end result of all this is that if the government wants a particular indictment badly enough, the government will get it. According to surveys, grand juries return "no bills"—refuse to indict—in only five percent of the cases brought before them.[5] Only some of these no bills, however, reflect instances where a grand jury actually disagrees with a prosecutor. In certain controversial cases involving public figures a prosecutor would rather not indict, the prosecutor may softpedal the case against the accused, hoping that the grand jury will get the prosecutor "off the hook" by not indicting. Moreover, in those cases where a grand jury does not find the prosecution's evidence sufficient to indict, the government can keep bringing the same case before different grand juries until it finds one that will indict.

Added together, all these powers give prosecutors total discretion inside the grand jury chamber. A fair-minded prosecutor can use this discretion to develop the truth. A narrow-minded one can exploit it to put blinders on your eyes.

Danger Signals

> Haldeman: (Inaudible) Well, there is danger in a Grand Jury.
> Dean: Well, there are no rules.
> President: Well, Grand Juries are not very fair sometimes——
> —from the Watergate Transcripts, conversation of March 22, 1973.

Given the government's lockgrip on what goes on inside the grand jury chamber, can grand jurors avoid becoming the unwitting accomplices of manipulative prosecutors? We think so, provided grand jurors learn to recognize the danger signals that give away prosecutorial misconduct. Some danger signals are obvious, others much more subtle. No list of danger signals can be complete, but the one below does outline the pressures you many find yourself up against. If you and your grand juror colleagues start noting any of the danger signals that follow on a regular basis, tread carefully. Trouble may be "a brewing."

Loose Language

"Watch what they do, not what they say" is a solid maxim citizens should apply to all government officials. But when it comes to prosecutors, grand jurors have to watch what they say as closely as what they do. That's because there are many comments a prosecutor can make to prejudice your deliberations.

As a grand juror, you are entitled to hear hard evidence, actual facts. If the evidence a prosecutor presents is strong, the prosecutor should have little trouble getting grand jurors to return a true bill. If, however, the only evidence the government has is flimsy, the prosecutor may try to "improve" a weak case with irrelevant or loaded comments and asides.

A prosecutor, for example, may choose to argue a case on evidence grand jurors will never be able to examine for themselves:

> Unfortunately, the government's most important witness, John Smith, died six months ago. But if Mr. Smith were here today, he would have a remarkable story to tell. [6]

Or a prosecutor may constantly refer to an accused with disparaging remarks:

> This man is a disgrace to our city's good name.

Grand jurors are not legal experts, for the most part, and a prosecutor may attempt to overawe you with his or her professionalism:

> In all my years in the district attorney's office, I have never seen a case as open and shut as this one.

A prosecutor may try to get you to make your decision on the basis of an issue that has nothing to do with the case at hand:

> What's at stake here is the reputation of the police. If no indictment is returned here today, this panel is telling the world that our police are a bunch of liars.

While it is a grand jury's job to make sure that no accused person stands trial unless there is good reason—probable cause—to believe that he or she has committed a crime, a prosecutor may attempt to pull a true bill out of a hesitant grand jury by downplaying the significance of the indictment process:

> By indicting this woman, you're not sentencing her to jail. If she is innocent, the jury will acquit her at trial. That's what the jury system is for.

A prosecutor may seek to bias you against a witness with embarrassing questions:

> Are you married? To whom are you married? You have a son, don't you? Do you love your son? Why are you ashamed to answer questions about your son? Who is the father of your child?

---

Some questions may reveal a prosecutor who has more in mind than helping you determine whether or not to indict a particular individual, the only proper grand jury function. Be especially alert for broad, open-ended questions. This question was asked by a federal prosecutor in 1970:

> I want you to tell the grand jury what period of time during the years 1969 and 1970 you resided at 2201 Ocean Front Walk, Venice (Los Angeles), who resided there at the time you lived there, identifying all the persons you have seen in or about the premises at that address, and tell the grand jury all of the conversations that were held by you or others in your premises during the time you were at that address.[7]

A prosecutor who asks questions like these is more likely interested in filling intelligence dossiers on private citizens than presenting evidence. Intelligence gathering is not a proper function of the grand jury.

Neither is using the grand jury to "fish" for information that could be used against an already indicted defendant at trial. This practice most commonly arises in cases where the government has had a suspect hastily indicted on scanty evidence, then finds itself in desperate need of evidence that will stand up in court. Be wary whenever a prosecutor begins questioning a witness about a crime for which someone has already been indicted.

Prosecutors have in the past tried to intimidate witnesses to get information:

> Do you really expect this grand jury to believe that? Don't you know that people can go to jail for lying to a grand jury?

Such questions unfairly undercut a witness' credibility, a function also served by badgering witnesses who ask permission to leave the grand jury chamber to see their attorney outside:

> Don't you know this grand jury is working on a tight schedule? You've already gone out to see your lawyer before. What's the matter? Do you have something to hide?

Going through the motions

What prosecutors do can be very bit as telling as what they say. Bad deeds belie good faith every time, and it's not difficult to pinpoint some of the prosecutorial actions that should start those danger signals flashing for you.

The first thing to check when you begin considering a case is whether the proceedings are being recorded. While not all jurisdictions require that grand jury proceedings be recorded, it's impossible to hold prosecutors accountable for what they do and say before a grand jury without a permanent record. With recording devices so simply and inexpensively available, there is no legitimate excuse for not recording grand jury exchanges involving the prosecutor.

It's essential that all prosecutor-grand jury interactions be recorded, not just the interrogation of witnesses. A prosecutor can make highly improper remarks when a witness or suspect is not inside the grand jury chamber.

Once recording has begun, make sure it continues. If a prosecutor should ever have a recording apparatus turned off (or a stenographer stopped) in order to make an "off-the-record" comment, you should, as a self-respecting grand juror, hit the roof. Internal grand jury deliberations, of course, should not be recorded. Secrecy is necessary here to maintain the integrity of the grand juror decision-making process. If prosecutors should ever walk in on your internal jury deliberations, inform the judge who has impaneled your grand jury immediately.

Justice delayed, the legal saying goes, is justice denied, and the right of every individual to a speedy disposition of the government's charges against him or her is a fundamental aspect of civil liberty. But sometimes a prosecutor's speed inside the grand jury chamber may be designed to benefit the government, not the accused. Legal observors have dubbed this undue haste the "race to indict." This unusual dash occurs in judicial districts where the grand jury and information coexist as methods of charging. In such circumstances, an arrested suspect may choose to waive the right to a grand jury indictment and seek instead to be charged by information. An information requires, as we have noted above, a public preliminary hearing where an accused hears and can challenge the government's evidence. A person charged via the grand jury route has no such opportunity, which is why some prosecutors will rush to get an indictment returned before the accused has an opportunity to call for a preliminary hearing.

At other times, undue haste may take the shape of subpoenas that demand a witness' immediate presence before a grand jury. Witnesses have been called before grand juries on only minutes' or hours' notice by subpoenas that indicate neither the crime under investigation nor the reason the person has been subpoenaed. Aside from disrupting a person's life—if you were ordered at this very moment to appear at the local courthouse in one hour, how would that affect you and your family?—such last-minute subpoenas effectively prevent a witness from arranging for legal advice. The resulting confusion is only likely to panic an already apprehensive witness.

The harassment factor in these subpoenas is obvious. What they contribute to the grand jury's dispassionate search for truth is not.

Subpoenas themselves can put out danger signals. A subpoena that, for instance, demands the grand jpury appearance of a public official in the midst of a heated election campaign or a subpoena that forces a witness to travel long distances, at great inconvenience, to be before the grand jury should raise questions in grand jurors' minds about what the prosecutor may be up to. As a general rule, any subpoena that causes a witness personal hardship entitles you and your fellow grand jurors to, at the least, a convincing explanation of why the subpoena was necessary.

Such a rule also applies equally to a subpoena duces tecum, a special kind of subpoena that demands the production of books, documents and the like. A subpoena duces tecum that orders a witness to turn over enormous numbers of papers to a grand jury could conceivably paralyze a particular organization or enterprise. This dislocation might be justifiable, but conscientious grand jurors cannot assume that the prosecutor can justify it. Ask.[8]

A wide-ranging subpoena duces tecum may also indicate that the government has tried to get a search warrant and failed because it could not prove to a judge that the warrant was proper under the circumstances. In cases like these, a subpoena duces tecum becomes a substitute for a search warrant, an end run round court rulings the government doesn't like.

When Silence Isn't Golden

> Meetings, groups, associations, and conversations are the First Amendment building blocks of our political process. Unless the government is engaged in a bona fide presentation of evidence of criminal activity to a grand jury, it has no business probing into such activities, frightening citizens away from them, or punishing people who resist revealing them to hostile authorities.—Charles Goodell, former United States Senator 1973

The danger signals of prosecutorial misconduct may be, as we have seen, comments or deeds. They may even be a single word. In fact, there are two words you might hear as a grand juror that should start red lights flashing just by their mere mention: immunity and perjury. Their mention inside the grand jury chamber doesn't mean something improper is about to happen, but it does increase the chances. Prosecutors who improperly manipulate immunity and perjury are the most dangerous you will ever face.

Immunity

Immunity has been variously described as an indispensable law enforcement tool, a slipshod legalism that rewards criminal behavior and a trapdoor to prison for those who value their personal privacy. It is, in short, a highly controversial item.

What is immunity? In its best sense, a bargain between a witness and the government. In return for a witness' testimony, the government promises not to prosecute the witness on the subject he or she may testify about.

Why should the government have to promise immunity in order to obtain a witness' information? The answer is in the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment of the Bill of Rights states that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself (sic)." This clause, usually referred to as "the privilege against self-incrimination" is no mere technicality. It is the bedrock of our criminal justice philosophy.

[8] In 1975, for instance, a U.S. Attorney in San Francisco subpoenaed over 1,000,000 documents from a local labor union. Complying with the subpoena, the union's attorneys charged, would have prevented the union from paying benefits to its disabled or retired members. San Francisco Chronicle, February 19, 1975. The court agreed and quashed the subpoena.

In our judicial system, anyone accused of a crime is presumed innocent. The government must prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the individual need not prove innocence. He or she is free to remain silent, and the right to this silence is crucial. If a suspect did not have a lawful right to silence, the government, with all the resources at its command, could pressure a person into saying what the government wanted to hear. Indeed, if the government had the authority to force citizens to answer its questions, privacy and the freedoms to speak, write and read freely would never be secure.

In the United States the government does not have the authority to force people to answer its questions. The Fifth Amendment protects our right to silence, and the government cannot revoke it. But while the government cannot force a person to relinquish this protection, federal and state legislation has given prosecutors the ability to replace the right to silence with a different sort of protection: immunity. Once the government removes the possibility of self-incrimination by immunizing a person from future prosecution, that person has no Fifth Amendment right to remain silent.

Used correctly, immunity can benefit both the immunized witness and society. Consider, for example, a case where the government has identified a minor participant in a criminal conspiracy, but needs more evidence to indict the higher-ups. The small-timer could provide that evidence, but he, understandably, is reluctant to answer questions that would help the government convict him. So the government strikes a bargain: if the witnes testifies inside the grand jury chamber, the government will grant the witness immunity from future prosecution. The witness agrees and, immunized, appears before the grand jury. His testimony leads to the indictments of his criminal superiors, and all the parties to the bargain walk away from it pleased—the government because the serious criminals are headed for jail, the immunized witness because he's not.

Immunity, however, does not always work so well. While prosecutors can immunize the criminal "small-fry" to obtain evidence against the criminals who really matter, they may also grant immunity to important criminals who should be prosecuted for their crimes, not immunized from them.

These immunity baths, as they are sometimes called, can seriously undermine public confidence in the judicial system. Today, though, immunity's greatest danger is not that prosecutors will use it to "reward" their criminally involved friends, but that they will manipulate it to punish their "enemies." Immunity can enable prosecutors to jail people without having to bother proving them guilty in a court of law.

The process may begin whenever a grand jury witness invokes the Fifth Amendment. On the federal level, a prosecutor can obtain an authorization to immunize this silent witness by filing a brief form with the Attorney General's office in Washington. Approval here is usually automatic, and once this authorization is signed by the appropriate federal judge, who by law must sign it once the Attorney General's office has given its approval, the grant of immunity becomes an order. The witness who refuses to comply with it—that is, testify—may be brought before the judge and found in contempt.

The destination for a witness found in contempt is jail. The length of the witness' stay behind bars depends on the nature of the contempt. Civil contempt is meant to coerce a recalcitrant witness (a witness who refuses to testify under court order) into testifying. A civil contempt incarceration lasts as long as the immunized witness' silence, and that, theoretically, could be a very long time. The witness may be kept in jail for as long as the grand jury that seeks his or her testimony sits. When the grand jury's term expires, the witness may be resubpoenaed before a new grand jury, immunized and jailed again. What this means is that a person found in civil contempt can be jailed indefinitely for what amounts to the "crime of silence."

Criminal contempt, on the other hand, is designed to punish a recalcitrant witness for interfering with the judicial process, not to coerce a witness into answering questions. A witness jailed for criminal contempt cannot end the confinement by simply deciding to testify, because the confinement is for a fixed term.

A judge unilaterally may sentence a recalcitrant witness to up to six months in jail for criminal contempt, but if a sentence of more than six months is contemplated, the witness must be tried before a jury on the criminal contempt charges.

Prosecutors usually justify the jailing of silent witnesses by citing society's "right to every man's evidence." Interestingly, however, forcibly immunizing witnesses and threatening them with jail if they refuse to answer questions seldom produces valuable evidence, which is really not surprising.

There are, after all, many reasons behind a witness' silence, some base, but others perfectly understandable—even admirable. On the former end of the silent scale are people invloved in organized crime intrigues. They often won't testify inside the grand jury room because they fear the consequences of testifying against their criminal colleagues. Given the choice between confinement for contempt if they don't answer questions and the proverbial "cement shoes" if they do, professional criminals immunized without their consent will choose silence.

Silence, though, is hardly the sole preserve of the disreputable. The ranks of the silent may, at various times, include:

politcal activists who feel that they have only been subpoenaed because they are members of a group the government wants to discredit and disrupt with a headline-ridden grand jury witch hunt.[9] journalists who believe that the obligation of reporters to protect the identity of their sources is essential to a free and vibrant press.[10] lawyers who would rather face a finding of contempt than answer questions about their clients and break the confidentiality that is necessary for a meaningful attorney-client relationship.[11]

We could continue this categorization of silent witnesses for some time, but, suffice it to say, there can be legitimate reasons behind a witness' decision not to answer questions inside the grand jury chamber.

Sometimes, however, the Fifth Amendment right to silence will be invoked for no apparent reason: a witness asked an innocuous question like "Where do you work?" will respond by invoking the Fifth Amendment. Is this witness mocking the integrity of the grand jury process? Not at all. The witness is simply taking a constitutional precaution. The Supreme Court has ruled that a sworn witness cannot pick and choose the questions he or she will answer and which he or she won't. Once a witness has begun to answer questions in the grand jury room, he or she has lost the right to invoke the Fifth Amendment on other questions.

Prosecutors know this, of course, but many grand jurors do not. Thus, a prosecutor may try to bias an unknowing grand jury against a witness by labelling a witness' apparent nonsensical invocation of the Fifth Amendment a disrespectful act, which it is not. In fact, since so few grand jurors understand that an invocation of the Fifth Amendment is not an admission of guilt, a prosecutor can bias a grand jury against a witness simply by forcing an invocation of the Fifth Amendment on any question. This is why the American Bar Association's standards for ethical prosecutorial conduct deem it improper for a prosecutor to call before a grand jury a witness who has already told the prosecutor he or she plans to invoke the Fifth Amendment inside the grand jury chamber.

The American Bar Association also maintains that it is wrong for a prosecutor to call a target—the subject of an investigation—before a grand jury without informing that person that he or she is under suspicion. On the federal level and in many states, there is no legal provision stopping prosecutors from engaging in this very practice. A grand jury witness who doesn't know whether he or she may be indicted on the basis of the testimony he or she is being asked to give has another good reason to remain silent.

Forcing immunity onto silent witnesses makes them choose between their commitment to silence and jail. For those whose decision to remain silent is based on conscience, there is only one choice. They will go behind bars rather than answer questions. In cases like these, immunity benefits neither the witness nor society.

As a grand juror, you can play a key role in preventing immunity abuse. Whenever an immunity order is contemplated, ask if the prosecutor really expects the grant of immunity to produce testimony of value to the grand jury. If your prosecutor cannot answer with more than vague conjecture, be persistent. Has the witness in question refused to talk to the prosecutors outside of the grand jury room? Why? Is the witness afraid of testifying? Will a grant of immunity and its corresponding threat of contempt overcome that fear? Or has the witness refused to answer questions because he or she objects, on a principled basis, to the prosecutor's questions? If need be, let the silent witness explain his or her position, even if that means asking the prosecutor to leave the grand jury chamber temporarily.

Under current immunity statutes, grand jurors are not asked to approve or deny a prosecutor's request for an immunity order. But this doesn't mean that a grand jury is helpless in the face of what it considers an improper immunity order. If you should feel that a particular immunity order does not serve the public interest, inform the court. Also keep in mind that an immunized witness' refusal to testify is only contemptuous as long as the grand jury demands the witness' testimony. By withdrawing a subpoena or refusing to pursue the disputed questions, your grand jury panel can prevent the confinement of a silent witness.

The misuse of use immunity

Since 1970 the form of immunity applicable on the federal and most state levels has been a special type called limited or use immunity.[12] A witness granted use immunity can be forced to testify about an incident, even if that testimony is self-incriminatory, yet still be prosecuted for that incident at a later time—as long as the government does not use the immunized witness' testimony, either directly or indirectly, in a future prosecution.*

This use immunity, which has been the subject of intense controversy, adds an extra dimension of risk to grand jury proceedings. Use immunity has helped some prosecutors improperly discover defendants' trial strategy. A suspect about to be indicted on the basis of evidence a prosecutor has already accumulated is subpoenaed before a grand jury, immunized and interrogated about the alleged crime. If the person admits guilt, the prosecutor knows the government has an open-and-shut case that cannot be refuted. If the person claims exonerating circumstances, the prosecutor learns the details of the defense the potential defendant plans to give later at trial. Armed with this information, the prosecutor can specifically tailor the government's case to rebut the defense's contentions. The defendant, of course, has no comparable means to force the prosecutor to reveal the government's trial strategy.

Unfair discovery is one way prosecutors may abuse use immunity. There is another, which brings us to our second danger word . . .

Perjury

Definitions of perjury vary somewhat, but most people would agree that to perjure oneself means to deliberately lie under oath. Perjury is and should be a crime. No one should be able to swear to tell the truth and then not. But should the government be able to make a perjurer out of someone who walks into the grand jury chamber with no intention of lying?

Sound preposterous? It can happen when a prospective defendant is called before a grand jury and compelled to testify by a grant of use immunity. If the witness denies his or her guilt, the prosecutor can ask the grand jury to indict the witness for perjury as well as for the alleged criminal act under consideration, reasoning that if the grand jury feels there is probable cause to prosecute, then the accused must have been lying when he or she denied committing the crime. By branding the defendant as a perjurer like this, the prosecutor has immeasurably strengthened the government's chances of getting a conviction from the trial jury.[13]

There are other unsavory ways perjury indictments can be built out of grand jury proceedings. Prosecutors, for instance, can call witnesses repeatedly before one or more grand juries over a long span of time and ask the same questions, hoping that recollections, and hence answers, will differ from one appearance to the next. Since witnesses are not allowed by right to see their earlier grand jury statements made perhaps when the event in question was fresher in their minds, the chances that inadvertent discrepancies will appear are high.

[12] Use immunity was created by the passage of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970. Since 1974 it has been the only form of immunity in the federal system.

[13] An excellent discussion of this danger was given in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights September 28, 1976 by Prof. Melvin Lewis of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

*Under the traditional transactional immunity, which still applies in some states, the government may never prosecute an immunized witness on the subject described in his or her testimony, unless the witness is guilty of perjury.

But honest mistakes are not perjurous statements. A sufficiently zealous prosecutor can trap almost anyone into a mistake, but no prosecutor should ever be able to trap a grand jury into returning an unjust perjury indictment. As always, be alert!

Some Precautions

> Every time you hand down an indictment, you are sitting there not as a rubber stamp for a district attorney, not as people who read the law and apply it rigidly, but as people who say: "We live in this city, we know its problems and we are going to hand down indictments in accordance with the necessities of modern life, and last and always the most important, we are going to see that no district attorney, no irresponsible assistant, no cop seeking revenge, no judge, if you will, can charge, or get us into a situation where even a subpoena which can destroy the good name of a friend is issued, or an indictment handed down, unless we know that it is not being done for political purposes, for revenge, for satisfying a private grudge, or is contrary to the conscience of the community."—Thomas Dewey, prosecutor and Governor of New York

How can you prevent grand jury abuse? You have already taken the first step by studying what can go wrong inside the grand jury chamber. Now combine that knowledge with the basic guidelines below, and you will be well on your grand juror is a worthless grand juror.

Be skeptical.

Don't take what you hear inside the grand jury chamber at face value. Most grand jurors realize that they can question witnesses to clarify a confusing point. Sometimes, however, it may be just as important to question prosecutors. Make sure you understand what your prosecutor is doing every step of the way. If you don't fully understand what is transpiring before you, ask. A confused grand juror is a worthless grand juror.

Be watchful.

Keep your eye out for the tell-tale signs of grand jury abuse discussed earlier in this booklet. Anyone can spot misconduct after it takes place. The trick is to prevent abuse before it occurs.

Be independent.

Grand jurors may see and hear what they want. Don't limit yourself to only what the government would like you to know. Ask your prosecutor if any other evidence exists that would shed a different light on the case at hand. Subpoena witnesses whose testimony you feel would increase your understanding of the case. If you ever feel that a prosecutor is deliberately dragging his or her feet to prevent an indictment that should be returned, make your displeasure known to the prosecutor. If the foot-dragging continues, request a new, special prosecutor from the court.

Above all, remember that while you do not have to be convinced of a person's guilt to return an indictment, the grand jury's democratic purpose is to guarantee that no individual be made to stand trial on flimsy charges. That's a tall order, and, as a grand juror, you will have to stand tall to achieve it.

Good luck.

After It's Over

When your stint as a grand juror is over, then what are you going to do?

File the experience off in some dusty corner of your memory and forget about it? We certainly hope not. Whether your grand jury experience was rewarding or frustrating, you owe it to yourself—and the rest of us—to think about your grand jury encounter.

If your grand jury experience was a joy, then share it. The grand jury is a misunderstood and seldom appreciated institution. Take the time to explain the grand jury process to others in your community. Write a letter to the editor, give a little talk to a local club or group.

And if you found the grand jury a deeply flawed judicial mechanism, then do something to change it. There is a wide range of grand jury reform activity now going on in cities, statehouses and Washington. In 1976, for instance, both the Senate and the House of Representatives opened the first Congressional hearings on grand jury reform ever held.

The Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse keeps an extensive record of all these activities and publishes a quarterly publication, Grand Jury Report, for those interested in restoring the grand jury to the honored place it once held in American life. For more information write:

State legislatures and Congress can do much to cure the ills of the grand jury system, but effective grand jury action ultimately depends on the existence of effective grand jurors. No one knows that better than former grand jurors themselves. Yet although former grand jurors have a unique perspective to offer on the grand jury system, precious little effort has been made to determine what they feel makes grand jurors effective. You can help break this silence by completing the questionnaire on the following page. Thank you.

A Questionnaire for Former Grand Jurors

1. Before I was called to serve on the grand jury, I ——was well-versed on the function and purpose of grand juries.
——had a rough idea of how grand juries operate.
——knew virtually nothing about the grand jury process.
additional comments:

2. The grand jury I served on was ——on the federal level.
——on the state or local level.

3. During most of the grand jury proceedings, I ——was kept fully informed about what was happening and why.
——was often confused.
——was lost.
additional comments:

4. The grand jury on which I served returned the indictments sought by the government:
——100 per cent of the time.
——95–99 per cent of the time.
——90–94 per cent of the time.
——other, please estimate

5. I felt the prosecutor(s) who presented cases before my grand jury ——was sensitive to the rights of suspects and witnesses.
——was insensitive to the rights of suspects and witnesses.
additional comments:

6. In answering grand jury questions and requests, the prosecutor was:
——very cooperative.
——uncooperative.
additional comments

7. I feel my service on the grand jury:
——was an exhilarating experience.
——served no real purpose.
additional comments:

8. I found this handbook:
——very useful.
——sometimes useful.
——irrelevant.
additional comments:

9. I would be interested in participating in an organization of former grand jurors:
——yes.
——no.

10. I would be interested in attending a grand juror's conference:
——yes.
——no.

Grand Jury Abuse:

A case in point

(By Emmy Hixson)

Emmy Hixson is now Staff Attorney with the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse in Washington, D.C. Jill Raymond now lives in Washington, D.C. and works with ACLU National Prison Project.

Strange things happen in isolated rural county jails, most of which we never hear about. I will never forget one such scene which I witnessed, a happy event which meant the end of a 14-month ordeal for my friend and client, Jill Raymond. It happened at about midnight of May 4, 1976, at the Madison County Jail in Richmond, Kentucky. During the past year I had made the 2½-hour drive to Richmond from my office in Louisville dozens of times. Richmond is on the fringe of the eastern Kentucky coal country, a sleepy little town built around a "square," smack in the middle of which is the country courthouse. Behind the courthouse is a low white building which houses both the Madison County Jail and the living quarters of the jailer and his family. A friendly looking sign announces "Frank King, Jailer, You-Alls Friend." The Madison County Jail is a family enterprise where Frank and his wife Katherine serve as jailer, matron (and in Katherine's case, cook), and raise 13 children, with the older sons serving as guards.

This midnight scene in particular looked like a family reunion until one noticed the odd assortment of personages gathered there in the shabby lobby of the county jail. Reporters with cameras, university students with "End Grand Jury Abuse" buttons, all surrounded Katherine and Frank sitting on the torn vinyl couch beneath a 19th-century photograph of Frank's parents. Despite the late hour a couple of the inevitable courthouse hangers-on were there, "local yokels" making full use of the strategically placed spittoons. Young children wandered in and out, trying to get Katherine's attention. The room fell quiet suddenly as two very official looking men in business suits came through the door. These were the long-awaited U.S. Marshals bringing what we hoped was the court order which would free Jill Raymond from her 14 months behind bars. The U.S. Marshal handed a document to Frank, unaware that he had never learned to read and relied on Katherine's literacy. Katherine took the document and her face lit up as she read the words which finally brought freedom to Jill Raymond. As Jill had been the lone female prisoner in the jail for weeks at a time, she and Katherine had become more friends than matron and prisoner. Katherine got up, pulled a huge ring of keys from her pocket, and entered the barred thick metal door, over which hung a crude handmade sign with a quote adapted from Matthew 25:35–46:

"For they were hungry, and ye gave them food. They were thirsty and ye gave them drink. They were naked and ye clothed them . . . And they will go away into eternal punishment, but the righteous into eternal life."

Katherine returned shortly with a sleepy young woman with long brown hair who was immediately surrounded by the jubilant crowd—Jill Raymond was free for the first time in 14th months. She had never even been charged with a crime.

How did this happen and what was it all about? It all began with a visit from the FBI . . .

A VISIT FROM THE FBI

In the summer of 1975 two young women named Lena Paley and May Kelley had lived and worked in the gay and feminist communities in Lexington, Kentucky. They moved on after that summer, and in the following winter the FBI received information which led them to believe that the women were, in fact, two anti-war activists, Susan Saxe and Katherine Powers, fugitives under indictment for charges stemming from a bank robbery in Boston in the late 1960s. Upon learning that these women may have been the two who lived in Lexington, the FBI descended on Kentucky feminists and gays and began a round of interrogations there that was to end with six young feminist and gay activists in jail.

These six young people, all between the ages of 19 and 23, were those who had refused to cooperate with the FBI. It is probable that others would have refused to answer the personal and inquisitional questions asked them (hundreds were questioned) but most were terrified, and unaware they were under no legal obligation to cooperate.[1] Gay persons questioned, in particular, were frightened of losing their jobs or of other ramifications if they did not place themselves at the disposal of the FBI. Jill Raymond was one who did know her rights and pushed her fears aside to stand on them—this only aroused the hostility of the FBI agents. "When the FBI first came to my house, the most threatening thing to me was their encroachment on my personal relationships," Jill remembers.

[1] Citizens are not required to answer FBI questions; however, those who do so may be charged with lying to the FBI if they give false information—this crime carries a possible 15-year sentence.

"They said that two people whom I cared about very much were wanted by the FBI, and they wanted me to give information about them." As Jill remained firm in her desire not to be involved in the FBI investigation, the FBI had agents visit people she knew in eight different cities across the country—names apparently obtained from a list of persons she had phoned long-distance in the past year.

These people were interrogated and threatened with subpoenas. The FBI visited Jill's sister at work and told her, in the presence of co-workers, that Jill was in jail (this occurred before Jill was incarcerated). They visited her grandmother in Cleveland, frightening her with stories that Jill was in terrible trouble. It is both a credit to Jill and a comment on the FBI tactics that both her sister and grandmother supported her throughout her ordeal.

As the FBI interrogations proceeded, the personal lives of the six gradually became public. Some were disowned by their families; others were under intense pressure to cooperate, not because the FBI was in the right, but because they were powerful and could destroy lives. Besieged with the mounting awareness that their lives were slipping out of their control, the six obtained a panel of attorneys, led by Prof. Robert Sedler of the Kentucky Civil Liberties Union, and a defense committee was formed. The FBI had threatened the six with grand jury subpoenas—a threat they were to make good.

The Not-So-Grand Jury

Shirley Hufstedler, a judge on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, observed recently:

"Today, courts across this country are faced with an increasing flow of cases arising out of grand jury proceedings concerned with the possible punishment of political dissidents. It would be a cruel twist of history to allow the institution of the grand jury that was designed at least partially to protect political dissent to become an instrument of political suppression."[2]

Federal grand juries are panels of citizens chosen from voter registration records. They serve 18-month terms during which time they issue indictments—criminal charges against persons alleged to have committed federal criminal offenses. Their other function is to investigate crimes in such areas as organized crime, political corruption, and tax evasion, to name a few. Grand juries are an arm of the judicial branch of the federal government, and as such they have the power to subpoena—both people and things. People subpoenaed to a grand jury have no choice but to respond and give testimony, unless they refuse to testify because to do so would violate a constitutional right, notably the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination. This right has been gradually eroded over the years, and has been virtually non-existent in grand jury cases since the enactment of the "use immunity" laws by the Nixon administration. At that time immunity became a powerful tool in Nixon's "war on dissent" waged by federal grand juries, which came to be virtually an arm of the executive branch of government, run by the Justice Department.

The institution of the grand jury was wide open for this abuse and exploitation by the executive branch. Originally created in the Constitution as a panel of citizens to serve as an intermediary between the people and the government to restrain the government from wrongfully prosecuting its political enemies, the framers of the Constitution saw no need to give people a slate of protections and safeguards before the grand jury—there was no need to protect the people from the people. At first, grand juries operated on their own, but as the laws became more complex, bewildered grand jurors turned to the U.S. Attorney, who would later prosecute the cases where indictments were issued, to assist them in understanding the law. Today the government attorney is the central figure in the grand jury room—literally running the grand jury. An example of this can be found in the area of subpoenas—issued under the grand jury's name, but actually controlled by the U.S. Attorney. Grand jurors often have no idea who or what has been subpoenaed until they actually have the witness or the object before them.

Thus the grand jury is as much an arm of the executive branch as it is of the judicial, and today is often deprecated as a mere "rubber stamp" for the government attorney.

During the late 60s and early 70s the Nixon Justice Department hired a special prosecutor, Guy Goodwin, and sent him all over the country to use grand juries to investigate dissident political organizations. With the enactment of "use immunity" laws, this was an easy task. Using the grand jury subpoena, the activist was brought to the grand jury chamber, where she or he had no right to an attorney. If the activist pleaded the Fifth or other Constitutional rights, she or he was "immunized"—given partial protection from prosecution for anything that might be said before the grand jury. Once immunized, the witness lost all right to refuse to answer questions—questions about private lives, organizations, meetings and names of those in attendance, any and all information the government needed to compile its dossiers. Those who could not bring themselves to testify were jailed for contempt—jailed without trial wherever the government chose to imprison them. Once imprisoned, the witnesses would remain there until they either testified, thus "purging" themselves of contempt, or until the 18-month grand jury term expired. However, the new grand jury could subpoena them again, and the entire process repeated—theoretically a witness could be returned to jail over and over again for the term of each new grand jury.

The Nixon years created a pattern of grand jury abuse which continues today.

The Lexington Grand Jury

The FBI does not have subpoena power—Congress has repeatedly refused to give them this powerful tool. But the FBI found a local U.S. Attorney Eugene Siler, (appointed to a federal district judgeship by then-President Ford shortly thereafter), who was willing to cooperate. Using the grand jury subpoena, Siler had the six brought before the federal grand jury which had been sitting in Lexington for a few months. An FBI agent, Peter MacDonald, emerged from the grand jury room to call the first of the six witnesses before the grand jury. Once inside, the witness observed the agent entering an anteroom, where with the door partly ajar, he could presumably listen to the proceedings.

Over and over, the witnesses were later to point out this abuse of the grand jury function to perform FBI investigations, and over and over again their protests would fall on deaf ears. One by one the witnesses entered the grand jury room alone, required to leave Attorney Sedler in the hallway. Once inside, they refused to answer questions, citing the Fifth and other Constitutional amendments. Shortly afterwards, they were "immunized" by the Justice Department and returned to the grand jury room. When they again refused to testify, they were notified that there would be a hearing in a few hours before a federal judge to determine if they were in contempt.

The arch-conservative federal judge, Bernard Moynihan, opened the proceedings with hostile admonitions to spectators against any interruption, and by requiring one of the witnesses to remove his shirt which was sloganed "Stop FBI Harassment". To the spectators who had entered the impressive federal courtroom with every expectation of justice, this was the first warning of what was to come. A court reporter read to the judge the refusal of the "immunized" witness to testify. This was sufficient to establish contempt, unless the witness could come up with a defense the judge would listen to. The basic defense in the Lexington case was grand jury abuse—that the grand jury was being used to force citizens to cooperate with the FBI, that the Lexington grand jury was not investigating crimes committed within their district (Saxe and Power being already under indictment elsewhere), and also that the witnesses' and attorneys' phones were wiretapped. Judge Moynihan ruled immediately at the close of the testimony that the witnesses were to be imprisoned—until they testified or the grand jury term expired. Before leaving the courtroom the witnesses all stood together, joined hands, and listened as Attorney Sedler read a statement that they had written:

"We believe that we have just cause for our refusal to answer questions propounded to us by the Grand Jury. We state to the Court that none of us know the present whereabouts of the persons who are known to us as Lena Paley or May Kelley. We further state to the Court that we had no knowledge or reason to believe that Lena Paley or May Kelley were persons other than the persons they claimed to be, or that they were fugitives from justice."

Handcufffed, the six young people were led away. The young man, Carey, and one woman, were sent to the Madison County Jail where Jill would eventually end up. Jill and one other woman were taken to the Bell County Jail in Pineville, Kentucky. The other two women went to the Franklin County Jail in the state capital, Frankfort, Kentucky. As federal prisoners, particularly in non-criminal cases, it at first seemed odd that they were not incarcerated in the modern federal facility there in Lexington. Ultimately it became clear that by placing them in poor quality county jails, at some distance from each other, the defense committee, attorneys, family and friends, Judge Moynihan hoped to encourage them to take the easy way out and testify. Their ordeal had begun in earnest.

Life in the County Jail

All of the jails had certain conditions in common—poor food, cramped cells, poor lighting, no facilities for fresh air or exercise. The 19-year old gay male, Carey, was beaten after a short time at the Madison County Jail. He and Debbie, alone in the female section of that jail, were the first to testify after a few weeks. Three others managed to tolerate the conditions for another four months. The women in Frankfort were particularly miserable because they had no privacy for bathing or toilet use. There were no curtains to draw in the cell which was next to the elevator and the jail office, so the male guards (there were no matrons) would amuse themselves by watching the women. Later, at this same jail, Jill was to fend off "pawing" attempts by a male guard.

Finally, after five months, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit returned the case to Judge Moynihan for a finding as to whether the Lexington grand jury was conducting a legitimate investigation. On the basis of a sealed affidavit from the U.S. Attorney, which neither the witnesses nor their attorneys were allowed to examine, Judge Moynihan ruled that the investigation was legitimate. Subsequent legal appeals failed in deference to this finding. The other witnesses testified, unable to continue their struggle, and sick of the disruption of their lives.

Jill Raymond is a woman of strong principles and the will to live by them. She is extremely repelled by attempts to glorify her stand, but the fact is that the history of English and American law reveals that rights we cherish, such as the Fifth Amendment, were created because someone had the strength to resist injustice. Jill's remaining nine months in prison were spent largely at the Madison County Jail. Her experiences there ranged from the almost comic—such as the time Frank was angered by a research paper written by a university student visiting Jill, which Frank of course, could not even read—to the terrifying—night after night alone on the third floor of the old facility. It was a day-to-day ordeal that only those of us who were close to Jill were able to even partially understand, made bearable by the support of the defense committee and family, and by the essential humanity of the matron, Katherine. Jill always maintained that she would suffer more by allowing her right to silence and privacy to be destroyed in the grand jury room than by resisting and being imprisoned. She was not re-subpoenaed by the next grand jury—her case had received too much publicity for the Justice Department to risk further outcry. The grand jury which had sent her to jail never issued a report on the investigation, or handed down any indictments in the case.

Ending Grand July Abuse

The House of Representatives began a second round of hearings on Grand Jury Reform in March. The House is studying legislation introduced by Representatives Conyers, Eilberg, Holtzman, Drinan and Patterson which included the following reforms:

Immunity

Abolish forced immunity (Conyers H.R. 3736; Drinan H.R. 844)

Abolish "use" immunity and replace with broader "transactional" immunity; take authority to issue immunity away from Justice Dept.; give it to federal district judges with guidelines as to when to grant immunity (Eilberg H.R. 94)

Subpoena

Require majority of grand jurors to vote to subpoena (Conyers, Patterson)

Require subpoena to inform witness of rights (Conyers, Eilberg, Patterson)

Allow 7 days notice in most cases between receipt of subpoena and date of appearance (Eilberg, Conyers, Patterson)

Right to Counsel

Allow witness to be represented by attorney in grand jury room (Eilberg, Conyers, Patterson)

Contempt

Limit imprisonment to six months (Eilberg, Conyers, Patterson, Holtzman)
Imprisonment must be in federal institution (Conyers, Patterson, Holtzman; if one located within 50 miles—Eilberg)

Other Cases of Grand Jury Abuse

The following persons are presently in jail in cases involving FBI investigations:

Jay Weiner—23-year-old sportswriter has been in Allenwood federal prison in Pennsylvania since November 1976.

Maria Cueto and Raisa Nemikin—employees of Episcopal Church Hispanic Commission, imprisoned in New York City Metropolitan Detention Center in March 1977.

What To Do When the FBI Knocks—A Primer for Pastors

(By Dean M. Kelley)

Dean M. Kelley is executive for Religious and Civil Liberty in the Division of Church and Society, National Council of Churches, and chairperson of the National Church-State Committee, American Civil Liberties Union.

On November 18, 1976 two agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation visited the Episcopal Church Center in New York City, national headquarters of the denomination, to obtain information about one or more members of the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs (NCHA). Explaining why they came, the agents said that correspondence from the commission had been discovered during an FBI search of an apartment in Chicago rented in the name of Carlos Alberto Torres. The same search turned up materials suited for the making of bombs, the agents said, along with literature of the Fuerzas Armadas Liberacion Nacional (FALN), a self-described Puerto Rican terrorist group. Either by its own claim or by official attribution the FALN has been connected with some 58 bombings in the past 32 months, including the January 1975 bombing of Fraunces Tavern in New York City, in which four persons were killed and 55 injured. Torres is now considered a fugitive; the FBI wanted to know anything that might help find him.

The agents met first with Bishop Richard Martin, coordinator of the church's programs for minorities, and then interviewed Maria Cueto, then executive director of the NCHA, and her secretary, Raisa Nemikin. In separate interviews lasting several hours, the two women identified a photo of Torres, and explained his service on the Theological Committee and the Theological Development Task Force of the commission. According to their account, they answered all questions put to them within the limits of their knowledge, and they believed the agents were satisfied with the results of the interrogation.

Four days later, however, agents reinterviewed the two women, with the approval of Bishop Martin and his superior, Bishop Milton Wood. No attorney was present. On this occasion Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin declined to answer further questions, and Ms. Cueto was threatened with a grand jury subpoena. Early in January, both women were subpoenaed to appear before a Federal grand jury in Manhattan, but again they refused to answer questions. They gave several grounds for their silence, the main one being that by responding they would violate the confidence and trust of persons working with the Hispanic Commission. Early in March 1977 the court rejected their claims and, when they once more refused to answer, imprisoned them for contempt of court. At this writing they are still held in the Metropolitan Correctional Center.

On their first visit to the Church Center, the FBI agents asked permission from Bishop Wood to take samples of the imprint of various typewriters. In the belief that refusal would imply lack of trust in the employees of the center, Bishop Wood approved the request. Later in November some eight or nine FBI agents were admitted to the premises after working hours, observed only by a custodian with poor sight. Critics of this action contend that no one can be sure what the agents searched, what they saw, what they obtained. According to The New York Times, there is some evidence that files wholly unrelated to the Hispanic Commission were searched. Bishop Wood has denied that the agents inspected any records other than those of the NCHA.

In its November visits the FBI, according to Bishop Wood, had asked for "any travel or meeting expenses that Mr. Torres might have in connection with the church that might give them some information as to his whereabouts or leads." The bishop said that the information furnished to the agents was "quite public, which you can get here or can have for the asking." When the agents came back about the first of December asking for more information, the church, on the advice of counsel, requested a subpoena "for the protection of all those concerned at that point." In response to the subpoena, the information requested for the years 1974–1976, which Bishop Wood claims was "nonconfidential," was turned over to the court.

Early in January Presiding Bishop John M. Allin was served with a subpoena requiring (in the words of Bishop Wood) that he supply the grand jury with the "same kind of information for the years '70 to '73 which has already been supplied for the years 1974–76." According to other sources, the information requested included personnel files, lists of members and associates of the Hispanic Commission and minutes of meetings. The Presiding Bishop's attorney persuaded the United States Attorney to withdraw the subpoena in return for the voluntary submission of material described by the church as "public" information. The material included: the names of commission members since its beginning in 1970; dates and places of all commission meetings since its founding; travel accounting records for persons who were being investigated in connection with the grand jury proceedings; biographical material which had been prepared and supplied by these persons; a list of all grant recipients in the Hispanic program since its inception; employment application forms "which contained no confidential information"; and samples of typewriter and copy-machine impressions.

Bishop Allin agreed to pay fees for attorneys chosen by Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin. On March 15, however, he issued a statement characterizing their refusal to testify as "against the policy of the church." They were placed on "leave of absence" and their pay was suspended, on the ground that their inability to perform their duties resulted from actions of their own choice—that is, their decision to go to prison rather than answer questions about persons connected with the commission.

Abuse of Power?

Anyone familiar with the case will understand that the foregoing is a barebones outline of a complicated series of events. Even without additional details, however, it will be clear why the episode has generated a several-sided controversy. Inevitably, questions both of fact and of principle arise. Are the two women obstructing justice, or are they heroically defending their own rights and ours against abuse? Have the FBI, the prosecutors, the grand jury and the courts exceeded their powers, or are they merely doing their plodding best to safeguard the public against the violence of urban terror?

At this writing the best answer to these questions is that no one really knows. The two women have not always articulated their positions as clearly as one might hope, and the rhetoric of some of their supporters has been more indignant than informative. At least one ruling in the case was based on Government evidence which the court kept secret. In short, enough facts are available to fuel a raging debate, but not enough for partisans on any side to end the debate by demonstrating the truth of their own view.

But what about the role of the church? Here, it seems, the problem is not the absence of agreed facts but disagreement on what the facts mean. According to unnamed church officials cited by The Times, the "vast majority" of Episcopalians see no dilemma. Fanatic bombers threaten innocent lives; duly constituted law enforcement bodies must act against them; the church has a duty to help. On such grounds Bishops Allin and Wood find themselves unable to understand why the women withhold testimony—unable, therefore, to support their cause. Other responsible church people, including Bishop Paul Moore of New York and former Presiding Bishop John Hines, have been critical of their colleagues' position.

What is important here is the future. If the churches, as one hopes, continue to seek empowerment of the oppressed, churchleaders can expect to encounter such incidents again. The present controversy rises in large part out of an excess of innocence; it points up the need of church people to achieve greater empathy with their allies in the struggle for social justice, greater sophistication about the ways in which that struggle can bring them into conflict with "duly constituted authorities."

In the abstract bishops and vestry people, pastors, elders and church bureaucrats may understand that the guardians of law and order are often also the overzealous protectors of the status quo, and that the pursuit of felons can be used, intentionally or otherwise, for the suppression of dissent. But nothing in their life experience prepares them for midnight visits by the FBI, or for the possibility that the quest for a violent criminal may be conducted in ways that do injury to rights and values at least as important as effective law enforcement.

If we are not to learn such lessons by hindsight, an effort of imagination is needed. We should remind ourselves that the churches have sinned more often by undue conformity than by defiance and that some of the best pages in our history record our predecessors' principled stands against kings and emperors and other powers. Even in the post-Watergate, post-Viet Nam era, knowing what we now do about CIA plots and FBI break-ins, we need not be cynical about the US Government, but surely we should be vigilant and skeptical—and well-informed.

In the present context Christians have a special need to be informed about newly controversial aspects of the grand jury system. In the 1950's Congressional investigating committees were the weapon of choice for "exposing" alleged or real Communists and rendering them virtually unemployable. Against the antiwar movement in the '60's, prosecutors favored the use of conspiracy indictments to link such supposed plotters as the Spock-Coffin defendants, the Chicago Seven and the "Catholic Left" at Harrisburg. But the backlash against McCarthyism has made Congressional investigators more circumspect, and most of the jerry-built conspiracy indictments failed at trial. Hence the new reliance on the compulsory processes of the grand jury.

Unholy Inquisition

There are many reasons why the grand jury has come into favor with the FBI and with certain prosecutors. Grand jury proceedings are, of course, secret. A witness appears alone; he/she can obtain legal advice only by requesting permission to leave the chamber. Few grand jury members have any conception of their own powers, or of the proper limits to be set on a prosecutor's zeal. Finally, heavy sanctions are available. Lying to a grand jury risks the penalties for perjury. If the judge backs the prosecutor—and most judges do, often almost automatically—silence can bring a jail term for contempt of court, a sentence that can last as long as the life of the jury (18 months or longer), and can then be renewed when the next jury is convened.

Though employed amateurishly in earlier decades, these grand jury powers were brought to a state of systematic effectiveness by Guy Goodwin of the Internal Security Division of the Department of Justice under Richard Nixon. Setting out to apprehend the "Weathermen" and other threats to the Republic, he subpoenaed Leslie Bacon all the way from New York to Seattle to tell what she knew about bombs set off in the Capitol in Washington (D.C., not the state). Other persons, supposed to know something about such crimes, were called before grand juries, often distant from their homes, sometimes with only a few days' or hours' notice.

A perceptive article by Judge Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis in The New Leader (Nov. 10, 1975) makes vividly clear what can happen at this stage. (Ironically, it was Judge Frankel, a highly respected jurist, who sent Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin to jail.) The article cites actual questions put to a witness by an Internal Security prosecutor before a grand jury in Tucson, Arizona:

"Tell the grand jury every place you went after you returned to your apartment from Cuba, every city you visited, with whom and by what means of transportation you traveled, and who you visited at all of the places you went during the time of your travels after you left your apartment in Ann Arbor, Michigan in May of 1970.

"I want you to describe for the grand jury every occasion during the year 1970 when you have been in contact with, attended meetings which were conducted by, or been any place when an individual spoke whom you knew to be associated with or affiliated with Students for a Democratic Society, the Weathermen, the Communist party, or any other organization advocating revolutionary overthrow of the United States, describing for the grand jury who was present and what was said by all persons there and what you did at the time that you were in these meetings, groups, associations or conversations."

A subpoenaed witness can ask the court that impaneled the grand jury to quash the subpoena, but courts are usually loath to do so. A witness can claim one of a very narrow privileges against answering (confidentiality of communication between lawyer and client, priest and penitent and, in some jurisdictions, physician and patient or husband and wife). A witness may also assert the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, but at that point he/she may first be given immunity against prosecution deriving from that testimony and then ordered by the court to answer the questions, under pain of contempt of court. One major problem with this kind of immunity (it is called "use immunity") is that even though it forbids direct use of a person's testimony against him/her, it can furnish leads to other ways of building a case. Obviously, then, its effect is to cancel out, or at least to weaken severely, the Constitution's ban on self-incrimination.

Witnesses sometimes appeal to the First Amendment, arguing that their right to freedom of association will be abrogated if they are compelled to tell the names of others with whom they have been associated in quite innocent activities. For experience has shown that the persons named may then be subjected to investigation, and their neighbors, employers, fellow employees and friends may be interrogated by the FBI, sometimes in intentionally embarrassing ways. The courts, however, have not been very receptive to such claims.

And there is still another pitfall: A claim of right or privilege not to answer may be asserted too late. Courts have often ruled that by answering seemingly innocuous questions ("What kind of work do you do?"), one has waived any right to refuse later questions in the same line of investigation ("For whom did you agree to print handbills urging a boycott of General Motors?") To guard one's rights, then, the only safe course is to give only one's name, address and serial number and refuse to answer substantive questions until the court has ruled on one's claims. If the court denies the claims, as it often does, the only way to avoid violating one's principles may be to go to jail.

Despite the evident potential for abuse of these coercive powers, to the person on the street (or the bishop in his office), the very name of the grand jury evokes favorable associations. There are historical reasons for this attitude. As recently as Watergate, "runaway" grand juries have helped expose official wrongdoing. At its earliest introduction, in England in the 12th century, the grand jury was obviously an improvement over trial by ordeal, and on some occasions it served to check the arbitrary use of royal power.

In our own history, grand juries were often bulwarks for the colonists against the wrath of royal governors, most famously in 1743 in the case of John Peter Zenger, a newspaper publisher who criticized the governor. The governor sought to have Zenger indicted for libel, but two grand juries refused. Prior to the Civil War grand juries in the North often refused to indict persons charged with violating the Fugitive Slave Law. But these very examples point to the ease with which the grand jury is politicized, and its considerable, little-supervised powers turned to less noble purposes. After the Civil War, for instance, terrorist activities by the Ku Klux Klan often went unpunished because Southern grand juries would not return indictments.

Another widespread misconception which helps validate the grand jury in the popular mind is the belief that it functions as an arm of the judiciary rather than as an instrument of the executive. In this view the grand jury simply weighs the evidence brought to it by the prosecutor to determine whether there is a sufficient basis ("probable cause") to justify putting a citizen on trial for his or her life or liberty. This, some believe, also justifies grand jury secrecy, so that, if no indictment is returned, no one's reputation is impugned.

The difficulty is that this is only one theory (or ideal) of grand jury functions—and is not the theory under which the FBI, most prosecutors and most courts are now acting. In current practice grand juries are considered to have investigative responsibilities as well as evaluative. Prosecutors ardently favor this theory, judges back them up, and the jurors themselves almost invariably go along. The consequence is an enormous increase in the powers of government over citizens.

Much of that power accrues to the FBI. Congress has repeatedly refused to give subpoena powers to the bureau, but when it is working in sympathetic collaboration with a prosecutor, its agents can threaten recalcitrant witnesses with a grand jury appearance. Not only can they so threaten, but they frequently have and still do; witness the case of Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin.

No one questions the importance of law enforcement in society, or the need of law enforcement agencies to act with authority. To understand the very real conflict of values under study here, however, one must distinguish between legitimate and illegitimate uses of power. Obviously the police, prosecutors and courts are simply doing their job when they pursue lawbreakers, especially those who commit acts of violence. Even in such cases, of course, the vigor of their pursuit must be tempered by concern for due process of law. But the real difficulty rises because these same agencies of government tend to lump together with criminals all persons whose opinions or styles of life challenge the established order.

In the long run such persons may contribute to the well-being of society, as did the agitators for abolition of slavery, the rights of labor, women's suffrage and the civil rights of minorities. But when their ideas are new and controversial, they are a source of trouble and disruption, regardless of how law-abiding and peaceable their efforts for change may be; and in the eyes of the law's custodians they are not only objects of suspicion but proper targets for harassment and intimidation. Usually, moreover, there is widespread public support for such attitudes, and never more so than when (as sometimes happens) a movement for social change is afflicted by the presence of a lunatic fringe of fanatics willing to use violence to compel public attention. The syllogism goes like this: The FALN demands independence for Puerto Rico; FALN members are terrorist bombers; therefore all who advocate an independent Puerto Rico are violent criminals, and any great concern for their civil rights is misplaced.

A Plenitude of Targets

Few of us would consciously endorse such logic—or deny that despite its faults it has subliminal power. The trouble is that even fewer understand how often such logic has been and is being invoked in our own day, specifically in support of unchecked, wide-ranging grand jury activities that observe few if any limits on the use of the jury's coercive powers. Such tactics have been employed against the antiwar movement, the student radical movement, the American Indian movement, the Chicano movement, the left-wing Roman Catholic movement, the feminist movement and others.

It is worth noting that despite all the indictments that have resulted, there have been few convictions. The principal effect, whether so intended or not, has been disrupting these movements, sowing divisions within them, draining their energy, sopping up their money and diverting them from the entirely legitimate work they want to do. Quite apart from the erosion of our liberties and the harm done to individuals, this represents a social cost, a loss of ideas and pressures we need.

But how, more precisely, does it work? Always in ostensible pursuit of perpetrators of heinous crimes, the prosecutors and the FBI summon anyone thought to have any association with a possible suspect ("X") to get information about the person's whereabouts, or information connecting the person with the crime. So much is certainly legitimate law enforcement activity. But then the questioning turns to third parties, though still in reference to the suspect: "Who else was connected with X?" Eventually it may (more often: does) come to focus on targets having only the remotest relation to X: "Who else belongs to this organization of which you and X were members?" At this point—when the prosecutor demands names and more names of persons who might have some information about the suspect—the inquiry becomes a fishing expedition, catching many innocent fish.

But if the fish are innocent, what do they have to fear? It is here that bishops and other ultra-respectable persons must use their powers of imagination. What is to be feared is what has often happened: the destruction of relationships, organizations and movements that have a right to exist. Witnesses, especially from minority communities, know perfectly well what they have to fear: Only the obloquy, calumny, suspicious and ostracism that often attach to persons thought to be either criminals or, worse, delators, informers, "stool-pigeons." When one of my associates enters the grand jury room, I have no way of knowing what goes on. Did he/she give them my name? What did she/he say about me? Will the FBI be looking into my affairs, my bank account, my past associations and activities? Nothing the witness says afterward can completely dispel the suspicion that he/she told everything and that, even if all was innocent, it may cause trouble anyway. It would be good if everyone could have confidence in the safety of the innocent from official abuse, but history, and the life experience of the poor and oppressed, do not encourage such confidence. We tend to associate rough, prolonged grillings with the Gestapo or the KGB. But there are some among us who know of such things from personal experience in America.

In the Cueto-Nemikin case, exactly these themes are being played out in the community, and this despite the principled stand the two women appear to have taken. It may well be that their sacrifice was irrelevant, on the likely assumption that the FBI had already obtained the names of persons and organizations connected with the Hispanic Commission. According to one source, NCHA records have furnished "leads" for investigations in New Mexico, California, Colorado, Florida, Ohio, Washington, D.C. and Texas. Episcopal bishops in Puerto Rico, Chicago and Colorado have been visited. Episcopal clergy and parishes in Puerto Rico, California and Colorado have been investigated. In short, because of the search for one fugitive who belonged to the commission for less than one year and who reportedly attended only a handful of meetings, all persons who worked with the NCHA in any capacity are under suspicion and subject to investigation as possible FALN members or sympathizers.

It needs no imaginative effort to grasp the devastating effect this can have, since the devastation is already happening. Credible information suggests that not only Hispanic but other minority communities are drawing away: "You work with the Episcopals and what happens? They give your name to the FBI." It does not greatly matter whether the FBI and the prosecutors intend these effects (out of a general purpose to intimidate "radicals"), or whether the intimidation is a side effect of an overzealous, overbearing disregard for the rights of citizens. Regardless of purpose the effects do occur.

In the present instance, it is sadly ironic that the effects have occurred in the context of an effort by the church to make contact with an alienated population. By its too-eager, too-innocent collaboration with the FBI, the Episcopal leadership has frustrated the threshold task of any such mission, the establishment of a relationship of trust. Instead of proving itself worthy of confidence, the church now appears to many minority persons as a naive or callous "stool pigeon."

A Posture for the Church

Rather than dealing only in hindsight judgments, however, this review should issue in some sort of guidelines for the future. An immediate caution: No set of guidelines can be complete, not only because circumstances differ radically from case to case, but also because in many areas the law is confused. Competent counsel is needed, not necessarily from "radical lawyers" but certainly from attorneys familiar with the territory.

At the outset there is a question of the church's attitude toward its own relationship with the civil power. It was not too long ago or far away that the civil arm had no jurisdiction over the employees of the church, and that the church could offer sanctuary even to nonemployees sought as criminals if they reached its premises. In present-day America the churches would not make such claims, but the historical reference is a useful reminder that the churches are not simply subagencies of the state. They need not, for instance, simply acquiesce when, as in the present case, a court takes upon itself the right to define which activities of a church are properly "religious." (The court said the activities of Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin were to be classified as "social work" rather than any form of "religious" ministry.) At the very least, the First Amendment right of free association is not made weaker when it is coupled with the freedom of religion the amendment also guarantees.

In the nature of things, it is at the beginning of an inquiry that crucial mistakes are most likely. In consequence, several church bodies have already notified their employees that governmental investigators are to be referred to the senior officer of the church for any information about the organization, its present or past employees or other institutional matters, so that secretaries, receptionists, accountants, etc. are not placed in the position of having to respond.

And how should the "senior officer present afloat" respond? The preliminary response once made by the General Counsel of the National Council of Churches to an inquiry from the Internal Revenue Service offers one model. In substance, he replied:

"The relationship between churches and government is a very sensitive one, and a church body is protected by the First Amendment as no other kind of institution is. I am sure neither you nor we would wish to make any missteps here because of haste or carelessness. Many of the legal guidelines are not clear on such matters, and we want to preserve the right to get clarification from a court before taking any steps we might later regret. So if you will particularize in writing what exactly it is that you want, and your authority for asking it, we will review your request and determine what we can appropriately let you have. If at some point we reach a difference of opinion, then we can let the court decide."

This stance, constituting neither defiance nor instant acquiescence, is probably the most prudent course. Another model was offered by a church leader who took a stand in the doorway and said, "No farther!" (The official rather hoped that the governmental agency would challenge him; it did not.) Either strategy would in most cases be preferable to the open-door posture resting on the view that "we have nothing to hide."

Whether the church has anything to "hide" hardly defines what is at issue; in a free country government agents do not have unlimited right of access to the private affairs of citizens, their organizations or—a fortiori—their churches, regardless of the agencies' purposes in demanding such access. Before questions are answered or files are opened, other considerations must be met. What will this do to employees and constituents? What precedents will it set for other churches? What has been the pattern of Government actions in similar situations? (The question is of special pertinence where a grand jury has been or may be convened.)

Suppose that the first strategy has been adopted, the Government has stated its inquiries in writing, and the church leaders must then decide their response. According to The Times, Bishop Allin has now adopted the view, previously urged by some legal authorities, that the church will not in the future turn over personnel files without the permission of the persons concerned; the initial response will be, "Sorry, we don't give that out." The grounding for this can be that personnel files are the joint property of employer and employee.

With respect to information about contributors, again the NCC practice may offer guidance. When asked for correspondence with contributors, the NCC declined on the ground that it considers the correspondence confidential and the identity of contributors not to be divulged. If the IRS were to ask whether a named person gave a claimed amount in a given year, NCC would answer yes or no; it would not supply such names on its own motion.

Who Owns My Name?

What about lists of members? The Supreme Court has found that the mere providing of names may indeed be a sensitive matter, when it upheld the refusal of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to divulge its membership list to the state of Alabama (NAACP v. Alabama). In some circumstances, the Court held, freedom of association requires anonymity.

Since law enforcement also has its claims, such an argument would not always prevail. And yet it will be well for church leaders, and for all citizens, to grasp a principle repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court: The freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment have a preferred position in our society. They cannot be abrogated by government except for compelling reasons, and—Mr. Justice Brennan often adds—after a showing by government that those reasons cannot be served in any other way. Here the Court is acting most clearly in our tradition, instructing us in the care and preservation of our liberty. The churches should be no less vigilant.

At the very least, then, they should not lend their cooperation to wide-ranging "fishing expeditions" that will bring innumerable persons under investigation solely through their connections with the church. Surely it will seldom, if ever, occur that the only or the best route to the apprehension of presumed criminals will be to track them to the church. Hence, when agents demand names, church leaders may well decline to comply until a showing has been made, preferably in adversary proceedings, to the effect that the information is genuinely needed and that other leads cannot be obtained in other ways. It should be demonstrated that the benefits disclosure may bring to society in terms of effective law enforcement outweigh the damage that may be done to legitimate interests of the church and its members (see 8 Wigmore Evidence, section 2285 at 527, McNaughton ed., 1961).

It may be granted that several levels of membership exist. Presumably, those who have been elected or selected to leadership positions can be said to have accepted a relatively high degree of visibility. Membership on an official body, such as the Hispanic Commission, may be public information to a greater degree than rank-and-file membership in the church itself. Of even less formal status would be those constituents or "seekers" who come only briefly within the ambit of the church. In general these levels of association with the church should be subject to disclosure in proportion to their eminence.

But even here circumstances alter cases. Church leaders should be knowledgeable enough, and commonsensical enough, to discern when (as in the case of the NAACP in Alabama) known association with a particular body may mean trouble, so that the presumption should be in favor of confidentiality rather than disclosure. In such cases the church should not simply hand over lists but should at most simply answer factual questions: "Was X a member in 1976?" "Yes, he was," or "No, he was not." Anything beyond this would arguably be excessive entanglement of government in the affairs of religion.

Defending his own policy wtih regard to the recent incidents, Bishop Milton Wood reportedly declared that, "In general, church programs can't be made confidential. The General Convention requires this. This is not Watergate." One wonders, in the first place, whether confidentiality is not more important in the life of the church than the bishop holds, and whether the General Convention can have meant to imply that, "in general," church business is government business.

It may well be, for example, that communications or other kinds of information may be freely shared with church members but are not intended to be divulged to others. Consider the example of a church-sponsored study of attitudes among members toward teen-age drug abuse. The study is meant for the use of the church, but its compiler (and the respondents) may very well object to its disclosure to prosecutors pursing drug abusers, lest members who had expressed opinions be thought to have evidence worthy of official investigation. A church that does not have confidential information of this and other kinds may well question its relevance.

Secondly, and more centrally, it appears that Bishop Wood has learned the wrong lesson from Watergate. The criminals in the original and related Watergate cases were not the officials of the Democratic National Committee, or Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist, or the journalists and others whose telephone lines were tapped. The crimes committed were not those of private citizens wrongfully frustrating their government. No, the criminals acted on behalf of Government officials, in most cases under color of the authority of our Chief Magistrate; and their crime was precisely the seeking of information, by illegal means, that the Government had no legal right to obtain.

Many observers have concluded that the Bill of Rights was never more at risk than during the period before the crimes associated with Watergate were exposed. The lesson to be learned is not new but a platitude: Vigilance is the price of liberty. In practical terms church officials must learn to respect their own rights, the rights of their constituents and their employees. When the agents of government come calling, their demands must be examined with care. It is not intransigence but respect for liberty which suggests the need for the churches to keep government at a distance, to offer poised and reasonable resistance against inroads on their privacy and their mission. It is hard to think of a better place to make a stand on the First Amendment than at the door of the church.

GRAND JURY ROLE

The criminal justice section of the American Bar Association has added its voice to those of other critics in favor of legislative safeguards against abuse of the grand jury. The ABA group has recommended that Congress, among other things, allow witnesses before grand juries to have legal counsel, ban the repeated imprisonment of witnesses for refusing to testify before grand juries, and allow grand jury witnesses to use a violation of the federal wire-tapping law as a defense.

Such protections are needed because of the evolution of the grand jury from what originally was its role as a shield against unjust prosecution to its present role as a tool of the prosecution. The abuse of the grand jury reached a peak under the Nixon Administration, which used the grand jury as an investigative lever to force delivery of evidence in violation of the spirit of the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination.

Legislative reforms, such as the ABA group is proposing, are designed to return the grand jury to its intended constitutional purpose as a shield for the people against the government rather than a sword for the government against the people.

GRAND JURY REFORM

There were undoubtedly those who saw a certain irony in the complaints by General Motors last month that the Federal government was abusing the grand jury process by hauling in GM officials to testify under oath about corporate tax matters. In recent times, at least, complaints about grand jury abuses have come most frequently not from the offices of the nation's corporate executives but from political radicals charging grand juries have been employed to quash their activities.

In theory, the grand jury serves a laudable purpose. It allows possible criminal charges against an individual to be screened in secrecy by an independent panel of the accused's peers before they are publicly lodged.

In fact, however, the grand jury has become a tool of the prosecutor. By both establishing the grand jury's agenda and orchestrating the quality and quantity of the evidence presented, the prosecutor almost invariably determines who is and is not indicted.

But the grand jury can still provide valuable protection to individuals and the most prudent course now is to increase those safeguards. At the Federal level, legislation to do this—which could well serve as a model for similar state actions—has been introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.). It received a cool reception from the Carter Administration at a hearing last week but it points in the right direction.

It would repeal the "use" immunity law enacted at the urging of the Nixon Administration under which witnesses can be compelled to testify before a Federal grand jury and then, despite the constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination, be tried for activities about which they testified as long as the specific testimony is not used. The Eilberg legislation would return the Federal system to "transactional" immunity under which a witness compelled to testify could not later be tried for crimes detailed in that testimony.

The Eilberg legislation would also allow defense attorneys into the grand jury room to advise their clients (now they wait outside the room and their clients can go out to them) and, not incidentally, to monitor the process. A similar proposal for Massachusetts grand juries was recently approved by the state Senate.

Another meritorious provision of the Eilberg legislation would require that a judge screen Federal grand jury indictments prior to their issuance to make sure that they are based upon sufficient admissible evidence and that the procedures were appropriate. The proposal is designed to avoid needless damage to reputations arising from improper indictments.

None of these proposals has won the general approval of prosecutors. Yet none should generally impair prosecutors' work. Whatever the grand jury's original function, in a complex industrial society, where crime is commonplace and crime fighting sophisticated, the professionals—the prosecutors—will play the dominant role. But it is in exactly such a society that sufficient measures must be taken to protect the rights of individuals.

[From the Wisconsin State Journal, May 3, 1977]

GRAND JURY REFORM

The grand jury system in this country needs reform.

The system, devised under English law to provide a more democratic way of bringing charges against persons suspected of crimes, has been perverted into a prosecutors' tool to get around constitutional guarantees.

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who wants a lawyer denied that right. Someone hailed before a grand jury must submit to questioning under oath with no professional legal help at his side. He can receive advice from counsel outside the jury room but must ask for and be granted permission to leave the room when he wants it.

Richard F. Gerstein, chairman of the American Bar Assn.'s (ABA) criminal justice section's grand jury committee, said this not only unnecessarily prolongs the proceedings but also places the witness in an unfavorable light before the jury.

"It is extremely damaging to the witness to continually get up, go outside, and consult with counsel," Gerstein, a prosecutor for more than 20 years, said.

What would be wrong with permitting someone testifying before a grand jury to have legal counsel at hand? He's allowed it outside the room. Why go through the clumsy motions of leaving the room to talk to a lawyer?

Other reforms are needed. The following changes have been recommended by the ABA:

Witnesses forced by law to give testimony that might violate the guarantee against self-incrimination should be given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony.

Witnesses who refuse on several occasions to testify about the same event.

Increased penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution says:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crimes shall have been committed . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence."

The rights spelled out in that amendment should not stop at the door to the grand jury room.

[From the Charlotte Observer, July 11, 1977]

LEAKY SHIELD—GRAND JURIES NEED REPAIR

The constitutional provision for grand juries was intended to protect citizens from repressive government, to place a shield between the prosecutor and the accused.

That function has become obscured, however. It's time for Congress and the states to tackle grand jury reform.

Hearings on one such bill for the federal judicial system before a House Judiciary subcommittee are about to end. The bill will go before the full House this fall. The Carter administration has announced its opposition to some of the bill's key provisions, contending that grand jury abuse is rare. There is evidence that it may be more common than the administration thinks.

Grand jury witnesses do not enjoy the constitutional protections they'd get in a trial. And the grand jury can become a tool of the government whose power it was meant to check. That became clear during the early '70s, when the U.S. Justice Department used grand juries to harass antiwar activists.

Among the questions Congress must answer are these:

Should witnesses be denied the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination because a judge grants them immunity from prosecution for anything they might tell a grand jury? Under federal law, a grand jury witness can be forced to testify if the judge promises immunity.

Two Charlotte police officers faced that situation recently in a grand jury investigation of alleged illegal police wiretapping. U.S. District Judge James McMillan expressed his disagreement with the law, though he saw no alternative to enforcing it.

"Given a free choice in the matter, I would refuse (to do so)," the judge said. ". . . Locking a person up for not talking is . . only a small degree removed from other traditional types of torture used to make men talk, such as the rack, the saw, the screw, the water treatment. . . ." We share the judge's distaste for forced testimony.

Should witnesses be denied the presence of an attorney inside the grand jury room?

Presently, witnesses must leave their lawyers outside the hearing room. They must face questioning by the jurors and district attorney on their own, traipsing back and forth to the hallway to seek legal advice. Prosecutors argue that allowing lawyers in would delay things and cause more breaches in grand jury secrecy. We need to hear more arguments pro and con before we take a position on this issue.

Should grand juries be allowed to seek help from independent lawyers and investigators?

Grand juries must rely for impartial legal counsel primarily on the same person who wants them to return indictments: the prosecutor. The availability of advice from an independent attorney would help prevent charges of collusion and make the grand jury system work as it's supposed to.

It's hard to say how widespread grand jury abuses may be. But the present system leaves too much room for them to occur.

[From the Austin American-Statesman, July 30, 1977]

Grand Jury Reform Needed

When the Bill of Rights was adopted, the grand jury was seen as a libertarian device against oppression by the British crown. The grand jury system has become, through the Fifth Amendment, central to the national criminal justice system.

Yet there is a growing sentiment that the grand jury is too much abused, too much a tool of the government's prosecutors. So much so that the Congress is considering reform legislation designed to protect the citizen against heavy-handed prosecutorial use of the grand jury.

A good bill, H.R. 94, introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg, D-Pa., takes a middle-of-the-road approach to the reformation of the grand jury. It should be enacted.

The bill would do several things.

It would allow a witness to have counsel to advise him during grand jury proceedings, a practice not now permitted.

It would limit to six months the time a recalcitrant witness could be jailed for contempt. Currently, a witness in contempt can be held through the term of the grand jury and when a new grand jury is empaneled the process can be repeated ad infinitum.

It would allow grand jurors to hire their own investigators if they don't trust the ones provided by the prosecutor.

It would provide stiff penalties for leaking grand jury information, though it would protect witnesses and their lawyers and journalists from the $20,000 fine or five-year imprisonment contemplated.

There are other provisions, but those are the important ones. They would help to prevent the sort of kangaroo grand jury witnessed during the Nixon administration.

The American Bar Association's policy-making House of Delegates next month will consider a resolution supporting grand jury reform. The proposal envisions allowing a witness the right to counsel, and would keep prosecutors from using a grand jury to aid administrative inquiries.

When the administration took its position on grand jury reform before the Immigration, Citizenship and International Law Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee a couple of weeks ago, Rep. Eilberg was disappointed. The administration "didn't think much of" the Eilberg bill, one of his aides reported. Eilberg had thought a Democratic administration would be more inclined to grand jury reform.

Nevertheless, the bill still is said to have the best chance of all those proffered to succeed. And it should. If the grand jury system is to become what it was envisioned to be, vigorous, independent, and a hedge against oppression, reforms are necessary. The Carter administration should be pushing the reforms, not opposing them.

[From the Dayton Daily News, August 13, 1977]

NOT-SO-GRAND JURIES

It's too bad Attorney General Griffin Bell does not like the idea of letting witness take lawyers with them when they testify before a grand jury. But that ought not deter those who believe the grand jury system is in need of serious reform.

The proposal comes from a committee of the American Bar Association that also recommended 25 other changes in the system to make it more just.

Mr. Bell calls the idea "the lawyers relief act" because it would mean more business for the pinstriped folks with briefcases. He has a point, but virtually every governmental change these days means more business for lawyers. Before the century is out everyone may be a lawyer because we won't be able to sneeze without filling out a form or getting sued.

But that is not sufficient reason to avoid correcting a situation that has gotten out of hand. The federal government itself is one of the biggest abusers of the grand jury system, using it in the 1960s and early 1970s to badger dissidents and investigate their doings even when there was little likelihood of obtaining convictions or even indictments.

Witnesses before a grand jury are thrust into an unfamiliar and threatening situation and questioned by trained prosecutors who can spring evidence on them without warning. If they don't answer they can be held in contempt and jailed.

Mr. Bell says lawyers to help the witnesses could prolong matters and slow down the judicial process. But that risk, and it is real, is not as important as preventing miscarriages of justice.

[From the Salt Lake Tribune, August 12, 1977]

GRAND JURY SYSTEM WOULD GAIN FROM ABA REFORM PACKAGE

If American Bar Assn. (ABA) policy is eventually reflected in law, and it often is, the grand jury system is in for some long overdue change.

The association's House of Delegates took the position this week that witnesses before grand juries should be allowed to have an attorney at their side to advise them. Some two dozen other changes designed to provide greater protection for individuals in grand jury proceedings were also approved, sometimes over the protest of Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell.

On too many occasions grand jurors have been reduced to little more than a rubber stamp for the prosecutor, the only lawyer permitted to address and advise them. There also have been frequent charges that grand juries used a new limited immunity grant weapon as an instrument of intimidation. And some critics believe grand juries have been employed as an investigative arm of established law enforcement agencies.

The ABA acted to stem these and other flaws in the face of a warning from Mr. Bell that the lawyers were destroying the grand jury and making law enforcement in some fields impossible. The attorney general's objections smacked of regret over the prospect of losing the government's overwhelming advantages under present grand jury procedures.

If the ABA recommendations become law an overly zealous prosecutor would no longer find it easy to browbeat a witness into possibly inadvertently incriminating himself or associates. Instead of having to leave the jury room to consult with a lawyer after each question put to him, a witness would have counsel with him.

Proposed limitations on grants of use-immunity would force prosecutors to develop evidence through investigation rather than extract it from an unwilling possible suspect under threat of contempt sentences.

The ABA recommendations came about because the grand jury system is being subverted and individual rights ignored or circumvented much too often. If, as Mr. Bell predicted, adoption of the reforms destroys the grand jury, then it deserves destruction.

If a cog in the criminal justice machine must rely on infringement of the very rights the system is designed to uphold, then the machine would run better without that cog. But it won't come to that.

If the ABA reforms are enacted into law the grand jury will survive and be better for them. Prosecutors may even find rewards in the return to traditional methods of case building sans questionable grand jury shortcuts.

[From the Norfolk Virginia-Pilot, August 11, 1977]

GRAND JURY REFORM

The American Bar Association's 24-point proposal to reform the grand jury is intended to put a stop to abuses by political prosecutors without killing off the system.

The fundamental reform is to give more protection to witnesses. There is now no requirement that those who are subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury be informed of their right to counsel, their privilege against self-incrimination, or that they could be indicted for perjury for giving false testimony.

Under current practice in most states, a witness may not be accompanied by counsel into the grand jury room, but can consult outside the room after a question is put. (Only nine states permit a lawyer to advise a client inside the grand jury room.) The ABA is recommending that an attorney be allowed to advise a witness before the grand jury, but not permitted to address the grand jury or participate in the proceedings.

The recommendation is sensible. Attorney General Griffin Bell's objection that the change would make the grand jury system unworkable and is meant only to provide "plenty of work" for lawyers is unpersuasive.

The Bar Association also recommends a tightening of the circumstances under which a witness could be granted immunity to testify. It endorses the principle of secrecy under which the grand jury operates.

There is no question that the device of the grand jury has been abused for political purposes in recent times. But it remains useful in circumstances where alternative procedures might not serve so well, as evidenced by the tenure of the Watergate grand jury.

The grand jury originated in England, but was abolished there in 1933. It is better to reform the system than to eliminate it altogether, which has happened in several states. Congress and the states ought to act upon the bar's advice.

[From the Bloomington (Ind.) Herald-Times, August 14, 1977]

GRAND JURY REFORM

We often find ourselves at odds with the American Bar Association on proposals to change the legal system. Most revisions put forth by the ABA are designed to promote the interests of lawyers at the expense of the public. But last week the ABA, meeting in Chicago, did urge a major policy change that we find appealing and appropriate.

The ABA urged Congress and the states to adopt a broad program of grand jury changes aimed at curbing abuses by prosecutors and providing more protection for witnesses.

Over objections by the Department of Justice in two instances, the association's House of Delegates approved a 24-point program that would permit witnesses to have their attorneys in the grand jury room and require the government to inform witnesses, who are possible targets of the inquiry, of that fact.

The proposed code for criminal investigation would also limit the circumstances under which grand juries can grant a witness immunity, while broadening the area of such immunity once granted. It would strongly uphold the principle of grand jury secrecy but attempt to prevent the use of grand juries for political purposes.

At present, there is no requirement that federal or state grand juries provide any legal information to witnesses subpoenaed to testify. Under the code adopted by the ABA Tuesday, the witnesses would be told of their privilege against self-incrimination, their right to counsel and the possibility that any false testimony could lead to a perjury indictment.

Under current practice in all but nine states, witnesses may not have lawyers with them in the grand jury room, although they can go outside after a question and consult their lawyers in the corridor.

Under the ABA proposal, an attorney could advise his client in the grand jury room but could not address the grand jury or participate otherwise in the proceedings. If he violated these rules, the prosecutor could ask the court to remove him.

Appearing briefly, Attorney General Griffin B. Bell argued that this was "overkill," a move that would either make the grand jury system unworkable or else constitute a "lawyers' relief act" providing "plenty of work" for the profession.

Bell's comments are well taken. However, it is important that witnesses be fully advised of their constitutional rights against self-incrimination guaranteed under the 5th Amendment. Given the premise that most Americans are ignorant of the breadth of their rights, they should have an attorney on hand—if they so desire—to guide them throughout the usually treacherous course of grand jury proceedings.

It is simply not enough that attorneys are permitted to await consultation in the corridors. They should be present when grand jury questions are posed. After all, lawyers—better than others—know the extent of liability to which witnesses expose themselves by answering leading grand jury questions.

Despite our past differences, we now side with the ABA in seeking much-needed grand jury reform. It is long overdue.

[From the Lexington (Ky.) Herald Leader, August 14, 1977]

Grand Jury System Should Permit Witness to Have Attorney Present

In the American criminal justice system grand juries have two roles: They investigate possible wrongdoings and screen evidence to determine if there are reasonable grounds for criminal indictments—formal accusations.

Originally, grand juries were intended to serve as panels of unbiased citizens acting as a buffer between the formal machinery of criminal justice and the individual.

Increasingly, however, grand juries have become tools of the prosecution—mere rubber stamps. One study of 6,500 cases in Ohio, Illinois and New York reported that grand jurors disagreed with the preferences of prosecutors only five per cent of the time.

The grand jury is a particularly powerful tool for the government because of the secrecy of its work and the prosecutor's privileged position as the only lawyer present.

Not every state uses the grand jury, though Kentucky is one of those that does. The fifth amendment requires the federal government to use grand juries in criminal cases.

Rule 6(d) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure specifies that the prosecutor is the only lawyer permitted in the federal grand jury room. Kentucky's procedural rules are the same.

Both these rules should be modified to allow a witness before a grand jury to be accompanied by his or her attorney. But the attorney should only be allowed to advise his client, not address the grand jury or take any other part in its activities.

Nine states already permit this procedure.

The American Bar Association recently backed such a modification of the federal rule. The Kentucky Bar Association should similarly push for a modification of the state rule.

The time has come to open up this medieval institution to ensure that its proceedings are fair.

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, August 14, 1977]

GRAND JURIES: CASE FOR REFORM

It is probably asking too much to expect the scrapping of the grand jury system within the reasonable future, flawed though it may be. It is not asking too much to seek a reform of grand jury procedures to provide more protection for witnesses and prevent the possibility of abuse of the system.

The American Bar Association has come up with an eminently reasonable series of recommendations to improve the grand jury system. The most important, and one which is pending in the Massachusetts Legislature, would permit witnesses to have their attorneys present in grand jury rooms.

This proposal has run into opposition from prosecutors on both the federal and state levels. They contend it would make the grand jury system unworkable and result in interminable delays in the administration of criminal justice.

However, the ABA proposal—and the Massachusetts legislation—would bar attorneys from addressing the grand jury or participating in the proceeding. They would have only the right to advise their clients. Given the lopsided advantage of prosecutors in grand jury proceedings, this is a more than reasonable recommendation, particularly since the proposal would uphold the principle of grand jury secrecy.

In the long run, the proposal could benefit the prosecutors themselves by encouraging them to present their best possible case before grand juries. And it would minimize the chances of inadvertent false testimony by badgered and confused witnesses.

Although outdated, the grand jury system will probably be around for the foreseeable future. Thus, the federal and state governments have a responsibility to insure that the system is fair to all parties.

[From the Palm Beach Post, August 15, 1977]

GRAND JURY REFORM

The American Bar Association (ABA) is not known for challenging long-accepted methods of operation in the legal system. So when the ABA calls for radical change, something must be radically wrong.

Such is the case with the grand jury system, a system so thoroughly riddled with the potential for abuse that even the ABA was moved to throw its considerable weight behind a program of comprehensive reform.

The United States inherited the grand jury system from England, where, in a bygone era, it was an effective buffer between innocent citizens and officials of the Crown. But on American soil the grand jury has turned into something very different; in the hands of the unscrupulous prosecutor, the grand jury can be and often is political plaything. The prosecutor holds all the cards, and the target of the investigation—who theoretically enjoys a presumption of innocence—is helpless against the overzealous prosecutor.

Grand jury abuse has been so well-documented and so widespread that even the staid ABA agrees that the time for reform has come.

Unfortunately that opinion is not shared by Atty. Griffin Bell, who showed up at the ABA's annual meeting last week to try to dissuade the bar from urging Congress and the states to adopt a broad range of grand jury reforms. Mr. Bell labeled the proposal "overkill."

To our way of thinking, the overkill lies in the present grand jury system, which compels citizens to attend closed proceedings and answer questions without knowing whether they are the target of the investigation, without having an attorney or even a friend in the courtroom, without being advised of their privilege against self-incrimination, and without being told that if they get their facts wrong, they could be indicted for perjury.

Under the ABA proposal, grand jury proceedings would still be kept secret, making it all but impossible for the public to know what kinds of games might be going on inside. But if games there must be, it's only fair that the unwitting players know something about the rules.

[From the Greenville (S.C.) News, August 15, 1977]

GRAND JURY WORK

Legislation pending in Congress to change the rules under which federal grand juries operate got a helping hand Wednesday when the American Bar Association approved a set of principles for grand-jury reform. Chief among them is a recommendation that a witness be allowed to have a lawyer present when being questioned in the grand-jury room.

This recommendation, if accepted by Congress—and we hope it will be—should go a long way toward eliminating the abuses by prosecutors that have made the grand-jury system suspect. In doing so, it may save the grand jury from extinction.

Originally created in England as a mechanism for protecting citizens against an overbearing government, the grand jury has been used instead by many prosecutors as an instrument for harassing witnesses and browbeating defendants before they are indicted. The Nixon administration was especially skillful at using grand juries for political rather than law enforcement purposes.

While the Department of Justice has recognized the need for new rules to end such abuses, it is not prepared to go as far as the Bar Association in fundamental reform. Attorney General Griffin Bell, in fact, argued before the lawyers against giving witnesses the right to have a lawyer with them—at present, witnesses' lawyers are required to wait outside the grand-jury room.

His fear, and that of many prosecutors, is that grand-jury proceedings will come to resemble those of a trial, thus making the task of law enforcement officials even more formidable than it is now. We think such fear is exaggerated. But even if it were not, this basic change in the law would be needed to preserve the grand jury's intended function.

Grand juries have been much criticized in the past few decades. They were abolished in England in 1933 and have been eliminated in several states. Their life expectancy in the remaining states and in the federal system was not considered great a few years ago because of the ways in which the juries had been abused.

But that has changed. The Watergate affair provided a striking example of their usefulness in investigating and bringing indictments in situations where no other technique could have enjoyed public confidence.

They are worth saving—but only if they are restored to the function intended by the Bill of Rights. The best way to do that would be for Congress to pass legislation along the lines suggested this week by the nation's lawyers.

[From the Las Vegas Sun, August 16, 1977]

GRAND JURY IMPROVEMENTS INEVITABLE

In 1166 King Henry II devised the grand jury to intimidate villagers suspected of challenging royal authority. The indicted villager was tossed into the water. If he sank, he was innocent. If he floated, he was guilty.

By the late 1600s, the villagers had learned to use the grand jury system. They refused to indict people King Charles II wanted to imprison. This notion, brought to the Colonies, led to the inclusion of the grand jury in the Fifth Amendment—to protect citizens against government repression.

BLOODHOUNDS

In the 1790s, when the Bill of Rights was adopted, Thomas Jefferson charged the Federalists used grand juries as prosecution bloodhounds to hush those who believed in free speech.

Now, the American Bar Association has urged procedural changes to limit the power of prosecutors and give witnesses more protection. It proposes:

Letting witnesses have their attorney in the grand jury room.

Prosecutors must tell witnesses they may be targets for indictment.

Limiting the ways of granting grand jury immunity, but broadening that area once granted.

Telling witnesses they can have a lawyer present, and could be charged with perjury if they lie.

MIXED BAG

There's strong disagreement on the need for continuing the grand jury system. Prosecutors could proceed on informations; justices of the peace and could make findings of probable cause. Both eliminate the requirements for a grand jury.

But it was the grand jury system that toppled Spiro Agnew; that led to the bribery trial against Agnew's successor as Maryland governor, Marvin Mandel (that trial being unresolved on Monday).

MAKE WORK

Some will challenge the need for these changes—coming from the American Bar Association—as a way of making work for more lawyers. It certainly will.

But it will also make more work for prosecutors, who might just learn not to use grand juries for fishing expedition if more restraints are placed on their conduct before these select secret groups.

CANDOR

Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell opposes the reforms. "A lawyer's relief act," he calls them.

U.S. Dist. Judge William J. Campbell says grand juries are "the total captive of the prosecutor who—if he is candid—will concede that he can indict anybody at any time, for almost anything, before any grand jury." He'd abolish the grand jury system.

But it's part of the Fifth Amendment. We're stuck with it. The bar association's proposals will do more to protect persons called before grand juries. We're willing to settle for that improvement.

GRAND JURIES IN OUR TIMES

No person shall be held for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, except on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury . . . U.S. Constitution, amendment V.

Despite that constitutional injunction, the grand jury is in danger of becoming the vermiform appendix of the criminal justice system, a useless or abused organ that constantly presents the danger of infection to the body politic.

Abandoned by many states, accused of being a rubber stamp of federal prosecutors, and generally misunderstood by the public, there is good reason to believe that the grand jury, as an institution, is going to be excised from the system unless it is seriously reformed.

That's a historical irony. The institution dates back to medieval England, where the grand (or large) jury of freemen was established as a control on the tendency of the royal courts to push other freemen around. The grand jury, as it developed in English common law (and was transferred to the United States) was to be a protection for citizens against malicious or frivolous prosecution, in that authorities or prosecutors had to convince the grand jury that they had a sufficient case against a citizen to cause his indictment and trial.

Today, the most serious charge being brought against grand juries is that they do exactly the opposite, that they are a tool and device of prosecutors, who control the grand juries and can get anything out of them they wish.

The reform proposals have now come from no less a body than the American Bar Association which, at its recent convention in Chicago, made two proposals affecting federal grand juries: that witnesses before the grand jury be allowed counsel inside the jury room, and that the rules governing grand juries be modified so that it would be more difficult for the jury to grant a witness immunity to force him to testify—that is, giving him the choice of accepting immunity or going to jail for contempt.

The ABA also made some secondary suggestions that would halt the growing trend of abuse of grand jury powers to put news reporters and lawyers in danger of contempt if they refuse to testify on matters they consider confidential.

These reforms should be considered minimal. They would afford at least a thin coat of protection for witnesses (who are very liable to end up as the accused or indicted) in the federal jurisdiction. It is only speculative whether they would accomplish any substantial reform. And, note well, even these reforms are opposed by the U.S. Department of Justice, which uses the grand juries to its best advantage in prosecutorial roles, and sees itself in an adversary role with the private lawyers in this argument.

More practically, the federal government could minimize or even eliminate the role of the grand jury and proceed on the "information" of a prosecutor to a court that a crime has been committed and that a certain person could have committed it. It could, that is, if it were not for the italicized quotation that heads this column.

As for the states, those who do not have constitutional inhibitions have long since taken end runs around grand juries, usually by proceeding on information and skipping the pro forma indictments. Some states keep the institution of a grand jury on standby, for use in special investigations of corruption or wrong doing in governmennt. In those instances, the mere convening of a special grand jury can have a chilling effect on official hanky-panky.

Delaware, alas, is among the states which require by constitution the grand jury process. A footnote on the Delaware Code in the state's 1897 constitution says that the grand jury is "enshrined" in our legal process, and the word is apt. Over the years, there has been a constant drumbeat of criticism to and from the grand juries, which are convened by counties, but constitutional reform would be necessary to operate in a less clumsy fashion, and constitutional reform is not a politically popular cause in Delaware today.

GETTING BACK TO BASICS WITH THE GRAND JURY

The grand jury, conceived as a protective shield between citizens and the awesome powers of their government, has increasingly evolved into a prosecutor's tool. The use of grand juries to obtain indictments for routine offenses in New York and 20 other states adds little by way of safeguards for defendants even as it makes the process of bringing criminals to justice unnecessarily cumbersome.

The latest step in the evolution was the passage in 1970 of the Organized Crime Control Act, which rewrote the rules governing witness immunity and came dangerously close to nullifying Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. As predicted by critics at the time, the act has been used not only to combat organized crime but to harass and intimidate potential witnesses and suspects in a wide variety of cases.

Demands for reform have been fueled by the fact that witnesses must appear before grand juries without legal representation. Even though the American Bar Association could be accused of trying to get more work for its members, it makes a good case for allowing a lawyer to be present in the grand jury room.

The Bill of Rights says, "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury," with some exceptions involving military service or public danger. But the Supreme Court has ruled the states exempt from the provision, and 29 states now allow indictments on the basis of prosecutors' information and preliminary hearings—a system that seems to work well for all parties. New York would do well to follow that example, reserving grand juries for special investigations or cases where a witness might be endangered if his or her identity became known.

The problem is more complicated on the federal level; Congress is wary of tampering with the Bill of Rights. An attempt by Representative Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.) to reform the system stands a far better chance. In essence, Eilberg would reverse the tilt toward the prosecution by allowing the presence of lawyers and restoring the immunity rules employed before 1970. His bill would also make grand juries more independent of prosecutors and attempt to prevent leaks of grand jury proceedings, which are supposed to be kept secret.

Attorney General Griffin Bell opposes the two key provisions on the ground that they may hamper the grand jury's work. But the safeguards in the Bill of Rights weren't intended to make the law enforcement system more efficient. And when those safeguards become largely meaningless, as has happened with the grand jury system, it's time to search for alternatives.

GRAND-JURY REFORM—ALTERNATIVE TO SHIELD LAWS

(By Sam Pizzigati, co-director of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, in Washington)

The fifteen days the Fresno Bee Four spent behind bars in September for refusing to reveal their source for a Bee exposé were, on one level, a courageous example of journalistic integrity. But on another equally valid and far more depressing level, their incarceration was no inspiration. It was a sorry reminder of how far the drive for an effective press shield hasn't come. Nearly fifty years after the push for press shield laws began, journalists can still be jailed for engaging in their profession.

The sacrifice of the Bee Four is not likely to change things. It will not, for instance, spark the enactment of a new California press shield law. When the four Fresno reporters and editors were initially subpoenaed, California already had a solid shield statute, but it didn't do the Bee Four much good. The judge in the case simply shrugged the state press shield off as unconstitutional. Nor will the Fresno horror prod Congress into action. The pending federal press shield bills are bogged down in legitimate problems with definitions: what is a "journalist" anyway?

All this leaves reporters where they have always been: at the mercy of criminal-justice officials. If a prosecutor or judge wants the name of a reporter's source badly enough, the journalist is in for a draining ordeal. Simply put, the drive to protect journalistic confidentiality has stalled. Perhaps it is time, then, to step back and rethink the press shield law movement's single-minded concern for who is being subpoenaed and start asking questions about who is doing the subpoenaing—and in most of the controversial press subpoena cases that means the grand jury.

By and large, journalists have not asked these questions yet. They have accepted the standard law-enforcement contention that grand juries are bulwarks against crime entitled "to every man's evidence" while trying to argue, without much success, that the importance of an unfettered press makes the journalist an exception to the grand-jury obligations of ordinary citizens.

Others, however, have challenged the government's conception of the grand-jury process. Lawyers subpoenaed before grand juries to testify about their clients, political activists grilled about their politics, and strikers questioned about their unions have pointed out that the grand jury was incorporated into the Bill of Rights in 1791 to check, not facilitate, prosecutorial power. They have shown that the grand jury has become exempt from due process and will do anything a prosecutor wants, and they have taken the case for fundamental grand-jury reform before Congress—and found a favorable reception. More than thirty representatives and senators have sponsored reform bills and, while none of these bills specifically mentions "journalists," all would profoundly affect the ability of journalists to protect the confidentiality of their sources. They offer, in effect, and alternative to what may be a dead end.

An example: Each major reform bill now before Congress would entitle every grand-jury witness to a copy of his or her testimony. Under current federal rules, this grand-jury transcript need not even be kept, let alone be accessible to witnesses. Without a transcript of their testimony, there is no way subpoenaed journalists can prove they have not violated a sources confidence short of total silence inside the grand-jury chamber. With a transcript guaranteed, journalists could conceiveably testify before a grand-jury and maintain credibility with their sources at the same time.

The omnibus grand-jury reform bills introduced by Representative Joshua Eilberg, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, and John Conyers, Jr., a Democrat from Michigan, among others, include dozens of such procedural changes that should make prosecutors think twice before embarking on headline-hunting expeditions or mad scrambles to fill the holes in hastily drawn indictments.

Conyer's H. R. 11660, for instance, spells out a legal foundation for subpoena challenges. The bill authorizes the bench to quash a subpoena whenever the subpoenaed journalist (the bills, remember, cover all witnesses) can show that the subpoena would impose an unreasonable burden, that the purpose of the subpoena is punitive, or that the subpoena represents an attempt to build the case against someone who has already been indicted.

Should none of these categories be found appropriate by the court, confinement would still not be automatic for journalists who refuse to betray their sources. Eilberg's H. R. 1277 says that no witness can be found in contempt if the questions he or she refuses to answer are based on a violation of the federal wiretap statute. Under Conyer's bill, no witness could be confined for refusing to answer questions based on any violation of the witness's constitutional or statutory rights—which means that the First Amendment would become a defense at a contempt hearing.

Should a judge refuse to recognize these contempt caveats, no journalist, in any case, could be confined for more than six months, according to the reform bills. Reducing the current threat of indefinite contempt confinement to six months should bolster the resolve of journalists to resist subpoena pressure, and prosecutors, faced with journalists willing and able to hold out for six months, might not choose to bother with them in the first place.

In most cases, moreover, an additional key provision in Conyer's reform package would do away with the threat of even this six-month incarceration. Conyers proposes the abolition of "forced" immunity, the government's ability to overcome witnesses' Fifth Amendment objections to questions by immunizing them against their will. Under the Conyers bill, witnesses would have to consent before a grant of immunity could be ordered. Subpoenaed journalists, then, could invoke the Fifth Amendment.

But is a journalist justified in taking the Fifth Amendment? Certainly the usual newspaper shortland for the Fifth, "the privilege against self-incrimination," ignores the long philosophical tradition which holds, as Justice William Douglas said two decades ago, that the right not to bear witness against oneself is "a right to silence."

"Reporters," explains Representative Conyers, "should not be placed in a position where they must either go to jail for contempt or 'incriminate' themselves in the eyes of their sources and colleagues."

The Justice Department, predictably, opposes any tinkering with the grand-jury system. Testifying before Representative Eilberg's House Judiciary Subcommittee last June, Attorney General Levi said reformers should trust the government to police its own grand-jury conduct, and, ironically, cited his department's internal guidelines on press subpoenas as an example of effective self-policing.

Levi's remarks should have been ripped apart by the press, but they weren't. With a few exceptions, the media have been indifferent to the grand-jury issue, slow to grasp the shield potential of grand-jury reform, and that is unfortunate. At a time of widespread distrust of the media, the drive to protect the confidentiality of the news-gathering process could profit by emphasizing the rights journalists share with their fellow citizens, not the privileges that set them apart.

TESTIMONY OF MARY EMMA HIXSON, DIRECTOR, COALITION TO END GRAND JURY ABUSE, ACCOMPANIED BY DAVID REIN, PRESIDENT

Ms. HIXSON. Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of the subcommittee, on behalf of the 21 national bar, civil liberties, labor, religious and women's organizations that comprise the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, I thank you for the opportunity to testify before you this morning.

My name is Mary Emma Hixson, and I am the director of the coalition. As one of the attorneys who represented Jill Raymond, one of the more publicized recent victims of grand jury abuse, during her 14-month ordeal in the county jails of Kentucky for her refusal to testify before a 1975 Federal grand jury in Lexington, Ky., I have witnessed grand jury abuse first hand.

With me today is David Rein. Mr. Rein has been a member of the bar since 1935, and has practiced law in the District of Columbia for over 30 years. Through these years he has had many experiences with grand juries which he would be glad to share with this committee.

The Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse began its work in April of 1973, and in the years since then we have learned a great deal about both the democratic potential and the frightening perversion of the contemporary Federal grand jury.

We have also followed closely, of course, the progress of this subcommittee under the able leadership of its chairman, Representative Eilberg. We commend this panel for its serious and painstaking examination of the Federal grand jury system, an examination that has produced a wealth of information on virtually every aspect of our modern grand jury system and its problems.

But now pending is the first congressional voting on grand jury reform proposals in American history years. It is time to take a step back into the voluminous and valuable evidence this subcommittee has collected and ask a very basic question: "What does it all mean?"

Despite the overwhelming evidence that prosecutors have consistently and continuously taken advantage of the broad powers of the grand jury to further their political careers, gather domestic intelligence, and to punish political and religious dissidents—to name a few of the more obvious perversions, we are told by the Department of Justice that there are: one, no abuses; two, if there are any abuses, they are abberations; and, therefore, that we should trust the Department of Justice to "watch-dog" prosecutorial conduct.

We are, in essence, to overlook the lessons of the 1970's. We are to overlook the fact that a former Attorney General is currently in prison for a felony; that the Department of Justice itself was, in very recent times, a hotbed of criminal activity. We are to ignore the fact that the one prosecutor that has been most closely linked to grand jury abuse, whose abuses are part of the public record, is still sent on grand jury missions by the Department of Justice.

As you have just heard from Mr. Sager, this example is just one more piece of evidence to us that the Department of Justice cannot be counted on to protect our constitutional liberties. Indeed, we sometimes wonder whether the Justice Department truly understands the meaning of our Bill of Rights guarantees.

In August, for example, I appeared on public television with Assistant Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti, who has testified before this subcommittee. Mr. Civiletti was asked a question about immunity, and I think his answer is quite revealing of a very disturbing mentality in the Department of Justice.

The question was: "Now, what about the ABA recommendation of changing back to transactional immunity rather than the current use immunity?"

Mr. Civiletti's answer:

> We think it unnecessary and undesirable. We are talking about people who have violated the law. We think that they ought to be given the most limited protection required by the Constitution, which is use immunity and approved under constitutional principles.

Mr. Civiletti says, "We are talking about people who have violated the law." That is a strange way to describe people who assert the fifth amendment, an amendment which Supreme Court Justice Goldberg, writing for the majority in the 1964 Murphy v. Waterfront Commission case noted: "while sometimes a shelter to the guilty, it is often a protection to the innocent."

We find it unnerving, to say the least, that the head of the Criminal Division of the Justice Department is not aware of this distinction.

The Department of Justice, as an institution, has violated its trust with the American people. It is up to Congress to assure that ours is a Government of laws and not men, and to protect the American people from those men who would abuse and make a mockery of the grand jury system.

As we speak before this subcommittee today, there are nine persons who are in prison for refusing to cooperate with grand jury probes—who are defying familiar old abuses and a few new ones. Three of these persons are church employees who contend that their first as well as their fifth amendment rights have been stolen from them. The National Council of Churches has been so outraged by these cases that it has not only passed a strong grand jury reform resolution, but has called upon churches to offer both material and moral support to recalcitrant witnesses such as these. The National Council of Churches, in other words, is supporting civil disobedience.

Of the other six imprisoned, five are political activists in the Puerto Rican independence movement, and one, a community health organizer from New Mexico, who has been subpenaed in both New York and Chicago, and, ultimately, imprisoned in Chicago.

Grand jury abuse is not an aberration of the Nixon era. It is a thriving cancer on the system, and these, now, are its current victims. Unless Congress acts—and soon—we can only expect this cancer to increase in strength and volume.

At this point I would like to defer to Mr. Rein for a few brief remarks on the role of counsel and immunity.

Mr. REIN. I want to make just a few remarks on the two subjects which, I think, are most crucial to this bill: one is the question of immunity, and the other is the presence of counsel and the right of witnesses to counsel.

As you know, we have come out for the repeal of all compulsory immunity, and we feel that the record justifies the committee taking that action now. I listened to the distinguished attorney general from Arizona today, and he was asked questions by Congressman Sawyer about the use of immunity. Both of them agreed that when a prosecutor uses immunity, for it to be meaningful, you sit down and bargain with someone: You tell them, "I'll give you this, I'll give you that," or plea bargaining, in other wordss, and that the immunity arrived at in this way is meaningful to the prosecutor; but when you use immunity compulsorily and don't know what you're getting or what you're giving, it is very rarely of any use.

The record has shown that there have been and are people in jail for long periods of time who have never been accused, tried, or convicted of a crime. We have constantly said that this is gross abuse. The answer the Department of Justice has given, I understand, to this committee—the answer it has given to us through Mr. Civiletti—is that this is necessary in order to prosecute organized crime.

We have presented the challenge to the Department of Justice—and I understand this committee also has:

> Can you, on the basis of the record of having this tool for the last 14 years—however long you've had it—show that the use of compulsory immunity has enabled you to get evidence from any recalcitrant witness or to convict anybody in an organized crime matter.

So far I have never heard the Department of Justice come forth with a single example.

In the area of organized crime where witnesses refuse to talk because of fear, the Government has not gotten any testimony. It did not get any forced testimony in the Hoffa case; it did not get any testimony in any of these cases.

And yet if there has not been a single case where testimony has been obtained in an organized crime case through compulsory immunity, why is this a useful tool that should be kept on the books when its only utility and its only use, so far as we can see, is to put people in jail who have not committed any crime and have not been convicted.

I thought it rather odd, in the context of the Attorney General's discussion this morning, that while he doesn't think forced immunity is a useful tool, and while he's never wanted to use it, he engages in this theoretical discussion of, "Well, maybe if it was 18 months these recalcitrant witnesses who won't talk might talk, but if it were 2 years they would talk. Maybe if you would have kept them there for life they might talk."

But when you get into that area it seems to me you are speculating. In order to justify continuing use of that tool, I think that the Department of Justice has a burden to come forward to show that it has been useful, and that it has not just been used in an abusive fashion.

Second, I want to speak on the question of the role of counsel in the grand jury. And here, too, there's been a tremendous misconception of why counsel is necessary in the grand jury. And there's been talk about how, after all, it's just "probable cause."

The purpose of a counsel in the grand jury is—he's not representing a defendant—he is representing a witness who is called before the grand jury, and he is there because this witness needs the protection of counsel because of certain rights that he has. And experience has shown that these rights are not accorded to him by the prosecution, and that unless he has advice of counsel, he is not going to have those rights.

One of the arguments made is that you would be giving him rights that witnesses normally do not get in an ordinary trial. That is not true. Any witness that is called in an ordinary trial that feels that he is entitled to a reporter's privilege, or a privilege he gets from self-incrimination, or husband-wife privilege, or whatever—priest-penitent privilege—is entitled to have counsel come before the judge and argue that that witness should not be required to answer those questions.

That experience happened just recently in a case here in the superior court. All judges recognize the rights of witnesses to be represented by counsel when their rights are involved in a trial. We ask for no more than that with regard to the right to counsel in the grand jury.

Now, the main objection we hear, again, to this is this picture that is conjured up by the prosecution, and apparently by some members of the committee, that on the one side we have the shining knights in white armor—people from the Department of Justice—and on the other side we have these malevolent defense attorneys who are in there not to practice law but to obfuscate, delay, and obstruct justice.

I submit to you that that is not the picture, that it is not accurate; that this picture of the shining knights in white armor does not describe the normal U.S. attorney—and I'm talking about all the way down the line—assistant U.S. attorney, is a man who feels that the way way to do his job is to get convictions and to prosecute people. He is not nice to witnesses; if he can browbeat a witness he will do it—and I'm talking about the normal. And I would say it is unusual not to browbeat a witness if he thinks it's going to serve his purpose. If counsel is present, he will not browbeat a witness.

I would say for the defense that the defense has as strong a standard of ethics as the prosecution anywhere, and that if there are defense lawyers who abuse the standard of ethics, they are subject to disciplinary procedures.

Now, the argument has been made time and time again the Department of Justice bar is subject to disciplinary procedures. I would suggest to you that the likelihood of having disciplinary procedures against a member of the defense bar is far greater than against anybody from the Department——

Mr. EILBERG. May I interrupt you?

Do you personally have, or can you gather for use, any evidence of disciplinary actions taken against any U.S. attorneys, assistant U.S. attorneys, in connection with grand jury abuses?

Mr. REIN. I've never heard of any.

Mr. EILBERG. All right.

Mr. REIN. So, I submit to you that this argument that the lawyer—the only function a lawyer can have in a grand jury is for disruption is just not sound; and that is why he is there, and why he is needed to be there, is that the witness—remember, he represents a witness, not a defendant, and when a witness feels that he needs counsel, he needs counsel.

And they talk about this tremendous delay that we have. The ordinary grand jury—we've heard about the ordinary grand jury. If the Government is going to come in—the U.S. attorney—with witnesses who are perfectly happy to testify, he's talked to them, and they give their testimony. Those proceedings will go just as they are now; there will be no problem.

The only place you need a lawyer is when a witness feels—not that he is a cooperative witness—when he is the target, when he is reluctant, when he is being badgered. And I would say to you that if a witness feels he needs a lawyer, he is right. And we don't have to take the answer of the Department of Justice, or the judiciary, to say to a witness, "You may feel you need a lawyer, but you don't. There are other people here to protect your rights." I think we should trust the witness to determine when he needs a lawyer.

And that does not mean that every witness will have a lawyer, because every witness will not feel he needs a lawyer. There will not be this great disruption, there will not be this great delay; what you will have will simply be a device where witnesses who have rights will have some means of protecting these rights. To the extent that that results in any delay whatsoever in the grand jury, I would say to you that that is the same consequence that follows from respecting the Bill of Rights anywhere along the line of criminal justice. Certainly, trials would be much more expeditious if we got rid of jury trials, if we got rid of every other step, if we got rid of the fourth amendment.

I don't think there would be much delay. Whatever delay there would be would be worthwhile in preserving the right of witnesses.

Mr. EILBERG. Just one or two questions, and then we'll recess.

I understand—this is a rather long question. I understand that your organization has had meetings with representatives of the Department of Justice concerning grand jury reforms. Could you describe for us the nature of these meetings? What agreements and disagreements developed? What is your present attitude toward the Department of Justice's ability to deal with grand jury abuses?

I ask this question specifically because, as you know, Assistant Attorney General Civiletti has stated that he believes most abuses can be dealt with in-house administratively.

Mr. REIN. We had a fairly long session with Assistant Attorney General Civiletti; I think it went on for 2 or 3 hours. We were very encouraged with that because we had asked for this meeting on the basis of our prior experience, and Attorney General Levi testified before this committee and stonewalled the whole issue, said he wasn't interested at all. We were quite encouraged with the fact that Assistant Attorney General Civiletti agreed to sit down with us and discuss these issues.

We must say, however, that the basis of that discussion—we found, really, basically, no different position than that of Attorney General Levi. Mr. Civiletti was very persuasive—very persuasive; and, as a matter of fact, it was impossible for us frequently to even get a word in. But his general position was that: "Well, there's nothing here to talk about." And if I may say, my comment about the characterization of the prosecution brought against the defense as shining knights in white armor fighting the devil was about the way Mr. Civiletti looked at the problem.

Mr. EILBERG. So, how do you respond to the question I asked: What is your present attitude toward the Department of Justice's ability to deal with grand jury abuses?

Mr. REIN. I don't think it recognizes that there is a problem, and if it doesn't recognize that there is a problem, I don't see how it can deal with abuses, to be perfectly frank.

Mr. EILBERG. Your organization has cataloged, I understand various cases or illustrations of abuses. Would you make this catalog available to the subcommittee? And, could you tell us what are the most common abuses?

Ms. HIXSON. We'll be glad to make that available. It would really be an incredibly massive undertaking to try to compiel all of the abuse cases of which we have knowledge; what we have compiled is an example of cases that illustrate the need for the provisions in H.R. 94, and there are cases to justify each one of those provisions without exception.

[Information to be furnished.]

Mr. EILBERG. Before you proceed to answer, may I also suggest to you that you know my position on H.R. 94; I think that is pretty clear. I wish that you would think about how we could better inform the Congress as to the abuses. And it's obvious that we can't submit thick volumes; they don't have time for such volumes if we did. So, why don't you help us educate the Members or think about what devices we might use for that purpose.

Ms. HIXSON. We'll be very glad to cooperate with that effort.

In terms of the most common abuses, I would say that the use of the grand jury subpena by the prosecutor, in cooperation with the FBI or other agencies—in other words, the subpena not really being issued by the grand jury but by the prosecutor working with other agencies—is a very common abuse.

The other, related, abuse is subpenaing people from great distances with very, very short notice periods; for instance, in Mr. Archuleta's case, being subpenaed from New Mexico to New York and then Chicago, and given 3 days' notice to accomplish that feat; this is a very common abuse.

Simply the use of the subpena to punish and harass is very common.

The use of otherwise inadmissible evidence before grand juries to get indictments is a common abuse.

I think that more and more we are seeing severe abuses in the forms of leaks—gradual leaks of secret information that ruin people's reputation and destroy their lives.

And lastly, and very emphatically, forcing immunity on people who have principles but don't have information.

Mr. EILBERG. I wish we had more time. Our time has run out. I would like to submit to you a list of questions; once again, would you assist us in answering them?

Oh, I'm sorry, Mr. Sawyer. I looked in your direction a moment ago and you were not there.

Mr. SAWYER. No; I was here all the time.

Mr. EILBERG. I'm sorry.

Mr. SAWYER. First of all, let me ask Ms. Nixon, I wasn't sure if I understood.

When you started out did you say you spent some 14 months incarcerated?

Ms. HIXSON. It felt that way. No; I represented a young woman—in fact, who is present here today—Jill Raymond, who was in prison for 14 months for, basically, refusing to cooperate with an FBI investigation.

Mr. SAWYER. Why did she refuse?

Ms. HIXSON. She did not trust the FBI. She felt that any names that she gave the FBI would be people that would then, themselves, be victims of FBI harassment. Her case was one in which the FBI descended on Kentucky and began to question every person who had been involved in the local feminist community.

Mr. SAWYER. Would she have refused to testify even before a Federal grand jury?

Ms. HIXSON. Yes; this was a Federal grand jury in 1975.

Mr. SAWYER. Was she indicted?

Ms. HIXSON. She was given forced immunity after refusal to answer questions and jailed for contempt. She was never indicted—no one was in this investigation.

Mr. SAWYER. And her basic reason for refusal was that she felt she might—her testimony involved the incrimination of others?

Ms. HIXSON. She claimed the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth and ninth amendments to the U.S. Constitution for her basis to refuse to testify.

Mr. SAWYER. Now, Mr. Civiletti—you are aware of course that Mr. Civiletti was a private sector trial lawer up until just a matter of a few months ago, having had some extensive experience.

Mr. REIN. He was in the district attorney's office prior to that.

Mr. SAWYER. But then he was in the private sector practicing.

Mr. REIN. I don't know how long. I would say that he retains the prosecutorial point of view, not the private sector.

Mr. SAWYER. If the witness wants immunity—not immunity; if he wants counsel, would you propose that if they were unable to that the public pay for their counsel?

Ms. HIXSON. I would say absolutely. We can't have a situation where witnesses, because they have a lot of money, could get a lawyer, and others—indigents—couldn't. I think that has got to be in there just as it is in trial situations.

Mr. SAWYER. Would you propose to put in a limitation on counsel in the jury room as to how many people they can represent that are appearing before the grand jury?

Mr. REIN. Well, let me tell you; that presents a very serious problem, and I've had that. And the situation arises.

I represented recently a trade union, a number of people——

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Rein—and Mr. Sawyer—

Mr. SAWYER. Yes?

Mr. EILBERG. I have a compelling engagement, and I am going to leave and let you ask other questions that you have. And then we have another witness who has just arrived, and he is Mr. Naftalis. I suggest that we postpone him until at least 2 o'clock.

So, may I ask you to proceed later?

Mr. SAWYER. I have only a couple of more questions.

Mr. EILBERG. So the committee will then recess until we get back sometime after 2 o'clock.

Mr. SAWYER. You want to come back at 2 o'clock?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes; just to wind up with the last witness, and also for the consideration of prisoner exchange legislation.

Excuse me.

Ms. HIXSON. Thank you, Mr. Eilberg.

Mr. REIN. Just let me answer the question. These individuals opted to have—they took a common point-of-view, and they all wanted to have one counsel. Now, as a matter of fact, if they were forced to accept counsel, I don't think that they could have afforded it, and I did not want to be in the situation of having counsel appointed.

In that kind of a situation, it seems to me that we should have the same rule about conflict of interest that you have with regard to representatives or different people in other situations.

This is what happened in a particular case with Judge Shaw. He called the witnesses in, he told them that they had a right to choose their own counsel. This was even if the counsel was standing outside. And that there is a conceivable conflict of interest with one witness; and if you are fully aware of that conceivable conflict of interest, what is your decision. And they made the decision; and I think it should be up to the witness to make the decision—in the light of all the information and all the knowledge with regard to it—as to whether he wants to be represented by a particular lawyer, and that any other rule, really, to deprives him of counsel of his choice.

Mr. SAWYER. Of course, one of the—You know, I've spent a lot more time on the private sector side of the grand juries than I have the prosecutorial. But I know that one of the great concerns that you have with people who are appearing before a grand jury is, since we all know that almost all perjury indictments that come down come down out of grand juries as opposed to coming out of trial lawyers or requests, and that one thing you are fearful of is that they—you know totally instruct them that no matter where chips fall, to tell the truth

Mr. REIN. We said that; better keep quiet——

Mr. SAWYER. And part of the reason for doing that is that they can't know, and you don't now, what that grand jury already has. And then that puts you in a terrible position if you are a lawyer and you do know what the prior witnesses have said. It seems to me you're almost dutybound to tell your client what the prior witnesses have said, just for his own protection. I don't think you have the right to hide that from him and still act as his counsel.

Mr. REIN. Well, as a matter of fact, there is no reason why, if they're represented by a different lawyer, why the prior witness can't tell the other witness what they said in the grand jury. There's no oath of secrecy on witnesses.

Mr. SAWYER. They're under restrictions of telling other witnesses; they can tell their own lawyer.

Mr. REIN. No; they can tell everybody else.

Mr. SAWYER. That might be the difference between the Federal and the State grand jury.

Mr. REIN. The witness is not prevented from telling anybody what he said.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, of course, the great problem the witness has is that if he is going to go in and not testify truthfully, particularly in a grand jury trial, you can usually sit and watch it if they go into some kind of rule. But he's playing Russian roulette if he wants to try to falsify or fabricate. That's really one of the most effective parts of a grand jury in getting testimony.

And I just hate to see that destroyed by this. And I'm not talking about attorneys like you, but we all know that there are attorneys—that represent the Mafia, for example—that are almost lackeys of the group, if you want to say that. And I'm sure that there are also bad apples on the prosecution side. I want to make that point.

But if you're investigating that kind of conspiracy, it seems to me that you just are badly undermining the investigative ability of the grand jury if you're in that kind of context. And, of course, you have to apply these rules. You can't say that these rules don't apply when you're investigating the Mafia; they have to go across the board. And I just hate to see the efficiency——

Mr. REIN. I think that's what I tried to address myself to earlier. I don't think citizens, across the board, should be denied their rights because somebody says, "We're addressing ourselves to organized crime."

I would go further than that. If organized crime is really going to work at this kind of thing, the magistrates are not going to prevent it. On the other hand, there is an exaction against a lawyer supporting perjury, and I'm sure if the Government had a case against one, it would rap him with it, and I understand it has.

Mr. SAWYER. There's also another thing that bothers me; for example, on your statement, about barring the use of hearsay testimony. Now, as you are aware, under the Federal Constitution as opposed many of the State constitutions, everybody is entitled to presentment of indictment by a grand jury; and yet, in the big Federal jurisdictions, they're running through, literally, thousands of cases a week, 99.9 percent of which are just routine and normally end in State prosecution—and 90-odd percent are criminal anyway. They may have been done by the issuance of filing complaint, the issuance of a warrant, of filing of information—something similar.

I haven't run a Federal grand jury, I've run State ones; but I know in a Federal grand jury, just bring in a—they do what we do in a State practice and get a warrant, merely bring down one of the investigating detectives who rattles off about three sentences in front of a district judge—which is our lower clerk judge—and they sign a warrant. And that's, really, almost as a practical matter what the Federal prosecutors have to do with a grand jury to comply with the constitutional end.

Now, obviously, if you had that bar of inadmissible testimony which would just completely bankrupt the whole system you could not——

Mr. REIN. I think the remark was not addressed to inadmissible testimony, would be hearsay testimony. The testimony that would be inadmissible to trial—for trial purposes—and the fact that we're talking, really, about cases where they would be barred by an exclusionary rule. In other words——

Mr. SAWYER. But hearsay was expressly mentioned, too.

Mr. REIN. I'm addressing that, say, of use of illegally obtaining evidence.

Mr. SAWYER. How would you propose to distinguish those cases where it might be important, namely the investigative grand jury which might be less than one percent of the grand juries, and yet not bog down the system by applying those kinds of rules to what is 90-odd percent of the grand juries functions—literally rubberstamping just to comply with the provision. Because there is no way you can conduct a main trial on each of these routine cases.

How do you cope with that?

Ms. HIXSON. Mr. Sawyer, it's just that rubberstamping that we object to, and it is our firm position that grand juries should only hear hard evidence—the real thing—not inadmissible evidence, not illegally obtained evidence, not evidence that—They should hear the same evidence that would be used at a trial.

Mr. SAWYER. When you recognize——

Mr. REIN. I just want to make one comment. Your Federal Rules of Evidence does permit the admissibility of a good deal of hearsay.

Mr. SAWYER. Some, but when you recognize and say that somewhat over 90 percent of all criminal prosecutions in the United States are handled in the State courts and are strictly under State jurisdiction, the Federal is less than 10 percent—in all the States 90-odd percent of the cases—or most all of the States—operating strictly with the complaint warrant information system unless they have investigation to conduct—why would it be worth while bogging down the Federal system with these trials on rubberstamp kind of noninvestigative case by requiring a production of, you know, say, hard evidence, witnesses, and so forth. That bothers me.

And I'm not being argumentative, it just bothers me about the problem.

Mr. REIN. I think that is greatly exaggerated in a sense, because I think if that is the case, I think hard evidence is easily available and, you know, we go through a lot of preliminary hearings. I don't know why it's that much more difficult for a prosecutor to cross-examine a witness to an event than putting on the detective.

Ms. HIXSON. It's a case of——

Mr. REIN. It's really the major difference in the sense of the grand jury thinking they have a function. And here is a witness and some detective who took a statement.

Ms. HIXSON. I think it's a case of lazy prosecutors in many instances, and I also think we can't overemphasize the fact that the grand jury was written into the fifth amendment of the Constitution for just that purpose, to review the evidence against a person and see if there was a basis for indictment—not simply to hear a police officer tell them a third-hand story.

Mr. SAWYER. Now, one other thing is there seems to be some concern expressed by a number of witnesses, now just you; prosecutors, in effect use—you know—unethical, illegitimate tactics, if you will, with the grand jury to get indictments. But what profits the prosecutor to get indictments since he has gotten stuck for going and trying this thing in front of a judge and jury and defense counsel and everything. And if he "bombs" on very many of his indictments, it's much better from his point of view that he never got the indictment.

What is his inducement to get a bad indictment that he can't convict?

Ms. HIXSON. I think in many of these——

Mr. REIN. He can get by very often. I can only give you an example of a case I read in the fifth circuit just the other day that came down with—there was a prosecution in Alabama where there was a conviction on a death sentence with two eyewitnesses who had a phoney identification and suppression of another eyewitness who identified somebody else. And he got a conviction that was affirmed in the court of Alabama. He brought a habeas corpus in the Federal district court that was denied. And it took the fifth circuit in a very good opinion say, "This whole prosecution was an outrage from beginning to end, and should never have been brought." They didn't understand why they had brought this prosecution.

Now, I think the answer is that people get by with a great deal. Not everybody can go this whole route of appeals—to the court of appeals, special district court, and then get habeas corpus in the fifth circuit. And the immediate thing with many prosecutors, unfortunately, even if the case isn't going to stand up eventually, they feel that there is publicity involved—there's too much involved—their names in the paper, and the prominent role they're playing. It seems to be the meaning——

Ms. HIXSON. I think, in a number of these cases, there's an enormous amount of pressure on the prosecutor to get an indictment in a case. There is a great deal of pressure on him, and he feels like he has to act and act fast; and, so, they will get, basically, what amounts to a trumped-up indictment. And there are, in fact, dozens of persons who were indicted in the early 1970's by one rather notorious prosecutor, and all of these people were acquitted—I mean trial after trial.

Mr. SAWYER. Well, if you look at the national percentage of convictions and/or pleas that resulted in indictments, or even complaints, or warrants—it's up in the high 90's, middle 90 percent—which would indicate that that is a very widespread——

Mr. REIN. On the contrary; what I would say is that the things that we are suggesting would not have this tremendous impact that the proponents of your legislation feel. It would only affect a small percentage, and you would still have the 90-percent prosecutions, you'd have the 90-percent plea bargain, and you would just go by the way it is. But we're talking about—in all this reform legislation—we're talking about would be the areas where there are abuses, where there are political considerations that overstep the mark.

And when I say it's a small percentage, I agree with you. I don't mean that makes it any less significant, because those are the cases that attract attention, and most people——

Mr. SAWYER. I agree with you. My sole concern in this area is not to emasculate an effective investigator, too, in certain kinds of cases, like conspiracy-type cases. They're not any good for individual crime.

For the sake of a couple of abuses, you know, there is the question of stripping a President of his power because a President in the immediate abused those powers. That's what you have to be careful of.

Mr. REIN. But I go back to my earlier statement, that I made this comment with regard to immunity, the Department of Justice's answer. I think we've reached the stage where I don't think we should simply make a cliche of that kind; I think we've reached the stage where people who say this will emasculate the investigatory process, or prevent the prosecution of organized crime, would do this—I think it's about time Congress should ask the Department of Justice, which has had this experience, to give some hard evidence of how these tools have helped them.

Mr. SAWYER. I might say that there are test cases in—price-fixing cases are almost always out of grand juries, too, because——

Mr. REIN. But they don't involve these problems, not really. No one gives immunity in an antitrust case.

10 OF 17

Mr. SAWYER. Well, I don't have anything further. Thank you very much.

I guess we'll stand in recess until 2 o'clock.

Mr. REIN. We'd like to express our appreciation to the committee. We certainly enjoyed it.

Mr. SAWYER. Enjoyed having you here.

[Whereupon, at 12:55 p.m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 2 p.m., this same day.]

[The responses of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse to supplemental questions of the subcommittee follow:]

COALITION TO END GRAND JURY ABUSE ANSWERS TO SUPPLEMENTAL QUESTIONS

Q. As you know, the American Bar Association has recently introduced a series of 25 principles for grand jury reform legislation. Could you tell us with which of these principles you disagree, if any, and why?

A. First, we would say that the principles passed by the American Bar Association are remarkably good when one considers the intensive lobbying effort against them launched by the Department of Justice. Those principles with which we disagree reflect the Department's influence on the ABA. In fact some proposals passed by the ABA Section of Criminal Justice, based on its extensive research and discussions between both prosecutors and defense attorneys, were modified even before the ABA House of Delegates had an opportunity to vote on them. In its desire to avoid a major floor fight with the Department of Justice, the ABA unfortunately overcompromised some of its excellent work.

Proposal number one would admit witness counsel to the grand jury room. We welcome this long overdue reform. However, we object to the limitations placed on the role of this counsel. We believe that the grand jury foreperson, representing the grand jury, should control the role of counsel, and prosecutor, for that matter.

We object to proposal 12 which states that prosecutors should not have to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena. The subpoena power belongs to the grand jury as a creature of the court. In actual practice today, grand jurors rarely know who has been subpoenaed until they actually see the witness. In addition, they may never see a subpoenaed witness. This is because many witnesses are taken directly before the prosecutor, and answer questions in his office, unaware of their rights. The prosecutor may then decide not to take this witness before the grand jury, perhaps because it would indicate to the grand jury that the prosecutor had subpoenaed someone unnecessarily, perhaps because the witness statements would not fit in with the prosecutor's version of events.

We believe that the record should reflect a vote of at least twelve grand jurors in favor of a specific subpoena. The prosecutor should give the grand jurors a list of persons he would like subpoenaed and briefly explain to the grand jury why he feels they should order a subpoena. The grand jurors, as ordinary citizens, can then decide whether the possible evidence the witness might offer would justify the inconvenience of a common appearance. This is in keeping with the historical view of the grand jury as a shield between the citizens and the government's powers.

Proposal 17 makes the excellent suggestion that the current "use" immunity statute be replaced with the fairer form of "transactional" immunity. We concur with this proposal, but it does not reach the major issue of "consensual" immunity. The Department of Justice has not established the efficacy of forcing witnesses to testify or go to jail. The elimination of the Fifth Amendment right to silence has caused the totally unjustified jailings of many recalcitrant grand jury witnesses who did not wish to answer questions about their friends, their political activities, or their private lives, questions that should never have been asked in the first place. This power to force testimony is at odds with American principles of justice and is a cancer that we have lived with since the anti-communist hysteria of the 50's. Forced immunity is an enormous power in the hands of prosecutors, one might say a totalitarian power. We call for a return to the original concept of immunity as a trade of protection from prosecution for testimony. No witness before a grand jury should be forced to testify over her/his Fifth Amendment objections or go to jail.

Proposal number 20 is well-intentioned, but potentially dangerous. While lawyers should not represent multiple witnesses when there is a conflict of interest, allowing a court to separate a lawyer from his or her clients is not the solution. Such actions would violate the witness's right to counsel or his or her own choosing and give the government a weapon with which especially low-income defendants could be pressured into behaving as the government wants them to behave.

The 24th proposal which advocates limiting contempt confinement to a maximum of twelve months is an unfortunate result of the Department of Justice lobbying. The original recommendation by the Criminal Justice Section of six months is the better proposal, clearly the more human.

It is highly regrettable that the Department of Justice was able to dissuade the ABA from the original proposals number 13 and 15 as follows:

(13) In any case in which a subpoenaed witness moves on proper grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena, the prosecutor should be required to make a reasonable showing in camera (which may be ex parte at the court's discretion) and on the record before the court convening the grand jury that the evidence being sought is:

(a) likely to be relevant to the grand jury investigation;

(b) not sought primarily for an improper purpose.

(15) When the circumstances place a hardship on the witness, motions to quash or modify subpoenas may be brought at the place where the witness resides, the documents sought are maintained, or before the court which issued the subpoena at the election of the witness. Such motion should be heard in camera and on the record.

These thoughtful recommendations were made by the Criminal Justice Section in an attempt to create some guidelines for the court to follow in determining whether the prosecutor has abused the grand jury's subpoena power. They offer a rational and not overly burdensome procedure to reach this determination. Proposal 15 speaks directly to one of the most notorious abuses of the grand jury system—the situation where the helpless witness in California is subpoenaed for an appearance the day after in New York. To challenge this unreasonable demand, the witness has to go to New York anyway.

Q. Your organization has expressed continuing concern about the use of the grand jury by federal prosecutors for "political purposes". This problem was especially highlighted to the subcommittee and the committee during the "Watergate years." What has been the recent experience of the Coalition as to the use by federal prosecutors of the grand jury for political purposes?

A. There are many ways prosecutors can manipulate a grand jury for political purposes, and, unfortunately, examples of each are readily available in recent, "post-Watergate" days.

Prosecutors can and have targeted grand jury investigations against their partisan political enemies and rivals. In 1975, Michigan State Supreme Court Justice John Swainson, a leading Democratic Party contender to succeed Phillip Hart in the U.S. Senate, was driven out of office and ruined after a three-year campaign to implicate him on a bribery charge. That charge was based on the word of an easily discreditable small-time hoodlum, and a trial jury eventually threw it out completely, but along the way the government prosecutor was able to trap Swainson into alleged perjury for his testimony before the grand jury.

Justice Swainson was convicted on that shaky charge, perhaps because the jurors felt that anyone the government investigates for three years must be guilty of something. It strains credibility to believe that the mammoth grand jury effort to "get" Swainson would have been mounted if Justice Swainson had been either of the same party as the national administration then in power, or a retiring personality whose prosecution wouldn't generate any newspaper headlines sure to advance an ambitious prosecutor's career.

This sort of grand jury political manipulation to ruin a rival is sometimes matched by grand juries manipulated to whitewash a political "friend". The recent Richard Helms affair is a notorious example of this phenomenon. A federal grand jury in the spring of 1976 reached the decision to indict Helms, the former CIA director, for lying to a Congressional committeee investigating U.S. intervention in Chile. The U.S. Attorney involved, on instructions from higher-ups who feared that an indicted Helms might make good his threat to embarrass other government officials, blocked the grand jurors' attempt to indict Helms for perjury. Eventually, after a deal between high Justice Department officials and Helms, the suspected perjurer pled to a lesser, almost non-existent charge. The entire case was clearly "political" from beginning to end.

Finally, there is the largest area of political abuse, the area of subpoena by political association. We have found that in the last seven years, both before and after Watergate, the FBI and federal prosecutors have used crimes like bombings to cast subpoena nets over broad numbers of political dissidents about whom they have absolutely no evidence of complicity in the crime in question. The resulting subpoenees are, in this manner, smeared into effective political limbo. When they protest their subpoenas, they are immunized and jailed.

We see this political manipulation especially in the recent contempt confinements of Hispanic Americans who have been connected with the Hispanic Commission of the Episcopal Church. Because a one-time volunteer for that commission, now a fugitive, has been linked to various bombings, every member of the Commission has come under suspicion as an accomplice. Many have been subpoenaed and jailed. As a result, the Commission's work to help alleviate poverty in Spanish-American communities has been irreparably damaged. Yet many observers still do not realize why the Hispanic community has been upset by the grand jury activity.

Perhaps an analogy would help explain the anger of the Hispanic activist community. If, after the Watergate burglary had been discovered, a Democratic prosecutor had called every member of the Republican National Committee behind the grand jury's closed doors while leaking to the press that there were disturbing organizational links between Gordon Liddy and National Committee members, Republicans everywhere would be aghast. This is the same situation that Hispanic activists now find themselves in.

Q. You have suggested that each grand jury have "independent counsel". Recently, Attorney General Bell has supported this concept of independent counsel. Have you had an opportunity to review the Attorney General's proposal and what are the similarities and differences between your idea and his concept?

A. It is not clear to us if Attorney General Bell is proposing an Office of Independent Counsel within the Department of Justice structure or a completely independent agency. We seek a totally objective non-prosecutorial advisor to the grand jury that has no conflicting relationship to the Department of Justice or the United States Attorney General's office. This attorney could be a completely independent agent or perhaps an arm of the court. The role of such counsel would be to present evidence impartially before the grand jury and in no way influence their deliberations or decisions vis a vis indictment. Unfortunately, we do not believe that this is the definition of "independent counsel" that the Attorney General had in mind when he broached the subject.

Q. One complaint made by many about proposals to reform the Federal Grand Jury System is that such reforms will limit the investigative power of the jury and result in more drastic alternatives. Specifically, if the investigatory power of the grand jury is reduced, would this not lead to direct investigatory power being granted to the FBI or prosecutors and is this not a much more dangerous procedure?

A. We, of course, do not favor the granting of more direct investigatory power to either the FBI or federal prosecutors. Indeed, the reason we want the investigative prerogatives of the grand jury limited is that the FBI and prosecutors have used the grand jury's broad powers to obtain the powers that society has expressly and wisely forbidden them. Our society has decided, for instance, that prosecutors cannot interrogate their suspects out of the presence of their lawyers. By forcing their suspects before grand juries, prosecutors neatly sidestep this limitation on their conduct. FBI agents do not have the power to force people to answer their questions. Yet by having their targets subpoenaed before the grand jury and immunized, they can have their targets jailed for asserting their right not to talk to FBI agents. The grand jury reforms proposed will not and should not result in drastic alternatives. What they will do is close loopholes for prosecutorial and FBI misconduct and make sure that basic concepts of fairplay like the assistance of counsel apply everywhere. No doubt prosecutors and FBI agents will use the passage of these reforms as an opportunity to demand more power to make up for the grand jury power they have lost. Let us remember, however, that the grand jury's power was never theirs to begin with. Let us remember also that law enforcement officials always cry "wolf" whenever due process safeguards are debated. Their "wolf"—the breakdown of the criminal justice system—did not materialize when the exclusionary rule was extended to all criminal cases. It will not materialize after the grand jury reform is enacted either.

Q. It has been recommended that we provide the ability of the court to remove an attorney when he represents multiple witnesses in the same investigation. Would you comment on this proposal?

A. We totally opposed this proposal. We must not allow repressive suggestions like this one to be enacted under the rubric of reform. This is really a matter for bar association regulation, not legislation. A rule like this, aimed at organized crime, cannot be made without seriously damaging the rights of union workers or political activists who wish to present a united "defense" to a grand jury investigation. This is a basic constitutional right. Surely we have learned through the horrendous abuse of the immunity powers that when we make a rule for organized crime cases, it is all too apt to be used against persons for whom it was never intended.

Again, we emphasize in the strongest terms possible: this is a proposal that will further grand jury abuse, not reform. It deserves a sudden death.

Q. I believe that providing for a right to counsel in the grand jury room is one of the most essential reforms we can enact. However, I am also concerned that such a right be limited—to giving advice only. You oppose this limited right to counsel. Would not the granting of additional power to a lawyer in the grand jury room really lead to dilatory actions?

A. We opposed any limitation on the role of counsel that is not imposed by the grand jurors themselves, acting through their foreperson. There are good defense attorneys and unscrupulous ones, as there are good and rotten prosecutors. This limitation on the role of counsel assumes the worst of witness attorneys, an unrealistic perspective to say the least. Furthermore, the limitation is unnecessarily chilling on the defense bar. The courts, remember, have the power to discipline errant attorneys.

Q. You argue for consensual immunity. The Department of Justice has stated that they have detailed guidelines for authorizing immunity grants. Have you had an opportunity to review these guidelines and why do you believe that these are insufficient?

A. Whether or not the Department of Justice guidelines are sufficient is not really the issue. In the first place, these guidelines are not mandatory. In the second place, the only "guidelines" that would be sufficient would be guidelines that assume, first and fundamentally, that the consent of the witness is necessary to the immunity deal. When this assumption is made, then and only then should questions be raised of whether offering immunity to a witness would be in the public interest.

AFTERNOON SESSION

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

We have as our final witness today the gentleman who is the author of a very fine textbook, "The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial," which he wrote together with Marvin M. Frankel—Mr. Naftalis.

Mr. Naftalis, we welcome you and ask you to proceed in your own way.

TESTIMONY OF GARY P. NAFTALIS, COAUTHOR OF "THE GRAND JURY: AN INSTITUTION ON TRIAL"

Mr. NAFTALIS. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate very much your kind invitation to testify before this committee on the subject of reform of the Federal grand jury.

Mr. EILBERG. May I ask that if you do not intend to read your statement—which many witnesses do not, it's entirely up to you—I would like to include it in the record at this point.

What would you like to do?

Mr. NAFTALIS. Well, with the chairman's permission, I would prefer not to read from the statement in its entirety, have it included, and just make a few brief remarks and answer questions.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, the statement will be made part of the record, and proceed in your own way. If you wish to summarize the statement, that's all right.

Mr. NAFTALIS. Thank you, sir.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Naftalis follows:]

STATEMENT OF GARY P. NAFTALIS

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your kind invitation to testify before this Committee on the subject of reform of the federal grand jury. I have followed this Committee's hearings with great interest and believe that you have performed a major public service in focusing attention on and devising thoughtful and constructive solutions for the problems that beset the grand jury.

As your hearings have demonstrated, the grand jury has been utilized too often by self-righteous or cynical prosecutors to harass the unorthodox and the unpopular. There have been too many instances where witnesses have been badgered, subjected to sudden appearances in distant places or defamed by purposeful leaks. Clearly, the present system is in need of reform to make certain that the rights of citizens summoned before or investigated by grand juries are fully protected.

To that end, I believe that several changes must be adopted if we are to have meaningful reform. They are as follows:[1]

(1) RIGHT TO COUNSEL

A witness should be permitted to have his lawyer accompany him inside the grand jury room to advise him as to his legal rights. If a witness lacks funds, counsel should be appointed for him.

The current practice that counsel may be available to the witness only in an adjoining room is one that produces potentially wasteful or prejudical consequences. If the witness feels he needs legal assistance in answering a particular question, he must interrupt the proceedings and leave the room to consult with his counsel. If the witness is very cautious, he might sensibly choose to be excused after every question, thereby making the proceeding a tedious and exasperating one. On the other hand, the present system tends to inhibit witnesses from asking to be excused and receiving proper legal advice. The witness may then be careless and do himself injury that a lawyer could have prevented. For example, the careless or intimidated uncounseled witness may unwittingly delay or forget to invoke a privilege, thus prejudicing his position before he is aware of the significance of his testimony. If counsel were present, both of these consequences would be avoided. Moreover, the mere fact that an attorney is present would deter the occasional over-zealous prosecutor from attempting to cross the line.

To be sure, the claim that the presence of counsel would delay and obstruct the grand jury's work is not weightless. The remedy, however, is to limit counsel's role (as H.R. 94 does) to advising the witness and to prohibit counsel from objecting to questions and arguing to the grand jury. And should an occasional attorney prove disruptive, judicial intervention is readily available.

More quickly disposed of is the argument of proponents of the status quo that the presence of counsel would violate the grand jury's secrecy. Simply put, there is no restriction on a witness giving a complete account of his testimony to his attorney. Hence, there can be no claim that it is wrong for the attorney to hear it first-hand unless we intend him to be ineffective—a position not expressly defended by anyone.

In sum, there is no public benefit to excluding counsel from the grand jury room. At most, the exclusion of the lawyer preserves the atmosphere of isolation and immediate friendlessness in which the witness is questioned. However, that is not an objective to be served in the public interest.

(2) DECENT NOTICE

Except in rare conditions of emergency, a witness should be given some minimal notice before being compelled to testify. Absent very unusual circumstances, there seems to be no good reason for the use of "forthwith" subpoenas requiring the immediate appearances of a witness before the grand jury. H.R. 94's requirement of 7 days' notice absent "special need" or the witness' consent seems to be a sound one and should be adopted.

[1] Much of the material that follows is excerpted or adapted from Frankel and Naftalis, The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial (Hill & Wang, 1977) Copyright 1975, 1977 by American Labor Conference on International Affairs, Inc.

(3) ADVICE OF RIGHTS

The theoretical possession of rights is no boon to the ignorant. A grand jury witness should be advised of his basic rights including (1) his right to counsel, (2) his privilege against self-incrimination, (3) the subject matter of the inquiry, and (4) whether the witness is a target of the grand jury investigation. Granted the recent decisions of the Supreme Court indicate that such a "target" warning is not constitutionally mandated. It is merely fair and decent. It imposes no serious burden on the prosecution and enables the prospective defendant to make an important decision (whether to testify or not) with a full understanding of the consequences. I might add that for several years, the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York has given such warning without any adverse effect on law enforcement.

Of course, the question when or whether the prosecution "knows" someone is a target should not become a new source of tangential disputation. At the outset of a broad investigation in a complicated field (securities fraud or other kinds of possibly complex wrongdoing), prosecutors are likely to be unaware of some or all who may come to be accused. People may be called as witnesses who only later are perceived to be active participants in the alleged crimes. In general, the grand jury's own records should show when a particular witness has become a probable defendant. Once that identification is made, there is much to be said for informing the witness of his status.

(4) RIGHT OF A PROSPECTIVE DEFENDANT TO TESTIFY OR NOT

A prospective defendant should not be summoned to testify if the prosecutor is forewarned that he will invoke his privilege against self-incrimination, thereby illicitly inviting the grand jury to draw an adverse inference that the Constitution forbids. Interestingly, this was the policy followed by the Watergate Special Prosecutor's Office. And I would add that the grand jury should not be told a target hasn't been called because he would exercise his Fifth Amendment privilege. This would have the same effect as his actually claiming the privilege before the panel. Only in those extremely rare instances where the grand jury specifically insists upon a target's appearance should the prosecution inform it of the reason for his non-appearance.

For the prospective defendant who is not called, there should be a right, in the absence of some good reason for disallowance, to appear voluntarily on request and present his version of the affair under inquiry. While it is doubtful that in most cases the target's testimony would be sufficiently persuasive to halt his indictment, there may be instances where it does make a difference. Obviously, there is no public interest in saving indictments returned that prove—and might have proved in advance—to be unwarranted. While I would not support a further right of a prospective defendant to all witnesses other than himself before the grand jury, his suggestions of people to be heard ought to be conveyed to, and given careful and sympathetic consideration by, the grand jurors.

(5) PLUGGING GRAND JURY LEAKS

Grand jury "leaks" are a recurrent and steadily nagging concern. It should be clear on principle that these violations of the rules are evil. The casual assassination of character or impairment of status through the illicit breach of grand jury secrecy ought to be seen always as a wrong, to be prevented when possible nation of character or impairment of status through th eillicit breach of grand jury leaks have been remarkably feeble. The federal contempt power has seldom been applied agaist such illict disclosures. H.R. 94's provision making it a specific crime to leak grand jury materials is a needed improvement. But more is probably needed. One additional remedy would be a statutory provision allowing victims of leaks to collect substantial money damages without proof of actual damages. An exception could be made for leaks later found to be justified in the interests of ferreting out corruption or other forms of official misconduct. The thrust of liability, even as thus qualified, might deter members of prosecution staffs who now find it agreeable to leak information with effective impunity. As things stand now, there is no question that people inside the courthouse are frequently responsible for deliberate, often malicious, always lawless breaches of the grand jury secrecy they are enjoined to help enforce.

(6) KEEPING RECORDS

I support H.R. 94's provision that a transcript be kept of all that goes on in the grand jury room except the "grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel." This would include not only the testimony of witnesses but instructions and directions by the prosecutor before and after the taking of testimony. The knowledge that a record is being kept is a sobering prophylactic against casual, slipshod, or malevolent behavior. There is no inconsistency with the interest in grand jury secrecy. The transcript would remain sealed, as it commonly is in current practice, until a legitimate need arose to consult its contents.

(7) FREER DISCOVERY OF GRAND JURY MINUTES

Grand jury secrecy, as the Supreme Court has noted, serves valid purposes. Like other useful ideas, however, it has been the subject both of undue extension and of frequent subversion. The overextensions include, in the federal courts and elsewhere, the withholding of grand jury transcripts from defendants on trial except that, after direct examination at trial, the grand jury testimony of a prosecution witness must be given to the defense for use in cross-examination. As a main justification for this restriction, secrecy is generally inapposite. Once a defendant is brought to trial, the reasons for secrecy are usually gone. Subject to safeguards of scope and timing—for example, to limit fabrication of evidence and tampering with witnesses—it seems desirable that grand jury transcripts be far more freely available to defendants.

So too, every grand jury witness should be entitled to have a transcript of his grand jury testimony. The supposed interest in secrecy is no argument against this. The witness is free to record and tell his lawyer, for his own protection, what he said to the grand jury. If he had a perfect memory, he could have and use a perfect record. Lacking that miraculous benefit, he faces a variety of dangers and disadvantages. If he has meant to be truthful, he may lose opportunities to correct innocent errors. If he means to stay truthful, he may nevertheless be led to later contradictions by lapses of memory that could be avoided if the transcript were available for reference. If he must come one day to contend with the prosecutor, his adversary will have the transcript. The embattled witness should not be without it.

(8) INSTRUCTIONS BY JUDGES

There is a large gap between the powers actually possessed by grand juries and the jurors' knowledge and use of them. Generally, the judge's "charge" to the grand jury as to its rights and duties tends to be brief, formal and instructive H.R. 94 would require that new grand jurors be more effectively advised of their broad authority, and of their duties to their fellow citizens for which the authority is conferred. The judge would be required to inform the grand jurors in some detail about their powers over witnesses, documents, and other evidence, as well as about powers to be administered by the panel. The main objective would be to give the citizens being impaneled some sense of their independence under law—not to incite unguided adventurism, but to underscore the necessity for positive judgment rather than supine obedience to the prosecution. This proposal is a sound and desirable one.

(9) PROSECUTORIAL REPORTING

H.R. 94 would require the Attorney General to report annually to Congress and the Administrative Office of the United States Courts on the work of federal grand juries. The statements would contain statistical information on investigations, requests for immunity, contempt citations, arrests, indictments, no-true bills, etc. Presumably these data would be available for future grand jury reform.

The reporting idea should be adopted and arguably extended. The grand jury is officially an arm of the court, but judicial supervision has been minimal. United States attorneys should be required to inform the court regularly about the grand jury's work. The practice might produce effective guidance and supervision, and might allow judges to make the grand jury a more meaningful agency of the court concerned with interests beyond prosecution. It would make for better understanding by the judges of current complaints and dissatisfactions, whether to attempt remedies or, in proper cases, to sustain the prosecutor against his critics. Possibly of greater importance, it might give pause to the occasional prosecutor tempted to act in ways that would not sound attractive in his required report.

I have not attempted to discuss all the provisions of H.R. 94. As my statement makes plain, I am in agreement in principle with many of its major reforms. With the improvements I have proposed and possibly some others now being considered by Congress, the grand jury can be a worthy means of investigation, prosecution and protection.

I appreciate the opportunity to be of some assistance to this Committee's important work and would be pleased to answer any questions that you may have.

Mr. NAFTALIS. As the Chairman knows, I have followed this committee's hearings with great interest. I know this committee's interest in grand jury reform, and particularly the chairman's interest in the subject. I believe that this committee has performed a major public service in focusing attention on, and devising thoughtful and constructive solutions for, the problems that beset the Federal grand jury system as it operates today.

I think that H.R. 94—although the chairman knows I do not agree with every provision in it—is a thoughtful, constructive attempt to deal with problems besetting the grand jury, and I endorse, at least in principle, many of the major reforms it proposes. I outline them in my statement, and I will review them briefly for the record and then open myself up to whatever questions the chairman and other members may have.

My own view, of the grand jury, is based on, the experiences I've had.

For half-a-dozen years, I was a Federal prosecutor, an assistant U.S. attorney in the southern district of New York where for some portion of that time I was Deputy Chief of the Criminal Division.

Mr. EILBERG. From what year to what year?

Mr. NAFTALIS. From September 1968—I went on active service, and I resigned February 1, 1974.

For the year before that, I was a law clerk for one of the Federal District judges in the Southern District of New York, Judge William Herlands.

Subsequent to my resignation from the U.S. attorney's office, I have been in the private practice of law as a litigator doing criminal defense work as well as commercial and corporate litigation.

So, I bring to bear my own experience as a prosecutor, and my own experiences doing some defense work.

I think what is primarily wanting today in the grand jury, is a codification and recognition of the procedural rights of the witnesses who appear before the grand jury as well as the members of the public who happen to be the targets or the subjects of the grand jury's investigation.

As the chairman himself has written what is lacking in the grand jury today, and what is almost singular about the grand jury today in our criminal justice system, is that there is no recognition of such procedural rights as exist in almost every other part of our criminal justice system.

And I would like to speak to a few of the things that H.R. 94 calls for, and that I favor.

First and foremost, I favor the right of every witness summoned before a grand jury to be accompanied inside the grand jury room by his attorney.

I also favor the provision of H.R. 94 which provides that if a witness lacks funds to retain an attorney, one should be appointed for him at public expense, just as an attorney is appointed for an accused in a criminal case at public expense if he lacks funds.

It seems to me that there is much to be gained and very little to lose by having counsel in the grand jury. In the first place, just from the standpoint of efficiency it makes little sense to have a lawyer outside the grand jury room, thereby forcing the witness to shuttle back and forth, sometimes after every question if he's really hyper-cautious, to obtain counseling and advice from his own attorney. That kind of delay is highly wasteful and it's hardly in the public interest.

At the same time the potential for prejudice does exist, because there are many witnesses who, obviously, are somewhat intimidated, either directly or indirectly, explicitly or implicitly, from asking to be excused too often to go outside and talk to their lawyers. As a result, the witness who is uncounseled—and no matter how sophisticated the uncounseled witness is, he is, obviously, no match on the law for the prosecutor—does not have a full understanding of what his rights are as a lawyer could give him, if he were sitting at the witness' side. He may well prejudice his own position by answering inaccurately, failing to invoke a privilege—I don't mean simply the fifth amendment privilege, but any one of the many privileges that people have, such at attorney-client, husband-wife, and the like.

I think there is much to be said for allowing witnesses to have counsel, and that the arguments made by those who oppose this reform are wide of the mark. The major argument aganist it has been that it will disrupt and delay proceedings of the grand jury. All of us who are lawyers know that there is always some potentiality for disruption in any situation in which a lawyer is present. On the other hand, no one, however, has called for the abolition of lawyers in the trial court room or other places where they have potentiality for disruption.

You can evolve rules and regulations to regulate that kind of conduct; indeed, H.R. 94 does, and I favor that. I favor a situation where lawyers cannot come into a grand jury and turn it into a mini trial, arguing to the jury and summing up, and the like. I think that their role should be limited simply to advising their clients. And I should add that judicial intervention is a quick and necessary remedy if there is a lawyer who tends to obstruct.

The fear of obstructional factors is a little over done, and if you properly modulate or regulate the role of counsel in the grand jury, such obstruction can be avoided.

The second criticism, that is generally made, is one which can be very easily disposed of. It is the claim that if lawyers are allowed inside the grand jury room this will violate grand jury secrecy. Of course, in the first instance, the witness is never under any constrictions as to grand jury secrecy. He can and should, in fact, tell his lawyer everything that goes on in the grand jury room if he wants to be properly counseled and advised.

So, the witness can tell his lawyer, and, indeed, if he had a photographic memory, give him a verbatim transcript of all the questioning that was done in a grand jury room. Thus there's no particular secrecy impediment to the lawyer himself hearing the testimony first-hand, unless—as we point out in our book—we want the lawyer to be less effective or ineffective, and I don't think anyone advocates that.

The right to counsel in the grand jury room is a vital and necessary reform; indeed, it is the most important reform in the grand jury reform legislation you have introduced and this committee is considering. I endorse it subject to the restrictions and limitations put on it in H.R. 94.

In addition, I would endorse a number of the other procedural safeguards that H.R. 94 provides. In principle, certainly, I can see no reason why decent notice ought not to be given to a witness who is summoned to appear before a grand jury in the absence of a showing of some special need. Obviously, if the statute of limitations was running, or someone was about to flee the country, that would be a situation of special need where the notice provision should be done away with.

But absent those kinds of situations, it's not much of an imposition to require a 7-day notice requirement before a witness is called to testify, thereby giving him an opportunity to consult with his lawyer and be prepared.

Second, I see no reason why witnesses who are summoned are not informed of their rights—informed of the fact that they do have a right to counsel—assuming that they are given one inside the given grand jury room—informed of what the subject matter of the investigation is, informed of the fifth amendment privilege, and, importantly, informed whether or not they themselves are the targets of an investigation.

Now I know that the Supreme Court has recently said, either by way of holding or by very persuasive dictum, that giving a so-called target warning to a witness who is a prospective defendant is not constitutionally required.

However, I would think that it should be given and I base this on my experience in the southern district of New York as assistant U.S. attorney. For years we routinely gave target warnings to prospective defendants, and I never noticed—nor did my colleagues ever tell me—that this created any problem, that any criminals escaped, or that we weren't able to function effectively as law enforcement officials.

It's a very small burden to put on the Government, to advise a prospective defendant of the true picture of what his status is. He can make important judgments such as: Should he testify or should he claim his fifth amendment privilege with his eyes open. A witness should not make this decision thinking he's just being summoned as some ordinary witness off the street when, in fact, he is the central figure in the investigation.

I also endorse H.R. 94's provisions for stronger sanctions against grand jury leaks. That is an area of law where there has been a fair amount of abuse. Those of us who have practiced law in New York City are aware that the former special State anticorruption prosecutor has been widely criticized for leaking information to the press. And I think that the law certainly needs the teeth in this.

Finally, I would say that the bill's provision for mandatory recordation of everything that goes on inside a grand jury room is also needed. That, like counsel, is a necessary and desirable prophylactic against abuse by the occasional prosecutor who would tend to overreach at the expense of the witness. Just simply knowing that whatever you say, whether it's charging the grand jury or questioning the witness, is being recorded, may, at minimum, serve to deter a prosecutor from stepping over the line.

Mr. Chairman, I, obviously, haven't spoken to everything. I welcome the opportunity to answer any questions you or anyone may have.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Naftalis, for your contribution, and for your remarkable book. We have made copies available to every member of this subcommittee because of its extensive and comprehensive review of the history, purposes, functions, and problems of the grand jury system.

Now, some questions. In your book, you note that there is a "national consensus" that a person may have his lawyer outside the grand jury room. You make it clear that this is not constitutionally guaranteed. Does your research indicate any jurisdictions, State or Federal, where the policy of the prosecutor is to not allow a lawyer to wait outside a grand jury room?

Mr. NAFTALIS. There may be, Mr. Chairman. I haven't found them, but on the other hand there may well be. I'm not entirely sure that I am familiar with every single State's practice. I think it is fair to say that the general rule, if not the unanimous rule, is that counsel may be outside the grand jury room. However, there are instances where there are restrictions on witnesses leaving to consult with counsel.

Now, in the Federal system that generally doesn't exist, but in New York State practice, one may not, under State law, leave the grand jury room to consult with your lawyer for what the cases call "strategic advice" as opposed to legal advice. And, therefore, there have been cases where people have been denied the right to go outside the grand jury room, by the courts on that ground.

But, in going back to your general question, I am not aware of any States that prohibit it.

Mr. EILBERG. In your book, you support the provision providing limited right to counsel in the grand jury room. You particularly note that the presence of a lawyer may deter prosecutorial excesses. Some have argued that providing for a transcript of all proceedings would eliminate such excesses without requiring counsel to be present. Would you comment?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I favor recordation. I think that counsel would be a useful addition to help prevent those kinds of excesses, for the simple reason, simple fact, that there is a live human being present with legal skills and training and the ability to know what to do if he sees something happening that is wrong. This obviously is a greater deterrent to misconduct than a cold record—although a cold record, I think, is a very helpful thing to have.

But above and beyond that, there are other useful things that lawyers can accomplish in terms of properly advising their clients and cutting down on wasted time and delay in the grand jury system, which would not be accomplished simply by recordation.

Mr. EILBERG. I agree with you that counsel can be provided for grand jury witnesses in a grand jury room. I think the presence of such counsel will reduce obstructions and delays. However, one problem does concern me, that of multiple representation.

Do you believe better standards can be established to allow a court to remove an attorney in conflict or multiple-representation situations? And what should be those standards?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I would think that standards can and should be established. As a general proposition multiple representation, both before grand juries and in courtrooms ought to be done away with. There ought to be something approaching a per se rule prohibiting a lawyer from representing more than one person before a grand jury.

Now, when I say approaching a per se rule, I would sort of leave it to the Government to object, simply because there may be situations where it is of no particular consequence or harm that one lawyer represents more than one witness. For example, a lawyer may represent a number of witnesses, say from a particular corporation, or a union, who are being summoned to give helpful testimony, and there is no indication of collusion, or protecting a target, or the like. Unless the Government objected, there probably would be no particular harm in having the same lawyer represent them. On the other hand, if, under the same hypothetical situation, the Government thought that the multiple representation was in any way impeding or improperly interfering with the search for the truth, I think the Government could properly object, and the rule could be invoked—one lawyer one witness.

But I would be very strict on the multiple representation question.

Mr. EILBERG. In your book, you support our provision providing for the right of the target to testify. In most cases, the grand jury is solely a rubberstamp, doing very little investigation, and merely indicting a person based on a prior police or other investigative agency report. Do you believe that in those cases, as well, prospective defendants should have a right to testify?

Mr. NAFTALIS. Yes. The basis for someone having the right to testify is that if the witness feels that by testifying he may be able to persuade the jury and/or the prosecutor not to proceed, then he ought to have a right to do it. And whether the case is a cut-and-dried counterfeiting, or bank-robbery case, or a complex securities fraud case, from his standpoint I don't see a particular difference.

Now, I do agree that, in terms of the realities of life, there are very few instances where a witness going before a grand jury in which the prosecutor puts substantial evidence tending to show that he committed an offense, is going to be able to talk the grand jury, or actually talk the prosecutor, into changing his recommendations to the grand jury, or talk the grand jury directly into saying no to the prosecutor. On the other hand, people ought to have that right.

The problem which you implicitly refer to in your question is one of notice, because there may be a problem of creating an intolerable notice requirement if in every case the prosecutor is required to give notice to every potential defendant in every case. I would be somewhat reluctant to impose such a notice requirement on the Government. In most instances where people want to testify, they know of the existence of the investigation very well, and it wouldn't be very difficult for them to make a request. So, I would, to that extent, be very wary of putting a notice requirement on the Government.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Naftalis, we have several questions we would like to ask you, but we have other pressing business at the moment. How much time do you have?

Mr. NAFTALIS. If I can cancel my train I can remain awhile. What is the chairman's schedule? What is your pleasure?

Mr. EILBERG. We are very anxious to recess the hearing for a few minutes—maybe 15 or 20 minutes, half and hour, I don't know—and then come back to you again.

Mr. NAFTALIS. That will be fine. I can do that.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will temporarily recess the grand jury reform hearing and will call upon you a little later, Mr. Naftalis.

Mr. NAFTALIS. Thank you.

[Recess.]

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Naftalis, in your book you oppose requiring a prosecutor to make disclosure of exculpatory evidence to the grand jury but believe it should be done voluntarily "as a matter of State practice." How can we allow the whim of the prosecutor to determine whether or not a grand jury is to hear all the evidence? Why should not standards be established?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I think that anyone that deals with the criminal justice system feels that the prosecutors ought to disclose exculpatory materials to the grand jury, to the defense of the trial, and elsewhere when appropriate. I think that there are a number of problems that I see in the area of exculpatory evidence, one of which is defining what is or is not exculpatory. In cases where, say, there is an eyewitness who says that somebody else committed the offense, or there is a confession from somebody else; those are easy cases. And, again, a prosecutor who claims to have ignored that testimony is probably, at minimum, very negligent and, perhaps, intentionally acting in a wrongful manner.

On the other hand, there are other matters which courts have felt to be exculpatory, which might have escaped the notice of a prosecutor. And I do have some problems in putting the prosector under the kind of obligation where he has to divine what may or may not be determined to be exculpatory at some future stage down the road. On the other hand, obviously, it seems to me good practice and it's good sense.

Mr. EILBERG. You don't think requiring disclosure might minimize the difficulties?

Mr. NAFTALIS. Well, I think if you lay down a general standard, that a prosecutor disclose to a grand jury matters that he knows or even presumably should know to be obviously exculpatory I could agree to that.

The problem of making it a requirement as opposed to a rule of practice is, one of having too many pretrial hearings—postindictment pretrail hearings—to slow down the criminal justice process.

Mr. EILBERG. We're not talking about a hearing. We're talking about disclosure, which is something outside the court room, outside the jury room, and, perhaps, in the district attorney's office, the assistant's office.

Mr. NAFTALIS. No. I believe this disclosure should occur. My problem is, what happens if you don't do it, what should be the remedy; and if the remedy is dismissal of an indictment for failure to disclose some exculpatory material, which the prosector, perhaps in good faith, did not realize, that might be too strong a dose.

Second, we may have all sorts of hearings as to what someone knew, and why didn't you tell them what you knew, and so on and so forth. That is what gives me a problem. The obvious case of exculpatory evidence, the true Brady against Maryland situation, where the prosecutor had evidence that someone other than Brady who confessed to the crime. It was obviously outrageous that the prosecutor never disclosed that fact. And if the prosecutor didn't make such a disclosure there ought to be very severe sanctions.

But the question of something that may affect the credibility of a witness who the Government intends to use, is much more difficult. I would favor requiring the prosecutor to disclose evidence that he clearly knows to be exculpatory and still makes a deliberate decision not to disclose it. But once you get beyond that, I get a little edgy.

Mr. EILBERG. I understand that the southern district of New York has long provided for "target warnings." How did you determine when one was a "target?"

Mr. NAFTALIS. Obviously, from the evidence that you had I can only speak from my own practice as to when target warnings should be given.

I gave target warnings very freely. When in doubt, I gave someone a target warning because it seemed to me to be that people ought to know that there is a possibility that they may be accused of a crime as a result of the investigation. I think it is a question of your own judgment based on the evidence, and I think that if you act in good faith you know very well when someone is a target and when they are not.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Naftalis, you support our position providing that a witness who states he will invoke privilege against self-incrimination should not be called before a grand jury. Some prosecutors have stated that they cannot know for a fact, until a witness is in a grand jury room, that he will refuse to testify. To require them not to introduce such witnesses would, in their opinion, eliminate this valuable source of evidence. Would you comment?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I support H.R. 94's provision, which would excuse people from testifying who give sufficient notice in writing that they will claim their privilege under the fifth amendment. It seems to me what the critics are saying, whom you are quoting, is that even though a lawyer will tell his client, "It's against your interest to testify, you should claim your constitutional privilege," when the witness goes in along to the grand jury room he may, against his lawyer's advice, be afraid to claim the privilege and, therefore, testify.

It is not in the public interest that witnesses should be forced not to claim a privilege. I cannot see any legitimate purpose for that at all. If someone wants to claim the fifth amendment privilege they ought to be permitted to do it. There shouldn't be erected a Great Wall of China, and a witness should not be forced to leap over it before he can assert his constitutional rights.

Mr. EILBERG. In your book, you indicated that you believe the "tide" is moving toward disclosure of grand jury information to a grand jury witness and defendant. With specific reference to H.R. 94, do you believe our provisions are adequate?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I support your provisions, subject to empowering the courts to issue protective orders limiting the timing and extent of disclosure where showing actually can be made that a witness may be harmed, or someone will flee, or the like. There should be free disclosure of grand jury minutes in advance of trials, to a defendant so that he can adequately prepare. There should be disclosure to the witness himself so that he can be adequately informed of his testimony and be prepared if he's ever called again or see if he has to make corrections or the like.

I subscribe to the provisions of H.R. 94.

Mr. EILBERG. You propose all of the resolution I have introduced to eliminate the constitutional requirement of an indictment in every case involving an infamous crime. You seem to oppose them only because they would "change the Bill of Rights." Is this a sufficient reason to allow a very often abusive and costly rubberstamp process to continue—that of the indicting grand jury?

Mr. NAFTALIS. No; I don't oppose abolishing this grand jury, simply because it would involve an amendment to the Bill of Rights. This is not a sufficient reason not to have a constitutional amendment to do away with the grand jury if it were warranted.

Mr. EILBERG. You are just saying it would not be helpful to amend the Bill of Rights in any circumstances.

Mr. NAFTALIS. I think there are a couple of reasons which are more valid as to why the grand jury should not be abolished. With full respect to the chairman, I do not believe we should abolish investigating and indicting grand juries.

If you eliminate the grand jury, you're going to have to have some vehicle for investigation, even in small cases, for the prosecutor. He's going to have to have either subpena power or some other means of compelling or producing witnesses and evidence. I'm not entirely sure that if what we're all concerned about is abusive and intimidating treatment of witnesses, that this alternative would be an improvement over a vehicle whereby when you have 23 citizens who at least should and probably can act as a check on Government. I think it is also of some value in a democratic society, to have citizen participation in the law enforcement criminal justice machinery. When people participate in the grand jury system, they are performng a public service, and I think it is a valuable public service in a country as large and diverse as ours.

Mr. EILBERG. You have serious reservations about allowing challenges to grand jury venue in districts outside the grand jury area. Our investigation—this subcommittee's investigation—of the Fort Worth Five case—you're somewhat familiar with that——

Mr. NAFTALIS. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG [continuing]. Indicates that prosecutors can convene investigations often far away from the locus of evidence. Witnesses are then subpenaed and have to go long distances, often without their lawyers, and unable to see their families, and can see them only at great cost. What limitation do you see as being available other than providing for the right to challenge in the district where the witness resides?

Mr. NAFTALIS. In general I do not support changes of venue in grand jury proceedings. Granted—as your hearings demonstrated—the Fort Worth Five incident is not a proud chapter in this Nation's history. On the other hand, I think that the incidence of that kind of forum shopping is not large—or not so large—as to justify such strong medicine as venue change.

Mr. EILBERG. And yet this practice was somewhat widespread during the Nixon administration.

Mr. NAFTALIS. It probably was, and you had testimony this morning about one of the people who was involved in that practice. One suggestion that we made was that there ought to be some clear justification as to why witnesses are being forced to go long distances across the United States to testify, and why their testimony could not be procured in some other way, such as before a local grand jury and in an appropriate case, even by affidavit. I would put the burden on the Government to show why the personal appearance, or the physical appearance, of a witness who had to travel a long distance—and we suggested an arbitrary figure of 1,000 to 1,500 miles—was necessary.

I prefer that approach to one where you could change the focus of investigation simply because it may inconvenience a witness, which may cause greater inconvenience to the work of the Government, to grand jurors and other public interests. So, I propose that as an alternative suggestion for this committee to consider to deal with the kinds of problems that the Forth Worth Five case exemplifies.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose, in your book, a return to transactional immunity. We have been told of the following situation: the witness "X" is granted immunity to testify against "Y." "Y" is then granted immunity to testify against "X." Because both are only given use immunity, both are then indicted, based on the other's testimony. Do you believe that this is proper?

Mr. NAFTALIS. Well, as hypothetically put, I obviously don't like that kind of a situation.

My own judgment on use as opposed to transactional immunity situation is that I don't discern any difference in practice, whether you have use or whether you have transactional immunity. By that I mean the burden of proving the absence of taint, that is the absence of the use of the immunized testimony, or that clues and leads derived therefrom, is so great that there have been very few instances where immunized witnesses have been prosecuted for the transactions about which they have been given use immunity.

Now, if, in fact, the practice is very widespread, and there are lots and lots of cases of people who are given use immunity, testify and still get indicted, then I might rethink my position.

But I think, in fact, there are only a very small handful of such cases. And I think the issue that most people are concerned about in the immunity area is really whether or not people ought to be immunized and then compelled to testify, and then if they don't, get locked up in prison for contempt—and, perhaps, get locked up again, and again, and again. That your bill speaks to.

I'm not sure that in those cases whether it is "use" or "transactional" immunity if it would make any difference. I know the Department of Justice says, in fact, that use immunity is better for compelling people to testify truthfully; and I think the chairman believes that transactional immunity would compel people to testify in a more forthright manner. I don't know which one would or wouldn't.

If the issue is abuse of people through contempt proceedings and the like, I don't think it matters whether its use or transactional immunity. I think that if first amendment rights are being violated, the problem ought to be approached in first amendment terms, not in immunity terms. That is, if there are violations of people's rights of speech, association, and religion, and the like, they ought to be dealt with because they're violations of first amendment rights. They should not be dealt with by laying down broader notions of immunity which may be useful and helpful in areas involving political dissidents, but may not be as useful and helpful in areas involving organized crime, white-collar crime and the like.

So, absent a showing that use immunity is being improperly or unfairly used, and that people who are given use immunity still get prosecuted, and that the taint burden is not sufficient to protect people's rights, I would say that the change back to transactional immunity is not needed.

My own view, based on the little emperical data I've seen, is that whether it's use or transactional immunity it does not make a difference in dealing with grand jury problems.

Mr. EILBERG. In your book, you seem to suggest an exception to that provision prohibiting disclosures of grand jury information where "leaks are found to be justified in the interest of ferreting out corruption or other forms of official misconduct."

Mr. NAFTALIS. That's the problem with writing books.

Mr. EILBERG. By the way, I have written a book review of your book; you are aware of that?

Mr. NAFTALIS. I was aware it was going to be out soon, and your counsel, Mr. Belsky, thought it was going to be in the Federal Bar Association Journal.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Belsky has something to do with that.

Go ahead.

Mr. NAFTALIS. In our book, we subscribe to H.R. 94's view that leaks ought to be firmly dealt with from the criminal point of view; that is, leaking grand jury minutes should be made a specific crime. The contempt power has been woefully inadequate to deter reckless, indifferent, lawless people from leaking information.

At the same time, we went on to say that we even wanted an additional sanction which was the right to have damage suits brought by people who were the victims of leaks. We were willing even to go so far as to say that it wouldn't be necessary to show actual damages and, that the victims of a leak could get a statutory damage award even without proving actual monetary loss.

It was in that context that we said maybe that civil damage awards might be limited in areas where a leak had to do with ferreting out corruption or other forms of misconduct.

Mr. EILBERG. How would that—could you give me a hypothetical case?

Mr. NAFTALIS. Let's suppose you have a situation where there is some kind of corruption inside the grand jury room—the prosecutor is on the take, or the prosecutor is covering up for someone, not permitting the grand jury to go forward. If the grand jurors, or stenographer, or another member of the prosecution staff, leaked that information, I think it would be wrong—I think it would be lawless. On the other hand, in that kind of very rare case—and it is sort of a rare case, isn't it?—that somehow you'd like that information to get out somehow. I guess it's the exception that proves the rule and we were trying to put in some kind of saving clause when you're making a very general suggestion on damage awards, that there may be certain rare cases where we might not want to have a damage remedy for that kind of leak—I think it's a very exceptional case and it happens very seldom. If in fact, an important investigation involving high members of Government was being covered up by the Government lawyers, and if a grand juror leaked that information, I doubt we would want to throw the book at the leaker.

And I think the danger of leaking really isn't in that narrow situation; it's in a situation that you've spoken of, the situation where people are just smeared indiscriminantly as being publicly identified as being under investigation or a target of a grand jury probe, and nothing comes of it. We had very bad experiences with the State Special Prosecutor on Corruption in New York City, Mr. Nadjari, who, it was alleged, and a State Commission of Investigation found, that he had been very, very indifferent to people's rights through leaking. That was the conclusion of that Commission. And I think that kind of practice has to stop, and I think your bill goes a long way toward stopping it.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Naftalis, we thank you very much. We thank you for coming to Washington for this special purpose. And we think you're clear testimony has been valuable and you've been very helpful to us even though all members of the subcommittee are not here. It will be part of the record—part of a very important record—and our thanks to Mr. Frankel as well.

Mr. NAFTALIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to be of some help to the committee.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you so much. The subcommittee is adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 3:40 p.m., the hearing was adjourned.]

1ST SESSION

H. R. 94

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JANUARY 4, 1977

Mr. EILBERG introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order to better protect the rights and liberties of such witnesses, to require notice to a grand jury of its rights and duties, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977".

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

SEC. 2. (a) Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the attorney for the Government may apply to the court for an order directing the witness to show cause why the witness should not be held in contempt.

"(2) After submission of such application, and a hearing, at which the witness is entitled to be represented by counsel, the court may, upon a finding that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined.

"(3) No hearing under this subsection shall be held unless seventy-two hours' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order, except that a witness may be given a shorter notice if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) (1) Any confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, if one is located within fifty miles of the court ordering confinement, unless the witness waives this right. Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering confinement may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness, or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness.

"(2) Any confinement for refusal to comply with an order to testify or produce other information shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the life of the court proceeding, or the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(3) No person confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, may be again confined under this section, or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 27 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by him from the order of his confinement unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Any appeal from an order of confinement under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, including all necessary appeals, counsel shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person unable to obtain adequate representation.".

(b) Section 2515 of title 18, United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Any violation of this chapter shall be a defense in any action brought against a witness under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, or section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, if the interrogation or other request for information is based on or is directly or indirectly derived from such violation".

(c) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Grand jury proceedings

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.".

WITNESS IMMUNITY

SEC. 3. (a) Section 6002 and 6003, title 18, United States Code, are amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"(a) Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) a court or grand jury of the United States,

"(2) an agency of the United States, or

"(3) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or a subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; but the witness shall not be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled under the order to testify or produce evidence, except that he shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying, for giving a false statement, or for otherwise failing to comply with the order.

"(b) No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(c) Upon communication to the witness of any order under this part, the person presiding over the inquiry shall give the witness reasonable and adequate notice of the nature and scope of the immunity from criminal prosecution provided by this section, and of the right of the witness to be represented by counsel in any proceeding challenging such order or confinement or fines pursuant to such order, and that, if he is unable to obtain adequate representation, counsel will be furnished for him as provided in section 3006A, title 18, United States Code.

"§6003. Court and grand jury proceedings

"(a) In the case of any individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a court of the United States or a grand jury of the United States, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the proceeding is or may be held shall issue, in accordance with subsections (b) to (d) of this section, upon the request of the United States attorney for such district, an order requiring such individual to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, such order to become effective as provided in section 6002 of this part.

"(b) In any proceeding under this section, the court shall not order any person to testify or provide information, if it finds that an individual is in danger of prosecution, or may be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, by the government of any other country on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may be ordered to testify or provide other information pursuant to an order under this part, unless the court also finds that such individual has been provided adequate safeguards to minimize such danger.

"(c) A United States district court may, at the request of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, any designated Assistant Attorney General, or a special attorney appointed under section 3330, issue an order under subsection (a) of this section when it is established to the satisfaction of the court that—

"(1) in accordance with subsection (b) of this section, there is no danger of foreign prosecution or that adequate safeguards have been provided to minimize such danger;

"(2) the testimony or other information from such individual may be necessary to the public interest;

"(3) such individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide other information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and

"(4) with respect to an individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a grand jury—

"(A) the investigation being conducted by the grand jury is authorized by law and the application for the order is in accord with existing guidelines or other practice of the Department of Justice;

"(B) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto;

"(C) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order;

"(D) a grant of immunity under this part would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation; and

"(E) a summary of the evidence relating to the witness has been certified and submitted to the court.

"(d) Any individual required to give testimony or provide other information pursuant to an order issued under subsection (a) may not be indicted for any offense by the grand jury before which such individual testifies pursuant to such order.".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 6005 of such title is hereby repealed.

(c) No amendment or repeal of any provision of law made by this section shall affect any immunity, or the scope of any immunity, to which any individual is entitled under such provision by reason of any testimony or other information given before the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this Act.

SIZE OF GRAND JURIES

SEC. 4. Section 3321, title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3321. Number of grand jurors; summoning additional jurors; return of indictment

"(a) Every grand jury impaneled before any district court shall consist of not less than nine nor more than fifteen persons. If less than nine of the persons summoned attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury, and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately or for a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury. Whenever a challenge to a grand juror is allowed, and there are not in attendance other jurors sufficient to complete the grand jury, the court shall make a like order to the marshal to summon a sufficient number of persons for that purpose.

"(b) An indictment may be found only if at least nine jurors are present and two-thirds of those present concur."

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 5. Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both,

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court; or

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) Subsection (b) shall not apply to any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(f) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States attorney, and such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties.

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURORS; INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

SEC. 6. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for Government

"(a) Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a district court of the United States, the court shall give adequate and reasonable notice to the grand jury, and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330 of this title;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) the subject matter of the investigation;

"(6) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(7) the necessity of sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment;

"(8) the obligation of secrecy and that it is a criminal offense to disclose to any person any information concerning any grand jury proceeding; and

"(9) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable.

"(b) (1) Any person, including a witness who has previously testified or produced books, records, or documents, may make a written request to the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed pursuant to this title, and request to testify in an inquiry before a grand jury, or to produce books, records, or documents, or to appear before a grand jury and request that the grand jury proceed in accordance with its powers under section 3330 of this title.

"(2) The attorney for the Government, or the special attorney—

"(A) shall forward any request under this subsection to the grand jury and may make a recommendation as to such request;

"(B) shall take reasonable steps to notify any person of his intention to present evidence against the person and request a presentment or indictment and of the person's right to testify or present evidence under this subsection and such notice shall be given a reasonable time in advance of any request for such presentment or indictment unless the attorney for the Government or the special attorney can prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution;

"(C) shall establish a public record of all requests and the action taken on each such request.

"(3) The grand jury shall not be required to hear any witness, or consider any book, record, or document, but shall consider all requests forwarded to it by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney. Unless the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, refuses to hear the testimony, or consider the documents offered by, a person, under this subsection, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall subpena the evidence or witness offered. If the grand jury refuses to hear the testimony or consider the documents offered, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall notify the person making such request, in writing, of the refusal.

"(4) Upon appearing pursuant to a subpena, such person shall be permitted to testify, only upon submission of a waiver of immunity, as to relevant and competent matters under consideration by the jury and shall be subject to examination by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.

"(c) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant.

"(d) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of the witness' appearance that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, nor bring to the attention of the jurors, in any way, the invocation of the privilege by such witness, unless such witness has been given a grant of immunity.

"(e) The attorney for the Government or a special attorney shall not initiate, and a grand jury shall not conduct, an inquiry into a transaction or transactions, event or events, if another jury has failed to return an indictment based on the same transaction or transactions, event or events, unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered.

"§ 3330. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district. Such grand jury shall, except as provided in this section, request the attorney for the Government to assist such grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury, the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the grand jury shall continue until the entry upon such application by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months.

"(b) (1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist, or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of a majority of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney, in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The special attorney appointed under this section may, with the approval of the court, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointee shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist in the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government, and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(4) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, documents, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.".

(b) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(c) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329 of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation.".

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 7. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof, the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in the grand jury room.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(d) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.

"§ 3330B. Subpenas

"(a) In the case of any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, except where the court finds special need upon a showing by the attorney for the Government or a special attorney appointed under this title, or the consent of the witness, no subpena may require any witness to testify or produce other information at such proceeding at any time before the expiration of the one-week period beginning on the date of service of the subpena.

"(b) Upon the service of any subpena requiring any witness to testify or produce other information at any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, the witness shall be given adequate and reasonable notice of—

"(1) his right to counsel as provided in section 3330A of this title;

"(2) his privilege against self-incrimination;

"(3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation;

"(4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury;

"(5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of the subpena; and

"(6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

"(c) (1) The district court which issued a subpena, or the district court for the district in which the person resides or is served shall have concurrent jurisdiction to hear, and take appropriate action with respect to any motion relating to, including any motion to quash, such subpena.

"(2) A motion relating to a subpena may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before a grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled.

"(3) If a motion is made under this section before the day on which the person subpenaed has been ordered to appear or books, records, or documents have been ordered to be produced, the appearance of such person, or the production of such documents, shall, upon appropriate application, be stayed until the court has ruled on such motion.

"(d) (1) Upon proper motion, the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed under this title, shall make a showing that—

"(A) a primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is not or will not be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment;

"(B) the witness has been advised of his rights, as specified in subsection (b);

"(C) the evidence sought is relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction;

"(D) compliance with the subpena would not be unreasonable or oppressive, as such subpena would not require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would not lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would not be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances; and

"(E) such other information as the court deems advisable.

"(2) The court may impose appropriate sanctions, including the quashing of such subpena to secure compliance with this subsection.

"(e) Upon proper motion, the court shall quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(1) the witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, or section 401 of this title for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events;

"(2) the witness has given written notice that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, unless a grant of immunity has been obtained; or

"(3) the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction or transactions, event or events, that was under consideration by another grand jury which failed to return an indictment based on such transaction or event and there is no additional, newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(f) (1) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district, or districts, in which it is believed criminal conduct may have occurred which are elements of such offenses.

"(2) The district court may quash a subpena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened if the court finds that a witness' appearance would impose a substantial and unnecessary hardship on such witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding. In considering whether such hardship exists, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of any related investigations and court proceedings.".

(b) Section 3006A (a) of title 18, United States Code (relating to appointment of attorneys), is amended—

(1) by striking out "or," before "(4)" in the first sentence thereof; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof: ", or (5) who is a witness before a grand jury impaneled before the district court".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 8. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3333. Recording of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded.

Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500 (e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript.

"(c) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.

"(d) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the government, the court shall permit the government to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant."

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (c) (2) thereof;

(2) by deleting "; or" and inserting "." at the end of subsection (e) (2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e) (3) thereof.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

SEC. 9. Chapter 217 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3368. Preliminary examination

"(a) A defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination, unless waived, when charged with any offense, other than a petty offense, which is to be tried by a judge of the district court.

"(b) Such preliminary examination may be held prior to, or within a reasonable time following, the filing of an indictment or information in the district court.".

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 9. Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts

for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 11. (a) The enumeration in this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3771, no rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure shall apply to the extent that such rule is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

SUMMARY OF GRAND JURY BILLS, INTRODUCED BY THE HONORABLE JOSHUA EILBERG IN THE 95TH CONGRESS

A. CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

1. H. Res. 59.—would eliminate the constitutional requirement of an indictment, but specifically states that Congress has the authority to enact appropriate legislation to require an indictment for certain classes of offenses or to enact appropriate legislation to authorize the attorney for the government to seek indictments or use an information at his election; and that Congress would have the power to continue to authorize investigating grand juries.

2. H. Res. 60.—would simply eliminate the Constitutional requirement of an indictment in any case, and thereby allow Congress to enact appropriate legislation to require an indictment for certain types of offenses, or to allow a prosecutor to use the indictment in certain types of situations; or to authorize and provide procedures for investigative grand juries.

3. H. Res. 61.—would totally eliminate the indicting grand jury, but allows the continuation of the investigating grand jury. This is the exact same amendment as H.J. Res. 46, introduced in the 94th Congress. Procedures for the reform of the investigative grand jury, under this amendment, could be enacted by Congress.

4. H. Res. 62.—would eliminate the constitutional requirement of the grand jury but specifically allows the Congress to enact legislation to require an indictment in certain cases, and to authorize investigating grand juries.

B. PROPOSED GRAND JURY STATUTE—H.R. 94—REINTRODUCED AS H.R. 3150 WITH 11 COSPONSORS

Section 1. Title.—The Act is to be called the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.

Section 2. Recalcitrance.—provides for procedures for an individual held in contempt for refusal to answer questions before a grand jury. A witness would have at least 72 hours to prepare for a contempt hearing, unless the attorney for the Government can demonstrate a need to dispense with such a period.

Confinement for contempt would be for a period of the life of the grand jury, until the witness testified, or a maximum of six months. Confinement is to be at a suitable federal correctional institution, if located within 50 miles of the court. Upon a special showing of hardship, the court could allow imprisonment at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness or his family.

This section would specifically preclude reiterative contempt—that is, holding someone in contempt for refusal to answer; imprisoning that person; and then subpoenaing the person again and holding him in contempt again. It would preclude such repeated contempt and imprisonment whether the first or the second proceeding was for civil or criminal contempt.

Bail emphasis is changed so as to provide that bail is to be allowed unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay; and that the appellate courts have to act within 30 days.

This section also specifically allows for counsel to be appointed, if necessary, to represent the witness at a contempt hearing. Illegal wiretap useage is made a defense to contempt.

Section 3. Immunity.—makes changes in the witness immunity law. Section 3 mandates a return to transactional immunity, and discontinues the use of "use immunity."

A witness is to receive at least one week's notice of the intent to grant him immunity, unless the court, upon a showing of special needs, reduces the period of time.

The witness is to be specifically given reasonable and adequate notice of the nature and scope of the immunity; and his right to be represented by counsel at a hearing on the immunity.

The attorney for the government is to request immunity and the court can grant immunity, in its discretion, only when the court finds that the information is necessary to the public interest and the individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify. Thus, unlike the present situation, where immunity is solely a prosecutor's decision, the court is to weigh benefits to law enforcement against the dangers to a witness, in determining whether the public interest is served by a grant of immunity.

The court is also to make certain findings in regards to a request of immunity, before the request can be granted. These findings include: that the grand jury investigation is authorized by law and that the application is in accordance with Justice Department procedures; that the testimony and information sought is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant; and that a summary of the evidence relating to the witness, and relating the need for immunity has been submitted to the court.

The court can consider as a possible defense to an immunity request, or a prosecution for contempt, a real threat of foreign prosecution if the witness testified. If the U.S. Attorney or the attorney for the government can demonstrate that adequate safeguards are made to minimize danger of foreign prosecution, immunity can nevertheless be ordered.

In order to protect the witness, and insure transactional immunity, the grand jury which considers the immunized witness' testimony cannot indict him under any circumstances.

This section also eliminates the 20-day waiting period for Congressional immunity and provides for an effective date of 60 days after enactment of the act.

Section 4. Size of Grand Juries.—This section changes requirements as to the size of the grand juries, as requested by the Judicial Conference of the United States. A grand jury, under this section, can be constituted by membership of between nine and fifteen persons and only nine persons are necessary to conduct business. Six of the nine are necessary for an indictment.

Section 5. Secrecy.—This section deals with unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Violations of grand jury secrecy are made an offense, divided in two parts. First, for knowing disclosure of evidence or a statement made, there is a fine of $500 or six months in jail. The crime is not applicable to a disclosure by the attorney for the Government in performance of his duties; disclosure directed and permitted by the court, disclosure by a witness or his counsel, or disclosure by a third party, not present at the grand jury proceeding.

Knowing disclosure of grand jury activities, in order to obtain money, to effect the actions or decisions of the jury, or to effect further legal proceedings is made a more serious offense punishable by a fine of $20,000 or imprisonment up to five years. This section does not apply to disclosures by the attorney for the Government in performance of his duties; disclosure directed and permitted by the court; or disclosure by a witness or his counsel. However, because this is the more serious offense, where it is demonstrated that there was a direct effect on the legal machiery, this provision does apply to third parties. The section makes it specific, however, that this more serious felony of obtaining or granting grand jury information for payment of compensation does not apply to a newspaper or television representative, acting in his professional capacity.

Section 6. Independent Grand Jury.—details the rights and duties of grand jurors and allows an independent inquiry.

(a) Rights and Duties.—Grand jurors are to be given adequate and reasonable notice of their various duties to inquire into the criminal law, to call and interrogate witnesses, to request a production of documents and are to be told of the subject matter of the investigation, criminal satutes known, the necessity of sufficient evidence to form an indictment, the obligation of secrecy, and other rights and duties as the court suggests.

An individual is given the right to make a written request to the attorney for the Government to appear before the grand jury and request to testify or present documents. The grand jury does not have to hear a witness, but the attorney of the Government is to forward the request, with a possible recommendation, to the jury, and the jury itself votes on whether or not to allow the person to testify. The attorney for the Government is to notify, unless special circumstances are shown, a potential defendant of the likelihood of indictment and tell him of his right to make a request to the jury to testify. Any person testifying would have to waive immunity and testify only as to relevant and competent matters, and would be subject to cross-examination by the attorney for the Government.

The attorney for the Government is required to advise the grand jury of the existence of exculpatory evidence against any potential defendant. The attorney for the Government is not permitted to bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of his intention to invoke the Fifth Amendment if he is called to testify, unless that person has been granted immunity.

(b). Independent Inquiry.—The grand jury is given the power to conduct an independent inquiry into violations of the criminal law. The grand jury is to generally utilize the attorney for the government in such an investigation; but when it finds a conflict of interest, or dilatory or improper activities, by the attorney for the Government, it can request the court to appoint a special attorney. Requests for a special inquiry, for a special attorney, and for the payment and compensation of special attorney and his staff, require the approval of the court. The grand jury can appeal to the circuit court of the district court disapproves any of their requests. The special attorney for the grand jury is given all the authority of a prosecutor.

Section 7. Rights of Witnesses.—This section deals the rights of grand jury witnesses.

(a) Counsel.—The witnesses are specifically granted the right to have counsel with them in the grand jury room; free if necessary. The role of counsel is only to advise and he is not permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part. The court is given the power to remove an attorney for improprieties and to appoint a new attorney.

(b) Subpoenas.—Specific procedures are provided for subpoenas. Generally, unless a special showing is made, a witness is to have seven days' notice, through subpoena, of his requirement to testify or produce evidence. The subpoena is to include information advising a witness of his rights, including counsel, his privilege against self-incrimination; the subject matter of the investigation; whether he is a potential defendant; the substance of criminal statute or statutes; and other rights or privileges.

Challenges to a subpoena can be held either in the district which issues the subpoena, or in the district in which the person resides or is served, at any time up until the day of the appearance. A motion relating to a subpoena on the day of appearance can only be made in the district which issued the subpoena. The court is given the power to stay an appearance, if a motion is made prior to the day of appearance, until it has ruled on any motion to quash.

Upon proper motion, the attorney for the Government has to make a showing that the subpoena is not to obtain evidence for a case already scheduled for trial; that the witness has been told of his rights; that the evidence sought is relevant to the grand jury investigation and is properly within the grand jury's jurisdiction; that compliance with the subpoena would not be unreasonable or oppressive. The court can change the venue of the proceeding, quash the subpoena, or take other appropriate action.

The court is to quash a subpoena if it finds that this is an attempt at reiterative contempt, despite the preclusion; that the witness has indicated in writing that he is going to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination and no immunity order has been obtained; or the grand jury is inquiring into a similar transaction as it earlier inquired into, and there is no additional newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

This section also provides that grand jury venue is limited to where there is substantial conduct in a district and the district court is given the power to quash a subpoena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into another district where the grand jury's appearance in a particular district would cause unnecessary hardship. Standards are elaborated as to what might constitute hardship.

Section 8. Recording and Disclosure.—This section details procedures for recording of grand jury proceedings and for the availability of grand jury transcripts.

(a) Transcribing.—All grand jury proceedings, except for secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and counsels, are required to be transcribed, either stenographically or electronically.

(b) Disclosure/Discovery.—Any person summoned to testify or provide information is to receive a copy of any prior statement in the possession of the government which he has made, before he is required to testify.

In addition, a witness is ordinarily entitled to a copy of his own testimony, after he testifies.

The court would have the power, under appropriate circumstances, to limit or condition such release.

This section also makes appropriate changes in the Jencks Act, and adds a new provision, providing that within a reasonable time prior to trial and after the return of the indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant should be entitled to get the grand jury testimony of all witnesses that are going to testify against him; all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government relating to the defendant's case, any other grand jury evidence relating to the defendant's case; and all other material which the court finds material to the defense. The court is given the power, upon a showing of good cause, to limit such disclosure, and the government's showing of good cause can be made, if necessary, in camera.

Section 9. Requirement of Preliminary Hearing.—Appropriate amendments require a preliminary examination, or a preliminary hearing, for every case whether or not there is an indictment. The attorney for the Government has the option to provide the preliminary examination before or after an indictment. Thus, the defendant would not be able to challenge evidence in front of the grand jury; cross-examine witnesses in front of the grand jury; nor interfere with the deliberative function of the grand jury. However, he would have the opportunity, as in most states, to determine the nature of the evidence against him, whether it involves hearsay, whether it involves constitutional problems, and its strength, through a preliminary examination prior to his trial.

Section 10. Reports.—Would provide for periodic grand jury reports to be made to Congress as to the number of grand jury investigations; the number of immunity requests, the number of imprisonments for contempt; the number of no-bills; description of data banks and other information as necessary.

Section 11. Savings Clause.—Provides that enumeration of any rights or guarantees in this act should not take away rights or privileges guaranteed by other laws. Moreover, as changes are made, for example, in the number of grand jurors, the right to counsel and the requirement of a preliminary examination, this statute would overrule contrary provisions in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 406

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JANUARY 4, 1977

Ms. HOLTZMAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To amend titles 18 and 28 of the United States Code to provide that an individual appearing before certain grand juries can be imprisoned for contempt for no more than 6 months, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Civil Contempt Reform Act of 1977".

SEC. 2. Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the court, upon such refusal and after a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be imprisoned.

"(2) Any imprisonment for refusal to give testimony or provide information pursuant to this subsection shall be at a Federal correctional institution unless the witness agrees to confinement at a non-Federal institution designated by the Attorney General.

"(3) Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering such imprisonment may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness.

"(4) Any imprisonment for refusal to give testimony or provide information pursuant to this subsection shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information except that no period of such imprisonment shall exceed the lesser of—

"(A) (i) in the case of a court proceeding, the life of the court proceeding before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, or

"(ii) in the case of a grand jury, the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred; or

"(B) six months.

"(5) No hearing shall be held under this subsection unless ten days' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order under this subsection, except that a witness subpenaed for a trial may be given a shorter notice of not less than five days if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) No person imprisoned under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events may be again imprisoned under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by such person from the order of imprisonment, unless the appeal is patently frivolous. If the person has not been released on bail or otherwise released, any appeal from an order of imprisonment under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal. If the appellate court shall fail to dispose of the appeal of a person who remains confined within thirty days, the person shall automatically be released on his or her personal recognizance pending disposition of the appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed in the same manner as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

"(e) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a grand jury of the United States shall not be punishable under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, if the question asked or the request for other information is based in whole or in part upon evidence obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.".

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding.".

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 1830

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JANUARY 13, 1977

MS. JORDAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To authorize in certain cases the appointment of a special judicial prosecutor and investigators to assist grand juries in the exercise of their powers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the table of the sections of chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately after the item relating to section 3328, the following new item:

"3329. Powers of grand jury; special judicial prosecutor and investigators.".

SEC. 2. Title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately following section 3328 a new section as follows:

"§ 3329. Powers of grand jury; special judicial prosecutor and investigators

"(a) Any grand jury impaneled before a United States district court may give notice to the court that it wishes to be assisted by a special judicial prosecutor in an inquiry into any activities of an officer in the executive branch. Any such notice shall be given in writing signed by twelve or more members of the grand jury. Such grand jury shall not be discharged by the court prior to the receipt by the court of written notice from the grand jury that such inquiry has been completed.

"(b) Upon receipt of notice pursuant to subsection (a), the United States district court shall appoint a special judicial prosecutor for the purposes and with the powers set forth in this section, and shall not remove or replace said officer except for extraordinary improprieties as an officer of the court.

"(c) Any judge of the United States district court, after making an appointment or reappointment pursuant to subsection (b) shall excuse himself from presiding over or otherwise participating in any prosecution or other judicial proceeding arising out of the exercise of responsibilities by a special judicial prosecutor appointed by him.

"(d) The United States district court having jurisdiction over any inquiry into the activities of an officer in the executive branch is vested with supervisory jurisdiction to issue and enforce all orders necessary and appropriate to insure the integrity and inviolability of all files, notes, correspondence, memorandums, documents, physical evidence, and other records and work product compiled, obtained, or otherwise produced and maintained by the United States district attorney or any other officer of the Justice Department from the date of impanelment of the grand jury until the appointment of a special judicial prosecutor pursuant to subsection (b).

"(e) The special judicial prosecutor appointed pursuant to this section may without regard to the laws relating to the competitive service, appoint or reappoint such permanent or temporary staff at such salaries (not to exceed the rate of $36,000 per annum) as may be necessary to assist in the exercise of his responsibilities, and may for that same purpose make use of necessary support services and facilities at Government expense. The United States Department of Justice is authorized and directed to pay the salaries and expenses of the office of special judicial prosecutor hereunder, all from its general funds including contingency funds. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any impounding or withholding or other impediment to the provision of such funds shall be unlawful.

"(f) Anything in the laws of the United States regarding the authority and responsibilities of the Attorney General or of the several United States attorneys to the contrary notwithstanding, the special judicial prosecutor shall have exclusive authority and responsibility on behalf of the United States of America to conduct all grand jury presentments and all other criminal proceedings, including without limitation the initiation and conduct of prosecutions, the framing and signing of indictments, and the filing of informations, and all pretrial and posttrial motions, orders, trials, appeals, petitions, and other processes (whether initiated before or after his assumption of duties) in all Federal courts including the Supreme Court of the United States, arising out of the grand jury's inquiry into the activities of any officer in the executive branch.

"(g) The special judicial prosecutor shall have full access to and use of the material described in subsection (d) and shall have power throughout the territory of the United States to compel the production of testimonial and documentary or physical evidence relating to any or all of the subject matter described in subsection (f) of this section. In particular, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the special judicial prosecutor shall have full power to—"(1) determine whether and how far to contest the assertion of Executive Privilege or any other testimonial or evidentiary privilege;

"(2) determine whether or not application should be made to any Federal court for a grant of total or partial immunity to any witness, consistently with applicable statutory standards, or for other warrants, subpenas, or other court orders including an order of contempt of court;

"(3) issue instructions to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other domestic investigative agencies for the collection and delivery solely to the special judicial prosecutor of information and evidence bearing on matters within the jursidiction of the special judicial prosecutor, and for safeguarding the integrity and inviolability of all files, notes, correspondence, memorandums, documents, physical evidence, and other records and work product compiled, obtained, or otherwise produced and maintained by the Office of Special Judicial Prosecutor; and

"(4) decide whether or not to prosecute any person and how to conduct and argue any appeals or petitions arising out of his prosecutorial activities.

"(h) All offices, departments, and agencies of the Federal Government shall cooperate fully with requests by the special judicial prosecutor for information and assistance.

In particular, the Department of Justice shall assign to the temporary supervision and control of the special judicial prosecutor such personnel as he may reasonably require.

"(i) The special judicial prosecutor shall have the authority and responsibility to deal with and appear before congressional committees having jurisdiction over any aspect of the matters covered by this Act, and to provide such information, documents, and other evidence as may be necessary and appropriate to enable any such committee to exercise its authorized responsibilities.

"(j) The special judicial prosecutor may from time to time make public such statements or reports, not inconsistent with the rights of any accused or convicted persons, as he deems appropriate; and he shall upon completion of his assignment submit a final report to the United States district court which empanelled the grand jury in connection with which the special judicial prosecutor was appointed.

"(k) The special judicial prosecutor shall carry out his responsibilities under this section until such time as, in his judgment, he has completed them or until a date mutually agreed upon between the United States district court judge who appointed the special judicial prosecutor pursuant to subsection (b) and himself.

"(l) Any judge of the United States district court, on empanelment of a grand jury, shall charge and inform the grand jury of its rights and duties under this section.".

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 2620

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

JANUARY 27, 1977

Mr. PATTERSON of California introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order better to protect the constitutional rights and liberties of such witnesses under the fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments to the Constitution; to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1975."

SEC. 2. Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any Federal grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the grand jury, upon affirmative vote of twelve or more members, may apply to the court for an order directing the witness to show why he should not be held in contempt. When such application is brought to its attention, the court may, after a hearing at which such witness may be represented by counsel, find such witness in criminal contempt and order such witness to be confined, if the court finds that the refusal was without just cause. Any such confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, unless the witness waives this right. Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, but in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(2) Whenever a witness in any criminal proceeding before or ancillary to any Federal court of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, the court, upon such refusail, may, after a hearing at which such witness may be represented by counsel, find such witness in criminal contempt and order such witness to be confined, if the court finds that the refusal was without just cause. Any such confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, unless the witness waives this right. Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the life of the court proceeding before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, but in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(3) No hearing shall be held under this subsection except upon ten days notice to the witness, except that in the case of a witness subpenaed for a trial, a shorter notice, but not less than five days may be ordered by the court upon a showing of special need.

"(b) No person who has been confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event or events may be again confined under this section for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accord with the provisions of chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by him from the order of his confinement, unless the appeal is patently frivolous and taken for purposes of delay. Any appeal from an order of confinement under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule ordered by the appelate court upon application by a party.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel shall be furnished as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate representation.

"(e) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a Federal court or grand jury shall not be punishable under this section if the question asked or the request for other information is based on any violation of the witness' constitutional rights, or of rights protected by any statute of the United States."

SEC. 3. Section 2514 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2514. Immunity of witnesses

"(a) Upon an affirmative finding by twelve or more members of a grand jury impaneled before a United States district court that the testimony of any witness, or the production of books, papers, or other evidence by any witness, in the case or proceeding before such grand jury, is necessary to the public interest, with the written consent of the witness, and upon the approval of the Attorney General, the grand jury shall make application to the court for an order that the witness shall testify or produce evidence subject to the provisions of this section.

"(b) Whenever in the judgment of a United States attorney, the testimony of any witness, or the production of books, papers, or other evidence by any witness, in any case or proceeding before any court of the United States, is necessary to the public interest, such United States attorney, with the written consent of the witness, and upon the approval of the Attorney General, shall make application to the court for an order that the witness shall testify or produce evidence subject to the provisions of this section.

"(c) Pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of this section, upon order of the court such witness shall not be excused from testifying or from producing books, papers, or other evidence on the ground that the testimony or evidence required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, and upon further order of the court, such witness shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence; nor shall testimony so compelled be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding (except in a proceeding described in the next sentence) against him in any court. No witness shall be exempt under this section from prosecution for perjury or contempt committed while giving testimony or producing evidence under compulsion as provided in this section."

SEC. 4. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties

"Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a United States district court, the court shall give adequate and reasonable notice to the grand jury of—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) (A) the subject matter of the investigation, and

CONTINUED

11 OF 17

"(B) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(6) the requirement that a subpena summoning a witness to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents or other objects before the grand jury may be issued only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury to which the subpena is returnable;

"(7) the authority of the grand jury to ask the court to grant immunity to a witness only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury;

"(8) the authority of the grand jury to apply to the court for an order directing a witness to show cause why he should not be held in contempt, under title 28, section 1826, only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury;

"(9) the necessity of legally sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment as provided under section 3330A (1) of this title;

"(10) the duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury, to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there are sufficient grounds for issuing indictments and shall determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

"(11) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable.

"The court's failure to instruct the grand jury as directed in this section shall be just cause for a witness's refusal to testify or provide other information before such grand jury. Any person indicted by a grand jury that has not been instructed in accordance with these provisions shall be entitled to a dismissal of any indictment by such grand jury and of any indictment issued by any other grand jury, if such other indictment is based on the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under sections 3331 and 3333) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district by any officer or agent of the United States or any State or municipal government; or by any person who, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, was an officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of twelve months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court upon a determination of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members that its business has been completed. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury before such grand jury determines that it has completed its business, the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the term of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the term thereof shall continue until the entry by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order upon such application. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months.

"(b) (1) Upon the request of any grand jury impaneled before any district court, pursuant to the affirmative vote of twelve or more members, the court shall appoint a special attorney to assist the jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a). Such special attorney shall serve in lieu of any attorney for the Government and shall be paid at the rate of $100 per day. Such special attorney, with the approval of the court, may appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. Any appointee under this subsection shall receive pay at a rate not to exceed $100 per day for each day during which he is engaged in the performance of his duties under this section. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

(2) Notwithstanding sections 516 and 519 of title 28 of the United States Code or any other provisions of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall have the exclusive authority to assist in the conduct of an independent grand jury investigation under this section, and any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry shall be signed by the special attorney in lieu of any attorney for the Government.

"§ 3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses

"(a) A subpena summoning a witness to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be issued only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury, and such subpena may not be returnable on less than seven days' notice, except with the consent of the witness.

"(b) Any subpena summoning a witness to appear before a grand jury shall advise the witness of (1) his right to counsel as provided in subsection (c) of this section; (2) his right against self-incrimination; (3) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury; (4) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation; (5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury; and (6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary and appropriate.

"(c) Any witness who is not advised of his rights pursuant to subsection (b) hereof shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testifies or any evidence he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court.

"(d) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to representation by counsel in the grand jury room, during such time as the witness is questioned in the grand jury room; such counsel may be retained by the witness or appointed pursuant to section 3006A of this title. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(e) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district in which it is believed substantive criminal conduct may have occurred as elements of such offenses; except that when a grand jury is to be convened to conduct an inquiry into both violations of substantive criminal statutes and violations of statutes forbidding conspiracy to violate substantive criminal statutes, the grand jury may not be convened before a district court in a district in which the only criminal conduct alleged to have occurred is conspiracy to commit the substantive criminal act.

"(f) (1) For the convenience of witnesses and where the interests of justice so require, a district court shall, on motion of a witness, transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened under subsection (e). In considering an application for such transfer, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed to testify before the grand jury, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of related investigations and court proceedings, if any.

"(2) Once a grand jury has failed to return an indictment based on a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into the same transactions or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the attorney for the Government, that the Government has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(g) (1) A complete and accurate stenographic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties including but not limited to those set forth in section 3329 of this title; all introductory comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the Government to the grand jury, witnesses, and counsel for witnesses; all testimony; and all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys and those between attorneys for the Government and counsel for witnesses. Consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded.

"(2) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript. Such transcript of such proceedings shall be available for inspection and copying not later than forty-eight hours following conclusion of such testimony.

"(h) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury, or the attorney for such witness with the witness' written approval, shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which such said witness had made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. The term 'statement' as used in this subsection shall be defined as in section 3500(e) of this title.

"(i) No person subpenaed to testify or to produce books papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury of the United States shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined pursuant to section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if, upon an evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpena or a court having jurisdiction under subsection (k) of this section, the court finds that—

"(1) a primary purpose or effect in requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is or will be to secure for trial testimony or other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment. When a witness refuses to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury on the ground that the purpose of requiring his testimony or the production of papers, documents, or other objects or questions put to him is in violation of this subsection, the Government must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that its inquiry is independent of such pre-existing indictment or accusation,

"(2) compliance with the subpena would be unreasonable or oppressive because (i) such compliance would involve unnecessary appearances by the witness; (ii) the only testimony that can reasonably be expected from the witness is cumulative, unnecessary, or privileged; (iii) other like circumstances,

"(3) a primary purpose of the issuance of the subpena is punitive,

"(4) the witness has already been confined pursuant to section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, or

"(5) the witness has not been advised of his rights as specified in subsection (b).

"(j) The district court out of which a subpena to appear before a grand jury has been issued, the court in which the subpena was served, and the district court in the district in which a witness resides shall have concurrent jurisdiction over any motion made by a witness to quash a subpena or for other relief under provisions of this section.

A motion under this section may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before the grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled. If the motion is made before or during the appearance of the moving party before a grand jury, the appearance before the grand jury shall be stayed by the making of the motion until the court before which the motion is pending rules on the motion.

"(k) A grand jury may indict a person for an offense when (1) the evidence before it is legally sufficient to establish that such offense was committed, and (2) competent and admissible evidence before it provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

"(l) Any person may approach the court and request permission to testify in an inquiry before a grand jury, or to appear before a grand jury and request that it proceed in accordance with its powers under section 3330 of this chapter. Such person shall be permitted to testify in such inquiry being conducted by, or appear before, a grand jury, unless the court finds that such testimony or appearance would serve no relevant purpose."

(b) The table of sections for chapter 215 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"3329. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties.
"3330. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses.".

SEC. 5. (a) Section 3361 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3361. Requirements for indictment

"The district court before which a grand jury is impaneled shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if it finds that—

"(1) the evidence before the grand jury was insufficient to establish that such offense was committed;

"(2) there was not competent and admissible evidence introduced before the grand jury such as provides reasonable cause to believe that the person indicted committed such offense; or

"(3) the attorney for the Government has not presented to the grand jury all exculpatory evidence in his possession with respect to the person indicted."

(b) The item relating to section 3361 in the table of sections for chapter 217 of title 18 is amended to read as follows:

"3361. Requirements for indictment.".

SEC. 6. Section 6001 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out paragraph (4), and by striking out "; and" at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

SEC. 7. Section 6002 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) an agency of the United States, or

"(2) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and such witness shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, nor shall testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information) be used against the witness in any criminal case, except a prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order."

SEC. 8. Section 6003 of title 18, United States Code, is repealed.

SEC. 9. (a) Part V of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end of such part the following new section:

"§ 6006. Reports concerning grand jury investigations

"In January of each year, the Attorney General or an Assistant Attorney General specially designated by the Attorney General shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken during the preceding year in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Department of Justice and witnesses for approval to make application to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2514 of this title, and the number of such requests approved by the Department of Justice;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under this title;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under this title that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in such investigations were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity; the offenses for which the convictions were obtained; and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate indicia and information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matter contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

(b) The table of sections for part V of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"6006. Reports concerning grand jury investigations.".

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 3150

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FEBRUARY 7, 1977

Mr. EILBERG (for himself, Mr. BURKE of Florida, Mr. CLAY, Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. BADILLO, Mr. MICHAEL O. MYERS, Mr. ROSENTHAL, Mr. WEISS, Mr. CONTE, Mr. RYAN, Mr. LEDERER, and Mr. FISH) introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order to better protect the rights and liberties of such witnesses, to require notice to a grand jury of its rights and duties, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977".

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

SEC. 2. (a) Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the attorney for the Government may apply to the court for an order directing the witness to show cause why the witness should not be held in contempt.

"(2) After submission of such application, and a hearing, at which the witness is entitled to be represented by counsel, the court may, upon a finding that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined.

"(3) No hearing under this subsection shall be held unless seventy-two hours' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order, except that a witness may be given a shorter notice if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) (1) Any confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, if one is located within fifty miles of the court ordering confinement, unless the witness waives this right. Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering confinement may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness, or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness.

"(2) Any confinement for refusal to comply with an order to testify or produce other information shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the life of the court proceeding, or the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(3) No person confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, may be again confined under this section, or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 27 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by him from the order of his confinement unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Any appeal from an order of confinement under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, including all necessary appeals, counsel shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person unable to obtain adequate representation.".

(b) Section 2515 of title 18, United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Any violation of this chapter shall be a defense in any action brought against a witness under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, or section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, if the interrogation or other request for information is based on or is directly or indirectly derived from such violation".

(c) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Grand jury proceedings

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events."

WITNESS IMMUNITY

SEC. 3. (a) Section 6002 and 6003, title 18, United States Code, are amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"(a) Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) a court or grand jury of the United States,

"(2) an agency of the United States, or

"(3) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or a subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; but the witness shall not be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled under the order to testify or produce evidence, except that he shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying, for giving a false statement, or for otherwise failing to comply with the order.

"(b) No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(c) Upon communication to the witness of any order under this part, the person presiding over the inquiry shall give the witness reasonable and adequate notice of the nature and scope of the immunity from criminal prosecution provided by this section, and of the right of the witness to be represented by counsel in any proceeding challenging such order or confinement or fines pursuant to such order, and that, if he is unable to obtain adequate representation, counsel will be furnished for him as provided in section 3006A, title 18, United States Code.

"§6003. Court and grand jury proceedings

"(a) In the case of any individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a court of the United States or a grand jury of the United States, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the proceeding is or may be held shall issue, in accordance with subsections (b) to (d) of this section, upon the request of the United States attorney for such district, an order requiring such individual to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, such order to become effective as provided in section 6002 of this part.

"(b) In any proceeding under this section, the court shall not order any person to testify or provide information, if it finds that an individual is in danger of prosecution, or may be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, by the government of any other country on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may be ordered to testify or provide other information pursuant to an order under this part, unless the court also finds that such individual has been provided adequate safeguards to minimize such danger.

"(c) A United States district court may, at the request of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, any designated Assistant Attorney General, or a special attorney appointed under section 3330, issue an order under subsection (a) of this section when it is established to the satisfaction of the court that—

"(1) in accordance with subsection (b) of this section, there is no danger of foreign prosecution or that adequate safeguards have been provided to minimize such danger;

"(2) the testimony or other information from such individual may be necessary to the public interest;

"(3) such individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide other information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and

"(4) with respect to an individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a grand jury—

"(A) the investigation being conducted by the grand jury is authorized by law and the application for the order is in accord with existing guidelines or other practice of the Department of Justice;

"(B) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto;

"(C) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order;

"(D) a grant of immunity under this part would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation; and

"(E) a summary of the evidence relating to the witness has been certified and submitted to the court.

"(d) Any individual required to give testimony or provide other information pursuant to an order issued under subsection (a) may not be indicted for any offense by the grand jury before which such individual testifies pursuant to such order.".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 6005 of such title is hereby repealed.

(c) No amendment or repeal of any provision of law made by this section shall affect any immunity, or the scope of any immunity, to which any individual is entitled under such provision by reason of any testimony or other information given before the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this Act.

SIZE OF GRAND JURIES

SEC. 4. Section 3321, title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3321. Number of grand jurors; summoning additional jurors; return of indictment

"(a) Every grand jury impaneled before any district court shall consist of not less than nine nor more than fifteen persons. If less than nine of the persons summoned attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury, and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately or for a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury. Whenever a challenge to a grand juror is allowed, and there are not in attendance other jurors sufficient to complete the grand jury, the court shall make a like order to the marshal to summon a sufficient number of persons for that purpose.

"(b) An indictment may be found only if at least nine jurors are present and two-thirds of those present concur."

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 5. Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both,

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court; or

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) Subsection (b) shall not apply to any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(f) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States attorney, and such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties.

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURORS; INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

SEC. 6. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for Government

"(a) Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a district court of the United States, the court shall give adequate and reasonable notice to the grand jury, and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330 of this title;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) the subject matter of the investigation;

"(6) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(7) the necessity of sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment;

"(8) the obligation of secrecy and that it is a criminal offense to disclose to any person any information concerning any grand jury proceeding; and

"(9) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable.

"(b) (1) Any person, including a witness who has previously testified or produced books, records, or documents, may make a written request to the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed pursuant to this title, and request to testify in an inquiry before a grand jury, or to produce books, records, or documents, or to appear before a grand jury and request that the grand jury proceed in accordance with its powers under section 3330 of this title.

"(2) The attorney for the Government, or the special attorney—

"(A) shall forward any request under this subsection to the grand jury and may make a recommendation as to such request;

"(B) shall take reasonable steps to notify any person of his intention to present evidence against the person and request a presentment or indictment and of the person's right to testify or present evidence under this subsection and such notice shall be given a reasonable time in advance of any request for such presentment or indictment unless the attorney for the Government or the special attorney can prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution;

"(C) shall establish a public record of all requests and the action taken on each such request.

"(3) The grand jury shall not be required to hear any witness, or consider any book, record, or document, but shall consider all requests forwarded to it by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney. Unless the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, refuses to hear the testimony, or consider the documents offered by, a person, under this subsection, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall subpena the evidence or witness offered. If the grand jury refuses to hear the testimony or consider the documents offered, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall notify the person making such request, in writing, of the refusal.

"(4) Upon appearing pursuant to a subpena, such person shall be permitted to testify, only upon submission of a waiver of immunity, as to relevant and competent matters under consideration by the jury and shall be subject to examination by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.

"(c) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant.

"(d) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of the witness' appearance that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, nor bring to the attention of the jurors, in any way, the invocation of the privilege by such witness, unless such witness has been given a grant of immunity.

"(e) The attorney for the Government or a special attorney shall not initiate, and a grand jury shall not conduct, an inquiry into a transaction or transactions, event or events, if another jury has failed to return an indictment based on the same transaction or transactions, event or events, unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered.

"§ 3330. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district. Such grand jury shall, except as provided in this section, request the attorney for the Government to assist such grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury, the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the grand jury shall continue until the entry upon such application by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months.

"(b) (1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist, or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of a majority of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney, in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The special attorney appointed under this section may, with the approval of the court, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointee shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist in the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government, and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(4) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, documents, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.".

(b) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(c) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329 of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation.".

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 7. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof, the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in the grand jury room.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(d) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.

"§ 3330B. Subpenas

"(a) In the case of any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, except where the court finds special need upon a showing by the attorney for the Government or a special attorney appointed under this title, or the consent of the witness, no subpena may require any witness to testify or produce other information at such proceeding at any time before the expiration of the one-week period beginning on the date of service of the subpena.

"(b) Upon the service of any subpena requiring any witness to testify or produce other information at any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, the witness shall be given adequate and reasonable notice of—

"(1) his right to counsel as provided in section 3330A of this title;

"(2) his privilege against self-incrimination;

"(3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation;

"(4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury;

"(5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of the subpena; and

"(6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

"(c) (1) The district court which issued a subpena, or the district court for the district in which the person resides or is served shall have concurrent jurisdiction to hear, and take appropriate action with respect to any motion relating to, including any motion to quash, such subpena.

"(2) A motion relating to a subpena may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before a grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled.

"(3) If a motion is made under this section before the day on which the person subpenaed has been ordered to appear or books, records, or documents have been ordered to be produced, the appearance of such person, or the production of such documents, shall, upon appropriate application, be stayed until the court has ruled on such motion.

"(d) (1) Upon proper motion, the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed under this title, shall make a showing that—

"(A) a primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is not or will not be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment;

"(B) the witness has been advised of his rights, as specified in subsection (b);

"(C) the evidence sought is relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction;

"(D) compliance with the subpena would not be unreasonable or oppressive, as such subpena would not require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would not lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would not be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances; and

"(E) such other information as the court deems advisable.

"(2) The court may impose appropriate sanctions, including the quashing of such subpena to secure compliance with this subsection.

"(e) Upon proper motion, the court shall quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(1) the witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, or section 401 of this title for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events;

"(2) the witness has given written notice that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, unless a grant of immunity has been obtained; or

"(3) the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction or transactions, event or events, that was under consideration by another grand jury which failed to return an indictment based on such transaction or event and there is no additional, newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(f) (1) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district, or districts, in which it is believed criminal conduct may have occurred which are elements of such offenses.

"(2) The district court may quash a subpena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened if the court finds that a witness' appearance would impose a substantial and unnecessary hardship on such witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding. In considering whether such hardship exists, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of any related investigations and court proceedings.".

(b) Section 3006A (a) of title 18, United States Code (relating to appointment of attorneys), is amended—

(1) by striking out "or," before "(4)" in the first sentence thereof; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof: ", or (5) who is a witness before a grand jury impaneled before the district court".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 8. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3333. Recording of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded.

Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500 (e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript.

"(c) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information; a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.

"(d) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the government, the court shall permit the government to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant."

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (e) (2) thereof;

(2) by deleting "; or" and inserting "." at the end of subsection (e) (2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e) (3) thereof.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

SEC. 9. Chapter 217 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3368. Preliminary examination

"(a) A defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination, unless waived, when charged with any offense, other than a petty offense, which is to be tried by a judge of the district court.

"(b) Such preliminary examination may be held prior to, or within a reasonable time following, the filing of an indictment or information in the district court.".

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 9. Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts

for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 11. (a) The enumeration in this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3771, no rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure shall apply to the extent that such rule is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 3736

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FEBRUARY 22, 1977

Mr. CONYERS (for himself, Mr. BROWN of California, Mr. ECKHARDT, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland, Mr. STARK, Mr. ROSENTHAL, Mr. EDWARDS of California, Mr. CARR, Mr. BADILLO, Mr. FORD of Tennessee, Mr. STOKES, Mr. DOWNEY, Mr. HAWKINS, and Mr. MOAKLEY) introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order better to protect the constitutional rights and liberties of such witnesses under the fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments to the Constitution, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977".

SEC. 2. Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court of the United States to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the attorney for the Government may, only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury that such refusal was without just cause, submit an application to the court for an order directing the witness to show why the witness should not be held in contempt. After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, the court may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in criminal contempt and order the witness to be imprisoned.

"(2) Any imprisonment for refusal to give testimony or provide information pursuant to this subsection shall be at a Federal correctional institution unless the witness agrees to confinement at a non-Federal institution designated by the Attorney General.

"(3) Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering such imprisonment may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness,

"(4) Any imprisonment for refusal to give testimony or provide information pursuant to this subsection shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information except that no period of such imprisonment shall exceed the lesser of—

"(A) (i) in the case of a court proceeding, the life of the court proceeding before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, or

"(ii) in the case of a grand jury, the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred; or

"(B) six months.

"(5) No hearing shall be held under this subsection unless ten days' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order under this subsection, except that a witness subpenaed for a trial may be given a shorter notice of not less than five days if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) No person imprisoned under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events may be again imprisoned under this section or under section 401

of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same or any related transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person imprisoned pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by such person from the order of imprisonment, unless the appeal is patently frivolous. If the person has not been released on bail or otherwise released, any appeal from an order of imprisonment under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal. If the appellate court shall fail to dispose of the appeal of a person who remains imprisoned within thirty days, the person shall automatically be released on her or his personal recognizance pending disposition of the appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed in the same manner as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

"(e) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a grand jury of the United States shall not be punishable under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, if the question asked or the request for other information is based in whole or in part upon evidence obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.".

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same or any related transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding.".

SEC. 4. That portion of title 18, United States Code, following section 2513 and preceding section 2515 of such title is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2514. Immunity of witnesses

"(a) In any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court of the United States, the attorney for the Government may submit an application to the court for an order that a witness shall testify or produce books, papers, or other evidence subject to the provisions of this section only if—

"(1) there is an affirmative finding by twelve or more of the members of the grand jury that such testimony or the production of books, papers, or other evidence by the witness is necessary to the public interest;

"(2) the witness gives her or his written consent to such application; and

"(3) the Attorney General approves such application.

"(b) Whenever in the judgment of an attorney for the Government the testimony of any witness, or the production of books, papers, or other evidence by any witness, in any case or proceeding before any court of the United States, is necessary to the public interest, such attorney for the Government, with the written consent of the witness, and upon the approval of the Attorney General, shall make application to the court for an order granting the witness immunity so that the witness shall testify or produce evidence subject to the provisions of this section.

"(c) Pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of this section, upon the court's order granting immunity, such witness shall not be excused from testifying or from producing books, papers, or other evidence on the ground that the testimony or evidence required of such witness may tend to incriminate her or him or subject her or him to a penalty or forfeiture, and no such witness shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which she or he is compelled, after having claimed her or his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence; nor shall testimony so compelled be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding (except in a proceeding described in the next sentence) against such witness in any court. No witness shall be exempt under this section from prosecution for perjury or contempt committed while giving testimony or producing evidence under compulsion as provided in this section.".

SEC. 5. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3229. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties

"Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a district court of the United States, the court shall give adequate and reasonable written notice to the grand jury of, and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands the nature of—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330 of this title;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) (A) the subject matter of the investigation, and

"(B) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(6) the requirement of section 3330A of this title that a subpena summoning a witness to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before the grand jury may be issued only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury to which the subpena is returnable;

"(7) the authority of the grand jury under section 2514 of this title to determine by an affirmative vote of twelve or more of its members that the attorney for the Government may submit an application to the court for a grant of immunity to a witness;

"(8) the authority of the grand jury to determine by an affirmative vote of twelve or more of its members that the attorney for the Government may submit an application to the court for an order directing a witness to show cause why she or he should not be held in contempt under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code;

"(9) the necessity of legally sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment as provided under section 3330A (1) of this title;

"(10) the duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there are sufficient grounds for issuing indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

"(11) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable.

The court's failure to instruct the grand jury as directed in this section shall be just cause within the meaning of section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a witness' refusal to testify or provide other information before such grand jury. Any person indicted by a grand jury that has not been instructed in accordance with these provisions shall be entitled to a dismissal of any indictment by such grand jury, and of any indictment issued by any other grand jury if such other indictment is based on the same or any related transactions, set of transactions, event, or events.

"§ 3329A. Certain duties of the attorney for the Government or the special attorney

"(a) The attorney for the Government, or the special attorney—

"(1) shall forward any request under this subsection to the grand jury and may make a recommendation as to such request;

"(2) shall take reasonable steps to notify any person of her or his intention to present evidence against the person and request a presentment or indictment and of the person's right to testify or present evidence under this subsection and such notice shall be given a reasonable time in advance of any request for such presentment or indictment unless the attorney for the Government or the special attorney can prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution;

"(3) shall establish a public record of all requests and the action taken on each such request.

"(b) The grand jury shall not be required to hear any witness, or consider any book, record, or document, but shall consider all requests forwarded to it by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney. Unless the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, refuses to hear the testimony of, or consider the documents offered by, a person, under this subsection, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall subpena the evidence or witness offered. If the grand jury refuses to hear the testimony or consider the documents offered, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall notify the person making such request, in writing, of the refusal.

"(c) Upon appearing pursuant to a subpena, such person shall be permitted to testify, only upon submission of a waiver of immunity, as to relevant and competent matters under consideration by the jury and shall be subject to examination by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.

"(d) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant.

"(e) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of the witness appearance that such witness intends to exercise her or his privilege against self-incrimination, nor bring to the attention of the jurors, in any way, the invocation of the privilege by such witness, unless such witness has been given a grant of immunity.

"(f) The attorney for the Government or a special attorney shall not initiate, and a grand jury shall not conduct an inquiry into a transaction or transactions, events or events, if another jury has failed to return an indictment based on the same or any related transaction or transactions, event or events, unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered.

"§ 3330. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may, upon its own initiative and after giving notice to the court, inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district by any officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government or by a person who, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, was an officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government. Such grand jury may request the attorney for the Government to assist such grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of twelve months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court upon a determination of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members that its business has been completed. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury before such grand jury determines that it has completed its business, the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the term of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the term thereof shall continue until the entry by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order upon such application. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months. The grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of twelve or more of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney to assist the grand jury in such inquiry. Such special attorney shall serve in lieu of any attorney for the Government and shall be paid at the rate of $100 per day. Such special attorney, with the approval of the court, may appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as she or he deems necessary. The special attorney and her or his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and general schedule pay rates. Any appointee under this subsection shall receive pay at a rate not to exceed $100 per day for each day during which she or he is engaged in the performance of her or his duties under this section. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by her or him and her or his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(2) Notwithstanding sections 516 and 519 of title 28 of the United States Code or any other provisions of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall have the exclusive authority to assist in the conduct of an independent grand jury investigation under this section, and any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry shall be signed by the special attorney in lieu of any attorney for the Government.

"§ 3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses

"(a) A subpena summoning a witness to appear and testify before a grand jury of the United States, or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury, shall be issued only upon an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury, and such subpena may not be returnable on less than seven days' notice, except with the express consent of the witness or upon a showing to the court by the attorney for the Government that good cause exists why the subpena should be returned in less than seven days.

"(b) Any subpena summoning a witness to appear before a grand jury shall advise the witness of (1) her or his right to counsel as provided in subsection (c) of this section; (2) her or his privilege against self-incrimination; (3) whether such witness' own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury; (4) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation; (5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury; and (6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary and appropriate.

"(c) Any witness who is not advised of her or his rights pursuant to subsection (b) shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which she or he testifies or any evidence she or he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against her or him in any court.

"(d) In any proceeding before the grand jury, if the attorney for the Government has written notice in advance of the appearance of a witness that such witness intends to exercise her or his privilege against self-incrimination, such witness shall not be compelled to appear before the grand jury unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

"(e) Any witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to assistance of counsel during any time that such witness is being questioned in the presence of such grand jury; such counsel may be retained by the witness or, may, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance, be appointed in the same manner as if that person were eligible for appointed counsel under section 3006A of this title. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(f) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district in which substantive criminal conduct may have occurred as elements of such offenses; except that when a grand jury is to be convened to conduct an inquiry into both violations of substantive criminal statutes and violations of statutes forbidding conspiracy to violate substantive criminal statutes, the grand jury may not be convened before a district court in a district in which the only criminal conduct alleged to have occurred is conspiracy to commit the substantive criminal act.

"(g) For the convenience of witnesses and where the interests of justice so require, a district court may, on motion of a witness, transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened under subsection (f). In considering an application for such transfer, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed to testify before the grand jury, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of related investigations and court proceedings, if any.

"(h) Once a grand jury has failed to return an indictment based on a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into the same or any related transactions or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the attorney for the Government, that the Government has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(i) (1) A complete and accurate stenographic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties including but not limited to those set forth in section 3329 of this title; all introductory comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the Government to the grand jury, witnesses, and counsel for witnesses; all testimony; and all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys and those between attorneys for the Government and counsel for witnesses. Consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded.

"(2) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his or her attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, she or he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript. Such transcript shall be available for inspection and copying not later than forty-eight hours after the conclusion of such witness' testimony, unless, for cause shown, more time is required to prepare such transcript. After examination of such transcript, a witness may request permission to appear before the grand jury again to explain his testimony. Additional testimony given under this subsection shall become part of the official transcript and shall be shown to the members of the grand jury.

"(j) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury or the attorney for such witness with the witness' written approval shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which such witness has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. The term 'statement' as used in this subsection shall be defined as in section 3500 (e) of this title.

"(k) No person subpenaed to testify or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury of the United States shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined pursuant to section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for her or his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if, upon the evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpena or a court having jurisdiction under subsection (l) of this section, the court finds that—

"(1) a primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is or will be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment; unless, after a witness refuses to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury on the ground that the purpose or effect of requiring his testimony or the production of such objects is in violation of this clause, the Government establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that its inquiry is independent of such preexisting indictment or accusation,

"(2) compliance with the subpena would be unreasonable or oppressive because (i) such compliance would involve unnecessary appearances by the witness; (ii) the only testimony that can reasonably be expected from the witness is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged; (iii) the impairment or disparagement of the right of any person to counsel of her or his choice or of other lawful confidential relationship which would result from compelling the witness' testimony would outweigh the value of that testimony, even though no privilege exists; or (iv) other like circumstances,

"(3) a primary purpose of the issuance of the subpena is to harass the witness,

"(4) the witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, or section 401 of this title for her or his refusal to testify concerning the same or any related transaction, set of transactions, event, or events,

"(5) the witness has given written notice that such witness intends to exercise her or his privilege against self-incrimination, unless a grant of immunity has been obtained, or

"(6) the witness has not been advised of her or his rights as specified in subsection (b).

"(l) The district court out of which a subpena to appear before a grand jury has been issued, the court in which the subpena was served, and the district court in the district in which the witness who was served such subpena resides shall have concurrent jurisdiction over any motion made by such witness to quash the subpena or for other relief under this section. A motion under this section may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before the grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district court in which the grand jury is impaneled. If the motion is made before or during the appearance of the witness before the grand jury, the appearance before the grand jury shall be stayed by the making of the motion until the court before which the motion is pending rules on the motion.

"(m) The attorney for the Government shall be limited to asking questions or requesting the production of books, papers, documents, or other objects relevant to the subject matter under investigation. He or she shall not in any way express to any witness or to the grand jury a coercive statement or threat or an opinion that the witness' testimony is untrue.

"(n) The attorney for the Government shall not be permitted to submit before the grand jury any evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.

"(o) A grand jury may indict a person for an offense when (1) the evidence before such grand jury is legally sufficient to establish that such offense was committed, and (2) competent and admissible evidence before such grand jury provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense. An indictment may be based on summarized or hearsay evidence alone only upon a showing of good cause to the court. An attorney for the Government shall present to the grand jury all evidence in such attorney's possession which she or he knows will tend to negate the guilt of the person or persons under investigation.

"(p) The district court before which a grand jury is impaneled shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district finds that—

"(1) the evidence before the grand jury was legally insufficient to establish that the offense for which the indictment was rendered was committed;

"(2) there was not competent and admissible evidence, or summarized or hearsay allowed by the court upon a showing of good cause, before the grand jury to provide reasonable cause to believe that the person indicted committed such offense;

"(3) the attorney for the Government has not presented to the grand jury all evidence in her or his possession which the attorney knows will tend to negate the guilt of the person indicted; or

"(4) the attorney for the Government has submitted to the grand jury evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.

(b) The table of sections for chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"3329. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties.
"3329A. Certain duties of the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.
"3330. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses.".

SEC. 6. Section 6001 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out paragraph (4), and by striking out "; and" at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

SEC. 7. Section 6002 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) an agency of the United States, or

"(2) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and such witness shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, nor shall testimony or other information compelled under the order (or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or other information) be used against the witness in any criminal case, except a prosecution for perjury, giving a false statement, or otherwise failing to comply with the order.".

SEC. 8. (a) Part V of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out section 6003.

(b) The table of sections of part V of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out item 6003.

SEC. 9. (a) Part V of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end of such part the following new section:

"§ 6006. Reports to Congress on grand jury investigations

"The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

"The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

SEC. 11. (a) The enumeration in this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3771, no rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure shall apply to the extent that such rule is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 4908

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MARCH 14, 1977

Mr. DUNCAN of Tennessee introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules for the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order to better protect the rights of such witnesses, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977".

WITNESS IMMUNITY

SEC. 2. (a) That portion of title 18, United States Code, which follows section 6001 and precedes section 6004 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"(a) Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) a court or grand jury of the United States,

"(2) an agency of the United States, or

"(3) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or a subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; but the witness shall not be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled under the order to testify or produce evidence, except that he shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying, for giving a false statement, or for otherwise failing to comply with the order.

"(b) No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(c) Upon communication to the witness of any order under this part, the person presiding over the proceeding shall give the witness reasonable and adequate notice of the nature and scope of the immunity from criminal prosecution provided by this section, and of the right of the witness to be represented by counsel in any proceeding challenging such order or confinement or fines pursuant to such order, and that, if he is unable to obtain adequate representation, counsel will be furnished for him as provided in section 3006A, of this title.

"§ 6003. Court and grand jury proceedings

"(a) In the case of any individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a court of the United States or a grand jury of the United States, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the proceeding is or may be held shall issue, in accordance with subsections (b) to (d) of this section, upon the request of the United States attorney for such district, an order requiring such individual to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, such order to become effective as provided in section 6002 of this part.

"(b) In any proceeding under this section, the court shall not order any person to testify or provide information, if it finds that an individual is in danger of prosecution, or may be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, by the government of any other country on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may be ordered to testify or provide other information pursuant to an order under this part, unless the court also finds that such individual has been provided adequate safeguards to minimize such danger.

"(c) A United States district court may, at the request of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, any designated Assistant Attorney General, or a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of this title, issue an order under subsection (a) of this section when it is established to the satisfaction of the court that—

"(1) in accordance with subsection (b) of this section, there is no danger of foreign prosecution or that adequate safeguards have been provided to minimize such danger;

"(2) the testimony or other information from such individual may be necessary to the public interest;

"(3) such individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide other information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and

"(4) with respect to an individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a grand jury—

"(A) the investigation being conducted by the grand jury is authorized by law and the application for the order is in accord with existing guidelines or other practice of the Department of Justice;

"(B) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto;

"(C) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order;

"(D) a grant of immunity under this part would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation; and

"(E) a summary of the evidence relating to the witness has been certified and submitted to the court.

"(d) Any individual required to give testimony or provide other information pursuant to an order issued under subsection (a) may not be indicted for any offense by the grand jury before which such individual testifies pursuant to such order.".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 6005 of such title is hereby repealed.

(c) No amendment or repeal of any provision of law made by this section shall affect any immunity, or the scope of any immunity, to which any individual is entitled under such provision by reason of any testimony or other information given before the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this Act.

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both;

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court; or

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) Subsection (b) shall not apply to any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(f) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States attorney, and such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties.

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

(b) The table of sections for such chapter 73 is amended by adding at the end of the following new item:

"1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy.".

INDEPENDENT INQUIRY; RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 4. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district. Such grand jury shall, except as provided in this section, request the attorney for the Government to assist such grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury, the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the grand jury shall continue until the entry upon such application by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months.

"(b) (1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist, or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of a majority of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney, in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The special attorney appointed under this section may, with the approval of the court, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointee shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist in the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government, and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(4) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, documents, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.

"§ 3330. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitle to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in the grand jury room.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(d) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.".

(b) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3329 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(c) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329

of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation.".

(d) The table of sections of chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"3329. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330. Counsel.".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 5. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, as amended by section 4 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Recording of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3330B. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500 (e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript.

"(c) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.

"(d) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the government, the court shall permit the government to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant."

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (e) (2) thereof;

(2) by deleting "; or " and inserting "." at the end of subsection (e) (2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e) (3) thereof.

(c) The table of sections for chapter 215 of such title, as amended by section 4, is further amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"3330A. Recording of grand jury proceedings.
"3330B. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements.".

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 6. Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district."

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 7. The enumeration in this Act and amendments made under this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

[From the Congressional Record, Extensions of Remarks, Feb. 22, 1977, p. E858]

THE GRAND JURY REFORM ACT OF 1977

(By Hon. John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan)

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce, with 13 of my colleagues, the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.

Grand jury reform was long overdue when I introduced my first bill to restore decency and due process into the grand jury chamber in 1974. It is even more so today. The panel that the authors of the Bill of Rights wrote into the fifth amendment for our protection has become a vehicle for our persecution.

Indeed, stepping into the grand jury chamber is like stepping back through time—way back, back past the two centuries of struggles Americans have waged to defend and extend our constitutional guarantees of liberty and freedom, back past the centuries of sacrifice that built our English heritage of individual rights, back to those medieval times when justice meant trial by "ordeal."

For that is just what the modern grand jury process can be: an ordeal. Under current grand jury procedures, for instance, any person in the United States can be subpenaed before any Federal grand jury, even if that grand jury is 3,000 miles away. A person can be ordered to appear at a moment's notice and never be told why he or she has been called or what the grand jury is supposed to be investigating.

The grand jury chamber itself is off limits to basic constitutional guarantees and rules of courtroom fairplay. Prosecutors may ask grand jury witnesses any questions they wish. They may badger witnesses, who are not allowed to have the assistance of counsel inside the grand jury room, with abusive threats and unfounded charges. They may bias grand juries against witnesses by introducing irrelevant or hearsay evidence that would not be admissible during a trial.

Should a witness object to this kind of treatment by invoking the fifth amendment right to silence, the prosecutor may have the witness immunized. Once immunized, the witness must either tell the Government what it wants to know or go to jail for contempt. Witnesses jailed for civil contempt in this manner are not entitled to a jury trial. Their confinement can theoretically last indefinitely because while a witness can only be jailed for as long as a sitting grand jury wants his or her testimony, there is nothing to stop the government from resubpenaing a silent witness before a second grand jury once the term of the first expires.

"The grand jury witness," summed up Prof. Melvin Lewis of Chicago's John Marshall School of Law last fall, "is the least favored person known to the Constitution."

With grand jury prerogatives like these to work with, prosecutors can wreak almost limitless havoc. They can destroy hard-earned reputations, stigmatize dissenters and disrupt their activities, handcuff—both literally and figuratively—journalists, strikers, and defense attorneys. In short, under the grand jury's umbrella, prosecutors can engage in the very sorts of behavior the grand jury was originally meant to prevent.

This turn of grand jury events was certainly not foreseen by James Madison and his contemporaries when they wrote into the Bill of Rights the provision that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime" unless a panel of his or her fellow citizens—the grand jury—decided that there was enough evidence to warrant further prosecution. The generation of 1976 saw the grand jury as an independent body that would prevent criminal activity from either being trumpted up or covered over, the former by thoroughly scrutinizing the government's case against an accused, the latter by investigating alleged instances of government wrongdoing that government officials could not be trusted to investigate themselves.

Modern Federal grand juries, at least one of which is in operation in every Federal district at all times, function in a way that bears little resemblance to this Bill of Rights ideal. The 23 members of the grand jury, who normally meet once a week or less for several hours at a time, play an essentially passive role. The U.S. attorney in charge of each grand jury panel selects the cases the grand jury will consider, the witnesses the grand jury will hear, and the evidence the grand jury will see.

Upon the completion of the prosecutor's presentation, the grand jurors, without the prosecutor present, decide whether or not to indict. Predictably, grand jurors almost always vote to indict. Why shouldn't they? All grand jurors know about the cases they are deliberating is what the Government wants them to know.

For the conscientious grand juror who really wants to make a contribution to justice, grand jury service can only be, as one grand juror noted last December, frustrating. That grand juror, Robert Pitzer, was the foreman of a Federal grand jury in Atlanta. When his panel's term ended, it analyzed its experience in a fascinating report.

"There have been times," the report noted, "when the members of the Pitzer grand jury have felt that they were simply there to be used at the whim or desire of whatever attorney in the U.S. attorney's office needed a 'warm-bodied grand jury' to hear testimony.

Given this depressing and demeaning grand jury reality, it is perfectly understandable why some observers have called for the grand jury's abolition. I have not, for two chief reasons. Since the grand jury indictment is required by the Constitution, abolishing the grand jury as a method of charging would mean amending the Constitution, a long, wearying process. Specifically, abolishing the grand jury would mean amending a part of the Constitution that has never been amended before, the Bill of Rights. Dare we risk setting such a precedent? I think not.

Moreover, the grand jury is one of only two institutions in our criminal justice system—the trial jury the other—where citizens have decisionmaking authority. I believe it would be a mistake to eliminate the grand jury at a time when popular participation in our political and legal institutions needs to be encouraged, not discouraged.

I also believe it would be a mistake to tolerate the sorry grand jury status quo a moment longer, and the impetus for the changes we need must come from Congress. It was the Congress, after all, that institutionalized the grand jury into our criminal justice system when it drafted the fifth amendment in 1789. Now it must be the Congress that puts an end to the pratices that have distorted the grand jury intended by the Bill of Rights almost beyond recognition.

This is the purpose of the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977. This legislation would break the lockgrip prosecutors now hold over the grand jury process and give grand jurors an active and vital role to play in the charging process. It would safeguard the rights of all those called to appear before grand juries and cripple the manipulation of grand jury proceedings for improper ends. It would help the Federal grand jury finally function as the democratic institution it was designed to be.

While the reforms embodied in this legislation touch many aspects of grand jury procedure, the heart of the bill is its proposal for an overhaul of current immunity law.

Immunity can be a very useful juridical device. By promising safety from future prosecution, the Government can elicit valuable testimony from a low-level criminal conspirator against a higher-up, testimony that the Government would not otherwise be able to obtain.

But immunity can also be a very dangerous device. Witnesses who refuse to answer questions inside the grand jury chamber can be immunized against their will and forced to choose between testifying or going to jail for contempt.

"This," a spokesman for the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Pat Tobin, said last September, "is the kind of choice that faces citizens of lands ruled by juntas. It should not be a choice confronted by Americans."

When we give prosecutors the power to force people to answer their questions, the result is predictable. Some prosecutors will use their power to demand the answers to questions they should not be asking, and that is exactly what has happened. Since the passage of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, that abominable document that broadened the immunization powers of Federal prosecutors, U.S. attorneys have compelled lawyers to testify about their clients, reporters about their sources, strikers about their unions, dissidents about their politics and scholars about their research.

Immunity has also made many grand jury panels little more than unwitting partners of FBI misconduct. FBI agents do not have subpena power. No police agent in the United States can yank people off the streets and force them to answer questions. Thus, it is perfectly legal for a person approached by FBI agents to refuse to answer their questions. Many people, especially political activists who suspect the motives behind FBI questions, have decided to take this course. They see FBI inquiries as attempts to gather intelligence on legitimate political dissent, intelligence that will later be manipulated to harass and discredit their activities. These fears are not paranoid delusions. They spring directly from the three-plus decades of FBI illegality examined in detail over recent years by congressional and media investigations.

What do FBI agents do when faced with people who exercise their legal right not to answer Bureau questions? Over and over again during the past 7 years, they have responded by obtaining a grand jury subpena from the nearest U.S. attorney's office. The silent person, who, remember, is charged with no crime, is hauled before a grand jury and asked the same questions the FBI wanted answered. Once immunized inside the grand jury chamber, the person has no right to refuse to answer. At this point, continued silence means a contempt confinement.

What this adds up to has been starkly described by the president of the National Organization for Women—NOW—Karen DeCrow:

"Through the grand jury process, the Bureau has gained the ability to maneuver its targets behind bars without having to go through the bother of proving them guilty in a court of law."

The Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977 would prevent incarcerations like these by making every grant of immunity consensual. If enacted, no person could be brought before a grand jury and immunized unless he or she consented.

Making immunity consensual is not the precedent-shattering step it may seem. Though prosecutors are presently under no legal compulsion to obtain a witness' consent before proceeding with an immunity order, wise prosecutors—that is, Government attorneys looking for evidence, not headlines—do anyway. These prosecutors already use immunity consensually. They treat it as a bargaining tool and trade immunity for a witness' testimony. They do not force immunity onto witnesses who have made it clear that they will not testify.

Why do they not? Peter Richards, an experienced Federal and New Jersey prosecutor and an expert on immunity, put it plainly at a Cornell University Institute on Organized Crime conference last August. Forcing a witness "to testify by court order over his clear objections," he said, "we don't like to do it because we have found that it normally does not work. The situation where a witness refuses to cooperate in the first place, then comes into the grand jury and changes his mind and cooperates and tells you the truth and gives you something valuable is extremely, very, very, very rare. I don't think I've ever seen it happen, as a matter of fact."

The enactment of consensual immunity would not hamper the work of fair-minded prosecutors. It would, however, end the mainipulation of immunity to punish witnesses for the "crime of silence."

Like my proposal for consensual immunity, other provisions in the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977 are designed to facilitate proper grand jury functioning.

To function properly, a grand jury needs, above all, information, solid evidence untainted by either unfair innuendo or illegality. This legislation would require that prosecutors let grand jurors know of any evidence in their possession that would tend to show an accused's innocence. It would enable defense attorneys to challenge indictments based on hearsay or other evidence that would be inadmissible at trial. By permitting defense attorneys to accompany their clients inside the grand jury room. It would discourage prosecutorial interrogations designed to turn a grand jury against a witness.

The Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977 would alo insure that grand jurors be kept up-to-date on what the prosecutor plans to do and why. It would require a grand jury majority vote before any subpena could be issued by a prosecutor, immunity offered or contempt pursued.

Most importantly, the act would facilitate proper grand jury functioning by taking grand juries out of the witness harassment buiness. Under its provisions, strict limits are set on prosecutors' ability to disrupt people's lives with grand jury subpenas. A 6-month lid is placed on contempt confinements. Contempt confinements based on questions that violate a witness' constitutional or statutory rights are prohibited all together.

These provisions have considerable public backing behind them. The nearly two dozen national bar, church, labor, women's, and civil liberties groups that comprise the Washington-based Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse have testified in favor of similar reforms I have proposed in earlier grand jury reform legislation. Many of the provisions of the Grand Jury Reform Act have also been endorsed by leading figures in the American Bar Association.

In fact, there are precious few students of the modern grand jury system who have not concluded that this institution desperately needs a sweeping overhaul. Unfortunately, in recent years, most of them have been concentrated in the Department of Justice. Last year, then Attorney General Edward Levi, in testimony before Representative JOSHUA EILBERG's Judiciary Subcommittee investigating the grand jury issue, opposed every significant check on prosecutorial conduct that grand jury reformers have put forth.

Past Justice Department leadership, however, has not always been as insensitive to the dangers posed by prosecutorial misconduct. I would hope that our new Attorney General, the Honorable Griffin Bell, will heed closely the warning of one of his most thoughtful predecessors, Robert Jackson.

"The prosecutor has more control over life, liberty, and reputation than any other person in America," Attorney General Jackson said in 1940, a year before he was to become a Supreme Court justice. "While the prosecutor at his best is one of the most beneficient forces in our society, when he acts from malice or other base motives, he is one of the worst."

The grand jury was supposed to shield us from prosecutors who act from "malice or other base motives." It is time to fashion the framework that can allow the grand jury to fulfill this noble goal.

A summary of the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977 follows:

SUMMARY OF THE GRAND JURY REFORM ACT OF 1977

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

Requires 12 or more grand jurors to vote that the refusal of a witness to testify is without just cause before government attorney may apply for a show-cause hearing order.

Gives the witness 10 days notice of a contempt hearing. Upon showing of special need, a notice of not less than five days may be given to a trial witness.

Guarantees right of counsel at a contempt hearing and for such counsel to be appointed for those unable to afford one.

Provides that imprisonment shall be in a federal institution, unless the witness waives this right. Upon showing of hardship, witness may be imprisoned at institution near family, work or attorney.

Reduces the period of contempt confinement to six months and prohibits reiterative contempt by making the six months cumulative, applying it against any confinement resulting from prior, subsequent or related grand jury investigations.

Requires that a witness found in contempt be allowed bail pending appeal unless it affirmatively appears appeal is frivolous. Appellate court must act within 30 days or the witness will be released pending determination of the appeal.

Prohibits imprisonment for civil or criminal contempt after a witness has once been imprisoned for criminal contempt for refusing to answer the same questions.

Provides that a refusal to answer questions or provide other information shall not be punished if the question or request is based on any violation of the witness' constitutional or statutory rights.

Applies all of the above protections to witnesses subpoenaed to trial as well as grand jury witnesses, with the exception of grand jury voting, where in trial the determination is made by the court.

NOTICE TO THE JURY OF ITS RIGHTS AND DUTIES

Requires that the district court judge who empanels the grand jury give instructions to the grand jurors at the beginning of their term, including: grand jury powers with respect to independent investigations, its right to call and interrogate witnesses, its right to request documents and evidence, the subject matter of the investigation, the necessity of legally sufficient evidence to indict and the power of the grand jury to vote before a witness may be subpoenaed, granted immunity, be given a contempt hearing or indicted.

Proscribes that failure to so instruct the grand jury is just cause for a refusal to testify or for dismissal of an indictment by that or by a subsequent grand jury on the same matter.

INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Allows the grand jury, upon notice to the court, to inquire on its own initiative into offenses committed by government or former government officials.

Authorizes the grand jury to ask the court to appoint a special attorney to assist its investigation upon a vote of at least 12 grand jurors. The special attorney would sign any indictments.

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

Requires an affirmative vote of 12 or more grand jurors to issue a subpoena. The subpoena would not be returnable on less than seven days' notice without the witness' express consent.

Requires each subpoena to inform the witness of the right to counsel, the right against self-incrimination, whether the witness' own conduct is under investigation, the criminal statutes involved and any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary and appropriate.

Bars the prosecution from calling a witness who has given the prosecutor advanced written notice the s/he intends to claim the Fifth Amendment unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

Permits representation by counsel inside the grand jury room. Frees witness' counsel from the secrecy rule.

Gives the court in the district out of which the subpoena was issued, the court in the district where the subpoena was served and the court in whose district the witness resides concurrent jurisdiction over motions to quash and other relief.

Limits permissible venue of a grand jury investigation to only where the grand jury is investigating both substantive criminal offenses and conspiracies to commit such offenses. In such cases, only a grand jury sitting in a district where the substantive crime took place would be permitted to question witnesses.

Forbids a second grand jury investigation into a matter which has led one grand jury, after considering the evidence, not to return an indictment, unless there is a showing that additional relevant evidence has been discovered.

Requires complete recordation of grand jury proceedings. Allows the witness or counsel to obtain a copy of the witness' testimony before the grand jury and thereafter submit clarifying statements.

Requires the government to turn over to the witness before questioning copies of any statements made by the witness related to the subject matter of the grand jury investigation.

Provides that no person shall be required to testify or be confined if the court, upon evidentiary hearing, finds: (1) the primary purpose of the subpoena is to secure testimony for trial evidence for a person already under indictment, (2) the testimony of the witness would be unreasonable, oppressive, cumulative or privileged, (3) the testimony would have a disparaging effect on a confidential or privileged relationship which would outweigh the value of the testimony, (4) the primary purpose is to harass the witness.

Requires that all questions and requests or other objects be relevant to the matter under investigation by the grand jury. Prohibits coercive threats or statements, or opinions as to the truthfulness of a witness' testimony from being made by an attorney for the government to the witness or the grand jury.

IMMUNTIY OF WITNESSES

Abolishes all forced and use immunity before grand juries and courts. Transactional immunity is allowed with the written consent of the witness, and by affirmative vote of 12 grand jurors; or, in the case of a trial proceeding, with the consent of the witness and the application of the U.S. attorney.

Provides transaction immunity for witnesses before Congressional committees and agency hearings.

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

Requires the Department of Justice to submit to Congress and the Administrative Office of the United States courts annual reports concerning grand jury investigations and the use of immunity orders. Requires reports in eight specified areas, set forth according to judicial district.

EVIDENCE

Requires the government to introduce all evidence in its possession tending to prove the innocence of a potential defendant.

Prohibits the grand jury from returning an indictment on the basis of hearsay evidence alone.

95TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 4908

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MARCH 14, 1977

Mr. DUNCAN of Tennessee introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules for the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order to better protect the rights of such witnesses, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977".

WITNESS IMMUNITY

SEC. 2. (a) That portion of title 18, United States Code, which follows section 6001 and precedes section 6004 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 6002. Immunity generally

"(a) Whenever a witness refuses, on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or provide other information in a proceeding before or ancillary to—

"(1) a court or grand jury of the United States,

"(2) an agency of the United States, or

"(3) either House of Congress, a joint committee of the two Houses, or a committee or a subcommittee of either House, and the person presiding over the proceeding communicates to the witness an order issued under this part, the witness may not refuse to comply with the order on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; but the witness shall not be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled under the order to testify or produce evidence, except that he shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying, for giving a false statement, or for otherwise failing to comply with the order.

"(b) No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(c) Upon communication to the witness of any order under this part, the person presiding over the proceeding shall give the witness reasonable and adequate notice of the nature and scope of the immunity from criminal prosecution provided by this section, and of the right of the witness to be represented by counsel in any proceeding challenging such order or confinement or fines pursuant to such order, and that, if he is unable to obtain adequate representation, counsel will be furnished for him as provided in section 3006A, of this title.

"§ 6003. Court and grand jury proceedings

"(a) In the case of any individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a court of the United States or a grand jury of the United States, the United States district court for the judicial district in which the proceeding is or may be held shall issue, in accordance with subsections (b) to (d) of this section, upon the request of the United States attorney for such district, an order requiring such individual to give testimony or provide other information which he refuses to give or provide on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination, such order to become effective as provided in section 6002 of this part.

"(b) In any proceeding under this section, the court shall not order any person to testify or provide information, if it finds that an individual is in danger of prosecution, or may be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, by the government of any other country on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may be ordered to testify or provide other information pursuant to an order under this part, unless the court also finds that such individual has been provided adequate safeguards to minimize such danger.

"(c) A United States district court may, at the request of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, any designated Assistant Attorney General, or a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of this title, issue an order under subsection (a) of this section when it is established to the satisfaction of the court that—

"(1) in accordance with subsection (b) of this section, there is no danger of foreign prosecution or that adequate safeguards have been provided to minimize such danger;

"(2) the testimony or other information from such individual may be necessary to the public interest;

"(3) such individual has refused or is likely to refuse to testify or provide other information on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination; and

"(4) with respect to an individual who has been or may be called to testify or provide other information at any proceeding before or ancillary to a grand jury—

"(A) the investigation being conducted by the grand jury is authorized by law and the application for the order is in accord with existing guidelines or other practice of the Department of Justice;

"(B) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto;

"(C) the testimony or other information sought to be obtained is relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order;

"(D) a grant of immunity under this part would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation; and

"(E) a summary of the evidence relating to the witness has been certified and submitted to the court.

"(d) Any individual required to give testimony or provide other information pursuant to an order issued under subsection (a) may not be indicted for any offense by the grand jury before which such individual testifies pursuant to such order.".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 6005 of such title is hereby repealed.

(c) No amendment or repeal of any provision of law made by this section shall affect any immunity, or the scope of any immunity, to which any individual is entitled under such provision by reason of any testimony or other information given before the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this Act.

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court; or

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) Subsection (b) shall not apply to any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(f) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States attorney, and such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties.

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

(b) The table of sections for such chapter 73 is amended by adding at the end of the following new item:

"1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy.".

INDEPENDENT INQUIRY; RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 4. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district. Such grand jury shall, except as provided in this section, request the attorney for the Government to assist such grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury, the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the grand jury shall continue until the entry upon such application by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months.

"(b) (1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist, or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of a majority of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney, in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a).

"(2) The special attorney appointed under this section may, with the approval of the court, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointee shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(3) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist in the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government, and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(4) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, documents, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.

"§ 3330. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitle to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in the grand jury room.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(d) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.".

(b) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3329 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(c) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329

of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation.".

(d) The table of sections of chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"3329. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330. Counsel.".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 5. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, as amended by section 4 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Recording of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3330B. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500 (e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript.

"(c) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.

"(d) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the government, the court shall permit the government to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant."

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (e) (2) thereof;

(2) by deleting "; or " and inserting "." at the end of subsection (e) (2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e) (3) thereof.

(c) The table of sections for chapter 215 of such title, as amended by section 4, is further amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"3330A. Recording of grand jury proceedings.
"3330B. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements.".

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 6. Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 7. The enumeration in this Act and amendments made under this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

95TH CONGRESS

S. 1449

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

MAY 4 (legislative day, APRIL 28), 1977

Mr. ABOUREZK introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order better to protect the constitutional rights and liberties of such witnesses under the fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments to the Constitution, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977."

SEC. 2. Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a) (1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the attorney for the Government may apply to the court for an order directing the witness to show cause why the witness should not be held in contempt.

"(2) After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness is entitled to be represented by counsel, the court may, upon a finding that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined. Such confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, if one is located within fifty miles of the court ordering confinement, unless the witness waives this right. Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering confinement may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness, or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness.

"(3) Confinement under this section shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(4) No hearing shall be held under this subsection unless five days' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order, except that a witness may be given a shorter notice of not less than forty-eight hours if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) No person who has been confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events may be again confined under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to this section of this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by him from the order of his confinement, unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Any appeal from an order of confinement under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, including all necessary appeals, counsel may be appointed in the same manner as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate representation.

"(e) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a grand jury of the United States shall not be punishable under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, if the question asked or the request for other information is based in whole or in part upon evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.".

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding.".

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 4. (a) Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court;

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, of any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury; or

"(4) any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, and an authorized assistant of a United States attorney;

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(f) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

(e) The table of sections for chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1512. Violations of grand jury secrecy.".

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURORS; INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

SEC. 5. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for Government

"(a) Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a district court of the United States, the court shall give adequate and reasonable notice to the grand jury of, and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330 of this title;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) the subject matter of the investigation;

"(6) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(7) the necessity of legally sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment as provided under section 3330A(1) of this title;

"(8) the duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there are sufficient grounds for issuing indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments;

"(9) the obligation of secrecy and that it is a criminal offense to disclose to any person any information concerning any grand jury proceeding; and

"(10) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable.

The court's failure to instruct the grand jury as directed in this section shall be just cause within the meaning of section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a witness' refusal to testify or provide other information before such grand jury, until such time as the court instructs the grand jury in accordance with this section.

"(b) (1) Any person, including a witness who has previously testified or produced books, records, or documents, may make a written request to the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed pursuant to this title, and request to testify in an inquiry before a grand jury, or to produce books, records, or documents, or to appear before a grand jury and request that the grand jury proceed in accordance with its powers under section 3330 of this title.

"(2) The attorney for the Government, or the special attorney—

"(A) shall forward any request under this subsection to the grand jury and may make a recommendation as to such request;

"(B) shall take reasonable steps to notify any person of his intention to present evidence against the person and request a presentment or indictment and of the person's right to testify or present evidence under this subsection and such notice shall be given a reasonable time in advance of any request for such presentment or indictment unless the attorney for the Government or the special attorney can prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution; and

"(C) shall establish a public record of all requests and the action taken on each such request.

"(3) The grand jury shall not be required to hear any witness, or consider any book, record, or document, but shall consider all requests forwarded to it by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney. Unless the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, refuses to hear the testimony, or consider the documents offered by, a person, under this subsection, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall subpena the evidence or witness offered. If the grand jury refuses to hear the testimony or consider the documents offered, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall notify the person making such request, in writing, of the refusal.

"(4) Upon appearing pursuant to a subpena, such person shall be permitted to testify, only upon submission of a waiver of immunity, as to relevant and competent matters under consideration by the jury and shall be subject to examination by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.

"(c) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of the witness' appearance that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, nor bring to the attention of the jurors, in any way, the invocation of the privilege by such witness, unless such witness has been given a grant of immunity.

"(d) The attorney for the Government or a special attorney shall not initiate, and a grand jury shall not conduct, an inquiry into a transaction or transactions, event or events, if another jury has failed to return an indictment based on the same transaction or transactions, event, or events, unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered.

"§ 3330. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district by any officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government or by any person who, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, was an officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government. Such grand jury may request the attorney for the Government to assist the grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court or upon a determination of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members that its business has been completed. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury before such grand jury determines that it has completed its business, the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the term of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the term thereof shall continue until the entry by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order upon such application. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months.

"(b) (1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of twelve or more of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the grand jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a). Such special attorney, with the approval of the court, may appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointees shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(2) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist in the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government, and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(3) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, documents, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.".

(c) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(d) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329

of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation.".

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 6. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in presence of the grand jury.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to disclose matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(e) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) or (d) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.

"§ 3330B. Subpenas

"(a) In the case of any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, except where the court finds special need upon a showing by the attorney for the Government or a special attorney appointed under this title, or the consent of the witness, no subpena may require any witness to testify or produce other information at such proceeding at any time before the expiration of the one-week period beginning on the date of service of the subpena.

"(b) Upon the service of any subpena requiring any witness to testify or produce other information at any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, the witness shall be given adequate and reasonable notice of—

"(1) his right to counsel as provided in section 3330A of this title;

"(2) his privilege against self-incrimination;

"(3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation;

"(4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury;

"(5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of the subpena; and

"(6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

"(c) (1) The district court which issued a subpena, or the district court for the district in which the person resides or is served shall have concurrent jurisdiction to hear, and take appropriate action with respect to any motion relating to, including any motion to quash, such subpena.

"(2) A motion relating to a subpena may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before a grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled.

"(3) If a motion is made under this section before the day on which the person subpenaed has been ordered to appear or books, records, or documents have been ordered to be produced, the appearance of such person, or the production of such documents, shall, upon appropriate application, be stayed until the court has ruled on such motion.

"(d) (1) Upon proper motion, the court may quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(A) a primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is or will be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment;

"(B) the witness has not been advised of his rights, as specified in subsection (b);

"(C) the evidence sought is not relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction;

"(D) compliance with the subpena would be unreasonable or oppressive, as such subpena would require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances; or

"(E) a primary purpose of the issuance of the subpena is to harass the witness.

"(e) Upon proper motion, the court shall quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(1) the witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, or section 401 of this title for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events;

"(2) the witness has given written notice that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, unless a grant of immunity has been obtained; or

"(3) the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction or transactions, event or events, that was under consideration by another grand jury which failed to return an indictment based on such transaction or event and there is no additional, newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(f) (1) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district, or districts, in which it is believed criminal conduct may have occurred which are elements of such offenses; except that when a grand jury is to be convened to conduct an inquiry into both violations of substantive criminal statutes and violations of statutes forbidding conspiracy to violate substantive criminal statutes, the grand jury may not be convened before a district court in a district in which the only criminal conduct alleged to have occurred in that district is conspiracy to commit the substantive criminal act.

"(2) The district court may quash a subpena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened if the court finds that a witness' appearance would impose a substantial and unnecessary hardship on such witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding. In considering whether such hardship exists, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of any related investigations and court proceedings.".

"§ 3330C. Evidence presented to the grand jury

"(a) The attorney for the Government shall not be permitted to submit before the grand jury any evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.

"(b) An attorney for the Government shall present to the grand jury all evidence in such attorney's possession which he knows will tend to negate the guilt of the person or persons under investigation.

"(c) A grand jury may indict a person for an offense when (1) the evidence before such grand jury is legally sufficient to establish that such offense was committed, and (2) competent and admissible evidence before such grand jury provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense. An indictment may be based on summarized or hearsay evidence alone only upon showing of good cause to the court which impaneled the grand jury.

"(d) The district court before which a grand jury is impaneled shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds that—

"(1) the evidence before the grand jury was legally insufficient to establish that the offense for which the indictment was rendered was committed;

"(2) there was not competent and admissible evidence, or summarized or hearsay allowed by the court upon a showing of good cause, before the grand jury to provide reasonable cause to believe that the person indicted committed such offense;

"(3) the attorney for the Government has not presented to the grand jury all evidence in his or her possession which the attorney knows will tend to negate the guilt of the person indicted; or

"(4) the attorney for the Government has submitted to the grand jury evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.".

(b) Section 3006A of title 18, United States Code (relating to appointment of attorneys), is amended—

(1) by striking out "or," before "(4)" in the first sentence thereof; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof: ", or (5) who is a witness before a grand jury impaneled before the district court".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING, AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 7. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3333. Recording of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the Government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500 (e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript. Such transcript shall be made available for inspection and copying not later than forty-eight hours after the conclusion of such witness' testimony, unless, for cause shown, more time is required to prepare such transcript. After examination of such transcript, a witness may request permission to appear before the grand jury again to explain his testimony. Additional testimony given under this subsection shall become part of the official transcript and shall be shown to the members of the grand jury.

"(c) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the Government, the court shall permit the Govrnment to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant.

"(d) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.".

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (e) (2) thereof;

(2) by deleting "; or" and inserting a period at the end of subsection (e) (2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e) (3) thereof.

(b) The table of sections for chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"3329. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties.
"3330. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses.
"3330B. Subpoenas.
"3330C. Evidence presented to the grand jury.
"3333. Recording of grand jury proceedings.
"3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements".

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

SEC. 8. (a) Chapter 217 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3368. Preliminary examination

"(a) A defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination, unless waived, when charged with any offense, other than a petty offense, which is to be tried by a judge of the district court.

"(b) Such preliminary examination may be held prior to, or within a reasonable time following, the filing of an indictment or information in the district court.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 217 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3368. Preliminary examination.".

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedures by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 10. (a) The enumeration in this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3771, no rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure shall apply to the extent that such rule is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

(By Mr. Abourezk)

S. 1449. A bill to establish certain rules with respect to the appearance of witnesses before grand juries in order better to protect the constitutional rights and liberties of such witnesses under the fourth, fifth, and sixth amendments to the Constitution, to provide for independent inquiries by grand juries, to require periodic reports to Congress, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, during the 94th Congress the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights held hearings on legislation I introduced to correct abuses in the Federal grand jury system. I am today introducing the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977. This bill incorporates most features of the legislation submitted last session, with several improvements adopted as a result of the testimony and comments received during hearings last year. I would urge early consideration this session. With the passage of this legislation Congress will finally restore to the "citizen's jury" its historical role as an independent body which shields the accused from a hasty, malicious, or oppressive prosecution.

In addition to increasing grand jury independence, the Grand Jury Reform Act will insure that the constitutional rights of witnesses are fully protected. The following provisions of the bill are significant in this regard:

First. The grand jury is given the power to conduct investigations into official misconduct and corruption. If the regular Government attorney is not helpful in such an inquiry, the grand jury may request the court to appoint a special prosecutor to assist its investigation.

Second. Witnesses will be permitted to have counsel accompany them inside the grand jury room. In order to prevent the proceeding from becoming a minitrial, counsel will be able to advise the witness, but not be allowed to address the grand jury directly. This provision gives statutory recognition to the fact that a grand jury appearance is indeed a "critical stage" in an inquiry into criminal conduct.

Third. The maximum period of confinement for contempt would be reduced to 6 months from the current 18. In addition, the practice of reiterative contempt would be abolished. This would end the possibility that citizens could be jailed indefinitely without ever being charged with a crime.

Fourth. All proceedings before the grand jury, with the exception of the grand jury's secret deliberations, must be recorded. A witness is given the right to obtain a copy of all statements he makes to the grand jury. [Safeguards are provided to insure that a witness is not coerced into obtaining copies of his testimony by persons he may have implicated to the grand jury.]

Fifth. A new provision has been added to protect the secrecy of grand jury deliberations. The knowing disclosure of grand jury proceedings in order to obtain money or to influence the grand jury or any other legal proceeding is made subject to a maximum fine of $20,000 and a prison sentence of 5 years. Exceptions to disclosure are provided for the witness, his lawyer, the Government attorney, or a news person, acting in his or her professional capacity.

Sixth. A person subpenaed by the grand jury must be advised of his or her constitutional rights, including the right to counsel. If the U.S. attorney has determined that the person's own conduct is under investigation, this "target" information must be provided.

Seventh. A defendant is given the right to a preliminary hearing in all cases, including those in which the prosecutor proceeds by way of indictment. This protection is not provided under current law.

Regrettably, our recent history has shown that some protection must be built into the system itself if the rights of the poor, minorities, or those with unpopular political views are to be protected. The reforms I am proposing today will help provide that protection, but not at the expense of this valued and important institution, or any diligent and scrupulous prosecution. This legislation seeks to restore to the grand jury its original role, shield as well as sword.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to revitalize one of the basic protections guaranteed by our Constitution.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Grand Jury Reform Act be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

S. 1449

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the * * *.

SEC. 2. Section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1826. Recalcitrant witnesses

"(a)(1) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before or ancillary to any court or grand jury of the United States refuses without just cause shown to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the attorney for the Government may apply to the court for an order directing the witness to show cause why the witness should not be held in contempt.

"(2) After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness is entitled to be represented by counsel, the court may, upon finding that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined. Such confinement shall be at a suitable Federal correctional institution, if one is located within miles of the court ordering confinement, unless the witness waives this right. Upon a showing of need or hardship, the court ordering confinement may grant a request by the witness to be imprisoned at a suitable correctional institution near the place of residence or employment of the witness, or the witness' family or relatives or the attorney of the witness.

"(3) Confinement under this section shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

"(4) No hearing shall be held under this subsection unless five days' notice is given to the witness who has refused to comply with the court order, except that a witness may be given a shorter notice of not less than forty-eight hours if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders.

"(b) No person who has been confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events may be again confined under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.

"(c) Any person confined pursuant to this section of this section shall be admitted to bail or released in accordance with the provisions of chapter 207 of title 18, United States Code, pending the determination of an appeal taken by him from the order of his confinement, unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Any appeal from an order of confinement under this section shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, pursuant to an expedited schedule, and in no event more than thirty days from the filing of such appeal.

"(d) In any proceeding conducted under this section, including all necessary appeals, counsel may be appointed in the same manner as provided in section 3006A of title 18 United States Code, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate representation.

"(e) A refusal to answer a question or provide other information before a grand jury of the United States shall not be punishable under this section or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, if the question asked or the request for other information is based in whole or in part upon evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.".

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding

"No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court of the United States under section 401 of this title for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in a proceeding before a grand jury (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331 of this title) impaneled before any district court of the United States may again be imprisoned or fined under section 401 of this title or under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 21 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"403. Refusal of a witness to testify in a grand jury proceeding.".

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

SEC. 4 (a) Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 1515. Violations of grand jury secrecy

"(a) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months or both.

"(b) Whoever knowingly discloses any evidence introduced, statement made, or other matter occurring before, any grand jury summoned or impaneled by a court of the United States, with the intent to secure compensation therefore, to effect the actions of or any decisions by that jury, to effect further legal proceedings against any witness, or to effect further legal proceedings as to the subject matter of any investigation by that jury, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both,

"(c) This section shall not apply to—

"(1) disclosure to or by an attorney for the Government in the performance of his duties;

"(2) disclosure directed or permitted by a court; or

"(3) disclosure by a witness who has appeared before such grand jury, or by his attorney, or any matter concerning which the witness has testified, or produced other information, before the grand jury.

"(4) Any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity.

"(d) Subsection (a) shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceeding.

"(e) As used in this section—

"(1) 'attorney for the Government' includes the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, and an authorized assistant of a United States attorney.

"(2) 'disclosure by a witness' includes disclosure by others of matter the witness has previously disclosed when made as a consequence of such disclosure by the witness.

"(f) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to affect the power of the court to punish any person for contempt for violation of any rule or order of the court.".

(e) The table of sections for chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item: "1512. Violations of Grand Jury Secrecy.".

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURORS: INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

SEC. 5 (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"§ 3329. Rights and duties of grand jury and attorney for Government

"(a) Upon impanelment of each grand jury before a district court of the United States, the court shall give adequate and reasonable notice to the grand jury of, and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands—

"(1) its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district;

"(2) its rights, authority, and powers with respect to an independent inquiry under section 3330 of this title;

"(3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

"(4) its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

"(5) the subject matter of the investigation, and

"(6) the criminal statute or statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

"(7) the necessity of legally sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment as provided under section 3330A (1) of this title;

"(8) the duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there are sufficent grounds for issuing indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments;

"(9) the obligation of secrecy and that it is a criminal offense to disclose to any person any information concerning any grand jury proceeding; and

"(10) such other duties and rights as the court deems advisable. The court's failure to instruct the grand jury as directed in this section shall be just cause within the meaning of section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, for a witness' refusal to testify or provide other information before such grand jury, until such time as the court instructs the grand jury in accordance with this section.

"(b) (1) Any person, including a witness who has previously testified or produced books, records, or documents, may make a written request to the attorney for the Government, or a special attorney appointed pursuant to this title, and request to testify in an inquiry before a grand jury, or to produce books, records, or documents, or to appear before a grand jury and request that the grand jury proceed in accordance with its powers under section 3330 of this title.

"(2) The attorney for the Government, or the special attorney—

"(A) shall forward any request under this subsection to the grand jury and may make a recommendation as to such request;

"(B) shall take reasonable steps to notify any person of his intention to present evidence against the person and request a presentment or indictment and of the person's right to testify or present evidence under this subsection and such notice shall be given a reasonable time in advance of any request for such presentment or indictment unless the attorney for the Government or the special attorney can prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution;

"(C) shall establish a public record of all requests and the action taken on each such request.

"(3) The grand jury shall not be required to hear any witness, or consider any book, record, or document, but shall consider all requests forwarded to it by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney. Unless the grand jury, upon an affirmative vote of a majority of its members, refuses to hear the testimony, or consider the documents offered by a person, under this subsection, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall subpena the evidence or witness offered. If the grand jury refuses to hear the testimony or consider the documents offered, the attorney for the Government or the special attorney shall notify the person making such request, in writing, of the refusal.

"(4) Upon appearing pursuant to a subpena, such person shall be permitted to testify, only upon submission of a waiver of immunity, as to relevant and competent matters under consideration by the jury and shall be subject to examination by the attorney for the Government or the special attorney.

"(c) The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of the witness' appearance that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, nor bring to the attention of the jurors, in any way, the invocation of the privilege by such witness, unless such witness has been given a grant of immunity.

"(d) The attorney for the Government or a special attorney shall not initiate, and a grand jury shall not conduct, an inquiry into a transaction or transactions, event or events, if another jury has failed to return an indictment based on the same transaction or transactions, event or events, unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered.

"§ 3330. Independent grand jury inquiry

"(a) (1) Any grand jury impaneled before any district court (including a special grand jury summoned under section 3331) may, after giving notice to the court, inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States alleged to have been committed within that district by any officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government or by any person who, at the time of the alleged commission of the offense, was an officer or agent of the United States or of any State or municipal government. Such grand jury may request the attorney for the Government to assist the grand jury in such inquiry.

"(2) The grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months after giving notice to the court under paragraph (1) unless an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court or upon a determination of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members that its business has been completed. If, at the end of such term or any extension thereof, the district court determines the business of the grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending such term for an additional period of six months. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed thirty-six months from the date on which notice to the court was given under paragraph (1).

"(3) If a district court within any judicial circuit fails to extend the term of a grand jury engaged upon an independent inquiry under this section or enters an order for the discharge of such grand jury before such grand jury determines that it has completed its business, the grand jury by an affirmative vote of twelve or more members may apply to the chief judge of the circuit for an order for the continuance of the term of the grand jury. Upon the making of such an application by the grand jury, the term thereof shall continue until the entry by the chief judge of the circuit of an appropriate order upon such application. No grand jury term so extended shall exceed twenty-four months.

"(b)(1) In the event that the attorney for the Government is unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist or hinders or impedes the grand jury in the conduct of any inquiry under subsection (a), the grand jury may, upon the affirmative vote of twelve or more of its members, request at any point in such inquiry that the court appoint a special attorney in lieu of the attorney for the Government, to assist the grand jury in the conduct of any independent inquiry referred to in subsection (a). Such special attorney with the approval of the court, may appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants, investigators, and other personnel as he deems necessary. The special attorney and his appointees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that the special attorney and any appointees shall be paid at a reasonable rate to be determined by the court. The special attorney shall be reimbursed for actual expenses incurred by him and his appointees in the performance of duties pursuant to this section.

"(2) Notwithstanding sections 516, 518, and 519 of title 28 or any other provision of law, a special attorney appointed under this section shall carry out the functions of an attorney for the Government and shall have the exclusive authority to—

"(A) assist the conduct of independent grand jury investigations under this section,

"(B) prepare and sign any indictment returned by a grand jury pursuant to such inquiry in lieu of any attorney for the Government and

"(C) conduct all other phases of any criminal prosecution arising out of such inquiry (including the argument of appeals in the United States courts of appeals and the United States Supreme Court).

"(3) A special attorney appointed under this section is authorized to obtain from any department or agency of the United States any files, records, document, or other materials which he deems necessary or appropriate in the carrying out of his functions under this section.".

(c) The Administrator of General Services shall furnish offices, equipment, supplies, and services to a special attorney appointed under section 3330 of title 18, United States Code, in the same manner as such items are furnished to agencies and departments of the United States.

(d) Section 524 of chapter 31 of title 28, United States Code (relating to appropriations for administrative expenses), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Such appropriations shall also be available for payment of the compensation and other expenses of the special attorney appointed under section 3329 of title 18 to assist a grand jury in the conduct of an independent investigation."

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

SEC. 6. (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof, the following new sections:

"§ 3330A. Counsel

"(a) Every witness subpenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury impaneled before a district court or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to the assistance of counsel, including assistance during such time as the witness is questioned in presence of the grand jury.

"(b) Such counsel may be retained by the witness or shall be appointed as provided in section 3006A of this title in the case of any person financially unable to obtain legal representation. Notwithstanding any rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, such witness' counsel is authorized to discuss matters which occur before the grand jury while such counsel is in the grand jury room.

"(c) Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury.

"(e) The court shall have the power to remove such attorney, and order the witness to obtain new counsel, when it finds that the attorney has violated subsection (c) or (d) of this section or that such removal and replacement is necessary to insure that the activities of a grand jury are not unduly delayed or impeded. Nothing in this subsection shall affect the power of the court to punish for contempt or impose other appropriate sanctions.

"(a) In the case of any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, except where the court finds special need upon a showing by the attorney for the Government or a special attorney appointed under this title or the consent of the witness, no subpena may require any witness to testify or produce other information at such proceeding (at any time before the expiration of the one-week period beginning on the date of service of the subpena).

"(b) Upon the service of any subpena requiring any witness to testify or produce other information at any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before a district court, the witness shall be given adequate and reasonable notice of—

"(1) his right to counsel as provided in section 3330A of this title;

"(2) his privilege against self-incrimination;

"(3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation;

"(4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury;

"(5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of the subpena; and

"(6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

"(c) (1) The district court which issued a subpena, or the district court for the district in which the person resides or is served shall have concurrent jurisdiction to hear, and take appropriate action with respect to any motion relating to, including any motion to quash, such subpena.

"(2) A motion relating to a subpena may be made at any time prior to, during, or when appropriate, subsequent to the appearance of any witness before a grand jury. Any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled.

"(3) If a motion is made under this section before the day on which the person subpenaed has been ordered to appear or books, records. or documents have been ordered to be produced, the appearance of such person, or the production of such documents, shall, upon appropriate application, be stayed until the court has ruled on such motion.

"(d) (1) Upon proper motion, the court may quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(A) a primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is or will be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation for such activities by any State or any subdivision thereof, where the accusation is by some form other than indictment;

"(B) the witness has not been advised of his rights, as specified in subsection (b);

"(C) the evidence sought is not relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction;

"(D) compliance with the subpena would be unreasonable or oppressive, as such subpena would require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances; or

"(E) a primary purpose of the issuance of the subpena is to harass the witness.

"(e) Upon proper motion, the court shall quash a subpena and take other appropriate sanctions when it finds that—

"(1) the witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under section 1826 of title 28, United States Code, or section 401 of this title for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events;

"(2) the witness has given written notice that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, unless a grant of immunity has been obtained; or

"(3) the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction or transactions, event or events, that was under consideration by another grand jury which failed to return an indictment based on such transaction or event and there is no additional, newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

"(f) (1) A grand jury impaneled to conduct an inquiry into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States may be convened only in a district, or districts, in which it is believed criminal conduct may have occurred which are elements of such offense; except that when a grand jury is to be convened to conduct an inquiry into both violations of substantive criminal statutes and violations of statutes forbidding conspiracy to violate substantive criminal statutes, the grand jury may not be convened before a district court in a district in which the only criminal conduct alleged to have occurred in that district is conspiracy to commit the substantive criminal act.

"(2) The district court may quash a subpena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation into any other district where it might properly have been convened if the court finds that a witness' appearance would impose a substantial and unnecessary hardship on such witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding. In considering whether such hardship exists, the court shall take into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including the distance of the grand jury investigation from the places of residence of witnesses who have been subpenaed, financial and other burdens placed upon the witnesses, and the existence and nature of any related investigations and court proceedings.".

"§ 3330C. Evidence Presented to the Grand Jury

"(a) The attorney for the Government shall not be permitted to submit before the grand jury any evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States.

"(b) An attorney for the Government shall present to the grand jury all evidence in such attorney's possession which he knows will tend to negate the guilt of the person or persons under investigation.

"(c) A grand jury may indict a person for an offense when (1) the evidence before such grand jury is legally sufficient to establish that such offense was committed, and (2) competent and admissible evidence before such grand jury provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense. An indictment may be based on summarized or hearsay evidence alone only upon showing of good cause to the court which impaneled the grand jury.

"(d) The district court before which a grand jury is impaneled shall dismiss an indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds that—

"(1) the evidence before the grand jury was legally insufficient to establish that the offense for which the indictment was rendered was committed;

"(2) there was not competent and admissible evidence, or summarized or hearsay allowed by the court upon a showing of good cause, before the grand jury to provide reasonable cause to believe that the person indicted committed such offense;

"(3) the attorney for the Government has not presented to the grand jury all evidence in his or her possession which the attorney knows will lead to negate the guilt of the person indicated; or

"(4) the attorney for the Government has submitted to the grand jury evidence seized or otherwise obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness' constitutional rights or of rights established or protected by any statute of the United States."

(b) Section 3006A(a) of title 18, United States Code (relating to appointment of attorneys), is amended—

(1) by striking out "or," before "(4)" in the first sentence thereof; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence thereof; ", or (5) who is a witness before a grand jury impaneled before the district court".

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 7 (a) Chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3333. Recordings of grand jury proceedings

"A complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record of all grand jury proceedings shall be kept, except that the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and their counsel shall not be recorded. Such record shall include the court's notice to the grand jury of its rights and duties and all other comments or charges by the court to the jury, at any time; all introductory comment, or other comments, directives, and other utterances made by attorneys for the government or special attorneys to the grand jury, witnesses and their counsels; all questioning of and testimony of witnesses; all interchanges between the grand jury and attorneys.

"§ 3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

"(a) Any person summoned to testify or provide other information before a grand jury impaneled before a district court shall be entitled, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement in the possession of the United States which he has made and which relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. Such examination and copying may be made by the attorney for such person if such person gives his written approval. As used in this subsection, the term 'statement' has the meaning provided by section 3500(e).

"(b) Any witness who testifies before a grand jury, or his attorney with such witness' written approval, shall, upon request, and under such conditions as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of the record for the period of such witness' own appearance before the grand jury, and if a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript.

"Such transcript shall be made available for inspection and copying not later than forty-eight hours after the conclusion of such witness' testimony, unless, for cause shown, more time is required to prepare such transcript. After examination of such transcript a witness may request permission to appear before the grand jury again to explain his testimony. Additional testimony given under this subsection shall become part of the official transcript and shall be shown to the members of the grand jury.

"(c) Upon a showing of good cause, the court may, at any time, order that the disclosure of the recorded proceedings of a grand jury be denied, restricted or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by the government, the court shall permit the government to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such a showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal by the defendant."

"(d) A reasonable time prior to trial, and after the return of an indictment or the filing of an information, a defendant shall, upon request and under such conditions and limitations as the court deems reasonable, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript or electronic recording of—

"(1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial;

"(2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the Government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case;

"(3) all grand jury testimony or evidence which in any manner could be considered exculpatory; and

"(4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense.

(b) Section 3500, title 18, United States Code, is amended

(1) by inserting "or" before subsection (e)(2) thereof:

(2) by deleting "; or" and inserting "." at the end of subsection (e)(2) thereof; and

(3) by deleting subsection (e)(3) thereof.

(c) The table of sections for chapter 215 of title 18, United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new items:

"3329. Notice to grand jury of its rights and duties.
"3330. Independent grand jury inquiry.
"3330A. Certain rights of grand jury witnesses.
"3330B. Subpoenas.
"3300C. Evidence presented to the grand jury.
"3333. Recording of grand jury porceedings.
"3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements."

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

SEC. 8. (a) Chapter 217 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3368. Preliminary examination

"(a) A defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination, unless waived, when charged with an offense, other than a petty offense, which is to be tried by a judge of the district court.

"(b) Such preliminary examination may be held prior to, or within a reasonable time following, the filing of an indictment or information in the district court.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 217 of title 18. United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"§ 3368. Preliminary Examination."

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Section 522 of title 28, United States Code (relating to reports of business and statistics), is amended by striking out "The Attorney General" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a) The Attorney General" and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Attorney General, at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, shall report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts with respect to the last preceding fiscal year on—

"(1) the number of investigations undertaken in which a grand jury or a special grand jury was utilized together with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken;

"(2) the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to apply to the court for an order compelling testimony under section 2003 of title 18, and the number of such requests approved by the Attorney General;

"(3) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18;

"(4) the number of applications to district courts for orders granting immunity under title 18 that were approved and the nature of the investigations for which the orders were sought;

"(5) the number of instances in which witnesses in the investigations enumerated in paragraph (1) were held in contempt and confined, and the dates and lengths of such confinement;

"(6) the number of arrests, indictments, no-bills, trials, and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity, the offenses for which the convictions were obtained, and a general assessment of the importance of the immunity;

"(7) a description of data banks and other procedure by which grand jury information is processed, stored, and used by the Department of Justice; and

"(8) other appropriate information concerning grand jury activity during such year.

The matters contained in the report required to be made by this section shall be set forth according to judicial district.".

EFFECT ON OTHER LAWS AND RULES

SEC. 10. (a) The enumeration in this Act of any rights and privileges of grand jury witnesses shall not affect any other rights and privileges to which such witnesses may be entitled under any law or rule of law.

(b) Notwithstanding section 3771, no rule contained in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure shall apply to the extent that such rule is inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

FEDERAL GRAND JURY REFORM. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JANUARY 19, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, last year my subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law conducted hearings and received testimony on alleged abuses of the Federal grand jury system, and obtained a study of such abuses from the Library of Congress for inclusion in the hearing record.

I have recently introduced H.R. 1614 proposing extensive reforms in the Federal grand jury system to eliminate or lessen these abuses. I expect to hold further hearings on this and on other related bills this session and report out comprehensive legislation.

I would like to include in the Record a series of articles detailing alleged abuses and particularly in the cases of Phil Shinnick and Jay Weiner:

HOW WELL DO GRAND JURIES WORK?

(By Dena Kleiman)

On any weekday in New York City, as many as two dozen grand juries meet with prosecutors in secret to consider whether suspected criminals should be indicted and brought to trial.

In recent months, procedures used by prosecutors in questioning witnesses, presenting evidence and drawing indictments have been criticized as a number of indictments by Maurice H. Nadjari, the former Special State Prosecutor, and others have been dismissed because of prosecutorial misconduct.

These dismissals underscore what an increasing number of legislators, lawyers and judges believe is a need to revise the grand jury system and institute new safeguards to curb prosecutorial abuse.

In the last month, indictments brought by Mr. Nadjari against Justices Joseph A. Brust, Carmine De Sapio and Patrick J. Cunningham have been dismissed.

In addition, a State Supreme Court Jutice has indicated he would dismiss a perjury and bribery indictment against Justice Irving H. Saypol and the Appellate Division has upheld the dismissal of an indictment brought by Charles J. Hynes, now the Special Prosecutor, against Albert H. Blumenthal, the outgoing State Assembly Majority Leader.

In each case, judges said that prosecutors relied on insufficient evidence or that they mislead witnesses into perjury charges when nothing more substantive could be established.

What is there about a grand jury proceeding that lends itself to prosecutorial abuse? How have critics said the system should be changed?

The grand jury, composed of 23 persons, is said to date from 1181 in England, the time of King Henry II, when it was [illegible]med to protest the power of the monarch. Over the years its purpose evol[illegible] into a safeguard against arbitrary prosecution. England abandoned the system in 1933 as outmoded and too costly. Charges now are made by prosecutors.

In the United States, the grand jury has come to serve two functions. One type of grand jury hears evidence after an arrest. The grand jurors must decide, by a vote of at least 12, if there is sufficient cause for an indictment. If the suspect is indicted, he faces trial.

A second type of grand jury investigates criminal wrong-doing and accordingly is vested with great power. It can subpoena and question anyone who may help its inquiry. Those who refuse to testify can be held in contempt and sent to jail.

In both, the prosecutor stands before the grand jurors as a legal adviser. Theoretically, he may not attempt to influence them. But in practice, there is often little doubt how a prosecutor feels about a case, and because grand jurors often look to prosecutors for guidance, much as petit jurors look to a judge during a trial, prosecutors can influence the outcome of an inquiry.

Critics contend that investigatory grand juries invite prosecutorial abuse—which can result in phony perjury indictments based on misleading questions—and that safeguards are needed to insure the system's integrity. They say that indicting grand juries have become archaic, more rubber stamps for a prosecutor, and should be abolished.

"Prosecutorial abuse is real," said Assemblyman Stanley Fink, Democrat of Brooklyn, Chairman of the State Assembly's Codes Committee, which issued a report on such abuse last May and plans hearings this session on revising the investigatory grand jury. "Our feeling is that the grand jury was originally designed to serve as a buffer between the governent and the people. It no longer does."

Mr. Fink's committee and one in Washington, a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee chaired by Joshua Eilberg, Democrat of Pennsylvania, are considering these proposals:

Permitting witnesses to have a lawyer inside the grand jury room. In 41 states, including New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, a lawyer must remain outside the room, so there is no one present to object to a misleading question. In 1974, the New York Legislature passed a bill providing for counsel inside the room, but it was vetoed by Governor Carey who said there was insufficient evidence that such a change was needed.

Informing witnesses of the line of inquiry before they appear so that they are better prepared.

Informing a witness of his rights, including the right to counsel and the right to remain silent if an answer would tend to incriminate him, before he is called inside the grand jury room.

Restricting rules of evidence and procedure to those that apply during a trial. A prosecutor is under less restrictions during a grand jury proceeding than he is at trial.

Those opposed to changing the investigatory grand jury system argue that it is not designed to be an adversary proceeding but rather a search for the truth. They say that the presence of a witness' lawyer might make for objections that could bog down the proceeding, and that a grand jury should operate with vast latitude and not be inhibited by the same restrictions imposed at criminal trials.

Critics of change also argue that historically the grand jury has worked well, that it is one of the rare institutions that provide for community participation in the administration of justice and that most prosecutors are responsible lawyers who conduct the proceedings accordingly.

With respect to the indicting grand jury, long considered a rubber stamp, twenty-nine states have allowed the prosecutor to bypass this panel and file charges in open court. In these states, including Connecticut, after a suspect has been arrested and probable cause has been established by the police, a prosecutor may file the charges by means of an "information." These states have retained the investigatory grand jury.

PHIL SHINNICK GOES TO PRISON—PATTY HEARST GOES FREE

(By William Taaffe)

Before the student uprisings of the late 1960s, Phil Shinnick was a jock. The title wasn't as disparaging as it later would become, and Shinnick didn't mind being described that way. He was a winner and proud of it, forever demonstrating on the athletic field the kind of excellence so appreciated and rewarded in the America of the Kennedy years.

In his way, Shinnick was a kind of Renaissance athlete. He was a marvel of stamina and grace, competing in several track and field events within minutes of each other in a single meet.

In 1964, when he was 22, he set an unofficial world's record in the long jump and held Canada's record in the decathlon. That fall he flew to Tokyo to compete in the 18th Olympiad.

Twelve years later, Shinnick appeared before the gates of a federal prison in a place called Allenwood, Pa. No longer was he considered a model American by this nation's sports establishment, much less by those who enforce the country's laws.

Shinnick will never forget the date: Nov. 30, 1976. Before his two daughters, aged eight and 10, he was handcuffed and escorted into the prison to begin serving a sentence of indefinite length.

Phil Shinnick's voyage through the late 1960s and middle 1970s has been replete with irony. In the late sixties he tried to reform the very sports establishment that one year named him Athlete of the Year at the University of Washington.

He was sent to prison by the very country he served as a captain in the Air Force, and as a kind of goodwill sports ambassador in Africa and Latin America. And not least of all, he was jailed exactly one week after Patricia Hearst went free on $500,000 bond.

The Shinnick-Hearst connection is a tenuous one at best, an amalgam of allegations leaked by the FBI to the news media over the last 2½ years and the uncorroborated trial testimony of Hearst, who said Shinnock transported Symbionese Liberation Army member Emily Harris from San Francisco to Scranton, Pa., in the summer of 1974.

Federal prosecutors investigating the alleged harboring of Hearst at a farmhouse in South Canaan, Pa., have obtained no indictment of Shinnick and admit that he is not even a target of the investigation at this time.

Yet Shinnick now is in prison while Hearst is free. That fact may say something about the state of the so-called "athletic revolution" he and several other athletes tried to begin around the time of the Olympic Games in 1968. It is a circumstance that does say something about the administration of justice in America is 1977.

Shinnick was sent to prison on civil contempt charges stemming from his appearance before the federal grand jury in Scranton last August. U.S. Atty. S. John Cottone has said that Jack Scott and his wife, Micki, close friends of Shinnick and also radicals in the athletic movement, are the focus of the probe.

Cottone apparently called Shinnick before the jury because he believes the former athlete was involved in harboring Hearst or has knowledge the government could use in obtaining an indictment against others.

Shinnick was sent to jail not because he refused to testify before the grand jury under a grant of immunity (he was willing to answer all its questions), but because he refused to comply with a certain demand of Cottone, the prosecutor.

At the August session, Cottone handed the jury foreman instructions that Shinnick should be forced to supply the FBI with his fingerprints and samples of his handwriting and hair in a room near the jury chamber.

It so happens under the American system that the FBI itself has no power to subpoena evidence from a person who has not been convicted of a crime. The right to such protection from indiscriminate police power is a right guaranteed to all Americans, whether they be mafia dons, alleged murderers or the most peaceful of grandmothers.

Shinnick refused to comply with the jury's (initially Cottone's) request, arguing that the FBI could easily obtain his fingerprints and handwriting samples from the Air Force, where his job involved the preparation of hand-written reports.

Shinnick offered to provide the jury a sample of his hair that would be kept under the control of the U.S. District Court for comparison with any independent samples the FBI may have. Such procedure would guard against any mix-up of hair samples, he felt.

Nevertheless, Shinnick was cited for contempt and sent to jail, where he will remain until the end of the jury's term July 31 or until he agrees to provide the FBI with his hair.

"Once a witness states the conditions under which the grand jury can receive evidence that it is entitled to, then the grand jury becomes less independent to that extent," said Cottone's assistant, Lawrence Kelly.

Also cited for contempt and sent to Allenwood was Jay Weiner, a 23-year-old sportswriter and friend of Scott and Shinnick. According to Hearst's testimony at her trial for bank robbery last year, Weiner once appeared at the Pennsylvania farmhouse where she was hiding from authorities. He refused to testify under a grant of "use immunity," which prohibits the government from using the words of his testimony against him at a later date.

The imprisonment of Shinnick, especially at a time when Hearst is free to return to her pre-revolutionary life and grant interviews on national television, has angered civil libertarians in this country as few other grand jury cases have in recent months.

Cottone and the FBI have served as judge and jury, they argue. For more than two years the government has been unable to indict Shinnick. His imprisonment for civil contempt is mere vindictiveness, the only way prosecutors can "convict" him, the government's opponents insist.

A group called the Coalition for Grand Jury Abuse, supported by former Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark and dozens of other well-known lawyers, has denounced Shinnick's jailing.

"In our view," a spokesman for the coalition told Congress recently, "there is no process or institution in America today more potentially destructive than the unregulated, unchecked, unbalanced grand jury inquisition. With it prosecutors and police agencies have the power to compel the appearance of any person anywhere at any time, to introduce illegal evidence, to grill witnesses about anything in the absence of constitutional restraints and to jail without trial."

When Shinnick said goodby to his daughters and friends on that gray day in November, he entered a minimum security institution. The handcuffs, really just a brutish ceremony, came off once Shinnick got inside the front door. He began to adjust; friends brought him running shoes for laps around Allenwood's track.

But the prosecutor wasn't quite through with Shinnick. On Dec. 16, the Philadelphia Daily News published an interview with Shinnick and Weiner. Although convicted prisoners have a basic right to speak to the press, Cottone promptly prohibited both men from talking to reporters.

Cottone was able to deny their First Amendment rights because of a loophole in the law. Felons fall under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. Those cited for civil contempt technically are subject to the court and U.S. marshals, who take orders from the prosecutor. Several lawyers last week said they thought Cottone's order was unprecedented.

"It's an appalling procedure," said Richard Gerstein, a prosecutor for 23 years in Miami and chairman of the American Bar Association's grand jury committee. "There is no legitimate basis for it whatsoever. If you're conducting a prosecutor's office and conducting it fairly, you have nothing to fear by those cited for contempt talking to the press. I don't care if they're Mafia. It's still appalling."

"It's outrageous," Clark said. "These two men haven't even been convicted of a crime. I don't see how you can deny them access to the press."

Cottone defended his action by arguing that Shinnick and Weiner are involved in a case still under investigation and that if indictments are issued, any news stories could allow defendants to move for a mistrial on grounds of prejudicial publicity. But yesterday, Judge William J. Nealon overruled Cottone and ended the ban after it had been enforced for three weeks.

Friends of Shinnick and Weiner say they were greeted as heroes by Allenwood inmates (among them Bernard Bergman, the New York nursing home bandit, and G. Gordon Liddy of Watergate notoriety) because they had not been charged with any crime. Outside of prison, the lionizing of Shinnick and Weiner also has begun.

College students in New York have staged fund-raising races for the two men. Faculty and students at Rutgers University's Livingston College, where Shinnick is an assistant professor in a sports-sociology program, have demonstrated for his release.

New York Times columnist Tom Wicker recently featured Shinnick on the paper's op-ed page. There are reports that CBS is preparing a segment on Shinnick's plight for "Sixty Minutes." And finally, outgoing Atty. Gen. Edward Levi has decided to review the entire Shinnick-Weiner case—to determine, an aide said, "If the necessary evidence can be obtained any other way."

Shinnick has said from prison that he believes the government is "out to get" the critics of the sports establishment, not simply to build a case against Scott. But why the sudden attention surrounding Shinnick?

Part of it may involve the public's appetite for all things relating to Hearst. Some of it may stem from the arguable tactics the government has used against him. And much of it may be based on the metamorphosis of American Olympian into U.S. prisoner.

If you had written the story of the quintessential All-American youth in the early sixties, you would have written the story of Phil Shinnick. At Washington, he married a beauty queen who served as the head baton twirler. Amazingly, he won the school's best athlete award at a time when only football players were used to getting it. He belonged to the local Newman Center, a Catholic lay organization, and once spent an entire summer's vacation building a church in Alaska.

He loved Seattle and the city returned his affections. Just after College he went to work in the mayor's office and Seattle gave Shinnick its annual "distinguished citizen" award. At one time, he worked in the middle levels of Sen. Henry (Scoop) Jackson's campaign. Then he entered the Air Force, working behind a desk in Los Angeles and participating in State Department tours by athletes to what then were called the emerging nations.

Perhaps it was these trips that transformed his ideas about the way sports were administered and athletes were treated in the United States. When the Olympic Games were held in Mexico City in 1968, Shinnick, as an alternate member of the U.S. team, was one of few white athletes in this country who endorsed the black power salute of John Carlos and Tommie Smith on the reviewing stand.

After those games, Shinnick enrolled at Berkeley to pursue a doctoral degree in education psychology. It was now the late 1960's, the antiwar movement was consuming the nation, the feminists were crusading and Berkeley offered such a ferment of ideas and radical politics that there seemed to be a campus chapter for every cause exposed in America.

It happened in Berkeley, 1969, that Shinnick crossed paths with Jack Scott. Scott has organized and grandiloquently named the Institute for the Study of Sport and Society, and he and Shinnick became close friends, both of them working towards one end—to stop the glorifying and the dehumanization they professed to see of amateur and professional athletes.

A few years later Scott accepted a job as athletic director at Oberlin College in Ohio, where he put some of his radical concepts of sport into effect. Shinnick went to Livingston. One of his first actions was to open the gymnasium to the local community and urge inner-city residents to participate in athletics.

"Phil always thought through his commitments," Scott says. "He came to identify with the type of commitment Phil and Dan Berrigan (the activist priests) had. He never identified with Che Guevara, for example, or the Yippies or the crazies."

Nevertheless, Shinnick had come full circle by last November. Marie Coles, a friend of Shinnick from Livingston, was one of several people who visited him just before Christmas. She recalls that Quincy Shinnick, his eight-year-old, was there to say hello.

"Daddy, you're going to be home for Christmas," she assured him.

Shinnick, who eventually was granted a five-day furlough for the holidays, "just was silent for a moment, not knowing what to say," Coles recalls. "Then he said, "Well, I might not be." His daughter was just sitting there. Maybe it takes a parent to feel that. But it was sad."

A MODERN INQUISITION

(By Tom Wicker)

Patty Hearst is out of prison and Phil Shinnick is in, and thereby hangs a tale of American justice.

Mr. Shinnick, 34, once held the world record for the long-jump and twice represented the United States in the Olympic Games. In 1972, he became the athletic director at Livingston College of Rutgers University. But he is now off the university's payroll and in the Allenwood Federal Penitentiary in Pennsylvania.

No one contends that Mr. Shinnick is being punished for a crime. He is not even charged with a crime. He has been imprisoned on civil contempt charges growing out of his appearance before a grand jury in Scranton, Pa., last Aug. 13.

At that grand jury hearing, Mr. Shinnick did not refuse to answer questions. He did not refuse to give the grand jury any evidence that it required for its own deliberations. He refused, instead to give the Federal Bureau of Investigation his fingerprints, samples of his handwriting and clippings of his hair.

When Mr. Shinnick appeared in the grand jury room—without a lawyer, as all witnesses must—a United States Attorney gave the foreman a statement to read. The statement instructed Mr. Shinnick to give fingerprints, writing samples and hair clippings to the F.B.I. in a room adjacent to that of the grand jury.

Now it happens that the F.B.I. does not have subpoena power. Outside the grand jury room, the bureau would have no legal way to get such exemplars from Mr. Shinnick or any other unconvicted citizen who did not want to provide them.

It happens, further, that the fingerprints of Mr. Shinnick, a former Air Force captain, are easily available to the F.B.I. through Air Force records. So are samples of his handwriting, since his Air Force job involved writing reports. And he offered to give the grand jury—not the F.B.I.—a hair sample, which would be sealed in an envelope and held in custody of the Scranton district court. If the Government had hair samples it wanted to match against his, he said, the Government's hair samples could be held in the same fashion, to guard against mix-up or misuse.

Upon Mr. Shinnick's inquiry, moreover, the grand jury could give him no reason why these exemplars were necessary to its investigation. He had not been given "use immunity," a prosecutorial device that effectively removes the Fifth Amendments rights against self-incrimination of the person granted such immunity.

But Mr. Shinnick's refusal, not to answer grand jury questions but to give the F.B.I. materials it otherwise could not legally have obtained, has resulted in his imprisonment for civil contempt. His incarceration, which began Nov. 30, could last for the life of the grand jury—until next July—and could be resumed if the same drama is played out before a successor grand jury. Meanwhile Rutgers has announced that it "will stop payment of his salary for as long as he remains unable to meet his classes."

What is this Kafkaesque nightmare all about, and how could it happen in a country where, supposedly, grand juries are provided to protect citizens from the arbitrary use of government power?

Apparently, the F.B.I. suspects Mr. Shinnick of having been involved in, or at least of knowing something about, the alleged harboring of Patricia Hearst in a Pennsylvania farmhouse in 1974. The Government told his attorney that the Air Force fingerprints and handwriting samples would not be "good enough" to use in a trial—which makes it clear that the grand jury was being used to force Mr. Shinnick to provide evidence that might be used against him in court.

Mr. Shinnick, who is more radical politically than the F.B.I. thinks proper, in turn suspects that the F.B.I. wants the hair clippings and other exemplars in order to concoct a frameup linking him criminally to Patty Hearst or those who protected her. He contends also that the subpoena summoning him to the grand jury was based on a wiretap put on his telephone and another on his attorney's telephone.

However that may be, the Shinnick case is one more in a lengthening pattern of blatant government use of grand juries for inquisitorial rather than accusatory purposes. The late Senator Philip Hart once said that grand juries now were being commonly used "to conduct political surveillances and build dossiers in the guise of investigating specific offenses" and it seems clear that that is about what the Government tried to do in the Shinnick case.

Attorney General Levi nevertheless strongly resisted reform legislation debated in Congress last session. That legislation will be introduced again next year and the Shinnick case may give it new urgency—but hardly enough to get him out of prison before July.

Olympic Spirit, FBI-Style—Two Face Jail for Resisting Harassment

For star athletes the world over, summer '76 meant the glory of the Olympics. But for Phil Shinnick, a 1964 U.S. Olympian and one-time world record holder in the long jump, summer '76 marked the climax of a grand jury inquisition.

As this Report goes to press, Shinnick and a 22-year-old friend, sportwriter Jay Weiner, are headed for jail. Officially, Shinnick and Weiner are going to jail because in August they refused to supply evidence to a Scranton, Pa. federal grand jury that is supposed to be investigating the harboring of one-time fugitive Patty Hearst.

Actually, Shinnick and Weiner are going to jail because silence and non-cooperation are their only ways of saying "no" to the FBI harassment which has, for the past 18 months, left their lives and careers in a shambles. The FBI suspects that Shinnick and Weiner were involved in the Pennsylvania farmhouse where Patty Hearst took refuge in 1974. Instead of indicting the two for their alleged role, however, and giving them a chance to defend themselves, the government has, in effect, already decided to punish them—with the grand jury.

The FBI first broke into Jay Weiner's life in February, 1975. Weiner was staying at his parents' Philadelphia home when agents approached and began questioning him about Patty Hearst. Weiner, who felt the FBI was trying to set his friends up for an indictment, exercised his legal right not to answer.

"We have other ways of getting it out of you," one of the agents then threatened, and the first "other way" came two weeks earlier. FBI agents forced Weiner's car off the road, threatened him with their guns and closeted him in a nearby office the rest of the evening for interrogation, all the while ignoring Weiner's repeated requests to see a lawyer. Two days later a thoroughly intimidated Weiner was hauled before a Harrisburg, Pa. federal grand jury where he answered questions.

Meanwhile, Shinnick got his first FBI visit March 4, the day after he had had a phone conversation with Weiner. Shinnick also refused to talk, but the FBI agents came back again—and again—to try to get him to change his mind.

"I was not merely visited," he remembers, "I was stalked."

The stalking wasn't enough to break Shinnick's silence, so the Bureau started leaking Shinnick's name to reporters covering the Hearst affair. That generated newspaper reports around the country linking Shinnick to Patty Hearst. The newspaper articles, coupled with FBI visits to the Rutgers University campus where Shinnick taught, cost the former Olympian his job as Rutger's director of sport studies.

The FBI wasn't through. Shinnick learned that his friends had been contacted by FBI agents and told he was involved in the Hearst case. Other friends said that letters Shinnick had mailed to them arrived apparently already opened. On numerous occasions, clicks and other tell-tale signs of wire-tapping disrupted Shinnick's phone conversations.

As a crowning blow, the FBI had Shinnick subpoenaed before a federal grand jury. He refused to testify, and the FBI backed off—momentarily.

But a year later, in May, 1976, the Bureau renewed the subpoena pressure. Weiner, who hadn't been able to find a journalism job because of the adverse publicity, was called before a Scranton grand jury which had six more months to run than the Harrisburg panel that had been investigating the Hearst case. The switch to Scranton added six months to the contempt confinement hanging over Weiner's head if he refused to testify.

Shinnick, informed he was a target of the investigation, was ordered to provide the same grand jury with his fingerprints as well as samples of his handwriting and hair.

The two immediately challenged the subpoenas. Shinnick was an Air Force veteran, and the government already had his fingerprints and handwriting on record. Since hair samples are notoriously poor indices of personal identification, Shinnick's subpoena struck observers as retaliation for his earlier silence.

In Weiner's case, the government looked as if it was out to dress rehearse testimony from Weiner for use in the prosecution of his friends, Jack and Micki Scott. The Scotts, well-known sports activists, have not yet been indicted for their widely alleged role in harboring fugitive Patty Hearst, even though the government, judging from its leaks to the press, has had enough evidence to indict them for months. But grand juries are not permitted to investigate cases where an indictment has already been handed down—the government, if they were, could use the grand jury subpoena power to discover a defense's trial strategy—and the government's delay in indicting the Scotts seems clearly a move to sidestep this prohibition.

The supervisory court, however, refused to quash the subpoenas in September. It ignored the evidence of FBI misconduct and manipulation of the grand jury process—as have most courts in similar circumstances over recent years—and, by doing so, helped to encourage further abusive FBI behavior.

That's because FBI agents lack subpoena power of their own. In theory, at least, they must rely on persuasion to gain a witness' cooperation. In reality, however, FBI agents do control subpoena authority—the grand jury's. As long as courts permit the FBI to exercise this authority, agents can be as heavy-handed as they choose with witnesses. Should a witness object to "third-degree" treatment by refusing to answer questions, FBI agents need merely have the witness subpoenaed before a grand jury where he or she must testify or go to jail.

And so long as the FBI retains this access to the grand jury's subpoena power, there won't be much meaningful reform of the grand jury—or the Bureau.

American Bar Association Committee Supports Federal Grand Jury Reform
(Congressional Record, Jan. 31, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. Eilberg. Mr. Speaker, during the hearings of my Judiciary Subcommittee in the 94th Congress, representatives of the American Bar Association testified as to the need for grand jury reform and supported our efforts to make those reforms.

The Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association recently passed a series of standards relating to the grand jury, which will be submitted to the full membership of the American Bar Association in a few weeks. The report which accompanied the proposed standards indicates that they closely parallel the provisions of my bill, H.R. 1614, the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, which I recently introduced.

At this time I insert in the Record the report of the Criminal Justice Section of the ABA and the summary of the "Proposed ABA Grand Jury Principles":

House of Delegates To Receive Section Reports on Grand Jury Reform, Changes to F.R.Cr.P.

The Criminal Justice Section will ask the ABA's policy-making House of Delegates to place the Association in favor of major reforms in the operation of grand juries at both the federal and state levels. The request will be made in the form of a general resolution (similar to the one printed in the right-hand column of this page) which the House of Delegates will debate at its Midyear Meeting, February 9–15 in Seattle, Washington.

Based upon a report prepared by the Section's Grand Jury Committee, chaired by State's Attorney Richard E. Gerstein of Miami, Florida, the Section's resolution may well be among the most controversial—and potentially most far-reaching—subjects to be considered at the Midyear Meeting.

The report is phrased in terms of legislative principles in order that specific wording of grand jury reform bills introduced in the 95th Congress can be supported or opposed as appropriate, Gerstein said.

As amended the report was approved unanimously by the Section's Governing Council at its fall meeting in Scottsdale, Arizona, in November, capping two years of intense Section study of grand jury reform. During that period. Gerstein testified twice on behalf of the Section on grand jury reform proposals before Congress, and the Section won limited support from the Association on the issue.

The Section's Grand Jury Committee is composed primarily of persons with substantial prosecutorial experience. In addition to Gerstein, they include: Seymour Glanzer of Washington, D.C.; Richard H. Kuh of New York City; George D. Crowley of Chicago; Judge Jack Rosenberg of New York City; David Austern of Washington; Charles Ruff of Washington; Professor George Pugh of the Louisiana State University Law School, Baton Rouge; Brian P. Gettings of Arlington, Virginia; Judge Paul Baker of Miami; Peter F. Langrock of Middlebury, Vermont; Paul B. Johnson of Tampa; Professor Melvin B. Lewis of John Marshall Law School, Chicago; and Sol Rosen of Washington. The law student member of the committee is Peter R. Wubbenhorst of Birmingham.

Capitol Hill Roundup

When Criminal Justice went to press, Washington was filled with speculation about what the 95th Congress would be doing. Here are some "best bets" as perceived by Herbert Hoffman, Staff Director of the ABA's Governmental Relations Office.

Grand Jury Reform—Early February hearings are expected by Rep. Joshua Eilberg's (D.-Pa.) Judiciary Subcommittee. His bill (HR 1277) is much less comprehensive than HR 2986 (proposed by Rep. John Conyers, (D.-Mi.) but is thought to have the best chance of passage. It includes provisions for a grand jury of 15 and indictments by 9 votes. Changes on the role of counsel and challenges to subpoenas are also expected.

Proposed ABA Grand Jury Principles

Be it resolved. That the American Bar Association support in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following priniciples:

1. A grand jury witness shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his appearance before the grand jury; the role of such counsel should be the same as that before a Congressional committee.

2. A subject of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such subjects of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

3. The grand jury shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence.

4. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted coconspirator to a criminal conspiracy.

5. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

6. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

7. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any noncriminal inquiry.

8. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

9. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

10. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry.

11. In any case in which a subpoenaed witness or a person directly affected thereby moves on proper grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena, the prosecutor should be required to make a reasonable showing in camera and on the record before the court convening the grand jury that the evidence being sought is:

(a) relevant to the grand jury investigation;
(b) properly within the grand jury's investigation; and
(c) not sought primarily for another purpose.

12. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

13. When the circumstances make it reasonable, motions to quash or modify subpoenas may be brought at the place where the witness resides, the documents sought are maintained, or before the court which issued the subpoena at the election of the witness. Such motions should be heard in camera and on the record.

14. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

15. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

16. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 15.

17. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any case.

18. If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise.

19. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

20. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

21. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

22. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury and is found in contempt should not exceed 6 months.

23. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

FEDERAL GRAND JURY REFORM (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, FEB. 2, 1977)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee considering proposals to reform the Federal Grand Jury, and as the author of H.R. 94, a bill to make those reforms, I have been receiving numerous letters and cards concerning the cases of Phillip Shinnick and Jay Weiner. Most of these communications request an investigation of these cases. It is the policy of the Judiciary Committee not to get involved in pending cases. However, an analysis of complaints concerning alleged grand jury abuses provide information about specific reforms.

Therefore, I asked the Library of Congress to analyze these cases and my staff to collect press articles on them.

I would like to include in the Record, the Library of Congress study and newspaper articles:

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., January 19, 1977.

To: Honorable Joshua Eilberg.
Attn: David Umansky.
From: American Law Division.
Subject: Examination of cases of Jay Weiner and Phillip Shinnick.

This is in response to your inquiry and our subsequent telephone conversation in which you requested an examination of the case of Jay Weiner and Phillip Shinnick to determine whether the facts may suggest areas where the powers available in connection with federal grand jury investigations are subject to abuse.

Jay Weiner and Phillip Shinnick were granted immunity and subpoenaed to appear as witnesses before a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Pennsylvania investigating the possibility that Patricia Hearst and William and Emily Harris were harbored within the district in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1071. Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick were ultimately incarcerated for failure to comply with the grand jury subpoenas, see 28 U.S.C. § 1826. They had previously tried unsuccessfully to have the subpoenas quashed, United States v. Weiner, 418 F. Supp. 941 (W.D.Pa. 1967), aff'd without opinion sub nom. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, No. 76-2286 (3d Cir. Oct. 27, 1976).

Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick were among those whom Patricia Hearst named in testimony at her bank robbery trial as having been present while she was a fugitive and staying near South Canaan, Pennsylvania, within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Weiner's testimony was sought as part of the grand jury's investigation into the possible harboring of Miss Hearst within the Middle District and the grand jury sought to obtain Mr. Shinnick's fingerprints, samples of his handwriting and clippings of his hair to compare with evidence found during the course of the investigation.

Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick sought to have the subpoenas quashed on several grounds. They contended that the subpoenas should be quashed because of prosecution misconduct and because the subpoenas were returnable to an improper situs. They also filed a motion for disclosure of any wire or oral interception of their communications.

The court ordered the government to submit affidavits affirming or denying the instances of wire or oral interceptions of the communications of Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick. The court found the affidavits submitted in response sufficient to meet the witness' allegations of illegal electronic surveillance.

The witnesses argued that the subpoenas were returnable to an improper situs because they instructed the witnesses to appear before the grand jury sitting in Scranton while the investigation had been originated by a federal grand jury in Harrisburg. The witnesses felt that the second grand jury investigation had been convened to "avoid the possibility that the Harrisburg grand jury . . . would decide that [their] testimony was not necessary" 418 F. Supp. at 951, and because the Scranton grand jury had a longer unexpired term so that the amount of time the witnesses could be incarcerated under 28 U.S.C. § 1826 would be longer. The court accepted the government's response that the witnesses had been subpoenaed to appear in Scranton rather than Harrisburg because the possible criminal violations under investigation were alleged to have occurred within the Scranton division of the district and as a result the Scranton panel would have been selected from a group of potential jurors which would have included residences of the county where the harboring was believed to have occurred while the Harrisburg panel would not.

Mr. Weiner also contended that he had been subjected to governmental misconduct in that he had been subpoenaed four times to appear before the grand jury investigating Patty Hearst. The court rejected this pointing out that two of the subpoenas had been quashed and one of those had been issued in connection with a federal grand jury investigation in California and that the final subpoena involved an appearance before Patty Hearst testified.

Mr. Weiner also moved to have the government instructed to affirm or deny whether he was a target of the investigation and for a transcript of his testimony. The court denied the latter as premature and held that the government was under no obligation to inform him whether he was a target of the investigation.

Mr. Shinnick also sought to quash on the grounds that his fingerprints and examples of his handwriting were already in the government's possession because of his service in the armed forces and that the cuttings of his hair would be inadmissible evidence. The court responded that the grand jury was entitled to fresh evidence if it chose; that the government should not be forced to undergo the burdens of establishing chain of possession and other problems in using the evidence from Shinnick's service record, and that the hair was not necessarily inadmissible.

Those who feel that present federal law permits abuse of the power associated with grand jury investigations might point to any of a number of features in the Weiner and Shinnick cases to document their contentions.

For example, many may feel that use of grand jury subpoenas reenforced by 28 U.S.C. § 1826 to secure physical evidence such as fingerprints and handwriting samples that could be secured in other ways far more convenient for the witness and yet no less effective is repressive.

Others may feel that the issuance of four subpoenas to appear before the grand jury is harassment even if two of the subpoenas are ultimately quashed.

It might also be argued that the government's investigation could not be substantially impaired by providing the witness with a copy of his grand jury testimony or with indicating whether or not the witness was the target of the grand jury's investigation. Of course, many would feel that prosecution of Weiner and/or Shinnick after their appearances before the grand jury would be in violation of the spirit of the Fifth Amendment in that they will have been made to participate in the preparation of the case again themselves.

Finally, there may be those who feel that the cases exemplify instances where the government has used the grand jury and 18 U.S.C. § 1826 as a shortcut for prosecution; thereby bypassing the rights that would ordinarily be afforded a criminally accused.

The United States v. In re Grand Jury Proceedings: Subpoena of Jay Weiner.
The United States v. In re Grand Jury Proceedings: Phillip Kent Shinnick.
United States District Court, M.D. Pennsylvania, July 13, 1976.

Opinion on the Merits Aug. 6, 1976.

On filing of various motions by witnesses subpoenaed by grand jury investigating the possible harboring of federal fugitives, the District Court Nealon, J., held inter alia, that an initial government denial that the witnesses had been subjects of electronic surveillance was insufficient to satisfy the requirements of applicable statute, but that supplemental affidavits later filed by the Government were sufficient in such regard.

Witnesses' motions denied.

1. Grand Jury—36.

If questions posed to grand jury witness or requests for other information or materials have been based on information derived from illegal electronic surveillance, "just cause" for witness not to answer or respond exists. 18 U.S.A. §§ 3504, 3504(b); 28 U.S.C.A. § 1826(a).

See publication Words and Phrases for other judicial constructions and definitions.

2. Grand Jury—36.

Where potential grand jury witnesses claimed that they had been subjected to illegal electronic surveillance, United States did not satisfy requirements of statute requiring it to affirm or deny occurrence of such surveillance by filing affidavits which obviated possibility of any nexus between such surveillance and grand jury proceedings and contained statement by United States Attorney who caused issuance of subpoenas in question that he was unaware of any electronic surveillance of witnesses. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 6(e), 28 U.S.C.A.

3. Grand jury—36.

Under statute requiring that, on claim by grand jury witness that evidence is product of illegal electronic surveillance, government should affirm or deny occurrence of such surveillance, adequancy of Government's response depends upon sufficiency of its denial of existence of electronic surveillance of witness, not on relationship of affiant to proceedings and whether he is in position to conclude that there could be no nexus between those proceedings and any unlawful activity Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. rule 6(e), 28 U.S.C.A.

4. Grand Jury—36.

Affidavits filed by United States Government in response to charge by grand jury witnesses that they had been subjected to illegal surveillance did not satisfy requirements of statute providing that Government should admit or deny such surveillance where, although affidavits purported to be based in part on check of federal agencies, results of such check were out of date and there was no affidavit from person making or supervising such check or explanation of mechanic's utilized or record-keeping systems of agencies involved. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3504.

5. Grand Jury—36.

Where grand jury witness claims that he has been subjected to illegal wiretap, it is appropriate for governmental agency closest to investigation to scrupulously search its files and submit affidavits affirming or denying validity of such claims and indicating which agencies had been checked. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3504.

ON THE MERITS

6. Grand Jury—36.

Affidavits filed by United States denying that grand jury witnesses had been subjected to illegal wiretaps were sufficient to satisfy requirements of applicable statute. 18 U.S.C.A. §§ 3504, 3504(b); 28 U.S.C.A. § 1826(a).

7. Grand Jury—36

Only those grand jury witnesses who claim their own conversations were illegally monitored or against whom such monitoring was directed have standing to require Government to respond under statute requiring Government to affirm or deny claims of illegal wiretapping. 18 U.S.C.A. § 3504.

8. Grand Jury—1.

United States acted properly in removing grand jury investigation into possible harboring of federal fugitives to another division in order to have investigation conducted by grand jury selected from division in which activity most prominently connected with alleged harboring occurred. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1826 (a) (2); U.S.C.A. Const., Amend. 6.

9. Grand Jury—36.

Affidavits submitted by United States in support of subpoenas ordering witnesses to testify before grand jury investigating into possible harboring of federal fugitives were sufficient to make preliminary showing that witnesses' fingerprints and hair and handwriting exemplars sought from such witnesses were relevant to grand jury investigation and properly within its jurisdiction, and not sought primarily for another purpose. 18 U.S.C.A. § 1071.

10. Grand Jury—36.

Quashing of subpoenas requiring grand jury witnesses to furnish fingerprints, handwriting exemplar and hair sample was not required by witnesses' contentions as to governmental misconduct.

11. Grand Jury—36.

Alleged abusive behavior by Federal Bureau of Investigation agents was not necessarily grounds for quashing grand jury witness subpoenas.

12. Grand Jury—36.

Fact that Government may already have requested materials in its possession will not ordinarily prevent grand jury from obtaining them in connection with its own independent investigation; thus, subpoena to require grand jury witness to furnish fingerprints and samples of his handwriting was not subject to being quashed because Government already had in its possession witness' fingerprints and samples of his handwriting from military records.

13. Grand Jury—36.

Witness may not interfere with course of grand jury's inquiry by urging objections of incompetency or irrelevancy; thus, grand jury witness was not excused from furnishing subpoenaed hair samples because of samples' alleged inadmissibility in evidence on grounds of incompetency and irrelevancy.

14. Grand Jury—36.

Grand jury witness, subpoenaed to provide hair samples, fingerprints and handwriting exemplars in proceeding in which grand jury was investigating possible harboring of federal fugitives, was not entitled to protective order requiring Government to file affidavit stating whether or not he was target of investigation.

15. Grand Jury—36.

Government is under no obligation to inform witness before grand jury whether he is target of jury's investigation.

16. Criminal Law—42.

In event that immunized grand jury witness is subsequently indicted, prosecution has affirmative duty to prove that evidence it proposes to use is derived from legitimate source wholly independent of compelled testimony.

17. Criminal Law—42, 627.9(1).

Subpoenaed grand jury witness was not entitled to protective order certifying existing evidence that jury had regarding witness in order that witness might be certain that Government did not violate immunity afforded him before grand jury by using that testimony in prosecution at later date, and to furnish transcript of grand jury testimony; request for transcript was premature, inasmuch as witness had not been indicted in connection with instant investigation; in event that witness was so indicted in future, propriety and necessity of his obtaining copy of grand jury testimony would then materialize. Fed. Rules Crim. Proc. rule 16(a)(1)(A), 18 U.S.C.A.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Nealon, District Judge.

These are matters arising out of an investigation by a grand jury from this district into the possible harboring of federal fugitives Patricia Hearst and William and Emily Harris within this district during the summer of 1974, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1071. In connection with the investigation, grand jury subpoenas have been served on Jay Weiner and Phillip Kent Shinnick, ordering them to testify before the grand jury [1]. Both prospective witnesses have submitted numerous motions in connection with the subpoenas. Each has filed a motion to quash the subpoena on the grounds of governmental misconduct and improper purpose, a motion to quash the subpoena as returnable to an improper situs, and a motion for disclosure of electronic or other surveillance. In addition, Weiner has filed a motion for protective orders and a motion requesting instructions to the grand jury. The issues raised by the motions have been briefed by the witnesses's attorneys and the attorney for the government, and oral argument was held before this Court on July 8, 1976. This memorandum will address only the motions for disclosure of electronic or other surveillance. The other matters will be considered in a subsequent opinion.

[1] In order to isolate the issues raised by the motions in question, their statutory framework must first set forth. 28 U.S.C. § 1826(a) authorizes a court to confine a witness who refuses "without just cause" to testify before or provide other information or materials to a grand jury when ordered by the court to do so. If the questions posed to the witness or the requests for other information or materials have been based on information derived from illegal electronic surveillance, then "just cause" not to answer or respond exists. Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41, 92 S.Ct. 2357, 33 L.Ed.2d 179 (1972). To facilitate the determination of whether information was derived from illegal electronic surveillance when a witness claims that such surveillance has occurred, 18 U.S.C. 3504 provides in pertinent part:

"(a) In any . . . proceeding in or before any grand jury . . .

"(1) upon a claim by a party aggrieved that evidence is inadmissible because it is the primary product of an unlawful act or because it was obtained by the exploitation of an unlawful act, the opponent of the claim shall affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged unlawful act."

Section 3504(b) defines an "unlawful act" as one involving illegal wiretapping or electronic surveillance. In the instant case, the witnesses have asserted that the subpoenas were based on information obtained from illegal electronic surveillance, and the government has denied any connection between the subpoenas and electronic surveillance of any kind. The dispositive questions here are whether the parties have satisfied the requirements of section 3504(a)(1).

At the outset, before analyzing the particular contentions and representations of the parties, it would be well to put this case in proper perspective. This is not a normal case of limited interest involving routine investigative efforts. The "Patty Hearst case" aroused unusual and nationwide interest and concern that exerted an undue amount of public pressure on the government to apprehend Miss Hearst and her Symbionese Liberation Army captors. This pressure undoubtedly stimulated special law enforcement efforts to locate her, including the possible participation of agencies in addition to the F.B.I. Under these circumstances, the possibility that extraordinary measures such as electronic surveillance were used in the investigation seems greater than in most cases. Mindful of the nature and scope of this case, as well as of the court's responsibility under section 3504 to determine whether proceedings have been tainted by illegal electronic surveillance, see infra, it would seem that the government's response should be as unambiguous, unequivocal, and reliable as reasonably possible, and should be more dispositive of the possibility of electronic surveillance than in a less extraordinary case. In the usual case which does not have any significance extending beyond this district, the affidavit of the U.S. Attorney and the F.B.I. agent in charge of the case may suffice, but this is not such a case.

It should also be pointed out that this case does not present the situation of an interruption of proceedings of a grand jury that is presently in session and awaiting the appearance of the witnesses who have filed motions resisting an appearance. The grand jury is not currently in session and no date has been fixed for the appearance of the witnesses involved. While the factor of grand jury delay is, nevertheless, still important, it is not as crucial as it might be were the circumstances different from what they are here.

In support of their assertions of illegal electronic surveillance, both Weiner and Shinnick have filed affidavits describing clicking, hollow and banging sounds and other audio interference during conversations on their telephones and on telephones that they customarily use, especially, in the case of Weiner, during conversations with other persons who were questioned or sought for questioning by the F.B.I. in connection with the Patricia Hearst case. In addition, Weiner describes two coincidences that may be explainable only by wiretapping: on one occasion, he received a telephone call from Jack Scott, warning him that the F.B.I. may question him, and the next day Weiner was visited by F.B.I. agents who asked him about Jack Scott; on another occasion, soon after Weiner's mother told someone over the telephone that Weiner was on his way to Oberlin, Ohio, from Philadelphia, Weiner was apprehended by F.B.I. agents shortly after his arrival in Oberlin. Shinnick alleges no such coincidences, but does state that information was relayed to him from an acquaintance that ". . . the States Police and the F.B.I. had been doing wiretaps the weekend of my visit on Nantucket." Affidavit of Phillip Kent Shinnick, attached to Motion to Quash Subpoena, para. 15. On the basis of these assertions, both witnesses have asked that the government disclose the records of any electronic or other surveillance of any conversations to which they were parties as well as of any communications at several locations and over several telephones, including the residences and telephones of their attorneys and several other telephones whose numbers the witnesses have listed in connection with the motion.

The government conceded at oral argument that the witnesses' assertions of illegal electronic surveillance amount to "claims" under section 3504, and thus have triggered its obligation under the statute to "affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged unlawful conduct." The government denies the existence of such surveillance, and, therefore, the critical question here is whether in the context of this case, that denial is sufficient to satisfy the statute. The government's response to both witnesses is an affidavit by Laurence M. Kelly, an Assistant United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, who is participating in the investigations and who caused the subpoenas at issue to be served [2]. With respect to both witnesses, Mr. Kelly states that the source of information leading to the subpoena, and upon which any questions or requests will be based, is the "testimony of Patricia Hearst given at her bank robbery trial between February 9, 1976 through February 20, 1976, in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, No. 74-364 OJC.", Affidavit Denying Electronic Surveillance, para. 4; that the subpoenas are not based on any electronic surveillance at any location; and that he is unaware of any electronic surveillance of the witnesses. In addition, with respect to Weiner, the affidavit states that a check was made with seven federal agencies that customarily conduct electronic surveillance, and that, based on the results of that check, as of the summer of 1975, "there has been no electronic surveillance occurring on premises known to have been owned, leased or licensed by Jay Weiner . . ." Affidavit Denying Electronic Surveillance, para. 10.[3]. The affidavit concerning Shinnick makes reference to no agency check whatsoever.

[2] The government makes a two-pronged argument that its affidavits here are sufficient. It argues first that, regardless of whether there has in fact been any electronic surveillance of the witnesses in this case, the affidavits have obviated the possibility of any nexus between such surveillance and the grand jury proceedings, in that the affiant, the Assistant United States Attorney in charge of the investigations who caused the issuance of the subpoenas in question, and who will determine what questions are addressed to the witnesses, has stated that he is unaware of any electronic surveillance of the witnesses. Moreover, the government points out, Mr. Kelley has affirmatively identified the source of the present grand jury proceedings—the trial testimony of Patricia Hearst. Because Section 3504 is only concerned with whether something is the "product" of unlawful surveillance, rather than with the unlawful act itself, the government concludes, its affidavits in this case are sufficient. The government's position is contrary to the plain meaning of the statute's language, is inconsistent with the cases construing section 3504, and fails to satisfy the court that the subpoenas in question are not the product of unlawful activity.

[3] Upon a claim that evidence is the product of illegal electronic surveillance, section 3504 requires the government to "affirm or deny the occurence of the unlawful act." It is clear from the plain meaning of the language of the statute that the government's response should go to the existence of the unlawful activity itself, and should not be concerned with the connection such activity may have with the proceedings at issue. The latter is for the court to determine, once the government has completed its function under the statute. In re Testa, 486 F. 2d 1013, 1016 (3d Cir. 1973). Thus the language of the statute suggests that the adequacy of the government's response depends on the sufficiency of its denial of the existence of electronic surveillance of the witnesses, and not on the relationship of the affiant to the proceedings and whether he is in a position to conclude that there could be no nexus between those proceedings and any unlawful activity.

If the government's position were correct, then all that would be required in every case where a "claim of illegal electronic surveillance has been made would be a denial by the prosecutor that the proceedings have been tainted by unlawful activity, regardless of whether he is in a competent position to know whether unlawful activity has in fact occurred. The cases which have evaluated the sufficiency of a denial under section 3504, however, have almost all involved affidavits or other documents by persons in a position to know about the existence of electronic surveillance. Most often, the denials contain the results of a so-called "agency check" of the federal agencies that customarily conduct electronic surveillance. See, e.g., In re Freedman, 529 F. 2d 543 (3d Cir. 1976); In re Horn, 458 F. 2d 468 (3d Cir. 1972). The courts have frowned upon "to my knowledge" affidavits by persons not in a position to have complete knowledge regarding the existence of electronic surveillance. See, e.g., In re Quinn, 525 F. 2d 222, 225 n. 5 (1st Cir. 1975); United States v. Vielguth, 502 F. 2d 1257, 1261 (9th Cir. 1974) (Chambers, J., dissenting).

Finally, in spite of the good faith of the Assistant United States Attorney in this case, which this court has no reason to question, if there has been illegal electronic surveillance of these witnesses, the instant proceedings could be tainted in a manner of which he might be unaware. The investigation of the possible harboring of Patricia Hearst within this district predates her trial by more than a year. Mr. Weiner, for example, testified before a grand jury in Harrisburg investigating the same activity more than a year ago, in March, 1975. Mr. Kelly acknowledged at oral argument that he was not involved in the previous grand jury investigation in this district, and thus a good portion of his knowledge of the pertinent facts of the investigation was presumably acquired by his reading of the government file. There could be some information concerning these witnesses in the file, with its source unknown to Mr. Kelley, [4] that is the product of electronic surveillance. Unless a reliable record of such surveillance is disclosed, it will be impossible to determine whether it has tainted the instant proceedings. With respect to Mr. Shinnick, his counsel stated at oral argument, and the government did not deny, that Patricia Hearst's trial testimony identified other persons besides Mr. Shinnick and Mr. Weiner who may have been involved in the harboring of herself and the Harrises in this district. That information would seem to call into question the accuracy of the government's assertion that the sole basis of the grand jury's current interest in the witnesses is Miss Hearst's testimony. If that assertion were correct, then it would seem that the other persons identified by Miss Hearst would have been subpoenaed. Since they were not, it may well be that the source of the current interest in the witnesses is more than simply Miss Hearst's testimony. Because the other sources could be tainted by the illegal electronic surveillance alleged by the witnesses in this case, it is incumbent upon the government to direct its response to the existence of illegal electronic surveillance vel non.

[4] The government argue alternatively that its response is sufficient, under the facts of this case and under the law of this Circuit, to satisfy the requirements of section 3504. An analysis of the government's affidavits leads to the contrary conclusion. With respect to Weiner, several inadequacies are evident. Although the affidavit purports to be based in part on an agency check, the results are out of date, inasmuch as they only cover a period of up to a year ago. In addition, without regard to its date, the report of the agency check leaves much to be desired. There is no affidavit from the person making or supervising it, nor is there an explanation, by one in a position to know, of the mechanics utilized, or of the record-keeping systems of the agencies involved, so that it is impossible to independently assess the reliability of the checks. As to Shinnick, the response is even more deficient. There is no reference to an agency check in the response, nor even an affidavit from the investigating agent. The government simply relies on the "to my knowledge" affidavit of the prosecutor handling the case. These responses fall far short of the comprehensiveness of the denials which have been held to be sufficient by the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, see, e.g., In re Horn 458 F.2d 468, 469 n. 3 (3d Cir. 1972); In re Freedman, 529 F.2d 543, 549–550 (3d. Cir. 1976). Moreover, none of the Third Circuit cases have involved the national overtones and unusual public attention that are present here. In addition, the Court of Appeals has been critical of several of the responses which it has considered. See, e.g., In re Horn, supra at 471; United States v. D'Andrea, 495 F.2d 1170, 1174 n. 12 (3d Cir. 1974). Such criticism is consistent with the concern that has recently been expressed by other courts about the reliability of affidavits in support of section 3504 denials. See, e.g., In re Quinn, 525 F. 2d 222, 225 n. 5 (1st Cir. 1975); In re Turgeon, 402 F. Supp. 1239, 1240–1241 (D. Conn. 1975). In view of these considerations, as well as of the court's task under section 3504, it seems only fair and proper to require a meaningful and authoritative response by someone who is in a position to attest to the modus operandi and dependability of the check.

[5] It would appear to be appropriate for the governmental agency ". . . closest to the investigation [to] scrupulously search [its] files and submit affidavits affirming or denying the validity of the aggrieved party's claims and indicating which agencies have been checked." In re Millow, 529 F.2d 770, 774 (2d Cir. 1976). [5] In that regard, government counsel stated at oral argument that he believes the F.B.I. has an index card file identifying by name any person whose telephonic conversation had been intercepted, whether or not it was such person's phone that was tapped. In other words, if A, using an outside phone, engaged in a telephone conversation with B, whose phone was under electronic surveillance by the F.B.I., and A was identified during the conversation, then this fact would be placed on an index card bearing A's name even though he was not the immediate subject of the surveillance. Consequently, a reference to an index card bearing A's name would disclose whether there had been any electronic surveillance of any conversation in which A was a participant. It would be helpful for the court to have this information as to the procedure utilized, in as precise a form as reasonably possible, in order to confidently decide whether the government's response is adequate under section 3504. In addition, such information would also provide a basis for evaluating the argument advanced by government counsel at oral argument that an agency check is a burdensome process. It is all too easy to state in conclusory fashion that the undertaking is onerous. The project could conceivably turn out to be a relatively simple assignment. See in this regard Judge Newman's observation in In re Turgeon, 402 F. Supp. 1289, 1242 (D. Conn. 1975), with respect to a file check by the F.B.I. similar to the check ordered here, that "(i)t is hard to understand why the task . . . could possibly entail more than one hour's work by a file clerk." Be that as it may, it is impossible to evaluate the merits of the government's claim of burden without some information about the mechanics of the process.

With respect to any delay that might be caused by the procedure ordered here, while any unnecessary delay in grand jury proceedings must be avoided, in circumstances such as those presently before this court we cannot assume that a file check and preparation of affidavits would consume so much time as to cause an inordinate delay. If there is to be an intolerable delay, we should know specifically why a delay is inevitable, the reasons for it, and what can be done to shorten or eliminate it. The issue of electronic surveillance is a volatile one and has caused considerable concern and, indeed, alarm, in our society. Nothing should be left to assumption or speculation. If a responsible check is made and the government has no record of any electronic surveillance, then the denial is official and ". . . the matter is at an end . . . " Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41, 71, 92 S.Ct. 2357, 2373, 33, L.Ed.2d 179 (1972) (White, J., concurring).

In order to insure a fair and appropriate disposition of the motions to quash the subpoenas, the government will be allowed ten days from the date of this order to file a supplemental affidavit or affidavits in accordance with the views expressed in this memorandum. In the meantime, the witnesses' motions will remain under advisement.

ON THE MERITS

In a memorandum and order dated July 13, 1976, this Court ordered the government, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3504, to file supplemental affidavits affirming or denying the occurrence of illegal electronic surveillance which has been claimed in a motion filed by the two witnesses, Jay Weiner and Phillip Kent Shinnick, who had been subpoenaed in these two cases to appear before a grand jury in this district that is investigating the possible harboring of federal fugitives Patricia Hearst and William and Emily Harris within this district during the summer of 1974. In addition, motions to quash on the grounds of improper purpose and the fact that the subpoenas are returnable to an improper situs were filed by both witnesses, and Jay Weiner alone submitted a motion for a protective order and a motion requesting supplemental instruction to the grand jury. In the July 13 memorandum, I deferred ruling on the other motions pending resolution of the electronic surveillance issue. The government has now submitted supplemental affidavits denying electronic surveillance in these cases, and the electronic surveillance issue is ripe for decision. Accordingly, I now turn to the issue, as well as to the other motions filed by the witnesses.

(6) Upon analysis, the affidavits appear to fulfill the conditions imposed by the July 13 memorandum and, therefore, to constitute satisfactory denials of unlawful activities under 18 U.S.C. § 3504. The filings with respect to both witnesses are identical. In each instance, the primary document is an affidavit by John J. Smythe, an F.B.I. agent in Washington, D.C., who is "responsible for maintaining the records containing the names of individuals who have been identified as being participants in conversations monitored by electronic surveillances conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation from 1960 to the present." The Weiner affidavit states that Smythe searched the records in Washington and caused a search to be made of the appropriate field offices of the F.B.I., and that as a result of those searches, the affiant has determined that "Jay Weiner was never the subject of electronic surveillance coverage nor were any of his conversations ever monitored by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." In addition, Smythe states that he has determined that the F.B.I. "did not maintain any electronic surveillance on premises which were known to have been owned, leased, or licensed by Jay Weiner." The Shinnick affidavit is identical in all material respects.

Accompanying the Smythe affidavits are two affidavits by Brandon Alvey, an attorney in the Criminal Division of the United States Department of Justice, one concerning Weiner and one with respect to Shinnick. The Weiner affidavit states that Alvey caused an inquiry to be made of the following six agencies to determine if there has been any electronic surveillance of the witnesses: Drug Enforcement Administration, United States Secret Service, Internal Revenue Service, United States Customs Service, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and the United States Postal Service; and that, as a result of those inquiries, the affiant states that "there has been no electronic surveillances occurring on premises known to have been owned, leased or licensed by Jay Weiner . . ., that there was no electronic surveillance directed against Jay Weiner . . . [and] that there have been no overhearings by electronic surveillance of conversations, at any location, to which Jay Weiner was a party." Alvey's Shinnick affidavit is identical in all material respects. In addition, Gary L. Penrith, Bureau Supervisor at the F.B.I. headquarters, Washington, D.C., submitted an affidavit to the effect that he has been involved in all aspects of the Hearst investigation since the kidnapping February 4, 1974, and that the original source of information concerning the alleged activities of Weiner and Shinnick in connection with this investigation was an individual to whom one of the alleged participants made statements and admissions, all of which was corroborated by the testimony of Patricia Hearst during the course of her trial on bank robbery charges in San Francisco, California, November 10, 1975, through March 20, 1976.

[7] The Smythe affidavit is a denial, by one in a position to know, of electronic overhearing by the F.B.I., the governmental agency closest to the investigation in this case, of any conversations of the witnesses. Together with the Alvey affidavit, which sufficiently obviates the possibility that other federal agencies authorized to conduct wiretapping have overheard conversations of the witnesses, the Smythe affidavit conclusively and unequivocally denies the claim of the witnesses, under 18 U.S.C. § 3504, that the subpoenas were the product of unlawful electronic surveillance of their conversations. Moreover, the Penrith affidavit identifies the original source of information concerning the two witnesses. As such, the denial is official, and ". . . the matter is at an end . . ." Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41, 71, 92 S.Ct. 2357, 2373, 33 L.Ed.2d. 179 (1972) (White, J., concurring). [6]

[8] Turning to the other motions, both witnesses argue that the instant subpoenas should be quashed as returnable to an improper situs, in that they are returnable to the current grand jury sitting in Scranton rather than to the Harrisburg grand jury which had previously begun to investigate the alleged unlawful harboring of federal fugitives that is being inquired into here. The witnesses argue in their briefs that this transfer deprives the Harrisburg grand jury of its historic function of deciding for itself what evidence will be produced before it, and is designed "to avoid the possibility that the Harrisburg grand jury, if he were subpoenaed there, would decide that his testimony were not necessary." Weiner's Motion to Quash the Subpoena as Returnable to an Improper Situs, para. 5. At oral argument counsel also maintained that the government's unstated motive in transferring the investigation to the Scranton grand jury is to gain greater leverage over the witnesses by having a grand jury with a longer unexpired term conduct the investigation—under 28 U.S.C. § 1826(a)(2), a witness who refuses "without just cause" to comply with a court order requiring him to testify before a grand jury may be confined for the duration of the term of the grand jury.

The government's response is that it has transferred the investigation to the Scranton grand jury in order to have the investigation conducted by a grand jury selected from the division in which the activity most prominently connected with the alleged harboring occurred—Wayne County, one of the nine counties from which members of the Scranton grand jury are selected. Grand juries in this district are selected on a sectional basis, and thus the Harrisburg grand jury, being selected from a section that does not include Wayne County, could not possibly contain any members who reside in the community where the alleged crime under investigation occurred. Government counsel represented to the court that the investigation has been transferred to the Scranton grand jury out of an abundance of caution in light of the Third Circuit's holding in Zicarelli v. Gray, Civ. No. 75-1473 (3d Cir., Nov. 18, 1975), vacated and rehearing en banc ordered (January 19, 1976), which held that the exclusion from a petit jury of residents from the county in which the crime allegedly occurred denied the defendant his Sixth Amendment right to the fair possibility for obtaining a jury composed of a representative cross-section of the community.

The government's stated purpose in removing the investigation to Scranton is reasonable, and the court declines to draw the inference offered by the witnesses that the government's motive is underhanded and unlawful, an inference for which the witnesses offer no support other than their own speculation. That the government's concern in light of the Zicarelli holding is legitimate and may be well-founded is reflected by the "tentative view" of the Committee on the Operation of the Jury System of the Judicial Conference of the United States "that the indictment for a crime alleged in one division of a judicial district by a grand jury sitting in and selected exclusively from a different division of the district raises some doubt as to whether the rights of the defendant to indictment by a grand jury drawn from a 'fair cross section of the community' are being realized." Memorandum to all Chief Judges, United States District Courts, from William E. Foley, Deputy Director, Administration Office of the United States Courts, March 24, 1976, p. 2. Moreover, the Scranton grand jury would be just as free as the Harrisburg grand jury to decide that the testimony of these two witnesses is not necessary. The motions to quash the subpoenas as returnable to an improper situs will be denied.

[9] To the witnesses' argument that the subpoenas should be quashed because of misconduct and improper purpose, the government has responded in the form of affidavits by Mr. Laurence Kelly, the Assistant United States Attorney in charge of the instant investigation, that set forth the scope and purpose of the investigation, as well as the relevance to that investigation of the testimony and materials sought by the subpoenas at issue, and disavow any improper purpose on the part of the government. With respect to Weiner, the affidavit sets forth that the investigation seeks to determine whether Patricia Hearst and William and Emily Harris were unlawfully harbored within this district, that there is reasonable cause to believe that Jay Weiner knows the identity and role of the participants in the alleged harboring effort, and that the purpose of the present subpoena is to elicit Weiner's knowledge regarding the alleged harboring.[7] The government's affidavit regarding Shinnick sets forth the same investigation, states that fingerprints, hair strands, and handwriting samples were recovered from the location in this district where the harboring is suspected to have occurred, and says that the purpose of the subpoena is to obtain fingerprints, handwriting and hair samples from Shinnick for comparison with the items recovered from the harboring location.[6] These affidavits are sufficient to satisfy the government's obligation "to make some preliminary showing by affidavit that each item is at least relevant to an investigation being conducted by the grand jury and properly within its jurisdiction, and is not sought primarily for another purpose." In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Schofield I), 486 F.2d 85, 93 (3d Cir. 1973).

[10] The witnesses' contentions as to governmental misconduct are not persuasive. Weiner alleges that he has been harassed by being subpoenaed four itmes in connection with the Hearst case and by having the grand jury situs changed from Harrisburg to Scranton; that he has been victimized by illegal electronic surveillance; and that he has been subjected to a pattern of abusive behavior by government agents investigating this case. It has already been determined, supra, that the subpoena is not the product of illegal electronic surveillance, and that the government's purpose in moving the grand jury investigation to Scranton is proper. The argument concerning the number of times the witness has been subpoenaed is unpersuasive. As the government points out in its brief, the instant subpoena seeks to compel only the second appearance of Weiner before a grand jury investigating the unlawful harboring within this district, and is intended to elicit information from him in light of a development that has occurred since his initial appearance in March, 1975—the trial testimony of Patricia Hearst in February, 1976. One other subpoena of Weiner to testify before a grand jury in this district was withdrawn after he filed a motion to quash in April, 1975. The fourth subpoena referred to by the witness sought to compel his testimony at the trial of Patricia Hearst in the Northern District of California, and thus has no bearing on possible harassment caused by the number of subpoenas issued in this district. In any event, the Northern District of California subpoena was also withdrawn without Weiner testifying after Weiner again moved to quash.

[11] The witnesses do not draw any direct connection between the alleged abusive behavior by government agents, particularly F.B.I. agents, and the grand jury process at issue here. For example, they do not claim that any physical evidence pertinent to the grand jury investigation was obtained as a result of the agents' allegedly unlawful actions, a claim which, incidentally, would not necessarily be grounds for quashing the subpoenas. (See United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 94 S.Ct. 613, 38 L.Ed.2d 561 (1974), where the Court held that a witness summoned to testify before a grand jury may not refuse to answer questions on the ground that they are based on evidence obtained from an unlawful search and seizure. They simply maintain that the subpoenas should be quashed, or at least that an evidentiary hearing should be held, because of the alleged abusive behavior of the agents. Such allegations do not constitute grounds for quashing a valid grand jury subpoena. Cf. the unreported opinion of Judge Herman in In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Scott and Miller), MCD Nos. 4541 and 4542, filed August 22, 1975, at pp. 8–9. As Judge Herman points out in his opinion, a person allegedly victimized by such misconduct may consider an action against the agents themselves, see Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Investigation, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2d 619 (1971), but may not attempt to thwart a grand jury investigation that has been demonstrated by government affidavit to be proper. Furthermore, to require the ventilation by hearing of every allegation of government misconduct before a witness would be required to respond to a grand jury subpoena ". . . would saddle a grand jury with minitrials and preliminary showings [which] would assuredly impede its investigation and frustrate the public's interest in the fair and expeditious administration of the criminal laws." United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 17, 93 S.Ct. 76, 773, 35 L.Ed.2d 67 (1973).

[12] Many of Shinnick's arguments concerning misconduct and improper purpose are similar to Weiner's and are unpersuasive for the reasons described, supra. Shinnick argues in addition that the subpoena, by which the grand jury seeks to have him produce fingerprints and handwriting and hair samples, should be quashed because the government already has in its possession two of the items sought—his fingerprints and samples of his handwriting from the military records of his service in the United States Air Force from 1967 to 1971—and because the third item, the hair sample, is irrelevant as it would not be competent evidence against him during a criminal trial. These arguments are also unconvincing. With respect to the fingerprints and handwriting samples, which Shinnick does not deny may be obtained under ordinary circumstances by a grand jury subpoena, see In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Schofield II), 507 F.2d 963 (3d Cir. 1975), the government is entitled to "competent fresh evidence," In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum (Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference, Inc.), 405 F.Supp, 1192, 1198 (N.D. Ga. 1975), and the fact the government may already have the requested materials in its possession will not ordinarily prevent a grand jury from obtaining them in connection with its own independent investigation. This is particularly so in the case of fingerprints and handwriting samples, since even assuming the government does have military records with fingerprints and handwriting samples that purport to be Shinnick's, it would have a difficult time at trial establishing that those prints and samples are in fact the witness's. The government does not have to be confronted with such a potential chain of possession problem, and may obtain new fingerprints and writing samples from the witness via the instant subpoena.

[13] Shinnick's argument regarding the hair samples requires little comment. Without deciding whether or for what purpose hair strands may be admitted against a defendant during a criminal trial, although it should be noted that Shinnick's contention that they are inadmissible as incompetent and irrelevant would not appear to be correct, cf. United States v. D'Amico, 408 F.2d 331 (2d Cir. 1969), it is sufficient to note that a witness may not interfere with the course of the grand jury's inquiry by urging " 'objections of incompetency or irrelevancy, such as a party may raise, for this is no concern of his,' " United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 345, 94 S.Ct. 613, 619, 38 L.Ed.2d 561 (1974), quoting Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 282, 39 S.Ct. 468, 63 L.Ed. 979 (1919). The motions to quash on the grounds of governmental misconduct and improper purpose will be denied.

[14–17] Weiner has moved for a protective order requiring the government to file an affidavit stating whether or not he is a target of the investigation, to certify existing evidence that it has regarding Weiner in order that the witness may be certain that the government does not violate the immunity afforded him before the grand jury by using that testimony to prosecute him at a later date, and to furnish him a transcript of his grand jury testimony. This motion will be denied. The government is under no obligation to so inform a witness before a grand jury whether he is a target of the investigation. With respect to protection against a possible violation of the witness's immunity, he is sufficiently protected by the holding of Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 92 S.Ct. 1653, 32 L.Ed.2d 212 (1972) that, in the event that an immunized witness is subsequently indicted, the prosecution has "the affirmative duty to prove that the evidence it proposes to use is derived from a legitimate source wholly independent of the compelled testimony." Id. at 460, 92 S.Ct at 1665. The request for a transcript of the witness's grand jury testimony is also made with an eye to protecting the witness's rights following a grant of immunity. Weiner argues that he should have a copy of the transcript of his testimony in order that he can more easily determine whether that testimony was used by the government against him in the event that he is indicted in the future. This request is premature, however, inasmuch as Weiner has not been indicted in connection with the instant investigation. In the event that he is so indicted in the future, the propriety and necessity of his obtaining a copy of his grand jury testimony will materialize. Indeed, under those circumstances, Weiner would be able to obtain by discovery from the government a copy of his grand jury testimony. See Rule 16(e)(1)(A), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Weiner's motion for supplemental instructions to the grand jury will remain under advisement.

FOOTNOTES

(1) Although the subpoena of Shinnick commands him to appear to testify before the grand jury, the government has acknowledged, in its brief in opposition to Shinnick's motion to quash and at oral argument on the motion, that it only intends to have Shinnick produce fingerprints, a handwriting exemplar and a hair sample for the grand jury, and that it does not intend to request his testimony.

(2) With reference to Weiner, the affidavit provides:

"Laurence M. Kelly, being duly sworn according to law deposes and says:

"1. He is an Assistant United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"2. In such position he is participating in an investigation relating to alleged violations of 18 U.S.C. 1071—the Federal 'Harboring' Statute—within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"3. He caused a subpoena to be served upon Jay Weiner, through his counsel, on May 19, 1976, requiring his presence before the Federal Grand Jury, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

"4. He knows that the source of information upon which the questioning of Jay Weiner will be based is the testimony of Patricia Hearst given at her bank robbery trial between February 9, 1976 through February 20, 1976, in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, No. 74-364 OJC.

"5. None of the information upon which the questioning of Jay Weiner will be based is the result, directly or indirectly, of any electronic surveillance of Jay Weiner.

"6. The undersigned is unaware of any electronic surveillance of Jay Weiner, directly or indirectly, at any time.

"7. That inquiry was made of the appropriate Agencies of the Federal Government to determine if there had been any electronic surveillance of the conversations of the witness Jay Weiner.

"8. These Agencies were selected as appropriate for inquiry because at the time the requests were made they were the only Agencies that had requested authority to conduct and had conducted electronic surveillance pursuant to Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, Public Law 90-351. All national security electronic surveillances authorized by the Attorney General have been conducted solely by, and all records of such surveillances have been maintained by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"9. The Federal Agencies to whom this inquiry was directed are listed as follows, together with the most recent date that a response was received to the inquiries made by the Department of Justice.

"a. Federal Bureau of Investigation—July 16, 1975.
"b. Drug Enforcement Administration—June 25, 1975.
"c. United States Secret Service—June 26, 1975.
"d. Internal Revenue Service—June 27, 1975.
"e. United States Customs Service—June 8, 1975.
"f. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms—June 24, 1975.
"g. United States Postal Service—June 23, 1975.

"10. Based upon the results of such inquiry the deponent hereby states that there has been no electronic surveillance occurring on premises known to have been owned, leased or licensed by Jay Weiner, as of the dates set forth above."

With reference to Shinnick, the affidavit provides:

"Laurence M. Kelly, being duly sworn according to law deposes and says:

"1. He is an Assistant United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"2. In such position, he is participating in an investigation relating to alleged violations of 18 U.S.C. 1071—the Federal 'Harboring' Statute—within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"3. He caused a subpoena to be served upon Phillip Kent Shinnick on May 24, 1976, requiring his presence before the Federal Grand Jury, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

"4. The purposes of this subpoena are as set forth in another 'Affidavit' of the undersigned filed herewith, and made a part hereof by reference.

"5. The undersigned is the person who issued the instant subpoena, and knows the source of the information upon which this subpoena is based.

"6. The source of the information leading to this subpoena is the testimony of Patricia Hearst at her Bank Robbery Trial as set forth in the other Affidavit of the undersigned filed herewith, paragraphs 6 and 7, together with the items of physical evidence obtained from locations relevant to the investigation.

"7. The undersigned has no knowledge of any electronic surveillance of Phillip Kent Shinnick at any location at any time.

"8. This subpoena is not based upon any information obtained through any electronic surveillance of Phillip Kent Shinnick at any location."

(3) Mr. Kelly stated at oral argument that he had reviewed his materials and could now state that as a result of the check, as of the summer of 1975 there had been no electronic surveillance at any situs of any conversations involving Jay Weiner. He stated that he would submit a supplemental affidavit and the court will assume for the purposes of this discussion that the affidavit is to that effect.

(4) The inquiry may have been based ". . . in some part, on information or leads furnished by other agencies about whose sources and activities neither [the U.S. Attorney nor the F.B.I. agent in charge of the investigation] may know." In re Quinn, 525 F.2d 222, 225 (1st Cir. 1975). Furthermore, for the § 3504 response to be adequate ". . . there must be included an explicit assurance indicating that all agencies providing information relevant to the inquiry were canvassed." Id., at 226.

(5) ". . . courts have interpreted the statute to require the Government to make it reasonably clear that its denial is based on sufficient knowledge to be meaningful." In re Quinn, 525 F.2d 222, 225 (1st Cir. 1975).

FOOTNOTES—Continued

(6) It could be argued that the government's response does not constitute a denial of all possible means by which information concerning the witnesses could have been gathered by illegal wiretapping, in that it does not deny the possibility that information concerning the witnesses was learned by overhearing the conversation of two other individuals who may have been discussing the witnesses. The short answer to such a contention is that section 3504 does not require the government to respond to such a claim. The statute requires the government to respond "upon a claim by a person aggrieved . . ." (emphasis supplied). Although section 3504 itself does not define the term "person aggrieved," Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. § 2510 et seq., to which section 3504 expressly relates and in light of which section 3504 should be construed, defines an "aggrieved person" as "a person who was a party to any intercepted wire or oral communication or a person against whom the interception was directed." 18 U.S.C. § 2510(11). Applying that definition to section 3504, it appears that only those who claim their own conversations were illegally monitored or against whom it was directed have standing to require the government to respond under section 3504. This conclusion is supported by the legislative history of section 3504, which indicates that the government is required to affirm or deny unlawful electronic surveillance only upon a claim "by the defendant with standing to challenge the alleged unlawful conduct." H.R. No. 91-1549, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970), 2 U.S. Code Congressional and Administrative News 4027 (1970) (emphasis supplied).

(7) The Weiner affidavit provides:

"Laurence M. Kelly, being duly sworn according to law deposes and says:

"1. That he is an Assistant United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"2. In such position, he is participating in an investigation relating to alleged violations of 18 U.S.C. 1071—the Federal 'Harboring' Statute—within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"3. The investigation seeks to determine if during the Summer of 1974, Patricia Hearst, William Harris and Emily Harris, who were Federal fugitives at the time were harbored near South Canaan, Wayne County, Pennsylvania, within the Middle District of Pennsylvania; and if so, whether any person or persons may have violated 18 U.S.C. 1071.

"4. The investigation seeks to identify all those persons who may have participated in such efforts to harbor and conceal the persons named in paragraph three (3) above, and determine the extent of their respective roles therein.

"5. On September 22, 1975, the fugitives named in paragraph three (3) were captured in San Francisco, California.

"6. Subsequently, Patricia Campbell Hearst was tried on charges of Bank Robbery in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, Cir. No. 74-364 OJC. Between February 9, 1976, and February 20, 1976, she gave testimony at said trial.

"7. Said testimony reflects that several persons may have been involved in the effort to harbor her and the Harris' at a farmhouse in Pennsylvania near Scranton.

"8. Patricia Hearst, as aforesaid, testified that this witness, Jay Weiner, was brought to the farmhouse by two persons where he met Patricia Hearst and the other fugitives names in paragraph three (3) above.

"9. On the basis of this testimony it appears that this witness, Jay Weiner, may have been made privy to the scope of the effort to harbor and conceal the fugitives, including the identity and role of each of the participants.

"10. It is the purpose of the present subpoena to seek information from Jay Weiner before the Grand Jury relating to those persons who may have participated in the efforts to harbor the fugitives named in paragraph three (3).

"11. While some duplication is inevitable, this subpoena is in quest of information different from any previously given by this witness to either Federal Agents or to any other Grand Jury.

"12. This subpoena is not intended to harass the witness in anyway, but is being issued in quest for information relevant to the inquiry.

"13. No prior testimony of this witness has been divulged by the Government to any person not authorized to obtain such testimony under Rule 6(e) F.R.C.P. to the best of the undersigner's knowledge, information and belief.

"14. It is not the purpose of this subpoena to induce the witness to commit perjury. To the contrary, it is hoped that Mr. Weiner will testify fully and honestly in all respects.

"15. It is not the purpose of this subpoena to 'freeze' the prior testimony of the witness. In the first place, such prior testimony is already 'frozen'; in the second place, as stated in paragraph ten (10) above, new and difference testimony is sought here.

"16. It is not the purpose of this subpoena to 'rehearse' the witness for any future trials."

(8) The Shinnick' affidavit provides:

"Laurence M. Kelly, being duly sworn according to law deposes and says:

"1. That he is an Assistant United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"2. In such position, he is participating in an investigation relating to alleged violations of 18 U.S.C. 1071—the Federal 'Harboring' Statute—within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

"3. The investigation seeks to determine if during the Summer of 1974, Patricia Campbell Hearst, William Harris and Emily Harris, who were Federal fugitives at the time, were harbored near South Canaan, Wayne County, Pennsylvania, within the Middle District of Pennsylvania; and if so, whether any person or persons may have violated 18 U.S.C. 1071.

"4. The investigation seeks to identify all those persons who may have participated in such efforts to harbor and conceal the persons named in paragraph three above, and determine the extent of their respective roles therein.

"5. On September 22, 1975, the fugitives named in paragraph three were captured in San Francisco, California.

"6. Subsequently, Patricia Campbell Hearst was tried on charges of Bank Robbery in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California. Cir. No. 74-364 OJC. Between February 9, 1976, and February 20, 1976, she gave testimony at said trial.

FOOTNOTES—Continued

"7. Said testimony reflects that several persons may have been involved in the effort to harbor her and the Harris' at a farmhouse in Pennsylvania near Scranton.
"8. Said testimony mentioned several persons in connection with the three fugitives being brought to the Wayne County premises.
"9. In connection with the investigation several fingerprints were obtained from locations relevant to the inquiry.
"10. In connection with the investigation, several strands of human hair were obtained from locations relevant to the investigation.
"11. In connection with the investigation, items of handwriting were obtained from locations relevant to the investigation.
"12. The purpose of this subpoena is to obtain known fingerprints, handwriting and hair samples of this witness for comparison with the above items that have been recovered during the investigation.
"13. This subpoena is being issued for no purposes other than described above.
"14. No information obtained through the production of the items requested of this witness will be divulged by the Government to any person not authorized to obtain it under Rule 6(e) F.R.C.P.
"15. It is not the purpose of this subpoena to harass the witness in any way.
"16. It is not the purpose of the subpoena to interfer with the employment opportunities available to this witness in any way or to otherwise reduce his opportunities for employment."

U.S. Drops Action in Hearst Case

Scranton.—The Federal Government said yesterday it no longer needs hair and handwriting samples or fingerprints from Phillip Shinnick, jailed for contempt since Nov. 30 in the Patricia Hearst case. The U.S. attorney's office said recent developments in its investigation of the harboring of the kidnaped California heiress in a farmhouse near here in the summer of 1974, no longer requires such evidence.

Shinnick, 34, of Livingston, N.J., was jailed along with Jay Weiner, 22, of Philadelphia, for refusing to cooperate with a federal grand jury investigating the case.

Weiner had been given immunity from prosecution and was cited for contempt when he continued to refuse to testify. Shinnick declined to give hair and handwriting samples or his fingerprints to investigators.

Chief Judge William J. Nealon, of the U.S. District Court here, was informed of the government's petition while hearing a case in Harrisburg. An aide said he probably would sign an order to release Shinnick later today.

However, a source in the U.S. attorney's office said the grand jury might now seek Shinnick's verbal testimony in the case, in which case he, too, would be granted immunity and would face contempt charges if he continues to refuse cooperation.

Both men have been held in the Allenwood, Pa., federal prison.

Shinnick Is Free After Government Reviews Case

(By William Taaffe)

Phil Shinnick, the former Olympic athlete imprisoned last month for refusing to comply with demands of a federal prosecutor and grand jury investigating the harboring of Patricia Hearst in 1974, has been freed at the request of the government.

Shinnick gained his release four weeks after he was charged with civil contempt and sentenced to an indeterminate term at Allenwood, Pa. His release also came one week after The Star published stories of his plight and former Atty. Gen. Edward Levi ordered the case reviewed.

In a telephone interview from Scranton yesterday, Asst. U.S. Atty. Lawrence Kelly insisted that the publicity surrounding Shinnick's and Levi's interest in the case had nothing to do with the prosecution's sudden about-face.

Shinnick's imprisonment stemmed from his refusal to comply with a jury request last August that he supply the FBI with his fingerprints and samples of his hair and handwriting in a room just outside the grand jury chamber.

Shinnick argued that it was the chief prosecutor, S. John Cottone, who instructed the jury foreman to demand these samples for the FBI and that such instructions were improper. Police agencies have no power to subpoena evidence. Shinnick offered to submit the samples directly to the courts, but Cottone refused.

Cottone was unavailable for comment. But Kelly, his assistant, said "further field investigation" of the Hearst case made unnecessary the comparison of Shinnick's fingerprints, hair and handwriting with other samples the FBI apparently possesses.

Shinnick, 32, was released from Allenwood Wednesday after U.S. Judge William J. Nealon approved Cottone's request. Kelly refused to disclose what discovery led to Shinnick's release, or when new information came to light.

Cottone and Kelly have been investigating the harboring of Hearst for 2½ years. They believe that sports activist Jack Scott and his wife, Micki, rented a farm house for her in South Canaan, Pa., and that Shinnick, a close friend of the Scotts, appeared at the house on occasion.

Jay Weiner, a 23-year-old sportswriter who also was sent to Allenwood last month on civil contempt charges, was not released with Shinnick this week. However, Weiner had refused to answer all grand jury questions while Shinnick merely refused to furnish the FBI potential evidence.

Shinnick said yesterday that he feels publicity surrounding his case (New York Times columnist Tom Wicker also wrote about Shinnick) may have influenced his release.

Shinnick competed in the long jump at the Tokyo Olympics in 1964 and later became part of the so-called "athletic revolution" which tried to reform establishment sports in this country. He now is an assistant professor of sports sociology at Rutgers University's Livingston College.

Despite his release, Shinnick's problems may be far from over. Kelly said it is "possible" Shinnick may be subpoenaed before the grand jury again.

U.S. ASKS RELEASE OF HEARST PROBE FIGURE

SCRANTON.—The U.S. Justice Department has asked that Phillip Shinnick, a former Olympic track athlete jailed since Nov. 30 for refusing to cooperate with an investigation of the Patrica Hearst case, be released from Allenwood Federal Penitentiary.

"I'll be very surprised if he's not out of jail by the end of the day Wednesday," said Laurence Kelley, assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

Kelly said that his office had not petitioned the court for the release of Jay Weiner, 23, a restaurant employee from Philadelphia, also jailed at Allenwood for contempt.

Shinnick, 34, an athletic director at the Livingston, N.J., campus of Rutgers University, was cited for civil contempt after he refused to obey a grand jury order that he give his fingerprints and samples of his hair and handwriting to the FBI.

Kelly said he had petitioned the court for Shinnick's release "because further investigation has made the comparison of his fingerprints, handwriting and hair sample no longer necessary to the case.

Shinnick was asked to turn over the samples last August by a grand jury in Harrisburg. He claimed that the jury had no power to ask for them and that investigators were attempting to link him with the harboring of Miss Hearst at a farmhouse in South Canaan, Pa., during the summer of 1974. She was being sought in connection with a San Francisco bank robbery.

Shinnick has denied that he ever visited the farmhouse, or ever knew Miss Hearst.

LET A JURY DECIDE, JAY WEINER SAYS IN PRISON INTERVIEW

(By Robert W. Kotzbauer)

"I'm fine. I'm angry about still being here, but I will never again be coerced into testifying."

It is 2 o'clock and Jay Weiner, 22, of Philadelphia, is speaking in the noisy visiting room at Allenwood Federal Prison near Williamsport.

Outside, the central Pennsylvania countryside is crackling with hard snow. It is a vast patchwork of white fields and black forests unbroken by walls or fences, and the cold is visibly etched on the red-brick buildings of the complex.

But inside this busy room, people are embracing, clinging to a few desperate moments of inner peace.

Despite his own turmoil, Weiner is smiling, pleasant, appearing relaxed in khaki fatigues, as he explains his frustrations and determination.

For almost two months Weiner, a former Temple University student, has been in jail for refusing to testify in the Patricia Hearst investigation.

He is a lonely among the nearly 500 inmates. His best friend, Phillip Shinnick, was set free Wednesday, and 24 hours later, Weiner feels that is no one with whom he can confide. Except a reporter. And, he is cautious.

"I hope you don't make me out to be crazy," he says.

"I want to be out. I can't get back the time I'm here. I don't want to chisel myself into martyrdom, but I will fight everything they do to intensify my punishment.

"My testifying could hurt other people, and would make me an accomplice of the government's cruelty. My feeling is there's a basic human right to be silent, to be left alone.

"They can't immunize me against the wrath of my conscience, or the scorn of my friends. I am guilty of contempt of court, as that is defined, but every day I spend here I have more contempt."

HE COULDN'T EXPLAIN

"If I have committed some crime, I should be charged and have a trial. I didn't have a chance to explain to people what I was doing.

"I feel that a jury might nullify the contempt. I feel I could explain my reason.

"Also, I and my family and friends have been treated horribly. To testify would be to endorse that. The grand jury is being used illegally, in my opinion, and I won't be part of that."

Jay Weiner is being held at Allenwood by order of U.S. Judge William J. Nealon of the Middle District of Pennsylvania, until he agrees to tell a grand jury in Scranton more about what he knows of Patty Hearst's 1974 hiding in a South Canaan, Wayne County, Pa. farmhouse.

Or, until the current session of this grand jury expires in July. Whichever comes first.

Authorities want to question Weiner about reports that Miss Hearst and her kidnapers in the radical Symbionese Liberation Army were harbored in the Northeastern Pennsylvania farm house during their flight from law enforcement officials in 1974.

He has testified about much of this before another grand jury in Harrisburg on March 13, 1975.

"I talked about Patty," he said, "and the Scotts," (former Oberlin College athletic director Jack Scott and his wife Micki who are suspected of harboring Miss Hearst during her long flight from the law.)

"I think it was a horrible mistake to testify then, but I was frightened. Had I not made the mistake, and learned from it, I wouldn't be so strongly determined not to testify now. The Jay Weiner of then was not the Jay Weiner of today.

DENIED FURLOUGHS

"The government," he continued, "had enough information from me to indict people for harboring. Patty herself gave far more explicit information in her trial (at which she was convicted of a California bank robbery). Yet no one has been indicted for harboring. I think the government is using the grand jury for some other reason.

"The only new questions I've refused to answer are, do I know Phil (Shinnick), and did I see him during the Summer of '74? But the FBI had stacks of pictures they didn't show me in Harrisburg. God knows who they would have asked me about."

Under law, which holds that a federal grand jury is entitled to every man's evidence, a person who refuses to testify, on grounds of his Fifth Amendment privilege not to incriminate himself, may be granted immunity from prosecution for his own actions and ordered to testify.

Failing to do so, he may be ordered to prison until he recants or the term of the grand jury expires. But, as in Weiner's case, he remains the responsibility of the federal marshal.

Thus, Weiner is denied the freedom of other Allenwood prisoners to leave the grounds for weekend furloughs. For a time, he was not permitted to speak with reporters, but Judge Nealon lifted this restriction.

Weiner said he is not being badly treated or harassed by prison staff or other inmates.

HE FEELS SAFE

"I'm not being beat up," he said, "I don't feel unsafe. I was exercising a lot until the cold weather. I don't eat the meat. It looks like doormats. My weight has dropped about 10 pounds."

He and Shinnick entered Allenwood last November. Shinnick had refused to give authorities samples of his hair, handwriting and fingerprints which, the FBI hoped, might tie him to the South Canaan farmhouse where Patty Hearst stayed. U.S. Attorney S. John Cottone decided last week that these materials were no longer needed, and the former Olympic athlete from New Jersey was released.

As for Weiner, he says he is reading a lot and tutoring three other inmates as part of his assignment in Allenwood's educational department.

Superintendent Eldron Jensen said Weiner is causing no problems, and because of his indefinite status, he isn't assigned to any specific rehabilitative programs.

Weiner said that he gets along well with other inmates, but doesn't talk with them.

"Most of the guys are here because some one testified against them. They're supportive," he said. "Also, they recognize they made a mistake, and can see the contradiction in my being jailed without any crime."

Weiner indicated G. Gordon Liddy, who was talking with a visitor in another corner of the room. Liddy, too, was jailed for refusing to tell all he knew and for crimes he committed in the Watergate scandal. He has been imprisoned for four years.

"That's wrong, in relation to how (former President) Nixon was treated," said Weiner. "Four years is long enough. Liddy's life has been ruined. He shouldn't be here."

"SLA IS NOT ME"

But what about Jay Weiner's life? Is it being ruined by his refusal to cooperate with the law? And how does he equate his professed non-violence with his involvement, however limited it may have been, with the Symbionese Liberation Army?

"This Scranton thing is about harboring," he said, "and not about bank robberies and other violence. I'm not here for the alleged crimes of the SLA. I've never held a gun. I've never done anything wrong.

"The SLA is not me, it never was me. When the government began hitting me, I said to myself. 'I'm on the SLA side.' But then I went to China (on a tour with Shinnick and other athletes, last year), and it became important to me to be critical of the SLA. Not just for its acts, but their clearly mistaken notion that things were going to change through kidnaping and such.

"There is certainly a need to change fundamental relationships in the United States. I've been thinking a lot about the power of the central government over the individual.

"If I were in the Soviet Union or China," he went on, "I would maintain there, too, that I have a right to be silent, and I know they would also jail me.

"William Penn was in jail four times. He too confronted this central question. I want to change things. I think it is everyone's responsibility.

"When I get out, I'd still like to get into sportswriting, although I realize I may be too hot an item to handle. I will always be identified as the Temple University graduate who refused to testify in the Patty Hearst case.

"I believe the job of a journalist," he said, "is to construct reality, not just observe it. Am I being too idealistic?

"I don't mind that as much as being considered naive," he said, and walked back out to the cold.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR SUPPORTS FEDERAL GRAND JURY REFORM
(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, FEB. 23, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law is about to commence its hearings on proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system. I have introduced H.R. 94 suggesting such extensive, yet balanced, reforms.

After careful review of my proposals, the Christian Science Monitor, I am pleased to say, has come out in strong support of my bill. I am inserting in the Record the editorial, dated February 16, 1977;

GRAND JURY REFORM AT LAST?

Attorney General Bell has stepped into the urgent question of grand jury reform by recognizing the general need for it while opposing such a specific key element of reform as permitting a witness to have counsel present. Mr. Bell promises study of the matter, which was also undertaken by his predecessor. The happiest outcome would be for him to lend his support to the new refinement of reform legislation perennially and persistently introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg of Pennsylvania.

Subcommittee hearings on this legislation are expected the middle of next month. Representative of the American Bar Association (ABA) have long backed efforts for reform. Passage of reform at long last would be a good way to begin the third century of a nation dedicated to liberty and justice for all.

Manifest abuses of the grand jury system have worked against justice. In his confirmation hearings Mr. Bell said it had become a tool of the prosecutor. But as the ABA convention considered adopting a slate of strong grand jury standards this week, Mr. Bell expressed reservations.

On the matter of permitting a witness to have counsel, the Attorney General, like his predecessor, makes the valuable point the grand jury should not be turned into a minitrial. The secret proceedings of the grand jury were never meant to be an adversary procedure but an investigative process to protect the innocent while bringing wrongdoing to the surface.

The new proposed legislation aims to keep it from becoming an adversary procedure by limiting the counsel's role to that of advising the witness—and not, for example, challenging evidence. Also, it would allow the court to remove or replace counsel in certain circumstances, while seeing that free counsel, if necessary, is available in general. Evidence could be challenged at a required preliminary, pretrial hearing such as most states already have.

There are also other refinements to provide some flexibility in the application of the reforms as evaluated by the courts. But the thrust remains to combat abuses by assuring the rights of the witnesses and the independence of the grand jury.

Thus not only must the witness be fully informed of his rights and other matters such as whether he is a potential defendant, but the jurors must be informed of their powers and duties—that they, not the prosecutor, are in control. Regulations on contempt and immunity would be tightened.

Beyond the legislation there are such proposals as a constitutional amendment to continue the investigative power but end the indicting power of grand juries. This has been proposed by high-level studies in the past. There are also proposals to eliminate the grand jury, as happened more than four decades ago in Britain, where the grand jury began.

Certainly, unless the United States is to follow Britain's lead in this manner, it must reform the grand jury system that has served it well in many ways but has been subject to too much misuse.

GRAND JURY REFORM (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, MARCH 15, 1977)

(By Hon. Raymond F. Lederer, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity today to bring to the attention of my colleagues an important article written by our colleagues from Pennsylvania the Honorable Joshua Eilberg.

Congressman Eilberg has worked diligently over the past years to bring to our attention the need for reform of our present grand jury system. This article, which appeared in the March 10 edition of the Evening Bulletin in Philadelphia, reviews the past and present actions in the area. I commend Congressman Eilberg's article to my colleagues of the House:

THE "EILBERG BILL": GRAND JURY REFORM

(By Joshua Eilberg)

The grand jury system has long been considered an integral part of our judicial heritage. Based on experiences with the British monarchy, our Founding Fathers considered grand juries such an important protection for the individual against possible Government persecution that they incorporated them into the Bill of Rights.

Unfortunately, the grand jury system has recently become the focus of controversy and misunderstanding. Defenders of grand juries view them as an essential prosecutorial tool and as a buffer between the state and the citizen. Critics fear them as uncontrolled "star chambers" and as "rubber stamps" for prosecutors.

Recent history has demonstrated that grand juries are valuable tools to ferret out official corruption. But the historic function of grand juries is also being perverted to serve partisan politica lends. Their historic purpose as a "legal shield" is being disregarded by prosecutors who totally dominate the proceedings.

As a result of these developments, for the first time since the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1789, Congress is conducting a comprehensive examination of the federal grand jury system—its operations, its problems, its abuses, and its reform.

In March 1973, as chairman of the subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee, I convened hearings regarding the so-called "Fort Worth Five"—controversy in which five Irish-Americans were subpoenaed by a grand jury in Fort Worth, Texas, for crimes allegedly committed in New York City. When they refused to testify, they were granted immunity without their consent, then held in contempt and imprisoned.

During the hearings, witnesses described the use of the grand jury to investigate "political crimes" and the ability of the prosecutor to open inquiries, often for political purposes, far from the site of an alleged offense. The witnesses also explained how the grand jury system is used to obtain information that is often unrelated to criminal activity.

Following this hearing, both in the 93d and 94th Congress. I introduced comprehensive bills to reform the federal grand jury system and held hearings on them.

Unfortunately, while almost all the witnesses supported some form of legislative change to grand jury procedures, the then attorney general and the Ford Administration totally opposed any reform. The new attorney general has publicly and privately stated his concern about prior abuses and about maintaining the independence of the grand jury. He has agreed to cooperate with my subcommittee in developing appropriate reforms. Hearings will be resumed this session on a new grand jury bill, H.R. 94, which I introduced on January 4, and I expect comprehensive legislation to be adopted by the 95th Congress.

H.R. 94 would insure independent and informed federal grand juries. Jurors, not the prosecutor, would determine and review all the evidence.

To insure secrecy, and avoid trial by newspaper, grand jury leaks would be made a crime with the punishment depending on the purpose of the leak.

To provide a proper balance between the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the right to obtain evidence, under H.R. 94 a witness could be immunized from prosecution, but only with strict judicial safeguards.

To establish a proper balance between the rights of a witness and the need for thorough investigations, H.R. 94 mandates new procedures. Witnesses would receive one week's notice, unless the government can justify a shorter period.

Witnesses could have counsel with them in the grand jury room—not to ask questions or challenge evidence but only to advise their clients and counsel could be removed for improprieties.

The need for grand jury reform is real. More and more states are providing increased rights and protections. But if the grand jury is to return to its historic role as a "bulwark against oppression," reform of our federal laws to provide for equitable procedures must be enacted.

Grand Jury Reform—Colorado Senate Proposals Parallel H.R. 94 Reforms
(Congressional Record, March 29, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. Eilberg. Mr. Speaker, Dale Tooley, the district attorney of Denver, Colo., has recently forwarded to me Colorado Senate bill 186 proposing reforms in that State's grand jury procedures. These reforms are almost identical to those I have proposed in H.R. 94 for our Federal grand jury system. Specifically, the provisions of the Colorado bill, which match my bill—

Would provide for a right to counsel in the grand jury room, free if the witness is indigent. Counsel would only advise, and could not make objections, arguments, or addresses to the grand jury. The court would maintain the power to remove any disruptive counsel;

Would require the grand jury to be informed of its duties, rights, and responsibilities prior to hearing the testimony of witnesses or reviewing documentary evidence;

Would permit any person to request to testify before the grand jury and allow denial of such a request to testify only for good reasons;

Would require witnesses to be informed of their rights before the grand jury and prohibit calling any witness if they indicate that they will exercise their privilege against self-incrimination;

Would allow subpenas to be challenged if they are unreasonable, oppressive, or for harassment purposes;

Would require all grand jury proceedings to be recorded and permit transcripts of a witness' testimony to then be made available to the witness prior to trial;

Would grant witnesses the right to review any prior statements in the prosecutor's possession prior to his testimony before the grand jury;

Would allow witnesses to be held in contempt only after a hearing with counsel and allow confinement only for the term of the grand jury or 6 months, whichever is less;

Would prohibit reiterative contempt, that is, prohibit witnesses imprisoned or fined for refusal to testify from being subsequently imprisoned or fined for refusal to testify as to the same matter;

Would prohibit repeated jeopardy, that is, once a grand jury has refused to issue an indictment, prohibit a new inquiry on the same matter from being initiated unless there is a finding that additional evidence has been discovered.

As District Attorney Tooley and others have indicated, the reforms proposed by H.R. 94—and the Colorado Senate bill—would not in any way interfere with legitimate investigations by grand juries. Rather, they would insure that such investigations are fair, thorough, and productive.

I would like at this point to insert in the Record the forwarding letter of District Attorney Tooley and the full text of Colorado Senate bill 186:

STATE OF COLORADO,
Denver, March 16, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Thank you for your letter of January 25, 1977, and for the information which you enclosed.

I thought you might be interested in S.B. 186 concerning grand jury reform, pending before the Colorado legislature. Enclosed is a copy of this legislation, in the form in which it was approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It was approved on second reading, and we expect it will clear the Senate within the next two weeks. There will be two amendments to it, [one which will leave to the discretion of the prosecutor the form of the subpoena and any required notice thereon, and the other restricting grand jury reports]. That restriction will probably require that a subject of a report have an opportunity to appear and to testify and that in no event could a report be issued without the approval of a judge who determines that public release of a report is important to the public interest.

Because so many of these changes encompass elements of the legislation which you are proposing, and which Dade County State's Attorney Richard Gerstein advocates, I am sending this information to you and to Mr. Gerstein.

Yours truly,

DALE TOOLEY.

The committee recommends that S.B. No. 186 be amended as follows and, as so amended, be referred to the Committee of the Whole with favorable recommendation:

Amend printed bill, page 1, strike everything below the enacting clause, and substitute the following:

"Section 1. 16-5-204, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is repealed and reenacted, with amendments, to read:

16-5-204. Witnesses before a grand jury—procedure (1)(a) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any grand jury refuses, without just cause shown, to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the prosecuting attorney may submit an application to the court for an order directing the witness to show why the witness should not be held in contempt. After submission of such application and (a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, the court may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined). Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information; however, (the court may release the witness from confinement if the court determines that further confinement will not cause the witness) to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

(b) If a witness has been confined in accordance with paragraph (a) of this subsection (1), he may, upon petition filed with the court, request a hearing to be held within ten days to review the contempt order at which hearing he shall have the right to be represented by counsel. The court, at the hearing, may rescind, modify, or affirm the order.

(c) In any proceeding, conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed for a person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

(2) No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before any district court shall again be imprisoned or fined for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events before any grand jury.

(3) Upon impanelment of each grand jury, the court shall give to such grand jury adequate and reasonable written notice of and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands the nature of:

(a) Its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the state of Colorado alleged to have been committed;

(b) Its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

(c) Its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

(d) The subject matter of the investigation and the criminal statutes or other statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

(e) The duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of nine or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there is probable cause for finding indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

(f) The requirement that the grand jury may not find an indictment in cases of perjury unless at least two witnesses to the same fact present evidence establishing probable cause to find such an indictment.

(4)(a) Each grand jury subpoena shall contain the following advisement prominently displayed on the front of the subpoena:

NOTICE

(I) You have the right to retain an attorney to represent you and to advise you regarding your grand jury appearance.

(II) Anything you say to the grand jury may be used against you in a court of law.

(III) You have the right to refuse to answer questions if you feel the answers would tend to incriminate you or to implicate you in any illegal activity.

(IV) If you cannot afford or obtain an attorney, you may consult with the public defenders office, or request the court to appoint an attorney to represent you.

(b) Any witness who is not advised of his rights pursuant to paragraph (a) of this subsection (4) shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testifies or any evidence he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding, except for perjury, against him in any court.

(c) In any proceeding before the grand jury, if the prosecuting attorney has written notice in advance of the appearance of a witness that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, such witness shall not be compelled to appear before the grand jury unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

(d) Any witness subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to assistance of counsel during any time that such witness is being questioned in the presence of such grand jury, and counsel may be present, in the grand jury room with his client during such questioning. However, counsel for the witness shall be permitted only to counsel with the witness and shall not make objections, arguments, or address the grand jury. Such counsel may be retained by the witness or may, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance, be appointed in the same manner as if that person were eligible for appointed counsel. An attorney present in the grand jury room shall take an oath of secrecy. If the court, at an in camera hearing, determines that counsel was disruptive, then the court may order counsel to remain outside the court-room when advising his client.

(e) Once a grand jury has returned a no true bill based upon a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into same transaction or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the prosecuting attorney, that the prosecuting attorney has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

(f) A certified or authorized reporter shall be present at all grand jury sessions. All grand jury proceedings and testimony from commencement to adjournment shall be reported. The reporter's notes and any transcripts which may be prepared shall be preserved, sealed, and filed with the court. No release or destruction of the notes or transscripts shall occur without prior court approval.

(g) Upon application by the prosecutor, or by any witness after notice to the prosecutor, the court, for good cause, may enter an order to furnish to that witness a transcript of his own grand jury testimony, or minutes, reports, or exhibits relating to them.

(h) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury, or an attorney for such witness with the witness's written approval, shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy at the witness's expense any statement in the possession of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury which such witness has made that relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. If a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript and shall not pay a fee.

(i) No person subpoenaed to testify or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined as provided in this section, for his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if upon filing a motion and, upon an evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpoena or a court having jurisdiction under this section, the court finds that:

(I) A primary purpose or effect of requiring such a person to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury is or will be to secure testimony for trial for which the defendant has already been charged by information, indictment, or criminal complaint.

(II) Compliance with a subpoena would be unreasonable or oppressive;

(III) A primary purpose of the issuance of the subpoena is to harass the witness;

(IV) The witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under this section for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events; or

(V) The witness has not been advised of his rights as specified in paragraph (a) of this subsection (4).

(j) Any grand jury may indict a person for an offense when the evidence before such grand jury provides probable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

(k) The district court before which the indicted defendant is to be tried shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds, upon the filing of a motion by the indicted defendant based upon the grand jury record without argument or further evidence, that the grand jury finding of probable cause is not supported by the record.

(l) Any person may approach the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury and request to testify or retestify in an inquiry before a grand jury or to appear before a grand jury. The prosecuting attorney or the grand jury shall keep a record of all denials of such requests to that prosecuting attorney or grand jury, including the reasons for not allowing such person to testify or appear. If the person making such request is dissatisfied with the decision of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury, such person may petition the court for hearing on the denial by the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury. If the court grants the hearing, then the court may permit the person to testify or appear before the grand jury, if the court finds that such testimony or appearance would serve the interests of justice.

(m) The foreman, or acting foreman when designated by the court, of the grand jury may swear or affirm all witnesses who come before the grand jury

(n) Any other motions testing the validity of the indictment may be heard by the court based only on the record and argument of counsel, unless there is cause shown for the need for additional evidence.

Section 2. Safety clause. The general assembly hereby finds, determines, and declares that this act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety."

FORMER GRAND JUROR NOTES ABUSES OF GRAND JURY SYSTEM (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, APRIL 27, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, today my Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law continued its hearings on grand jury reform. We heard the testimony of prosecutors and former prosecutors and a district court judge, representing the Judicial Conference of the United States. In addition, we received the testimony of former grand jurors.

I would like to call to the attention of the Members the testimony of William P. Gloege, who was a Federal grand juror in 1975 in California. Mr. Gloege forcefully demonstrated that the Federal grand jury system has become merely an extension of prosecutorial power, with little input and decisionmaking by the grand jurors themselves.

His description of his actual grand jury experience, as presented to the subcommittee, clearly demonstrates the need for the reforms I have proposed in H.R. 94.

The testimony follows:

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM P. GLOEGE, VICE PRESIDENT, ASSOCIATION FOR EFFECTIVE GRAND JURIES, BEFORE THE HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

[The submitted statement of Mr. Gloege may be found in the hearings of April 27, 1977, at p. 517.]

FEDERAL JUDGE WILLIAM CAMPBELL DISCUSSES GRAND JURY REFORM (CONGRESSINAL RECORD, MAY 23, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, recently the Honorable William J. Campbell, U.S. district judge for the northern district of Illinois, testified before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, Specifically, Judge Campbell discussed some of the problems involved in the present Federal grand jury system, in an antitrust context.

Judge Campbell noted that the grand jury has effectively abandoned its function as a "protective bulwark—against arbitrary and overzealous prosecutors." He recommends the abolishment of the grand jury and the use of an "information." I have introduced four resolutions, House Resolution 59, House Resolution, 60, House Resolution 61 and House Resolution 62, each of which would eliminate the constitutional requirement of an indictment for infamous crimes. In hearings by the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, we have explored and will continue to explore the continuing vitality of the grand jury as an indicting body.

Judge Campbell's testimony also supports my belief that whether or not the constitutional requirement of an indictment is eliminated, there is a clear need for reforms of investigatory grand jury procedures. Judge Campbell notes that the present grand jury system allows abuses, such as those involving immunity, notification of witnesses, and prosecutorial discretion. He indicates that one solution would be to reduce some offenses, here—antitrust offenses, to misdemeanors and thereby require preliminary hearings. H.R. 94 would accomplish the same result, but in a slightly different manner. To insure, as Judge Campbell recommends, preservation of testimony, review of charges by the judiciary, and accountability by the prosecutor, H.R. 94 would require a preliminary hearing in every case whether or not there is an indictment. Prosecutors, knowing there is an indictment. Prosecutors, knowing that they would have to present their evidence at a preliminary examination, would be less likely to present hearsay or inadmissible evidence to the grand jurors to secure an indictment. In addition, they would be more likely to conduct preliminary examinations prior to indictment and thus increase the number of waivers by defendants of indictments.

I commend to my colleagues the very scholarly and knowledgeable presentation by Judge Campbell, excerpts of which follow:

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM J. CAMPBELL

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your kind invitation to appear today to testify regarding the trial of major antitrust litigation in the United States district courts. The federal courts are, and indeed have been, experiencing problems in processing these major antitrust cases for some time. Cases involving complex issues, virtually endless discovery, and the examination of thousands—and even millions—of documents result frequently in interminable delay and sap the resources of the courts to the detriment of other cases on the docket. I would like to commend you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of your subcommittee for your willingness to undertake the demanding task of seeking to improve the judicial handling of these major antitrust cases and the dedication you obviously are bringing to this effort. I can promise you that it will not be easy.

Let me say first of all that my remarks are my own and not necessarily those of the Judicial Conference of the United States or federal judges generally. . . .

Education of judges in the use of techniques to control, expedite and minimize expense in these types of cases—a continuing part of the work of the Federal Judicial Center—has in my judgment been the most effective means of aiding the judiciary in the trial of major antitrust cases. Yet a great many problems remain to be solved that cannot be solved by education alone. I would like to mention a few.

(1) extended and protracted grand jury proceedings in criminal antitrust cases frequently lasting a year or more. . . .

As to the function of the grand jury in antitrust criminal prosecutions, my experience has led me to the conclusion that this ancient and honorable institution has long outlived its usefulness and should be abolished. I have long advocated the abolition of the grand jury as a means of improving, economizing, and expediting the federal administration of criminal justice. Several years ago I corresponded at some length with your distinguished Chairman, Senator Kennedy, on this subject. I also respectfully direct your attention to my published views which will be found in 55 F.R.D. 229–253 and in Volume 64, No. 2, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology (Northwestern University School of Law) at pp. 174 to 182. In considered judgment the grand jury as it is now being used in complex antitrust criminal cases is the principal cause of the delay, expense, confusion, and unfairness about which so much public complaint is heard today. Although the grand jury still performs in a cumbersome and dilatory fashion its traditional investigative function, it has completely abandoned its more important necessary and historical function of providing a protective bulwark to the citizenry against arbitrary and overzealous prosecutors. Its proceedings continuing to be ex parte; the complexity of the issues in antitrust cases continuing to cause the grand jurors always to follow the prosecutor's recommendations; the abuse of immunity still being practiced by prosecutors before it, and the continuing failure to inform witnesses who are themselves "targeted" for prosecution, as well as the corporation in whose investigation they are testifying, all add up to a complete abuse of this ancient protective duty of the grand jury.

Although, as the Chairman well knows, I still adhere to my recommendation that the federal government follow the lead of so many states and of England and abolish the grand jury. This would of course require the time consuming process of Constitutional amendment. The same result could however be immediately achieved in antitrust criminal proceedings, which this Committee is considering, by statutory amendment reducing all antitrust crimes from felonies to misdemeanors and proceeding in each case hereafter by information rather than indictment and reducing the penalty to fines and imprisonment of not more than one year under the following plan.

I favor a system which would bring theory into line with reality by placing the responsibility for initiating criminal prosecutions where it in fact already exists—with the prosecuting attorney. Prosecutions should be commenced upon the filing of an information signed by the prosecutor, and be followed by a probably cause hearing before a judicial officer who would determine whether there is sufficient evidence to allow the prosecution to continue to trial. A most salutary result of such a process would be the removal of the anonymity which presently enshrouds the exercise of prosecutorial discretion through the vehicle of the grand jury.

My suggestion would encompass the transfer to the prosecutor all powers which currently belong to the grand jury. Thus, for example, the subpoena power would be lodged with the prosecuting officer. The Department of Justice under the Antitrust Civil Process Act already possesses subpoena powers. Witnesses could be examined under oath as well as in secret, their testimony being recorded by an official court reporter. Testimony would thus be preserved for use at trial, if necessary. Authority to extend immunity for prosecution in exchange for testimony would also be given the prosecuting attorney. Indeed, federal prosecutors already enjoy such authority under the Omnibus Crime Act.

Upon reaching a determination that a prosecution should be initiated, the prosecutor would then file a criminal information with the court in much the same fashion as indictments are now presented. A hearing to determine whether there is probable cause to proceed with the prosecution would then be scheduled. The hearing would be conducted before a judicial officer such as a magistrate. I suggest that the hearing be adversary in nature, with the accused given the right to appear with counsel, cross-examine the prosecution's witnesses and present evidence in his own behalf.

The benefits which would accrue from the system which I have described seem to me to be unlimited. The determination of whether a citizen would be required to answer criminal charges brought against him would be made by a member of the judiciary. The sham of the "autonomous" grand jury would be discarded in favor of a judgment made by one trained and skilled in the law, and more importantly not subject to the direction and control of the prosecuting agency. True independence would be restored, thereby revitalizing the concept that a citizen should be protected against unfounded accusation of crime, whatever its source.

Investigative powers so necessary to orderly enforcement of the antitrust laws would not be curtailed. They would simply be lodged with the prosecuting authority, where their de facto exercise has already come to reside. Constitutional guarantees would not be diluted in the slightest. Judges would remain available to entertain motions seeking to prevent any over-reaching by prosecutors. The civil analogue to such a procedure would be the protective order issued in the context of discovery disputes. Also, a transcript of the prosecutor's investigative proceedings would always be available for review by the judge.

The advantages which some contend flow from the secret nature of grand jury proceedings would also be preserved under the system I propose. Although this secrecy has been the subject of well-intended criticism in recent years, no one can question that in some cases it has its benefits during the investigatory phase of a prosecution. It is said to encourage disclosure by witnesses who have information concerning the commission of a crime, to prevent outside influences from contaminating the investigation, to prevent the accused from fleeing prior to being charged, to limit subornation of perjury, and to protect the innocent from the harm that might be visited upon them by disclosure of an investigation not leading to a formal charge. An example would be the exposure to class action suits predicated solely upon the appearance of innocent corporate executives as witnesses before the grand jury.

Perhaps the most significant by-product of my suggestion will be the focusing of responsibility of concomitant accountability for the initiation of a criminal prosecution with the prosecuting authority. No longer will the prosecutor be able to hide anonymously behind the shield of the grand jury. His decision to prosecute will be reviewable by a trained and independent legal officer. As with the conduct of our other institutions of government, public scrutiny will follow his actions. In my considered judgment, such a scheme cannot help but have a sobering impact upon the so-called "overzealous" prosecutor. Furthermore, our courts would be relieved of many cases now returned by grand juries at the urging of such prosecutors despite woefully insufficient evidence to convict.

Another important contribution which would result from the system I advocate would be a substantial increase in the efficiency and economy of our system of antitrust enforcement. It cannot be doubted that the operation of grand juries constitutes a very expensive and time consuming process in complex antitrust cases. Antitrust grand juries seem always to be held for the full statutorily permissible 18 months. Nor can we underestimate the unnecessary waste in the energies of our law enforcement and prosecuting personnel generated by the totally repetitious task of making presentations before the grand jury. The elimination of this needless squandering of resources would be a great boon to the administration of justice.

The foregoing procedure would in my opinion, should this Committee recommend it and it becomes law, do more to expedite the prosecution and punishment of price fixers and restore public confidence in our system of justice than anything else this Committee could do. Furthermore nothing would be lost in sanction or deterrence since the one-year imprisonment it provides would in practice exceed the average now imposed under felony charges and is well within the present suggested sentences less parole as outlined in the Department of Justice suggestions filed with this Committee. (See Guidelines for Sentencing, Department of Justice, February 24, 1977.)

National Council of Churches Calls for Grand Jury Reform
(Congressional Record, May 23, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. Eilberg. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a most thoughtful and comprehensive statement adopted on May 5, 1977, by the National Council of the Churches of Christ Governing Board, concerning the need for Federal grand jury reform.

The NCC resolution recognizes the need for church and ecumenical agencies to support this reform, which is now under study by the House Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair.

I commend to my colleagues' attention a Washington Post news account on May 7, 1977, of this NCC statement, along with the text of the resolution:

National Council of Churches Criticizes Grand Jury System

(By Janis Johnson)

The National Council of Churches governing board has attacked the grand jury system as riddled with abuses and urged its 31 member denominations to resist efforts by governmental investigators to obtain confidential information from church files.

The unanimous action by the 150 delegates to the semi-annual meeting of the board in Cincinnati, completed yesterday, stemmed from a grand jury probe into purported links between a military Puerto Rican independence group and a controversial Hispanic social activist organization funded by the Episcopal church.

The federal investigation of bombings believed to be the work of the military FALN has led to the imprisonment on contempt charges of two women lay ministers of the Episcopal church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs. They went to jail rather than testify before the grand jury. They have denied knowledge of the FALN or its members but said their resistance was "on principle."

In January Presiding Bishop John M. Allin voluntarily allowed the FBI into the Episcopal Church Center's office in New York for a week to look at nonconfidential Hispanic commission files. He took this action after a subpoena served first on Bishop Milton Wood, church executive for administration, was withdrawn.

Officials of other churches have conceded they are uninformed on the implications that similar actions against their files would raise about religious liberty and separation of church and state.

In one resolution passed without dissent the governing board expressed "deep concern" over the jailing of the women "as a matter of great significance to all member churches of the National Council." It directed council president William P. Thompson to appoint a commission to meet with Bishop Allin and "aid him in securing the early release of the two women, to restore their salaries and to pay their legal expenses."

In a resolution on grand juries, pending development of a more thorough policy statement, the council declared that "the use of the grand jury's powers to harass and pursue political dissidents is a departure from its proper constitutional function (to protect citizens from unwarranted prosecutions) and is a great threat to public order, lawful government and true domestic security."

The statement listed a binding procedure for council agencies and urged member churches, which have about 40 million members, to adopt the same course of action.

LITTON CASE SHOWS NEED FOR GRAND JURY REFORM (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JUNE 15, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues two recent court cases which point up the need for reform of the Federal grand jury system.

Both cases demonstrate how grand juries and grand jury procedures can be totally dominated by prosecutors. I will present the details on one case, United States against Litton, today, and information on the second case, involving the indictment of a New York City judge, on a subsequent day.

In United States against Litton, a Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., noted the use by the prosecutor of the grand jury to improperly secure a civil remedy against a company. Specifically, the court stated that:

"This (case) is further evidence of a cynical view that . . . the grand jury . . . (is) a mere echo of the Office of the United States Attorney."

The House Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair, Mr. Speaker, is in the process of holding hearing on H.R. 94, which would provide badly needed reform in the Federal grand jury system. I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following materials regarding one case I have cited:

[From the Washington Post, May 26, 1977]

FRAUD CHARGE AGAINST LITTON DISMISSED BY FEDERAL JUDGE

(By Jane Seaberry)

A federal judge in Alexandria yesterday dismissed an indictment charging fraud againt Litton Industries, ruling that U.S. prosecutors abused the grand jury system in threatening Litton with the indictment if the company did not agree to government proposals.

The order of U.S. District Court Judge Albert V. Bryan Jr. also prohibits prosecutors from reindicting Litton on the charge because "prosecutorial discretion" [was] abused.

Litton, a major defense contractor, was indicted April 6 on a charge of fraudulently overcharging the Navy $37 million for building three nuclear attack submarines between 1968 and 1971.

This indictment came after an attempt to indict Litton in 1975 failed when the term of the special grand jury called in March of that year solely to investigate Litton expired.

But in April, 1976, the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals awarded a $17.5 million judgment to Litton from the Navy in connection with the contract.

Bryan said in his opinion that after the 1975 attempt to indict Litton failed, prosecutors, in an attempt to get the award revised, continued to threaten to indict Litton if it did not agree to reopen the appeals board proceedings.

"What is reprehensible is the threat to use, as well as the actual use of, the grand jury as a bargaining tool in an effort to upset the final civil award to which Litton was entitled," Bryan said.

Prosecutors also had two FBI agents summarize evidence to the April 6 grand jury rather than formally present information and witnesses as in the previous grand jury, which did not indict Litton, Bryan said.

"This is further evidence of the cynical view that has been taken of the grand jury in this case, namely, as a mere echo of the voice of the U.S. Attorney," Bryan said.

"I think the court misread our action," said U.S. Attorney William B. Cummings, who, with the Justice Department, headed the two-year investigation of Litton.

Bryan "assumed that there were motivation, a desire on our part to get this thing back to the [appeals] board and use the grand jury to bludgeon them. Nothing could be further from the truth," Cummings said.

[In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, Alexandria Division—Criminal No. 77-70-A]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA VERSUS LITTON SYSTEMS, INC. d/b/a INGALLS NUCEAR SHIPBUILDING DIVISION, DEFENDANT

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

On April 6, 1977 a grand jury of this district, Alexandria Division, returned a one-count indictment charging the defendant with presenting a false and fradulent claim to the United States Navy on or about May 26, 1972, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 287.[1] That claim arose from a contract awarded the defendant, Litton Systems, Inc., d/b/a Ingalls Nuclear Shipbuilding Division (Litton) by the United States Navy in June, 1968, for the construction of three nuclear attack submarines. The defendant has filed, among others, a motion to dismiss the indictment on the ground of governmental misconduct in connection with the grand jury proceedings preceding the indictment.

During the course of performance of the contract there were certain delays which resulted in increased costs of construction. After some preliminaries, on May 26, 1972, Litton forwarded to the Navy data supporting a previously submitted price proposal (the claim) to recover that portion of the cost increase attributable to the government. When no resolution of the matter could be reached, Litton appealed to the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals (ASBCA) claiming a total reimbursement of approximately $30,000,000. The hearing before the ASBCA began in October 30, 1973, and concluded on March 7, 1974. On April 16, 1976, the ASBCA issued it decision awarding Litton over $16,000,000 on its claim. It is the May 26, 1972 claim which was the subject ultimately of the proceedings before the ASBCA and which the present indictment charges violated 18 U.S.C. § 287.

On March 17, 1975, after the conclusion of the hearing before the ASBCA but over a year prior to the time that body issued its decision a grand jury was impanelled by this Court to investigate whether a crime had been committed by Litton in the subcommitting of the claim. After eighteen months this grand jury expired by operation of law [Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(g)] on September 17, 1976, [1] § 287. False, fictitious or fraudulent claims.

Whoever makes or presents to any person or officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, or to any department or agency thereof, any claim upon or against the United States, or any department or agency thereof, knowing such claim to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

without having returned an indictment against Litton. The decision of the ASBCA in the meantime had been filed on April 16, 1976, and Litton and the government on or about May 14, 1976 jointly agreed not to file motions for reconsideration of that decision.

On September 9, 1976, just prior to the expiration of the grand jury's term, at a meeting between the Assistant United States Attorney in charge of the case and attorneys for Litton, the former offered to terminate the investigation and not seek an indictment if Litton would agree to allow the proceedings before the ASBCA to be reopened and to permit evidence gathered by the grand jury to be presented to the ASBCA. A similar offer was made on September 14, 1976. Litton rejected the offer on both occasions and subsequently by letter dated November 1, 1976.

The government characterizes the overtures in this way:

On September 7, 1976, AUSA Dunham initiated contact with Vincent Fuller, then representing Litton, and suggested a meeting which occurred on September 9, 1976 in the offices of the United States Attorney. At this meeting, Fuller was advised that the Grand Jury investigation indicated that the claim had been premised on an erroneous basis and decided by the ASBCA without benefit of all the facts. Fuller was further advised that, although the Grand Jury was expiring, further investigation would be required to determine whether Litton or any officer or employee of the company had deliberately allowed the claim to be premised on a factually erroneous basis, that is, it was made clear to Fuller that the primary open avenue of inquiry was the issue of criminal intent.

Dunham explained to Fuller that he saw a possible way to resolve the intent issue in Litton's favor and thus eliminate further expenditure of resources by both Litton and the Government. Dunham stated he was reluctant to discuss it without assurances first being made that the discussions would not be taken as a threat or treated as other than a good faith attempt to resolve the intent question. Fuller agreed with the ground rules laid out and encouraged the dialogue to ensue. He said he would terminate the talks at any time he deemed them inappropriate or improper. The suggestion was then made by the Assistant United States Attorneys that, assuming all the details could be worked out, the ASBCA hearing be reopened with both sides having access to the investigation materials.

* * * * * * *

The suggested meeting commenced on September 14, 1976. Present were Lintz, Fuller, and Wilson, another retained crimnial counsel, and Dunham, Fisher and Kirby, Assistant United States Attorneys. It was again unequivocably stated at the meeting's outset that before any discussion could ensue, there had to be assurances from Litton's side of the table that, at some later point in time, the discussions would not be used as a basis for an allegation of duress, threat, intimidation or other intimidation of improper conduct on the part of the prosecution. Fuller, Wilson and Lintz all indicated they understood that the discussions were being had only with this mutual understanding. The Government then fully outlined the evidence developed during the Grand Jury investigation establishing that Litton's claim was false. This was followed by an indepth discussion participated in by all persons present on the mechanics that would be utilized to get a 6(a) Order and reopen the ASBCA proceedings. The meeting terminated on a cordial note.—Government's Response, pp. 4–6.

Following the expiration of the grand jury's term, the United States continued its own investigation of the matter and it asserts that this investigation revealed evidence of criminal intent which had been unavailable to the eighteen-month grand jury. Consequently, according to the government, it presented evidence to an existing grand jury which had been impanelled on July 19, 1976 in connection with inquiries of other matters. This evidence was presented at various times during the period February 28, 1977 through March 10, 1977.

On March 11, 1977, perhaps sensing an impending indictments, Litton offered by letter to do what had been suggested the previous September by government counsel. By then, however, the matter had progressed too far. Deputy Attorney General Thornburg had requested on January 17, 1977, that the matter be presented to a new grand jury for the purpose of seeking an indictment, and on February 7, 1977 the Attorney General personally approved prosecution of the case. Before the grand jury two special agents of the FBI summarized the matters that had been presented to the previous grand jury. Counsel represented at argument on this motion that the summary and presentation of additional evidence took approximately six days. The previous grand jury, during its eighteen month tenure, had considered the matter for a total of approximately twenty-five days.

It appears from the uncontroverted affidavit of defense counsel that at a meeting held on April 19, 1977, the Assistant United States Attorneys stated that there had been no requirements of the two agents:

1. To read and review all of the matters occurring before the eighteen month investigating grand jury;

2. To restrict their summary presentations to those matters occurring before the eighteen month grand jury;

3. To distinguish between hearsay and personal knowledge; and

4. To distinguish between matters occurring and not occurring before the eighteen month investigating grand jury.

At the same meeting, one of the Assistant United States Attorneys involved in the case stated to counsel for the defendant that "Litton bought this indictment."

* * * * * * *

No matter how benign a view of the matter is urged by the government, the truth of it is that the government wanted a "second bite at the apple" in its controversy with Litton over the issue of reimbursement; that it used the implied threat of indictment in an effort to obtain reconsideration of what Litton, presumptively innocent, was otherwise entitled to; and that when Litton, as was its right, refused to forego that entitlement, namely the finality of the civil award, the government retaliated—made good its threat—by producing an indictment. This is a serious abuse of prosecutorial power.

The government's position is that during the investigation before the first grand jury incriminating evidence was uncovered which led the prosecutors to believe that the claim as submitted to the ASBCA was false, although there was no evidence before the grand jury of criminal intent; that their attempt to resolve the matter without an indictment was motivated by a desire to see that the ASBCA had the entire picture—to let Litton prove its innocence if it had nothing to hide; and that the deal had many attractive features from Litton's point of view.[2] This misses the point of its misconduct. Had the bargain been proposed after indictment it arguably could be justified, but what is reprehensible here is the threat to use, as well as the actual use of, the grand jury as a bargaining tool in an effort to upset the final civil award to which Litton was entitled.[3] Rather than ". . . security against hasty, malicious and oppressive prosecution; . . . standing between the accuser and the accused . . . ," Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962), the grand jury here was used to formulate a ". . . charge . . . dictated by an intimidating power . . ." ibid.

The government's analogy of the procedure followed here to that followed in a Pretrial Diversion Program is misplaced. The Pretrial Diversion Program is a judicially sanctioned plan designed for rehabilitation of persons who admit their guilt, without formal charges brought. Here, not only at a time when the defendant was protesting its innocence, but at a time when the government, according to its brief,[4] had no evidence of criminal intent, the investigating grand jury was used as a bargaining tool to effect a reopening of the matter before the ASBCA.

[2] The government points out that the bargain as offered could possibly have resulted in Litton's obtaining a higher award and the government could not assert fraud as a defense to the claim before the Court of Claims. The "bargaining," however, was hardly at arm's-length. With a grand jury investigation in the background, the United States enjoyed substantial leverage in making its proposal.

[3] The perception of the grand jury as an intimidatory device was implicit in the Assistant United States Attorney's statement at the April 19, 1977 meeting. In his opinion, by refusing to agree to a reconsideration of the award it had gained through the ASBCA, Litton had brought the indictment upon itself.

[4] "The investigation had established beyond peradventure of a doubt that the claim was false. The only remaining issue was the presence or absence of criminal intent. Although the net effect of what was done in the company's name was egregious, the evidence of wrongdoing by particular individuals was not then of a character to convince the Department of Justice that any individuals should be indicted, although certain individuals were being considered as possible targets. The individuals considered as potential defendants with the exception of shipyard president, Ned Marandino, were low to middle management, people in positions sufficiently significant enough to bind the corporation with their conduct but as to whom no direct benefit could be discerned as having been derived from participating in the assembly of a false claim. The only direct beneficiaries of the wrongful conduct, assuming intent could be established, was the company and the highest echelons of its management. But there was no evidence that these individuals had ever read what had been submitted in Litton's name. After review of the matter in the Department of Justice, the company itself appeared to be the foremost criminal target assuming that additional evidence on willfulness could be developed and obtained through further investigation." Government's Response, pp. 3, 4.

Nor does the claim of waiver by the United States validate its conduct in this case. One need only put himself in the shoes of counsel for a putative defendant being investigated by a grand jury to recognize how little choice such counsel would have when approached by an Assistant United States Attorney with a proposition contemplating termination of the investigation. What prudent lawyer would not have acceded readily to the stipulation that any discussion would not be considered fraud or coercion? But the exaction of such a condition does not make the circumstances less coercive, and it is no comfort to the government here.

At least one circuit court of appeals, in the exercise of its supervisory power, has directed a dismissal of an indictment returned solely on hearsay testimony in an extreme case. e.g., United States v. Estepa, 471 F. 2d 1132 (2nd Cir. 1972). This Court, however, is unwilling to dismiss the indictment on that ground in view of the unequivocal and as yet unrepudiated language in Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956), especially since here there was evidence other than the summary presented to the indicting grand jury. In the case of In re Grand Jury Investigation of Banana, 214 F. Supp. 856 (D. Md. 1963), cited by the defendant, the Court condemned the practice followed here, but the action there was the prohibition of future conduct rather than a dismissal of the indictment.

The appearance and summation testimony before the grand jury of the two agents is relevant, however, to the issue of the misconduct of the United States Attorney's Office. One need not be a skeptic to question the impartiality of a presentation which persuaded a grand jury that neither had heard nor seen the previous witnesses or documents to do within ten days what the prior grand jury had not seen fit to do after twenty-five days of evidentiary hearing over an eighteen month period. This is further evidence of the cynical view that has been taken of the grand jury in this case, namely, as a mere echo of the office of the United States Attorney.

The government's suggestion to reopen the matter before the ASBCA ominous when considered with the fact that after the Board's decision was rendered but while the first grand jury was still in existence and prior to the September overtures to the defendant by the United States Attorney's Office, the government caused subpoenas to be served on the judge who presided at the ASBCA hearing, and the Chairman of the ASBCA (who was one of the four concurring judges in the ASBCA decision). They did not actually testify before the grand jury, but on or about May 21, 1976, a Special Assistant United States Attorney, and on or about July 21, 1976 two FBI agents interviewed the presiding judge relative to whether and to what extent matters disclosed before the grand jury had been considered by the ASBCA in its decision. The extent to which such matters were revealed in the interview is not shown by the record; however no order allowing disclosure was obtained as provided for by Fed. R. Cr. P. 6(e). Such activity could only carry the potential for depreciation of the ASBCA's impartiality and vitiation of its decisions in any reopened claim or in future claims involving the defendant.[5]

It is entirely possible that upon trial Litton would be found guilty of presenting a false or fraudulent claim; however, when prosecutorial discretion is abused, as here, dismissal of the indictment as a prophylaxis is warranted. Cf. United States v. DeMarco, 550 F.2d 1224 (9th Cir. 1977). While the circumstances here do not carry the procedural "due process implications" found to support the dismissal in DeMarco, the Court has no difficulty discerning abridgement of the defendant's substantive due process rights in permitting the government's conduct. The determination and review of civil disputes such as the one at the core of this prosecution is governed by an established statutory and regulatory scheme. Allowing the government to circumvent the finality otherwise accorded the administrative resolution of contract disputes by threatening criminal prosecution in substance abrogates the private party's right to hold the government to its own rules. At the very least the Court is warranted in exercising its supervisory power over federal prosecutors where there is present deliberate and disingenuous conduct.

The foregoing resolution of the matter renders it unnecessary to face the issue presented by the other motion on which the Court reserved decision, namely, the defendant's motion for a change of venue under Fed. R. Cr. P. 21(b). Should the [5] It is represented that Litton has pending before the ASBCA claims totaling in excess of $900,000,000.

Court now or in the future be required to face the issue it would be inclined to grant the motion. The indictment was presented in this district because the allegedly false claim was presented to the contracting officer whose office by mere happenstance is located here. The failure of Litton to request an onsite hearing in the civil administrative appeal proceeding which it initiated ought not to foreclose it from asserting its right to be tried criminally elsewhere if the requirements for a 21(b) transfer otherwise exist. And they do. Platt v. Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co., 376 U.S. 240 (1964). The defendant's offices and shipyard, where the work which formed the basis of the claim was performed, are located, in Mississippi. The numerous (approximately 60 according to the defendant) defense witnesses for the most part are located there, and the inconvenience inherent in requiring them to come to Virginia for what may be a lengthy trial is readily apparent. The events likely to be in issue also occurred in Mississippi and the documents and record involved in the case are there. Some disruption of Litton's business is bound to take place if its witnesses have to be this far from its place of business. While the Court cannot at this time determine whether a view of the location is necessary, this has been done in ASBCA proceedings other than those involved here and that body apparently found it helpful in its resolution of the matters in controversy. The expense of the trial for the defendant undoubtedly would be greater if the trial was conducted in Virginia rather than Mississippi; such expense would include, among other things, the employment of local counsel as well as payment for travel and maintenance for defendant's Mississippi counsel[6] and witnesses. The only factor weighing in favor of retaining the case in this district and division is convenience for the Department of Justice. This is not entitled to a great deal of weight. The presumption that the proper location for trial is the place of indictment and of the technical commission of the alleged fraud has been overcome. The above discussion illustrates that for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice, the case most appropriately should be prosecuted in the Southern District Mississippi. The latest statistics from the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts show that district as having a much lighter criminal docket than this district, an expeditious handling of its criminal docket and a docket no more congested than the one here.

Since argument on May 20, 1977 of the motions discussed in this Memorandum, the Court has received daily and sometimes twice daily communications from counsel on both sides in the form of letters and affidavits. The Court has examined and considered the matters raised in these addenda and believes them to be irrelevant to its decision. They do not alter the Court's judgment.

For the foregoing reasons the indictment is dismissed; and it is so ordered.

Appeals Court Cites Abuse of Grand Jury (Congressional Record, June 22, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. Eilberg. Mr. Speaker, just recently the appellate division of the Supreme Court of New York reviewed a case in which it found that a special State prosecutor used what it called coercive methods to indict a judge in Queens County.

This case, Mr. Speaker, is another example of why the Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair has been conducting hearings on H.R. 94, which would provide for the first comprehensive reform of the Federal grand jury system since the birth of our Nation.

In the case at hand, the five appellate judges ruled unanimously that the prosecutor was responsible for "procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

In this case, the prosecutor went back to the grand jury again and again to secure an indictment. The judges noted that this was a serious breach of the historic role of the grand jury "to remain truly free and independent of outside influence."

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following materials describing this case:

JUSTICE, PROSECUTOR CRITICIZED BY COURT IN GROH INDICTMENT

(By Max H. Seigel)

The Appellate Division in Brooklyn yesterday accused Justice Leonard H. Sandler of State Supreme Court and the Special state anticorruption prosecutor, John F. Keenan, of having used "coercive" methods to get a Queens County grand jury to indict Judge Robert T. Groh of Civil Court last November on charges of bribery and grand larcency.

The appellate justices said that if they could, they would throw out the indictments, but that they could not do so because the lawyers for Judge Groh still had recourse to State Supreme Court.

It was the first time Mr. Keenan had been accused of using the kind of overzealous tactics that had led to the dismissal of charges against many persons indicted by Maurice H. Nadjari, Mr. Keenan's predecessor as special prosecutor for corruption in the criminal justice system.

"Had the motion been submitted to us from the start," the five appellate justices said in a unanimous opinion on the Groh case, "we would have granted the application and ordered that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

Mr. Keenan and an assistant, Stephen Sawyer, had brought before the Queens grand jury charges that Mr. Groh, while deputy borough president of Queens in 1972, had sought a political campaign contribution of more than $10,000 from a law firm representing the Sheraton Corporation to help it get a zoning variance to expand its inn at La Guardia Airport.

GRATUITOUS DISCUSSION

After hearing the evidence, the grand jury voted not to indict Mr. Groh. Afterward, according to the Appellate Division "the special prosecutor, having learned of the result re-entered the grand jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict."

"And without any request from the grand jury," the ruling went on, "he then suggested to it that the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired."

According to the court records, one grand juror questioned the usefulness of such a gesture on the ground that a vote already had been taken and the matter disposed of, but the special prosecutor insisted that additional instructions from the judge might enable the grand jury "to adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter."

This was done, the Appellate Division said, notwithstanding the fact that the grand jury had done just that—"reached, voted on and recorded its determination."

[The special prosecutor then retired from the jury room and a vote was taken. "Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions," the appellate justices said, and "despite the fact that there was no request by the grand jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the special prosecutor and the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term appeared before the grand jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge."]

NARROW VOTE TO INDICT

The grand jury then took another vote and decided to indict Mr. Groh by the minimum margin—12 to 7.

The appellate justice said: "Aside from the fact that we view these further instruction to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they have no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well-motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system."

The justices added that "under the facts of this case, it was improper for either the special prosecutor or the court to have interceded in the proceedings once the grand jury had voted to dismiss." And, they said, "to sanction such a procedure" would "permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly-arrived-at determinations."

The Justices suggested that Mr. Groh apply again to Justice Howard A. Jones of State Supreme Court, who had twice previously refused to dismiss the charges.

"In the light of the views here expressed," the Appellate Division said, the learned justice at the extraordinary special and trial term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor."

In denying motions for dismissal on March 4 and March 15, Justice Jones had made it clear he would welcome submittal of the controversy to the Appellate Division, "there apparently being no precedent" on which he "might rely in resolving these questions."

KEENAN'S REACTION

Commenting on the decision, Mr. Keenan said yesterday: "I certainly agree that the grand jury should not be badgered, and obviously, I don't think we did. What we did was well-intentioned and well-motivated and I'm not going to quarrel with the decision.

The special prosecutor added that he might try now to present the case again before another grand jury, he might apply to Justice Jones for permission to present the case again, or he might intervene when Judge Groh moves again for dismissal before Justice Jones.

Marvin B. Segal, Judge Groh's lawyer, said yesterday he would promptly submit another application for dismissal to Justice Jones.

"The Appellate Division decision," he said, "is a strong suggestion, if not a directive, to dismiss. To try the case now would be a useless procedure since the Appellate Justices have made it clear that any conviction after trial in a lower court would be reversed."

Mr. Segal said that he had not gone directly to the Appellate Division because he had not seen the grand jury's minutes and so had been unaware of the actions of the special prosecutor and Justice Sandler. "It was an extraordinary procedure by two very able men," he said. "It's impermissible for a judge to go into a grand jury room."

Justice Sandler said yesterday that he had gone to the grand jury purely for the convenience of the jurors. "It was easier for me to go to them in Queens," he said, "than to have all of them come to my courtroom in Manhattan."

In welcoming the appellate decision, Judge Groh—who was elected a judge of the Civil Court shortly before his indictment—said yesterday he was "proud to be a member of the system that treats defendants equitably."

APELLATE DIVISION

Second Department

(People vs. Groh)

After a full presentation of the evidence, a charge on the law by the Special Prosecutor and a spirited discussion among the grand jurors, they voted to dismiss the proposed charges. The Special Prosecutor reentered the room and suggested that the Justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term would be willing to provide a further charge on the law. The utility of such a gesture was questioned by a grand juror. The Special Prosecutor retired and a vote was taken. Only three jurors voted to receive further instructions. Nevertheless, the Special Prosecutor and the Justice appeared on a later day and delivered a further charge. The grand jurors voted the indictment by the narrowest permissible margin. Defendant's application to dismiss the indictment or, pursuant to article 78, to prohibit further proceedings, was denied at the Extraordinary Term. The Appellate Division, for lack of jurisdiction to overturn the prior decision, denied this motion for identical relief. It advised defendant to renew his application before the same justice at the Extraordinary Term. Both the Special Prosecutor and the court, ex parte, acted improperly by interceding in the grand jury proceedings.

THE PEOPLE, etc., plaintiff, v. ROBERT T. GROH, defendant.
IN THE MATTER OF ROBERT T. GROH, petitioner, v. HOWARD A. JONES, as Justice of the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, County of Queens, et al., respondent.

Decided May 31, 1977

Before Gulotta, P. J.; Martuscello, Cohalan, Daminani and Shapiro, JJ.

Motion pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh for an order dismissing an indictment filed against him or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting further proceedings with respect to the said indictment.

Segal & Hundley, New York, N.Y., for defendant-petitioner.

John F. Keenan, Deputy Attorney General, New York, N.Y. (George F. Bradlau of counsel), respondent pro se and for plaintiff.

Per Curiam—This is a motion pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh, a defendant in a pending criminal action, for an order dismissing the indictment filed against him by the Extraordinary Special Grand Jury for the County of Queens, or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting the Trial Justice assigned to the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term, and the Special Prosecutor, from proceeding with respect to the said indictment.

Motion denied and proceeding dismissed, without costs or disbursements.

Consideration by this court of the prayer for relief pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law is barred by the fact that an identical motion had been made before the Extraordinary Special and Trial term and was denied by it on March 4, 1977; that determination was adhered to upon reconsideration on March 15, 1977. The availability of relief by motion to this court pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) is an alternative to proceeding before the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term and, having elected to proceed before Acting Supreme Court Justice Jones in the first instance, defendant is now precluded from attempting to overturn his decision by a de novo application to this court (see Matter of Dondi v. Jones, 40 NY 2d 8, 15).

So far as the application for relief in the nature of prohibition is concerned, we must take cognizance of the holding of the Court of Appeals in Matter of State of New York v. King (36 NY 2d 59, 62):

"The extraordinary remedy either of prohibition or mandamus lies only where there is a clear legal right, and in the case of prohibition only when a court (if a court is involved) acts or threatens to act without jurisdiction in a matter over which it has no power over the subject matter or where it exceeds its authorized powers in a proceeding over which it has jurisdiction (see, e.g., Proskin v. County Ct. of Albany County, 30 NY 2d 15, 18; Matter of Lee v. County Ct. of Erie County, 27 NY 2d 432, 436–437; Matter of Hogan v. Culkin, 18 NY 2d 330, 335–336)." (Accord Matter of Nigrone v. Murtagh, 36 NY 2d 421, 423–424.)

While the question is not entirely free of doubt, we have concluded that the allegations proffered by the defendant Groh fail to raise a jurisdictional issue (see Matter of Paciona v. Marshall, 35 NY 2d 289; Matter of Wroblewski v. Ricotta, 35 NY 2d 745; cm. Matter of Dondi v. Jones, supra; La Rocca v. Lane, 37 NY 2d 575).

We should indicate, however, that had the motion under Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law been submitted to us ab initio, we would have granted the application and ordered that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system. Here, after a full presentation of the evidence, a charge on the law by the Special Prosecutor, and an apparently spirited discussion among the grand jurors themselves, they voted to dismiss the proposed charges in their entirety, and recorded that determination in their minute book. Thereafter, and this appears without contradiction on the record, the Special Prosecutor, having learned of the result, re-entered the Grand Jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict. Without any request from the Grand Jury, he then suggested to it that the justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired.

The utility of such a gesture was questioned by a grand juror, who told the Special Prosecutor that a vote had already been taken and the matter disposed of, but the latter insisted that a further charge might enable the Grand Jury to "adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter", this notwithstanding the fact that the Grand Jury had done just that—reached, voted on and recorded its determination.

The Special Prosecutor then retired from the Grand Jury room and a vote was taken. Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions. Despite the fact that there was no request by the Grand Jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the Special Prosecutor and the justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term appeared before the Grand Jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge. The grand jurors then retired to deliberate and voted the instant indictment by the narrowest permissible margin (see CPL 190.25 subd. 1).

Aside from the fact that we view these "further instructions" to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they had no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system. That system, which has its origins in antiquity and enjoys no lesser protection than that afforded by the Federal and State Constitutions (U.S. Const., 5th Amdt: N.Y. Const., art I, Section 6), performs a vital function in our jurisprudence—that of protecting the private citizen from unjust prosecution. As Justice Foster stated in Matter of Gardiner (31 Misc. 364, 366-367, 375, cited with approval in People v. Minet, 296 NY 315, 322):

"The grand Jury had its origin at a time when there raged a fierce conflict between the rights of the subject and the power of the crown. It was established to secure to the subject a right of appeal to his peers, under the immunity of secrecy and irresponsibility, before the government could bring him to trial. It was a right wrung from the government to secure the subject against oppression.

* * * * * * *

"[As] was rightly said by Judge King, in the case of Lloyd and Carpenter, 5 Penn. L.J. 62: 'Grand Juries are high public functionaries, * * * They are the great security to the citizen against vindictive persecutions, either by government, or by political partisans, or by private enemies. In their independent action, the persecuted have found the most fearless protectors; and in the records of their doings are to be discovered the noblest stands against the oppression of power, the virulence of malice, and the intemperance or prejudice.'

* * * * * * *

"It is as important to a person that he be fairly and justly accused of crime as that he be fairly and impartially tried therefor" (emphasis supplied).

However, this historical function can only be carried out if the grand jury remains truly free and independent of outside influences. As was stated by Justice Callagahan in People v. Both (118 Misc. 414, 423):

"The life and liberty of the individual depend largely upon the citizens who are called from all walks of life to act as jurors. They are in every instance the sole judges of the facts, and, when called as grand jurors, they are the judges of the law as well as of the facts. The administration of the criminal law lies largely with grand and petit juries. It is through the jury system alone that the people have a part in the administration of the law. It is important, therefore, that no undue influence or coercion be exerted at any stage of a prosecution to influence unduly the judgment of a juror." (See, also, People v. Cunningham, NYLJ, April 28, 1977, p. 10, col. 4; People v. Benin, 186 Misc. 548; United States v. Rintelen, 235 F. 787.)

Clearly, this is not a case in which the Grand Jury has voted to reconsider the charges sua sponte (see People v. Stecker, 141 Mis. 417; 42 CJS, Indictments and Informations, Section 25), nor is it a case in which the court having charge of the grand jury, upon an appropriate showing, has directed that the charges be resubmitted following a failure to indict (CPL 190.75, subd. 3; see People ex rel. Flinn v. Barr 259 NY 104; People v. Potter, 50 AD 2d 410). Under the facts of this case it was improper for either the Special Prosecutor or the court, ex parte, to have interceded in the proceedings once the Grand July had voted to dismiss. To sanction such a procedure, no matter how well intentioned it may have been in this case, would permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly arrived at determinations. Nevertheless, while firmly convinced of the grave impropriety underlying the present indictment, this court is without jurisdiction to deal with it at this juncture. However, in the light of the views here expressed, the learned Justice at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor.

Gulotta, P. J. Martuscello, Cohalan and Shapiro, J. J., concur. Damiani, J., concurs in the result.

BUSINESS COMMUNITY JOINS EFFORT TO REFORM GRAND JURIES (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JUNE 23, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, in the June 23, 1977, issue of the Wall Street Journal we read of the growing number of businessmen, attorneys, and politicians who have urged reform of the Federal grand jury system.

This article, I believe, is a valuable contribution to the discussion now centering on H.R. 94. The House Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair is now considering this legislation to make the first comprehensive reform of Federal grand juries in our Nation's history.

I commend today's article from the Wall Street Journal to the attention of my colleagues:

UNDER INDICTMENT: GM, OTHER UNLIKELY CRITICS ACCUSE GRAND JURIES OF ABUSING RIGHTS THEY ARE SUPPOSED TO PROTECT

(By Carol H. Falk)

WASHINGTON.—For years, complaints of abuse by grand juries came mostly from antiwar activists or other dissenters. Now some unlikely and powerful allies are joining this "minority" cause.

Businessmen, attorneys and politicians who have had personal experience as grand jury witnesses in the post-Watergate era are throwing their influential weight behind legislation that would provide more protection for potential defendants called before grand juries. With this backing sponsors are optimistic that such a bill can be adopted by the current Congress.

The old and the new critics contend that a grand jury seldom, in practice, serves its historic function as an independent shield to protect citizens against unjustified prosecutions by the government. Rather, they say, it usually does the prosecutor's bidding and, in the hands of a ruthless or ambitious government attorney, can be a sword to harass, intimidate or indict for political or publicity reasons.

SOME RECENT RECRUITS

The latest recruits to the cause range from the American Bar Association, which has endorsed a number of legislative restraints on grand juries and is due in August to vote on further recommendations, to General Motors Corp., which is resisting subpoenas from a grand jury investigating its taxes. A GM lawyer complained this week that the government was treating the matter like a "gangster case."

"Now we hear the hue and cry we should have heard when poor folks were objecting to grand jury tactics," says Oscar Goodman, a Las Vegas defense attorney. The lesson that is hitting home, in effect, is one cited by Irving Younger, a professor at Cornell University Law School and himself a former federal prosecutor: "You protect the rights of the miserable and friendless precisely so that you have rights when it's your turn."

This doesn't mean, of course, that support for protective legislation is unanimous. Attorney General Griffin Bell says he is opposed to one key change: a provision that would permit grand-jury witnesses to be accompanied by their attorneys. He says he worries about creating a system of "two trials" because lawyers could raise or get their clients to raise the same kind of objections that can be raised in a courtroom.

MANY RIGHTS DON'T APPLY

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution provides that a suspect can't be "held to answer" for a serious federal crime unless he is first indicted by a grand jury. The grand jury, a panel of citizens to whom the prosecutor presents evidence, operates in secret, theoretically for the protection of those who testify but who aren't themselves charged with any crime. Yet over the years, courts have held that many of the protections guaranteed a suspect by the Bill of Rights don't apply when he is called before a grand jury.

For example, besides having to face the grand jury without his lawyer present, a grand-jury witness can be forced to testify in exchange for a grant of immunity—a guarantee that his testimony won't be used to prosecute him. If he rejects immunity and insists on his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, a witness can be cited for contempt and jailed. Plainly, abuses by grand juries can cost individual witnesses heavily in time, money and reputation.

While complaints about overreaching by grand juries have been raised for years, the outcry from dissidents intensified after passage of the 1970 Crime Control Act, which gave federal prosecutors additional power to use grand juries against organized crime, as well as against political leftists. Ironically, some of the law-and-order Nixon administration officials who were accused of encouraging the use of grand juries against dissenters in the early 1970s found they don't like the system much when they themselves had to face grand juries on Watergate-related charges.

ISSUE CONCERNING ATTORNEYS

Former Nixon Treasury Secretary John Connally has urged that grand-jury witnesses be given the right to be accompanied by their attorneys. He and other high officials who were accused of wrongdoing have also complained that promises of lenient treatment can be used to coerce a potential defendant into false implication of higherups. Mr. Connally was acquitted in a 1975 trial of charges that he accepted bribes from a giant dairy co-op. The trial jury apparently didn't believe the story of his chief accuser, Jack Jacobsen, who had been allowed to plead guilty to reduced charges in return for the testimony on which the Connally indictment was based.

General Motors is raising an increasingly discussed issue: the extent to which supposedly secret grand-jury material can be shared with Executive Branch agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service, that provide technical assistance to the grand jury. GM contends, in court papers filed in April, that the IRS is using a grand jury's subpoena powers to conduct a tax investigation that the agency should be handling on its own.

In moving to quash the subpoenas or else to restrict the use of the data, GM cited a ruling last November by a federal appeals court in San Francisco. The appeals court found that a lower court had gone too far in granting 24 IRS employes access to materials turned over to a grand jury by J. R. Simplot Co. and Simplot Industries Inc. of Boise, Idaho; John Simplot, who controls the companies, made headlines last year with a huge default on potato futures.

Noting that the grand jury has powers justified by its function "in accusing individuals of criminal acts," the court said that justification doesn't apply "when grand-jury material is used for civil tax liability."

The government, for its part, says it hasn't any intention of using the information sought from GM for civil tax purposes. Rather, the Justice Department maintains it is investigating allegations of criminal activity and needs the tax agency's expertise. As for the Simplot case, the government has asked the appeals court to withdraw its opinion, suggesting that the issue is moot because Mr. Simplot and his two companies last month pleaded "no contest" to charges of criminal tax violations.

Antitrust cases also are providing recruits for the cause of grand-jury restraint. William Lurie, general counsel of International Paper Co., which has been a target in several industry-wide grand-jury investigations, complains of "extremely vague and broad" subpoenas covering as much as 15 years of company records. A particular frustration, he adds, is that "there is no mechanism to insure that anything . . . that would tend to negate guilt is brought to the attention of the grand jury."

Mr. Lurie asserts that "you need due-process protections in grand-jury proceedings just as much as in a trial—or more," because "sometimes the economic risks are so great you can't afford to go to trial and bet your company."

He explains that "unless your case is 100% pure," there is a strong incentive to settle a broad antitrust indictment with a "no-contest" plea. That's because, if the company risks a trial and is convicted on government antitrust charges, the verdict can be used as the basis for costly treble-damage claims by private plaintiffs.

UNHAPPY ATTORNEYS

Attorneys, as well as their clients, have been complaining of grand-jury harassments. Mr. Goodman of Las Vegas heads a committee of criminal defense lawyers that aids attorneys subpoenaed by grand juries seeking information about their clients. An attorney who himself is being pressured by a grand jury isn't likely to be effective in representing his client, Mr. Goodman asserts.

He cites examples of defense attorneys subpoenaed to testify about relations with their clients, including the amount and the source of their fees. Federal appeals courts have differed on whether this is a proper area of inquiry, but at least some lawyers have been cited for contempt and jailed for refusing to provide the information.

Charles Berry, an Albuquerque attorney, was subpoenaed to deliver five years' worth of his law firm's financial records to a grand jury looking into allegations of illegal campaign contributions and bribery of former state officials. He explains that records of over 5,000 clients were involved and that some of the records dealt with cases not yet resolved. The financial records included the names of clients and, in certain instances, references to witnesses interviewed.

A LAWYER JAILED

Mr. Berry refused to yield the documents, was cited for contempt and "sat in jail six months." After losing all his appeals, he turned over the records and was released last December. A government attorney says that Mr. Berry himself was never a target of the inquiry and that the grand jury wasn't interested in the names of his clients. Rather, the law firm was thought to have had "some business relationships" with a former state official who was being investigated. The man was indicted but was acquitted in a trial.

Some critics, contending that grand juries don't serve their constitutional "shield" role and are a waste of taxpayers' money, argue that they should be abolished. Most critics, however, are willing to settle for changes intended to protect witnesses better. They note that many prosecutors, including Richard Gerstein, the state attorney in Miami who is leading the ABA drive for grand-jury legislation, have operated successfully for years with self-imposed restraints.

In Congress, several lawmakers are promoting legislative treatments for the most common complaints. Rep. Joshua Eilberg, a Pennsylvania Democrat, has introduced a measure that would allow lawyers in grand jury rooms to advise witnesses, though it wouldn't let them raise formal objections or address the jury.

"USE" IMMUNITY PROVISION

The Eilberg bill, cosponsored by Rep. Hamilton Fish, a New York Republican, would also eliminate the so-called use immunity permitted by the 1970 crime law. A grand-jury witness granted use immunity can't be prosecuted on the basis of his own testimony but can be charged if prosecutors show they are relying on evidence from other sources. The Eilberg bill would provide that someone testifying under immunity couldn't be prosecuted under any circumstances for the action involved.

The bill also provides that a witness who refused to testify after being granted immunity couldn't be jailed for contempt for more than six months. Currently a balky witness can be jailed for the full 18-month life of a federal grand jury and then can be called before new grand juries and jailed repeatedly.

The Eilberg bill would also give the grand jurors more independence from the prosecutor by empowering them to hire their own lawyer. Attorney General Bell says he might go along with the idea of having a judge appoint such a lawyer for the grand jury, if the judge felt it necessary.

A somewhat similar measure has been introduced in the Senate by James Abourezk, a South Dakota Democrat, and a bill sponsored by Rep. John Conyers, a Michigan Democrat, would go further—letting a witness remain silent without being cited for contempt.

Thus far, a House Judiciary subcommittee led by Mr. Eilberg has held several days of hearings on grand-jury legislation, and it has scheduled more this month. The aim is to get a bill set for floor action by year-end.

NEW YORK TIMES REVIEWS MR. EILBERG'S GRAND JURY REFORM ACT
(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JUNE 27, 1977)

(By Hon. Benjamin S. Rosenthal, of New York)

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, June 26, the New York Times provided a comprehensive review of efforts underway in Congress to reform the Federal grand jury system.

The Times focused on three areas: The provisions of a bill introduced by our colleague from Pennsylvania (Mr. Eilberg), the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, H.R. 94; the control of grand juries by prosecutors; and current activity in California, one of 29 States which proceeds in criminal cases without using a grand jury.

Because I believe this article is a thoughtful analysis, I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

THE GRAND JURY UNDER EXAMINATION; IT HAS FALLEN ON HARD TIMES

NOTE.—The grand jury—a panel of citizens empowered, and in Federal law and that of 21 states solely empowered, to bring criminal indictments—has recently fallen if not into disrepute at least into controversy. In New York, for example, a number of indictments voted by grand juries advised by former special prosecutor Maurice H. Nadjari have been dismissed for causes including insufficient or illegally obtained evidence and improperly presented cases. Federal prosecutors have allegedly used grand juries to harass radical causes.

A bill introduced in Congress by Representative Joshua Eilberg, Democrat of Pennsylvania, is due for subcommittee hearings this week. The bill would reform Federal practice in several ways—for example, by permitting witnesses to have lawyers in the grand jury room and by providing review of indictments by a judge before trial. Similar reforms are proposed in New York, where a new law that went into effect last week now requires grand jurors, who were formerly volunteers, to be picked from the same pool as trial jurors.

The articles on this page examine three areas of current concern; the more or less complete prosecutorial control of the grand jury; a number of the reforms now contemplated by state and Federal legislators; and the manner of bringing criminal charges in California, one of the 29 states that have found it possible to proceed in criminal cases without using the grand jury.

MR. EILBERG'S BILL CALLS FOR REFORM IN THE FEDERAL PRACTICE

(By Tom Goldstein)

Since the grand jury was imported to this country from England during the Colonial era, an intricate and sophisticated body of law has developed that attempts to balance the interest of individual freedom with the interest of the state in uncovering criminal activity. In the last few years, critics of the grand jury contend that the balance has tipped against the individual, and dozens of proposals to change the grand jury have been made. The following represents some of the issues presented in Congressman Eilberg's bill and in other legislation introduced in Congress and state legislatures:

Protecting the witness

At the urging of the Nixon Administration, Congress in 1970 narrowed the Federal immunity law. That law, which was immediately copied by half the states, grants a grand jury witness "use" immunity—the witness may be compelled to testify but his compelled testimony may not be used against him in a criminal proceeding.

A year later, New York enacted a "transactional" immunity statute that is broader than the Federal one. Efforts to adopt a similar law on the Federal level are now under way. Under "transactional" immunity, a witness who is compelled to testify may not subsequently be prosecuted—even upon totally independent evidence—for any transaction mentioned in his testimony.

Many prosecutors feel that "transactional" immunity leaves open the possibility that a heinous crime could go unpunished because, during grand jury testimony, a witness who was the perpetrator gave peripheral evidence concerning it. Opponents of "use" immunity argue that it leaves a witness excessively exposed to further prosecution. New witnesses may be found and new information may be gathered as a result of the witness's own testimony before the grand jury.

Allowing lawyers inside

In Federal courts and in most states, lawyers are excluded from the grand jury room. But a lawyer can remain outside the door, and his client can excuse himself from the proceeding to confer with him. Most prosecutors want it that way. Otherwise, they argue, there would be too much opportunity for obstruction and delay.

Defense lawyers want in. They feel it makes little sense to have a witness traveling in and out of the grand jury room. The mere presence of a lawyer, they say, would curb improper questioning by a prosecutor.

Replacing the prosecutor

A variety of proposals would replace or supplement the prosecutor as legal adviser to a grand jury. Instead, there would be an independent office of the grand jury counsel to instruct the grand jury on the law and pass on the admissibility of evidence and competency of witnesses.

Proponents of such an office say that it is unfair to allow the prosecutor to control all the legal information received by a grand jury, especially since the grand jury should be at liberty to disobey a prosecutor's wishes. Opponents say there is no guarantee that the advice of this impartial counsel will be any better than a prosecutor's or that he will be any less likely to abuse his office.

Guarding against leaks

Grand jury proceeding are secret, but periodically there have been unauthorized disclosures. The news that someone is a traget of a grand jury investigation—especially if he is never indicted—can be devastating to his reputation.

Some states make it unlawful for anyone but witnesses and lawyers to reveal what has taken place in the grand jury; in Federal court, leaking of information by prosecutors, stenographers of grand jurors is punishable by contempt of court.

Only rarely has anyone been punished for grand jury leaks, and in order to deter them there have been several proposals to stiffen the penalties. But many prosecutors say that the difficulty in investigating and prosecuting violations of secrecy is unrelated to the severity of the penalties imposed. The principal reason, they say, is that the investigation inevitably collides with the protection of a free press guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Since it is not unknown for an errant prosecutor to do the leaking himself, there have been proposals to empower the court to appoint special independent prosecutors to investigate the leaks.

Screening indictments

With the current emphasis on prosecutorial abuse, proposals for greater judicial oversight of grand juries have emerged. One suggestion would have a judge—but not the judge who empaneled the grand jury—screen all indictments before they are filed. If the judge found insufficient evidence or improper procedures used in the grand jury, the indictment would be dismissed before it was made public, thus sparing the defendant publicity that might damage his reputation.

But most prosecutors feel this would unnecessarily encumber the proceedings. There are not enough grand jury reporters and typists to transcribe all the minutes and not enough judges to review all the proceedings, they say. Moreover, they argue, only a minuscule—though highly publicized—number of indictments are dismissed for legal insufficiency.

Changing the grand jury size

No one is quite sure how the number developed, but from its origins in England a grand jury has consisted of 23 citizens. That number has been carried over to Federal courts and to many state courts. Twelve votes are required to return an indictment, and 16 jurors make up a quorum.

There are those who argue that the current size is more a matter of historic precedent than necessity. They feel that reducing a grand jury's size would be economical and would focus greater responsibility on individual grand jurors. Opponents of this change feel it would make it harder to obtain a quorum and inhibit the expression of divergent views on the jury.

The Prosecutor Seems To Have Taken Over

(By Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis)

The notion of the grand jury as a shield for the innocent—presumably at the heart of the reasons for its inclusion in the Bill of Rights—is continually echoed in judicial opinions. Relatively recently the Supreme Court stated:

"Historically [the grand jury] has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will."

Apt as that description may have seemed for the People's Panel in the 18th century, it certainly is not much realized in practice in the 20th. Day in and day out, the grand jury affirms what the prosecutor calls upon it to affirm—investigating as it is led, ignoring what it is never advised to notice, failing to indict or indicting as the prosecutor "submits" that it should. Not surprisingly, the somewhat technical, somewhat complex, occasionally arcane language of indictments is drafted by the prosecutor and handed to the grand jury foreman or forelady for the necessary signature, which is almost invariably affixed. As Federal judge William J. Campbell points out: "Today, the grand jury is the total captive of the prosecutor who, if he is candid, will concede that he can indict anybody, at any time, for almost anything, before any grand jury."

It could not more than rarely be otherwise. In a busy, densely populated, elaborately organized society—where crime is rife, criminals are tough, many wrongs are mysterious and concealed from laymen—law enforcement is inescapably for professionals. The very notion of the grand jury as beneficent for a free society would be subverted by a band of amateurs engaged in sleuthing, summoning, indicting, or not indicting as their "independent" and untutored judgment might dictate. Privacy, security, and reputation would be in steady jeopardy. Sophisticated criminals would be safe; innocent citizens would be less safe.

Those the grand jury "refuses" to indict are likely to be people the prosecution does not want indicted. Many of the cases ending with "no true bill" are actually instances where a prosecutor feels the need for such backing to support his own view that further proceedings should not be held.

There is nothing necessarily sinister in this. On the contrary, some cases in which a "crime" has literally been committed—the youthful seducer of a female legally too young to consent; the impulsive, seemingly one-time shoplifter—are for one reason or another difficult for the law-trained official to overlook. The grand jury's dispensing power, kin to the power of a trial jury to acquit the technically "guilty," supplies some needed play in the joints that a system does not always supply. But saving graces of this sort do not alter the fact that the grand jury rarely stands in the path of a prosecutor determined to indict. Perhaps it is not realistic to hope for anything sharply different. Indeed, few reformers urge the serious pursuit of this theoretical function.

On the other hand, there is active dissatisfaction that the grand jury seldom does more than the prosecutor asks. It is possible that Watergate, at least temporarily, has added impetus to this sentiment. Rightly or wrongly, it was thought that the Washington grand jury was not being led to sweep broadly or dig deeply in the months before the first trial at which Judge John J. Sirica presided. It appeared to at least some observers that if not for unusual circumstances of the judge himself insisting upon more intensive inquiries, profound misdeeds might never have come to be prosecuted.

Though they seldom occur, perplexing and dramatic cases sometimes arise when the several main participants—prosecutor, grand jury, and judge—disagree about whether a prosecution should properly be instituted or dropped. The grand jury has an absolute veto over whether to indict. Does the same apply to the prosecutor? So-called runaway grand juries in state courts have succeeded from time to time in bringing prosecutions without the aid, or even over the opposition, of the regularly designated prosecutor.

So, too, special prosecutors have been appointed where the regularly elected or appointed officials have failed to act. The corrupt political machine of Boss Tweed in New York City was successfully pursued by a grand jury that acted independently of, and in spite of, the district attorney. Some 50 years later, Thomas E. Dewey was appointed special prosecutor in New York City because of the seeming nonfeasance of the regularly elected district attorney.

Such unusual cases characteristically involve matters of bitter conflict in the community. Like most "hard" or "great" cases, they tend to make somewhat special, unique, or possibly "bad" law. In any event, state courts remain unclear, and perhaps are shifting even now, on whether judges have the power to appoint special prosecutors to pursue cases the grand jury, but not the regular prosecutor, deems appropriate.

In the Federal picture, the court-appointed special prosecutor has been substantially unknown. In recent times, a Federal rule of criminal procedure has required that an indictment be "signed by the attorney for the government." This sounds like an inescapable and unambiguous barrier to the grand jury's proceeding without that attorney. But people learned in the law have seen means of escaping and possibly overriding barriers that appear insurmountable at first. While the barriers here still stand, the debate may not be over.

On occasion, judges have tried to intervene and prevent prosecutors from dropping cases. But the practical upshot of recent Federal court decisions seems to be that prosecutors can end prosecutions substantially without judicial interference—unless some plain impropriety or dereliction is discovered. The reservation stand as a cautionary sign, a warning that there may always be a demand for an explanation and an exposure of the prosecutorial decision to public view. But the usual response of a judge to a prosecutor's decision to withdraw an indictment is likely to be relatively unquestioning acquiescence.

In the foreseeable future there will probably be few run-away grand juries and few instances of interference by judges with the prosecutor's plenary control over decisions to begin or withdraw criminal cases. The exceptions will probably arise in situations of uncommonly deep and bitter conflict—where alignments are not predictable and it is not possible to know in advance whose will be the voices of the good or bad guys.

For that among a host of reasons, the precise lines of grand jury and prosecutor authority may never be drawn with finality. The uncertainty has to date been reasonably tolerable. It may even be healthful for the pertinent law to stay a little loose and incomplete, rather than try to freeze an unknown future too hard too far in advance.

California Has Learned to Sidestep the System

(By Robert Lindsey)

Los Angeles.—Almost 20,000 felony cases will be prosecuted in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County this year. But only 50—one in 400—will be heard by a grand jury. For the vast majority, this is the procedure followed in Los Angeles County and the 57 other counties in California:

Within 48 hours of a defendant's arrest on a felony, he must be arraigned before a municipal judge, who will schedule what is called a "preliminary hearing" for him, usually within a week of his arrest. The defendant may or may not be released on bail.

At the preliminary hearing, the defendant's lawyer is present. The district attorney is required to bring a complaint against the defendant, producing evidence sufficient to convince a municipal court judge that a crime has been committed, and that there is reason to believe the accused person committed it and should stand trial in superior court.

At the hearing, the defendant may question witnesses and challenge the substance and legality of the evidence—whether it was seized unlawfully, for example. On occasion, judges dismiss cases as too weak during these preliminary hearings. But in practice, most prosecutors present enough evidence to persuade a judge. And most judges appear to give the prosecution the benefit of the doubt in determining whether there is sufficient cause to believe the accused should stand trial.

Nevertheless, defendants under this system appear to have an edge over those processed by grand jury. "There are tremendous advantages," Kenneth Kahn, a Los Angeles criminal lawyer observed. "It lets the defense in on the ground floor. You can cross-examine witnesses, you see the evidence they have against you, and only legally admissible evidence is permitted. In a grand jury, they can use all kinds of garbage as evidence, and the grand jury becomes simply a rubber stamp for the prosecution."

Once the accused person has been bound over to face trial in the Superior Court, which handles felony trials, the district attorney must file a document that legally is the equivalent of a bill of indictment—a list of allegations called an "information." Based on these allegations, the defendant is arraigned in Superior Court, enters a plea, and the trial process begins.

What about the other 50 cases a year? In California, because of statutes and tradition reaching back to the Gold Rush era more than a century ago, grand juries spend most of their time not as prosecutorial organs indicting accused criminals, but as community watchdogs to review the operations of county government and attempt to uncover inefficiency, waste and corruption. Only in a small fraction of felony cases do they indict the alleged criminals.

But the district attorney has the option to bring cases to trial through a grand jury if he chooses. According to Joseph Siler, the legal adviser to the Los Angeles County grand jury, the jury here generally becomes involved in criminal cases only in the following categories:

Major frauds and other complex white collar crimes involving expensive documents or bookkeeping records, many suspects and many lawyers, or other complicating factors that make presentation of allegations difficult or cumbersome at a preliminary hearing;

Crimes alleged to have been committed by public officials or policemen.

Cases in which the prosecution wants to keep an investigation secret, usually to protect witnesses who might be fearful of their safety, where there are still some suspects at large and it is deemed necessary to keep the prosecution secret. Major organized crime cases usually fall in this category.

Cases involving prominent people or those in which the district attorney has other reasons to believe extensive publicity from a preliminary hearing might make it difficult to find an impartial jury. Many of Southern California's most famous defendants of the recent past—Sirhan Sirhan, the murderer of Robert Kennedy; Charles Manson and his crime clan; Patricia Hearst, and other celebrities and those involved in highly publicized cases—have been processed through the grand jury rather than in the "information" procedure.

Because many cases that go before the grand jury are complex financial frauds, jurors can spend up to 40 percent of the time hearing criminal cases, Mr. Siler said. But he said most effort goes into local government. "California has a reputation for extremely honest local government, and I think one of the reasons for this is our grand jury systems," he said.

COLORADO PASSES MAJOR BILL ON GRAND JURY REFORM (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JULY 12, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, on March 29 I informed my colleagues that the Colorado Legislature was considering an extensive reform of that State's grand jury system.

Many of the proposals I outlined then have now been approved by the Colorado Legislature. They are similar to the provisions of H.R. 94, the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, which is now being considered by the House Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair.

The Colorado measure, I believe, illustrates the moderateness and practicality of the reforms under study in Congress.

Like H.R. 94, the Colorado statute:

Provides for the right to counsel in the grand jury room but limits counsel's role to advice only and allows the court to remove disruptive attorneys;

Provides for detailed instructions to be given by the court to all grand jurors;

Provides for hearings on contempt orders and limits incarceration for contempt to no more than 6 months total;

Provides for witnesses to be advised of their rights prior to their testimony;

Precludes calling any witness who indicates he will invoke his privilege against self-incrimination, unless immunity is granted;

Allows a witness to request the grand jury for an opportunity to testify or retestify;

Provides for recording of all grand jury proceedings and furnishing of transcripts, with appropriate safeguards, to witnesses;

Provides for review of subpoenas by the court of their reasonableness and purpose; and Precludes repeated grand jury investigations of the same transaction unless based on additional evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert Colorado Senate Bill No. 186 into the Record for consideration by the House and comparison with our proposed reforms:

COLORADO SENATE BILL No. 186

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado:

SECTION 1. 16-5-204, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is repealed and reenacted, with amendments, to read:

16-5-204. Witness before a grand jury—procedure. (1) (a) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any grand jury refuses, without just cause shown, to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper document, record, recording, or other material, the prosecuting attorney may submit an application to the court for an order directing the witness to show why the witness should not be held in contempt. After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, the court may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined. Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information; however, the court may release the witness from confinement if the court determines that further confinement will not cause the witness to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

(b) If a witness has been confined in accordance with paragraph (a) of this subsection (1), he may, upon petition filed with the court, request a hearing to be held within ten days to review the contempt order at which hearing he shall have the right to be represented by counsel. The court, at the hearing, may rescind, modify, or affirm the order.

(c) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed for a person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

(2) No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any criminal incident or incidents in any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before any district court shall again be imprisoned or fined for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same criminal incident or incidents before any grand jury.

(3) Upon impanelment of each grand jury, the court shall give to such grand jury adequate and reasonable written notice of and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands the nature of:

(a) Its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the state of Colorado alleged to have been committed;

(b) Its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

(c) Its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

(d) The subject matter of the investigation and the criminal statutes or other statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

(e) The duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of nine or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there is probable cause for finding indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

(f) The requirement that the grand jury may not find an indictment in cases of perjury unless at least two witnesses to the same fact present evidence establishing probable cause to find such an indictment.

(4) (a) At the option of the prosecuting attorney, a grand jury subpena may contain an advisement of rights. If the prosecuting attorney determines that an advisement is necessary, the grand jury subpoena shall contain the following advisement prominently displayed on the front of the subpoena:

NOTICE

(I) You have the right to retain an attorney to represent you and to advise you regarding your grand jury appearance.

(II) Anything you say to the grand jury may be used against you in a court of law.

(III) You have the right to refuse to answer questions if you feel the answers would tend to incriminate you or to implicate you in any illegal activity.

(IV) If you cannot afford to obtain an attorney, you may consult with the public defender's office, or request the court to appoint an attorney to represent you.

(b) Any witness who is not advised of his rights pursuant to paragraph (a) of this section (4) shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testifies or any evidence he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding, except for perjury, against him in any court.

(c) In any proceeding before the grand jury, if the prosecuting attorney has written notice in advance of the appearance of a witness that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, such witness shall not be compelled to appear before the grand jury unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

(d) Any witness subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to assistance of counsel during any time that such witness is being questioned in the presence of such grand jury, and counsel may be present in the grand jury room with his client during such questioning. However, counsel for the witness shall be permitted only to counsel with the witness and shall not make objections, arguments, or address the grand jury. Such counsel may be retained by the witness or may, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance, be appointed in the same manner as if that person were eligible for appointed counsel. An attorney present in the grand jury room shall take an oath of secrecy. If the court, at an in camera hearing, determines that counsel was disruptive, then the court may order counsel to remain outside the courtroom when advising his client. No attorney shall be permitted to provide counsel in the grand jury room to more than one witness in the same criminal investigation, except with the permission of the grand jury.

(e) Once a grand jury has returned a no true bill based upon a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into the same transaction or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the prosecuting attorney, that the prosecuting attorney has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

(f) A certified or authorized reporter shall be present at all grand jury sessions. All grand jury proceedings and testimony from commencement to adjournment shall be reported. The reporter's notes and any transcripts which may be prepared shall be preserved, sealed, and filed with the court. No release or destruction of the notes or transcripts shall occur without prior court approval.

(g) Upon application by the prosecutor, or by any witness after notice to the prosecutor, the court, for good cause, may enter an order to furnish to that witness a transcript of his own grand jury testimony, or minutes, reports or exhibits relating to them.

(h) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury or an attorney for such witness with the witness' written approval, shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy at the witness' expense any statement in the possession of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury which such witness has made that relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. If a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript and shall not pay a fee.

(i) No person subpoenaed to testify or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined as provided in this section, for his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if upon filing a motion and, upon an evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpoena or a court having jurisdiction under this section, the court finds that:

(I) A primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury is or will be to secure testimony for trial for which the defendant has already been charged by information, indictment, or criminal complaint;

(II) Compliance with a subpoena would be unreasonable or oppressive;

(III) A primary purpose of the issuance of the subpoena is to harass the the witness;

(IV) The witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under this section for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events; or

(V) The witness has not been advised of his rights as specified in paragraph (a) of this subsection (4).

(j) Any grand jury may indict a person for an offense when the evidence before such grand jury provides probable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

(k) The district court before which the indicted defendant is to be tried shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds, upon the filing of a motion by the indicted defendant based upon the grand jury record without argument or further evidence, that the grand jury finding of probable cause is not supported by the record.

(l) Any person may approach the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury and request to testify or retestify in an inquiry before a grand jury or to appear before a grand jury. The prosecuting attorney or the grand jury shall keep a record of all denials of such requests to that prosecuting attorney or grand jury, including the reasons for not allowing such person to testify or appear. If the person making such request is dissatisfied with the decision of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury, such person may petition the court for hearing on the denial by the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury. If the court grants the hearing, then the court may permit the person to testify or appear before the grand jury, if the court finds that such testimony or appearance would serve the interests of justice.

(m) The foreman, or acting foreman when designated by the court, of the grand jury may swear or affirm all witnesses who come before the grand jury.

(n) Any other motions testing the validity of the indictment may be heard by the court based only on the record and argument of counsel, unless there is cause shown for the need for additional evidence.

SEC. 2. 16-5-205, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is amended by the addition of a new subsection to read:

16-5-205. Information--authority to file--indictments--warrants and summons. (4) The report of the grand jury shall not be made public except when required by statute or except that all of the report or a portion thereof may be released if the chief judge of the district court finds such a release will exonerate a person or persons who have requested such a release.

SEC. 3. Appropriation. There is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1977, to the judicial department, trial courts, the sum of thirty-five thousand two hundred thirty-four dollars ($35,234), or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the implementation of this act.

SEC. 4. Safety clause. The general assembly hereby finds, determines, and declares that this act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety.

BOSTON GLOBE COMMENDS CONGRESSMAN EILBERG'S BILL TO REFORM GRAND JURIES (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, JULY 18, 1977)

(By Hon. Robert F. Drinan, of Massachusetts)

Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, for many months now, Congressman Eilberg, chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, has been working assiduously to reform the Federal grand jury system. He and his subcommittee members have spent much energy and time in hearings and markups to develop a bill which will truly bring needed change to this ancient institution.

The Boston Globe recently recognized the magnitude and importance of the work of the Eilberg subcommittee. On its editorial page, the Globe noted that the legislation being developed "could well serve as a model for similar State actions," where reform of the grand jury is also needed. It is unfortunate that the Carter administration is not giving the effort more support.

The Globe editorial is a fine tribute to our distinguished colleague and it is inserted into the Record here for all to see:

GRAND JURY REFORM

There were undoubtedly those who saw a certain irony in the complaints by General Motors last month that the Federal government was abusing the grand jury process by hauling in GM officials to testify under oath about corporate tax matters. In recent times, at least, complaints about grand jury abuses have come most frequently not from the offices of the nation's corporate executives but from political radicals charging grand juries have been employed to quash their activities.

In theory, the grand jury serves a laudable purpose. It allows possible criminal charges against an individual to be screened in secrecy by an independent panel of the accused's peers before they are publicly lodged.

In fact, however, the grand jury has become a tool of the prosecutor. By both establishing the grand jury's agenda and orchestrating the quality and quantity of the evidence presented, the prosecutor almost invariably determines who is and is not indicted.

But the grand jury can still provide valuable protection to individuals and the most prudent course now is to increase those safeguards. At the Federal level, legislation to do this—which could well serve as a model for similar state actions—has been introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.). It received a cool reception from the Carter Administration at a hearing last week but it points in the right direction.

It would repeal the "use" immunity law enacted at the urging of the Nixon Administration under which witnesses can be compelled to testify before a Federal grand jury and then, despite the constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination, be tried for activities about which they testified as long as the specific testimony is not used. The Eilberg legislation would return the Federal system to "transactional" immunity under which a witness compelled to testify could not later be tried for crimes detailed in that testimony.

The Eilberg legislation would also allow defense attorneys into the grand jury room to advise their clients (now they wait outside the room and their clients can go out to them) and, not incidentally, to monitor the process. A similar proposal for Massachusetts grand juries was recently approved by the state Senate.

Another meritorious provision of the Eilberg legislation would require that a judge screen Federal grand jury indictments prior to their issuance to make sure that they are based upon sufficient admissible evidence and that the procedures were appropriate. The proposal is designed to avoid needless damage to reputations arising from improper indictments.

None of these proposals has won the general approval of prosecutors. Yet none should generally impair prosecutors' work. Whatever the grand jury's original function, in a complex industrial society, where crime is commonplace and crime fighting sophisticated, the professionals—the prosecutors—will play the dominant role. But it is in exactly such a society that sufficient measures must be taken to protect the rights of individuals.

American Bar Association Section Recommends Grand Jury Reform
(Congressional Record, July 21, 1977)

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania)

Mr. Eilberg. Mr. Speaker, I have recently obtained a copy of recommendations by the American Bar Association's Section of Criminal Justice regarding grand jury reform.

This report will be presented to the ABA House of Delegates next month.

As the following indicates, these recommendations are similar to the provisions of H.R. 94, the Federal grand jury reform bill of 1977. This bill is now under consideration by the House Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair.

Because of the importance of this issue, I commend the report to the attention of my colleagues:

[The attached presently represents only the policy of the ABA Section of Criminal Justice, and not the position of the American Bar Association. This report will be presented to the ABA House of Delegates in August 1977]

American Bar Association, Report to the House of Delegates, Section of Criminal Justice

Recommendation

The Section of Criminal Justice recommends adoption of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the American Bar Association support in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt.

3. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.
