GRAND JURY REFORM

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION,
CITIZENSHIP, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 9:30 a.m., in room 2237, Rayburn House Office Building, Hon. Joshua Eilberg (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Hall, Harris, Evans, Fish, and Railsback.

Staff members present: Garner J. Cline and Martin H. Belsky, counsel; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

Last year, for the first time in the history of our Nation, Congress began a comprehensive review of the Federal grand jury system and proposed reforms of that system. This subcommittee heard testimony from Attorney General Levi, Members of Congress, representatives of the American Bar Association, of the Judicial Conference, and of several grand jury reform groups. Because of the press of other legislative business, we were unfortunately unable to complete our hearings and report out legislation. However, we did prepare a comprehensive record of our proceedings, with extensive research materials, which we have made available to the Members and the public.

Since our hearings, a number of important developments have occurred. First, and most important, there is a new administration. Unlike former Attorney General Levi, Attorney General Bell, at his confirmation hearings and in private conversations with me, has indicated that he supports legislation to provide additional safeguards in the grand jury system and to eliminate abuses. He has asked for time to review specific proposals and will testify at a future hearing.

Next, at my request, the Library of Congress completed a detailed analysis of alleged grand jury abuses. This study, which I have placed in the Congressional Record, documents the need for legislation eliminating the recurrence of such abuses.[1]

A series of articles in magazines and journals have described defects in the federal grand jury system and many reputable legal and social groups have urged reforms. For example, the New York Times in an article, and the Christian Science Monitor in an editorial, stressed the need for the types of reforms this subcommittee is considering; and the Newspaper Guild and New York State Assembly have published reports suggesting our proposed reforms.[2]

Finally, the American Bar Association has moved quite close to adopting a series of grand jury standards, which parallel the suggested reforms of my bill. Although the House of Delegates has postponed final approval of these standards until this summer, so as to give the Attorney General time to review their specifics, the section on Criminal Justice has adopted them. One of our witnesses today, Richard Gerstein, State's Attorney for Dade County (Miami), Florida, chairman of the committee which proposed these standards, will fill us in on the ABA position when he arrives and it becomes his turn to testify.

As a result of our hearings, and the subsequent events I noted, I have introduced a new Grand Jury Reform bill, H.R. 94. This bill, titled the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, is much more comprehensive than H.R. 1277, which I introduced last Congress. I am pleased to say that it has been reintroduced as H.R. 3150, with twelve cosponsors, including the distinguished ranking minority member of this subcommittee.

I have also introduced four proposed constitutional amendments, all of which would eliminate the constitutional requirement of a grand jury indictment for "infamous crimes" but all of which would allow investigative grand juries to be convened. Much has been written and said about the "rubber stamp" nature of the grand jury when it approves an indictment. All of our witnesses last session conceded that in 95 percent of the cases, the grand jury merely ratifies the decision of the Government attorney to prosecute or not prosecute. These proposed constitutional amendments can serve as a basis for testimony this session as to whether the constitutional requirement should be eliminated and, if so, should indictments be allowed by statute for certain types of cases, or be allowed by statute at the election of the prosecutor.

H.R. 94 is an attempt to provide procedural due process in investigating grand juries, while at the same time avoid delays, obstructions, or interference with the work of the grand jury. For example, counsel is provided for grand jury witnesses, but counsel may only advise his client and cannot otherwise participate. Adequate notice is to be provided to witnesses prior to their testimony, prior to a grant of immunity, and prior to a hearing for contempt for refusal to testify, but the period for notice and the preparation time can be shortened or eliminated if the Government attorney can demonstrate a need for prompter action.

H.R. 94 also seeks to insure the independence of the grand jurors. For example, grand juries are required to be fully advised of their rights and duties and can conduct an independent inquiry, with their own counsel if necessary. Requests to testify by any citizen or potential defendant and all exculpatory evidence are to be considered by the jurors.

H.R. 94 also seeks to increase judicial supervision of grand juries. Detailed standards are established for subpenaing witnesses, venue, granting immunity, and imposing jail terms or fines for contempt.

The court is to apply these standards at any hearing challenging these grand jury procedures.

H.R. 94 seeks to prevent grand jury leaks. Unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information is made a crime, ordinarily punishable by 6 months in jail and/or a $500 fine. To preserve the integrity of the grand jury, knowing and unauthorized disclosure for money or to affect legal proceedings is made a more serious offense, punishable by up to 5 years and/or a $20,000 fine.

To avoid meritless prosecutions, H.R. 94 requires that all cases be presented to the court for a preliminary examination prior to trial. Some have suggested that challenges to evidence be permitted in the grand jury. I believe this could cause delays and minitrials. My proposal, adopting the practice in most States, would allow a neutral judicial determination prior to trial of the probable cause for a charge and of the availability of admissible evidence to support such a charge.

Finally, to increase public confidence in the grand jury system, H.R. 94 would require all proceedings to be transcribed, with appropriate limitations on pretrial disclosure. In addition, it requires periodic reports by the Justice Department on grand jury activities so as to allow appropriate congressional oversight.

I would like to conclude my opening remarks by stressing that my proposals are only offered as a basis for discussion and comment. Other proposals and suggestions[1] and, of course, recommendations from the administration, judges, lawyers, and others, will also be carefully considered. With the cooperation of all concerned, we are anxious to report out comprehensive legislation this Congress and thus return the grand jury to its historic role as a protector and not an oppressor.

Mr. EILBERG. We have several witnesses in this panel: Ms. Linda Bakiel, Professor John Anthony Scott, Mr. Robert L. Borosage, Ms. Doris Peterson, and Ms. Rhonda Copelon.

Ladies and gentlemen, we are delighted to have you here this morning. I have had occasion to look through your statements, and obviously a great deal of work has been done in preparing for this hearing. But we do have a time problem. Obviously time does not permit the reading of your entire statements, and I would urge that you each speak for about 10 minutes, at the end of which time, members of the subcommittee will ask questions. No doubt we will not be able to complete all the questions because this member, at least, will be interrupted to go to the floor for the opening of the House today. We will go as long as we can and come back after that point and have more questions and answers.

We would like to place your formal statements in the record, and we will take them one at a time, and hope and expect your opening statements will be about 10 minutes in length.

So if I may, the first we'd like to have would be Mr. Robert L. Borosage of the Center for National Security Studies.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT L. BOROSAGE, CENTER FOR NATIONAL SECURITY STUDIES

Mr. BOROSAGE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like to thank the chairman and committee for inviting me to testify today on the issue of Federal grand juries. Although the views I express here are purely my own, I approach the subject from the perspective of the Center for National Security Studies.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Borosage, unless you'd like it not to be part of the record, I'd like to have your full statement made part of the record.

Mr. BOROSAGE. I'd like that.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, it will be made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Borosage follows:]

STATEMENT BY ROBERT L. BOROSAGE, DIRECTOR, CENTER FOR NATIONAL SECURITY STUDIES

I thank the Committee for inviting me to testify on the issue of the abuse of the federal grand juries. Although the views I express are purely my own, I approach the subject from the perspective of the Center for National Security Studies. The Center is a non-profit institution devoted to nonpartisan research on issues of national security. Over the past three years, a major emphasis of our work has been the intelligence agencies and their relationship to the constitutional liberties of American citizens. Members of the Center have investigated the range of intelligence agency activities and abuses. We have published three collective works on the general subject, "The CIA File" (Grossman, 1975), "The Abuses of the Intelligence Agencies" (CNSS 1975), and "The Lawless State" (Penguin, 1976). In our work, we have tried to explore the threats posed to our constitutional system by intelligence agencies engaged in political spying and disruption. It is from this perspective that I will speak to the question of grand jury abuse.

One legacy of the Nixon Administration is the transformation of the modern grand jury into an instrument of political surveillance, disruption and intimidation. The Senate and the House committees investigating the abuses of the intelligence agencies did not include the Justice Department's misuse of the grand jury in their investigation. This unfortunate omission may be attributed to the arbitrary limits imposed by scarce resources, for the modern grand jury surely falls within the mandate of those committees. The omission makes the task of this Committee both more difficult and more imperative, for it is up to this Committee to take the steps necessary to correct this deformation of the grand jury. Although designed as a "people's panel" to shield the innocent from overreaching prosecutors and unwarranted prosecutions, the grand jury has been transformed into a modern inquisitor, a major weapon in the government's arsenal of political repression, similar in function if not in form to the FBI's COINTELPRO, the IRS's politically-motivated tax audits, or the Congress' anti-subversive investigating committees.

This deformation of the grand jury is best described in relation to its lineage. One task of the modern intelligence agencies has been the collection of intelligence on suspect political groups and individuals. The collection of information creates an imperative to make use of it, and one constant theme of the intelligence apparatus has been the search for ways to harass and disrupt the activities of those groups and individuals who come under surveillance. Since World War II, the instruments of political surveillance have remained relatively constant: the informer, the wiretap and the bug, the screening of mail, of movements and of open records. Each era of political repression seems also to develop a new technique of spying and disruption, an instrument which comes to symbolize the campaign against political associations.

For example, in the anti-communist hysteria of the late forties and fifties, the entire panoply of governmental weapons was mobilized against communists and "communist sympathizers." Informers and wiretaps abounded; tax investigations were frequent; deportation proceedings, the Attorney General's list, and numerous criminal prosecutions were brought to bear against the Left.[1] But the characteristic instrument of the era was the congressional investigating committee—the House Un-American Activities Committee, the Senate Internal Security Committee and their brethren.[2] Working in close cooperation with the FBI, congressional committees were used to amass great amounts of information on suspected "subversives." The hearings often served as the basis for later prosecutions or persecutions.

More importantly, the committees themselves served as a major instrument of disruption and harassment. Witnesses were hailed from across the country to testify either in executive session or in public. Public hearings were filled with remorseful confessions, with the naming of names, or with repeated invocations of the Fifth Amendment, widely accepted as clear evidence of guilt. In the atmosphere of hostility and fear about communism, public hearings were effective in directing fierce public censure. Mere appearance before the committee could lead to dismissal from jobs, blacklisting, public condemnation, social ostracism, and threats to life and property.[3]

The demise of Joe McCarthy in the mid-fifties was the first sign of the passing heyday of the congressional committee, although major hearings would be held for another decade. As the anti-communist hysteria subsided, the committee lost its effectiveness. Public attention became increasingly difficult to capture; the media provided ever less coverage. The courts slowly began to limit the discretion of the committee.[4]

The congressional committee was soon replaced by another instrument of political disruption: the FBI's counter-intelligence program or COINTELPRO. As the Supreme Court made legal action against communists increasingly difficult and public apathy made public denunciation less effective, the FBI went underground, its own memos justifying the action because it had "become impossible to prosecute Communist Party members" and some alternative was needed to "contain the threat."[5] In 1956, the Bureau formalized its long-standing, somewhat desultory covert action program against the Communist Party into the first COINTELPRO operation. Over the next decade, COINTELPRO slowly expanded to encompass the Socialist Worker's Party by 1961, "White Hate" groups (the Klu Klux Klan, the Minutemen) in 1964, "Black Nationalists" in 1967, and the "New Left" in 1968.[6]

COINTELPRO became the characteristic intelligence operation used against protest movements in the sixties, although it was once again but one of many techniques turned on the civil rights and anti-war movements. Since both movements had substantial sympathy in the middle class and in the press, COINTELPRO was secret, a covert disruption program which "under no circumstances" was to be "made known outside of the Bureau."[7] Its tactics were often illegal and certainly beyond any charter of the FBI. Activities ranged from instigating conflicts within organizations, to planting "snitch jackets" to create the impression that "leaders are informants for the Bureau," [8] to planting unfavorable press stories, to more dangerous attempts to spark inter-group violence and struggle.

COINTELPRO was illegal and secret, often even from the FBI's supposed overseers in the Justice Department. Its activities were accordingly limited by those restraints. While COINTELPRO operations seem to have been most effective against Black political groups where the most "unsavory and vicious" tactics were employed, they seem to have had little effect on the loosely-structured, transitory and open groupings of the "new left," and the middle-class anti-war movement. Thus although the program continued until exposed to the public, it was soon superceded by another weapon against dissent.

The first years of the Nixon Administration witnessed the culmination of the peace movement, which challenged the the President's war policies abroad, and grew in size and in intensity as impatience spread with the President's policy of waging war while declaring peace. The response of the Nixon Administration, as we all have now learned, included the entire range of intelligence agencies and activities but its characteristic weapon was the political grand jury.

Recourse to the grand jury was in part an expression of Nixon's frustration with established intelligence agencies, which seemed intractable. The initial attempt to gin up domestic intelligence operations was the infamous Huston Plan. The plan had two major parts, the removal of restraints on illegal surveillance techniques like mail opening and break-ins, and the creation of a committee of all the intelligence agencies to coordinate information and operations. Nixon's brief approval of the plan constituted one count in the impeachment resolutions against him, but the plan itself floundered on the unbending opposition of J. Edgar Hoover. This history has been carefully documented by the impeachment and intelligence inquiries of the House and Senate.[9] What has received far less attention and analysis is the Nixon Administration's response to the failure of the Huston Plan.

Essentially, the White House set out to create its own intelligence apparatus, and to proceed by working around Hoover if necessary. By the end of 1970, Robert Mardian was named the head of a re-vitalized Internal Security Division in the Justice Department. Mardian created two new sections—the Special Litigation Section and the Intelligence and Analysis Section, and these became the center of the new intelligence thrust. I&A was to coordinate intelligence collection and develop assessments on internal security matters. It housed the IDIU, the Interdivisional Information Unit, a computerized information network, which received information from "the FBI, and the U.S. Attorneys . . . and other intelligence gathering bodies within the Executive Branch." [10] I&A also secreted the new Inter-agency Evaluation Committee (the IEC), which included representatives from the CIA, Army counterintelligence, the FBI, and the National Security Agency, and had access to domestic intelligence from NSA, the CIA's mail-opening and CHAOS programs, and, of course, the FBI.

The Special Litigation Section, placed under the leadership of Guy Goodwin, provided the other arm of the Justice Department offensive: the political grand jury. Goodwin launched an unprecedented series of grand jury investigations. From 1970 to 1973, ISD conducted over 100 Guy Goodwin-supervised grand juries in eighty-four cities of thirty-six states, and called some 1000 to 2000 witnesses by subpoena.[11] Targets included the Black Panther Party, the Vietnam Veterans against the War, Daniel Ellsberg, the Los Angeles anti-draft movement, the Catholic Left, Mayday, the Puerto Rican independence movement, the women's movement, and Irish unification supporters. Senator Edward Kennedy summarized the situation in testimony before this subcommittee in 1973, stating:

"The use of 'political' grand juries by the present administration is unprecedented. In a sense, of course, the practice is a throwback to the worst excesses of the legislative investigating committees of the 1950's. In this respect, the Internal Security Division represents the Second Coming of Joe McCarthy and the House Un-American Activities Committee." [12]

The abuses involved in this campaign have been amply documented by others before this committee and elsewhere, and need not be repeated here.[13] What is clear is that, although grand juries had been used for political ends before, never before had the grand jury served as the primary instrument of a coherent program of political surveillance and harassment.

The Nixon Justice Department discovered that the lawful attributes of the grand jury gave it enormous potential as an instrument for both surveillance and disruption. The independence of the "people's panel" had succumbed to prosecutorial domination long ago. As Herbert Miller, former Chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division commented, the "grand jury pretty much acts as an appendage of the prosecutor; it is subject to the whim and will of the prosecution." [14] Given this control, the vast powers of the grand jury—its protected secrecy, its purported investigative powers and its popular legitimacy—can be twisted to serve the political purposes of the executive.

The Nixon Administration used the grand jury network as an independent source of intelligence information on political dissidents. Although it has never been documented that the Special Litigation Section fed raw data to the FBI or the IEC, it is simply inconceivable that the grand jury network was not used for that function. When asked editors of the Columbia Law Review if information collected by ISD grand juries was fed into the IDIU network, the ISD's carefully worded response stated that "no inquiries are conducted for the purpose of supplying intelligence type information to any other office of the government." (emphasis added) [15] That is as close as anyone in the Nixon Administration ever came to an open admission.

Thus, Guy Goodwin became famous for his broad inquiries about the private and political activities and associations of grand jury witnesses.[16] Moreover, the major intelligence gathering resulting from the grand juries occurred not in front of the panel, but in the hundreds of FBI interviews which could use the threat of a grand jury subpoena to "encourage" cooperation from citizens. Added together, it is clear that the grand jury network provided the Nixon Administration with a major source of intelligence information on the political activities of its political targets.

The primary utility of the grand jury was not for intelligence collection, but for the disruption and "neutralization" of political groups and activities, the same objectives as the FBI's Cointelpro. The protected secrecy of the grand jury panel invites and cloaks abuse. The prosecutor may publicly label an organization as terrorist simply by convening a grand jury, announcing its purpose, and then subpoenaing members of the organization. The protected secrecy of the proceedings can then mask the absence of any evidence to support the public association. For the political group, the grand jury becomes a secret ordeal, in which the stigma attaches when the subpoena arrives. In this, the grand jury has vast advantages over the FBI's Cointelpro, which had to rely on articles planted with sympathetic journalists to achieve a similar effect. The grand jury's secrecy can also be used to control the information available to the public about an investigation, for it virtually insures that the prosecutor will control the flow of formal announcements and informal leaks.

The extraordinary legal powers of the grand jury provides the prosecutor with a range of tactics to be used against a political target. In federal grand juries, compulsory process extends through the country; a prosecutor may subpoena an individual from anywhere in the country at anytime. The purpose of the investigation need not be explained; the relevance or the witness's testimony need not be demonstrated. In a political context this provides the license for abuse.

For example, one of the hair-brained plots hatched by G. Gordon Liddy for Nixon's re-election campaign was to kidnap likely demonstrators at the Republican convention then planned for San Diego, and hold them in Mexico for the week. Attorney General John Mitchell found the suggestion unpalatable and ordered Liddy back to the drawing board.[17]

Yet when the Republican convention moved to Miami, the Justice Department used a grand jury to achieve remarkably similar effects. The Vietnam Veterans Against the War planned a series of demonstrations at the Democratic and Republican conventions in July and August. Three days prior to the Democratic convention, Guy Goodwin issued a batch of 23 subpoenas to members of the VVAW, including many of the national, regional and state organizers. They were summoned to a grand jury in Tallahassee, 500 miles from Miami on the very day their demonstration was scheduled to take place. Many were held a week, asked a few desultory questions and released. Four were jailed for up to forty days until their contempt citations were reversed. Eight were ultimately indicted for conspiracy to commit violence at the Republican convention in August. All were acquitted on all counts, but the VVAW's activities were totally disrupted, its activists removed from politics during the course of the conventions, and its members branded with a terrorist label from that time on.[18]

Perhaps most important, the Nixon Administration grasped the fearful weapon which could be fashioned from the ability to grant involuntary immunity to a witness before a grand jury. A witness stands before a grand jury alone, without notice of questions to be asked, without instruction as to his or her rights, without an attorney. If he or she invokes a Fifth Amendment right to remain silence, involuntary immunity can force the solitary figure back before the panel. Refusal to respond can then lead to imprisonment for contempt. The prosecutor can effectively offer a citizen the choice of secretly informing against his or her colleagues, or the public disgrace of incarceration for contempt of the "people's panel." In Cointelpro, the FBI planted misinformation to make associates believe that a colleague was a Bureau informer. In the grand jury, the prosecutor can seek through coercion to turn the person into an informer. If cooperation is still not forthcoming, the prosecutor may seek a contempt citation, or simply dismiss the witness from the secret proceedings, and thereby create exactly the same suspicion sought by the FBI's "snitch jacket."

Moreover, the more politically committed the witness, the less likely he or she is to cooperate with the grand jury. The grand jury subpoena becomes a predictable invitation to jail. Here the grand jury takes on the odious form of the self-contained executive court of the police state, for all of the proceedings from subpoena to imprisonment fall within the virtually complete control of the prosecutor, with the jury panel too often serving as an eerie silent witness, occasionally called on to chorus their approval of the prosecutor's whim.

In all of this, the grand jury's legitimacy only adds to its potential for political abuse. The research for a legitimate cover for political spying is a continual concern of the intelligence agencies. Political surveillance and disruption is inherently suspect in a democracy and must parade under other labels: the investigation of subversives, the prevention of terrorism, the legislative mandate of Congress. Former CIA Director William Colby now stumps the nation and the Congress calling for a CIA "compatible with the Constitution," an altogether admirable goal although the CIA has not yet found a way to achieve it without substantially amending the Constitution. Similarly, the FBI is now developing a new justification for its political spying. Terrorism and the anticipation of violence have replaced subversion and international conspiracy in the lexicon of FBI political spying.

In contrast the legitimacy of the grand jury is even today only somewhat tarnished by the excesses of the past years. When a grand jury is empanelled, few of us doubt that a proper criminal investigation is taking place. Persons summoned before the secret panel became immediately labelled with the crime purportedly under investigation. Our courts continue to defer to the fiction of a citizen's panel engaged in an independent inquest.

The Nixon grand jury offensive ended in 1973, and its architects found themselves the targets of a grand jury investigation. The demise of the Nixon Administration did not insure the end of grand jury abuse, however. The powers of the grand jury remain intact, and the potential for misuse unchecked.

Indeed, as early as the spring of 1975, there were new indications of a resurgence of political grand juries. At that time, FBI agents descended upon the women's community in Lexington, Ky., and New Haven, Conn., allegedly pursuing a tip about Susan Saxe and Katherine Powers, already under indictment for bank robbery in Boston. Hundreds of people were interviewed and asked detailed personal questions. Several who refused to answer the FBI's questions, were subpoenaed and jailed for contempt.

No indictments were handed down in either community.

Under severe criticism for its improper political spying, the FBI can cloak its political surveillance in the cloth of grand jury investigations, using the grand jury as a legitimate cover for its traditional intelligence collection. In New Haven and Lexington, most of the interrogation took place outside of the grand jury. Only persons who refused to cooperate with the FBI were subpoenaed to appear before the panel. Cooperation from others was obtained by either the suggestion or direct threat of subpoena. In Detroit, U.S. Attorney Ralph Guy has admitted that FBI agents are often sent to question people with blank grand jury subpoenas in their pockets.[19]

With the Internal Security Division dismantled, the FBI may be coordinating the nationwide direction of grand jury probes, taking advantage of the increased reliance now being placed on local U.S. Attorneys. If the Bureau can coordinate national information collection through grand juries, it will be able to channel much of its political spying through the new cover.

Another instance of recent use of the grand jury for political purposes arises out of the 1976 grand juries in New York and Puerto Rico investigating "bombing and explosive charges." The grand juries were used to subpoena people identified in some manner with the Puerto Rican independence movement. Again the FBI used the occasion to interview hundreds in the Puerto Rican community about their activities and associations, threatening the recalcitrant with subpoena. The investigation initially focused on members of the Puerto Rican Socialist Party at the time of an electoral campaign in Puerto Rico in which PSP was an active participant, and during PSP organizing efforts for a July 4 demonstration in Philadelphia to call for a "Bicentennial Without Colonies." The bombings under question were "claimed" by the "Armed Forces of Puerto Rican Libration (FALN). A June 18 issue of the FBI's "Domestic Terrorist Digest" identified PSP with the FALN because PSP called for Puerto Rican independence, and "independence has been one of the demands of the [FALN]." Not surprisingly, the focus of the grand jury shifted to other Puerto Rican groups once the elections and demonstrations had passed without incident.

Grand jury investigations aimed at the American Indian Movement, individuals associated with the Chicano movement, members of the gay community, and activist lawyers indicate that a new wave of political grand juries started in 1975. Yet this charge is not any easy one to prove because of legitimacy accorded to the grand jury and its misuse may not be readily apparent. The normal standards used to differentiate between a permissible investigation and a political intelligence operation are not adequate.

For example, the stated purpose of the grand jury investigation will not be helpful, for all panels must have a criminal predicate. In most jurisdictions, a prosecutor can attest that the purpose of the panel is to investigate violation of the laws of the United States or the general conspiracy statute.

One possible test is whether a witness comes under investigation because of his or her political affiliations. A political nexus should at least provide a strong presumption of impropriety. Yet a federal court in the New York bombing grand jury accepted the propostion that mere association with the Puerto Rican Socialist Party was sufficient to justify a subpoena.[20]

The apparent scope of the grand jury investigation will not necessarily reveal the political character of a grand jury. The Senate Committee on Intelligence distinguished between legitimate information and "intelligence about the political advocacy and actions and private lives of citizens."[21] Yet a prosecutor may subpoena a witness to a grand jury panel only to make good the agents' threats to unwilling interviewees and thereby gather intelligence. A series of carefully tailored questions may then be put to the subpoenee which would not offend the most stringent relevancy test.

The Senate Committee also looked for instances in which the information gathered "has been used to discredit the ideas advocated and to neutralize the actions of their proponents." [22] But in the grand jury context, discreditation follows from the wholly legitimized of subpena, and may be reinforced if contempt proceedings result from involuntary grants of immunity.

Occasionally, of course, current political abuse parallels the blatant excesses of Guy Goodwin era. For example, last month, a New York grand jury was informed that an alleged member of the FALN was an employee of the Hispanic Commission of the Episcopal Church. A grand jury subpoena was issued to the Bishop for:

Any and all records, documents, reports, notes, lists memoranda, statements, books, papers and things in your care, custody, possession or control which relate to, concern or reflect for the years 1970 up to and including 1977:

(1) the members of the National Commission of Hispanic Affairs [hereinafter "Commission"];

(2) financial statements of the Commission including, but not limited to statements showing expenses, salaries, income, gifts and the sources thereof;

(3) names and addresses of all personnel employed by the Commission;

(4) a list of all meetings, conferences and convocations sponsored in whole or in part by the Commission;

(5) the names and addresses of all persons attending said meetings, conferences and convocations.

The Episcopal Church voluntarily provided the requested files to the grand jury. Nothing could better illustrate how simple it is for the unrestricted powers of the grand jury to be used once again for political intelligence and harassment.

For this Congress and for this committee, the Nixon legacy is not a matter of the past, safety attributed to the isolated excesses of a discredited president. Without legislation, the grand jury will remain unchecked, and even further legitimated by a Supreme Court which continues to curtail rights rather than constraining abuses.[23] Now that the ominous potential of the political grand jury for surveillance and harassment has been demonstrated, reform is required simply to insure that the abuses do not continue.

A detailed analysis of the several reform proposals before this committee is beyond the scope of my testimony. It should be clear however that any reform program must seek to limit those powers which make the grand jury such a seductive instrument for political abuse. Some fundamental guidelines for reform are clear:

1. The grand jury must be given greater independence and be freed from the control of the prosecutor;

2. Restrictions must be placed on the use of the subpoena power, by requiring prior approval of either the grand jury or a judicial officer;

3. Perhaps most important, compulsory immunity must be terminated. No other measure will suffice to eliminate the extraordinary power which this measure affords prosecutors to harass the politically active.

Mr. BOROSAGE. The Center for National Security Studies has for the past 3 years focused on the intelligence agencies of our government and the conflict between their activities and the constitutional rights and liberties of American citizens. The members of the Center have investigated intelligence agencies and their abuses, and it is in that context and from that perspective that I'd like to make some of the comments that I have on the question of grand jury abuse.

It seems to me that the way to begin any reform program is to begin, as Confucius suggested, by calling things by their right names. I think what you have in the grand jury is an institution that was transformed by the Nixon administration into a fearful instrument for political surveillance, intimidation, and disruption. When you talk about reform of the grand jury system, you are now talking about the reform of an intelligence system which engaged in programmatic abuse over a period of years against political "dissidents" in this country.

One way to highlight that fact is to look at the lineage of political repression. We discover that the grand jury is similar in function if not in form to the FBI's Cointelpro, the IRS's politically-motivated tax audits, or the Congress anti-subversive investigating committees.

One of the tasks of intelligence agencies over time has been to gather information on suspect political groups and individuals and use that intelligence to harrass or disrupt their activities. Since World War II, the instruments of political surveillance have remained relatively constant: the informer; the wiretap and the bug; the screening of mail, of movement, and of open records. But the instruments for disruption change from period to period.

In the 1950's, for example, in the campaign against Communists and subversives and Communist sympathizers, the entire range of Government institutions turned on them and they came under Government repression. But the characteristic instrument of the period was the congressional investigating committee. Using the great public consensus against Communists and the great stigma that would attach to anyone known as a Communist or Communist sympathizer, the congressional committees led in the attempt to disrupt or harass the Communist Party in the 1950's. It is clear from the work of McCarthy and others, the committee was the major instrument of disruption and harassment in that period.

In the 1960's, the situation changed. Public attention became increasingly difficult to capture; the media provided ever less coverage, and far less stigma was attached to being a member of the Communist Party.

As a result, the FBI went underground with Cointelpro. Cointelpro eventually spread to encompass the entire range of dissent in the 1960's. And I would suggest that the characteristic method of disruption of political groups in the 1960's was the secret and covert disruption Cointelpro program of the FBI.

In the 1970's the dissidence increased. When the Nixon administration came into office, it faced the culmination of the antiwar movement, which grew as the administration continued its war in Vietnam. The administration attempted to line up each of the intelligence agencies to turn their attention to domestic dissidents, to gather intelligence on their operations, and help in the attempt to control them. In the infamous Huston plan, each of those agencies, including the foreign intelligence agencies, was brought together in an attempt to coordinate intelligence gathering. But the Huston plan floundered and was eventually abandoned on the objections of J. Edgar Hoover.

At that point the Nixon administration turned to a different track. It turned to the Internal Security Division of the Justice Department and developed the political grand jury as a systematic instrument for not only political intelligence gathering, but for political disruption.

I think this committee is well aware of the statistics of the number of grand jury probes that were launched by ISD under Guy Goodwin. From 1970 to 1973, ISD conducted over 100 Guy Goodwin-supervised grand juries in 84 cities of 36 States, and called some 1,000 to 2,000 witnesses by subpena. Targets included the Black Panther Party, the Vietnam Veterans Against the War, Daniel Ellsberg, the Los Angeles antidraft movement, the Catholic Left, Mayday, the Puerto Rican independence movement, the women's movement, and Irish unification supporters—the entire range of the peace and civil rights movement of the time.

The grand jury was used both for intelligence collection and for harassment. It is fairly clear, ISD fed information collected by the grand juries into the interdivisional information unit, the IDIU, which collected data from the FBI and other intelligence agencies and spread it out through the government. There is no absolute documentation of this practice, but we can tell from various pieces of evidence that now exist that, in fact, the IDIU did receive documents from the ISD political grand juries.

But the major portion of the intelligence gathering didn't take place within the grand jury panel. It took place around it; that is, the ability of the FBI to threaten people it was interviewing with subpena before a grand jury greatly increased its ability to gather intelligence. And so the very existence of the grand jury enabled the Government to exercise its intelligence-gathering function against political dissidents in a way that it could not before.

The second thing the grand jury was effective at doing was political disruption. It did this in a variety of different ways, and I'd like to give two or three examples.

One is the use of compulsory process, the subpena, to disrupt the activities of a political group.

For example, one of the plans that G. Gordon Liddy brought before John Mitchell in reference to the Nixon reelection campaign was a proposal: Kidnap demonstrators who might gather outside the Republican convention in San Diego, take them to Mexico, and hold them for a week. Obviously, the Attorney General found that ridiculous and told Liddy to go back to the drawing board.

Yet, some months later the same process took place with the appearance of legality through the grand jury. When the Republican convention moved to Miami, the grand jury was used to subpena members of the VVAW who had planned to set up demonstrations around those conventions, drag them off to Tallahassee, some 500 miles away, to hold them there a week or longer to testify before the grand jury and totally disrupt their plans.

What G. Gordon Liddy had suggested to the Attorney General to do illegally, the grand jury had done through its normal process.

Compulsory immunity has the same kind of effect. One of the things the FBI would do in the Cointelpro was to plant "snitch jackets" on political dissidents. A "snitch jacket" is a packet of information which would lead your colleagues to believe that you are an FBI informer. The Bureau did this with some regularity, both in black movements and with the Communist Party. Obviously, the attempt is to create suspicion in the group.

The grand jury process in its use of compulsory immunity has the same effect. If you call a witness before the grand jury, force him or her to testify in secret, overcome his objections to doing so through compulsory immunity, then the prosecutor has a whole range of things that he may do. He may hold the witness in contempt if he continues to refuse to testify, or he may simply let the witnesses go without holding them in contempt, and suspicion attaches as to whether or not the witness did testify in secret against his colleagues.

The same effect of the "snitch jacket" is achieved through the grand jury.

So, I think that when you approach the reform of the grand jury, you must approach it as a Nixon legacy which is now bequested to us. For when the Executive claims a new set of powers or exercises a new systematic form of abuse, that will slowly become legitimated over time unless the Congress or courts act to cut it back.

And we can see from all present indications that once again some political grand juries are taking place. It is time, it seems to me, for this committee to carry through the great promise that it has already shown, and attempt to bring about the reforms that are necessary to return the grand jury to the protection of American citizens.

I am not going to get into the details of that at this point, partly because my colleagues plan to do that, but it seems to me there are obviously three principles that should be followed, and I think H.R. 94 does a great deal in each of those areas.

One is that the independence of grand jury from the prosecutor must be established and defended.

The second is that limits must be put on compulsory process in the use of the subpena. There is no question that the use of the subpena can be used to disrupt political movements in a way that democracy cannot stand.

And third, compulsory immunity must be removed from the process. The ability to force people inside a secret panel to testify under compulsion gives the prosecution a tool which greatly adds to the authority over political dissidents.

I thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. That was Robert L. Borosage, representing the Center for National Securities Study.

I appreciate very much your staying within the time limit.

Next we will have Ms. Linda Bakiel, representing the grand jury project.

TESTIMONY OF LINDA BAKIEL, GRAND JURY PROJECT

Ms. BAKIEL. Thank you.

The grand jury project is an organization that attempts to provide information to prospective grand jury witnesses and to political groups and communities about their rights. It attempts to help them protect their rights under the current laws regarding grand jury testimony.

One of our major concerns is to prevent the use of grand juries as a means of doing things, such as described by Mr. Borosage, and I would like to describe to you the ways in which present grand jury procedure has permitted the use of grand juries as an effective Cointelpro program to disrupt political activities and the lives of people who have been subpenaed.

I became concerned with the problem in the spring of 1971 where the very small neighborhood I was living in in Philadelphia was literally invaded by cars full of FBI. There were over 50 extra agents assigned to this small area. The agents were following people to work, photographing them on the street, following them in their cars, breaking into houses, and stealing people's typewriters, all in an effort to discover who had taken the documents describing the Cointelpro program, and making them public for the first time, from the FBI offices in Media, Pa.

On the heels of that FBI invasion there were a number of subpenas issued to witnesses to come to Harrisburg, Pa., and testify before a grand jury there. We never knew exactly how many subpenas were issued. Many were not served. The FBI frequently told people they had been subpenaed, that subpenas had been or were going to be issued for them in response to their refusal to cooperate. One husband and wife spent 14 months in jail in connection with that investigation.

As a result of that combined invasion by the FBI and grand jury, that small community of people virtually disintegrated. Many people moved away from the area and out of the State. Many stopped their political activity. And the political activity of a community of people that had been accustomed to relying on each other's judgment and trusting each other and planning political activities together was totally disrupted.

Between the end of 1972 and 1975, this pattern of abuse seemed to slow down considerably, and in early 1975 it regenerated in the form of FBI and grand injury investigations which were alleged to be about the search for women who were fugitives from the FBI.

The effect of these grand juries was initially to put the women's movement in considerable disarray. One of the things that the FBI was doing at that time was threatening and carrying through other threats to inform employers and parents of women who were lesbians about their sexual orientation.

Another effect was that a great concern in the women's movement then about the presence of informers, and the openness and trust which had characterized the women's movement began to dwindle. Offices of women's newspapers were vandalized and objects with considerable market value left untouched while address lists had disappeared.

The pattern followed in these investigations in Lexington and New Haven is typical of the kind of chilling effect that these investigations, which are always backed up with the grand jury subpenas, have on a political community.

For the moment, though, I'd like to focus not on a community but on a specific individual. Follow me, if you will, through an imaginative exercise, focusing on one person.

Imagine that you are a father. You have a son who is about 20 years old. Your son was a college student and a very promising sports writer. You were very proud of him. You didn't go to college. However, your son now has not had a regular job for over 2 years. His sports writing career is over. Your son is in jail. He has been accused of no crime. He never had a trial. He is in jail because the Government says that it is trying to find out whether Patricia Hearst was in Pennsylvania in the summer of 1974.

You see Patricia Hearst interviewed on television. She is at home with her parents. She has had a trial. She has been convicted of armed robbery, and she is at home with her parents. She is giving interviews on national television. Your son is in jail. You are angry.

In March of 1975, when Jay Weiner was a college student, agents of the FBI threatened him with their guns, interrogated him in a sealed-off building in Oberlin, Ohio, through the early morning hours without allowing him a phone call or attorney, and then served him with a subpena commanding him to appear before a grand jury in Pennsylvania less than 36 hours later.

He went to Harrisburg, found an attorney, and testified. At the end of his testimony, he was threatened with prosecution because one of the U.S. attorneys didn't believe that his testimony was consistent with what he told the FBI.

As the father of this son, you feel like you are waking from a nightmare. You believe it's all over. You are wrong.

This was only the first of four subpenas over a period of 2 years commanding Jay Weiner to appear and give testimony in Harrisburg, Pa., in California, and two again in Scranton.

It is 2 years later. Your son has been in jail since November 30, 1976. He is imprisoned ostensibly for refusing to answer questions about Phillip Shinnick, a man who was jailed with him and then released when the Government discovered it didn't need this evidence. Your son is in jail because the U.S. attorney has said he is investigating the possibility that somebody harbored Patricia Hearst in Pennsylvania almost 3 years ago, and he thinks your son can aid in this investigation.

At the contempt hearing for your son, the FBI agent testified that there were 58 field officers involved in this investigation, and you read in the newspapers that over 27,000 people were questioned in San Francisco alone about the missing heiress. You know her mother testified before a Harrisburg grand jury and that in her own trial Patricia Hearst gave enough evidence to issue indictments for harboring. You were angry when you heard the FBI threatened Jay Weiner with guns, and you were angry when they asked you to help get inside his head, but you thought they would go away. You thought it would be over soon. Now you are beginning to think it will never be over because it isn't just happening to your son. The nightmare about midnight interrogations, secret police flashing guns and bright lights and jailing people when they don't hear what they want, putting people in cold storage for claiming the right to remain silent, for refusing to talk to prosecutors in secret about their friends and associates—this nightmare is called the grand jury investigation. You are afraid it will never go away.

This single example is a capsule version of what kind of impact grand jury subpenas and coerced immunity have on the lives of individuals. It is no worse than what happens to other grand jury witnesses. It is one case out of many. It doesn't illustrate all of the abuses, but I think it shows clearly the effect of the power of the U.S. attorney in cooperation with the FBI to issue grand jury subpenas to a witness, to hold witnesses in contempt for not giving information to the grand jury clearly doesn't need that information.

I think Doris Peterson from the Center for Constitutional Rights will talk about the kinds of legal protections we think are necessary to correct this abuse. I would just focus your attention on two major aspects.

One is the abuse of the subpena power, and I talk about abuse because I think the mere issuance of a subpena has a very strong negative effect on the person subpenaed and the political group, if there is one.

The subpena carries with it a considerable stigma. The average lay person has no understanding of the function of the grand jury and equates a subpena with a warrant, and involvement with any phase of the criminal justice system as quilt. The subpena, therefore, effectively accomplishes one of the purposes of the Cointelpro programs. It disrupts efforts, takes people's efforts away from legitimate political activities and brings them into defending themselves against the grand jury system. It discredits either the organization or the individual and also chills other people from associating with that group.

As a result of subpenas issued in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., the women's movement in Hartford virtually disintegrated. The women's center closed down and never reopened. Many people moved away. One of the grand jury witnesses who was merely subpenaed but never called reported that many of her best friends refused to talk to her because they were afraid if they were seen with her the FBI would come after them.

There is a further stigma once the witness goes into the grand jury room, and you don't need to be told about the effect of that stigma.

In addition, there is the stigma of coerced immunity, forcing people to choose between going to jail or giving testimony in secret about associates, and this creates an aura of being a turncoat or informer.

Finally, there is the danger of being prosecuted for perjury or false statements on inadvertent misstatements or rather minimal inconsistencies between what someone said under great duress to the FBI and what someone says in the presence of the grand jury.

Finally, I think that one of the conditions that has to be addressed by any kind of grand jury reform is a recognition of the kind of coercion that is involved in appearing alone before a large body of strangers, before a prosecutor, without an attorney, and being told that as a result of that appearance you must either answer all the questions that are put to you or face the substantial risk of going to jail. Leaving the grand jury room to consult with an attorney is some relief from that, but very often adverse comments are made about leaving the room and coming back, and time limitations are put on the amount of time people can spend out of the room.

Doris Peterson will talk about the ways of remedying these abuses.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Ms. Backiel.

I assume you have no objection to your full statement being made a part of the record?

Ms. BAKIEL. That is right.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record. And I might add that if any of the witnesses desire after the hearing to supplement their statements, you are encouraged to do so as we consider this statement further.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Bakiel follows:]

STATEMENT OF THE GRAND JURY PROJECT ON GRAND JURY REFORM ACT OF 1977

Originally organized to facilitate communication among communities of women undergoing intensive surveillance, questioning and other forms of harassment by the FBI, the Grand Jury Project quickly became an information center for a variety of political groups which attracted the attention and animosity of the FBI. The Project now provides general information and educational materials about the rights of grand jury witnesses and grand jurors, and maintains contacts with those doing legal and educational work in relation to grand juries affecting political groups around the country.

In the past 5 years over 150 witnesses have refused to cooperate with grand juries being used to gather political intelligence, to disrupt communities, to harass activities, or for other improper purposes. Not all of these witnesses have gone to jail, but many have spent months and some well over a year waiting for a grand jury term to expire so they can go free. They have chosen this course because they believe that the power of the FBI, working closely with complaint prosecutors, threatens us all with a spectre against which Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black warned in 1957:

"Secret inquisitions are dangerous things justly feared by free men [and women] everywhere. The are often the beginning of tyranny as well as indispensable instrument for its survival. Modern as well as ancient history bears witness that both innocent and guilty have been seized by officers of the state and whisked away for secret interrogation."

In recent years we have grown distressingly familiar with this phenomenon. Grand juries have been diverted from their historic constitutional mission, and have become convenient tools for a Federal Bureau of Investigation frustrated, and at times outraged at its own inability to comprehend those who are radically dissatisfied with the present distribution of the economic wealth and political power in this country. Increasingly, we have seen grand jury subpoenas arrive on the heels of a refusal to talk with the FBI and increasingly find subpoenas served by the FBI, with judicial approval.

Following the alleged discovery of a number of explosives in an apartment in the Puerto Rican section of Chicago recently, fifty extra agents were reportedly assigned there. People active in the Puerto Rican independence movement were followed, and FBI vans were parked outside their homes and certain churches for days (and nights) on end. Some activists received no mail for an entire month. One woman who lives in the area explained that local police and FBI agents were randomly stopping cars and looking for a man they described as a "fugitive." She asked not to be identified in the national press for fear she would be interviewed or subpoenaed. "It's like a dragnet," she commented. Of the eight people subpoenaed from Chicago to the grand jury there, all but one had already refused to talk with the FBI. An agent served one subpoena while pointing a gun at the prospective witness saying, "Now you'll have to talk."

Secret interrogations and dangerous things. In March, 1975, twenty-year old Jay Weiner was visiting friends at the Oberlin College campus. As he pulled out of a college parking lot late one night, his car was cut off by two others. Three men lept from the other cars and prevented him from moving. One jumped into his car and commanded him to drive to the college security office. Once Jay and the agents were inside the building, it was locked so that none but the FBI agents could enter or leave the building. They questioned Jay for several hours about his relation to former Oberlin athletic coach Jack Scott, among others, and finally served him a subpoena returnable in Harrisburg, Pa. the next morning. At the beginning of the "interview" one of the agents removed his jacket and, pointing to his shoulder holster, asked, "Does this intimidate you, Jay?

The moral: tyranny does not being in the grand jury room. It is futile to attempt meaningful grand jury reform without first considering the relation between abuses of power by the FBI and grand jury abuse. The Grand Jury Project has found that one of the most serious abuses of the grand jury system today is as a coercive adjunct to the FBI. When the investigator can get no more information voluntarily, he often serves a subpoena. In addition to perverting the original purpose of the grand jury, this practice enables an executive investigatory body to exercise considerably more power over the lives of individuals and the fate of communities than be tolerated in a democracy.

In the case of Jack and Micki Magee Scott, Judge R. Dixon Herman of the Middle District of Pennsylvania acknowledged that the witnesses' affidavits "allege outright police state tactics on the part of the FBI, which, if believed, would be reprehensible, and far beyond proper investigation." The government made no effort to deny the truth of those allegations, but Judge Herman felt that it was not proper to quash subpoenas flowing from such "police state tactics" because those tactics were attributable to the FBI and not the grand jury itself. "Further," he wrote:

"if the alleged FBI misconduct was attributable to the grand jury, and an evidentiary hearing held, the court would find itself in the position of passing judgment on the prudence or imprudence of individual FBI agents' investigative techniques."

In this case, and in the case of Jay Weiner, the district judges refused to find that quashal of the subpoenas was an appropriate remedy to "police state tactics." The witnesses were instead reminded of their rights to sue the individual agents for civil damages.

In other words, given the present state of the law, judges believe that witnesses may be compelled to testify in the face of abuse of their rights amounting to police state tactics, as long as the harassment is not the "sole or dominant purpose" of the subpoena. A prosecutor's representation—often in camera and ex parte—of some colorable relation to an ongoing investigation is all that is required to defeat this claim.

Despite consistent Congressional refusal to authorize the FBI to subpoena witnesses and material, it is only a fiction that they do not presently enjoy that power. Witnesses are frequently questioned by FBI agents carrying subpoenas to be served should the interview not produce all the information desired or anticipated. Often, U.S. Attorneys learn from agents of the FBI the names of persons to be subpoenaed and even more often, grand jurors have not even heard the name of a witness whose testimony is characterized by the prosecutor as "essential to their investigation."

As long as there are no requirements of probable cause, no need to seek the approval of a neutral and detached magistrate, the subpoena power will effectively be in the hands of investigators who do not believe citizens have a right to remain silent. And as long as there is coerced immunity, the FBI effectively has the power to nullify that right.

Individuals have many reasons for declining to be interviewed by an investigator, including the desire to preserve what has been referred to as "the ordinariness" of everyday life. Indeed, under the Constitution no reason at all is good enough. The disruption of ordinary life is often a real and long-lasting consequence of being in the path of an FBI/grand jury investigation.

In Lexington, Kentucky many of those who ultimately cooperated with the investigation allegedly concerned with the possibility that Susan Saxe and Kathryn Power had been harbored as fugitives in the area only because the FBI threatened to reveal their homosexuality to parents or employers. Those who withstood these threats often received grand jury subpoenas after information about their personal lives had been revealed in ways calculated to damage them.

In Chicago recently the FBI tried to scapegoat political activists for a rash of serious fires which took 26 lives in the Puerto Rican section of town. The fires were all accidental; if they had a single "cause" it was economic discrimination, inadequate housing and negligent enforcement of building codes and fire regulations. The FBI however, suggested that "mad Puerto Rican bombers" were responsible for the deaths, and that "arson" was the subject of the grand jury investigation to which numerous Puerto Rican activists were subpoenaed.

In Seattle, Washington four out of seven people subpoenaed to a grand jury were single mothers faced with the anxiety of separation from their young children and the threat of losing custody should they resist and be held in contempt. A similar pattern of targeting parents of young children was also apparent in native American communities.

The danger illustrated by these examples is not merely the disruption of individual lives, but the creation of a national network of unpaid informers—people who are so terrified by the FBI and the threat of jail for contempt that they are willing to incriminate themselves, their friends, loved ones and political associates. The result of this is the disruption of an already tattered social fabric stitched together by fragile relations of trust and confidentiality, expectations of privacy and "ordinariness"—defined as freedom from governmental intrusions into one's every day life.

INDICTING OR INVESTIGATING GRAND JURIES?

There are several specific proposals in the Grand Jury Reform Act now pending before this Committee upon which the Grand Jury Project would like to make specific comments and recommendations, based upon our familiarity with the experiences of grand jury witnesses. With respect to other proposals not directly addressed by us, we endorse and adopt the recommendations made by the Center for Constitutional Rights.

The Grand Jury Reform Act under consideration contains three separate proposals for eliminating the constitutional requirement of an indicting grand jury while permitting the use of grand juries as investigative bodies. The Grand Jury Project believes that grand juries as they are presently constituted and conducted rarely offer any protection to those accused of crime, and often serve as little more than a legal excuse to harass and intimidate people against whom prosecutors could not, even under the present system, obtain an indictment. We therefore have little hope that the present grand jury system will ever be able to fulfill its historic role as a shield for the accused.

We do, however, support the goals of that historic mission—the protection of the accused from politically motivated prosecution and the protection of citizens from crimes by government officials. It is our position that no one should be accused of a crime and forced to defend against the accusation upon the recommendation of a prosecutor alone. We therefore support the principle that all accusations should be screened by a truly independent lay body whose composition accurately reflects the numbers of women, young, working and poor people, and members of ethnic and racial minorities in our society.

Substantial reform in almost every area of grand jury practice could make the constitutional requirement of indictment meaningful. On the other hand, we oppose the proposal to legitimize the investigative function of the grand jury because we believe that it is in the exercise of that function that most of the abuses are committed, and because it would, as a practical matter, extend the investigative powers and techniques of the prosecutor far beyond those permitted by the Constitution and pervert the historic function of the grand jury.

RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

The proposals as to recalcitrant witnesses contained in the bill under consideration by this Committee include reforms in several major areas including:

guaranteeing the right to counsel, appointed if necessary, at every stage of the grand jury proceedings;
providing notice and time to prepare for each stage;
replacing "use" with "transactional" immunity;
reducing the permissible length of confinement;
providing for confinement in a suitable federal institution; prohibiting reiterative contempt; requiring the granting of a stay or bail pending appeal; and making violation of wiretap statutes a defense to contempt.

The Grand Jury Project supports these general proposals for reform, and would like to make specific recommendations as to several, and document the need for extending the spirit of these proposals.

1. Right to representation and adequate notice

On Friday, January 7, 1977, Maria Cueto, Director of the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs, was served with a subpeona to appear before a federal grand jury the following Monday and 10:00 AM. Ms. Cueto called the U.S. Attorney's office and requested her appearance be postponed as she anticipated trouble securing an attorney over the weekend. She was told to appear as scheduled and see about having the matter adjourned at that time. She appeared as scheduled, without an attorney, and was ordered into the grand jury room. Not wishing to take any actions which might affect her legal status without first consulting with an attorney, she declined to take the oath. She was shortly held in contempt for persisting in this refusal and committed to Metropolitan Correctional Center. Her release was not secured until the following day, by which time her family and friends had found an attorney who entered a stipulation to the effect that the witness would be sworn without waiving any rights to object to the subpoena.

This history illustrates the necessity of prohibiting the practice of compelling a witness to appear before a grand jury without: (1) prior notice of the right to legal assistance; (2) meaningful opportunity to consult with counsel, including time to file motions to quash if requested; and (3) signed formal waiver of counsel if none is desired.

The present proposal for 72 hours notice does not allow sufficient time to permit a witness to consult with counsel and file motions in many circumstances. Ms. Cueto was unable to secure counsel given almost 72 hours in New York City because her subpoena was served on a Friday and because of her lack of previous encounters with the criminal justice system. Consider the problem of 20 native American activists and supporters subpoenaed to Norman, Oklahoma from South Dakota, New Mexico, Wisconsin, Colorado and elsewhere. 72 hours was hardly adequate time to locate attorneys to represent the witnesses in Oklahoma, much less to interview them, consult with others and prepare responses to the subpoenas. We believe that the right to counsel cannot be adequately protected unless a grand jury witness is guaranteed at least 14 days notice from the time the subpoena is served until the date of the initial grand jury appearance.

We also oppose any provision which would permit the government to shorten the amount of time available to a witness to obtain counsel or prepare for any stage of the grand jury proceedings. Our experience has demonstrated that the urgency of the need for a witnesses' testimony or the danger of her disappearance is often greatly exaggerated, if not substantially misrepresented by the government.

JoAnna LeDeaux, a legal worker who studied and interpreted treaties between the U.S. and various native tribes, lived on the Rosebud reservation at the time of the Wounded Knee occupation. She was near the scene at the time of a shooting incident which left two FBI agents and one native American youth dead. Several months after the incident FBI agents with sniper rifles stationed themselves around the house where JoAnna lived with her parents and kept a vigil through the night. Early the next morning they broke into the house and dragged the young woman downtown to the federal courthouse in her nightgown. They had a material witness warrant to bring her before a grand jury, and insisted that the danger she would flee from the midst of these heavily armed men was such that she could not be given the time to change into street clothes. The affidavits on the basis of which the material witness warrant was obtained contained statements known by the FBI agents to be false. We have no reason to trust that such tactics would not be to circumvent the requirement of notice and opportunity to consult with counsel, were a specific exception written into the reform bill.

2. No reiterative contempt

JoAnna LeDeaux was eventually imprisoned for refusing to testify before the grand jury. Also imprisoned at the same time were Angie and Ivis Longvisitor, the parents of three small children. Angie and Ivis eventually agreed to testify because there was no one to care for their children while they were in jail. Over a year later Angie was arrested by six heavily armed FBI agents who broke into her sister's bedroom while she slept. Once again, they were executing a "material witness" warrant for a trial scheduled for six weeks hence. She was held in jail some time pending the reduction in bail set for her, and, should she refuse to testify at the upcoming trial of Leonard Peltier, she will have been jailed three times as a witness to the same event. We therefore believe that the proposed ban on reiterative contempt must be written into any comprehensive grand jury reform act.

3. "Suitable" Federal correctional institution

Jill Raymond was held in Kentucky county jails for fourteen months for her refusal to testify before a federal grand jury in Lexington. Often she was watched by male guards, had no privacy, no ventilation, and seriously inadequate nutrition. We believe that if witnesses are to be confined pursuant to the order of a federal district judge, they should be confined in federal facilities unless they request otherwise. However, it should be remembered that the vast majority of those confined as recalcitrant witnesses in cases involving political activists in recent years have been women. The very small number of federal facilities for women renders the "50 mile" provision proposed in the reform bill practically meaningless for most of these witnesses. When JoAnna LeDeaux requested a transfer in the hope of avoiding severe malnutrition during pregnancy she was shipped 1,500 miles from her family, to the federal correctional facility for women at Terminal Island, California.

Since the purpose of confinement for civil contempt is not punishment, but coercion, we believe reform legislation must specify that incarceration of witnesses for civil contempt must be at the nearest suitable federal facility, and if there is none within 50 miles of the witnesses' home, then at the nearest minimum security facility for prisoners serving comparable sentences.

4. Maximum period of confinement

We support the reduction of the amount of time to be spent in custody by a recalcitrant witness. Experience demonstrates, however, that no coercive purpose is served by incarceration beyond 30 days. Most witnesses who are eventually amenable to coercion testify within a week or two of incarceration. We would therefore further reduce the maximum period of confinement to 30 days.

5. Stay or bail

In light of the fact that the right to be free on bail pending appeal belongs to those convicted of serious crimes, we believe it is essential to explicitly guarantee the right of witnesses adjudged in civil contempt the right to a stay or bail until the resolution of all pending appeals. It is unlikely that incarceration will have any coercive effect upon a recalcitrant witness until her or his constitutional claims are all finally resolved.

IMMUNITY: TRANSACTIONAL OR USE?

The present form of coerced immunity which may be imposed in lieu of a person's unqualified right to silence is a cruel hoax offering no real protection at all. Under the present "use" immunity statute, "A" can be compelled to give information about "B", and "B" against "A". Each may then be prosecuted for his or her part in the transaction; there is no bar on the use of the fruits of the compelled testimony against the other participants. A return to transactional immunity would at least truly immunize a witness from subsequent prosecution for the same transaction.

However, we believe that even transactional immunity is entirely too small a fee to pay for an individual's giving up the right to be free from compulsory self-incrimination, unreasonable searches and seizures and invasions of the right to be let alone. Prior to 1954 this nation did not know coerced immunity; the exchange of coerced use immunity for Fifth Amendment rights was not ratified until 1973. Since that time it has been widely used not against organized crime, but against men and women whose sensitivity and responsibility to others has led them to actively oppose injustice and oppression in its many forms. When used against those reputed to be involved in "organized crime," coerced immunity has proved notoriously ineffective. When used against political activists, it has been successful only in creating more knowledgeable and embittered critics of the criminal justice and prison systems.

We believe that no coerced immunity can adequately replace an individual's Fifth Amendment rights. We believe that if an individual is not willing to accept voluntary immunity, she should be allowed to assert the Fifth Amendment and be left alone. However, if some of you believe that coerced immunity is necessary to abolish government corruption or organized crime, we would like to suggest a systematic study of its efficacy in those areas. If after such a study coerced immunity still appears advisable, we would urge the adoption of the following minimal protections for recalcitrant witnesses:

(1) Transactional, not use immunity;
(2) To be imposed only for specific, enumerated crimes relating to "organized crime" and government corruption;
(3) Strict procedural safeguards and articulated standards regulating the impostion of immunity;
(4) Judicial supervision of the immunization process; and
(5) Judicial review of the grant of immunity, including review of the asserted nexus between the witness and the subject of the investigation.

COERCED IMMUNITY: INCOMPATIBLE WITH A FREE SOCIETY

A. The effects of a subpoena

The issue of of coerced immunity, along with abuse of the subpoena power, present the major opportunities for abuse of the grand jury system and therefore, we believe, deserve consideration in some detail. Coerced immunity forces the witness to choose between becoming an informer or going to jail. It should not be imposed on the mere word of the prosecutor that the testimony sought is necessary and in the public interest. The witness should at least be given a hearing and an opportunity to contest the factual basis of the determination that the testimony is necessary and in the public interest. The burden at this hearing must be on the government to demonstrate (1) a substantial nexus between this witness and specific information related to a matter presently pending before a grand jury considering possible violations of specific criminal statutes within the district, and (2) the unavailability of other more appropriate sources for this information.

We also strongly urge that no witness be called to appear before a grand jury without immunity once the prosecutor has been notified in writing that the witness intends to invoke the Fifth Amendment. This protection, together with stricter standards for and judical review of the issuance of subpoenas is necessary because even an appearance behind the closed doors of the grand jury room may give rise to fears and suspicions about the witness. This danger was recognized in the case of Marti Copleman, an attorney participating in the Wounded Knee Legal Defense/Offense Committee.

The Committee was organized to help native Americans defend against myriad criminal charges and grand jury subpoenas arising out of the occupation of Wounded Knee, and to assist them in vindicating their civil rights. Ms. Copleman was subpeonaed to appear before a grand jury to answer questions about a client of hers who failed to appear as scheduled for a criminal trial. Although the questions proposed were not strictly within the attorney-client privilege, the district court recognized the danger of an appearance of betrayal and suggested alternatives to a secret grand jury appearance.

Another frequent result of a witness' receiving a subpoena and/or testifying is what is becoming recognized as "conviction by subpoena." Political careers, including that of former Michigan Supreme Court Justice Swainson, have been broken by the public's learning of the issuance of a subpoena or the giving of testimony to a grand jury. The real problem is not the violation of grand jury secrecy, but the bad faith issuance of the subpoena and the implications of testifying in secret or refusing to do so. In Mr. Swainson's case the subpoena led to widespread media predictions that the former Justice would be indicted. He was—but the only charge that seemed to a jury to have any substance was a perjury charge based on his grand jury testimony.

Towards the other end of a political spectrum, one woman subpoenaed to a Seattle grand jury charged that the prosecutor wanted to make it apparent that people working to end grand jury abuse were guilty of something. Because of the District Attorney's issuing the subpoenas and making public statements linking the subpoenaees to a bombing, the subpoenaees found themselves "in the position of being on public trial without ever having been charged with a crime. We have been branded in the public mind," she wrote, "and now have to spend a lot of energy in trying to refute a charge that should never have been made," she added:

"I believe that this net of slander was deliberate. I believe that the government knew we were concerned with grand jury abuse, and that we would be unwilling to cooperate with them. I believe that this sort of thing was designed to cast suspicion on us so that our anger at our treatment, and our denunciation of their actions, and their repeated abuse of the grand jury process, would not appear as the acts of principle that they truly are, but rather the acts of guilty people covering up."

Confidentiality and constitutional rights must be protected in the first instance, by requirements of prior judicial approval for the issuance of subpoenas. Once a witness has established by uncontroverted affidavits or at an evidentiary hearing that confidential relationships or constitutional rights have been invaded, we believe the government should show a compelling necessity for the witness' appearance. Otherwise the grand jury process will remain a convenient tool for harassment, even if the subpoena is ultimately unenforceable. One attorney, whose subpoena was quashed as an abuse of process, described the human cost of defending against such a subpoena:

"This subpoena took a tremendous amount of time and energy and expense for me . . . not only in hiring an attorney but also doing some of the research myself, trying to go out and organize support and generally making me so worried about the possibility of going to jail that I was unable to deal with the other cases I had, There's a tremendous amount of fear and anxiety that attaches to a subpoena, even though I knew it was off the wall."

Needless to say, this attorney who was experienced at representing others in grand jury proceedings, was much better prepared for the experience than most lay witnesses.

B. The effects of coerced immunity

Brenda Carter, subpoenaed to a grand jury in Seattle, explained to the grand jurors:

"I have the choice of giving information about my personal friends and political associations—of being an informer—or of going to prison.

"To deprive me of the same protections guaranteed any other citizen is to continue to move in the direction of suppression of all people working for change in this country and finally a police state. I ask each of you members of the grand jury, do you believe my rights and the rights of others can be eroded away in this fashion and have no effect on your own rights?"

We would ask you, members of Congress, to do what Brenda Carter asked of the Seattle grand jurors:

"Try to imagine what it feels like to have the police going through your garbage can, searching your house, forcing you to testify or go to jail, all in an effort to get information about the people you love and work with."

Brenda Carter's subpoena was dropped, at least in part because those grand jurors did understand that we cannot have a nation which is free for some and acts like a police state with respect to others. Coerced immunity is one of the primary reasons that the way grand juries are abused today threatens all of us with the prospect of living in a police state in the near future.

"We want to get into Jay's head," FBI agents told Jay Weiner's father. An inquisitorial power, interfering in intimate and confidential relations, the disruption of communities based on trust and the loss of individual self-respect resulting from the violation of these human rights are the hallmarks of a police state. Over and over the "recalcitrant" witnesses make it clear that they are willing to go to jail, not to protect themselves or others from criminal prosecutions, but to maintain their individual self-respect and collective trust. These values are often maintained and reaffirmed in direct opposition to attempts by agents of the government to subvert them and disrupt almost every human relationship considered fundamental or sacred.

The brother of one witness, now in jail, relates that his parents, initially skeptical of the charges of bad faith and misconduct by the FBI became bitter as they watched the judicial machinery grind on towards the jailing of their son, impervious to the documented abuses of power by the FBI. One night, searching for some diversion on television, the mother tuned in on a show, watched it for several minutes until she recognized the FBI show. She walked up to the television set and turned it off in disgust saying, "I don't want to watch that. That is the enemy."

By and large, the FBI's efforts to use parents to "get inside" their children's heads have failed. Nancy Compez, mother of a Seattle prison activist, was subpenaed to a grand jury in Portland after she refused to talk with the FBI about her credit card account. "I knew of no problem with this account," she said, "and since the reputation and credibility of the FBI have been questionable in the past few years, I did not wish to talk to them.

"I guess they figure I'm a straight middle class person who's going to go in and talk . . . I haven't done anything, but I suppose I could go to jail because I won't talk about my daughter."

When she appeared before the grand jury, there were no questions about the credit card, but two hours of interrogation regarding her daughter. "If this is why I am here, I am shocked that a judicial body such as the grand jury would expect me to violate the very profound and sacred trust relationship between parent and child," she told the grand jurors. Both Ms. Coupez' former husband and 22 year old son were also questioned by the FBI. "In a time when the family structure is disintegrating anyway, here's the grand jury contributing to it, she observed." Coerced immunity, with the threat of almost certain incarceration for refusal to inform on loved ones, places a heavy strain on that structure. And although parents are not routinely called to testify about their children before grand juries, the practice seems to be gaining in popularity with U.S. Attorneys and agents of the FBI.

Invasions of family relationships not specifically protected by any Constitutional guarantee or other privilege is just one common example of abuses of the grand jury process not yet addressed in any specific reform proposals. The Grand Jury Project would support and extend the proposal contained in the Grand Jury Reform Act presently under consideration that violation of the wiretap statute be recognized as a defense in a contempt proceeding. We believe that in addition to this defense, any grand jury reform must, to be effective, also contain provisions recognizing violation of other Constitutional rights and confidential relationships as just cause for refusal to testify. This position is based on the large number of cases in which the government has been allowed to benefit from flagrant violations of a witnesses' rights. Violations of First, Fourth and Sixth Amendment rights have raised particularly serious, recurring problems in the grand jury context, and will be considered in some detail.

First amendment violations.—FBI official Edward S. Miller justified his request for increased authority to conduct domestic security wiretaps against "people who are talking about revolution" with the observation that it was impossible to catch these thought criminals by ordinary investigative means. Their conversations tended to be "abstract, with no suggestion that a particular crime has or will take place." Certain ideas are dangerous, the argument goes; in order to avert disaster we need to monitor what people think. Such was the apparent thought behind subpoenas issued to the director of radio station KPFA for tapes of poetry read by women of the Weather Underground. This subpoena was quashed for the government's failure to show "that there is a substantial possibility that the tape will lead to information on criminal activities." The purpose of the subpoena was, in all likelihood, not to obtain information on criminal activities, but to prevent the poetry from being read on the air.

Another giant step toward 1984 was taken when grand jury subpoenas were issued for "all motion picture film, including but not limited to all negatives, working copies and prints and all sound tracks and sound recordings made in connection with such motion pictures concerning a group known as the "Weather Underground." The three subpoenaed film makers were in the process of editing the film at the time the subpoenas were served. The film makers, who resisted the subpoena, pointed out that if they were allowed to finish the movie, the FBI was welcome to see it. Once again, the purpose of the subpoena was not to aid a grand jury considering whether to issue indictments, but to prevent the expression of views considered subversive by agents of the FBI. The subpoenas were dropped in the face of widespread protest from film makers and others who perceived it as an attack on the First Amendment harking back to the early 1950's.

Freedom of expression through public media is not the only First Amendment freedom infringed by grand jury subpoenas. Rights of political association are particularly vulnerable, and have frequently been the object of grand jury attacks. The Puerto Rican Socialist Party was cast under suspicion by the issuance of grand jury subpoenas to its members during the first electoral campaign in which it had entered a candidate in Puerto Rico. The entire Puerto Rican independence movement has been tainted by repeated subpoenas to members of various legitimate political and even religious organizations in connection with bombings that have gone unsolved for years.

Recently labor unions have also been targeted for disruption by grand jury subpoenas, often in the midst of a strike when solidarity is especially important and resources usually strained. Most recently members of the Washington Post Pressman's Union, the United Transportation Union, United Electrical Workers, and a local union at a shrimp processing plant in Tampa have been commanded to testify during an ongoing strike.

Perhaps the most serious negative effect of subpoenas which interfere with First Amendment rights is the effect they can have on the internal relationships between members of the group. As with family relationships, there is no specific Constitutional protection against the effects of coerced immunity on political associations. Prosecutors are well aware of the disruption and chaos which can result from the discovery of an informer—even an unwilling one—in a group advocating controversial positions.

Women subpoenaed to a grand jury in New Haven, Connecticut in the spring of 1975 while agents of the FBI were combing the country for traces of Susan Saxe and Kathryn Power, explained:

"We have seen how the government, acting through the FBI and grand juries, has used inquiries such as this to harass and gather information on political leftists and feminists. . . Any person who talks with FBI agents or to grand juries runs the risk of having what they say used in some twisted way against them or their friends. . . . This is a total invasion of privacy and should not be tolerated. These tactics have also been used by the government to create distrust, confusion and disunity among people and break up communities of women and other political groups."

Of four women subpoenaed in New Haven, one decided, for personal reasons, that she could not face the prospect of going to jail and reluctantly testified. Although the three resolutely "recalcitrant" witnesses wanted to extend their personal sympathy and support to her, they recoghized that her decision was only strengthening the government's position wth respect to their testimony. If she had given in to the pressure, a little more might convince the others to testify. The women's community in New Haven was confused and at times sharply divided by the personal and political implications of the choices forced upon these women.

As a result of this FBI/grand jury investigation the women's movement in Hartford, where the investigation began, virtually came to a halt. Many women moved away. The local women's center, which had been a clearing house of information and activities, was closed and never reopened. Women were afraid to conduct meetings or talk in public. In the course of its investigation the FBI had asked questions about the associations and activities of women in consciousness raising and other groups in which one of the ground rules was personal candor and honesty. These groups were premised on the understanding that the experiences, feelings and attitudes revealed there would never be exposed to "outsiders." The level of trust and expectation of privacy was at least as great as between therapist and client or priest and penitent. Yet women were forced to reveal facts derived from their experiences in these groups under threat of going to jail. One Hartford woman who was subpoenaed four times and interrogated by the U.S. Attorney but never brought before the grand jury stated simply, "My life was totally disrupted for an entire year."

The principle of "non-collaboration" invoked by the witnesses in New Haven and elsewhere is premised on an understanding of personal and moral obligations which are the foundation for a humane society. The New Haven witnesses explained:

"Our refusal to speak with FBI agents was based on a number of reasons. We have an absolute moral belief that the investigation the government is involved in will violate our basic constitutional and human rights. We believe that the right to privacy and confidentiality in human relationships goes beyond those traditiaonally recognized confidences such as attorney-client, spouse-spouse, doctor-patient. We believe that every person has the right to to keep her affairs private without intervention by government agents."

In order to protect those principles and preserve those human rights and commitments intact, two women went to jail for 8 months in Connecticut and one for fourteen months in Kentucky. Three witnesses are presently in jail for contempt of grand juries whose terms will not expire until July 1977 and April 1978, respectively.

The trend which is apparent from a review of recent cases is not toward extending the protections of the Constitution and various testimonial privileges so as to protect the principles invoked by these witnesses, but rather, to sharply limit the application of already-established protections. This trend is particularly noticeable and dangerous in increasing use of the grand jury to limit the Fourth and Sixth Amendment rights of witnesses.

Fourth amendment violations—The power of prosecutors to compel the production of real evidence which is theoretically outside the Fifth Amendment and therefore does not even require the formality of an immunization procedure is an increasingly popular one. In many of the most recent grand jury cases—New York, Chicago, Seattle—witnesses' homes, offices and/or persons were subjected to extensive searches prior to or concurrent with the service of their subpoenas. In other instances, subpoenas have been used by agents of the FBI as if they were search warrants, delivery of requested items to the agents being "deemed" by them compliance with the subpoena. Often items seized or delivered form the basis of further demands for the production of exemplars. Here's how it happened to one group of people living together in a collective in Seattle, Washington:

"Shortly before 11:30 AM on May 1, 1976, approximately 15 Federal agents and Seattle police entered our Capitol Hill home with a search warrant authorizing them to seize guns, ammunition, explosives, written information about the George Jackson Brigade and the production of explosives, and miscellaneous items including typewriters, red tip pens, wire, flashlight batteries, bricks, alarm clocks and friction tape.

"For the next three and a half hours the house was sealed off and ransacked. We were separated into two different rooms and not permitted to move. During this time two of us . . . were served with subpoenas to appear before the federal grand jury . . .

"When the police and government agents finished searching the entire house, they had found none of the contraband items listed on the warrant . . . The items seized . . . were all things commonly found in most households. In addition, personal letters and diaries, business papers, leaflets and the financial records of the Committee to End Grand Jury Abuse were taken."

One of those whose handwriting was demanded after her diary was seized described the effect the search had on her life:

"I am 28 years old, and the mother of a two and a half year old boy. Before May 1st I lived a relatively quiet life raising my son. I had a home I liked, roommates I cared about, and was putting together a wonderful garden of vegetables and flowers. My life was similiar to the lives of hundreds of other people.

"Then on May 1st, the peace and enjoyment of my life was shattered and has never been regained. On that day 15 agents of the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms division of the Treasury Department burst into my house. For an hour and a half I was not allowed to leave the chair in my dining room. For three hours we were held incommunicado. Two armed Seattle police stood over my son, my roommate and myself to make sure we didn't move, even though we had in no way acted in anything but a reasonable and calm manner, especially when you consider what was going on. All of us, including my son, were bodily searched to the very soles of our feet. We had to watch while these people went through all the rooms of our house. We were powerless to stop them from taking anything they wanted to."

As the result of her diary having been seized in the course of this search, this witness was subpoenaed and commanded to produce handwriting exemplars. As is often the case when exemplars are demanded, the government admits having possession of or access to other copies of the desired exemplars. In this case the U.S. Attorney admitted in an affidavit that the witness was the owner of the confiscated diary, which contained over a hundred pages written in her hand.

In the case of Phillip Shinnick the government had access to handwriting samples from the days when the former Air Force Captain submitted handwritten reports on a regular basis. They also had a copy of his fingerprints, which they produced in court, but argued that they were entitled to "better evidence." The district and Circuit judges agreed with their position, and Mr. Shinnick went to jail rather than furnish the exemplars. Why? "It is simply a matter of self respect," explained Katie Mitchell:

"I couldn't stop the government from ransacking my house, strewing garbage around, leaving my son's art work all over the living room floor, or turning people's bedrooms upside down.

And I couldn't stop them from taking and reading my diary. All this was done without my cooperation. But now they need my cooperation. After all that has happended to me I hope that you can understand why I must refuse to provide my handwriting and my fingerprints."

It would be ironic in the extreme for this Congress to enact legislation which would permit a witness to assert the electronic overhearing and/or recording of a telephone conversation as "just cause" for refusal to testify or produce evidence, but would allow the government to base a demand for the same on materials obtained by such gross invasions of a citizen's right to be secure in her home and free from unreasonable searches and seizures. We would therefore strongly urge that grand jury subpoenas for the production of non-testimonial evidence, including exemplars, be subjected to the same standards as other search warrants, and that the fruits of unreasonable searches and seizures not be permitted to provide the basis of demands for the production of further evidence before a grand jury.

Sixth amendment violations.—The Grand Jury Project endorses the proposal to allow attorneys to accompany witnesses into the grand jury room, but would like to point out that the provision which would permit the removal of an attorney from a case could easily render the protection meaningless. We can think of no situation in which it is more important to have counsel in which the client has absolute confidence than in a grand jury appearance. However, in recent years, one major aspect of grand jury abuse has been the use of grand jury subpoenas to drive a wedge between lawyer and client and separate political activists from attorneys who can be effective advocates for their cause.

The attorney-client privilege, which many may presume would prohibit the subpoenaing of an attorney for questioning about a client, is, in the words of one defense attorney, "being whittled away bit by bit in courtroom after courtroom." Lawyers who had been present in the courtroom during the sentencing of members of the Black Liberation Army were subpoenaed for questioning in connection with the alleged transfer of contraband to the prisoners during the sentencing. The lawyers resisted the subpoenas because they considered "this grand jury to be an attack on the people's right to attend trials and the rights of defendants to have open trials and a vigorous defense." Various attorneys and legal workers from the Wounded Knee Legal Defense/Offense Committee have also been subpoenaed to provide information about clients.

James Diorio, chair person of the American Trial Lawyers Association's Criminal Law Section sees government prosecutors using grand jury subpoenas to lawyers as "shortcuts to get to clients" and attributes this tactic to the increasing use of crime as a scapegoat in hard economic times. He believes that the independence of the trial bar is threatened by an increasingly narrow interpretation of the lawyer client privilege. Professor Matt Zwerling of San Francisco School of Law wrote:

"We face a potentially troubled time in which lawyers may be attacked for their politics, or simply for their zealous defense of their clients and their steadfastness in preserving the confidence of their clients. . . . If prosecutors are allowed to use grand juries to break up the [attorney-client] privilege, the erosion of our civil liberties will have progressed a further step and the grand jury, once an institution seen as the great protector of individual liberty, will be that much closer to an institution of prosecutorial repression."

CONCLUSION

"I thought I was living in the United States in 1976," said a white middle-aged, middle class woman subpoenaed to a grand jury, "but I feel like I'm in Germany in 1935." Lawyers are not the only ones who fear that the grand jury process is becoming a powerful instrument of repression rather than a steadfast guardian of the people's rights. The current epidemic of serious abuses of power by investigative agencies and grand juries is posing the issue in the minds of many Americans.

Democracy or police state? Due process of law did not protect Michelle Whitnack from being choked unconscious by federal investigators and local police so that they could obtain her fingerprints. They never had a warrant; they didn't need one. Michelle was already in jail for contempt of a grand jury; the purpose of her incarceration, in theory, was to coerce her into cooperating with the fingerprinting procedure. As a matter of conscience, she resisted. Until she lost consciousness at the hands of eight agents, armed with an order to use whatever "reasonable force" was necessary to obtain the exemplars. The order was premised on a representation that the exemplars were a necessary part of the routine booking procedures of the jail and in no way related to the grand jury investigation. But as soon as they were obtained Michelle was released from jail. She has, of course, still not been accused of any crime. Democracy, or police state tactics?

The present epidemic of abuses of power by investigative agencies and grand juries is posing the issue in the minds of many Americans. The choice cannot be left in the hands of individual prosecutors or executive or judicial agencies; it cannot even be determined by the lay persons sitting on today's prosecutor-dominated grand juries. It can only be made by the people, through you, the legislators. On behalf of all the victims of grand jury abuse, the Grand Jury Project brings a mandate for grand jury reform as suggested in this testimony. It is up to you, the legislators to carry out that mandate. The choices you make will affect not just the friends and loved ones, political supporters and relatives of those subpoenaed and the "recalcitrant" witnesses themselves, but every one who looks to the Constitution to protect her or himself from the arbitrary interference of the State into her or his home, thoughts and activities. Ultimately, it means making the choice to reject legal and political developments which characterize the police state as incompatible with the Constitution and a democratic form of government.

Mr. EILBERG. The next witness is Ms. Doris Peterson. You have submitted a statement, and I assume you would like your full statement to be made a part of the record.

Ms. PETERSON. Yes; I would.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, the statement will be made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Peterson follows:]

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

(By Doris Peterson)

The Center for Constitutional Rights (hereinafter CCR) wishes to thank this Committee for inviting us to share our experience and views on the issue of the abuse of Federal grand juries and our recommendations for grand jury reform.

These Congressional hearings, the first on the Federal grand jury system in our 200-year history, represent an important recognition of the role which Congess must play if the rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights are to be preserved. As an organization primarily concerned with the preservation and expansion of people's rights, CCR has come to view abuse of the grand jury in this decade as one of the gravest threats to our democratic system. We wish to acknowledge the vital leadership role which the chairman, Representative Eilberg, has played in facilitating full exploration of the issues of grand jury abuse and reform. We view enactment of a strong reform bill in this session as a matter of great urgency.

It is a remarkable tour de force that the grand jury system, which historically was the shield for protecting the individual against unwarranted prosecution, has become a powerful weapon of oppression by the Executive Branch. The growth of prosecutorial control over the grand jury and the whittling away of the Fifth Amendment privilege provided the matrix for this perversion of the grand jury. But it is important to observe that the consolidation of this process is recent and directly attributable to the Nixon-Mitchell administration.

A TOOL TO SUPPRESS DISSENT

In 1970, the Federal grand jury began to be used to gather intelligence, harass, stigmatize, and destroy groups working for social change. The best known text in the field of Federal criminal procedures puts the matter as follows:

"[W]hen technical and theoretical distinctions are put aside, the true nature of the grand jury emerges—i.e., it is 'basically . . . a law enforcement agency.' Nowhere is this characterization more apt than in considering the use of grand jury proceedings by the Nixon administration. In Nixon's war against the press, the intellectual community, and the peace movement generally, the Federal grand jury has become the battleground. As a result, the courts—whose workload the Administration is ostensibly seeking to reduce—are now confronted with a large amount of grand jury litigation. It is clear that the administration's legal position in many of the pending cases is exceedingly weak, but this is to be expected in the light of the administration's political strategy which is based on harassment of the opposition. If the time, money, and energies of newsmen, intellectuals, and other leading critics of the administration can be diverted from affirmative action to defending themselves against grand jury inquisition, and if in the process these critics can be publicly stigmatized as outlaws, the administration may prove to have won the political war while losing the legal battle. 8 Moore's Federal Practice § 6.02[1]b."

In the past seven years, hundreds of people have been subpoenaed to appear before Federal grand juries all over the country, often thousands of miles away from family and friends, frequently with little or no notice. Federal grand juries have been employed against the following:

Women's Movement, Native American Movement, Anti-war activists including Catholic peace people, the Vietnam Veterans Against the War (hereinafter VVAW), anti-war writers, critics, scholars and publishers, Black Movement, Irish-Americans, Chicanos, defense attorneys, Congresspersons and Senators and their aides, the Puerto Rican Independence Movement, radical sports activists, prison movement, union members, social workers, clergy, lay ministers and their assistants, media people—film makers, reporters, publishers, writers, and researchers.

The massive and abusive use of the grand juries has produced a flood of litigation. Judge Hufstedler of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has said:

"Today, courts across this country are faced with an increasing flow of cases arising out of grand jury proceedings concerned with the possible punishment of political dissidents. Bursey v. United States, 466 F.2d 1059, 1089 (9th Cir. 1972)."

From the first evidence of such grand jury abuse, CCR applied its experience and skills to the defense of grand jury witnesses. For the past seven years, CCR attorneys have been involved in litigative and/or consulting roles in connection with hundreds of grand jury subpoenas throughout the country and in Puerto Rico concerning grand jury abuse. The positions taken here regarding grand jury reform are based on this widespread litigative and consultive experience.

Although the flagrant abuse of the grand jury began with the Nixon Administration, it did not end with it. Grand jury abuse continues both in the same and more subtle forms today.

FROM AN ACCUSATORIAL TO INQUISITORIAL SYSTEM

In our system of checks and balances, the grand jury was designed as a check against the otherwise totally unregulated power of the prosecutors to determine whether or not to prosecute. Under the Fifth Amendment, no person has to stand trial unless the government can present enough evidence to convince a grand jury to vote an indictment.

Despite this clear historical purpose, it has long been recognized that the grand jury does not function as a buffer. As long ago as 1931, the Wickersham Committee[1] said:

"The Grand Jury usually degenerates into a rubber stamp wielded by the prosecuting officer according to the dictates of his own sense of propriety and justice."

But something even worse than the loss of an independent grand jury has been taking place in the last few years. The grand jury's powers, particularly the subpoena power, are being used at will by prosecutors and the FBI despite the fact that Congress has consistently refused them this power. Thus, the shield has become a weapon against those whom it was designed to protect.

Prosecutors have free rein with grand juries. They are protected by grand jury secrecy. Much of what they tell the grand jury is not recorded. There is no scrutiny and review, and no adversary counsel. Prosecutors have virtually absolute control over what the grand jury hears, sees, and understands as its duty. They are in a clear conflict of interest position insofar as they function as the grand jury's legal adviser while simultaneously attempting to secure indictments and using its powers for their own investigative work.

Grand jury witnesse are deprived of rights we consider fundamental to our constitutional system: the right to counsel—even to be told of the right to consult counsel before appearing and the right to have counsel in the grand jury room; the right to remain silent; the right to know if one is a target; the right not to have to assist in preparing one's own indictment; the right to know what is being investigated and what the potential charges are; to be told what one's rights are and warned about perjury; to know why one is being subpoenaed; to not be questioned on the basis of illegally seized evidence; to get copies of the government's version of prior information supplied to the government by the witnesses; and statutory rights to which persons other than grand jury witnesses are entitled.

The witness is put to the same intolerable trilemma that faced witnesses summoned to the High Commission and the Star Chamber: (1) to be forced to give self-incriminating evidence; (2) to risk prosecution for perjury; or (3) to be punished for asserting the right to remain silent and to withhold self-incriminating eivdence. The witness contemnor is presumed not innocent but guilty and the government escapes its burden of proof.

JUDICIAL EROSION OF SAFEGUARDS

In our country we have been accustomed to look to the courts for protection of constitutional rights. But on the matter of grand jury abuse, for reasons we are about to explain, the American people must turn to Congress to protect their constitutional rights. It is the wisdom of our system of checks and balances that every branch of government is the guardian of the Constitution and when, as we shall show, the courts have faltered in their traditional responsibility, the Congress has the power and duty to act in support of the Constitution.

At the same time as the Nixon Administration massively expanded both the dimension and repressive impact of grand juries, the Supreme Court of the United States, dominated by appointees of that same Administration, has in a series of decisions, fostered grand jury abuse.

Thus, in the well-known case of United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), in a decision which effectively overruled Mr. Justice Holmes' historic pronouncement in the Silverthorne[2] case, the Court held that a grand jury could use illegally seized evidence.

In 1973, in United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, the Court held that the Fifth Amendment applied to actual testimony only and accordingly permitted grand jury subpoenas to compel production of voice and handwriting exemplars. And in Fisher v. United States, 48 L. Ed. 2d 39 (1976) the Court strongly indicates that despite the Fifth Amendment, any witness may be required to produce private documents and papers. The latter decision effectively overruled one of the landmarks of constitutional law, namely, Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 631–32 (1874) which held that:

"[A]ny compulsory discovery by extorting the party's oath, or compelling the production of his private books and papers, to convict him of crime, or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman; it is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power; but it cannot abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom."

Again, the spring of 1976, Chief Justice Burger in his opinion in United States v. Mandujano, 48 L. Ed. 2d 212, legitimized the procedure developed by the Nixon Administration of routinely calling the target of an investigation and forcing him/her to testify and be exposed to a perjury prosecution or plead his/her Fifth Amendment privilege without even being given notice of applicable constitutional rights.[3]

Perhaps most serious of all is the Court's 1972 decision in Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, sustaining the 1970 statute by which any witness (including a target) in any criminal case, at the sole discretion of the Department of Justice and with no judicial review, may be given a very limited immunity (use immunity), although s/he might subsequently be prosecuted not only on the general subject matter but on the very act about which s/he testified.

Kastigar buries the Fifth Amendment privilege which was intended to provide a "shield of absolute silence." Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591 (Field, J. dissenting). It gives the government the power to "probe the secrets of every conversation, or society by extending compulsory pardon to one of its participants, and thus turns him into an involuntary informer." U.S. v. James, 605 F. 2d 257 264, upheld by dissenters in Brown v. Walker, supra.

Indeed, Kastigar bears out Mr. Justice Field's warning in Brown, addressed to a limited transactional immunity statute, that the smallest compromise of constitutional guarantees is the first step to their wholesale abrogation. Conferring upon the executive the power to coerce immunity ignores the origin of the Fifth Amendment as the basic guarantor against totalitarian power. Again we quote Justice Field's dissent:

"[B]oth the safeguard of the Constitution and the common law rule spring alike from the sentiment of personal respect liberty, independence, and dignity which has inhabited the breasts of English-speaking peoples for centuries, and to save which they have always been ready to sacrifice many governmental facilities and conveniences. In scarcely anything has that sentiment been more manifest than in the abhorrence felt at the legal compulsion upon witnesses to make concessions which must cover the witness with lasting shame, and leave him degraded both in his own eyes and those of others."

[2] Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920).

[3] The anomalous nature of this practice is revealed by the fact that the "Handbook for Federal Grand Jurors," which was published by the GPO a few years ago and is still being distributed in some District Courts, includes the following statement:

"Neither the person under investigation (sometimes referred to as the 'accused,' although this does not imply he is guilty of any crime) nor any witnesses in his behalf normally will testify before the grand jury.

The impact of this series of decisions, which has made the grand jury the major loophole for constitutional rights, is to legitimize the shift from an accusatorial to an inquisitorial system of justice.

The framers' insistence on an accusatorial rather than an inquisitorial system was the fundamental guarantor against the excesses of executive power, fought in England and the colonies. As the Supreme Court stated in 1961:

"[O]urs is an accusatorial and not an inquisitorial system—a system in which the State must establish guilt by evidence independently and freely secured and may not by coercion prove its charge against an accused out of his own mouth. Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534, 541 (1961)."

Together with the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory swearing, the presumption of innocence and the burden on the state to demonstrate guilt without the assistance of suspect or accused, the grand jury was an essential bulwark of the accusatorial system. Even the Department of Justice concedes that "the Constitution explicitly refers only to its [the grand jury's] protective function." (Office of Policy and Planning, U.S. Department of Justice, "Memorandum on the Grand Jury," Hearings, p. 87). Today, however, the grand jury, under the sway of the prosecutor, unconstrained by constitutional rights, and recently equipped with the power to coerce testimony and other evidence, functions purely as the mainstay of a viscious inquisitorial system. It bears only superficial resemblance to the people's protector envisaged by the framers.

The effects of this shift from an accusatorial to an inquisitorial system are felt not only by the grand jury witnesses, the target, and the accused, but all society. When the use of illegally seized evidence before the grand jury is authorized, no one is safe or secure in their houses or effects.

When these inquisitorial powers are applied to the investigation of crime, they are oppressive enough; but, as we have seen, when applied to even the mildest political dissidents, they threaten the basic workings of our democratic system.

THE CONGRESSIONAL TASK: "RECONSTITUTIONALIZING" THE GRAND JURY

For all the foregoing reasons, Congress must now consider a wide range of proposals which will re-establish the historic role of the grand jury and protect the citizenry from abuses. We are firmly committed to the principle that the grand jury must be preserved and equipped to function as a shield against an overreaching executive. As stated by the Supreme Court in Wood v. Georgia:

"Historically, this body has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill-will . . . [I]t [is] important that freedom of communication be kept open and that the real issues not become obscured to the grand jury. It cannot effectively operate in a vacuum. 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962)."

The task of this Committee and the Congress is to "reconstitutionalize" the grand jury. To do this, the following must be the guiding principles:

1. Ensure the grand jury's independence from the prosecutor.
2. Confine the grand jury to its constitutional accusatory screening function.
3. Reinvest the process with basic constitutional rights.
4. Eliminate any form of coerced immunity which was unknown at common law.

SUBPOENAS

Today, there is no supervision over the issuance of grand jury subpoenas. Prosecutors and federal agents serve them at will. Grand juries are generally ignorant of the fact or purpose of the subpoenas served in their name.

The absence of any check on the issuance of subpoenas significantly expands the repressive powers of the law enforcement establishment. The abuses are perhaps most flagrant in the political context.

Grand jury proceedings are usually presaged by the descent of the FBI or other investigating agents on the targeted community. People who are hesitant to talk to the FBI may be urged into cooperation by the suggestion or being subpoenaed. Those who assert their right not to be interrogated are often explicitly threatened with subpoena. In many of the grand jury cases in which we have been involved, mere refusal to talk to the FBI was taken by the agents as a presumption of relevant testimony.

There have been numerous occasions when agents have not only threatened an unwilling interviewee with subpoena, but have filled in blank ones on the spot; altered them, substituting organizations and addresses; or subpoenaed people to non-existent grand juries hoping to be given the information in advance. Subpoenas for tangible evidence commonly carry the following note (or words to the same effect):

[NOTE.—The requirement of this subpoena may be satisfied by delivery of the material called for by the subpoena to a Special Agent of the FBI at or before the time required herein for its production.]

Occasionally the prosecutor has clearly not been involved in the process at all.

Subpoenas are served and withdrawn for many reasons, not the least being that they served their purpose without involving the grand jury. Subpoenas have been dropped after agents have gained access to books, records, files, or answers to questions. Although there are undoubtedly numerous occasions when a subpoena is either desired or voluntarily accepted, the use of the subpoena power to trick or coerce a person into compliance is unconscionable and must be stopped. As no records are kept on the issuance of subpoenas, it is impossible to measure the extent of these abuses.

Few of the witnesses we have counseled knew anything about the grand jury process. Many equated the subpoena with immediate jailing and were unaware of their right to challenge the legality of their subpoena. Never have we counseled a witness who was not terrified or whose life was not turned inside-out by the prospect of their appearance before the grand jury. As lawyers for witnesses, we have never taken on a case which did not require extraordinary round-the-clock attention in order to be prepared on the return date.[4]

Because of the dangers of abuse and the enormous impact on an unwilling subpoenee, we think the following safeguards essential:

(1) That every subpoena be justified by an affidavit signed by the prosecutor, stating its purpose and the nexus between the testimony or tangibles sought and the investigation;

(2) That the issuance of the subpoena be approved by a majority of the grand jury or by a detached judicial officer if the grand jury declines to exercise this power, but this approval carries no presumption of regularity;

(3) That every subpoena be served at least two weeks in advance of the return date with the notice of rights contained in H.R. 94 § 3330B(b) and H.R. §§ 3736, 3330A(b), attached to the affidavit described in (1) above;

(4) That the FBI or other investigating or prosecutorial authority be prohibited from threatening persons with subpoena in order to encourage them to informal interrogation; and

(5) That violation of any of the foregoing safeguards be grounds for quashal of the subpoena and/or a defense to contempt.

The showing of nexus and legitimate purpose required to approve a subpoena at this ex parte stage should be the one referred to as the "Schofield" criteria, established by the Third Circuit,[5] exercising supervisory power over grand juries, and adopted by other district courts[6] and in some districts by United States Attorneys. Although the Schofield standard was formulated in the context of a witness moving to quash a subpoena as improper, its standards should be applied ex parte as a test for issuance. Schofield would then require the government to file an affidavit showing at a minimum that the testimony or evidence sought is:

(1) Relevant to an investigation;
(2) Currently being conducted by the grand jury;
(3) Concerning violations of specific criminal statues; and
(4) Properly within the jurisdiction of the grand jury.

The affidavit should contain (or have in appendices) sufficient facts to enable the grand jury or other judicial officer to determine from its face whether the subpoena is legitimately connected with a particular grand jury investigation, and whether there is reason to believe the witness summoned can provide the evidence sought. Of course, an additional showing may be required.

[4] Our recommendation in ¶ 3 below that subpoenas be served at least two weeks prior to the return date is based on our experience that most witnesses not subpoenaed for business purposes do not know and need time to find counsel, and that preparation of the motion to quash is severely prejudiced by insufficient time.

Because many subpoenas are negotiated and issued on consent, prior approval of the subpoena may be knowingly and intelligently waived in writing as long as the witness has received the above-mentioned notice of rights. Abuse of consensual service can be deterred by allowing the witness to raise, as a defense to the subpoena or later contempt, that the waiver was not voluntary.

MOTION TO QUASH SUBPOENA

The motion to quash is the witness' first formal opportunity to challenge the legality and permissibility of the subpoena. It is a critical stage in the proceedings. It should guarantee immediate vindication from wrongful process. It should protect the witness against the needless anxiety and disruption occasioned by delay. Full and prompt consideration is particularly necessary where the witness is engaged in First Amendment protected activities.

Early determination of the witness' challenge to the subpoena is also required to prevent needless invocation of the Fifth Amendment by the witness. Although the Amendment prohibits legal deprivation for claiming the privilege, the plea of the Fifth is widely viewed and often exploited as tantamount to guilt. Media stories which refer repeatedly to the fact that a witness took the Fifth may obviate the need to go on trial if the government's purpose is served by stigmatization alone. The effect of the plea of the Fifth in the First Amendment context is also particularly severe.

Today, motions to quash are at best tolerated in the courts. They are almost never granted. With rare exception they are decided on the basis of affidavits with no adversarial proceedings. The legal grounds for quashal are rapidly being cut away by the Supreme Court. The standards of illegality are impossible to meet. If the Court errs in its denial of the motion, the issues are not appealable until the witness, divested of the Fifth Amendment privilege, has been cited and usually, jailed for contempt.

Under these circumstances, the motion to quash cannot safeguard the rights of the witness nor check the abuse of the grand jury. From 1970 to the present, the only limit on the grand jury has been the willingness of hundreds of courageous women and men to go to jail rather than violate principle or conscience.

The bills before the Committee recognize the importance of the motion to quash stage, but they do not go far enough. To alleviate the present situation, Congress must instruct the courts to:

1. Recognize, as grounds for quashing the subpoena, the violation of constitutional and statutory rights, violation of confidential relationships, and abuse of the grand jury function and prosecutorial misconduct.

2. Order adversarial evidentiary hearings where material and contested issues of fact as understood by Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are joined in the motion to quash.

3. Apply reasonable standards for and impose practical safeguards against illegality and abuse.

4. Entertain an immediate appeal from denial of a motion to quash.

5. Guarantee the witness the right to the effective assistance of counsel of choice, appointed by the Course where necessary.

Grounds and standards of quashal

An exhaustive discussion of the law as applied to motions to quash would fill volumes. We have selected examples illustrative of the need for directing the courts to meaningfully review and enforce basic constitutional, legal and human rights.

a. Constitutional rights (first amendment).—Certain fundamental constitutional safeguards are being written off as a check on the subpoena power of the grand jury. A witness has no right to complain that the subpoena is the fruit of a Fourth Amendment violation;[7] the Fourth and Fifth Amendments no longer protect against compulsion of physical evidence;[8] the Fifth provides brief protection only if the witness knows about it;[9] and the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is in jeopardy.[10] These and other rights should be guaranteed by a provision that any violation of a defendant's rights is grounds for a motion to quash.[11]

The First Amendment presents a different problem. It is an example of a guarantee to which the courts continue to give lip service but rarely enforce.[11] The status, or lack thereof, of the First Amendment in grand jury proceedings bears this Committee's careful examination because the grand jury, when used against political dissent, deeply threatens our democratic system. The impact of the grand jury on political rights can be summarized as follows:

The grand jury is a weapon of political intelligence-gathering. Witnesses are asked to name names, repeat what occurred at formal and informal meetings, catalogue people's whereabouts, travels, and relationships—political, personal and sexual. Moreover, the FBI's power to coerce the reluctant interviewee with a subpoena indicates that what happens before the grand jury is just the tip of the iceberg of political intelligence-gathering and intimidation.

It generates suspicion and divides friends, communities and families. People question why a person was selected or not selected for subpoena. As proceedings are secret, no one knows for sure what breach of privacy or trust may have occurred behind closed doors.

It diverts constructive political energy into all-consuming legal defense and is calculated to disrupt on-going work. Subpoenas are often timed to interfere at critical moments in organizing activities, force people to travel great distances from their homes and communities, and remove leadership by jailing them for contempt.

It frightens and deters people from becoming politically involved either by stigmatizing leadership or striking those on the fringes. Its message: unless you are willing to become an informer, you had better stay away from exercising political and civil liberties. The price can be a court battle, the threat of going to jail, implication of criminal involvement, loss of privacy, job, and harassment of friends and family.

It stigmatizes and discredits legitimate political activity by linking it with criminal conduct. Mere issuance of a subpoena plants the suspicion. Judicial approval, pleading the Fifth, and contempt legitimate and confirm the equation of ideology and terrorism. Spurious indictments may follow to justify the subpoenas and further "disrupt, discredit and neutralize" effective organizations.

Finally, the grand jury gives the prosecutor the power to jail activists for contempt for long periods without any evidence of crime, without indictment, trial or any of the constitutional protections guaranteed to defendants in the criminal process.

Since the Supreme Court's refusal in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) to give weight to First Amendment rights in the grand jury context, grand jury witnesses' First Amendment claims have been consistently ignored or subjected to impossible burdens of proof. As a result, protected associational activity or espousal of dissident political viewpoints has become a permissible basis for singling a person out for subpoena. This McCarthyite tactic did not abate with the end of the Nixon Administration but continues right up to the present:

Lureida Torres, a Puerto Rican teacher, spent four months in jail for contempt. The first time she was subpoenaed she was asked about her associations as a university student eight years earlier. The second time the prosecutor asked her to identify persons involved in FALN bombings. Looking only to these laundered questions, the Court disregarded the fact that she was selected for subpoena solely because of her membership in PSP. The FBI's "Domestic Terrorist Digest" links PSP and FALN, simply because they both support Puerto Rican independence. Her supporters were photographed by the FBI at the court and their pictures shown in the community. (In re Torres, S.D.N.Y., No. 76 Misc. 11–188, (1976).

Edgar Maury also espouses Puerto Rican independence. FBI agents told him that he was selected for questioning before a federal grand jury in Puerto Rico because during a time period covered by a government investigation he had rented a truck, was a supporter of Puerto Rican independence and his father had been a member of the Nationalist Party in the 1950's. It was the latter considerations which caused the FBI to single him out from the hundreds of other truck renters in Puerto Rico.

[11] Section 3330A(n) of H.R. 3736 is essential to guarantee the witness against submission of unconstitutionally or illegally obtained evidence. This does not go far enough. For example, to protect constitutional rights and prevent abuse of the grand jury process, overbroad subpoenas should be subject to quashal. In addition, we assume these prohibitions to be likewise enforcible by the witness by motion to quash though the ground is not one listed in subsection 3330A(k). As discussed above, vindication of these and other constitutional rights should not have to await the contempt stage, although we support the right to raise them there as well. See H.R. 3736, Section 2 amending 1826(c).

[12] See discussion of the first Amendment in the grand jury context, Bursey v. United States, 466 F. 2d 1059, 1081–1088 (9th Cir. 1972).

The virtual repeal of First Amendment rights in the grand jury process is illustrated by the standard applied by the First Circuit in Maury's case:

The legitimacy of the purpose of the grand jury also tends to negate Maury's charge that he was called before the grand jury merely to harass him for his unpopular political beliefs. The First Amendment generally does not offer protection from a duty to testify before the grand jury. See Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, 92 S. Ct. 2646, 33 L. Ed. 2d 732, 747–49 (5th Cir. 1972). While use of the grand jury for bad faith harassment of a political dissident with no expectation that any testimony concerning the commission of a crime would be forthcoming would constitute an abuse, that is not the situation in this case. The district court did not err in refusing to hold an evidentiary hearing in regard to charges of abuse of the grand jury (italics added). In re Maury, 533 F.2d 727, 730 (1st Cir. 1976).

In order to get a hearing, Maury had the impossible burden of proving that the investigation was completely illegitimate or that his subpoena promised no expectation of testimony concerning a crime. This is an ominous departure from the traditional principle that First Amendment interests weigh heavily in the balance and are not to be infringed except upon a showing of overriding and compelling need or clear and present danger (Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 44 [1944]).

If a hearing had been held and the traditional standard applied in connection with subpoenas to 23 VVAW members and supporters, tremendous cost to both First Amendment rights and to the government could have been saved. These subpoenas tied up some of the key organizers of a lawful anti-war demonstration at the 1972 Democratic Convention. Although some of the subpoenees were later excused without being questioned, four spent forty days in jail for contempt; eight were indicted for conspiracy and acquitted a year later by a jury, after little more than an hour's deliberation; two were named as "unindicted coconspirators," and vindicated by the Fifth Circuit three years later. Precious resources of VVAW, as well as CCR which represented them, were diverted into their defense.

The VVAW witnesses raised First Amendment claims in a motion for a temporary restraining order (at least equivalent to a motion to quash) and as a defense to contempt. Each time they were summarily denied by the district court and affirmed on appeal.[13]

Vindicating the unindicted co-conspirators in 1975, the Fifth Circuit finally acknowledged that impermissible political reasons underlay all these events:

Nine of the ten persons named in the indictment were active in the Vietnam Veterans Against the War, an anti-war group. The naming of appellants as unindicted co-conspirators was not an isolated occurrence in time or context. The same procedure was employed in other cases. See Note, Federal Grand Jury Investigation of Political Dissidents, 7 Harv. Civ. Rts.-Civ. Lib. L. Rev. 432 (1972). There is at least a strong suspicion that stigmatisation of appellants was part of an overall governmental tactic directed against disfavored persons and groups. Visiting opprobrium on persons by officially charging them with crimes while denying them a forum to vindicate their names, undertaken as extrajudicial punishment or to chill their expressions and associations is not a governmental interest that we can accept or consider. (footnotes omitted, italics added.) U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794, 805–806 (1975).

First Amendment rights cannot afford the luxury of hindsight. They should be heard immediately and subjected to rigorous scrutiny.

To this end we suggest that the courts be instructed, through statute or legislative history, as follows:

1. Whenever a witness claims that the subpoena or inquiry violates the First Amendment, the court should hold an evidentiary hearing, including the right to confront government witnesses.

2. A prima facie case of First Amendment abuse is established by demonstrating a basis to believe that the inquiry was initiated or pursued or the witness identified or selected for subpoena in whole or in part (i) on the basis of her/his exercise of First Amendment rights; (ii) for the purpose or with the effect of obtaining information about First Amendment protected associations, activities or beliefs; or (iii) for the purpose or with the effect of otherwise "chilling" such rights.

3. The prima facie case raises a presumption of illegality, shifting the burden to the government to demonstrate by a preponderance of concrete evidence, independent of First Amendment activity, that (i) the predominant basis, purpose or effect of the inquiry or the subpoena is not (i), (ii) or (iii) set forth in paragraph 2 above; (ii) the evidence sought from the witness is necessary to effectively pursue the investigation at that time (i.e. all alternatives have been exhausted); (iii) the investigation or portion thereof affecting the witness is of overriding public importance; and (iv) adequate safeguards against improper use of any First Amendment protected information.

4. Where the witness demonstrates that the purpose or effect of the inquiry or subpoena is to obtain information about or to chill First Amendment protected associations, activities or beliefs, the witness shall be entitled to claim an absolute privilege under the First Amendment. This privilege shall apply to journalists, scholars, broadcasters, lay ministers, etc.

b. Abuse of the grand jury function.—Guaranteeing effective relief against grand jury abuse presents a similar problem to that discussed in respect to constitutional rights. There are a number of grounds occasionally recognized by the courts as abusing the proper judicial function of the grand jury, e.g. collecting evidence after indictment for use at trial ("after-acquired evidence"); collecting evidence unnecessary for indictment but useful at trial; supplementing the investigatory powers of the FBI; discovering the defendant's case; gathering evidence for other agencies of the executive branch; freezing testimony; searching for fugitives; subpoenaing witnesses for questioning by the FBI and/or prosecutors outside the grand jury room. There are other forms of abuse which are not permissible executive or judicial functions: i.e. intelligence-gathering, harassment, and using the grand jury to discredit the witness or defendant in the press. Reform bills H.R. 94 and 3736 codify the after-acquired evidence problem. Lest the omission of other abuses be construed to negate them, all the aforementioned forms should be codified as grounds for quashal in order to confine the grand jury to its constitutional function.

These claims, however, will never prevail unless a realistic standard is applied. The courts presently ask whether the illegal purpose is the "sole or dominant" one. Where allegedly legal and demonstrably illegal purposes coexist, the courts almost invariably accept the legal one as major and characterize the illegal one as "incidental."[14]

We urge Congress to instruct the courts to abandon the sole or dominant purpose standard, and adopt a standard which would authorize quashing a subpoena whenever the government cannot deny that a substantial purpose or effect of the subpoena or questioning is an abuse of the grand jury function. The "primary purpose" standards suggested in bills H.R. 94 § 3330B(d)(d)(A) and H.R. 3736 § 3330A(k)(1) is an improvement but does not go far enough. In addition, where any illegal purpose or effect is shown, Congress should require the court to fashion sameguards against the government's deriving even incidental benefit. The inability to benefit, though difficult to enforce, should have some deterrent effect on the issuance of subpoenas for these purposes.

c. Statutory rights (electronic surveillance).—Though we do not discuss them individually, we strongly favor the statutory provisions, such as venue, reiterative contempt, and jurisdiction contained in the proposed bills.[15]

We also support the provision which would codify that any violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2515 is a defense in any civil or criminal contempt proceeding against the witness where the subpoena and/or request for testimony or production is based on or directly or indirectly derived from such violation.

The right to raise and litigate the claim that electronic surveillance taints the proceeding should not have to await the contempt stage. There are many instances where the claim of electronic surveillance is properly raised on a motion to quash, i.e. when the claim is that identification or selection of the individual for subpoena was based directly or indirectly on electronic surveillance. The prohibition on use embodied in 18 U.S.C. § 2515 is absolute, and applies to compelling the appearance of the witness as well as attempting to exact her/his testimony. If electronic surveillance taints the subpoena, the witness should be entitled to discover that and invalidate the subpoena at the earliest opportunity.

[14] The misuse of two grand juries to acquire evidence for the Ellsberg trial is well described in an article, "The Grand Jury Network," by Frank J. Donner and Eugene Cerruti published in The Nation, Jan. 3, 1972. Hearings, pp. 474, 483. On the impossibility of meeting the sole and dominant purpose standard we refer the Committee to United States v. Doe (Application of Ellsberg), 455 F. 2d 1270 (1972). See also, In re Raymond, infra.

[15] Codification of the procedures and grounds for quashing subpoenas in H.R. 3736 § 3330A and H.R. 94 § 3330B are essential to prevent abuses. We also strongly support those provisions giving the witness a choice of forum as to where to make a quash motion and a stay pending determination. H.R. 3736 § 3330A(1), H.R. 94 § 3330B(1), (2) and (3).

The right to raise and litigate the claim of electronic surveillance is also broader than that guaranteed by § 2515 because it is constitutionally and statutorily founded. Electronic surveillance legal under the statute may violate the Fourth, Fifth and/or Sixth Amendments, e.g. where the surveillance invades matters relating to the legal representation of the witness.[16] The right of the witness, just discussed, to raise all claims of unconstitutionality thus applies to electronic surveillance.

Some of the problems enforcing the ban on use of electronic surveillance before grand juries bear discussion. While electronic surveillance claims are technically entertained by the courts, they are virtually impossible to substantiate because the courts deny meaningful discovery.

If the witness only suspects electronic surveillance (i.e. alleges a "mere claim"), the courts accept a conclusory denial by the government as sufficient. However, as electronic surveillance is conducted secretly, the insistence on more than a "mere claim" before ordering a meaningful search makes the witness' right to discover electronic surveillance dependent on the government's carelessness.

Even where the claim is substantiated, the courts consistently refuse to order the government to make a meaningful search. Just two weeks ago, in connection with an alleged investigation of a bombing conspiracy, the district court did not even require the government to search the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, which conducts electronic surveillance and together with the FBI, conducts such investigations. (In re Nemikin and Cueto, S.D.N.Y. 77 Cr. Misc. M 11-118.) Rarely do the courts require that a search be made of local law enforcement agencies cooperating with federal agencies, although their cooperation may be demonstrated by the witness or simply a matter of common knowledge or sense. It is well documented that the fruits of electronic surveillance are often camouflaged in the information exchanged between investigating agencies and the prosecutor.

One of the greatest loopholes in the scheme affecting every surveillance claim is the FBI's Elsur Index (Electronic Surveillance Index) which is designed to conceal rather than reveal electronic surveillance. It contains only those conversations which the monitoring agents prepared for indexing, and only so much of those as the field offices send to FBI headquarters. There is no retrieval system for the vast majority of conversations where the caller uses only her/his first name, and the government consistently refuses to check the records of surveillance on telephones which the witness alleges s/he frequently uses unless the Fourth Amendment "interest in the premises" test is met. While we recognize that record-keeping and indexing problems transcend the scope of these hearings, they emphasize the necessity of requiring the government to conduct a full search for electronic surveillance, including all federal, state and local agencies and their subdivisions arguably contributing to a particular investigation, and to have the scope and results of the search subject to question in adversarial proceedings (as some courts have been willing to do).

Meaningful discovery not only guards the witness against further violation of rights based on illegal surveillance; it also safeguards the process and the rights of future defendants against the "laundering" of illegally seized information through compulsion of the testimony of grand jury witnesses.

If 18 U.S.C. § 2515 is to be enforced and the government prevented from benefitting from illegally and improperly seized communications, uniform standards must be established for courts dealing with electronic surveillance claims of grand jury witnesses, with respect to both themselves and their counsel.

d. Relationships meriting recognition as confidential (lawyers and others).—Increasingly, grand jury subpoenas are being used against people having recognized confidential relationships. The lawyer-client relationship is particularly threatened. In cases involving political dissidents, attorneys are being subpoenaed as sources of information desired for the purpose of locating, apprehending or [16] See discussion in the section entitled "Ex Parte in Camera," infra, of the government's wrongful denial of overhearing of counsel for the Fort Worth Five and the manner in which the present Attorney General, as Judge of the Fifth Circuit, dealt with it. In re Tierny, 465 F. 2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972).

indicting their clients. For example, a subpoena to a New York City attorney was quashed on the ground that the lawyer was being used as an arm of the FBI to locate his client for the purpose of questioning.[17] An attorney connected with the Wounded Knee Legal Defense-Offense Committee has for over a year fighting a subpoena which would compel her to tell the court whether she instructed her client about a court hearing, information needed to indict her client as a fugitive.[18] Such abuse of the subpoena power should be prohibited, designed as it is to drive lawyers from controversial clients and to drive a wedge of distrust between them. We favor an absolute bar against subpoenaing attorneys to get information about their clients because of the chilling effect on precious Sixth Amendment rights and this essential confidential relationship.

However, if such subpoenas are permitted, it is essential to resolve the attorney-client privilege issue on a motion to quash. If the attorney is forced into the grand jury room, it may adversely affect his/her client's confidence and trust in her/him. The government should inter alia be required to demonstrate the purpose of the subpoena and provide a list of all the questions to be propounded to to the attorney so s/he can demonstrate that some or all are protected by the privilege. Congress should provide that great weight should be given to the protection of the privilege in its broadest sense.

Congress must also address itself to situations where a deep moral and confidential relationship exists, if not yet recognized as legally privileged. The relationship of parent and child is recognized as of fundamental constitutional dimension.[19] Nonetheless, parents have been subpoenaed to grand juries to be interrogated about their children.[20] No parent should be faced with the dilemma of choosing between destroying a relationship of mutual trust with a child, albeit a grown up son or daughter, or being jailed for contempt.

Husbands and wives should also be guaranteed absolute confidentiality. Moreover, as patterns of relationships among adults are undergoing radical changes, privilege should be accorded all relationships which share the intimacy traditionally accorded the marital relationship. As the courts won't provide these guarantees, it is Congress' task to do so.

e. The necessity for compelling testimony.—The integrity of the accusatorial system and the entire democratic process has been deeply undermined by the failure to question the assumption that compulsion of testimony or evidence is a necessary and proper component of the grand jury's powers. History demonstrates that the grand jury never had this power at common law and that those authorities that aquired it, i.e. the High Commission and the Star Chamber, were the most oppressive weapons of state tyranny. The modern grand jury's inquisitional powers, disconnected from its accusatorial function and expanded by the ability to punish a refusal to testify, must be undone.

One means (discussed infra) is elimination of coerced immunity. We also urge that at every juncture where the powers to sustain compulsory process or coerce or punish recalcitrance are exercised, the court be required to determine whether the witness' testimony is necessary to the grand jury's ability to exercise its proper function. If alternative sources of evidence are available, the subpoena should be quashed or stayed until these sources are explored. If the court does not rule enforcement improper on any of the grounds discussed in the preceding sections, and holds this necessity test satisfied, it must then determine whether the significance of the evidence which can reasonably be expected to be obtained by compulsion overrides the interests the witness puts forth.

The right to a hearing

Without the right to a hearing on the claims raised in the motion to quash, the motion is a useless remedy. As a test for when a hearing is appropriate we would urge that the standard applied by the courts in resolving summary judgment motions under Rule 56 is fair, workable and familiar to judges. Thus a witness would be entitled to a hearing whenever a material and contested issue of fact is presented by the motion. Courts could no longer resolve these questions on the basis of untested, conclusory or secret[21] submissions, sworn or unsworn, of the government.

The Burger Court frequently reiterates the claim that grand jury proceedings should not be saddled with mini-trials. Congress must repudiate this position since the efficacy of almost every reform ultimately depends upon meaningful judicial review. If the grand jury is going to continue to be permitted to compel testimony, approve any form of immunity, or authorize accusations for contempt, then substantial constitutional and other rights will be at issue in the grand jury process and mini-trials will be essential to guarantee fundamental fairness. The critical nature of the grand jury stage, both to the witness and to the integrity of governmental process and law enforcement, requires that the same modicum of efficiency must be sacrificed therein, as in every other context where rights must prevail.

COUNSEL FOR THE WITNESS

There is too much at stake for a grand jury witness to be denied the right to counsel. The witness faces the possibility of having his/her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination taken away without consent, being jailed for contempt, prejury or evasive answers, as well as possible indictment. Counsel is essential to enable the witness to challenge the subpoena and thereby minimize the systematic effect of the widespread abuse of the grand jury process. The Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Mandujano, supra illustrates the need for a legislative guarantee of the right of grand jury witnesses to counsel.

Counsel has a pivotal role to play at every stage: raising the witness' rights in court, advising the witness in the appearance before the grand jury, and presenting a witness' claims to the grand jury to ensure that it can fully evaluate the need and impact of the exercise of its coercive or punitive powers * * *[32]

We find outrageous the Justice Department's position that grand jury witnesses should not be informed of their rights because they might exercise them. Witnesses without counsel may incriminate themselves without even realizing that their own words could be used to convict them of a crime. People should not be tricked into jail.

We also find the Department's position that "[t]here is nothing about grand jury proceedings that renders them hostile or threatening" to be disingenuous. Even though represented by counsel and assured by us of their right to leave the grand jury room to consult, our clients are terrified to go into the grand jury room alone, fearing they will be tricked or coerced. Often the appearance before the grand jury creates more anxiety than going to jail. They are intimidated about leaving the room. The prosecutor may ridicule them for leaving or create the impression that to leave without permission will constitute contempt or otherwise prejudice the grand jury against them. For this reason we strongly support the provisions of H.R. 94 § 3330A and H.R. 3736 § 3330A, entitling the witness ot counsel inside the grand jury room.

It is essential, however, that these provisions will not deny counsel and the witness their right to privately consult outside the presence of the jurors. Counsel is a protection but not a guarantee against intimidation. The secrecy and lack of ground rules in the grand jury process is intimidating even to the most experienced lawyer.

Effective representation of counsel in grand jury proceedings must include the right of counsel to address the grand jurors and advise them of his/her client's position and their powers and duties with respect thereto. Participation by the witness' counsel is the baseline guarantee that the grand jury be able to question the prosecution,[33] exercise its powers independently, and respect the rights of both the witness and potential accused.

For this reason we strenuously oppose the provision of § 3330A(c), which absolutely prohibits counsel from "address[ing] the grand jurors or otherwise tak[ing] part in proceedings before the grand jury." Likewise, the sanctions provision of § 3330A(d) must be struck as it is an open invitation to harass and intimidate witness' counsel and to deprive the witness of effective representation of counsel of her/his choice. Courts are already equipped with all the powers necessary to deter and punish exercise conduct by counsel. These powers are too often abused in cases involving politically controversial defendants or attorneys.[34]

[32] See p. 38, infra.

[33] Occasionally in grand jury proceedings, the witness is able to show that the prosecutor has failed to give the jurors full or accurate information. In the Shinnick proceedings, in which the subpoena sought the witness' fingerprints, the prosecutor did not tell the grand jury that he had of the fingerprints in his possession, nor that the witness had previously provided the government with prints, e.g. in connection with military service.

[34] See, e.g. In re Dellinger, 461 F. 2d 389 (7th Cir. 1972); Banks v. Holder, 417 U.S. 187 (1974).

In the often highly charged atmosphere of grand jury proceedings, the potentiality for abuse of these powers is particularly acute. Rather than requiring or even authorizing removal of defense counsel, it would be far more appropriate to authorize sanctions and removal of misbehaving prosecutors.

IMMUNITY

Under the common law, the grand jury could not invade a person's privacy or effects because it had no power to compel someone to take the oath or to punish anyone for not doing so. The State's right to "every man's evidence" was thus severely qualified by the person's absolute right to refuse to give it. The Fifth Amendment, which codifies this right, used to be the ultimate protection of the citizen against grand jury abuse. Today only lip service is paid to the Fifth Amendment in grand jury proceedings. It has been divested of its original character and power as a check on the exercise of compulsory process by the power of the State to force immunity and thereafter punish for contempt.

We urge enactment of the provisions in Sec. 4 of H.R. 3736 requiring the written consent of the witness before transactional immunity may be conferred, as the only course truly consistent with the Fifth Amendment and as the most effective means of constraining grand jury abuse.

On the issue of immunity, the entire matter is in the hands of Congress. Immunity is based on legislation; without it no court can take away Fifth Amendment rights. Since the entire system of immunity emerges from the Congress, it is its responsibility to take a careful look at the impact and workings of the system.

In Ullman v. United States, when the cry for "law and order" was as loud as it is today and when, like today, "national security" had become a slogan in the name of which constitutional liberties were abridged, Justice Frankfurter spoke eloquently and at length on the "spirit in which the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination should be approached."

"It is relevant to define explicity the spirit in which the fifth amendment's privilege against self-incrimination should be approached. This command of the fifth amendment ('nor shall any person * * * be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself * * *') registers an important advance in the development of our liberty—'one of the great landmarks in man's struggle to make himself civilized.' [Citing Griswold, 'The Fifth Amendment Today' (1955), 7.] Time has not shown that protection from the evils against which this safeguard was directed is needless or unwarranted. This constitutional protection must not be interpreted in a hostile or niggardly spirit. Too many, even those who should be better advised, view this privilege as a shelter for wrongdoers. They, too, readily assume that those who invoke it are either guilty of crime or commit perjury in claiming the privilege. Such a view does scant honor to the patriots who sponsored the Bill of Rights as a condition to acceptance of the Constitution by the ratifying States. The Founders of the Nation were not naive or disregardful of the interests of justice. 350 U.S. 422 at 426 (1956)."

A century of erosion of the Fifth Amendment culminated in the Supreme Court's decision sustaining the Nixon Administration's use immunity statute[25] in Kastigar v. United States.[26] Since the Kastigar decision, government attorneys have been literally conferring immunity at will. Federal courts have been rubber stamping government attorneys' decisions to divest witnesses of their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. As the present use immunity statute is being interpreted, the determination of when there is a sufficient public interest to deprive someone of a constitutional right is left entirely in the hands of the Department of Justice. There is no judicial review of this determination. Constitutional rights are too precious to allow the executive branch alone to decide which citizens should be allowed to retain them.

Furthermore, the protection provided by use immunity is limited. A witness testifying under use immunity may provide leads that result in his/her conviction. Our own experience has convinced us that government attorneys are not above perjury in pursuit of disfavored persons. We therefore believe that when a witness is willing to exchange her/his privilege for testimony, transactional and not use immunity should be given. When immunity is used as a carrot and not a stick, it does not violate the Fifth Amendment. To make the exchange both fair and desirable, however, transactional immunity is necessary.

[25] The decisions of the Court, discussed in the Introduction, which hold that the Fifth Amendment applies only to testimonial compulsion and does not protect against the compulsion to produce physical evidence and private records also constitute a major dilution of the accusatorial system of justice.

There is no doubt that the power to force immunity is the sine qua non of the unprecedented grand jury abuse in this decade. The usefulness of coerced immunity in combatting white collar and organized crime, which was its original justification, is hotly disputed. To this debate the Department of Justice, its chief proponent, has failed to provide the data necessary to allow a thorough examination of the way forced immunity has been used; whether it is useful, if so, in what areas; what the alternatives are (i.e. other investigative techniques and the sufficiency of voluntary transactional immunity); and what the cost is to law enforcement of returning to a system of voluntary immunity. They have given us only selective, conclusory, self-serving statistics and professions of need.

It is enormously frustrating to us, trained as constitutional litigators, to be unable to put the government's allegations of need and good faith to the test of discovery and trial, and present our findings to this Committee. Since the courts have accepted the fiction that immunity is not a divestiture of the Fifth Amendment right they do not provide a forum for this test.

We do not believe the marginal efficiency that coerced immunity might contribute to law enforcement could ever justify dismantling the Fifth Amendment. The absence of a compelling and particularized showing of need from the government dictates against authorization by this Congress of any form of coerced immunity.

It is clear from our experience with subpoenas invasive of First Amendment protected activities, that coercion of immunity does not produce useful information to the government. Rather it facilitates the gathering of political intelligence and incarceration of the political resistor. Thus, if coerced transactional immunity were ever to be approved by the Congress, it would have to be limited to enumerated crimes or circumstances where compelling justification and overriding public interest were shown. In this way, Congress would at least reclaim the threshold control over the use of coerced immunity.

Congress would also have to ensure strict judicial review on a case by case basis. Congress must mandate the courts to determine in an adversarial proceeding that the information sought to be compelled is necessary to the investigation alleged and not sought for political reasons; that the investigation is of overriding importance; that the coercion of immunity is the only way to obtain the information sought; and that the information is likely to be provided if immunity is ordered. This kind of scrutiny is the minimally necessary check on an inherently totalitarian power.

Under the above it is essential that notice of intent to apply to the Court for an immunity order be given to the person who stands in danger of losing his/her constitutional right against self-incrimination before the plea of the Fifth is publicly made and at least 14 court days before the immunity hearing. Congress should require that immunity be authorized by a person currently serving as Attorney General and signed no more than two weeks prior to service of the notice. All papers presented to the Attorney General requesting authorization to apply for immunity for a witness, a copy of the signed authorization, and any special instructions or restriction placed thereon by the authorizing party should be attached to the notice to the witness. A list of the questions to be asked of the witness should also be attached, to help protect the witness from having his/her entire personal and political life subject to inquiry.

Any of the above-listed rights could be waived voluntarily and knowingly by the witness in writing. But even grants of voluntary immunity should be reviewed by the court, to ensure that the waiver is freely and intelligently given.

Congress should (1) repeal the use immunity statute, (2) enact a transactional immunity statute providing for voluntary immunity, specify that such immunity must be given before the production of any evidence claimed to be self-incriminating can be compelled, and containing the procedural safeguards suggested above, (3) study for a period the impact of the absence of a non-consensual immunity statute on law enforcement, to see if, as we believe, the benefits to constitutional liberty outweigh the cost, if any, in lost convictions. All of the above would help restore our accusatorial system of criminal justice.

EX PARTE IN CAMERA PROCEEDINGS

It is a fundamental principle in our system of justice that persons not be deprived of significant rights or privileges without an opportunity to rebut the evidence against them. The right to confrontation is explicitly codified for criminal proceedings in the Sixth Amendment. This right is also recognized in civil matters as part of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.

In both civil and criminal proceedings there must be a sanction for withholding adverse information. In the criminal context, the rule is that unless the government discloses potentially relevant evidence, the prosecution must be dismissed.[27] In the civil context, the government may not restrict First Amendment rights unless the person has an opportunity to contest the government's claimed need for restraint, even where "top secret" or other highly sensitive information is involved.[28]

Today, the courts are beginning to recognize that the government may not clear itself of liability for wrongdoing on the basis of secret submissions to the court.[29] The principle inheres also in the sanctions authorized for failure to disclose information by Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Court Procedure.

There is, however, a growing tendency in the federal courts to accept ex parte in camera submissions (the one-sided submissions of the government) in a variety of contexts. This tendency presents a very real threat to the adversarial principle, and the grand jury process has been allowed by the courts to be the worst offender.

It has become routine in grand jury cases for the government to submit ex parte in camera affidavits designed to justify the investigation and the relevance or necessity of the witness' testimony whenever a serious challenge to the grand jury is made. The witness never has an opportunity to rebut the conclusions, facts or inferences contained in these submissions, yet they are the basis on which the witness' challenge to the legality of the grand jury subpoena is rejected, that immunity is directed, and that a person is ultimately cited and jailed for contempt.

For example, Jill Raymond spent 14 months in jail for contempt of a grand jury in Lexington, Kentucky.[30] She challenged her subpoena on the ground that the grand jury was being illegally used to apprehend fugitives rather than to investigate the commission of crimes in the district. The evidence of abuse was substantial: The FBI agent responsible for the investigation has admitted to people that he was sure no one in Lexington knew the identity of the fugutives; the foreman of the grand jury explained the purpose of the investigation was "to find out where these two girls [Lena Paley a/k/a Susan Saxe and May Kelley a/k/a Katherine Powers] are or who they were with"; the Court characterized the investigation as concerning the "whereabouts" of the fugutives; and the United States Attorney insisted on speedy incarceration of the recalcitrant witnesses because time would allow the fugitives to escape the FBI net.

On appeal, the Sixth Circuit took this evidence as a prima facie showing of abuse and remanded for a hearing on whether the sole or dominant purpose of the investigation was to apprehend fugitives. This hearing never took place. The Court accepted at face value the secret submissions of the government alleging that harboring was the primary purpose of the grand jury and the witnesses' counsel was given no opportunity to examine either the agents or the prosecutors on this question. After Ms. Raymond was jailed, the so-called "harboring" investigation halted. A similar pattern of abuse and use of secret submissions was followed in New Haven, Connecticut in connection with the same fugitive search.[31]

In the case of the Fort Worth Five, which this Committee reviewed in 1973 and which the Chairman has indicated inspired these proceedings; the use of ex parte in camera submissions likewise blocked the witnesses, jailed for contempt, from discovering and demonstrating that an electronic overhearing of their counsel invaded their Sixth Amendment rights. CCR attorneys were co-counsel in that case.

[31] In re Grusse and Turgeon, Civ. No. 75–122 (D. Conn.).

While the contempts were on appeal, the government admitted that the electronic overhearing occurred two days before the witnesses were to appear before the grand jury and was "in connection with a separate aspects of the investigation." Attorney General Griffin Bell, then Circuit Justice Bell, wrote the opinion of the Court affirming the contempts.[32] Ignoring the cardinal rule of Alderman, he fused disclosure of the in camera logs. Had disclosure been ordered, we would have timely discovered that the overheard conversation was between co-counsel and another witness whom he represented in connection with the same grand jury proceedings. The lack of disclosure deprived the incarcerated witnesses of the opportunity to demonstrate Sixth Amendment taint to the Court. We learned the contents of the overheard conversation as a result of a disclosure order in connection with a federal prosecution in a New York case in which the same counsel represented the defendant. At that point the witnesses had served ten months in jail. On the basis of this discovery, Justice Douglas ordered them bailed and the grand jury expired shortly thereafter.[33]

Because these affidavits are central to the witness' challenge to the grand jury process and because of the severe consequences to the witness in term of loss of constitutional rights and liberty itself, we urge that the reform legislation contain a provision applying the "disclosure-or-dismiss" rule of Alderman to the grand jury process. The government must choose between attempting to compel or coerce a person's testimony and the necessity of giving up some information about its investigation. Such a rule is not only required by basic principles of due process; it is the only means of guaranteeing that questions as to abuse of the grand jury will really have their day in court, and give the government an incentive to limit is use of compulsory process to those cases where the need for the information is tested by some cost to law enforcement.

A number of lower federal courts have insisted on disclosure. The Ninth Circuit has stated the applicable principle:

"[R]udimentary concepts of fair play mean that the affidavit must be disclosed to Dinsio and her counsel [cities omitted] . . . The grand jury must make a fundamental showing that exemplars have some relevance to the investigation that it is conducting. Dinsio cannot be expected to demonstrate just a cause in a factual vacuum. She cannot be relegated to the status of a 'blind man striking at an invisible foe.' (Chernekoff v. United States, 219 F.2d 721, 724 [9th Cir., 1955]). She is entitled to an uninhibited adversarial hearing in which she can develop her proof that she has just cause to refuse the grand jury's demand . . . Nothing in the remand before us provides any basis upon which we could or would impermissibly comprise the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. Moreover, 'modest breaches of grand jury secrecy may be required when nondisclosure would defeat fundamental constitutional rights, including the right to due process.' United States v. Dinsio, 468 F.2d 1392, 1394 (9th Cir., 1972)."[34]

On the other hand, the major trend in the courts is reflected by the Raymond and Tierney cases. For this reason we feel that Congress must codify a disclosure rule.

RECORDING

We support the provisions in H.R. 94, § 3333 and H.R. §2333OA(i) that all proceedings before federal grand juries be recorded except the deliberative and voting processes of the grand jury. However, the actual vote should be recorded. Such deliberations and voting should be conducted in the presence of no one but grand jurors. If the approval of the grand jury is required for any matter besides the approval or disapproval of an indictment, the same rules should apply. Obviously the witnesses and their counsel must be able to consult without being overheard, and such consultations should not be recorded.

at p. 86, it is stated at p. 103: . . . one of the major factors preventing recordation of grand jury testimony at the present time is the unavailability of court reporters in many areas.

This is a truly extraordinary assertion by the Department, particularly in light of the fact that beginning in the 1550's recordation was a requirement in the English magistrate's and coroner's inquests. IV Wigmore Evidence § 1326 n.1 (3d ed.). Federal district courts are not located in the middle of cornfields. Their very presence creates centers of legal activity, demanding the services of court reporters.

The Department's position against mandatory recordation serves first and foremost to circumvent the requirement of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, that the government produce the grand jury testimony of its witnesses. There is substantial evidence that government attorneys engage in selective recordation of grand jury testimony. The testimony of the court reporter in the Shinnick-Weiner case provides a clear example:

Q. Is everything before the grand stenographically transcribed?

A. Not always, no.

Q. Could you tell me the occasions when it is and when it's not?

A. I believe when the agents report to the grand jury, then I don't—I am not in the room. I'm dismissed for the time they are in there.

Q. Who dismisses you?

A. Whichever Assistant Attorney is in charge.

Q. So that it's the United States Attorney who either requests that you be there or that you not be there? Or dismisses you?

A. Yes.

Q. And that the practice, to your knowledge, is that when an agent—you mean an FBI agent—testifies, then under those circumstances you are dismissed?

A. Sometimes, not always.

Q. But have you ever been dismissed when any witness other than an FBI agent testifies?

A. I don't think so.

The Shinnick case is but one example of what appears to be a daily practice in many federal courts. The Circuit Courts have unanimously refused to require recordation of the testimony of government witnesses. By contrast, the leading authorities on criminal procedure urge mandatory recordation as an essential ingredient of fairness, 8 Moore Federal Practice (Cipes) ¶ 6.02[2] p. 6–23 (1976); 1 Wright Federal Practice and Procedure, § 103 (1969), as does the American Bar Association Project on Standards For Criminal Justice, Standards Relating to the Prosecution Function (Approved Draft 1971) § 3.5(c) p. 87–88. In addition, Moore sees recordation as "controlling overreaching or improper examination of witnesses by the prosecutor," Id. at 6–23. The ABA emphasizes the importance of recording the prosecutor's communications and representations to the jury to prevent his "tak[ing] advantage of his role as ex parte representative of the State . . . to unduly or unfairly influence it" in voting upon charges brought before it. Id. at 88.

Urging adoption of a mandatory recording rule, Judge Oakes of the Second Circuit explains that it also "go[es] to the integrity of the grand jury process" because it makes a future charge of prejury the price of dissembling before the grand jury, and it enables the defendants to challenge the sufficiency of the indictment. See U.S. v. Cramer, 447 F.2d 210, 222 (2d Cir. 1971) cert. denied 404 U.S. 1024.

Complete recordation of the proceedings is also essential to enable the witness to challenge the legality of the grand jury's investigation and subpoena effectively. The practice of selective recordation in the Eastern District of Kentucky prevented Jill Raymond from being able to prove her well-substantiated claim that the grand jury was improperly being used to assist in the apprehension of fugitives. She was unable to prove it because the FBI agent and/or prosecutor's "background" statements to the grand jury were not recorded, although the testimony of non-government witness was.

Civil contempt, which purports to be only a coercive power, is most often used to punish. A system of voluntary transactional immunity[35] would greatly reduce the number of persons who would face confinement under the recalcitrant witness statute.

Proposals to prevent reiterative contempts, whether civil or criminal, are urgently needed (H.R. 94 § 1826, H.R. 3736 § 1826 and H.R. 406 § 1826). CCR attorneys represented a recalcitrant grand jury witness, who, while still in prison, was resubpoenaed to a successor grand jury.[36] After spending fourteen months in jail, Jill Raymond was threatened with being resubpoenaed. This threat appears commonplace. 28 U.S.C. § 1826 in its present form and as interpreted, has built in the possibility of unlimited confinement.

The above proposals as to reiterative contempts very properly apply to both grand jury and court proceedings.

We understand the reform bills to intend to limit the punishment for contempt, whether civil or criminal, to a maximum of six months for refusal to testify in connection with a particular transaction or set of transactions. However, the bills contain two loopholes which we believe to be an oversight in drafting.

The provisions of H.R. 94, H.R. 3736 and H.R. 406 share these problems. The way the bills are presently drafted, they would permit a person to be punished under both 28 U.S.C. § 1826 and 18 U.S.C. § 401 for the same refusal to testify. This is the implication of the use of the term "subsequent" in the sections amending § 1826, H.R. 94, p. 3, L. 18, and adding § 403, p. 5, L. 6. This loophole could be corrected by adding the words "same or" before "subsequent" in each instance.

CCR attorneys are presently of counsel for a defendant who was confined during a trial for refusal to testify and is now under indictment facing trial for the same refusal.[37] Such double punishment is unfair. The bar against Double Jeopardy was intended to prevent double punishment whether the label to "criminal" or "civil." Congress should prevent this abuse of its laws.

Secondly, the bills still permit open-ended punishment for criminal contempt. Unless Congress includes in proposed Section 403 the same limitation on the term of sentence applied to § 1826, the government can simply shift from using the recalcitrant witness statute to § 901 and circumvent this critical protection of the reform bills.[38]

We support a one-month limitation on contempt sentences for recalcitrant witnesses whether the court proceeds under 28 U.S.C. § 1826 or 18 U.S.C. § 401. Our experience has been that it is the threat of any incarceration rather than its length that coerces a witness to testify. We believe that a study would show that most witnesses comply shortly after incarceration or not at all.

Should the six-month limit on sentence proposed in the reform bills be adopted, we believe there should be no confinement when a witness has made a showing that s/he won't be coerced. A substantial showing was made in the case of Jay Weiner,[39] that he could not be coerced into testifying because of firm moral principles against doing so, yet he has been confined since November, 1976.

The courts should also be mandated to periodically reconsider whether continued confinement is punitive rather than coercive. It is important in § 1826 that the witness is entitled to such review but the courts rarely grant release. The most noteworthy exception is In re Grumbles, U.S.D.C., N.J., Crim. No. 722-71.[40] Patricia and Donald Grumbles were released after fourteen months imprisonment because the court found their sentence had become punitive.

We support grand jury participation in deciding if contempt should be sought. H.R. 3736(a)(1). (See discussion, infra, "Voting by the Grand Jury.")

Fourteen days notice of a contempt hearing should be the minimum required, unless the witness consents to a shorter period. It is difficult to show cause why a witness should not be held in contempt. Unlike criminal cases, the presumption is really guilt, not innocence. In preparation for a contempt hearing, witnesses often have to be interviewed and subpoenaed, affidavits prepared, and evidence gathered and examined. Undue haste deprives a witness of the barest opportunity to show cause.

[38] The Warren Court rule enunciated in Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966) that the government should use coercive contempt before punitive was cast in question last term in United States v. Wilson, — U.S. —, 95 S. Ct. 1802, 1807 n. 9, and 1809, n. 2. (Blackman, J. concurring) (1975).

[39] Jay Weiner was incarcerated with Philip Shinnick but is not a public figure and was not released when Dr. Shinnick was. After an article about Dr. Shinnick entitled "A Modern Inquisition" by Tom Wicker appeared in the New York Times on Dec. 31, 1976, the government attorneys moved for his release and he was set free without any involvement of the grand jury.

[40] The Third Circuit denied the government's motion for summary reversal. In re Grumbles, No. 73-1184, 3d Cir., 1973.

Bail or release during appeal should be routine. The formulation that bail or release should be granted unless the appeal is "patently frivolous," H.R. 3736 § 1826(c) and H.R. 406 § 1826(c) is the best proposed.

The change proposed by H.R. 94 § 1826(c) requiring bail or release "unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay" is a vast improvement over the "no bail unless" formulation of the present statute, but we fear it will be interpreted to deny release.[41]

As an alternative to the present formulations we urge that there should be an absolute right to bail pending appeal. Expedited treatment of these appeals which the bills require, will take care of the problem of frivolous appeals as they can be quickly denied by the Circuit.

We agree that appeal from contempts should be dealt with expeditiously by appellate courts and that no contemnor should under any circumstances remain incarcerated for more than thirty days while their appeal is pending.

The 30-day time period for the circuit to decide, however, should not remain mandatory. This requirement is confusing to the courts. The various circuits have differed on their interpretation of the present 30-day rule. See In re Milickian, 20 Crim. L. Rep. 2382 (8th Cir., 1977), which analyzes the widely disparate results reached by different circuits in interpreting the 30-day provision. It also prevents the courts observing the rule from giving full consideration to the issues presented, and encourages unexplained affirmances.

We agree that these appeals should be dealt with expeditiously. If anyone is to be incarcerated pending appeal, they should be entitled to release after 30 days until resolution of the appeal. No appeal requiring more than 30 days to decide can be considered frivolous. Jill Raymond sat in jail for five months waiting for the Sixth Court's decision.

We urge reforms to make confinement less onerous. The "Fort Worth Five" case, where confinement in Texas made visits from families an impossibility, was especially oppressive. Both the "Fort Worth Five" (during a large part of their incarceration in Texas) and the VVAW grand jury witnesses confined in a county jail in Florida got no fresh air for weeks on end. Such conditions are intolerable.

We have discussed supra, the issues of counsel for grand jury witnesses (See "Counsel") and the necessity to guarantee the right to raise constitutional and statutory violations in defense to contempt, although we believe these rights should also be available at the motion to quash stage. (See "Motion to Quash.")

SAFEGUARDING THE ACCUSATORIAL FUNCTION

The grand jury cannot reclaim its historical role as a "people's panel" exercising independent accusatory powers without significant institutional and legal changes. These are necessary to ensure that it exercises its powers in the name of the community in a truly democratic fashion.

The need for independent counsel to the grand jury

It is commonly accepted that the modern grand jury acts as the prosecutor's rubber stamp. Characterizing the grand jury as "essentially controlled by the United States Attorney and . . . his prosecutorial tool," one court recently adopted the following description of the process:

One experienced practitioner has noted:

"Indeed, generally, it is the prosecutor and not the grand jury that provides the only potential protection that exists between a possible accused and the bringing of criminal charges. . . .

"In theory, the grand jury could function without the prosecutor's direction and control. . . . However, as a practical matter, in the federal context, it is the prosecutor who provides the initiative and impetus needed for an effective grand jury investigation. He controls the commencement, pace, direction and scope of the investigation and serves the grand jury in the dual capacity of legal advisor and chief full-time investigator. He decides what witnesses, [41] In the VVAW grand jury case, the government claimed the appeal was frivolous and taken for delay. The Fifth Circuit refused bail even though it later reversed the contempts. Beverly v. United States, 468 F. 2d 732 (5th Cir. 1972).

evidence and information must be subpoenaed. He drafts the subpoenas and sets the date for each grand jury meeting. He conducts screening interviews with witnesses before they testify. . . . He places witnesses before the grand jury and normally conducts the initial examination. He will secure investigative support. . . . He will represent the grand jury in any legal proceedings ancillary to the investigation—for example, motions to quash subpoenas and contempt proceedings. He will obtain immunity grants and . . . will ultimately draft the indictment or information, if one is needed. Panel and Discussion . . . The Ethical, Moral and Legal Obligations of the Prosecutor in a Grand Jury Investigation, 67 F.R.D. 536, 539–39 (D.C. Cir. Judicial Conf. 1975) (remarks of S. Glanzer).[42]"

Important insights into prosecutorial domination of the grand jury were recently provided by an angry Atlanta grand jury. The Atlanta Journal reported:

"In an apparently unprecedented move, a federal grand jury here has sent U.S. District Court Judge Charles A. Moye a private memorandum harshly criticizing the administration of the grand jury system and asserting—among other things—that the jurors sometimes felt they were 'simply there to be used at the whim' of the U.S. Attorney's office.

"The jurors began their 11-page memorandum with a complaint that they had been empaneled in July 1975 to consider evidence in an investigation of two federal housing agencies and—despite the passage of 15 months—had yet to hear any testimony on the case.

"At another point in the memorandum, the jurors said that over a three-month period they had taken testimony in connection with a probe of alleged banking irregularities here, only to see their involvement in the investigation unexpectedly halted.

" 'Suddenly,' the memo states, 'we not only are not hearing evidence presented on this investigation, we cannot even learn what has happened to the investigation; what its status is, etc.' (Dec. 3, 1976).

" 'There have been times when the members of the Pitzer [the foreman] grand jury have felt that they were simply there to be used at the whim or desire of whatever attorney in the U.S. Attorney's office needed a 'warm-bodied grand jury' to hear testimony,' they complained in the memo.

"One day, Pitzer recalled, an assistant U.S. attorney annoyed the jurors by trying to take full control of questioning a witness. If the jurors had any questions to ask, the attorney reportedly told them, they could ask them only through him.

"The attorney had been handling the Atlanta grand jury as he was accustomed to handling grand juries in New York, explained his boss, chief U.S. Atty. John Stokes (Dec. 5, 1976)."

The prosecutor's usurpation of the grand jury's power and function precludes the grand jury from effectively exercising its watchdog function. The prosecutor must be divested of the anomalous function of legal adviser to the grand jury. So blatant a conflict of interest is not tolerated in any other judicial context, let alone one which so pervasively threatens basic constitutional rights.

Not only must the prosecutor be returned to the common law status as litigant before the grand jury, but the grand jury must be equipped with the resources necessary to enable it to act independently on a consistent basis. It is universally recognized that, given the increasing complexity of the law, a modern grand jury, particularly one concerned with white collar and organized crime, cannot function without legal assistance. It is also clear that the grand jury needs professional assistance to fully exercise its duty to question the prosecutor's evidence and representations.

Accordingly, we urge that a baseline step towards reestablishing the independence of the grand jury is for Congress to require the appointment of independent counsel for the grand jury. Such counsel would point out legal issues, help analyze testimony, ferret out exculpatory information not presented by the prosecution, assist the grand jury in exploring areas not touched by the prosecution, and in all other respects contribute to the functioning of the grand jury as an independent body consistent with its historic role.

[42] Quoted in Robert Hawthorne, Inv. v. Director of Internal Revenue, 406 Supp. 1098, 1110, n. 37 (E.D.P. 1976).

Because of the need for an independent advisor on a continuing basis, we do not think that the appointment of grand jury counsel should be limited to those situations where the grand jury is embarked on an independent inquiry. (See H.R. 94 § 3330(b) and H.R. 3736 § 3330(a)(3)).

The institutionalization of grand jury counsel does not eliminate the need for appointment of special counsel to assist the grand jury in independent investigations. But we believe that history and sound public policy dictate that the power to conduct an independent inquiry must be confined to situations in which official misconduct is at issue.

Charge to grand jury

Grand jury reform cannot be effective unless grand jurors understand the importance of their independent role and function as guardians of constitutional rights of both targets and witnesses. We agree with the idea embodied in H.R. 94 § 3329 and H.R. 3736 § 3329 that Congress should mandate the matters on which grand juries must be instructed.

The sanctions contained in H.R. 3736 § 3329 for failure to instruct are necessary. We agree with the provision in both bills requiring district courts to guarantee that grand jurors understand the instructions given them. We feel that the charge should be given by the district court orally and that each grand jury should be given copies thereof. However, neither of the proposed bills charges in the manner we believe required to expedite a return of the grand jury to its independent institutional role, as they emphasize inquisitorial rather than accusatorial duties.

Just as petit juries are carefully instructed by the courts concerning their responsibilities, district courts should be required to instruct grand juries on their historical and constitutional function as a shield. This includes two prime duties:

First, it must determine whether or not the prosecutor has presented sufficient evidence upon which to found an indictment.

Secondly, even when the government has presented legally sufficient evidence on which to base an indictment it must act as the conscience of the community to determine whether one should be issued in a particular case. The grand jury's power of nullification was an integral part of their historic role. Instructing grand jurors that they have this power is essential to their independence and fulfillment of their constitutional function.

Rights of targets and witnesses

The grand jury cannot effectively exercise its accusatorial function unless certain rights, historically inherent in the grand jury process, are restored to the target or potential accused.

a. The right to appear before the grand jury.—Unlike many state jurisdictions, the target or potential accused has no right to appear before a federal grand jury. Yet the grand jury process exists to prevent a person from suffering the ignominy, trauma and disruption inevitably caused by indictment and subsequent trial, even if the defendant is ultimately acquitted. To deny the accused the right to possibly avert indictment by facing the grand jury, presenting her/his side of the story, answering questions, and presenting or suggesting exculpatory evidence that should be subpoenaed by the grand jury undermines its essential function.

At common law, the potential accused had this right as a matter of course. Denial of this right is explicable only as a concomitant of the growth of prosecutorial control over the grand jury. The return of this right fosters the grand jury's independence.

The right to communicate one's position to grand jurors outside the grand jury room so that they do not decide "in a vacuum" was recognized by the Supreme Court in the early 60's.[43] To be meaning, this right should be guaranteed inside the grand jury room as well.

We support the provisions of H.R. 94 § 3329(b) and 3736 § 3329(A)(a) requiring the United States Attorney to notify the target of the proceedings and of her/his right to request an opportunity to appear before the grand jury. But we do not believe that the decision whether or not to hear the target should be left to the grand jury. An absolute right to appear before the grand jury is a safeguard against an overreaching prosecutor. Moreover, to make it meaningful, the grand jury should either reveal to the accused the inculpating evidence or at least present a fair summary of it. Failure to allow a target to appear before the grand jury should be grounds for dismissing the indictment.

b. The right to have exculpatory evidence presented to the grand jury.—It is irreconcilable with the grand jury's screening function not to insist that the prosecutor present to the grand jury exculpatory information either in his possession or reasonably available in the exercise of due diligence.

Beginning with Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 and continuing up to the recent case of United States v. Agurs, 96 S.Ct. 2392, it has been recognized that due process of law prohibits a prosecutor from basing a prosecution on perjured testimony and requires that s/he notify a defendant of exculpatory evidence reasonably in the government's possession.

But generally speaking, courts refuse to sanction prosecutors who fail to provide a grand jury evidence which they know may tend to exculpate the defendant.

Prosecutors should have a statutory duty to present to the grand jury all the evidence that is or may be exculpatory. Otherwise abuses like those in connection with the indictment pending against former Representative Henry Helstoski will go unchecked. For two years, nine separate grand juries heard evidence, some of which was exculpatory. Though the United States Attorney promised the indicting grand jury that they would hear all the evidence presented to the other eight panels, he gave them only part of the evidence, omitting exculpatory portions. The court criticized the prosecutor's conduct as "wrong" and as "magnifying the significance of the omission of certain exonerating evidence from the presentation," but declined to quash the indictment.

Very occasionally, an indictment is dismissed because of the prosecutor's failure to present exculpatory evidence to the grand jury. For example, in dismissing the indictment in United States v. DeMarco, 401 F. Supp. 505, 514 (C.D. Calif. 1975), the Court wrote:

"Despite the defendant's colorable claim that the [illegible] was the product of improper motives and the defendant's colorable claim that the charge in question had been the subject of improper threats, the prosecutor did not disclose to the grand jury that the charge could be attacked as an unjustifiable exercise of the charging power. The grand jury was entitled to be appraised of that information so that it could make an independent judgment as to whether it was appropriate to return an indictment under the circumstances."

Also in United States v. Basurto, 497 F. 2d 781 (9th Cir. 1974) a conviction was reversed because the prosecutor found out after indictment that the government's principle witness had committed perjury before the grand jury.

Cases giving relief to indicted defendants are rare, however, because it is almost impossible to meet the standard set by the courts. The most recent example of this is the Helstoski case. Refusing to dismiss the indictment, even though the prosecutor had failed to present clearly exculpatory material to the grand jury, the court, quoting quite out of context from Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956) said: "An indictment returned by a legally constituted and unbiased grand jury . . . if valid on its face is enough to call for trial of the charge on the merits.

In principle the distinction between the obligation of a prosecutor at the grand jury stage and the obligation at the trial stage cannot be justified. Withholding exculpatory evidence at the grand jury stage of a proceeding stultifies that body and denies it the opportunity to exercise its independent judgment in determining whether an accused should be prosecuted.

We therefore support the provisions of H.R. 94, § 3329(c) and H.R. 3736 § 3329A(d) which codify the prosecutor's duty to advise the grand jury of exculpatory evidence. We think, however, that to have teeth, the law should insist on the presentation of such evidence and make the failure to do so grounds for dismissal of the indictment.

Other rights must be guaranteed to witnesses and targets to safeguard against prosecutorial tactics which unfairly manipulate the power to indict.

c. The right not to have one's plea of the fifth amendment presented to the grand jury.—We also strongly support the provision contained in H.R. 94 § 3329(d) and H.R. 3736 § 3330(c) which precludes the prosecutor from bringing before the grand jury any witness who has given notice of her/his intention to plead the Fifth Amendment, or from informing the grand jury that the Fifth was invoked by one witness outside the presence of the grand jury.

The urgent need for such restraints is demonstrated in the record of a recent case where for some 20 pages of transcript, in a manner reminiscent of the McCarthy period, a witness was compelled to plead the Fifth Amendment repeatedly. This serves only to prejudice the witness and to influence the grand jury toward indictment, regardless of whether indictment is supported by the evidence or appropriate. The non-target witness is also threatened by this process as it influences the jury to charge the witness with contempt, although we believe this contempt power should be returned to the grand jury.

Again, the violation of this simple prohibition should be a ground for dismissal of the indictment or quashal of the subpoena.

d. The prohibition on reiterative investigation.—The provisions of H.R. 94 § 3329(e) and 3330B(e)(3) and H.R. 3736, § 3329A(f), and 3330A(h) requiring judicial approval for the use of multiple grand juries to obtain an indictment is also crucial to the reemergence of the grand jury as a shield to the accused. As recognized in the recent decision in the Helstoski case, the use of multiple grand juries "holds forth a high potential for prosecutorial abuse." (Slip Opinion p. 14.)

The standard for permitting additional consideration of the evidence should be a strict one: the newly discovered evidence should be significant and previously undiscoverable by due diligence. The prosecutor should be required to advise the grand jury of the action of its predecessor(s).

The sanction for failure to seek judicial approval should be dismissal of the indictment or quashal of the subpoena.

e. Safeguards against a set up for perjury.—It has become the practice of federal prosecutors in many jurisdictions to "set up" perjury prosecutions in a manner which seriously prejudices the rights of witnesses and defendants and effectively corrupts the institution of the grand jury.

The scenario adopted by a prosecutor intent on indicting a "target" is to call the person before a grand jury on several occasions and question him/her about a wide range of matters. The target, loath to plead the Fifth Amendment, answers the questions. The ultimate indicment is then handed down with a number of perjury counts based on inconsistencies in that testimony. Perjury before a grand jury is easy to establish these days because of a 1970 statute enacted at the request of the Department of Justice eliminating the "two witness" rule for perjury before such a body. The U.S. Attorney always presses the court not to sever the perjury counts from the substantive counts—and most courts go along in the interest of judicial economy.

The result is an open invitation to trial juries to compromise their verdicts and find guilt on perjury even if the substantive offense is not established.

The same scenario may be used against the witness as to whom there is insufficient evidence to obtain indictment for the substantive crime under investigation.

The bills before this Committee contain the essential protective ingredients: (1) The right, in advance of the witness' appearance before the grand jury, to be supplied with all prior statements in the government's possession (H.R. 94, § 3334(a) and H.R. 3736, § 330A(j)); (2) the right to examine a copy of transcript of the witness' testimony in the grand jury (H.R. § 3334(b) and H.R. 3736, § 3330A(i)(2)); and (3) the right to reappear before the grand jury to explain any inconsistencies (H.R. 3330A(i)(2)). We strongly urge adoption of these safeguards and making their disregard grounds for quashal of the subpoena or an absolute defense to a perjury indictment or contempt.

f. Voting by the grand jury.—We support the provisions of H.R. 3736 which require an affirmative vote by the grand jury: (1) before a witness is subpoenaed to testify or produce, H.R. 3736 § 3330A(a); (2) before the government submits an application for immunity to the court, H.R. 3736 § 2514(a)(1); and (3) before the attorney for the government applies for an order for a witness to show cause why s/he should not be held in contempt. As the immunity hearing could lead to taking a constitutional right away from the witness and a contempt hearing could lead to incarceration, we feel that applications relative to immunity and contempt should be filed only after a unanimous affirmative vote by the grand jury.

The potential contemnor faces the same jeopardy as a potential defendant. The principles discussed as to why an indictment should only be based on a unanimous vote of the grand jury (Statement p. 37) are applicable to requiring a witness to show cause at a contempt hearing. A charge of contempt before a grand jury is as a factual matter almost tantamount to conviction. Only if a unanimous vote of the grand jurors is required can the grand jury's nullification function come into play.

The grand jury should be allowed to vote on these three matters because they all involve whether or not the grand jury can obtain certain evidence. Increased grand jury involvement in that process would help eliminate the prosecutorial subterfuge of using the grand jury process and powers to obtain evidence for other purposes and help restrict application to the actual needs of the grand jury.

Before the grand jury votes on applications for immunity and contempt, it should hear arguments from the witness and/or witnesses' counsel. See discussion Statement, p. 19, re the role of witness' counsel in the grand jury room.

g. Preliminary examination.—The provision in H.R. 94 § 3368 for a post-indictment preliminary examination is sorely needed. The availability of such hearings should not depend on whether or not an indictment has been issued.[44] They would serve a triple function. First, to make sure that the grand jury has properly exercised its screening function and the government has sufficient evidence that the defendant committed the offense charged to require him/her to stand trial; second, to permit the defendant to examine government witnesses and prepare a defense; and third, to allow the defendant to present evidence on his/her own behalf. Many of the protections of the Sixth Amendment will be rendered more meaningful by such preliminary hearings including "to be informed of the nature and causes of the accusation," "to be confronted with the witnesses against him," "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor" and "to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." If impeaching witnesses are available, the defendant will have adequate time to assure their appearance at trial. Totally exculpatory material may be presented that could put an end to the whole matter.

Size and representativeness

The right to indictment by a grand jury reflecting a fair cross-section of the community is firmly embedded in our constitutional law. The Federal Jury Selection and Service Act attempts to implement strict standards of representatives.[45]

Proposals to reduce the size of the grand jury threaten this constitutional right and the grand jury's ability to act in the name of the community. A grand jury of 23 is necessary to insure that there will be an adequate representation of minority groups. As a disproportionate number of minority persons are targets of criminal investigation, representation is crucial to equal and fair justice.

You may ask why the grand jury must be larger than the petit jury for it to be representative and fair. The answer lies in basic differences between the two. Grand jurors are screened only for eligibility and availability. There is no opportunity—as there was under the common law—for the witness or the accused to screen or voir dire the grand jury for prejudice. By contrast, the petit jury is voir dired and selected from a venire of 40 in the usual case or of over 100 in the more controversial case. The voir dire process is designed to have a mitigating impact on the jury prejudice, as is the fact that it witnesses the full adversarial process of the criminal trial. In general, the grand jury is likely to see only the prosecutor's case, even under the reforms envisaged.

Shrinking the present size of the grand jury virtually guarantees against minority voices being heard. Relevant sociological studies on small group interactions demonstrate that a member of a minority group will be silenced or confused by the majority even where the minority person is objectively correct in his/her perception. Conversely, it has been shown that the minority voice begins to make itself felt when a minority group of two, three or more is able to form. With a grand jury of twelve, most minority populations will lose the opportunity to be heard either because they are too small, or because discrimination in the composition system disproportionately underrepresents them in the pool.[46] A larger size is necessary to give voice to cross-sectional differences which may well be decisive on the issue of indictment or no bill.

[44] Rule 5.1(a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides for a preliminary hearing only in those cases where a complaint has been filed. Thus, in federal crimes which require indictments, such hearings are presently available only where the indictment is preceded by a complaint. The right to a hearing is lost by indictment. Prosecutors can manipulate the timing of indictments to deprive defendants of this important right.

For the same reasons, we strongly support the reform legislation which would require a unanimous vote of the grand jurors to indict. The lesser probable cause standard applied by a grand jury, compared with the reasonable doubt standard at rial, also argues for unanimity. If the government is unable to convince a grand jury, unscreened for prejudice, in a non-adversary proceeding, that someone should be indicted, then there can be no likelihood of a conviction. Thus unanimity would both save prosecutorial resources and make possible a grand jury's function as a shield to the accused.

GRAND JURY SECRECY AND LEAKS BY PROSECUTORS

Grand jury secrecy is an important protection for the accused. But, like the grand jury as a whole, this protective device is manipulated by prosecutors against the potential defendant. After an exhaustive study of the problem, the New York State Commission on Investigations identified the prosecutor as the chief culprit:

Although most prosecutors disagreed, the testimony adduced at the hearings supports the conclusion that a substantial percentage of the improper disclosure emanates from prosecutors' offices.[47] Report on Improper Disclosures of Grand Jury Proceedings, 3/24/76, pp. 4–5.

In the many federal grand juries with which CCR has been involved, we have seen evidence of prosecutorial leaks that could only have come from either the Department of Justice or the local United States Attorney's office.

The most recent example of this was in connection with the Phillip Kent Shinnick/Jay Weiner case in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. In a contempt proceeding, the court refused to allow the defendants to put the United States Attorney, S. John Cottone, on the stand to examine him regarding information contained in newspaper articles quoting him on the progress of the grand jury investigations (i.e., when indictments would be forthcoming, and what evidence was available).

In connection with the Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW) grand jury in Tallahassee, Florida, the government attorneys refused to disclose the subject matter of the investigations to the witnesses' attorney. However, an article in the Atlanta Constitution on July 12, 1972, based on a Justice Department source, revealed that V.V.A.W. members were being investigated in connection with a bomb plot.

The damage done to individuals and groups who find themselves accused of wrongdoing through grand jury leaks is self-evident. Steps must be taken to stop those responsible for law enforcement from abusing the information and power in their hands.

New remedies must be designed to deter leaks of grand jury information and to remedy the harm done. We do not object to the provisions in H.R. 94, 18 U.S.C. § 1512, imposing criminal penalties on grand jurors and government officials for violations of grand jury secrecy, but we feel that there is little likelihood of prosecution of government attorneys or agents by other government attorneys. Although leaks are also punishable by contempt, we know of no instance of a government attorney ordered to show cause as to why he should not be held in contempt because of such leaks to the press.

The remedy must not depend on the state or local criminal justice machinery. The reason for this is obvious. History has shown that prosecutors don't prosecute themselves or their colleagues.

Nor does the remedy lie with the bar associations. As the Association of the Bar of the City of New York concluded after extensive study:

[47] The Report on Improper Disclosures of Grand Jury Proceedings, pp. 4–5 (Mar. 24, 1976).

"Grievance committees of state or local bar associations have been overwhelmingly unsympathetic to disciplinary actions against public prosecutors." [43]

The only effective deterrent is one which can be invoked by the aggrieved party. We recommend legislation to provide a cause of action to persons about whom grand jury information has been leaked. The action should be against the prosecutor or law enforcement official who leaked the information.

In 1968, Congress made such a civil damage remedy available for victims of illegal electronic surveillance by passing Section 2520 of Title 18 of the United States Code. Today, victims of illegal electronic surveillance are vigorously suing the wrongdoers, who were never prosecuted, although such electronic surveillance has long been a crime.

Similar federal legislation on illegal grand jury leaks could provide for liquidated or actual damages, whichever is higher, as well as for punitive damages, attorneys' fees, and costs to a successful litigant. The statute should negate any claims of governmental or prosecutorial immunity or privilege.

Just as witnesses, their counsel, and media representatives are exempt from criminal sanction under H.R. 94, they should not be subject to civil suit. Nor should they be forced to testify in connection with any such proceeding although their voluntary testimony is, of course, permissible.

Ordinarily, government attorneys represent government officials who are sued. In grand jury leak damage suits, such representation should be contingent on execution of an affidavit by the alleged wrongdoer affirmatively denying responsibility for grand jury leak(s) and setting forth any information she/he has as to who was responsible for said leaks. Affidavits, if later proved false, could result in perjury penalties as well as punitive damages.

The passage of such legislation will serve as a deterrent to prosecutors and others who are charged with keeping grand jury information secret, but leak it with impunity. The character assassination caused by grand jury leaks must be stopped. A civil remedy would help stop them.

Additionally, if a no-bill is voted by a grand jury or the investigation is dropped, and there has been previous improper release of information regarding an investigation, the person(s) who was the target of the investigation should be notified, and given the option to request the prosecutor's office to issue a statement announcing the no-bill or dropping of the investigation. Victims of improper leaks should be able to use the grand jury's decision in whatever additional way they think will help make them whole.

In discussing grand jury secrecy, it is necessary to distinguish between secrecy necessary to avoid character assassination, and unwarranted secrecy inconsistent with an open society. The recently publicized crimes committed by those in high office, who hid behind claims of privilege, should make us take a fresh look at grand jury secrecy. How much secrecy is necessary? In his dissenting opinion in Pittsburg Plate Glass Co. v. United States, 360 U.S. 395 at 405, Justice Brennan summarized the justifications for grand jury secrecy:

(1) To prevent the accused from escaping before he is indicted and arrested or from tampering with the witnesses against him. (2) To prevent disclosure of derogatory information presented to the grand jury against an accused who has not been indicted. (3) To encourage complainants and witnesses to come before the grand jury and speak freely without fear that testimony will be made public thereby subjecting them to possible discomfort or retaliation. (4) To encourage the grand jurors to engage in uninhibited investigation and deliberation by barring disclosure of their votes and comments during the proceedings.

When considering whether or not to disclose information about a grand jury investigation in a particular situation, many of the above reasons for secrecy may not be applicable. We refer the Committee to an excellent discussion on this issue by United States District Judge Ferguson in In re Russo, 53 F.R.D. 564 (1971). The whole issue of grand jury secrecy requires serious rethinking.

We strenuously support the continuation of the policy that grand jury witnesses and their attorneys not be bound by grand jury secrecy.

Grand jury secrecy should not be used to prevent courts from exercising their supervisory power over grand juries. It is impossible to determine whether or not a grand jury is being improperly used or whether the constitutional and other rights of witnesses are being violated without an adversary hearing with disclosure of all evidence on which each side relies. A technique adopted by the Second Circuit in In re Vericker, 446 F.2d 244, n.2 (1971), shows how targets can be protected from unfair publicity. Following the example set by our brief in that case, the Second Circuit edited out the names of the persons inquired about.

It is important for the public to be aware of grand jury abuse, so that necessary reforms can be brought about. Secrecy should not be allowed to hide misuse of the grand jury process or violations of the right of witnesses.

We strongly support a requirement that the entire record of the grand jury proceedings be made available to the defendant shortly after formal accusation. After indictment, the considerations justifying secrecy no longer obtain. Full disclosure is necessary to permit the defendant an effective challenge to the indictment. It is also necessary to prevent the government from manipulating the testimony before the grand jury to reduce the possibilities of impeachment of its witnesses (e.g. the practice of putting one investigating or undercover agent before the grand jury and saving his/her partner for trial). Giving defense counsel the right to examine the transcript is the only means of assuring that all testimony or evidence material to the defense will come to light.

CONCLUSION

As counsel to victims of grand jury abuse, we cannot overstate the critical role Congress and only Congress can play at this juncture to curtail this growing menace to our fundamental liberties. Neither the executive nor the courts will do so.

The protection of constitutionally cherished rights and values falls to Congress in times like these when conservative Supreme Court majorities leave them in jeopardy. Just as Congress stepped in after the Court's decision in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928) to curtail the investigatory powers of the state by prohibiting wiretapping, so must this body today assume the duty to safeguard the rights of the people which the grand jury was designed to protect.

TESTIMONY OF DORIS PETERSON, CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, ACCOMPANIED BY RHONDA COPELON, CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Ms. PETERSON. I am a staff attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, and with me today is Rhonda Copelon who is another staff attorney who will help me in responding to questions.

The center has been involved for many years in representing victims of grand jury abuse. I have personally been involved in either representing grand jury witnesses or consulting with other attorneys, in over 100 cases, including the Fort Worth Five, the VVAW grand jury, the Boston Pentagon papers grand jury, and the Phillip Shinnick case. In all of those cases I was personal counsel for the witnesses.

We get many calls each week at the Center for Constitutional Rights from attorneys around the country with problems about grand juries. These calls come from as far away as Puerto Rico, Alaska, and California. The center views grand jury abuse as one of the gravest threats to our democratic system, and we welcome this committee's efforts to find a solution to this problem.

The previous administration vastly expanded the dimensions and repressive impact of grand juries. The FBI and prosecutors have begun massive borrowing of grand jury subpena power and are responsible for its abuse, so that we cannot look to the Executive for reform. The Supreme Court, through a series of decisions, has fostered grand jury abuse. It clearly cannot be counted upon to stop these abuses.

Therefore, the job is up to Congress. Congress must come forward to protect the constitutional rights of witnesses. The committee has before it many wonderful proposals in the bills, and we have not been able to respond to all of those proposals, but our lack of response does not mean that we are not very impressed with the job that you have done in this matter. We would especially like to compliment the chairman of the committee.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you for that. And again I stress that the record will remain open so that you can respond to anything that you want to subsequent to the hearing.

Ms. PETERSON. Thank you very much. We feel that the prime task is to restore the grand jury to its constitutional function. Professor Scott will discuss the historical and constitutional role of the grand jury and how it should properly function.

We have been moving in this country from an accusatorial system of justice, which is our basic system of justice, to an inquisitorial one. This is most manifest in the area of grand jury abuse. Two things are necessary to help restore the accusatorial system.

One is the adoption of voluntary immunity. We think that the step proposing the return to transactional immunity is a good one, but we do not support coercive immunity of any kind.

Second, we believe that it is necessary to restore the independence of the grand jury. This can be done by freeing the grand jury from the control of the prosecutor. As long as prosecutors control the grand jury, there is a built-in conflict of interest, and the grand jury cannot be independent. That is why we propose special counsel to the grand jury.

The special counsel we suggest is different from the special prosecutor proposed in the bills. The special counsel's only function would be as an adviser to the grand jury. He would not prosecute cases after indictment. He would just help the grand jury to review the evidence to fulfill its constitutional role which Professor Scott will discuss.

In order to protect the rights of witnesses, we feel that it is of prime importance that counsel for the witness be allowed in the grand jury room. We oppose that proposal for the removal of counsel for the witness, because we think that that invites abuse and will be used to harass grand jury witnesses. There are other ways of controlling the behavior of counsel. Removal of witness counsel would also be very much under the control of the prosecutor who would suggest to the court that counsel for the witnesses be removed. Yet the prosecutors have been among the prime abusers of the grand jury process and I know of no example where a prosecutor has been removed from a particular grand jury case, no matter what excesses he or she engaged in.

We also feel that the grand jury should be permitted to hear counsel for the witness if they want to. There may be occasions on which the grand jury would feel that the witness' counsel could make a valuable contribution, and we don't think that the bill should contain a bar against the witness' counsel ever speaking, because that takes away from the grand jury's independence to determine what they want to hear.

Another basic right for witnesses that should be guaranteed is that no witness should either be deprived of the fifth amendment right against self-incrimination or subject to punishment through contempt on the basis of ex parte submissions which the witness has no opportunity to answer.

It is a fundamental principle in our system of justice that persons should not be deprived of significant rights without an opportunity to rebut the evidence against them.

In the case of Jill Raymond, an FBI agent told persons in the community that they were looking for two fugitives but that they did not think that anyone in Lexington knew who they were. The foreman of the grand jury, in a very unusual occurrence, told one of the witnesses in the grand jury room that the grand jury was conducting the investigation to find two fugitives. The district court characterized the investigation at one point in the record as concerned with the whereabouts of fugitives. The prosecutor argued that the witnesses should not be freed on bail because unless the witnesses were forced to testify immediately the fugitives would escape.

The sixth circuit took this as a prima facie showing of abuse and remanded the case for a hearing. At the hearing the Government submitted an ex parte, in camera affidavit which the attorneys for the witnesses were never allowed to see. The witnesses' attorneys were not allowed to examine the prosecutor or the foreman of the grand jury as to the purpose of the grand jury, or to enable the FBI agent who had given a "background" statement to the grand jury.

But on the basis of the Government's in camera submission, the court found that the purpose of that grand jury was to investigate harboring and not look for fugitives.

This case illustrates the need for full disclosure when witnesses are going to be punished, either by deprivation of constitutional rights or by incarceration. Such things could not happen at a criminal trial.

Where the witness has made a showing of abuse, the counsel for the witness should at least be entitled to know what information the Government relies on before the court overrules the witness' contentions.

Another critical safeguard for the rights of witnesses is evidentiary hearings. They must be made more available to witnesses when necessary. All the warnings about minitrials really mean no protection for the rights of witnesses, even for the constitutional rights of witnesses. Hearings are often necessary to protect these rights.

This committee held a hearing in the case of the Fort Worth Five which revealed a great deal of evidence as to why they had been subpenaed to Texas. There was no reason for them being called that far away, but we could not have gotten that information during the grand jury proceedings, nor could we have had that hearing in New York as the reform bill would allow.

In the Phillip-Shinnick case the Government was subpenaing handwriting and fingerprint examples. At the contempt hearing, which is the trial, we were not allowed to put the U.S. attorney on the stand to prove that the Government had no need for examplars which it was trying to get from Dr. Shinnick, even though this was our contention and we had put into the record that the Government already had these examplars. We were also not allowed to put the foreman of the grand jury on the stand to prove that the grand jury was being used simply to collect evidence for the FBI and for a trial and that the grand jury did not need the evidence sought.

After an month in jail, the Government released Dr. Shinnick, admitting that they did not need these examplars.

Thank you very much.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Ms. Peterson.

TESTIMONY OF PROF. JOHN ANTHONY SCOTT, LEGAL HISTORIAN, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

Mr. EILBERG. Next we will have Professor John Anthony Scott. And I assume you are agreeable to your statement being made part of the record?

Professor SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, it is made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Professor Scott follows:]

STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR JOHN ANTHONY SCOTT, LEGAL HISTORIAN AND LECTURER IN LAW, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, NEWARK, N.J.

As a student of the common law origins of our Constitution, particularly of the Bill of Rights, I am delighted at the opportunity to address this Committee.

The work of the Committee is of truly historic importance. This decade is experiencing the culmination of a shift from the accusatorial system of justice, dictated by the framers of the Constitution, to one with the characteristics of the inquisitorial system against which they and their English forebearers revolted.

The grand jury was written into the Bill of Rights because it became, in common law England and particularly in the colonies, a leader and symbol of community resistance to arbitrary and oppressive state power. History teaches that in both England and the colonies, despotic rulers were constantly experimenting with more "efficient" and controllable mechanisms to circumvent the grand jury. The most devasting of these were the High Commission and the Star Chamber which claimed also the power to punish a person for refusing to give testimony.

The modern grand jury, dominated by, and indeed a tool of the prosecutor, and aided by the power to punish a person for asserting the right to silence which the Fifth Amendment originally guaranteed, bears more resemblance to these hated instruments of power than to its democratic predecessor. Particularly within the last decade, under the Nixon Administration, the full force of this oppressive instrumentality has been brought to bear—and frequently against political dissidents.

Distortion of both the form and the purpose of the "investigatory" powers of the common law grand jury has both camouflaged and abetted this transformation of the grand jury. As we shall see, the medieval grand jury's "investigations" consisted of examining physical evidence and talking with community people willing to give evidence. As the justice apparatus of the state developed and magistrates, invested with subpoena power, began to collect evidence, the grand jury exercised its subpoena power, particularly in the colonies to assure itself of the appropriateness of indictment. The critical and ignored fact is that the common law grand jury was valued as an independent body; when it investigated it was in the name of the community and not of the king. Moreover, the investigative powers of the common law grand jury were always critically limited by a person's right to refuse to take the oath. The long struggle to reclaim that right as against the Star Chamber's oath ex officio was summarized in the 17th Century in the fierce and eloquent personnage of John Libourne.

Though the development of the grand jury after 1870 falls outside the scope of the research I have prepared today for the Committee, it is important to note briefly that the exercise of independent investigatorial powers of the American grand jury developed primarily after the civil war when corrupt practices by elected officials and wrongdoing by business corporations began to assume enormous proportions. Public anger brought a response from grand juries, which began to assume sweeping powers in the investigation of governmental crime, municipal corruption, and business conspiracies in restraint of trade. This type of investigation was not infrequently carried forward in the teeth of governmental opposition and prosecutorial indifference. Again, the critical and overlooked element is the degree of independence enjoyed by American grand juries until quite recent times.

Thus, the inquisitorial powers claimed by both the Executive and the Supreme Court for the modern grand jury are a perversion of its historical role and function. The power to inquire which inhered in the common law grand jury was connected to its accusatorial or screening function. This is the function mandated by the Constitution. Later, the grand jury as in independent citizen's body undertook to initiate investigations against officials and magnates where the prosecutor defaulted. This exercise of power, though it may be salutary for a democratic society, is not mandated by the Constitution. In neither instance, however, was the grand jury acting as the tool of the prosecutor. It is the acquisition of control of the grand jury by the Executive, together with the power to force immunity which has effectively converted the grand jury into a star chamber, which was its very antithesis.

This is not to say that the grand jury itself, even an independent one, never functioned oppressively. Those examples are well known. What is less well understood is that there was, in England and particularly in colonial America, a ferocious struggle to preserve the grand jury as a protector of the people against their rulers. The Framers' understanding of the continuing need for that protection explains the requirement of the grand jury in the Bill of Rights. It is this history that I have summarized for the Committee today.

Before I begin that I would like to draw what I believe are the lessons that should guide this Committee in its historic task. The first is not to try to abolish the grand jury because it has been captured by the law enforcement establishment, but rather to redefine its duties and powers as envisaged by the Framers of the Constitution. The power to compel immunity and thereafter punish for recalcitrance, a very recent addition, must be eliminated and the Fifth Amendment restored for any reform to be meaningful. Beyond that is the slow process of restoring independence to the grand jury which was the essence of its strength.

1. IN ITS ORIGINS THE ESSENCE OF GRAND JURY PROCEDURE WAS THE ACCUSATION OF SUSPECTED PERSONS

Juries, or groups of neighbors sworn to provide the King with information which they personally possessed, were a fact-finding instrument systematized in England by the Norman Kings after the Conquest. Such juries were supposed to tell the King whatever he wanted to know; and, because he belonged to a foreign conquering dynasty, usually he wanted to know a great deal. The compilation of Doomsday Book, a complete and incredibly detailed picture of English landholding in the late 11th century, is a good example of what was accomplished by the use of local juries.

During the reign of Henry II, in the latter part of the 12th century, the use of juries began to become specialized. The jury emerged as an instrument, not at first for the trial, but for the detection of crime. The first grand juries were set up all over England with the command that they accuse people suspected of crime, so that such people might then be brought before the royal justices and sent to trial. The relevant portion of the Assize of Clarendon promulgated by Henry II in 1166 reads:

"For the preservation of peace and the enforcement of justice, inquiry shall be made in every county and in every hundred through twelve of the more lawful men of the hundred and through four of the more lawful men of each vill, put on oath to tell the truth, whether in their hundred or in their vill there is any man accused or publicly known as a robber or murderer or thief . . . since the lord king has been king. And let the royal justices make this investigation in their presence and the sheriffs in their presence." [1]

This method of handling presentment and accusation was confirmed by the Assize of Northampton, passed in 1176. The severity of the punishment inflicted upon those who failed to clear themselves was greatly increased—guilty persons were to be deprived of a hand and a foot and sent into exile. Even those who cleared themselves at trial, if their reputation was bad, must nonetheless go into exile and not return under penalty of death or whatever punishment the King might decree.

Why did Henry II institute these new grand jury proceedings?

The Norman kings found the adversary principle rooted in their English domains, and this was a national tradition that could be traced back to the very origins of the Anglo-Saxon peoples. This adversary principle would survive in a unique way in England when it had passed out of use in the rest of Europe.

Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence knew nothing of the distinction between civil and criminal actions which is so fundamental to our modern law. Virtually any wrong inflicted upon one person by another, whether intentionally or not, was emendable, that is, could be set right by the payment of an appropriate sum of money. With tiny, even if important exceptions, the whole range of human behavior fell under this rule. Homicide itself was a form of damage that could be paid for.

There was a certain charming simplicity about this scheme of things. For one, it ruled out the question of motive. A man was responsible for everything that he did no matter what his motive. He was responsible for harm inflicted by his sword if it had been borrowed by a friend, or for the damage inflicted by his runaway horse. For what you did, or for what was done by yours, you paid. And the sanction for payment rested not with a court, but with the kin. The family of a damaged person were in duty bound to prosecute his affairs, to defend his interests, and to exact the stipulated payment, if necessary at the point of the sword.

Almost all law, in other words, was private law, and the adversary procedure was rooted in the kinship system which sustained it, which initiated suits, which prosecuted actions, which collected payments. The process of bringing a wrongdoer to court and, face to face, making an accusation before a judge, was known as the appeal. This is not to be confused with our modern use of the same word, which has quite a different meaning in law. The ancient appeal, quite simply, was a face to face accusation in a properly constituted court.[2]

By the 12th century appeals, or suits brought by private individuals, were no longer sufficient to maintain law and order. The old kinship system had been weakened by centuries of social change and by the rise of serfdom. The lawlessness of the rural population had increased greatly since the Conquest. This, of course, was not the lawlessness of Norman barons who could and did fight each other, as in the reign of Stephen (1100–35), but the lawlessness of an oppressed peasantry whose degree of exploitation had increased directly with the Conquest and the enormous additional burdens which this imposed upon them.[3]

The Norman state, therefore, had to find additional ways of punishing criminals at a time when the traditional method of private prosecutions conducted by individuals and their kin had become entirely inadequate.

The introduction of the grand jury for this purpose was a brilliant stroke. The Norman state in the 12th century was still very weak by modern standards. The very concept of royal prosecutorial authority, of the royal conduct of trials, of royal responsibility for initiative in the enforcement of criminal law, of special legal staffs to implement such things, was not even in its infancy—it had not yet been born. Henry therefore decided to use the community itself, under oath, to initiate those prosecutions or appeals which private enterprise—i.e., private appeals—could or would no longer do. Grand jury proceedings would supplement, and in time supplant, the purely private accusations or appeals which traditionally had been the way in which all legal suits were initiated.

In initiating this form of royal prosecution Henry was the prisoner of his own weakness and of Anglo-Saxon tradition. The initiation of criminal proceedings assumed the same adversary form as the private appeal. The only difference, now, was that the appeal was made by and on behalf of the community in which the accused person lived, not by an individual.

This utilization of English villagers and freeholders in the development of the grand jury is a fact of enormous importance in understanding the essence of the institution. The central purpose of the grand jury, at the very root of the innovation, was not the investigation of crime but the accusation of an already suspect party. It is more than likely that Henry was only further systematizing what had been accusatorial procedure even in the late Anglo-Saxon times. The laws

[2] Shakespeare gives matchless dramatic expression to the appeal process in Richard II when Bolingbroke comes before the King to "appeal" or accuse Thomas Mowbray. Richard opens court and opens the play with these words:

"Old John Gaunt, time-honored Lancaster,
Hast thou, according to thy oath and bond,
Brought hither Henry Hereford thy bold son,
Here to make good the boisterous late appeal,
Which then our leisure would not let us hear,
Against the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Mowbray?"

The "appealer" and the "appealed" appear before the king and greet him. Richard then says

"We thank you both; yet one but flatters us,
As well appeareth by the cause you come;
Namely to appeal each other of high treason." (Emphasis added) of Ethelred II include an ordinance for the swearing in, in the shire court, of 12 senior landholders; they must take an oath, that they will not fail to accuse the guilty, but that, too, they will not accuse the innocent. Such accusing bodies, under oath, must avoid false accusation, and they must present those who, from their own knowledge, are suspect.

2. THE ORIGINAL GRAND JURY HAD NO INVESTIGATORY FUNCTION

The concept of pretrial investigation of criminal acts was utterly unknown in 12th century England and would have been meaningless. The grand jury was not a permanent body of permanent membership, but a group of freeholders selected ad hoc by the sheriff before the royal judge, who rode "circuit," arrived. They were assumed to know everything and were bound to accuse from their own knowledge of local people and their reputation. When the royal judge left they were disbanded. Though they may have acted on rumors or gossip, they were not constituted to investigate them.

Persons presented by the grand juries thus set up were then sent to trial. It is crucial for us, in understanding the significance of the grand jury, also to understand what "trial" meant and not to fall into the unhistorical trap of assuming that a 12th century trial was in essence a secular proceeding with a jury like a modern trial might be. Most trials in those days were conducted by the Church. The function of either the royal or seigneurial court was simply to hear the accusation, to determine the mode of trial, and to pronounce sentence. Until well into the 13th century, and certainly long after Magna Carta in 1215, the commonest mode of trial was the ordeal.

It is also important to understand that 12th century Englishmen viewed the ordeal as a basic human right. The very idea that mere men could establish the truth in the matter of appeals would have been inconceivable to them. To the 12th century mind only God knew the truth of such matters and could alone reveal that truth if he was approached with the appropriate ritual. Ordeal was the cherished right handed down from early Anglo-Saxon days. The Catholic Church having in vain tried to stamp out this pagan practice had taken it over. By the end of the Anglo-Saxon era the Church was conducting hundreds of ordeals and the prayer books were filled with instructions as to the appropriate rituals to be conducted in these legal causes.[4]

The ordeal was not tantamount to condemnation and death. Many survived and if the ordeal failed, the royal or seigneurial courts imposed the punishment.[5] The grand jury's accusation, though greatly feared, was not the equivalent of guilt. Though the grand jury was bound not to accuse falsely, it was a matter of faith that false accusations would be vindicated since the trial was conducted by God and the Church.

There were, in the 12th century, some direct penalties arising from grand jury accusation, but these were temporary. By the statute of Northampton, 1176, persons who were cleared by the ordeal might still have to go into exile if they were of notorious reputation:

"And if he should be cleared by the ordeal of water let him find sureties and remain in the kingdom, unless he has been accused of murder or other disgraceful felony by the community of the county and the lawful knights of his own

[4] The historical fact is that trial by jury did not begin to make headway until after the Lateran Council abolished trial by ordeal in 1215; and then it took the best part of a century to get itself established in the fact of a determined opposition by the English community.

[5] Here is an account of the cold water trial and the pretrial procedures. "Let the hands of the accused be bound together under the bent knees. . . . Then he shall be bound around the loins with a rope strong enough to hold him; and in the rope will be made a knot at the distance of the length of his hair; and so he shall be let down gently into the water so as not to make a splash. If he sinks down to the knot he shall be drawn up and saved; otherwise let him be adjudged a guilty man by the spectators."

In the hot iron trial the procedure (dooms of Aethelstan) was as follows:

"An equal number of men from both parties shall go in and stand along the church on each side of the ordeal, and all of them shall be fasting and shall have held themselves from their wives during the previous night. And the priest shall sprinkle them all with holy water and give them to taste of the holy water; and he shall give them the Book to kiss and the sign of Christ's cross. And no one shall build up the fire any more after the consecretation has begun, but the iron shall lie on the embers till the last collect. Then it shall be laid on the post. And nothing else shall be said inside the Church except a prayer to God Almighty that He disclose the fullness of truth. And his hand shall be sealed; and after the third day it shall be inspected to whether, within the sealed wrapping, it is foul or clean."

countryside. If he has been accused in the aforesaid manner of this, although he has been cleared by the ordeal of water, let him nevertheless go out of the kingdom within 40 days. . . ."[8]

This regulation did not outlast the thirteenth century. By the end of that time right to jury trial had become clearly established. Banishment after being cleared by one's peers would have been considered double jeopardy.

3. ORIGINALLY A SYMBOL OF ROYAL OPPRESSION, THE GRAND JURY BECAME VIEWED AS A PROTECTOR OF THE COMMUNITY

Utilization of the English freeholders in the development of the grand jury is a fact of great importance in understanding the history of the English legal system. By 1215, when Magna Carta and clause #39 were enacted, the guarantee of due process meant (a) presentment by a grand jury and (b) trial by battle or ordeal.

Though established to do the king's bidding grand juries functioned, even under Henry, to protect the community. Though subject to penalties, grand jurors had the power not to accuse even those known to be guilty of offenses. Absent a private appeal or the accusation of a grand jury, the king was stymied and could not punish the wrongdoer. It was not uncommon in Henry's reign for grand juries to flee to the woods rather than report what the royal inquisition demanded.

The provision that accusation must come from an outside source was thus an important bulwark against royal oppression. It also meant that no man could be required to accuse himself. The outside source could only be: a private appellor, a grand jury, or, in special cases, Parliament itself. These guarantees had by 1215 become part of the law of the land and the fundamental law.

4. EVOLUTION OF THE GRAND JURY DURING THE MIDDLE AGES

Grand juries evolved during the 13th and 14th centuries in three important ways:

(a) Grand juries not only presented accused persons, but they began to indict. In the course of time it became customary for private parties to make their accusations not directly to a royal court, but to a Crown official, i.e., a sheriff or magistrate; or to the grand jury itself. Thus the grand jury evolved into an institution that had the obligation to screen all accusations or appeals prior to referral to the royal courts for trial.

(b) The abolition of the ordeal in the 13th century created a crisis for English justice and for the English people which it took more than fifty years to resolve. The resolution ultimately was logical enough; it substituted jury trial, the petty jury, the verdict of a man's "country," for trial by God. At first resisted fiercely as a Norman encroachment upon cherished rights, by the end of the 13th century jury trial was on the way to being accepted as "the palladium of English liberties." Thus criminal procedure in England was becoming something that would be viewed by Europeans with wonderment. The screening process and the trial process that must be conducted before a suspect was found innocent or guilty, involved two separate panels of up to 36 people in all.

(c) After the shotgun approach of the Assize of Clarendon—which required the grand juries to name people suspected of crime in general rather than to present people accused of a specific crime or crimes—the old appeal was restored to its rightful dignity and proper place in English jurisprudence. Presentment or indictment became a specific accusation with which an accused person was publicly confronted.

THE CORONER'S JURY

The operation of the system is well illustrated by an examination of that special grand jury, known as the coroner's jury, which had the obligation of initiating proceedings on behalf of the Crown when a corpse was found and the possibility of foul play needed to be investigated.

The medieval coronor[9] was a royal official brought into being in the reign of Richard I (1189-99) when the justices were instructed to see to the election in every country of freemen to be keepers of the Pleas of the Crown (i.e., criminal actions). The coroner's function soon developed into the narrow but important task of investigating suspicious deaths.

[8] Stephenson and Marcham, "Sources," cited above, 80.
[9] See R. F. Hunniset, "The Medieval Coroner" (New York, 1961).

The coroner's office grew up naturally enough because the grand jury system, without special support, was not likely to produce all the indictments that the King might wish it to. Jurors, for example, had a direct interest in concealing the death of Normans; when such deaths were established and the perpetrators not produced, the community was subject to a heavy fine. Both in terms of royal security and of revenue the Norman kings were concerned to locate corpses and to establish their identity before local people whisked them away into an unmarked grave.

When a body was found the coroner had to be summoned. Before setting out to view the corpse the coroner ordered the sheriff to summon a jury. This "inquest" jury was composed of men from the hundred and from the four villages closest to where the body had been found; the number varied from 12 to 24. When the jurors were assembled, the coroner swore them in, and accompanied them on a field trip to view the corpse. All of them then retired indoors and conducted their investigation with respect to the identity of the dead person and the reasons for his demise:

(a) The jury heard testimony of kin, that the dead man was related to them, and that he was indeed English. This was known, logically enough as "presentment of Englishry or Welshry." If the jurors had had to report the presence in their community of a Norman corpse, but failed to produce a person accused of slaying the victim, the community would incur a heaving fine or "murdrum". One kinsman was required to attend the jury proceedings for this purpose.

(b) On the assumption that they knew a good deal about the circumstances of the death, the jurors then had to answer questions which the coroner posed to them. If they did not seem to know enough, they might be sent away with instructions to learn more. The jurors did not summon witnesses to their presence, but went out into the community to gather whatever facts people were willing to provide them.

(c) If the jury pleaded ignorance, there was nothing that either the coroner or the jury itself could do except return a verdict of felonious death at the hands of person or persons unknown.

(d) The inquest might also result in indictments being handed down against persons charged either with homicide or aiding and abetting it. It was then up to the coroner to order the arrest of such persons, to seek them if they had fled, and to capture them. Witnesses, too, might have to be indicted—it was an offense, for example, not to raise the hue and cry.

5. THE ORIGIN OF THE INDICTMENT PROCEDURE

The grand jury entered the modern period (16th century) firmly established as part of due process of law. A statute enacted in the 14th century stated that no man could be held for treason or other capital crime except upon presentment or indictment by a grand jury, and this measure accurately reflected the decline of the private "appeal" as a way of instituting a criminal suit. By the middle of this century it was common practice for local magistrates to accept private accusations by petition, and then to submit them to the grand jury. If the grand jury decided that these were "true bills," trial proceeded as if an old-style presentment had been made. This procedure became "indictment" in the strict meaning of that term. Thus we see the evolution in the high middle ages of a process wherein the accusation comes from a member of the community and is screened by other members of the community. Grand jury procedure develops, then, as a synthesis between the traditional Anglo-Saxon "appeal" and the sworn witnesses brought into being by the Assizes of Henry II.

6. EVOLUTION OF GRAND JURY PROCEDURE, 16TH–18TH CENTURIES

In the 16th century the advent of the Tudor dynasty marked a rapid growth in the prosecutorial power of the state and the development of Crown officials at both local and national levels armed with formidable new powers. The medieval office of Justice of the Peace was turned into a powerful local magistracy; the attorney general made his appearance to coordinate the work of lawyers doing

Crown business, and developed into an authority of central importance during the 16th century.[10]

During this century (16th) important changes were occurring in the indictment procedure, which now followed for the most part only after the arrest of an accused person. The necessary information on suspects was now not being provided by jurors to Crown officials, but the other way around. Pretrial examinations were conducted by Justices of the Peace, who had the power to summon witnesses by compulsory process, and to administer oaths. We may illustrate by an example.

"John Smith was assaulted by William Higgins, and complained to a local justice, who perhaps took his deposition but certainly required his recognizance and the recognizances of two sureties and any witnesses to appear at the next quarter-sessions; and the clerk of the peace perhaps on the basis of Smith's deposition, drew up an indictment endorsed by Smith's witnesses, who might be examined by the Grand Jury before it approved or dismissed the charge."[11]

Although by the 16th century the grand jury had become armed with the power to subpoena witnesses, this power was usually exercised by the investigating magistrate, rather than by the grand jury itself.

The subpoena power compelled a person to appear but could not be used to compel them to testify or give evidence. Justices of the Peace were not supposed to place suspected persons under oath, and they were not supposed to question such persons directly if they did not wish to be questioned. The right against self-incrimination, as a corollary of the right to grand jury indictment, was a well-recognized right of late medieval times. The right against self-incrimination was an absolute right to silence. No person could be forced to take the oath and if the oath was refused no punishment could be imposed. But it is clear that the bullying magistrates of Tudor days often paid as little heed to these rights as modern police do.

In practice the institution of the grand jury was used not only for the presentment of felonies but of misdemeanors as well. Grand Juries were now being asked to examine and endorse a prima facie case for prosecution that had been submitted to them by a magistrate: here the change from the medievel role becomes immediately apparent. The grand jury might find that the case before them was not a "true bill," but the investigating authority might submit more evidence later to the same or to a different grand jury if such evidence could be gathered; ignoramus might be replaced by billa vera.

William Blackstone summarized the situation as it existed in the middle of the 18th century—this is regarded as an authoritative and accurate expression of grand jury indictment as it prevailed in England—but not, as we shall see, the Colonies—on the eve of the American Revolution:

"An indictment is a written accusation of one or more persons of a crime or misdemeanor, preferred to, and presented upon oath by, a grand jury. . . . This grand jury are previously instructed in the articles of their enquiry, by a charge from the judge, who presides upon the bench. They then withdraw, to sit and receive indictments, which are preferred to them in the name of the king, but at the suit of any private prosecutor; and they are only to hear evidence on behalf of the prosecution; for the finding of an indictment is only in the nature of an enquiry or accusation, which is afterwards to be tried and determined; and the grand jury are only to enquire upon their oaths, whether there be sufficient cause to call upon the party to answer it. A grand jury, however, ought to be thoroughly persuaded of the truth of an indictment, so far as their evidence goes; and not to rest satisfied merely with remote probabilities; a doctrine that might be applied to very oppressive purposes."[12][13]

In Blackstone's time grand juries may still have functioned to some extent to protect people from governmental harassment and arbitrary prosecution. But the [10] "The Reformation settlement brought with it numerous questions which had to be settled in the courts—questions of land titles arising out of the dissolution of the monasteries, questions of criminal law created by the insecurity of the dynasty, and still more difficult questions of constitutional law due to the inadequacy of the medieval financial system. . . . A single solicitor-general and attorney general were, of course, unable to deal with the mass of business created by the sixteenth-century State, and it therefore became necessary for them to secure a more or less permanent staff of assistants." effectiveness of the institution had been undermined by the growth in the power of the central state and its seizure of the initiative in the matter of pretrial examination and the gathering of evidence. Even more significant for the decay of the power of the grand jury was the development of prosecution "on information."

7. TRIAL "BY INFORMATION" CIRCUMVENTED THE GRAND JURY

One central factor in the decline of the power of the grand jury was the rise in the Tudor period of prosecutions initiated "by information," rather than by grand jury presentment or indictment. The rise of this legal technique to haul subjects before special courts, endowed the Tudor monarchs with a fearsome power to initiate prosecutions without having to secure the permission of grand juries, to harass dissenters and objects of their animosity at will, and to dispense not only with the grand jury but with jury trial as well.

Tudor claims to absolute power could not be realized so long as these monarchs had to cope with community power in the form of the "double screen" of grand jury presentment and petty jury trial. The excuse given by the Crown for legislation authorizing discretionary abolition of grand jury indictment and jury trial was the insecurity of the dynasty, the violence in the countryside, and the need of a strong hand to suppress the lawlessness of the rich which an intimidated community was powerless to cope with.[14] For our purposes it is enough to note that this use of the prerogative courts far outlasted the crisis that occasioned it, and indeed grew more high-handed the greater the prestige and security of the dynasty became.[15]

The battle between royal absolutism and the old common law came to its climax in the revolutionary struggle of the years 1641–49. The Crown found a powerful ally in ecclesiastical law and procedure.

After the Conquest the English Catholic Church introduced the practice of receiving denunciations from private parties in secret. On the basis of such "informations," or allegations provided by informers, the ecclesiastical judge conducted a trial in which he combined the roles of accuser, prosecutor and judge all rolled into one. On appearing before the court the accused person was obliged to submit to what later on would be called "the Star Chamber oath," or the oath ex officio. This placed the victim between the hammer and anvil. He must swear, tell the truth, and be condemned out of his own mouth, or he must lie and be convicted of the heinous ecclesiastic offense of perjury. And for refusal to take the oath he could be punished anyway.

As we see, the English common law system was diametrically opposed to this form of procedure. Critical to common law proceedings was grand jury presentment which provided the accused with the precise and specific charges against him.[16] And of course there could be no prosecution at all without public grand jury indictment and a face-to-face confrontation at trial between the accused person and his accuser. Thus the introduction of inquisitorial procedure in the 18th century into trials for heresy, perjury, bigamy, incest, and other heinous sins provoked a bitter reaction in England, where freemen saw, in the years after Magna Carta, a menace to due process and the right to fair trial. Bans upon [14] "England," writes a noted authority about the early 16th century, "remained a country of ready violence. . . . In the absence of a police force there could be no hope of preventing trouble; one could only make the consequences so unpleasant that people would learn to curb their tempers and to seek satisfaction for their claims and grievances in the long-drawn agony of the law courts instead of the sharp exhilaration of riot." The procedure for securing convictions "even when juries refused to indict patent transgressors," was for the Royal Council (Star Chamber) to act on information received from the local magistrate, to issue a subpoena to the offenders, to hale the accused before the court either in London or the provinces, and to convict without a jury. G. R. Elton, "England Under the Tudors" (London, 1955), 59.

[16] Part of the glory of the common law was the incredible precision which judges came to insist upon in an indictment if it was not to be thrown out on its face. By the 18th century the conservatism of judges "was counterbalanced by their regard for the minutiae of their profession. The slightest error in an indictment was sufficient to secure the acquittal of the prisoner." In the case of John Tutchin, whom the government prosecuted for seditious libel in 1704, the defense maintained that the indictment ought to be dismissed because he was not given there the title of "gentleman." And the indictment was dismissed because of an error in the date, Laurence Hanson, "Government and the Press, 1695–1763" (Oxford, 1936), 57. "The grand jury not only stood between the suspect and the government which sought to prosecute him; the judge himself subjected the indictment to the most exacting scrutiny. It was the only written document in the proceedings, which were in all other respects oral." L. Levy, "Origins of the Fifth Amendment" (New York, 1968), 30.

such procedures were issued both by King and Parliament during the 12th and 13th centuries, but the Church ignored them.[17]

By the time of the Tudors, royal opposition to inquisitorial procedure had evaporated. The prerogative courts began to develop in the 15th century in response to the chaos and disintegration of the feudal order, and the thrust of the central state for greater powers of control. By the end of the fifteenth century the Tudors were consciously borrowing from the ecclesiastical, or civil law courts, legal weapons with which to free themselves from the restraints of the old common law and its community foundations. These new prerogative courts were erected by royal commission. They acquired in the course of time an extensive criminal jurisdiction and an almost unlimited power to harass, oppress and persecute English subjects without restraint.

Star Chamber was the principal secular weapon of Tudor despotism; the judges were members of the King's Council sitting alone or as a group. Cases were brought before them upon information provided by informers or at the initiative of the government itself.[18] Witnesses were summoned by subpoena, and the oath was administered to them. These proceedings swept away the guarantees of due process which had developed during the medieval period—the right to grand jury indictment, the right to jury trial, the right to remain silent in the absence of public accusation.

The basic weapon for the stamping out of heresy was the Court of High Commission which was established by Elizabeth in 1580 and which reached its apogee under Archbishops Whitgift and Laud during the period 1583–1641. Henry VIII's repudiation of papal supremacy in 1527 had brought the English Catholic Church under the direct control of the Crown. After that time the Crown itself took over the responsibility for the crushing of anti-Catholic heresy and for the punishment of offenses against Church law. The Crown itself inherited the techniques of ecclesiastical law and of the Inquisition, and became a principal agency of religious persecution. In this work the Tudors faced in two directions, punishing Catholic champions of papl supremacy and radical Protestants, with bland impartiality. By the time of Elizabeth, heresy and treason had become almost indistinguishable crimes.[19] It did not make much difference in practice—though there was some in theory—whether you landed up before Star Chamber or High Commission.

The pattern for the persecution of protestants and Catholics was the same: suspected persons were hauled before High Commission or Star Chamber on the initiative of the government itself or of an informer. Charged with no specific offense against the law, suspects were administered the oath ex officio, that they would tell the truth and answer whatever questions were asked them; they were required themselves to provide the information upon the basis of which they could be sent to prison or to the stake. Such trials, which bypassed grand jury procedure, were said to be initiated "on information" brought before the court by informers or by the government itself.

By the beginning of the 17th century prerogative courts, Star Chamber and High Commission, had become hated symbols of royal tyranny to Catholics and radical Protestants alike. Both courts were abolished by the Long Parliament in 1641 at the opening of the Revolution that began to accomplish the conversion of the English state from an authoritarian system into a constitutional monarchy under the control of Parliament. But the years of prosecution "on information" left deep marks upon the common law and upon the Parliamentary leaders who championed it. Henceforth indictment by information—at the initiative of the attorney general or following the depositions of an informer, entered common law practice and remained there side by side with the traditional form of grand jury indictment. This was the more true in that England's conservative bourgeois leadership of the late 17th and 18th centuries found that this particular type of legal repression was as useful a weapon in its hands as it had previously been in the hands of Stuart or Tudor kings.

[17] As early as 1164, in the Constitutions of Clarendon, Henry II had forbidden the use of inquisitorial procedures in the church courts when laymen were brought before them. See Leonard Levy, "Origins of the Fifth Amendment" (New York, 1968), 43–8. Inquisitorial procedure was vigorously attacked by Parliament as contrary to Magna Carta No. 39 by petitions of 1331 and 1347, and by an act of 1352 which provided that "none shall be taken by petition or suggestion made to our lord the king, or to his Council, unless it be by indictment of good and lawful people of the same neighborhood where such deeds be done. . . ." Same, 52.

[18] The Tudors relied heavily upon informers to maintain their authority, and the country swarmed with government spies who provided a foundation for the growth of arbitrary power and the setting aside of the common law. See G. R. Elton, "Star Chamber Stories" (New York, 1958), 79–80, and Levy, "Origins of the Fifth Amendment," cited above.

[19] "In practical effect the distinction between heresy and treason was nugatory, and the penalties, publicly administered for nugatory effect, were equally horrible. . . ." William Haller, "Foxe's Book of Martyrs and the Elect Nation" (London, 1963), 43.

This fact is of importance in understanding the history of the grand jury both in the Old World and in the New. It provoked a fresh round of political struggle, both in England and in America, during the late 17th and the 18th centuries. It provides the key to the fact that the right to grand jury indictment was provided for not only in the Bill of Rights but in all American jurisdictions following the accomplishment of the Revolution in 1776.

Blackstone provides an excellent and lucid summary of the process of indictment by information as it existed in bourgeois England during the 18th century and at the time of the American Revolution:

"The only species of proceeding at the suit of the king, without a previous indictment or presentment by a grand jury, now seems to be that of information.

"Informations are of two sorts: first those which are partly at the suit of the king, and partly at that of a subject; and secondly, such as are only in the name of the king. The former are usually brought upon penal statutes, which inflict a penalty upon conviction of the offender, one part to the use of the king, and another to the use of the informer. . . .

"The objects of the king's own prosecutions . . . are properly such enormous misdemeanors, as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger his government, or to molest or affront him in the regular discharge of his royal functions. For offenses so high and dangerous, in the punishment or prevention of which a moment's delay would be fatal, the law has given to the crown the power of an immediate prosecution, without waiting for any previous application to any other tribunal. . . .

"The objects of the other species of information, filed by the master of the crown-office upon the the complaint or relation of a private subject, are any gross and notorious misdemeanors, riots, batteries, libels, and other immoralities of an atrocious kind, not peculiarly tending to disturb the government (for those are left to the care of the attorney general) but which, on account of their magnitude or pernicious example, deserve the most public animadversion." [20]

Blackstone then pointed out that in constitutional law, trial upon information had originally been applicable to misdemeanors only, and not to capital offenses; and in this form it was revived, after sharp controversy, during the reign of William and Mary. Blackstone argued that when trial upon information was restored to the control of King's Bench and the common law, the subject had no further reason for complaint; "the same notice was given, the same process was issued, the same pleas allowed, the same trial by jury was had, as if the prosecution had originally been by indictment." [21, 22]

Blackstone was a conservative and a defender of the legal status quo. British subjects on both sides of the Atlantic had good reason in the 18th century to be bitterly critical of indictments on information.

With the restoration of Charles II in 1660 the revolutionary movement that had so shaken English society during the 1640's and early 1650's came to a close. A narrow oligarchy of land owners and commercial magnates succeeded in thrusting back the impetus of the popular revolutionary movement and in seizing and consolidating power for themselves. This oligarchy, that ruled England in the late 17th and throughout the 18th century possessed a very narrow political base, was aware of the precarious nature of its hold upon the masses, and feared greatly the power of the political opposition and of the press. It embarked upon a new struggle to curb freedom of expression, and for this purpose it utilized the old laws against seditious libel, and added new ones.

The struggle thus joined lasted for more than one hundred years (about 1670-1815). There were hundreds of convictions for seditious libel during this period. For every conviction there were several prosecutions which resulted in acquittal; for every prosecution there were probably many indictments that were never brought to trial.

Seditious libel was a very elastic concept that enabled the government to prosecute virtually any utterance which, it imagined, brought it into public contempt. Libels were misdemeanors the punishment of which did not expose the victim to death or mutilation, as was the case with felonies. But the penalties inflicted were rigorous enough: next to fine and imprisonment the most common punishment was the pillory and the lash. The pillory in particular came to be regarded by defiant British printers and writers in the 18th century as a badge of honor. Seditious libels, as misdemeanors, could be brought to trial by the attorney general upon information. This bypassing of the grand jury process greatly increased the ease with which the government could harass its opponents by illegal search and seizure of materials, by arrest and jailing without warning.

All persons involved in the writing, printing and distribution of seditious libels were liable to prosecution. While it is true that in such cases the accused had a right to jury trial, the government, thanks to the years of Star Chamber procedure, had been able in fact to eviscerate the jury and reduce its role to a minor one, one indeed that was almost miniscule. The function of the jury was simply to establish the fact of publication and the meaning of the "innuendos." [23] Whether what was printed was in fact libelous was a matter for judicial determination alone.

The law of seditious libel in England was doubly offensive to the opposition. It shortcircuited, in cases involving liability to crippling fines and bodily harm, an Englishman's right to grand jury indictment. It undermined the sanctity of jury trial itself.

In the century-long struggle to muzzle the press the government initiated a series of extraordinary prosecutions. It appealed, to be sure, to provincial grand juries to hand down indictments on their own initiative; but for the most part it filed its own information; and this was its preferred method of proceeding. Freed from the restraint of having to summon and convince intractable London jurymen, the government was able to act with speed and flexibility. The victims charged, and with good reason, that the government made frequent arrests aimed only at harassment. Incredible militancy in the struggle for freedom of the press alongside savage repression; these were characteristics of the English political scene during the 18th century.

Dramatic evidence concerning the value that Englishmen placed upon grand jury indictment for common law misdemeanors as well as felonies is provided by the continuing opposition throughout the 18th century to the prosecution of criminal libels upon information.

On June 7, 1775, the Rev. John Horne, a notorious civil libertarian, placed the following advertisement in the "Public Advertiser" and several other publications:

"At a special meeting this day of several members of the Constitutional Society, during an adjournment, a gentleman proposed that a subscription should be immediately entered into by such of the members present who might approve the purpose, for raising the sum of £100 to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhaumanely murdered by the King's troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts, on the 19th of last April. And this sum was immediately collected."

The Attorney General proceeded against Horne by information that is, without grand jury proceedings. Horne's trial opened on July 7, 1775, and this champion of a free press conducted his own (often hilarious) defense. He made a frontal attack on the government's initiation of the prosecution by the filing of an information. The central point of his argument was that the Attorney General was a political appointee who could abuse power to harass his political enemies, whereas the temptation to do this would be much less if a grand jury of Londoners had been assembled, every time he wished to undertake such a prosecution. "The Attorney General," said Horne, "accuses men neither on the oath of others, nor yet upon his own oath. If he believes the matter of the accusation true, it is but the belief of one man, and he a prejudiced man, and the most improper man in the kingdom for his authority to be taken in such a case. But, gentlemen, what is much worse, it frequently happens that no man whatever avows the accusation, or believes it . . . The apparent object of this prosecution is to take what little money out of my pocket I may have there, and to imprison me, and so exclude me from that society of which I have rendered myself unworthy." [24]

8. THE GRAND JURY IN COLONIAL AMERICA

The value of the grand jury as a shield to the ordinary subject against oppressive government was grasped nowhere with more certainty than in colonial America. The institution, along with other central features of the common law, was transplanted to America where it bloomed with all the vigor of a native plant.

In Virginia grand juries were empanelled both in the General Court and in lower criminal courts. The Governor's charge to the jury emphasized the jury's obligation with respect to law enforcement and the prosecution of criminals, but also underlined that "it is your duty, gentlemen, with great care, to examine into the facts for which (alleged criminals) have been committed, and on proper proofs to find the different bills and present them to the court for their trial."

Indictment, rather than presentment, was the rule in 18th century Virginia. Indictments were drawn by the attorney general and submitted to the grand jury, who might then call and examine witnesses. The testimony of one witness was sufficient to find a true bill in all criminal cases except treason. But, no more than in England itself, was the Virginia grand jury an investigatory body. Its function, purely and simply, was to accuse.[25]

As for Massachusetts, provision for grand jury indictment was made in Article 49 of the "Body of Liberties." As in England, magistrates tried criminal cases with a petty jury when these had been brought before them after presentment or indictment.[26]

For the colonial period the most detailed study of the operation of grand juries has been done for New York. Distinguished authorities emphasize that: "New York grand juries followed the English medieval tradition rather than the less democratic procedures then prevailing in England. With great tenacity the freemen of the Province held fast to their prerogatives as the accusers for their respective countries . . . but for this, ex officio information would have crowded out popular participation." [27]

In New York the engines of the law were set in motion when the injured person appeared before a magistrate alleging the commission of a crime. The accusation was entered in the form of an affidavit, or information under oath. The accused, but not under oath, would then be called in to be examined. If he found sufficient cause, the examining magistrate would then bind the accused over to appear at the next court sessions, where proceedings before the grand jury would take place. If no accuser or prosecutor appeared the accused would be discharged even before grand jury proceedings had been instituted. Such witnesses were not subpoenaed for a grand jury appearance, though the grand jury might hold a prisoner in the hope that witnesses would show up.

When a sufficient number of grand jurors had appeared the panel was called over and the jurors were sworn. The charge was then given, the jurors being exhorted not to present the innocent and to preserve the secrecy of their proceedings at that time and later. Such charges might underline the fact that grand jury presentment was a basic right of the subject deriving from Magna Carta:

"And amongst all our valuable privileges as Englishmen it is justly esteemed one of the greatest and has all the securities of Magna Carta that the King (who holds the sword of justice . . . will yet give sentence upon no man's person or property but by trial of his equals; and the method prescribed of putting the law in execution is by presentment of a Grand Jury: who represent the country as well as by living in it. . . ." [28]

Sentenced to jail Horne continued to have the company of his friends and the pleasure of a weekly dinner at the Dog and Duck, procuring large quantities of claret to preserve him from jail fever. He passed the time in the study of his favorite languages—Norse, Gothic and Old English. One of the judges who presided at the trial was himself a former champion of a free press—John Wilkes. As for poor people, like the "mercuries"—street women who hawked papers and sang satirical songs—not even arrest on an information was necessary. They were simply committed to prison as vagrants on the order of a magistrate; and there they stayed for 10 days, minus both friends and claret.

The bulk of the cases that came before grand juries in New York were those of persons bound over by the magistrates, but in some instances the jurors themselves heard persons who were aggrieved. The grand jury was "clothed with vast prerogatives in respect of summons and examination." [29] By the end of the 18th century witnesses were usually bound over to give evidence directly to the grand inquest. But we should note that the king's officer was not present at these proceedings, and whatever written material was produced from magistrates' examinations was put before the jurymen by the clerk of the court. There seems to have been a growing reluctance to examine such written materials. Willful refusal to appear before the jury constituted a contempt, and witnesses who did appear were put under oath.

Refusal to give evidence for the king before the grand jury under oath was contempt of court, but persons who were afraid of incriminating themselves refused to take the oath. It is interesting to note that no penalty attached to this refusal, since it was still recognized that a man's right of protection against self-incrimination was as basic to the British constitutions as the right of grand jury indictment itself. Goebel and Naughton make reference to "innumerable entries" in the record that substantiate this fact.

In 1764, for example, seven persons were indicted by the grand jury and subsequently fined for obstructing the King's Highway. Summoned before trial to appear before the grand jury that indicted them, all refused to take the oath and to give evidence on behalf of the King. No penalty attached to this refusal. They were eventually indicted for "stopping up the King's Highway with force and arms unlawfull and injuriously to the great damage and common nuisance of the King's subjects and against the peace." [30]

Accusations by New York grand juries were largely informal—written out, as it were, on the backs of old envelopes. Grand juries then transmitted these scraps of paper to the court; and one of the clerk's chores was to put the amateur indictments into more polished form. In the Supreme Court of New York this task was allotted to the attorneys general and was one of his principal responsibilities. One such gentleman found this chore an awful bore, and lamented that such work "cost me a great deal of thought, pains and care. . . ." [31] At some stage along the way the accusation, written down and then worked up, was metamorphosed from a mere bill into an indictment through the endorsement, billa vera. All this is highly interesting as it illuminates the jealous autonomy of the colonial grand jury and the quite subordinate role in which both magistrates and Crown prosecutors were cast at this particular stage of criminal proceedings.

When we compare the New York grand jury practice in the 18th century with contemporary English practice, it is clear that in the Province the grand jury had an infinitely greater independence of action. Whereas in England the initiative in making accusations had passed largely to the Crown and its central and local officers, in New York this was emphatically not true. In terms of initiative the Grand Jury still retained its earlier and more vital medieval role. Note the crucial and absolutely critical conclusion reached by Professor Goebel:

"In New York," he tells us, "the Grand Jury recaptured its ancient autonomy in the process of accusation, so that in the majority of cases presentment preceded the forming a bill of indictment . . . . The colonists were bent upon preserving the maximum of liberty for the inquest and the maximum of control over accusations, neither of which objectives was achieved merely by voting on what authority had made ready in advance . . . . This is the more remarkable since in general English practices were unresistingly duplicated." [32]

This is a fact of great significance for understanding the provision for grand jury indictment that was written into the Federal Bill of Rights and also into the State constitutions. It was an accurate reflection of 18th century colonial practice under which popular presentment not professional indictment remained the rule until the end of the colonial period and indictment by information was virtually unknown. Grand jury men were inbued with a sense of responsibility for their own investigations—it was not a matter simply of rubberstamping the probable correctness of somebody else's findings.

9. THE GRAND JURY AND THE ZENGER CASE[33]

Crown officers who sought to bypass the grand jury system and to introduce indictment by information flouted public opinion and did so at their own peril. This is dramatized and proved by the Zenger case in 1734, though, strangely enough the centrality of the grand jury issue to Zenger's trial and acquittal has on the whole been overlooked by both lawyers and historians.

On January 15, 1734 Justice DeLancey of the New York Supreme Court made a charge to the Grand Jury and drew their attention to the circulation of newspapers which were attacking the unpopular Governor Cosby and villifying his administration. The authors, he told the jury, were unknown, but it was easy to guess who they were. "I know most of you personally," said his Lordship, "and I make no doubt but that you will discharge your duty."

Having been invited to indict Johann Peter Zenger, publisher of the New York Weekly Journal and the immediate cause of the governor's anguish, the grand jury then returned no indictments. Emboldened by this check to the censorship activities of the Crown, Zenger and his employers became more brazen than ever. When the time came in the fall of 1734 to elect new magistrates and councilmen, the voters turned out to elect the opposition candidates. Salt was rubbed in the wound by the circulation of a ballad:

> To you good lads that dare oppose
> All lawless power and might,
> You are the theme that we have chose
> And to your praise we write:
> You dared to show your faces brave
> In spite of every abject knave, > with a fa la la

On October 15 the Chief Justice returned to the attack and delivered yet another charge to the Grand Jury on the subject of libels. "If you gentlemen," he told them, "do not interpose, consider whether the ill consequences that may arise from any disturbances of the public peace, may not in part lie at your door?" He called also for the suppression of the authors, printers and publishers of certain "scandalous songs that are handed about . . . ."

Thus pressed the Grand Jury returned presentments on the songs on two of them, but reported that they were unable to discover the authors, printers and publishers of said songs.

The attempt to proceed against Zenger by grand jury indictment on two separate occasions is interesting, because it indicates that proceeding by information was not considered constitutional in New York, and the government only resorted to this "Star Chamber method" when faced with grand jury defiance. An attempt, too, to secure the cooperation of the Assembly in suppressing Zenger also failed.

Cosby then advertised a reward for information about the publisher and printer of the songs and the anti-administration articles that had appeared in the Journal. Early in November Zenger himself was arrested under a warrant from the Governor's Council—in itself an extraordinary and highly unusual proceeding.

Zenger was then indicted on the filing of an information by the Attorney General, and this news he made known to the public through the Journal in January 1735: [bail having been set too high for him to meet] "I returned to jail, where I lay until Tuesday, January 28, 1735 . . . and the Grand Jury having found nothing against me, I expected to be discharged from my imprisonment, but my hopes proved vain: for the Attorney General then charged me by information, for printing and publishing parts of my Journals . . . as being false, scandalous, malicious and seditious."

Opinion, which even before this was inflamed against the governor, became even more inflamed. This mode of proceeding was not recognized in the colony and it seemed to the colonists—as it would to medieval Englanders—that such a thing violated the basic guarantees of due process as established by Magna Carta. To make doubly sure there would not be a fair trial but that Zenger's conviction would be secured at all costs, the New York Supreme Court issued an order for the exclusion from the court of Zenger's attorney, James Hamilton.

[33] This account is based upon the trial records published by Livingston Rutherford, ed., "John Peter Zenger: His Press, His Trial" (New York, 1904). See also John A. Scott, "Settlers on the Eastern Shore" (New York, 1967), 120 ff.

The trial opened on August 4, 1735. Richard Bradley, the Attorney General, read the "information":

"Be it remembered that Richard Bradley, Esq., Attorney General of our sovereign Lord the King, for the Province of New York, who for our said Lord the King in this part prosecutes, in his own proper person comes here into the Court of our said Lord the King and for our said Lord the King gives the Court to understand, and be informed, that John Peter Zenger, late of the City of New York, printed, . . . did falsely, seditiously, and scandalously publish, and cause to be printed and published, a certain false, malicious, seditious and scandalous libel, entitled the New York Weekly Journal."

The information, as was customary in these cases, then quoted in detail those passages in the Journal that Bradley thought constituted a seditious libel.

At this point Andrew Hamilton, America's most eminent lawyer, appeared in court to defend Zenger. As Bradford and the justices listened in consternation Hamilton launched a frontal attack upon the practice of indicting British subjects upon information.

It was, he said, the very essence of Star Chamber practice, and so, unconstitutional. "I was in hopes," he told the Court, "as that terrible court [of Star Chamber] . . . was long ago laid aside, as the most dangerous court to the liberties of the people of England, that ever was known in this kingdom; that Mr. Attorney knowing this would not have attempted to set up a Star Chamber here, nor to make their judgments a precedent to us. . . . Informations for libel is a child, if not born, yet nursed up and brought to full maturity, in the Court of Star Chamber."

And, he continued: "The practice of informations for libels is a sword in the hand of a wicked King, and an arrant coward, to cut down and destroy the innocent; the one cannot because of his high station, and the other dares not, because of his want of courage, revenge himself in another manner." [34]

Later in the trial Hamilton returned to this theme and hammered in this point. Prosecutions for libels, since the time of Star Chamber, he said, had generally been initiated at the instance of the Crown or its ministers. Star Chamber had established the precedent for this, and for bypassing the Grand Jury. "Instead," he said.

"Of being lawfully accused by 24 good and lawful men of the neighborhood and afterwards tried by 12 like men, here is a power given to the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, the Keeper of the King's Privy Seal, or two of them, calling to these a bishop, a temporal lord, and other great men mentioned in the act . . . to receive information against any person for any of the misbehaviors cited in the act, and by their discretion to examine, and to punish them according to their demerit." [35]

The danger of reviving this awesome power, which had been cut down by the abolition of Star Chamber in 1641, was obvious. "If," Hamilton went on,

"Mr. Attorney is at liberty to come into court, and file an information in the King's name, without leave, who is secure, whom he pleases to prosecute as a libeller? . . . And give me leave to say . . . that the mode of prosecuting by information (when a grand jury will not find billa vera) is a national grievance, and greatly inconsistent with that freedom, which the subjects of England enjoy in most other cases." [36]

All the more reason, concluded Hamilton, for the trial jury to take matters into their own hands and insist upon finding as to the truth or falsity of the allegations as well as on the fact of publications:

"Here," Zenger's attorney concluded, "are two statutes [3 and 1[5] Henry 7] that are allowed to have given the deepest wound to the liberties of the people of England to any that I remember to have been made, unless it may be said that the statute made in the time of Henry VIII, by which his proclamations were to have the effect of laws, might in its consequence be worse. . . . By those pretences the people of England were cheated or awed into delivering up their ancient and sacred right of trials by Grand and Petit Juries."

The abrogation of basic common law rights, Hamilton warned, through the instrumentality of Star Chamber procedures, brought on the English Revolution.

This great lawyer, speaking in 1735, cast a prophetic shadow that reached forward 40 years into the future.

Zenger, as we know, was acquitted, but the historic importance of the case has not always been rightly understood. It did not establish "freedom of the press." Colonial authorities, as much as those in London, believed in the concept of seditious libel, were prepared to punish libellers, and had as yet little understanding of the more absolutist ideas of freedom of expression which—in theory at least—would triumph in the 19th century.[37] What was asserted here was that government could not tamper with grand jury indictment and that the petty jury was judge not merely of the fact of publication but also of the libelous nature or otherwise of the material under examination. New Yorkers had vindicated the idea that both grand and petty juries were shields of the colonial innocent against the harassment and persecution of their imperial masters.

This idea was embodied in the common toast at revolutionary gatherings in the 1760's and 1770's: "To the Grand Jury, defender of American liberties!"

10. Sewell v. Hancock

The key role played by grand juries in the period leading up to the American Revolution in defending the rights of Americans against the imperial authorities who sought to abolish those rights is well illustrated by the cast of Sewall v. Hancock.

In May 1768, officers of the Crown boarded Hancock's sloop the Liberty and made preparations to confiscate the ship as surety for the payment of penalties that might be levied against Hancock for the smuggling of wine. A mob of sailors and wharfingers gathered and a riot ensued. This disturbance provided the occasion for the military occupation of Boston by the Crown authorities in September 1768.

The Attorney General Jonathan Sewall then filed an information against Hancock in Admiralty Court. The suit was based on the Trade Act of 1764 which decreed that people landing goods without payment of duties should forfeit treble the value of what had been smuggled. Sewall alleged that Hancock had aided in landing 100 pipes of Madeira wine knowing that duties had not been paid; a penalty of £9,000 was sought.

The government chose to proceed in Admiralty Court rather than by common law. For one thing, common law juries in America would not convict smugglers. For another the Admiralty Courts, even like Star Chamber and High Commission, permitted the initiation of a suit by the filing of private and/or government informations. Admiralty proceedings bypassed the common law requirement for a grand jury indictment which the government could no way have procured.

Jonathan Sewall was as reluctant to proceed in this way as the New York Attorney-General Richard Bradley had been. He knew that such proceedings flew in the face of the colonial conviction that grand jury indictment was a constitutional right. He resorted to the Admiralty procedure, as he very well knew, at the risk of inflaming the temper of the community. As he himself admitted, "This method has seldom been used in Massachusetts without the consent of the Judges. . . ."

The government in Massachusetts, as in New York, was faced with the resistance of a hostile community. In this situation—even as in Star Chamber days—the informer played a crucial role in ensuring the success of the prosecution.

Josephy Maysel was a key witness against John Hancock. Maysel was a government informer, a man, evidently, who had an unenviable reputation in the Boston community. In March 1769, while Hancock's trial was continuing, the Suffolk grand jury indicted Maysel on a charge of perjury; and the authorities at once spirited him out of the jurisdiction. Sewall, deprived of his key witness, moved for a dismissal of the case.

The lengthy trial, which had begun in December 1768, and which collapsed on March 25, 1769, saw the appearance in court of John Adams as counsel for the defense. The draft of his argument in this case is of particular interest to us. His editors call it "an unfinished contribution to the political literature of its time."[39]

"The Courts of Admiralty," wrote Adams, "are authorized under the Act (of 1764) to proceed on the initiative of the informer or prosecutor. Thus these extraordinary penalties are to be heard and tried—how? Not by a jury, not by the law of the land, but by the civil law and a single judge. Unlike the ancient barons who una voce responderunt, nolumus leges Angliae mutare [replied with one voice, we refuse to change the laws of England] the barons of modern times have answered that they are willing that the laws of England should be changed, at least with regard to all America, in the most tender point, the most fundamental principle.

"Is it not directly a repeal of Magna Carta, as far as America is concerned? . . .

"The people of England are attached to Magna Carta. By the 29th [sic] chapter of that Statute, 'Nullus liber Homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisietur de libero tenemento suo, vel libertatibus, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum vel per legem terrae.'[40] This 29th chapter of Magna Carta has for many centuries been esteemed by Englishmen, as one of the noblest monuments, one of the firmest bulwarks of their liberties—and we know very well the feelings and reflections of Englishmen whenever this chapter has been infringed upon even by Parliament. One proof has been given us by Lord Coke, in his exposition of this chapter:

> 'Against this ancient and fundamental law, and in the face thereof I find an Act of Parliament made, that as well Justices of Assize as Justices of Peace without any finding or presentment of 12 men, upon a bare information for the King before them made, should have full power and authority by their discretions to hear and try men for penalties and forfeitures.'"

Adams concludes with a solemn warning. Let Parliaments beware, that instead of using the ordinary trial per legem terrae, they introduce "absolute and partial trials by discretion."

We need to study carefully the part played by colonial grand juries in the struggle against the British and against the subversion of the British constitution. This may be a key to our perception of the future role of the grand jury in this country, and the rescue of this popular institution from the forces that have usurped control over it.[41]

11. THE GRAND JURY AND ABOLITION[42]

Antislavery lawyers, almost from the beginning of the 19th century, pondered the anomaly of a law of slavery that was supreme even in the North where the common law was supposed to be sovereign. This paradox centered around the status of the fugitive slave. The master was authorized by the Constitution itself (IV 2) to seize his slave wherever he might find him, and drag him "home" with little or no legal formality. This procedure opened the door to a flood of abuses, including the growth of a traffic in kidnap victims seized by proslavery bandits wherever they might find them and shipped south for sale.

To be accused of being a slave, then, was an extraordinary type of accusation! A white man could level it against a Black one as and when he pleased—he did not even have to file an information with a court! For the Black victim there was neither shelter in the law, nor remedy. And it was federal law itself which sanctioned this outrage, this trampling upon the common law constitution.

[40] I am puzzled why Adams and other lawyers refer to this as the 29th chapter of Magna Carta when in actual fact it is No. 39: "No free man shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised or exiled or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him nor send upon him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or the law of the land." W. S. McKechnie, "Magna Carta" (Glasgow, 1914), 375.

[41] Leroy D. Clark dismisses the role of the grand jury in the anticolonial struggle as something "illegal." He writes "The grand jury did not function in any strict sense to protect the 'innocent' against arbitrary and unfounded persecution. Much of the colonialists' activity, such as burning tea chests brought to the colonies by the British ships in 1774 [sic] was blatantly illegal, yet the grand jury blocked charges brought against the participants." The Grand Jury, 17–18. Clark's conclusion ignores the dimension of the colonial struggle for grand jury indictment as part of the fundamental law against the British drive to destroy that law; it muffles the central thrust of the struggle against Admiralty Courts as tools for the conviction of those who challenged the arbitrary and unconstitutional legislation of King-in-Parliament; and it overlooks that essential to the protective function of the jury was the power to nullify the state's attempt to enforce the law where it was perceived as oppressive.

[42] An elementary treatment of the legal struggle for the rights of free Black people in the ante-bellum period is in John A. Scott, "Hard Trials on My Way: Slavery and the Struggle Against It" (New York, 1974), Chapter 9, "Unreasonable Searches and Seizures," pp. 163–76. This piece is weakened by the fact that, while it deals with the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, it neglects the clause relating to indictment for a capital or otherwise infamous crime.

Clearly—thought the lawyers—such accusations were equivalent to accusations for capital or otherwise infamous crimes. Was not the punishment resulting from this accusation a deprivation of property, family, liberty, even of life itself?

Starting with Indiana, New York and Vermont, state after state began to insist upon the extension of the full panoply of due process rights to Black people accused of the "infamous crime" of being a slave—a day in court, the right to counsel, jury trial, the right to summon witnesses for the defense, the right to testify on one's own behalf, and so on. But the grand jury implications of the liberty laws have not been sufficiently emphasized. At that time virtually every jurisdiction in the United States provided that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime . . . unless on indictment of a Grand Jury." The extension of this right to Black people meant that a Black person could not even be accused of being a slave, if he was in a jurisdiction where slavery was outlawed, without grand jury indictment. The fact is that by the late 1830's it would have been hard to find, anywhere in the North, a community prepared to hand down such an indictment no matter what the evidence might have been.

The Supreme Court of the United States grasped this clearly when it struck down the liberty laws in the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842). It affirmed in that case that a slaveholder's right to recapture his property was a national right overriding any legal barriers that might be set up by the states in accordance with the provisions of the common law.

As the opposition to the recapture of fugitives deepened in the decade 1840–50, it became necessary for the slaveholders to involve the Federal Government itself with its own law enforcement agencies, and primarily the Army, to participate actively in and to guarantee the return of fugitives. This was accomplished by the passage of a second Fugitive Slave Act in 1850. This act set up special courts to hear cases involving fugitives (or alleged fugitives); the judges or "commissioners" of these courts being appointed by the United States Circuit Courts. Owners of slaves were authorized to arrest fugitives themselves, take them before a commissioner, establish the identity of the prisoner, and receive a written authorization to take the captured person back to the South. The testimony of the accused was not to be accepted as evidence. The writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of seized persons was forbidden. There was to be no jury trial. The slaveowner's right to seize suspects precluded automatically the community's right to pass upon the validity of the accusation or to interfere in any way in the process.

Champions of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 argued that the recovery of fugitives was analogous to the extradition of criminals: "rendition of fugitives from service," said Commissioner Curtis, "is an act analogous to the rendition of fugitives from justice, and the two cases . . . are of the same general character and may be provided for by the same general means." [43] But central to the position of the antislavery people was the point that in fact there was a big difference between the two cases. A criminal sought for extradition was a person who had been charged in one state with the commission of a felony, and whose return was sought, "not to avoid a trial, but to have one." As Horace Mann put it, "The original indictment or charge, the arrest in a foreign state, and the delivery and transportation to the place of trial were separate parts of one legal proceeding." The proceedings for extradition of fugitive criminals were preliminary; the proceedings for the extradition of fugitive slaves were final.

Thus a central feature of the popular struggle against slavery in the decade 1850–60 was for the abolition of a Star Chamber-type court, the commissioner's court, that bypassed, even as Star Chamber, High Commission and the Admiralty Courts had done, the citizen's right to public indictment and common law due process. The continuity of the struggles for the grand jury and against illegal or ex parte indictment, in the Old World and the New for three and one-half centuries, from the sixteenth until 1860, is something that needs to be noted, and the appropriate conclusions drawn. People, it seems obvious enough, would not have struggled so bitterly and so continuously for this right if they did not feel that something substantial was to be gained from it.

CONCLUSION

Grand jury indictment was a right of the American colonists that protected them from oppressive government. The protective function of the grand jury threads the entire history of the common law, and emerges most decisively from the struggle against prerogative and admiralty courts from the sixteenth to the last half of the eighteenth century.

A central feature of British government during the 18th century was the jailing, fining, lashing and harassment of people on both sides of the Atlantic for their political opposition. The main path to success in this type of persecution, since the time of the Star Chamber, was the elimination of the time-honored right of community indictment and community trial. In the 18th century colonial situation the existence of a strong tradition that grand jury indictment might not be set aside had provided a major obstacle to the kind of political repression that developed at the same time in England.

The guarantee of grand jury indictment for capital and otherwise infamous crimes included the crime of seditious libel. It was designed, first and last, to prevent the use of governmental power for purposes of political harassment and repression. It was designed to prevent governmental shortcircuiting of community power by devices such as the ex officio oath, informations and the absolute requirement, to which there were no exceptions, that accusation must come from the mouth(s) of the community and not from the mouth of the individual who was accused.

Beginning in the 19th century but with accelerating speed after World War II the grand jury has been converted both into a rubber stamp for the initiative of the Attorney General and into an inquisitorial body whose function is not so much to indict as to ferret out information upon the basis of which indictments can be handed down. It has become an instrument of the very political persecution and intimidation which is forbidden by the fifth amendment. Today once more, as in the days of Star Chamber and High Commission, people are between hammer and anvil; either take the oath to answer truthfully the questions put to you, or go to jail for your refusal. Either lie under oath and be convicted of perjury, or tell the truth and be convicted of your own mouth.

Possible remedies might be

(a) in the spirit of constitutional checks and balances create an elected body which is completely independent of the Department of Justice and which is empowered to check the validity of and to veto Government-inspired prosecutions;

(b) eliminate the prostitution of the grand jury to inquisitorial uses and the extraction by compulsion of information upon which indictments may be based.

Mr. EILBERG. Will you proceed, Professor Scott.

Professor SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, my name is John Anthony Scott. I am a student of the Anglo-Saxon common law origins of our Constitution, and the jurisprudence of the Bill of Rights, and I would like to add my congratulations to those of other people who have appeared before you upon the work that you have undertaken of casting a spotlight on the operations of the grand jury and the very serious problems of grand jury reform.

I would like to spend just a few minutes within the time allotted to me to highlight the conclusions which I think flow from the draft of a statement on the history of the grand jury which you have before you, which I plan to expand upon later in the year, and to publish as an article.

Mr. EILBERG. We read your statement, Professor, and it is a very scholarly one. It does require some pinpointing for the subcommittee, however, in terms of the legislation that we are considering.

Professor SCOTT. Yes. The statement is designed to provide something of the constitutional framework within which the question of grand jury reform needs to be examined.

I think the main points made in the statement are that the grand jury developed originally as an independent community voice in the accusatorial process. It was something that was taken over by the community and became a basic part of the community's role in the accusing of persons. The basic principle established long before the end of the Middle Ages was that an accusation must come from the mouth of a person in the community and, by the end of the Middle Ages, must come from the community itself as organized and represented by the grand jury. The flip side of that coin is that the accusation in no sense and no way comes from the mouth of the accused person himself. By the end of the Middle Ages this has become established as a fundamental principle of the advisory process.

Both in England and in the colonies, despotic rulers mounted over the centuries an unending battle to short circuit the grand jury and get around what they so rightfully saw was a most formidable obstacle to the development of their powers. Despotic monarchs sought above all to undermine the independent powers of the grand jury as a bulwark of the community rights and interests against the tyranny and power inherent in governments.

The technique they used was to attempt indictment, and therefore to trigger trial of persons as a result of "information" provided by government informers or information provided by the Attorny General himself. Thus they used trial "by information" as a means of short circuiting the grand jury's independent decision. And again, when these trials took place, they used, in the courts of Star Chamber and high commission, enforced oath-taking and compelled testimony as the basic tools to extract information out of people and to compel them to convict themselves out of their own mouths. If they said nothing, they were convicted of contempt. If they took the oath, they might be convicted out of their own mouth, or they might be punished severely for perjury if they were thought to have lied.

The classic example of subversion of the grand jury process, which, as you know, had been written into Magna Carta, were the courts of Star Chamber and High Commission of the Tudor and Stuart kings in the 16th and 17th centuries. The struggle between those kings and their subjects around the subversion of the grand jury and the protection of the English Constitution are written large on the history of England throughout those centuries. Hundreds were brought before those courts; hundreds went to jail; and hundreds even died rather than give up the grand jury protection of the British Constitution and the right to silence.

In the 18th century, in England the government continued to be successful in the abuse of the grand jury institution, and was able to mount literally hundreds of trials, or hundreds of accusations rather than trials, for sedition against English subjects, and it chilled and harassed political dissent.

But we also note that the struggle for the grand jury as an independent agency of the people and the community came to its very height in the 18th century in America because the grand jury came here and began to flourish in all its independent glory as part of the colonial experience.

We know, for example, so well was it known by the British subjects that the right to grand jury presentments or indictments was a fundamental part of the British Constitution, there was the utmost reluctance of colonial governors in this Nation to indict "on information." The star case here is that of Johann Peter Zenger whom two grand juries refused to indict, whereupon the Government tried him "on information." We know the resounding success of his acquital, reflecting the affirmation of the jury that trial "by information" was a crime against the Constitution.

The grand jury came to its height, as a defender of the American people against the harassment and arbitrary rule of the British imperial masters from the period from 1673 until the opening of the Revolution. One of the causes of that revolution was the passage by Britain of measures to bring all cases arising under the acts of trade before special admiralty courts. And we remember those courts were characterized by the fact that prosecution might take place before them on information from the Attorney General without having to go through a colonial grand jury. The use or the attempted use of these admiralty courts and the bypassing of the grand jury protection was, indeed, one of the causes of the Revolution. It was not for nothing, gentlemen, that in colonial days there was a universal toast in this country before the Revolution, "To the grand jury, the protector of our liberties."

All of this struggle of four centuries was then recorded and summarized with great conciseness in the Bill of Rights, and especially in the fifth amendment. The essence of the matter was that the struggle showed that the most precious right of an accused person was the right not to have to incriminate himself out of his own mouth and without the protection of the grand jury. And so important was this viewed that the Founding Fathers did not state this once in the fifth amendment, they stated it twice:

> No person shall be held to answer for capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.

That situation was summarized with great conciseness by the distinguished commentator and Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, Joseph Story, when he wrote:

> Grand juries perform most important public functions, and are a great security to the citizen against vindictive prosecutions, either by the Government or by political partisans or by private enemies.

In the latter part of the 19th century, grand juries began to reflect the rage of the American people at profound governmental corruption, like the Tweed ring, municipal corruption and abuse of power by the great corporations and railroad monopolies, and they began to develop on their own independent initiative far-ranging investigative powers. I think it remained for the Nixon administration not to set aside or sidetrack the grand jury but to convert it into its opposite, into an inquisitorial apparatus which the Constitution forbids, and make it a tool in the hands of the Government for the harassment of political dissent.

What I am saying here, gentlemen, is absolutely nothing new. This reality of what the Constitution mandates is familiar to all students of the law, but perhaps it is timely at this point to reaffirm what is fundamental. The grand jury was not brought into being by the Founding Fathers to preside over the persecutions and inquisitions of Government against the citizen. It was, on the contrary, designed to protect the citizens against the persecutions of the Government. And it was designed, I think, to be a watchdog and defender of the rights of the community and the citizen. It seems to me the Constitution and the history of this experience mandates that the grand jury be returned to that fundamental role which it is supposed to play.

And it is in that sense, in terms of remedies, leaving the details to my colleagues, I would conclude by saying that it is not—emphatically not—important or right, in my opinion, to have constitutional amendments to abolish the accusatory grand jury. I think that, on the contrary, an accusatorial role has to be maintained in order to act as the Constitution mandates. What is important is to return the grand jury to its independent role as a guardian of people's rights. And it is that task, I think, which is before the committee and in which I am sure we all wish it the utmost of success.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Professor Scott.

The members will now ask questions under the 5-minute rule, and the questions may be asked, of course, of any member of the panel or of the panel as a whole. If directed to the panel generally, I would suggest asking for volunteers from the panel to answer any questions that might come from the subcommittee.

I will start with a few questions, first to Ms. Peterson.

One of the many arguments made against grand jury reform in general is that abuses are a result of improper use of the system and not the system itself. For example, last year former Attorney General Levi stated that grand jury problems can be minimized by the selection of honest, qualified prosecutors and that no legislated reforms could provide adequate protections if abusive government attorneys are in power. Would you comment on this?

Ms. PETERSON. Could Mr. Borosage comment on this? Government misconduct is one of his specialties.

Mr. BOROSAGE. Purely an avocation, not a vocation.

The problem with the "good prince" theory is that it sets us up for a bad one. In the intelligence field, we have seen over the years continual proof of the fact that you cannot trust good men or good women to protect our liberties. It doesn't take much of a memory to remember that the Senate committee found that one of the people approving the appointment of J. Edgar Hoover to be head of the FBI was Roger Baldwin of the ACLU who considered Hoover to be one of the stars in civil liberties and civil rights.

It was Richard Helms, before all the abuses of the CIA came out, who said when asked how we could trust the CIA's activities without congressional oversight, said "You must assume we, too, are honorable men in the service of our country."

Obviously, what I think this committee should conclude about the grand jury is that good men or good women are not enough, and you must create checks and balances in legislation; you must create standards to which people can be held accountable.

Mr. EILBERG. Ms. Peterson, the Center's statement notes that you were cocounsel in the Fort Worth Five case. As you said, this controversy was really the inspiration for my bills and these hearings. Can you tell us, step by step, what has happened in that investigation since the confinement of the five and if there are any present proceedings in that case?

Ms. PETERSON. The five were found in contempt and incarcerated. We made bail applications which were denied both by the district judge, and by the fifth circuit in a panel on which the present Attorney General sat and wrote the opinions. Then we applied to the Supreme Court, and Justice Douglas let them out on bail pending the filing of our petition for certiorari. By that point, the fifth circuit had affirmed the contempts.

They were released, the first time mainly because of the issue of the possibility of foreign prosecution.

When the Supreme Court denied certiorari, they were reincarcerated. Wire top logs obtained in a criminal action in New York in which Frank Durkan was counsel for the defendant revealed that the government's denial of electronic surveillance of counsel for the witnesses had been inaccurate, as one of the Texas grand jury witnesses whom he and I represented had been overheard talking to Mr. Durkan on the phone. A habeas proceeding was started to get the witnesses out. A bail application was made in connection with that. At this point I was in Florida defending the VVAW and not actively involved in the Fort Worth Five case, so I was only consulting with Mr. Durkan by phone.

The district court denied bail, the fifth circuit denied bail. Justice Powell denied bail but Justice Douglas granted bail because of the attorney-client overhearing. I believe the grand jury expired while they were out on bail. They were threatened with being resubpenaed. They have never been resubpenaed. They have never been prosecuted. As far as I know, they have never been called as witnesses. There has never been any case that I know of that was brought in Texas or elsewhere out of that investigation.

Mr. EILBERG. Professor Scott, in the center's statement, there is a suggestion that the Supreme Court has, by a series of recent decisions, fostered grand jury abuse. Because of this perception by lawyers, have fewer cases of abuse been appealed, and are State appellate courts more liberal in their decisions as to rights and protections surrounding the grand jury?

Ms. COPELON. If the Chairman would permit me, perhaps I could answer that, since Ms. Peterson and myself are engaged in litigating these cases.

Mr. EILBERG. May we have your name again.

Ms. COPELON. I am Rhonda Copelon and a staff attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights.

The Supreme Court's hostility to preserving constitutional rights in the grand jury process is evidenced in a number of ways.

No. 1, to my knowledge, the Supreme Court has affirmed only one case of a grand jury witness who won a favorable decision below. This was Gelbard v. United States a./k./a. the Egan case, which had to do with the wiretapping in violation of 2515.

In every other instance in which the Supreme Court has granted certiorari it has reviewed and reversed a decision sustaining the witness' constitutional rights. And so we have had a series of reversals starting in 1972 with Branzburg v. Hayes, and coming right up to the present with United States v. Mandujano.

It is a devastating series of opinions. There are cases presently pending in the Court.

In addition, there have been a lot of erosions of due process and substantive rights by virtue of the Supreme Court's very process of denying certiorari in the cases that are decided against the witness below, even though the denial of certiorari does not, technically, have precedential effect. These decisions have a very real impact on what counsel does when confronted with going to the Supreme Court today.

For example, we have indicated to the committee that we think it is extremely important, as part of the reforms, that the prohibition on ex parte, secret, in camera material, be articulated in the bills in order to enforce what is the fundamental guarantee of Alderman v. United States, which is the requirement of disclosing information as a precondition to putting someone in jail or depriving them of significant liberty. Thus, if you don't disclose, you have to dismiss the proceeding. Our position is that the situation that happened in Jill Raymond's case should not have happened. We did not go to the Supreme Court for certiorari in Jill Raymond's case. She did not want to take the risk of their taking her case and making bad law.

Two justices of the Supreme Court, including Justice Douglas, who was extremely ill at that time, denied a stay when we made an application to the Supreme Court. And she decided that in view of that, the hostility of the Court was so great she didn't want them to take her case, even though there was an overwhelming factual showing which is also impossible to develop in grand jury litigation—it may not look overwhelming to you because there are holes in it we were never able to prove, but considering the limited discovery allowed in a grand jury case, it was extraordinary. We did not take that to the Supreme Court. She felt that to do that would be a waste of time or would give the Court an opportunity through denying certiorari or affirming the contempt, to make further bad law.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you.

Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. In order to save the committee time, Mr. Chairman, may I ask that with respect to the Center for Constitutional Rights, the Grand Jury project, and the Center for National Security Studies, the committee be supplied with information concerning the entities, such as the principal officers or board of governors or trustees.

Mr. EILBERG. They have indicated they agree to supply that to the subcommittee.

Ms. PETERSON. We will supply that information for the Center for Constitutional Rights.

CENTER FOR NATIONAL SECURITY STUDIES

BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF BACKGROUND AND ACTIVITIES

Background

The Center for National Security Studies was organized in the Fall of 1974 in response to the exercise of Executive power and prerogative in the name of "national security"—and the growth of instructions which claim that rationale. Through five administrations these institutions have fostered wars and repeated acts of intervention abroad, and the erosion of our liberties at home. Indochina and Watergate are shameful monuments to the widely shared assumption that matters of "national security" are above the limits of law, and beyond the control of the Congress or the people. And while the Watergate revelations have encouraged some to question Presidential claims to national or internal security prerogatives, neither the end of our involvement in Indochina nor the removal of a President has greatly circumscribed the powers of the Executive or the license of our national security institutions.

The Center's primary objective is to contribute to a public reappraisal of the purposes and policies of our national security institutions. The Center works with other groups and with concerned citizens in exposing secret policies to public debate.

The Center for National Security Studies is funded, by grants from the Field Foundation, the Veatch Committee, the Stern Fund and others. It is sponsored by the Fund for Peace, a non-profit institution concerned with world peace and justice.

Center activities

The Center

Conducts research and produces information on issues of national security;

Provides information and expertise to concerned groups, individuals, the press and Congress;

Sponsors conferences and public meetings designed to open national security issues to public discussion;

Coordinates the efforts of citizens' groups and individuals concerned about the issues;

Develops reform proposals to hold national security institutions accountable to the Congress and responsive to the people;

Assists individuals and groups seeking information under the Freedom of Information Act and coordinates litigation in related areas.

Center projects

The work of the Center is separated into a number of inter-related projects, each directed by an associate with experience and expertise in the area. The main projects include:

Project on the CIA and Covert Action.—Directed by John Marks. Operating in secret, and engaging in covert action beyond the reach of the law and without the knowledge or consent of the people, the CIA is the institutional expression of Executive national security prerogative. This Center project engages in extensive investigations of the CIA's clandestine operations at home and abroad, and seeks to stimulate public debate on U.S. involvement in covert action.

Project on Democracy and the Military.—Directed by David Cortright. The Vietnam War revealed widespread unrest in the military over undemocratic procedures and practices. This project explores the widespread disaffection in the military and the growing union organizing movement. It cooperates with other groups working on issues such as amnesty, troop reductions and military reforms.

Project on Domestic Security.—Directed by Jerry Berman. This project is designed to monitor and challenge Executive claims to internal security prerogatives. The focus of the project is the Federal Bureau of Investigation. It publishes materials on political intelligence, coordinates a committee of groups exploring ways to reform intelligence agencies, and works closely with organizations engaged in litigation to curb the illegal and unconstitutional activities of those agencies.

Project on National Security and Civil Liberties.—Directed by Morton Halperin. Secrecy has provided a veil for national security institutions, behind which every intelligence agency has engaged in activities which violate the rights and liberties of citizens at home and abroad. This project is designed to challenge these abuses. It encourages the use of the newly amended Freedom of Information Act, coordinates litigation and exposes information about various policies of national security bureaucracies, and uses the Act to reveal improperly classified information. It publishes a monthly newsletter which explores the relationship between national security prerogatives and civil liberties.

Project on Southern Africa and National Security.—Directed by Courtland Cox. U.S. policy toward southern Africa provides an important case study of national security policy abroad. A 1970 White House policy review placed the United States in greater sympathy with the white regimes in southern Africa, slighting internationally-declared objections, and the smoldering aspirations of the black majorities. This project has undertaken a study of the policies of national security institutions in this area. It seeks to inform Americans, especially black Americans on evolving American policy toward southern Africa.

Project on Interns.—Directed by Susan Kaplan. Undergraduate, graduate and law students work at the Center during the academic year as part of the Center's intern project, participating in the various projects. During the summer they participate in special "task forces" focusing on topics which have included: military intelligence; policing in the social service agencies; and racism in the military.

Special studies sponsored by CNSS include:

Project on U.S. Labor and Western Europe.—Directed by Elizabeth Eudy. This project is writing a book on CIA/U.S. Labor activities in France and Italy.

Project on Police and Military Arms Trade and Aid Abroad.—Directed by Mike Klare. This project carries on research and writing on the nature of American aid to police in other nations, and the trade and aid in armaments throughout the world.

CENTER FOR NATIONAL SECURITY STUDIES

The Center for National Security Studies is an independent organization devoted to nonpartisan research and publication on national security issues. A central concern is the relationship between traditional liberties and freedoms and the exercise of state power in the name of national security. The principal purpose of the Center is to promote public understanding and involvement in these issues of national importance.

The Center is an independent, non-profit, tax-exempt project of the Fund for Peace. It is financed by tax-deductible contributions from private donors and foundations and receives no government funds or support.

Mr. FISH. Professor, I was very interested in what you had to say as far as the history, and what I'd like to explore since you mentioned the term "Anglo-American jurisprudence" is the role, for example, of the grand jury in other English-speaking countries like Great Britain and Canada.

It is my understanding that just about the time the grand jury was developing in this country, the English saw no further need for it and abolished it. And I don't think the Canadians today use it.

What have they substituted for an independent community role and a guarantee that the rights of the accused be addressed?

Mr. SCOTT. I wish I could answer your question. I think that I have to say that I don't know. As you know, the British abolished the grand jury in 1933 or thereabouts after a long period of grand jury decay. What the experience of Great Britain and Canada has been, what they have substituted for community role, what new problems of abuse of power they have faced, if any, I cannot tell you.

I would say this, though, that I think in these hearings we owe a great debt of gratitude, not because we have answers but because you are raising new questions. And I think one of the things that concerns me and my students at Rutgers is to try and begin now to find answers posed by the extraordinary actions of the Nixon administration and the past years. And all I can say at the moment is that we are going to focus our investigations for the next period very, very closely on precisely this kind of question.

I cannot answer your question substantively at this time because I don't know.

Mr. EILBERG. Professor, would you be able to supply for the record that information? If you can get it together for us, I think it would be a useful addition to the record.

Professor SCOTT. I'd be more than happy to undertake that project for you, yes.

Mr. FISH. Without going into specifics, very recently, as occurs frequently, a group of Congressmen went up to Canada, and in the course of our discussions with members of Parliament I think a number of us came away with the feeling that there was a first-class viable democracy, but they didn't go anywhere near as far as we do as far as rights of the individual.

First, let me ask a question of everybody. Is anybody in favor of abolishing the grand jury? You all think that this is a patient that can be restored to good health?

Ms. PETERSON. I think I can speak on behalf of the panel that we are all vigorously opposed to abolishing the function of the grand jury which is provided for in the Fifth Amendment. We are very much opposed to tampering with the Bill of Rights at all. We believe in expanding the rights of the people.

Mr. FISH. I think it was you, Ms. Peterson, who made a suggestion that the prosecutor does not go before the grand jury, but the individual who presents the case to the grand jury is a different individual from the person who will be prosecuting the case. Is that what you're saying?

Ms. PETERSON. Let me explain that a little more. The prosecutor now is in a conflict of interest situation. The prosecutor is a litigant before the grand jury; its constitutional role is to screen or question the sufficiency and appropriateness of this request for an indictment. At the same time, however, he is the advisor to the grand jury on legal questions. And if the grand jury has a question, for example, about how much evidence he should present in order for it to be proper for them to vote an indictment, the prosecutor is now the person whom they must ask. If there were special counsel, the prosecutor would be more clearly confined to the litigant role of presenting evidence to the grand jury, and would be less able to dominate and control its review.

At present, grand juries don't act independently. They don't decide who to call before them, what questions to ask, when to excuse witnesses.

Phillip Shinnick recently was released from prison. I am sure the grand jury was never consulted about whether or not he should have been released, just as they were never consulted on whether or not he should have been called. The prosecutor makes all of these decisions.

We are glad he was released, but nonetheless, it was not the grand jury that made the decisions; it was the prosecutor and/or the FBI. The grand juries are supposed to be screening the prosecutor's evidence, but they can't independently screen the evidence of somebody who is controlling them. That is why we think it's necessary to separate these two functions and to give the grand jury a legal advisor so that they do not need to constantly turn to the prosecutor.

Mr. FISH. Let me cut you short because we are operating on the 5-minute rule.

You are not talking about an assistant district attorney as distinct from the district attorney. You are talking about somebody entirely separate.

Ms. PETERSON. Yes; we are not talking about a regular or special prosecutor who would initiate proceedings or superintend the gathering of evidence. We are talking about someone who can assist the grand jury when it seeks legal advice. The simplest and, we believe, most effective way of institutionalizing this advisory role is through the system of law clerks to the grand jury. After graduation from law school some students become law clerks to Federal judges. They serve for only a year or two.

Likewise, law clerks could be appointed on a short term basis to serve as legal advisor to one or more grand juries. These clerks would be employees of the judiciary and given instruction in how to fulfill their duty of assisting the grand jury in the exercise of its independent screening function. The grand jury is supposed to be an arm of the court, and yet its advisor is now a member of the executive branch.

Mr. FISH. Thank you very much.

Mr. EILBERG. Before introducing the next member, I have the obligation to leave this hearing and go to the floor of the House to both get permission for the subcommittee to sit after 11 o'clock, and to introduce the guest chaplain for today, so I will be leaving in a few minutes and I will ask Mr. Hall to take the chair.

Mr. Hall, please.

Mr. HALL. One question I would like to ask. With reference to the Fort Worth case, did I detect that there is any attacking of the court system as to the manner in which they interpreted it and carried out the mandate of what they thought was right in the Fort Worth case? I gather that in some instances the lady who spoke here last—you got some stays from Justice Douglas, and then you had a panel decision in the fifth circuit which upheld certain things that were done in the Fort Worth case.

Are you attacking the court system as it applied to the Fort Worth case?

Ms. PETERSON. No; I was attacking specific decisions. For example, the decision of the panel to take in camera material and not show it to us after the Government on appeal admitted that it had discovered some wiretap. It said the wiretaps were in a separate investigation. During the district court proceedings the Government had denied such wiretap.

The procedure under Alderman is to remand for a taint hearing before the district court. The fifth circuit did not follow that procedure.

Mr. HALL. I don't intend to interrupt you, certainly, but as I gather, we are getting away from the function of what we are here for today. In that instance, as I understand it, the court took evidence and made certain decisions based upon the evidence as presented to it from the five and made its findings; is that correct?

Ms. PETERSON. Yes, but what we are recommending is that such findings should not be made without adversarial hearings. We are recommending that teeth be put into legislation that is passed requiring such adversarial hearings.

Ms. COPELON. Mr. Hall, if I could add to that, your question raises a very good question as to why we as litigators are here before the Congress today.

In response to Mr. Eilberg's question before, I indicated that we are in a time when the courts are withdrawing the rights of the people. And we do not agree with the interpretation of the Constitution as expounded by the Supreme Court today and as applied by the lower courts. When the courts fail to fulfill the constitutional duty to safeguard the Bill of Rights, then is the legislature's duty to fill that void.

The task of this body is to reinvest the judicial system with the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, and with the standards of review and with the procedures required to ensure that these constitutional rights are protected. We cannot deny or fool ourselves that there is in the judicial decisions today there is a real erosion of fundamental constitutional guarantees. This erosion of rights generally, as well as in the grand jury process, is part of the legacy of the Nixon administration.

Mr. HALL. Well, it is not your testimony here today that all of the evils of the grand jury system originated in the Nixon administration, is it? I have noticed that has been in the testimony of all the witnesses—not all of them but some—that all of this peaked during this era.

Ms. COPELON. It is the testimony, I think, of the panel—and others could add their comments on that—that the Nixon administration took advantage of a gradual and very limited process of erosion to accomplish an immense erosion of fundamental guarantees.

The fifth amendment, for example, has been whittled away over time. But it is only in the last few years that through the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 which provided use immunity, and a series of decisions putting targets, for example, at the mercy of the grand jury, that we see the culmination of that development, which is unprecedented in history of this country.

Mr. HALL. Thank you.

Mr. Harris.

Mr. HARRIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like to ask Ms. Backiel: You all have been studying grand jury abuses for a couple of years, as I understand it. Do you feel that the incidence of grand jury abuses is tended to recede or increase over the past few years?

Ms. BACKIEL. Statistically I couldn't say. It seems to me that the targets of politically motivated investigations are different. Originally it was the antiwar movement and the veterans' movement, and it has been the black movement; it has been the women's movement. Now the focus seems to be on the Puerto Rican movement and the native American movement. I don't see any decrease quantitatively. I do see a shift in the targets of the politically motivated investigations.

Mr. HARRIS. You think that the incidence of abuse has been relatively constant, right?

Ms. BACKIEL. Certainly between the end of 1973 and the beginning of 1975 there was a large lull in the activity that coincided somewhat with the Watergate grand jury. And I think for awhile grand juries were not being used in that Cointelpro fashion.

But I don't feel now that the use of politically motivated grand juries is on the wane—no, not right now.

Mr. HARRIS. There have been a number of cases where individuals have gone to jail rather than testify before the grand jury under a grant of immunity.

Ms. BACKIEL. Quite a few.

Mr. HARRIS. Would you summarize for me why someone would go to jail instead of testifying.

Ms. BACKIEL. I think that there are a number of reasons, but they cluster around the feeling that the fifth amendment protects one's right not only to be free from compulsory self-incrimination but also a right to silence, to protect other values, for example, values of confidence and trust in a relationship which doesn't fall within any particular evidentiary privilege; values of community coherence and cohesion, a feeling that it is improper for the Government to compel an individual to name all of his or her political associates and describe their affiliations and activities; that that kind of information should not be compelled from an individual. And to protect the integrity of those activities and organizations and individuals and relationships, an individual will go to jail—also to protect his or her beliefs in what the Constitution says and the applicability of the Bill of Rights to people subpenaed before a grand jury.

Mr. HARRIS. So, it is not a matter of being stubborn is it?

Ms. BACKIEL. I think they have commitments that they consider more important than going to jail for 18 months.

Mr. HARRIS. I was impressed, frankly, at your uniform definition of the grand jury system. I have never known that many people who have served on a grand jury.

Ms. BACKIEL. Neither have I.

Mr. HARRIS. Are there uniform standards for appointing grand jurors, are those standards met nationwide?

Ms. BACKIEL. Rhonda Copelon should answer that question.

Ms. COPELON. I am a board member of the national jury project and have been involved for the past 4 or 5 years in a number of challenges to the composition of grand juries and am somewhat familiar with that situation.

There is, in fact, a standard method which was enacted in 1968 by the Congress for selecting grand and petit jurors, and that is in 28 U.S.C. 1861.

That procedure is supposed to guarantee representative cross-sectional petit and grand juries, and it is supposed to guarantee the right of every person to serve on grand juries.

There are very substantial problems with the implementation of that act, which I will not go into in depth here. One of the fundamental problems with it is with the voter registration lists. The voter registration list is mandated as the basic source for the drawing of names. The voter registration list is very underrepresentative of minority populations. That has been documented by the census.

The statute is actually a very good statute in that it says,

> Where there is a substantial underrepresentation of a minority community, the court shall order that the voter lists be supplemented from other sources which would make the list more representative.

The courts are terribly unwilling to apply the congressional mandate to supplement. I think there is one Federal district in the country now which is using multiple source lists which, in fact, is drawing representational grand juries. Clearly to be able to fulfill its constitutional function, the grand jury must adequately reflect the minority populations.

Mr. HALL. I hate to interrupt you, but it is the 5-minute time.

Mr. HARRIS. I want to thank you for your answer. I appreciate it very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Evans.

Mr. EVANS. Directed at the panel, do you find that most of the grand juries now in fact operate under the concept that they are a tool of the prosecutor rather than the prosecutor being an aid to the grand jury and is it fairly uniform?

Ms. PETERSON. That has been our experience, and the attitude which grand jurors have reflected as reported to us by witnesses who have been in grand jury rooms and talked to them.

Mr. EVANS. Do you have documented cases of abuse from witnesses who have appeared before the grand juries that they were harassed by the prosecutor in the grand jury room?

Ms. PETERSON. Yes. For example, witnesses have the right to come out in the hall and consult with counsel. In the case of the Fort Worth five when they asked to exercise this right witnesses were told, they would have to wait. They would be asked several questions before they were allowed to leave. Witness was asked whether he was sitting in a chair to convey to the grand jury that the witness was doing something wrong by leaving to and consulting with counsel. Or a witness will be asked "Who are your attorneys? Where are they?" Witnesses are made to feel very intimidated by having to go out. They feel that somehow they are going to be punished for that, too.

Ms. BACKIEL. I think there is also a problem of grand jurors being intimidated by a prosecutor who tells them that if they don't issue indictments when he leaves, there is enough evidence, they will be dismissed. Or grand jurors are abused because they are not informed of the subject matter of the investigation, and they are expected to just sit there and literally rubberstamp.

And grand juries in some cases are beginning to issue reports complaining about this, the supervising, and things like that, and I think we are just beginning to learn about grand juries who are sometimes dismissed in the middle of an investigation because the prosecutor doesn't consider them to be competent enough.

Mr. EVANS. You have given a lot of testimony dealing with the use of grand juries in intimidating political dissenters. Do you also find abuse in the investigation of organized crime or investigations under the omnibus crime bill?

Ms. PETERSON. I am afraid we are not as familiar with that and we really can't comment on that.

Mr. EVANS. Well, can you imagine that there would be the same type of abuses in these cases, especially under the most recent administration?

Ms. PETERSON. For some time now, the Justice Department has pursued a policy of punishing people who wouldn't cooperate by putting them in jail for contempt where they couldn't use the substantive statutes against them. Paul Cowan addresses this in a New York Times magazine article.

Mr. EVANS. Do you see any difference between the use of the fifth amendment rights or protecting one's rights not to testify against himself and the right not to testify at all before a grand jury?

Ms. COPELON. I am not sure I understand your question. I think our position on what the fifth amendment means is that it means that there is an absolute right to silence. Now, I don't know if that answers your question.

Mr. EVANS. That answers my question.

You are saying there is no difference, that if you don't want to testify you shouldn't have to testify whether it involves you or not.

Professor SCOTT. Historically, as I understand it, sir, there never was any penalty for refusal to testify. Grand juries in the earlier period, for example, would subpena witnesses. If the witnesses refused to answer, there was no penalty. There was no conception of coercive immunity. There was no possibility to coerce the witness to compel him to testify.

I think I'd have to say that from the historical evidence, the concept of the right to silence embodied in the fifth amendment right is not, as it is so often called, a privilege, but as near to an absolute right as one can conceive in the Constitution.

Mr. EVANS. I think if we will continue along this path we will not have to worry about obtaining evidence. We can just make someone appear and testify and convict them on the basis of that and also convict their friends or associates. So we shouldn't have to have an investigatory power at all. We just need the police to get them in and question everybody and put them in jail if they don't testify.

Would you say that is the trend in which we are headed?

Ms. BAKIEL. I don't think we are terribly far from that now.

Ms. COPELON. In addition, in organized crime there are people who have spent 4 or 5 years in jail before they have gotten out, and it seems to me that is a clear example of using contempt as a substitute for attempting to prove substantive crimes.

Mr. EVANS. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Railsback.

Mr. RAILSBACK. I don't have any questions.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If we could pursue this role of investigatory power. Let's say it's eliminated as a power of the grand jury. Wouldn't that lead to a direct investigatory power being granted to the FBI or the prosecutors and, if so, isn't this far more dangerous?

Ms. COPELON. We don't see that the elimination of the investigatory function of the grand jury as an adjunct to the FBI or the prosecutor leads to that result. In fact, what we have today is a system where the grand jury is simply a thin veil for what the prosecutor and what the FBI want to do.

Through it, the FBI and the prosecutor have the very power that we have all wanted to keep away from them.

I think that we all share a horror of the executive branch of the Government having that kind of power. It is seen, for example, in the less visible aspects of grand jury abuse which Ms. Bakiel described before, where what you have is terror in the community, intelligence gathering in the community, fears and divisions, simply by virtue of the fact that the FBI agents have effectively the subpena power in their pocket.

One need not have an agency equipped with the power to punish the assertion of the right to silence. It is not something which is or would be asserted that often, particularly in a system which could encourage participation by voluntarily exchanging transactional immunity for testimony. The power to punish for contempt, which the grand jury or the prosecutor acquires through the ability to coerce immunity, is the power to push people into jail, avoiding all the accusatorial guarantees of presumptions of innocence, of burdens of proof, of jury trials, of basic due process rights.

In fact, the modern state has a wealth of investigatory instruments that far transcend the imagination of the framers. The easy use of the subpena power to force people to testify at the cost of going to jail is something which invites abuse and circumvention of the true investigatory function of the executive.

Mr. FISH. This question is addressed to anybody who cares to answer it, but I think it is one of the center's suggestions of reform, the presence of the counsel in the proceedings.

And I'd just like someone to explore the function—and remember, we have also advocates-prosecutors, not the law clerk now.

What would be the function of an attorney for the witness in the grand jury room? And to elaborate on a comment one of you made in your oral presentation, which was that any uses or any behavior that were remarked on by the witnesses and attorneys could be done in other ways. Would you elaborate on that?

Ms. PETERSON. There is available to the courts at the present time the contempt power which can be used against attorneys. The contempt power is used only against attorneys for defendants. It is never used against prosecutors for equal or worse behavior. Also, a matter can be referred to bar disciplinary committees which help to control the behavior of lawyers.

I am concerned about adding another sanction—the removal of counsel—in the grand jury situation because it will be used by prosecutors or courts who don't like the attorneys who are vigorously representing certain witnesses—to get rid of counsel of choice.

This hapepned in the case of Arthur Banks, which I referred to in our long statement, where he had selected an attorney of his choice. The district court removed that attorney claiming misbehavior. It took litigation all the way up to the Supreme Court to get Mr. Banks counsel of his choice. Fortunately the appellate courts stayed his trial pending their review of the exclusion of his counsel. But such stays are not routinely granted in respect to trials and would be even rarer in the grand jury context. In the face of a statute authorizing removal of counsel, the prosecutor or court could easily force either the incarceration of a witness or his/her testimony and there would be, at best, belated review for the contemnor. Indeed, if a witness, by being deprived of counsel of choice, can be cajoled or frightened into testifying, there would be no occasion for the appeals courts to review the removal. This would be an ominous power.

Mr. FISH. Professor, in your historical perspective, do you see any grounds for a grand jury being used as an investigative mechanism, or do you think it should be limited strictly to the original purpose that you described?

Professor SCOTT. Well, of course, the original purpose as an accusatory body and as endorsing, if you like, or OK'ing deliberations of pretrial investigations of the magistrate—there was an inevitable investigatory aspect in the grand jury from quite early days. If they had a suspect before them, they might want to investigate, that is, hear a couple of witnesses to assure themselves that, indeed, there was a prima facie case. The point there is that they were investigating in the context of a suspect whose name was before them.

Now, it is very clear that that investigatorial role expanded to an enormous degree in the period after the Civil War and between the Civil War and World War I and was directed to official corruption or a crime or gambling or whatever.

It does seem to me there is a role for both of these functions, but that the investigatorial type which was a much broader type of investigation directed to alleged public corruption requires, indeed, some further statutory regulation and control.

It does seem to me that there are, indeed, grounds historically for maintaining both these somewhat distinct functions as important functions of the grand jury.

Mr. FISH. I am glad you mentioned that, sir, because before this committee also is the question of whether or not we should establish an office of special prosecutor, largely to look into matters of official corruption. And, of course, that brings up questions as to why shouldn't the Justice Department do this itself? Why should it need to have an independent special prosecutor?

So I gather what you are saying is that in those cases you see a legitimate role for a grand jury.

Professor SCOTT. Yes, I think precisely on account of the abysmal experience of the Nixon administration, that wide-ranging investigatorial role does require statuatory and congressional definition.

Mr. FISH. Is there time for one more?

Mr. HALL. Yes.

Mr. FISH. The Grand Jury project in its prepared testimony states the vast majority of those confined as recalcitrant witnesses in political cases were women.

I must confess I was surprised to hear this. Can you tell me what kind of cases we are talking about and the basis for this statement?

Ms. BACKIEL. There are a couple of reasons for that. One is that the early 1975 investigation centered around the women's activities in New Haven and Hartford because the FBI said they were trying to find suspects who were women who they suspected had lived with women or gay communities.

Subpenaed before the grand jury in New Haven were four witnesses, all of whom were women. So the investigation that took place really nationwide but culminated in only two grand juries was specifically focused around women active in the women's movement.

That is one reason.

I think the other reason is that grand jury subpenas are often calculated to put people who are considered the most vulnerable in the position of choosing whether or not to go to jail.

Another phenomenon we have noticed is grand jury witnesses being singled out not so much according to any predictable or rational pattern for who would have the most evidence, but rather who was most vulnerable. Therefore, subpenas have been issued to single mothers who have the additional problem of figuring out who'd have custody of their children and facing the possibility of losing their children if they chose to go to jail rather than testify.

We think the singling out of women is symptomatic of the perception of the FBI that women are not particularly strong or vulnerable to a lot of pressure and will be crushed under the pressure; and also that women who are alone and caring for children are in a difficult position with respect to choosing to go to jail.

Mr. HALL. One question I'd like to ask the panel. You dispute the contentions by the Justice Department that immunity is a necessary weapon against organized crime. What do you base that upon? It appears to me you'd have to have an immunity provision in many instances where you were having to get into the organized crime that exists in this country today.

Ms. COPELON. Mr. Hall, the reality of the history of this country is that immunity was very rarely used up until 1970, so that we survived many years without having to have the power to compel people to talk or face going to jail.

Our position is that the fifth amendment guarantees against being compelled to testify under pain of contempt, and that the fifth amendment brooks no arguments of efficiency.

Even if one moves from that position, it is indisputable that the fifth amendment, at the very least, places on the executive branch of Government an extraordinarily heavy burden to prove with particularity where immunity is useful.

The Justice Department has not done that. The Justice Department has told us that a survey of prosecutors says that compelled immunity is useful. That is not something you can tackle. It is not something you can evaluate. You cannot tell, for example, in what narrow circumstances, if any, compelled immunity might work. You don't know that. The Department has refused to provide this committee with the kind of information that would enable it to examine the purported usefulness in the different criminal law contents. We say that where you are going to take away rights that are of the dimension of the fifth amendment, there is an enormous burden on the Government. The Government has survived in the past without the power to immunize.

Mr. HALL. Don't you think that in the past several years you have had a change in the type of crime that we now see running around in this country, and just under the very situation that now exists it is nearly mandatory to a Federal prosecutor or to the Federal agencies, in order to make a case, in order to have the power and the right to grant immunity, to have some people who will help them in these particular areas.

Ms. COPELON. I think that is an assumption. It is not substantiated. The Watergate special prosecutor did not employ compelled immunity; he got the testimony that he wanted through consensual immunity. If there were a transactional immunity statute which was consensual, the Government would, in fact, be giving people something for their testimony and it would be a real carrot to people to go along with and provide the evidence to the Government.

It is impossible even to judge the effectiveness of immunity in terms of its consensual possibilities under a system of use immunity, because use immunity is not a meaningful guarantee to anyone, particularly to someone who is, for example, an accessory, against whom the Government has plenty of information, and whose testimoney is only going to add the tail on the dog, in terms of their vulnerability to prosecution. There is also no guarantee that the Government will not manufacture a trial to the very evidence which the immunized testimony provided.

I think we are in a situation where it is impossible to judge the difference between the effectiveness of voluntary transactional and coerced immunity. The burden is on the Department of Justice at the very least to give us the objective information necessary to determine whether there is any circumstance where immunity could be justified.

We don't think it would ever be constitutionally justified, but in terms of testing the assumptions which led, in fact, to the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, a case analysis should be made.

Mr. HALL. That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Professor SCOTT. Can I add a word to that which is outside of the context of the law but perhaps is relevant.

I think that the Nixon legislation was based upon a tremendous and justified fear of the disintegration of the social order and increased crime. However, I would add the point here that one could argue that the enormously increased crime rates of the last few years might be thought of as a function of the decay of our cities and the disintegration of the social order arising out of a failure of Government at all levels to cope with tremendous new economic and social needs. If this new economic and social crisis results in crime which is then used as an excuse for taking away fundamental constitutional rights, I think we have the whole thing the wrong way around. And I think the Congress has to focus on the most fundamental causes of crime rather than try to wash the tides back with a broom. And the facts of crime arising out of intolerable social conditions must not be used as a reason for the abolition of fundamental constitutional rights.

Mr. BOROSAGE. I think one of the functions this committee could serve would be to have the GAO do a study of those instances in which forced immunity was useful, what the crimes were, who the people who received immunity were, what they confessed to or what they testified to, whether it was important or not, instead of having to debate our contention versus the contention of the Justice Department, which is where it is at now.

I suspect there is a great dilemma here, using Mr. Hall's standards of commonsense, if you are a member of an organized crime coterie, you face a more severe sanction for talking than you do for silence. The only way you are going to be able to use forced immunity to force someone like that to talk is to put him behind bars for a very long time. Six months or a year they can do standing on their hands. One of the things I am certain that most people in this panel, and I would hope in the Congress, are unwilling to do is to give a weapon to the prosecutor by which he can put someone in jail for years and years without a trial and without review. If you are not willing to do that, I think maintaining forced immunity with a reiterative shorter penalty serves only to harass the weak or politically active and nothing much more.

Mr. HALL. As an example, this committee had testimony last week, if I may get into it, with reference to the illegal alien situation in these United States. We had a man who appeared before this committee who has turned what I call State's evidence to help the Federal people and the immigration people to break in and determine how the immigrants are getting into this country. And he came in with a hood because of fear of what might happen to him.

Well, in many instances the Federal Government, customs people, immigration people, would have a difficult job, as I see it, trying to ferret out and find out and determine how these people are getting into this country unless they had someone they could rely upon.

Mr. BOROSAGE. But the person you could rely on is the man who came to you with a hood, who volunteers to take immunity. The person forced to take immunity may not tell you the truth, and may resist saying anything at all of worth.

Mr. HALL. I am not saying what this man said was truthful, but I am saying I can see a situation like that where they'd need some sort of assistance.

Mr. BOROSAGE. I agree with you. I think giving voluntary immunity is an important function that allows the Government to break into the hierarchical or secret organization—give someone immunity and have him testify and go up the ladder. That is what happened in the Watergate investigation. But that is voluntary. And the person who volunteers for immunity you can rely on generally, and you can get testimony. The person you force immunity on is in a very different situation, and is not the person who came before you in the committee and is not the person who is going to be particularly helpful in the illegal alien situation.

Mr. HALL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Evans.

Mr. EVANS. Addressing this to the panel again, I agree with the concept you have on force immunity. I think you get a very unreliable witness when you force immunity on a person, and oftentimes that person is in more danger of his life by testifying than he is by refusing to testify and go to jail. But I am concerned somewhat about the opinion you expressed on the fifth amendment right.

It has always been my concept that the fifth amendment right was against self-incrimination and that the public has a right to some extent to have testimony where that testimony does not incriminate the person testifying. And I think I have seen cases in the past in which the public does have a right to this testimony where it does not incriminate the person testifying.

Do you see any instances, or are there any precedents that you have seen, in which the public has a right to testimony of individuals where it does not incriminate that person?

It is sort of a duty of citizenship type concept.

Ms. COPELON. There is a concept of the duty of citizenship, and I think maybe Professor Scott should answer this. Historically what has been described as the grand jury's "right to every man's evidence" or every person's evidence—that right was always limited, until coerced immunity came in, by the fifth amendment. That is, by the concomitant right of the person not to give evidence. This does not mean that there is not a penalty attached, socially, publicly, economically, to the claim of the fifth amendment. It is not that by claiming the fifth amendment nothing happens to a person. Obviously, there can be a tremendous impact on refusing to give testimony. So there are enormous social pressures in certain kinds of circumstances to cooperate, just as there are enormous pressure not to in other circumstances.

But the coersion of testimony is not the way to deal with that problem, and the fundamental right to refuse one's evidence, in order to be meaningful, must be that original right to silence that the common law understood.

Mr. BOROSAGE. The other problem, Congressman, is the notion of waiver, that if you testify a little bit about something you can't then refuse to answer the next question, because that one will incriminate you. The court decisions that you can waive your fifth amendment rights, opening the door to a line of questioning, make attorneys wary of recommending to their witnesses that they testify in a situation where they could be incriminated. They say, "After you say your name, don't say anything else."

Mr. EVANS. I think my question is a little more basic than that in that it would involve people who would not be incriminated in any way by their own testimony but would have special knowledge of events which would aid in the prosecution of a case. I have sat outside the grand jury room on many occasions to consult with witnesses, so I am familiar with what you are talking about. I am wondering if there is any concept in which you felt that the public or the State had a right to testimony where it did not incriminate the person giving the testimony, but that person might not want to give it because he was a reporter and he didn't want to give a source, or it was a friend and he didn't want to incriminate a friend.

Is there a public right to information in such instances?

Professor SCOTT. I think that the fifth amendment would indicate that the balancing and the decision here rests with the individual. I think perhaps I'd also have to say at the risk of being called an idealist, that democracy, which is at best an uncertain experiment, rests ultimately, if you like, on a Jeffersonian notion, that the ordinary citizen who, indeed, does have an interest in law and order and a peaceful and secure life ordinarily has a very profound interest ordinarily in revealing wrongdoing.

We all know—and it happens every day of the week—there are people who, for one reason or another, will not get involved because they are not involved. But I think in the last resort we are saying that the investigation of crime and the maintenance of public law and order depends upon the cooperation of the citizenry. And it is that cooperation which I think normally, since we have faith in people, we assume, and that normally, even though there are costs and even though the right may be abused, we say the public has such an overwhelming interest, too, in the right to silence and non-self-incrimination that the price of that constitutional right also has to be paid. What is being done here, in effect, is balancing off a number of important values, one against another, all of which compete, and all of which have a right to be heard. There is in a fundamental sense no ultimate answer to your question, except the inculcation of a strong sense of civic duty in citizens, and also a clear understanding of the nature of the privilege or the immunity that the fifth amendment gives them, so when that right is exercised it will, indeed, be exercised responsibly and not irresponsibly.

Mr. EVANS. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. I want to say that the subcommittee is very grateful to all members of the panel. We thank you for giving us the product of your experience and your study and research, and we look forward to continuing to hear from you. And in that connection, we would like to submit the questions that we did not have time to ask this morning, and hope that you will let us have responses as soon as you reasonably can. We want to have your input.

You may not want to comment on this, but the bills introduced under my signature represent things we learned from the hearings in the last Congress, and we hope it is in the right direction. Of course, it remains to be seen how the House feels about these matters.

Thank you again, Thank you very much.

Ms. COPELON. Thank you.

Professor SCOTT. Thank you.

Ms. PETERSON. Thank you.

Ms. BACKIEL. Thank you.

SUPPLEMENTAL WRITTEN ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS FROM THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP AND INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY FROM THE PANEL CONSISTING OF DORIS PETERSON AND RHONDA COPELON OF THE CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS; LINDA BAKIEL OF THE GRAND JURY PROJECT; ROBERT L. BOROSAGE OF THE CENTER FOR NATIONAL SECURITY STUDIES; AND PROF. JOHN ANTHONY SCOTT, LEGAL HISTORIAN, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW

Q 1. One of the many arguments made against grand jury reform in general is that abuses are a result of improper use of the system and not the system itself. For example, last year former Attorney General Levi stated that grand jury problems can be minimized by the selection of honest, qualified prosecutors and that no legislated reforms could provide adequate protections if abusive government attorneys are in power. Would you comment on this?

A 1. This question was answered by Mr. Borosage in his oral testimony.

Q. 2. Issue of grand jury abuse is an elusive concept which is often difficult to document. On the other hand, in my judgment, there are certain activities which are a clear indication of abuse of this institution. In this regard, can you indicate how often the following has occurred based on your research or alternatively can you give us specific examples of the following: (1) reiterative contempt (2) subpoenaing of targets before the grand jury (3) use of grand jury to gain evidence in pending cases (4) use of grand jury to gather intelligence information?

A 2. It is even more difficult to quantify the problem of grand jury abuse than it is to define it. The Department of Justice, which is the only agency in a position to keep track of how many times targets are subpoenaed, how many times coerced immunity yields usable results or how often grand jury investigations are used to accomplish pretrial discovery in pending cases, does not record this information and/or make it accessible to the public. Specific examples illustrate the problems, however.

(1) Reiterative contempt.—It is rare that a grand jury witness incarcerated for civil contempt after refusing to cooperate with an investigation for political reasons is released without at least a reminder of the power of the U.S. Attorney to resubpoena her or him. Threats to this effect were made explicit in the cases of Phil Shinnick ("SLA" investigation), Jill Raymond ("Susan Saxe/Kathy Power" investigation), Lureida Torres (1975 "FALN" investigation) and others. In the Shinnick-Weiner and Raymond cases it was clear that the investigations focusing on them stopped as soon as they were jailed for contempt.

Among political grand jury contempt prisoners who have been served second subpoenas in connection with a single investigation are: Pedro Archuletta (currently imprisoned on two citations of civil contempt in related "FALN" investigations in Chicago and New York). In Chicago, explicit threats were made by members of U.S. Attorney Margolis' office to the effect that new subpoenas would be issued to recalcitrant witnesses presently jailed when the term of the current grand jury expires in February, 1978.

In New Haven, Connecticut, Terri Turgeon and Ellen Grusse were both resubpoenaed the day of their release from prison and served an additional six months after being held in contempt a second time for refusal to answer any questions in relation to the Saxe/Power investigation. We believe these examples illustrate on ever-present potential for abuse.

There are also several variations on the problem of reiterative contempt, including the "material witness arrest" and subsequent contempt confinement of Leslie Bacon and Ivis Longvisitor, and the criminal contempt indictment of Jane Alpert, following a commitment for contempt for refusing to testify during the course of a criminal trial.

(2) Subpoenaing of targets.—In the political cases, many of those subpoenaed are frequently also targets of the investigation. For example, eight of those subpoenaed to Tallahassee in connection with the VVAW investigation were later indicted (and subsequently acquitted).

Phil Shinnick, Jay Weiner, Jack and Micki McGee Scott, and others were subpoenaed to Harrisburg and Scranton in connection with the "SLA" investigation. To the extent that it was a bona fide investigation into whether federal fugutives had been harbored in the jurisdiction, the "witnesses" were also targets of potential harboring prosecutions. (No indictments on this charge were ever issued.)

In the current New York and Chicago investigations, at least one witness—Pedro Archuleta, has been identified by U.S. Attorneys in Chicago as a "subject" of the investigation, jailed for refusing to furnish exemplars, and not granted immunity there. In New York the same witness was immunized and jailed for refusing to answer questions clearly related to the subject matter of the Chicago investigations following an invocation of his Fifth Amendment rights. Once again, we believe these examples illustrate a serious problem which is presently unchecked and which must be limited by specific legislation.

(3) After acquired evidence.—The refusal of the prosecutors to certify evidence already obtained at the time of an order compelling testimony suggests strongly that grand juries are viewed by them as a means of obtaining evidence for trial. Protective orders and requests for certification of evidence were resisted and denied in every case we have been involved in. The most flagrant recent example is the case of Pedro Archuleta (simultaneously a witness and a target). Indictments are pending in both jurisdictions. Also, orders compelling the production of physical exemplars—which account for six of the present nine civil contempt prisoners in the New York-Chicago investigations—suggest that the grand jury is being used as a pretrial discovery device. The prosecutorial insistence on "fresh" evidence is to get evidence admissible for trial purposes. In the Phil Shinnick case the prosecutors insisted on Shinnick supplying fresh fingerprints and handwriting exemplars even though he had previously supplied such exemplars to the government which would have satisfied the grand jury's needs. However, for trial purposes, the prosecution would run into problems with old fingerprints or handwriting samples in establishing chain of custody.

(4) Use of grand jury to gather intelligence information.—The unrestrained use of the subpoena for the production of documents and exemplars as well as the power to compel testimony under threat of incarceration for 18 months is a powerful tool in the intelligence gathering arsenal of the Department of Justice and the FBI. Potential witnesses are often threatened with grand jury subpoenas and incarceration for exercising their rights not to answer questions posed by agents of the FBI, many of which are clearly of a general intelligence gathering nature. Extremely broad duces tecum subpoenas such as were directed at the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs of the Episcopal Church are clearly aimed at learning the names and addresses of persons who contribute to or attend conferences concerning important social justice issues (e.g. the independence of Puerto Rico). Many of those whose connections to this Episcopal organization are remote have themselves become the targets of FBI inquiries. Many activists in the women's movement are still learning that the FBI is asking their friends, employers, and former co-workers about their political beliefs, activities and associations as a result of the investigations by the FBI and grand juries which jailed eight persons active in the women's and gay rights movement in 1975–1976. Without strict control over the issuance of subpoenas—especially duces tecum subpoenas to organizations—the intelligence gathering potential of grand juries cannot be limited.

For a detailed study of how grand juries are misused to gather intelligence, see Donner and Cerutti, "The Grand Jury Network," The Nation, January 3, 1972 and Donner and Lavine, "Kangaroo Grand Juries," The Nation, November 19, 1973.

Q 3. In the Center's statement (Page 4), you suggest that the Supreme Court has, by a series of recent decisions, fostered grand jury abuse. Because of this perception by you, and other lawyers, have fewer cases of abuse been appealed, and are state appellate courts more liberal in their decisions as to rights and protections surrounding the grand jury?

A 3. This question was partially answered by Ms. Copelon in her oral testimony. Our experience has primarily been with federal grand juries.

Q 4. The Center speaks of "reconstitutionalizing" the grand jury by mandating reforms. This is, of course, our desire and hope. One example cited is the abuse of subpoenas by the FBI, shown by subpoenas that say on their face that they can be satisfied by delivery to an FBI agent. Have you, or your clients, received such subpoenas? In what types of cases? Have you checked on their original source? Can you submit copies of these subpoenas for our record?

A 4. Although none of us have represented witnesses who have received such subpoenas, subpoenas with such notations have come to our attention in connection with cases on which we have worked. The examples we have are in connection with investigations of church groups involved in funding Hispanic community needs and in connection with supporters of Puerto Rican independence. Copies of two subpoenas are annexed illustrating the type of abuse inquired about in this question. One of these subpoenas was made out to the Jewish Human Resources Center requesting the personnel file of Martha Schwartz. It contains a note: "Compliance with this subpoena may be satisfied by delivering copies of the above described material to the Federal Bureau of Investigation Agents serving the subpoena." The subpoena was served on the Jewish Family Service of New York where Ms. Schwartz works. When the FBI agents were informed that there was no organization called the Jewish Human Resources Center, one of the agents crossed out that name and substituted Jewish Family Services of New York. Ms. Schwartz was represented by attorneys from the Center for Constitutional Rights.

The other subpoena was served on Bishop Milton Wood in connection with the alleged "FALN" grand jury investigation. It was made part of the record in connection with litigation surrounding subpoenas issued in that matter. It contains a note: "The requirements of this subpoena may be satisfied by delivery of the material called for by the subpoena to a Special Agent of the F.B.I. at or before the time required herein for its production."

Q 5. Some of you suggest there is little possibility that the grand jury will ever be able to properly act as a shield. I am not as pessimistic as you, and in addition, I am concerned about the alternatives. If the investigatory power of the grand jury is eliminated, would not this lead to direct investigatory power being granted to the FBI or prosecutors, and is this not a much more dangerous procedure?

A 5. The grand jury process is not the only one which can lead to abuses of civil rights and a perversion of the judicial process for political ends. However, its almost unlimited power o compel the production of testimonial, documentary and physical evidence and its power to imprison creates several serious problems not likely to arise if the investigatory function were confined to the executive branch where it properly belongs. The broad powers of the grand jury to compel the production of evidence are derived from its function to serve "as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution." Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 390 (1962). It possesses the subpoena power to carry out that judicial function, and not to supplement the executive function of discovering evidence and fixing responsibility for crime. Citizens retain a perfect right not to answer questions put to them by official investigators; to remove this right is to move towards a police state.

The distinctions between the power of a grand jury and that of an investigator attached to the executive branch illustrate the serious problems created by a merger of the executive and judicial powers in the grand jury. Before an investigator from state or local police or the FBI can detain a person and/or compel the production of physical or documentary evidence or testimony, the investigator must obtain judicial approval upon a showing of "probable cause" to believe the evidence is pertinent to a criminal investigation and likely to be found in the place described. A grand jury subpoena compelling the production of the same evidence may be obtained with no prior consultation or judicial approval, on the merest suspicion that some relevant information may be obtained.

Clearly defining the different functions of grand juries (determining whether individuals should be formally charged with specific crimes—an integral part of the judicial process) and investigators (determining whether a crime has been committed and gathering evidence to be used against those accused) can only emphasize and strengthen our constitutional commitment to an accusatory system of justice. To argue that the power to compel the production of evidence under penalty of incarceration must then be officially lodged in an executive agency is to imply that we have acquiesced in a de facto conversion from an accusatory to an inquisitorial system of criminal justice, the Constitution notwithstanding.

Q 6. You state that "the only limits" on grand jury abuses have been the willingness of "hundreds" to go to jail. You indicate that over 150 have refused to cooperate with so-called political grand juries and that some have gone to jail, as a result. We have had some great difficulty in learning of the number of people who have been held in contempt and either fined or imprisoned for refusal to testify before a grand jury. Do you have any statistics on this, and can you supply us, at a further date, with the individual particulars surrounding these 150 witnesses?

A 6. Like you, we have had great difficulty keeping track of the number of people subpoenaed to grand juries, the number who were coerced into answering improper questions put to them by the FBI under a misapprehension of their rights and improper threats of jail or worse. We have no comprehensive picture of the numbers of people who have refused, as a matter of principle, personal or political loyalty, for religious or other reasons, to testify or produce evidence following a grant of immunity. According to one source, between the effective date of the new "use immunity" provisions of the Organized Crime Control Act (1970) and January 1973, between 1,000 and 2,000 grand jury subpoenas were issued in connection with special ISD grand juries conducted by Guy Goodwin. The thrust of these grand juries was almost exclusively political, with special emphasis on anti-war and black activists. As a result of those subpoenas, at least 30 persons were cited with contempt. ("A Kind of Immunity That Leads to Jail: The New Grand Jury," Paul Cowan, New York Times Magazine, April 29, 1973.) The conviction rate on the resulting 400 indictments was 15% as compared to the normal rate of 65%. ("The Grand Juries, An American Inquisition," Judy Mead, Center for National Security Studies. Reprint 105. Information on ISD conviction rate from Cowan, supra.) See "The Organized Crime Control Act or Its Critics: Which Threatens Civil Liberties?" McClellan, 46 Notre Dame Lawyer, 55, 60 (1970), for conviction rate of "regular" grand jury indictments.

Since 1973 several major grand jury investigations have focused on political activists, their families, friends and communities.

The "SLA" investigation involed 58 FBI field officers and led to the questioning of thousands of people in San Francisco alone. Three persons were jailed for contempt after orders to testify or produce exemplars. More than a dozen subpoenas were issued in Pennsylvania.

Eight people were jailed for refusing to cooperate with grand juries in Lexington and New Haven investigating members and friends of activists in the women's liberation and gay rights movements in 1975–1976.

At least 13 Hispanic activists, including Chicanos and supporters of Puerto Rican independence have been jailed in the last few years for contempt of grand juries in Denver, Colorado, Puerto Rico, New York and Chicago.

At least 3 persons active in Native American rights movements have been jailed for contempt of grand juries. At one point subpoenas were issued for 20 Native American and Hispanic activists from all over the southwest. Most of these were continued indefinitely or dropped. Ten persons refused to testify, none jailed.

In Washington, D.C., over 20 members of a labor union refused to testify when questioned about events which occurred during a strike at the Washington Post. Many of those subpoenaed were later indicted; there were no contempt citations after grants of immunity.

We believe it is the obligation of the Department of Justice to maintain accurate grand jury in Seattle, Washington purportedly investigating the George Jackson Brigade.

We believe it is the obligation of the Deuartment of Justice to maintain accurate figures on the numbers of people subpoenaed, immunized, jailed and coerced by means of the grand jury process, and to analyze the value of testimony received after grants of use immunity are resisted by the witness. Until this is done, it will be impossible to monitor the use of this process and accurately assess its effectiveness and abuses.

Q 7. You repeatedly describe the use by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of grand jury procedures to conduct political investigations and to harass dissidents. H.R. 94 attempts to provide much more independence to the grand jurors, and to detail specific safeguards as to grand jury procedures, such as the assurance of subpoenas. Would this not effectively eliminate possible FBI misuse?

A 7. Additional safeguards to protect the ability of grand jurors to act independently of a prosecutor who may be using the grand jury to obtain information desired by the FBI will certainly improve the grand jury process and curb some of the present abuses. However, further safeguards must be created to (1) enhance the grand jurors' independence and (2) prevent abuses which now occur without the knowledge of the grand jury. Grand jurors should have access to independent legal counsel in order to protect their ability to serve as a shield between the accused and a prosecutor whose responsibility is both to advise them and obtain convictions. While safeguarding the independence of grand jurors is an essential part of any meaningful reform, it will not correct improper exercise of the subpoena power itself unless that power is put under strict judicial supervision and/or shared by the grand jurors themselves. Likewise, independence of the grand jurors will not curb abuses of the power to impose use immunity unless they are given the power to determine whether a particular witness should be immunized. Guarantees of effective assistance of counsel and meaningful notice requirements are essential complements to grand jury independence.

See further discussion in Ms. Peterson's and Ms. Copelon's oral testimony.

Q 8. You note that Congress has continually refused to authorize the FBI to subpoena witnesses and material, and that the FBI, in fact, has maintained this power through use of grand jury authorizations. Do you believe this problem could be eliminated if we specifically prevent the FBI from serving or using subpoenas, and requiring such subpoenas to be served by marshals or others under the direct supervision of the court?

A 8. Legislation specifically prohibiting the service of subpoenas by the FBI would help to curb some of the most egregious examples of the abuse of the subpoena power—e.g. FBI agents filling out blank subpoenas with the names of those who decline to talk to them, FBI issued subpoenas commanding the attendance of witnesses at grand jury proceedings at a time the U.S. Attorney is out of town and the grand jury is not sitting,[1] subpoenas stating on their faces that they may be complied with by handing over material to the FBI, etc.

However, these facial defects are not the heart of the problem, and legislation prohibiting the service of subpoenas by agents of the FBI would not reach the more serious problem of U.S. Attorneys authorizing the issuance of subpoenas in response to the desire of FBI agents to obtain information from an individual reluctant to talk with them. This more serious problem can only be corrected, as your question suggested, through the creation of judicially enforceable standards for the issuance of subpoenas.

Q 9. The Center notes that you were co-counsel in the Fort Worth Five case. As you said, this controversy was really the inspiration for my bills and these hearings. Can you tell us, step by step, what has happened in that investigation since the confinement of the five and if there are any present proceedings in that case?

9. This question was answered by Ms. Peterson in her oral testimony.

Q 10. We have been told that it is the policy of the Justice Department that grand jury witnesses are free to leave the room at any time to consult with their counsel. You note that often witnesses are intimidated about leaving the room. Do you know of any cases where witnesses are not allowed to leave the room to consult with their attorney? If an attorney is allowed to be outside and a witness is indigent, who pays for this lawyer, if anyone?

A 10. See discussion by Ms. Peterson about witnesses being harassed in connection with their request to consult counsel. Attorneys for witnesses in political cases most often volunteer their services as the witnesses do not have funds to pay attorneys. This was true, for example, in the Fort Worth Five case, the VVAW case, the Shinnick-Weiner case, and with the women's movement witnesses subpoenaed in Kentucky and Connecticut.

It is essential, however, that grand jury witnesses be assured the right to counsel through statutory authorization of court-appointed counsel for the indigent. The jeopardy faced by a grand jury witness is enormous as is the potential for government manipulation of the witness to her or his own detriment.

Q 11. We are convinced that in addition to assisting the government in prosecuting for perjury, recordation would be of invaluable assistance to immunitized witness in the event of prosecution—i.e. to show that the evidence may have been derived directly or indirectly, knowingly or unknowingly from his testimony. Have U.S. Attorneys, to your knowledge, ever granted use immunity and failed to provide for recordation of the testimony of immunitized witnesses?

A 11. We are not familiar with any cases where immunity was granted and a witness's testimony not recorded. The problem arises because of selective recordation. For example, in the VVAW grand jury, reporter were present in the grand jury room when potential defense witnesses were being questioned. Apparently the testimony of not one government witness was recorded, as none was turned over to defense attorney as Jencks Act material at the trial. This same pattern of non-recordation of government witnesses, except of hostile witnesses, was evident in the case of United States v. Butler and Robideau in the Eighth Circuit. The VVAW case was in the Fifth Circuit.

Q 12. Based on your extensive experience in this area, can you briefly summarize or alternatively can you document for the record the various policies of U.S. Attorneys with regard to (A) subpoenaing targets to testify before the grand jury; (B) recordation of grand jury proceedings—responsiveness to request by defense attorneys for recordation; (C) calling newsmen to testify before grand jury—extent to which U.S. Attorneys follow or supplement Department of Justice guidelines in this area.

A 12. (A) There seems to be a fairly common practice among U.S. Attorneys of subpoenaing targets. We know of no case where the U.S. Attorney voluntarily declined to subpoena a particular witness because s/he was considered a target. Whereas in the early 70's many witnesses were subpoenaed purely for intelligence-gathering purposes, today, U.S. Attorneys are more boldly claiming subpoenees to be targets. This creates not only an intolerable situation in terms of the original meaning of the Fifth Amendment, but also enhances the stigmatizing power of the grand jury. See answer to question No. 2, supra.

(B) See answer to question No. 11, supra.[2]

(C) See testimony of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press delivered by Jack C. Landau. We have no information beyond that which he supplied.

Q 13. You dispute contentions made by the Justice Department that immunity is an essential weapon against organized crime. What do you base this decision on?

A 13. The testimony of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse effectively refutes this argument, and we adopt their response to it.

14 Q. You indicate that "use immunity" can be used by playing off one witness against another. Specifically, you note that Witness "A" can be compelled to give testimony against Witness "B" and "B" against "A". Each is then prosecuted for their own part, using the other person's testimony. Can you give us any examples of this use of "use immunity"?

14 A. Our experience is primarily, if not uniquely, with political individuals who refuse to testify before grand juries; even after a grant of immunity, precisely because they do not wish to give even the appearance of providing information to prosecutors which could subsequently be used (and misused) as the basis of prosecutions against friends and associates, and to destroy the organizations with which they work. There is absolutely no bar to the use of A's compelled testimony against B and B's against A so long as the prosecutor conducting the grand jury investigation refuses to record and provide the witness with copies of his or her testimony and certify the evidence against him or her prior to the compelled testimony. This is true because the government's theoretically "heavy burden" to show that A's prosecution is not derived from his or her immunized testimony is considerably lightened when A has no means of challenging the representation that there are independent sources for the prosecution.

15 Q. You indicate that compulsory immunity does not, in fact, secure any evidence that consensual immunity would not also obtain and that it has "marginal efficiency." Also, obviously many judges and prosecutors disagree. What evidence do you have on the ineffectiveness of immunity to secure evidence? We have been told that in many cases, involving organized crime, or plain nonpolitical prosecutions, like bank robbery, valuable evidence has been obtained. Do you believe that there are any types of crimes or circumstances that would justify the use of coerced testimony assuming that transactional immunity is restored?

15 A. The Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse has addressed the question of the issue of coerced immunity in "organized crime" and similar investigations. We would add that we firmly believe any form of coerced immunity to be unconstitutional and contrary to our history of maintaining a judicial system committed to an accusatorial system of justice. See also oral testimony of Mr. Borosage.

16 Q. What specific changes would you make in the Department of Justice procedures which are followed in requesting and receiving immunity grants? Do you envision any problems or delays in having the Attorney General himself review immunity requests?

16 A. We believe that the only entirely satisfactory solution is restoring transactional immunity and limiting the imposition of immunity to those situations where a witness voluntarily exchanges immunity from prosecution for his or her Fifth Amendment rights. Short of this, we believe that the Department of Justice should be required to follow the procedures currently described as "guidelines" for obtaining immunity, and that compliance with those guidelines should be a prerequisite to a judicial order granting immunity. Failure to consider all the factors listed in the guidelines, including the value of the testimony and the hardship to the witness and unlikelihood of coercion should be grounds for vacating the immunity or contempt order.

[2] The case law of several Circuits makes it clear that there is currently no requirement with regard to recording grand jury testimony. See, e.g. United States v. Evans, 542 F. 2d 805 (10th Cir. 1976), United States v. McDaniel, 428 F. Supp. 1226 (D.C. Okl. 1977). The Eighth and Sixth Circuits also do not require recordation.

It is apparent from the legislative history of 18 U.S.C. § 6002 et seq. that Congress intended, when enacting the use immunity statute, to centralize the decision to grant immunity and strictly limit the power of the Attorney General to delegate the power to make this decision. We believe that this desire represents a concern for the orderly administration of justice which cannot be circumvented in the interest of speedy decision-making.

There should be relatively few applications, as there were prior to the immunity binge which followed congressional approval of the 1970 Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act. A large number of applications for immunity suggests that the grand jury process is indeed focusing not on witnesses who have information relevant to the grand jury's determinations, but either on those who are likely to prove the targets of the investigation or those whom the prosecutor does not expect to comply with an immunity order and who are targeted for incarceration for political reasons.

17 Q. What practical problems, if any, will result from requiring the prosecutor to attach a letter of proposed questions to be propounded to the witness to his immunity request? Will this unduly limit the prosecutor when the witness actually testifies? Both of these recommendations were made by the Center for Constitutional Rights.

17 A. A list of propounded questions should be attached to all requests for an immunity authorization to enable the Department of Justice to determine the scope of the questioning anticipated. It is hard to understand how an intelligent decision to authorize a grant of immunity can be made without this information. A list of such questions would also enable a witness to make an informed decision as to his or her course of action before the grand jury and better enable him or her to protect legal rights involved. Such a list of proposed questions is essential to a determination of the transactions under investigation and whether the proposed subject of the investigation is proper. See, e.g., In re Vericker, 446 F. 2d 446 (2nd Cir. 1971), where questions demonstrated that subject of the investigation differed from what prosecutors had represented. The only limitation such a procedure would place on the prosecutor would be to prevent him from using the grand jury to conduct a fishing expedition.

18 Q. You would provide numerous defenses to testify, including "personal relationships", family relationships, lawyer-client relationships or even just personal attitude. As I am sure you know, the courts have repeatedly held that compulsory testimony, if necessary after a grant of immunity, is constitutional. Congress has repeatedly provided for procedures for compulsory testimony, although, Congress has varied on whether immunity should be "use" or transactional. Under H.R. 94, we make every attempt to insure that immunity and compulsory testimony are only to be used to secure information as part of a criminal investigation, and not to punish someone. Isn't this sufficient?

18 A. We do not suggest that the existence of certain relationships based upon confidence and trust provide an absolute defense to a subpoena or an order to testify. We are, however, concerned about the use of orders to testify or produce other evidence which have the effect, if not the purpose, of undermining certain vital relationships. For example, the Director of the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs and her secretary have been incarcerated for resisting an investigation which demanded the names and addresses of all who had attended conferences sponsored by an organization whose mission was to establish the trust of Hispanic people in the Episcopal Church. They believe that their mission was chilled and thwarted by this investigation, and that the credibility of the religious oragnization which employed them would have been destroyed by their compliance with orders to provide information. Examples of subpoenas aimed at compelling information gained through confidential relationships are also contained in the oral testimony of the Grand Jury Project.

These relationships include those which are analogous to those accorded an evidentiary privilege—e.g. husband and wife—but which do not meet the traditional definitions of those relationships (e.g. common law marriages, lay ministers, members of a political collective or communal living arrangement). Others, like the relationship between parent and child, one would expect a democratic society to protect instinctively. Since the grand jury has sought to interfere in this relationship (In re Kinoy, 326 F. Supp. 400 (SDNY 1971)), statutory recognition of the privilege is required. We believe these relationships play an important role in modern society, and that the common law evidentiary privileges have not kept pace with the societal changes they reflect.

19 Q. The project states that the vast majority of those confined as recalcitrant witnesses in "political cases" are women. I must admit that I am surprised at this. What kind of cases are we talking about and why do you think this is true?

19 A. The Grand Jury Project believes that one of the major reasons a majority of the political activists jailed as civil contempt prisoners were women is an inaccurate perception on the part of the FBI and the Department of Justice of the role and strength of women. In recent years women in political movements have demonstrated that they are no more afraid of jail than men, and have gone to jail rather than testify despite conditions which made their incarceration much more harsh than that of male civil contempt prisoners. (e.g. the jailing of Jill Raymond for fourteen months in Kentucky county jails, often without any female guard, or the incarceration of Joanne LeDeaux for the length of her pregnancy). The decision to subpoena a disproportionate number of women reflects a prosecutorial desire to use the grand jury and the threat of jail to obtain information not otherwise available about political movements, and to harass and chill dissidents in the exercise of their First Amendment rights.

20 Q. You suggest a maximum period of incarceration for contempt of 30 days. Many have indicated that even our six month maximum period may be too short in that someone would be willing to wait out the six months and not testify, rather than obey an order to testify. Do you have any statistics, or examples, proving that no constructive purpose is served by incarceration beyond 30 days?

20 A. We know of no case in the last five years in which a political activist jailed for refusing to testify changed his or her mind after a period of thirty days or more in jail. We do know of several cases in which witnesses jailed from a period of less than one day (in the current Chicago investigation) to overnight (same investigation), several days (Lexington, Kentucky investigation) to approximately one week (also Lexington) have decided to testify. It is one experience that the fear of jail is the greatest coercion; to testify once a person has been in jail for thirty days, an adjustment is made and, if anything, the determination to continue to resist grows increasingly stronger.

21 Q. You seem possibly confused and the purpose of my provision on punishment for recalcitrance. If civil contempt for coercive purposes is desired, there would be a six month maximum. If criminal contempt for punitive purposes is desired, the period of imprisonment could be longer—but all due process rights, including a jury trial, would necessarily be involved. This would force an election. Would you comment on this proposal.

21 A. We believe this proposal represents an important step toward resurrecting the important differences between civil and criminal contempt, thereby reducing the usefulness of grand juries as a tool for harassment of dissidents. We would, however, propose a maximum of one month for "coercive" civil contempt because we have found that longer periods are not coercive, but punitive. We would also urge a six-month maximum for criminal contempt, with a jury trial required. If the penalty for contempt is left open-ended, the recalcitrant witness is completely at the mercy of the court and judges have been known to be as or more vindictive than prosecutors. (In re Raymond.) Since the grand jury subpoena can so effectively stigmatize the unwilling witness as a criminal, a maximum is necessary to insure that a witness will not be effectively punished for the underlying offense, through the easy route of contempt (to which there are few defenses).

22 Q. You suggest that there should be an absolute right to bail pending appeal by witnesses adjudged in contempt. Last year, a former Attorney General forcefully argued that this would interfere with the investigatory function of the grand jury. Witnesses out on bail would delay, and delay, and delay appellate proceedings so that investigation would be necessarily frustrated. The ABA, which supports many reforms, also opposes any automatic bail—saying it would lead to extensive delays and effectively thwart the investigations and the coercive intent of confinement. Would you comment?

22 A. A provision for bail pending appeal of a civil contempt citation is necessary to avoid an anomalous situation currently met by many witnesses; most judges are firmly convinced that time spent in jail is not actually "coercive" until all hope of legal vindication has been lost—i.e., all legal appeals have been rejected. The only legitimate purpose of incarceration in civil contempt cases is coercion; therefore, incarceration prior to the resolution of appeals is punitive and therefore illegal. Any comprehensive reform of the grand jury system must resolve this problem by providing for bail pending appeal.

Moreover, denial of bail means the witness is punished by the court's delay. To avoid unnecessary delay, such appeals can be heard on an expedited schedule.

23 Q. You complain of the improper use of grand jury subpoenas to get around the Fourth and Fifth Amendments and suggest that the exclusionary rule should apply to grand jury proceedings. Studies have shown that the exclusionary rule results in exclusion of evidence in a small number of cases and the admissibility of evidence in most cases. By applying the exclusionary rule to grand jury proceedings, we are requiring competent counsel to file a motion to suppress as to each witness and their potential defendant. This would mean many hearings and much delay—and result, if history is any indication, in exclusion in only a few cases. HR 94 would require the government to "put up or shut up" at a preliminary examination prior to trial whether or not there is an indictment. On balance, is not this procedural protection and even exclusion at trial enough—as prosecutors would not secure indictments only to have charges dismissed at the preliminary examination or trial? Would the "new hearings" on motions to suppress be an unwarranted procedural hindrance and delay legitimate grand jury proceedings?

23 A. We soundly applaud your proposal to require a preliminary hearing prior to trial. But this protects only some of the rights of the defendant. Under the Supreme Court rulings, the defendant cannot complain of the violations of the witnesses' rights unless he/she has standing to complain of them as breaches of his/her own privacy. The witness is likewise denied the right to complain and there is accordingly no deterrent to using the grand jury wantonly to violate the rights of the citizenry and effectively launder illegally seized evidence for trial.

Recent House and Senate committee investigations have revealed the shocking extent to which federal agents have violated constitutional rights in pursuit of political dissidents. Justice Brandeis warned many years ago about the danger when government becomes the wrongdoer. Delay is a relative thing. Star chamber proceedings and torture get quicker results than due process but have fortunately been rejected in favor of an adversarial system of justice. Years of McCarthyism in this country demonstrated the chilling effect upon all society of not stopping improper practices at the earliest possible moment. The suppression of the fruits of all violations of constitutional rights would deter such violations. The earlier improperly seized evidence is suppressed, the more time that will be saved.

24 Q. I am concerned about your suggestions that the issuance of a subpoena, the order of immunity, a request for contempt citation—all be by a majority vote of the grand jurors. Would this not lead to possible prejudice as to particular witnesses. If the grand jurors are to vote on these items, they need some information about the case to show the need for a particular piece of evidence, or order. Such information might be vague and hearsay. Why is not the establishment of standards, and the judicial enforcement of such standards, sufficient?

24 A. The establishment of judicially enforceable standards for the issuance of a subpoena is essential. But the issuance of a subpoena cannot be left to prosecutors if the independence of the grand jury is to be re-established. This requirement would not prejudice jurors any more than the present practice.

Moreover, we suspect that it is common for prosecutors to provide vague hearsay statements to "prepare" the jurors. For example, in the Lexington grand jury, it was revealed that the FBI agent gave the grand jurors "background statements" explaining the purpose of the investigation and of the witnesses' testimony. As this statement was unrecorded, we do not know its contents. Your proposal for recordation of the entire proceedings provides the most effective safeguard against the kind of prejudice to which you refer. On the other hand, we believe there is no substitute for the exercise of an independent community judgment on the justifiability of subpoena, immunity and contempt.

25 Q. In addition to suggesting a requirement for decisions by a majority of grand jurors, you suggest extensisve periods of notice for subpoenas, immunity grants, contempt hearings, etc. Last year, the judicial conference, representing local federal district judges, indicated that such notice periods can cause problems. Specifically, they noted that in many districts, jurors are convened for short periods, maybe a few days a week, or even every other or every third week. Requiring them to come together to vote, and giving long periods of notice, would cause hardships as to the jurors would have to be called back and forth, sometimes over great distances, and at a doubling or tripling of costs and great inconvenience.

My bill would provide shorter notice periods but allow continuances, or quashing of subpoenas, of citations, if the notice period is unduly burdensome or oppressive; and for strict enforceable standards for the granting of subpoenas, and of immunity and contempt orders. Is this not sufficient?

25 A. Notice periods can always be waived. Most criminal trials do not depend upon the coercion of unwilling witnesses. The cases where there will be some delay are cases where the government is trying to make a case with the help of the target (whose cooperation will probably not be forthcoming in any event) or from persons who are being required to exchange their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination for limited use immunity, and cases where First Amendment rights are at stake. How much time a recalcitrant witness has to present proof and litigate claims should not depend on drawing a sympathetic judge who resists the government's argument that the statutory periods are per se reasonable. Only Congress can provide the uniform justice that is needed through adequate minimum time safeguards.

26 Q. You oppose any provision that would allow short periods of notice in certain circumstances and base your opposition on the fact that the urgency of the need for testimony is often "greatly exaggerated." Does not the establishment of judicial standards for allowing shorter periods of notice eliminate this problem, while at the same time allow prompt action if necessary?

26 A. The problem has been to determine when prompt action is really necessary. Government claims of urgency which have been persuasive to courts in our cases have often later proved to be unfounded. For example, 23 Vietnam veterans were subpoenaed to a grand jury in Tallahassee, Florida. Government attorneys and the court refused to grant any delay. Three years later a United States Circuit Court in United States v. Briggs, 514 F. 2d 794, 805 (1975) said as to some of the subpoenees: "There is at least a strong suspicion that stigmatization of appellants was part of an overall government tactic directed against disfavored persons and groups." Because of the in camera method the government adopts in presenting claims of urgency to courts in grant jury proceedings, it is virtually impossible for a witness to prevail when government attorneys want to steamroll proceedings.

The old slogan that haste makes waste should be heeded. Political dissidents, not organized crime witnesses, suffer from speed. The latter are likely to have lawyers ready to defend them at a moment's notice. Grand juries are not crime prevention agencies. They indict for crimes already committed. The extra few days are necessary to ensure the substance as well as the "appearance of justice." (Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11 (1959)). See also answer of Ms. Copelon in her oral testimony.

27 Q. You oppose our provision limiting the role of counsel in the grand jury room. We did this to avoid making the grand jury an adversarial proceeding and hoped to resolve the problem of frivolous prosecutions by mandating a prompt preliminary hearing. If all proceedings are to be recorded, how can restricting the role of counsel, tied to a prompt hearing, lead to harassment and intimidation?

27 A. Our concern is that Congress not preclude a grand jury from hearing from counsel for a witness if the grand jury determines that such testimony would be useful. This is not unlike the rule in the Senate which provides that "each standing, select or special committee of the Senate adopts its own rules." This allows committees to give counsel greater scope than permitted under House Rule XI, cl. 2(k)(3) which limits counsel to an advisory role and which appears to be the model followed in the Chairman's proposed bill. Thus, for example, Rule 8.4(a) of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which precludes counsel from direct or cross-examination, does give counsel scope to present problems directly to the Committee:

However, counsel may submit in writing any question he wishes propounded to his client or to any other witness and may at the conclusion of his client's testimony, suggest the presentation of other evidence or the calling of other witnesses. The Committee may use such questions and dispose of such suggestions as it deems appropriate.

In the grand jury context, we think that greater scope should be allowed to the witness' counsel. The Senate Select Committee negotiated with witnesses' counsel respecting problems of possible recalcitrance before the Committee. As the grand jury witness communicates with the grand jury only in formal proceedings, there are clearly additional concerns which counsel should be permitted to address directly to the grand jurors. At present, the witness is entitled to make such statements; allowing counsel to do so as well is a crucial safeguard for the less articulate or sophisticated witness.

A grand jury should have available to it the explanations of the witness' counsel which may result in the dismissal of the witness. Like the role of counsel before the Senate Select Committee, grand jury witness's counsel should be permitted to suggest information that the witness would be willing to supply and which would meet the needs of the grand jury, as well as additional information which the grand jury might seek.

The preliminary hearing provides no remedy for the witness who is neither target nor defendant. For such a witness, prompt dismissal and/or protection from improper incarceration can be secured only by his/her attorney's having the opportunity to address the grand jurors.

Moreover, it is important to emphasize that the mere presence of an attorney in the grand jury room does not necessarily guarantee against intimidation and harassment. Although recordation might deter the prosecutor from making derogatory remarks about the witness' need to consult with his/her attorney, the pressure to rush, inherent in the circumstances and communicated by prosecutors in non-verbal ways, can unfairly influence even an attorney experienced in grand jury matters.

The sanction contained in 3330A(d) unnecessarily adds to the pressure on the witness' counsel and adds nothing to the court's inherent and statutory power to discipline an attorney. Thus, whatever role the Committee ultimately defines for the witness' counsel, it is unnecessary to legislate additional sanctions.

28 Q. You have indicated that the grand jury is often used to drive a wedge between lawyers and clients. Your discussion of this issue does not seem to distinguish between a lawyer's action as counsel and action in a personal relationship to others. The Code of Professional Responsibility makes it clear that a lawyer may not encourage, incite and certainly not participate in any illegal activities. In addition, the code makes it clear that the lawyer-client privilege is not as absolute as you might suggest. Why should protections, or restrictions, be placed on proper investigations, which might involve the testimony of an individual who happens to be a lawyer and why should these protections or restrictions be applied in grand jury cases while they don't apply in any other type of proceeding?

28. A. Our discussion was not intended to extend a lawyer in personal relations with others but to attorneys being asked about clients. Nor do we suggest that attorneys have any kind of immunity to engage in illegal activity.

By contrast, we note that the government asserts a sweeping form of immunity for its attorneys' conduct. See the recent decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, John Briggs v. Guy Goodwin, No. 75-1642. That case involves perjury by a government attorney in connection with a grand jury proceeding. The cases in which we have been involved respecting attorneys subpoenaed to grand juries have not in any instant involved claims that the attorney committed any crime; rather they have all been cases in which the government has attempted to secure information from the attorney about a client. The calling of attorneys before grand juries for such purposes threatens the independence of the bar and the constitutional right to the effective assistance of counsel.

29 Q. You suggest that it is possible for individuals to be "convicted by subpoena". H.R. 94 provides detailed safeguards as to a subpoena, and also punishes violations of secrecy by making such violations criminal offenses. Do you think these provisions would lessen the possibilities of prejudicial publicity?

29 A. It has long been possible to punish violations of secrecy through contempt, yet no violating prosecutors have ever been punished. Prosecutors do not and will not prosecute themselves. For example, the Department of Justice was ordered to investigate the source of highly prejudicial information concerning a grand jury witness which appeared on the front page of the Sunday edition of the New York Times. The information was attributed to "federal law enforcement sources." No report has been filed, and no action taken against any prosecutor or agent. See in re Archuleta, F. Supp. (SDNY, 1977).

We feel that damage actions are the only effective deterrent.

30 Q. You suggest an automatic right to testify for any "target." I provide a qualified right for any witness to testify. Many have argued that it is impossible to determine when one is a "target". How would you define it?

You attack my provision providing for the grand jury to determine if a witness should be allowed to testify, yet in almost all other situations—for subpoenas, immunity, contempt—you provide for the grand jurors to decide. Are not these two positions inconsistent?

30 A. (1) We would propose defining a target as any person about whom questions are asked during the course of grand jury examination or any person whose name is mentioned in a context which would imply the possibility of criminal liability for the offenses under investigation. (2) We believe the witness' historic and absolute right to testify makes this question moot.

31 Q. You complain that present procedures to check our allegations of illegal electronics surveillance are insufficient. Specifically, you note that the Surveillance Index does not cover cases where the FBI cannot trace the surveillance to the witness. If the FBI cannot so trace, then is there not little likelihood of harm and little likelihood that surveillance was in any way related to an investigation of an individual?

31 A. See attached testimony of John Smythe, custodian of the central file of electronic surveillance records of the FBI for an illustration of the problems inherent in the current FBI record keeping system. Information may flow from illegal electronic surveillance to a prosecutor without his knowledge. FBI files may not reveal the illegal source of the information.

32 Q. Would you elaborate on the need for uniform, mandated instructions to grand juries during the impanelling process. Should these instructions be written and provided to each grand juror? Should the instructions include any additional items not mentioned in H.R. 94 (i.e. that grand jurors are not to draw any inferences from a witness' assertion of Fifth Amendment rights, the nature of use immunity)?

32 A. See attached instructions for example of those which we would propose be given to inform grand jurors of their rights and powers under the present grand jury system. Additional instructions should be given as appropriate concerning any significant reform in this system. Instructions should be written and provided to each grand juror as well as read to each panel at the inception of its term so that grand jurors would understand that they had powers, duties and rights among themselves and enforceable by a judicial officer. This is a small but essential step in reinforcing the independence of grand juries from prosecutors.

33 Q. You state that the standard and duty of the grand jury is to "act as the conscience of the community to determine whether an indictment should be issued." This is not my historical understanding. The grand jury is only to determine if there is a prima facie case—not whether an individual should or should not be prosecuted or convicted. What is the historical basis for your position?

34 Q. You suggest that each grand jury has "independent counsel". One possible problem with this suggestion is that there could be thereby established hundreds of little prosecutorial fiefdoms—without any overall policy. Each jury and each "independent counsel" could go their own way—conduct their own investigations (perhaps even duplicative of others), have their own rules, and standards—and not be bound to a nationwide policy. Should there not be some centralized control?

34 A. Your concern for fiefdoms and arbitrariness is well-taken. In our oral testimony we advocated the institutionalization of "independent counsel" through the appointment of law clerks to federal grand juries, simply expanding the present practice which is to appoint law clerks to individual district and circuit judges and also assist motions panels of the circuit. Indeed, the only institution of the judiciary which does not have the assistance of a law clerk is the grand jury. As law clerks are recent graduates of law schools, and, therefore at a very early point in their careers, they could be easily instructed as to their role and duties by an orientation program or manual, the problems you raise should be easily avoided. Selection of the clerk could be made by a panel of judges.

35 Q. You suggest that the actual vote of grand jurors be recorded. Letters to this Committee from former grand jurors indicate that they fear retribution if public access could be had as to their votes on particular cases. Do you wish such recordation by name or would a tally sheet be sufficient?

35 A. We would oppose any proposal to require grand jurors' votes to be recorded in any way which would reveal the vote of individual grand jurors. A numerical tally would be sufficient.

36 Q. You oppose our proposals to reduce the size of the grand jury. Some studies have shown that the larger a group, the more likely they will follow a group consensus—the "herd effect"—and thus rely more on the leader—here the prosecutor. A smaller jury would give more opportunity for active participation by each member of the jury—and less opportunity for prosecutorial domination. Would you comment?

36 A. Ms. Copelon has answered this question in her oral testimony.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Swearing in and instructions to a new panel of Federal grand jurors, convening for deliberations in the United States Court House, Scranton, Pennsylvania, on Monday, January 26, 1976, at 10:10 a.m.

Before: Honorable William J. Nealon, United States District Judge, at Scranton, Pennsylvania, on Monday, January 26, 1976, at 10:10 a.m.

Appearances for the Government: S. John Cottone, Esq., United States Attorney, for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

The COURT. Good morning, Members of the Jury. I've asked Mr. Harding to serve as Foreman of the Grand Jury and Mrs. Phillips to serve as Deputy Foreman. And I'll ask the Clerk now to administer the Oath to Mr. Harding and Mrs. Phillips and I ask all Members of the Grand Jury to listen closely to the Oath, as it applies equally to all the Members of the Grand Jury.

Deputy Clerk MILLER. Would you stand, please? Do you solemnly swear by almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, that as Foreman and Deputy Foreman of this Grand Jury, you will diligently inquire and a true presentment make, of all such matters and things as shall be given you in charge. As of those things which you shall know to be presentable here, the Government Counsel's, your fellows and your own, you will keep secret. You will present no one for envy, hatred, malice or ill will. Neither will you leave anyone unpresented through fear, favor, affection, reward, gain or any hope thereof, but will present all things truly as they shall come to your knowledge and the best of your understanding. So help you God.

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mrs. PHILLIPS. I do.

Deputy Clerk MILLER. Thank you. Please be seated.

The COURT. Now the Clerk will administer the Oath to all Members of the Grand Jury.

Deputy Clerk MILLER. Please rise. Raise your hands. You, and each of you, do swear by almighty God, the searcher of all hearts, that the same oath that your Foreman and Deputy Foreman hath taken, to observe and keep on his part, you, and each of you, will well and truly observe and keep on your part. So help you God.

GRAND JURORS. I do.

Deputy Clerk MILLER. Thank you. Please be seated.

The COURT. Mr. Berry, we have a full complement of 23; do we?

Chief Clerk BERRY. Yes, sir.

The COURT. Members of the Grand Jury, you're about to embark upon a very serious and a very responsible assignment. You're being assembled here from various walks of life and different sections of the Middle District of Pennsylvania to serve as Grand Jurors and to inquire into the commission of public offenses against the laws of the United States.

You might ask: What is a Grand Jury; and, what is its function? You have received a handbook from the Clerk's Office which sets forth the purpose, origin and procedure for a Federal Grand Jury. But it is necessary for the Court to instruct you as to your duties. In my instructions, incidentally, I'll use the masculine gender. But, of course, my words apply equally to our female Jurors.

The Supreme Court of the United States has on several occasions spoken out on the function of the Federal Grand Jury. In the case of Costello versus the United States the Supreme Court stated that the basic purpose of the Grand Jury is to provide a fair method for instituting criminal proceedings against persons believed to have committed crimes. The Grand Jury is convened as a body of laymen; free from technical rules; acting in secret; pledged to indict no one because of prejudice; and to free no one because of special favor.

Also, in the case of Wood versus Georgia, the Court emphasized further, and I quote, "Historically the Grand Jury has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive prosecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or is dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will."

In addition, in the case of the United States versus Calandra, the Supreme Court reiterated, and I quote again. "Its," referring to the Grand Jury, "Its responsibilities continue to include both the determination whether there is probable cause to believe a crime has been committed and the protection of citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions."

"The scope of the Grand Jury's powers reflects its special role in insuring fair and effective law enforcement. A Grand Jury proceeding is not an adversary hearing in which the guilt or innocence of the accused is adjudicated. Rather, it is an ex parte investigation to determine whether a crime has been committed and whether criminal proceedings should be instituted against any person."

From that language several things should become obvious. If it were not for the Grand Jury the prosecuting agencies, the accusers, would be free to arrest and bring to public trial anyone they felt should be prosecuted for whatever reason.

But, as the Supreme Court has stated, you stand between the accuser and the accused. And in that capacity serve an invaluable function in our society in insuring fair and effective law enforcement.

You're expected to be fair and you're to act independently. That is, you may vote an indictment, or refuse to do so, as you deem proper without regard to the recommendations of the Judge, the United States Attorney, his assistants, the prosecuting agency, or any other person.

In other words, the United States Attorney is your legal advisor but he cannot tell you or require you to return an indictment: Neither can the Court; nor anyone else. This is a decision that you must make. You would do a great disservice to your Oath and the tradition of the Grand Jury if you were to merely rubber stamp the contemplated prosecutions that are brought before you. Similarly, you would perform a disservice if you didn't indict where the evidence warranted an indictment.

Historically, the Grand Jury system originated in England more than seven centuries ago. It was recognized in the Magna Carta, the first English constitutional document, which King John granted in the year 1215 at the insistence of his subjects.

Over the years the Grand Jury developed into a separate entity independent of the King. So that the King could not charge a subject with a serious crime, but had to first submit the evidence and the witnesses to a grand Jury, who then decided whether to return an indictment against the accused.

America has inherited the institution of the Grand Jury. It was so firmly established in the traditions of our founding fathers that they included it in the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The Fifth Amendment provides in part that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury."

The Fifth Amendment has been implemented in the federal system by Rule Six of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which establishes the procedure under which the Grand Jury operates. Now pursuant to that rule the United States Attorney for the Middle District of Pennsylvania has certified in writing to this Court that there is necessity for Grand Jurors to meet for the consideration of bills of indictment. That is why you have been summoned here.

The Middle District of Pennsylvania embraces that area contained in 32 counties of Pennsylvania, extending from the New York-New Jersey boundary to the State of Maryland. Your deliberations will concern the subject of federal crime primarily in the northern tier of the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

During the course of proceedings the United States Attorney or one of his assistants will submit bills of indictment to you for your consideration. An indictment is an accusation, in writing, presented by the Grand Jury to the Court charging a particular person with a crime.

Your prime function is to decide whether or not sufficient evidence has been produced to indicate that a federal crime probably has been committed by the person accused. If the evidence produced does not meet the standard necessary for an indictment, because you cannot conclude that a crime probably has been committed by the accussed, you should have no hesitancy in refusing to vote for an indictment.

You're not a Trial Jury, however. That is, it is not your responsibility to determine the innocence or guilt of an accused defendant, but solely to determine whether or not sufficient evidence has been produced to indicate that a federal crime probably has been committed by the person accused. If the evidence is sufficient, then you should indict. If it is not sufficient, then you should not indict.

Specifically you have been convened here pursuant to Rule Six of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. This rule provides in pertinent part, and I'll read these sub-sections to you. Sub-section "(a) Summoning Grand Juries. The Court shall order one or more Grand Juries to be summoned at such times as the public interest requires. The Grand Jury shall consist of not less than 16 nor more than 23 members. The Court shall direct that a sufficient number of legally qualified persons be summoned to meet this requirement."

Sub-section "(c) Foreman and Deputy Foreman. The Court shall appoint one of the jurors to be Foreman and another to be Deputy Foreman. The Foreman shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations and shall sign all indictments. He or another juror designated by him shall keep a record of the number of jurors concurring in the finding of every indictment and shall file the record with the Clerk of the Court, but the record shall not be made public except on order of the court. During the absence of the Foreman, the Deputy Foreman shall act as Foreman."

Sub-section "(d) Who may be present. Attorneys for the government, the witness under examination, interpreters when needed and, for the purpose of taking the evidence, a stenographer . . . may be present while the Grand Jury is in session, but no person other than the jurors may be present while the Grand Jury is deliberating or voting."

Sub-section "(e) Secrecy of proceedings and disclosure. Disclosure of matters occurring before the Grand Jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, stenographer . . . may disclose matters occurring before the Grand Jury only when so directed by the Court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the Court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the Grand Jury."

Sub-section, "(f) Finding and return of indictment. An indictment may be found only upon the concurrence of 12 or more jurors. The indictment shall be returned by the Grand Jury to a Judge in open Court. If the defendant is in custody or has given bail and 12 jurors do not concur in finding an indictment, the Foreman shall so report to the Court in writing forthwith."

Sub-section, "(g) Discharge and excuse. A Grand Jury shall serve until discharged by the Court but no Grand Jury may serve more than 18 months."

So that, Members of the Jury, is a brief resume of Rule Six. Therefore, as you can see, the Grand Jury is composed of no more than 23 members and not less than 16. Your Foreman is appointed by the Court and must preside at all sessions. He must administer oaths and affirmations and sign all indictments.

When he's absent the Deputy Foreman, also appointed by the Court, acts as Foreman. At least 16 of your members must be present at all times when you are in session. At least 12 of your members must concur before an indictment is returned.

Neither the Government's attorney or any witness is allowed to be present while you deliberate and vote. In other words you must be alone. That is, just the Members of the Grand Jury should be present when you deliberate as to whether an indictment should be returned; and, of course, only you, the Grand Jury, should be present when you vote as to whether an indictment should be returned.

Witnesses will be called before you and will be sworn by the Grand Jury Foreman, or, in his absence, by the Deputy Foreman. The United States Attorney is your legal advisor and may be present at the examination of witnesses to assist you, if necessary, in asking questions and advising you from time to time as to the applicable law.

Ordinarily the United States Attorney or one of his assistants questions the witness first; followed next by the Foreman; and then other members of the Grand Jury may question the witness. All questions asked by each witness must be relevant and proper. Witnesses should be treated courteously when they appear before the Grand Jury. Questions should be put to them in an orderly fashion.

Because of the need for secrecy, it is very important that only authorized persons be present in the Grand Jury Room while evidence is being presented. This means only the Grand Jury; the United States Attorney or an Assistant United States Attorney; and the witness who is then being examined. If a witness refuses to answer a question, the Grand Jurors, accompanied by the United States Attorney or one of his assistants, may bring this matter before the Court in order to obtain a ruling as to whether or not the witness must answer the question.

However, if a person is under investigation and appears before you as a witness, he cannot be forced to testify because of the provision in the Fifth Amendment of the Federal Constitution against self-incrimination. In fact, he must first be advised of his right not to testify and should be required to sign a formal waiver before his testimony is received.

Moreover, if such a person exercises his Constitutional right not to testify, you must not and you cannot draw an inference of guilt or any inference of any kind against him because of his failure to testify. I emphasize again that it would be improper for you to draw any adverse inference against one who exercises his Constitutional right not to testify.

Another point that I wish to make special reference to is the obligation of secrecy imposed on each Grand Juror. You must not discuss the case under investigation with anyone except fellow Grand Jurors, and the United States Attorney or his assistants, and then only in the Grand Jury Room.

Grand Jury proceedings are not to receive any publicity. The tradition of secrecy is a vital part of the Grand Jury system. No one, whether it be Members of the Grand Jury, the United States Attorney and his assistants, the prosecutors, or witnesses are permitted to disclose to anyone outside the Grand Jury Room any matters occurring before the Grand Jury. Furthermore, you're to avoid reading, viewing, or listening to any comment or speculation in the public media concerning matters that are before you.

Summing up then, your inquiry is limited to offenses committed or which are triable in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. The United States Attorney will bring before you charges against various persons and it is for you to explore the nature and inquire into the basis for these charges that have been made, and then determine whether or not the defendant should be made to stand public trial.

The accused is not called before you to deny the charge or introduce any testimony in his own behalf. You hear only the government's case. And because of this you must be scrupulously careful to respect the Constitutional rights of the accused and not commence any prosecution, if, in your good judgment, such a prosecution is not well founded. Because if you indict then the accused will be put to the expense, the inconvenience and notoriety of a public trial. However, we do not want any person to escape trial where the evidence presented to you is such that you really believe that it warrants going before the public with a public trial.

If you return an indictment this means that at a subsequent week that case will be aired publicly. In other words, at the trial later on everybody will be present; the government will present its witnesses; and the defendant will be there with his witnesses; and at that time a Jury of twelve will determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

You're considered by the law to be practical men and women and you're asked to apply your common sense and judgment in your deliberations. Only the evidence presented to you in the Grand Jury Room may be considered in determining whether to vote an indictment. Each Grand Juror must be absolutely fair and impartial in his judgment of the facts. Otherwise he will defeat the democratic purpose the Grand Jury is designed to serve.

The Grand Jury is therefore both a sword and a shield of justice. A sword because it is the terror of the criminals; a shield because it is the protection of the innocent against unwarranted prosecution. You can, therefore, realize the importance of your duties. And, needless to say, your duties should be carried out with the highest motives and sense of justice.

Are there any requests for additional instructions from the United States Attorney?

Mr. COTTONE. No, Your Honor.

The COURT. All right. Members of the Grand Jury, you may now proceed to the Grand Jury Room with the United States Attorney and his assistants and commence your deliberations.

(Record is closed.)

Mr. KELLY. O.K. Would you people——

Miss MAGUIGAN. We'll hang around.

The COURT. Court is recessed.

The CLERK. Court is now recessed.

[11:15 a.m., Court recessed.]

[11:50 a.m., Court resumed.]

[Grand Jury present in the Court Room.]

The CLERK. Court is now in session, please be seated.

The COURT. Mr. Foreman, we have a return, do we?

The FOREMAN. Yes, sir, Your Honor.

The COURT. That's eight indictments?

The FOREMAN. Eight, Your Honor.

The COURT. All right. The clerk will record the indictments and impound the voting slips.

Members of the grand jury:

If you'll recall, the first day when you appeared here, the Court gave you certain instructions as to your functions as grand jurors. I'm going to make some additional comments for you now which I ask you to incorporate with the instructions that I have given you previously.

I would like you to know that witnesses who are called before the grand jury have the right to leave the grand jury room to consult with their attorneys. And you are to draw no adverse inferences from such actions.

And I would point out also that in the case of a witness who appears before you and is given a grant of immunity that immunity protects the witness only from the use of any statements made before the grand jury or any consequences stemming from his testimony before the grand jury. And that a witness, even after the grant of immunity, can later be indicted for perjury resulting from statements that he may have made before the grand jury.

And finally, members of the jury, even though a witness is brought before you, if he turns out to be a recalcitrant witness, that is, one who is reluctant to testify, you have the option of declining to question him. In other words, the fact that he comes before the grand jury doesn't make it obligatory that he be asked questions. You still have that discretion or that option. If you decide with a particular witness that you don't desire to ask him any questions, you may consequently refrain from asking him any questions.

All right, the grand jury may now return and resume their work.

Miss MAGUIGAN. May I see you at side-bar. please, Your Honor?

The COURT. Surely.

[At side-bar.]

Miss MAGUIGAN. Judge, would you instruct the grand jurors that if they decide to persist in questioning a recalcitrant witness that that could result in an imprisonment for the life of their time, so that they know what the options are. That if they persist that the United States Attorney would request that he be held in contempt. That if he were held in contempt that he would go to prison. But that they can——

The COURT. He might go.

Miss MAGUIGAN. But he could. That he might go. And that they can decide, after listening to the reasons for his refusal to testify, that they don't wish to make him choose between prison and violation of his conscience.

The COURT. O.K.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Thank you.

[The Proceedings proceeded within the full hearing of the jury.]

The COURT. Members of the grand jury:

I believe that when I charged you originally I made some reference to possibility that some witnesses may refuse to testify before the grand jury. I think in fairness we should—would you mind taking the child out of the court room, please. That a witness if brought before you may claim his 5th Amendment rights not to incriminate himself. That then you may decide not to question him any further or you may decide to grant him immunity. If the witness is granted immunity as I have explained it to you, and is then brought again before the grand jury and persists in his refusal to testify, then the government may seek to have the Court order the witness to testify. If the witness is then brought before the Court and the Court orders the witness to testify and he reurns to the grand jury and once again refuses to testify, then the government may move to have the witness held in contempt.

Now, if a witness is thus held in contempt by the Court, the Court may confine him. That is, imprison him for the balance of the term of the grand jury, or until he agrees or decides to testify. And it is your option that if a witness nevertheless refuses to so testify and exposes himself to contempt, you may decide not to question him any further rather than have him make that choice of whether he's going to testify before you or the possible consequence that he will be held in contempt and ordered imprisoned for the balance of the term of the grand jury.

You may now return, members of the grand jury, and resume your deliberations.

Mr. KELLY. We would like to ask Jay Weiner to appear before the grand jury now.

The CLERK. Court is now adjourned.

The CLERK. Raise your right hand, please.

JOHN L. SMYTHE, called on behalf of respondent being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

The CLERK. And would you state your name for the record, please.

The WITNESS. John L. Smythe.

The CLERK. Would you spell your name.

The WITNESS. S-m-y-t-h-e.

The CLERK. Thank you.

By Miss MAGUIGAN.

[Direct examination.]

Q. Do I address you as Agent or Mr. Smythe?

A. It doesn't matter.

Q. I will use Mr. then.

You are the same John L. Smythe are you not, who prepared affidavits concerning electronic surveillance——

A. That's correct.

Q. [continuing] In this matter. Those affidavits you signed on August 2d, 1976; is that correct?

A. I believe that's correct.

Q. Do you have copies of those affidavits with you?

A. No, I do not.

Q. Have you reviewed them before you testified?

A. I have reviewed them yesterday.

Q. Did you review them today?

A. No, I haven't seen them.

Q. When was the last time you reviewed them?
A. Yesterday.
Oh, excuse me. Day before yesterday.
Q. I have copies of those here. If at any time during your testimony you would like to look at them to refresh your recollection, don't hesitate to ask to look at my copies.
A. Thank you.
Q. What is your rank?
A. I'm a special agent supervisor.
Q. Now, what is a special agent supervisor?
A. I'm assigned at FBI headquarters in a supervisory capacity, performing a specific function.
Q. What function is it that you perform?
A. Well, among other things, I maintain and control the electronic surveillance indices, which is known as the ELSUR indices.
Q. The what?
A. ELSUR, E-L-S-U-R, electronic surveillance indices.
Q. Would you describe what those indices are; physically, how are they maintained?
A. They are 3x5 cards maintained in indices cabinets.
Q. 3x5 cards. If you pulled out one of those 3x5 cards, what information——
A. It would be the name of the individual overheard, the date of the overhear and the source of the overhear.
Q. What do you mean by source of overhear?
A. The identifier as to the—it's a code symbol number to the electronic device whereby they were overheard, over which they were overheard.
If it were a telephone, it would be a code symbol designating a telephone.
Q. Is that the only information that is contained on these cards?
A. That is all.
Q. Is that the only information that you have?
A. That I have?
Q. Yes. In your indices do you have any back-up information to the information contained on the 3x5 card?
A. In some instances there might be some specific identifier relative to the individual overheard. Not very often, but ever once in a while the agent who has prepared the card may put down the name of a company or something like this, some type of identifying data relative to the individual who was overheard.
Q. Can you tell from looking at the card who the agent is who conducted the overhear?
A. No, no, I can only tell which field office it was that conducted the surveillance.
Q. That is reflected on the card then?
A. That's contained within the code symbol.
Q. The code symbol lets you know what sort of surveillance it was and lets you know—
A. No, it does not tell me what sort of surveillance it was.
Q. Tell me, then, what does the code symbol let you know?
A. It tells me the field office that conducted the surveillance and the code number that that field office is utilizing to identify the source.
Q. Do you know how to decode the field office code number?
A. No. Well, I can tell if it is a security surveillance or if it is a criminal surveillance.
Q. Criminal meaning the FBI is acting criminally or the FBI is investigating a crime?
A. If it involves a specific electronic surveillance of an individual involved in a criminal activity.
Q. I see. Can you tell from looking at the 3x5 card whether the surveillance with which you're dealing is authorized by court order or not?
A. I can tell if the—if it's a title 3. I can tell if it's under title 3.
Q. Could you describe briefly what you mean by "If it's under title 3," you can tell.
A. Title 3 is the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 whereby a procedure for court-authorized electronic surveillance was established by Congress and specifically—
Q. How can you tell if it's a title 3 tap?
A. Because it's on a blue card.

Q. What other color cards are there?
A. White.
Q. Only blue and white?
A. Blue and white.
Q. So if you have a white card, you know it's not a title 3 tap; is that right?
A. It's a security tap.
Q. If you have a white card, you know it's not a title 3 tap; is that correct?
A. That's correct.
Q. Do you know what kind of tap it is?
A. Pardon me? If it's what?
Q. If it's on a white card, what kind of tap is that?
A. An intelligence security tap.
Q. What do you mean by "An intelligence security tap"?
A. It's one that is conducted in the area of intelligence or national security.
Q. From looking at that white card you cannot tell whether that is a court-ordered tap or not; is that right?
A. No, I cannot.
Q. Where do you get your information, Mr. Smythe?
A. Where do I get what information?
Q. The information that comes into those indices?
A. In the cards?
Q. Right.
Q. From the field office. Is it telephoned in to your office?
A. No.
Q. Do they make up the cards and send them in?
A. That's correct: they make up the cards and send them in.
Q. How many field offices send information into your department?
A. How many do on a regular basis?
Q. Right.
A. I can't tell you.
Q. Are all of them supposed to, if they conduct taps?
A. All of them are supposed to; that's correct.
Q. Do you know whether all of them do?
A. I have no way of knowing.
Q. Who would know?
A. Who would know—
Q. Whether all the field offices send information in to you about taps?
A. Only the field office. Only the specific field office itself.
Q. To the best of your information, when a field office sends you a card, does the field office keep a copy of the card?
A. That's correct.
Q. Does the field office send you anything except the card?
A. Nothing else.
Q. Do you know, Mr. Smythe, how many field offices were involved in any aspect of the Patricia Hearst investigation?
A. 58.
Q. Of those field offices, do you know how many sent cards in to your office?
A. None.
Q. None. Do you know of those 58 field offices how many maintained cards in their field offices relative to wire-tapping?
A. Relative to any wiretap?
Q. Right.
A. No, I couldn't give you a specific number.
Q. Do you know of those 58 field offices how many maintained cards relative to wiretaps conducted in the course of the Patricia Hearst investigation?
A. There are none.
Q. Do you know that? How do you know this?
A. How do I know what?
Q. How do you know that among—from all of those 58 field offices there are none which maintained cards describing wiretaps conducted in the Patricia Hearst investigation?
A. There have been no wiretaps.
Q. I thought all you had was——
A. Wait a minute.
Q [continuing]. The cards that were sent you.

Q. So that, for instance, if the Bureau of—that is it? Tobacco, Alcohol and
Q. Right. From your information, there are no wiretaps.
A. That's correct.
Q. That's your position.
A. That's correct.
Q. Now, I am asking you to step back a bit and tell me whether there are wiretaps where the records are maintained only in those field offices?
A. I can't answer that.
Q. Who could answer that?
A. The specific field office.
Q. The information which comes to your office, is that information relative only to FBI-conducted wiretaps?
A. That's correct.
Q. What about information which comes from wiretaps conducted by other agencies and transmitted to the FBI?
A. No, we get——
Q. Does your office maintain a record of that?
A. No, we do not.
Q. So that, for instance, if the Bureau of—that is it? Tobacco, Alcohol and Firearms had maintained a tap in the Patricia Hearst investigation, and the FBI had been given information resulting from that tap, your office would not be able to say whether or not there had been that tap?
A. That's corect. Uh-huh.
The COURT. But you say that you maintain no cards if another agency sent in wiretap information to your office?
The WITNESS. No, we would not have cards on it because we did not conduct the wiretap.
The COURT. All right.
Q. Now, Mr. Smythe, you testified before to the Court of information that's—that's on a 3x5 card. There is no topical indexing of those cards; is that correct?
A. That's correct.
Q. So that there might, in fact, be wiretaps conducted in the course of the Patricia Hearst investigation which you wouldn't be able to turn up because you didn't recognize the name of the person overheard; is that correct?
A. By just looking at the cards, I could not make a determination relative to that.
Q. So you are not in a position to say that there has been no wiretapping conducted by the FBI in connection with the Patricia Hearst investigation; are you?
A. I am.
Q. How are you?
A. Because I did further review of records relative to this matter.
Q. Was that before or after the August 2nd affidavit?
A. Before.
Q. What was that search of records, review of records?
A. A search of the general indices and a review of all file references.
Q. The general indices of what and all file references?
A. Of FBI headquarters.
Q. The general indices including wiretap and everything else?
A. And everything else.
Q. And what did you discover when you did your search of the general indices?
A. That there was no information relative to any wiretapping relative—
Q. What did you look for?
A. What did I look for?
Q. Right. How did you set about to look for that? How are those indices arranged?
A. They are by name.
Q. By name of?
A. The individual.
Q. So what names did you use in this search?
A. Jay Weiner and Phillip Shinnick.
Q. Now, those are the only names you used?
A. Phillip Kent Shinnick.
Q. Jay Weiner?
A. Yeah.
Q. Phillip Kent Shinnick?
A. That's correct.

Q. Those are two names that you looked through the general indices for? Is that right?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you look for any other names?
A. No. Relative to these two men? Relative to Weiner and Shinnick?
Q. You just stated that you did a review of records before you prepared this affidavit.
A. That's correct.
Q. Now, who asked you to do this affidavit?
A. The Department of Justice.
Q. Do you know specifically who asked you to do it?
A. Yes.
Q. Who was that?
A. Brandon Alvey.
Q. And what information—who is Brandon Alvey?
A. He's an attorney at the Department of Justice.
Q. What did Brandon Alvey ask you to look for?
A. Any indication of electronic surveillance, legal or illegal, consentual or nonconsentual.
Q. Pertaining to?
A. These two individuals. Jay—
Q. Did he ask you to look and see whether there's been any electronic surveillance, legal or illegal, conducted in the course of the Patricia Hearst investigation?
A. Not specifically.
Q. Now, the indices—the general indices are maintained in the same general fashion as the indices that are under your supervision?
A. Yes.
Q. By name?
A. By name. They have other—there are different things—different indexable items that they would have in there, but I am not familiar with the general indices. I don't work it, so I am not really an expert at it, so I can't exactly tell you how they index everything.
Q. So there might have been information about Jay Weiner or Phillip Kent Shinnick only you didn't have the tools to retrieve it; is that right? You didn't know how the general indices worked?
A. No, that's not correct.
Q. I thought you just said you weren't an expert at those indices.
A. No. I didn't do the search of the general indices.
Q. You did not personally do that?
A. No, I did not personally do that.
Q. I thought your affidavit said that you did.
A. I said I conducted a search of the electronic surveillance indices.
Q. Oh, I see. "I have also caused a search to be made of the general indices." Who made that search?
A. The personnel of the general—of the—that handled the general indices.
Q. You didn't make the search. You are not in a position then to say, from your own personal knowledge, whether there was information relevant to electronic surveillance of these two men contained in those general indices; is that right?
A. I caused the search to be made, and, based upon the information provided to me.
Q. Do you know how that search was made?
A. I——
Q. I beg your pardon?
A. What do you mean by "how it was made"?
Q. Do you know whether the person or persons who conducted that search did anything except look under the names of these two men?
A. I'm sure that's the way they did it.
Q. But you don't know for sure what they did?
A. That's what they did.
Q. How do you know?
A. I was not there with them but that is the procedure.
Q. But you don't know what they did; is that right?
A. That's correct.
Q. Now, in the general indices, do you know whether there is also topical indexing?
A. No, I don't.

Q. Did you ask the person or persons who did the search of the general indices to check under topical indexing?

A. No.

Q. For information relative to these two men?

A. No.

The COURT. Well, did you say indices?

Miss MAGUIGAN. Topical.

The COURT. Are there topical indices?

The WITNESS. There would be in certain instances, but only if a code name or something had been given to a specific investigation.

Q. Was a code name given to the Patricia Hearst investigation or any aspect of it?

A. Yes.

Q. What's that code name?

A. HERNAP.

Q. Her nap?

A. HERNAP.

Q. HERNAP. Did you ask the person or persons who checked the general indices to look under HERNAP?

A. No, I didn't.

Q. Now, you testified earlier that the information on your cards, the blue and the white ones, are by name of person overheard; is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. Full name?

A. That's correct.

Q. Maintained alphabetically?

A. That's correct.

Q. According to last name?

A. That's correct.

Q. What does your agency do if there is an overhear of a person whose last name is not stated during the overhear? How do you index that tap?

A. It's not indexed.

Q. It's not indexed.

It might be topically indexed; is that correct?

A. Negative, no. It would not be.

Q. It would not even be——

A. Not in the electronic surveillance indices.

Q. What about in the general indices?

A. No, it wouldn't be.

Q. Why not?

A. Because the electronic surveillance overhears are not placed in the general indices.

Q. I see. I see.

What about a tap on, say, John Jones' telephone in which someone called up and said, "Hi, John. This is Mary," giving no last name. How is that indexed?

A. It's not indexed.

Q. It's not indexed at all?

A. No, not in the electronic surveillance indices or in the general indices. It may be indexed in the field office. It's an unidentified person and, therefore, until the person is identified—now, if Mary is identified as Mary Jones, then the card is sent into the electronic surveillance indices.

Q. Now, let me get a couple things straightened out. What about John Jones? Would it be indexed in your office under that?

A. Yes, it would.

Q. But if I represent Mary Smith and I want to know about a tap in which she has been overheard, I have to ask you for John Jones to find that out; right?

A. (no audible reply)

Q. Assuming that the conversation on John Jones' phone was "Hi, John, this is Mary." Is that right? In order to get to the tap of Mary's conversation, I would have to ask you to look under John Jones; right?

A. Right.

Q. So, if, for instance.——

The COURT. Even if her last name is identified?

The WITNESS. Well, all that would do, if she says she wants to know about John Jones, then I can tell her when John Jones was overheard. That's all I can tell her. "John Jones was overheard," if he's identifiable with the person making the request.

The COURT. But if—using that hypothetically if someone called and said, "This is Mary," and the field office is able to identify Mary as Mary Smith—

The WITNESS. She would go in as Mary Smith, in the indices.

The COURT. Okay.

Excuse me. Go ahead.

The WITNESS. If the person is identified, they are placed in the file. If they are unidentified, they are not.

Q. That is if the field office reports that to you; isn't that right?

A. That's right.

Q. But the field office can keep it in their office and not send that in to you; isn't that right?

A. It's possible.

The COURT. Well, are they required under any rule——

The WITNESS. They are required to send it in. The rules state that every person identified must be sent in.

Q. That doesn't always happen; does it, Mr. Smythe?

A. I do not know if it hasn't happened. I have no knowledge one way or the other.

Q. But you say to the Court that all the information that is required to be sent in to your office is, in fact, sent in?

A. No.

Q. Now, if I—so that it's—excuse me. Let me strike that.

So it's possible that an agent in the field office would know that the Mary on our hypothetical conversation was Mary Smith, but would not put that information down and send it to you unless she said, "Hi, John. This is Mary Smith." Is that right?

That's possible?

A. No, that's not right.

Q. Why not?

A. If he identifies her—if a Mary calls——

Q. That's right.

A. [continuing]. And he doesn't know who she is, but later determines who she is, he will sent in the card. He is required to send in the card.

Q. Very often, FBI agents do not do what they are required to do; isn't that correct?

A. I won't—can't answer that. You're saying that.

Q. Well. Mr. Smythe, let me ask you another thing: Are you prepared to take responsibility for the agents in the field offices and vouch for the fact that they send in cards when they are supposed to?

A. No.

Q. I don't blame you.

Mr. KELLY. Your Honor, I object to that last remark. It's out of order.

The COURT. Yes, strike that and we will have no response from the people in the back of the courtroom. That remark was uncalled for, Miss Maguigan, and let's not go into it.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Well, Judge, I apologize if I offended the Court by that.

The COURT. Well, you're an officer of the Court and I want you to direct your questions for the benefit of the Court and not for the benefit of anyone in attendance.

Miss MAGUIGAN. But, Judge——

The COURT. And I can assure you that I won't be impressed by your emotional reaction to it.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Judge, one of the things that we have tried to do with our subpoena to Clarence Kelley is to get someone who could answer these questions. I want to make a record of the fact that this agent cannot.

The COURT. Absolutely. That's understandable.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Thank you.

Q. Now, Agent Smythe, if I wanted to find out about conversations in which Jay Weiner had been overheard and there has not during the relevant period been a telephone registered in his name, but I had reason to believe he had been overheard, I would have to submit to you the names of the persons on whose telephones I thought he had been overheard; isn't that right? Before you could make a check.

A. Uh-huh.

Q. Your you answer "Yes" or "No."
A. Yes.
Q. Yes.
The COURT. You mean—do I understand this? Is the question that if you identified him by name——
The WITNESS. Are you talking about—by name?
Q. Right.
A. If he is not in the indices by name, then we have no knowledge of him anywhere on any phone at any time.
Q. But supposing we have a situation where there's a surveillance going on of someone with whom Jay Weiner has conversations regularly, and supposing, during those conversations Jay just says, "Hi, this is Jay," and they talk. If you were going to determine to a certainty that those conversations had not been overheard, you would have to check the phones on which he made the calls; isn't that right?
I would have to give you a list and say, Here are 12 phones on which Jay Weiner has been overheard and you would have to check those phones in order to say to a certainty that he had not been overheard; isn't that right?
A. Right, if he didn't give his name. If it was somebody like Jay, just Jay.
Q. If it was just Jay. If he was talking to a friend——
A. Uh-huh.
Q. [Continued]. And said, "This is Jay."
A. Right.
Q. You would have to check that friends phone in order to determine to a certainty that that conversation was not overheard?
The COURT. Was what?
Miss MAGUIGAN. Was not overheard.
The WITNESS. Well, we would be dependent then upon you telling us that this is Jay Weiner making that conversation, and we would have no way of knowing it was him, unless you told us it was him.
The COURT. Would your card show, say Jay Weiner called Frank Smith and said, "Hello, this is Jay," and no one knows who Jay is, would Frank Smith's card say that there was a call from a man named Jay?
The WITNESS. No.
The COURT. Well, then, you couldn't find that out even by checking Frank Smith's card.
The WITNESS. Well, if we checked Frank Smith and you made a specific statement that Jay Weiner called Frank Smith on such a day and used the name Jay and then we checked Frank Smith, and we did have a surveillance on that phone, and the log showed a Jay calling, who had not been identified, then that's Jay and you are telling us it's him. But we have no way of knowing it.
The COURT. All right. I understand you then. You are not saying that the card would make any—as far as you have it—would make any reference to Jay. Frank Smith's card would make no reference to Jay unless Jay was identified by a last name.
The WITNESS. Unless he was identified by last name, that's correct.
If he were identified, which would therefore make the information obtained usable, then it would be entered in the indices. Otherwise, it would be just, you know, unusuable information that is waiting for some unraveling, I guess.
The COURT. I understand. If Jay calls Frank Smith and says, "I am Jay," and no one in the field office knows who Jay is, you have no record of that anywhere.
The WITNESS. That's correct. That's correct. We would have nothing anywhere. Except it would be in the logs of the surveillance.
The COURT. Yes. All right.
Q. Mr. Smyth, what if the agent in the field office thought it might be Jay Weiner? What would he do then?
A. Well, they would have to make a determination one way or the other whether it is or not, and then opt in favor of his suspicion that it might be, and send a card in.
If he thinks it's somebody but he's not sure, he should send a card in. He would send the card in.
Q. What are the logs?
A. There are no laws relative to maintenance of the ELSUR indices.
Q. But you have testified about logs here.
A. Oh, logs. I thought you said "laws." Excuse me.

Q. Logs, l-o-g-s.

A. The logs are the—are the—every time a call comes in, under an electronic surveillance, the overhearing agent writes down descriptive information as to what that call is: the time of it, incoming or outgoing, who answered, who's calling and a brief description of the conversation.

Q. So that if I wanted to get at this conversation between Jay Weiner and Frank Smith, and I told you that I thought he'd been overheard on Frank Smith's phone, you would go to Frank Smith, is that right, and check and see if there was an overhear on Frank Smith or not?

A. That's right.

Q. Do you have copies of the logs at your office?

A. No.

Q. So then if you were going to do a search, you'd go back to the field office and ask them to check the logs on the Frank Smith transaction; is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And you would ask them to check the logs to see whether there had been any phone calls where someone called up and said, "Hi, this is Jay," is that right? Or other information.

A. That's right.

Q. You did not do that in this case, did you?

A. No.

Q. Did Brandon Alvey tell you that Jay Weiner submitted a list of names?

A. OK, that was done then. If a list of names and telephone numbers was submitted, which was possibly so, then they have been checked.

Q. Were they submitted to you?

A. Yes. And then I sent them to the field office.

I don't know. I don't recall offhand. You've got me——

Q. You said before that the only names you got were Jay Weiner and Phillip Kent Shinnick. I asked you that a couple of times.

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, you say, if there was a list, there was a list and you checked it through the logs.

A. OK.

Q. How can you say that if you don't even remember?

A. Well, if you sent——

Mr. KELLY. Excuse me, your Honor. At the initial time that this witness was called, of course, he was being called subject to the objections to the relevancy of the testimony at all. Now, I understood the Court was taking it under the assumption that it was going to be short, but at this time I would like to submit that, if possible, we could save time by arguing whether or not the witness should testify at all, rather than waiting until the conclusion of the testimony.

The COURT. Well, do you have——

Mr. KELLY. In other words, the——

The COURT. Let's find out first, do you have much more examination of this witness?

Miss MAGUIGAN. I don't have too much more. Mr. Stavis has some examination of this witness. We are not going to duplicate, he has some additional examination.

Mr. KELLY. Well, any number of cases have held, time and again, that the affidavits, such as what Mr. Smythe has filed previously in this case, were sufficient denial to satisfy the 3504 issue and I respectfully submit that that issue is just as established now as it was before, which makes his testimony now completely irrelevant and immaterial and going far beyond anything that we have ever had to produce before in even a contempt hearing such as this. So at this time I would like to ask the Court to entertain my motion to strike the testimony of this witness.

Miss MAGUIGAN. May I be heard?

The COURT. Oh, yes.

Miss MAGUIGAN. The first thing is that this Court definitely ruled at the stage of the motion to quash that the affidavits were sufficient.

The COURT. Pardon me?

Miss MAGUIGAN. That you ruled, when we filed the motion to quash, that the affidavits satisfied you.

The COURT. Yes.

Miss MAGUIGAN. At that time you also denied our motion for an evidentiary hearing on the issue. I mean that was one motion for disclosure and for an evidentiary hearing. You were satisfied with the affidavits and denied those.

We are now at the stage of having to show cause why the witness should not be held in contempt and that is the state that is peculiarly appropriated for an evidentiary hearing.

The COURT. Can you show me any authority, once again, that says that this type of evidence is appropriate on it—or at the hearing to show cause?

Miss MAGUIGAN. Gelbard. I mean Gelbard suggests that, if nothing else, that if you have a claim of taint that that is relevant to the issue of cause for refusal to testify.

The COURT. Well, Gelbard did not have an affidavit, did it?

Miss MAGUIGAN. No, Judge, I am talking about that's the principle for the relevance of this kind of—what I'm trying to do now is go behind the affidavit and I think I'm on the road to showing the insufficiency of the affidavit and that's why Mr. Kelly has objected at this point, he sees that this affidavit is not sufficient.

While it was sufficient at the motion to quash stage, we're able to show now that this agent cannot categorically state what he stated apparently categorically in the affidavit submitted to this Court. He simply is in no position to know. What I'm trying to do is explore the parameters of his lack of knowledge.

The COURT. Well, it's—if you had made this motion originally, I would be happy to entertain it, but I think it's quite belated.

Mr. KELLY. Well, it was my understanding, your Honor, that we—that that was the understanding in which you allowed the witness to take the stand in the first place.

The COURT. Are you saying now that you don't want to accommodate him, take him off the stand and——

Mr. KELLY. Well, we were doing it for the purpose of time-frame. It was my understanding that the witness' appearance would not be protracted and it turns out that it is and that's the problem.

Miss MAGUIGAN. I should say that Mr. Kelly did not ask us how long he would be here. He got no representation from me as to how long.

Mr. KELLY. That's true.

The COURT. All right. Overruled. You may proceed, with the same understanding. Relevancy and materiality will be determined after he is finished.

Q. Agent Smythe, have you brought with you any notes that you made at the time you conducted the search that Mr. Alvey requested?

A. I was not requested to bring anything. I did not bring anything.

Q. All right. You did not bring any notes?

A. Right.

Q. Now, you testified that the names you remembered checking out for Mr. Alvey were Phillip Kent Shinnick and Jay Weiner; is that right?

A. Yeah, that's the—in conducting the search it was relative to Jay Weiner and Phillip Kent Shinnick. If you submitted to me or to Mr. Alvey a list of individuals and addresses, which is—which gives the address and the telephone numbers—is that what you submitted?

Q. We didn't submit addresses? Is that necessary?

A. Telephone numbers?

Q. Telephone numbers and names.

A. Okay, then they go——

The COURT. You don't know what was submitted?

The WITNESS. I don't recall.

The COURT. Do you know what was submitted?

Mr. KELLY. I'm certain their motion would have it.

Miss MAGUIGAN. What we have annexed as Exhibits A–1 and A–2 to Jay Weiner's motion for disclosure are lists, some with addresses and some not. List of all the addresses where Jay Weiner has resided with telephone numbers.

The COURT. And were these—Mr. Kelly, were these submitted then to Mr. Alvey for purposes of the affidavits that were filed?

Mr. KELLY. I'm not in a position to certify, your Honor, I can tell you that my procedure throughout was to forward whatever we—whatever we received from the witnesses' counsel to Mr. Alvey as a matter of form. And when the Court entered the first order, we asked Mr. Alvey to make the search in compliance with the Court's order. But, as I say, I'm not in a position to certify that I sent a copy of that motion to Mr. Alvey with instructions.

The COURT. Do you recall whether you, in checking the ELSUR—is that what you call it?

The WITNESS. ELSUR indices.

The COURT. You checked those yourself, did you?

The WITNESS. Yes.

The COURT. Do you recall whether you checked in this matter names other than Messrs. Weiner and Shinnick?

The WITNESS. No, I wouldn't—I would not check any other names. If there are other names and addresses, they would go to the field office covering that individual area to determine if there was any coverage of that specific individual or telephone.

I cannot determine at headquarters whether a specific phone has been—had electronic surveillance.

So I then send what was sent to me, giving the telephone numbers and so forth to the field office that covers that area, to determine if there was any electronic surveillance of that specific telephone number or address.

In this case I was advised there had been none, relative to that.

The COURT. And—but I am asking, did you send to the field offices just the names of Messrs. Weiner and Shinnick?

The WITNESS. No, I send them exactly what I receive, from Brandon Alvey. A copy of his letter transmitting the identifying data and the rest of the data, to each appropriate field office covering the areas where—of the addreses within the petition.

The COURT. And you don't know if that—

The WITNESS. I do not know.

The COURT. —what that was?

The WITNESS. I do not.

The COURT. All right.

The WITNESS. In—relative to that, if—if an individual who has not been identified is overheard on a tap, and the information—whatever he said is unusable and it's not—you are not able to put it anywhere or use it, if you can't identify the person. When the person is identified, a card is sent in thereby making that information retrievable.

So, if an individual named Jay had called and the information was utilized in any way by the FBI, it would only be if he was identified as Jay Weiner, thereby making it usable information.

Then, by the rules, he should have been identified and a card sent in. That's the best I can say.

Q. Mr. Smythe, do you have any special way of categorizing the electronic surveillance information you get that relates to, say, the Domestic Terrorists Digest? Do you code in that way? Information that comes through the FBI as part of their participation in compiling the Domestic Terrorists Digest?

A. I don't even know what the Domestic Terrorists Digest is.

Q. Okay. Then you can't answer any questions with reference to that Digest?

A. No. All I can answer is whether an individual has been overheard or not.

Q. Do you know what sort of records are maintained in field offices relative to taps that are not conducted directly by the FBI?

Just: Do you know what kind of information they might maintain about such taps, that they would not, under the rule, send to you?

A. No, I would not know.

Q. So that there may be information in field offices about taps of Jay Weiner, conducted by state or local authorities and you would have no way of knowing that from your records; is that right?

A. Well, it would be in the files. It would be in the file in the field office, as relative to individual. And in the request that I send out, they would respond if there was or there wasn't, if it was in the file.

Q. But you didn't send out to field offices in this case, did you?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. I thought you just said that you checked your indices and the general indices.

A. That's correct. And I also sent out to the field offices.

Q. Whose names did you send out to field offices?

A. I sent the request from the Department of Justice, a copy of the request from the Department of Justice.

Q. Do you remember what names were in that request from the Department of Justice?

A. I don't recall offhand. I know Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick were in there.

Q. Did you send that request to all 58 field offices involved in the Patty Hearst investigation?

A. No, I did not.

Q. To what field offices did you send your request?

A. To all the offices reflected by addresses within the request. The addresses of the individuals and any other addresses that appear within the request.

Q. What field offices were those in this case?

A. I can't recall right offhand. It would be—well, Newark, Portland, I think there was Oberlin, Ohio, Cincinnati or Cleveland, whichever covers that one. San Francisco, Los Angeles.

Q. Who made the decision which field offices to check?

A. I did.

Q. But you don't remember now on what basis you made that decision except that it was from addresses?

A. On all of those offices that had addresses and I sent, I think in this matter, knowing that it was relative to HERNAP, I think I sent to the major offices in the HERNAP case. San Francisco——

Q. What are the offices?

A. [Continuing.] Primarily.

Q. So that you did not check—that sounds like about maybe six or eight of the 58 field offices involved in this investigation.

A. That's correct.

Q. So there could be logs or other records reflecting wiretaps of Jay Weiner and Phil Shinnick in those remaining 50 field offices and you wouldn't know, because you didn't check them; is that right?

A. Well, the reason for the——

Q. You would not know because you did not check them?

A. The reason for the electronic surveillance indices is to tell me that they have been overhead and identified in the field office, and that's the field office I would go to. If I saw in the electronic surveillance indices a card reflecting an overhear on that individual, I would go to that field office. There were no cards in the indices relative to Weiner or Mr. Shinnick.

Q. Right, but say you had in mind to determine whether those field offices had wiretap information that they got from state or local agencies or that they got from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms or from other federal agencies, if you wanted to know that—

A. Uh-huh.

Q. You would send to the individual field offices for that information; is that right?

A. That's correct.

Q. So we are talking now about federal taps not done by the FBI, tap by federal agencies not the FBI or a tap by a state or local agency.

The COURT. If a field office had information, one of your field offices, from the Alcohol, Tobacco and Tax Division, they would not send a card to you?

The WITNESS. No.

The COURT. It's only an FBI tap——

The WITNESS. That is correct.

The COURT [continuing]. That would be in your——

The WITNESS. I believe that when an ELSUR check is done, they would go to every federal agency and ask. I would expect in this case they did also. I don't know for sure.

The COURT. But if—if a field office had information from a state tap in a file, bearing the name of Jay Weiner, for example, that wouldn't be—show up in your file, would it?

The WITNESS. No, it would not.

The COURT. But you're saying that you did send inquiries to those field offices associated with the addresses listed in the request from Mr. Alvey?

The WITNESS. That is correct.

The COURT. And they came back negative?

The WITNESS. That is correct.

The COURT. Go ahead.

Q. You don't remember——

The COURT. Is that available? Is that hard to find, that request of Mr. Alvey to you?

The WITNESS. No. It's not hard to find.

The COURT. Where would it be?

The WITNESS. It's in my office.

The COURT. Okay. Go ahead. I am sorry.

Miss MAGUIGAN. That's all right, Judge.

Q. There is some—just before I go on to another area, there is some 50 field offices that you did not check with regard to wiretap of Jay Weiner and Phil Shinnick; is that right?

A. That's correct.

Q. Did you make any check after you executed your August 2nd, 1976 affidavit?

A. Is this the one here?

Q. Right.

A. No.

Q. All right. During the checks that you made, that are reflected in that affidavit, did you check to determine whether there was a wiretap on any attorney telephones?

A. Was that requested in your request?

Q. I don't know. Did Mr. Alvey request it of you?

A. I don't recall it. If you requested—if you sent your name in, then it was done. I don't recall.

Q. Mr. Smythe, I know what I sent in, what I submitted to this Court but there's a long chain. What I submitted to the Court, a copy of which goes to Mr. Kelley and Mr. Cottone, that's one, that's pretty direct. I know what they got. Then there's what they give to Mr. Alvey. I don't know what that was. Then there's what Mr. Alvey gave to you, and I don't know what that was. Do you see what I mean?

A. Right. I do not recall your name appearing, so that's——

Q. What about Thomas Menaker? Do you recall that name?

A. I don't recall. If it was sent—the only two names that I searched in this was Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick.

Q. Those are the only names that you personally searched?

A. That I personally searched. I don't know what there was on the other—on the addresses.

Q. Okay. So you did not personally search the ELSUR indices for Holly Maguigan, to determine whether my telephone had been tapped?

A. No.

Q. And you did not personally search to determine whether Thomas Menaker's telephone had been tapped?

A. No.

Q. Or Morton Stavis?

A. No.

Q. Or Doris Peterson?

A. No.

Q. Margaret Ratner?

A. No.

Q. William Kuntsler?

A. No.

Q. Center for Constitutional Rights?

A. No.

Q. Mr. Smythe, do you know what a "Do Not File" file is?

A. Only what I read in the newspaper.

Q. We're in the same boat.

Do you have—what I'm trying to establish is you've talked about the rules that govern transmittal of information from field offices to your office.

A. Yes.

Q. When you describe that, you presume good faith on the part of the field agents in the field office; is that right?

Mr. KELLY. Well, I object to the apparent line of questioning, Your Honor. If they want to stick to the question of electronic surveillance and his manner of checking——

The COURT. Yes. Let's keep it to what he would know about.

Miss MAGUIGAN. That's what I'm trying to find out, Judge.

Q. Whether: Do you have any information that would lead you to have a conclusion one way or the other whether the concept of "Do Not File" file applies also to information on electronic surveillance?

Mr. KELLY. I object.

The COURT. Overruled.

Do you have any information?

The WITNESS. No, I don't.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Thank you.

If you will indulge me for a minute we wil try to tighten this up a little bit.

The COURT. Well, while you're doing that, we'll take a brief recess.
[Recess, 3 p.m.]
[3:15 p.m., Court resumes.]
The CLERK. Court is now in session.
By Miss MAGUIGAN.
Direct examination [continued].
Q. Agent Smythe, the Brandon Alvey request——
A. Yes.
Q [Continued]. Pursuant to which you conducted the investigation about which you testified, was that request addressed to you personally?
A. No.
Q. How was it addressed?
A. Director of Federal Bureau of Investigation, attention to our section.
Q. Are you the person who normally conducts searches pursuant to that sort of request?
A. Yes.
Q. Is there anyone else in your department who conducts searches?
A. Yes, when I'm not there, someone will fill in and conduct a search.
Q. Is that a situation where in your absence you delegate your authority to do that?
A. No, they are equal authority.
Q. How many people are there?
A. Two others that do them.
Q. What are their names?
A. Walter Mangicotti and Michael Keown.
Q. Do you maintain files of searches you conducted pursuant to requests like Mr. Alvey's request?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you and the other two persons authorized to make searches keep a joint file or do you keep personal files of those searches that you do?
A. They're all filed in the regular file, they're in a special file.
Q. Do you happen to know whether either of those two persons conducted a search for electronic surveillance relative to Jay Weiner and Phil Shinnick?
A. The individual who had the—who was doing it prior to me, before I came to Washington, did one, I believe. In 1975, maybe.
Q. Who would that be?
A. William Harwood.
Q. Harwood. And tha twas in relation to Phil Shinnick or Jay Weiner or both?
A. If they both came at the same time, then he probably did both of them. I recall that he did one on Jay Weiner; I know that.
Q. Do you recall whether he did one on Phil Shinnick?
A. No, I don't recall.
Q. Did you participate in that earlier search?
A. No.
Q. So you can't testify of your own personal knowledge how that search was conducted or what it turned up?
A. It was negative.
Q. You know that through what Mr. Harwood told you?
A. Well, I know what the file reflects. It was negative.
Q. But you don't know what kind of a search that was? Is that right?
A. It was an ELSUR search.
Q. All right. But do you know how many field offices Mr. Harwood caused to be searched?
A. No. Certainly Not.
Q. Do you know whether, since your—your tenure of office was about a year; is that right?
A. That's correct.
Q. Since your tenure of office, has anyone in your department, besides yourself, conducted a search for tapping of Jay Weiner or Phil Shinnick?
A. I don't believe. Not to my knowledge.
Q. Have you made a request to any Federal agencies to determine whether they had information on surveillance of Jay Weiner or Phil Shinnick?
A. No. When we make a response to the Department, we have a paragraph in which we say, "It is suggested that you contact any other federal agencies to determine if they have conducted any electronic surveillance."
Q. And what are the federal agencies that in your opinion would be appropriate to contact?

Mr. KELLY. I object, your Honor. That's outside the purview of his knowledge.

The COURT. Sustained.

Q. When you receive a request, do you also suggest that the person making the request check State and local agencies?

A. No.

Q. Could you estimate how long is the time sequence between a field office obtaining information about a wiretap and your office obtaining a card that reflects that information?

A. They're supposed to send them every Friday of the week in which the surveillance was conducted, cards are sent.

Q. So, to the extent of your knowledge, the time lag would be not more than a week-to-week allowing for the vagaries of the mail—are they sent by mail?

A. Yes.

Q. What does a log in a field office look like? Do you know if it's in a loose-leaf binder or is it on government forms?

A. It's a form type of thing generally. It is a form type of thing with a column that would show type of call, incoming or outgoing, time of call, individuals, and nature of the call. Length of the call.

Q. Is there a separate sheet for each call or are several calls reflected on one?

A. Several are reflected on one.

Q. The last column that you described, that contains more subjective information than the other columns? Is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. And that would contain information like what the subject matter of the call was thought to be if it wasn't spelled out.

A. That's correct.

Q. It might contain information about who a particular agent thought was being overheard even if he wasn't certain. He would send you a card on that person, is that correct.

A. That's correct.

Q. Would that log be the place in the field office where information obtained as a result of taps by other federal agencies was contained?

A. No.

Q. Where would that information be.

A. That would be in the file, case file.

Q. What about information obtained as a result of wiretaps conducted by state or local agencies? Would that be in the log?

A. No, that would be in the case file.

Q. Now, when you send the request, to the six or eight of the 58 field offices in this case, you just ask them to check their logs; is that right?

A. No, they check the files also. The procedure is to check the files. If they have a—if they have a file relative to the individual, or if they're indexed into a file, for instance if John Smith is part of the Hearst file, he is indexed into the file. And then a review is conducted of that file relative to that individual.

Q. You don't know of your own personal knowledge what kind of search was done by each of the field offices you contacted; is that right?

A. I was not there. I would not.

Q. Can you estimate, if you take the information in the field office that's obtained as a result of state or local wiretaps and add to that the information that's obtained as a result of wiretaps by other federal agencies, add to that information pertaining to telephone calls in which the party overheard may not be fully identified, right, take all that information, can you estimate what percentage of that information is reflected in the cards that you make?

A. The cards that we make?

Q. Right, the cards that you maintain in your department.

A. There would be none.

Q. There would be none.

A. That's correct.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Just a minute.

The COURT. I don't think anyone's being accommodated any longer. Does he have a plane to make or something?

Mr. KELLY. Well, he did, your Honor, but at four o'clock but he's obviously not going to make it.

The COURT. And you have some more questions?

Miss MAGUIGAN. Yes.

The COURT. All right. Take him off the stand.

You go ahead with your case.
Mr. KELLY. Okay.
[Mrs. Alice Glatz, called on behalf of being duly sworn, testified as follows:]
The CLERK. Would you state your name, please.
The WITNESS. Alice Glatz, G-l-a-t-z.
By Mr. KELLY.
[Direct examination.]
Q. Now, Mrs. Glatz, where do you live, please?
A. Wyoming, Pennsylvania.
Q. And how are you employed?
A. I am a legal secretary and I am—do court reporting.

The COURT. Good morning.
Mr. KELLY. Good morning, Your Honor.
The COURT. When we had adjourned the last time we heard some testimony. Is Mr. Smyth here?
Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.
The COURT. All right. We heard some testimony from Mr. Smyth. And I had obtained an offer of proof from counsel for the witnesses, and it's my desire now, under the same conditions as previously expressed, to ask Mr. Smyth to return to the stand for continued examination.

Mr. KELLY. Excuse me, Your Honor. We would like to interpose an objection to Mr. Smyth testifying in this matter for the reasons substantially set forth in our supplemental memorandum filed on August 3rd, which points out that in the absence of critical and conflicting evidence from the witness, indicating that the government's denial of electronic surveillance is false, there is no bases for an evidentary hearing in this matter, and citing several cases. I would respectfully submit that notwithstanding whatever Mr. Smyth's testimony has been heretofore in this hearing, that there is a definite absence of any credible evidence indicating that there has been any interception of either of the witnesses in this case. And therefore I respectfully submit that it's improper to have testimony of Mr. Smyth in this matter.

The COURT. Well, I haven't rule on that and so that motion will be taken under advisement. But we will ask Mr. Smyth to retake the stand. You're still under oath, Mr. Smyth.

Mr. SMYTH. Yes, sir.

[John L. Smyth, recalled.]

The COURT. You may proceed.

Miss MAGUIGAN. Thank you, Judge.

By Miss MAGUIGAN.

[Direct examination.]

Q. Mr. Smyth, when you testified last Friday, and you testified that you had received a request to do a search of Elsur indices from Brandon Alvey; is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. When you were in court last Friday you did not have with you a copy of your request from Mr. Alvey; is that correct?

A. That's correct.

Q. Do you have that request with you today?

A. No.

Q. Have you brought with you today any notes or memoranda or any documentation concerning the request from Mr. Alvey?

A. No. All I brought was a list of the telephone numbers that were provided to me last week by the Department.

Q. There were telephone numbers provided to you last week?

A. Yeah. In Mr. Alvey's request the—all he requested was the name of Jay Weiner and his address in Philadelphia, was the request that we received to do the Elser check on.

Q. And what did you get last week?

A. The full—what is it, the motion that was provided to the government.

Q. Do you have a copy of that?

A. No, I don't have a copy of it. I have a Thermo-Fax that was sent to our office in Washington.

Q. And when was that sent to your office?

A. Monday.

Q. Monday of last week?

A. That's correct.

Q. Were you aware of that when you testified last week?

A. No.

Q. You had not received that personally?

A. Never received it prior to Monday.

Q. May I see the Thermo-Fax that you have?

A. I don't have it with me. I did not bring it with me.

Q. Did you bring anything at all with you, Mr. Smyth?

A. I just brought a list of the telephone numbers that were included on that thing.

Q. I see. Can I see that list?

Mr. KELLY. Excuse me, Your Honor. I submit that the list that she has includes issues that have not yet been presented before the Court. And for that reason I respectfully submit that this goes beyond the scope of the inquiry at the present time. And by elaboration——

The COURT. I don't understand.

Mr. KELLY. By various motions they have submitted numerous telephone numbers to determine whether or not there have been any electronic surveillance on them. Among the numbers are those of counsel that they have made allegations with reference to and issues that are separate from the issues to whether or not either Mr. Weiner or Dr. Shinnick have been overheard at any time. For that reason I submit that any numbers that he gives her at the present time should be restricted to those that have been made in the first motions seeking any electronic surveillance on the witnesses themselves.

The WITNESS. Well, if the inquiry had determined that we had conducted an electronic surveillance over that telephone number, there would be logs of the intercepted conversation. And in the logs it would have the names of individuals who were participating in the conversation and the topic of their conversation.

The COURT. I see, Well, are you in a position then to say whether the reports back as to these numbers in the August 23rd affidavit would indicate to you whether there had been any conversation concerning—where the name of Messrs. Shinnick or Weiner appeared?

The WITNESS. That's correct, that's correct, yes.

The COURT. All right. O.K., the Court will take a brief recess.

Mr. STAVIS. May we ask him a question?

The COURT. After the recess you might.

Mr. STAVIS. Thank you, Your Honor.

[5:25 p.m., Court recessed.]

[6 p.m., Court resumed.]

The CLERK. Court is now in session.

The COURT. Mr. Smyth.

[Mr. Smyth resumes the stand.]

The COURT. So that I will understand, that you called the field offices represented by the area codes of the phone numbers contained in Mr. Weiner's motion, which is Docket entry No. 4, Appendix A–1 and A–2, and Shinnick motion, Docket entry No. 2, which contains phone numbers in paragraph 16, to check their files and see if they ever conducted any electronic surveillance as to those numbers. And the answer came back negative; is that correct?

The WITNESS. That's correct.

The COURT. All right. So I take it then that that would indicate that of course not having been the subject of electronic surveillance, that not only Mr. Weiner and Mr. Shinnick did not participate in telephone conversations as to those numbers that were recorded, but also that their names weren't even mentioned?

The WITNESS. That's correct.

The COURT. O.K. Now, as to the phone numbers on the Shinnick August 23 affidavit, you said that the offices, the field offices represented by those numbers were canvassed as to whether, first, whether those phones had been the subject of electronic surveillance?

The WITNESS. That's correct.

The COURT. And if they had been, and either Mr. Weiner or Mr. Shinnick's names were the topic of conversation, then this would be recorded on their logs and reported back to you——

The WITNESS. That's correct.

The COURT [continuing]. From the field office? All right. Now, are you familiar with these? I have the affidavit of Mr. Shinnick here. No, not that one, I'm talking about another one. And in paragraph four he identifies—he says, "My calls to my attorneys have been made from the following numbers: Area Code 201–932–3233, and Area Code 201–246–8557?"

The WITNESS. Yes.

The COURT. Now, were those numbers checked in the field office?

The WITNESS. Yes, they were.

The COURT. And what was the report on those?

The WITNESS. We never conducted any electronic surveillance on those telephone numbers.

The COURT. All right. And Mr. Stavis' telephone numbers are listed, Area Code 201–622–3789–90–91–92, Area Code 201–624–0471, Area Code 201–485–3926, were those numbers checked?

The WITNESS. You lost me on the numbers there.

The COURT. All right. Do you want me to repeat them?

The WITNESS. Yes.

The COURT. Area Code 201, No. 622–3789–90–91–92; do you have that now?

The WITNESS. Yes.

The COURT. You also have 201–624–0471, and Area Code 201–485–3926?

The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. All right. And did you check those numbers?
The WITNESS. Yes, I did.
The COURT. And what was the report on those?
The WITNESS. We've never conducted any electronic surveillance on those telephone numbers.
The COURT. All right. Now, as to Mr. Stavis' affidavit, he identifies phone numbers with whom he has been in contact, and it's Area Code 914–657–8257?
The WITNESS. 657–8257?
The COURT. Yes. And Area Code 212–924–5661.
The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. And Area Code 212–431–4118, and 4119?
The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. And you checked those numbers; did you?
The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. And have those numbers been the subject of electronic surveillance?
The WITNESS. Those numbers have never been the subject of any electronic surveillance.
The COURT. Now, there's also mentioned Area Code 212, No. 674–3303 et seq?
The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. Has that number been the subject of electronic surveillance?
The WITNESS. That number has never been the subject of electronic surveillance.
The COURT. So you're saying none of the numbers——
The WITNESS. None of the numbers have been the subject of electronic surveillance.
The COURT. All right, do you want to question?
Mr. STAVIS. Yes.
By Miss MAGUIGAN.
[Direct examination:]
Q. Mr. Smyth, were you provided with an affidavit which I submitted, which I signed August 20th, 1976, if I give you the phone numbers will you be able to tell me if you checked them?
The COURT. I'm sorry, I overlooked those. Can you tell me what——
Miss MAGUIGAN. Yes, sir, these were the ones that were submitted in my affidavit which was attached to my answer to the petition for order to show cause.
The COURT. He's gone over those, hasn't he?
Miss MAGUIGAN. I'm not sure. You haven't asked him any questions about these.
The COURT. Oh, I haven't?
Miss MAGUIGAN. Some of the numbers are duplicative. I just want to get his answer that he'd give as to the numbers that are not duplicative before we explore the manner by which he came to that conclusion.
The COURT. What numbers would they be?
Miss MAGUIGAN. They would be, for instance, 717–236–9341.
The COURT. That's Mr. Menaker. Do you have that number?
The WITNESS. Yes.
The COURT. And what would your answer be to that one?
The WITNESS. No electronic surveillance.
Miss MAGUIGAN.
Q. 212–255–1851?
The COURT. Do you have that?
The WITNESS. I have that number.
The COURT. What's your report on that?
The WITNESS. No electronic surveillance.
Mr. KELLY. Excuse me Your Honor, do I understand that my objection to standing still on the record?
The COURT. Yes, it still is, and I will explain my position in time. O.K.
Miss MAGUIGAN.
Q. 215–LO—or, 563–8312, 8313, 8314?
A. I have those. No electronic surveillance on those numbers.
Q. 215–GE8–6139?
A. I have that number. No electronic surveillance on that number.
Q. 215–SH4–9374?
A. I have that number. No electronic surveillance on that number.
Q. 215–349–9058?
A. I have that number. No electronic surveillance on that number.
Q. 215–EV6–0948?

A. I have that number. No electronic surveillance on that number.
Q. 609-966——
A. Pardon me, what was the area code?
Q. 609-966-6194?
A. I have that number. No electronic surveillance on that number.
Q. Now, you have answered in response to all of the telephone numbers submitted, no electronic surveillance. Is your answer to each of those numbers that there has never been electronic surveillance at any time ever, whether related to this case or not?
A. That's my answer, yes. There has never been electronic surveillance on those telephone numbers.
Q. Now, I ask you when you were earlier on the stand Mr. Symth, whether you had brought with you any documentation and said you had not; remember saying that?
A. I said I brought a list of telephone numbers which you asked me, and that was the last thing that we had.
Q. Yes, I see that you're referring to pieces of paper as you testify. Are those the lists that you brought?
A. Right, they are.
Q. You selected those from a packet of pieces of paper; is that correct?
A. You mean this thing? They're blank cards, or cards that say pick up groceries, or whatever it is. It's mine.
Q. What appears on the cards that are laid out in front of you at the witness stand?
A. Telephone numbers.
Q. Written in hand, or written by machine?
A. Yes, I wrote them. No, I wrote them myself.
Q. Now, before I get into those numbers, you testified, I believe, that you had never seen Appendix A-1 and Appendix A-2, either appendices that were submitted to you; is that correct, in connection with Jay Weiner?
A. That's correct, I had not.
Q. How do you know then that you have checked all the numbers listed in these appendices?
A. Because I was given an affidavit or something Monday, and I checked those numbers.
Q. How do you know that they're the same numbers?
A. They have been cross-checked against all of the affidavits that are here.
Q. Did you cross check them?
A. Yes.
Q. Now, you've made the search that allows you to answer a sto each of these numbers since Monday of this week; is that right?
A. The Shinnick list that was submitted in June was done prior to last week. The rest of the numbers were done since last week.
Q. Who did the Shinnick list that was submitted in June?
A. I did.
Q. When you were here on Friady my recollection of your testimony is that you only remembered getting Phil Shinnick's name?
A. No, I think I stated that I thought that possibly there was a list of telephone numbers with it but I was not sure and that I would have to recheck to find out.
Q. Now, how did you check each number?
A. I called the field office covered by that area code and instructed the supervisor who handles the electronic surveillance indices and the searches to certify to me the information relative to that telephone number.
Q. Do you know how each supervisor conducted the check?
A. By searching the indices in the field office.
Q. Do you know in each field office contacted how the index is maintained?
A. This is, the index is maintained—well, it's the whole indices for the entire office. It contains names of every individual in which—who is named in a file or who has been indexed. It contains telephone numbers, vehicle identification numbers, any other identifying data that can be catalogued in an index system to allow for retrieval of the information.
Q. Do you know whether the telephone numbers that each supervisor checked were listed under topical headings, or under names, or do you know how they were listed?
A. No, they're listed by number. They have a way of indexing numbers. In other words, telephone numbers are indexed by the—the numbers. Starting, I guess, with O and then they have a system whereby they can index numbers.

Q. Do you know how that system works?
A. Not, not really.
Q. You haven't yourself done that kind of retrieval?
A. No, I have done it, but I don't recall right offhand how—how they index it. I am not familiar with the indexing system but I have retrieved that information myself in the field office.
Q. In relation to the numbers involved in this case, you did not personally retrieve that information with regard to any of these numbers; is that right?
A. No, I did not. I did not, no.
Q. Mr. Smyth, do you know whether there are certain sorts of F.B.I. investigations which are specially denominated so that electronic surveillance conducted in the course of those investigations would not turn up either in your Elsur indices or in the field office indices?
A. I do not.
Q. You do not know?
A. I do not know.
Q. For instance, do you know whether if an investigation is denominated domestic-subversive—excuse me, let me start all over again. If an investigation is denominated domestic-subversive, do you know whether there are separate electronic surveillance files from the files of which you have knowledge?
A. I have no knowledge of that.
Q. Do you know whether a domestic-subversive investigation, if it were not—I'm sorry, if a wiretap in a domestic-subversive investigation were not authorized under Title 3, do you know whether it would appear under national security?
A. I don't know.
Q. So that a domestic-subversive wiretap might appear under national security or might appear in a separately maintained file?
A. I don't know.
Q. Agent Smyth, do you know what a pen register is?
A. Yes.
Q. What is a pen register?
A. Pen register is a device that will indicate what number is being dialed from a telephone.
Q. When you check a field office to determine whether a telephone has been subjected to electronic surveillance, does that check include a determination whether that particular phone has been monitored by a pen register?
A. A pen register is not considered electronic surveillance.
Q. So that pen registers could have been employed in this case to keep track of phone calls out of a certain phone and you would have no record of that nor would your check have turned it up?
A. If a pen register had been utilized it would have been indexed in the indices, thereby indicating some type of activity on the phone. I would say that a pen register was not used.
Q. But you don't know that for sure? I mean, when I asked you before it was did you check a field office for electronic surveillance, will they answer as to pen register?
A. I think they would answer to pen register but it is not technically electronic surveillance.
Q. So you don't know whether an individual field office would include pen registers in electronic surveillance; is that right?
A. I can't say positively.
Q. Excuse me just a minute, please. The names of the various attorneys who've been mentioned in court today Mr. Smyth——
A. Yes.
Q. [Continuing] Did you check those names in the Elsur index?
A. No, I did not.
Q. Those names will be Maguigan, Ratner, Menaker, Kunstler, Stavis, Peterson, that list of names?
A. Yes.
Q. You checked none of those names?
A. That's correct.
Q. So you did not make any determination whether any of us might have been overheard in a fashion that would be reflected in your indices as a cross-check against your check of the field offices?
A. I did not check the indices, that's correct.
Q. So the thing that you could have personally have done and told this Court about you did not do? You were able to tell the Court what's been certified to you from the field offices but you are not in a position to know the method of check that was done in the field office?

A. That's correct.

Q. Do you know which other federal agencies conduct either Title 3 or national security wiretaps?

A. No, I don't.

Q. So you're not in a position to say whether other federal agencies may or may not have been involved in surveillance in this case, electronic surveillance?

A. That's correct.

Q. Did you check whether there had been wiretap information given to the F.B.I. as a result of taps conducted by state or local agencies either with regard to these witnesses or with regard to the attorneys?

A. I checked—I have not personally. I don't know how to answer that. Are we talking in reference to the Hearst case?

Q. Well, would the answer be different if it were a general question—

A. I can only speak for the Hearst case.

Q. Why is that? I didn't think you kept topical indices?

A. Well, I had a review done of the Hearst file. A file review of the Hearst case.

Q. When did you have that done?

A. Prior to the time I was here last time.

Q. And what kind of check was that on the Hearst case?

A. It was a file review conducted at headquarters and in the field. At the office of origin, San Francisco, in the Hearst case where all—all investigation conducted throughout the country and all of the field offices goes to San Francisco file as the office of origin. And I had a file review done in San Francisco. I did not do it. I had a file review done here at headquarters, and it was done by two individuals at headquarters to determine if there was any indication of any electronic surveillance of any kind, anyplace, anytime, on anybody in the Hearst case.

Q. And the result of that check to the best of your knowledge as it was transmitted to you by other persons?

A. There was one Title 3, and there was some—one consensual monitoring.

Q. And the Title 3 tap was of none of the attorneys in this case?

A. None of the attorneys, none of the individuals involved here.

Q. And now are you in a position to say—excuse me. You did that check before you testified on Friday; is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. On Friday do you remember saying there had been no electronic surveillance conducted inthe course of the Hearst investigation?

A. Relative to these individuals.

Q. No, I also asked you if there had been any electronic surveillance and you answered that there had been none?

A. Well, I knew that there had been a Title 3. If you had asked me the question that you are saying you're asking me I would have indicated that there was.

Q. I see. Now, you did not check any of the attorneys' names in your indices to see whether any of us had been overheard on either the Title 3 tap, or the consensual tap; did you?

A. That's correct.

Q. Now, would your check of the Hearst investigation file reveal whether there was information in the F.B.I. file that had been supplied as a result of a wiretap conducted by another federal agency or by a state or local agency?

A. It would if there was anything in the file. That's what you asked me, if there was anything in the file would I know it?

Q. Right.

A. Yes, based upon the way I asked, it would.

Q. But you don't know—excuse me, strike that. In relation to the indices maintained in a field office, do you know whether the field office indices reflect the fact that information is provided to the field office as a result of a wiretap conducted by another agency or by a state or a local agency?

A. It would not be reflected in the indices. It would be reflected only in the file.

Q. You did not check each file in each field office; did you?

A. Each of the field offices contacted, of the ones that were contacted, the ones I previously indicated to the Judge that were contacted, searched their indices and reviewed their file relative to this.

Q. But what I asked you was whether information would turn up either in the file or in the indices, if it was the result of a wiretap conducted not by the F.B.I. but by another federal agency or by the state or local agency?

A. It would not show in the indices. In the event, and something occurred as you indicate, it would be reflected in this case file itself. Where the agent receiving the information would say on such and such a date I received such information from so and so, if that were the case.

Q. But that information might not contain the phone number tapped by the state or local agency; is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. So that your check of the phone numbers from the field offices would not show whether those numbers had been the subject of a tap by another federal agency or by a state or local agency?

A. That's right. I can't certify to any other agency or any law enforcement agency. All I can certify to is the result of my check regarding the F.B.I.

Q. Just one minutes, please. So what you're telling us really is that on the basis of your check you can say that the F.B.I. did not conduct taps, but you cannot say whether the F.B.I. has operated with information supplied by other federal agencies, or state or local agencies which may have been the result of wiretaps conducted by those agencies?

Mr. KELLY. Your Honor, I object to the repetitious nature of that question. It has been asked four times previously.

The COURT. It has, but I'll allow him to answer.

The WITNESS. No, I can't say one way or the other.

Miss MAGUIGAN.

Q. I asked on Friday whether you had personally checked with other federal agencies and I believe your answer was you have not?

A. That's correct.

Q. Since Friday have you checked with any other federal agencies?

A. No.

Q. We have no other questions.

The COURT. Do you have any questions?

Mr. KELLY. I have no questions, Your Honor.

The COURT. All right.

Mr. EILBERG. Our next witness is Richard E. Gerstein, State's attorney, Metropolitan Dade County, representing the American Bar Association.

He has come to us from Florida, and we are very appreciative of this. When he appeared the last time he was extremely helpful, and it is good to have Mr. Gerstein once again.

TESTIMONY OF RICHARD E. GERSTEIN, STATE'S ATTORNEY, METROPOLITAN DADE COUNTY, REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION; ACCOMPANIED BY DAVID T. AUSTERN, ATTORNEY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. GERSTEIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I have a brief statement.

My name is Richard E. Gerstein, and I am State attorney of the 11th Judicial Circuit of Florida, which is the Greater Miami area. I have held this office for over 20 years. I have served as president of the National District Attorneys Association. I am now serving my second year as chairman of the Grand Jury Committee of the American Bar Association Criminal Justice Section. Accompanying me today is David T. Austern, an attorney in private practice in Washington, D.C., and a member of my committee.

I welcome the opportunity to appear a second time before this subcommittee on behalf of the American Bar Association to present the views of the ABA on changes in grand jury procedure proposed by H.R. 94.

The ABA Criminal Justice Section created a committee on the grand jury in September 1974. The committee's mandate is to examine pending legislation to revise grand jury procedure and to offer proposed changes for association approval.

In August 1975 our committee successfully obtained section and ABA house of delegates approval for a policy supporting certain provisions of H.R. 1277—94th Congress—sponsored by Mr. Eilberg.

Many key aspects of grand jury reform are covered in this already-established association policy—such elements as counsel in the grand jury room; amendment of the recalcitrant witness statute; provision of transactional immunity; increasing penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy; issuance of subpoenas; and appointment of a special prosecutor.

Believing that the ABA policy should be broadened, my committee presented a comprehensive report with the recommendations to the section of criminal justice governing council in November 1976. That report, containing 23 legislative principles—some of which are elaborations on existing ABA policy—to which we believe grand jury legislation should adhere, was unanimously approved by our section council. The section then submitted the report to the ABA's policy-making house of delegates at its midyear meeting in Seattle last month. As you are no doubt aware, Attorney General Griffin Bell personally appeared before the house of delegates and asked that body to defer action on our report until the August 1977 annual meeting, to allow him time to thoroughly study our proposals. I briefly advised the house of delegates in Seattle of the development of the principles by my committee, and I pointed to the extensive prosecutorial experience of its members. The criminal justice section then moved, in deference to the Attorney General, to delay consideration of the principles until the house of delegates meeting in August.

I must emphasize, therefore, that the legislative principles contained in that report represent only the views of the criminal justice section at this point, and have not been acted upon by the American Bar Association.

In my remarks today, I will thus confine my comments to the policy previously established by the ABA house of deleates in August 1975.

It is perhaps significant to note that the 1,100 members of the ABA criminal justice section, which formulated the recommendations I present today, represent every segment of the criminal justic system: prosecutors, trial and appellate judges, public and private defense attorneys, corrections officials, persons engaged in investigation and enforcement, and law teachers and students.

I believe it is noteworthy to comment upon the make-up of my committee to allay fears which have been expressed by some critics that the pending legislation represents idealistic, but pragmatically unsound, proposals. In that connection, I again point to my own extensive prosecutorial experience and that of the majority of my committee.

One of the members of my committee served for 4 years as an assistant district attorney in New York City, and for 4 years as an assistant U.S. attorney here in Washington, Charles Ruff. The current Watergate special prosecutor, is a member of the committee. My committee includes Federal and State prosecutors, criminal defense lawyers, public defenders, judges, law professors, and law students. The committee has met on 10 occasions in the past 2½ years to study grand jury procedures.

First, as we have informed this subcommittee before, the American Bar Association opposed in principle House Joint Resolution 46 in the 94th Congress, which would have amended the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution to eliminate the requirement that a defendant to be charged for any "capital or otherwise infamous crime" against the United States be proceeded against by way of indictment. I note that this has been reintroduced by Congressman Eilberg in the 95th Congress as House Joint Resolution 61. Although the ABA is aware of the expense and time consumed in presenting many Federal offenses to a grand jury which might more efficiently be prosecuted by way of information—for example, interstate transportation of stolen motor vehicles—we do not believe that a constitutional amendment provides the appropriate resolution to this problem.

As you know, the American Bar Association has endorsed in principle, and opposed in principle, certain amendments to titles 18 and 28 of the United States Code as proposed by H.R. 1277, the legislation which Mr. Eilberg sponsored in the 94th Congress. Many of these comments are also applicable to H.R. 94.

Section 2(a) of the bill would amend the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) to reduce the maximum period of confinement for refusal to testify before a grand jury from 18 months to 6 months for civil contempt. The ABA has gone on record opposing this reduction. While this is the current Association policy, you should be aware that our section will be asking the ABA House of Delegates in August to revise that policy to support the 6-month maximum contained in the legislation. This is not yet the Association's position, however.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Gerstein, I do not like to interrupt you, but we have a rollcall, and I think we'd better recess at this point, and we will come right back.

Mr. GERSTEIN. Surely.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee is recessed.

[Whereupon, a short recess was taken.]

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

Mr. Gerstein, would you be good enough to proceed.

Mr. GERSTEIN. The ABA supports in principle H.R. 94's provisions in sections 2(a) and 2(c) which would amend the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) and add a new section 18 U.S.C. 403 to prohibit multiple confinements of a witness upon subsequent refusals of the witness to testify about the same transactions. The ABA believes such a measure is needed to limit potential abuse, possibly if issuance of continuing subpenas are coupled with multiple confinements.

Section 2(a) of H.R. 94 would amend 28 U.S.C. 1826(b) to place the burden of opposing bail pending appeal upon the Government, following confinement of a witness for a refusal to testify before a grand jury. The ABA has opposed this amendment, believing that the intent of the existing law is appropriately to limit frivolous appeals. Under this bill, the prosecutor would have to affirmatively show that an appeal is frivolous; this is inconsistent with the established policy of the ABA in its standards relating to criminal appeals (standard 2.4).

Section 2(b) of H.R. 94 would amend 18 U.S.C. 2515 to provide that a witness before a Federal grand jury may allege a violation of title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C. 251, the Federal Wiretapping Act), as a defense to an action brought against him or her under the Recalcitrant Witness Statute. The association supports this provision in principle, believing that the Government ought not to be able to take advantage of any improper governmental conduct to lay a foundation for questioning the witness before the grand jury.

Section 3(a) of H.R. 94 addresses the question of witness immunity. The American Bar Association has already gone on record supporting amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide transactional immunity—rather than the use immunity presently provided under Federal law 18 U.S.C. 1525(b) and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972).

The ABA does not lightly urge a restoration of transactional immunity. This position is rooted in the belief that use immunity is not only susceptible of prosecutorial abuse, but can be a subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. If what is sought is truthful testimony, the witness must feel no constraints that what he says, will, in fact, be used against him. In sum, testimony obtained in this manner is simply less reliable.

Further, a witness told—as he is when use immunity is granted—that, "We retain the right to prosecute you," is being told that his ultimate fate depends on the prosecutor's view of the acceptability of his testimony. This can lead to such abuses as the prosecutor's playing off one witness against another. While use immunity is constitutional (see Kastigar, supra), its desirability is another matter. The rationale that without use immunity guilty persons would go free does not appear sufficient—for the U.S. Department of Justice reports that in practice few witnesses granted it are subsequently prosecuted for crimes described in their immunized testimony (see 14 American Criminal Law Review 275, 282). If the theoretical goal of use immunity is more prosecutions, this does not then seem to be the actual result. We believe use immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the constitutional right against self-incrimination, and favor a return to transactional immunity, as provided in H.R. 94.

Section 5 of the Eilberg bill addresses the serious question of violations of grand jury secrecy. Secrecy is fundamental to the grand jury if it is to function fairly and effectively. As you know, the ABA went on record in 1975 supporting that section of H.R. 1277 in the 94th Congress—but calling for increased penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. We are pleased to note that section 5 of H.R. 94 provides additional provisions with much strengthened penalties—a fine of not more than $20,000 or imprisonment of not more than 5 years—for disclosure when motivated by monetary gain or by an attempt to affect the actions or decisions of that grand jury or to influence further legal proceedings. We also note the exceptions provided, including the provision that this section would not apply to press representatives acting in a professional capacity.

The ABA thus supports in principle the strengthening of penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

Section 6(a) of H.R. 94 provides that a grand jury may conduct an independent inquiry, and that, while it should generally utilize the attorney for the Government, when it finds him or her unable to impartially assist, refusing to assist, or hindering or impeding the grand jury, the grand jury may request that the court appoint a special prosecutor.

The association in 1975 went on record opposing a provision in H.R. 1277 in the 94th Congress—which would have required the court to appoint such a special attorney upon the request of a grand jury conducting an independent inquiry. The ABA's concern had been founded on the mandatory nature of the grand jury's request to the court to appoint a special prosecutor; and we thus find the present, more discretionary provision in H.R. 94 preferable.

Counsel would be allowed to accompany and advise witnesses appearing before a grand jury under section 7(a) of H.R. 94. This would add a new section 3330A to chapter 215 of title 18. The ABA went on record in 1975 supporting a similar provision in H.R. 1277.

The association believes that a witness' attorney should be allowed to be present in the grand jury room during the testimony of that witness, in order to advise the witness of his or her rights in connection with the appearance. We feel that this is a key provision in the legislation currently pending before the Congress, and one which will more meaningfully effectuate the sixth amendment right to assistance of counsel. Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right—except before the grand jury.

At present, a witness may receive advice of counsel outside the grand jury room; the witness must frequently be excused to consult with counsel. We believe this not only unnecessarily prolongs the proceeding, but also places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jury. It is extremely damaging to the witness continually to get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. It is our understanding that several States have already instituted the practice of allowing counsel in the grand jury room. We do not agree with those critics who claim such a proposal will disrupt the grand jury or prolong its proceedings.

I would like to expand on the question of counsel in the grand jury room for 1 minute.

This provision in the pending legislation seems to have drawn considerable attack. I am certain you are aware that the prestigious American Law Institute in its model code of prearraignment procedure has gone on record supporting this practice, as has the association of bar of the city of New York.

We understand some eight States now allow this practice—Arizona, Illinois, Kansas, Michigan, before a one-man grand jury, Minnesota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Washington State. The section has talked with attorneys in those States in an effort to find out whether problems are being encountered. While we have not undertaken any large sampling or empirical research, you may be interested to know that none of the persons with whom we spoke reported disruptions, delays, or other problems as a result of allowing counsel in the grand jury room with a witness. Several prosecutors who said they were initially opposed told us they now favor the concept.

Let me briefly share some of their comments with you. In the Cook County, Ill., State attorney's office, a prosecutor with many years experience handling the grand jury told us that Illinois' 18-month-old statute allowing counsel to appear with witnesses is in no way disruptive and does not delay the proceedings. In fact, he believes it furthers the interest of justice. Consistent with the ABA position, the Illinois law restricts the attorney's participation to advising the witness. The prosecutor told us he had heard no opposition among his fellow prosecutors. Another attorney in the same office likewise reported no troubles with the practice, although he had opposed it initially.

I note from the record of the July hearings which your subcommittee held that Shelvin Singer, an Illinois attorney representing the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, similarly reported that, "* * * this has not created any problems or obstructed grand jury investigations in Illinois."

A justice on the Minnesota Supreme Court, responding to our inquiry, said there has been no problem with the practice in that State, and their experience has been most favorable. In Minnesota, by the way, the statute does allow counsel to address the grand jurors.

In Arizona, where a grand jury witness who is the target of the investigation is entitled to counsel, a leading defense attorney there reports that the provision, which is more than 1 year old, has not created any problems among either prosecutors or defense counsel.

A Kansas attorney, who recently served 4 years as a district attorney, told us that that State's law had worked well and that there was no indication that counsel impeded the proceedings. In fact, she said she strongly favors the concept of allowing counsel in the grand jury room.

I would also remind the subcommittee that a member of my committee, Charles Ruff, the Watergate Special Prosecutor, has gone on record before the Senate subcommittee hearings last September supporting counsel in the grand jury room.

The Justice Department has expressed concern that allowing counsel in will have the potential effect of producing time-consuming delays, interfering with the grand jury's ability to conduct an effective investigation, and discouraging witness cooperation. We just don't see, from the contacts we have made, that these concerns are borne out in the States which have already adopted this practice.

Section 7(a) of H.R. 94 would add a new section 3330B to title 18, chapter 214, concerning subpenas. The present ABA policy only addresses a small portion of the proposals in this section of the bill. With respect to the provision which would delay for 1 week the appearance of a subpenaed witness, the association has urged that this be amended to provide a 72-hour period, rather than 1 week, unless special need is shown by the Government attorney. The ABA's rationale was that the longer period would unduly prolong grand jury proceedings and reduce the effectiveness of grand jury investigations.

In conclusion, I reiterate that my comments today have been restricted to the previously approved ABA policy. My committee on the grand jury is continuing its work; we have drafted a series of proposed grand jury standards, now under consideration by the ABA Special Committee on Administration of Criminal Justice. As I mentioned above, we will be presenting our grand jury legislative principles to the ABA house of delegates in August, and hope thereafter to have the opportunity to appear before you again to set forth a more comprehensive ABA policy.

However, in the event your subcommittee intends to move grand jury legislation prior to our August meeting, I would appreciate very greatly the opportunity to present the Criminal Justice Section's recommendations to you, if it appears that the ABA's timetable would deprive us of the chance to set forth a formal ABA position.

The Criminal Justice Section is committed to the concept of grand jury reform. We believe this to be important work, and we applaud Congressman Eilberg and the subcommittee for your continuing attention to these issues.

I thank you for the opportunity to appear here today for the American Bar Association. I will be happy to answer any questions you may have.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Gerstein. I would say that your statement is a very fine one, indeed, and we certainly will keep in mind all of your observations. We appreciate your cooperation.

I'd like to ask some questions.

One common complaint made about proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system is that reform suggestions are really only the position of defense counsel and a few fringe groups. You note that the ABA recommendations were based on involvement of every segment of the criminal justice system, and included prosecutors, and trial and appellate judges. Could you describe for us the variations of positions and attitudes which occurred in your committee, and in the section, as to various reform suggestions. And I say that from my background in Pennsylvania, with bar associations there, where sometimes a few lawyers made decisions for the entire association.

Mr. GERSTEIN. In this instance, the committee I chair is a very representative group with extensive prosecutorial experience. As I said, I have had more than 24 years' experience myself and am serving my sixth term in elective office. We also have Richard Kuh, the former district attorney of New York who succeeded Frank Hogan, the current Watergate prosecutor, Charles Ruff; the former State attorney of Tampa, Fla; three members who have served as assistant U.S. attorneys in the Washington, D.C. area. Seymour Glanzer was one of the original Watergate prosecutors.

In the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar there are other former Federal prosecutors on the council—Sylvia Bacon, Paul K. Rooney of New York, Donald Santerelli of Washington, and three prominent district attorneys: Carol Vance, the district attorney of Houston, Tex.; William Randall, a long-time district attorney of St. Paul, Minn.; and John Price, the long-time district attorney of Sacramento. These three gentlemen are former presidents of the National District Attorneys Association.

In fairness, I must say that although Mr. Vance voted for these proposals, he has had some second thoughts on some of the issues, particularly counsel for witnesses in the grand jury room. But he did vote in support of the proposals at the time they came before the criminal justice section.

So the criminal justice system represents a very composite group of all elements that are interested in the administration of justice, and it does not represent fringe elements or people who might be termed radical. In fact, I think, if anything, these people might be termed quite establishment.

Mr. EILBERG. Can you give us any idea of those who were active with you in the development of these principles?

Mr. GERSTEIN. There are approximately 10 lawyers, including the former and present prosecutors I have named. Several judges have been active on this committee. We have met 10 times and debated and discussed these principles at great length. They are the product of a great deal of work. It is a committee that consists of approximately 10 persons, almost all of whom have had extensive prosecutorial background. The principles were then submitted to the criminal justice section council where there were some 25 to 30 persons present who approved them unanimously. Those voting had diverse backgrounds in the various elements of the administration of justice.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you say that any Federal prosecutors, especially those presently serving, supported reform at any of your meetings or perhaps by letters or in other ways?

Mr. GERSTEIN. Mr. Charles Ruff, the present Watergate Special Prosecutor, participated actively in the deliberations of the committee and testified before a Senate subcommittee, and he has supported almost totally all of these reforms. I believe that he differed with us on the length of time for which a recalcitrant witness should be jailed, but he was in favor of counsel in the grand jury room for witnesses, and in favor of all the other reforms which we have advocated.

Mr. EILBERG. I wonder if you could further briefly describe for us the variations of positions which occurred in your committee. Perhaps we can get a little better feeling of the process.

Mr. GERSTEIN. There was some disagreement, of course, over the immunity question, as to whether transactional or use immunity should be granted. The length of incarceration for recalcitrant witnesses was another area of disagreement, and whether or not there should be a vote by the grand jury on the granting of immunity, and whether or not there should be court approval of the granting of immunity was an area of some disagreement.

I might add further, to amend my previous answer, that when the council considered these principles and voted to approve them at a meeting in Arizona, there were representatives of the Justice Department there to oppose some of the principles, and they were given an opportunity to present their views fully, and it was after hearing those views that the section unanimously approved these principles.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If I understood you correctly, Mr. Gerstein, the attorney general has asked the house of delegates not to act until this summer on the latest proposals of your group.

Mr. GERSTEIN. That is right.

Mr. FISH. I don't remember your saying whether or not you expected to hear the attorney general's position well in advance of that date.

Mr. GERSTEIN. I would hope to. I saw the attorney general in California 2 days ago, and I requested of him that he put me in touch with the person in the Justice Department who was formulating his position, and he gave me the name of the gentleman in the Justice Department to whom he has assigned that task. I expect to contact that person, and I would hope to have some opportunity to meet with them and to discuss any differences that we might have.

I would hope that expeditiously the Justice Department will formulate a position on both Congressman Eilberg's bills and the views of the criminal section.

Mr. FISH. You think it was just a new Attorney General asking to be given time to see what his options are before he is committed to the program?

Mr. GERSTEIN. I think I would be presumptious to assume what his position will be, Congressman. I do know at the hearings held when his appointment was under consideration he indicated he favored some grand jury reform. I think he has expressed some concern about the right of a witness to have counsel in the grand jury room. I do not know what his ultimate position on that issue will be.

Mr. FISH. I think I am correct, am I not, Mr. Chairman, that we might have started these hearings a month ago had it not been that the Attorney General indicated to us he'd like to have a look at the issues. I am giving the benefit of the doubt. He just has an awful lot of problems all at once.

Mr. GERSTEIN. It was for that reason that we have readily gone along with his request that the matter be delayed until August. And I myself appeared before the house of delegates and joined in that request.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Gerstein, however, I would hope that this committee would be in a position to report out legislation prior to August.

Mr. GERSTEIN. I would hope so.

Mr. FISH. The Chairman feels that way, and I certainly do. In fact, in August we'd be in recess anyway, so we are talking about 4 months.

Mr. GERSTEIN. It is for that reason I have suggested in my testimony I would appreciate the opportunity to reappear before you in the event that it becomes necessary for you to hear further from us, because of your desire to move the legislation through the Congress.

Mr. EILBERG. I might observe, Mr. Fish, that we are awaiting the departmental position from the Justice Department. I hasten to add, that we were in the same position in the last Congress where we were kept waiting for a long period of time because of the reluctance of the then Attorney General to appear, but it is my expectation that Justice will promptly respond and we will move quickly now.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, what do you think of asking our witness if he could submit to us at this point the recommendations that are pending, for the views of the Attorney General or the views of the house of delegates, or would that be improper?

Mr. EILBERG. We have those already, I believe.

Mr. GERSTEIN. Yes, and I believe in the next 30 to 60 days we will have some additional principles. I am confident that one of the additional principles we will adopt which was overlooked through some oversight was one that will require the prosecutor to place before the grand jury any exculpatory evidence which I believe is a provision of your bill, and which is also a part of the standards approved by the national District Attorneys Association. It was an oversight that we did not include that provision.

Mr. EILBERG. Unless there is objection, I ask that we submit for the record at this point the principles and their rationale, and without objection they will be a part of the record at this point.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION—REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES—SECTION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE—RECOMMENDATION

The Section of Criminal Justice recommends adoption of the following resolutions:

Be it resolved, That the American Bar Association support in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. A grand jury witness shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his appearance before the grand jury; the role of such counsel should be the same as that before a Congressional committee.

2. A subject of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such subjects of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

3. The grand jury shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence.

4. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a crimal conspiracy.

5. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

6. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

7. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

8. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

9. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

10. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry.

11. In any case in which a subpoenaed witness or a person directly affected thereby moves on proper grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena, the prosecutor should be required to make a reasonable showing in camera and on the record before the court convening the grand jury that the evidence being sought is:

(a) relevant to the grand jury investigation;
(b) properly within the grand jury's investigation; and
(c) not sought primarily for another purpose.

12. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

13. When the circumstances make it reasonable, motions to quash or modify subpoenas may be brought at the place where the witness resides, the documents sought are maintained, or before the court which issued the subpoena at the election of the witness. Such motions should be heard in camera and on the record.

14. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

15. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

16. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principal No. 15.

17. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

18. If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise.

19. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

20. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

21. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

22. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury and is found in contempt should not exceed 6 months.

23. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

Be it further resolved, That the President of the Association or his designee be authorized to present testimony in support of the Association's position before the appropriate committees of Congress.

REPORT

Background

The Criminal Justice Section first set up a Committee on Grand Jury Matters in August of 1974. In August 1975, the Criminal Justice Section obtained ABA House of Delegates approval for a policy on grand jury legislation addressing a limited number of issues. Because the existing ABA policy confined its comments largely to one bill—H.R. 1277, 94th Congress—the Section Committee on the Grand Jury continued its analysis of pending legislation. The Committee has reviewed a large number of bills in the past 18 months. These included H.R. 2986 (94th Congress, 1st Session), sponsored by Congressman John Conyers (D–Mich.) and S. 3274 (94th Congress, 1st Session), introduced by Senator James Abourezk (D–S.D.). Both bills have a much broader focus than does H.R. 1277.

The Criminal Justice Section, based on this comprehensive study, now urges the House of Delegates to broaden the existing ABA policy on grand jury reform. This is particularly timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention to this issue, but because early hearings—and action—are anticipated in the 95th Congress. Because the multitude of grand jury bills introduced in the 94th Congress have now died, and because they will probably be revised prior to introduction in the 95th Congress, the Section has addressed grand jury legislative principles to which it believes and ABA-supported legislation should adhere. The 23 principles here proposed thus represent some 18 months of intensive work by the Section and its Grand Jury Committee.

It should be noted that the proposed principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors, and chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami, Fla. area, and former President of the National District Attorneys Association. The principles further represent a consensus of the Section's Council—which includes prosecutors, State and Federal judges, law teachers and defense lawyers—based on action at its fall, 1976 meeting in Scottsdale, Ariz.

In recent years the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England abolished the grand jury in 1933, and most states allow prosecution either by indictment or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The Section believes that its proposed legislative principles will go a long way towards correcting the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

Principles

Following are comments regarding the 23 principles for which ABA House of Delegates support is sought:

1. The Association has already gone on record, in August 1975, supporting the right of witnesses to have counsel present in the grand jury room. That policy does not spell out, however, what the role of counsel should be. The Section's proposed Principle No. 1 defines counsel's role as one of advising the witness—but would not allow counsel to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings. Most of the grand jury legislation pending before the Congress would provide a right to counsel. Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right—except before the grand jury. The Principle analogizes the role of counsel to that before Congressional hearings, in which the attorney plays a similar advisory function. Presently, a witness may receive advice of counsel outside the grand jury room. In practice, witness' counsel waits at the door to the grand jury room and the witness is frequently excused to consult with counsel. This unnecessarily prolongs the grand jury proceedings, and places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jury. The Section believes it is extremely damaging to the witness continually to get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. It is the Section's understanding that some states have already instituted the practice of allowing counsel in the grand jury room. The Principle analogizes the role of counsel to that before a Congressional hearing, since the attorney would be playing a similar advisory function. Enactment of this provision will more meaningfully effectuate the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel.

2. Principle No. 2 would require that the subjects of grand jury investigations, before an indictment is returned against them, be given the right to testify and present their side of the facts, provided such persons sign a waiver of immunity. The Section's proposal would require a prosecutor to take all reasonable steps to notify each prospective defendant, but recognizes that in certain circumstances the prosecutor will truly be unable to locate such persons; or that, under some circumstances, the prosecutor will fear the person would flee if notified, or, once notified, would endanger witnesses or other persons. In such instances, notification would not be required under the Principle. The purpose of this proposal is to insure that fair and just opportunity is given an individual to testify in his or her own behalf prior to being indicted. The Section believes this to be an essential ingredient in a fairly functioning grand jury—and criminal justice—system.

3. The third Principle would forbid the grand jury to consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence. The Section believes that the integrity of the grand jury will best be served by prohibiting grand jury consideration of unconstitutionally-obtained evidence, notwithstanding U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), in which the United States Supreme Court declared that a grand jury may consider illegally obtained evidence. The Section does not believe that such a principle will harm the effective functioning of the grand jury, but will serve instead to insure its integrity.

4. Principle No. 4 would prohibit naming a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. The Section believes that naming of persons as unindicted co-conspirators visits approbrium upon them—by charging the named persons with the commission of a crime but denying them a forum in which to seek acquittal or vindication. This is another instance, the Section feels, in which reforms are necessary to insure the fair functioning of the grand jury. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already held in accord with this principle in U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975).

5. The issuance and publication of grand jury reports which single out persons for scorn or criticism, impugn their motives, or denigrate their moral fitness to hold office have the effect of charging such persons with misconduct or unfitness —without affording them any forum in which to refute the charges or to seek vindication. The Section is not proposing that such a report be forbidden from commenting on the job that an office holder is performing, but such reports should not condemn character alone. Grand jury reports which do single out persons in the manner described tend to undercut the fairness of the grand jury. Such misuse of the grand jury can, in fact, affect the political process. The procedures proposed in Principle No. 5 will assist in insuring that such abuses do not occur. See U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975) and Report of Grand Jury Proceedings, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, 479 F.2d 458 (1973).

6. The Section opposes the practice of a prosecutor's using the grand jury to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist in his or her preparation for trial of a defendant already charged by indictment or information. This is an abuse of the grand jury and transforms it into a mere tool and arm of the prosecutor's office—a role which is contrary to the grand jury's historical purpose and function. Grand juries would not, of course, be prohibited from investigating other potential offenses of the same defendant; Principle No. 6 makes this clear.

7. The Section strongly opposes prosecutorial use of the grand jury to assist in noncriminal—e.g., income tax—investigations. Such improper utilization of the grand jury warps its true function and leads to abuses such as those described in No. 6, supra.

8. The Section supports legislation which would end the practice of repeatedly calling a witness to appear before a grand jury. In some instances, grand jury witnesses have been subjected to unreasonable delays or unnecessarily repeated appearances or other forms of harrassment. Legislation to end such practices is necessary. A lack of concern for the convenience of a grand jury witness who must wait unnecessarily long to be called is as objectionable as the use of a grand jury subpoena to harass or inconvenience a witness.

9. Many of the grand jury reform bills before the Congress (e.g., H.R. 2986 and S. 3274 from the 94th Congress) would require grand jury approval of any subpoenas issued. The Section opposes such a procedure. It believes this requirement would not only be cumbersome, but would cause unnecessary delay. The prosecutor is better suited to make determinations regarding issuance of subpoenas than are lay grand jurors.

10. Principle No. 10 would require that a grand jury subpoena indicate the statute or general subject area that is the focus of the grand jury inquiry. This requirement is intended to enable the recipient and the court to determine more accurately questions of relevancy; it would also enable more effective and efficient use of counsel, court, and grand jury time. The Principle does not intend that a detailed description of the statutory and subject areas be required; but that a broad statutory citation or general description of the subject be included. Such a legislative requirement will lend a further element of fairness to the grand jury system.

11. Principle No. 11 is designed to prevent improper use of grand jury process. It provides that a prosecutor must show, in resopnse to a motion to quash a subpoena, that the evidence subpoenaed is relevant to the grand jury investigation; properly within its investigation; and not sought primarily for other purposes. The Section's proposal would safeguard this process by providing that the showing be made in camera and on the record. In order to limit the applicability of this requirement, the Section included language specifying that the person bringing the motion have a sufficient interest—that it either be the subpoenaed witness or a person directly affected. The motion must further be made "on proper grounds."

12. Principle No. 12 specifies that a grand jury subpoena not be returnable except when the grand jury is sitting. This is intended to avoid potential abuse of the subpoena power by the prosecutor's office, and would help to insure the integrity of the grand jury function.

13. The Section carefully weighed the assertion that this Principle would place too heavy a burden on prosecutors—who might be forced to travel extensively to answer such motions. The Section believes, however, that the language "when the circumstances make it reasonable" will preclude the procedure's becoming the norm. The Principle will help to work minimal hardship on witnesses.

14. Principle No. 14 would mandate stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury, except the deliberations of the grand jury itself. This requirement would be a major step forward in grand jury reform; it is not inconsistent with the necessity of maintaining grand jury secrecy. The comments of the judge charging the grand jury as to its function and responsibilities would be recorded, as would the prosecutor's introductory comments and testimony and questioning of all witnesses. Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure currently has no such requirement, although it does require that if a stenographer is present, that he or she must leave the grand jury room during deliberations.

15. At the August 1975 Montreal Annual Meeting, the ABA House of Delegates supported amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide "transactional" immunity, rather than "use" immunity, as presently provided in federal law. Under "transactional" immunity, a witness may be statutorily compelled to give testimony which might otherwise violate the privilege concerning self-incrimination, provided the witness is given immunity from prosecution from any crime which is referred to in the testimony. Under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b), Part V of the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1970, and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972), only "use" immunity need to be afforded; this merely prevents the prosecution from using the actual testimony of the witness in any future trial. The Section urges the Association to broaden its previously-adopted policy to specify proper instances in which transactional immunity should be issued. The Principle states that such instances would occur only when it is in the public interest; when there is no other reasonable way to elicit the testimony; and when the witness has refused to testify, or stated he or she will invoke the Fifth Amendment. This is intended to insure that grants of immunity are carefully considered prior to issuance and that they are not issued when other means could be used to obtain the needed information.

16. Several of the grand jury bills (e.g., H.R. 2986 and S. 3274) before the 94th Congress included provisions requiring approval of immunity grants by a majority vote of the grand jury. While many supporters of this provision believe that it would help to insure the independence of the grand jury, the Section does not support such a requirement. Instead, Principle No. 16 would provide that immunity be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury; the standards outlined in Principle No. 15 would be followed in determining whether such a grant should be made. The Section believes that lay grand jurors are not adequately oriented to make determinations regarding immunity grants; and that this is properly an executive function with court overview.

17. Principle No. 17 would forbid making the granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings a matter of public record before the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause. To make public such grants undercuts the function of the grand jury by selectively publicizing its investigations—and has the definite potential of harm to those to whom immunity is alleged to have been granted.

18. The controversial question of multiple representation of defendants before the grand jury is addressed by Principle No. 18. It would spell out the court's role as one of advising the witnesses of potential conflicts of interest and alerting them to their right to separate representation. It would no grant the court a more intrusive role or stronger hand, such as authority to prohibit such multiple representation. The Section does not believe that the prosecutor should properly take action in such multiple representation situations by personally contacting witnesses. The Section, in adopting this Principle, considered multiple representation to include the following: two or more witnesses in a grand jury proceeding who may have conflicting interests; a witness and a potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding; or a witness whose counsel fees are paid by a third party who is a witness or potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding. The Principle further assumes that defense counsel who are fulfilling their professional responsibilities will also themselves fully advise their clients of the possible effects of multiple representation.

19. The identity of witnesses coming before the grand jury must be shielded from public scrutiny in order to prevent unjust harm to witnesses and potential defendants. The practice in some jurisdictions of having witnesses exposed to public and press as they emerge from the grand jury room is an unfair one, the Section believes, for it taints the witnesses' reputations by the mere fact of their appearance before the grand jury.

20. The Section supports legislation which mandates the court's charging grand jurors orally on impanelling as to their duties and responsibilities; written copies of the charge should be distributed to the grand jurors at that time for their own continuing reference. It is believed that detailing to grand jurors their powers, responsibilities and rights will help to insure comprehensive understanding by them of their proper role, and will thereby help to strengthen the independence and fair functioning of the grand jury. Several of the bills pending in the 94th Congress included such a provision.

21. In adopting Principle Number 21, the Section urges the ABA to go on record as recognizing potential abuses of newspersons who are called as witnesses before the grand jury and then claim a First Amendment privilege not to testify.

In some prosecutors' offices around the country, office policy already exists which forbids calling of newspersons before the grand jury. Principal number 21 is further intended to express Section concern about the increasing number of instances nationally in which criminal defense lawyers are themselves being subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. The Section purposely did not go into further detail in this proposed Principle, believing that an expression of Association concern about present abuses of the grand jury vis-a-vis the press and the criminal defense bar would call attention to what appears to be a growing problem.

22. In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates opposed amendment of the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) to reduce from 18 to 6 months the maximum period of confinement on a civil contempt order for refusal to testify before a grand jury. The Section is now asking the Association to revise the previously-adopted position, and to support—as provided in several grand jury bills—a maximum of 6 months confinement. It is believed that this should be sufficient to compel a witness to testify. (The Section previously obtained ABA support for legislation to prohibit multiple confinements upon a subsequent refusal by a witness to testify about the same transaction.) Many of the grand jury bills before the Congress provide a 6-month maximum confinement, and the Section is now convinced that this is sufficient to compel a witness to testify, while avoiding the longer, more punitive confinement. The Section thus urges Association support for a 6-month maximum.

23. Rather than specify proposed sanctions for violation of each proposed grand jury legislative Principle outlined supra, the Section simply notes that the court should exercise its power to impose appropriate sanctions whenever the proposed Principles are violated. Such sanctions will obviously be fashioned in any proposed legislation; but it is not the Section's intent, in proposng Association policy on the grand jury, itself to suggest statutory language.

Conclusion

The Criminal Justice Section urges ABA House of Delegates approval for the 23 above-described legislative Principles. A statement on the grand jury by the nation's organized bar is essential; it is probable that attention will be given this timely subject early in the 95th Congress, and a continued professional, media and public focus in this area can be expected. A comprehensive Association policy is thus needed to help fashion well-reasoned, workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

Respectfully submitted,

ALAN Y. COLE,
Chairman.

December 1976.

Mr. FILBERG. May I ask, Mr. Gerstein, rather than waiting specifically for us to contact you, if you don't mind. Will you keep us apprised of significant developments by your section?

Mr. GERSTEIN. We will certainly do that.

Mr. FILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Gerstein, you mentioned one possible area of disagreement with the Attorney General was the appearance of counsel for the witness in the grand jury room. This was true of his predecessor in his testimony before us last year.

Mr. GERSTEIN. I am aware of that.

Mr. FISH. I think one of the arguments was that the presence of counsel would violate grand jury secrecy, make the witnesses less willing to testify fully. And I just wonder if your rationale responds to these objections, or would you like to elaborate on it at this point?

Mr. GERSTEIN. Well, under present law the witness has a right to relate to his counsel the matters that occurred in the grand jury room, to discuss his testimony and discuss the questions posed to him by the prosecutor with his defense counsel. So certainly a provision could be made that would limit counsel in making public or publishing any matters before the grand jury in the same fashion that grand jurors are limited.

In my State, witnesses are limited, but I know of no other State that has that provision. In Florida, witnesses cannot repeat to anyone any matters that have transpired before the grand jury. You can certainly bind counsel to where he could discuss with no one other than his client the matters that transpired before the grand jury.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I note that you are as pleased as I am that the ABA has supported as many provisions of your legislation as they are.

Mr. EILBERG. Indeed, I am.

Mr. FISH. The two areas where there still seems to be some disagreement—one is over bail and the other is over the length of incarceration if held in contempt. Are those areas that you plan to go into?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Then I defer to you.

Mr. EILBERG. Go ahead.

Mr. FISH. The Chairman wants to reduce the length of incarceration, and I gather the ABA position is opposed to that. We heard from previous witnesses earlier today that in some cases it might take years. The testimony was if it was only 18 months, you could stand on your hands for that length of time if you are going to get in trouble by talking. So what are we talking about?

Mr. GERSTEIN. I don't approach with any cavalier attitude a stretch of 18 months for anyone. I suppose there are some people who could, to use that phrase, stand on his hands and do 18 months.

The position of the ABA was a longer period of confinement. The position of my committee, my Grand Jury Committee, with Mr. Ruff casting a dissenting vote, recommended a reduction in the period of maximum confinement to 6 months.

I think it is necessary to draw a line here between a period of confinement that is likely to make the witness cooperative and a period of confinement that substitutes for inability to convict the witness of a substantive crime. Are you thereby using the confinement to punish him when you feel he is engaged in an illegal activity and you do not have evidence to convict him of a substantive crime.

And I think lengthy periods of incarceration tend to do that rather than to be for the purpose of encouraging a witness to be cooperative.

Mr. FISH. Would you prefer to see far more discretion in court over the length?

Mr. GERSTEIN. I do not think that there should be discretion in the court, because I don't think that the court is privy to the information upon which it can make a valid decision.

I think it would be better to set a period of time by statute that is a reasonable punishment likely to cause a witness to cooperate if he is ever going to cooperate, and not so lengthy as to be a substitute for a failure to have sufficient evidence to convict him of a substantive crime and to want to punish him for real or imagined conduct.

I believe that there is a great deal of misunderstanding about the role of the court. The court is not privy to the grand jury testimony, not privy to information which the prosecutor has, and I do not think in a better position than the Congress to set any limit as to the length of incarceration.

Mr. FISH. I appreciate that. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Gerstein, in your statement and in the ABA resolution, you discuss one of my recent proposals to eliminate the grand jury indictment. I have introduced four proposed amendments this year. Three of those amendments will only eliminate the constitutional requirement of an indictment and still allow Congress to authorize an indictment in particular cases, for particular crimes, or in the discretion of the prosecutor. Have you had an opportunity to review these proposals and could you comment on them? Last year Mr. Austern indicated that the Grand Jury Committee was considering proposals to define "infamous crimes" so as to lessen the need for indictments. Has there been any further work on this proposal?

Mr. GERSTEIN. Regrettably, there has not and that is something to which we must address ourselves. We have not had that opportunity, and thus I cannot articulate a new position.

Mr. EILBERG. And you will keep us posted on further developments?

Mr. GERSTEIN. I will, indeed.

Mr. EILBERG. The ABA supports the right to counsel in the grand jury room. We have heard a lot of comment on this, both from witnesses at these hearings and from few letters and various other sources. Some witnesses have indicated that counsel should have an active rather than a passive advisory and observer role. What do you believe should be the role of counsel in the grand jury room?

Mr. GERSTEIN. The role should be a passive one. An active role would indeed do what the Attorney General stated he feared would happen. It would cause, in effect, two trials to take place, and it would be totally disruptive. So I strongly support a passive role and strongly oppose an active role, and congratulate you Congressmen for having placed in your bill a provision that would enable obstreperous counsel to be removed and to be replaced by other counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. Also in that connection, Mr. Gerstein, I wonder if you have given thought to the possibility of going to the Justice Department and indicating your views as to counsel in the grand jury room? From public statements of the Attorney General, something is on his mind as to counsel in the grand jury room. He seems to think that "mini-trials" will be involved, and he has not decided whether to endorse it or not. It occurs to me the work and research you have done may be persuasive along those lines.

Mr. GERSTEIN. We hope to have the opportunity to convey our views to the Justice Department and the Attorney General and will try to do that.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Gerstein, I have other questions, but because of the lateness of the hour I think we will adjourn at this time and submit the questions to you, if we may, for answer.

Mr. GERSTEIN. Fine.

Mr. EILBERG. We thank you once again for your tremendous role in helping us to develop our thinking. The new bills that we produced are the result, to a large extent, of the testimony that we got in the last Congress, so we are getting a clearer and better picture as we go, which is very important for us and for the country, we hope.

Thank you very much for coming all the way from Miami.

Mr. GERSTEIN. I thank you, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the American Bar Association, and on my own behalf, and request the opportunity to reappear should we formulate additional principles which may be helpful to you.

[The prepared statement of Richard E. Gerstein follows:]

STATEMENT OF RICHARD E. GERSTEIN, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON THE GRAND JURY, CRIMINAL JUSTICE SECTION, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee; my name is Richard E. Gerstein, and I am State Attorney of the 11th Judicial Circuit of Florida, which is the greater Miami area. I have held this office for over 20 years. I have served as President of the National District Attorneys Association. I am now serving my second year as Chairman of the Grand Jury Committee of the American Bar Association Criminal Justice Section. Accompanying me today is David T. Austern, an attorney in private practice in Washington, D.C., and a member of my Committee.

I welcome the opportunity to appear a second time before this Subcommittee on behalf of the American Bar Association to present the views of the ABA on changes in grand jury procedure proposed by H.R. 94.

The ABA Criminal Justice Section created a Committee on the Grand Jury in September, 1974. The Committee's mandate is to examine pending legislation to revise grand jury procedure and to offer proposed changes for Association approval.

In August 1975, our Committee successfully obtained Section and ABA House of Delegates approval for a policy supporting certain provisions of H.R. 1277 (94th Congress), sponsored by Mr. Eilberg.

Many key aspects of grand jury reform are covered in this already established Association policy—such elements as counsel in the grand jury room; amendment of the recalcitrant witness statute; provision of transactional immunity; increasing penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy; issuance of subpoenas; and appointment of a special prosecutor.

Believing that the ABA policy should be broadened, my Committee presented a comprehensive report with recommendations to the Section of Criminal Justice governing Council in November, 1976. That report—containing 23 legislative principles (some of which are elaborations on existing ABA policy) to which we believe grand jury legislation should adhere—was unanimously approved by our Section Council. The Section then submitted the report to the ABA's policy-making House of Delegates at its Midyear Meeting in Seattle last month. As you are no doubt aware, Attorney General Griffin Bell personally appeared before the House of Delegates and asked that body to defer action on our report until the August 1977 annual meeting, to allow him time to thoroughly study our proposals. I briefly advised the House of Delegates in Seattle of the development of the principles by my Committee, and I pointed to the extensive prosecutorial experience of its members. The Criminal Justice Section then moved, in deference to the Attorney General, to delay consideration of the principles until the House of Delegates meeting in August.

I must emphasize, therefore, that the legislative principles contained in that report represent only the views of the Criminal Justice Section at this point, and have not been acted upon by the American Bar Association.

In my remarks today, I will thus confine my comments to the policy previously established by the ABA House of Delegates in August 1975.

It is perhaps significant to note that the 11,000 members of the ABA Criminal Justice Section—which formulated the recommendations I present today—represent every segment of the criminal justice system: prosecutors, trial and appellate judges, public and private defense attorneys, corrections officials, persons engaged in investigation and enforcement, and law teachers and students. I believe it is noteworthy to comment upon the make-up of my Committee to allay fears which have been expressed by some critics that the pending legislation represents idealistic—but pragmatically unsound—proposals. In that connection, I again point to my own extensive prosecutorial experience and that of the majority of my Committee. Mr. Austern, for example, served for four years as an Assistant District Attorney in New York City, and for four years as an Assistant U.S. Attorney here in Washington. My Committee includes federal and state prosecutors, criminal defense lawyers, public defenders, judges, law professors and law students. The Committee has met on 10 occasions in the past 2½ years to study grand jury procedures.

First, as we have informed this Subcommittee before, the American Bar Association opposed in principle House Joint Resolution 46 in the 94th Congress, which would have amended the Fifth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution to eliminate the requirement that a defendant to be charged for any "capital or otherwise infamous crime" against the United States be processed against by way of indictment. I note that this has been reintroduced by Congressman Eilberg in the 95th Congress as H.J. Res. 61. Although the ABA is aware of the expense and time consumed in presenting many federal offenses to a grand jury which might more efficiently be prosecuted by way of information—e.g., interstate transportation of stolen motor vehicles—we do not believe that a Constitutional amendment provides the appropriate resolution to this problem.

As you know, the American Bar Association has endorsed in principle (and opposed in principle) certain amendments to Titles 18 and 28 of the United States Code as proposed by H.R. 1277, the legislation which Mr. Eilberg sponsored in the 94th Congress. Many of these comments are also applicable to H.R. 94.

Section 2(a) of the bill would amend the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) to reduce the maximum period of confinement for refusal to testify before a grand jury from 18 months to 6 months for civil contempt. The ABA has gone on record opposing this reduction. While this is the current Association policy, you should be aware that our Section will be asking the ABA House of Delegates in August to revise that policy to support the 6-month maximum contained in the legislation. (This is not yet the Association's position, however).

ABA supports in principle H.R. 94's provisions (in Section 2(a) and 2(c) which would amend the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) and add a new section 18 U.S.C. 403 to prohibit multiple confinements of a witness upon subsequent refusals of the witness to testify about the same transactions. The ABA believes such a measure is needed to limit potential abuse, possible if issuance of continuing subpoenas are coupled with multiple confinements.

Section 2(a) of H.R. 94 would amend 28 U.S.C. 1826(b) to place the burden of opposing bail pending appeal upon the government, following confinement of a witness for a refusal to testify before a grand jury. The ABA has opposed this amendment, believing that the intent of the existing law is appropriately to limit frivolous appeals. Under this bill, the prosecutor would have to affirmatively show that an appeal is frivolous; this is inconsistent with the established policy of the ABA in its Standards Relating to Criminal Appeals (Standard 2.4).

Section 2(b) of H.R. 94 would amend 18 U.S.C. 2515 to provide that a witness before a federal grand jury may allege a violation of Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Street Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C. 251, the "Federal Wiretapping Act") as a defense to an action brought against him or her under the Recalcitrant Witness Statute. The Association supports this provision in principle, believing that the government ought not to be able to take advantage of any improper governmental conduct to lay a foundation for questioning the witness before the grand jury.

Section 3(a) of H.R. 94 addresses the question of witness immunity. The American Bar Association has already gone on record supporting amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide transactional immunity—rather than the "use" immunity presently provided under federal law under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b) and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972).

The ABA does not lightly urge a restoration of transactional immunity. This position is rooted in the belief that "use" immunity is not only susceptible of prosecutorial abuse, but can be a subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. If what is sought is truthful testimony, the witness must feel no constraints that what he says will, in fact, be used against him. In sum, testimony obtained in this manner is simply less reliable.

Further, a witness told—as he is when "use" immunity is granted—that "we retain the right to prosecute you," is being told that his ultimate fate depends on the prosecutor's view of the acceptability of his testimony. This can lead to such abuses as the prosecutor's playing off one witness against another. While "use" immunity is Constitutional (see Kastigar, supra), its desirability is another matter. The rationale that without "use" immunity guilty persons would go free does not appear sufficient—for the U.S. Department of Justice reports that in practice few witnesses granted it are subsequently prosecuted for crimes described in their immunized testimony (see 14 American Criminal Law Review 275, 282). If the theoretical goal of "use" immunity is more prosecutions, this does not then seem to be the actual result. We believe "use" immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the Constitutional right against self-incrimination, and favor a return to transactional immunity, as provided in H.R. 94.

Section 5 of the Eilberg bill addresses the serious question of violations of grand jury secrecy. Secrecy is fundamental to the grand jury if it is to function fairly and effectively. As you know, the ABA went on record in 1975 supporting that section of H.R. 1277 in the 94th Congress—but calling for increased penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. We are pleased to note that Section 5 of H.R. 94 provides additional provisions with much strengthened penalties—a fine of not more than $20,000 or imprisonment of not more than five years—for disclosure when motivated by monetary gain or by an attempt to affect the actions or decisions of that grand jury or to influence further legal proceedings. We also note the exceptions provided, including the provision that this section would not apply to press representatives acting in a professional capacity.

The ABA thus supports in principle the strengthening of penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

Section 6(a) of H.R. 94 provides that a grand jury may conduct an independent inquiry, and that, while it should generally utilize the attorney for the government, when it finds him or her unable to impartially assist, refusing to assist, or hindering or impeding the grand jury, the grand jury may request that the court appoint a special prosecutor.

The Association in 1975 went on record opposing a provision in H.R. 1277 in the 94th Congress—which would have required the court to appoint such a special attorney upon the request of a grand jury conducting an independent inquiry. The ABA's concern had been founded on the mandatory nature of the grand jury's request to the court to appoint a special prosecutor; and we thus find the present, more discretionary provision in H.R. 94 preferable.

Counsel would be allowed to accompany and advise witnesses appearing before a grand jury under Section 7(a) of H.R. 94. This would add a new § 3330A to Chapter 215 of Title 18. The ABA went on record in 1975 supporting a similar provision in H.R. 1277.

The Association believes that a witness's attorney should be allowed to be present in the grand jury room during the testimony of that witness, in order to advise the witness of his/her rights in connection with the appearance. We feel that this is a key provision in the legislation currently pending before the Congress—and one which will more meaningfully effectuate the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel. Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right—except before the grand jury.

At present, a witness may receive advise of counsel outside the grand jury room; the witness must frequently be excused to consult with counsel. We believe this not only unnecessarily prolongs the proceeding, but also places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jury. It is extremely damaging to the witness continually to get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. It is our understanding that several states have already instituted the practice of allowing counsel in the grand jury room. We do not agree with those critics who claim such a proposal will disrupt the grand jury or prolong its proceedings.

Section 7(a) of H.R. 94 would add a new § 3330B to Title 18, Chapter 214, concerning subpoenas. The present ABA policy only addresses a small portion of the proposals in this section of the bill. With respect to the provision which would delay for one week the appearance of a subpoened witness, the Association has urged that this be amended to provide a 72-hour period—rather than one week, unless special need is shown by the government attorney. The ABA's rationale was that the longer period would unduly prolong grand jury proceedings and reduce the effectiveness of grand jury investigations.

In conclusion, I reiterate that my comments today have been restricted to the previously-approved ABA policy. My Committee on the Grand Jury is continuing its work; we have drafted a series of proposed grand jury standards, now under consideration by the ABA Special Committee on Administration of Criminal Justice. As I mentioned above, we will be presenting our grand jury legislative principles to the ABA House of Delegates in August, and hope thereafter to have the opportunity to appear before you again to set forth a more ABA comprehensive policy.

However, in the event your Subcommittee intends to move grand jury legislation prior to our August meeting, I would appreciate very greatly the opportunity to present the Criminal Justice Section's recommendations to you, if it appears that the ABA's timetable would deprive us of the chance to set forth a formal ABA position.

The Criminal Justice Section is committed to the concept of grand jury reform. We believe this to be important work, and we applaud Congressman Eilberg and the Subcommittee for your continuing attention to these issues.

I thank you for the opportunity to appear here today for the American Bar Association. I will be happy to answer any questions you may have.

[The following communication was received after the hearings:]

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., May 5, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: When I testified recently on grand jury legislation before your Subcommittee, you asked our ABA Section of Criminal Justice Committee on the Grand Jury to comment on the four House Joint Resolutions you have sponsored—H.J. Res. 59, 60, 61, and 62, proposing an amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

My Section Grand Jury Committee has now had an opportunity to carefully study these proposals. While we believe them to be well conceived, my Committee does not intend at this time to recommend any change in the current ABA policy opposing a Constitutional amendment to eliminate the requirement that a defendant must be proceeded against by way of an indictment. We believe your suggested Constitutional amendment might well, in fact, result in more expeditious and efficient criminal justice administration. We are wary of supporting any move to amend the Bill of Rights and support, instead, legislation (such as H.R. 94) to effect reforms in the present system.

We do support your efforts to focus attention on the need for grand jury reform.

Sincerely,

RICHARD E. GERSTEIN,
Chairperson, Committee on the Grand Jury.

[On May 2, 1977, the ABA Grand Jury Committee made additional recommendations as follows:]

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., May 2, 1977.

MEMORANDUM

Re Report with recommendations of Grand Jury Committee.
To: Officers, council, liaison, committee chairpersons, and other meeting attendees.
From: B. James George, Acting Chairperson.

Enclosed is a report with recommendations which Grand Jury Committee Chairperson Richard E. Gerstein will present at the forthcoming Council meeting in Los Angeles. Please bring your copy with you to the meeting.

MAY 1977.

REPORT WITH RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE GRAND JURY COMMITTEE TO THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SECTION COUNCIL

RECOMMENDATION

Be it resolved, That the Section of Criminal Justice approve the following three additional grand jury legislative principles:

The prosecutor shall disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he or she knows will tend to negate guilt or preclude the finding of an indictment.

* * * * * * *

A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

Be it further resolved, That the Section of Criminal Justice approve revisions in Principle #1 and Principle #18 of the 23 grand jury legislative principles, so that they will read as follows:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

18. A lawyer should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of his or her independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

REPORT

The Section of Criminal Justice Grand Jury Committee urges Council approval for three additional grand jury legislative principles to add to the package of 23 principles approved by the Council in November 1976. The three new principles are almost identical to already-approved Association policy in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice; and also mirror Standards approved by the National District Attorneys Association (NDAA).

The Committee also asks Council approval for two revised versions of existing principles. Principle #1 has been rewritten to spell out more clearly what role counsel would play in the grand jury room; this had been misunderstood by some persons commenting on our principles. Principle #18 has also been revised and expanded.

The Grand Jury Committee, in considering additional principles, has reviewed to add to those which will be presented to the ABA House of Delegates at the Annual Meeting in August. As members of the Council are probably aware, our report came before the House of Delegates at the February Midyear Meeting in Seattle. Action was deferred until August at the personal request of Attorney General Griffin Bell, who asked for more time to study our proposals.

The Grand Jury Committee, in considering additional principles, has reviewed the National Prosecution Standards recently promulgated by the National District Attorneys Association; the NDAA Standards contain a chapter on the grand jury. The three new principles for which we now ask Council approval are identical to NDAA Standards. Further, two are identical to existing Association policy in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function; the third is very similar to the ABA Standard. While we are aware that these already constitute ABA-approved policy, we believe their addition will make our grand jury legislative principles more comprehensive and complete.

The first additional principle would require the prosecutor to present the grand jury with an exculpatory evidence of which he or she is aware. The Committee believes that this is a key element in bringing fairness to the grand jury process and is essential to prevent the indictment of innocent persons. The grand jury legislation now pending before the Congress includes such a requirement. ABA Prosecution Function Standard 3.6(b) reads very similarly: "The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." NDAA Standard 14.2D is identical to our proposal. As the commentary to the ABA Standard states, "Such a procedure tends to insure public confidence in the ultimate decision as to prosecution. The obligation to present evidence which tends to negate the guilt of the accused flows from the basic duty of the prosecutor to seek a just result." The NDAA volume notes that such a standard "provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendant's guilt."

The second new principle would require the prosecutor to recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law. This language is identical to that of both the NDAA Standard (14.2E) and the ABA Standard (Prosecution Function 3.6(c)). Pending legislation also contains such a provision. The NDAA Standards commentary notes that this standard "recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise cases." Our Grand Jury Committee agrees with this rationale, and believes incorporation of this into our existing principles will insure substantial justice within the grand jury room.

The third new principle which we propose is also taken directly from the NDAA (14.4B) and the ABA Standards (Prosecution Function 3.5(b)). It would prohibit the prosecutor from making statements or arguments to influence the grand jury action in a manner which would not be permitted before the trial jury. As the commentary to the ABA Standards notes, "A prosecutor should not take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury." The Committee feels that incorporation of this into our package of legislative principles will serve to define more specifically what role the prosecutor should play before the grand jury. Because of the secret nature of grand jury proceedings, the lack of direct court supervision, and the fact that the prosecutor's is a unilateral presentation, the prosecutor must avoid unduly influencing the grand jurors by means which would not be felt appropriate in the public courtroom, before a petit jury.

The three new principles which we urge the Council to approve are needed to better define the role of the prosecutor before the grand jury. Much of the recent furor surrounding the grand jury has centered on the accusation that its original function has been warped and that it now too often serves as a tool of the prosecutor. The Grand Jury Committee believes that by incorporating these into our set of principles we will be stating, in effect, that when the prosecutor does follow basic rules of conduct and procedure—ones which the National District Attorneys Association has endorsed—that grand jury abuse is far less likely to occur. Such professional self-discipline is a needed first step in reform of the grand jury.

The Committee is also asking Council approval for revised versions of two of the principles contained in our Midyear Meeting report.

The first principle has been rewritten to define more specifically and comprehensively what role counsel should play before the grand jury. (The original wording of Principle #1 is as follows: "A grand jury witness shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his appearance before the grand jury; the role of such counsel should be the same as that before a Congressional committee.") As spelled out in our rewritten version, counsel's role is very carefully defined so that it is clear that it is strictly limited to one of advising his or client. Counsel is not allowed to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings. Further, a mechanism has been provided (adapted from language in Congressman Eilberg's legislation) to remove counsel who are disruptive or who do not stay within the boundaries of counsel's role, as spelled out in the principle. As the Council is aware, the ABA has previously gone on record in support of counsel in the grand jury (in August 1975). The American Law Institute and other national groups have similarly endorsed this position. Our Committee has conducted further research in this area, as well, and has found that the experience of the nine states which have adopted such a practice has been good. The Committee believes that the more specific definition of counsel's role incorporated into rewritten Principle #1 will help to allay the fears of those who wrongly interpreted our Principle, as first presented, as allowing some sort of "mini-trial."

The second principle which our Committee has redrafted addresses the question of multiple representation of witnesses before a grand jury. Critics of the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room have focused much of their objection on problems which could occur when one attorney represents more than one witness in a grand jury proceeding. Our Committee has therefore redrafted and strengthened Principle #18 to spell out the responsibilities of an attorney not to continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if conflicts can arise. As originally worded, our Principle #18 provided that, "If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise." Under the proposed redraft of Principle #18, the burden is initially placed on the attorney to assume responsibility for remedying situations when conflicts from multiple representation arise or could arise. If the court finds that this principle is not being followed, however, it would have the authority under our principle to order separate representation. We have included a phrase, "giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing," to avoid a situation in which the court summarily excludes certain counsel from representing any witness in the proceeding.

At its recent meeting the Grand Jury Committee also reviewed proposed commentaries to the Standards on the Grand Jury which we drafted last year. These proposed commentaries were prepared by the American Bar Foundation, with whom our Committee is working closely. They will be referred to General Kenneth J. Hodson's Special Committee on the Administration of Criminal Justice, to whom our Standards were referred last year by the Criminal Justice Section Council.

Our Committee also continues to monitor the status of grand jury legislation before the Congress. On March 17, I testified on behalf of the American Bar Association before Congressman Eilberg's House Judiciary Subcommittee. We will continue to follow closely Congressional progress in this area.

Respectfully submitted,

RICHARD E. GERSTEIN,
Chairman, Grand Jury Committee,
ABA Criminal Justice Section.

[In June of 1977, the Criminal Justice Section approved recommendations to the American Bar Association House of Delegates as follows:]

The attached presently represents only the policy of the ABA section of Criminal Justice, and not the position of the American Bar Association. This report will be presented to the ABA House of Delegates in August 1977.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES SECTION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

RECOMMENDATION

The Section of Criminal Justice recommends adoption of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the American Bar Association support in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. Expanding on the already established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt.

3. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

4. A target of grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons or obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify such persons.

5. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidence which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

6. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

7. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

8. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

10. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

11. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

12. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the staute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of an indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be a basis for dismissal.

13. In any case in which a subpoenaed witness moves on proper grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena, the prosecutor should be required to make a reasonably showing in camera (which may be ex parte at the court's discretion) and on the record before the court convening the grand jury that the evidence being sought is:

(a) likely to be relevant to the grand jury investigation.

(b) not sought primarily for an improper purpose.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. When the circumstances place a hardship on the witness, motions to quash or modify subpoenas may be brought at the place where the witness resides, the documents sought are maintained, or before the court which issued the subpoena at the election of the witness. Such motions should be heard in camera and on the record.

16. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

17. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

18. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

19. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 18.

20. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

21. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

22. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

23. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

24. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

25. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury is found in contempt should not exceed 6 months.

26. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

REPORT

Background

The Section of Criminal Justice urges House of Delegates approval for 26 legislative Principles to which it believes grand jury reform legislation should adhere. The Section has spent more than three years studying the grand jury. In August 1975—at Section urging—the House of Delegates approved a policy addressing one grand jury bill (H.R. 1277) in the 94th Congress. That policy is a limited one, but includes Association support for such key elements of grand jury reform as allowing counsel in the grand jury room, transactional immunity, and strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Since 1975, the Section's Grand Jury Committee has analyzed a number of pending bills, including H.R. 2986 and S. 3274 (94th Congress), both with a broader focus than H.R. 1277, on which the current ABA policy was formulated. New legislation, including H.R. 94, H.R. 3736, and S. 1449, has been introduced in the 95th Congress; hearings are already being held on these proposals.

Based on its continued study of this issue since 1975, the Criminal Justice Section now asks House of Delegates adoption of Association policy addressing a broader range of grand jury issues. This is timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention being focused on this issue, but also because action is anticipated in the 95th Congress on the pending legislation. Further, a number of states are now considering—and some have already enacted into law—similar bills.

In February, 1977, the Section asked the House of Delegates to approve a package of 23 legislative principles. At the personal request of Attorney General Bell, the Section asked the House to defer action until the August Annual Meeting. Since February the Section has revised several Principles to clarify intent; has added 3 new Principles concerning prosecutorial conduct; and has met with Honorable Benjamin Civiletti, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, and other Department representatives to discuss the Principles. Mr. Civiletti has expressed support for some 15 of the Principles, and noted that the Department would take no position on an additional five. On several additional Principles, Mr. Civiletti said that some rephrasing might moot Department objections. In an attempt to reach compromise in as many areas as possible, the Section's Grand Jury Committee held a special meetin gin early June, made additional amendments to a number of the Principles, and gained Council approval for these changes via a special mail ballot.

It should be noted that the proposed Principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors. It is chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami area for more than 20 years, and former President of the National District Attorneys Association. The Committee also included members with state and federal prosecutorial experience (including the last Watergate Special Prosecutor, Charles Ruff), judges, law professors and members of the defense bar. The Principles further represent a consensus of the Criminal Justice Section Council, which includes a similar mix of persons from all parts of the criminal justice system. Most of the Principles were approved by the Council unanimously.

In recent years, the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England—where the grand jury originated—abolished the institution in 1933; the majority of states in our country allow prosecution either by indictment or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The ABA House of Delegates in 1975 went on record opposing amendment of the United States Constitution to eliminate the requirement for indictment by a grand jury. That position of the ABA should not be changed, but a comprehensive effort is needed to correct existing abuses. The Section believes that its proposed legislative Principles will go a long way toward remedying the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

PRINCIPLES

Following are comments on each of the 26 proposed Principles:

1. The American Bar Association has already gone on record (in August, 1975) supporting the right of a witness to have counsel present in the grand jury room. Principle #1 represents a reaffirmation of that position. Since this report was first presented to the House of Delegates in February, the Section has rewritten Principle #1 to spell out more specifically what role counsel should play in the grand jury room. That role is now carefully defined in the Principle to make it clear that it is strictly limited to advising the witness. This limited role will preclude the grand jury's becoming a "mini-trial"—as some have feared—and will not impair expeditious investigations. Under the proposed Principle, counsel is not allowed to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings. Further, the Section had added a provision to allow removal of counsel who are disruptive or do not otherwise stay within the prescribed boundaries laid down by the Principle. Clarification of the attorney's limited role, coupled with the mechanism for removing disruptive counsel, should meet the objections raised by those who have feared creation of a "mini-trial."

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice process—except before the grand jury—is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right. Requiring a witness who needs advice of counsel to consult his attorney outside the grand jury room door is awkward and prejudicial. It unnecessarily prolongs the grand jury proceeding and places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jurors. The American Law Institute has called it a "degrading and irrational" procedure. It is extremely damaging to the witness to continually get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. A recent Seventh Circuit decision (U.S. v. Kopel, 552 F.2d 1265 (1977)) points to additional problems with the procedure of consulting outside the grand jury room. In that case, the Seventh Circuit said the U.S. Attorney, who had granted the witness permission to leave the grand jury room, was free at trial to bring up this fact as relevant to the perjury charges against the defendant. Dissenting, Judge Swygert decried the fact that the government was "permitted to 'sandbag' him [the defendant] by using the fact that he consulted his attorney against him." Nor is the right to leave the grand jury room to consult counsel absolute. (See In re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972), in which the court said a limit could be placed on how frequently the witness could leave the room to consult his lawyer.)

The prestigious American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure adopted in 1975, supports counsel in the grand jury room. "While this is a break with tradition and prevailing practice," the ALI notes, "it is consistent with the provisions of some recent state procedure codes . . . it seems unfair and inefficient to require a witness to leave the grand jury room each time he wishes to consult with counsel." [at 237; emphasis added] The ALI commentary goes on to state that "exclusion of counsel . . . is closely related to the traditional view that proceedings should be secret, and concern lest the presence of counsel hamper the freedom of the grand jury and the prosecutor in their investigation . . . The difficulty with this view . . . is that complex and important legal issues face a witness before a grand jury. An appearance before that body may subject an individual to the grave danger of self-incrimination or imprisonment for contempt . . . The witness may also inadvertently lose his right to claim the privilege by operation of the doctrine of waiver . . . And the inherent pressure and accompanying nervousness of a grand jury appearance upon an individual may make it very difficult for him to remember his attorney's instructions . . . For effective implementation of this right, an attorney should be present to follow the flow of the interrogation." [at 601]

Some nine states now have statutes allowing counsel to be present in the grand jury room—Arizona (for target witnesses), Illinois (for target witnesses), Kansas, Michigan (one-man grand juries), Oklahoma, South Dakota, Minnesota, Virginia and Washington State. The Section has contacted practicing attorneys and prosecutors in these states; none has reported problems. In fact, some prosecutors who said they initially fought the procedure now support it as a means of insuring fairness in the system. Congressman Joshua Eilberg (D–PA), writing in a recent issue of Judicature (Vol. 60, No. 8), similarly reported that those states which have implemented the practice have not reported any serious problems. Further, a number of additional states are now considering such legislation—including Colorado (where it has passed both houses of the legislature), New York, Massachusetts, and California (where it has the support of the state's Attorney General).

Several arguments are raised by opponents. First, it is argued that allowing counsel in the grand jury room will be a breach of the secrecy rule. In fact, grand jury secrecy is not served by keeping the lawyer outside the grand jury room, since the witness is free to tell his attorney anything that occurred inside (Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)). Secondly, it is argued that the presence of the witness' lawyer will restrict free testimony in cases of organized crime, corporate and political corruption investigations. The Section notes that the states which allow counsel in the grand jury room have retained the grand jury in most instances as an investigatory body for precisely these kinds of investigations, and have no record of negative results. Further, there are alternate ways of securing a cooperative witness' statement, and this evidence can be summarized for the grand jury in the form of hearsay, Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956). When a witness is called to testify before a grand jury, the witness' attorney, sitting outside the grand jury room, can easily conclude from the time spent with the jury whether the witness takes the Fifth Amendment or testifies in full. Experienced prosecutors, further, have noted that very few witnesses indicate a desire to cooperate without the knowledge of their counsel; if the witness' testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will become evident to the attorney fairly quickly.

Recognizing that problems arising from multiple representation of witnesses could be exacerbated by allowing counsel in the grand jury room, the Section has strengthened Principle #21, which addresses that subject.

The presence of the attorney will not only reduce unfair speculation about the prosecutor's conduct, but will also serve to inhibit the prosecutor from possible improper conduct. Analogous to having counsel present to witness a line-up, the presence of the attorney in the grand jury room will help to insure the fairness of the proceedings. Watergate Special Prosecutor Charles Ruff—in supporting this proposal in recent Congressional testimony—declared that ". . . the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed, most prosecutors would admit, I think, that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel." (Testimony before House Judiciary Subcommittee, April 27, 1977, at 3.)

The American Bar Association has traditionally been a leader in asserting the right to assistance of counsel in the criminal justice process. As the ABA Standards on Providing Defense Services (§ 1.1) declare, "The objective of the bar should be to ensure the provision of competent counsel to all persons who need representation in criminal proceedings . . ." Enactment of Principle #1 will more meaningfully effectuate the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel; but the limitations on the role of counsel will forestall the grand jury's being turned into an adversary proceeding.

2. Principle #2 states that the prosecutor shall not knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt. The Section believes this to be a key element in bringing fairness to the grand jury process, and essential to prevent indictment of innocent persons. The Association has already gone on record in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6(b)) supporting this, declaring that, "The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." The National District Attorneys Association (NDAA) Prosecution Standard 14.2D is also similar to Principle #2. As the commentary to the ABA Standard states, "Such a procedure tends to insure public confidence in the ultimate decision as to prosecution. The obligation to present evidence which tends to negate the guilt of the accused flows from the basic duty of the prosecutor to seek a just result." The NDAA Standards note that such a standard "provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendent's guilt." Indictments have been overturned on the grounds of due process when a court has ascertained that the prosecutor knowingly used perjured evidence or failed to present evidence that squarely negated guilt. U.S. v. Basurto, 497 F. 2d 781 (9th Cir., 1974); Johnson v. Superior Court of California, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P. 2d 792 (1975). This is a new Principle, added by the Section since the Principles were presented to the House of Delegates in February. At the suggestion of U.S. Department of Justice representatives, who questioned the mechanics of the Principle as first drafted, the Section has written it so as to clarify its coverage and intent, since this is a legislative Principle, and not simply a more general standard for prosecutorial conduct.

3. The third Principle is also a new one, added since the report was presented to the House of Delegates in February. This would require the prosecutor to recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law. This language is identical to that of both ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function 3.6(c) and the National District Attorney's Association Standard (14.2E). The NDAA Standards commentary notes that this standard "recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise improper cases." The Section agrees with this rationale. Adoption of the Principle will help to insure substantial justice within the grand jury room. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated support for this Principle, which is, as noted above, already ABA policy.

4. Principle #4 would require that the target of a grand jury investigation be given the right to testify and present his side of the facts before an indictment is returned—provided such person signs a waiver of immunity. Under this proposal, the prosecutor would be required to take all reasonable steps to notify such prospective defendants—but recognizes that in some instances the prosecutor will truly be unable to locate such persons; or that, under some circumstances, notification may result in the person's fleeing, or his endangering witnesses or other persons, or obstructing justice. In such instances, notification would not be required. The Section has made two changes in this Principle since its initial presentation in February: First, at the suggestion of the Justice Department, the term "subject" was replaced by "target." The Department suggested this as more appropriate wording, since "target" is the term generally used in federal law enforcement. Secondly, Justice Department representatives suggested addition of the phrase "or obstruct justice" as an additional condition under which the prosecutor need not notify a target. (The Section also made this amendment, believing it to be inherent in the original Principle. Principle #4 is intended to insure that fair and just opportunity is given individuals to testify in their own behalf prior to being indicted. Such groups as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York have supported such a right. This is an essential ingredient, the Section believes, in a fairly functioning grand jury—and criminal justice—system. Without it, the grand jury's essential function of arriving at an accurate indictment is undermined.

5. The Fifth Principle has been rewritten since presentation of the report in February. As originally phrased, it stated the grand jury "shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence." In the light of concerns raised by the Justice Department, the Section has rewritten Principle #5 to put the affirmative burden on the prosecutor not to present evidence which he knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial. It thus makes the burden more specific. The Section believes that the integrity of the grand jury will best be served by prohibiting presentation of unconstitutionally-obtained evidence by the prosecutor. Already-approved Association policy in the ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function (§ 3:6(a)) declares that "a prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial." Notwithstanding the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), the Section believes that this Principle is needed to insure the integrity of the grand jury process; indeed, the Court in Calandra noted that "for the most part, a prosecutor would be unlikely to request an indictment where a conviction could not be obtained" because of use of illegally-seized evidence. The Principle is thus not totally inconsistent with the thrust of Calandra.

6. Principle #6 would prohibit naming a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. The Section believes that naming of persons as unindicted co-conspirators visits opprobrium upon them—by charging the named persons with the commission of a crime but denying them a forum in which to seek acquittal or vindication. This stains the reputation of the person without providing any means for the person to show his innocence. This is an instance in which reforms are needed to insure the fair functioning of the grand jury. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already held in accordance with this principle in U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975). The Section has added a second sentence to the Principle since its original presentation. This states that supplying such names in a bill of particulars would not be prohibited. This would permit the prosecutor to respond to a request by the defense to reveal the names of co-conspirators who were not indicted. The Section felt the addition of this sentence is needed to spell this out to avoid potential confusion in interpretation of this Principle.

7. The issuance and publication of grand jury reports which single out persons for scorn or criticism, impugn their motives, or denigrate their moral fitness to hold office have the effect of charging such persons with misconduct or unfitness—without affording them any forum in which to refute the charges or to seek vindication. The proper purpose of grand jury reports is to inform the public of situations requiring administrative, judicial or legislative corrective action—not the castigation of individuals when the fact-finding forum insured by the finding of an indictment is absent. The Section is not proposing that such grand jury reports be prosribed from commenting on the job that an office holder is performing; but such reports should not condemn character alone. Grand jury reports which do single out persons in the manner described tend to undercut the fairness of the grand jury. Such misuse of the grand jury can, in fact, affect the political process. Judicial scrutiny of the report is essential to prevent spurious attacks on indviduals when no forum of trial is available. The states that have recently considered this issue have reinforced control over the reporting process. People v. Superior Court of Santa Barbara County, 531 P. 2d 761 (Cal. 1975); Del. Rules, R. 6 (1975); Fla. STAT. ANN. § 905.28 (1975). The procedures proposed in Principle # 7 will assist in insuring that such abuses do not occur. See U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975) and Report of Grand Jury Proceedings, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, 479 F.2d 458 (1973). The National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standards commentary (discussing an NDAA proposed standard on this subject, modeled on recent New York legislation) notes that, ". . . an unfavorable report may stand as a severe form of extra-judicial punishment, from which there is no appeal . . . the quasi-judicial nature of the grand jury gives it an apparent reliability which may not be justified . . . grand jurors are accountable to one one . . . grand jurors may impose a personal standard of morality on persons, rather than an abstract and neutral conception of right and wrong."

8. The Section opposes the practice of a prosecutor's using the grand jury to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist in his preparation for trial of a defendant already charged by indictment or information. This is an abuse of the grand jury, and transforms it into a mere tool and arm of the prosecutor's office—a role which is contrary to the grand jury's historical purpose and function. The Department of Justice supports this Principle; in a Department Office of Policy and Planning statement filed in 1976 with the House Judiciary Subcommittee examining grand jury legislation, the Department states that, "It is well-established under federal case law that a grand jury should act only with a view toward returning an indictment or to satisfy itself that no crime has occurred . . . It would be an abuse of legal process for a government attorney to use a grand jury to discover or build up evidence for trial of an existing indictment. Courts would discipline attorneys who did so and the Department would not countenance such action by its representatives" This principle is in accord with well-settled case law United States v. Dardi, 330 F.2d 316 (2d Cir. 1964); United States v. Doss, 545 F.2d 548 (6th Cir. 1976). In the Doss decision, the Court declared that, "We find no constitutional, statutory or case authority for employment of the grand jury as a discovery instrument to help the government prepare evidence to convict an already-indicted defendant. Such a use of the grand jury would pervert its constitutional and historical function . . ." The Court called it "a possible revival of a version of the Star Chamber of 18th Century England . . ."

9. The Section strongly opposes prosecutorial use of the grand jury to assist in administrative investigations—e.g., Internal Revenue income tax investigations. Such improper utilization of the grand jury warps its true function and leads to abuses such as those described in # 8, supra. The ABA House of Delegates in February, 1977—in addressing a proposed amendment to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)—expressed concern regarding dissemination of grand jury information to government experts for use in unrelated civil proceedings. The Section report accompanying the House-approved resolution declared that disclosure of grand jury information to a broad group of governmental personnel might be used as "subterfuge by some agencies to obtain information through the grand jury process which was not legitimately required for the purposes of the pending grand jury investigation . . . The dissemination of information to serve particularized departmental or agency needs would not be a legitimate one." (House of Delegates Report book, 2/77 Midyear Meeting, at 138-9). A U.S. Department of Justice paper submitted to the House Congressional hearings echoes this concern: "[o]ne of the primary abuses of the grand jury which must be avoided . . . is the attempted use of its broad investigative powers by government agencies in pursuit of investigations that are solely their own rather than the grand jury's." (U.S. Department of Justice Office of Policy and Planning, Memorandum on the Grand Jury, p. 106; printed in record of House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings.) In the case of United States v. Doe, 72 Crim. Misc. 1 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), the court in denying a government motion to examine special grand jury minutes to determine violations of Titles 18 and 28 and "to determine civil tax liability," declared that, "The grand jury's role is properly confined . . . when it is held empowered to conduct investigations that are in their inception exclusively criminal." It should be noted that the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys has expressed its support for this proposed Principle.

10. Principle # 10 provides that witnesses summoned before grand juries should not be subjected to unreasonable delays or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment. The Section supports legislation which would forbid such practices. In some instances, these abuses have occurred and grand jury witnesses have been repeatedly called to appear; or have been subjected to unreasonable delays or other forms of harassment. An indifference to the convenience of a grand jury witness is as objectionable as the use of a grand jury subpoena to harass a witness, and is a subtle means of intimidating the witness before his appearance. The ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function (§ 5.7(a)) recognize the prosecutor's obligation to handle witnesses "fairly, objectively and . . . without seeking to intimidate or humiliate the witness . . ." The U.S. Department of Justice supports this Principle, as does the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

11. Several of the grand jury reform bills before the 95th Congress (e.g., H.R. 3736) would require grand jury approval of any subpoenas issued. The Section opposes such a procedure. It believes this requirement would not only be cumbersome, but would cause unnecessary delay. The prosecutor, the Section believes, is much better suited to make determinations regarding issuance of subpoenas than are lay grand jurors. The Section thus does not support these provisions in pending legislation. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

12. Principle #12 would require that a grand jury subpoena indicate the statute or general subject that is the focus of the grand jury inquiry. This requirement is intended to enable the recipient and the court to determine more accurately questions of relevancy. It would also enable the witness to prepare himself more adequately for his appearance, and would insure more effective and efficient use of counsel, court and grand jury time. The Principle does not intend that a detailed description of the statutory and subject areas be required; but that a broad statutory citation or general description of the subject be included. Justice Department representatives have expressed support for this Principle; but indicated concern that, as initially written, the Principle would leave open the question of later challenges to the indictment based on the fact that the defendant was charged under statutes not named in the subpoena. To meet this concern and clarify the Principle's original intent, the Section has added the second sentence; this makes it clear that the indictment cannot be vitiated if the person is indicted under a statute or in a subject area not mentioned in the subpoena. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

13. Principle #13 is designed to prevent improper use of grand jury process. The Section has revised this proposal since its initial presentation in February. As now written, it provides (that a prosecutor must show—in response to a motion to quash a subpoena—that the evidence subpoenaed is likely to be relevant to the grand jury investigation and is not sought primarily for an improper purpose.) The Section's proposal represents a narrowed verision of the requirements set out by the Schofield court. In In Re Grand Jury Proceedings (Schofield I), 486 F.2d 85 (1973), the Third Circuit held that the government was required, before the subpoenas would be enforced, to make a preliminary showing that the subpoenaed records were relevant to an ongoing investigation, properly within the grand jury's jurisdiction, and were not sought primarily for another purpose. Expanding on its rationale in a later case, In Re Grand Jury Proceedings (Schofield II), 507 F.2d 963 (1975), the Third Circuit argued that this procedure "is designed to prevent abuse of the grand jury process by requiring a minimum disclosure of the grand jury's purpose in every case." The U.S. Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys objected to our Principle's initial wording, which granted not only the subpoenaed witness but also "a person directly affected thereby" standing to move to quash a subpoena. Responding to this concern, the Section has amended #13 to delete that phrase, finding merit in the Advisory Committee's view that granting standing to third parties could cause unreasonable delays. Additional changes have been made in response to Justice Department suggestions. As originally phrased, the Principle would have required the prosecutor to make a reasonable showing that the evidence sought was relevant to the grand jury investigation; properly with the grand jury's investigation; and not sought primarily for another purpose. The Section has amended and narrowed these requirements. The Section does not believe that these changes violate the Principle's original intent, however. Further, the proposal has been amended to provide that the court, at its discretion, can allow the prosecutor to make the showing ex parte, thus not forcing him to disclose his investigative strategy to the defense.

14. A grand jury subpoena should not be returnable except when the grand jury is sitting. This proposal is intended to avoid potential abuse of the subpoena power by the prosecutor's office. It will help to insure the integrity of the grand jury function. Both the Justice Department and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys support this Principle.

15. Principle #15 would allow a witness to bring a motion to quash or modify subpoenas at the place where the witness resides, the documents are kept, or before the issuing court when the circumstances place a hardship on the witness. As originally worded, this Principle would have allowed this procedure "when the circumstances make it reasonable." This language was amended in response to U.S. Department of Justice concerns that it would be expensive and burdensome on Government attorneys, in cases in which a large number of witnesses are subpoenaed, to be forced to travel all around the country to answer motions to quash subpoenas. The amendment lessens the burden on the prosecution by spelling out that this Principle would only apply when there is real hardship on the witness to bring such a motion in the district in which the grand jury is sitting. As rewritten, the Section does not believe this places too heavy a burden on the prosecution; it will help to work minimal hardships on witnesses. Such legislation is needed, however, since under existing law, motions to quash subpoenas must be heard by the court under whose authority they were issued; this has involved considerable inconvenience for some witnesses.

16. Principle #16 would mandate stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury—except the deliberations of the grand jury itself. This would represent a logical step forward in grand jury reform, and is not inconsistent with the necessity of maintaining grand jury secrecy. The judge's charge to the grand jury would be recorded, as would the prosecutor's introductory remarks and testimony and questioning of all witnesses. Some 31 states already require recording of all grand jury proceedings other than votes and deliberations, and an additional 6 states permit it, according to a Library of Congress study (printed in 1976 Hearings record, House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, p. 714. Several federal district courts already record all grand jury proceedings—including the District of Rhode Island, the Eastern District of Washington, and the Northern District of Illinois. The Ninth Circuit has ruled that a prospective defendant who makes a timely request cannot be arbitrarily denied a recordation of grand jury proceedings. United States v. Thoreson, 428 F.2d 654 (1970); United States v. Price, 474 F.2d 1223 (1973).

Major groups have supported this requirement. The American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure, urges that a record be made of all proceedings before the grand jury. The ABA Standards for Criminal Justice on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(c))—already ABA policy—provide that, "The prosecutor's communications and presentations to the grand jury should be on the record." The accompanying commentary points out that "since grand jury proceedings are generally secret and ex parte, it is particularly desirable that a record be made of the prosecutor's communications and representations to the jury." The recently-issued Prosecution Standards of the National District Attorneys Association (§ 14.2(F)) also urge that "all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded." Recording will aid the prosecution—by insuring that perjured testimony does not go unpunished. Recording would also act as a restraint on the prosecutor not to exercise undue or improper influence on the grand jury.

The Justice Department supports this Principle to the extent that it would require recordation of the judge's charge and the questioning and testimony of witnesses, but opposes recording the prosecutor's comments to the jury. The U.S. Attorney's Advisory Committee argues that this would "formalize what should be an informal working relationship between grand jurors and government attorneys." (From position paper submitted to Section Council, May 14, 1977, p. 7.) It is exactly that "informal" relationship which invites subtle abuses of the grand jury, the Section believes; that is itself a cogent argument in favor of recordation. The Advisory Committee further argues that a recordation requirement would "impose severe and undue administrative burdens" (p. 7 of position paper, supra); and the Justice Department points to "unavailability of court reporters in many areas" (p. 103 of House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings record, supra). There are real benefits to be gained by recording matters before the grand jury—for the prosecution, as well as for the defense. Raising administrative hurdles is not sufficient argument against this proposal, which truly goes to the integrity of the grand jury process.

17. This Principle—which has been added since February—is identical to National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standard (§ 14.4B) and the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(b)). It thus already is Association policy. It would prohibit the prosecutor from making statements or arguments to influence the grand jury action in a manner which would not be permitted before the trial jury. This is essential because of the prosecutor's role as the only legally-trained person before the lay grand jurors. As the commentary to the ABA Standards notes, "A prosecutor should not take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury." Because of the secret nature of the grand jury proceedings, the lack of direct court supervision, and the fact that the prosecutor's is a unilateral presentation, he must avoid unduly influencing the grand jurors by means which would not be appropriate in the public courtroom before a petit jury. This is essential to prevent the grand jury's becoming a mere echo of the prosecution. As one writer has noted, "[G]rand jurors must place enormous trust in the prosecutor's guidance. It is he, after all, who tells them what the charge is, who selects the facts for them to hear, who shapes the tone and feel of the entire case . . ." [emphasis added] (Antell, "The Modern Grand Jury; Benighted Super-government," 51 A.B.A.J. 153, 154 (1965). The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

18. Principle #18 calls on the ABA to broaden its previously-adopted policy concerning immunity to specify proper instances in which immunity should be issued: when it is in the public interest; when there is no other reasonable way to elicit the testimony; and when the witness has refused to testify, or stated he will invoke the Fifth Amendment. This is intended to insure that grants of immunity are carefully considered prior to issuance and that they are not issued when other means could be used to obtain the needed information. The ABA House of Delegates (at the 1975 Annual Meeting) has already supported amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide "transactional" immunity, rather than "use" immunity provided under present federal law. Under transactional immunity, a witness may be statutorily compelled to give testimony which might otherwise violate the privilege concerning self-incrimination, provided the witness is given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony. Under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b), Part V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, and under Kastigar v. U.S. 406 U.S. 441 (1972), only "use" immunity need be afforded. This merely prevents the prosecution from using actual testimony (or leads derived therefrom) in any subsequent criminal prosecution. Some 31 states currently provide transactional immunity, according to the House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings record (supra). The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has supported it, in the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rule 732(b)). "Use" immunity, while Constitutional (see Kastigar, supra), should be rejected for several practical reasons. It is not only susceptible of prosecutorial abuse, but can be a subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. Testimony thus obtained is not accurate. Witness cooperation is essential to an effective grand jury investigation, yet the uncertainty generated by "use" immunity, and the difficulties in determining the scope of the protection afforded the witness, can chill and inhibit his cooperation. Transactional immunity better encourages accurate testimony and minimizes witness resistance to questioning. The small number of actual successful prosecutions of immunized witnesses with "use" immunity indicates that a return to transactional immunity will not remove a significant weapon against organized crime (see, 14 American Criminal Law Review 275, 282, wherein U.S. Department of Justice reports that, in practice, few witnesses granted "use" immunity are subsequently prosecuted from crimes described in their immunized testimony). "Use" immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the Constitutional right against self-incrimination, the Section believes.

19. Several of the grand jury bills pending before the 94th Congress include a provision requiring approval of immunity grants by a majority vote of the grand jury. While many supporters of this provision believe that it would help to insure the independence of that body, the Section does not support such a requirement. Instead, Principle #19 would provide that immunity be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury; the standards outlined in Principle #18 would be followed in determining whether such a grant should be made. Lay grand jurors are not adequately oriented to make determinations regarding immunity grants, the Section believes. This is properly an executive function with court overview.

20. Principle #20 would forbid making the granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings a matter of public record before the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause. To make public such grants undercuts the function of the grand jury by selectively publicizing its investigations—and has the definite potential of harm to those to whom immunity is alleged to have been granted. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated its agreement with this Principle.

21. The question of multiple representation of witnesses in grand jury proceedings has recently received increasing attention both from members of the private bar and from government attorneys. (See, e.g., Cole, "Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should be Stopped," 2 Journal of Criminal Defense 149 (1976); and Speech May 3, 1977 to Chicago Bar Association on "The Perils of Multiple Representation in Criminal Antitrust Proceedings," by Richard Favretto, Deputy Director of Operations, Antitrust Division, U.S. Department of Justice.) Recent court opinions have also tried to grapple with the question (see, e.g., In Re Investigation Before April, 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir. 1976)). Principle #21 has been substantially rewritten by the Section since February to strengthen its provisions, to meet concerns raised by critics of the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room. Opponents of that Principle have focused much of their objection on problems which could arise when one attorney represents more than one witness in a grand jury proceeding. The Section has redrafted Principle #21 to spell out the professional responsibility of an attorney not to continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if conflicts can arise. As originally worded, the Principle provided that, "If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise."

Under the newly-redrafted Principle, the burden is initially placed on the defense attorney to assume responsibility for remedying situations when conflicts from multiple representation arise or are likely to arise. If the court finds that this principle is not being followed, however, it would have the authority to order separate representation. The phrase "giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing" has been added to avoid a situation in which the court summarily excludes certain counsel from representing any witness in the proceeding. In adopting this Principle, the Section considered multiple representation to include the following: two or more witnesses in a grand jury proceeding who may have conflicting interests; a witness and a potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding; or a witness whose counsel fees are paid by a third party who is a witness or potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding. The significant ethical concerns involved in multiple representation when the clients have actual or potential conflicting interests; the potential compromises to the Constitutional guarantee to effective assistance of counsel; and the potential for inhibiting the public's right to an effective grand jury investigation require the private bar to deal seriously with this issue. As Alan Y. Cole noted in a recent article (supra) "To avoid the Scylla of conflict, the defense attorney with multiple clients will likely become engulfed in the Charybdis of ineffective assistance of counsel . . ." Benjamin Civiletti, head of the Justice Department's Criminal Division, has expressed his support for this Principle as now formulated.

22. Principle #22 provides that the confidential nature of grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny. Shielding their identity is necessary to prevent unjust harm to witnesses and potential defendants. The practice in some jurisdictions of having witnesses exposed to public and press as they emerge from the grand jury room is an unfair one—it taints the witnesses' reputations by the mere fact of their appearance. The importance of maintaining the secrecy of grand jury proceedings has already been recognized by the Association, when, in its 1975 policy, it urged strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. The Justice Department supports this Principle.

23. The Section supports legislation which would mandate the court's charging grand jurors orally on impanelling as to their duties and responsibilities; written copies of the charge would then be distributed to the grand jurors for their continuing reference. Detailing to grand jurors their powers, responsibilities and rights will help to insure their comprehensive understanding of their proper role, and will thereby help to strengthen the independence and fair functioning of the grand jury. Several of the bills pending in the 95th Congress contain such provisions, as does pending legislation in several states. The Department of Justice has indicated its support for this Principle.

24. In adopting Principle #24, the Section urges the Association to go on record as recognizing potential abuses of newspersons who are called as witnesses before the grand jury and then claim a First Amendment privilege not to testify. In some prosecutors' offices around the country, office policy already exists forbidding the caling of journalists before the grand jury. As the U.S. Supreme Court has noted, "Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification . . . We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment, as well as the Fifth." Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, at 707–708 (1972). Supporting the need for legislation in this area, a Newspaper Guild spokesperson declared in testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings in June 1977, "The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion . . ." Principle #24 is further intended to express Section concern about the increasing number of instances nationally in which criminal defense lawyers are themselves being subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. Abuse of grand jury subpoenas used against persons having recognized confidential relationships appears to be increasing; this can drive a wedge of distrust between defense attorney and client, and has a chilling effect on 6th Amendment rights and confidential relationships. The Section purposely did not go into further detail in this proposed Principle, believing that an expression of Association concern about present abuses of the grand jury vis-a-vis the press and the criminal defense bar would call attention to what appears to be a growing problem. The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

25. In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates opposed amendment of the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) to reduce from 18 to 6 months the maximum period of confinement on a civil contempt order for refusal to testify before a grand jury. The Section is now seeking revision of the previously-adopted position. This Principle would support—as provided in several pending grand jury reform bills—a maximum of six months confinement. It is believed that this length of confinement should be sufficient to compel a witness to testify. (It should be noted that the ABA has previously gone on record supporting legislation to prohibit multiple confinement upon a subsequent refusal by a witness to testify about the same transaction.) The Section now believes that this is sufficient to compel a witness to testify, while avoiding the longer, more punitive confinement. This has been an area in which many abuses have allegedly occurred (See record of 1976 hearings before House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law). The Section thus urges ABA support for a 6-month maximum.

26. Rather than specifying proposed sanctions for violation of each proposed grand jury legislative Principle outlined herein, the Section simply notes that the court should exercise its power to impose appropriate sanctions when the proposed Principles are violated. Such sanctions will obviously be fashioned in any proposed legislation; but it is not the Section's intent, in proposing ABA policy on the grand jury, itself to suggest statutory language.

CONCLUSION

When the grand jury was created in 12th Century England, it was intended to serve as a shield between the citizen and the Crown. In recent years, the grand jury has come under increasing attack: observers charge that the grand jury system is riddled with abuse, and is no longer a shield for the citizen but a shield for the government. Critics declare that it has departed from its proper Constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecutions.

The Section of Criminal Justice, based on the work of its Grand Jury Committee, chaired by experienced prosecutor Richard E. Gerstein, believes that reforms are needed to insure fairness—but without undercutting the grand jury's legitimate functions or destroying it as an institution. While legitimate objections to these Principles have been raised, resistance to change from those within the criminal justice system cannot in itself be sufficient reason to reject well-considered—and needed—proposals.

The Section urges the House of Delegates to support the 26 legislative Principles. The Congress and many state legislatures are now acting on grand jury reform proposals; professional, media and public focus on this subject cannot be expected to abate. The Association—as in its landmark Standards for Criminal Justice project—has long been in the forefront of criminal justice improvement.

ABA leadership is now needed to help fashion well-reasoned, workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

Respectfully submitted,

B. JAMES GEORGE, JR.,
Acting Chairperson.

Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At the meeting of the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association held August 8–10, 1977 the attached resolution was adopted upon recommendation of the Section of Criminal Justice.

This resolution is being transmitted for your information and whatever action you may deem appropriate. If hearings are scheduled on the subject of this resolution, we would appreciate your advising Herbert E. Hoffman, Director of the American Bar Association Governmental Relations Office, 1800 M Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 331–2210.

Please do not hesitate to let us know if you need any further information, have any questions or whether we can be of any assistance.

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT D. SLEDD, Secretary.

Be It Resolved, That the American Bar Association support in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. Every witness before a grand jury shall be informed of his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel and shall be advised that false answers may result in his being charged with perjury. Target witnesses shall be told that they are possible indictees.

3. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilty.

4. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

5. A target of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons or obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

6. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidence which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

7. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

8. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, holds them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

10. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

11. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harrassment.

12. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

13. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of an indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be a basis for dismissal.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of any testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

16. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

17. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

18. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 17.

19. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

20. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

21. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

22. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

23. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

24. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury and is found in contempt should not exceed one year.

25. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

As approved by the ABA House of Delegates, August 9, 1977

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION—REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES

SECTION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

REPORT

Background

The Section of Criminal Justice urges House of Delegates approval for 25 legislative Principles to which it believes grand jury reform legislation should adhere. The Section has spent more than three years studying the grand jury. In August 1975—at Section urging—the House of Delegates approved a policy addressing one grand jury bill (H.R. 1277) in the 94th Congress. That policy is a limited one, but includes Association support for such key elements of grand jury reform as allowing counsel in the grand jury room, transactional immunity, and strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Since 1975, the Section's Grand Jury Committee has analyzed a number of pending bills, including H.R. 2986 and S. 3274 (94th Congress), both with a broader focus than H.R. 1277, on which the current ABA policy was formulated. New legislation, including H.R. 94, H.R. 3736, and S. 1449, has been introduced in the 95th Congress; hearings are already being held on these proposals.

Based on its continued study of this issue since 1975, the Criminal Justice Section now asks House Delegates adoption of Association policy addressing a broader range of grand jury issues. This is timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention being focused on this issue, but also because action is anticipated in the 95th Congress on the pending legislation. Further, a number of states are now considering—and some have already enacted into law—similar bills.

In February, 1977, the Section asked the House of Delegates to approve a package of 23 legislative principles. At the personal request of Attorney General Bell, the Section asked the House to defer action until the August Annual Meeting. Since February, the Section has revised several Principles to clarify intent; has added 3 new Principles concerning prosecutorial conduct; and has met with Honorable Benjamin Civiletti, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, and other Department representatives to discuss the Principles. Mr. Civiletti has expressed support for some 15 of the Principles, and noted that the Department would take no position on an additional five. On several additional Principles, Mr. Civiletti said that some rephrasing might moot Department objections. In an attempt to reach compromise in as many areas as possible, the Section's Grand Jury Committee held a special meeting in early June, made additional amendments to a number of the Principles, and gained Council approval for these changes via a special mail ballot.

It should be noted that the proposed Principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors. It is chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami area for more than 20 years, and former President of the National District Attorneys Association. The Committee also included members with state and federal prosecutorial experience (including the last Watergate Special Prosecutor, Charles Ruff), judges, law professors and members of the defense bar. The Principles further represent a consensus of the Criminal Justice Section Council, which includes a similar mix of persons from all parts of the criminal justice system. Most of the Principles were approved by the Council unanimously.

In recent years, the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England—where the grand jury originated—abolished the institution in 1933; the majority of states in our country allow prosecution either by indictment or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The ABA House of Delegates in 1975 went on record opposing amendments of the United States Constitution to eliminate the requirement for indictment by a grand jury. That position of the ABA should not be changed, but a comprehensive effort is needed to correct existing abuses. The Section believes that its proposed legislative Principles will go a long way towards remedying the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

Principles

Following are comments on each of the 25 proposed Principles:

1. The American Bar Association has already gone on record (in August, 1975) supporting the right of a witness to have counsel present in the grand jury room. Principle No. 1 represents a reaffirmation of that position. Since this report was first presented to the House of Delegates in February, the Section has rewritten Principle No. 1 to spell out more specifically what role counsel should play in the grand jury room. That role is now carefully defined in the Principle to make it clear that it is strictly limited to advising the witness. This limited role will preclude the grand jury's becoming a "mini-trial"—as some have feared—and will not impair expeditious investigations. Under the proposed Principle, counsel is not allowed to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings. Further, the Section had added a provision to allow removal of counsel who are disruptive or do not otherwise stay within the prescribed boundaries laid down by the Principle. Clarification of the attorney's limited role, coupled with the mechanism for removing disruptive counsel, should meet the objections raised by those who have feared creation of a "mini-trial."

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice process—except before the grand jury—is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right. Requiring a witness who needs advice of counsel to consult his attorney outside the grand jury room door is awkward and prejudicial. It unnecessarily prolongs the grand jury proceeding and places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jurors. The American Law Institute has called it a "degrading and irrational" procedure. It is extremely damaging to the witness to continually get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. A recent Seventh Circuit decision (U.S. v. Kopel, 552, F.2d 1265 (1977)) points to additional problems with the procedure of consulting counsel outside the grand jury room. In that case, the Seventh Circuit said the U.S. Attorney, who had granted the witness permission to leave the grand jury room, was free at trial to bring up this fact as relevant to the perjury charges against the defendant. Dissenting, Judge Swygert decried the fact that the government was "permitted to 'sandbag' him [the defendant] by using the fact that he consulted his attorney against him." Nor is the right to leave the grand jury room to consult counsel absolute. (See In re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972), in which the court said a limit could be placed on how frequently the witness could leave the room to consult his lawyer.)

The prestigious American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure adopted in 1975, supports counsel in the grand jury room. "While this is a break with tradition and prevailing practice," the ALI notes, "it is consistent with the provisions of some recent state procedure codes . . . it seems unfair and inefficient to require a witness to leave the grand jury room each time he wishes to consult with counsel." [at 237; emphasis added] The ALI commentary goes on to state that "exclusion of counsel . . . is closely related to the traditional view that proceedings should be secret, and concern lest the presence of counsel hamper the freedom of the grand jury and the prosecutor in their investigation . . . The difficulty with this view . . . is that complex and important legal issues face a witness before a grand jury. An appearance before that body may subject an individual to the grave danger of self-incrimination or imprisonment for contempt . . . The witness may also inadvertently lose his right to claim the privilege by operation of the doctrine of waiver . . . And the inherent pressure and accompanying nervousness of a grand jury appearance upon an individual may make it very difficult for him to remember his attorney's instructions . . . For effective implementation of this right, an attorney should be present to follow the flow of the interrogation." [at 601]

Some nine states now have statutes allowing counsel to be present in the grand jury room—Arizona (for target witnesses), Illinois (for target witnesses), Kansas, Michigan (one-man grand juries), Oklahoma, South Dakota, Minnesota, Virginia and Washington State. The Section has contacted practicing attorneys and prosecutors in these states; none has reported problems. In fact, some prosecutors who said they initially fought the procedure now support it as a means of insuring fairness in the system. Congressman Joshua Eilberg (D–PA), writing in a recent issue of Judicature (Vol. 60, No. 8), similarly reported that those states which have implemented the practice have not reported any serious problems. Further, a number of additional states are now considering legislation—including Colorado (where it has passed both houses of the legislature), New York, Massachusetts, and California (where it has the support of the state's Attorney General).

Several arguments are raised by opponents. First, it is argued that allowing counsel in the grand jury room will be a breach of the secrecy rule. In fact, grand jury secrecy is not served by keeping the lawyer outside the grand jury room, since the witness is free to tell his attorney anything that occurred inside (Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)). Secondly, it is argued that the presence of the witness' lawyer will restrict free testimony in cases of organized crime, corporate and political corruption investigations. The Section notes that the states which allow counsel in the grand jury room have retained the grand jury in most instances as an investigatory body for precisely these kinds of investigations, and have no record of negative results. Further, there are alternate ways of securing a cooperative witness' statement, and this evidence can be summarized for the grand jury in the form of hearsay, Costello v. United States, 350

U.S. 359 (1956). When a witness is called to testify before a grand jury, the witness' attorney, sitting outside the grand jury room, can easily conclude from the time spent with the jury whether the witness takes the Fifth Amendment or testifies in full. Experienced prosecutors, further, have noted that very few witnesses indicate a desire to cooperate without the knowledge of their counsel; if the witness' testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will become evident to the attorney fairly quickly.

Recognizing that problems arising from multiple representation of witnesses could be exacerbated by allowing counsel in the grand jury room, the Section has strengthened Principle No. 20, which addresses that subject.

The presence of the attorney will not only reduce unfair speculation about the prosecutor's conduct, but will also serve to inhibit the prosecutor from possible improper conduct. Analogous to having counsel present to witness a line-up, the presence of the attorney in the grand jury room will help to insure the fairness of the proceedings. Watergate Special Prosecutor Charles Ruff—in supporting this proposal in recent Congressional testimony—declared that ". . . the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed, most prosecutors would admit, I think, that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel." (Testimony before House Judiciary Subcommittee, April 27, 1977, at 3.)

The American Bar Association has traditionally been a leader in asserting the right to assistance of counsel in the criminal justice process. As the ABA Standards on Providing Defense Services (§ 1.1) declare, "The objective of the bar should be to ensure the provision of competent counsel to all persons who need representation in criminal proceedings . . ." Enactment of Principle No. 1 will more meaningfully effectuate the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel; but the limitations on the role of counsel will forestall the grand jury's being turned into an adversary proceeding.

[2. Principle number two was added by the ABA House of Delegates at August, 1977 Annual meeting in Chicago as a proposed amendment to the Criminal Justice Section Principles offered by the Judicial Administration Division.]

3. Principle No. 3 states that the prosecutor shall not knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt. The Section believes this to be a key element in bringing fairness to the grand jury process, and essential to prevent indictment of innocent persons. The Association has already gone on record in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6(b)) supporting this, declaring that, "The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." The National District Attorneys Association (NDAA) Prosecution Standard 14.2D is also similar to Principle #3. As the commentary to the ABA Standard states. Such a procedure tends to insure public confidence in the ultimate decision as to prosecution. The obligation to present evidence which tends to negate the guilt of the accused flows from the basic duty of the prosecutor to seek a just result." The NDAA Standards note that such a standard "provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendant's guilt." Indictments have been overturned on the grounds of due process when a court has ascertained that the prosecutor knowingly used perjured evidence or failed to present evidence that squarely negated guilt. U.S. v. Basurto, 497 F.2d 781 (9th Cir., 1974); Johnson v. Superior Court of California, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P. 2d 792 (1975). This is a new Principle, added by the Section since the Principles were presented to the House of Delegates in February. At the suggestion of U.S. Department of Justice representatives, who questionsd the mechanics of the Principle as first drafted, the Section has written it so as to clarify its coverage and intent, since this is a legislative Principle, and not simply a more general standard for prosecutorial conduct.

4. The fourth Principle is also a new one, added since the report was presented to the House of Delegates in February. This would require the prosecutor to recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law. This language is identical to that of both ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function 3.6(c) and the National District Attorneys Association Standard (14.2E). The NDAA Standards commentary notes that this standard "recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise improper cases." The Section agrees with this rationale. Adoption of the Principle will help to insure substantial justice within the grand jury room. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated support for this Principle, which is, as noted above, already ABA policy.

5. Principle No. 5 would require that the target of a grand jury investigation be given the right to testify and present his side of the facts before an indictment is returned—provided such person signs a waiver of immunity. Under this proposal, the prosecutor would be required to take all reasonable steps to notify such prospective defendants—but recognizes that in some instances the prosecutor will truly be unable to locate such persons; or that, under some circumstances, notification may result in the person's fleeing, or his endangering witnesses or other persons, or obstructing justice. In such instances, notification would not be required. The Section has made two changes in this Principle since its initial presentation in February: First, at the suggestion of the Justice Department, the term "subject" was replaced by "target." The Department suggested this as more appropriate wording, since "target" is the term generally used in federal law enforcement. Secondly, Justice Department representatives suggested addition of the phrase "or obstruct justice" as an additional condition under which the prosecutor need not qualify a target. The Section also made this amendment, believing it to be inherent in the original Principle. Principle No. 5 is intended to insure that fair and just opportunity is given individuals to testify in their own behalf prior to being indicted. Such groups as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York have supported such a right. This is an essential ingredient, the Section believes, in a fairly functioning grand jury—and criminal justice—system. Without it, the grand jury's essential function of arriving at an accurate indictment is undermined.

6. The sixth Principle has been rewritten since presentation of the report in February. As originally phrased, it stated that the grand jury "shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence." In light of concerns raised by the Justice Department, the Section has rewritten Principle No. 6 to put the affirmative burden on the prosecutor not to present evidence which he knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial. It thus makes the burden more specific. The Section believes that the integrity of the grand jury will best be served by prohibiting presentation of unconstitutionally-obtained evidence by the prosecutor. Already-approved Association policy in the ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6(a)) declares that "a prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial." Notwithstanding the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), the Section believes that this Principle is needed to insure the integrity of the grand jury process; indeed, the Court in Calandra noted that "for the most part, a prosecutor would be unlikely to request an indictment where a conviction could not be obtained" because of use of illegally-seized evidence. The Principle is thus not fully inconsistent with the thrust of Calandra.

7. Principle No. 7 would prohibit naming a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. The Section believes that naming of persons as unindicted co-conspirators visits opprobrium upon them—by charging the named persons with the commission of a crime but denying them a forum in which to seek acquittal or vindication. This stains the reputation of the person without providing any means for the person to show his innocence. This is an instance in which reforms are needed to insure the fair functioning of the grand jury. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already held in accordance with this principle in U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F. 2d 794 (1975). The Section has added a second sentence to the Principle since its original presentation. This states that supplying such names in a bill of particulars would not be prohibited. This would permit the prosecutor to respond to a request by the defense to reveal the names of co-conspirators who were not indicted. The Section felt the addition of this sentence is needed to spell this out to avoid potential confusion in interpretation of this Principle.

8. The issuance and publication of grand jury reports which single out persons for scorn or criticism, impugn their motives, or denigrate their moral fitness to hold office have the effect of charging such persons with misconduct or unfitness—without affording them any forum in which to refute the charges or to seek vindication. The proper purpose of grand jury reports is to inform the public of situations requiring administrative, judicial or legislative corrective action—not the castigation of individuals when the fact-finding forum insured by the finding of an indictment is absent. The Section is not proposing that such grand jury reports be proscribed from commenting on the job that an office holder is performing; but such reports should not condemn character alone. Grand jury reports which do single out persons in the manner described tend to undercut the fairness of the grand jury. Such misuse of the grand jury can, in fact, affect the political process. Judicial scrutiny of the report is essential to prevent spurious attacks on individuals when no forum of trial is available. The states that have recently considered this issue have reinforced control over the reporting process. People v. Superior Court of Santa Barbara County, 531 P. 2d 761 (Cal. 1975); Del. Rules, R. 6 (1975); Fla. STAT. ANN. § 905.28 (1975). The procedures proposed in Principle No. 8 will assist in insuring that such abuses do not occur. See U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F. 2d 794 (1975) and Report of Grand Jury Proceedings, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, 479 F. 2d 458 (1973). The National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standards commentary (discussing an NDAA proposed standard on this subject, modeled on recent New York legislation) notes that, ". . . an unfavorable report may stand as a severe form of extra-judicial punishment, from which there is no appeal . . . the quasi-judicial nature of the grand jury gives it an apparent reliability which may not be justified . . . grand jurors are accountable to no one . . . grand jurors may impose a personal standard of morality on persons, rather than an abstract and neutral conception of right and wrong."

9. The Section opposes the practice of a prosecutor's using the grand jury to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist in his preparation for trial of a defendant already charged by indictment or information. This is an abuse of the grand jury, and transforms it into a mere tool and arm of the prosecutor's office—a role which is contrary to the grand jury's historical purpose and function. The Department of Justice supports this Principle; in a Department Office of Policy and Planning statement in 1976 with the House Judiciary Subcommittee examining grand jury legislation, the Department states that, "It is well-established under federal case law that a grand jury should act only with a view toward returning an indictment or to satisfy itself that no crime has occurred. . . . It would be an abuse of legal process for a government attorney to use a grand jury to discover or build up evidence for trial of an existing indictment. Courts would discipline attorneys who did so and the Department would not countenance such action by its representatives." This principle is in accord with well-settled case law. United States v. Dardi, 330 F. 2d 316 (2d Cir. 1964); United States v. Doss, 545 F. 2d 548 (6th Cir. 1976). In the Doss decision, the Court declared that, "We find no constitutional, statutory or case authority for employment of the grand jury as a discovery instrument to help the government prepare evidence to convict an already-indicted defendant. Such a use of the grand jury would prevent its constitutional and historical function . . ." The Court called it "a possible revival of a version of the Star Chamber of 18th Century England . . ."

10. The Section strongly opposes prosecutorial use of the grand jury to assist in administrative investigations—e.g., Internal Revenue income tax investigations. Such improper utilization of the grand jury warps its true function and leads to abuses such as those described in No. 9, supra. The ABA House of Delegates in February, 1977—in addressing a proposed amendment to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)—expressed concern regarding dissemination of grand jury information to government experts for use in unrelated civil proceedings. The Section report accompanying the House-approved resolution declared that disclosure of grand jury information to a broad group of governmental personnel might be used as "subterfuge by some agencies to obtain information through the grand jury process which was not legitimately required for the purposes of the pending grand jury investigation . . . The dissemination of information to serve particularized departmental or agency needs would not be a legitimate one." (House of Delegates Report book, 2/77 Midyear Meeting, at 138–9). A U.S. Department of Justice paper submitted to the House Congressional hearings echoes this concern: "[o]ne of the primary abuse of the grand jury which must be avoided . . . is the attempted use of its broad investigative powers by governmental agencies in pursuit of investigations that are solely their own rather than the grand jury's." (U.S. Department of Justice Office of Policy and Planning, Memorandum on the Grand Jury, p. 106; printed in record of House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings.) In the case of United States v. Doe, 72 Crim.

Misc. 1 (S.D.N.Y. 1972, the court, in denying a government motion to examine special grand jury minutes to determine violations of Titles 18 and 28 and "to determine civil tax liability," declared that, "The grand jury's role is properly confined . . . when it is held empowered to conduct investigations that are in their inception exclusively criminal." It should be noted that the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys has expressed its support for this proposed Principle.

11. Principle No. 11 provides that witnesses summoned before grand juries should not be subjected to unreasonable delays or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment. The Section supports legislation which would forbid such practices. In some instances, these abuses have occurred and grand jury witnesses have been repeatedly called to appear; or have been subjected to unreasonable delays or other forms of harassment. An indifference to the convenience of a grand jury witness is as objectionable as the use of a grand jury subpena to harass a witness, and is a subtle means of intimidating the witness before his appearance. The ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function (§ 5.7(a)) recognize the prosecutor's obligation to handle witnesses "fairly, objectively and . . . without seeking to intimidate or humiliate the witness . . ." The U.S. Department of Justice supports this Principle, as does the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

12. Several of the grand jury reform bills before the 95th Congress (e.g., H.R. 3736 would require grand jury approval of any subpoenas issued. The Section opposes such a procedure. It believes this requirement would not only be cumbersome, but would cause unnecessary delay. The prosecutor, the Section believes, is much better suited to make determinations regarding issuance of subpoenas than are lay grand jurors. The Section thus does not support these provisions in pending legislation. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

13. Principle No. 13 would require that a grand jury subpoena indicate the statute or general subject that is the focus of the grand jury inquiry. This requirement is intended to enable the recipient and the court to determine more accurately questions of relevancy. It would also enable the witness to prepare himself more adequately for his appearance, and would insure more effective and efficient use of counsel, court and grand jury time. The Principle does not intend that a detailed description of the statutory and subject areas be required; but that a broad statutory citation or general description of the subject be included. Justice Department representatives have expressed support for this Principle; but indicated concern that, as initially written, the Principle would leave open the question of later challenges to the indictment based on the fact that the defendant was charged under statutes not named in the subpoena. To meet this concern and clarify the Principle's original intent, the Section has added the second sentence; this makes it clear that the indictment cannot be vitiated if the person is indicted under a statute or in a subject area not mentioned in the subpoena. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

14. A grand jury subpoena should not be returnable except when the grand jury is sitting. This proposal is intended to avoid potential abuse of the subpoena power by the prosecutor's office. It will help to insure the integrity of the grand jury function. Both the Justice Department and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys support this Principle.

15. Principle No. 15 would mandate stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury—except the deliberations of the grand jury itself. This would represent a logical step forward in grand jury reform, and is not inconsistent with the necessity of maintaining grand jury secrecy. The judge's charge to the grand jury would be recorded, as would the prosecutor's introductory remarks and testimony and questioning of all witnesses. Some 31 states already require recording of all grand jury proceedings other than votes and deliberations, and an additional 6 states permit it, according to a Library of Congress study (printed in 1976 Hearings record, House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, p. 714). Several federal district courts already record all grand jury proceedings—including the District of Rhode Island, the Eastern District of Washington, and the Northern District of Illinois. The Ninth Circuit has ruled that a prospective defendant who makes a timely request cannot be arbitrarily denied recordation of grand jury proceedings. United States v. Thoreson, 428 F.2d 654 (1970); United States v. Price, 474 F. 2d 1223 (1973).

Major groups have supported this requirement. The American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arrangement Procedure, urges that a record be made of all proceedings before the grand jury. The ABA Standards for Criminal Justice on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(c))—already ABA policy—provide that, "The prosecutor's communications and presentations to the grand jury should be on the record." The accompanying commentary points out that "since grand jury proceedings are generally secret and ex parte, it is particularly desirable that a record be made of the prosecutor's communications and representations to the jury." The recently-issued Prosecution Standards of the National District Attorneys Association (§ 14.2(F)) also urge that "all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded." Recording will aid the prosecution—by insuring that perjured testimony does not go unpunished. Recording would also act as a restraint on the prosecutor not to exercise undue or improper influence on the grand jury.

The Justice Department supports this Principle to the extent that it would require recordation of the judge's charge and the questioning and testimony of witnesses, but opposes recording the prosecutor's comments to the jury. The U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee argues that this would "formalize what should be an informal working relationship between grand jurors and government attorneys." (From position paper submitted to Section Council, May 14, 1977, p. 7.) It is exactly that "informal" relationship which invites subtle abuses of the grand jury, the Section believes; that is itself a cogent argument in favor of recordation. The Advisory Committee further argues that a recordation requirement would "impose severe and undue administrative burdens" (p. 7 of position paper, supra); and the Justice Department points to "unavailability of court reporters in many areas" (p. 103 of House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings record, supra). There are real benefits to be gained by recording matters before the grand jury—for the prosecution, as well as for the defense. Raising administrative hurdles is not sufficient argument against this proposal, which truly goes to the integrity of the grand jury process.

16. This Principle—which has been added since February—is identical to National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standard (§ 14.4B) and the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(b)). It thus already is Association policy. It would prohibit the prosecutor from making statements or arguments to influence the grand jury action in a manner which would not be permitted before the trial jury. This is essential because of the prosecutor's role as the only legally-trained person before the lay grand jurors. As the commentary to the ABA Standards notes, "A prosecutor should not take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury." Because of the secret nature of the grand jury proceedings, the lack of direct court supervision, and the fact that the prosecutor's is a unilateral presentation, he must avoid unduly influencing the grand jurors by means which would not be appropriate in the public courtroom before a petit jury. This is essential to prevent to the grand jury's becoming a mere echo of the prosecution. As one writer has noted, "[G]rand jurors must place enormous trust in the prosecutor's guidance. It is he, after all, who tells them what the charge is, who selects the facts for them to hear, who shapes the tone and feel of the entire case . . ." [emphasis added] (Antell, "The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment," 51 A.B.A.J. 153, 154 (1965). The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

17. Principle No. 17 calls on the ABA to broaden its previously-adopted policy concerning immunity to specify proper instances in which immunity should be issued: when it is in the public interest; when there is no other reasonable way to elicit the testimony; and when the witness has refused to testify, or stated he will invoke the Fifth Amendment. This is intended to insure that grants of immunity are carefully considered prior to issuance and that they are not issued when other means could be used to obtain the needed information. The ABA House of Delegates (at the 1975 Annual Meeting) has already supported amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide "transactional" immunity, rather than "use" immunity provided under present federal law. Under transactional immunity, a witness may be statutorily compelled to give testimony which might otherwise violate the privilege concerning self-incrimination, provided the witness is given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony. Under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b), Part V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972), only "use" immunity need be afforded. This merely prevents the prosecution from using the actual testimony (or leads derived therefrom) in any subsequent criminal prosecution. Some 31 states currently provide transactional immunity, according to the House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings record (supra). The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has supported it, in the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rule 732(b)). "Use" immunity, while Constitutional (see Kastigar, supra), should be rejected for several practical reasons. It is not only susceptible of prosecutorial abuse, but can be a subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. Testimony thus obtained is not accurate. Witness cooperation is essential to an effective grand jury investigation, yet the uncertainty generated by "use" immunity, and the difficulties in determining the scope of the protection afforded the witness, can chill and inhibit his cooperation. Transactional immunity better encourages accurate testimony and minimizes witness resistance to questioning. The small number of actual successful prosecutions of immunized witnesses with "use" immunity indicates that a return to transactional immunity will not remove a significant weapon against organized crime (see, 14 American Criminal Law Review, 275, 282, wherein U.S. Department of Justice reports that, in practice, few witnesses granted "use" immunity are subsequently prosecuted for crimes described in their immunized testimony). "Use" immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the Constitutional right against self-incrimination, the Section believes.

18. Several of the grand jury bills pending before the 94th Congress include a provision requiring approval of immunity grants by a majority vote of the grand jury. While many supporters of this provision believe that it would help to insure the independence of that body, the Section does not support such a requirement. Instead, Principle No. 18 would provide that immunity be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury; the standards outlined in Principle No. 17 would be followed in determining whether such a grant should be made. Lay grand jurors are not adequately oriented to make determinations regarding immunity grants, the Section believes. This is properly an executive function with court overview.

19. Principle No. 17 would forbid making the granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings a matter of public record before the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause. To make public such grants undercuts the function of the grand jury by selectively publicizing its investigations—and has the definite potential of harm to those to whom immunity is alleged to have been granted. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated its agreement with this Principle.

20. The question of multiple representation of witnesses in grand jury proceedings has recently received increasing attention both from members of the private bar and from government attorneys. (See, e.g., Cole, "Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should be Stopped," 2 Journal of Criminal Defense 149 (1976); and Speech May 3, 1977 to Chicago Bar Association on "The Perils of Multiple Representation in Criminal Antitrust Proceedings," by Richard Favretto, Deputy Director of Operations, Antitrust Division, U.S. Department of Justice.) Recent court opinions have also tried to grapple with this question (see, e.g., In Re Investigation Before April, 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir. 1976)). Principle No. 20 has been substantially rewritten by the Section since February to strengthen its provisions, to meet concerns raised by critics of the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room. Opponents of that Principle have focused much of their objection on problems which could arise when one attorney represents more than one witness in a grand jury proceeding. The Section has redrafted Principle No. 20 to spell out the professional responsibility of an attorney not to continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if conflicts can arise. As originally worded, the Principle provided that, "If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise."

Under the newly-redrafted Principle, the burden is initially placed on the defense attorney to assume responsibility for remedying situations when conflicts from multiple representation arise or are likely to arise. If the court finds that this principle is not being followed, however, it would have the authority to order separate representation. The phrase "giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing" has been added to avoid a situation in which the court summarily excludes certain counsel from representing any witness in the proceeding. In adopting this Principle, the Section considered multiple representation to include the following: two or more witnesses in a grand jury proceeding who may have conflicting interests; a witness and a potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding; or a witness whose counsel fees are paid by a third party who is a witness or potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding. The significant ethical concerns involved in multiple representation when the clients have actual or potential conflicting interests; the potential compromises to the Constitutional guarantee to effective assistance of counsel; and the potential for inhibiting the public's right to an effective grand jury investigation require the private bar to deal seriously with this issue. As Alan Y. Cole noted in a recent article (supra), "To avoid the Scylla of conflict, the defense attorney with multiple clients will likely become engulfed in the Charybdis of ineffective assistance of counsel . . ." Benjamin Civiletti, head of the Justice Department's Criminal Division, has expressed his support for this Principle as now formulated.

21. Principle No. 21 provides that the confidential nature of grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny. Shielding their identity is necessary to prevent unjust harm to witnesses and potential defendants. The practice is some jurisdictions of having witnesses exposed to public and press as they merege from the grand jury room is an unfair one—it taints the witnesses' reputations by the mere fact of their appearance. The importance of maintaining the secrecy of grand jury proceedings has already been recognized by the Association, when, in its 1975 policy, it urged strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. The Justice Department supports this Principle.

22. The Section supports legislation which would mandate the court's charging grand jurors on impanelling as to their duties and responsibilities; written copies of the charge would then be distributed to the grand jurors for their continuing reference. Detailing to grand jurors their powers, responsibilities and rights will help to insure their comprehensive understanding of their proper role, and will thereby help to strengthen the independence and fail functioning of the grand jury. Several of the bills pending in the 95th Congress contain such provisions, as does pending legislation in several states. The Department of Justice has indicated its support for this Principle.

23. In adopting Principle No. 23, the Section urges the Association to go on record as recognizing potential abuses of newspersons who are called as witnesses before the grand jury and then claim a First Amendment privilege not to testify. In some prosecutors' offices around the country, office policy already exists forbidding the calling of journalists before the grand jury. As the U.S. Supreme Court has noted, "Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification . . . We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment, as well as the Fifth." Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, at 707–708 (1972). Supporting the need for legislation in this area, a Newspaper Guild spokesperson declared in testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings in June 1977, "The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion . . ." Principle No. 23 is further intended to express Section concern about the increasing number of instances nationally in which criminal defense lawyers are themselves being subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. Abuse of grand jury subpoenas used against persons having recognized confidential relationships appears to be increasing; this can drive a wedge of distrust between defense attorney and client, and has a chilling effect on 6th Amendment rights and confidential relationships. The Section purposely did not go into further detail in this proposed Principle, believing that an expression of Association concern about present abuses of the grand jury vis-a-vis the press and the criminal defense bar would call attention to what appears to be a growing problem. The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

24. In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates opposed amendment of the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.C. 1826(a)) to reduce from 18 to 6 months the maximum period of confinement on a civil contempt order for refusal to testify before a grand jury. The Section is now seeking revision of the previously-adopted position. This Principle would support—as provided in several pending grand jury reform bills—a maximum of six months confinement. It is believed that this length of confinement should be sufficient to compel a witness to testify. (It should be noted that the ABA has previously gone on record supporting legislation to prohibit multiple confinement upon a subsequent refusal by a witness to testify about the same transaction.) The Section now believes that this is sufficient to compel a witness to testify, while avoiding the longer, more punitive confinement. This has been an area in which many abuses have allegedly occurred (See record of 1976 hearings before House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law). The Section thus urges ABA support for a 6-month maximum.

25. Rather than specifying proposed sanctions for violation of each proposed grand jury legislative Principle outlined herein, the Section simply notes that the court should exercise its power to impose appropriate sanctions when the proposed Principles are violated. Such sanctions will obviously be fashioned in any proposed legislation; but it is not the Section's intent, in proposing ABA policy on the grand jury, itself to suggest statutory language.

Conclusion

When the grand jury was created in 12th Century England, it was intended to serve as a shield between the citizen and the Crown. In recent years, the grand jury has come under increasing attack: observers charge that the grand jury system is riddled with abuse, and is no longer a shield for the citizen but a shield for the government. Critics declare that it has departed from its proper Constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecutions.

The Section of Criminal Justice, based on the work of its Grand Jury Committee, chaired by experienced prosecutor Richard E. Gerstein, believes that reforms are needed to insure fairness—but without undercutting the grand jury's legitimate functions or destroying it as an institution. While legitimate objections to these Principles have been raised, resistance to change from those within the criminal justice system cannot in itself be sufficient reason to reject well-considered—and needed—proposals.

The Section urges the House of Delegates to support the 25 legislative Principles. The Congress and many states legislatures are now acting on grand jury reform proposals; professional, media and public focus on this subject cannot be expected to abate. The Association—as in its landmark Standards for Criminal Justice project—has long been in the forefront of criminal justice improvement.

ABA leadership is now needed to help fashion well-reasoned, workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

Respectfully submitted.

In November of 1977, the formal policy of the American Bar Association on the Grand Jury was forwarded to Congress as follows:

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION POLICY ON THE GRAND JURY

(Prepared by the Section of Criminal Justice, Washington, D.C.)

INTRODUCTION

This report with recommendations represents the accomplishment of the ABA Section of Criminal Justice Grand Jury Committee, which spent more than three years in developing comprehensive recommendations with respect to the grand jury. The leadership of its chairperson, Richard E. Gerstein, played a major part in the development of this product.

The recommendations contained herein—25 legislative principles—were approved by the American Bar Association's policy-making House of Delegates on August 9, 1977. They thus now represent approved ABA policy. The work of the Section of Criminal Justice and the Committee will now continue with efforts to secure adoption of legislation on the federal level. The Section is also encouraged to note increasing parallel efforts in many of the states—and would be interested in hearing from those actively involved in grand jury reform work.

The preparation of these proposals represents only one of many timely areas in which the Section of Criminal Justice is working. If you are not already a member, I encourage you to join and to become active. A membership application is included in the back of this publication.

B. JAMES GEORGE, JR.,
Section Chairperson.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION POLICY ON THE GRAND JURY

Based on proposals of the section of criminal justice approved by the ABA House of Delegates on August 9, 1977. Only the principles set forth below represent official ABA policy; the accompanying report is for background purposes only.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The American Bar Association supports grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel and his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in the proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. Every witness before a grand jury shall be informed of his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel and shall be advised that false answers may result in his being charged with perjury. Target witnesses shall be told that they are possible indictees.

3. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt.

4. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

5. A target of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons or obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

6. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidence which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

7. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

8. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

10. The grand jury shall not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

11. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

12. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

13. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of an indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be basis for dismissal.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberation of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

16. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

17. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

18. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle number 17.

19. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

20. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

21. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

22. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

23. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

24. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury and is found in contempt should not exceed one year.

25. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

REPORT

Background

These twenty-five Principles were approved by the American Bar Association House of Delegates on August 9, 1977, during the ABA Annual Meeting in Chicago. They are now approved Association policy. The Principles represent the proposals off the ABA Section of Criminal Justice, and its Committee on the Grand Jury, chaired by Richard E. Gerstein.

The ABA believes that the grand jury reform legislation now pending before the Congress should adhere to these legislative principles. These proposals represent more than three years of study of the grand jury by the Section of Criminal Justice. In August, 1975, at Section urging, the ABA House of Delegates approved a policy addressing one grand jury bill (H.R. 1277) in the 94th Congress. That policy was a limited one, but included ABA suport for such key elements of grand jury reform as allowing counsel in the grand jury room, transactional immunity, and strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Since 1975, the Section's Grand Jury Committee has analyzed a number of pending bills, including H.R. 3736 and S. 3274 (94th Congress), both with a broader focus than H.R. 1277, on which the former ABA policy was formulated. New legislation, including H.R. 94, H.R. 3736 and S. 1440, was introduced at the beginning of the 95th Congress, and hearings have been held on these proposals.

Based on its continued study of this issue since 1975, the Criminal Justice Section asked the ABA in August 1977 to adopt an Association policy addressing a broader range of grand jury issues. This was felt timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention focused on this issue, but also because action was anticipated in the 95th Congress on the pending legislation. Further, the Section recognized that a number of states are considering—and some have already enacted into law—similar bills.

In February, 1977, the Section asked the ABA House of Delegates to approve a package of 23 legislative principles. At the personal request of Attorney General Bell, the Section moved that the House defer action until the August 1977 Annual Meeting. In the interim, the Section revised several Principles to clarify intent; added three new Principles concerning prosecutorial conduct; and met with Honorable Benjamin Civiletti, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, and other Department representatives to discuss the Principles. Mr. Civiletti expressed support for some fifteen of the Principles, and noted that the Department would take no position on an additional five. On several additional Principles, Mr. Civiletti said that some rephrasing might moot Department objections. In an attempt to reach compromise in as many areas as possible, the Section's Grand Jury Committee held a special meeting in June, 1977, made additional amendments to a number of the Principles, and gained Council approval for these changes via a special mail ballot.

It sould be noted that the Principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors. It is chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami area for more than 20 years, and former President of the National District Attorney Association. The Committee also included members with state and federal prosecutorial experience (including the last Watergate Special Prosecutor, Charles Ruff), judges, law professors and members of the defense bar. The Principles further represent a concensus of the Criminal Justice Section Council, which includes a similar mix of persons from all parts of the criminal justice system. Most of the Principles were approved by the Council unanimously.

During the ABA Annual Meeting debate on this subject in August 1977, the House of Delegates approved the vast majority of these Principles by overwhelming voice vote. The hotly-contested question of allowing counsel in the grand jury room—Principle Number 1—was approved bp the House by a two-to-one margin (196 to 83), despite subtantial opposition voiced by the U.S. Department of Justice. Similarly, despite articulate criticism of Principle Number 17, supporting transactional immunity, the ABA reaffirmed its support for that position.

In recent years, the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England—where the grand jury originated—abolished the institution in 1933; the major of states in our country allow prosecution either by indiement or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The ABA House of Delegates in 1975 went on record opposing amendment of the United States Constitution to eliminate the requirement for indictment by a grand jury. That position of the ABA should not be changed, but a comprehensive effort is needed to correct existing abuses. The Section believes that its proposed legislative Principles will go a long way toward remedying the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

Principles

Following are comments on each of the twenty-five Principles:

1. The American Bar Association has previously gone on record (in August, 1975) supporting the right of a witness to have counsel present in the grand jury room. Principle Number 1 spells out specifically what role counsel should play in the grand jury room. That role is carefully defined in the Principle to make it clear that it is strictly limited to advising the witness. This limited role will preclude the grand jury's becoming a "mini-trial"—as some have feared—and will not impair expeditious investigations. Under the Principle, counsel is not allowed to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings Further, the Section included a provision to allow removal of counsel who are disruptive or do not otherwise stay within the prescribed boundaries laid down by the Principle. Clarification of the attorney's limited role, coupled with the mechanism for removing disruptive counsel, should meet the objections raised by those who have feared creation of a "mini-trial."

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice process—except before the grand jury—is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right. Requiring a witness who needs advice of counsel to consult his attorney outside the grand jury rooom is awkward and prejudicial. It unnecessarily prolongs the grand jury proceeding and places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jurors. The American Law Institute has called it a "degrading and irrational" procedure. It is extremely damaging to the witness continually to get up, go outside, and consult with counsel.

A recent Seventh Circuit decision [U.S. v. Kopel, 552 F.2d 1265 (1977)] points to additional problems with the procedure of consulting counsel outside the grand jury room. In that case, the Seventh Circuit said the U.S. Attorney, who had granted the witness permission to leave the grand jury room, was free at trial to bring up this fact as relevant to the perjury charges against the defendant. Dissenting, Judge Swygert decried the fact that the government was "permitted to 'sandbag' him [the defendant] by using the fact that he consulted his attorney against him." Nor is the right to leave the grand jury room to consult counsel absolute. [See In re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972), in which the court said a limit could be placed on how frequently the witness could leave the room to consult his lawyer.]

The prestigious American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure adopted in 1975, supports counsel in the grand jury room. "While this is a break with tradition and prevailing practices," the ALI notes, "it is consistent with the provisions of some recent state procedure codes . . . it seems unfair and inefficient to require a witness to leave the grand jury room each time he wishes to consult with counsel." [at 237; emphasis added] The ALI commentary goes on to state that "exclusion of counsel . . . is closely related to the traditional view that the proceedings should be secret, and concern lest the presence of counsel hamper the freedom of the grand jury and the prosecutor in their investigation . . . The difficulty with this view . . . is that complex and important legal issues face a witness before a grand jury. An appearance before that body may subject an individual to the grave danger of self-incrimination or imprisonment for contempt . . . The witness may also inadvertently lose his right to claim the privilege by operation of the doctrine of waiver . . . And the inherent pressure and accompanying nervousness of a grand jury appearance upon an individual may make it very difficult for him to remember his attorney's instructions . . . For effective implementation of this right, an attorney should be present to follow the flow of the interrogation." [at 601]

Some nine states now have statutes allowing counsel to be present in the grand jury room—Arizona (for target witnesses), Illinois (for target witnesses, Kansas, Colorado, Michigan, (one-man grand juries), Oklahoma, South Dakota, Minnesota, Virginia and Washington State. The Section contacted practicing attorneys and prosecutors in these states; none reported problems. In fact, some prosecutors who said they initially fought the procedure now support it as a means of insuring fairness in the system.

Congressman Joshu Eilberg (D–Pa), writing in Judicature (Vol. 60, No. 8), similarly reported that those states which have implemented the practice have not reported any serious problems. Further, a number of additional states are now considering such legislation—including New York, Massachusetts, and California (where it has the support of the state's Attorney General).

Several arguments are raised by opponents. First it is argued that allowing counsel in the grand jury room will be a breach of the secrecy rule. In fact, grand jury secrecy is not served by keeping the lawyer outside the grand jury room, since the witness is free to tell his attorney anything that occurred inside. [Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)]. Second, it is argued that the presence of the witness' lawyer will restrict free testimony in cases of organized crime, corporate and political corruption investigations. In fact, the states which allow counsel in the grand jury room have retained the grand jury in most instances as an investigatory body for precisely these kinds of investigations, and have no record of negative results. Further, there are alternate ways of securing a cooperative witness' statement, and this evidence can be summarized for the grand jury in the form of hearsay [Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. (1956)] When a witness is called to testify before a grand jury, the witness' attorney, sitting outside the grand jury room, can easily conclude from the time spent with the jury whether the witness takes the fifth amendment or testifies in full. Experienced prosecutors, further, have noted that very few witnesses indicate a desire to cooperate without the knowledge of their counsel; if the witness' testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will become evident to the attorney fairly quickly.

Recognizing that problems arising from multiple representation of witnesses could be exacerbated by allowing counsel in the grand jury room, the Section has strengthened Principle Number 20, which addresses that subject.

The presence of the attorney will not only reduce unfair speculation at the prosecutor's conduct, but will also serve to inhibit the prosecutor from possible improper conduct. Analogous to having counsel present to witness a line-up, the presence of the attorney in the grand jury room will help to insure the fairness of the proceedings.

Watergate Special Prosecutor Charles Ruff—in supporting this proposal in recent Congressional testimony—declared that ". . . . the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed, most prosecutors would admit, I think, that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel." [Testimony before House Judiciary Subcommittee, April 27, 1977, at 3.]

The American Bar Association has been a leader in asserting the right to assistance of counsel in the criminal justice process. As the ABA Standards on Providing Defense Services (§ 1.1) declare, "The objective of the bar should be to ensure the provision of competent counsel to all persons who need representation in criminal proceedings . . ." Principle Number 1 would more meaningfully effectuate the sixth amendment right to assistance of counsel; but the limitations on the role of counsel will forestall the grand jury's being turned into an adversary proceeding. This proposal was approved by the ABA House of Delegates by an overwhelming 186–93 margin.

2. Principle Number 2 was added by the ABA House of Delegates at the August, 1977 Annual Meeting in Chicago as a proposed amendment to the Criminal Justice Section Principles offered by the ABA Judicial Administration Division. During the debate, the U.S. Department of Justice representatives said that they did not oppose this Principle.

3. Principle Number 3 states that the prosecutor shall not knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt. The ABA believes this to be a key element in bringing fairness to the grand jury process, and essential to prevent indictment of innocent persons. The Association already had gone on record in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6[b]) supporting this, declaring that, "The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." The National District Attorneys Association (NDAA) Prosecution Standard 14.2D is also similar to Principle Number 3. As the commentary to the ABA Standard states, "Such a procedure tends to insure public confidence in the ultimate decision as to prosecution. The obligation to present evidence which tends to negate the guilt of the accused flows from the basic duty of the prosecutor to seek a just result." The NDAA Standards note that such a standard "provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendant's guilt."

Indictments have been overturned on the grounds of due process when a court has ascertained that the prosecutor knowingly used perjured evidence or failed to present evidence that squarely negated guilt. [U.S. v. Basurto, 497 F.2d 781 (9th Cir., 1974); Johnson v. Superior Court of California, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P.2d 792 (1975).] At the suggestion of U.S. Department of Justice representatives, who questioned the mechanics of the Principle as first drafted, the Section rewrote it to clarify its coverage and intent, since this is a legislative Principle, and not simply a general standard for prosecutorial conduct. The Justice Department did not oppose this Principle in the House of Delegates debate.

4. The fourth Principle would require the prosecutor to recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law. This language is identical to that of both ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function 3.6(c) and the National District Attorneys Association Standard 14.2E. The NDAA Standards commentary notes that this standard "recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise improper cases." The ABA agrees with this rationale. Implementation of this Principle will help to insure substantial justice within the grand jury room. The U.S. Department of Justice has indicated support for this Principle.

5. Principle Number 5 would require that the target of a grand jury investigation be given the right to testify and present his side of the facts before an indictment is returned—provided such person signs a waiver of immunity. Under this proposal, the prosecutor would be required to take all reasonable steps to notify such prospective defendants—but recognizes that in some instances the prosecutor will truly be unable to locate such persons; or that, under some circumstances, notification may result in the person's fleeing, or his endangering witnesses or other persons, or obstructing justice. In such instances, notification would not be required.

The Section made two changes in this Principle during the drafting process. First, at the suggestion of the Justice Department, the term "subject" was replaced by "target." The Department suggested this as more appropriate wording, since "target" is the term generally used in federal law enforcement. Second, Justice Department representatives suggested addition of the phrase "or obstruct justice" as an additional condition under which the prosecutor need not notify a target. The Section also made this amendment, believing it to be inherent in the original Principle. Principle Number 5 is intended to insure that fair and just opportunity is given individuals to testify in their own behalf prior to being indicted. Such groups as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York have supported such a right. This is an essential ingredient, the ABA believes, in a fairly functioning grand jury—and criminal justice—system. Without it, the grand jury's essential function of arriving at an accurate indictment is undermined. The Justice Department did not oppose this Principle in the House of Delegates debate.

6. The sixth Principle puts the affirmative burden on the prosecutor not to present evidence which he knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial. This was rewritten by the Section during the drafting phase to meet Department of Justice concerns about the Principle as originally phrased. (It had originally stated that the grand jury "shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence.") The ABA believes that the integrity of the grand jury will best be served by prohibiting presentation of unconstitutionally-obtained evidence by the prosecutor. Association policy in the ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6[a]) declares that "a prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial." Notwithstanding the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), the ABA believes that this Principle is needed to insure the integrity of the grand jury process; indeed, the Court in Calandra noted that "for the most part, a prosecutor would be unlikely to request an indictment where a conviction could not be obtained" because of use of illegally-seized evidence. The Principle is thus not inconsistent with the thrust of Calandra.

7. Principle Number 7 would prohibit naming a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. The ABA believes that naming of persons as unindicted co-conspirators visits opprobrium upon them—by charging the named persons with the commission of a crime but denying them a forum in which to seek acquittal or vindication. This stains the reputation of the person without providing any means for the person to show his innocence. This is an instance in which reforms are needed to insure the fair functioning of the grand jury.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already held in accordance with this principle in U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975). A second sentence states that supplying such names in a bill of particulars would not be prohibited. This would permit the prosecutor to respond to a request by the defense to reveal the names of co-conspirators who were not indicted. The Justice Department has not opposed this Principle.

8. The issuance and publication of grand jury reports which single out persons for scorn or criticism, impugn their motives, or denigrate their moral fitness to hold office have the effect of charging such persons with misconduct or unfitness—without affording them any forum in which to refute the charges or to seek vindication. The proper purpose of grand jury reports is to inform the public of situations requiring administrative, judicial or legislative corrective action—not the castigation of individuals when the fact-finding forum insured by the finding of an indictment is absent. The ABA is not proposing that such grand jury reports be proscribed from commenting on the job that an office holder is performing; but such reports should not condemn character alone. Grand jury reports which do single out persons in the manner described tend to undercut the fairness of the grand jury. Such misuse of the grand jury can, in fact, affect the political process. Judicial scrutiny of the report is essential to prevent spurious attacks on individuals when no forum of trial is available. The states that have recently considered this issue have reinforced control over the reporting process. [People v. Superior Court of Santa Barbara County, 531 P.2d 761 (Cal. 1975); Del. Rules, R.6 (1975); FLA. STAT. ANN. § 905.28 (1975).]

The procedures proposed in Principle Number 8 will assist in insuring that such abuses do not occur. [See U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (5th Cir. 1975) and Report of Grand Jury Proceedings, 479 F.2d 458 (5th Cir. 1973).] The National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standards Commentary (discussing an NDAA proposed standard on this subject, modeled on recent New York legislation) notes that ". . . an unfavorable report may stand as a severe form of extra-judicial punishment, from which there is no appeal . . . the quasi-judicial nature of the grand jury gives it an apparent reliability which may not be justified . . . grand jurors are accountable to no one . . . grand jurors may impose a personal standard of morality on persons, rather than an abstract and neutral conception of right and wrong." This proposal was not opposed by the Justice Department during the August debate.

9. The ABA opposes the practice of a prosecutor's using the grand jury to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist in his preparation for trial of a defendant already charged by indictment or information. This is an abuse of the grand jury, and transforms it into a mere tool and arm of the prosecutor's office—a role which is contrary to the grand jury's historical purpose and function. The Department of Justice supports this Principle. In a Department Office of Policy and Planning statement filed in 1976 with the House Judiciary Subcommittee examining grand jury legislation, the Department stated that, "It is well-established under federal case law that a grand jury should act only with a view toward returning an indictment or to satisfy itself that no crime has occurred . . . It would be an abuse of legal process for a government attorney to use a grand jury to discover or build up evidence for trial of an existing indictment. Courts would discipline attorneys who did so and the Department would not countenance such action by its representatives."

This principle is in accord with well-settled case law. [United States v. Dardi, 330 F.2d 316 (2d Cir. 1964); United States v. Doss, 545 F.2d 548 (6th Cir. 1976).] In the Doss decision, the Court declared that, "We find no constitutional statutory or case authority for employment of the grand jury as a discovery instrument to help the government prepare evidence to convict an already-indicted defendant. Such a use of the grand jury would pervert its constitutional and historical function . . ." The Court called it "a possible revival of a version of the Star Chamber of 18th Century England . . ."

10. The ABA strongly opposes prosecutorial use of the grand jury to assist administrative investigations—e.g., Internal Revenue income tax investigations. Such improper utilization of the grand jury warps its true function and leads to abuses such as those described in Number 9, supra. The ABA House of Delegates in February, 1977—in addressing a proposed amendment to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)—expressed concern regarding dissemination of grand jury information to government experts for use in unrelated civil proceedings. The Section of Criminal Justice Report accompanying the House-approved resolution declared that disclosure of grand jury information to a broad group of governmental personnel might be used as "subterfuge by some agencies to obtain information through the grand jury proces which was not legitimately required for the purposes of the pending grand jury investigation . . . The dissemination of information to serve particularized departmental or agency needs would not be a legitimate one." [House of Delegates Report Book, 2/77 Midyear Meeting, at 138-9.]

A U.S. Department of Justice paper submitted to the House Congressional hearings echoes this concern: "One of the primary abuses of the grand jury which must be avoided . . . is the attempted use of its broad investigative powers by governmental agencies in pursuit of investigations that are solely their own rather than the grand jury's." [U.S. Department of Justice Office of Policy and Planning, Memorandum on the Grand Jury, p. 106; printed in record of House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings.] In the case of United States v. Doe, 72 Crim. Misc. 1 (S.D. N.Y. 1972), the court, in denying a government motion to examine special grand jury minutes to determine violations of Titles 18 and 28 and "to determine civil tax liability," declared that, "The grand jury's role is properly confined . . . when it is held empowered to conduct investigations that are in their inception exclusively criminal." It should be noted that the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys has expressed its support for this proposed Principle.

11. Principle Number 11 provides that witnesses summoned before grand juries should not be subjected to unreasonable delays or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment. The ABA supports legislation which would forbid such practices. In some instances, these abuses have occurred and grand jury witnesses have been repeatedly called to appear; or have been subjected to unreasonable delays or other forms of harassment. An indifference to the convenience of a grand jury witness is as objectionable as the use of a grand jury subpoena to harass a witness, and is a subtle means of intimidating the witness before his appearance. The ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function (§ 5.7[a]) recognize the prosecutor's obligation to handle witnesses "fairly, objectively and . . . without seeking to intimidate or humiliate the witness . . ." The U.S. Department of Justice supports this Principle, as does the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

12. Several of the grand jury reform bills before the 95th Congress (e.g., H.R. 3736) would require grand jury approval of any subpoenas issued. The ABA opposes such a procedure. It believes this requirement would not only be cumbersome, but would cause unnecessary delay. The prosecutor, the ABA believes, is much better suited to make determinations regardng issuance of subpoenas than are lay grand jurors. The ABA thus does not support these provisions in pending legislation. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

13. Principle Number 13 would require that a grand jury subpoena indicate the stature or general subject that is the focus of the grand jury inquiry. This requirement is intended to enable the recipient and the court to determine more accurately questions of relevancy. It would also enable the witness to prepare himself more adequately for his appearance, and would insure more effective and efficient use of counsel, court and grand jury time. The Principle does not intend that a detailed description of the statutory and subject areas be required: but that a broad statutory citation or general description of the subject be included. Justice Department representatives have expressed support for this Principle, but indicated concern that, as initially written, the Principle would leave open the question of later challenges to the indictment based on the fact that the defendant was charged under statutes not named in the subpoena. To meet this concern and clarify the Principle's original intent, the Section added the second sentence; this makes it clear that the indictment cannot be vitiated if the person is indicted under a statute or in a subject area not mentioned in the subpoena. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

14. A grand jury subpoena should not be returnable except when the grand jury is sitting. This proposal is intended to avoid potential abuse of the subpoena power by the prosecutor's office. It will help to insure the integrity of the grand jury function. Both the Justice Department and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys support this Principle.

15. Principle Number 15 would mandate stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury—except the deliberations of the grand jury itself. This would represent a logical step forward in grand jury reform, and is not inconsistent with the necessity of maintaining grand jury secrecy. The judge's charge to the grand jury would be recorded, as would the prosecutor's introductory remarks and testimony and questioning of all witnesses. Some 31 states already require recording of all grand jury proceedings other than votes and deliberations, and an additional 6 states permit it, according to a Library of Congress study (printed in 1976 Hearings Record, House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, at 714). Several federal district courts already record all grand jury proceedings—including the District of Rhode Island, the Eastern Ditsrict of Washington, and the Northern District of Illinois. The Ninth Circuit has ruled that a prospective defendant who makes a timely request cannot be arbitrarily denied recordation of grand jury proceedings. [United States v. Thoreson, 428 F.2d 654 (9th Cir. 1970); United States v. Price, 474 F.2d 1223 (9th Cir. 1973)]

Major groups have supported this requirement. The American Law Institute, in its Model City of Pre-Arraignment Procedure, urges that a record be made of all proceedings before the grand jury. The ABA Standards for Criminal Justice on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5[c])—already ABA policy—provide that, "The prosecutor's communications and presentations to the grand jury should be on the record." The accompanying commentary points out that "since grand jury proceedings are generaly secret and ex parte, it is particularly desirable that a record be made of the prosecutor's communications and representations to the jury." The recently-issued Prosecution Standards of the National District Attorneys Association (§ 14.2[F]) also urge that "all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded." Recording will aid the prosecution—by insuring that perjured testimony does not go unpunished. Recording would also act as a restraint on the prosecutor not to exercise undue or improper influence on the grand jury.

The Justice Department indicated during the August 1977 House of Delegates debate that it now would not oppose this Principle. The U.S. Attorneys' Advisory Committee has opposed recordation of prosecutorial comments to the grand jury, arguing that this would "formalize what should be an informal working relationship between grand jurors and government attorneys." (From Position Paper submitted to Section Council, May 14, 1977, at 7.)

It is exactly that "informal" relationship which invites subtle abuses of the grand jury, the ABA believes; that is itself a cogent argument in favor of recordation. The Advisory Committee further argues that a recordation requirement would "impose severe and undue administrative burdens" (Position Paper, supra at 7); and the Justice Department points to unavailability of court reporters in many areas" (House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings Record, supra at 106). There are real benfits to be gained by recording matters before the grand jury—for the prosecution, as well as for the defense. Raising administrative hurdles is not sufficient argument against this proposal, which truly goes to the integrity of the grand jury process.

16. This Principle is identical to National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standard (§ 14.4B) and the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5[b]). It would prohibit the prosecutor from making statements or arguments to influence the grand jury action in a manner which would not be permitted before the trial jury. This is essential because of the prosecutor's role as the only legally-trained person before the lay grand jurors. As the Commentary to the ABA Standards notes, "A prosecutor should not take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury."

Because of the secret nature of the grand jury proceedings, the lack of direct court supervision, and the fact that the prosecutor's is a unilateral presentation, he must avoid unduly influencing the grand jurors by means which would not be appropriate in the public courtroom before a petit jury. This is essential to prevent the grand jury's becoming a mere echo of the prosecution. As one writer has noted, "[G]rand jurors must place enormous trust in the prosecutor's guidance. It is he, after all, who tells them what the charge is, who selects the facts for them to hear, who shapes the tone and feel of the entire case . . ." [emphasis added] [Antell, The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Super-government, 51 A.B.A.J. 153, 154 (1965.)] The Justice Department has also expressed its support for this Principle.

17. Principle Number 17 broadens a prior ABA policy concerning transactional immunity to specify proper instances in which immunity should be issued: when it is in the public interest; when there is no other reasonable way to elicit the testimony; and when the witness has refused to testify, or stated he will invoke the fifth amendment. This is intended to insure that grants of immunity are carefully considered prior to issuance and that they are not issued when other means could be used to obtain the needed information.

The ABA House of Delegates (at the 1975 Annual Meeting) had already supported amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide "transactional" immunity, rather than "use" immunity provided under present federal law. Under transactional immunity, a witness may be statutorily compelled to give testimony which might otherwise violate the privilege concerning self-incrimination, provided the witness is given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony. Under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b), Part V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972), only "use" immunity need be afforded. This merely prevents the prosecution from using the actual testimony (or leads derived therefrom) in any subsequent criminal prosecution.

Some 31 states currently provide transactional immunity, according to the House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings Record, supra. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has supported it, in the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rule 732[b]). "Use" immunity, while constitutional (see Kastigar, supra) should be rejected for several practical reasons. It is not only susceptible of prosecutorial abuse, but can be a subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be an encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. Testimony thus obtained is not accurate. Witness cooperation is essential to an effective grand jury investigation, yet the uncertainty generated by "use" immunity, and the difficulties in determining the scope of the protection afforded the witness, can chill and inhibit his cooperation. Transactional immunity better encourages accurate testimony and minimizes witness resistance to questioning.

The small number of actual successful prosecutions of immunized witnesses with "use" immunity indicates that a return to transactional immunity will not remove a significant weapon against organized crime. [See 14 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 275, 282 (1977), wherein the U.S. Department of Justice reports that, in practice, few witnesses granted "use" immunity are subsequently prosecuted for crimes described in their immunized testimony.] "Use" immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the Constitutional right against self-incrimination, the ABA believes.

18. Several of the grand jury bills pending before the 94th Congress include a provision requiring approval of immunity grants by a majority vote of the grand jury. While many supporters of this provision believe that it would help to insure the independence of that body, the ABA does not support such a requirement. Instead, Principle Number 18 would provide that immunity be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury; the standards outlined in Principle Number 17 would be followed in determining whether such a grant should be made. Lay grand jurors are not adequately oriented to make determinations regarding immunity grants, the ABA believes. This is properly an executive function with court overview.

19. Principle Number 19 would forbid making the granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings a matter of public record before the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause. To make public such grants undercuts the function of the grand jury by selectively publicizing its investigations—and has the definite potential of harm to those to whom immunity is alleged to have been granted. The U.S. Department of Justice has indicated its agreement with this Principle.

20. The question of multiple representation of witnesses in grand jury proceedings has recently received increasing attention both from members of the private bar and from government attorneys. [See, e.g., Cole, Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should be Stopped, 2 Nat'l. J. Crim. Def. 149 (1976); and Speech, May 3, 1977, to Chicago Bar Association on The Perils of Multiple Representation in Criminal Antitrust Proceedings, by Richard Favretto, Deputy Director of Operations, Antitrust Division, U.S. Department of Justice.] Recent court opinions have also tried to grapple with this question. [See, e.g., In Re Investigation Before April 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir. 1976).] Principle Number 20 was substantially rewritten by the Section during the drafting stages to strengthen its provisions, to meet concerns raised by critics of the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room. Opponents of that Principle have focused much of their objection on problems which could arise when one attorney represents more than one witness in a grand jury proceeding.

Principle Number 20 spells out the professional responsibility of an attorney not to continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if conflicts can arise. As originally worded, the Principle provided that, "If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in a grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise." Under the redrafted approved Principle, the burden is initially placed on the defense attorney to assume responsibility for remedying situations when conflicts from multiple representation arise or are likely to arise. If the court finds that this principle is not being followed, however, it would have the authority to order separate representation. The phrase "giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel or his or her own choosing" was added to avoid a situation in which the court summarily excludes certain counsel from representing any witness in the proceeding. Multiple representation is considered to include the following: two or more witnesses in a grand jury proceeding who may have conflicting interests; a witness and a potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding; or a witness whose counsel fees are paid by a third party who is a witness or potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding.

The significant ethical concerns involved in multiple representation when the clients have actual or potential conflicting interests; the potential compromises to the Constitutional guarantee to effective assistance of counsel; and the potential for inhibiting the public's right to an effective grand jury investigation require the private bar to deal seriously with this issue. As Alan Y. Cole noted in a recent article (supra), "To avoid the Scylla of conflict, the defense attorney with multiple clients will likely become engulfed in the Charybdis of ineffective assistance of counsel . . ." The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

21. Principle Number 21 provides that the confidential nature of grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny. Shielding their identity is necessary to prevent unjust harm to witnesses and potential defendants. The practice in some jurisdictions of having witnesses exposed to public and press as they emerge from the grand jury room is an unfair one—it taints the witnesses' reputations by the mere fact of their appearance. The importance of maintaining the secrecy of grand jury proceedings had already been recognized by the Association, when, in its 1975 policy, it urged strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. The Justice Department supports this Principle.

22. The ABA supports legislation which would mandate the court's charging grand jurors orally on impanelling as to their duties and responsibilities; written copies of the charge would then be distributed to the grand jurors for their continuing reference. Detailing to grand jurors their powers, responsibilities and rights will help to insure their comprehensive understanding of their proper role, and will thereby help to strengthen the independence and fair function of the grand jury. Several of the bills pending in the 95th Congress contain such provisions, as does pending legislation in several states. The Department of Justice has indicated its support for this Principle.

23. In adopting Principle Number 23, the ABA goes on record recognizing potential abuses of newspersons who are called as witnesses before the grand jury and then claim a first amendment privilege not to testify. In some prosecutors' offices around the country, office policy already exists forbidding the calling of journalists before the grand jury. As the U.S. Supreme Court has noted, "Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification . . . We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment, as well as the Fifth." [Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, at 707–708 (1972).] Supporting the need for legislation in this area, a Newspaper Guild spokesperson declared in testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings in June 1977, "The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion . . ."

Principle Number 23 is further intended to express ABA concern about the increasing number of instances nationally in which criminal defense lawyers are themselves being subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. Abuse of grand jury subpoenas used against persons having recognized confidential relationships appears to be increasing; this can drive a wedge of distrust between defense attorney and client and has a chilling effect on sixth amendment rights and confidential relationship. The ABA purposely did not go into further detail in this proposed Principle, believing that an expression of Association concern about present abuses of the grand jury vis-a-vis the press and the criminal defense bar would call attention to what appears to be a growing problem. The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

24. In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates opposed amendment of the Recalcitrant Witness Statue [28 U.S.C. 1826 (a)] to reduce from 18 to 6 months the maximum period of confinement on a civil contempt order for refusal to testify before a grand jury. The Criminal Justice Section, in its study of grand jury legislation after the 1975 action, became convinced that this position should be reconsidered, and supported a six-month maximum, as contained in several pending grand jury reform bills. The Section felt that this length of confinement would be sufficient to compel a witness to testify. In June, 1977, the U.S. Department of Justice—softening its original opposition to any change in current law—agreed to support a maximum 12-month confinement. During the ABA House of Delegates debate in August 1977, the Section agreed to support the 12-month maximum as a compromise. While recognizing that abuses have occurred [see Record of 1976 hearings before House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law], the Section believes the ABA-approved 12-month maximum will help to avoid long, punitive confinement. It should be stressed that the Association has previously gone on record supporting legislation to prohibit multiple confinement upon a subsequent refusal by a witness to testify about the same transaction.

25. Rather than specifying proposed sanctions for violation of each proposed grand jury legislative Principle outlined herein, the ABA simply notes that the court should exercise its power to impose appropriate sanctions when the proposed Principles are violated. Such sanctions will obviously be fashioned in any proposed legislation; but it is not the ABA's intent to suggest statutory language.

Conclusion

When the grand jury was created in 12th Century England, it was intended to serve as a shield betweent the citizen and the Crown. In recent years, the grand jury has come under increasing attack: observers charge the grand jury system is riddled with abuse, and is no longer a shield for the citizen but a shield for the government. Critics declare that it has departed from its proper constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecutions.

The American Bar Association—based on the work of the Criminal Justice Section and the C.J.S. chaired by experienced prosecutor Richard E. Gerstein—believes that reforms are needed to insure fairness—but without undercutting the grand jury's legitimate junctions or destroying it as an institution. While objections to these Principles have been raised, resistance to change from those within the criminal justice system cannot in itself be sufficient reason to reject well-considered—and needed—proposals. Efforts to implement the Principles are now needed.

The Congress and many state legislatures are now acting on grand jury reform proposals; professional, media and public focus on this subject cannot be expected to abate. The Association—as in its landmark Standards for Criminal Justice project—has long been in the forefront of criminal justice improvement.

The ABA presents the 25 Principles as a contribution towards helping to fashion well-reasoned, workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

COMPARATIVE SUMMARY OF DIFFERENCES BETWEEN H.R. 94 AND RESOLUTION APPROVED BY THE ABA HOUSE OF DELEGATES, AUG. 9, 1977

	H.R. 94	ABA
I. RECALCITRANT WITNESS
A. Application	Federal court and grand jury witnesses	Grand jury witnesses (No. 24).
B. Initiation	Prosecutor	Prosecutor (comment to No. 24; ABA resolution of August 1975).
C. Procedure	(1) Show cause hearing, (2) with counsel, and (3) 72 hr notice.	No provision.
D. Place of confinement	Federal correctional institution within 50 mi unless witness requests other suitable institution.	No provision.
E. Period of confinement	Not more than 6 mo	Not more than 12 mos (No. 24).
F. Reiterated contempt	Bars use of 28 U.S.C. 1826 or 18 U.S.C. 401 for same witness and same transaction after 1 use of either.	Bars multiple imprisonment of the same witness for the same transaction (No. 24 comment).
G. Bail	Applies 18 U.S.C., ch. 207 unless appeal is frivolous or taken for delay.	No provision.
H. Expedited appeal	Within 30 days	No provision.
I. Applicability of § 3006A	Yes	No provision.
J. Defenses	Questions may not be based on violations of Federal wiretap law.	Supports (ABA resolution of August 1975).
II. IMMUNITY
A. Type	Transactional	Transactional (No. 17).
B. Prosecution permitted	Perjury, false statements, or failure to comply	Same (No. 17 comment; earlier ABA resolution).
C. Procedure
1. Notice	(1) 1 week except in case of special need, (2) scope and nature of immunity, (3) right to counsel and availability of §3006A.	No provision.
2. Authorized to request order	U.S. Attorney with Attorney General's approval.	Prosecutor (No. 18).
3. Witness consent	Not required	Not required.
4. Conditions for issuance	(1) Court determines order is in the public interest.	Same.
	(2) No danger of foreign prosecution	No provision.
	(3) Witness will or has claimed his 5th amendment privilege.	Same.
	(4) Grand jury cases:	No other reasonable way to elicit testimony (No. 17).
	(A) evidence sought is relevant to scope of immunity and inquiry.
	(B) investigation is authorized.
	(C) summary of evidence is provided to the court.
5. Secrecy	No provision	Motion made in camera (No. 18).
	No provision	Granting of immunity secret until indictment or testimony (No. 19).
6. Indictment of immunized witness.	Barred in case of the same grand jury before which the witness testifies.	No provision.
D. Congressional immunity	Attorney General notification repealed	No provision.
III. SIZE OF GRAND JURY
A. Reduced	6 to 15 members	No provision.
B. Selection after failure of sufficient number to appear.	Not from bystanders	No provision.
C. Number required for indictment	2/3 of 9 or more	No provision.
IV. DISCLOSURE CRIMES
A. Unlawful disclosure by those present.	Matters occurring before the grand jury—$500 and/or 6 mo.	Supports (ABA resolution on August 1975).
B. Unlawful disclosure for profit or to obstruct justice.	Matters occurring before the grand jury—$20,000 and/or 5 yr.	No provision.
C. Exceptions	Disclosures ordered by the court, to or by attorney for the government, and by witness or his attorney.	Supports (ABA resolution on rule 6(e)).
	Press exempt from B	Identity of witnesses appearing before grand jury not available to public (No. 21).
V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES
A. Notice to grand jury	Duty to inquire into alleged Federal crimes committed within the district.	Written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations (No. 22).
	Right to independent inquiry	Prosecutor not to make statements or arguments that would be impermissible at trial (No. 16).
	Right to call and question witnesses.
	Right to require production of evidence.
	Subject matter of inquiry.
	Statutes involved.
	Basis for indictment.	Prosecutor not to recommend indictment by grand jury if evidence does not warrant (No. 4).
	Obligation of secrecy.
	Other matters in the discretion of the court.

V. RIGHTS AND DUTIES—Continued
B. Requests to testify	Anyone may request attorney for the government which is forwarded to the grand jury.	Target has right to testify before the grand jury (No. 5).
	Grand jury may refuse to receive evidence.	No provision.
	Targets must be notified of right to request to appear unless result in flight, would endanger other witnesses, or delay investigation.	Targets must be notified unless that would result in flight, danger or obstruction of justice or unless notification not possible.
	Public record or requests to appear maintained.	No provision.
	Witness appearing under request waives his fifth amendment privilege.	Same (No. 5).
C. Duties of attorneys for the government	Advise jury of impeachment or exculpatory evidence.	Advise jury of evidence which would "tend substantially to negate guilt" (No. 3).
	Avoid calling witnesses who intend to assert the 5th amendment privilege.	No provision.
	May not initiate inquiry without additional evidence after earlier grand jury has failed to return indictments.	No provision.
	No provision	Recommend against indictment if evidence does not warrant (No. 4).
	No provision	Avoid presentation of evidence which would be constitutionally inadmissible at trial (No. 6).
	No provision	Avoid use to secure evidence against an already charged defendant, but no bar to inquiry into other crimes or defendants (No. 9).
	No provision	Avoid use to secure evidence for noncriminal proceedings (No. 10 and comment).
	No provision	Make statements to influence jury action which could not be made to a petit jury (No. 16).
VI. INDEPENDENT GRAND JURY INQUIRY
A. Scope	Alleged violations of Federal law within their district.	No provision.
B. Term	18 mo with 6-mo extensions not to exceed 36 mo.	No provision.
C. Special attorney to assist grand jury.	Appointed by court upon request of majority or grand jury.	Opposes (ABA resolution of August 1975).
	Special attorney may appoint assistants.
	Special attorney may assist in conduct of inquiry, prepare and sign indictments, conduct all other phases of related criminal prosecution, obtain material from other agencies, be supplied by GSA, be funded out of Department of Justice appropriations.
VII. RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES
A. Counsel	Witnesses have right to have attorney present to assist them.	Same (No. 1).
	Application of §3006A	Same (comment to No. 1, prior resolution, August 1975).
	Attorney may be present in grand jury room with his client but only to advise client; may not address the grand jury.	Same (No. 1).
	Attorneys may be removed for addressing the grand jury or to prevent delays or impediments.	Attorneys may be removed for conduct inconsistent with limited role (No. 1); court may remove counsel representing multiple witnesses (No. 20).
B. Subpena:
1. Delay between issuance and and appearance.	1 week except for special need or consent of witness.	No unreasonable delays (No. 11); 72 hours unless special need or consent (ABA resolution Aug. 1975).
2. Information in subpena	Right counsel	Same (No. 2).
	5th amendment privilege	Same (No. 2).
	Subject matter of inquiry	Subject matter or statutes involved (No. 11).
	Whether witness is target	Same (No. 2).
	Statutes involved	Subject matter or statutes involved (No. 11).
	Other matters in court's discretion	No provision.
	No provision	False answers constitute perjury (No. 2).

VII. RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES—Continued
B. Supena—Continued
3. Motions concerning subpenas.	Venue in district where issued or served or where the witness resides.	No provision.
	Motion may be made at any time but one not made before appearance must be made where the grand jury is sitting.
	Motion stays requirement for appearance.
4. Grounds for quashing or modifying subpenas.		Court should impose appropriate sanctions for violation of principles which include:
	Evidence sought against one who is already formerly accused.	Grand jury should not be used to gather evidence against a formerly charged defendant (No. 25), (No. 9).
	Witness has previously been held in contempt concerning the same transaction.	Same (No. 24 comment).
	Written notice that the witness intends to claim 5th amendment privilege.	No provision.
	Witness was not advised of his rights	Advised of right to counsel and 5th amendment privilege (No. 2), traget advised of right to appear (No. 5), advised of subject matter or statutes involved in investigation (No. 13), and target advised that he is such (No. 2).
	Compliance would be unreasonable, oppressive and require unnecessary appearance.	Not subjected to unreasonable delay in appearance, unnecessary and repeated appearances, or harassment (No. 11).
	Purpose is punitive	No provision.
	Evidence sought is not relevant or is not within the grand jruy's jurisdiction.	No provision.
	No provision	(e) Grand jury should not be used to gather evidence for noncriminal proceedings (No. 10).
	No provision	(f) Subpenas should not be returnable when the grand jury is not sitting (No. 14).
	No provision	(g) Preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships and comparable values should not be threatened (No. 23), but identity witnesses should not be made public (No. 21).
5. Jurisdictional limitation	Grand jury may only investigate where violation of a substantive criminal law may have occurred.	No provision.
6. Grand jury approval	No provision (assumes jury approval not required).	Jury approval not required for issuance of subpena (No. 12).
VIII. RECORDINGS, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS
A. Recordings	Stenographic or electronic recording of notice of grand jury perogatives, charges and comments of the court, statements of attorney for the government, questioning and testimony of witnesses, interchanges between witnesses and attorneys, but not grand jury deliberations.	Stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury, charges and comments of the court, statements of attorney for the government, questioning and testimony of witnesses, but not grand jury deliberations (No. 15).
B. Witness access	Examine and copy any of witness' statements in possession of the government prior to grand jury testimony.	No provision.
C. Defendant access	Examine and copy after formal accusation: grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial, statement to grand jury by attorneys for government relating to case, other exculpatory or material grand jury evidence.	No provision.
D. Restricted access	Court may deny or restrict disclosure and must preserve record.	No provision.
IX. PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION
A. Right	Defendant is entitled to one after formal accusation except on petty offenses or unless waived.	No provision.
X. REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS
A. To Congress and Administrative Office of U.S. Courts.	By Attorney General at the beginning of each session of Congress.	No provision.

X. REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION—Continued
B. Content	By judicial district: (1) the number and description of grand jury investigations, (2) number of requests and approvals for immunity applications, (3) number of immunity applications, (4) number of immunity applications granted, (5) date, number and duration of grand jury contempts, (6) number of arrests, convictions, indictments, no-bills resulting from immunity grants, (7) description of Justice Dept. use and storage of grand jury information and (8) other information concerning grand juries.	No provision.
XI. GRAND JURY REPORTS
A. Prohibitions	No provision.	Singling out persons to impugn motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism, or address-ing fitness to hold office (No. 8).
B. Procedures	No provision.	All reports submitted in camera with those named afforded an opportunity to move in camera for expungement (No. 8).
XII. OTHER PROVISIONS
A. Effect on other laws	Any other rights or privileges not affected by bill.	No provision.
	Inconsistent provisions of Fed. Rules of Criminal Procedure inapplicable.	No provision.
B. Other rights	No provision.	Unindicted coconspirators should not be named, but bill of particulars unrestricted (No. 7).
	No provision.	Identity of grand jury witnesses should not be made public (No. 21).

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee is adjourned.

GRAND JURY REFORM

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 10:10 a.m., in room 2226, Rayburn House Office Building, the Honorable Joshua Eilberg [chairman of the subcommittee] presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Hall, Evans, Fish, and Sawyer.

Staff present: Garner J. Cline, Arthur P. Endres, Jr., Martin H. Belsky, and Alfred M. Nittle, counsel; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

This is the second in our series of hearings in the 95th Congress on proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system. Last month we heard from witnesses representing the American Bar Association and representing various grand jury reform groups. Today, we are pleased to receive the testimony of prosecutors and former prosecutors, of former grand jurors, and from a District court judge representing the Judicial Conference of the United States. These witnesses should be able to describe for us what, in fact, occurs in the grand jury room and the legal and policy issues surrounding grand jury proceedings.

We hope by our hearings to direct public attention to a long overlooked step in the criminal justice system—the grand jury.

At our hearings during the 94th Congress, and again on March 17 of this year, the subcommittee heard numerous complaints about alleged grand jury abuses and reviewed detailed requests for legislative reforms. A recent television drama, called the "Rockford Files," brought increased public awareness to present grand jury practices and the need for reform. A series of recent cases, involving witnesses allegedly involved in the harboring of Patty Hearst, and witnesses allegedly involved in terroristic activities in behalf of the Puerto Rican liberation movement, have similarly highlighted present Federal grand jury rules. Finally, investigations in New York State as to the propriety of actions by prosecutors and special State grand juries have led to public questioning of the "protective" role of the grand jury.[1]

Recently, the House passed some technical amendments to rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and disapproved some proposed substantive changes to this rule. Rule 6 deals with the authorization of persons to be present in the grand jury room and the need to insure secrecy in grand jury proceedings. Because several proposed provisions of our bill deal with the same provisions, the subcommittee has agreed to consider the possible amendment of rule 6 as part of our total consideration of changes in the Federal grand jury system. We, of course, will work closely with the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, chaired by the distinguished Member from South Carolina, Mr. Mann, on any proposed Federal rules changes.

The focus of our hearings is H.R. 94, the proposed Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, which I have introduced and which has now been cosponsored by 12 Members. Other bills have also been introduced and these alternative proposals will, of course, be considered by the subcommittee. We expect to continue our hearings in future months by receiving the testimony, comments, and suggestions, of other legal organizations, attorneys, citizen groups, judges, businessmen, and prosecutors. The official position of the Department of Justice will also be given at later hearings.

I hope and expect to bring a bill to the floor during this session. We will be able to report out comprehensive legislation this session, and then, working with the Senate, enact needed reforms and changes into law.

First, let me thank all those who are present for their interest and for coming here to Washington to testify before us. This is the first serious attempt to look at the grand jury in the history of our country and what we are doing may have historic connotations.

With that, I would like to welcome to the stand the Honorable Frederick B. Lacey, district judge of New Jersey, representing the Judicial Conference of the United States, together with Carl Imlay.

Will you gentlemen forgive me? I did not see the chairman of our full committee here. Mr. Chairman, will you please come forward and help us?

Mr. RODINO. I don't want to interrupt the committee, but I did want to come here and say hello to my friend, Judge Lacey and welcome him to the committee. I know you have got Mr. Del Tufo in the audience and I thought I'd come and just welcome them. I don't want to take the time of the subcommittee, but you will be interested, I know, in hearing Judge Lacey and Mr. Del Tufo.

Mr. EILBERG. Gentlemen, I know that you have statements and you may read them or summarize them. If you decide to summarize them we can place the statements in the record and we have some questions we'd like to ask after you have concluded.

TESTIMONY OF HON. FREDERICK B. LACEY, DISTRICT JUDGE, NEW JERSEY, REPRESENTING JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES; ACCOMPANIED BY CARL IMLAY, GENERAL COUNSEL, OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE, UNITED STATES COURTS

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: First, I'd like to identify my role. I'm a member of the Supreme Court's Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules and as of approximately February 1, I was appointed by Judge Lumbard, who's chairman of that committee on grand jury procedures. My predecessor was Judge Russell Smith from Montana who I believe appeared before your committee approximately a year ago.

At that time Judge Smith indicated that the Advisory Committee had not considered all of the legislation that was then pending before you section by section and bill by bill, and my presentation suffers from the same disability. Having been appointed recently, I have not had an opportunity to confer with the new committee about H.R. 94 and therefore what I will do will be to combine with a reiteration of what the committee position was on certain precursors of the provisions of H.R. 94 my own reaction to provisions of the legislation.

I will simply say briefly that I have been on the Federal bench for 6 years. I was U.S. attorney for the district of New Jersey immediately prior to that for approximately 18 months and practiced law for approximately 20 years in New York City, New Jersey, and Washington, D.C.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Lacey, if I may interrupt, I hope you will feel very free, even after today, to submit any further reflections or comments on our bill H.R. 94 or any of the other bills that are in the hopper.

Mr. LACEY. I had remarked preliminarily to Mr. Belsky that in informal conversation that I have had with trial judges active on a day to day basis I was somewhat chagrined to find lack of information and lack of understanding and knowledge on the part of trial judges at the Federal level throughout the country about this legislation. I indeed mentioned to Mr. Belsky that it might well be a good project to be undertaken by the Federal Judicial Center to try to complement what the Judicial Conference has been doing and will in the future do; but I wanted to be sure before I brought that up this would not run counter to any program your committee had.

Mr. EILBERG. It would not run counter, but it is our desire in view of the importance of the subject and the abuses that we have been hearing about that have occurred over the years that we move as promptly as we can.

Mr. LACEY. Let me express my appreciation for having been invited to appear here today on a subject that insofar as the criminal justice system is concerned is the most important matter Congress is going to consider in my lifetime. I'm going to deal in summarizing my statement with just a few of the provisions.

Mr. EILBERG. If I may, then at this point I will be glad to accept your statement for the record, unless there's objection. Hearing none, we will make the statement part of the record.

Mr. LACEY. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Hon. Frederick B. Lacey follows:]

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK B. LACEY, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE, DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

I am a United States District Judge from New Jersey and a member of the Supreme Court's Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules.

I was appointed to the Federal bench in February 1971. Prior thereto I was United States Attorney for the District of New Jersey for approximately 18 months. In private practice I was active as a trial lawyer with offices in Newark, New Jersey, New York City, and Washington, D.C.

I appear here today as chairman of a subcommittee appointed by the Advisory Committee chairman, Judge Lumbard, to study grand jury operations and procedures.

As chairman of the grand jury subcommittee, I succeed Judge Russell E. Smith of Montana. Judge Smith appeared before this committee on July 1, 1976 and, in a prepared statement, submitted to you the comments of the Advisory Committee on the various bills and resolutions which were before you at that time. These included the following:

H.J. Res. 46 (Eilberg).
H.R. 213 (Ms. Jordan).
H.R. 1277 (Eilberg).
H.R. 2986 (Conyers).
H.R. 4604 (Conyers; same bill as 2986).
H.R. 6006 (Kastenmeier).
H.R. 6207 (Rangel).
H.R. 10947 (Badillo).

In his presentation Judge Smith noted that the Advisory Committee had issued in November 1975 a preliminary report concerning the Federal grand jury and that this report was before you and set forth at length reasons for proposals relating to the Federal grand jury. Thereafter, Judge Smith then devoted his submission to "those matters which were discussed [by the Advisory Committee] but which did not find their way into definite recommendations to the Judicial Conference." Judge Smith further noted that the Advisory Committee had not considered the then pending bills section-by-section and, for that reason, he was unable to express the Advisory Committee's recommendations on a bill-by-bill and section-by-section basis.

My presentation suffers from the same disability. The Advisory Committee has not had the opportunity to review H.R. 94, nor have I taken up its provisions with my subcommittee. Accordingly, I hereafter set forth the Advisory Committee position on legislative provisions which were precursors of H.R. 94 and my own comments on H.R. 94.

Insofar as my own observations are concerned, I offer them against a background of judicial experience in an active district with a substantial number of trials involving organized crime and political corruption. Additionally, my reflections draw upon my prosecutorial experience in the same environment.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

At the outset, I wish to express to this Committee my appreciation for its invitation to address it on what is probably the most important matter relating to the criminal justice system which the Congress will deal with in my lifetime. Having expressed by graditude at having been invited here, I regret that I must take issue with several provisions of the legislation you are considering. Having review the history of your consideration of grand jury legislation, and the remarks of your chairman and other proponents of this legislation, I fear that you have allowed the "Watergate syndrome" to draw you into concluding that there have been widespread abuses of the grand jury system, which require not mild medicine but rather drastic surgery. I make these comments assured that you want from me a frank and candid statement rather than a half-hearted and diluted analysis of this legislation.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES

Judge Smith commented last year upon H.J.Res. 46 and noted that the recommendation of the Advisory Committee was contained at pages 2–5 of the Committee report. As there stated, the Committee approved that portion of the resolution which continues the investigatory function of the grand jury and the idea in the resolution that there should be some method of charging serious crimes other than by the indictment. The position of the Advisory Committee remains unchanged.

H.R. 94

Sec. 2(a). Recalcitrant witnesses

The Advisory Committee's position remains unchanged. See Report, pages 62–63. It opposes impairment of a grand jury's investigation by (a) reducing the maximum period of confinement for contempt; and (b) barring a second confinement. A witness, granted immunity, nonetheless can frustrate a grand jury inquiry by refusing to testify. Reduction of sanctions is not in aid of the public interest overall.

Sec. 3. Immunity

The Advisory Committee's position is unchanged. See Report, pages 63–65. Thus "use" and not "transactional" immunity is favored. My own observations follow.

My personal view is that this section involves the court in what should not be a matter of judicial concern. By hedging the granting of immunity with so many restrictions to aid a witness who does not want it, the court has been brought into what is essentially an executive decision.

I object to the requirement that the court must be satisfied that the various requirements of the statute have been met, particularly when such nebulous concepts must be evaluated. A hearing will invariably be necessary to determine whether the sought-for testimony "is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto"; and is "relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order"; and that "a grant of immunity . . . would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation." Indeed, the court must even review "a summary of the evidence relating to the witness."

These requirements, which must be met before immunity can be granted, suggest that a subject of a grand jury investigation now has standing to contest a grant of immunity to a witness. If the trial judge errs, grants immunity, and indictment and thereafter conviction follow, is the conferring of immunity an appealable issue?

I respectfully suggest that, to cure the one-in-a-thousand case (e.g., the dissident who does not want to betray a friend, yet who does not want to be imprisoned either), you are adding immeasurably and needlessly to the judicial workload.

Sec. 4. Size of grand juries

This reduction in size of the grand jury and accompanying provisions are in accordance with the Advisory Committee's position. See Report, pages 5–17.

Sec. 5. Violations of grand jury secrecy

Providing for criminal sanctions for violation of grand jury secrecy is in accordance with the Advisory Committee's position. See Report, pages 37–47.

I add my personal concern, related to the right of a witness to have an attorney before the grand jury, over the provision which would allow the attorney, who has been present in the grand jury room to advise a witness, to disclose to others what took place. Thus, if an attorney jointly represents two or more grand jury witnesses, he may freely disclose to each of his clients the testimony of the other or others. No attorney-client privilege is involved, although ethical considerations are. These will be dealt with under the "right to counsel" section. In any case, while it is popular to accuse the prosecutor of violations of grand jury secrecy, my own experience indicates that counsel for those under investigation—or the subjects themselves—are just as often, if not more often, guilty of such violations.

Sec. 6(a). Rights and duties of grand jurors: Independent inquiry

The Advisory Committee has recorded its opposition to so much of this provision as relates to the power of the grand jury to conduct an independent inquiry and to the appointment of an independent prosecutor. See Report, pages 65–66. Its position is unchanged.

In our district I was the grand jury judge and regularly empanelled the grand jury. I favor giving instructions such as those set out at § 3229(a) (1), (3), (4), (7), (8), as well as others of like import. Thus grand jurors are told that their dissatisfaction with the presentation or conduct of the United States Attorney, any questions they have, or any other matters which concern them, may be brough directly to me. On the other hand, when I empanel a grand jury which will consider hundreds of matters, I cannot tell them, as (5) and (6) require, what they will be "investigating." The Advisory Committee has not taken a position on this matter of instructions by the court.

As to § 3229(b)(1) and (2), the Advisory Committee has stated its preference for the present practice under which a person desiring to testify is generally permitted to do so. See Report, pages 51–52. It raises the caution that, under certain circumstances, it will be unwise to notice anyone of a right to testify. This of course suggests an objection to (b)(2)(B).

My own personal view is that the granting of an absolute right to testify is unwise. It requires that "reasonable steps" be taken to give notice of such right. What are "reasonable steps"? While such are being taken, proceedings are delayed. The "safety valve" allowing application to the court for relief from this provision simply adds one more burden to the court.

On the basis of my own experience, very few defendants will take advantage of the notice of the right to testify—except in cases of narcotics investigations, for example—to flee. The people who will accept the opportunity to testify for the most part already know of the right to apply to give testimony. They have retained counsel. They usually are those involved in "white collar" or political corruption cases who know they are under investigation. If it be said that United States Attorneys are recommending rejection of such applications, this is easily remedied. The Justice Department can be called upon to set out guidelines for their offices which require the government attorneys to forward such applications, with a favorable recommendation, to the grand jury.

Section 3229(c) also gives me concern, again because it raises so many problems which will ultimately be laid before the court. The experienced attorney for one under investigation can suggest to the government attorney many things which "might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant." This information may be remote, unreliable, or "a trap." Yet the attorney must pass it on to the grand jury, and under another provision of this legislation, the attorney, whose client has now been indicted, can obtain the record of what the government attorney told the grand jury. The normal grand juror will ask, on the record, for an evaluation. The government attorney, also on the record, may make an erroneous evaluation discounting the significance of the information. This can easily happen. At an early stage, that which "might" exculpate or impeach is not always easy to calculate. What is the result? Is it dismissal of the indictment? Is a hearing required? Are witnesses to be called? Is the defense attorney to be a witness? Clearly the government attorney would have to testify why he did not credit or relay the information. What about one or more grand jurors who, let us assume, may not have voted to indict had they been given the alleged exculpatory or impeaching material? Are they to be witnesses too?

The proposed language includes the words "materially affect." Yet, "material" is undefined. Does it mean that the information would have led to a no-bill rather than indictment? Cf. United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), setting out three standards of "materiality" in varying situations at trial. See also, Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1973). The fact is that in a grand jury context this requirement is vague and impossible to interpret. Every complex fact pattern includes inconsistencies, varying observations, differences in recollection or ability to narrate, and credibility considerations, e.g., Federal Rule of Evidence 608(b) "bad act," or 609 conviction, material, which are not susceptible to easy analysis at the grand jury stage. Moreover, if the government attorney "knows" of such material, then it is a ready step to conclude that he "should" know it. How great is this burden? What are the sanctions if he fails to discharge it? I can envisage too that there will often be a dispute over whether the government attorney did or did not know of the exculpatory or impeaching information.

These are practical questions, yet they have a ring of unreality about them. And the reason why is clear: this provision actually converts a grand jury proceeding into a trial-type proceeding. The burden of proof in the grand jury is that there be legally sufficient evidence before the grand jury, which establishes probable cause to believe that the defendant committed that crime. The function of the grand jury is to decide whether or not the individual is guilty.

This provision would by its terms, require the presentation of all types of purportedly exculpatory evidence, of whatever apparent weight or reliability. Let me give an example. A member of a gang of thieves decides to cooperate with the government. He testifies before a grand jury. The grand jury, under this provision, would be told, in the record, everything impeaching this witness' credibility. Assume he has testified in two other cases in other districts. His cross-examination was relentless. Everything he had ever done in his life was brought out. The transcripts run a few hundred pages. Under your requirement the government attorney would have to bring all this out and, to be safe, bring it out in detail. Why, I ask? At trial it will be available. Why convert the grand jury proceeding into a trial?

No one wants to charge an innocent person with a crime, or to indict where a case cannot be won. The Brady evaluation can be made at trial. The grand jury stage is not the time for it.

Sec. 7. Rights of grand jury witnesses

The Advisory Committee has taken a position opposed to allowing a witness to have counsel in the grand jury room. See Report, pages 53–56. This position stands unchanged.

The Report points out the problems inherent in the proposal. Id. at 54.

My own views coincide. Let us assume that the ordinary witness, having been warned of his privilege against self-incrimination, decides he wants a lawyer, while also taking the position that there is no reason why he should retain one. An indigency hearing must follow. This can go on through a day, requiring indigency hearings and exploration of a witness' financial background, while a jury trial or other judicial business is stalled. Then counsel must be found and another date set for grand jury appearance to allow that counsel to confer with his client and arrange his own schedule so that he can go into the grand jury room. Parenthetically, it is noted that an appointment of a Federal Public Defender for a witness will probably disqualify the former from representing a defendant later in that matter.

I am mindful that this legislation endeavors to restrict a witness' counsel in what he can do in the grand jury room. I respectfully suggest it is impossible to prevent counsel's interference if he seeks to do so.

An "objection" on grounds of "hearsay" or "relevancy" seemingly is still available as is a direction to his client not to answer. Indeed, under his right "to advise the witness," counsel can in fact address the grand jury. Through his client's mouth counsel can make himself heard.

In § 3330A(d) you empower the court to remove counsel and order the witness to obtain new counsel. I question the validity of this interference with the witness' right to counsel of his own choice. On the other hand, the presence of this proviso reflects the well founded concern that there will be obstructionists from time to time who seek to frustrate an investigation. What is the court to do? Contempt is available but that too causes delay.

If removal of counsel is attempted, immediate appeal, with more delay, will follow, or, alternatively, the witness will have to be excused while other counsel is retained and makes himself available.

I raise one more consideration. The phenomenon of joint representation grows; in a grand jury investigation one lawyer in our district recently represented nine witnesses. Let's take an example. A corporation and its top officers are under investigation. Subordinates are subpoenaed. To protect the higher-ups, it is suggested to them they retain the same corporate counsel. This legislation would allow the attorney into the grand jury room to monitor that subordinate's testimony to be sure it is not hurtful to the planned defense.

I would suggest that, if this provision stays, and you continue to believe you can, under certain circumstances, dictate choice of counsel, you consider an opinion I recently wrote in the area of joint representation. You may find it of interest.

Sec. 3330B. Subpenas

Judge Smith last year expressed the Advisory Committee's objection to giving a witness one week's notice, absent a judicial finding of "special need." The position of the Advisory Committee remains unchanged.

My own view of this provision is that it is undesirable in that it will undoubtedly lead to numerous applications to the court on what is generally a trivial matter. Under the present practice, where a subpena issues and it is burdensome or oppressive on the witness, an application can be made to the court by the witness and these matters are resolved by the court readily. The present practice places the burden where it should be. The other provisions of this subsection were likewise addressed by Judge Smith and the Advisory Committee's position is unchanged.

My own view of this subsection is that it is going to create much doubt and confusion and lead to numerous applications for clarification and relief thereunder.

In the first place, what is "adequate and reasonable" notice? Is it sufficient if the "notice" required is embodied in a writing which is served along with the subpena? Can it be done orally? Is a letter to counsel sufficient?

Why every witness, including those who are ordinarily run of the mill witnesses testifying to facts they observe, has to be frightened by being advised of their right to counsel and privilege against self-incrimination is hard for me to discern. The very giving of the warning will lead the average witness to feel that he should obtain counsel, resulting in unnecessary expense to him. The fact that he may apply for appointment of counsel is dealt with under the appropriate subsection.

I can think of no better way to destroy the traditional secrecy which surrounds grand jury proceedings than to require that "adequate and reasonable" notice be given to every witness concerning the subject matter of the grand jury investigation. Moreover, the term itself, that is, "subject matter," is vague and ambiguous. Is it to be defined in terms of persons, areas (e.g., political corruption in Hudson County, etc.) or in some other fashion?

I see no objection to telling a witness whether his own conduct is under investigation. I note, however, that to tell him that on the one hand while advising him of right to counsel and privilege of self-incrimination, is likely to leave him a rather puzzled witness.

This subsection also states that there shall be "adequate and reasonable" notice of "any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary and appropriate." Unless every other subpena is cleared with a court, how will the court be in a position to require notice of "other rights and privileges"?

Still dealing with this subsection, it is noted that a motion relating to a subpena may be made at any time, even after the appearance of a witness before a grand jury. If made after appearance, but is one "relating to a subpena," what relief is available? May such a witness through his attorney move to strike the testimony he has already given? If so, on what grounds may such a motion be made?

The fact that a motion may be made before the return day (which already has a built-in seven-day lead time) and stays the appearance until the court rules, means first of all that in each and every instance a lawyer representing any grand jury witness may, utilizing such motion practice, effectively halt a grand jury investigation. Under this subsection, upon "proper motion," the attorney for the government must make a showing of government compliance with certain provisions. This "showing" motion, I predict, will become almost a reflex on the part of counsel for witnesses. Moreover, there are certain provisions, incorporated in the "showing" requirement that will create problems. Thus, the government must make a "showing" that the evidence sought is "relevant" to the grand jury investigation. What is the standard of relevancy here? How can a judge possibly define this in terms that have any meaning unless he reads a great deal of grand jury transcript? What does "relevant" mean in this context? Is it to be defined in terms of Federal Rule of Evidence 401?

The government must also come forward upon a "showing" motion and actually endeavor to prove a negative, that is, that "compliance with the subpena would not be unreasonable or oppressive." Traditionally, the burden has been on the witness to prove oppressiveness. It should remain this way.

It is also noted that the court may impose appropriate santions to secure compliance with this subsection. Among the sanctions is quashing of subpenas. What, however, as I have already inquired, is the sanction available where the motion is not brought until the witness has testified?

Sec. 8. Recording, transcribing and availability of grand jury proceedings

§ 3333. Recording

The Advisory Committee favors recording "[a]ll proceedings during which a witness is present." See Report, pages 20–28. The statutory provision goes much further. Virtually everything said before the grand jury must be recorded. The costs of complying with this mandate will, of course, be tremendous; however, this is a matter for the Justice Department to discuss. I am concerned with the additional grist thus provided for the resourceful defense attorney, who, to avoid a later 28 U.S.C. § 2255 attack upon his competence, will move for all this material before he will advise his client to plead guilty. You might wish to consider what effect an error in carrying out the mandate of this legislation by either the court or the government attorney will have upon an indictment when a subsequent motion to dismiss is made. For example, let us assume the government attorney advises the grand jury upon the law of conspiracy. Is he required to give essentially the same instruction to the grand jury that the trial judge later must give to the trial jury? If he errs, is it ground for dismissal of the indictment?

Parenthetically, there are many instances now created by this legislation which place before a trial judge matters, at the grand jury stage, which may be claimed to warrant recusal at trial. Has this Committee considered this, and if so, what is its reaction? In the multi-judge districts, only a minor problem is created; however, in the one and two judge district, recusal can be disastrous for the trial calendar in that district.

§ 3334. Availability of grand jury transcripts and other statements

(a) The Advisory Committee has taken no position. I favor this provision.

(b) The Advisory Committee's position is in accord with this provision. See Report, pages 61–62.

(c) The Advisory Committee's position is in accordance with this provision insofar as the testimony of witnesses is concerned. It has not taken a position on the other provisions of this subsection. See Report, pages 47–49. However, it believes that the pre-trial turning over should be subject to withholding, under the direction of the court, of such material upon certification by the government attorney that there is good cause for doing so.

The Advisory Committee has taken no position on (c)(2), (3) or (4).

I am concerned over the turnover required under (c)(2). What is intended? Is it contemplated that the defendant may move for dismissal for some inadvertent misstatement or omission of fact or law? The fact that this is tied to (3) makes this likely.

As to (3), the words "which in any matter could be considered exculpatory" is an incomplete explication of the Brady (and Agurs) standard.

(4) This subsection puts a burden on the court which, in a substantial political corruption or white collar investigation, is intolerable. Defense counsel will automatically move for production of "all other grand jury testimony" and the court will have to review the testimony to determine materiality, against a sketchy background of knowledge of the government's case and probably none of the defense. This gives rise again to the problem of recusal. Does a defendant who, by his motion exposes the court to what may be a great deal of disparaging evidence about the defendant, waive his right to move thereafter for recusal?

This is the appropriate place, I suggest, for a statement that an indictment will not be dismissed for insufficient or incompetent evidence or for reasons suggested by subsections (c)(2), (3) and (4).

Sec. 9. Preliminary examination

The Advisory Committee has taken no position on this matter.

My own concern is that, once again, the reality of our criminal justice system is undetected. Over 90 percent of all criminal indictments result in pleas of guilty, entered after a judicial hearing pursuant to Fed.R.Cr.P. 11. Indeed, it is only because of this high percentage of guilty pleas that we are able to meet the requirements of the Speedy Trial Act, although the adverse impact upon the adverse impact upon the court's civil calendar is severe.

Now you are giving us for each of those guilty plea cases a minitrial. You even require that the examination be conducted by a judge and not a magistrate.

Every lawyer will have to counsel his client to request such a hearing or face a later attack, post-conviction, upon his competence.

Of course, the standard of proof, I assume, is probable cause. Yet that is what the grand jury acted upon. What purpose is served?

Do not be deceived by the thought that these can be handled in a few minutes. Even a relatively simple case can easily run several hours. The costs, the terrible drain on the criminal justice system, lead me to implore you to reconsider your position.

Sec. 9. Grand jury reports

The Advisory Committee has taken no position on this section.

SUMMARY

I predict that this legislation if passed will at least double the amount of time judges currently are spending on their criminal calendar. Congress passed the Speedy Trial Act. We are striving mightily to comply with it. In some districts, e.g., Arizona, as well as others, including my own, civil trials are rare now for many judges. This legislation will aggravate the situation.

Thus, the potential for requiring judicial action is created by—

(a) the necessity for a preliminary examination in each and every case;

(b) the judical review and findings required for every grant of immunity, and appointment of "adequate" counsel;

(c) the various applications the government may make to be relieved of burdens now thrust upon them;

(d) the resolution of problems created by witness' counsel in the grand jury room who advertently or inadvertently interferes with the grand jury investigation;

(e) the resolution by motion of problems of "relevancy" arising from the imposition of that requirement in connection with subpenas;

(f) the "showing" motion permitted every witness under § 3330B(d);

(g) the motion permitted for all recorded material under § 3334(c) and (d);

(h) the post-indictment motions for whatever relief is afforded by this bill;

(i) the necessity for dealing with "exculpatory" problems arising during grand jury proceedings;

(j) motions for appointment of counsel for indigent witnesses.

Again, I thank the chairman, members and staff of the Committee for your invitation and your attention to my remarks.

Mr. LACEY. The Advisory Committee position as stated by Judge Smith a year ago with respect to recalcitrant witnesses, section 2A(f) of H.R. 94, remains unchanged. It opposes impairment of the grand jury investigation by reducing the maximum period of confinement for contempt and barring a second confinement.

With respect to immunity, again, the Advisory Committee position, as stated by Judge Smith, remains unchanged. Use immunity is preferred over transactional immunity.

I would like to deal with one aspect of the immunity provision, section 3, from my own point of view. By hedging the granting of immunity with so many restrictions to aid a witness who, for one reason or another, doesn't want immunity—the court has been brought into what is essentially a decision of the executive department of Government. I find objection, for example, to the requirement that the court must be satisfied that the various requirements of the statute have been met, particularly when such nebulous concepts have to be evaluated. As I see it, a hearing will ultimately be required to determine whether the sought-for testimony is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant thereto, and is relevant to the subject matter of the immunity order and a grant of immunity would be adequate for purposes of the investigation and, indeed, as I construe the legislation, the court would even have to review what is labeled a summary of the evidence relating to the witness.

I suggest that these requirements, all of which must be met to the satisfaction of a judge before immunity can be conferred, suggests that a subject of a grand jury investigation may now have standing to contest a grant of immunity to a witness. If that not be so, why is it required that the judge make findings as to all of these matters?

I raise one other question: If the trial judge errs and grants immunity and indictment and conviction thereafter follow, is the conferring of immunity an appealable issue? I respectfully suggest that to cure the one-in-a-thousand case, for example, the dissident who does not want to betray a friend, yet who does not want to be imprisoned either, you are adding immeasurably and needlessly to the judicial workload.

With respect to size of grand juries, the reduction in size was favored by the Advisory Committee, as you know, Mr. Chairman, and as you know, members of the committee.

With respect to section 5, violations of grand jury secrecy, the Advisory Committee favored, as do I, making violation of grand jury secrecy a criminal offense. I add my personal concern with respect to something that is now opened up by reason of another provision in the legislation affording a witness the right to counsel. The secrecy provision in article 5 exempts from the requirement of nondisclosure an attorney who has been in the court and the jury room to advise the witness. Thus, if an attorney jointly represents two or more grand jury witnesses, he may freely disclose to each of his clients the testimony of the other or others. Moreover, if he is placed there by, let us assume, the president of a corporation under investigation in order to monitor the testimony of subordinates who are testifying before the grand jury, he's under no secrecy requirement at all and may disclose to the president of that corporation or anybody else for that matter what the subordinate testified to before the grand jury. There's no attorney-client privilege involved, although ethical considerations are, and I deal with these, incidentally, in an opinion which I submitted as part of my paper, United States v. Garafola and Dolan.

It's an opinion that deals with the problem that's bedeviling trial judges throughout the country—the matter of joint representation. It's one that trial judges are grappling with not too successfully, but nonethless, I do raise that issue and I thought that in that respect the copy of my opinion might be helpful.

I might say this further, that while it's popular to accuse the prosecutor—and I was one—of violations of grand jury secrecy, my own experience indicates that counsel for those under investigation or the subjects themselves just as often, if not more often, are guilty of such violations.

Section 6(a), I deal with just in highlighting it, because my statement is rather complete on that. For a year I held, just recently surrendering the honor to another judge, the position of grand jury judge in our district. I empaneled the grand jurors, I favor what you require in 6(a); that is, a judge laying out precisely the rights and duties of the grand jury. I think that this has been long needed. Indeed, I think that the Justice Department and the courts bear a great deal of responsibility for the looseness around the country, as I perceived it to be, when I made inquiry when I first took on that assignment, in terms of judges handling this assignment, and so we were very strict about what we laid out to grand jurors.

There are a couple matters I might mention to you that I think are trivial matters but nonetheless I raise them.

Where a grand jury is being empaneled to handle a myriad of cases or investigations, items 5 and 6 of 6(a), more precisely numbered section 3329(a)(5) and (6), cannot be complied with because I can't tell the grand jury what they are going to be investigating. If, on the other hand, it's a special grand jury investigation going into a particular matter, then of course I can.

The matter of permitting a witness subject to investigation to testify, I deal with in my paper. I think I would disagree with the requirement that notice go out to anybody who is the subject of an investigation. Your bill requires that "reasonable steps" be taken to give notice of such right. I might in this regard point out that we have a time problem that I would respectfully bring to the attention of your committee.

Mr. Chairman, the ultimate limits of the Speedy Trial Act set a limit of 30 days from the time of arrest to the time of return of an indictment. In this period of time generally there will be a lag of a week or 10 days before the U.S. Attorney gets things underway. He will then have to take the reasonable steps required to give the notice that is demanded here. Thereafter, if a subpena goes out, as H.R. 94 proposes, where somebody indicates that he wants to testify, a 7-day notice provision must be given. I recognize these are all subject to safety valves on application to the court, but nonetheless, it is a time factor that I thought I would and should bring to the attention of the committee.

I might add that on the basis of my own experience, the person who, having received notice of his right to testify, will apply therefor, will be one in 100, or one in 1,000, or even less. The people generally who want to testify, those involved in white collar and political corruption investigations, know that they are under investigation. They have counsel. They are well advised of their right to apply to testify and those applications are made today.

I'm completely on the track of the committee in this sense. I have always believed that when anybody wants to testify before a grand jury the prosecutor should recommend to the foreman of the grand jury that that person be permitted to do so. I am completely in accord with that view. I recognize that your bill does preserve the right of the grand jury by a vote of a majority to deny the application to testify. I think, however, that on balance I would disagree with the requirement that notice must be given to everybody who is a subject of a grand jury investigation of the right to testify.

Section 3229(c) gives me great concern. It raises so many problems that will ultimately be laid before the court. If I, as an experienced defense attorney, want to create chaos in the grand jury room, you have given me the ticket to do it. I can write a letter to the U.S. Attorney's Office and lay out a laundry list of what I suggest are exculpatory items or items that will reflect unfavorably on the credibility of a witness. Do not underestimate the resourcefulness of those of us who were once defense counsel. I can put myself in the shoes of some of my good friends who are on the other side of the bar these days trying cases for defendants and I can tell you with utmost sincerity that they can bring to a halt the grand jury investigation once they perceive the U.S. Attorney is handcuffed in terms of proceeding with his investigation.

The difficulty is innate, in the legislation which requires that the prosecution advise the Grand Jury of anything that "might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant." This converts the grand jury into a trial proceeding.

I often have difficulty in a post-conviction application when all the evidence is in, in determining whether under Brady v. Maryland, or now as formulated in United States v. Agurs, whether information withheld by the prosecutor was in fact "material" to the case. I can't conceive of how a judge at a preliminary stage, such as grand jury can make the "materiality" determination required in order to assess whether this provision has been violated.

Now, does he have to make that determination?

I assume from the bill that he must make that determination on motion at a certain stage and, if that be so, while he's deciding that motion, nothing happens within the grand jury room. I would urge that very serious consideration be given to withdrawing that provision from the legislation.

I have elaborated on that point in my prepared statement.

Rights of the grand jury witnesses are dealt with by section 7 of your legislation. The ordinary witness is warned of his privilege against self-incrimination. I visualize my friends who receives a warning of his privilege against self-incrimination. He's also told he has a right to a lawyer. He's also told, "we are not investigating you." The latter doesn't give him much comfort. He decides he wants counsel and then he thinks, "well, why should I hire my own attorney?" He's told that he may have counsel appointed for him. We must then take on in court an indigency hearing. I don't believe that in this context very often we will find a witness indigent to the extent that he cannot afford $200 or $300 that a attorney will require to represent a witness at a grand jury hearing. This means then that the witness is going to have to assume this burden in effect thrust upon him by a good motive, but nonetheless, I think that I would draw a distinction between the ordinary witness who has no need for counsel and the target defendant, and I leave that thought with you as well.

As to the matter of counsel, I'm gravely concerned about that provision in the bill. I recognize that you have done everything that you believe is feasible to restrict the ability of counsel, or perhaps the propensity of counsel, to obstruct grand jury proceedings. I submit, however, that inherent in the concept is failure. Counsel has a right to object on the basis of relevancy—is the question within the scope of the grand jury subpoena or the scope of the grand jury investigation as previously defined in the subpena? If counsel doesn't object, he's faced with the possibility that he may have waived a right. Therefore, he' going to object.

Additionally, counsel, while not addressing the grand jury, can, through the mouth of the witness address the grand jury. I recognize that you give us the right to remove counsel where obstreperous or obstructionist tactics are used. I question, however, once the right to counsel is conferred by H.R. 94, whether we have the power to do this. Even if we do, a hearing will be required.

Now while I'm talking about that, I now come back to the Garafola and Dolan opinion that I mentioned. I would urge, Mr. Chairman, that if you and the committee preserve the right to counsel in grand jury and if you also continue to feel that you have the right under certain circumstances to dictate the choice of counsel, that you give consideration to the problem of joint representation.

In a recent grand jury investigation, a lawyer in our district was permitted by the court of appeals to represent nine witnesses who were potential defendants in a grand jury investigation. I have recently been advised in connection with someone who was seeking a copy of my Garafola opinion that there's now an attorney in my district representing 15 persons who are subjects of the grand jury investigation. This is a dreadful problem. It creates all kinds of problems in the bar.

Now in that respect, you will see in my opinion a reference to a statement by Alan Cole who headed the Criminal Section of the American Bar Association. I don't subscribe to what I call his pungent criticism of the bench and bar, but nonetheless, the fact that he, in the position he finds himself, sees the necessity for making the strident comment he makes, underscores the difficulty that we face, and I would leave that with the committee.

Well, I have certainly gone over my 10 minutes and I don't want to take up any more time and I will submit to questions.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Lacey, let me say that unless there's objection, we will put your opinion, United States v. Garafola on the record at this point.

Mr. LACEY. It's been published, but I thought I would leave it with you anyway.

[The opinion referred to follows:]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF,

v.

MICHAEL GARAFOLA AND JOHN DOLAN, DEFENDANTS

United States District Court, District of New Jersey

(Criminal No. 77-1—Opinion)

D. J. LACEY

The problems which can result from indifference to the biblical teaching that "no man can serve two masters," [1] transposed into an attorney's joint representation of two defendants, have now emerged in this matter.

Jointly charged under 18 U.S.C. § 659 (1976), in a one-count indictment, with unlawful possession of chattels stolen from foreign commerce, Michael Garafola and John Dolan were arraigned in this district on January 14, 1977. Each entered a plea of not guilty. Because they were represented by the same attorney, my colleague, Judge Herbert J. Stern, presiding at arraignment, conducted a United States ex rel. Hart v. Davenport [2] hearing. Responding to his questions, defendants and their attorney stated that there was no conflict of interest between the defendants; and the defendants, notwithstanding Judge Stern's advice on their right to separate legal representation, announced that they desired to continue to be represented by their jointly retained attorney there present.[3]

> Refusing to accept or continue employment if the interests of another client may impair the independent professional judgment of the lawyer.
> (A) A lawyer shall decline proffered employment if the exercise of his independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by the acceptance of the proffered employment, except to the extent permitted under DR 5–105(C).

> (B) A lawyer shall not continue multiple employment if the exercise of his independent professional judgment in behalf of a client will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his representation of another client, except to the extent permitted under DR 5–105(C).
> (C) In situations covered by DR 5–105 (A) and (B) except as prohibited by rule, opinion, directive or statute, a lawyer may represent multiple clients if he believes that he can adequately represent the interests of each and if each consents to the representation after full disclosure of the facts and of the possible effect of such representation on the exercise of his independent professional judgment on behalf of each.

On the day of trial, just before jury selection, defendants' counsel advised me that one of his clients, Garafola, had decided to retract his not guilty plea and plead guilty to the charge. A Rule 11, Fed.R.Crim.P., proceeding followed, at which Garafola, in open court, under oath and with counsel present, admitted his guilt in terms which enabled me to find a basis in fact for the guilty plea, which was then and there accepted; and a sentencing date was then set.

Prior to commencement of the Rule 11 proceedings, I had conducted another Davenport hearing. Again, Garafola and Dolan, and their attorney, all flatly stated that there was no conflict of interest; and both Garafola and Dolan reiterated that they wanted the same attorney to continue to represent both of them.

Following the entry of Garafola's guilty plea, the trial commenced against Dolan. The government's testimony, in summary, was that Garafola and Dolan, as railroad co-workers, had been arrested by a railroad detective while in the act of removing stolen television sets from an abandoned trailer, described by a government witness as a "well-known stash." One government witness testified that, an instant before the arrest, Dolan had picked up from the floor of the "stash," one of the stolen sets.

Following my denial of his motion for judgment of acquittal, Dolan took the stand as the first witness in his own defense. He testified that he was in the abandoned trailer and was about to pick up a television set to remove it therefrom when he was placed under arrest. He denied knowing that the set was stolen. He was, he said, simply assisting Garafola, who had asked Dolan to help him, Garafola, "get the television sets back." It was obvious from the testimony thus presented that Dolan's defense would be that, while he may have possessed the stolen property, he lacked that state of mind requisite for guilt under 18 U.S.C. § 659. The trial day ended while Dolan was on cross-examination.

Upon the resumption of trial the next day, I conducted a further inquiry into the conflict of interest problem. Dolan's attorney stated that he saw no ethical impropriety in his representation of Garafola and Dolan, before or during trial; that Garafola could in fact exculpate Dolan; but that he had decided not to call Garafola as a witness because he would not make a "good" impression.

The government, on the other hand, indicating that it was going to call Garafola as a rebuttal witness, had him in court under subpoena. I asked defense counsel what he intended to do when Garafola was called. He responded that he did not think that Garafola should testify, having not yet been sentenced, particularizing that Garafola would doubtless consult him about his, Garafola's, rights, and that he would advise Garafola of his fifth amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination.

I then inquired of counsel whether any advice he now gave Garafola would be rendered by his acting solely in Garafola's interest, or would be influenced, even slightly, by his continuing representation of Dolan. Indeed, I found it further of interest to speculate on how, if Garafola, contrary to his counsel's advice, decided to testify, the latter could cross-examine Garafola while still representing him in connection with the upcoming sentence. Counsel responded by stating that he still perceived no conflict of interest between Garafola and Dolan and saw no reason why he could not continue to represent Dolan effectively.

Because I am granting defendant's motion for mistrial for reasons unconnected with the issue of joint representation, I have the opportunity of implementing and enforcing what I regard, under the circumstances, as the appropriate standard of legal representation in a criminal case. I find that present counsel cannot effectively represent both Garafola and Dolan, and I am directing that he withdraw from representing either of them. Counsel and the two defendants are to appear before me on a date to be set, at which time the matter of future legal representation will be resolved.[3a]

What has occurred requires comment. The trial judge is placed in a difficult position when, at arraignment, he is confronted with joint representation by defendants' counsel. The Davenport inquiry, by and large, is an ineffective charade. The judge and counsel know the purpose of the inquiry: to forestall a convicted defendant from later successfully urging on appeal that he did not at trial have effective assistance of counsel. Put in other words, it is done to construct a predicate for claiming later that there has been a waiver of a constitutional right. For reasons I shall explicate, it fails utterly as a means of assuring an informed consent from jointly represented—and unsophisticated—defendants.

[3a] On Mar. 15, 1977 counsel appeared before me to state that Garafola was obtaining new counsel but that Dolan continued to want present counsel to represent him. I advised counsel that I am adhering to my original ruling.

In the recently decided Matter of Grand Jury Empaneled January 21, 1975, 536 F. 2d 1009 (3d Cir. 1976), the court of appeals stated that, as is the case with other constitutional rights, "the Davenport right may be waived." Id. at 1012. The court went on to find that "a waiver is exactly what the district court elicited from each of the appellants at the hearings conducted in this case." Id.[4] With all deference, I question whether there can be a waiver in the Johnson v. Zerbst sense.[5]

Many trial judges are concerned about the ability and capacity of any defendant knowingly and intelligently to waive his sixth amendment right to the effective assistance of counsel within the context of a Davenport inquiry into joint representation. The average defendant cannot possibly understand fully and completely the extent to which his counsel's trial strategy may be affected by his representation of other defendants. Moreover, what of the situation, not uncommon, where a "strong defendant" thrusts his own attorney upon a "weak" co-defendant? The latter does not dare indicate his displeasure with the joint representation. In simple terms, the Davenport inquiry, to the extent it is directed at the defendants, is a futile exercise. There can be no real waiver.[6]

Respectfully it is submitted that the trial judge cannot conduct a meaningful inquiry. He does not know the case. He cannot know the facts or the inferences which may be fairly drawn from them. He is unaware of the quality of the witnesses and the trial strategy the government and the defendants will pursue.

I do not join in Mr. Cole's pungent criticism of the bar and bench; however, it is deserving of reflection that a leading member of the bar, active in the defense of criminal cases, finds the situation warrants such candid comment. Nor can he inquire into the defense without violating defendant's fifth and sixth amendment rights; and this is so whether the interrogation is held in open court or in camera. He is restricted to imparting vaguely contoured, abstract advice on a doctrine as to which the lawyer then and there present has undoubtedly already advised his clients. Indeed, the attorney's words will have more meaning to the defendants because they are not empty abstractions but related to the facts of the case. He has already told his clients that there is no conflict in their interests. Thus, when the defendants answer the court's inquiry, they actually are relying upon the advice received from their lawyer. If he tells them there is no conflict and that he can effectively represent them, how can their responses to the court be deemed to amount to a Johnson v. Zerbst waiver of their sixth amendment to effective aid of counsel? Cf. Fay v. Noia, 372 U.S. 391 (1963).[7]

[4] Other circuits have also adopted the principle that effective assistance of counsel can be waived in a joint representation situation, United States v. Garcia, 517 F.2d 272 (5th Cir. 1975), after holding "defendants may waive the right to conflict-free assistance of counsel," detailed the procedure a trial judge should follow in advising "of the potential dangers of representation by counsel with a conflict of interest." [6] In a paper adapted from a speech given at the National College of Criminal Defense Lawyers and Public Defenders in Houston, Tex., on June 24, 1976, Alan Y. Cole, Esq., Chairman of the Section of Criminal Justice, American Bar Association, has stated, after discussing the Third Circuit [536 F. 2d 1009 (1976)] and District of Columbia Circuit [531 F. 2d 600 (1976)] cases,

> This is a dismal scene. The attorney conduct involved in these cases is hardly of a nature that enhances the image of the profession. It does not reflect respect for the principles underlying the canon of ethics. It suggests that self-regulation is essentially non-existent. The judicial response is likewise unsatisfactory to a society which is already disenchanted with its lawyers and its courts.

Cole, Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should Be Stopped 9–10 (unpublished) (footnote omitted).

[7] See Circuit Judge Lumbard's concurrence in United States v. Carrigan, supra, note 4, at 1058:

> It would be a rare defendant who could intelligently decide whether his interests will be properly served by counsel who also represents another defendant. However parallel his interests may seem to be with those of a co-defendant the course of events in the prosecution of the case, the taking of a guilty plea, or the conduct of the trial may radically change the situation so as to impair the ability of counsel to represent the defendant most effectively. Even defense counsel, who all too frequently are not adequately informed regarding the evidence available against their clients, may not be in a position to judge whether a conflict of interest between their clients may develop.

Even when the government is compelled to outline its prospective proofs, the problem remains. Cf. Abraham v. United States, Nos. 603, 625, 655, 735 (2d Cir., filed Jan. 21, 1977), a proceeding brought under 28 U.S.C. § 2255, challenging, on deprivation of effective assistance of counsel grounds, a conviction upheld in United States v. Sisca, 503 F. 2d 1337 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1008 (1974). In Abraham the Court of Appeals details and approves District Judge Bryan's joint representation inquiry. Slip opinion at 1513–15.

The reasoning supporting the "waiver" doctrine in this context of joint representation seemingly is founded upon an analysis of the sixth amendment from which there emerges the concept that, because there is a right to waive counsel altogether, Farretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975), there is also a right to waive effective assistance of counsel. Like so many seemingly simple truths, this one has its frailties. The absolute, that is, counsel or none, as is so often the case, is easier to define and deal with than the relative, that is, is one counsel or another better able to represent the defendant. A trial judge can quite readily advise a defendant on the wisdom of proceeding with counsel, the bases for his advice and the pitfalls which a defendant will encounter absent counsel. On the other hand, in view of the limitations already alluded to in this opinion, the joint representation inquiry falls far short of assuring a knowing and intelligent waiver. Cf. United States v. Paz-Sierra, 367 F.2d 930, 932 (2d Cir 1966).

The efficacy of a trial judge's joint representation inquiry is largely a function of how the attorney views his role. As I have stated, the responses of the jointly represented defendants will in reality be their attorney's response. Predictably, once they state there is no conflict, and that they desire his continued representation, he too will advise the court there is no conflict in his representing the two or more defendants involved.

Clearly, then, it is primarily, if not exclusively, the responsibility of the attorney to avoid joint representation which has any possibility, no matter how remote, of a conflict of interest. If he is representing > multiple clients having potentially differing interests, he must weigh carefully the possibility that his judgment may be impaired or his loyalty divided if he accepts or continues the employment [and he is to] resolve all doubts against the propriety of the representation.

Code of Professional Responsibility, Ethical Consideration 5–15.

See also ABA Standards Relating To The Defense Function, § 3.5(b), at 159, 211 (Approved Draft 1971), which state that the > potential for conflict of interest in representing multiple defendants is so grave that ordinarily a lawyer should decline to act for more than one of several co-defendants except in unusual situations when, after careful investigation, it is clear that no conflict is likely to develop and when the several defendants give an informed consent to such multiple representation.

The next question to be put is whether joint representation should be allowed, no matter how remote the possibility of a potential conflict of interest. Unfortunately, no matter how thorough an attorney's investigation, he may not be aware of those facts which suggest the possibility of a conflict. As was stated by Judge Lumbard, concurring in United States v. Carrigan, 543 F.2d 1053, 1058 (2d Cir. 1976):

> It is a rare defendant in a criminal case who fully advises his own counsel of all he knows about the charges against him. Accordingly, most counsel must operate somewhat in the dark and feel their way uncertainly to an understanding of what their clients may be called upon to meet upon a trial. Consequently, counsel are frequently unable to foresee developments which may require changes in strategy.
> It follows that there will be cases where the court should require separate counsel to represent certain defendants despite the expressed wishes of such defendants. Indeed, failure of the trial court to require separate representation may, in cases such as this, require a new trial, even though the defendants have expressed a desire to continue with the same counsel. The right to effective representation by counsel whose loyalty is undivided is so paramount in the proper administration of criminal justice that it must in some cases take precedence over all other considerations, including the expressed preference of the defendants concerned and their attorney.
> Our burgeoning criminal calendars and the need to try a larger percentage of criminal cases under the provisions of the Speedy Trial Act and court rules for the prompt disposition of criminal cases have made it all the more necessary for our federal trial courts to take all measures to avoid the necessity for the retrial of multi-defendant cases. One such measure is to require separate counsel for each defendant in a multi-defendant case.

See also United States v. Mari, 526 F.2d 117, 119–21 (2d Cir. 1975) (Oakes, C. J., concurring).

That there is much wisdom in the suggestion made by Judge Lumbard that there be "separate counsel for each defendant in a multi-defendant case" (543 F.2d at 1058) is further underscored by the fact that it is not possible to "anticipate with complete accuracy the course that a criminal trial may take. Fryar v. United States, 404 F.2d 1071, 1073 (10th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 964 (1969), which also notes "the practical difficulty for a trial judge to determine the existence of a conflict of interest between co-defendants without encroaching upon the fifth amendment." Id.

See also American Bar Association Standards Relating to the Defense Function, supra, at 214:

> the risk of an unforeseen and even unforeseeable conflict of interest developing is so great that a lawyer should decline multiple representation unless there is no other way in which adequate representation can be provided to the defendants.

While it may be contended that what amounts to a per se rule barring joint representation in a criminal case intrudes upon a defendant's right to choose his own counsel, it is well established that the right is not an absolute one. Indeed, Matter of Grand Jury Empaneled January 21, 1975, supra, 536 F.2d at 1012, indicated "without deciding" that, in the context of grand jury representation > the government may obtain, in appropriate circumstances, judical interference with private arrangements for multiple legal representation of witnesses called to testify before a grand jury, on the theory that the multiple representation impedes the effectiveness of the grand jury investigation.

Cf. In re Gopman, 531 F.2d 262, 268 (5th Cir. 1976); Pirillo v. Takiff, 341 A.2d 896, 900–05 (Pa. 1975), appeal dismissed and cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1083 (1976).[8]

The trial judges are in need of guidance in this delicate and sensitive area.[9] Until it is forthcoming in the form of a rule of the Supreme Court,[10] or a directive from our court of appeals in the exercise of its supervisory power, it would seem that no case of joint representation should be permitted unless counsel can state that he knows all of the facts of the defense; that he is totally aware of the government's case; that there is absolutely no possibility, however remote, of a conflict arising in his joint representation of the defendants; and that his analysis and response are made with a total understanding of the canons and rules applicable to attorneys engaged in joint representation of defendants in a criminal case.

Should it later develop, as the proceeding moves to trial, that counsel has misstated the situation, disciplinary measures should be pursued by the offended trial judge.

It follows that the same rule should apply where one or all of the jointly represented defendants intends to, or does, plead guilty. As Circuit Judge Oakes stated in his concurrence in United States v. Mari, supra, 526 F.2d at 120:

> The problem is that even where as here both codefendants pleaded guilty there are frequently potential conflicts of interest. . . . [T]he prosecutor may be inclined to accept a guilty plea from one codefendant which may harm the interests of the other. The contrast in the dispositions of the cases may have a harmful impact on the codefendant who does not initially plead guilty; he may be pressured into pleading guilty himself rather than face his codefendant's bargained-for testimony at a trial. And it will be his own counsel's recommendation to the initially pleading co-defendant which will have contributed to this harmful impact upon him. . . . [I]n a given instance it would be at least conceivable that the prosecutor would be willing to accept pleas to lesser offenses from two defendants in preference to a plea of guilty by one defendant to a greater offense.

Moreover, the aforesaid rule is also called for when the joint representation comes about by virtue of each defendant being represented by attorneys associated with each other in practice. See Code of Professional Responsibility (New Jersey Disciplinary Rule) DR5-105(D), n.3, supra.

[8] See the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(b): "The United States magistrate or the court shall appoint separate counsel for defendants having interests that cannot properly be represented by the same counsel . . . ." The District of Columbia Circuit, recognizing that "the burden placed on the trial judge by the Act, to decide before trial whether separate counsel for co-defendants are required, is an exceedingly onerous one," requires that separate counsel be appointed for each defendant initially. Ford v. United States, 379 F.2d 123, 125–26 (D.C. Cir. 1967). Counsel have the right later to apply to the court to allow joint representation. Id.

[9] In Matter of Grand Jury Empaneled Jan. 21, 1975, supra, the court referred to the trial judge's barring of an attorney's joint representation of nine grand jury witnesses as "draconian," 536 F.2d at 1012, meaning, of course, harsh, severe, or rigorous.

[10] The Supreme Court Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules is presently considering a rule requiring judicial inquiry into joint representation.

A suggested form to be signed by counsel who jointly represents multiple defendants in a criminal case is annexed as Appendix A to this opinion. The judge, of course, is not relieved thereby of making the Davenport inquiry.

In conclusion, it is appropriate to quote again from the earlier cited paper by Mr. Cole:

> Reliance upon the right to select counsel is not a very persuasive factor in this context. There are more than enough good defense lawyers to go around. Though multiple representation does not permit some saving in fees, it does not appear that this factor is the principal motivation in the many cases in which this conduct occurs.
> A more realistic analysis of these situations suggest that multiple representation is more often prompted by the desire to keep certain persons in "friendly" hands. What better way can there be for an attorney to learn what a witness or codefendant will say or do than by representing such a person? Indeed, by representing him, an attorney not only will know what he will say or do; he will even be able to guide him. Such a witness will remain "friendly," because his attorney will keep him that way.
> This may be advantageous to the attorney's principal client, but is it fair to the other clients? Will an attorney who is representing multiple defendants be as aggressive in seeking a plea bargain for Client No. 2 as he would be if Client No. 2 was his only client? Would he even consider obtaining a grant of immunity for Client No. 3 when that client's testimony might affect the destinies of Clients Nos. 1 and 2? Because conflict is generally inherent in any criminal proceeding involving multiple defendants, it is generally impossible for one lawyer zealously to represent more than one client in any such proceeding. To avoid the Scylla of conflict, the defense attorney with multiple clients will likely become engulfed in the Charybdis of ineffective assistance of counsel.[11]

As I have already noted, I regard it highly significant that a leading member of the criminal defense bar would regard the matter of joint representation in criminal cases as requiring presently that he express himself in such critical terms. It would seem that the time is at hand when serious consideration must be given to the issues raised by this case. The responsibility lies with bench and bar alike.

Reverting to the specific issue raised herein by Garafola's decision now to retain separate counsel, the position of conflict in which defense counsel knowingly placed himself from and after arraignment continues to persist. This is so for several reasons. Simply by way of example, should Garafola be called as a witness by the United States upon re-trial, how can he be cross-examined effectively by his former attorney without intruding into matters protected by the attorney-client privilege.[12] Moreover, what is to be done if Dolan wishes to waive the attorney-client privilege but Garafola does not? What is present counsel then to do? A myriad of equally complex questions are presented, simply because counsel did not, when he first ascertained all of the facts of the case, exercise that prudence which was required. Accordingly, I adhere now to my ruling of March 10, 1977, and order that Dolan retain new counsel to represent him at re-trial.

FREDERICK B. LACEY,
U.S. District Judge.

DATED: March 16, 1977.

APPENDIX A

I, _____ a member of the Bar of _____, appear to represent jointly the following defendants:

1. _____
2. _____

I have thoroughly investigated the facts of this case and am aware of the facts as they will affect each of the defendants I represent. I have also considered what the theory of the United States may be in the prosecution of this case, the witnesses it may call, and the trial strategy I will follow.

Moreover, the foregoing elements have been considered in the light of the ethical considerations presented by the New Jersey Disciplinary Rules, including but not limited to DR5–105, the Canons of Professional Ethics, and the American Bar Associations' Standards Relating to the Defense Function, including but not limited to § 3.5, and the commentary thereto.

I represent to the court that, having given full consideration to the foregoing, I am certain that there is no conflict in interest between the defendants I represent.

I recognize that should later events disclose that my assessment of the matter of conflict-in-interest was in error, I may be subject to court-imposed or other sanctions as may be deemed appropriate under the circumstances.

I further state to the court that I have conferred with each of my clients, discussed with them the facts of the case, their own status alone and as it may be affected by the status of the others I represent, and the trial strategy I plan to pursue, including the witnesses I plan to call. I have also advised them of their right to separate counsel; however, I have advised them that I presently perceive no conflict in the interest of any one defendant as against any other defendant jointly represented by me.

_____,
Attorney for the defendant.

DATED:

Mr. EILBERG. Before proceeding to question you, after your very lucid and forceful presentation, I'm wondering if Mr. Imlay has any formal statement or any comments that he wishes to make at this point. We have questions for you, also. What is your pleasure?

Mr. IMLAY. I would be very pleased to defer to Judge Lacey for the questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. All right. I believe we do have some questions for you, Mr. Imlay, in addition to some for Judge Lacey. We do have your statement and, without objection, we will put your statement in the record at this point, Mr. Imlay.

Mr. IMLAY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Imlay follows:]

STATEMENT OF CARL H. IMLAY, GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS

I am Carl H. Imlay, General Counsel of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

I appear here today to express some views on behalf of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts on H.R. 94 and related grand jury measures. I should emphasize at the outset that the Judicial Conference of the United States has not had the opportunity to study and comment on most aspects of these bills, and therefore my testimony does not necessarily express a judicial consensus in these matters. I do, however, want to be helpful in expressing the thoughts of my own office.

The Judicial Conference of the United States has spoken to those features of H.R. 94 which were present in two precursor bills, H.R. 1277 and H.R. 2986 of the 94th Congress, as is reflected in the following extract of the report of its session of September 1975, to wit:

"LEGISLATION REGARDING THE GRAND JURY

"The Committee reported that the Conference's views had been requested on two bills pending in the Congress, H.R. 1277 and H.R. 2986. These bills would effect radical changes in grand jury practices and procedures permitting any grand jury to turn itself into an independent grand jury operating independently of the Department of Justice and would permit witnesses the right to assistance of counsel while testifying before grand juries. The Conference agreed with the committee recommendation in disapproving each of the two pending bills."

I should like to address various other features of the bill seriatim.

SECTION 2. RECALCITRANT WITNESSES

The proposal to amend 28 U.S.C. § 1826 describes the procedures to be followed in civil contempt proceedings. Section 2(a) has no bearing on the alternative criminal contempt remedy under 18 U.S.C. § 401 or procedures on criminal contempt under Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Compare Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966), with Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373 (1966).

With respect to the procedures set forth in proposed Section 1826(a)(2), we see no basic problem. Hearings are already being held on civil contempt in such situations, and attorneys do appear. Where the charged witness is without funds, it is the policy of the Judicial Conference that an attorney shall be appointed for him and compensated pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3006A.

However, we have serious difficulty with proposed Section 1826(a)(3), which allows 72 hours' notice to the witness who has refused to testify. This provision would allow a witness to bring a grand jury proceeding to a standstill for three days or more until a hearing before a judge could be scheduled. Since a witness charged with civil contempt can purge his contempt at any time by compliance with the court order in question, this delay would give a contumacious witness the power to delay grand jury proceedings without valid cause, and if the term of a grand jury were about to expire, perhaps he could thereby escape testifying altogether. While the court can create exceptions to the 72-hour rule on application of the government, this sort of extra appearance at which a showing of special need must be made would itself create a delay of several days. We therefore recommend the deletion of subparagraph (3), leaving that procedural subject matter to rulemaking.

With respect to Section 1826(b)(1), we have no problem with the first sentence inasmuch as it is addressed to the Bureau of Prisons and the United States marshals. However, we urge the deletion of the second sentence, which requires the judge to order confinement at a specific institution. This decision is a prerogative of the Attorney General, who is otherwise charged by law with making such determination of availability and appropriateness of prison facilities.

Section 1826(b)(1) and (2) place limitations on confinement, which are matters of policy upon which I shall not attempt to comment.

The provision for bail at proposed Section 1826(c) adopts the provisions of the criminal code in this respect and thereby largely removes the distinction between civil and criminal contempt which was established by the Supreme Court in Shillitani v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966). The use of the civil contempt remedy is to compel prompt testimony and not to punish (an objective left to the criminal contempt remedy). If, as suggested in Section 1826(c), a witness is given an absolute right to bail pending appeal of the district court order affecting him, he could frustrate the grand jury's inquiry to the point of rendering it useless. This might well be the result even though bail could be denied if "it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay". A mere notice of appeal would not reflect this kind of determination, and thus bail or release under the presently proposed language would effectively become a matter of absolute right. Furthermore, this bail provision borrows the Bail Reform Act provisions of 18 U.S.C. §§ 3146 and 3148, which are in some respects inconsistent with the civil contempt remedy. Finally, the section fails to take into account the witness' status if, after appeal, he files a petition for a writ of certiorari.

We would therefore strongly suggest that all of subsection (c) of proposed Section 1826 be deleted and the following substituted:

> "Any person confined pursuant to this section may take an appeal. The appeal shall be heard expeditiously, without the necessity of briefs, after reasonable notice to the attorney for the government, upon such papers, affidavits, and portions of the record as the parties shall present or which may otherwise be of record. The court of appeals or a judge thereof may order the release of the appellant pending the appeal on bail or otherwise, and may impose such conditions on release as may be appropriate, including a condition that the appellant remain under the supervision of a designated person or organization agreeing to supervise him."

This language would adopt the abbreviated form of appeal of Rule 9 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. It would make bail a matter of judicial discretion, rather than of right, and would allow the use of third party release supervision by a pretrial service agency (see 18 U.S.C. § 3154) or by any other public or private supervisory agency.

With respect to the appointment of counsel, proposed Section 1826(d) suggests that counsel "for any person unable to obtain adequate representation" may be "appointed as provided in section 3006A of title 18, United States Code." This not only fails to provide for compensation to the attorney but is also so broad as to apparently include persons who are not financially disabled but who cannot find an attorney "adequate" in their own judgment.

In order to assure compensation of counsel provided under the "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977" and to provide guidance as to the amount of compensation, it is suggested that the amended Section 1826(d) of Title 28 and Section 6002(c) and 3330A(b) of Title 18 should both be further amended to provide specific provisions as to compensation. An alternative method would be to include as Section 7(c) to the Grand Jury Reform Act, an additional amendment to the Criminal Justice Act, Section 3006A, which might read as follows:

"(c) Section 3006A(d)(2) of Title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after the last sentence thereof, the sentence: "For representative of a witness, pursuant to Section 1826(d) of Title 28, or Section 3330A or 6002(c) of Title 18, the compensation to be paid to an attorney shall not exceed $400.'"

AMENDMENT OF WIRETAP STATUTE

We have no comment on Section 2(b) of the bill, which would extend the exclusionary rules to civil and criminal contempt cases.

GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

Section 2(c) of the bill is apparently intended to preclude dual civil and criminal contempt penalties for the same acts of contempt. The difficulty is that this statutory jeopardy provision goes beyond questions relating to the same transaction and uses the term "set of transactions." Such a term could apparently mean that, if a bookmaker is once held in contempt for failure to respond to questions concerning certain gambling transactions, he could not thereafter be cited for refusing to answer as to other perhaps unrelated gambling transactions if the term "set of transactions" is intended to mean, "series of transactions." I suggest substitution of the term "related transactions" to effectuate the apparent purpose of this section to prevent harassment.

WITNESS IMMUNITY

Section 3 of the bill would extend transactional immunity to witnesses called to testify pursuant to 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002 and 6003, a policy about which I will not comment at this time. We do note that Section (b) suggests that an application to the court can be made to consider special need to require a witness to testify without the usual week's notice to him. This kind of emergency hearing would be extremely inconvenient for the court to schedule on such short notice, and we suggest the deletion of such provision.

Subsection (c) requires that a person presiding over an inquiry (including agency and congressional hearings) shall advise the witness of the nature and scope of the immunity from criminal prosecution, and of the right of the witness to be represented by counsel "in any proceeding" challenging the order or confinement or fines, and that "if he is unable to obtain adequate representation, counsel will be furnished for him as provided in section 3006A, title 18, United States Code."

Aside from the policy issue of assigning this function to any agency as defined in present 18 U.S.C. § 6001(1), the right to counsel is unclear, as it applies to a right "in any proceeding" which could presumably include civil and administrative proceedings, as well as to Federal criminal proceedings covered by the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A. The section does not indicate any source of payment for such counsel in proceedings not encompassed by the Criminal Justice Act, and therefore the proposal is at variance with the terms of that Act, i.e., 18 U.S.C. § 3006A.

Moreover, the Criminal Justice Act does not now provide for the appointment of counsel for a person "if he is unable to obtain adequate representation", but for a "person financially unable to obtain representation", a phrase with a significant difference. We suggest either that some additional independent funding provision be substituted, or if so intended, that the Criminal Justice Act be amended to reconcile the two statutes. We suggest deletion of (c).

SIZE OF GRAND JURIES

The principle of reducing the grand jury in size has considerable support, and the instant proposal was endorsed by the Judicial Conference Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law.[1] A panel of 23 is administratively unwieldy, costly, and unnecessary. As a matter of fact, the actual number of grand jurors which sat on a grand jury in session in Fiscal Year 1976 was 19.9, while some sat with only 16, the number necessary for a quorum under the present law.

A grand jury of not less than nine nor more than 15 would be easier to assemble and therefore could go about its business more expeditiously. This would ease some of the problems imposed by the Speedy Trial Act, which would by July 1, 1979, demand return of an indictment within 30 days following the arrest (18 U.S.C. § 3161(b)).

Our experience is that it is easier to summon a smaller panel than a larger one from throughout the larger districts.

The necessity of concurrency by two-thirds "of those present" may be ambiguous (e.g., suppose 11 or 13 grand jurors were in attendance). This number might be stated in absolute figures to resolve doubt.

We also suggest that the provision that the marshall summon additional jurors "from the body of the district, etc.," if less than nine appear, be deleted, and the following be substituted:

> "If less than nine of the persons summoned attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury and the court shall order that an additional number of persons be summoned to complete the grand jury in a manner ordered by the court in accordance with procedures set forth in section 1866 of title 28, United States Code."

This would bring the procedure into line with the comparable situation under the Jury Selection and Service Act where shortages of petit jurors exist.

UNAUTHORIZED DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY INFORMATION

We have no specific comment on proposed Section 1512, imposing penalties on violations of grand jury secrecy. Our lack of comment, however, is based on our interpretation that subsection (g) preserves the power of courts, through rules and orders, including the Free Press-Fair Trial Guidelines of the Judicial Conference (45 F.R.D. 391) to insure constitutional trials by fair and impartial juries and to prohibit disclosures dehors the record of the trial.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF GRAND JURORS; INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

We have no particular over-all positions on proposed Section 3329 with some exceptions, such as the reference to independent inquiries discussed hereafter. Also we might note that in the life of a grand jury hundreds of matters might be brought before it, and therefore such a body in a busy court could not usually be informed at impanelment of "the subject matter of the investigations" (5), or the criminal statute or statutes involved (6).

Our major objection is to Section 3329(e), which would preclude a second grand jury inquiry following an ignoramus returned by a first grand jury, "unless the court finds, upon a proper showing, that additional evidence relevant to such inquiry has been discovered." This would require a judge to review, at great expense of court time, a transcript of a first grand jury proceeding, and then hold an extensive hearing on newly discovered evidence. In view of the mounting backlogs, Federal district judges do not have the time to do this except at the expense of further postponing their trial calendars. They could not review all the actions of, for example, a special grand jury inquiry conducted over many months, unless they declare a moratorium on all other matters before them. The Speedy Trial Act, moreover, demands that the criminal trial calendar be expedited. We recommend deletion of (e).

With respect to proposed Section 3330 providing for an "independent grand jury inquiry," the Judicial Conference, as noted above, has specifically objected to such a provision in the context of an earlier bill. A group of lay citizens could not be expected to be familiar with the intricacies of Federal jurisdiction and criminal law and, despite the provision for a special attorney, could not render effective assistance to the courts in returning indictments. Indeed, they might, without the guidance of the Department of Justice or some special national officer such as the recent Special Prosecutor's Office, do more harm than good.

RIGHTS OF GRAND JURY WITNESSES

We would not support the provision in Section 7 of the bill for allowing counsel in the grand jury room, first on the basis that it would inevitably delay such proceedings by encouraging non-targeted witnesses to enter into conferences prior to answering questions while advice is sought and obtained. Grand juries question many witnesses, many to get routine information of a non-incriminating sort. This Act would allow any such witness to bring an attorney into the grand jury room, and thus inevitably delay the proceedings.

As shown in the attached Exhibit A, grand jury proceedings are becoming longer and more frequent year by year, but are doing less work. We feel that to allow each witness to bring in his private counsel would work a delay of the grand jury proceeding without benefit to anyone else, and to the considerable detriment of the defendant (who is paying legal fees all the while) and the courts (who must have indictments filed within 30 days of arrest of a defendant to meet the schedule of 18 U.S.C. § 3161(b)).

The provision creates a doubt as to whether it intends to amend 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(g), which now provides for discretionary appointments of counsel for persons "in custody as a material witness." This ambiguity is not clarified by Section 7(b) of the bill which would add as a new category of persons covered by the Criminal Justice Act, specifically Section 3006A(a), one "who is a witness before a grant jury impaneled before the district court." Not only is there this ambiguity, but no explanation is made as to compensation of such attorney by my office, or who would approve such claim for compensation, especially claims in excess of maximum amounts (see 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(d), "Payment for representation").

Having counsel present for each and every witness would make it extremely difficult to insure against prejudicial publicity and would impede the court in finding an unprejudiced petit jury, particularly in view of the final sentence of § 3330A(b), which suggests that counsel in the grand jury proceeding are under no secrecy constraint.

The provision relating to subpoenas in proposed section 3330B creates additional problems. How can each witness be given "adequate and reasonable notice of" the broad subjects listed from one to six at the time the summons is served and, if counsel is appointed, why would such abstract notice be necessary or useful? Who would give such notice in view of the fact that the subpoena issues from the court, not the office of the United States Attorney?

Proposed section 3330B(c) would apparently allow a witness to move to quash a subpoena and to obtain a stay of the inquiry pending hearing thereon. This procedure again would delay the grand jury inquiry an intolerable time, interrupt the schedule of a busy judge, and generally impact on the present case backlogs in all courts. Some judges could not reach such matters for weeks for hearing and then would be required to study a lengthy grand jury transcript, perhaps consuming additional weeks of time. This would be the consequence of requiring a judge, prior to the appearance of the witness before the grand jury, to determine such issues as whether "the evidence sought is relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction" (§ 3330B(d)(1)(C)). A grand jury organized under Chapter 216 of Title 18, United States Code, may have produced a transcript record of over 18 months of grand jury inquiry (up to 36 months). In short, this burden of rendering speculative opinions of this nature would create severe burdens on the ability of judges to manage their caseloads, in addition to stalling the accusatory function of the grand jury.

RECORDING, TRANSCRIBING AND AVAILABILITY OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

Section 8 of the bill relates to the recording of grand jury testimony, making it available to witnesses, and a repeal of the Jencks Act. Since the Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure has studied and is studying these matters in extenso, I will leave this subject to Judge Frederick B. Lacey who appears today as a witness. Judge Lacey will also address the issue of availability of the transcript.

On the issue of availability however, I might note that one critical objection we have is that if reporters (grand jury reporters are contracted for by the Department of Justice) had to separately record the grand jury testimony for every one of the witnesses and make it available in transcription form or in the form of edited electronic recordings, "a reasonable time prior to trial," the courts simply could not comply with the demands of the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3161.

Under Section 3161(c) of that Act, arraignment must be held within ten days from the filing date of the indictment or from the date it is made public if a sealed indictment is returned. Up to this time it will not be known how the defendant or defendants will plead so as to necessitate publication to anyone of a transcript or electronic record. After arraignment 60 days are allowed to the commencement of the trial (18 U.S.C. § 3161(c)). After that the United States Attorney would have to identify witnesses to be called, an additional court hearing would have to be scheduled and convened to comply with proposed Section 3334(c) and (d), and then transcripts or edited electronic recordings would have to be supplied to each witness a sufficient time in advance of the remainder of the 60 days to trial as to constitute "a reasonable time prior to trial." This schedule would seriously conflict with the main business of the court in trying cases.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

The preliminary hearing is largely a duplication of the role of the grand jury, insofar as it seeks to resolve the issue of probable cause to justify further criminal proceedings. The preliminary hearing is exclusively an exploration into probable cause to hold the accused to answer the prosecution further. Coleman v. Burnett, 477 F.2d 1187 (C.A.D.C. 1973). There is no logic in duplicative proceedings which greatly increase attorney costs for the defendants and further delay the courts in handling other matters. Certainly there would be no benefit in a preliminary hearing after an indictment is filed. The filing of an indictment resolves the probable cause issue and causes the case to be opened in the court.

Not only would such duplicative proceedings cause delay and create problems under the Speedy Trial Act, but they would further harass the witnesses who may have appeared several times in court already (preliminary hearings may be held before magistrates in different places within the district than where the grand jury sits, and the witnesses may have to travel to distant places for such hearings).

In many respects preliminary hearings are fairer to defendants as a vehicle for testing probable cause. If a device were worked out giving a defendant the option of having a preliminary hearing in lieu of a grand jury hearing, such proposal would probably receive more support.

Our experience shows, however, that year after year there are fewer waivers of grand jury hearings (see Exhibit B attached) due in some part perhaps to the refusal of the United States Attorney to accede to such waiver, but also in part to the interest of defense counsel in enhanced fees based on time sheets.

REPORTS CONCERNING GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS

Section 9 of the bill provides for a report to be made to the Congress and to the Administrative Office by the Attorney General of numerous details concerning grand jury business. While we are concerned with selection, utilization and payment of grand jurors, and procure our own statistics on those subjects, we are not sure why we were included as a recipient of such reports, although we have no objection to such receipt.

In essence, the major concern we have with the bill is that it would so greatly increase time delays in the criminal process as to swell the backlog of criminal and civil cases remaining untried and would collide with the imperatives of the new Speedy Trial Act. Our most recent statistics, those for fiscal year 1976, show that civil cases increased by 11.3 percent, and many courts declared a virtual moratorium on civil dockets because of preoccupation of the courts in meeting the imperatives of the Speedy Trial Act in trying criminal cases. As of June 30, 1976, there were 351 civil cases pending per judgeship, 52 more than the year before. These include everything from civil rights cases to antitrust suits. The judicial system simply cannot absorb the additional judicial hearings that would be created by some of the provisions we have identified in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the Committee for letting us express our views.

Highlights of Grand Juries

July 1974–June 1975

During the 30-month period: 672 grand juries were discharged; 553 of these were "regular"; 119 of these were "special".

A. The 237 grand juries which were in existence for 18 months accounted for 35.3 percent of all grand juries discharged.

B. 38 special grand juries lasted more than 18 months. 5.7 percent of the grand juries discharged lasted beyond 18 months while 1.2 percent lasted the full 36 months. Twenty-seven special grand juries, or 4.0 percent, lasted from 2 to 3 years in length.

C. 152 grand juries, or 22.6 percent, lasted 6 months or less; 141 grand juries, or 21.0 percent, lasted between 7 and 12 months; 340 grand juries, or 50.6 percent, lasted between 13 and 18 months; 39 grand juries, or 5.8 percent, lasted between 19 and 36 months.

Mr. EILBERG. We have a very lengthy list of witnesses on a very vital subject today and there is great interest as evidenced by the very good attendance of our subcommittee this morning, so I think all we will have time for is perhaps for each of us to ask a few questions and we will do the best we can to accommodate all the witnesses today, many of who have come some distance.

Judge Lacey, how often does a witness come with a counsel who waits outside the grand jury room to give advice?

Mr. LACEY. Very rarely. Again, where this comes up, I would just give you my estimate, is in the political corruption case or the organized crime investigation or the combination of the two such as we had on the prosecution of the city of Newark and the Hudson County investigation and prosecution.

In the routine case, the bank robbery investigation, you're not getting close enough to the targets of the investigation, that kind of grand jury presentation, where the people concerned will bring lawyers in. It happens, but happens only rarely. When it does happen, the permission is freely given. There is no unseemly atmosphere created. I have noted that some statements submitted to you suggest that the witness is repeatedly in and out of the grand jury room for one reason or another. It certainly doesn't happen that way. Certainly it didn't in the 18 months while I was U.S. attorney.

Mr. EILBERG. How would you characterize the delays that occur where there is counsel outside?

Mr. LACEY. No delay at all. It's a matter of a few seconds out on a particular area of questioning. What happens is that the attorney knows by the time his client goes in the grand jury room generally what the areas of questioning are going to be and if there is thereafter a doubt created in the mind of a witness as to question he seeks permission to leave and he goes out briefly. This is not the kind of thing where you have a coach on the sidelines calling play by play. It just doesn't happen that way and to say it does is to mislead the committee. Certainly my experience would not support that kind of horror picture I know has been created for you.

Mr. EILBERG. You testified as to funds for indigent witnesses and raised some interesting questions there. We have been told that the present federal law does not allow funds for indigent witnesses to have counsel to be outside the grand jury room. You say that fees involved are relatively small and you question the practicality of having hearings on indigency in those cases. Yet $150 or $200 may be a lot of money to many people who may be called as witnesses, and the question I would ask is, do you believe it's fair that the rich can have lawyers and the poor not?

Mr. LACEY. Obviously not, but you're asking me first to accept your premise about rich and poor. Let me try to draw the parallel because you hit I think on a very significant area.

We judges day-in and day-out are struggling with this concept of indigency, recognizing we are dealing with the taxpayers' money. More and more our threshold is dropping lower and lower as to what constitutes indigency. As lawyer's fees rise, the defendant who is unrepresented and who has an income of $10-, $12-, or $15,000 says, "I can't afford to hire counsel to defend me in this case. Every lawyer I have consulted wants $5-, or $6-, or $7,000." So we have finally a situation develop where a judge says, "Well, I have to declare this man incapable of hiring his own counsel. I will appoint counsel for him."

On the other hand, where we're talking about a witness, the ordinary witness, who has been reminded of his privilege against compulsory self-incrimination and his right to the lawyer and decides he wants a lawyer but doesn't feel he should hire his own, says, "I can't afford a lawyer for one appearance in the grand jury room." He's only going to be in there perhaps 15 minutes or a half-hour. Yet he decides he wants counsel and he has the right to apply to the court. The court says, "You're making $10,000 a year and of course you can afford $200 to hire a lawyer." That was the point I was making.

I don't see counsel for every witness required. I would draw a line, as to appointment of counsel and warning of rights between the ordinary witness and the so-called "target" witness. I see no necessity for giving the ordinary witness court-appointed counsel and a warning.

As to a "target" witness, however, I agree with providing for counsel and warning. Counsel should not, however, be permitted in the grand jury. I agree completely with the philosophy that underlies the legislation.

Mr. Imlay reminds me I haven't answered one point you made. There is payment made for counsel for targeted witnesses.

Mr. EILBERG. I will ask one more question and then yield to my colleagues. Concern is often raised about a witness granted use immunity later being prosecuted and being unable to show that leads, direct or indirect, from his testimony led to his prosecution. Have you ever had to review challenges to an indictment from a previously immunized witness, and how do you determine if there is a taint?

Mr. LACEY. I have had no case put before me since I have been on the bench in that area, Mr. Chairman, but I know this to be so: the burden upon the United States is so substantial, so heavy—it must show that the prosecution is founded on information that was not obtained from the witness or represents the fruits of what was obtained from the witness. So the burden is not upon the witness to prove the affirmative. Instead, the burden is upon the Government to prove the negative. I'm aware of only one recent case, where it was quite clear there was a challenge made and the Government did demonstrate that the prosecution was founded on an independent source.

So I think that use immunity is appropriate and I don't agree with those who feel that while it conforms constitutionally, it's a grudging concession. I think it's an appropriate concession and strikes the appropriate balance between the rights of the defendant or the witness on the one hand, the interest of the Government on the other, and the third party, the public.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Judge Lacey. I think you have given us a lot of homework to do as we go over carefully your testimony.

Mr. Chairman, I presume in the interest of time that it will be possible to submit some questions to Judge Lacey.

Mr. EILBERG. Yes; we will do that. Judge Lacey, with your permission, and also for all the other witnesses. Obviously, with a panel this size and such an important subject, we cannot begin to cover it adequately today. That is, the hearing time does not permit that.

Mr. LACEY. I would be delighted to.

Mr. FISH. I'm going to restrict myself to one area because my colleague, Congressman Sawyer, is far more experienced in this field, but I would like just to go back to your criticism of 3329B(2)(b) which concerns the reasonable steps to notify any person of his intention to present evidence. Starting at the bottom of page 5 of your testimony you're critical of that section. But are we talking about the subject of the grand jury investigation?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir. I wanted to be sure—and perhaps I didn't make it clear, but I wanted to be sure that it was understood that my position is that a line should be drawn between the ordinary witness on the one hand and the target or subject of an investigation on the other; in connection with providing for counsel and for the warnings that I think should go only to the "target" witness. As to notice, you're asking me what should be done. My concern is this—and I raise it in my submitted statement. I know of very few defendants, who, when they were the subject of an investigation, would have taken advantage of the right to come in and testify. The ones who would, already know of that right and therefore I see no reason to give them notice.

Mr. FISH. But this is the subject—we are talking about the subject?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; I'm talking about the subject. I think that there's no reason to. Let's assume we have a narcotics investigation underway. Recently there was an arrest of 40 people in the State of New Jersey. The indictments will be processed shortly and if I'm lucky the case won't be assigned to me, but as each one of these cases goes forward, ultimately a notice will have to go out. None of these—I feel completely safe in saying that not one of these defendants is going to take the opportunity to come in and testify before the grand jury. Why? Because guilty or innocent, the feeling is that you can't help yourself in this testimony.

What is done then by the notice? Well, where there's an arrest, as here, it doesn't make much difference of course because the subject has already been advised of what lies ahead. But where an investigation is begun by an indictment, what you're doing is giving the narcotic suspect an opportunity to flee and this is what's going to happen.

If, on the other hand, you have a political corruption case, a white-collar crime case, this is in an area where prospective defendents have lawyers. The lawyers know of their right to apply to testify. We did get applications when I was U.S. attorney. I have reason to believe that those applications continue and where they come in, my policy was to recommend always to the grand jury that they hear the witness. Again, on a practical basis, from the point of view of the prosecutor, whatever the witness has to say we wanted to hear. We don't want to indict in a case where the trial jury, when it hears this witness, is going to decide he's innocent. There's also, of course, the right of this witness to be heard. I always felt he had that right if he wanted to be heard.

But I suggest that those who are going to take advantage of this already know of that right. I'm dealing, I recognize, in an area that's subject to speculation, but on the other hand, speculation backed by my own experience. I don't see any need to send out to every subject of an investigation the fact that he's under investigation by a grand jury and has a right to apply to testify.

Mr. FISH. Have you considered, Judge, the possibility of making this a right but one that is qualified so that a judicial officer could find otherwise in those cases such as the narcotics case that you cited?

Mr. LACEY. I recognize and I think it's a wise provision to have in there. I think this is again a safety valve that you have in there where an application can be made. I raise this, however, in that regard. Indeed, what I am about to say applies not only to that provision but to several others. It relates to grand jury secrecy. With this kind of application, which incidentally adds to the workload of the court and may require us to read grand jury transcripts in order to determine what we are being told is accurate—what about grand jury secrecy? Is this application to be made in camera and considered in camera? Is it to be made in open court? This runs through much of my presentation and I raise this not only in connection to your question but with respect to other aspects as well.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. Judge, I appreciate your very capable testimony. You made a comment at the end of this testimony that I find myself in total agreement with; that is, that the workload of the present judiciary is such that this is going to double your workload and I'm not unmindful of the fact that constitutional rights are involved in what we are talking about. But looking at this from your standpoint, is this legislation that we're talking about here today needed?

Mr. LACEY. I put it in these terms. I think there are many things this legislation deals with that need to be done. What I feel has happened here is that the Department of Justice has been remiss and, gentlemen, the judiciary has been remiss. I indicated earlier on the basis of my own experience, having been assigned as grand jury judge, we did not have a grand jury judge in my district until I suggested that we have one. It coordinated then in one chambers all of the grand jury problems. The grand jury was told by me that any criticism they had of any assistant could be brought to me and I received some and I dealt with them. Mr. Belsky knows me well enough to know when I say I dealt with them, I dealt with them. I heard many good things about the presentations, too, but there were some complaints. One grand juror came to me and said he had not been allowed by an assistant on the strike force to ask a question, and I inquired into that and found out there was more to it than that simple declaration. But the point is that I think that given a tight control by the judiciary and given an uniformity of instruction emanating from the Justice Department, much of what concerns the proponents of this legislation, if not all, can be resolved.

Mr. HALL. If you had a uniform set of criminal rules, rules promulgated by the Department of Justice, given to the various judges, could they not in their own bailiwick handle this problem without going through the throes of all of this legislation and still protect the rights of the parties involved?

Mr. LACEY. What you're saying is that we would know what the Justice Department had been given?

Mr. HALL. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Yes. I think the answer to it lies in this solution. When a grand jury judge in a district calls in the U.S. attorney and says, "Now here's the first thing we're going to do. You've got a large staff here. You're going to have your grand jury presentations centered in a few people." I understand Mr. Curran will be here later today or perhaps is sitting in the room now, and he probably can tell you what his staff did with well over 100 assistants. Center the presentation in a few assistants who know what they are doing and who will not inadvertently transgress.

The U.S. attorney—and I made this a requirement incidentally—must constantly be in touch with the grand jury. He must go in there at least once during a given week in order to ascertain things are being done as they should. The prosecutor should conduct himself as if he were at a trial, avoiding none of the informality that prevails all too often.

I think if you can, through those means, tighten up the controls, center responsibility in the courts, and let the courts know this has to be done, let the Justice Department know that this has to be done, that virtually everything that you take care of here is going to be resolved except, of course, things like granting the right to counsel in grand jury rooms. But I'm frank to admit that there just was too much looseness.

In the first grand jury session, I sat in on when I became U.S. attorney, a strike force attorney who was about 6 months out of law school was making a presentation, and I walked out of there having tried cases for my 20 years and I couldn't believe this. Grand jurors were languishing, drinking coffee, conversation was going on in the room all while this fellow was stumbling back and forth, and we got that straightened out.

Mr. HALL. Well, it didn't take an act of Congress to get that straightened out.

Mr. LACEY. It took an act of mine.

Mr. HALL. That's all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LACEY. Apropos of that, I just refer to the last two pages of my statement.I point out that there are potentials A through J for conferring or thrusting upon the judge work that the judge has not had heretofore. Motion that will come on, climaxed of course by the preliminary examination in the hearing that he must have. So I think if you will review that you will see where I think that we will not be able to handle a civil calendar if we're going to have this workload added.

Mr. EILBERG. You understand, Judge Lacey, in our attempt to be fair, we are trying to include every possible point of view.

Mr. LACEY. Absolutely, and I appreciate that.

Mr. EILBERG. That's the only thing we can do if Congress is to do its job.

Mr. LACEY. Absolutely.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. Judge Lacey, first, I want to say I substantially concur in just about everything, you've said. I was not a member of this subcommittee at the time we were hearing the other side apparently of this on March 17, and I kind of regret that I wasn't because I'm sure I would have had more questions of that side of the presentation.

For your information, I practiced trial law for 30 years, a fellow of the American College and the International Academy and then spent 2 years of State prosecutorship where we ran grand juries too, and I'm sure you will concur that the basic function of a grand jury is sort of a double one: One, to protect the citizen against whom there is insubstantial evidence from being subjected to a felony trial; and the other side, the investigative side, where they are investigating situations; and the functions are quite different. And I saw this "Rockford File" picture, too, and it certainly was a horror story, but I think your experience has been parallel to mine, that in 30 years of practice I have not been aware in the State of Michigan of any such horrendous abuses. They may have existed but they certainly must have been scarce.

Mr. LACEY. It was intended to be fiction.

Mr. SAWYER. Do you concur that the grand jury as it presently operates and under its present rules, with as you say perhaps some procedural tightening up under the control of the judiciary really, is a good system and operates well, functions well, and does not trample on the rights of citizens?

Mr. LACEY. I believe it does, sir. There's a factor here that nobody has really described in appropriate terms. Again, drawing on my own experience, I told my assistants, "Now look, I don't want to indict anybody that we don't convict. I've got my reputation to think of. You have your reputation to think of. We know probable cause is the standard but that's not the standard in this office." Also, I think what really gets buried under a lot of emotional argument is that there are 23 people from all walks of life who have friends who may not like the U.S. attorney and I simply put it in those terms to let you know that I think the average U.S. attorney recognizes that, when he makes a presentation or one of his assistants does, in the grand jury room. While this may be secret in terms of the content of the testimony of the witnesses, there is no secrecy in terms of the reaction of those grand jurors to that office, and it's beyond me how anybody can overlook that. Yet I know that a lot of people in the private bar who are on the defense side overlook that. They think the prosecutor or the U.S. attorney is unmindful of those practical consideration of life and he's not.

Mr. SAWYER. Under the present rules, the defense attorney can apply to the district judge to get a full copy of the minutes of a grand jury proceeding affecting his client. Don't you feel that if this were just open to request as a matter of right that you would find that district attorneys who have pretty well—either they or their investigators—have pretty well talked to most of the witnesses that appear in a grand jury and know what they are going to say, that they will tend to cut their presentation to the bare bones so that they produce no more witnesses than they could help before the grand jury in order to secure an indictment?

Mr. LACEY. Well, presently under rule 16, the defendant is entitled to get only a transcript of his testimony and then the other testimony is Jencks Act material and the bill would change that. Incidentally, in that respect, I thing this bill is helpful. Indeed, I lean very hard on the Government attorneys to get what is traditionally Jencks Act material to the defense attorney well before the Government witness takes the stand so we don't have any undue delay after direct examination. Most trial judges I know do exactly that.

What you say in terms of strategy I think is accurate. I would say that generally speaking the presentation by the United States in the grand jury room is done in recognition of the fact that what is being generated is rule 16 material or Jencks Act material and, therefore, is cut to a minimum in order to conform on the one hand to the probable cause requirement, but on the other, to avoid making available a lot of material under section 3500 or rule 16.

Mr. SAWYER. You addressed yourself in your written statement which I read to the question allowing an attorney in the room during an interrogation of a witness, and I recognize the problem of a multiple defendant, too. That's an obvious problem in that. But under our State law in the State of Michigan, we, in addition to a citizen grand jury, also have what we call a one-man grand jury or so-called judicial investigation is the technical term. And under that statute an attorney is permitted in the room.

We found or have found that to be practically uncontrollable. There is practically no way that you can prevent an attorney from obstructing the—and that's even with a judge there presiding actively in the matter. Do you feel that there is any really practical way to allow a defense attorney in the room in a grand jury proceeding and still conduct an orderly proceeding?

Mr. LACEY. No. This is exactly the point that I have made. If this is done, and if the attorney wants to intrude, wants to interfere, I don't think that you can really effectively stop him. This atmosphere that's been created of the witness running back and forth and in and out of the grand jury room, one of your witnesses who appeared here I think said that it creates an impression on the grand jury that is unfavorable to the witness. It doesn't happen that way.

If you want to argue that position, picture now a trial and the defendant is on the stand. At a very critical point in the trial he says, "I'd like to talk to my lawyer." What is the jury going to think of that as he's conferring in whispers with counsel or, worse still, because he and his counsel want to be sure they are not overheard, he or his counsel request permission to confer outside the courtroom.

Now let's take it back to the grand jury room. At a very critical point the witness says, "I'd like to talk with my lawyer," and the lawyer is there and they hold a whispered conference, or ask to confer outside the courtroom. Is the impression less favorable or more favorable than leaving the room under the present system. The argument that's made that there's going to be a delay of proceedings while the witness is out back and forth, under the present system, that doesn't hold water, nor does the argument that the present system creates a bad impression by leaving and coming back, whereas putting counsel in the grand jury would not. The other side of it is, on balance, that you're providing the opportunity to disrupt proceedings; and this cannot be controlled no matter how, with all good motives, you have tried to do it in this legislation.

Mr. SAWYER. If we assume in an antitrust case, particularly, let's say, a price fixing case, where a number of sales people and various other people of a corporation—clerks and what-not—are called to testify, do you see a problem there with particularly if counsel who may have been employed by the corporation for all of the witnesses sitting there present in the courtroom while they're being asked to testify?

Mr. LACEY. You mean in the grand jury room?

Mr. SAWYER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. This is exactly the point I make in my statement. Indeed, I have been told that there was recently a price fixing investigation in New York City where this was exactly what was done. A corporate lawyer, paid for by the corporation, represented everybody who went into the grand jury room and, of course, in this way he was able to keep his finger on everything that took place.

Mr. SAWYER. I'm sure it had a dampening effect on the testimony of the witnesses.

Mr. LACEY. Now this is the next point. We have from time to time this kind of problem. In my statement I refer to the weak defendant and the strong defendant. The strong defendant says—we'll take a bank robbery case—says to the weak defendant, "I've got a lawyer for you. He's going to represent you." The weak defendant says, "I don't want that lawyer. I'm going to get my own." He says, "No; I told you he's going to represent you." And we all know why this is done. We have been around. We understand. We had the Hudson County investigation. The man who ultimately made that case, the county engineer, was the fellow who ultimately broke away from the others under investigation and came to the Government. He came to me one day and said he wanted to talk and he was the one who made the case which led ultimately to the demise of the John B. Kenny machine in Hudson County. This man was initially taken to a law firm representing three of the other defendants and told, "Here's the firm that's going to represent you." Fortunately, because even then he was thinking of cooperating with the Government, he was able to say, without arousing suspicion, "I have a brother who's a lawyer and I think I'd better go to see him and let him represent me." It happened to be true. He did go to his brother. His brother recognized the situation and brought him to an attorney who saw that he should cooperate. But right in the beginning the attempt was made to shackle him to the other defendants. This goes on day in and day out in the real world. We all know this is happening.

A guard will be given a message. That happened not too long ago in the U.S. attorney's office in New Jersey. Judge Whipple had to bring in the lawyer and suggest that now there was a conflict. But what happened was this: The lawyer represented two defendants, both in the Manhattan Correctional Center in New York City. One defendant got the message through a guard to the U.S. attorney's office that he wanted to talk but he didn't trust his lawyer because his lawyer also represented the codefendant against whom he wanted to give testimony.

Now we all know this is what is going on. The secrecy, of course, that you talk about and which I am so much in favor of, gets eroded completely when you say that the attorney who's in there for witnesses is not under the constraints of secrecy. He can tell anybody anything that went on there and I just think it's wrong.

Mr. SAWYER. Thank you, Judge Lacey. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Evans.

Mr. EVANS. Judge, how would you guarantee against abuse by the district attorney? It's a difficult question to ask a district attorney who obviously takes his work or did take his work seriously, but I think we're talking about a system of laws and not of individuals. My question is, how do you guarantee against abuse of the witnesses by the district attorney where there's no defense counsel present?

Mr. LACEY. What do you mean by abuse?

Mr. EVANS. I mean questions such as, "You're lying. You know what the penalty for perjury is." Badgering a witness or abusing a witness who comes in the grand jury room and generally using the grand jury for the DA's purposes rather than the other way around which is the way it's supposed to be.

Mr. LACEY. Well, first of all, I subscribe completely to the requirement that all testimony of witnesses should be reported. The Crutchley case in the third circuit says if the U.S. Attorney is going to report and transcribe any testimony, he must do it with all. I would require by way of rule that all testimony of witnesses be transcribed. You see, the Federal system has this advantage that State systems don't. I think you have, if it's used, the opportunity in the Federal system for the Attorney General to tighten up the controls, to do the things I was talking about before, to have periodic review of what's going on in the U.S. Attorney's office, have somebody there who is constantly monitoring this grand jury transcript that's being generated.

Now no system is perfect, but I submit that on balance that kind of approach makes more sense than some of the things that are urged in this legislation.

This would be my answer to you, sir, that it's recorded. If it's in there and ultimately it comes out at trial, the embarrassment, indeed perhaps the devastation in front of a petit jury to that kind of approach is a preventive. Indeed, what is the attorney going to do who's in there? He's going to object. It's brought to a judge. But ultimately it's going to be brought to a judge anyway if there's a conviction.

Moreover, while I recognize that there are abuses as I have said, I think the answer lies with better administrative controls out of the agency involved here, the Justice Department.

May I just add this: I don't mean this in any pedagogical or didactic sense. I urge that it not be forgotten what I said earlier, that there are 23 people sitting there and some of these people you know are in touch with the real world outside. These are responsible people. These are not just a lot of people who were brought in and sit there like manikins. These are people who are responsible people and can go to a judge and say:

> Look, we want to report. We want to take advantage of what you said we should do. We are bringing to you a complaint. We don't like what's going on in that grand jury room. There's an assistant—the rest are good, but one fellow comes in and he badgers the witness. We don't like this.

If the judge tells the grand jury this at the outset as I did, they know that avenue is open.

So, Congressman, I feel, given that kind of approach, you will resolve this problem.

Mr. EVANS. I agree with that, Your Honor, if you give that kind of approach, but the potential for abuse is still there. The potential for abuse on the part of the district attorney is there and having seen it and speaking from firsthand experience from sitting outside jury rooms and dealing with inexperienced grand jury men under a revision of grand juries in the South, where the people really don't know what their role is and they know what they have been instructed but they go along with what the district attorney does, the abuse is there and it's bad and I don't know whether this is the proper answer or not, but I appreciate your suggestions.

Mr. LACEY. I think the Judicial Conference probably has the channel that I mentioned of utilizing—and this is getting around all the judges—a standard instruction. This is definitely a must, no matter how this legislation comes out—definitely a must, a standard instruction to be given all over the United States when a judge empanels a jury.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Lacey, we thank you very much and we would observe that if there were more people like you with your kind of background and experience in the criminal justice system, perhaps we would not be sitting here right now reviewing this legislation. But it's my opinion that a great many do not have your qualities, sir, and I respectfully have to keep that in mind. We will submit further questions to you because we have only scratched the surface.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, thank you very much and I want to thank all of you for the opportunity to be here, for the attention you gave me, and for the courtesy extended.

[The questions and responses follow:]

QUESTIONS FOR CARL IMLAY, COUNSEL, JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES

1. Mr. Imlay, la[illegible]ear Judge Smith testified as to proposed recommendations of the Judicial Conference. I understand that grand jury issues are being considered by a number of committees. Could you tell us how consideration is parceled out and when you believe a comprehensive official proposal will be forwarded to Congress?

2. One continuing recommendation of the Judicial Conference is the reduction in the size of the grand jury. Some witnesses scheduled to testify later today have opposed this proposal—saying that it might reduce the representability of grand juries. Would you comment?

3. As you might know, the House of Representatives has rejected a substantive amendment to Rule 6(e), which would have allowed additional persons to be present in the grand jury room, and has referred the proposed rule change to this subcommittee. Why does the Judicial Conference believe such a rules change is warranted?

4. The Judicial Conference supports the recording of all grand jury proceedings but I understand there is some conflict between committees as to the method of recording. Could you comment on this?

5. Your committee on the Administration of Criminal Law has previously supported our ban on reiterative contempt. What is the position of the Conference on this today?

6. The committee also supported a return to transactional immunity. What is the position of the Judicial Conference today?

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE,
UNITED STATES COURTS,
Washington, D.C., May 12, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, House Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: At the conclusion of the hearing on H.R. 94 and related bills before your Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee, I was asked to respond to a series of questions, a copy of which I attach.

My responses to the questions follow:

1. The subjects proposed in the grand jury bills touch the interests of four Committees. First, the Advisory Committee on Rules of Criminal Procedure has under study several proposed changes to Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure including provisions for the recording of proceedings and a provision that an indictment may not be dismissed on the ground that the evidence before the grand jury was not sufficient or competent. The Committee also has a subcommittee on grand juries chaired by Judge Frederick B. Lacey who appeared before your Committee as a witness. This subcommittee is conducting a broadscale inquiry into the grand jury system and to this end has asked the Federal Judicial Center to make a general inquiry into some of the aspects of the proposed legislation.

The Conference Committee on the Administration of the Criminal Law is also concerned with various features of the proposals such as the scope of immunity, the rights of witnesses, the law of contempt and other subjects. This Committee has been passing its comments on to the Rules Committee.

The Committee on the Operation of the Jury System has responsibility in several areas such as the selection process and the cross-sectional and representative nature of grand jury selection, and the efficient utilization of grand juries (overseeing the statistical, fiscal and reporting programs of the Administrative Office). In addition this Committee has a subcommittee on "Free Press-Fair Trial" which is concerned with problems of prejudicial pretrial publicity.

Finally, the Conference's Committee to Implement the Criminal Justice Act oversees the program of compensating private attorneys, the management of Federal Public Defenders' and Community Defenders' offices, and establishing guidelines for awarding counsel fees.

These Committees are working in tandem and will assist the Judicial Conference in formulating its consensus on these proposals at its next session on September 15th and 16th, when a full report to your Committee will be rendered.

2. The assumption that a larger accusatorial body is less likely to vote a true bill than a smaller one, or that it represents the community less adequately, is a highly speculative matter, having no basis in proof. First, whether larger or smaller, the selection process may skew the representativeness of the final selection. As a matter of fact, the Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968 only requires that the original base of names from which names to be considered for either grand or petit jury service are originally selected be representative, but not necessarily the final array. See the attached extract from Senate Report No. 891, 90th Congress, 1st Session, p. 25. Given the fact that the winnowing process (excuses, exclusions, disqualifications and challenges) could equally skew the representativeness of a grand jury whether it be 23 or 15, it simply is not logical to assume that 23 persons constitutes a panel which is more proportionate to the elements of the greater community, than one of smaller size (actually as pointed out in our testimony, the present national average size of a grand jury is 19.8 persons and not 23).

Moreover, there is not the same representativeness problem with respect to grand juries as there is with petit juries. With petit juries the difference of one vote in voting a verdict can make a crucial difference in the outcome of a case so that representativeness is more crucial. Grand juries are subject to a majority vote rule (12 of 23) and thus a reduction in the size of the panel has far less tendency to affect the representativeness assuming the relative proportions remain a constant.

As a matter of fact, Section 4 of H.R. 94, would increase the proportion needed to vote a true bill of "two-thirds of those present," thus greatly increasing proportionately the chances for a defendant to avoid indictment. In this major respect the bill, from the standpoint of the defendant, represents an improvement in his chances of avoiding indictment.

As far as giving various elements of the community a chance to serve is concerned, the reduction of the panel size would not per se have a tendency to create any skewing. Even with respect to petit juries, a change in one vote would affect the outcome, the Supreme Court has in recent years twice refused to credit the notion that a jury of 6 is necessarily less representative than 12. See: Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973); Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 102 (1970). In Colgrove the Supreme Court noted that (413 U.S. at p. 158 n. 15), "one study suggests that the decrease in the size of the jury from 12 to 6 is conducive to a more open discussion among the jurors, thereby improving the quality of the deliberative process." The logic of this observation is far stronger in a grand jury room where in a group of 23 the persuasive voice of each individual is diminished in inverse proportion as a function of its greater size.

Moreover, if grand juries are suspected of being less than proportional at any time, there is a whole battery of remedies available in 28 U.S.C. § 1867. Also the Judicial Conference has an established program of sampling jury wheels to detect imbalances in jury wheels by race or sex so that remedial action can be taken by any court so affected.

One factor which tends to make a grand jury less representative in its final makeup is the length of service required. For example, proposed Section 3330(a)(2) of H.R. 94 speaks in terms of grand jury sessions from 18 to 36 months in duration. Only a certain proportion of persons could devote that much time away from jobs and families without experiencing that "undue hardship or extreme inconvenience" which entitles them to an excuse from such service under 28 U.S.C. § 1866(c)(1), or a permanent excuse if they belong to one of the categories defined in the plan pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1863(b)(5). Women with children, farmers, ranchers, commission salesmen, pieceworkers, owners of one-person businesses, and many other categories of persons would face extreme hardship in serving such periods of time, and thus the jurors finally selected would be only those persons with enough economic independence or lack of commitment to others to be able to perform jury service over such extended periods.

Attached hereto is a report of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Operation of the Jury System which relates to grand jury tenure (extracted from "The Jury System in the Federal Courts," West Publishing Co.). This is a matter which will continue to be explored.

3. The most adequate response to this question is to reiterate the Advisory Committee's Note to proposed Rule 6(e) as it appears in House Document No. 94-464, 94th Congress, 2d Session, a copy of which I attach. The proposal was, of course, subject to intense study prior to approval by the Supreme Court in its order of April 26, 1976.

4. With respect to the methods of recording grand jury testimony, we are not immediately aware that the problem has been formally studied and reported on. This, however, will presumably be included in the Conference report on the subject of this proposed legislation.

5 and 6. The Judicial Conference has not itself taken a position either on reiterative contempt or transactional immunity although these matters have been discussed by its Committees, Presumably again, any appropriate comments thereon will be included in the Judicial Conference report.

If I can be of any further assistance, please let me know.

Sincerely,

CARL H. IMLAY,
General Counsel.

IMPROVING THE SYSTEM'S OPERATION

After the number needed is determined, the number to be summoned must be calculated. This is done by adding the percentage of expected non-respondents and excuses to the number needed. Here records from previous terms are used.

Once the call-in is made it is difficult to summon additional jurors for the term. For this reason, it is wise to err on the side of caution, and allow a margin of safety over the minimum in determining the number of summonses to be sent.

F. UTILIZATION OF GRAND JURORS

Rule 6(g), Rules of Criminal Procedure, specifies that "no grand jury may serve more than 18 months." Are all federal grand jury terms across the country of 18 months duration? How many days do federal grand jurors actually serve during a term? Will it be possible to get busy citizens to serve on special grand juries whose tenure may be extended to 36 months or beyond under 18 U.S.C. §§ 3331(a) and 3333(e) 1970? These and other questions are considered in this study of federal grand jury utilization. It has been conducted by a Subcommittee of the Committee on the Operation of the Jury System, Judge Irving R. Kaufman, Chairman.

Improving the utilization of grand juries also has a dollars and cents side. Costs of the jury system have soared in the past ten years, reaching $16,617,100.00 in fiscal year 1972. What is not generally known is that the cost of grand juries has risen in relation to similar petit jury costs. The cost of grand juries now accounts for eighteen percent ($3,085,800.00 in fiscal year 1972) of the total cost of the jury system (grand and petit).

Part I of the report is compiled from data supplied from 28 district courts situated in all eleven circuits. Twenty-seven clerks and one United States Attorney answered the first letter of the Subcommittee. Questions asked for the total number of grand jurors who have served within the past four years, the allocation of grand jurors by length of service (15 to 18 months, 12 to 15 months, and less than 12 months), and the average days served by grand jurors in each period of service.

In responding to the first letter, the Clerk for the Southern District of New York attached a table prepared by the jury deputy clerk. The table provided statistics for each grand jury identified by return date of panel. With respect to each grand jury, the chart itemizes the number of jurors on the panel, number of substitutes, number of months served, days served in each month, and total number of days panel served. A second letter asked the same district courts, to the extent records permitted, to furnish statistics of the kind and detail furnished by the Southern District of New York, and to comment on the adaptability of this kind of record keeping in the respective district. So far, 16 districts have forwarded additional statistics comparable to the Southern District of New York report.

Attached to this report as an appendix are the responses to one of several questions submitted to 43 grand jury foremen of discharged grand juries. The grand jury foremen interrogated served on the United States District Courts for the District of Columbia, for the Southern District of Indiana, for the Middle District of Louisiana, and for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division.

The Judges who composed the Subcommittee serve in those districts and submitted the questions to the foremen.

Part II of the report contains the Committee's recommendations.

Part I

Differences in the keeping of grand jury records is revealed in the responses to the Subcommittee's letters. The complete records that are maintained by a jury clerk in the Clerk's office of the Southern District of New York have already been itemized. In contrast, in the Northern District of Ohio the Clerk's office maintains no grand jury records other than copies of the payroll vouchers. Whatever records there are, are kept in the office of the United States Attorney in Cleveland. One of his assistants writes:

"The Attendance Record Book is kept with the minutes book in the office of the United States Attorney. The older records are difficult to trace because there is no continuity of place and length of time for retaining them."

He continues:

"[T]here was not much uniformity in marking grand jurors present, absent, or excused. No initial of the secretary or forman appeared on the sheet. The pages were looseleaf and many pages had torn their punch holes. Seldom was a record entered in the book as to date of discharge."

Assistant United States Attorney Clarence L. Sharpe concludes by saying, "* * * since the grand jury is a court function the record keeping might well be centered in the office of the Clerk of Courts." Fortunately, the records were sufficiently adequate to permit Mr. Sharpe to meet the Subcommittee's second request of January 26, 1972, with "grand jury statistics designed after those submitted by the Southern District of New York and taken from the records in this office."

The Clerks of the Eastern District of Kentucky and the District of Nebraska supplied the statistics requested in the first letter. In response to the second letter, Clerk McGarvey of the Eastern District of Kentucky writes:

"The vouchers for pay to grand jurors which are audited by the Administrative Office reflect the number of grand jurors serving, days served and when finally excused.

"Maybe some day the Administrative Office Data Section will find a combination of buttons that can be punched to record this information and produce a "print out sheet" for the benefit of committees or officials who need the information."

In reply to the Subcommittee's second letter, Clerk Peck of the District of Nebraska explained that grand juries are impaneled every 18 months, that periodic sessions are from two to four days' duration, and "that recalls into such sessions average no more than five or six times over an eighteen-month period." He adds:

"Accordingly, we keep no detailed records such as that provided to you by the Southern District of New York. Moreover, I can see no usefulness to this court, or to one of equal or smaller size, in the maintenance of such a record. For us it would be a record kept for the mere sake of record keeping, and in this era of increasing workloads the judicial system ought to diligently avoid that temptation."

None of the 16 districts that responded to the second letter keep records as detailed as those of the Southern District of New York. However, from the records that they do keep these districts have supplied the Subcommittee with grand jury statistics "in the format that is used by the Southern District of New York," as Clerk Evensen of the Northern District of California put it in his letter. Clerk Cunningham of the Northern District of Illinois, submits reports "covering grand jury activities for 1969, 1970, and 1971 in the same format as those of New York Southern." He explains that his office uses a reporting system that keeps track of "(a) number of grand juries still sitting; (b) number of days on which a given grand jury sat during its first month of service; (c) number of days a given grand jury sat other than the first month." As to record keeping he suggests these "minimum necessary documents,"

(a) An order impaneling the grand juries;

(b) A sign-in sheet or some sort of form to show which grand jurors are present on which days;

(c) Copy of payroll voucher; and (d) Order extending or discharging grand jury.

"Noting that "statistics can be gathered from four types of documents to serve most needs," he stresses:

"The regular reporting of grand jury operations should probably be kept to a minimum (if only to make sure that such reports are not regarded as more in an endless series of forms to be "filed")."

Clerk Cunningham concludes with comments on internal reporting and cost control:

"In this district we have concentrated more on the petit jury operations than on the grand jury operation in terms of internal reporting and cost control. This is basically because the total fees in the petit jury operation are more than twice as large as those in grand jury. However, with the steady increase in grand jury costs I suspect we will shortly be examining that area more closely."

On the same subject of grand jury costs, John J. Harding, Clerk of Eastern District of Pennsylvania, through his deputy Michael Kunz, recommends that "grand juror cost data be included in utilization reports."

Part I now turns to an analysis of the grand jury statistics which the Subcommittee has obtained. A preliminary note is essential. The grand jury statistics furnished by the Southern District of New York and thereafter by 16 other districts in response to the second letter, discloses that the four-year study period includes grand juries impaneled before January 1, 1968, that continued into the next years. Also included are some grand juries impaneled during the period that were still sitting December 31, 1971. All statistics of grand jurors reported from all 28 districts are included in the computations of numbers of different jurors and average days of service of individual jurors for the four years examined. But only grand juries (as distinguished from grand jurors) that were both impaneled and discharged within the four-year period are included in the computed numbers of months of service of grand juries and total days of service of grand juries.

[1] Period covered is 1967 through 1970.
[2] Days per each year.

Districts among the 28 reporting who used more than 1,000 grand jurors during the four-year study period include Southern District of New York (1,815); District of Columbia (1,265); and Northern District of Illinois (1,127). Districts using between 500 and 1,000 grand jurors during the period include Central District of California (943) and Eastern District of Kentucky (674). Each of the remaining 23 districts used less than 500 grand jurors during the four-year study period.

Some may wonder how Eastern District, Kentucky joins company with four metropolitan districts in the use of more than 50 grand jurors during the four-year period. Clerk McGarvey writes:

"Six hundred and seventy four different individuals. About 10 grand juries a year; they sit in five different places; they serve one or two days only and are discharged. One day the grand jury returned 105 indictments. They really work and want to get home."

Columns 2, 3, and 4 of Figure 1 reflect the wide distribution of number of jurors in terms of months of service. Months served include any month in which a juror sat. In 15 districts a majority of the jurors served less than 12 months. In six districts a majority of jurors served 12 to 18 months. In two districts all jurors served 12 to 18 months with a majority of them serving 18 months. In three districts all jurors served the full 18 months. In six districts all jurors served less than 12 months.

Columns 5, 6, and 7 reflect the varying average days served by jurors who served 15 to 18 months, 12 to 15 months, and less than 12 months. In 11 districts the highest average days of service in any category ranged from 2 to 16 days. In 10 other districts the average highest days of service in any category ranged from 20 to 34 average days. In two other districts the highest average days of service in any category are 42 to 45 days. In two other districts the average highest days of service in any category are 63 and 73 days. In one other district the highest average days of service in any category is 83 days. In the last two districts the highest average days of service in any category are 106 and 115 days.

Ticking off statistics does not make for easy reading. However, the statistics of Figure 1 convey at least these messages. Most grand jurors are not being required to serve 18 months, the maximum life of a regular grand jury. But from the averages so far examined it appears that a substantial number of grand jurors are serving more than 30 days. Yet only 30 days of service are required of petit jurors under 28 U.S.C. § 1866(e) (1970) during any two-year period. The same section merely limits grand jurors to "one grand jury" in a two-year period.

Before arriving at any final conclusions we turn to the statistics supplied by 17 districts as to all grand juries in these districts that have been impaneled and completed service during the four-year study period. One of these districts, Northern District of Illinois, as noted in Clerk Cunningham's letter, reports statistics for the three-year period 1969, 1970, and 1971.

From the supplied statistics the Subcommittee extracted for each of the districts the following compilations: (a) the total number of grand juries; (b) the number of months that each grand jury served; (c) the number of grand juries that have served for the indicated number of months; (d) for each category of grand juries in (c) the greatest number of days served in one month; and (e) for the designated range of days served, i.e. 1–19, 20–29, 30–39, etc., the number of grand juries serving a total of days within each range. In the distribution within the ranges of total days served each grand jury is identified by its total length of service in months.

The Administration of Justice Committee in Cleveland, Ohio (hereafter called called AJC), an affiliate of Government Research Institute, is a non-profit private, foundation funded, criminal justice system reform agency. AJC was asked by the Subcommittee to cast the foregoing compilations into graphic form to show grand jury utilization. AJC willingly agreed. Its helpful and professional service is gratefully acknowledged. AJC first prepared two tables that condense the compilations previously itemized. These tables appear on pages 251 and 252 as Figures 2 and 3. However, AJC determined that to provide statistical comparisons to aid the study of grand jury utilization it was necessary to use weighted averages, computed by appropriate equations. Applying this method it computed weighted averages from the compilations (raw data) supplied by the Subcommittee. Weighted averages have been calculated for grand juries as to each of the 17 districts, and as to all 17 districts both as to months and days served. These comparisons appear in tabular form (Figure 4) on page 253; and as a bar graph (Figure 5) on page 254.

Average number of days per month	10	9	8	5	5	3	3	3	4	3	1	2	3	3	3	1	4	3	2

In each of the Figures the District of Columbia is listed first followed by 16 districts arranged according to circuit. To illustrate Figure 2, the 49 grand juries of the District of Columbia are distributed according to the number of months each grand jury served. Thus, line (a) discloses that three grand juries served a total of two months, seven served three months, 20 served four months, etc. Line (b) shows that for the three grand juries that served two months the greatest number of days served in one month was 11 days.

Explaining Figure 3 also by the District of Columbia entries, its 49 grand juries are distributed according to the total days served by those grand juries. Thus, four grand juries served a total number of days that fall within the 1–19 range, six within the 20–29 range, 27 within the 30–39 range of days, etc.

For each district Figure 4 records the average number of days served by grand juries that served in that district for the indicated length of months. Figure 4 also gives the average number of days served by all grand juries in each district and the average number of days served by all grand juries in all 17 districts for the indicated length of months.

Referring to Figures 2, 3, and 4, four districts are well above all other districts in use of grand juries during the four-year study period. These are New York Southern (66); District of Columbia (49); California Central (32); and Illinois Northern (26) (but only for three years). The average number of days served by all grand juries in these districts are New York Southern (30); District of Columbia (39); California Central (29); and Illinois Northern (16).

The middle tier of grand juries used are California Northern (13) with average number of days 13; Indiana Southern (11) with 21 days; Michigan Eastern (8) with 36 days; Missouri Eastern (7) with 28 days; Georgia (7) with 3 days; Pennsylvania Eastern (6) with 38 days; Ohio Northern ED (6) with 47 days (the highest average number of days of any district); and Idaho (6) with 10 days.

The lowest tier of grand juries used includes New Mexico (5) with average number of days 13; North Carolina Middle (5) with 5 days; Alabama Northern (4) with 11 days; Wisconsin Eastern (3) with 15 days; and Colorado (2) with 30 days.

Variations in grand jury usage, marshaled in these figures, are even more marked when viewed in the bar graph that follows on page 205.

The left half of Figure 5 depicts the wide range in average numbers of months served by all grand juries in the 17 districts. A five to one ratio exists between Ohio Northern ED and Idaho grand juries averaging respectively 15.8 and 15.5 months and the average of 3.7 months served by all grand juries in Indiana Southern.

It will be recalled that New York Southern (66) and District of Columbia (49) led all the districts in numbers of grand juries. One of the proximate factors is now visualized by the relatively low average months served by all grand juries in each district: 5.2 months in New York Southern and 5.8 months in District of Columbia. Closely following is the 6.4 average months served by the 27 grand juries in Illinois Northern.

In California grand juries in the Central District served months whose average was 2 to 1 the average months served by the Northern District—12.1 in California Central and 6.2 in California Northern.

The right half of Figure 5 reveals that the average number of days served by grand juries in the 17 districts presents even a wider range than the left half of the graph.

Ohio Northern ED leads with 47 days as the average days served by all its grand juries. At the other end of the range is Georgia Middle with three days. Nine districts (a majority of 17) have average numbers of days that exceed 20. Six districts, a third of the 17, have average days served that range from 30 to 47.

Summing up, the statistics of Part I, both as to grand juries and grand jurors, conclusively show that grand jury service is falling unevenly on our citizens in different federal district courts. Equally plain, in at least a third of the districts (but actually 137 of 255 grand juries) the average number of days served by grand juries ranges from 30 to 47 days—in excess of 30 days, the maximum required petit jury service.

Part II

This study discloses that there is need to better utilize the services of grand jurors and grand juries. This need is particularly acute in large metropolitan districts, but is also present in other federal court districts. However, because the problems vary from district to district the study's recommendations are offered as general guidelines, not intended to be rigidly applied.

1. Traditionally the study shows that each grand jury appoints a secretary who maintains a record, often looseleaf, of the names of the grand jury's membership and attendance at sessions. The quality and completeness of these records has depended on the efficiency of the grand jury secretary, and its foreman.

The Committee finds that grand jurors like petit jurors report daily to the office of the Clerk of Court to verify the juror's entitlement to compensation. The Clerk's Office pays the grand jurors by vouchers; and different Clerks keep varying additional types of grand jury records in different district. All Clerks are required to keep the grand jury votes on indictment.

The Committee believes that individual grand juries should continue to keep their records in accordance with Rule 6(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. However, the Committee recommends that to aid in better utilization of grand juries and to assist the Administrative Office in properly maintaining its statistical records and fiscal control minimal statistical source records should be kept and permanently maintained by each Clerk of Court. Therefore, the following minimum records should be kept by each Clerk:

(a) An Order impaneling the grand jury.

(b) A sign-in sheet or equivalent record that will show attendance on a daily basis of grand jurors and the total hours of service on each day of service.

(c) Copies of payroll vouchers of individual grand jurors and covering payroll vouchers for each grand jury.

(d) Grand jury votes on indictment.

(e) Any Order extending the term of grand jury; and the Order discharging the grand jury.

2. For the convenience of grand jurors and to achieve the maximum utilization of their services, sessions should be scheduled for days certain when a sufficient accumulation of business exists fully to occupy their time.

3. The Committee directs attention to the attached appendix which contains the condensed responses to one of several questions submitted to 43 foremen of discharged grand juries in four districts. Their comments relate in part to the length of grand jury services, and the duration of sessions. Whether or not this sampling of the responses of these 43 grand jury foremen warrants further study by an appropriate committee of the Judicial Conference, this Committee expresses no recommendation.

The above report has been submitted to Henry Peterson, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Section of the Department of Justice for consideration and comment. The Subcommittee recognizes the contribution of Judge Oliver Gasch of the District of Columbia, the former chairman of this Subcommittee in the planning and the preparation of the study and report.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM K. THOMAS, Chairman.

APPENDIX

What recommendations would you make for controls on such things as the length of the term of the grand jury, the number of days that grand jurors can be expected to sit, the designation of the secretary of the grand jury as the person with whom records and other materials produced by a subpoena duces tecum might be filed in the first instance?

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

1. Told he would serve three days and five hours a week, he served longer hours and more days. He was not paid by his employer for lost time.

2. None.

3. A regular grand jury should sit for 90 days only. Present practice is to hear cases during the entire period. Foremen should be responsible for records.

4. Eighteen months with service for four days a week was all right. Person who handles records should be in regular attendance.

5. A four-month term was not excessive; nor was three days a week.

6. Term not long enough and five days instead of three should be served—since the week was broken up anyway.

7. Length of his grand jury service (two months) was not excessive. No comment on the number of days.
8. If a juror is required to serve for a protracted period court should have more contact with the employer to ease pressure. Questions whether secretary had requisite skills for maintaining jury book.
9. (Special) Eighteen months' service not too long a period of service. No interference with her duties as housewife. Many of the jurymen who worked for the government could get off when needed. Objects to secretary getting documents.
10. (Special) Believes term was almost two years but could have been 18 months. Met approximately 20 times, several times a month, and average of three hours a day. Eighteen months should be sufficient, two months' service clearly would not be sufficient to accomplish things expected of an investigative or special grand jury. Two years might be too long and might prove oppressive, particularly for grand jury foremen in the employ of the federal government. Some employers objected to service during an 18-month period, as did some government people. Sees no need for change whereby secretary could receive documents.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF INDIANA

1. "Term should be extended to one year. Jurors should be able to serve at least three days a month."
2. "More careful selection."
3. "I do not believe that the length of term or number of days jurors are required to sit to be excessive. [By court rules three grand juries are impaneled each year.]"
4. Blank.
5. Blank.
6. Blank.
7. Blank.
8. "More time should be given to calling jurors, due to distance some must travel."
9. "Term could be as long as 6 months if case preparation and witness preparation could be better organized."
10. None.
11. Blank.
12. ". . . an exact schedule of time should be given. Some employers will not tolerate the on again off again routine."
13. "Length of term of the grand jury in my opinion is alright."
14. "The length of meeting is too long as it presents a definite hardship upon its members . . . ."
15. "One of the problems I observed was the fact the District Attorney did not have his cases ready."
16. None.
17. "The length of term should certainly be reduced from the present three months. One month should be sufficient with no more than one week at a time."
18. "If possible for cases to be ready to present, several could be handled and number of days served lessened."
19. None.

MIDDLE DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA

1. "I think that four months should be the maximum for a member to serve [reasons given]."
2. "They should [be] three months, average two days a week . . . . The U.S. Attorney's office should be responsible for records and material taken by a subpoena duces tecum."
3. None.
4. ". . . I'd say a three month term should be a fair one and unless something unusual should arise possibly one day per week would suffice for meetings."
5. "The length of term apparently did not cause undue inconvenience. No one objected."
6. None.

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO, EASTERN DIVISION

1. "I believe that a term of 12 months would be preferable. . . . The Secretary of the grand jury being a member of such, should not be required to be the custodian of records . . . ."

2. "The length of term is too long. . . . I would recommend (1) more grand juries; (2) for shorter terms, say six months; with (3) a specified maximum number of days per month, say 3 to 4. This would make grand jury service more practicable for business people and others who must plan their schedules more precisely than is now possible."

3. "Jurors should not be expected to sit more than one week out of every four weeks or one-two days per week."

4. "Not to have the grand jury appear more than one time in any given month, for the benefit of employers. And when called to serve a minimum of a full week and leave the term at the present 18 months."

5. "Recommend a shorter term; 18 months worked a hardship on my duties in my occupation. Suggest maximum of one year."

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 8, 1973.

MR. CARL IMLAY,
General Counsel, Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Supreme Court Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. IMLAY: This is in reply to your letter of February 13, 1973, inviting our comments upon a report of Judge William K. Thomas' subcommittee studying the utilization of grand jurors.

This matter of making a proper use of the time of grand jurors is certainly worthy of attention, and I favor the early implementation of the subcommittee's recommendations that certain specified records be kept about the grand jury system. The keeping of the specified records should not be particularly onerous, and the informational needs warrant such recordkeeping.

In light of the subcommittee's recommendation that grand jury proceedings be planned more carefully so as to avoid less than full day sessions, I will alert the United States Attorneys to the problem and ask them to give it appropriate attention. As a general guideline, grand jury sessions should be scheduled, as the subcommittee recommends, for days certain and when a full day's work is at hand. I do believe, however, that the demands upon the United States Attorney's Offices may be such that they cannot always utilize a grand jury in the way they would like because other business takes precedence or for other good reasons. The statement of the general guideline might take this more directly into account by recommending that the close scheduling be accomplished to the fullest extent practicable.

Several of the grand jurors polled indicated that they felt their number to be too large and that the system would work as well, if not better, with fewer members. The subcommittee might wish to consider recommending that appropriate attention be given to the question whether grand juries should be composed of substantially fewer than the presently prescribed 16 to 23 members, with fewer needed as a quorum and to return indictments.

I appreciate being afforded an opportunity to comment upon these matters. Let me know if I may be of any further assistance.

Sincerely,

HENRY E. PETERSON,
Assistant Attorney General.

[From S. Rept. No. 891, 90th Cong., 1st sess., p. 25]

The new section 1861 sets forth the policy underlying the legislation. It establishes, as the policy of the United States, that all litigants in Federal courts entitled to trial by jury shall have the right to grand and petit juries selected at random from a cross section of the community. No litigant has the right to a jury that itself mirrors the makeup of the community. On any single jury some groups may be overrepresented and others under-represented. But the technique of random selection tends to ensure, according to the laws of probability, that distortions most often will be minor and will even out in the long run. If a given jury is not a perfect cross section of the community that situation is a product of the laws of chance, together with the permissible statutory grounds for elimination from service set forth in the act, and not of impermissible discrimination.

Excerpt from the Report of the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure to the Judicial Conference of the U.S.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Rule 6. The Grand Jury

(e) SECRECY OF PROCEEDINGS AND DISCLOSURE. Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. For purposes of this subdivision, "attorneys for the government" includes those enumerated in rule 54(c); it also includes such other government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, stenographer, operator of a recording device, or any typist who transcribes recorded testimony may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule. The federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned [court] may direct that [an indictment] it shall be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has [given bail], been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the finding of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.

(f) FINDING AND RETURN OF INDICTMENT. An indictment may be found only upon the concurrence of 12 or more jurors. The indictment shall be returned by the grand jury to a [judge] federal magistrate in open court. If [the defendant is in custody or has given bail] a complaint or information is pending against the defendant and 12 jurors do not concur in finding an indictment, the foreman shall so report to [the court] a federal magistrate in writing forthwith.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE NOTE

(Rule 6)

The proposed definition of "attorneys for the government" in subdivision (e) is designed to facilitate an increasing need, on the part of government attorneys, to make use of outside expertise in complex litigation. The phrase "other government personnel" includes, but is not limited to, employees of administrative agencies and government departments.

Present subdivision (e) provides for disclosure "to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties." This limitation is designed to further "the long established policy that maintains the secrecy of the grand jury in federal courts." United States v. Procter and Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677 (1958).

As defined in rule 54(c), "'Attorney for the government' means the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney and when applicable to cases arising under the laws of Guam * * *." The limited nature of this definition is pointed out in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 309 F.2d 440 (3d Cir. 1962) at 443:

"The term attorneys for the government is restrictive in its application. * * * If it had been intended that the attorneys for the administrative agencies were to have free access to matters occurring before a grand jury, the rule would have so provided."

The proposed amendment reflects the fact that there is often government personnel assisting the Justice Department in grand jury proceedings. In In re Grand Jury Investigation of William H. Pflaumer & Sons, Inc., 53 F.R.D. 464 (E.D. Pa. 1971), the opinion quoted the United States Attorney:

"It is absolutely necessary in grand jury investigations involving analysis of books and records, for the government attorneys to rely upon investigative personnel (from the government agencies) for assistance."

See also 8 J. Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 6.05 at 6-28 (2d ed. Cipes, 1969):

"The rule [6(e)] has presented a problem, however, with respect to attorneys and nonattorneys who are assisting in preparation of a case for the grand jury. * * * These assistants often cannot properly perform their work without having access to grand jury minutes."

Although case law is limited, the trend seems to be in the direction of allowing disclosure to government personnel who assist attorneys for the government in situations where their expertise is required. This is subject to the qualification that the matters disclosed be used only for the purposes of the grand jury investigation. The court may inquire as to the good faith of the assisting personnel, to ensure that access to material is not merely a subterfuge to gather evidence unattainable by means other than the grand jury. This approach was taken in In re Grand Jury Investigation of William H. Pflaumer & Sons, Inc., 53 F.R.D. 464 (E.D. Pa. 1971); In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, 239 F.2d 263 (7th Cir. 1956); United States v. Anzelmo, 319 F. Supp. 1106 (D.C. La. 1970). Another case, Application of Kelly, 19 F.R.D. 269 (S.D.N.Y. 1956), assumed, without deciding, that assistance given the attorney for the government by IRS and FBI agents was authorized.

The change at line 27 reflects the fact that under the Bail Reform Act of 1966 some persons will be released without requiring bail. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 3146, 3148.

Under the proposed amendment to rule 6(f), an indictment may be returned to a federal magistrate. ("Federal magistrate" is defined in rule 54(c) as including a United States magistrate as defined in 28 U.S.C. § 631–639 and a judge of the United States.) This change will foreclose the possibility of noncompliance with the Speedy Trial Act timetable because of the nonavailability of a judge. Upon the effective date of certain provisions of the Speedy Trial Act of 1974, the timely return of indictments will become a matter of critical importance; for the year commencing July 1, 1976, indictments must be returned within 60 days of arrest or summons, for the year following within 45 days, and thereafter within 30 days. 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161(b) and (f), 3163(a). The problem is acute in a one-judge district where, if the judge is holding court in another part of the district, or is otherwise absent, the return of the indictment must await the later reappearance of the judge at the place where the grand jury is sitting.

A corresponding change has been made to that part of subdivision (f) which concerns the reporting of a "no bill," and to that part of subdivision (e) which concerns keeping an indictment secret.

The change in the third sentence of rule 6(f) is made so as to cover all situations in which by virtue of a pending complaint or information the defendant is in custody or released under some form of conditional release.

Rule 23. Trial by Jury or by the Court

* * * * * * *

(b) JURY OF LESS THAN TWELVE. Juries shall be of 12 but at any time before verdict the parties may stipulate in writing with the approval of the court that the jury shall consist of any number less than 12 or that a valid verdict may be returned by a jury of less than 12 should the court find it necessary to excuse one or more jurors for any just cause after trial commences.

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS,
Washington, D.C., October 25, 1977.

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request for the views of the Judicial Conference of the United States on the pending bill, H.R. 94, to make certain changes respecting the procedures of grand juries in the United States district courts. The Judicial Conference considered this legislation at its recent session on September 15 and 16, 1977. It has determined to oppose the bill.

In support of this action by the Judicial Conference, I am enclosing a letter and accompanying report addressed to Congressman Joshua Eilberg, the chairman of the subcommittee before which this legislation is pending, by Judges Murray I. Gurfein (a member of the Conference's Committee in the Administration of the Criminal Law) and Walter R. Mansfield of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. These materials, which have already been transmitted to Congressman Eilberg on a personal basis by Judges Gurfein and Mansfield, were approved and adopted by the Judicial Conference in explanation of its position on H.R. 94 and are therefore being sent to you at this time on behalf of the Conference.

On the basis of the study and report on H.R. 94 performed for the Judicial Conference by its Criminal Law Committee, the Conference concluded that this legislation would have the effect of making a grand jury proceeding an adversary one and that it would greatly harm the administration of justice by increasing the opportunity to obstruct, delay, and disrupt the investigatory and accusatory processes with no showing of a counterbalancing gain for the public or for the protection of individual rights. The Conference is further of the view that the enactment of this bill would impose an enormous and unconscionable burden upon an already overloaded federal judiciary.

The Judicial Conference believes that any benefits which might possibly derive from the provisions of H.R. 94 are at best speculative and could generally be achieved by less radical means. For example, the Conference's Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules has already recommended the amendment of Rule 6(e), Fed.R.Crim.P., to require the recording of all testimony and other relevant proceedings before the grand jury except for its deliberations. In light of the speculative nature of these benefits, the Conference is of the view that its cost in terms of the time which would have to be expended under the various provisions of this bill for judicial hearings, examinations of evidence, and findings would be excessive.

In addition to the matters treated in the report by Judges Gurfein and Mansfield. I should also like to point out one aspect of H.R. 94 that is of particular concern to the Judicial Conference's Committee on the Operation of the Jury System, which has also studied this bill. This is a provision contained in section 4 of the bill amending section 3321 of title 18, United States Code, but retaining so much of its present language as requires the district courts, when an insufficient number of grand jurors appear in response to summons, to order the marshal to summon "from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders" a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury. It is the view of the Judicial Conference that this procedure for selecting additional grand jurors would be contrary to the philosophy of the Jury Selection and Service Act of 1968 that federal jurors shall be selected at random from a fair cross section of the community. The Conference therefore recommends that the following alternative language be incorporated in section 4, reflecting the procedure now employed in the case of an unanticipated shortage of petit jurors, as provided at 28 U.S.C. § 1866(f), for the marshal to summon additional persons directly from the voter lists or other source lists specified in the court's jury selection plan:

"If less than nine of the persons summoned attend, they shall be placed on the grand jury and the court shall order that an additional number of persons be summoned to complete the grand jury in a manner ordered by the court in accordance with procedures set forth in section 1866 of title 28, United States Code."

I should also point out that the Judicial Conference at its recent session instructed its Jury Committee to work toward the promulgation of a model charge to federal grand juries which would serve to place the jurors on notice as to their rights and responsibilities and would be helpful in controlling the possible badgering or abusive treatment of witnesses before grand juries by prosecutors. The Conference would also wish to express the additional point that this legislation would in its view grant to witnesses and their attorneys too broad a license to disclose grand jury proceedings without being subject to the criminal penalties created by section 5 of the bill in enacting proposed 18 U.S.C. § 1512. While the enactment of this provision would still leave the courts free to enforce their local rules limiting the dissemination of information adversely affecting the prospects for a fair trial of the cause, the Judicial Conference nevertheless believes that the exemption of witnesses and their attorneys from the specific criminal penalties provided in this bill might be reexamined.

I hope that these observations may be of assistance to your committee in its consideration of H.R. 94. If there is any further assistance which the Judicial Conference can provide, please so advise me.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM E. FOLEY, Deputy Director.

SECOND CIRCUIT,
U.S. COURTHOUSE,

Re H.R. 94—Grand Jury Procedures and Rights and Liberties of Grand Jurors.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and Naturalization Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: We take the liberty of expressing our deep concern about some of the proposals in H.R. 94, which is now under consideration by your Committee. Since federal judges are required as part of their duties to deal on a day-to-day basis with grand juries, which act under the supervision of the judiciary, and with problems raised by the grand jury system as it presently functions, your Committee may be interested in our views.

The grand jury is one of our oldest public institutions, dating back to pre-Colonial days. Although long ago it was sometimes used for political purposes, it has since limited itself for the most part to the important public function of investigating crime and to fulfillment of the public's interest in seeing that where there is probable cause to believe that a person has committed a crime that person will be accused and brought to trial. On the other hand, where no such probable cause is shown every federal grand jury is usually advised by the court that its duty is to protect persons under investigation against unwarranted injury to their reputation. The grand jury, operating with the aid of federal prosecutors, has accordingly conducted its proceedings in secret in order to protect the innocent, encourage full investigation, disclosure and deliberation, prevent persons from tampering with witnesses or suborning perjury, and preclude the escape of those likely to be indicted.

By and large the federal grand jury, despite some faults, has functioned satisfactorily under the guidance of prosecutors held to high standards. It has filed public accusations only where there has been probable cause to believe the accused guilty, as is attested to by the fact that almost all federal indictments result in guilty pleas or convictions after trial. The grand jury, moreover, has served as a moderating influence on any tendency on the part of prosecutors to be overzealous and has brought nonprofessionals into the decision-making process.

As with every public institution, there is undoubtedly room for improvement in the federal grand jury. However, where an institution such as a grand jury has functioned reasonably well in the past, it seems wise to scrutinize proposed "improvements" most carefully, particularly where the "abuses" against which they are purportedly aimed may have been minimal or nonexistent and the reforms pose a risk of harm or of unnecessary and costly burdens. Guided by this approach, we believe that some of the proposals advanced by H.R. 94 may well serve to improve the administration of justice. We refer, for instance, to the proposal to criminalize unauthorized disclosure of evidence presented to a grand jury (proposed § 1512), which might serve to protect against leakages of the type that can cause harm to those under investigation as well as to the Government's investigation itself. Recording of all grand jury proceedings, including statements of the prosecutors and of grand jurors (as proposed in § 3333), might serve to protect against misstatements or misconduct in the grand jury room. Authorizing the court to disclose to a defendant prior to trial the grand jury testimony of witnesses to be called at trial and exculpatory testimony given before a grand jury could promote Congress' policy in favor of fairness and prompt disposition of criminal proceedings. Reduction in the size of the grand jury, while more debatable, could conceivably improve the process by leading to greater active participation by individual jurors.

As against these potentially helpful proposals, others—particularly those which would tend to turn the grand jury proceeding into an adversarial one—appear to pose great harm to the administration of justice by needlessly increasing the opportunity for obstructing, delaying, disrupting and prolonging the investigatory and accusatory process, with no showing of a counterbalancing gain to the public or to individual rights. If enacted, this legislation would, furthermore, impose an enormous and unconscionably disproportionate additional burden on an already overworked federal judiciary. If a Judicial Impact Statement (similar to an Environmental Impact Statement) were prepared with respect to these proposals, it would demonstrate that in exchange for benefits that are at best speculative the cost in terms of judicial hearings, examinations of evidence and findings would be excessive. For instance, the proposed legislation would almost certainly require the judiciary to resolve such issues as—

(1) Whether a grant of transactional immunity to a witness would be "adequate for the purposes of the investigation,"

(2) Whether the interrogation of a witness for whom immunity is sought could be attributed directly or indirectly to wiretapping in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2515,

(3) Whether such a witness' testimony is "necessary to the public interest,"

(4) Whether a witness, if granted immunity would be exposed to the danger of foreign prosecution and, if so, whether he has been provided with "adequate safeguards,"

(5) Whether a request for immunity complies with Department of Justice guidelines or other practice,

(6) Whether the testimony of such a witness would fall "within the scope" of the grand jury's investigation and be "relevant" thereto as well as to the immunity order itself,

(7) Whether the Government has reasonable grounds to believe that a witness would be an accused,

8. Whether the Government properly refrained from advising a witness that he was a target of a grand jury investigation on the ground that, if so advised, he might flee, tamper with witnesses or otherwise seek to delay the investigation,

(9) What information concerning a grand jury's investigation should have been imparted to a witness in order to enable him to prepare and seek permission to present rebuttal evidence to the grand jury,

(10) What sanctions should be imposed on the Government for failure to comply with its obligations under the proposed legislation,

(11) Whether evidence not presented to a grand jury might be "exculpatory," see Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1973), or might have "materially" affected the testimony of a witness who appeared before the grand jury, see United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976),

(13) Whether a witness is not "financially able" to retain his own counsel and thus entitled to an assigned counsel under the Criminal Justice Act.

(13) Whether the conduct of a witness' counsel in the grand jury room in advising his client and in objecting to questions has been so disruptive as to require his removal from the grand jury room and the substitution of other counsel for the witness.

14. Whether the substitution of such counsel would violate a witness' statutory or constitutional right to counsel of his own choice.

(15) Whether counsel for a possible target of a grand jury investigation may appear in the grand jury room as counsel for more than one witness without involving conflicts of interest.

(16) What relief may be granted retroactively with respect to a subpoena that is quashed after the witness has appeared and testified before the grand jury,

(17) Whether a subpoena must be quashed because it is "oppressive," "punitive" or because the witness' appearance is "unnecessary" or his testimony would be "privileged" or "cumulative."

The foregoing examples of the issues that would be repeatedly faced by federal judges in administering the proposed legislation demonstrate that the court would be called upon to interpret many terms that are vague and general in their import and to review evidence, much of it complex in nature, to make the necessary rulings.

The proposed legislation, if enacted, may also prevent the federal courts from complying with the mandate of the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161–3174, to the effect that, beginning in July 1979, they must dismiss indictments that were not filed within 30 days after the defendant had been arrested or served with a summons in connection with the charges against him, see 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161 (b), 3162(a)(1). Although the Speedy Trial Act excludes certain periods of delay in computing the prescribed time limits, see 18 U.S.C. § 3161(h), the excluded periods are so limited in nature that delays of the type that will inevitably occur under the amendments proposed by H.R. 94 will create a possibly irreconcilable tension between these two statutes.

Since it would not be appropriate to attempt in this letter a detailed analysis of each of the omnibus provisions of H.R. 94, we attach hereto a memorandum setting forth some of the major provisions to which we are opposed and the grounds of our opposition. We believe that the views stated in this memorandum are generally in accord with those of the Committee on Administration of the Criminal Law of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which we are advised will be set forth in a report to be forwarded shortly to your Committee.

We would appreciate your furnishing a copy of this letter and enclosure to the members of your Committee. We stand ready, should the Committee desire, to answer questions or to furnish such additional information as may be available.

Respectfully yours,

Memorandum re: Certain proposals in H.R. 94, a bill dealing with grand jury procedures and the rights and liberties of grand jurors

The following is an analysis of certain sections of H.R. 94 to which various members of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals are opposed. The memorandum does not deal with proposals, some of which are mentioned in a letter dated July 1977, signed by certain members of the court, that may be favored or unopposed.

1. Restrictions on the court's power to hold a recalcitrant witness in civil contempt under 28 U.S.C. § 1826

The bill would amend 28 U.S.C. §1828 to limit the court's use of civil contempt power in dealing with recalcitrant witnesses before a grand jury by

(1) requiring that the witness be given 72 hours' notice of a contempt hearing, absent a showing of special need for speed;

(2) placing a 6-month maximum on the period of confinement that might be imposed, or a period equal to the length of the court proceeding or of the grand jury, whichever is lesser;

(3) barring further confinement of a grand jury witness for a subsequent refusal to testify concerning the same transaction or event;

(4) requiring that a witness held in contempt be admitted to bail pending appeal unless the appeal is frivolous;

(5) providing counsel under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2006A, for any witness unable to obtain adequate representation;

(6) prohibiting contempt proceedings against a witness interrogated on the basis of illegal wire intercepts in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2515.

Comments: A witness charged with civil contempt before a grand jury should, of course, be afforded reasonable notice and opportunity to defend. However, reasonable notice in a particular case ordinarily depends on such circumstances as the nature and complexity of the evidence to be obtained and presented, the extent of preparation needed to present it, and the amount of time remaining before the grand jury's term is terminated.

Rather than fixing the required notice at a specific period (e.g., 72 hours), a better approach, which would recognize flexibility as essential, would be to provide that reasonable notice be given, since there would be many cases where less than 72 hours' notice would be consistent with due process and with the public interest in avoiding unnecessary delay in the investigation and prosecution of crimes, which Congress mandated in enacting the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161, et seq.

Similarly, to limit confinement for civil contempt to a maximum of six months, regardless of the possibly longer remaining term of the grand jury, and to bar any further confinement for the witness' subsequent refusal to testify concerning the same transaction or event, unnecessarily weakens the court's power to require a recalcitrant witness to give testimony to which the grand jury is entitled in its search for the truth. The purpose of § 1826 is not to punish but to provide a weapon that can be used to require a witness to furnish material testimony which he is obligated to give in the public interest. The witness, of course, holds the key to his own release, which he normally obtains upon his testifying. The length of incarceration, however, that will induce a witness to fulfill this obligation will vary according to the witness and the circumstances of each case.

Some witnesses would fulfill their legal obligation only if faced with the prospect of incarceration longer than six months, whereas others would be induced to act by the prospect of a much shorter commitment. The court should be vested with the flexible power to impose whatever term appears reasonably necessary under the circumstances of each case rather than be hobbled by a fixed maximum period that may be shorter than the remaining term of the grand jury.

Bail pending appeal from a civil contempt order issued under § 1826 should be fixed where the witness can demonstrate a likelihood of success on appeal from the district judge's order. The proposal that bail be granted except where the appeal is found to be frivolous places the burden on the wrong person—the prosecutor. After a district judge, following a hearing, has decided the merits against the witness, the burden should normally be on the witness. If it appears that there are close or difficult questions warranting review, the district court or the court of appeals, in the exercise of their discretion, would then normally admit the witness to bail pending the appeal. But a witness should not be presumptively entitled to bail after a hearing has gone against him.

To prohibit holding in contempt a witness who has been interrogated on the basis of illegally obtained wiretaps runs directly counter to the Supreme Court's sound reasoning in United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 at 349–50 (1974). Because a grand jury does not finally adjudicate the guilt or innocence of a person but merely determines whether there is probable cause to believe that the person has committed a crime, the grand jury has always been permitted to pursue its investigatory and accusatory functions unhampered by procedural and evidentiary restrictions applied in a criminal trial. Moreover, the Supreme Court concluded in Calandra that the incremental deterrence against police misconduct that would result from extending the exclusionary rule to grand jury proceedings would be speculative at best and not justify extension of the rule to grand jury proceedings even though it would be enforced at trial.

Regardless whether one agrees with the Supreme Court's reasoning, there can be no doubt that the proposed prohibition against interrogation of grand jury witnesses on the basic of illegally obtained intercepts would place a very heavy additional burden on already overworked federal courts. As the Supreme Court noted in Calandra:

"Permitting witnesses to invoke the exclusionary rule before a grand jury would precipitate adjudication of issues hitherto reserved for the trial on the merits and would delay and disrupt grand jury proceedings. Suppression hearings would halt the orderly progress of an investigation and might necessitate extended litigation of issues only tangentially related to the grand jury's primary objective. . . . In sum, we believe that allowing a grand jury witness to invoke the exclusionary rule would unduly interfere with the effective and expeditious discharge of the grand jury's duties." 414 U.S. at 349–50.

As matters stand today, the demands of competent trial counsel for wiretap canvasses and checkouts on the part of the Government, each of which usually require weeks for a report and are often followed by court hearings to determine whether there was strict adherence to the procedures prescribed by 18 U.S.C. §§ 2516–19 frequently delay or prolong criminal trials. If this proposal were adopted and each witness provided with competent counsel, the prohibition against interrogation of grand jury witnesses on the basis of illegally obtained intercepts would enable counsel to stall grand jury investigations indefinitely and to raise issues that would involve the court in countless hearings.

2. Proposals to change the type of immunity that may be granted to recalcitrant witnesses under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002–3 from "use" to "transactional" immunity and to change the conditions for granting immunity.

Under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002–3 as this statute presently stands a United States Attorney, when he believes it necessary to the public interest, may, with the approval of the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General or any designated Assistant Attorney General, request the district court to issue an order compelling a grand jury witness who has invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege to testify in exchange for a grant of immunity under which no testimony or information provided by the witness may be used directly or indirectly against him in any criminal case except perjury. Upon the making of such a request the court is obligated to grant such "use" immunity to the witness.

H.R. 94 would shift from the United States Attorney to the federal court the duty of determining to its "satisfaction," upon a request by the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General, or designated Assistant Attorney General, (1) whether the testimony of a witness is necessary in the public interest, (2) whether there is danger of foreign prosecution of the witness, (3) whether the grand jury investigation is legally authorized and the request for immunity complies with the Department of Justice guidelines, (4) whether the proposed testimony is within the scope of the grand jury's investigation and relevant thereto as well as relevant to the immunity order, and (5) whether a grant of immunity would be "adequate for the purposes of the investigation." Only if satisfied that these conditions have been met and if furnished with a certified "summary of the evidence relating to the witness," would the court be permitted to grant immunity. Even then the court might in its discretion refuse to grant immunity. The immunity granted, moreover, would not simply prohibit use of the witness' testimony against him (directly or indirectly) but would immunize him from prosecution on account of any "transaction, matter or thing" concerning which he was compelled to testify.

Comments.—This proposal is most unwise and would place an intolerable additional burden on already overtaxed federal courts. Except in extraordinary cases (e.g., Watergate), under the principle of separation of powers, which is an integral part of our Constitution, the Attorney General, not the federal court, is the party who determines whether an immunity grant would be in the public interest. It is the function and duty of the Attorney General, not that of the court, to investigate and prosecute those cases which will best insure that the federal laws will be carried out and to coordinate prosecutorial efforts toward that end.

Moreover under our system of government the Attorney General and his subordinates are far better equipped than a federal judge to make the necessary determination. The prosecutor is ordinarily the only person sufficiently familiar with the details of pending investigations and prosecutions to determine whether a grant of immunity is essential to obtain important evidence or to secure an indictment or conviction. In contrast, the court is not sufficiently acquainted with the general program for federal law enforcement in the community or the particular problems in each case to determine whether a witness' testimony would warrant a grant of immunity, much less to determine whether such a grant would be in the public interest.

The new duties placed by the new amendment on the federal judiciary would be staggering. To carry them out the court would have to play a role that has traditionally been exercised only by the Executive Branch, studying the background of the grand jury's proposed or pending investigation, acquainting itself with the relationship of the investigation to other federal law enforcement programs, and delving into the often complex evidence in each case to appraise the relevancy, adequacy and need for the testimony of the witness whose immunity is sought. Only after steeping himself in the background could the judge be satisfied that the conditions imposed by the legislative proposal were met. This would require in many cases an enormous amount of time and effort to be invested by already overworked judges. It might also require judges in some cases later to excuse themselves from sitting as the trial judge because of inability to preside without being influenced by the background information acquired in the investigation to determine whether immunity should be granted.

The proposal that, where an immunity grant is necessary, it must be of "transactional" rather than "use" immunity is also unwise. A grant of immunity represents an accommodation between a witness' Fifth Amendment privilege and society's need for evidence essential to law enforcement. As the Supreme Court recognized in Kastingar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), as long as a grant of immunity is "co-extensive with the scope" of the witness' Fifth Amendment privilege he receives all of the protection to which he is entitled under the Constitution, no more, no less, i.e., the right to be protected against the use of his testimony against him, with the government bearing the burden of proving that any later prosecution against him has not been based on or derived from his testimony. After some six years of experience under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6001-3 we know of no evidence that the broader transaction immunity is necessary to protect witnesses against prosecution derived from disclosures which they have been compelled to make through grants of "use" immunity. Since use immunity fully protects the witness' constitutional rights, transactional immunity is therefore unnecessary.

3. Imposition of various conditions upon the prosecutor's presentation of evidence to a grand jury (proposed § 3329).

H.R. 94 would add a new § 3329 to Title 18, U.S. Code, which, among other things, would require that the court, in giving preliminary instructions to each grand jury, "assure that the Grand Jury reasonably understands . . . (5) the subject matter of the investigation." The proposal would also permit any person to ask to testify or to produce records before the grand jury, whereupon the prosecutor would be required to notify the grand jury and, if he wished, make recommendations with respect to the handling of the request. Unless a majority of the grand jury voted to the contrary, the prosecutor would be required to subpoena the evidence or witness, who must then be permitted to testify upon waiving immunity.

The prosecutor would also (1) be required to notify a person against whom evidence is to be offered that he has a "right to testify and present evidence," unless the prosecutor can prove that the person would flee, endanger other witnesses, or unduly delay the investigation and prosecution; (2) be required to advise the grand jury periodically of the nature and existence of any evidence, not yet received, "which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant"; (3) be barred from representing a case to another grand jury after a grand jury has failed to return an indictment unless the court finds that additional relevant evidence has been discovered.

Comments.—This proposal would heap enormous and difficult burdens on the judiciary, precluding it from performance of other essential duties, including compliance with the Speedy Trial Act.

Turning first to the requirement that the judge assure that the grand jury understands the "subject matter of the investigation" of each case, this would be difficult enough to achieve in a district where grand jury investigations were few and far between. But in a large urban center such as New York the court would find it virtually impossible to comply. In the Southern District of New York, for instance, there may be as many as 25 grand juries functioning simultaneously, with a half dozen sitting at the same time, of which some are "regular" grand juries hearing a series of cases in one day's sitting, following each of which a vote is taken on whether to indict. To satisfy the proposed amendment several judges would be required daily to acquaint themselves with the background of each case and to instruct the jury accordingly. There simply would not be enough judicial time to meet this additional obligation unless new judgeships were created or existing judges abandoned important trials and hearings of other cases to perform this new duty.

The other proposed amendments, aside from policy considerations which might be debated at length, pose problems that could be resolved in specific cases only after evidentiary hearings. For instance, where a prosecutor fails to notify a person against whom evidence is offered because the Government did not become aware that he was likely to be a target until all the evidence was in and an indictment filed against him, a motion to dismiss the indictment for failure to receive notification would be filed, which would require the court to unravel the background in order to make findings.

The proposed amendment also raises a question as to when a prosecutor is justified in concluding that a person need not be notified because he might flee, endanger other witnesses or unduly delay the investigation. The assumption that the Government can always come in with tangible proof on this issue seems unreal. In many cases knowledge that a grand jury investigation is pending may lead a person to flee or to start tampering with witnesses even though no tangible evidence could have been adduced that he would do so until the misconduct occurred.

Assuming that a prospective accused is given the opportunity to give rebuttal evidence to the grand jury, there arises the question of how much information must be furnished to him by the Government regarding the case in order to enable him to prepare and present his evidence. Must the Government make a detailed disclosure that would outline the evidence against him? If so, would this not turn the grand jury proceeding into a preliminary mini-trial on the merits? Assuming there is a failure on the part of the prosecutor to comply with these proposed requirements as construed by the courts, what sanctions could be imposed? Dismissal of an indictment? All of these questions would have to be resolved by the courts.

The proposed amendments further appear unnecessary. In most cases the evidence of probable cause is clear. The defense could at best raise issues for trial rather than be entitled to a "no true bill." A grand jury is instructed by the court at the outset, and the prosecutor recognizes, that its duty is not merely to indict but to protect the innocent against unwarranted indictment. Although the grand jury looks principally to the prosecutor for production of relevant evidence, it may in close or doubtful cases protect against arbitrary accusations by notifying the target of its investigation and permitting him to testify or to point to exculpatory evidence. Nor does anything prevent the grand jury from directing the prosecutor to subpoena witnesses or other evidence that may be relevant. However, to impose upon the prosecutor the statutory duty of converting the grand jury's investigation into an adversary proceeding goes too far. Moreover, it is impractical for the reason that it is frequently impossible for prosecutor or court to make the kind of decisions dictated by the proposed amendment, since the lines at the preliminary investigatory stage are often not as bright and sharp as they later become at trial, after the parties have the benefit of additional evidence that was not uncovered or available at the time when the indictment was filed.

For these reasons it is also inadvisable to require the prosecutor to advise the grand jury of all Brady or impeachment material. In many cases the Government simply is not in a position at the investigatory stage to determine what is or may be exculpatory. Nor can the court or prosecutor, before the facts are uncovered, determine whether evidence not presented to the grand jury would have "materially" affected at witness' credibility or negotiated guilt.

In short, these proposals, if adopted, could have the effect of delaying, obstructing and prolonging grand jury investigations by turning the grand jury proceeding into a preliminary mini-trial in which the Government, the grand jury and the court would be forced to devote a disproportionate amount of time to issues that should be saved for resolution at trial. Rather than expose the Government and the courts to such unconscionable burdens at the risk of having a resulting indictment dismissed, the better course would be to rely upon the integrity of the Government and the disposition of grand juries to act fairly and to hear both sides where there are doubts about the existence of probable cause. Ordinarily neither the grand jury nor the prosecutor has a motive to indict unless there is probable cause to believe that on the record as a whole the accused committed the crime. The prosecutor hardly desires an indictment unless he believes he will be able to obtain a conviction after trial.

4. Right of grand jury witness to have counsel (§ 3330A)

At present a grand jury witness may retain counsel whom he may consult outside of the jury room. H.R. 94 would add a § 3330A to Title 18 U.S.C. to the effect that (1) every witness should be entitled to the assistance of counsel, with counsel appointed under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A, for any person financially unable to obtain counsel, (2) counsel would have the right to be present with the witness when interrogated in the grant jury room and to advise him but not to address the grand jurors, and (3) if counsel violated the limits on his function in the grand jury room, he could be removed by the court and the witness ordered to obtain new counsel.

Comments.—In theory the presence of counsel with the witness in the grand jury room instead of outside of the grand jury room seems reasonable enough, particularly if the witness is a possible target of the grand jury's investigation. Counsel, if present, might be more effective in improving his client's understanding of his constitutional rights and protecting him against violation of those rights or of statutory privileges and against harassment, misunderstandings and the like.

In practice, however, admitting counsel to the grand jury room poses the serious risk that the proceedings will be protracted and disrupted, with the court being forced to intervene repeatedly. Experience in criminal trials demonstrates that many lawyers simply would not adhere to the idealistic conception that they would limit themselves to advising their clients in sotto voce. Once in the grand jury room, many counsel, unimpeded by the presence of the court, would seek to influence the grand jury, using tactics of the type frequently employed in criminal trials, e.g., lengthy objections to questions, in which counsel refers to irrelevant prejudicial material as the basis for an objection. Advice to a witness could be given in tones that would be overheard by every grand juror. A witness' answers would be those of the attorney rather than of the witness himself. Judges would inevitably be invoked to rule on preliminary objections as to the relevancy and materiality of questions, to discipline or remove counsel from the grand jury room and to substitute new counsel. Moreover, should a judge discipline or remove a witness' counsel, a serious question would then arise as to whether he had interfered with the witness' constitutional or statutory right to counsel of his own choice.

To provide counsel for every grand jury witness "financially unable to obtain legal representation," as would be mandated by the proposed § 3330A, would probably tax our limited pool of available lawyers versed in criminal matters beyond the breaking point, rendering them unavailable for the more important task of trying cases. To provide counsel for such witnesses would also increase enormously the appropriations required to finance appointments under the Criminal Justice Act, since the number of indigent witnesses called before grand juries would be far greater than the number of indigent accused.

On balance, the harm that would flow from the proposal to provide each witness with counsel in the grand jury room substantially outweighs the speculative benefits from such a procedure. The present federal grand jury system has worked reasonably well in protecting witnesses' rights. The only person normally desiring counsel at the grand jury's investigatory stage is a possible target of the investigation. Most, if not all, federal prosecutors advise such persons of their status if it is known to the prosecutor and of their Miranda rights, including the right to have counsel available for consultation. Indeed the giving of such a warning could well be mandated.

Under the existing system, moreover, the target of an investigation has the option of invoking his privilege. Although the witness may not be as competent to judge the significance of a question as would be his counsel, there is no reason to assume that the prosecutor or grand jurors would be unfair in questioning him. The risk that a witness would be improperly questioned is outweighed by the disruption, obstruction and delay that could be expected if each witness, regardless of whether the witness is or might be a target, were provided with counsel at his elbow.

5. Quashing of grand jury subpoenas (§ 3330B)

H.R. 94 would add a new § 3330B which, among other things, would require that a witness subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury be given notice of his right to counsel, including appointed counsel, his Fifth Amendment privilege, the "subject matter of the investigation" and statutes involved, and whether his own conduct is being investigated.

A motion to quash, which could be made in the district where the witness resides or in the district where the subpoena has been issued, would automatically stay compliance with the subpoena until the court had ruled on the motion. The Government would be obligated to show that the testimony was not sought to secure information for trial or regarding activities of a person already under indictment, and that the evidence would be "relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction." The Government would furthermore be required to show that compliance with the subpoena would not be "unreasonable or oppressive," would not require "unnecessary appearance" and would not lead to testimony or information that would be "cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would not be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances." The court could quash or impose sanctions upon findings that the witness had already been confined for civil contempt under § 1826 for refusal to testify, that the witness had given notice of intent to claim his privilege, or that a previous grand jury had failed to indict him on the same evidence.

Under the amendment a grand jury could be convened only in the district where "elements" of the criminal conduct under investigation occurred and the court could quash a subpoena upon finding that a witness' appearance would impose a serious hardship on him or his family because of the grand jury's location, or could transfer the grand jury proceedings to some other district.

Comments.—This proposal for the most part is contrary to the public interest. It would greatly increase the opportunities for obstruction and delay of grand jury proceedings without any apparent gain in the administration of justice. It would impose additional, unnecessary burdens on the prosecutor and would enormously and unnecessarily increase the work of overloaded federal judges.

If a prosecutor has reason to believe that a witness is a target of a grand jury investigation, he should advise the witness. This is the practice currently followed by most federal prosecutors. But to require the Government to advise every witness of the "subject matter" or purpose of a grand jury investigation and of the relevancy of the information sought from the subpoenaed witness would tend to destroy the objectives of grand jury secrecy, which are to prevent the escape of prospective accused, insure deliberation by the grand jury free from importuning or harassment, prevent subordination of perjury or tampering with witnesses, and encourage free disclosure and protection of the innocent from unwarranted accusations. Disclosure of subject matter and relevancy would in many instances be the equivalent of publicly broadcasting the grand jury's investigation rather than keeping it secret. The time for such disclosure is after the accusation, if any, is made, and at the ensuing trial rather than during the grand jury's investigation, which is not an adversary proceeding.

Usually it is inconvenient for most witnesses to be required by subpoena to attend any proceeding, whether it be a trial or a grand jury inquiry. Although witnesses should be protected against harassment or oppression, there is no reason to believe that such tactics are common as to require the type of showing or sanction that would be imposed by § 3330B. As against the witness' convenience, moreover, there is the public importance of the grand jury's investigation which should come first. Where it investigates a crime believed to have been committed within its jurisdiction, there is no adequate substitute for the personal testimony of witnesses, whether they are nearby or must come from a distance. Their travel and living expenses are paid by the Government, and it is usually in the interest of all parties concerned to examine the witness promptly and to release him for return to the district of his residence. In these days when one can travel in a matter of hours by air to almost any point from which a witness might be subpoenaed the danger of oppression is minimal.

Whether a witness' testimony is "relevant," "necessary," and not "cumulative," "unreasonable," "privileged," "oppressive" or "exceedingly burdensome" is a matter of opinion which can be arrived at by a judge only after examination into the entire background and circumstances, which are often complex. For this purpose additional court hearings would be triggered by the inevitable motions to quash. The result would probably be a series of small trials on the merits to determine whether a witness, advised by counsel provided under the Criminal Justice Act, must appear in response to the subpoena. Moreover, if the witness chose to seek relief in the district of his residence rather than in the court which issued the subpoena the prosecutor, although the balance of conveniences weighed in his favor against that of the witness, would have to leave the situs of the grand jury investigation to acquaint the non-issuing court with the essential facts. The prosecutor would thus be forced to suspend his supervision of the grand jury investigation in which other witnesses might be appearing. Similarly, the court's time would be unnecessarily absorbed in hearings to determine whether the venue of the grand jury should be changed to suit a witness' convenience. The potential for abuse and prolongation of the investigatory procedure is substantial.

The provision obligating the Government to show that a witness' testimony is not sought for trial or that information is not sought regarding activities of a person held under indictment appears to be unnecessary. As federal decisional law now stands the grand jury may not be used to develop evidence for trial.

6. Encouragement of independent grand jury inquiries (§ 3330)

H.R. 94 would also add a new § 3330, which is designed to encourage grand juries to undertake independent inquiries of the "runaway" type. It would provide them with special counsel and investigators for the purpose, should the Government attorney refuse to cooperate. The grand jury's term would be extended at its request up to 36 months. The special counsel would have the powers and pay of a federal prosecutor, including staff, appropriations, reimbursement of expenses, etc.

Comments.—This proposal is unwise for several reasons. It would pose the risk of abuse of power by an inexperienced, rump body going off on its own, misguided by a special prosecutor who might be motivated by reasons inconsistent with sound administration of justice and unfamiliar with sensitive policies formulated over many years by the Department of Justice regarding such important matters as division of responsibility between state and federal governments and guidelines for exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The result could be not only confusion but the filing of indictments without adequate groundwork.

Any accusatory system can become an instrument of oppression in the wrong hands. Although, under the existing system, there may have been occasions where federal prosecutors have failed in their duties or abused their power as the advisors depended upon by grand juries to guide them, the instances have been rare and do not warrant broad and sweeping authorizations of the type here proposed. A provision for runaway grand juries may occasionally be salutary in state practice or even in federal (e.g., Watergate) but it poses too great a risk of irresponsible encroachment upon the Executive Branch in our federal system to be encouraged without strict limitations of a type not found in the proposed § 3330.

7. Availability of grand jury transcripts of testimony of witness (§ 3333)

A separate provision, § 3333 would make available to any grand jury witness a copy of any earlier statement by him in the Government's possession and of the transcript of electronic recording of his testimony before the grand jury. Prior to trial a defendant would be entitled to the grand jury transcripts of all witnesses to be called by the Government at trial, all statements made to the grand jury by the prosecutor and all grand jury testimony or evidence "which in any manner could be considered exculpatory," or which the court might deem "material" to the defense. Upon a showing of good cause the court could deny or restrict such disclosures.

Comments.—To the extent that transcripts of grand jury testimony would aid a trial court and jury in its search for the truth, there should be no objection to disclosures of such transcripts. However, the initial determination of what constitutes exculpatory material should, as under Title 18 U.S.C. § 3500, rest upon the shoulders of the Government, with the court being called upon to rule only where the Government had doubts or there is reason to believe that the Government has not furnished all exculpatory material. No purpose would be served by adding a clause "in any manner" before the term "exculpatory." The standard should be whether, under the circumstances known to the Government, the testimony or evidence could reasonably be considered exculpatory.

Nor would any purpose be served by requiring disclosure to the accused of the prosecutor's statements to the grand jury, except to the extent that such statements might reasonably lead to exculpatory evidence. A prosecutor's statement is not evidence.

8. Defendant's right to a preliminary examination (§ 3368)

H.R. 94 would add § 3368 guaranteeing each defendant a preliminary examination, unless waived, which might be held before or after the filing of an indictment or information in the district court. A preliminary examination after the filing of an indictment would be a sheer waste of time since the indictment evidences the existence of probable cause. Defense could in such a case demand a preliminary examination in order to seek discovery or protect themselves against possible later § 2255 applications or suits for malpractice. It would be an unnecessary burden on the court, particularly since most indictments result in pleas of guilty.

9. Reports concerning grand jury investigations

We live in an age when reports seem to have assumed a sacred character in themselves. Unnecessary statistics are being gathered by the trunkful. This bill requires a report by the Attorney General to the Administrative Office of the number of investigations undertaken by a grand jury with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken. What this hope to accomplish, we do not know. Reporting would also require a list of immunity requests by the Attorney General and orders granting immunity, the number of contempt cases, the number of arrests, indictments and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity and a description of data banks by which grand jury information is processed by the Department of Justice. Some of this material is not in itself objectionable except that resources may be better used to a more appropriate purpose.

Mr. EILBERG. Our next witness is Mr. Charles S. Ruff, Watergate Prosecutor. We welcome you, Mr. Ruff.

Do you wish to submit your statement for the record or summarize it? Either would be in order and I would also suggest if you wish to address yourself perhaps to any particular points raised by Judge Lacey that might be helpful for the record also, but you go your own way and then we'll ask you some questions.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES S. RUFF, WATERGATE PROSECUTOR

Mr. RUFF. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today. I will indeed, if it meets the committee's concerns, simply leave on the record the statement which

I have already submitted and try to restrict my presentation to just a few minutes and then respond to whatever questions the committee may have.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, your statement will be made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Ruff follows:]

STATEMENT OF CHARLES F. C. RUFF, WATERGATE PROSECUTOR

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: Thank you for giving me the opportunity to appear before you today and to testify concerning the important legislation that you have under consideration. I should note at the outset that I appear neither in my official capacity as Director of the Watergate Special Prosecution Force nor as a representative of the American Bar Association Grand Jury Committee; hence my views are mine alone and not those of either organization.

Most thoughtful analysts of the federal grand jury system agree that some changes are necessary. Unhappily, however, much of the debate over the extent of those changes seems to have become polarized, with critics urging extensive reform and charging wholesale repression of individual rights while defenders deny that anything is wrong. There are, of course, exceptions—commentators like Judge Frankel who approach the problem with a broad scholarly and practical background and whose recommendations address the crucial issues in measured terms. It is important, I submit, that the Congress take such a balanced approach, but I question whether the bill now before this Subcommittee does so. Much of the proposed legislation has merit, but on the whole it is, I fear, an overreaction to problems more illusory than real.

Any attempt to reform the grand jury must begin from the premise that it is the pre-eminent vehicle for the investigation of white-collar, organized and other complex criminal activity. It is no accident that the last fifteen years have seen a quantum leap in the prosecution by the federal government of sophisticated fraunds, public corruption and similar offenses while state prosecutors have remained incapable, for the most part, of equally vigorous enforcement. The success of the Department of Justice and the United States Attorneys is due, in large measure, to their increasingly effective use of the investigative grand jury. But with this success came, undeniably, overreaching—particularly but not solely in the realm of the quasi-political investigations of the late 1960's and early 1970's. This overreaching has prompted much of the criticism, some of it justified, of the present grand jury process. For the first time attention has been paid to the rights of those called as witnesses as well as those who are the subjects of the grand jury's inquiry—interestingly, attention little paid when the principal focus of the grand jury's activity was the member of organized crime.

Obviously, respect for individual rights must be weighed heavily in the balance but no more heavily than constitutional and other societal interests truly require. It is the appropriate balance between the public's interest in effective law enforcement and the public's interest in protecting the rights of individual citizens that Congress must strike in drafting grand jury legislation, and on one major point H.R. 94 achieves that goal.

The proposal to permit every witness to have counsel present in the grand jury room has met, and will undoubtedly continue to meet, substantial opposition from prosecutors. The principal grounds for that opposition are two: first, that the presence of an attorney will disrupt the conduct of the investigation whatever statutory restrictions are placed on his role; and second, that his presence may intimidate a witness who might otherwise have been willing to be candid if a lawyer hired by his employer could not hear what he was saying. Neither ground in my judgment justifies the refusal to afford to the grand jury witness the meaningful assistance of counsel without the artificial barrier of the jury room door between them.

The fear that the presence of a lawyer in the grand jury room may prove disruptive cannot be dismissed as idle—the history of the defense bar in pressing aggressively to expand individual rights during the criminal justice revolution of the last fifteen years is likely to continue when the forum of the grand jury is opened. If the legislation specifically limits the lawyer's role, however, and the Committee's report makes it clear that judges are expected to enforce this restriction, the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed most prosecutors would admit, I think, that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel.

The problem of a lawyer's interference with an otherwise cooperative witness is more difficult to resolve. There is no question that the problem of multiple representation of witnesses during the investigative process is a serious one and surfaces most frequently in just the kind of investigation in which the grand jury is most important. Movement has begun in the organized bar and in the courts to address the problem by clarifying and enforcing the ethical obligation of attorneys, but the movement has been slow. Nonetheless, in my judgment the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room will not have any appreciable impact on the level of improper influence exercised by counsel on witnesses.

In my experience I have encountered very few witnesses who indicated a desire to cooperate without the knowledge of their counsel. In the typical grand jury investigation into the activities of any hierarchically structured organization, a witness from the lower or middle levels represented by counsel hired by his superiors will meet with the prosecutor and there will be some discussion both about his status and about the nature of his prospective testimony. If his lawyer advises him to assert his privilege against self-incrimination, and the prosecutor decides not to immunize him, it is difficult to see what added harm is created by permitting the witness' lawyer to be in the grand jury room. If the witness is advised to testify without asserting his privilege, there is some risk that he will be less candid if his employer's representative is present, but I question whether the risk is measurably greater than it is with the lawyer outside the grand jury room, since, if the witness' testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will probably become evident to the lawyer in fairly short order. If the government decides to immunize the witness, it has already announced that it considers him a potential witness against his employer, and has laid a firm basis for the disqualification of counsel.

In any event, whether there will be an increase in the risk of improper influence is, at best, speculative, and there does exist an alternative solution. Motions to disqualify are now being made with increasing frequency, although they have not met with uniform success. More importantly, distinguished members of the defense bar are speaking out on the dangers inherent in multiple representation, and there is, therefore, some meaningful hope both for increased judicial receptiveness and for self-policing by the profession. Against this background, although the question is not an easy one, I do not believe that the critics have made out their case against the presence of counsel.

Although, as I have indicated, I believe that the proposal to permit counsel in the grand jury room strikes an appropriate balance between the need for effective investigation and the need to protect the rights of the witness, the same cannot be said for other portions of the pending bill. I will sketch out briefly some of my concerns and will be glad to elaborate if the Subcommittee so wishes.

Recalcitrant witnesses.—Although it is now the policy of the Department of Justice not to seek repeated confinement of witnesses who refuse to testify after being immunized and it is reasonable to codify that policy, the reduction of the maximum period of confinement to six months means that a witness can achieve perpetual freedom from compulsion to testify about the most serious offenses by serving that relatively short term. It is, of course, difficult to judge just how many months in jail will serve as an an effective but not excessive sanction, but I think it safe to say that six months will not deter the witness who knows that at the end of that time he will never again be obliged to give testimony about the same transaction. I would recommend the retention of the present eighteen-month maximum. In addition, I believe it preferable to permit separate contempt citations for refusal to testify before the grand jury and before the court.

Immunity.—Two aspects of the proposals concerning immunity are troublesome. First, the decision to return to transactional immunity is, by and large, a meaningless effort to provide a protection which the witness does not need. In the absence of some showing that the government has abused the use immunity process by compelling witnesses' testimony and then prosecuting them, the requirement that transactional immunity be conferred actually removes a safeguard now afforded to all witnesses. Testimony compelled under a grant of use immunity cannot be used against the witness in anyway, except in a perjury prosecution, but testimony given under a grant of transactional immunity could be used, for example, to impeach the witness who is charged with an unrelated offense.

Second, to give the ultimate immunity decision to the courts rather than to the executive is to infringe on the prosecution function without real justification. The decision to immunize a particular witness is made against the background of an entire investigation, with information developed from a variety of sources and judgments to be made about the likelihood of convicting those seen as principal actors in the criminal activity. This discretion has historically been reserved to the prosecutor subject to limited review where it is exercised in constitutionally impermissible fashion and subject to the sanction of the jury's refusal to convict. The proposed bill asks the judge not to decide a legal issue but to decide whether a particular prosecution serves the amorphous public interest and whether the prosecutor's choice of means in conducting an investigation is the right one. Further, to give the judge sufficient information to make an informed decision would require virtually wholesale disclosure of vital information to the witness and his lawyer. Beyond this, except in those few cases where a witness does not wish to be immunized, either the witness will acquiesce in the request and the judge will serve as a mere rubber stamp, or the government will make an informal arrangement with the witness in order to secure his testimony—a procedure frequently used even under the present immunity laws.

Rights of witnesses.—The provision for advising the grand jury witness of his rights upon service of a subpoena seems wholly appropriate. It has been suggested that to advise a non-target witness of his privilege against self incrimination will dissuade a possibly reluctant witness from testifying, but two points should be made on that issue: first, the experience of the Watergate Special Prosecution Force, which followed an extremely liberal policy concerning warnings, showed no marked increase in the number of uncooperative witnesses; and second, even if there were such an increase, it is difficult to justify a failure to warn the witness on the ground that he may decide to exercise a privilege which clearly is his to assert.

One caveat, however: the provision that the witness be advised of the subject matter of the investigation beyond a listing of the statutes being investigated presents a serious risk of disseminating information about the persons who are the subjects of the grand jury's inquiry, of permitting a witness to structure his testimony artificially, and of permitting interested third parties to alter or destroy evidence or to interfere with the witness himself. Further, it should be made clear that a good faith effort to list the principal statutes under consideration by the grand jury will suffice, so that a failure to list what may be one of twenty possible federal offenses will not undermine the validity of the subpoena.

The provision that motions to quash may be heard in the district where the witness resides or is served does little except to disrupt the orderly grand jury process. The thrust of this and the related provisions concerning the showing required to be made by the government is clearly to establish a presumption in favor of the witness' right to refuse to testify and against the legitimacy of the grand jury's inquiry. I respectfully submit that such a presumption flies in the face of the historic obligation of the citizen to give evidence without a showing that there has been widespread abuse of the grand jury process. Would Congress enact a similar provision governing its own subpoenas?

There already exists a right in every witness to quash a subpoena if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive. In the vast majority of cases, however, the motion to quash never becomes necessary because the time, place and manner of compliance are negotiated with the prosecutor who caused the subpoena to issue. I would think it reasonable, as an alternative, to provide that, where a witness has requested a stay of his appearance, and the prosecutor has refused, application could be made in another district for a temporary stay that would permit the appropriate request to be made in the district where the grand jury is sitting.

The provision concerning venue for grand jury investigations is, at best, meaningless and, at worst, extraordinarily burdensome. The requirement that a grand jury investigate only offenses that have occurred in its district is already the law.

The problem that the bill seeks to address is caused by existing venue rules that permit the trial of any conspiracy or other multi-district offense wherever any part of that offense was committed. To attempt to solve those venue problems by legislating grand jury reform is a useless exercise. Further, to provide that a court can transfer grand jury proceedings from one district to another to meet the needs of an individual witness is to play havoc with any sort of orderly investigation. Certainly the court retains sufficient authority to quash, stay or modify subpoenas to deal with the witness who is truly unable to comply without undue hardship.

Although the requirement that a complete recording of grand jury proceedings be kept is entirely appropriate, even recognizing the financial burden involved in compliance, there is no justification for providing each witness with a transcript of his testimony. I fail to see how such a requirement protects the witness in any meaningful fashion, but it certainly would mean that confidential and potentially damaging information would be given widespread currency. If the purpose is to permit a witness to revise testimony that he has given, certainly it would be sufficient to give him the opportunity to review a transcript on request in the prosecutor's office.

Nor does the requirement that the equivalent of the Jencks Act be made applicable to grand jury proceedings meet any real need. It seems a wholly legitimate tactic of examination and an aid to truth-finding for a prosecutor to examine a witness on the basis of prior statements without having given him the opportunity to conform his testimony. If the concern is that prosecutors will entrap a witness into perjury, it should be noted that courts have shown some willingness to dismiss charges on that basis, and any prosecutor will tell you that perjury convictions are the most difficult ones to secure.

Independent grand jury inquiries.—The grand jury is an investigative not a prosecutive agency, but the proposed legislation seems to treat it as having both functions. Is it intended that a special attorney be appointed by the court serve merely as the functionary of the grand jury—that he sign whatever indictment the grand jury prepares? Or is it intended that he exercise some discretion, and if so, when will the grand jury no longer be entitled to the substitution of an attorney who will comply with its wishes? Does the court have any discretion to refuse the appointment of a special attorney? None of these questions is answered by H.R. 94.

But beyond this, I have substantial qualms about the appointment of any prosecutor other than by the Executive Branch, and certainly about the appointment of a prosecutor responsible to no one in the carrying out of his duties. It is my understanding that another Subcommittee is now considering legislation to provide for the appointment of temporary special prosecutors, and I would suggest that the many and varied constitutional and practical problems involved in such appointments can better be addressed outside the narrow realm of the grand jury.

Duties of the attorney for the Government.—The requirement that the attorney bring to the attention of the grand jury a request by a citizen to appear or give evidence is a reasonable one, but I question the reasonableness of a blanket rule requiring that a subject of a grand jury's investigation be notified of his status and given the opportunity to appear. The Watergate Special Prosecution Force, as a matter of policy, frequently did give potential defendants that opportunity, but it must be remembered that the work of that office involved matters already much in the public eye and also involved subjects who posed little risk of flight or injury to others. The grand jury is charged with the duty of determining whether there is probable cause to believe that an individual has committed a crime, and there is no societal interest to be served by expanding the scope of its inquiry to the point where it becomes a trial on the merits. Nor, in the vast majority of cases, will a prospective defendant be well served by a decision to testify; I dare say that almost every prosecutor would like nothing better than to have the defendant's testimony under oath, and only in extraordinary cases will that testimony influence the grand jurors to refuse to indict.

The proposal that the prosecutor advise the grand jury of evidence "which might . . . tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant" is not well considered. Clearly, the knowing suppression of exculpatory evidence is improper and should be subject to some sanction, but if it is intended that there be a full-blown, retrospective examination of all the evidence that might have been presented in order to determine whether it might have led the grand jury not to indict, I would suggest that the elements of the Brady doctrine are difficult enough to apply at trial and ought not to be inserted into the investigative process. In a jurisdiction where the prosecutor charges by information, he may base his judgment on whatever facts he chooses so long as he can establish probable cause at a subsequent preliminary examination; in a system where probable cause is determined by a body of citizens, I question whether there is any need to apply standards which heretofore have been reserved for the protection of the defendant on the issue of guilt or innocence.

With respect to the requirement that the prosecutor advise the grand jury of evidence "which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness," I would only point out that, although the intent of the drafters was undoubtedly to alert the grand jurors to the weaknesses of testimony from those with prior convictions or those who had made a deal with the government, the real impact of the rule would be to permit the government to attack the credibility of witnesses who give testimony favorable to the prospective defendant.

Grand jury secrecy.—The proposal to make disclosure of matters before the grand jury a criminal offense is an important one, and I have only one major comment. The restriction of the prohibition in proposed Section 1512(a) to those who were present in the grand jury room leaves open the substantial risk that a government employee or someone having access to the stenographic record will reveal protected information. Further, I suggest that the seriousness of the offense is not reflected in the sanction provided for under subsection (a); it would seem more suitable to provide for punishment at least at the typical misdemeanor level of one year's imprisonment and/or fine of $1,000.

In conclusion, I respectfully submit, that, although H.R. 94 accomplishes much that is worthwhile in the reform of the grand jury process, in many areas it tips the balance too far against the important societal interest in effective law enforcement. Despite the abuses that have occurred during the past several years, and I believe that they have not been as pervasive as some critics have argued. I retain my belief in the ability of the Department of Justice, with some measure of judicial supervision, to adhere to appropriate standards of conduct, and suggest that the appropriate role of the Congress is to address through legislation only those areas that are most clearly in need of reform.

Mr. RUFF. I think from my point of view, and it's the point of view of a prosecutor, one whose experience has been almost entirely in the area of white collar crime, organized crime, and public corruption cases, it's important to begin any look at this subject from a couple of very basic premises: first, the presumption, if you will, of the validity of the grand jury process insofar as it concerns the crucial function of acting as the vehicle for the investigation of these very sophisticated forms of criminal activity; and second, the presumption—and I think this is historically accurate—that the citizen who's called upon by the grand jury to give testimony has an inherent obligation to cooperate, short of the assertion of his fifth amendment privilege or any other applicable privilege which may in fact be asserted at the appropriate time.

But if in fact we begin with those two presumptions, the validity of the grand jury process and the obligation of the citizen to give information when called on, it seems to me that there must be afforded to that witness the protections which will insure that in fact he is not deprived of whatever privileges he may enjoy and in fact, as Congressman Evans suggested, is not abused during the course of his cooperation with the grand jury.

On this score, this attempt to strike the balance between the needs for and the presumptive validity of the grand jury process and the rights of the individual witnesses, it seems to me the crucial point made in this legislation is affording of counsel in the grand jury room. It's an issue obviously that Judge Lacey dealt with at some length and I'd like to address it briefly because my position is, although consistent with Judge Lacey's on many points that he makes, very different from his on the issue of counsel in the grand jury room. Indeed, I suspect that at least most of the Federal prosecutors with whom I'm familiar would disagree with my position. Nonetheless, I set it out for what it's worth.

The attacks on the proposals to permit counsel in the grand jury room essentially take two avenues: first, the suggestion that it will permit disruption in the grand jury, that it will create minitrials; and that that disruption will not in fact be able to be controlled either by the prosecutor in the grand jury or the judge if called on to do so. The second avenue of attack is a very important one and one that can't be lightly dismissed and that's the problem of multiple representation which has already been discussed here this morning.

With respect to the issue of disruption, obviously, in the Federal system at least, all we can do is speculate—to extrapolate from experience in other aspects of the criminal justice system to what might happen in the grand jury if counsel were permitted.

My experience, and particularly over the last 3 or 4 years in the life of the Watergate Special Prosecutors, is that witnesses who come before the grand jury frequently are represented by counsel. One knows before that witness goes into the grand jury room essentially what the witness is prepared to testify to. Conversations have been held with counsel for that witness in most cases and in most situations I have found counsel to be cooperative, protective of his client's rights, but not in any sense attempting to disrupt the orderly functioning of the grand jury.

I have no basis for believing, other than pure speculation, that that would change were counsel permitted to enter the grand jury room. I have had some experience with the situation in which a witness has frequently gotten up and asked permission to leave the grand jury room—to go out and consult with counsel. Sometimes I have had the feeling that it was done to obstruct the grand jury's inquiry. Sometimes, however, and more frequently, I suspect, I found that they were perfectly legitimate exercises of the right to consult with counsel, and I found it mildly absurd that he would have to get up and go outside the room and consult with counsel. Sometimes I would have to go outside the room and talk to counsel if requested to do so when, in fact, it seemed to me that most of the questions either could have been readily answered with counsel there advising his client and without the need to go through what I really view as something of a charade.

I had occasion a couple weeks ago to discuss this problem with the district attorney for Denver who recently has had experience with, and I believe has indeed submitted some comments to the committee on, the subject. He's had experience with permitting counsel in the grand jury room, as have a few States, and is seeking legislation in the Colorado Legislature to permit just that.

He indicated to me that his experience along these lines was not that of disruptive counsel. Indeed, he was content, if not pleased, with the experience he's had under this rule. I grant you that I have the normal prosecutor's suspicion that energetic competent defense counsel will take all possible steps to protect their client's rights and may indeed overstep the bounds of zealous representation, but I suggest—and it's my conclusion in this regard—that that speculation, that guess, as to what will happen if we permit counsel in the grand jury room is not a sufficient concern to overcome what seems to me to be the basic right to have simple and ready access to the advice of counsel in the grand jury room.

With respect to multiple representation, this is an issue that I have addressed in public on a number of occasions and feel very strongly about, and it's certainly an issue that has arisen perhaps more frequently in the context of the Watergate Special Prosecutor's work over the last 3 or 4 years than in most contexts. We have had situations, without question, in which we have been investigating a hierarchally structured organization in which someone in the middle levels of that structure is represented by counsel hired by his superiors or by the corporation or by the organization that's under investigation. We have on a number of occasions expressed directly to counsel our concern about the possible existence of conflicts of interest and on occasion we have had counsel say, "Yes; I agree with you," and withdraw. On more occasions—and I consider this a serious problem—counsel has said, "No; I don't see it." The witness himself, for whatever reasons, proper or improper, has acknowledged that he understands that he has the right to independent counsel, but has decided not to take advantage of that right.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Ruff, may I interrupt at this point by asking how would you respond to Judge Lacey's point, in his testimony, that allowing counsel limits the search for the truth when a lawyer represents multiple witnesses or an organization and a witness?

Mr. RUFF. I agree entirely with Judge Lacey's basic premise. Indeed, it's one that I, myself, expressed on a number of occasions. Multiple representation poses a serious risk to the truth-finding process. It presents problems not only involving disruption of the grand jury process but, more importantly—and I think this is where the organized bar and the courts themselves have fallen down on this issue—it represents a serious threat to the right of the individual who's being represented by a lawyer who does not in fact devote his full energies and his full concerns to that client's welfare. Indeed, I think in recent years and perhaps the last 2 years, this issue has surfaced repeatedly in the courts, in various meetings of the organized bar, and I think there is now a recognition of this problem and some movement in both the bar and the courts to do something about it. But there is no question that it's an extraordinarily serious problem and one that those of us who are involved in this kind of investigation of sophisticated criminal activity confront all the time.

My difference with Judge Lacey is on this point. I think that putting the counsel in the grand jury room does not measurably add to that risk or danger. To the extent that it does have some incremental risk attached to it, I think it's one that has to be dealt with not by restricting the basic right to be advised by counsel, but one that has to be addressed by the bar, by prosecutors who are willing to confront the problem, and most importantly—and I'm afraid that Judge Lacey is an exception to the rule—in the judicial reaction to this problem—by judges who are willing to say:

Yes; I recognize that it is a violation of the ethical obligation of counsel. It infringes on the right of the client to zealous representation of his interest and

I'm going to do something about it by ensuring that in fact this client, if he wishes to, and perhaps even if he doesn't wish to—

(and that's the hangup that most judges find themselves disturbed by)

is going to have independent representation.

In sum on this issue, I think the answer is not to say keep that lawyer outside the door, because realistically he's going to have a pretty fair notion of what his client said inside the room. The answer is to make a forthright attempt to provide adequate representation and solve the other problems directly headon by addressing them for what they are.

There are a number of points contained in this legislation which, as my statement indicates, I do not think strike the appropriate balance between the needs for effective grand jury investigation and the needs of the individual defendant and/or witness for protection. I won't go into them at any length because I have stated my position clearly I think in my statement but I would, if the committee has any questions, be glad to respond to them.

Mr. EILBERG. Just one or two questions from me at this point. Do you agree that a witness should be advised of his rights? Specifically what does your office do now in this regard?

Mr. RUFF. Congressman Eilberg, I do agree that the witness should be advised of his rights, including, of course, the right to his privilege against self-incrimination. The Watergate Special Prosecution Force followed over the course of its existence a very liberal—put the word "liberal" in quotes—policy with regard to warning witnesses of their right to counsel, of their right to privilege against self-incrimination, and on occasion, other privileges which seemed applicable under the circumstances. Not only target witnesses, but in many of our investigations all witnesses are warned.

Frequently what will happen is this. We will meet with a lawyer for a particular witness and say:

We want your client to come in and testify. We are going to advise him in the grand jury room of his rights, but we want to tell you and we want to tell your client right now we do not feel him at the moment to be a subject of this investigation.

We have encountered, I think, no difficulty in giving those warnings. We have produced no more reluctant witnesses, I believe, than we had already, particularly in a situation where the witness is represented by counsel.

I think there is a risk that in a situation where you have the untutored witness, the witness who is unrepresented by counsel, that he may be taken aback. He may say, "my goodness, I have a right not to testify. I think I will assert it." But I question whether that risk is a really substantial one and, even if it is, I question whether or not it's appropriate to deny advice to the untutored witness with respect to the assertion of a constitutional privilege if the fear is that they might assert that privilege.

For that reason, I agree with the proposal in the bill that all witnesses be advised of their right to refuse to testify on the grounds of self-incrimination.

Mr. EILBERG. It is the policy I believe of your office not to call any witness if he has given written notice of his intention to invoke his privilege against self-incrimination. Do you favor our provision making that mandatory?

Mr. RUFF. I certainly do and I think our position on this score was not something we simply dreamed up out of the blue. It is in fact part of the ABA standards on the prosecution function and one that seems to me entirely appropriate.

I might point out that there are problems in this rule which have not yet been confronted. For example, supposing that a grand juror asked a prosecutor why haven't we heard from "x"? How should the prosecutor respond to that question, if in fact what he's received is a letter saying, "I'm not going to appear because I'm going to assert my fifth amendment privilege"? We haven't really run into that problem but it is one that's lurking out there in the background somewhere and one that hasn't been solved.

Nonetheless, I don't think it's a sufficient problem to justify opposing the rule that you suggest here.

Mr. EILBERG. What is your policy as to the presentation of exculpatory evidence?

Mr. RUFF. Well, I agree here entirely with Judge Lacey. He approaches the problem both from his experience as a prosecutor and his experience as a judge, and I have only half of that experience. But without question, the application of the Brady exculpatory evidence rule is perhaps the most difficult one for the prosecutor to deal with during the investigative and trial process and certainly during the postconviction and review process, and I would find it virtually impossible to make the kinds of judgments that are called for by the provisions of this bill during the investigative process or indeed to defend retrospectively my judgments about whether or not a particular piece of evidence was exculpatory during the trial or in a postconviction review process.

I simply think those protections are indeed appropriate and obviously constitutionally mandated at the stage where we are determining guilt or innocence. At the investigative stage two factors are at work. One, the good faith of the prosecutor—and that's not to be idly dismissed because I think most of my brethren in the Federal prosecution system meet the highest professional standards—and second, the notion that the prosecutor must look forward to the day not in which he's simply achieved the resounding triumph of getting 23 or 12 of the 23 citizens to vote a true bill, but when he has to convince all 12 petit jurors to convict, and if he goes forward suppressing what may be exculpatory material and forges ahead to the point of indictment only to find himself confronted with an unwinnable case, then he's not accomplished anything at all. He has violated not only his professional responsibility but any guidelines for the exercise of the prosecutorial function.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Ruff.

Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. You question the 6 months confinement of a grand juror or a witness before a grand jury. You indicate that it should remain at the 18-month level. How many times in your experience have you had a situation where the testimony of one person was crucial to the return of an indictment?

Mr. RUFF. I have run into innumerable cases in which the testimony of one individual was crucial to the making of the case and have been unable to get that testimony, simply because we couldn't find the evidence to indicate that the testimony that he did give was perjurious, we couldn't make a legitimate decision to immunize the particular witnss in order to overcome the assertion of privilege, and we wouldn't overcome the assertion of attorney-client privilege or other applicable privileges. In only one situation have I been confronted—and my experience is not necessarily typical—with a witness who when immunized refused to testify and on whose testimony the making or breaking of the case rested.

On that occasion the witness was held in contempt, jailed, and after 3 or 4 months decided that he preferred cooperation to the not very prepossessing confines of the jail in which he was incarcerated. He decided to testify, and the case was made.

My objection to the 6-month limitation is this—and it goes back to the point I made at the very beginning. There should be a presumption in favor of a witness' obligation to testify and not against.

Mr. HALL. Why? Why do you make that statement?

Mr. RUFF. Because every citizen it seems to me—and I think this is historically founded as well as constitutionally founded—has the obligation to cooperate with legitimate demands of his government and one of those legitimate demands is that he come forward with evidence of a crime if he has that evidence in his possession.

If, in fact, you accept that presumption, and I begin there, it seems to me that, yes, we should surround that witness with whatever appropriate protections may be required and perhaps one of those protections should be a prohibition against repeated confinement if he has in fact elected to refuse to testify after an immunity order. But I think we ought to attempt to strike a balance between the level at which it's, if not easy at least acceptable, for him to elect not to cooperate and that level in which it becomes a truly burdensome and excessive punishment. It seems to me that the 6-month period doesn't strike that balance; that if in fact the witness elects to refuse to testify, 6 months, although it's impossible to predict what the impact of that kind of sentence is, is simply too short. If you're going to give him permanent freedom from that obligation to testify, I submit that the 18-month maximum is an appropriate balance to strike.

Mr. HALL. I think you were here when Judge Lacey testified about the instructions, the mandatory instructions that should be given. Do you think that if those instructions were given, that a trial judge who was in charge of his court and understood the workings of that court, could solve some of the problems that this legislation is trying to solve without going through the procedure of an act of Congress.

Mr. RUFF. I do indeed, and I concur wholeheartedly on what Judge Lacey had to say on that point. It seems to me that two forces can act effectively without the need for congressional intervention: as he suggested, the Attorney General, by the formulation of strict, clear guidelines, and, perhaps one step that Judge Lacey did not specifically mention, although it was implicit in what he said, the intensive education of those who carry the responsibility of being Federal prosecutors; and, second, the active involvement of the courts in seeing to it that those guidelines are adhered to.

As he indicated, there are certain points here that I do think are important and are addressed by this legislation: One, counsel in grand jury room and, two, the proposed new offense of leaking of grand jury information. Both are very important for this Congress to take action on. But, by and large, as I indicate in my statement, much of what needs to be accomplished can be accomplished by the actions of the Department of Justice, and I think one function that this set of hearings performs, perhaps, or should perform, is to bring to the forceable attention of the Department of Justice the need for just that kind of activity.

Mr. HALL. Thank you. That's all I have.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Evans.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Ruff, you seem to indicate that there is a duty on the part of the citizenry to come forward with information on any crime if they have any special knowledge, that it's their duty to give that. It's my understanding of the system that we have that the powers of the Government are given by the consent of the governed and, further, that these certain rights were kept for the people and only certain restricted rights were given to the Government.

One of the rights, of course, that were kept for the people was the right against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment. Another was the right to indictment by a grand jury which would seem to me to indicate that the grand jury system is set up for the protection of the people rather than for the investigation of white collar or any other crime that you referred to.

Is your concept consistent with these principles that I have just espoused?

Mr. RUFF. I believe it is entirely consistent, Congressman. Indeed, the provision of the fifth amendment, that no shall be charged with an infamous crime except by indictment of a grand jury, is intended to serve as a protection for the individual who is subjected to the rigors of the criminal justice system, but I think if you go behind that bare wording of the fifth amendment you will find the grand jury historically playing a role which can't be ignored, and that is the protection of the public interest in the prevention of criminal activity.

Clearly, that protection can never override the right of the individual defendant nor the right of the witness who is called to give testimony, but I think the Constitution makes clear the boundaries within which that balancing has to take place, and it has said the privilege against self-incrimination is one, and one of a very few ways, that an individul can refuse to give testimony under oath. I think we ought not to expand those protections which are inherent in the Constitution to provide other exits from the obligation to cooperate with the Government.

Mr. EVANS. Let me get you to address, if you will, Mr. Ruff, one other part of that, and that is the granting of use immunity which is a fairly recent development and this is specifically the area that I was concerned about.

I certainly agree with the other statement that you made, but it seems to me we have restricted this constitutional guarantee by this particular granting of use immunity and making witnesses testify—we have restricted this fifth amendment right.

Mr. RUFF. Well, of course, the easy answer to that would be that the Supreme Court of the United States has said it's constitutional, but that's not the answer because the Congress certainly has the right to say:

I don't care what the minimum constitutional requirements are, we, as a matter of social policy are going to expand them or treat them differently in a way that is consistent with the Constitution but also consistent wih other concerns that we have.

I would suggest this: the debate between transactional and use immunity is a debate I think without substance. Congressman Eilberg, I think, asked Judge Lacey about the burden that falls on the individual who has been granted use immunity to establish that in fact he's not being prosecuted with the use of the testimony he's giving. I think if you took a survey—and I've not taken a complete one—you would find that the Government is faced with an almost insuperable burden of establishing that it may prosecute an individual without having used testimony that he gave, and, indeed, I think you will find an almost universally adhered to policy in the Department of Justice not to prosecure people who have been given use immunity. The transactional immunity that was afforded under the old law and that would be afforded under this proposed provision of H.R. 94, is then in my view not a measurable step forward in affording protections to the defendant, and, indeed, I point out in my statement that, in fact, it offers less protection in one aspect because it means that if you brought somebody in in the middle of a narcotics investigation, for example, and gave him transactional immunity and he testified that he had been engaged in narcotics activity and some time thereafter he was brought to trial on a totally different transaction, that testimony would be usable to impeach him at trial. Thus, transactional immunity would provide less protection rather than more in comparison with the present law.

Mr. EVANS. Well, actually, immunity itself is a fairly recent development in our jurisprudence system.

Mr. RUFF. Something approaching 100 years approximately, and I think another point to be made here and one that is perhaps overlooked in much of this debate over the question of immunity, much of what happens in the immunization process happens totally outside the courtroom, totally outside the boundaries of this proposed legislation. Immunization is a decision that's made all the time by a prosecutor—the decision not to proceed against one individual or to proceed against another.

We meet with a witness in his office and say, "Don't worry about a thing. Cooperate with me. Nothing you say will be used against you." That kind of thing goes on all the time and will be enforced by the courts. So that this debate over transactional versus use immunity really deals with the very tip of a rather large iceberg and I think is really not as serious a problem as some of the critics of the grand jury process would have the committee believe.

Mr. EVANS. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. The observation you just made I think is something that is overlooked, that even without the use of a grand jury very often prosecutorial immunity is granted. I have done it many times myself.

If you're willing to testify on this thing we will not prosecute the case against you or we will not prosecute you on it and it has backup sanction that the judges will enforce it and, second, if you deviate from it you're not going to get the essential testimony from that witness.

Mr. RUFF. That's right.

Mr. SAWYER. So I think a lot of this is attributed to a grand jury where under our State practice we normally didn't use grand juries, we used information and preliminary exams in trials. So it was entirely a matter handled by the prosecutors and it functions the same way and it's almost essential to the operation of the system really.

Mr. RUFF. I agree entirely, Congressman, and that bears directly I think on the question of who should be making that decision, and it's partly for that reason that I indicated in my statement that I oppose the attempt to prepose the discretion of the immunity in the judicial rather than the executive branch.

Mr. SAWYER. I think always—and perhaps you would agree—we tend too much to think of the witnesses as "Mr. Nice Guys." Very often you get this tremendous reluctance to testify even when they are not involved themselves. They are in league with their own community or group and would feel much like a Frenchman in Nazi occupied France testifying against his neighbor to a Nazi court about the fact that he did some stealing. You have a tremendous problem there as a prosecutor.

Mr. RUFF. I'm not sure I'll buy your analogy, but yes, the underlying concern is present, yes.

Mr. SAWYER. Thank you. That's all.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Ruff, we are indeed indebted to you for coming to testify today. We have some questions we'd like to mail you if we may.

Mr. RUFF. Absolutely. I would be glad to respond to any questions you may have to submit and, once again, let me say I appreciate the opportunity to address this problem which is of concern not only to prosecutors but to academics, both of which I try to be.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much.

Our next witness is Mr. Edwin L. Miller, district attorney, San Diego, Calif., representing the National District Attorneys Association.

Mr. Miller, we welcome you here this morning and once again you may read your statement, summarize it, and proceed in any way you see fit.

TESTIMONY OF EDWIN L. MILLER, DISTRICT ATTORNEY, SAN DIEGO, CALIF., REPRESENTING NATIONAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS ASSOCIATION

Mr. MILLER. I have submitted the statement and would request that that be incorporated in the record and then I will address a couple of subjects which are of very serious concern to me in this legislation.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection, the statement will be made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Miller follows:]

STATEMENT OF EDWIN L. MILLER, JR., DISTRICT ATTORNEY, COUNTY OF SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

Members of the committee: I am honored to have the opportunity to discuss with you the ramifications of H.R. 94.

I am a former United States Attorney, the first person to be appointed to that position in the Southern District of California. Currently, I am the District Attorney for San Diego County, an officer in the California District Attorneys Association and the National District Attorneys Association, Chairman of the Metropolitan District Attorneys Committee and a member of the American Bar Association's Committee on the Defense Function. I would hope to give you a view of H.R. 94 which you might not otherwise receive.

The grand jury is one of the oldest institutions of Anglo-American civilization, with a history of more than nine hundred years, from origins in the common law to today.

Indeed, the practice of summoning a body of citizens to investigate crime and to bring formal charges against an accused preceded the development of trial by jury.

The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution carried the concept of the Grand Jury into our criminal justice system by requiring that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. . . ."

The federal grand jury as part of our system has the responsibility to investigate criminal activity and to accuse those suspected of crimes.

H.R. 94 radically modifies historical concepts and actual operation of the federal criminal justice system. Some of the individual proposals in the Bill do have merit. In reality, however, they are either already incorporated in federal statutory or decisional law or are generally observed by federal prosecutors. These are the measures which limit grand jury investigations to criminal conduct, assure grand jury secrecy and require that grand jury subpoenaes are returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

Other provisions, however, will materially affect the government's ability to seek out and prosecute crime. The grand jury, as the accusatory and investigatory mechanism of the criminal justice system, stands at the initiation and not the conclusion of the criminal process.

The position of a witness summoned to appear before the grand jury is not that of an accused, one whom society has determined should be called to account for his actions, but rather is that of one who has been called upon to fulfill a duty of citizenship by providing information to assist the grand jury in performing its function. He is not being proceeded against and probably will not be. However, if he becomes the accused—as opposed to one whose aid is being sought to uncover the facts—he will be accorded his full panoply of rights in the adversary stage of the system.

But because the grand jury inquiry is not itself an adversary proceeding, the procedural and evidentiary rules designed to bring about a fair verdict at trial are largely unnecessary and irrelevant to the proper discharge of the grand jury's responsibilities. Restrictions on litigation of issues involving the conduct of grand jury proceedings are designed to avoid precipitating the adjudication of issues properly reserved for trial on the merits.

In large measure the latitude accorded the grand jury in performing its function is predicated on a policy of discouraging the "litigation of issues only tangentially related to the grand jury's primary objective." United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 343–44; 38 L.Ed.2d 561; 94 S.Ct. 613 (1974).

For, as the Supreme Court has stated, to "saddle a grand jury with minitrials and preliminary showings would assuredly impede its investigation and frustrate the public's interest in the fair and expeditious administration of the criminal laws." United States v. Dionizio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973) at page 17.

My first major concern with this Bill is the language in Section 3329(4)(c) which, I believe, will result in each and every indictment handed down by a grand jury being later challenged by lengthy and costly legal motions. The language of that Section is:

"The attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence, as yet not received, which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant." (Emphasis added.)

That provision—although admirable on its face—will, if the California experience is to be believed, result in a new focus on federal criminal prosecution: no longer will the courts be concerned with the guilt or innocence of the defendant; they will be trying the legal abilities of United States Attorneys.

Motions will be heard to determine if the U.S. Attorney has been responsible in his efforts to seek out favorable defense material and damaging evidence against the credibility of prosecution witnesses.

The idea of prosecutors having a duty to seek out and present exculpatory evidence to grand juries was first contained in a 1975 California Supreme Court case, Johnson v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P.2d 792.

In writing the opinion for the majority of the court, Justice William P. Clark, Jr. stated:

"When a district attorney seeking an indictment is aware of evidence reasonably tending to negate guilt, he is obligated . . . to inform the grand jury of its nature and existence . . . (Johnson, supra at 255.)

In practice, however, the meaning of the words used by the Justice has been lost. Trial courts are beseiged by defense attorneys bringing so-called "Johnson motions" alleging the prosecution failed to seek out and find any item which would tend to mitigate the evidence against a defendant. The result has been the calling to the witness stand and cross-examination of prosecutors who presented the case to the grand jury. The prosecutors are put on trial to determine if they did—even without realizing it—have evidence or the ability to find evidence which a court, in hindsight, could interpret as favorable to the defendant. If such evidence did exist, then the indictment is not valid and the prosecution and costs start again.

It would seem clear from an insurance carrier's point of view that the failure of a defense attorney to attack an indictment under this provision would border on malpractice. This provision also would require the attorney to go behind the indictment and have full discovery of everything which transpired, not only in the grand jury room, but in the offices of the prosecutor and the law enforcement investigators. How else would the defense know the substance of the evidence available to the prosecutor and whether that evidence was presented to the grand jury?

The attorney, of course, would have an appeal from an adverse ruling by the District Court and the delays caused to the grand jury function become real, not imaginary.

Because of the harassment of prosecutors in California which the Johnson case allows and the numerous avenues which must be checked and rechecked by the prosecution before a grand jury presentation can be made, most California prosecutors are refusing to take cases to the grand jury. They, instead, present evidence at a preliminary hearing. In California we have that choice—either to present evidence to a grand jury or before a magistrate at a preliminary hearing. Federal prosecutors, however, do not have a choice; the United States Constitution mandates that they proceed by Grand Jury indictment.

But even the California Court did not heap upon the prosecution the added burden of investigating the background of all witnesses to determine their credibility.

Take now the problems created by the affirmative duty to seek out evidence favorable to the defendant, add the "Johnson motion" harassment of prosecutors and multiply that circumstance by one hundred fold and you might have some concept of the chaos which will be created by Section 3329(4)(c).

The second concept contained in this Bill which is taken from the Johnson case is the idea of post-indictment preliminary hearing.

The germ of this procedure is contained in a concurring opinion written by Justice Stanley Mosk.

In that opinion Justice Mosk somewhat cavalierly dismisses the key argument against a post-indictment preliminary hearing as being superfluous.

The primary purpose of a presentation to a grand jury or a hearing before a magistrate is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe a crime has been committed and whether there is probable cause to believe the person charged by the prosecutor committed the crime.

There is no reasonable doubt standard at either type of hearing as the question of guilt or innocence is not before the court. Jeopardy does not attach.

Therefore, the Constitutional idea of the existence of probable cause is completed when an indictment is returned.

I do not believe it is contained in this Bill, and I do not believe it is the purpose of Congress to give to the preliminary hearing magistrate the power to overturn an indictment by the grand jury.

So, the real purpose—in fact, the only purpose under the Bill—is to create a post-indictment discovery hearing to give the defense attorney the ability to cross-examine prosecution witnesses.

Recognizing the true purpose of the Section and, if that is—in fact—the Congress' desire, then I would recommend a modification of Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the discovery rule.

If, however, it is the Committee's belief that every defendant in a criminal case should be entitled to a determination of probable cause by a magistrate, then I recommend a Constitutional amendment be sought. If, on the other hand, it is the Committee's belief that the integrity of the grand jury should be maintained, then it is my position that the two provisions taken from California's Johnson case effectively frustrate the indictment function of the grand jury and should not become law.

The second function of the grand jury is the responsibility to investigate criminal activity.

Other proposals contained in H.R. 94 will be detrimental or completely eliminate the grand jury's ability to investigate and uncover political corruption, massive white-collar or consumer-oriented fraud and organized criminal conduct.

The proposals which will cause the greatest hindrance are:

Authorizing grand jury witnesses to be accompanied by counsel in the grand jury room; and Shifting the burden to the prosecution to prove grand jury subpoenas are reasonable and not oppressive.

Both proposals will create new grounds for dismissal of criminal charges and grounds for legal motions and hearings which do not now exist in the federal system and will create intolerable delays in the administration of justice.

Additionally, these provisions are in direct conflict with the Constitutional purpose of the grand jury:

A grand jury proceeding is not an adversary hearing in which the guilt or innocence of the accused is adjudicated. Rather, it is an ex parte investigation to determine whether a crime has been committed and whether criminal proceedings should be instituted against any person. United States v. Calandra, supra, at p. 343–44.

Even though H.R. 94 says the role of counsel in the grand jury room will be similar to that of an attorney for a witness before a Congressional Committee, such a limitation cannot be enforced.

Lawyers—without a Judge or a Congressional Committee Chairman to keep order—will not remain silent. Their objection to questions, challenges to relevancy, arguments over claims of privilege and other legal issues will inevitably disrupt and unreasonably draw out a grand jury investigation.

Since judges will not be present to rule on each objection by an attorney, the only solution will be to interrupt the grand jury for repeated trips to the courtroom.

But more important is what I believe will be the final ramification to this legislative door-opening: The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution requires counsel. The courts have toyed and struggled through the decades to decide in which legal proceedings that a person be capable of having that constitutional guarantee of counsel. If the Legislature decides a grand jury proceeding is such a hearing, the courts would have to find that any limitation—such as that written in H.R. 94—on the effective representation of those clients would be unconstitutional. The constitutional right to counsel is a right to have not just an attorney standing there but a capable, competent lawyer actively and adequately representing his client. Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 728, 18 L.Ed.2d 493, 87 S.Ct. 1396; reh.den. 388 U.S. 924, 18 L.Ed.2d 1377, 87 S.Ct. 2094 (1967).

This also raises the question of the purpose of the grand jury. Isn't it to seek truth? Surely it is clear that when a witness is being advised how to answer questions by his counsel the testimony tends to become more that of the lawyer than the witness.

And, since the defense attorney must effectively advise his client how to answer questions from the prosecutor, this provision raises the question of pre-testimony discovery of the prosecutor's files. An attorney would be effectively blocked from competently advising his client during testimony without being able to review relevant information which is in the prosecutor's possession.

Also, counsel cannot be restricted exclusively to those who can afford to hire an attorney. Therefore, with the adoption of this provision, the Committee must also set up the administrative mechanism to offer, supply and pay counsel to all persons subpoenaed before a grand jury.

The provision does not face the problem of multiple representation. In other words, how do you prevent cover-ups when the attorney representing the "small fry" is being paid and controlled by the president of the corporation, the President of the United States or the Chieftain of organized crime?

How do you deal with investigation in these types of criminal activities when the grand jury runs into "house counsel"? With house counsel present in the grand jury—a presence that as a practical matter cannot be avoided—an employee, officer or organized crime lieutenant will not be in a position to cooperate with the grand jury and maintain the secrecy of his cooperation. As society demands vigorous investigations of official corruption, white collar and organized crime conspiracies, the ability of prosecutors to penetrate these conspiracies will be circumscribed by the omnipresent counsel. By knowing all that transpires in the grand jury, it will be easier for defenses and responses to criminal investigations to be orchestrated and the investigations obstructed.

Currently a witness in the grand jury, if confused about a particular question or uncertain how to respond to it, can request permission to be excused for an opportunity to consult with counsel. This counsel remains outside the grand jury room. The permission to consult with counsel, if not abused, is routinely granted. In addition, a counsel can, of course, debrief his client after he testifies. This being so, it might be argued that the proposal to have counsel in the grand jury is hardly a significant change.

The change, however, is dramatic.

Most important, the mere presence of "house counsel" inside the grand jury will necessarily deter any one of those he represents from cooperating with the investigation since cooperation inside the grand jury will immediately become known. Moreover, because of the tremendous advantages gained by having an "ear" in the grand jury and thereby knowing precisely what was asked and what was answered, the pressures for multiple representation by a "house counsel" will increase significantly. As it is, under existing practice, multiple representation of possible subjects of an investigation as well as witnesses poses a major, if not the chief, obstacle to effective fraud and corruption investigations.

The information these counsel can obtain now by consulting with their clients outside the grand jury during their testimony or debriefing them after they testify permits orchestration of responses to investigations. To allow counsel inside the grand jury room as this proposal would do, will necessarily increase the prospects of orchestration.

These objectionable proposals will, as the Supreme Court has stated, "saddle a grand jury with minitrials and preliminary showings" and thereby "assuredly impede its investigation and frustrate the public's interest in the fair and expeditious administration of the criminal laws." United States v. Dionizio, supra.

But it is not just political corruption, white-collar and organized crime investigations which will suffer if these provisions become law.

Alan Y. Cole, Chairman of the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association analyzed other types of cases in a speech given in Houston on June 24, 1976. He said:

In the fall of 1975, the contract between the Washington Post and its pressmen's union came to an end. The union went on strike at 5:30 a.m., on October 1. At that time, 100 pressmen were working the early morning shift. After they left the job, all nine of Post's presses were found to be seriously damaged. Five days later, a Federal grand jury began an investigation. Twenty-one of the 100 pressmen were subpoenaed to testify.

The union's general counsel, using union funds, retained an experienced defense lawyer to represent the subpoenaed members of the union before the grand jury. This attorney recognized the potential for conflict generated by his multiple representation. He could not interview each pressman—for if he were to learn something from one detrimental to another, he could not disclose that information without breaching his confidential relationship with the first and thus would not be able to fully counsel the second. To solve the problem, he studiously avoided individual consultation with any of his clients. Instead, he gave all of them—collectively—what he described as a lecture. He told them of their privilege against self-incrimination, their obligation to testify if granted immunity, and their possible waiver of constitutional rights. He neither sought to ascertain the extent to which each of his clients participated in or observed any criminal activity, nor did he make any effort to negotiate with the Government for immunity in exchange for the testimony of any his clients. In due course, two of the twenty witnesses told the grand jury they had seen nothing and the other nineteen invoked the Fifth Amendment. The grand jury investigation came to an abrupt end.

The prosecutors did not contest the pressmen's assertion of their Fifth Amendment privilege, nor did they offer immunity to any of them. Instead, they moved to disqualify the attorney. They argued that the pressmen were making legally unwarranted assertions of the Fifth Amendment, that they could not receive the effective assistance of counsel, and that the efforts of the grand jury to ascertain the truth had been obstructed.

The District Court held that the witnesses' rights freely to choose and associate and to retain counsel are not absolute, that the public has an interest in thorough investigation by the grand jury, and that the witnesses' rights must yield to preserve the effective functioning of the criminal justice system.[1] The judge ordered the attorney to cease representing the pressmen. And although not a single pressman was before him, the judge ordered each of the pressmen who wished to be represented by counsel to retain separate counsel.

The United States Court of Appeals vacated the District Court's order. It held the evidence insufficient to establish that each witness regarded the attorney as his personal legal representative or that absent unified representation, each witness would retain personal counsel and cooperate more fully with the Government.[2] The Court advised the Government to seek judicial hearings to determine the applicability of the Fifth Amendment to particular questions asked before the grand jury and to confer immunity upon some of the witnesses. "Until accommodation . . . (through these procedures) has been demonstrated to be not feasible or contrary to the public interest", the Court of Appeals held, "it is surely premature to seek it through disqualification of counsel whose advice to his clients the Government does not like."[3]

Following the Court of Appeals' decision, the grand jury investigation resumed. Some of the pressmen testified before the grand jury.[4] Fifteen pressmen were indicted and variously charged with inciting to riot, destruction of property, grand larceny, and assault.[5] Others have been permitted to plead to misdemeanor charges in return for their testimony.[6]

This affair is hardly one which reflects glory upon the criminal justice system. The defense attorney spent more time defending himself than his clients, the courts produced decisions which were less than satisfactory and the profession was badly damaged in the public eye.[7]

Another high profile confrontation with respect to multiple representation occurred recently in the investigation into the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa. A father and son team of lawyers who had been representing several targets in the grand jury investigation appeared also as attorneys for four persons subpoenaed to testify as witnesses. Two of these witnesses, moreover, had been granted immunity. The prosecutors moved to disqualify the attorneys from representing the witnesses, and the District Court granted this motion.[8] The Court held that the conflict of loyalty arising when counsel learned of one witness' testimony which might incriminate another witness represented by the same counsel was sufficient to support disqualification.[9] The Court was not persuaded by the fact that each of the witnesses had submitted an affidavit affirming his knowledge and acquiescence in any conflict of interest by his attorney; the Court held that the public had a right to an effective functioning grand jury investigation and that this right prevailed over the witness' Sixth Amendment right to select counsel.[10] This decision is presently being appealed.

These are sensational cases, but they are hardly unique. For example, in the case of In re Gopman,[11] the Fifth Circuit upheld the disqualification of an attorney who sought to act simultaneously on behalf of a union and three of its officials in a grand jury investigation into the whereabouts of certain union records. The union's interest was in full disclosure of the records, while the witnesses' interest was in refusing to incriminate themselves. The irreconcilable conflict is manifest.

In Pirillo v. Takiff,[12] two attorneys representing twelve policemen subpoenaed by a grand jury were disqualified. The attorneys, who were paid by the policemen's union, testified that they would not on their own raise the subject of cooperation in exchange for immunity and also stated they would withdraw as counsel for any witness who indicated that he would consider cooperation. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court upheld the disqualification order, not because multiple representation violated the witnesses' Sixth Amendment rights,[13] but rather because it considered that the public interest in the grand jury's investigatory power, its secrecy, and in the prevention of conflicts of interests outweighed the witnesses' rights to associate and freely choose legal representation.[14]

The problem of multiple representation has even found its way into administrative proceedings. In SEC v. Csapo,[15] the Securities and Exchange Commission refused to permit two lawyers to appear with a witness during an SEC investigation. These lawyers had represented eight other witnesses in that same investigation, and some of those witnesses had been pressured to accept the services of these attorneys with a promise that "council fees would be taken care of." However, because the record was deemed not to be adequate, the Commission's order was reversed in the District of Columbia courts.[16]

This is a dismal scene. The attorney conduct involved in these cases is hardly of a nature that enhances the image of the profession. It does not reflect respect for the principles underlying the canons of ethics.[17] It suggests that self-regulation by the profession is essentially non-existent. The judicial response is likewise unsatisfactory to a society which is already disenchanted with its lawyers and its courts.

It is especially disturbing that in each of these cases the prosecution instigated the challenge to the defense lawyer's conduct. Indeed, it may be that the action taken in these cases may be pursuant to a recently embraced prosecutorial policy.[18] This is a bad business and will certainly encourage those who have urged federal legislation authorizing the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate, and United States Attorneys to enforce, disciplinary proceedings against defense lawyers in the federal courts.[19] It is also disturbing that in a good number of these cases there was either an actual or an anticipated assertion of Fifth Amendment rights.

The following observation, contained in a Memorandum recently prepared and submitted by the Department of Justice to the House Judiciary Committee, is of interest:

Not infrequently, particularly in investigations of organized crime and of business frauds and other whitecollar offenses, one attorney represents several potential witnesses. At times, counsel is retained—by the very business, union, or other organization, the activities of which are under the investigation—to represent all persons connected with an organization. In such situations, the individual witness may possess relevant information and may be willing to cooperate with the investigation. Understandably, however, he may desire that his cooperation not become known to his employer, fellow union members, or others whom he knows the attorney has been associated. Even at present, the multiple representation of witnesses by a single attorney has occasioned problems in conducting complex investigations.[20]

Reliance upon the right to select counsel is not a very persuasive factor in this context. There are more than enough good defense lawyers to go around. Though multiple representation does permit some saving in fees, it does not appear that this factor is the principal motivation in the many cases in which this conduct occurs.

A more realistic analysis of these situations suggests that multiple representation is more often prompted by the desire to keep certain persons in "friendly" hands. What better way can there be for an attorney to learn what a witness or co-defendant will say or do than by representing such a person? Indeed, by representing him, an attorney not only will know what he will say or do; he will even be able to guide him. Such a witness will remain "friendly" because his attorney will keep him that way."

This detriment, this blockade of justice by those who can afford it is real and concrete. Therefore, I strongly urge you to eliminate this provision from the Bill.

My second concern when it comes to the investigative function of the grand jury is the numerous attacks which will be brought against grand jury subpoenaes. In fact, if the wording of Section 3300b is adopted into law, a lawyer once again would be guilty of malpractice if he does not bring a motion challenging the subpoena.

Present law requires the person challenging a subpoena to establish the unreasonableness or oppressiveness of the subpoena. See Rule 17(c), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; In re Loprato, 511 F.2d 1150 (1st Cir. 1975); Universal Manufacturing Co. v. U.S., 508 F.2d 684 (8th Cir. 1975); In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 391 F. Supp. 991, 994–95 (D.C., R.I. 1975); In re Morgan, 377 F. Supp. 281 (Southern District, N.Y. 1974).

Under this Section, however, the mere filing of a motion to quash shifts burden to the prosecutor and requires a demonstration that:

(A) a primary purpose or effect requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects to the grand jury is not or will not be to secure for trial testimony or to secure other information regarding the activities of any person who is already under indictment by the United States, a State, or any subdivision thereof for such activities; or of any person who is under formal accusation is by some form other than indictment;

(B) the witness has been advised of his rights, as specified in subsection (b);

(C) the evidence sought is relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction;

(D) compliance with the subpena would not be unreasonable or oppressive, as such subpena would not require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would not lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would not be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances; and

(E) such other information as the court deems advisable.

Three of those requirements—the ones which require the prosecutor to demonstrate the evidence sought is: relevant to the investigation, properly within the grand jury's investigation and not sought primarily for another purpose—are apparently taken from an opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the third Circuit in In re Grand Jury Procedures (Schofield I) 486 F.2d 85, 93 (1973).

However, these standards have not been accepted in other federal jurisdictions and place a near-impossible burden on prosecutors.

The fact of the matter is that relevance is particularly difficult to demonstrate at the early stages of a grand jury investigation.

Some exploration or fishing necessarily is inherent and entitled to exist in all documentary productions sought by a grand jury." United States v. Schwimmer, 232 F.2d 855, 862–863 (8th Cir.), cert. den., 352 U.S. 832 (1956). As the Supreme Court explained in Blair v. United States, 250 U.S. 273, 282 (1919):

It (the grand jury) is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation and inquisition, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited narrowly by questions of propriety or forecasts of the probable result of the investigation, or by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime. As has been said before, the identity of the offender, and the precise nature of the offense, if there be one, normally are developed at the conclusion of the grand jury's labors, not at the beginning.

The standards unjustifiably require prosecutors to do that which the Supreme Court in Blair ruled was not required: establish at the beginning of or during a grand jury investigation what can only be determined at its conclusion.

It would cripple the administration of justice to require the grand jury to demand documents with a particularity "which presupposes an accurate knowledge of such papers, which the tribunal describing the papers would probably rarely, if ever, have." (Citation omitted). In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum, 203 F. Supp. 575, 579 (S.D., N.Y. 1961).

In summary, the federal system—as opposed to a system such as California in which the grand jury is used in only special cases—must use the grand jury for all felony prosecutions. Many measures in the proposed legislation are designed to deal with problems which presently arise only in unique or highly sensitive cases. As such, the restrictive rules, the new motions and the new rights granted to both defendants and witnesses will wreak havoc with literally thousands of federal prosecutions—the so-called routine cases which heretofore have not presented any appreciable problems, either for the government or in the nature of significant claims of violations of substantive rights of individuals.

In the special cases in which witnesses are likely to seek the assistance of counsel or in which the issues of exculpatory evidence is likely to occur, the proposed legislation unnecessarily shifts the balance away from the interests of society—that interest in effectively dealing with corruption of public officials, the depradations of the sophisticated white collar criminal and the ever increasing controls of organized crime.

The federal grand jury presently remains as the only effective tool to deal with conspiratorial crimes, those which often require the government to bring pressure upon lesser figures in order to reach the important individuals who make the conspiracy work. The proposed legislation, as I have indicated, places unnecessary restrictions on the ability of the government to deal with these highly dangerous forms of crime. Restrictions contained in the legislation are, in large part, unnecessary because the federal courts have demonstrated both the willingness and the power to prevent oppression of individuals by the government. And, this includes persons called as witnesses before the grand jury and those persons who are the subject of the grand jury investigation.

There is no demonstrated need to shove prosecutors off the scales of justice at this time in favor of a more restrictive control on the federal grand jury. Frankly, this legislation is not needed and should not be adopted.

Thank you.

Mr. MILLER. As you noted, I'm appearing today as a representative of the National District Attorneys Association and I speak both as the district attorney and as a former U.S. attorney. I have had both experience with State grand juries under the California grand jury system as well as the Federal system, and it is with that experience in mind that I would like to discuss if I may the analogous application of section 3329, subsection 4(c), which in effect creates many of the same problems under Federal legislation—that of exculpatory evidence—which have occurred as a result of the Supreme Court opinion rendered in September of 1975.

I would like to illustrate what has occurred since that Supreme Court opinion in order to point out some of the pitfalls I think that may be facing us in this Federal area.

In September of 1975 a California court ruled that a prosecutor who has possession of exculpatory evidence must bring the evidence to the attention of the grand jury and on the surface, of course, that requirement does not seem onerous; but let me just discuss if I may the application of that requirement in California.

We have seen, through ingenious efforts of criminal defense attorneys, virtual emasculation of the grand jury system in California as we know it. Those legal maneuverings are referred to in California as the Johnson motion which is named after the particular Supreme Court case. Let me describe for you some of the problems that our office encountered as a result of Johnson and, again, while it may seem on balance fairness would require that the prosecutor make available those matters which are of an exculpatory nature, the manner in which this subject has been approached by criminal defense attorneys has put such a burden upon our office that we have gradually discontinued the use of the California grand jury. In fact, nearly all criminal matters now go to the alternative preliminary hearing in California, and I might add that is an alternative that is not available to Federal prosecutors.

Let me give you an example of what actually occurred. A criminal defense attorney, knowing that his client is the subject of an investigation, will wait until just prior to the culmination of the investigation and then will contact the prosecutor handling the case and inform him that the defendant believes the prosecutor has within his possession exculpatory evidence. When the prosecutor asks the nature of the evidence, the criminal defense attorney then declines to become more specific. Now in this particular case involving a complex fraud, the prosecutor may have in his possession several thousand documents. The prosecutor is put in the position of literally—if he is to comply with the alleged requirement concerning exculpatory evidence—having to search every single document in order to determine whether within all of those thousands of documents he could find something which could conceivably pertain to matters of an exculpatory nature. This simply is not only impractical, but impossible.

First, there may be no exculpatory evidence existent to substantiate the claim made by the defense attorney and, second, even if the document in question is reviewed, the prosecutor may not have all of the facts available to even make a judgment as to whether that document is in fact exculpatory. This was the subject of the Johnson motion, taking several days, but that does not include other Johnson motions which included several weeks and in many instances a longer period of time than the trial itself.

Let me give you another example of what occurred under the Johnson motion. There's a communication during the course of an investigation in which the defense attorney offers to bring the suspect into the grand jury for purposes of testifying with respect to exculpatory evidence. The problem with that avenue—and this is based upon our own experience—is that the defense attorney then states that his client will testify before the grand jury as to the exculpatory nature of his defense but he will not permit the prosecutor or the grand jury to question him on any matter, including his testimony.

Now all of these approaches to this issue obviously are specious, but in each and every instance they permit the laying of a foundation which ultimately results in protracted motions, motions in which as I mentioned may last for several days and sometimes in excess of a month. Consequently, at least from a cost and efficiency standpoint, the prosecutor may just as well take that matter to a preliminary hearing which is the alternative in California, because the motion itself from our experience might very well take longer than the period of time to process an actual trial.

Now I mention this because this is our actual experience in California and rest assured that the same tactical approach is going to be used on the Federal side and you're going to see it is even a larger burden to be placed upon the Federal prosecutor because in his instance he doesn't have the State alternative that we do, that is the preliminary hearing.

Now bear in mind that we aren't talking about, in most instances, a situation in which a prosecutor actually has in his possession exculpatory evidence which will explain away the charge. This is not the circumstance. What we have, instead, under this Johnson rule, is the possibility of possession, a possibility engendered by the communications and allegations made by a criminal defense attorney pending the outcome of the grand jury presentation. So therefore, in California, to reiterate, the deputy district attorneys in my office and the deputy district attorneys in most jurisdictions in the State, by virtue of this experience, are simply now taking all of their criminal matters to preliminary hearing.

Now to turn to another subject and one which has been discussed both by Judge Lacey and Mr. Ruff, and one which is pending I might add before our own State legislature as well as in H.R. 94, and that is the requirement that a witness be permitted to be accompanied by his attorney in the grand jury room. Mind you, with the Johnson motion, we have in effect almost seen the demise of the grand jury system as we have known it in California. I can only say that if this provision is added to the problems encountered through our exculpatory evidence requirement, then the demise of the grand jury system in California as we know it will be complete and the Federal system will remain but with a combination of those two matters it will remain only because it's constitutionally mandated. It's just simply impractical and it's impossible—and my experience I think says something for it—to control the actions of a criminal defense attorney in a grand jury room, and I really don't care what kind of restraints or conditions that you lay down for an attorney who appears; it is going to be impossible to regulate his actions in any way, and I say this because I have been dealing with these matters for a great many years and I believe I appreciate the ingenuity of attorneys who are involved in criminal defense work. I hasten to say that I don't mean their attempts to protect their client are in any way not honorable. I simply mean attorneys are not going to go into a grand jury room and advise their client without attempting in many instances and in many ways to affect the questioning of the particular witness, his demeanor and his attitude.

I foresee that a criminal defense attorney, if a question is asked which in his mind presents a problem, will speak out and object. Consequently, of necessity, a judge will then have to rule on each objection and if the judge believes the particular criminal defense attorney has not adhered to the guidelines as set down in this bill, then he, of course, can remove the attorney; but that doesn't really make any difference. The next attorney could put the grand jury in virtually the same position, causing in effect inordinate delays.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Miller, may I interrupt with a question at this point? I would be very interested in having your comment or reaction to an analogy that has been made; namely, counsel representing a witness before a congressional hearing to counsel representing a witness in a grand jury room.

Mr. MILLER. I think there's a big distinction because people at least in the Federal system who are members of the grand jury, are picked at random. They are lay people. In most instances they have had no experience whatsoever with conducting hearings and they are not sophisticated in dealing with attorneys or with disruptions within a grand jury room and I think in their instance they would be placed in a defensive posture and that is not true when people who are experienced or conducting congressional hearings of a judge is conducting a trial.

Mr. EILBERG. But you do have an attorney or assistant district attorney present to participate and perhaps complain to the judge, do you not?

Mr. MILLER. Well, this is exactly what would result. What would result would be a complaint to the judge. The judge would then have to make a ruling and an obstreperous defense attorney could then go back in the grand jury room and continue objecting to questions which——

Mr. EILBERG. And if he does, could not the judge then impose contempt on that particular lawyer?

Mr. MILLER. Well, sure. There are a lot of remedies, but I don't foresee under the federal system, or even under the State system, very much coming out of that. I have seen very few contempt proceedings against attorneys who have in many instances conducted themselves in a much more onerous way than that. So I don't see as a practical matter much coming from the contempt proceeding.

In the Johnson motion that I have discussed with you, as we have seen by way of example under California law, it's being used to illustrate what can happen when some of these matters are incorporated into law.

Now much has been said about the traditional problem of multiple representation. The American Bar Association Committee on Defense Function, on which I have been recently serving, has recently taken a very strict approach to multiple representation of clients. In fact, our committee has recommended that except for very minor circumstances and prehearing situations, multiple representations be prohibited. But that is only a standard of conduct. It doesn't mean that any vehicle in the law currently exists whereby we can foreclose or prohibit multiple representation as applied to witnesses in the grand jury room.

As a result, we are going to see witnesses appearing in the grand jury room with attorneys for the future defendant. We have been working on this matter of multiple representation and I include in my statement comments made by Mr. Cole, and it is an extremely serious problem. I think it goes without saying that neither of the two major objections that I have raised today as to the so-called grand jury reform are really going to have much impact or effect upon subjects who are charged with the traditional or routine crimes. You know, the application of these proposed rules will only have their impact in areas which involve such matters as complex fraud cases, organized crime or public corruption, and you can rest assured, these rules as applied to those people who are poor, young, or of a minority background will be presented just as they have been in the past. The people who will take advantage of this type of reform will be the sophisticated criminal, the major mobster, and the corrupt public official who will be represented for the most part by experienced, high-priced, sophisticated criminal defense attorneys.

Now, in conclusion, while I concede from a procedural standpoint there are a number of matters which require improvement, including as has been mentioned by the two previous witnesses, the recording of testimony before the grand jury and an improvement of the discovery procedures, I do urge you to retain the Federal grand jury system in essence as it exists today.

Now under the California grand jury system we do record all testimony. We do record all statements made by attorneys and by grand jurors and it seems to me that that is the direction in which many of the protections that you're concerned about can be attained.

Just as a final matter, to alert you to the differences within the various jurisdictions, you not only have investigative grand juries on the Federal side, but you also have the routine presentations of criminal matters to the grand jury and in some jurisdictions—San Diego is one—you have enough crimes committed on the border so you will have upward of 40, 50, and sometimes 60 indictments returned in a single day. So the kind of jurisdictions that cross the federal system should be of some concern to you in the application of any changes in the law.

I also believe, and finally, than whenever you change the law in these areas—again illustrating the Johnson type of motion—you in effect create a brandnew set of pretrial motions. If my understanding is correct with respect to the provisions of the new Federal Speedy Trial Act, if all of these matters are culminated in a series of new motions, postindictment, which will take time and effort and cost in the future, then certainly you're going to run into a problem in the application of the Speedy Trial Act.

Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Miller, for a very thoughtful and searching review of the issues involved. That's not to say we agree with you in many respects, but we thank you for the time and trouble you took for your presentation today.

I have a few questions. In a letter addressed to me dated February 14, 1977, Patrick Healy, executive director of the National District Attorneys Association, stated that the NDAA endorsed the grand jury reforms advocated by the ABA. As you know, these reforms track H.R. 94 very closely. How many prosecutors were involved in this decision? Is this still the NDAA position?

[The February 14, 1977, letter follows:]

NATIONAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., February 14, 1977.

Congressman JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law of the Judiciary Committee, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Thank you for your letter of January 24 along with a copy of your proposed legislation, H.R. 94.

The Executive Committee of the Association has just endorsed the grand jury reform changes being advocated by the American Bar Association. In those situations where your Bill is in agreement with the ABA's suggested reforms, we undoubtedly support it and conversely in those situations where your Bill is in opposition, I am sorry but it will be impossible for us to support it. There are many areas where your Bill is silent and we have not had the opportunity to examine it. So, at this time, we are not in a position to take a stand one way or the other.

Yours very truly,

PATRICK F. HEALY,
Executive Director.

Mr. MILLER. I believe this NDAA position is to oppose H.R. 94. In my conversations with Mr. Healy and in our latest board of directors meeting, we took the position, first of all, that we would oppose the proposal to put an attorney with his witness in the grand jury room. Now we didn't cover every single proposal of the ABA but that was the major concern of the members of the District Attorneys Association.

[In May of 1977, the National District Attorney's Association adopted "National Prosecution Standards." The standards on the grand jury follows:]

CHAPTER 14. THE GRAND JURY

The grand jury is a traditional mechanism in the judicial process. It plays a role that is felt to be vital by some, and a waste of time by others in the normal processing of cases. Eastern and southern states regard it with high esteem, yet it is seldom used in western states.

The grand jury has two basic functions: charging and investigation. Investigation is most frequently used in economic crime, public corruption and such other issues that require a broad investigative base. Charging is very similar to what a prosecutor can do without grand jury action. Generally, following the decision of the lower court in the preliminary hearing or probable cause determination, to "bind over" a defendant the formal "charge" is made. This can be accomplished quite simply by the prosecutor filing a document called the "information." However, if a grand jury is used the process is more complex and time consuming, for the decision at the preliminary hearing/probable cause determination only binds over the accused for further consideration by the grand jury. Again, the prosecutor must demonstrate, this time to the grand jury, that there is probable cause. If the grand jury agrees, it issues a document called the "indictment" which constitutes the formal charge. If the grand jury does not find probable cause the case is dismissed. In some jurisdictions both a preliminary hearing/probable cause determination and a grand jury are not necessary; then only one of the methods to charge is used.

A defendant can take part in preliminary hearings/probable cause determinations, but can not in grand juries. Empaneling and servicing a grand jury requires a costly expenditure of facilities, manpower, and budget. The National Advisory Commission found the grand jury basically a waste of time and money, except where notorious cases required a community voice or in politically sensitive issues, and the indictment process not justifying the delay and inconvenience it causes.

This chapter looks at the positive and negative factors of grand juries, both as a charging and investigation function. It recommends that both functions be available to prosecution in all jurisdictions, but it strongly advocates that prosecution have a bypass process (information) available. Utilization is left to prosecutorial discretion; bypassing the grand jury is called for in most cases, with the provision for a probable cause determination. The Standards also address the prosecutor's role in relation to the grand jury, indicating that the grand jury needs to receive legal advice while also remaining independent to adversary arguments of prosecution. Several limitations are called for in prosecution's conduct, which the Task Forces feel will aid in assuring that independence, legal knowledge, and judicial esteem are achieved.

STANDARD 14.1. CONTINUATION

There should be in each jurisdiction a grand jury possessing both indictment and investigatory powers, which may be called into session by the court or the prosecutor.

STANDARD 14.2. CHARGING

A. The prosecutor should have the option to bypass the grand jury as long as there is provision for a probable cause determination.

B. Where charges are reviewed by a grand jury, the requirement for a probable cause determination should be eliminated.

C. When hearsay evidence is presented to a grand jury, the primary source is expected to be available for testimony at trial.

D. The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt or preclude the finding of an indictment.

E. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

F. All testimony before the grand jury should be recorded.

STANDARD 14.3. INVESTIGATIVE

A. The precise scope of grand jury investigatory functions should be determined by each state.

B. Witnesses before grand jury investigating panels should be allowed the assistance of counsel, unless and until immunity is granted. Counsel should not accompany the witness into the grand jury room during the testimony, but should only be available for consultation outside the grand jury room.

C. State law should provide that upon petition from two or more prosecutors, a grand jury be impaneled to investigate matters of a special nature, and to bring charges based upon that investigation based on activities within all the counties joining the petition.

D. Where grand jury reporting is provided for, the reporting function should be governed by the following procedures:

1. The grand jury may submit to the court by which it was impaneled a report:

(a) Concerning misconduct, non-feasance or neglect in public office by a public servant as the basis for a recommendation of removal or disciplinary action; or

(b) Stating that after investigation of a public servant it finds no misconduct, non-feasance or neglect in office by that individual provided that such public servant has requested the submission of such report; or

(c) Proposing recommendation for legislative, executive or administrative action in the public interest based upon stated findings.

2. The court to which such report is submitted shall examine it and the minutes of the grand jury and, except as otherwise provided in subdivision (4) four, shall make an order accepting and filling such report as a public record only if the court is satisfied that it complies with the provisions of subdivision (1) one and that:

(a) The report is based upon facts revealed in the course of an investigation and is supported by the preponderance of the credible and legally admissible evidence; and

(b) When the report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision (1) one, that each person named therein was afforded an opportunity to testify before the grand jury prior to the filing of such report, and when the report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (b) or (c) of subdivision (1) one, it is not critical of an identified or indentifiable person.

3. The order accepting a report pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision (1) one, and the report itself, must be sealed by the court and may not be filed as a public record, or be subject to subpoena or otherwise be made public until at least thirty-one days after a copy of the order and the report are served upon each public servant named therein, until the affirmance of the order accepting the report, or until reversal of the order sealing the report, or until dismissal of the appeal of the named public servant by the appellate division, whichever occurs later. Such public servant may file with the clerk of the court an answer to such report, not later than twenty days after service of the order and report. Such an answer shall plainly and concisely state the facts and law constituting the defense of the public servant to the charges in said report, and except for those parts of the answer which the court may determine to be scandalously or prejudicially and unnecessarily inserted therein, shall become an appendix to the report. Upon the expiration of the time set forth in this subdivision, the prosecuting attorney shall deliver a true copy of such report, and the appendix if any, for appropriate action, to each public servant or body having removal or disciplinary authority over each public servant named therein. The determination by the court as to whether a report is in compliance with the requirements of this standard, and should be filed as a public record, or whether it should remain sealed for any reason, including prejudice to an on-going criminal matter, should be subject to appellate review.

4. Upon the submission of a report pursuant to subdivision (1) one, if the court finds that the filing of such report as a public record, may prejudice fair consideration of a pending criminal matter, it must order such report sealed and such report may not be subject to subpoena or public inspection during the pendancy of such criminal matter, except upon order of the court.

5. Whenever the court to which a report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision (1) one is not satisfied that the report complies with the provisions of subdivision (2) two, it may direct that additional testimony be taken before the same grand jury, or it must make an order sealing such report, and the report may not be filed as a public record, or be subject to subpoena or otherwise be made public.

Task Force V.—Each state should adopt procedures adequate to assure that:

A. The grand jury report is supported by the findings made during an investigation;

B. Each person named in connection with a report under paragraph (c) of subdivision (1) of Section D of this standard was given an opportunity to testify before the grand jury prior to the release of the report.

STANDARD 14.4. PROSECUTOR'S RELATION WITH THE GRAND JURY

A. Where the prosecutor is authorized to act as legal advisor to the grand jury the prosecutor may appropriately explain the law and express his opinion on the legal significance of the evidence but he should give due deference to its status as an independent legal body.

B. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

COMMENTARY

History

The grand jury was created in England in 1166.[1] It was initially conceived, and served for the first 500 years of its existence, as an instrument for the consolidation of royal power.[2] Only in the 17th Century did it begin to gain the level of independence that transformed the grand jury into a shield against oppression by the state. The grand jury continued to be a feature of the English legal system until the 1960's. Suspended by war-time emergency measures, it was finally abolished by Parliament in 1933.[3]

The concept of the grand jury was part of the common law brought by English settlers to the New World. By the end of the colonial period, the grand jury had come to serve as an indepensable part of colonial government.[4] Essentially the grand jury served as a kind of ongoing town meeting—as sounding board for judical and lay opinion on a variety of governmental activities.[5] During the era of the American Revolution "[Grand Juries] enforced or refused to enforce laws as they saw fit, and stood guard against indiscriminate prosecution by royal officials." [6] The grand jury was retained by each of the original states following independence.

In the years following the U.S. Civil War, there was a strong movement to eliminate the grand jury, and especially its indictment function.[7] Curiously, many of the basic arguments heard then are still germane today—that the grand jury is time-consuming and inefficient and that it offers only a limited protection to individual rights. This abolition movement received a boost in 1884, when the Supreme Court in Hurtado v. California,[8] ruled that the 14th Amendment, read with the 5th, did not require the use of a grand jury indictment in state prosecution of crimes. Rather, the Court held that "due process of law" included any system of prosecution which preserved liberty and justice.[9]

Between the 1850's and 1920's, most states west of the Mississippi abolished the regular grand jury for indictment of crimes, substituting the prosecutor's "information." This reform movement, however, had almost no impact in the South, and made little headway in the East.

The momentum for abolition continued into the '20's and '30's, marked by reports from Raymond Moley,[10] Wayne Morse [11] and National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement (Wickersham Commission)[12] which urged a shift to prosecution by information. Younger, in his study The People's Panel, reports, however, that about the same time the grand jury regained public esteem by spectacular probes of governmental corruption and organized crime.[13] For whatever reason, the movement toward prosecution by information suffered a key defeat in the late 1930's, when the New York constitutional convention reaffirmed the state requirement for initiation of charges by indictment.[14] Since then, there has been little change in the number of states utilizing a charging grand jury. Even in states lacking indicting grand juries, the institution has been retained in its investigatory and supervisory capacities.

Presently, about 24 states require use of indictment in felony prosecutions, 20 or so allow use of either information or indictment (and rely largely on the former); the remainder reserve grand juries for initiation of prosecution in some special class of cases (capital crimes, high felonies, etc.). A few states require indictment for some serious misdemeanors.[15]

Strengths and weaknesses of the grand jury

The major criticisms made of the grand jury throughout the years have been that it is inefficient, causing needless expense and delay in prosecution of offenders. But it is impossible to consider the inefficiency argument apart from its key assumption—which is that the grand jury performs limited or nonexistent protective functions against arbitrary or oppressive prosecution, or that such functions merely duplicate those already provided effectively by the prosecutor or the courts. No critic argues that a grand jury which acts as a necessary and viable protection of individuals should be abolished because it is inconvenient. Therefore, because the assertions of the grand jury's inability to function as intended in protecting the individual form the underpinning for much of the criticism addressed against the grand jury, it is appropriate to begin the discussion on this point.

The grand jury is alleged to be a "rubber stamp" for the prosecutor. Critics cite statistically low "no bill" rates in many American jurisdictions. Even these low rates may be deceptive, since, in many instances, the prosecutor concurs with the grand jury's refusal to indict.[16]

James Shannon, in a recent New Mexico Law Review article, sees the grand jury as an administrative tool of the prosecutor that serves merely to protect the prosecutor's exercise of discretion in cases from public scrutiny.[17] Further, he asserts that many grand juries lack one or more of the factors that would enable them to serve as effective checks on the prosecutor—impartial selection, representativeness, freedom from antecedent bias and prejudice, freedom excessive prosecutorial domination, and internal leadership and independence.[18]

This "rubber stamp" character is attributed to several factors. First, grand jurors are inexperienced and untrained in law, and so are unable to make independent evaluation of evidence and elements of offenses.[19] Second, most grand juries have little opportunity to obtain outside assistance of counsel or independent investigation. Third, the jurors in most states are allowed to hear only the prosecution side of the case. Finally, grand jurors are criticized as demonstrating a "passive acceptance of anything which seems to bear the sovereign's approval"—the idea that the prosecutor would not be presenting a case unless the accused was probably guilty.[20]

The second major criticism of the grand jury sytsem is that it is inefficient. Even those critics who assume that the grand jury does serve a protective role, argue that its function is redundant since other aspects of the legal system can serve the same function for less cost in money, prosecutorial and citizen resources, and delay. Proposed as alternative sources of this protection are the prosecutor in his screening function, and the judicial system through the mechanism of probable cause determinations.

The assertion that the prosecutor can do as good or better a job in "screening out" cases unworthy of prosecution has several aspects. Prosecutors have a great incentive to screen out bad cases since the prosecutor must try the case, and pursuing them only adds to their usually large workload. In fact, the standards for eliminating cases used by many prosecutors is "convictability" rather than the less stringent test of "probable cause" utilized by the grand jury.[21] Antell asserts that in fact it is more common for a prosecutor to protect an individual from a provoked grand jury than for the grand jury to interpose itself between prosecutor and individual.[22]

Reformers promote the preliminary hearing as an adequate substitute for grand jury protection.[23] An oft-made argument is that in many states probable cause determinations occur anyway, and the use of two procedural steps—grand jury and preliminary examination—to reach the same probable cause determination is redundant and wasteful. Among the negative effects resulting from this redundancy are:

1. additional burden on witnesses (multiple appearances),
2. additional opportunities (assuming preliminary examination and grand jury transcripts available to defendant) for inconsistencies in testimony that would aid defendant.

Further, while historically grand jury secrecy has been justified as serving to protect the reputation of persons for whom indictments were denied, in fact, where a probable cause determination exists, these accusations have already been made a matter of public knowledge.[24]

A third fundamental criticism of the grand jury is that regardless of its effectiveness or ineffectiveness as a buffer to arbitrary and untrue charges, it is often a source of injustice for either failing to charge when the law clearly requires or for indicting unjustly and irresponsibly.

It is pointed out, for example, that grand juries in the Reconstruction South failed to bring charges for violations of civil rights, including voting rights.[25] Shannon draws attention to the failure of some modern grand juries—for various improper reasons—to indict. Among the cases cited are the Kent State shooting and three killings by police officers in New Mexico where the decision of the grand juries not to indict was "on face contrary to statutory and decisional law of the state."[26] The same author sees a trend toward the grand jury becoming a shield protecting officers of the law from possible criminal charges by citizenry.[27]

The grand jury may over-prosecute as well as under-prosecute, and even where no charges are brought, grand jury investigations can be misused. Judge

Antell notes that grand juries are sometimes "engines of oppression" [28] and it is clear that others believe some grand jury investigations and indictments are more tailored to repression of dissent than punishment of criminals. A pertinent example of this is the recent role of federal grand juries in anti-war dissent cases.[29]

The final criticism of grand juries is in some ways a summation of ones preceding. It is that the grand jury, as an institution, has lost the respect and confidence of the people, perhaps irreparably.[30]

Proponents of the continued extensive use of grand juries for both charging and investigative purposes have taken a fundamentally different direction from their opponents. Generally, they concede that the grand jury does have a significant cost in terms of money, manpower and citizen time, although they see the time delay as minor, especially in relatively populous areas or areas where a grand jury meets frequently.[31] However, while conceding the costs, grand jury defenders dispute assertions that the grand jury is a rubber stamp, that it is redundant, and that it has lost the confidence of the people.

The most prevalent argument in favor of the grand jury is that it plays an important role in the democratic process itself. C. W. Wickersham, replying to Judge Antell's claims, starts with the premise that effective democratic government depends on participation, and that the grand jury is a "highly important instrument" for this purpose.[32] The late Senator Kefauver, in similar terms, favored grand juries because they were close to the people.[33] Another writer disapproved a shift to an information system because it would eliminate community participation in prosecutorial decision-making.[34]

Younger perhaps best summarizes the arguments on this point. Condemnation of the grand jury system on a strictly utilitarian basis, he points out, has the effect of narrowing debate to one of democracy versus efficiency.[35] While acknowledging grand jury limitations—in terms of subservience to the prosecutor and abuses of authority—he believes that there are ways to eliminate these. The most significant aspect of the grand jury is its democratic and local character and he argues that, at least potentially, the grand jury is an effective weapon against "big government and statism." [36]

Moving beyond the philosophical to the pragmatic, there is a considerable dispute over whether grand juries are in fact rubber stamps for the prosecutors' wishes. Wickersham cites a 1960 survey showing that a New York grand jury in 1960 dismissed outright over one-fifth of the complaints, and reduced 25% of the rest.[37] Others explain that the high incidence of agreement between prosecutor and grand jury is a result merely of the prosecutor's careful pre-screening of cases.[38] The prosecutor may be predicting grand jury reaction rather than controlling it. The same source insists that even the small number of cases thrown out at the indictment stage is adequate justification for using grand juries in this process. Professor Dession in his 1932 study pointed out that given a standard of probable cause, the open-and-shut nature of the great majority of cases was not expected. However, he asserted that it was in the record of the small minority of difficult cases that reputation of the grand jury was to be judged.[39]

The grand jury's indictment review is not necessarily duplicative of the prosecutor's screening decision and the court determination of probable cause. While there is no reason to suspect wide-scale prosecutorial misbehavior in charging, allowing a prosecutor to bring persons to trial by simply filing an information may place a power too susceptible to political and personal abuses in the hands of a single individual. Thus, th egrand jury serve to thwart certain abuses from time to time, even though it is somewhat passive during the normal situations when the rposecutor does not misuse his office. Ironically, some prosecutors themselves seem uneasy about the breadth of their discretion in charging; prosecutors can use the grand jury to protect themselves from criticism by presenting sensitive cases to the grand jury and in effect receiving citizen ratification for their intended course of action.[40]

One answer to the claim that the preliminary examination provides an adequate determination of the existence of probable cause is that such a process is an imperfect device for this purpose and that the judicial evaluations of the sufficiency of a case is in any case often de minimis. An article discussing the status of the grand jury in New York argues, for example, that preliminary examination often take place soon after arrest, when there is little chance for investigation or other case preparation, and that it can't be expected to accomplish a thorough examination looking to the protection of the accused.[41]

Finally, the evidence that grand juries have lost the confidence of the public is presently subject to question. In some states at least—New York is an outstanding example—citizen involvement and support seem high. More recently, the joint performance of prosecutors and grand juries in the Watergate case, in the Agnew case and investigating other political corruption in various areas of the country belie this opinion. Of course, these are examples of the investigative rather than the charging function of grand juries, but to many defenders of the institution, and perhaps to the public, the distinction is not a clear one. Finally, even among some critics there is dispute as to the public regard for the grand jury. Though he thinks the opinion unjustified, Antell admits that the grand jury generally has public trust and confidence.[42]

Charging function

The Task Forces' adoption of a position favoring continued use of the grand jury in investigative and indicting roles is made with an awareness of the views of the various proponents and opponents of the grand jury concept. Task Force members are also aware of the tremendous variety in grand jury usage, ranging from states relying largely on a prosecutor's information for initiating charges, to states where even serious misdemeanors are required to be initiated by indictment. There are similar differences encountered in the cost of grand juries in both money, and case processing delay, in the independence and quality of grand jurors, in the scope and procedures for preliminary hearing, and in the scope of the investigatory and supervisory roles. Finally, there are great disparities in citizen involvement and interest in the grand jury concept, and in the degree of public trust in the institution. All these factors make it difficult or impossible to adopt any useful standards on the scope of the grand jury's indictment or investigating functions. Instead, those matters are left for resolution to the individual jurisdictions.

Prosecutor's option

Standard 142A does propose that while states do not necessarily have to require use of the grand jury indictment, in some or all cases, they should at least allow the district attorney discretion to send cases to the grand jury for review. It may be of special value to community confidence in the criminal justice system to have citizen involvement in cases where a decision either to charge or not to charge would be subject to public suspicion, mistrust, or belief that the district attorney's decision was motivated by political considerations.[43]

Prosecutors have been charged with improperly using the grand jury process to evade preliminary hearings, often to avoid the resultant discovery by the defendant. It is doubted that this criticism has substantial merit. The Supreme Court's recent decision in Gerstein v. Pugh indicated that, as a constitutional matter, the process of grand jury indictment is an acceptable and appropriate alternative to a magistrate's determination of probable cause.[44] Also, the Standards calling for general reciprocal discovery in criminal cases, and for disclosure of general jury testimony for impeachment purposes, will operate to reduce the importance of a preliminary hearing as a discovery device. Thus, the fact that defendants might gain knowledge of the state's case through preliminary hearing should not play any role in the determination of whether the indictment/grand jury or information/probable cause determination (or preliminary hearing) process is utilized.

Duplication eliminated

In a minority of jurisdictions, a preliminary hearing is used to determine whether sufficient evidence exists to warrant presentation of a case to the grand jury for indictment. Where it exists, the procedure should be abolished. Both grand jury and preliminary hearings engage in a determination of whether there are sufficient grounds on which a criminal prosecution may be based. The delay occasioned by requiring both findings to be made is costly both to defendants and the system in terms of delaying ultimate disposition of cases.

However, in eliminating the dual use of grand jury and preliminary hearings, states will be somewhat restricted by the terms of Gerstein v. Pugh. Gerstein requires that, if an accused is deprived of personal liberty in some manner, there must be a reasonably speedy determination of probable cause.[45] When the grand jury is unable to consider the charge within a short time, a summary, non-adversary examination of probable cause may be necessary. (See Standard 12.2).

Quality of evidence

Evidence which would be inadmissible at trial (for example, illegally obtained, or hearsay) may not serve as sufficient basis for indictment. Grand juries without legal training may return an indictment based on evidence inadmissible at trial. For example, a common procedure subject to some criticism is the utilization of a witness such as a law enforcement officer to summarize the state's evidence—including the testimony of absent witnesses. This has been criticized as denying grand jurors the opportunity of observing the demeanor of the witness who will be testifying at trial.[46]

On the other hand, the grand jury's screening function can be best carried out if it has all the facts; the prosecutor is usually available to offer advice about the admissibility of certain items, and has no incentive to have the grand jury indict a defendant who prosecution knows will be non-convictable. Even if the prosecutor does not process admissible evidence on a key point, further investigation might produce such before trial. Further, the use of a single official to summarize other witnesses is fast and saves witnesses from the inconvenience of multiple appearances.

New York and 16 other states in some way limit grand jury consideration of non-legal evidence;[47] New York courts will dismiss an indictment based solely on inadmissible evidence. Some states limit the use of a summarizing witness' hearsay to situations where the witness is unavailable.[48]

Section 14.2D, of this Standard provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendant's guilt.[49] This requirement to disclose exculpatory evidence is analogous to the finding of the Supreme Court in Brady v. Maryland[50] that the prosecutor had a duty to disclose exculpatory material to the defense.

Section 14.2E of the Standard recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury, to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise improper cases.

"A prosecutor should not, however, take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury. Since grand jury proceed-

Investigative function

Jurisdictions utilize the investigatory and supervisory capacities of grand juries in a large variety of ways. The Standard does not address the basic investigatory functions a grand jury should have, leaving these matters to the individual jurisdictions. However, the Standard does not propose the adoption of two procedures, wherever the investigatory powers of grand juries are used.

Right to counsel

While many normal procedural safeguards for witnesses are lacking in grand jury investigations, it was determined as early as 1892 that such witnesses do retain the privilege against self-incrimination.[52] This constitutional protection was later extended to witnesses testifying before state grand jury panels.[53]

In order to allow greater testimony before grand jury investigations, most states have statutes granting immunity, which allow the compelling of testimony without intruding on the 5th Amendment privilege. However, witnesses may encounter a problem in seeking to handle the immunity or to invoke the 5th Amendment. Courts in all jurisdictions have been reluctant to extend rights of counsel to grand jury proceedings.[54] So, a witness, without the direct advice of counsel, must determine individually the incriminating nature of questions and answers, and must avoid waiving this privilege against incrimination.[55]

Section 14.3B of the Standard, based on the Washington Criminal Investigation Act of 1971[56] would avoid the problem by providing a limited right to counsel, but only until or unless immunity was granted. Counsel would be available only for advising the witness; presence of counsel would not create a quasi-trial adversary proceeding. There are some problems with the procedure—including the adverse effect of counsel presence, especially where counsel represents a crime syndicate or the head of a conspiracy. The attorney might in such cases act to coordinate witnesses' responses in such a way as to thwart an investigation.[57] However, the ability to exclude counsel as soon as immunity is granted offers a valuable option. Judges should retain the power to issue protective orders excluding counsel likely to be in the service of the conspiracy, etc., upon showing of a reasonable likelihood of interference with the investigation. In such a case, the witness should be able to depend on some other source for legal advice about this privilege.

Reporting procedure

Section 14.3D of the Standard presents a procedure for reforming and standardizing the issuance of grand jury reports. For purposes of the Standard, a report may be defined as an informal, written accusation, directed at either general conditions in the community or a specific individual, from which no indictment is framed.[58]

Although the controversy over the propriety of the grand jury's reporting power is not a new one, the historical roots of the practice are solid. One of the first cases approving, at least implicitly, a grand jury report charging misconduct by named individuals occurred in 1683.[59] The breadth of grand jury inquiry in England was broad, including both criticisms of specific individuals and informational reports into broad areas of public concern.[60] "Some of the American colonies also adopted the practice of allowing the grand jury to issue reports on matters of public concern." [61]

Modern American practice regarding the scope of grand jury investigative and reporting power varies considerably. Based on the common law, many courts permit a general, informational type of report to be made; on the other hand, a majority of courts which have addressed the issue have disapproved reports which publicly criticize an individual without indictment.[62] Some states have resolved the issue by statute. In California, for example, the grand jury is assigned the duty to routinely investigate county government officials and agencies.[63]

Many spokesman strongly favor a continuation, or even an expansion of the investigative/reporting roles of the grand jury. Even though an investigation may not lead to criminal charges:

"Much conduct which is not subject to criminal penalties is nevertheless a legitimate matter of public concern, for example, inefficient or corrupt city government, improperly administered police or fire departments, and the like."[64]

Further, if the grand jury, while investigating alleged criminal activity, discovers misconduct which is less than that which should be indicted, it is argued that limiting the right to report on these matters would thwart legitimate public interest.[65] Other strengths of the grand jury are its non-political nature, and the ability of its reports to stimulate public discussion on issues. A recent California decision emphasized these factors:

"In our system of government, a Grand Jury is the only agency free from possible political or official bias that has an opportunity to see the picture of crime and the operation of government relating thereto on any broad basis. It performs a valuable public purpose in presenting its conclusions drawn from that overview. The public, may of course, ultimately conclude that the jury's fears were exaggerated or that its proposed solutions are unwise. But the debate which reports, such as the one before us, would provoke could lead only to a better understanding of public governmental problems. They should be encouraged and not prohibited.[66]

Finally, while even many defenders of the grand jury report express misgivings over reports criticizing private individuals' activities, they believe there are no such objections to reports on public officials. "Public servants, especially elected officials, occupy positions of public trust, and as trustees of the public welfare these officials assume a risk that they will be the subject of close scrutiny and public comment."[67] Of course, even these public officials deserve certain fundamental protections against improper grand jury reports.[68]

There are also a number of serious criticisms of grand jury reports, especially, though not exclusively, those which criticize named individuals. First, an unfavorable report may stand as a severe form of extra-judicial punishment, from which there is no appeal. Second, the quasijudicial nature of the grand jury gives it an apparent reliability which may not be justified. Third, the secrecy of grand jury proceedings prevents any accused from knowing the basis for the accusations; the accused is denied the chance to cross-examine accusers, or to present one's own side in the dispute. At least where an indictment is returned on the basis of such proceedings, there will be an opportunity to respond to the charges at trial. Fourth, grand jurors are accountable to no one. Fifth, grand jurors may impose a personal standard of morality on persons, rather than an abstract and neutral conception of right and wrong.[69]

Section 14.3D of the Standard, recognizing the complexity of arguments for and against grand jury reporting, neither endorses nor opposes the concept. However, where the grand jury is given reporting powers, the procedures contained in the Standard would operate to eliminate most of the negative aspects of reporting. The Standard is that of recent New York legislation[70] which permits grand juries to report on misconduct of less than a criminal level.

The statute has several notable features. First, the precise reporting responsibilities of the grand jury are defined. Specifically, these do not include reports on private individuals. Second, the report is examined by the court prior to public dissemination. Before releasing it, the judge is charged to determine the reliability of the report by assuring that its conclusions are based upon the preponderances of credible, legally admissible evidence. Further, the judge must assure that the criticized individuals had an opportunity to testify. Together, these features operate to limit reports based on one-sided unreliable information. Third, issuance of the report may be delayed to allow named public servants to reply to the charges, with such replies to be included as an appendix to the report itself. Fourth, the court may suppress temporarily the report where it might prejudice a pending criminal matter.

Together, these features of the statute "appear to reconcile the public's right to know of socially harmful conditions with the right of the individual to due process of law." [71]

Prosecutors' relations with grand jury

The final section of the Standards directly addresses the prosecutor's role in dealing with the grand jury.[72] While the grand jury has often been criticized for being a rubber stamp for the prosecutor in granting or denying indictment, it is difficult to ignore the legitimate need for the grand jurors to receive legal advice on matters beyond their experience and knowledge. Instead, the Standard forthrightly accepts the prosecutor's responsibility in this regard.

But at the same time, the Standard recognizes that public confidence in the indictment process may be dependent on the independence of the grand jury, and its ability to refuse to charge when it believes an accusation is unfounded. Therefore, several limitations are placed on how the prosecution must conduct itself. Though it does not define how this is to be done, the Standards call on the prosecutor to respect the independence of the grand jury. The prosecutor must also not attempt to unduly influence the jurors. Partly to permit supervision of this standard of conduct, the grand jury statements of prosecutor should be recorded. The Standard does not define who is to review such statements.

While some prosecutors may feel that these procedures interfere too greatly with their relationship with the grand jury, the adoption of such a standard of conduct does have fundamental importance to continuation of the grand jury's indictment functions. For if the prosecutors do not clearly respect the independence of the grand jury as a check on their great discretion, then the grand jury process may be rightly regarded as a mere cloak for the prosecutor's absolute control over the formal charging decision.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Miller, you spoke about grand jury proceedings required to be transcribed under the California law and then being given to a defendant. H.R. 94 has a similar requirement. Would you have us legislate in that direction?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. You see, this is part of the reason I think I was asked to testify before you, and that is that I have had the opportunity to be intimately familiar with both the federal system and our State grand jury systems and while I wouldn't go so far as to put down the stringent requirements that we have under California law because of the constitutional nature of the indictment process on the Federal side, I could recommend without reservations the recording of testimony and the submission to the defense attorney of that recorded testimony at an appropriate time.

Under California law, of course, we go one step further. We are required to present competent evidence in every respect and that can be challenged in the postindictment hearing, but I just don't think it's practical to require that on the Federal side because of some of the obvious problems just in processing routine cases. I wouldn't say that you should be permitted to use rank hearsay, but I don't think you're going to be able to get away from the use of hearsay recorded or not on the Federal side. We can do it on the State side. I don't think it's a practical thing to require on the Federal side.

Mr. EILBERG. Speaking of hearsay evidence, your California law does not allow the grand jury to consider hearsay evidence unless in a deposition or evidence that would be inadmissible at trial. Consideration of this evidence does not, however, automatically invalidate an indictment.

The question is, how are challenges to evidence made and what are the remedies, if any, in California?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; we have a postindictment hearing in California known as the 995 hearing, in which an indictment can be attacked on the basis that there was not sufficient evidence to find probable cause, and in the attack on that indictment there can be raised the question of the type of evidence that's used and whether that evidence would be admissible in court.

Consequently, you do have under the California system the availability of a remedy. Now that's in conjunction with supplying to the defense attorney the entire transcript and in my office, while it's not required as a matter of State law, I require all statements made, whether by the deputy district attorney, whether by the grand jury, whether it's of an advisory nature or not, to be recorded. The requirement under California law is that all testimony be recorded. We require everything to be recorded.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. SAWYER. I assume, as in Michigan where we have the same State alternative procedures, that you would only use grand juries for rather special type important cases, so therefore it may be practical to require only competent evidence to be introduced and to engage in all these protective procedures because you're only giving a very small portion of your prosecutions. Isn't that correct?

Mr. MILLER. That's correct. The percentage has changed radically since the Johnson case, but prior to Johnson, we probably sent less than 3 percent of our cases to the grand jury.

Mr. SAWYER. And that would be even more true under the Michigan procedure. We probably use it less than 1 percent. But the Federal prosecutorial authorities have to run every single minor case through a grand jury.

Mr. MILLER. Absolutely.

Mr. SAWYER. And they have no alternative procedure constitutionally available to them.

Mr. MILLER. That's why I attempted to point out the fact that we do have that alternative under California law. We can go to the preliminary hearing even if it means that we take a fraud case which we otherwise would have taken to the grand jury to preliminary hearing which might result in a preliminary hearing taking several weeks. But we do have the alternative. You don't have the alternative on the Federal side. You have to take these matters to the Federal grand jury. So you've got to consider the burden to be placed as a result of that constitutionally mandated requirement.

Mr. SAWYER. From the duality of your experience with both Federal and State prosecution, isn't it your impression that there are really a much greater percentage of relatively nonserious type cases prosecuted in the Federal court as Federal crimes than there are in the State courts? Do you have that impression?

Mr. MILLER. Nonserious?

Mr. SAWYER. Well, you know, the statutory type violation.

Mr. MILLER. I don't think I could generalize on that except to say this: my experience is that in San Diego a vast majority of the Federal crimes are smuggling crimes, smuggling narcotics, smuggling aliens, the crimes that occur at the border, and I suppose if numbers mean anything you could reach the point where you almost take the position that they aren't as serious as, say, the organized crime case, but they are important crimes.

Mr. SAWYER. I didn't mean to infer that. All our crimes are important. What I'm getting at basically is there is an inordinate amount of somewhat routine—which is perhaps a better word—routine Federal prosecution going on but it still has to go through a grand jury while under State law you would never run it through a grand jury. Isn't that true?

Mr. MILLER. That's right, and of course to give you a typical example of a Federal crime under our jurisdiction is stopping a car at the border. The car contains contraband of some sort. The car is taken to the secondary. The person is arrested. If he decides to make a statement, he makes a statement. If you have the contraband, that's the case. That's a routine type of Federal crime occurring in that jurisdiction but they are countless. They increase in numbers every year, but they have to go to the grand jury.

Mr. SAWYER. Whereas that kind of thing you never would run through a grand jury in the State process?

Mr. MILLER. Never.

Mr. SAWYER. Thank you. That's all I have.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall.

Mr HALL. Mr. Miller, I want to ask you one question. What's your thinking, having been in both State and Federal practice, about the giving of a week's notice to a person who will appear before a grand jury as a witness? Do you do that now?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. We give them notice. Typical witnesses that come before a grand jury—well, let me think for a second. We do have some other crimes which wouldn't touch on the Federal problem at all having to do with child molest witnesses——

Mr. HALL. Let's just restrict it to Federal crimes. Is that an impractical situation to find yourself under, that you have to give a week's notice to a witness before he or she can testify before a Federal grand jury?

Mr. MILLER. I don't know that it's necessary. I really don't perceive the reason for it. In many instances a subpena is given to a person and then a contact is made with them as to the particular time at which they are to appear, and in many instances it's at their convenience and it's a scheduling matter.

Mr. EILBERG. Under the bill, as I recall our bill, we provide for a week's notice or less if the court so decides, and I believe the thrust of Mr. Hall's question is what do you think of that provision?

Mr. MILLER. Well, I don't think that it's necessary really.

Mr. HALL. There was testimony earlier that in certain cases that a person may, in a narcotics case, leave if they get advance notice of that.

Mr. MILLER. I really don't see the necessity of that rule.

Mr. HALL. All right. Now under your Johnson case, the Johnson motion as you refer to it—and I'm looking at page 5 of your testimony speaking from Justice Clark:

> When a district attorney seeking an indictment is aware of evidence reasonably tending to negate guilt, he is obligated to inform the grand jury of its nature and existence.

Now do I understand you to say that under the Johnson motion, as you call it, that you have to ferret through all of the testimony that you may have or that you may have had to determine if such is in existence?

Mr. MILLER. No. It is not an established legal requirement, but it has become a practical necessity in application.

Mr. HALL. And if you don't find it and if it's there, does that negate a conviction or an indictment?

Mr. MILLER. No. But a tremendous burden is placed on the prosecutor to show good faith. Certainly, if the prosecutor had exculpatory evidence in his possession and knew it, the conviction or indictment would be set aside. Let me hasten to add that we have survived the Johnson motions. I don't recall, except in one instance, where a couple of counts were dismissed, that we did not survive the Johnson motion.

The point I'm trying to make is that that's the way the foundation is laid in order to bring the motion. The motion itself is a tedious matter in which the defense attorney continues to allege during the hearing that we have exculpatory matters and puts us in a defensive position where we are either accused of not producing it or of not ferreting it out. So, consequently, the rulings under Johnson ultimately have been in our favor. It's just that it's been more of a discovery type of procedure in which there is a great deal of questioning concerning what the prosecutor has in his possession in order to determine that point. Every Johnson motion that we have had in California—and I forgot to mention this—every Johnson motion that we have had has required that every prosecutor handling that case testify as a witness and every prosecutor who testifies as a witness is asked questions which pertain to every single contact that he had with that case, what materials he's had in his hands right down to the work product, in order to determine whether he has exculpatory evidence in his possession.

Mr. HALL. All right. With reference to H.R. 94, it says the attorney for the Government and the special attorney shall periodically advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence as yet not received which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant.

Would that work a burden on a district attorney to have to do that?

Mr. MILLER. Oh, that goes much further than the Johnson motion. Sure. Of course. It's an impossible burden.

Mr. HALL. How could you do it?

Mr. MILLER. You couldn't. We can't comply with Johnson in the strictest sense and it puts our integrity in issue in every single case because the accusation is made that we have in effect exculpatory evidence in our possession when we don't.

Mr. HALL. I believe that's all. Thank you, Mr. Miller.

Mr. EILBERG. First, let me thank you very much, Mr. Miller, for coming and being so very well prepared, and we will have additional questions which we would like to send you.

[The questions to Mr. Miller and his responses follow:]

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY, COUNTY OF SAN DIEGO,
San Diego, Calif., May 4, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: The answers to those written questions posed by your committee in connection with H.R. 94 are enclosed. In the event you require follow-up questions or additional questions which did not come to mind during the course of my testimony, please do not hesitate to contact me and I will attempt to comply.

During the course of my testimony I neglected to thank you and your committee members for their courteous treatment as well as your sincere attempt to obtain answers to penetrating questions. I was impressed with the committee's objective approach to the entire subject of federal grand jury reform.

Sincerely,

EDWIN L. MILLER, Jr.,
District Attorney.

QUESTIONS FOR EDWIN L. MILLER, Jr., DISTRICT ATTORNEY, SAN DIEGO, CALIF. (REPRESENTING THE NATIONAL DISTRICT ATTORNEYS' ASSOCIATION)

Question 1. Your law allows subpoenas for witnesses whose testimony "is material in an investigation before the grand jury." Who determines whether testimony is "material" and what is the standard?

Answer. Any witness appearing before a California Grand Jury has the right to challenge his subpoena by bringing a motion to quash the subpoena before the Superior Court. The Grand Jury is under the supervision of the Superior Court and therefore it is that Court which makes the determination of whether or not the testimony to be given is material to the investigation. It should be noted that as to all questions which arise as the result of challenges brought by a witness before the Grand Jury, it is the Court which ultimately decides the propriety of the action and only the Court which may impose sanctions for failure to comply.

Question 4. Your law provides that an indictment is to be returned only when "all the evidence before it, taken together, if unexplained or uncontradicted would, in its judgment, warrant a conviction by a trial jury." This standard of proof, commonly called a "prima facie" case, is almost universally the standard for indictments. Can a defendant challenge the sufficiency of evidence for an indictment and if so how?

Answer. A defendant in California may challenge the indictment based upon the insufficiency of evidence by means of a statutory procedure codified in California Penal Code section 995. That Section provides in pertinent part:

"The indictment or information must be set aside by the court in which the defendant is arraigned, upon his motion, in either of the following cases:

"If it be an indictment:

"(1) Where it is not found, endorsed, and presented as prescribed in this code;

"(2) That the defendant has been indicted without reasonable or probable cause . . ."

The test for insufficiency of the evidence has been determined to be whether or not the evidence establishes reasonable or probable cause which is the same standard for a bindover following preliminary examination. The challenges are made by motions filed in the Superior Court and the Court makes the determination upon the transcript of the grand jury proceedings. It should be noted that all proceedings before a California grand jury are recorded and the defendant is entitled to a copy of those proceedings within a specified time following arraignment. If the defendant is unsuccessful in his motion in Superior Court, he has a right to pretrial appellate review by way of a Writ of Prohibition in accordance with California Penal Code section 999(a).

Paragraph 1 of Penal Code section 995 above has also been deemed to be sufficiently broad to allow the defendants to challenge procedural violations in the presentation of evidence. It was this particular provision that gave jurisdiction to the Court in Johnson v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P.2d 792, in ruling that exculpatory evidence must be presented.

Question 5. Your law allows the grand jury to report or declare that a person called before a grand jury was a witness only and that if a witness was a target that there was not sufficient evidence to indict. How often does this occur?

Answer. When a grand jury returns an indictment, the names of all witnesses testifying are endorsed upon the back of the indictment and their testimony is made available to the defendant. It is highly unusual for a grand jury to publicly report that an individual was called as a witness only or that there was "not sufficient evidence to indict." The latter provision is called for under California Penal Code section 939.91 which did not take effect until January of 1976. Since grand juries have been used with even less frequency since 1976, we have not seen any examples of cases falling within the above Penal Code section.

Question 7. Our studies indicate that in California, few cases proceed by indictment alone. Rather, most proceed by complaint and preliminary hearing. I have proposed eliminating the indictment function of the grand jury. Do you agree?

Answer. I strongly disagree with the proposal of eliminating the indictment function for California grand juries. While it is true the overwhelming number of cases proceed by complaint and preliminary examination, the ability to utilize a grand jury in selected cases is an absolute necessity for proper enforcement of the criminal laws. The ordinary street crime which is brought to the District Attorney following police investigation can be processed in this state by complaint and preliminary examination. Investigations involving complex financial schemes, corruption of public officials and organized crime simply cannot be handled through the normal complaint and preliminary hearing process. Those cases require the utilization of immunity, secrecy and subpoena power in order to develop information sufficient to prosecute the leaders of sophisticated conspiratorial crimes. Abolition of the indictment function would result in the state abdicating its responsibility to protect the citizens from the most sophisticated and insidious crimes. It would result in the prosecutor being capable only of prosecuting the poor, the ignorant and the minorities who find themselves in the environment in which street crimes are committed and would grant immunity to the corruptor, the money manipulator and the organized crime chieftain.

Question 8. As most California cases proceed by preliminary hearings, why do you oppose H.R. 94's provision requiring a preliminary hearing in every federal case, whether there is an indictment or not—especially as this is an alternative to those proposals allowing an attack on the presentation of incompetent or inadmissible evidence to the grand jury?

Answer. I oppose the provision of H.R. 94 requiring a preliminary hearing in each case as being an unnecessary step in the proceedings. The purpose of a preliminary hearing is to determine whether there is probable cause to hold the defendant pending the Grand Jury. Once a grand jury has returned an indictment, the purpose of a preliminary hearing cannot conceivably be to determine probable cause. If review of the sufficiency of the indictment is to be granted, it should be before a district court and not before a magistrate. The only possible purpose of a post-indictment preliminary hearing would be to grant the defendant additional discovery rights, most notably by way of testimony of witnesses at the preliminary hearing. If it is the desire of Congress to grant additional discovery, then it should do so through modification of Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Discovery should not be the purpose of a preliminary examination.

Question 10. Do you believe potential defendants should be called, if it is known they will invoke their privilege against self-incrimination?

Answer. I do not believe that potential defendants should be called to the grand jury for the purpose of having them invoke their privilege against self-incrimination. I believe that in a number of instances the potential defendant should be notified of the investigation and given an opportunity to appear if he so desires. Simply calling the proposed defendant to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination runs the risk of creating a false aura of consciousness of guilt before the grand jury.

Question 11. California law does not allow a witness to have his counsel present in the grand jury room but counsel may stay outside and be available to the witness. Does this cause delays? Wouldn't these delays be eliminated by having counsel in the room? Why do you believe that our limitation on the role of counsel cannot be enforced when our study indicates that in those states where it is law—it is enforced, with few problems?

Answer. With regard to counsel for witnesses allowed inside the grand jury room. I believe such practice will cause rather than prevent delays. Most studies with which I am familiar dealing with counsel being permitted inside the grand jury room have dealt basically with street crimes in which there would be no problem of dual loyalty on the part of counsel. In most of these cases with which I am familiar counsel presents no particular benefit nor any particular detriment. The cases simply were not good tests cases. Allowing a witness to exist the grand jury room for consultation certainly may cause delay in the presentation, but I have never experienced an incident where this arrangement has been overly abused or resulted in inordinate inconvenience. If the delays become abusive however, assistance can be sought from the supervising judge.

I believe that to permit counsel inside the grand jury will in many instances destroy the effectiveness of the grand jury. Most grand jury witnesses are percipient witnesses to a criminal event. To these witnesses such a provision will make no difference because the overwhelming majority have no desire for counsel.

It is in the significant cases in which conspiratorial conduct is at issue when counsel will pose a tremendous detriment to the interests of justice. In many instances persons peripherally involved in crime are called upon to testify against persons who are more culpable. In a high percentage of cases of that type, particularly cases involving corporations, counsel is provided for the witness by the subject of the inquiry. A witness will not truthfully inculpate the subject of the inquiry in the presence of counsel. Further, once Congress deems the right of a witness to have counsel present within the grand jury room, then Congress, I submit, cannot limit the effective assistance of counsel by preventing counsel from objecting to questions and seeking rulings from the supervising judge before allowing the witness to answer those questions. Tremendous delays will result from that practice.

In addition, in many instances the witness will be given the opportunity to confer with counsel and have counsel fashion the answer to the question. This means the grand jury will not be receiving the witness' testimony, but rather the testimony of the witness' attorney mouthed by the witness. The placement of the witness' counsel inside the grand jury will virtually terminate the use of the grand jury as a device to ferret out covert conspiratorial crimes, particularly those involving corruption or coercion such as is present in the case of organized crime. There have simply been no valid studies to my knowledge dealing with the use of the grand jury in these areas where witness counsel has been present.

Question 12. Why cannot the problems of multiple representation and "house counsel" be handled, case-by-case, by the Court?

Answer. The problem of multiple representation by house counsel cannot effectively be handled on a case-by-case basis by the Court. While the Court may suspect or even draw inferences concerning the source of the funds for counsel, there is no present ability existent in the Court to force a witness to divulge the source of payments to his counsel. Further, the witness can be persuaded by the suspect of the investigation in most cases to waive any conflict caused by the "multiple representation." It is a drastic step for the Court to interfere with the attorney/client relationship, and courts simply will not do so absent a clear showing that the representation by counsel is a sham device designed to protect someone else. That showing is almost impossible to make on a case-by-case basis. Even if the showing can be made, it can only be accomplished after lengthy hearings which will further delay and compound grand jury proceedings.

Mr. EILBERG. Let me say that there are three private bills value which will only take a few moments when time is of the essence. If counsel is ready to present them, we shall do so. Then it is the Chair's intention to recess 45 minutes after that. To those present who are witnesses, we will resume at 1:15. We are now proceeding with other legislative business in the jurisdiction of the subcommittee.

[Whereupon, at 12:30 p.m., the hearing was recessed, to be reconvened at 1:15 p.m. this same day.]

AFTERNOON SESSION

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order, and the witness is Paul J. Curran, Esq., former U.S. attorney, Southern District of New York.

We are very happy to welcome you back before the subcommittee again, Mr. Curran, and we apologize to you for causing you to stay over as long as you have. So please proceed.

TESTIMONY OF PAUL J. CURRAN, ESQ., PRIVATE ATTORNEY—FORMER U.S. ATTORNEY, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. CURRAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I enjoyed listening this morning so it was no hardship at all.

As I think my secretary told one of the committee secretaries yesterday, I do not have a prepared statement to submit. I hoped to, but I have been out of my office most of the past week and wasn't in it yesterday.

I do have some notes on the bill which I would like to address. If the chairman desires it, I would be pleased to submit a prepared statement promptly. If you don't, I, of course, will not.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Curran, it would be helpful I think for at least the other members of the subcommittee as well as the full committee and the House, to perhaps have a formal statement.

Mr. CURRAN. I will, sir. I will try to get that together this weekend and get it down early next week.

In addition to serving as U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York from 1973 to 1975, I was an assistant in that district for 3 years, 1958 through 1961. And I spent 5 years as chairman of the New York State Commission of Investigations, which is not a prosecutive agency but does investigations of organized crime and official corruption, among other things.

I have also represented defendants in Federal court, and represented witnesses before grand juries in Federal court.

My comments today are based primarily upon my experiences as a prosecutor, leavened somewhat by my defense counsel experience which presently is more current than my prosecution experience.

The bill, H.R. 94, as I understand it and read it, would make, I think, dramatic and drastic changes in the present Federal grand jury system, and would impact, I believe, on the whole at least, adversely the public interest and law enforcement in the Federal system. My philosophical problem with the measure, I suppose, is that, as I see things, organized crime is doing pretty well these days, white collar crime is booming, antitrust and security frauds, mail frauds, land frauds. Official corruption is a ceaseless concern.

This bill, I think, would clearly make those kinds of cases much more difficult to investigate and to prosecute. If that is recognized as a fact, and I think what I just said really can't be disputed, then I think that we have to think very long and hard as to whether we really want to do at least some of the things the bill would propose to do. I think that the bill, looking at it now as a lawyer who has represented, and still does represent targets, witnesses before Federal grand juries, it is just terrific for people like me now. I love it, talking just as a lawyer, if somebody came to me and I have some such clients, now it is tremendous from that standpoint. But I think really from the standpoint of the public interest and the interest of justice, the bill is not sound.

I would like, if I may, sir, and this is briefly and obviously a real overview, and pretty superficial, to touch upon some of the sections which have troubled me. There are one or two that I like substantially. Then perhaps if there are questions I will try to respond to them.

The 6-month limit on contempt, I heard Mr. Ruff talk about that this morning, with no subsequent prosecution or attempt to get information from the witness permitted; I really don't want to be belabor that. I agree, I think I can say, entirely with what Mr. Ruff had to say about that particular issue, and I would leave that for now.

On witness immunity, eliminating use and going back to transactional immunity, I think that the option to the Government which presently exists and which has been upheld by the Supreme Court should be continued. I don't get terribly excited about that because, as has been said, by other witnesses, this is a situation which rarely, as a practical matter, makes much difference. My attitude, when I was U.S. attorney, was that we used, as distinguished from the strike force, immunity very sparingly. Certainly this was true of formal immunity. And I don't recall having a case when I was U.S. attorney where we prosecuted someone who had received formal use immunity. Our attitude was (I know I discussed it at staff meetings at length with my criminal division chief at the time), if we were going to try to have a case—I don't recall we ever did—we would have taken everything we had before that person went before the grand jury under a grant of use immunity and put it under seal. Because we really felt that to be the only certain thing you could do and still prosecute that case without a great deal of trouble and perhaps having it thrown out.

Literally take the evidence and seal it somewhere. Perhaps even go to the court and ask that the evidence be put under some sort of seal. We never did it but that was our attitude about that situation.

So I don't think as a practical matter it makes terribly much difference. I don't believe it is wise, as I understand the bill, to hold a court hearing on a grant of immunity. I understand the bill would require that. I think that whether or not to grant immunity is an executive department decision, if you will, a prosecutors decision, and that the court has enough problems without getting involved in that kind of a decision which has always been, as I said, a prosecutors decision and one which I think properly belongs in the executive department.

Or, I suppose in some cases, if it is a legislative matter, with the legislative committee that may be interested in granting immunity.

On pages 10 and 11 of the bill leaks are dealt with. I applaud those measures and favor very substantially what is there. I am pleased to say I know of no leak that ever came from my office when I was U.S. attorney, because the rule was that I didn't leak, and if an assistant leaked, he would be fired at least. If I wanted to do it, I suppose the court wouldn't have stood for it anyway. It didn't happen. I have one problem I would mention here. The bill appears to exempt the media.

It seems to me, if you are going to make it a Federal crime to leak grand jury information, the media shouldn't be treated differently. If a media person who knows what he's doing gets together with an assistant U.S. attorney or with the U.S. attorney and they get together and decide the U.S. attorney or assistant leaks to the media person and they work it out, you would have the anomalous situation of the U.S. attorney or assistant being prosecuted and the other person, because he is in the media, walking away laughing. I don't think we should have a different law for media people in this area because a leak is a leak. If it is wrong, it should apply to everybody.

Otherwise I do applaud—I think it does make some sense to have a specific criminal sanction for leaks, as distinguished from now in the Federal system, at least, where you have to rely on a contempt approach.

Page 12 begins to deal with the rights and duties of the grand jury and attorney for the Government. Much of the preliminary material tracks present practice, at least as I practiced it in the Southern District of New York, and I believe my predecessor and successor do. Here I subscribe to most of what Judge Lacey says.

On page 14 is the provision that defendants get notice of indictment unless there is proof submitted to the court that it should not have to be done. I think, as Judge Lacey pointed out, that in most investigations, even those where there has been no arrest on a complaint because they already have the notice, obviously, defendants or prospective defendants know when something is going to happen. Indeed, the common practice—I am talking now of securities fraud cases, official corruption cases—the lawyer for that target who already knows he is a target, will come in and see the assistant, and sometimes will come to the U.S. attorney. My policy always was to see lawyers, not their clients, but if a lawyer wanted to come in and discuss with me why his client should not be indicted, we had an absolute policy in the office he could do that. I would have the assistant present who was involved, and hear him out.

In some situations, based upon a presentation in the office, what the assistant decided was altered. The assistant was present. But I don't think that in those cases there is any element of surprise.

I do believe and I know that in organized crime cases, and we prosecuted a lot of them in the southern district, particularly in the narcotics area, when word gets out that something is going on, that somebody is informing, and that the Feds are working on a narcotics conspiracy, prosecution people do vanish. There is no question about that.

I think in terms of grand jury secrecy, and opening this up even further, this could be a dangerous approach.

On page 15, 4BJ provides that a witness not be brought before the grand jury if he gives written notice that he intends to exercise his privilege. I don't have, as a general proposition, much problem with that except I don't believe it should be mandated so absolutely. Let me say why.

Judge Lacey mentioned this in a little different context. There are cases, and I know of them, where some witnesses have lawyers who are not really their lawyers. It happens a lot in organized crime cases. And there have been cases where a witness has gone before a grand jury, his lawyer isn't there because he assumes he's going to assert his privilege and is going to talk for various reasons but usually to help himself.

Under the present law, I believe a witness has to invoke his privilege, before immunity can be granted. Situations do change. So I think the general point there is a sound one. I do not believe that it is wise to mandate it so firmly and flat that it would have to be observed without any deviation in any case; if there was a deviation you could end up with, perhaps, a troublesome litigation.

On the issue, Mr. Chairman, of counsel before the grand jury, I think in my Law Journal article which I submitted to staff last year, or to you, sir, I set forth my basic feelings. I agree with what Judge Lacey had to say. I would love this, love this as a defense counsel; no question about it, it would be terrific.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Curran, let me just interrupt.

Having forwarded us your New York Law Journal article, we would like to insert this in the record, and, frankly, we used it as a basis for preparing questions for you this afternoon. So with your permission, we would like to insert your letter of June 29 and the January 22, 1976, Law Journal article in the record at this point.

Do you have any objection to that?

Mr. CURRAN. No, sir. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[The documents referred to follow:]

KAYE, SCHOLER, FIERMAN, HAYS & HANDLER,
New York, N.Y., June 29, 1976.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: An article in today's edition of the New York Law Journal stated that the Subcommittee which you chair is conducting hearings on grand jury "reform" and that your Subcommittee welcomes hearing from lawyers familiar with the Federal grand jury process.

I served for three years as an Assistant United States Attorney in the Southern District of New York and, more recently, for some two and one-half years as the United States Attorney for that district. I was also for five years Chairman of the New York State Commission of Investigation and for four years a member of the New York State Assembly. I have been engaged in the private practice of law, except for the time that I was United States Attorney, since 1961 and have represented persons under investigation by Federal grand juries. I set forth this background in order to demonstrate that I have substantial familiarity with the Federal grand jury system and how it works in the busiest Federal judicial district in the United States.

I respectfully disagree with your apparent conclusions that the grand jury system needs to be changed drastically. In support of the proposition that the kinds of change you advocate are unwise and clearly not in the public interest, I am taking the liberty of enclosing a copy of an article which I wrote for the Law Journal and which appeared in that newspaper last January 22. This article sets forth in some detail why I believe very strongly that the present Federal grand jury system has served the people of the United States well and should be continued. I am prepared to testify before your Committee on this issue and to discuss my position with you or an appropriate member of your staff at any mutually convenient time. With the exception of establishing criminal penalties for unauthorized grand jury "leaks", I believe that the "reforms" which the Law Journal has stated you are sponsoring make no sense and will do grave harm to the administration of criminal justice in the Federal courts.

Sincerely,

PAUL J. CURRAN.

THE GRAND JURY NEEDS PROTECTION FROM THOSE WHO ABUSE IT, NOT MAJOR SURGERY—THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM DEFENDED

(By Paul J. Curran)

Roy M. Cohn asserts that in "Grand Jury—An Institution on Trial," Judge Frankel and Mr. Naftalis have concluded that "the grand jury system, as now constituted, has outlived its usefulness." If that is the authors' finding, they have concealed it very well indeed. In fact, while arguing for certain "reforms and directions", the totality of their article presents a reasonably balanced case for their conclusion that the federal grand jury system should be retained.

Mr. Cohn wants grand juries scrapped because "they have become rubber stamps for prosecutors." He does not trace when this happening occurred, but it is clear that the present grand jury system has operated substantially unchanged for at least many decades and that it has operated in the public interest and without oppression of individuals. (Of course, the public interest usually conflicts with the interests of targets of grand jury investigations.) It's somewhat surprising that it has taken Mr. Cohn, who was an Assistant U.S. Attorney some twenty-five years ago, so long to reach his conclusions.

NOT RUBBER STAMPS

Composed of twenty-three citizens selected just as petit jurors are selected and carefully instructed by the Court before undertaking their duties, grand jurors are not "rubber stamps for prosecutors" or for anyone else. In fact, in hundreds, if not thousands, of cases grand juries annually return "No True Bills" signifying their refusal to indict in cases presented to them by prosecutors. Moreover, my personal experience has been that although prosecutors of course draft indictments and appear before the grand jury to question witnesses, most grand jurors are extremely conscientious, live up to their oaths in all respects, and do not blindly accept prosecutors' recommendations.

At any rate, the bulk of Mr. Cohn's case for abolition rests upon claimed improperties by prosecutors. But with no grand juries, investigations will then be conducted by prosecutors alone, with no citizen review of their conduct or of the charges until after an indictment is filed. This is a power which no prosecutor needs or deserves and, given Mr. Cohn's horror stories, it is difficult to understand how he can possibly advocate this result. Thus, rather than serving "to rent a seam in the schemes of various prosecutors", abolition of the grand jury will, for some prosecutors, serve to legitimize the very conduct about which Mr. Cohn complains.

SCRAP THE PROSECUTOR

The answer to a prosecutor's abuse of the grand jury system is not to scrap the grand jury. The answer is to scrap the offending prosecutor. And in the federal system there are ample means available to lawyers to have such complaints heard and the offender disciplined. These include, but are not limited to, bringing the matter to the attention of the U.S. Attorney personally or, if necessary, to the Attorney General, raising the complaint with the District Court of which the grand jury is an arm, or referring the grievance to the bar association. In my experience the bar association, although not always as vigorous when it comes to the questionable activities of defense counsel, is not at all loath to investigate the conduct of federal prosecutors upon the complaint of lawyers, or even in some cases sua sponte. Such grievances are even sometimes investigated by the media. The point is that any lawyer or citizen who has a legitimate complaint about the conduct of a government lawyer has means to redress his grievances.

The recent hue and cry for abolishing or reforming the federal grand jury system constitutes an unwarranted assault upon the one part of the criminal justice system which functions as effectively as it has functioned in years past. If abuses take place, they can and should be stopped and the offenders punished, but the misconduct of individual government lawyers should not be used to injure the public by scrapping the grand jury.

CLAIM "MISLEADING"

Further, Mr. Cohn's claim that "a potential defendant who knows of exculpatory evidence and witnesses is powerless to require their disclosure to the grand jury" is totally misleading if not just plain wrong. In my five and one-half years as a federal prosecutor I never saw or heard of a case where such exculpatory material was suppressed by the government. Moreover, counsel or even a private citizen can bring such matters to the grand jury's attention, even without government action, by simply setting forth the facts in a letter to the foreman or to all of the grand jurors.

However, even accepting, arguendo, Mr. Cohn's entirely erroneous premise that all prosecutors are devious, ruthless and bent far more on their prey than on fairness, his suggestion that prosecutors secure indictments of innocent people by hiding exculpatory evidence and witnesses from the grand jury makes no sense. When indictments are filed they do not disappear—they must be tried. Mr. Cohn's prosecutor, no matter how reckless or venal he is, can only be far less embarrassed by a grand jury's secret no true bill than by an acquittal in open court.

UNLIKELY DEVELOPMENT

A prosecutor would not only have to be unethical but indeed utterly devoid of reason to secure the indictment of an innocent man by concealing from the grand jury exculpatory evidence which will necessarily be before the jury at a trial where the government has a higher burden of proof.

Finally, if, as Mr. Cohn seems to suggest, self-interest is the noblest motivation that can be ascribed to a prosecutor presenting a case to the grand jury, one wonders why such a prosecutor, far from shunning the summoning of witnesses favorable to the defendant, would not welcome their appearance in a forum where, without interference by opposing counsel, he may learn their testimony before trial, "freeze" their stories under oath, and cross-examine as he chooses.

As for Judge Frankel's and Mr. Naftalis's proposed "reforms and directions" the majority simply state what has been the practice at least in the Southern District of New York for many years. This applies to the three recommendations dealing with a prospective defendant's appearance upon request, his being given "target warnings" if in fact a target, and consideration to hearing from witnesses suggested by a prospective defendant.

PROPOSAL WITHOUT MERIT

Moreover, the recommendation that witnesses not be subpoenaed solely to have them invoke their Fifth Amendment privilege also reflects general present practice. Witnesses are never subpoenaed solely for that reason. However, the proposition that a witness should never be called before the grand jury if he states in advance that he will assert his privilege lacks merit for at least two reasons. First, there are situations where witnesses have abandoned their prior stated intent when appearing in the secrecy of the grand jury room and this cannot be ruled out in every case. Second, in cases involving grants of immunity the witness must assert the privilege before the grand jury itself before the prosecutor can apply to the Court for immunity.

There are, however, "reforms" proposed by Judge Frankel and Mr. Naftalis, which seem to me to be ill-considered. Presently, grand jury witnesses who are later indicted are entitled to receive, pre-trial, copies of their own grand jury testimony. Further, defendants also receive at trial for cross-examination copies of the grand jury testimony of any witnesses who testify against them at the trial itself. In addition, grand jury testimony can be obtained by application to the Court upon a showing of "compelling necessity" and "particularized need". Thus, witnesses and others whose need for grand jury testimony is genuine and urgent may obtain such testimony at any time.

"NOT FAIR ENOUGH"

However, Judge Frankel and Mr. Naftalis suggest that these procedures are not fair enough, that defendants should profit from "access to the full grand jury record" pre-trial, and that witnesses should receive copies of their testimony. This should be done, it is argued, because this would be helpful to defendants and to witnesses I have no doubt that it would indeed be helpful to them. It would help some defendants to do everything possible to obstruct justice and evade conviction. It would help some witnesses to structure later testimony, either grand jury or trial, so as to cast their activities and a defendant's activities in the best possible light. However, it would not help at all the administration of justice. If there were some showing that the present federal grand jury system leads to the conviction of innocent people or is in some less sinister way unfair to defendants and witnesses, then I would understand the need for these "reforms". But no such claims are made.

In fact, there are a dozen or more reported opinions by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in the past several years which establish that defendants threaten, assault, bribe, and even kill witnesses to prevent their trial testimony. These suggested reforms would only aggravate what is already a demonstrably grave threat to the enforcement of law and the administration of criminal justice. Moreover, in those reported cases and in others not reported, of which I have personal knowledge, a "protective order" can only be described as a joke.

ILL-ADVISED SUGGESTION

Another ill-advised proposal is to permit lawyers to accompany their clients into the grand jury room and participate in the proceedings. The lawyer, it is claimed, would help to expedite the proceedings by being inside rather than just outside the room. It is also asserted that the lawyer's presence would "help to avoid confusion, ambiguities and derailment of the investigation" and "could expedite the inquiry by raising points about the questions and offering proposals to improve them."

Without question, a lawyer's presence could accomplish all of these desiderata. However, there is serious doubt as to whether a lawyer's presence would do so in most cases.

My experience in conducting private hearings with lawyers present to counsel the witnesses has been that too often the lawyers have attempted to create such problems and not "avoid" them. And surely some lawyers representing witnesses will wish to see the investigation's "derailment" take place as promptly as possible. Indeed, as advocates, such lawyers will undoubtedly argue eloquently and properly why "derailment" is deserved.

PROBLEMS OF CONFLICT

Further, in many grand jury investigations lawyers who appear for witnesses also often represent initially other interested parties. Frequently, problems of conflict arise as an investigation progresses, facts are developed, and targets surface. The presence of counsel in the grand jury room will serve to exacerbate these problems which, under present practice, are already fraught with sufficient difficulty. Further, adoption of this proposal would unquestionably contribute toward delay and increased procedural litigation and would thereby place uncalled for additional burdens upon an already overburdened criminal justice system.

Finally, this suggestion assumes that all lawyers are sufficiently detached from their client's problems so as to be able to function as a lawyer must. Regrettably, this is simply not the case. There have been and undoubtedly still are cases in which the lawyers themselves are deeply involved in the matters under investigation and in these cases the lawyers' presence in the grand jury room cannot be assumed to be automatically helpful either to the "client" witness or to the interests of justice. Moreover, it is a fact of life that not every lawyer who appears for a client in this setting actually represents that individual to the exclusion of all others. Sometimes lawyers appear for clients when their real clients are others. Obviously this is not always susceptible of proof and even if it were, sometimes such proof cannot be offered without endangering the witness. In those situations at least, the dangers to justice and even to the witness of a lawyer's presence before the grand jury are manifest.

I take no pleasure in noting that in the two and one-half years that I was privileged to serve as U.S. Attorney forty-one lawyers were convicted of federal felonies in the Southern District of New York and another eighteen were under indictment on Nov. 1, 1975. Very few of these forty-one convicts have been disbarred. My point is that unfortunately one may not assume that the presence of a lawyer in the grand jury room necessarily means that the proceedings have been graced by an ethical and responsible member of the bar.

There presently exist ample means for dealing with allegations of unfair treatment of witnesses in the grand jury room without introducing lawyers into that room. Those who advocate this radical change have the burden of proving its need—a burden which has not been sustained.

Almost fifty-three years ago Judge Learned Hand rejected broadening discovery of grand jury proceedings. In language that is even more apposite today Judge Hand wrote:

"Under our criminal procedure the accused has every advantage. While the prosecution is held rigidly to the charge, he need not disclose the barest outline of his defense. He is immune from question or comment on his silence; he cannot be convicted where there is the least fair doubt in the minds of any one of the twelve. Why in addition he should in advance have the whole evidence against him to pick over at his leisure, and make his defense, fairly or foully, I have never been able to see. No doubt grand juries err and indictments are calamities to honest men, but we must work with human beings and we can correct such errors only at too large a price. Our dangers do not lie in too little tenderness to the accused. Our procedure has always been haunted by the ghost of the innocent man convicted. It is an unreal dream. What we need to fear is the archaic formalism and the watery sentiment that obstructs, delays, and defeats the prosecution of crime." United States v. Garsson, 291 F. 646, 649 (S.D.N.Y. 1923).

I'll stick with Judge Hand and I believe our system of justice should, too.

EVILS OF "LEAKS"

Judge Frankel's and Mr. Naftalis's remarks on the evils of grand jury leaks deserve both applause and implementation. Although I agree that "stronger sanctions should be employed to plug" them, I suggest that the real answer to this burgeoning criminal conduct lies not so much in stronger sanctions but rather in observance and enforcement of existing sanctions.

Leaking by a prosecutor of matters under investigation in the grand jury is a misdemeanor under New York law and a contempt under federal law. Thus, when a prosecutor engages in such outrageous conduct he not only acts unethically but he also is gulity of a crime. It follows logically that such leaks by a prosecutor make him unfit to continue in office.

Prosecutors who violate the law in this fashion presumably attempt to rationalize their actions on the ground that some worthy end is being served by tarring suspects publicly but this is simply another restatement of the Watergate and Ellsberg themes that somehow perceived noble ends can justify illegal means. This kind of thinking overlooks the fact that the justice system is tested by the conduct of those who are responsible for its operations and, in addition to the obvious dangers of harming innocent people and alerting subjects by premature disclosure of investigations public confidence is undermined and destroyed when those who are sworn to uphold the law willfully violate it in this fashion.

Leaks by prosecutors have not been a problem in the Southern District of New York insofar as I am aware. They appear to be a grave and continuing problem in the state system, notably in the office of the Deputy Attorney General for New York City's Criminal Justice System. Certainly, for over three years and continuing up to the end of last month there have been many media accounts which raised on their face at least a serious question that such leaks were coming out of Mr. Nadjari's office.

NO INQUIRIES

Yet, so far as I or the public can tell, no inquiry has ever been conducted to determine whether the criminal laws of New York or provisions of the Code of Professional Responsibility have been violated. No State judge appears to be disturbed. No one superior to Mr. Nadjari in the Executive Department exhibits concern. Mr. Nadjari himself seems oblivious to any possible problem. The bar association is silent and inactive. In short, the leaks which obviously come from some source are not even denounced by any responsible official and they (and thus possible crimes) continue unabated and are not even investigated.

Surely, one cannot expect the media to protest because, after all, they are the beneficiaries. Their revelling in such information is perhaps understandable but they also may understand that in some situations their own representatives may have been accomplices to misdemeanors and, thus, they may be caught up in their own Watergate-type ends-can-justify-means illegalities.

Now the State Commission of Investigation is studying this problem at the behest of among others, State Senator Roy M. Goodman. I applaud the Commission's energy but I suggest that there is not too much to study, unless of course the Commission intends to investigate specific situations. Illegal leaks of grand jury investigations could be drastically curtailed and probably eliminated altogether tomorrow if those responsible took the following few simple steps.

OBSERVE THE RULE

First, every prosecutor should make it plain to his staff that he will not leak confidential information himself and that no member of his staff may do so without being at least fired. The prosecutor should then observe this rule scrupulously.

Second, the courts of New York should make clear, as the federal courts have, that such leaks will not be tolerated and judges should inquire diligently into any leaks that appear, and act if they find violations of law or professional ethics.

Third, the bar association and the bar generally should insist that grand jury leaks be investigated by appropriate and available means and, if prosecutors are involved, that their derelictions be dealt with. If the leaks are not investigated properly by the responsible public officials, then the bar association's Grievance Committee should involve itself.

Finally, prosecutors should be prohibited from hiring press agents. A prosecutor has no legitimate need for such non-lawyer personnel. They can only get him in trouble while attempting to earn their high salaries. In any case there is no sound reason why the people should have to lift the anchor for such talent in connection with the investigation and prosecution of crime and criminals.

In sum, the grand jury has been a great and effective instrument for good. It needs no major surgery but it does need to be protected from those who in any way subject its delicate machinery to unfair or illegal abuse. That is the most clear and present danger to a grand jury system that has served the public well and should be allowed to continue to do so.

Mr. CURRAN. This business of counsel before the grand jury has been discussed at length by other witnesses and, as I said, I agree with most of what has been said. As a defense counsel, again, I think it is great. It is very helpful for discovery purposes because now if you have conferences among counsel on a grand jury investigation, each counsel has to rely upon a debriefing of a witness that he took afterwards.

The conflict problem is a very real one. Lawyers do not always represent those whom they purport to represent. That is a fact of life, particularly in organized crime, and indeed in some business crime situations. Not every lawyer, unfortunately, who appears is an ethical member of the bar. When I was U.S. attorney in the southern district we convicted on Federal felonies 41 lawyers; that is not indicted, convicted. It was security fraud, mail fraud, selling narcotics, obstruction of justice, and it is still going on.

Mr. EILBERG. And they used to talk about Philadelphia lawyers.

Mr. CURRAN. So I don't think it is necessary. A person has his privilege and he can confer by going outside. That privilege or that right is granted liberally, in my experience.

On the issue of subpena notice, again I don't think it is wise to do that flat out. Target warnings we always gave, but normally a person getting a subpena had a week or 2 weeks' service before the return date. Sometimes he had notice beforehand that he was going to be served. But again there are special situations, and I don't believe it is wise to get into a court hearing on this point because of secrecy and the harm in fostering additional litigation.

I think there can be cases where one should not have to go to the court. If someone is aggrieved by that procedure he can go to the court. If the U.S. attorney is acting improperly—it's happened—and there are some cases in the southern district, or I should say in the second circuit reported on that. A forthwith subpena was used and they attempted to actually drag the person to the grand jury; the person didn't go, and one of the judges wrote an opinion about it and said that forthwith is fine but you can't do it that way. The law is clear that if a person is subpenaed he has an absolute right to consult with a lawyer, any assistant or U.S. attorney who tried to stop that, by relying on a forthwith subpena where the person said I want to talk to a lawyer, would be acting at least unethically and certainly very improperly, if he then forced that person before the grand jury.

I don't feel terribly strongly about that, but again, I question whether it is wise to involve the court in this kind of a procedure. If the U.S. attorney or assistant is abusing his process in this fashion, at least in the Southern District of New York there are many remedies available to stop it. Lawyers can go right to the chief judge; they can go to the U.S. attorney if it is an assistant; they can go to the Attorney General; go to the media; the Bar Association, and they regularly do all those things if they feel they are aggrieved.

I think it is fair to say that, while I was there at least, I don't think any of the complaints were founded. But certainly there are avenues for redress where this kind of abuse occurs.

With respect to grand jury transcriptions, it was our practice that the minutes of what transpired before the grand jury were recorded. On the question of getting the grand jury transcript I'd be opposed to that for I think reasons which have been alluded to. This is really pretrial discovery.

A year ago or more there were between, 1972 and 1975 in the second circuit, some dozen reported cases where witnesses had been threatened, bribed, and in a couple of instances killed. Granted, they were trial witnesses. But that is always a problem, and in most of those situations it could not have been anticipated so well in advance that you could go to a judge and say don't reveal that name, or don't give that person's testimony because there is a danger to the witness. We operated on the assumption in many kinds of cases, and it was true, certainly in any organized crime case, indeed in some others, that there is always a danger.

I think to the extent you open up in advance this kind of discovery, which is ample now certainly for trial purposes, you create dangers of obstruction of justice, and dangers to witnesses. People get together to try to tailor testimony. I don't believe any of that serves the legitimate ends of justice.

Now, one can get grand jury transcript by showing a compelling necessity or a particularized need. If someone is indicated he gets his or hers with the indictment. Under section 3500 of title 18, the grand-jury testimony of trial witnesses has to be made available. We normally made it available in advance of trial in some cases; in some cases in advance of the witness' appearance. But under the law, as you know, sir, you don't have to do that. You have a right to wait until the witness has finished his direct testimony. We tried not to wait that long except in very extreme cases.

Finally on that point too, as I read the measure, it talks about even other evidence. This is pretrial. "All other evidence," I think was the language used. As far as I can tell, that is really saying that pretrial the Government should turn over its file to the defendant. I don't think that makes any sense; I don't think it is in the public interest.

The final comment I have is on preliminary examination requirement. I must confess I don't understand the reason for that. If a grand jury has found probable cause, I don't quite understand the point of a preliminary examination, except to discover the Government's case by methods other than the regular pretrial, postindictment motions that one would make. So on that one I can only comment to that extent.

That, sir, very briefly constitutes my comments, and I know it has been pretty superficial, but I tried to hold pretty close to the time. I will give a written submission.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, Mr. Curran.

Mr. Curran, you state that most grand jurors are extremely conscientious and do not blindly accept prosecutors' recommendations. In your experience, how often did a grand jury refuse to indict over the recommendation of the prosecutor?

Mr. CURRAN. Well, when I was an assistant, I know of one case that I personally handled. I didn't have any others personally, but then I wasn't comparing notes around the office. When I was U.S. attorney, I can think, I guess, of one. But we sort of prided ourselves on going beyond the probable cause standard and being satisfied, at least in the office, that we were morally certain of the person's involvement or guilt before we recommended an indictment. We tried to apply a pretty strict standard.

I was speaking in the article at that point, sir, more to the State systems around the country, where I had heard, or read some figures I should say, where I am told thousands, several thousands or more cases are dismissed by grand juries. I believe there are some witnesses from the New York State Grand Juries Association here who have information on that, and I believe in New York State they dismiss—the grand jury has dismissed—now I don't know whether that is always against the recommendation of the prosecutor, but sometimes, I am sure it is. They throw cases out in the thousands in New York State; 2,000, 3,000 a year, I think, under that circumstance.

Mr. EILBERG. On the same line, how often, in your experience, did a grand jury indict over the negative recommendation of a prosecutor? Ever?

Mr. CURRAN. I remember some cases, sir, where the grand jury felt very strongly about a particular situation, and we would go and explain to them that despite their feelings about the person, there was insufficient evidence or there were legal reasons why they should not indict, and they would accept that statement. I don't recall any case where that happened, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. That is from your experience.

Mr. CURRAN. In my experience, at least.

Mr. EILBERG. I infer from the answers that you have given, based on your own experience, that it bears out my feeling that to a large extent the grand jury is, indeed, a rubberstamp, and this is what we are concerned with.

Mr. CURRAN. Well, I think nationally, as I said, there are a lot of cases that are no true billed or dismissed in the State systems. Rubberstamp, I don't believe it necessarily follows that if a prosecutor is conducting his office diligently and as fairly as he can and still serving the public interest and going after criminals, that it follows that if a grand jury, hearing competent evidence, decides to indict people based upon a recommendation or the facts that they are rubberstamping. You could call it a rubberstamp, but you could also say they are fulfilling their duty, hearing evidence and filing indictments.

It seems to me rubberstamp is kind of a rhetoric sort of word that conjures up things where prosecutors get them to indict somebody where there was insufficient evidence to indict simply for the sake of getting them indicted. That would be, it seems to me, the kind of rubberstamp activity that really is rubberstamping.

The prosecutor goes in and gets what he wants. I don't think he can do that with grand juries in the Federal system.

Mr. EILBERG. Some of the witnesses have testified about multiple grand juries in a district investigating the same transaction. Have you ever observed this and, if so, why are multiple juries needed?

Mr. CURRAN. You mean grand juries sitting in different judicial districts, or different U.S. attorneys?

Mr. EILBERG. No; in the same district.

Mr. CURRAN. You mean you had two grand juries investigating the same matter?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. CURRAN. In one U.S. attorney's office?

Mr. EILBERG. Yes.

Mr. CURRAN. I am not familiar with that, sir. I don't understand why it should happen. There is no point to that, obviously.

There is no point to the multidistrict either, really, because what I would always do in something like that is call the U.S. attorney and work it out. One of us would go with the case.

Mr. EILBERG. Of course you know about the Fort Worth Five case which this subcommittee looked into.

Mr. CURRAN. I have read about it a little bit, sir. I don't really know about it.

Mr. EILBERG. Five Irish Americans who lived in New York City were required to go to Forth Worth and then pleaded the fifth, granted immunity, and were incarcerated. We never did get a satisfactory answer from the Justice Department as to why it was necessary to have the grand jury hear testimony in Texas. This is one of the evils, if it was an evil.

Mr. CURRAN. I can't speak to that case, sir, but if there are abuses, and I said that—this in the article, and I really believe it; I don't think you should scrap the present system which has functioned effectively for decades. I think you should scrap the abuser.

The grand jury system in the Federal courts is the one arm of the system that functions as effectively, it seems to me, now, or almost as effectively, as effectively as it has in decades past. I don't believe the same can be said for the rest of the system.

Mr. EILBERG. In your article for the New York Law Journal you state that the answer to abuse of grand jury is not necessarily reform, but rather disciplining the prosecutor. Can you tell us of any examples where prosecutors were disciplined for abuses, including grand jury leaks?

Mr. CURRAN. I can tell you of a situation which occurred before I was U.S. attorney where the court directed my predecessor to conduct an investigation of a grand jury leak. That leak did not come from the U.S. attorney's office, but at the time it came out nobody knew where it came from.

I didn't have any leaks when I was there that had to be investigated. I have no doubt had there been some which emanated from my office, that I would have been in deep trouble with the chief judge of the district court and chief judge of the second circuit. If I did it outrageously depending on what happened and how it occurred, I or my assistants might have been in more than trouble.

Certainly, in the district I operated in, the judges wouldn't tolerate it if the prosecutor wanted to do it, and we didn't do it. I know one of the things that has occurred to me, from seeing the State system operate at least in New York is that the judges, many of them at least over the years, appear not to get concerned, or members of the executive department, for that matter, about what appear to be leaks from prosecutors. They never investigate it or check out. I think they should. Leaks don't always come from prosecutors, but I think that the courts should do more disciplining in that area.

I don't know of any in my district. We really haven't had the problem that I am aware of.

Mr. EILBERG. You stated in your article that you never heard of a case where exculpatory evidence was withheld from a jury. Do you believe the prosecutor has the duty to disclose such evidence?

Mr. CURRAN. I don't know whether that was the whole sentence. I think that when you are talking about a grand jury investigation, a prosecutor has a duty above all not to try to indict somebody where there is any doubt in his mind that the person did the act, committed the crime. I think that in terms of what you present to the grand jury, and I believe that Judge Lacy talked about this a little bit, you have to examine what you are talking about by way of exculpatory evidence.

If, for example, in a, let's say, bank robbery case you have evidence that the—credible evidence that the person was 100 miles away or 500 miles away, you probably shouldn't present the case to the grand jury, if that is credible evidence. On the other hand, I don't know that you have an obligation at that stage to conduct an investigation to find exculpatory evidence. If it is presented to you by the defendant, if he's been arrested on a complaint, or by his lawyer, I think you should probably bring that to the attention of the grand jury.

In terms of a person himself testifying before the grand jury, our practice always was to tell the grand jury that the prospective defendant who has been arrested on a complaint wanted to testify and to recommend that the grand jury hear from him or from her.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose an absolute rule prohibiting the calling of a witness who indicates he will invoke his privilege against self-incrimination. As a practical matter, does not taking the fifth in front of the jurors bias them?

Mr. CURRAN. I think the assistant or the person who has entered the case will tell the grand jury, certainly should, and normally do I believe, that this is not an admission of anything, the person has a right to do this. It certainly doesn't help him. I would never put somebody before a grand jury simply to have him assert his privilege and thereby prejudice him.

My point there was, and I think I mentioned it briefly just now, the point was that I would not make that a flat, inflexible rule because there are situations where that doesn't, where a person says he's going to take the fifth and then doesn't for some reason. Under present law, as I understand it, in order to receive a grant of immunity the person must first assert his privilege. That would be done before the grand jury.

Mr. EILBERG. Do I understand you to say that in your practice as U.S. attorney, that your assistants were required to tell the grand jury not to infer any negative evidence from the taking of the fifth amendment?

Mr. CURRAN. "Required" is probably too strong. I can't tell you I personally ever did that. I think the Criminal Division Chief did. But my practice was to tell the grand jury that person had a right to take the fifth amendment and that wasn't proof of anything.

Mr. EILBERG. You state, or just stated that some witnesses abandon their intent to invoke their privilege when actually called to testify. How often does this occur?

Mr. CURRAN. Rarely, but it has happened.

Mr. EILBERG. Can this not be determined by the prosecutor or judge without parading the witness before the jurors?

Mr. CURRAN. You mean whether they are going to——

Mr. EILBERG. In fact take the fifth amendment.

Mr. CURRAN. I can think of one or two cases where we had, I had talked to someone and suggested he testify, and his lawyer was there and he said no, and went before the grand jury. We had some indication that he might be weakening or might really want to talk, and he talked. But I think in most cases, yes. Again, sir, I go to this business about an absolutely inflexible rule. I agree with the general proposition, but I would not mind it to that extent. I wouldn't make it so hard and fast that never should it be done. I mean, as I said, I think it is dead wrong to put somebody in just to have them take the fifth.

Mr. EILBERG. You state that it is necessary that the witness assert the privilege before immunity is granted. Why can't this be legislatively changed?

Mr. CURRAN. It could be. When I wrote that article that was law, sir, and it is still law. It certainly could be.

Mr. EILBERG. You state that there would be a grave threat to the administration of justice if a witness were to automatically obtain a copy of his testimony. Many other prosecutors and former prosecutors disagree. Can you give us illustrations of the existence of this grave threat?

Mr. CURRAN. That comes up in several contexts. If you are talking about a witness obtaining his—a copy of his own grand jury testimony during the investigation, you will then, I think it is fairly simple, you will then have all the other targets and witnesses obtaining copies of their testimony. It then becomes infinitely easier for other people who have not yet appeared before the grand jury, let's say, in an antitrust investigation or substantial fraud or official corruption case to see verbatim what each person has said and to tailor his testimony.

I think that that is elementary, and we know testimony tailoring happens. If someone goes before a grand jury and testifies truthfully, and he's not yet indicted, why does he have to have a copy of his testimony? If everybody gets his or her testimony you simply are going to have all the grand jury testimony out in the open because the lawyers will exchange it if the individuals don't, and there goes your grand jury secrecy and everything else.

I don't see any need for it. Again, as a defense counsel, I think it is terrific.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you see any need for it on the basis that people's memories fade as time goes by.

Mr. CURRAN. Are they going back before the grand jury now, or on trial?

Mr. EILBERG. On trial.

Mr. CURRAN. They have the testimony if they get indicted. I wouldn't give it to them before that, sir. That is my point. If someone is indicted he gets his grand jury testimony after indictment. Under rule 16. Automatically, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. Counsel is suggesting this may have been the case, or been the case in your district, but he questions this is universal around the country. In fact, the court can prohibit such release.

Mr. CURRAN. It may still be under rule 16, but I know of no judge, at least in the southern district, who doesn't require it. It is just done automatically, sir. In many cases it is done without a motion. Right after the indictment comes down the lawyer gets automatically the grand jury testimony of his client who becomes a defendant.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose allowing a lawyer to be in the grand jury room as this would cause problems. A recent study by Richard Gerstein, district attorney of Dade County, and head of the ABA Grand Jury Committee, in those States which allow it, eight or nine, has indicated that few, if any, problems arise, if counsel is limited to giving advice only as provided in H.R. 94. Problems of obstreperous conduct or multiple witnesses can be handled by the court, case by case. What do you think?

Mr. CURRAN. Well, I heard the testimony this morning and I agree with what Judge Lacy had to say about that. I would add I conducted private hearings at the State commission investigation for 5 years, and the lawyers weren't supposed to be obstreperous but they can be. What do you do about it? You go before a judge; there are strong judges, medium judges, and weak judges. The judge gives him a lecture and he goes back; he does it again.

"I will have to cite you for contempt. Well, I will do that tomorrow." The grand jury investigation stops, the jurors go home. Well let's wait a week. The judge then gets his back up, says, well, if you do it again you go in the can. Let's say he does it again. The judge cites him for contempt. He wants to appeal it. The grand jury investigation stops, the client now has to get a new lawyer.

I just don't really see any point to it. I don't think individuals are being abused now. I think the system is more than fair to defendants. I don't think the goal should be to make it any tougher to prosecute cases. I think it is tough enough.

Again, I say, as a person on the other side, these matters are definitely beneficial to people representing targets of investigations. They really are.

Mr. EILBERG. You certainly don't maintain conditions are the same throughout the country in all the districts?

Mr. CURRAN. I really can't speak to other districts, sir, but if there are problems that the Justice Department or your committee is aware of, I think those problems should be addressed. Again, as I talk about leaks in that article that you are quoting from, I think you have to take hold of that office and tell them how to do it properly.

I do think if district judges are vigilant, it probably would be done even without words from Washington. But the combination of the two should certainly do the trick.

Mr. EILBERG. You raise the question in your testimony earlier about why do we require a preliminary hearing in the bill.

Mr. CURRAN. Where there was an indictment, sir. Yes; I didn't understand.

Mr. EILBERG. Yes; forgive me for not being complete in that.

Don't you think the preliminary hearing is a useful device in determining whether admissible evidence or hearsay evidence is used, or whether, indeed, these are part of the Government's case?

Mr. CURRAN. I really don't because now, with the speedy trial rule, now you have to put witnesses on the stand promptly to prove the case after probable cause is found. But what happens after the preliminary examination where you have already gotten an indictment. The magistrate says, well, you haven't established probable cause. That doesn't vitiate the indictment necessarily, nor should it.

All you are doing, it seems to me, is affording the defendant discovery different from the kind of discovery he should get by motion.

Mr. EILBERG. I was assistant district attorney in Philadelphia under Richardson Dilworth in the early 1950's. I had occasion to observe our own grand jury in various cases. It was standard practice, I tell you, for the arresting officer to have his criminal report with him, report on summarizing the arrest and just read the summary. Do you think that kind of practice is fair?

Mr. CURRAN. No; but he probably could get away with the same thing in a preliminary hearing under the present rules of evidence. No; I wouldn't do it that way, sir. I would have someone come in and testify, at least lay out the essential elements of the crime and establish probable cause based on some personal knowledge.

You do have some hearsay situations in the grand jury, but I think there should be credible evidence with the least hearsay possible.

Mr. EILBERG. You don't think having a preliminary hearing where the defendant has a lawyer, the defendant's rights would be better protected after an indictment?

Mr. CURRAN. No; I don't because I think you would get more discovery of the Government's case perhaps in a different fashion. But what I don't quite understand is, if at the preliminary hearing the judge or magistrate finds there is not probable cause, what happens to the indictment? Is the indictment then dismissed? Because it doesn't follow that what was brought out at the preliminary hearing is what was presented to the grand jury. I don't see how you can dismiss indictments based upon another proceeding, to wit, a preliminary hearing postindictment.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Curran, we have had a very interesting session. We appreciate everything you have said, and hope that you will give us a statement when you can. Thank you very much.

Mr. CURRAN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. Next we have Mr. Robert J. Del Tufo, First Assistant Attorney General and Director of the Division of Criminal Justice, State of New Jersey.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT J. DEL TUFO, FIRST ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL AND DIRECTOR OF THE DIVISION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE, STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. DEL TUFO. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. We apologize for requiring you to stay all day.

Mr. DEL TUFO. Not at all. It's been very interesting, really. I heard most of the testimony this morning, and questions and comments; it was very instructive.

Mr. EILBERG. Please proceed in your own way. If you wish to summarize your statement, we can place it in the record.

Mr. DEL TUFO. Very good, Mr. Chairman. I am bombarding you with statements. We have a very lengthy statement which sets forth Attorney General Hyland's position and my own on grand juries in general, and on H.R. 94. I guess we also included some references to H.R. 3736.

We also submitted the grand jury manual prepared by our office and county prosecutors in New Jersey, which is in operation in the State of New Jersey. And I, if I may, would like to make some brief remarks which would tend to summarize some of the things set forth in the statement.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you have a statement? It will be made part of the record without objection.

[The documents referred to follow:]

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM F. HYLAND, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF NEW JERSEY, AND ROBERT J. DEL TUFO, FIRST ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL OF NEW JERSEY AND DIRECTOR OF THE DIVISION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

I. INTRODUCTION

At the outset I wish to express my appreciation to this committee for its invitation to testify concerning the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act. We in New Jersey have become acutely aware that in recent years the grand jury system as variously administered has been the source of much criticism and reappraisal throughout the country and other nations. Some have recommended elimination of the grand jury requirement except for special situations where its traditional investigative functions must be preserved. Others have questioned whether the grand jury is effective as a buffer between the State and one suspected of having committed a criminal offense.[1] Nevertheless, our present system is not without its defenders. It may be fairly argued that the grand jury properly fulfills its extraordinary dual functions. It both indicts persons upon a finding of probable cause, and protects citizens from inquisitional conduct on the part of public officials.[2] Moreover, it provides a mechanism for active citizen participation in government. Finally, our grand jury system has historically insulated the criminal charging process from political considerations.

The bills presently pending before this Committee must be reviewed against the backdrop of this continuing national controversy concerning the efficacy of the grand jury and the need for reform. Therefore, while the provisions of H.R. 94 will be the focal point of my remarks, I feel it incumbent upon me to address the broader problem of defining the proper parameters of grand jury action. In this context I am particularly concerned with H.R. 3736, which adopts an approach similar to H.R. 94, but which may be fairly characterized as even more drastic in its terms.

Succinctly stated, I believe that the approach taken in both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 is largely misdirected. Initially, I would observe that these bills reveal an unfortunate lack of confidence in executive officers entrusted with the enforcement of the criminal laws. They are premised upon the erroneous assumption that the grand jury has become the mere "rubber stamp" of the federal prosecutor and does not exercise sufficient independent judgment. The inference is that prosecutors commonly intrude upon the independence of the grand jury. In my view this charge constitutes a gross generalization and is not substantiated by empirical evidence. As a general rule, prosecutors are dedicated public servants whose ethical duty is not to convict but to insure that justice is done. It is as much the prosecutor's obligation to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction as it is to use every legitimate means to bring about a just one. These obligations are not mere theoretical concepts or idealistic abstractions. They are responsibilities imposed on prosecutors as a matter of law.

It would be well to observe in this context that our government is founded upon trust. We entrust those who govern with the power to fulfill their public mission, and we have faith that they will properly perform that obligation. Prosecutors stand in a fiduciary relationship to the people whom they serve. As fiduciaries of the public trust they are under an inescapable obligation to serve the people with the highest fidelity. History has sadly revealed, however, that faith in government and its officers is not enough. Although our government is one of law, it is managed by men. It would be naive indeed to assume that all public prosecutors will be immune from human frailties and excesses. Yet, to deny to prosecutors, on that account, the authority that they must have to execute their public duties would be destructive. A certain degree of mistrust is not only healthy, but necessary to the preservation of our democracy. Nevertheless, it would be sheer folly to deprive prosecutors of their power to deal with crime merely because of a figment of fear that government itself may run amuck.

We must not be unmindful of the fact that in a prior administration, executive arrogance reached to the highest levels of government. This insolence in office, however, was not checked by legislation in the final analysis, but by the people relying heavily on the grand jury. The action of the grand jury, in returning indictments against the highest officials of government, should serve as a strong reminder that those entrusted with enforcement of the law must live within its proscriptions. In short, the vitality of the grand jury system was plainly demonstrated by its response to executive arrogance. Should this proposed legislation be enacted, it is inevitable that the grand jury's ability to respond to similar assaults on our democracy will be substantially diminished.

What has been said thus far should not detract from what I perceive to be the need for grand jury reform. I strongly endorse adoption, at least in a modified form, of several provisions in the bills under consideration. For example, I believe that pretrial discovery of grand jury minutes should be available immediately following the return of an indictment. Further, it is my view that, absent some compelling justification, it should be incumbent on a prosecutor to introduce only competent and admissible evidence. Nevertheless, I am constrained to disagree with the principle thrust of the proposed bills, which will inevitably impair the prosecutor's ability to effectively perform his public responsibilities.

It is axiomatic that any conceivable accusatorial process administered by executive officers, provided with discretion, presents an opportunity for abuse. In my view, our greatest insurance against overzealousness on the part of prosecutors, rests in attempts to professionalize law enforcement through the administrative authority of the Attorney General. In this context, I would note that New Jersey's criminal justice system is similar to that of its federal counterpart. The Attorney General of New Jersey exercises broad supervisory powers over the local prosecutors,[3] in much the same manner as the federal Attorney General.[4] In my role as chief law enforcement officer of New Jersey, my office has promulgated specific rules and standards which are contained in a comprehensive manual to guide prosecutors in the presentation of matters to the grand jury. Moreover, the Attorney General in New Jersey is statutorily empowered to sanction an errant prosecutor, and in certain circumstances to supersede him. I will subsequently describe my efforts in this regard in greater detail. Suffice it to say, at this point our experience in New Jersey strongly indicates that administrative supervision of prosecutors best insulates the grand jury from prosecutorial impropriety. In short, we have utilized the administrative process to facilitate the evolution of the common law grand jury into an institution which jealously guards the rights of all elements of society.

In sum, I believe that federal grand jury reform is necessary. That reform should be viewed as a natural consequence of the growing complexity of modern problems. Nevertheless, we must not lose faith in the very institution which has allowed the people to vindicate their fundamental right to self-government in accordance with the law. Reform need not entail destruction. The vitality of the grand jury as an institution has not wilted in the heat of political corruption, nor should our faith in the grand jury be frozen by fear of innovation.

II. COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS OF H.R. 94 AND H.R. 3736

Proposed bills H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 are similar responses to the admitted need for reform of the federal grand jury system. The proposed legislation would transpose essential elements of trial procedure to the grand jury stage. The effect of these changes would substantially impair the orderly administration of justice.

These bills are generally directed toward severe curtailment of executive discretion. Further, grand jury witnesses are accorded substantive rights which are far in excess of constitutional requirements. In our view, the net effect of the proposed legislation is to deprive government of the ability to fulfill its primary mission, to protect the citizen against criminal attack in his home, his place of business and on the streets. Our comparative analysis of H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 will focus on the following topical areas:

A. Grants of Immunity.
B. The Rights of Witnesses and Suspects.
C. Contempt Procedures.
D. Grand Jury Independence.
E. The Grand Jury as an Institution.

A. Grants of immunity

1. Transactional Immunity.—Transactional immunity in return for compelled testimony is proffered by both bills.[5] Transactional immunity affords the witness full immunization from prosecution for the offense to which the compelled testimony relates.[6] The witness is thus provided with considerably broader protection than is required by the Fifth Amendment.[7] The Fifth Amendment privilege has never been construed to mean that one who invokes it cannot be subsequently prosecuted.[8] The sole concern of the Fifth Amendment is to insure protection against compelled self-incrimination.[9] Thus, immunity from use of compelled evidence, as well as evidence derived directly or indirectly therefrom, provides that insurance.[10] Use immunity is not discordant with the just and compelling interest of the government in the prosecution of crime.

We fail to perceive why plenary immunity from prosecution should be required where an admitted misdemeanant or felon is compelled to give evidence which can never be used against him. Moreover, an individual accorded use immunity is not dependent for the preservation of his rights upon the integrity and good faith of the executive. The Constitution imposes upon the government the affirmative duty to prove that any evidence it proposes to use at trial is derived from a legitimate source, wholly independent of the compelled testimony.[11]

In our view, abrogation of the use plus fruits immunity doctrine would substantially impair the grand jury's function. Traditionally, the grand jury has been accorded wide latitude to inquire into violations of the criminal law.[12] It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation, the scope of whose inquiries should not be limited by doubts as to whether any potential individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime.[13] Significantly, the grand jury is not an officious meddler, for its investigative function "is not fully carried out until every available clue has been run down and all witnesses examined in every proper way to find if a crime has been committed." [14] It should be recognized that the grand jury's investigative power must be broad if its proper responsibility is adequately to be discharged. The principal function of the grand jury is to determine the truth.

It is to be observed in this context that truth and justice are inseparable. A deliberately false judgment debases the grand jury process. Yet, transactional immunity works to conceal evidence of guilt to the end that the witness and others will escape detection and conviction. When the truth is suppressed and the criminal is set free, the pain of suppression is felt, not by some inanimate state, but by the offender's next victims for whose protection we hold office. Therefore, transactional immunity, which is not required by our Constitution, is contrary to the public interest.

2. Notice of Intent to Confer Immunity.—H.R. 94 provides a witness with a period of one week before an order immunizing him and requiring him to testify becomes operative.[15] While the one week notice provision allows the prospective witness an opportunity to apepal, it also provides him the ability to flee. To syndicated crime, pledged to a code of silence, flight or the destruction of evidence is favored over immunity from prosecution.[16] More importantly, those who may be incriminated by the immunized testimony are, in effect, given one week to eliminate or otherwise hinder the source of their potential crimination. Lastly, this period of grace provides the witness with time to tailor his testimony. In my view, there is no valid reason for inclusion of this notice provision. In short, once immunity has been granted, the witness has no choice but to tell the truth and to produce the relevant evidence.

3. Conditions for Obtaining Immunity.—H.R. 3736 provides that twelve grand jurors must concur before the government may seek immunity. The bill further requires that a court must concur in the decision to grant immunity. Lastly, the proposed legislation mandates that the witness must consent in writing and that the prosecution must obtain the approval of the Attorney General before applying to a court for an order granting immunity.[17]

It is my position that the decision to grant immunity is one which must remain exclusively within the province of the executive. Granting leniency to an individual in return for his cooperation is a most delicate and complicated matter. The objectives and interests of thorough and diligent law enforcement must always be considered in the context of dealing fairly and justly with actual or potential defendants. As a general rule, it should be our policy to confer the least possible consideration in obtaining the cooperation of witnesses. If a witness will testify truthfully with no immunity at all, he should receive none. The central question is how much, if anything, should we sacrifice when we immunize such potential witnesses and how does it balance against what we can anticipate in return. Also to be weighed is the effect of any consideration upon the individual as a witness before a trial jury. Ultimately, immunity should be granted only after all of its implications have been fully assessed.

It is impossible to set forth a precise formula by which the decision to confer immunity is to be made. However, there are certain factors which should be weighed by the prosecutor when considering any form of immunity. Among these considerations are: (1) whether the information can be obtained from another source, (2) how useful the information is for purposes of criminal prosecution, (3) the likelihood that the witness can be successfully prosecuted, (4) the relative significance of the witness as a potential defendant, (5) the importance of the investigation, and finally, (6) the impact that an order granting immunity will have on public confidence in the law enforcement process.

Mere recitation of these factors strongly militates in favor of permitting experienced prosecutors to determine independently whether immunity should be requested. Members of the grand jury do not possess the requisite experience and insight to make such delicate law enforcement policy judgments. The tenure of grand jurors is brief. Their knowledge of the criminal law is minimal. Substitution of their judgment for that of a qualified professional can only hinder and impede the investigation and detection of serious criminal conduct.

We also take strong exception to H.R. 94 which requires, as a prerequisite to the issuance of an order granting immunity, a judicial finding that the information is necessary to the public interest.[18] In essence, the bill compels judicial encroachment in an area properly within the domain of the prosecutor. The Attorney General is the chief law enforcement officer in the United States.[19] In this role he is obliged to use all reasonable and lawful diligence for the detection, arrest, indictment and conviction of offenders against the law. To the end that he may satisfactorily execute these solemn obligations he is vested with broad discretion.[20] Investigation of criminal conduct and preferring charges against persons who allegedly have committed crimes are two vital responsibilities of the Attorney General.[21] The power to investigate and the charging decision is the heart of the prosecutor's function.[22] His broad discretion in these areas should be limited only by the requirement that he not act beyond the powers of his office or in bad faith.

It is axiomatic that whether immunity should be sought may well depend upon matters of public policy beyond the legal competence of the judiciary. Historically, prosecutorial decisions concerning enforcement of the criminal law comprises a part of the executive's responsibilities, and are matters of discretion particularly in the province of the executive department.[23] It is antithetical to our notions of judicial integrity to involve the courts in the decision with respect to whom to prosecute. The court, immersed in judicial matters, should not be expected to expend the time and effort to appreciate the basis of the prosecutor's decision.

Another consideration strongly mitigating against judicial review of immunity grants is the attendant loss of time and resources. Certainly, if a court is required to make a finding with respect to the efficacy of an immunity grant, then it will be necessary to engage in a "mini-trial" at which time, all relevant data concerning the ongoing investigation will be detailed. Clearly, such an untimely and great expenditure of judicial resources is unconscionable.

A most disturbing aspect of H.R. 3736 is the requirement that a witness consent to a grant of immunity.[24] Immunity predicated on the consent of a witness totally destroys the government's power to compel testimony. Under the proposal a witness would determine when immunity is to be granted. In short, consensual immunity would allow witnesses to define the scope of the grand jury's inquiry.

Both bills are consistent with current law in requiring the Attorney General's approval for grants of immunity.[25] We believe that this is a needed protective device. This type of review is consonant with our conception of close administrative supervision within the executive department.

B. Rights of witnesses and suspects

Both proposed bills attempt to supplement the rights of grand jury witnesses and suspects. We limit our discussion to the most important proposed changes. These proposals include: (1) notice to targets of grand jury investigations, (2) subpoenas containing advice respecting the rights and duties of witnesses, (3) the right to have counsel present in the grand jury room, (4) the requirement that the prosecution must present all exculpatory evidence to the grand jury, (5) the applicability of the rules of evidence to grand jury proceedings and (6) the right of an accused to pretrial discovery of all grand jury minutes. Violation of any of these provisions would result in dismissal of an indictment or the conferral of transactional immunity. Further, prosecutors would also be required to notify all targets of their intention to present evidence to the grand jury unless they can "satisfy a court that notice would result in flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation or prosecution." Finally, H.R. 94 would afford all indicted defendants the right to a preliminary examination.

1. Notice to Witnesses of Rights and Duties

Both bills require that subpoenas advise witnesses of the following.

(1) right to counsel;
(2) privilege against self-incrimination;
(3) the subject matter of the grand jury investigation;
(4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury;
(5) the substantive criminal statute or statutes, violation of which is under consideration by the grand jury, if these are known at the time of issuance of the subpoena, and
(6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.[26]

We are in partial agreement with this provision. In our view, targets of grand jury investigations should be advised of their rights. As will be noted later, this is our practice in New Jersey. Federal law is not yet settled on this subject,[27] but we believe that considerations of fair play dictate that targets be informed of the nature of the interrogation, the fact that they are putative defendants, that they have the right to counsel, and that they may refuse to testify based upon their privilege against self-incrimination. In addition, it is our practice to inform nontarget witnesses of the circumstances of the grand jury's investigation as they relate to him. Nevertheless, we can ascertain no compelling reason for requiring that such witnesses be provided with subpoenas setting forth information solely applicable to target witnesses.[28]

One further matter deserves attention. As presently written, H.R. 94 (at p. 15 and 23–24) precludes the prosecutor from calling a witness before the grand jury when the witness has given written notice that he intends to exercise his Fifth Amendment privilege. This provision conflicts with the time honored principle (see Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 486–87 (1951)) that a witness may not make himself the final judge of the availability of the Fifth Amendment privilege and hence enough much appear to permit a court to pass upon it. We thus believe that ordinary witnesses should be required to appear before the grand jury and assert the privilege. On the other hand, target witnesses should be allowed to invoke their Fifth Amendment privilege on the record out of the presence of the grand jury.

In any event, we strongly disagree with the remedy of transactional immunity provided in H.R. 3736 with respect to witnesses who are not properly advised of their rights.[29] We have already discussed our position with respect to transactional immunity. Suffice it to say, use immunity is constitutionally permissible and is supported by sound policy considerations.

2. Presence of Counsel in Grand Jury.—Both proposed bills permit counsel to be present with the witness in the grand jury room.[30] This, of course, deviates from the present law.[31] H.R. 94 specifically forbids counsel from speaking with anyone other than the witness.[32] H.R. 3736 is silent on the permissible extent of counsel's participation. We believe that adoption of these provisions would disrupt the grand jury proceedings. Grand jurors would not act with the independents required of an accusatory and inquisitorial body. The proposal would substantially inhibit inquiries by grand juries and detract from the well recognized policies supporting the secrecy doctrine. Moreover, there may be instances, especially involving syndicated crime, where the presence of counsel would be undesirable from the witness's perspective. In short, we urge retention of our present rule which insures the utmost freedom to the grand jury during its investigation.

3. Disclosure of Exculpatory Evidence.—We have no doubt that our Constitution presupposes a grand jury acting independently of either prosecuting attorney or judge whose mission is to clear the innocent, no less than to bring to trial those who may be guilty. Both bills propose that all exculpatory evidence in a prosecutor's possession be disclosed to a grand jury.[33] It is thus suggested that the grand jury's ability to fulfill its public responsibilities is compromised to the extent that the prosecutor is not currently required to present all exculpatory evidence to it for its consideration.[34] We note that it is highly unlikely that the grand jury will learn of exculpatory evidence unless the prosecutor brings it to its attention. Hence, the tenable possibility exists that an individual may be compelled to undergo the trauma of a felony trial based upon an ex parte proceeding from which he and all his evidence are excluded.

In other jurisdictions, it has been held that "if the district attorney seeking an indictment is aware of evidence reasonably tending to negate guilt, he is obliged to inform the grand jury of its nature and existence."[35]

This rule appears to be consistent with the prosecutor's principal responsibility, i.e., to see that justice is done. Therefore, in New Jersey, we have administratively adopted a standard requiring disclosure of evidence which a prosecutor knows may exonerate the accused. A.B.A. Standards, The Prosecution Function, § 3.6(b). Nevertheless, we believe that the present proposals should not be the subject of legislation. In many cases it will be difficult for a prosecutor to determine exactly which evidence might be deemed exculpatory. The quality of evidence varies depending on the subjective values and perspective of the evaluator. Thus, while prosecutors should present evidence which will exonerate, legislation requiring production of all exculpatory evidence is unrealistic. Moreover, the drastic remedy of dismissal is clearly without legal justification.

4. Application of Rules of Evidence.—H.R. 3736 provides that indictments must be based on competent and admissible evidence.[36] An exception exists where the government demonstrates good cause supporting the admission of "summarized or hearsay evidence alone."[37]

The bill further would prevent the prosecutor from presenting illegally obtained evidence.[38] Significantly, violations of this rule would serve to vitiate a well-founded indictment.[39]

At present, reception before a grand jury of inadmissible or even illegally obtained evidence procured in violation of an individual's constitutional rights does not serve to vitiate the resulting indictment.[40]

In most jurisdictions the grand jury is not limited to receiving evidence admissible at trial.[41] As a general rule, the competency of evidence presented to the grand jury may not be the subject of judicial inquiry.[42]

Although the great weight of authority supports this rule, many have argued that it ought to be modified. It has been suggested that the failure to apply any evidentiary controls results in unnecessary trials and permits improper rummaging into personal lives of witnesses.[43] In point of fact, several states have, by statute, limited the power of the grand jury to receive inadmissible evidence.[44] In addition, the American Bar Association Project on Standards for Criminal Justice has provided:

"A prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial. However, in appropriate cases the prosecutor may present witnesses to summarize admissible evidence available to him which he believes he will be able to present at trial." [45]

In the accompanying commentary, the Bar Association noted that "as a general principle, the use of secondary evidence before a grand jury should be avoided unless there are cogent reasons justifying" deviation from that course.[46] For example, the need to use a summary of available evidence may arise "in cases involving voluminous records or where an absent witness has given a written statement but is not available at the time and circumstances justify prompt grand jury action.[47] So too, the Bar Association advocates the use of hearsay evidence "where the victim of a criminal act is seriously injured and therefore is unavailable. . . ." [48] Another example set forth in the commentary is "where the safety of an important witness reasonably warrants that his identity remain covert." [49] In such a case the witness' statement, if sufficiently detailed, can be presented to the grand jury.

The American Law Institute has adopted a similar approach in its Model Code of PreArraignment Procedure.[50] Under the Code, prosecutors may present "secondary" evidence only where the opposite course would impose an unreasonable burden on one of the parties or on a witness.[51]

We recommend that prosecutors should, as a general rule, seek to present only admissible evidence to the grand jury. Incompetent and also illegal evidence should not be presented to the grand jury. So too, as a general rule, evidentiary privileges should be honored and not violated at the grand jury stage of proceedings. Where a privilege is personal to a defendant or the target of an investi-

One line of cases, however, has indicated that where a target of an investigation is compelled to give incriminating evidence before a grand jury, that same grand jury cannot permissibly indict for the offenses to which he has confessed. See e.g., Goldberg v. United States, 472 F. 2d 513, 516 (2 Cir. 1973); Jones v. United States, 342 F. 2d 863 (D.C. Supp. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 1953), appeal dismissed sub nom. United States v. Roth, 208 F. 2d 467 (2 Cir. 1953). For example, the court in Goldberg v. United States, supra, observed that an indictment might be invalid if returned by the same grand jury before whom a defendant was compelled to testify against himself under a grant of immunity and who actually testified as to incriminating matters. The court applied the rationale of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), to the grand jury setting in finding that under such circumstances "it would be well nigh impossible for the grand jurors to put [defendant's] answers out of their minds." Thus, the very testimony which was compelled by the grant of immunity might be used against him by the grand jury. Goldberg v. United States, supra at 516.

gation and that individual has the right to claim the privilege, it can be assumed that the individual will exercise the privilege. In all other instances where the privilege is not personal, consideration should be given to the nature of the privilege, the individual who has a right to exercise it and other surrounding circumstances.

Failure to observe evidentiary controls results in unnecessary trials and permits improper rummaging into the personal lives of witnesses. Further, a wrongful indictment is "no laughing matter," for it indelibly stains the reputation of the accused. Nevertheless, the nature of the grand jury process also suggests that some exceptions be made to the policy requiring that only admissible evidence be presented to the grand jury. For example, investigative grand juries must often sift through all available clues to determine whether a crime has been committed. It would be unwise to restrict the scope of the investigative grand jury's inquiries by requiring that only competent, admissible evidence be received. So too, expert reports may often be presented to the grand jury in the interest of economy. Ordinarily, where an expert would merely testify as to the contents of his report, his presence before the grand jury would not be needed. It seems only fair, however, that the prosecution clearly inform the grand jury of the availability of better or firsthand evidence so that it can, if it wishes, request presentation of such proofs.

Nevertheless, we believe that dismissal of an indictment is far too drastic a remedy for violation of this rule. (For further discussion of the inappropriateness of this remedy with respect to illegally seized evidence, see pp. 34 to 37, infra). In short, we recommend adoption of the following standard which best protects the rights of the public and those of the witness:

"The grand jury shall receive none but evidence that would be admissible over objection at the trial of a criminal action, absent justification for introduction of incompetent or inadmissible evidence which justification shall be stated on the record at the time of its admission; but the fact that evidence which would have been excluded at trial was received by the grand jury does not render the indictment void where sufficient competent evidence to support the indictment was received by the grand jury."

5. Pretrial Discovery of Grand Jury Minutes.—Both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 provides for limited discovery of grand jury minutes. Any witness who testifies before the grand jury may, upon written request, be entitled to examine and copy a transcript of that individual's testimony before the grand jury.[52] Under H.R. 3736 the transcript must be available 48 hours after the conclusion of the witness' testimony.[53] After examination of the testimony the witness may request permission to reappear before the grand jury to explain his testimony.[54]

We believe that the right to pre-trial discovery of grand jury minutes should not be so limited. In our view, disclosure, rather than suppression of relevant materials ordinarily promotes the proper administration of civil and criminal justice. If justice is to be meaningful, the search for the truth should not be unduly circumscribed. In short, we favor full pre-trial discovery of all grand jury minutes by the defendant, other than matters relating to deliberations. Secrecy, of course, impedes the search for truth and hence must rest firmly upon some greater social need. We perceive no countervailing value which would require circumscribing the accused's right to discovery of grand jury minutes.

The reasons supporting the traditional secrecy policy have been aptly summarized in the oft-quoted language of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in United States v. Rose, 215 F.2d 617, 628–29 (3 Cir. 1954). Succinctly stated, the secrecy doctrine is designed to (1) prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated, (2) insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury during its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning grand jurors, (3) prevent subornation of perjury, (4) encourage free and untrammeled disclosure by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes, and (5) protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation. However, it is to be observed that a defendant in the federal courts is entitled to review a witness' grand jury testimony for the purpose of cross-examination during the trial.[55] In many instances, there can be no difference between disclosure at trial and disclosure before trial. Further, the courts have ample power to excise what should not be revealed and doubtless could exercise it in the area under discussion without prejudice to the accused.[56] A protective order would suffice to protect the interests of the prosecution and those of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury.

6. Preliminary Hearing Requirement.—H.R. 94 requires that a preliminary hearing be conducted in every case regardless of whether there is an indictment.[57] The attorney for the government has the option to provide the preliminary hearing before or after indictment.[58] Current federal law provides that the return of an indictment supersedes the right to a hearing on probable cause.[59] We believe that the present practice should not be abandoned. Initially, it is to be observed that the grand jury bases its decision to indict on a finding of probable cause.[60] Therefore, a post-indictment hearing would be merely duplicative of proceedings before the grand jury and would serve no purpose since the function of the hearing is to determine whether the accused is to be bound over for the grand jury. Moreover, a defendant may exercise his right to move prior to trial for a dismissal of the indictment for want of probable cause, thereby achieving the desired result.[61] And finally, we note that it is our view that grand jury minutes should be discoverable by the accused before trial, thereby obviating any possible need for a post-indictment preliminary hearing.[62]

C. Contempt procedures

1. Methods of Instituting Contempt Proceedings.—Contempt of the grand jury traditionally has been in the form of recalcitrance. Contempt is not actionable in a punitive sense. Thus, the law affords the prosecution a means to coerce evidence in a manner consistent with due process, and that for the reason that the grand jury is entitled to "every man's evidence." [63] Stated somewhat differently, the object of the contempt remedy is not to punish but to place on the recalcitrant witness a sufficiently onerous burden as to compel him to testify.[64]

Both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 would significantly amend federal law relating to contempts committed by recalcitrant witnesses. Presently, a witness who refuses, without just cause, to respond to a grand jury demand for evidence, may be summarily committed for contempt.[65] The proposed legislation makes contempt actionable only upon service and disposition of an order to show cause.[66] H.R. 3736 would further limit executive action by requiring an "affirmative vote of 12 or more members of the grand jury that such refusal was without just cause" prior to institution of contempt proceedings.[67] We urge rejection of both proposals.

Summary contempt procedures permit a recalcitrant witness to be brought directly from the grand jury to the court. The witness is immediately confronted with the choice of producing evidence or being incarcerated. In contrast, contempts punishable only on orders to show cause require suspension of the proceedings.[68] Both means of instituting contempt proceedings are necessary.

Witnesses are called before the grand jury under varying circumstances. Consequently, the government should be accorded alternative methods of dealing with contumacious conduct. An evaluation of the character of the witness is often considered by the government in its determination respecting how to proceed. In other words, the possible involvement of the witness in the criminal conduct which is the subject of investigation may be significant. So too, the witness' prior record, if any, may have a bearing on whether summary contempt procedures are to be utilized. The urgency of the evidence is also relevant to this decision. In any event, maximum flexibility is necessary in order to insure the cooperation of even the most hardened criminal. We thus urge retention of both methods of instituting contempt proceedings. Rather than abrogating summary contempt procedures, the Attorney General should be afforded the opportunity to promulgate guidelines for federal prosecutors to be used in deciding whether to proceed against a recalcitrant witness summarily or on an order to show cause. In this way, the competing interests of the witness and society can be constitutionally accommodated.

[68] H.R. 94 provides that no contempt proceeding be commenced prior to 72 hours after the refusal to answer. H.R. 3736 grants 10 days notice. While both bills destroy the coercive effect of summary contempt, H.R. 3736 clearly contemplates a plenary trial on the issue. Appellate matters are to be expediently processed under both bills and H.R. 3736 provides an automatic release if an incarcerated contemnor's appeal is not disposed of within 30 days. Bail pending appeal permitted by both bills, unlike current federal law, and free counsel is explicitly made available to indigents. We strenuously object to dissolution of the summar contempt power, but we endorse the rights to counsel and bail.

2. Length of Confinement.—The length of confinement of contemnors is crucial to analysis of the coercive nature of the contempt remedy. The proposed legislation limits confinement to a period of six months.[69] The effect of this limitation is to establish a specific criminal sentence for the commission of civil contempt. As we have noted, however, civil contempt does not seek to punish one for recalcitrance. Rather, its purpose is to encourage the witness to produce evidence by penalizing his refusal to comply with the legitimate demands of the grand jury. In short, the government's interest is in obtaining evidence and not in punishment.

Logic dictates that the period of confinement be limited only by its coercive effectiveness. The apparent concern of the authors of the proposed legislation is that witnesses will be confined well beyond the period necessary to determine whether incarceration will have a coercive effect. This concern can be alleviated by adopting a provision permitting a witness to obtain release when he can demonstrate that confinement has ceased to be coercive and has become punitive in nature.[70]

3. Reinstitution of Contempt Procedures.—The proposed bills provide that once a witness has been confined for contempt, he may never again be incarcerated for failure to produce evidence relating to the same investigation. Specifically, H.R. 94 prohibits confinement for "subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or set of events." [71] H.R. 3736 utilizes the same language, but it also prohibits confinement for subsequent refusal to give evidence concerning any "related transaction." [72] Thus, the grand jury would no longer be entitled to evidence within the possession of a witness who has previously been held in contempt.

We believe that such a result is untenable. Evidence discovered at a later date might well create a pressing need to compel the witness to testify again. To justify so serious an insult to the truth-finding process, some compensating gain should be incontestable. We perceive no such compelling justification.

4. Illegally Obtained Evidence As A Bar To Contempt.—Both bills modify present federal case law which makes it just cause to refuse to answer questions derived from illegal electronic surveillance.[73] H.R. 3736, however, extends that defense to "any evidence obtained by an unlawful act or in violation of the witness's constitutional right or rights established by any statute of the United States." [74] Most significantly, violation of this provision would vitiate a subsequent indictment.[75] We believe that this expansion of a witness's rights is ill-advised and unwarranted.

The Fourth Amendment prohibits the admission of evidence procured by means of an unlawful search or seizure.[76] The efficacy of that rule is presently under attack.[77] Many legal scholars hold the view that civil damages are a sufficient remedy for violation of Fourth Amendment rights.[78] The Fifth and Sixth Amendments prohibit admission at trial of involuntary confessions [79] and suggestive identifications.[80] H.R. 3736 would extend these protections to the grand jury room. Moreover, the bill would also provide witnesses with protections derived from every other federally assured right, whether it be created by the Constitution or by statute. Under this proposal, a suppression motion and hearing would be required during the grand jury investigation. Thus, a separate mini-trial would be necessary before the answer to any question could be compelled.

We reiterate our position that this is an inefficacious misapplication of judicial resources and an unwise extension of the prophylactic measures which now surround the right to a fair trial. The strain on the judiciary would be incalculable. The economic and social cost of indictments, investigations and trials would spiral.

As we have noted, we believe that absent some compeling justification, a prosecutor should be duty-bound to present only competent and admissible evidence. In New Jersey we have administratively adopted such a rule. However, quashing an otherwise well-founded indictment merely because inadmissible evidence has been introduced is truly a draconian remedy. The Attorney General may wish to adopt a standard requiring federal prosecutors to introduce only competent evidence, along the lines we have previously suggested. In the alternative, the bills should be amended to require dismissal of an indictment only when no admissible evidence supporting the charge has been presented to the grand jury.

D. Grand jury independence

Both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736 provide for independent grand jury inquiries. H.R. 94 would permit the federal grand jury to "inquire upon its own initiative into offenses against the criminal laws of the United States" committed by any individual.[81] H.R. 3736 would limit independent investigations to federal offenses believed to have been committed "by any office or agent of the United States or of any state or municipal government." [82] Furthermore, both bills permit the grand jury to petition the courts for appointment of a special prosecutor. H.R. 94 limits appointment of a special prosecutor to situations where the attorney for the government is "unable to impartially assist, refuses to assist, or hinders or impedes the grand jury" in the conduct of any independent inquiry.[83] Under H.R. 3736, a special prosecutor may be appointed whenever twelve grand jurors conclude that such a course is necessary.[84]

Independent inquiry has always been a mainstay of the common law grand.[85] Federal grand juries are statutory,[86] however, and legislative codification of their independent status is laudable. Nevertheless, we harbor deep reservations concerning the provisions of H.R. 94 which permit undue external interference with the grand jury's function.

H.R. 94 provides that "any person" may request to appear and give evidence before a grand jury. That request must be presented to the grand jury by the prosecutor and it must be voted upon.[87] Equally disturbing is that provision which requires independent grand jury investigation upon the request of "any person." [88] These provisions are cumbersome and laborious. The grand jury should be insulated from potentially petty grievances which would occupy their precious time with nonsense. Certainly, the prosecutor can be relied upon to bring to the grand jury's attention any viable complaint or request to appear.

E. Grand jury as an institution

The grand jury's basic structure would be altered by H.R. 94. That bill decreases the size of the grand jury. A federal grand jury would consist of from nine to fifteen members, with nine constituting a quorum. Concurrence of two-thirds of the total number present would be sufficient to return an indictment.[89]

Current federal law provides that a grand jury be comprised of 16 to 23 persons.[90] Presently, twelve grand jurors must concur before an indictment is returned.[91]

We do not endorse a reduction in the size of the grand jury. The grand jury's size should be sufficient to represent a cross-section of the community. A diminution of the size of the grand jury might well preclude representation on the panel of all recognized groups in the community.

H.R. 94 attempts to codify traditional notions of grand jury secrecy.[92] Grand-jury secrecy is both a shield for the innocent and a cloak for the legitimate interest which law enforcement officials have in preventing premature disclosure of their efforts. Although there are extant various mechanisms for controlling violations of grand jury secrecy,[93] we favor the proposed legislative formulation. We believe that this is a proper subject for the legislative process.

Both legislative proposals mandate that a judge inform grand jurors, before impanelment, of their rights and duties.[94] H.R. 3736 requires that these instructions be in writing.[95] That bill permits an indictment to be dismissed if the charge is not given.[96] We favor adopting a "model grand jury charge" which would be distributed to all federal judges. The model instructions would emphasize the independent role of the grand jury. The charge would also stress that the judiciary is accessible to respond to questions that the grand jurors might have. We in New Jersey have adopted such a model charge.

III. THE NEW JERSEY EXPERIENCE

New Jersey is one of the most densely populated and highly urbanized states in the nation. Therefore, it is not surprising that our law enforcement officials are continually engaged in combatting the ugly realities of crime. Yet, despite the difficulties of this task, we have maintained a high level of respect for the rights of those accused of criminal wrongdoing. This tradition has been manifested, in large measure, by the safeguards provided those who have become the focus of grand jury inquiries.

As we have observed, the ability of the grand jury to prevent unwarranted prosecutions and to act independently has been the subject of much public debate. Yet, the charge that prosecutors abuse their powers in grand jury proceedings is wholly unsubstantiated in New Jersey. In point of fact, specific instances of prosecutorial misconduct have been rare in our State. We believe that the success of the New Jersey system is premised largely on our efforts to professionalize law enforcement through the administrative authority of the Attorney General. Close supervision of well-trained professionals is the best guarantee against prosecutorial excesses.

Toward this end, the Attorney General of New Jersey and I commissioned a task force consisting of county prosecutors and members of the Division of Criminal Justice to prepare a grand jury manual for the use of State and local law enforcement agencies. Our efforts were designed to select the best procedures presently in force as opposed to merely weeding out the worst.

The manual, in its completed form, extensively sets forth recommended practices for prosecuting attorneys in presenting cases to grand juries. It provides for uniformity of prosecutorial conduct in every grand jury in New Jersey. It also constitutes a valuable orientation document for newly appointed Deputy Attorneys General and Assistant Prosecutors.

The manual, the first of its kind, codifies the best practices presently utilized by state and local prosecutors in presenting matters to grand juries. It provides a comprehensive statement of the prosecutor's duties and ethical obligations before the grand jury. The manual addresses such important areas as grand jury orientation, the role of the prosecutor in grand jury proceedings, the rights and duties of witnesses appearing before the grand jury, standards for determining whether immunity should be employed as an investigative tool, guidelines for dissemination of information to the media, preparation of cases prior to presentation to the grand jury and post-indictment procedures. The textual portion of the Manual has been supplemented with an extensive appendix consisting of model forms for use during the investigative phase of the grand jury function. Copies of the manual will be supplied to the members and staff of this Committee.

Many of the reforms presently being considered by this Committee, as well as numerous others, have already been instituted through the administrative process in New Jersey. For example, the manual provides that: (1) the grand jury must be furnished with exculpatory evidence which makes it unlikely that the prosecution will be able to sustain its burden of proof before a petit jury, (2) evidence may be submitted by a target when there is clear indication that he will be exonerated thereby, (3) targets must be warned of their rights and duties prior to being called before the grand jury, (4) the prosecutor is prohibited from stating an opinion or urging a point of view, or commenting on the weight or sufficiency of the evidence, except that he may comment on reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, the extent of harm caused by the offense, nonenforcement of the statute in question, improper motives of a complainant and the cooperation of the accused, (5) the prosecutor may not without justification, present illegal or incompetent evidence, (6) the prosecutor is specifically prohibited from usurping the grand jury's power to subpoena, (7) guidelines are established to assist in the determination of whether to seek a summary contempt order or to proceed by a show cause order in cases of recalcitrant witnesses, (8) standards are articulated to formalize procedures to be used in extending immunity or other consideration to a witness, and (9) prosecutors are to assist the grand jury in the exercise of their function by reminding the jurors that they have the right to request additional witnesses and that they may put questions to any witness.

In sum, our grand jury manual was the product of a painstaking effort to define the rational bounds of prosecutorial discretion. It seeks to facilitate the need for a flexible system, which ensures individual rights, while permitting prosecutors to have sufficient authority to fulfill their sworn duties. Further, those who deviate from the standards set forth in the manual may be administratively disciplined. Adherence to the articulated standards set forth in the manual will ensure that prosecutors in New Jersey will continue to be solicitous of the rights of defendants and witnesses in grand jury proceedings.

Our experience clearly indicates that the best means of insuring against prosecutorial overzealousness is through the professionalization of our law enforcement personnel by utilization of the administrative authority reposed in New Jersey's Attorney General. Nevertheless, grand jury reform has also been the subject of joint action by the courts and prosecuting attorneys. For example, we have prepared a model charge which emphasizes both the grand jury's independence and the accessibility of the court to respond to questions. Further, as a result of such joint efforts, New Jersey's criminal discovery rules are probably the most liberal in the nation. We have totally rejected the notion that the criminal trial is a contest. Accordingly, grand jury minutes are available to all defendants subsequent to a routine discovery request. Discovery of grand jury minutes provides an important check on any possible abuses in the grand jury process. Moreover, full discovery of grand jury minutes provides the basis for legal challenges to the sufficiency, weight, competency and admissibility of the evidence presented. Public recordation of the evidence upon which the prosecutor seeks to found an indictment gives strong incentive for professionalism.

In our view the response to purported abuses of the grand jury system should reflect the trust and confidence which a free society must repose in its executive officers. We reiterate that under present law prosecutors are duty bound to serve the public with the highest fidelity. In discharging the duties of their office, prosecutors must act reasonably and not arbitrarily. Above all, they must display good faith, honesty and integrity. Enactment of broad remedial legislation to ameliorate the effect of specific and isolated instances of abuse of the grand jury is not the answer. While we do not question that grand juries have been misused by individual prosecutors, law enforcement as an entity has performed in a responsible and professional manner. Legislation will only breed further mistrust and skepticism. Moreover, the proposed legislation would seriously impair the ability of the grand jury to perform its historical function without any compensating social gain. The federal Attorney General's supervisory power over United States Attorneys is the best means of preventing prosecutorial excesses. Indeed, in New Jersey the administrative process has been, for the most part, responsible for insuring the successful operation of our grand jury system. Public faith in our present institutions, coupled with necessary administrative reforms, will enhance the ability of grand juries to protect citizens against unwarranted prosecutions and ferret out criminal conduct.

GRAND JURY ORIENTATION

The responsibility for indoctrinating a newly constituted grand jury, the members of which have little or no knowledge or understanding of how they are supposed to function, rests with the Prosecutor.

Accordingly, on the day the grand jurors are sworn in, they should be addressed by the Prosecutor who will be presenting most of the cases to them.

At this time, the jurors should be given a brief outline of the criminal justice system. They should be informed that, in most cases, the first step in a criminal prosecution is the filing of a complaint in a municipal court in which a defendant is charged with the commission of a specific crime. The complaint is usually signed by either the alleged victim or a police officer. The succeeding steps after the filing of a complaint should be detailed, tracing a case through the municipal court, the Prosecutor's office, the grand jury and the trial court.

It should be explained how cases will be submitted to them, how they will receive testimony, deliberate and act. They should be advised that, in presenting a case, it is not the practice, nor is it necessary, for the Prosecutor to bring before them all the available witnesses, provided the testimony of those witnesses who are produced provides sufficient legal evidence to establish a prima facie case upon which an indictment may be based, i. e., evidence which if unexplained or uncontradicted, would carry the case to a trial jury and justify the conviction of the accused. However, it should be emphasized that the grand jury, as an independent body, has the right to request that additional witnesses or other evidence be produced before them.

It would be advisable to suggest to them that, if a juror has personal knowledge of the facts of a case or is acquainted with a complaining witness, victim or defendant, that fact should be called to the attention of the Foreman. The juror should consider disqualifying himself or herself from deliberating and voting in the matter.

Cases to be presented to a grand jury for its first two or three sessions should be screened so as to exclude matters involving major crimes or cases of a complex nature.

The terms "Indictment," "No Bill" and "No Bill-Remand" should be defined for them, and the legal and practical significance of each clarified.

The respective duties of the Foreman, Deputy Forman and Clerk of the Grand Jury should be outlined, particularly those duties referred to in Rule 3:6. Thus, it should be stated that the Forman, and in his or her absence the Deputy Foreman, presides over the daily sessions, administers the oaths, moderates discussions, and endorses all indictments and presentments. It should also be stated that it is the duty of the Clerk of the Grand Jury to make and keep the minutes of the proceedings as well as to record the vote of each juror, by name, on each considered matter.

They should be advised that, in accordance with R. 3:6-6(a), the Prosecuting Attorney, the Clerk of the Grand Jury, the witness under examination, interpreters when needed and, for the purpose of taking the evidence, a stenographer or operator of a recording device may be present while the grand jury is in session. No person other than the jurors, the Clerk and the Prosecuting Attorney may be present while the grand jury is deliberating. The grand jury, however, may request either the Prosecuting Attorney or the Clerk to leave the jury room during its deliberations.

Finally, the role of the Prosecutor in relation to the grand jury should be set forth. The grand jury should be informed that it is the responsibility of the Prosecutor presenting a case to examine witnesses and to introduce other evidence. Further, the Prosecutor is to advise members of the grand jury as to the admissibility of evidence and the propriety of specific questions which they may wish to ask witnesses. Often grand jurors are tempted, particularly in marginal cases, to ask experienced police officers what their opinion is with respect to the guilt or innocence of a putative defendant. Grand jurors should be instructed not to ask "opinion" questions with respect to laymen witnesses. Finally, the Prosecutor should note that, when necessary, it is incumbent upon him to explain and relate the testimony with reference to applicable statutes and legal principles.

THE ROLE OF THE PROSECUTOR

A prosecutor's duty before the grand jury is to present the evidence and explain the law, thereby assisting the grand jury to accomplish its purpose which, simply stated is:

1) to ensure that persons will be brought to trial only if a reasonable basis for the charge exists; and

2) to ensure that those brought to trial will be adequately informed of the charges against them.

In a typical situation, a complaint which has been forwarded to the grand jury (realistically the Prosecutor's Office) after the probable cause hearing should be initially reviewed by an assistant prosecutor to determine if additional investigation is necessary or whether, in the particular case, administrative action or other alternative to prosecution is appropriate. After having thoroughly reviewed the entire file and determining that the matter should be presented to the grand jury, the assistant prosecutor must decide which witnesses are to be called before the grand jury. The witnesses will testify to matters the assistant prosecutor thinks necessary for a proper understanding of the charge made and also will present sufficient evidence to sustain the charge. As a practical matter the number of witnesses is controlled in part by the time available and the number of cases that must be heard by the grand jury on a given day. This is not to say that a particularly complex case should be inadequately presented because of the lack of time. Time must be made to accommodate those cases where extended testimony is necessary in order to give the grand jury a full understanding of the charge and the defendant's involvement or lack of it in the crime. A survey of New Jersey prosecutors indicates that almost without exception, prosecutor's offices in this State are committed to placing experienced and capable lawyers in charge of the grand jury. This experience is put to good use in deciding the quantity of testimony that is necessary for the grand jury's knowing evaluation of a case, the context of the examination of witnesses and the charges ultimately included in the indictment. Of course, it is within the sphere of the authority of the grand jury to call for additional witnesses that they may wish to hear in a particular case. Toward that end, the prosecutor should remind them of that prerogative.

The prosecutor may also make the determination that the potential defendant or target should, at least, be offered the opportunity to testify in his own behalf. This situation may arise in a number of circumstances, among them being the neighbor-type dispute, domestic or inter-family quarrel, or those instances where there is a suspicion that the complainant possibly has improper motives for signing the complaint. The target himself may initiate a request to be heard by the grand jury; the prosecutor may grant such a request if the ends of justice require it, or to assure a full presentation of the matter to the grand jury. Whether the defendant chooses to testify or not, the prosecutor presenting the case may have, or receive from the target, evidence that would tend to exculpate the target. It is axiomatic that if reliable, exculpatory evidence exists, the prosecution is not likely to sustain its burden of proof before a petit jury, and therefore would justify submission of same to the grand jury. However, care must be taken not to present a "trial" of the issue before the grand jury, and certainly not to create an adversary hearing of any variety. It is therefore recommended that, in the ordinary case, evidence offered by the defense (other than through the testimony of the target of the investigation) be submitted to the grand jury only when there is a clear indication that the target would be exonerated thereby.

In presenting the typical criminal complaint to a grand jury, it is necessary at the outset that the prosecutor say a few words about the complaint. He should set the scene for the grand jurors by spelling out the charge or charges including the elements where it would assist the jurors in considering the facts and the witnesses to be called. In more complex cases, a brief explanation of the testimony that is anticipated may be of assistance. While in no way expressing an opinion nor urging a point of view, a prosecutor should prepare the grand jurors with the factual background necessary for what they are about to hear thereby making the testimony meaningful. In examining the witnesses before the grand jury, it is imperative that questions be concisely and simply stated to elicit answers that are relevant and clearly within the understanding of the grand jurors. It would be well to remember that grand jurors have varied educational backgrounds, comprise many occupational levels, and range in age from 18 to 70. They bring to their duties their life experiences, also their pre-conceived ideas of the criminal justice system, often gleaned from television and other public media. Also it should be kept in mind that while the prosecutor examining the witness has had the benefit of reading all the reports in the case, perhaps more than once, the grand jurors are hearing the testimony for the first time and performing the difficult task of placing the testimony that they are hearing into the overall framework of the case. It is in this area that the experienced prosecutor can, while maintaining an objective stance, be of immeasurable assistance to the grand jury in fulfilling its function. Witnesses' examination should be brief, with concentration on the elements that must be shown to establish a prima facie case. Leading questions are often necessary, and entirely proper to assure that the witness keeps to relevant issues, and to handle expeditiously matters presented to the grand jury.

Occasionally, it will be necessary to "cross-examine" a witness. Normally, such an approach is necessary (1) when there is an obvious inconsistency between the witness's testimony before the grand jury and his prior statements; (2) when the witness's story is "unlikely"; (3) when there is a conflict in testimony between witnesses; (4) when the witness appears evasive or hostile; or (5) when there appears to be a strong probability that the witness is not being truthful. It is the prosecutor's duty to elicit the truth from the witnesses appearing before the grand jury; probing examination is therefore essential when it is suspected that a witness is being less than honest or forthright.

After the prosecutor has concluded his examination of the witness, the grand jurors should be questioned to determine if they have any questions to put to the witness. From our survey of Prosecutors' Offices throughout the State, there appear to be two methods of dealing with grand jurors' questions. Both methods are acceptable. As a matter of practice the prosecutor should consider the merits of both and make his decision accordingly. The first method is to permit the grand jury to ask questions directly of the witness. Utilizing this procedure requires that the prosecutor be on his guard to cut off an improper question, i. e. "Have you ever arrested this man before, Officer"; "does the defendant have a prior record?". In short, there is no prior determination by counsel as to propriety and relevance. If an improper question is asked and answered before the assistant prosecutor can interrupt, the only thing to be done is to instruct the grand jury on the record to disregard the answer and not to consider it in their deliberation.

The second method requires that the witness leave the jury room, and have the prosecutor and other grand jurors screen the questions before being asked of the witness to avoid improper query, and more importantly, improper responses. Aside from the obvious improper question which could place inadmissible or unnecessary information before the grand jury, direct questioning by the grand jury is a problem for several other reasons: (1) There is always the possibility irrelevant or improper inquiries could harm an investigation or prosecution; (2) The time consumed by irrelevant and repetitious questions could interfere with the work of the grand jury. It is the responsibility of the prosecutor to help the jury discipline itself to limit questioning of witnesses to pertinent matters.

After all the witnesses have been examined and have left the grand jury room, the assistant prosecutor may fairly and impartially summarize the evidence and explain the testimony with reference to the law of the case. For instance, if the charge is armed robbery and there has been testimony that the weapon employed was a toy gun, it is absolutely necessary that the grand jurors be given a brief and simple explanation that the law permits a charge of armed robbery even though the gun was not in fact operable, nor capable of inflicting injury. Similarly, it may be necessary to read the statute on robbery to put the testimony regarding the fear that the victim felt (or lack of it) in the proper perspective. Although over a period of months grand jurors gain some slight expertise in the law and a superficial knowledge of the applicable criminal statutes, they are still lay people who have little or no training in the law, or in how the law relates to the facts presented to them. It is the prosecutor's obligation to explain these matters to them with simplicity and clarity. In complex cases a draft indictment may be prepared beforehand and used as an aid in relating the testimony to each of the possible charges. Of course, the Assignment Judge is available to the Grand Jury for instruction independent of the prosecutor and the grand jury should be reminded of that from time to time. However, as a practical matter, it is generally not feasible to transport the grand jury to the court after they have heard evidence in each case. Therefore, it is incumbent upon the assistant prosecutor to gain the grand jury's collective confidence in his judgment, honesty, good faith and fairness. Adequate preparation by the prosecutor is an absolute necessity to achieving this desired rapport.

The prosecutor's role before the grand jury is not easily defined. "[T]here is no impropriety in the prosecutor assisting in the investigation and examination of witnesses; in advising the grand jury as to the admissibility of evidence and the proper mode of procedure and in explaining the testimony with reference to the law of the case . . . [H]e may not [however] participate in its deliberations, or express his views on questions of fact, or comment on the weight or sufficiency of the evidence, or in any way attempt to influence or direct the grand jury in its findings . . . [that is, toward the return of an indictment]," State v. Hart, 139 N.J.Super. 565, 567-568 (App.Div. 1976).

While the broad pronouncements quoted above appear to apply without variation, there are numerous situations in which additional information within the knowledge of the prosecutor should be brought to the attention of the grand jury to assure that justice is done. The following is a partial list of those situations:

a. The prosecutor's reasonable doubt that the accused is in fact guilty;

b. The extent of harm caused by the offense;

c. The disproportion of the authorized punishment in relation to the particular offense or the offender;

d. Possible improper motives of a complainant;

e. The prolonged non-enforcement of a statute, with community acquiescence;

f. The reluctance of the victim to testify;

g. Cooperation of the accused in the apprehension or conviction of others;

h. Availability and likelihood of prosecution by another jurisdiction.

(White Paper: F. O. No. 11- 1976)

In short, a prosecutor may recommend a "no bill" in those instances where justice requires. In some cases, substantial justice will best be achieved by a remand of the matter to the Municipal Court; the prosecutor should be prepared to discuss the possible penalties and consequences of such a remand in the event of a "no bill."

There is no doubt of the impropriety of a prosecutor who influences the grand jury to indict when there is a lack of evidence to support such indictment. State v. Hart, supra; State v. Ferrante, 111 N.J.Super. 299, 304-306 (App.Div. 1970). However, it is equally clear that, in the rare case when a grand jury votes not to indict and the prosecutor is convinced that a real and obvious miscarriage of justice has thereby occurred, the prosecutor should not hesitate to seek to re-present the matter to another grand jury. In short, the prosecutor must be guided by the dictates of justice, with recognition of the deference given his position by the jurors and the influence his comments might have. Cf. State v. Farrell, 61 N.J. 99 (1972).

GRAND JURY WITNESSES

The responsibilities of the prosecuting attorney to particular witnesses vary greatly depending upon the status of the witness subpoenaed to or appearing before a grand jury. In order to catalogue the duties of the prosecutor, it is necessary to distinguish between the different classes of witnesses likely to be encountered.

Non-target (non public employee) -

A non-target witness is one who is not identified or reasonably identifiable by the prosecutor as an object of the grand jury inquiry or investigation. The prosecutor's good faith determination as to the "status" of a particular witness will prevail, and the burden is on the witness to demonstrate that the inquiry was a "ruse" to induce the witness "to unwittingly give evidence against himself." State v. Cattaneo, 123 N.J.Super. 167, 172 (App.Div. 1973), certif. den. 63 N.J. 324 (1973). See also State v. Vinegra, 134 N.J.Super. 432 (App.Div. 1975), appeal pending

It is not necessary to advise a non target witness of his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination if he is called to testify before a grand jury conducting a "general investigation." "Where the inquiry is in fact a general investigation not aimed at the witness and the witness fails to claim the privilege, his testimony can be used against him and can even be the basis of an indictment." State v. Fary, 19 N.J. 431 (1955). Thus, the witness need not be advised of his privilege when he is summoned to give testimony before a grand jury if there is only the mere possibility that he may later be indicted. State v. Fary, supra; United States v. Luxemberg, 374 F.2d 241 (6 Cir. 1967).

This general rule does not, however, preclude a witness from claiming his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. This privilege extends to all witnesses, whether or not they are targets of the investigation. State v. DeCola, 33 N.J. 335 (1960). The privilege may not, however, be claimed prior to the oath being administered and a question being asked. Vineland v. Maretti, 93 N.J.Eq. 513, 521 (Ch. 1922). Moreover, the witness must be prepared to demonstrate a factual basis to the court to justify his claim of privilege. If the question is answered by the witness without claim of privilege, he waives his Fifth Amendment rights. State v. Toscano, 13 N.J. 418, 423 (1953). In short, a non-target witness called before a grand jury need not be warned of his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, and any testimony elicited from him may later be used against him.

A non-target witness may only refuse to answer a question which, in fact, will incriminate him. Rule 24 of the New Jersey Rules of Evidence defines incrimination:

> Within the meaning of this article, a matter will incriminate (a) if it constitutes an element of a crime of this State or another > state or the United States, or (b) the circumstances which with other circumstances would be a basis of a reasonable inference of the commission of such crime, or (c) is a clue to the discovery of a matter within clauses (a) or (b) above; provided, a matter will not be held to incriminate, if it clearly appears that the witness has no reasonable cause to apprehend a criminal prosecution . . .

Thus, a question is incriminating if the response reveals the commission of an element of a crime, furnishes new evidence that the witness committed a crime, or creates an inference that the witness has committed a crime. The right against self-incrimination extends not only to answers which within themselves would support a conviction under a criminal statute, but also to those answers which would furnish a link in the chain of evidence necessary to prosecute one under a criminal statute. Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964).

When a non-target witness, claiming his Fifth Amendment privilege, refuses to answer a question, the prosecuting attorney may properly challenge whether the witness may validly claim this privilege. This determination must be made by the court, usually the assignment judge, before whom the witness can be brought. The assignment judge cannot accept merely the witness's statement that the requested answer will tend to incriminate him. In re Boiardo, 34 N.J. 599 (1961). See also In the Matter of Carl "Pappy" Ippolito, --N.J.Super. -- (App.Div. 1976). Rather the witness must support his invocation of the privilege by a statement indicating the nature or area of the criminal exposure which he fears. It is necessary for him to pinpoint the area to the extent necessary to support his claim of privilege to the satisfaction of the court. The witness must show sufficient facts to the assignment judge to indicate a legitimate basis for his fear of criminal prosecution. State v. DeCola, 33 N.J. 335 (1960); In re Boyd, 36 N.J. 285 (1962).[1] If, in making this disclosure, factual incriminating material is elicited, the witness is protected against the use of such evidence and its fruits. In re Boyd, supra. If a witness is a "target" he need show no more than that fact in order to support his Fifth Amendment claim. In re Addonizio, 53 N.J. 107 (1968).

The assignment judge is usually the final arbiter of the applicability of the Fifth Amendment privilege. He must determine whether the witness has a reasonable basis on which to "apprehend the peril." The danger must be real and appreciable, rather than of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency. In re Pillo, 11 N.J. 8 (1953). In making this determination, the court must consider all the facts and circumstances of the case.

> In determining whether a matter is incriminating . . . and whether a criminal prosecution is to be apprehended, other matters in evidence, or disclosed in argument, the implications of the question, the setting in which it is asked, the applicable statute of limitations and all other factors should be taken into consideration. Rules of Evidence 24.

1 Federal courts have held that a spurious assertion of a claimed apprehension is punishable as perjury. Carlson v. United States, 209 F.2d 209, 214 (1 Cir. 1954).

In order for the court to find that a witness has no basis for an assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege, it must be clear from a careful consideration of all the circumstances in the case that the witness is mistaken, and that the answer cannot have a tendency to incriminate. Malloy v. Hogan, supra. If the court determines that there is no basis for the claim he will order the witness to return to the grand jury and answer the questions put to him by the prosecutor. If, in a later proceeding, it is revealed that the privilege was improperly denied, the testimony elicited may not be used against the witness. State v. DeCola, supra. If the court finds that the witness has a basis for his claim of privilege, the witness does not have to answer the questions unless his testimony has been legally compelled, that is the witness has been immunized against the use or derivative use of his testimony in a subsequent criminal prosecution against him.[2]

Target (non public employee) Witnesses

The latitude afforded the questioning of a "non-target" witness, as discussed above, does not apply to a witness who is the target of a grand jury's investigation. Even if the State makes the allegation that the proceedings are a general investigation, the "target" witness must be warned if the facts and circumstances show that in truth the witness is a target for indictment. State v. Vinegra, supra; State v. Cattaneo, supra; State v. Sibilia, 88 N.J.Super. 546 (Cty.Ct. 1965). A witness becomes a target of the investigation when he is called in order to obtain evidence to fix a criminal charge; he must then be given the appropriate warnings. State v. Sarcone, 96 N.J.Super. 501 (Law Div. 1967); State v. Fary, supra. It is not necessary for a witness to have had formal charges filed against him in order for him to be considered such a target. It is only necessary that an intent to indict him at the time of questioning is present. However, if a witness is subsequently indicted after he has testified before a grand jury, not having been given warnings, the burden is on the witness to show that "there was a ruse by which it was sought to induce him unwittingly to give evidence against himself." State v. Fary, supra; State v. Grundy, 136 N.J.L. 96, 98 (Sup.Ct. 1947). Any doubt is resolved in favor of the validity of the indictment, that is, the indicted witness is treated as merely an ordinary witness who has waived the privilege by not claiming it. State v. Fary, supra.

It should be noted, however, that the State's ability to call a "target" witness before a grand jury has been regulated to assure maximum protection to the individual. State v. Sarcone, supra. In Sarcone, a trial court held that the appearance of a "prospective defendant" before a grand jury, absent the warnings and a subsequent waiver, mandates a dismissal of a resulting indictment. But see State v. Vinegra, supra. It does, however, appear that a target witness may be called before the grand jury for the purpose of having him claim his privilege. Almost all of the federal circuit courts, as well as most of the state courts, hold that a prospective defendant may properly be subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, placing the obligation upon the target, having been duly warned, to claim privilege. See 1 Crim.Jus.Quar. at 49. Although our Supreme Court has not conclusively ruled on the issue, it has inferentially upheld the holding in Sarcone [In re Addonizio, 53 N.J. 107 (1968)], and is at present specifically considering the issue in State v. Vinegra.

It would appear that a target may be summoned before a grand jury, and after proper advisements may claim privilege or may elect to testify before the grand jury; in the latter situation, it is necessary to obtain a waiver of immunity from that witness after advising him that he is a target, has the right to remain silent and the right to the advice of an attorney. Again, it is noteworthy that a witness who has been subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury, who has not been given the appropriate warnings and who has not signed a waiver of immunity, has the burden of proof in establishing that he was, in fact, a target when he testified. State v. Cattaneo, supra; State v. Grundy, supra. Nevertheless, in view of the present status of the law, it is recommended that procedures outlined below be followed when any witness is subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury when it is evident that the inquiry has centered upon him and it appears that the investigation will result in formal charges being lodged against him:

> The "target" witness should be advised
> (1) that he is the "target" of the investigation;
> (2) that the investigation pertains to [relate a specific description of the factual matters involved];
> (3) that the target witness has the right to consult with an attorney;
> (4) that the target witness has the right to refuse to answer any question on the ground that it may tend to incriminate him personally; and
> (5) that, should he answer any questions or make any statements, his responses or statements may be used against him in a court of law.

The "target" witness should respond to each inquiry separately, and finally be asked if he understands that to which he has been advised. See State v. Fary, supra; State v. Sarcone, supra.

A target (at least in those cases where no complaint has been lodged) should be advised as outlined above "on the record" but generally outside the presence of the grand jury. It is further recommended that these advisements be given in the presence of counsel (if the witness has an attorney) and that counsel's presence be noted on the record. Further, it is recommended that, whenever practicable, the target be questioned as to his understanding of the advisements on the record. In addition (or in the alternative when both procedures cannot be followed), a written waiver in the form appended should be executed by the target.

It is not recommended that "target warnings" be repeated in the presence of the grand jury, inasmuch as such a procedure might be considered a communication of the prosecutor's view of what the result of the grand jury investigation should be. Moreover, there appears no reason for such advisements to be repeated in the presence of the grand jury. In short, the target witness has been provided with the alternative courses of action open to him, and he must elect either to waive or claim the privilege against self-incrimination.[3]

Upon a "target" witness claiming the Fifth Amendment privilege, the factual basis for the claim may not be sought by the prosecuting attorney.

3 This recommendation is in no way intended to preclude a prosecutor from reviewing the circumstances surrounding the appearance of the target witness to assure the grand jury that the target is voluntarily appearing with a full understanding of the circumstances of the investigation.

Cross Complainant Witnesses:

In those situations in which potential grand jury witnesses are the subject of cross-complaints arising from the same factual transaction, such persons should be advised of the existence of the criminal complaint and provided, as a courtesy, advisements similar to those given a target. It is recommended that a witness who is the subject of a cross-complaint should be advised of his right to the advice of counsel, that he is the subject of a criminal complaint arising from the same factual transaction to which he is to testify, a description of the nature of the charges lodged against him, and that the witness therefore could incriminate himself by providing testimony to the grand jury. As in the case of target warnings, it is recommended that, whenever practicable, these warnings be given on the record, outside of the presence of the grand jury.

Cross-complaint situations are generally sensitive in nature, involving as they do claims of wrongdoing by both the "victim" and the "culprit." Unfortunately, neither the prosecuting attorney nor the grand jury can always identify the offender before all the facts are presented, and therefore all "witnesses" should be encouraged to testify. At the same time, given the fact that a criminal complaint has been lodged against the "witness," he should not generally be "compelled" to testify. This recommendation should be followed strictly in those situations involving a cross-complaint against a police officer. In short, inasmuch as the prosecuting attorney has the authority by virtue of N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(1), et seq. to compel the testimony of a public officer without court supervision, care should be taken that neither de facto nor statutory immunity results from the grand jury's inquiry.

Public employees (non-target)

Every public officer and employee[4] has the obligation to cooperate and to testify in any investigation pertaining to his public office or employment. However, this obligation cannot circumvent the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

In the case of a non-target public employee, no warnings need be given prior to appearance before or questioning by the grand jury. If a non-target public employee declines, without claim of privilege, to appear or to testify, he is to be handled as any other witness, that is by contempt process pursuant to R. 1:10-1, et seq. Moreover, the public officer or employee is subject to removal from office for his failure, without justification, to cooperate in the investigation. N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(1) et seq.

In order to seek removal for failure to appear or failure to testify, it is necessary that the public employee be advised of the consequences of his decision. See Kugler v. Tiller, 127 N.J.Super. 468 (App.Div. 1974) and discussion infra. In those situations in which the public officer appears but declines to testify, he should be advised on the record of his obligation to

4. The definition of "public employee" is of broad scope.

"For the purposes of this act the term 'public employee' shall mean any person who occupies any office, position or employment in the government of the State of New Jersey, or the several counties and municipalities thereof, or any political subdivision of the State, or a school district, or any special district, or any authority, commission, board, or any branch or agency of the public service. This term shall include, but shall not be limited to, elected and appointed persons." N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a).

testify and the consequence of his refusal. In those situations in which the public employee declines to appear after having been subpoenaed, he should be arrested on a bench warrant duly issued and apart from all other advisements upon his being presented to the court, he should be advised of the consequences of his refusal to appear. If the public employee immediately alters his position and appears to testify, removal proceedings could be foregone. Cf. Hyland v. Smollok, 137 N.J.Super. 456 (App.Div. 1975).

In those situations in which a non-target public employee appears and claims the Fifth Amendment privilege, his public office does not alter his status vis-a-vis the prosecutor's right to challenge the basis for claiming privilege. See discussion on non-target witness, supra.

If the claim of privilege is upheld, the prosecutor must decide (as in the case of a target public employee) whether to "compel" the testimony of the public officer under threat of removal from office. If the prosecutor elects to "compel" the testimony of the public officer, the testimony given will be protected from use or derivative use against that officer in any subsequent criminal prosecution; in effect, the public officer will have been granted use plus fruits immunity.

If the public officer, "compelled" to testify pursuant to N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(1), et seq., persists in his refusal to testify, having been properly warned of the consequences of his refusal, he may be subject to removal from office. N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(3). If the public officer, while testifying, admits the commission of a crime relating to his public position, he is likewise subject to removal. Id. (See appendix for applicable forms).

31-400 O - 78 - pt. 1 - 25

Public employee-target witness

The public employee-target witness situation presents the most complex situation, involving as it does the absolute right of a target to claim privilege and the conflicting obligation of the public officer to cooperate.

The public officer-target should be considered a target first, thereby being warned as described in the "target witness" section. If a waiver of immunity cannot be secured (and after following the procedures for immunity considerations outlined infra), the testimony of the public employee-target can be compelled pursuant to N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(1), et seq., provided the "target-public employee" witness has claimed the Fifth Amendment privilege. The result of such action, that is compelling the public officer to testify, eliminates him as a "target" of the investigation, and immunizes him against the use and derivative use of his testimony. N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(2). Since there is no court supervision, and since the prosecuting attorney need do no more than to ask questions to grant this "immunity," it is absolutely necessary that each prosecutor understand the nature of the statutory provision (N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a)(1), et seq.) and the consequences of his actions.

By recent amendment, the Public Employees Immunity Law reduced the risks of mistake. Now, in order for immunity to result, the public officer must first claim the privilege against self-incrimination, thereby putting the prosecutor on notice that the provisions of the Act may come into play. If the prosecutor persists in asking questions after claim of privilege and responsive answers are given, use plus fruits immunity will result.

The key event in the public employee situation is the officer's claim of privilege. Upon that occurrence (assuming the privilege claim is valid), the prosecutor must elect to immunize the witness or to break off questioning. If the prosecuting attorney elects to continue the inquiry, he must advise the public officer as follows:

1. That he is a public officer or employee within the meaning of N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a) et seq.;
2. That pursuant to that Act, he has the duty to appear and to testify upon matters directly related to the conduct of his public position;
3. That if he fails to appear and to testify, he is subject to removal from office pursuant to that Act;
4. That if he does give testimony pursuant to this inquiry, neither that testimony nor anything derived from that testimony can be used against him in a subsequent criminal prosecution except for perjury or false swearing.

5. That if he declines to provide testimony, in addition to any action the court may take in the nature of contempt, he is subject to removal from office for his refusal to provide testimony pertaining to the conduct of his office; and

6. That if he admits the commission of a misdemeanor or high misdemeanor relating to his public employment, office or position, he is subject to removal from office.

As in the case of target warnings, these advisements should be placed on the record (although there is no reason that this particular proceeding cannot occur in the grand jury). The public officer should be questioned as to his understanding of the advisements and his opportunity to consult with counsel as well. See generally Hyland v. Ranone, 141 N.J.Super. 48 (App.Div. 1976); Hyland v. Smollok, supra; Kugler v. Tiller, supra, and forms appended.

Refusal to Answer Non-Incriminatory Questions or to Respond After Testimony Has Been Compelled

After a witness has unsuccessfully claimed his privilege before the assignment judge he must, upon the urging of the grand jury, answer the questions or face a contempt charge. Likewise, a witness whose testimony has been legally compelled must respond to interrogation or be faced with contempt, assuming this course of action is sanctioned by the grand jury.[5]

There are two distinct ways that the matter of contempt can be approached. The court offended (usually the assignment judge) can bring summary contempt proceedings pursuant to Rule 1:10-2, or the offense can be treated as a common law crime punishable under N.J.S.A. 2A:85-1.

> A contempt, in the court's discretion, may be prosecuted summarily, i. e., without indictment and without trial by jury as provided in R.R. 4:87-1 to 4, or as a crime under N.J.S.A. 2A:85-1. In re Buehrer, 50 N.J. 501, 522 (1967).

If the matter is heard in a summary manner, as should be preferred, there is some question as to procedure to be utilized. The issue is whether the contempt is one considered to be in the presence of the court (R. 1:10-1) or whether the contempt action must be pressed by notice and order to show cause. See R. 1:10-2.

The court in In re Schwartz, 133 N.J.L. 79, 84-85 (Sup.Ct 1945), determined that the grand jury is an arm of the court, that proceedings before it are to be considered as proceedings in court, and that contempts in the presence of the grand jury are to be treated as taking place in the presence of the court. This ruling was overruled by In re Schwartz, 134 N.J.E. 267 (E. & A. 1946), where the court, determining that there was no contempt in that there was no violation of a court order, determined that the contempt, the refusal to answer questions before the grand jury, if it existed, would have been for the disobeyance of a court order and would not have been contempt in the actual presence of the court.

5 It is recommended that in all instances in which a contempt citation is to be sought, the grand jury should affirmatively commission the prosecutor to pursue that particular action against the witness.

Ignoring the decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals, the State Supreme Court in State v. Haines, 18 N.J. 557 (1955), addressing the issue of whether the grand jury is part of the court, quoted, attributing it to the Court of Errors and Appeals, the language in 133 N.J.L. that contempt in the presence of the grand jury is to be treated as taking place in the presence of the court. See also In re Caruba, 139 N.J.Eq. 404 (1947), aff'd 140 N.J.Eq. 563 (1947).

Other cases have, however, cast the foregoing conclusions in doubt. For example, in Swanson v. Swanson, 8 N.J. 169 (1951), the court stated that where the contempt is in facie curiae but depends on proof from persons other than the judge himself, the proceedings for contempt should be by an order to show cause. In In re Finkelstein, 112 N.J.Super. 534 (Ch.Div. 1970), while the court determined that contempt at a court ordered deposition might be contempt in facie curiae, it held that where the proof of the contempt would depend on those attending the deposition, an order to show cause procedure should be followed. See In re Tiene, 17 N.J. 170 (1954) (contempt proceeding for failure to obey court issued subpoena instituted by order to show cause).

The latter view is consistent with the apparent position of the federal courts. In Harris v. United States, 382 U.S. 162 (1965), the court held that prosecutions for contempt for refusing to answer questions before the grand jury were to be prosecutions upon notice and with an opportunity to defend. Cf. U. S. v. Wilson, 421 U.S. 309 (1975). Thus it is recommended that, in those situations in which time is not of the essence, summary contempt be pressed by notice and order to show cause.[6] In those situations having time pressures, it is suggested that the witness be brought before the court directly, that the witness be requested by the court to comply with its previous directive, and that the witnesses's intention be solicited by the court. In developing a record for contempt, it would be most desirable (in addition to the court reporter and the unresponsive answers of the witness being presented to the court) that the court actually conduct the same inquiry in its presence.

6 1. The judge whose order was allegedly breached may not hear the charge unless the witness consents.

2. The contempt process may be instituted only by the court lest a litigant turn it to private gain.

3. Defendant shall be informed plainly whether the proceeding is penal as distinguished from one civil in nature, that is punishment imposed until the party complies with the court's directive.

4. A penal charge may not be tried with a civil contempt unless consented to by the party.

5. A conviction is reviewable upon appeal both upon the law and the facts.

6. There is a presumption of innocence.

7. Charges must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Buehrer, supra; Rule 1:10.

CONSIDERATION TO WITNESSES

The judgments which attend possible grants of immunity and other possible consideration to witnesses are often among the most sensitive and difficult a prosecutor is called upon to make. Great care must be exercised to ensure that rightfully culpable defendants do not escape prosecution and, quite frankly, that third parties are not unjustly accused by an actual or potential defendant who seeks personal exoneration at any cost.

On the other hand, immunity - as a matter of prosecutorial discretion as well as statutory mandate - is a concept of long standing in our jurisprudence and is an important concomitant to Fifth Amendment privileges in the context of the social interest in proper and thorough law enforcement efforts. In short, the concept of immunity provided to the prosecutor a mechanism to obtain evidence that otherwise would not be got:

> "The Fifth Amendment privilege is an exception to the longstanding principle that the public has a right to every man's evidence, a principle which is particularly applicable to grand jury proceedings . . . On occasion, however, immunity provisions have for a considerable period of time filled the need of achieving a further balance - some say implementing the balance - between the individual's right not to provide information incriminatory of himself and society's need for his information to pursue its investigation of the criminal activity of others. The practice of providing immunity > against the use of compelled incriminatory testimony has an unquestioned tradition in English legal history. Certain offenses, such as bribery, are of such a character that the only persons possessing helpful knowledge thereof are oftentimes those who themselves are implicated in the offense. If the investigation of crime is not frustrated in such circumstances, there must be a means of both securing the citizen's privilege against compulsory self-incrimination and obtaining the necessary information." [7]

Ideally, of course, our citizenry should be uniformly forthright and willing to come forward at all times with relevant information, a situation which would of course obviate the need to immunize. Practically speaking, such is obviously not the case. And, as stated above, the nature of many crimes, including the consensual conspiratorial character of criminal conduct in the official corruption and organized crime areas, requires the use of immunity as an investigative tool to identify factually the criminal event and to reach the key participants:

> "One might wish that our society were so structured that the investigation of crime could rely solely upon the wholly voluntary cooperation of citizens. But it is not and has never been. If the grand jury is to perform its historic function of investigating crime and returning only well founded indictments, it must have available to it compulsory process and the testimony of witnesses who sometimes are themselves involved in the matters under inquiry. Increasing the rights of witnesses to > refuse to comply with a grand jury inquiry, whatever the merits of the suggestion, would seriously hamper the grand jury in its investigative efforts."[8]

Likewise, apart from statutory immunity, other forms of favorable consideration to a witness may also be required in the context of a grand jury inquiry. The sensitivity of all such decisions, as well as their effect on any potential prosecution, is apparent. For that reason, standards governing the procedure to be followed and the criteria utilized in reaching these decisions are required.

Procedure

Appended is a memorandum which, once adapted to a particular prosecutor's office, shall be utilized in situations involving immunity or other substantial concessions to a witness in a grand jury context.

I.

With respect to immunity or other substantial concession to a witness, the obtaining of all approvals shown on the face of the memorandum, including the prosecutor or his designee, constitutes a prerequisite to the grant of use plus fruits immunity (both in informal and in the formal statutory situations), de facto transactional immunity, civil considerations or other substantial concessions to a witness for testimony in a grand jury or investigative context. In addition, the procedure shall be pursued prior to seeking the testimony of a public official pursuant to N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17.2(a), et seq., and thus possibly invoking the statutory immunity there conferred. Attached to the memorandum, as noted upon its face, should be a supplemental memorandum giving a brief background of the case listing the names of known and potential defendants and discussing the factors referred to in the section of this Manual dealing with the criteria to be utilized in weighing a decision to grant concessions to a witness.

II.

With respect to an investigative or field attorney's interview of witnesses without prejudice, an informal understanding with the witness that an interview will be conditioned on an agreement by the prosecutor that nothing the witness says or leads therefrom shall be used against him may be made after obtaining oral approval from their immediate superior. No such agreement should be made by investigators or detectives without the approval of the appropriate assistant prosecutor. Such agreements, which shall be as clear and precise as possible in their terms, shall be promptly reduced to writing in the form of a memorandum from the attorney to the section or bureau chief, and a copy of the memorandum shall be included in the case file. Further, such agreements will always be entered into with extreme caution, and within the prosecutor's discretion, only in situations where it appears to the attorney from the information available to him that the witness has valuable information which cannot be obtained from other sources, and where the object of the interview is to obtain facts concerning potential defendants other than the witness himself. In cases of extreme sensitivity or significance, before entering such agreements, the section or bureau chief shall obtain written approval from the prosecutor or his designee in the manner outlined above for other concessions to witnesses.

Criteria for Granting Consideration to a Witness

Granting leniency to an individual in return for his cooperation is a most delicate and complicated matter. The objectives and interests of thorough and diligent law enforcement must always be considered in the context of dealing fairly and justly with actual or potential defendants.

Although the circumstances of each situation differ widely, it is, has been and should be the general policy of the State's prosecutors to give up the least possible consideration in obtaining the cooperation of witnesses. If a witness will testify truthfully with no immunity at all, he should receive none. The question we must always answer is how much, if anything, are we giving up when we immunize such a potential witness and how does it balance against what we can anticipate obtaining in return from the witness. Also to be considered is the effect of any consideration upon the individual as a witness before a jury. Ultimately, a "bargain" should be struck only after all of its implications have been fully assessed.

To understand how immunity can be used in a limited fashion in order to develop an investigation to a point where final judgments can be made, it is necessary to discuss the nature of the following forms of agreement between prosecutor and witness: (1) an informal understanding that an interview will be conditioned on an agreement by the prosecutor that nothing said in the course of the interview will be used against the witness; (2) a formal grant of "use plus fruits" immunity by court order; and (3) a commitment by the State that in addition to "use plus fruits" immunity, some degree of leniency will be shown to the witness in connection with the disposition of a criminal or civil right of action against the witness, or that the witness will be totally insulated from criminal prosecution for the entirety of the criminal episode ("transactional immunity").

The first two categories involve no commitment by the State other than that of the witness's information itself and any leads derived therefrom will not be used against him. Such immunity is not a bar to the prosecution of the witness in the event that evidence derived from sources independent of the witness's statements is developed. The drawback involved, from a prosecutorial standpoint, in using limited immunity is that if and when the witness is subsequently prosecuted, the State must prove that its evidence was derived from an independent source. In re Petition to Compel Testimony of Tusa, 140 N.J.Super. 500 (App.Div.1976), certif. granted -- N.J. -- (1976); Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), 32 L.Ed.2d 212, rehearing den. 408 U.S.931 (1972);

Ziccarelli v. N.J.State Commission of Investigation, 406 U.S. 472, 32 L.Ed. 234 (1972). Additionally, when using use plus fruits immunity, we must avoid compelling the witness to testify before a grand jury which might later indict him for an offense other than perjury or false swearing. Tuso, supra. If proper care is taken in the course of the investigation in anticipation of a subsequent taint hearing, the result of a grant of use plus fruits immunity can be nothing more than the inconvenience of an additional proceeding at the time of trial. The most difficult situation from a judgment standpoint occurs in negotiating some other form of consideration to a potential witness. The alternatives range from an agreement to accept a guilty plea to a reduced charge with no recommendation as to sentencing, to an agreement to dismiss all pending criminal cases and not to institute a civil action against the witness.

It is impossible to set forth a precise formula by which the decision to negotiate immunity is made, but there are certain factors which should be weighed when considering any form of immunity.

1. Can the information be obtained from any source other than a witness who wants to negotiate immunity? It should be understood here that it is our policy never to negotiate any form of actual leniency until we have received and evaluated the information being offered. If a potential witness refuses to disclose his information before such negotiations take place, we should attempt to compel his testimony through statutory forms of immunity or drop our efforts to deal with him.

It should again be stressed that use plus fruits immunity (N.J.S.A. 2A:81-17) should be used cautiously and sparingly, even though from a purely legal standpoint prosecution of the individual would not necessarily be foreclosed. There is no question but that legal difficulties will present themselves (proving independent basis) if prosecution of the witness is pressed, and practical difficulties in the believability of the witness in prosecution against others.

2. How useful is the information for purposes of criminal prosecution? From time to time law enforcement agencies make various kinds of deals with informants to obtain intelligence type information. Such negotiations are not the subject of this memorandum. We are concerned here with the development of admissible evidence which can be corroborated in the context of a grand jury inquiry.

3. What is the likelihood that the witness can successfully be prosecuted? When no case at all exists against the witness, immunity sacrifices only a vague possibility that one might be developed. If there is little chance of a successful prosecution, or if the case against the witness is relatively minor in nature, the State gives up less than it would if the potential prosecution of the potential witness is solid and significant.

4. What is the relative significance of the witness as a potential defendant? Such a witness must be considered in the broadest possible context of his background, power and influence as well as the severity of the offenses committed and the extent of the potential witness's participation in responsibility for them.

5. What is the relative significance of the potential defendant against whom the witness offers to testify? Again, this kind of a judgment should not be made in the narrow confines of the case itself. The defendant's importance must be measured by the seriousness of the social harm which will result from not prosecuting him, thereby leaving him free to exercise his power and influence.

6. What is the value of the testimony of the witness to the case? Where the testimony forms the core evidence upon which the prosecution is based, it is of greater value than testimony which is corroborative or merely cumulative.

7. What impact will immunity - particularly the terms of transactional immunity and consideration in the civil sense - have on the credibility of the witness at trial? The more the State has given up to obtain the testimony, the more likely it is that the witness will not be believed. We should make all judgments on consideration with the realization that any negotiations and the final results thereof must be disclosed. In each case there comes a point at which the terms of the immunity agreement are so favorable to the witness or outrageous to the jury that a jury will not accept the testimony.

8. What impact will immunity - again, particularly the terms of any transactional immunity and civil consideration - have on the prosecutor's personal credibility and that of his office? A prosecutor has an affirmative duty to engage in conduct which will assure the public that his office is being run in a fair and responsible manner. In weighing the relative significance of potential witnesses and targets of investigations, we must avoid even the appearance of making our judgments on the basis of personal or political motives.

Statutory Immunity - Procedure

Inasmuch as use plus derivative use immunity is provided as a prosecutorial tool pursuant to N.J.S.A. 2A:18-17.3, the statutory procedure is recommended for all situations in which "immunity" is either part or all of the consideration given a particular witness.

The Statute specifies that a petition, approved by the Attorney General may be presented to the court for an order compelling the testimony of a particular witness. The petition must set forth the justification for the prosecutor's determination that the witness's testimony ought to be compelled; that is, the witness has knowledge of particularized crimes. (See form of petition, appended).

A prerequisite to the court's compelling the witness's testimony, and as a consequence granting use plus fruits immunity, is the requirement that the witness claim his privilege against self-incrimination (preferably under oath in response to questions before the grand jury). The fact of the witness's claim of privilege and the specific questions to which that claim was asserted should be part of the petition in support of the prosecutor's application.

The petition being in proper form, and approved by the Attorney General, the court generally may not question the decision of the prosecutor to immunize the witness, and therefore must sign the order. (Form appended). In only one instance, In re Tuso, 140 N.J.Super. 500 (App.Div. 1976), appeal pending, has the court denied the prosecutor's application to compel testimony. Tuso involved an attempt to compel the testimony of an individual who was already under indictment for the same transaction in which his testimony was sought.[9]

(See Forms which are reproduced in Appendix - Part I, pp.1a - 9a)

9 Inasmuch as the procedures utilized in Tuso are under review, the precautions which would entitle a prosecutor to attempt such a procedure will be added as a supplement upon the State Supreme Court decidir the issues involved.

THE GRAND JURY SUBPOENA

The Grand Jury is a law enforcement body that is charged with various investigatory and accusatory duties. Likewise, the County Prosecutor, as the Chief law enforcement officer within his respective counties, is charged with the duties, among others, to detect and prosecute violators of the law.[10] Since the Constitution of the State of New Jersey requires that no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense unless indicted by a Grand Jury,[11] the County Prosecutor and the Grand Jury must jointly discharge their responsibilities to the end that justice is done, i. e. to assure that all indictments or presentments are supported by sufficient evidence.[12] Toward that end, the Grand Jury and its legal counsel, the County Prosecutor, has been provided with legal process, that is the grand jury subpoena.

The Issuance of the Grand Jury Subpoena:

The Grand Jury, traditionally and historically, has authority to issue subpoenas to gather evidence and the Prosecutor, to assist the Grand Jury, may issue the Grand Jury's subpoena for evidence gathering purposes.[13] This power to issue the Grand Jury's subpoenas is limited to the Prosecutor and his Assistant Prosecutors. County Detectives or Investigators or Police Officers have no such authority, unless delegated by the Prosecutor. County Investigators or police officers are not to be given blank subpoenas or the authority to issue the same based on their own discretion. In sum, police officers have no authority to issue their own subpoenas except as provided by R. 7:3-3. More importantly, the decision to issue a subpoena, especially a subpoena duces tecum, has legal ramifications that fall within the realm of a prosecutor. As a general proposal, all County Prosecutors should direct that the service of all subpoenas be authorized by a prosecutor. Once the subpoena is authorized by a prosecutor it can be served by the police officer or anyone else eighteen (18) years old or older.

Form of the Subpoena:

The subpoena ad testificandum shall identify the grand jury, the title of the action and shall command the person to whom it is directed to attend and give testimony at the time and place specified therein without prepayment of any witness fee.

[13] In re Addonizio, 53 N.J. 107 (1969)

Generally, the subpoena should specify the name of the defendant or subject under investigation. However, when secrecy so requires it, the subpoena ad testificandum need not identify the subject matter of the testimony sought or identify the cause to which it pertains.[14]

The subpoena duces tecum should follow the same form as the subpoena ad testificandum except the subpoena must indicate, with some degree of specificity, a description of the records sought.[15] The Courts have given wide latitude in compelling production of records covering many years, regardless of any statute of limitations.[16] However the subpoena must be limited in scope, relevant in purpose and specific in directive so that compliance will not be unreasonably burdensome. (See attached form).

Notice Requirements:

The New Jersey Rules of Court do not specify any notice requirements for service of the subpoena. In theory, a subpoena can be served, compelling testimony or production of evidence immediately at the Grand Jury. However the courts do apply the subjective test of reasonableness depending on the nature of the testimony or records sought.[17] In an emergent situation, the Court may well deny a motion to quash a subpoena ad testificandum requiring a witness to testify at Grand Jury with one (1) day notice. However in dealing with the subpoena duces tecum for large quantities of records, the return date of the subpoena should be sufficiently in the future as to give the witness a reasonable time to comply.[18] All subpoenas, whether it be a subpoena ad testificandum or subpoena duces tecum, must be made returnable for a day in which the Grand Jury is actually sitting.

Standards for Issuance of the Subpoena:

The Grand Jury has the duty not only to investigate violations of the law, but also the duty to investigate conditions of public interest even though no violation of a penal statute is, in fact, involved.[19] In order to satisfy this duty, the Grand Jury may investigate and subpoena evidence based upon anonymous charges, rumors or hearsay even though such an investigation will entail a "fishing expedition."[20]

The Subpoena Duces Tecum: What can be subpoenaed:

Generally the subpoena duces tecum is directed to three (3) areas: Municipal records, corporate records and personal papers.

---

[18] State v. Asherman, 91 N.J.Super. 159

[20] Blair v. U. S., 250 U.S. 273 (1918); In re Addonizio, supra.

1. Municipal Records: All municipal records including records of municipal agencies, zoning boards, school boards and the like are subject to subpoena restricted only by the test of reasonableness. These records may be subpoenaed on rumor or suspicion alone, and probably on the ground that the Grand Jury desires to inquire whether the public agency is operating properly. These records can be subpoenaed even though the municipal official to whom the records pertain is the target of the investigation.

2. Corporate Records: Generally, all records of any corporation, including any utility company whether it be a public corporation or closed corporation can be subpoenaed, restricted only by the Fourth Amendment test of reasonableness, even if the corporate official, or the corporation itself, is the target of the investigation.[21] This broad power of process is based on the premise that only natural persons can resist the subpoena of papers and records on the grounds of self incrimination. This rule would apply to subpoenas directed to a corporation in which the target of the investigation is, in effect, the sole owner of the corporation.[22]

3. Personal Records of Target and Non-Target Witnesses: As a general rule, all individuals and the evidence possessed by them are subject to the Grand Jury subpoena unless such testimony or evidence to be produced is protected by the Fourth or Fifth Amendment, or unless otherwise protected by statute or Court Rule.[23]

[21] Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1905)

In dealing more specifically with the subpoena of testimony or documentary evidence from a target witness, such subpoena would likely be subject to a motion to quash because of the Fifth Amendment protection afforded to the target-witness. In other words, a valid subpoena to obtain personal papers or documents in the possession of a defendant or a target-witness probably could not withstand a claim of Fifth Amendment privilege,[24] since the target would be obligated to respond by personal and affirmative action.[25] However, a non target-witness can be compelled to produce his personal records pursuant to a Grand Jury subpoena provided that such records are not personally incriminatory or otherwise not protected by statutory privilege.

4. Personal Papers or Records of a Defendant or Target-Witness that are in the Possession of Another Person: Pursuant to the Fifth Amendment protection, a defendant or target-witness cannot be compelled to testify or produce evidence that would incriminate him. However, once the constitutionally protected evidence is transferred by the defendant or target-witness to another person, these records can be subpoenaed from that other person unless otherwise protected by a statutory privilege.[26] For example, a defendant's incriminatory financial records in his possession are not subject to a subpoena. A search warrant would be needed to obtain these records. However, if the defendant transfers those records or the information contained therein to his bank or broker, the records and the information contained therein can be subpoenaed from that bank or broker.[27]

Subpoena of non-testimonial evidence:

The Grand Jury subpoena can be used to compel a person to appear at the Grand Jury for the purpose of obtaining his fingerprints, voice prints, handwriting examplars and other types of non-testimonial evidence. Such evidence has been regarded as non-testimonial in nature, and therefore not protected by the Fifth Amendment. Likewise, provided that the inquiry is reasonable, the subpoenaed material is not protected by the Fourth Amendment since the subpoena is not a seizure within the scope of the Fourth Amendment.[28]

Voluntary Compliance with a Grand Jury Subpoena In lieu of Actual Appearance at the Grand Jury:

The issuance of the Grand Jury subpoena serves the sole purpose of obtaining evidence for the Grand Jury consideration. Once a subpoena duces tecum is issued, the subpoenaed witness is required to physically appear at the Grand Jury and deliver the requested material. However, especially relating to subpoenas served upon business entities and public agencies, the subpoenaed party often prefers to deliver the subpoenaed material directly to the investigator at time of service, in lieu of actual appearance at the Grand Jury. Such pre-grand jury compliance is permissible.

Use of the "Office Subpoena ad Testificandum":

A prosecutor has no subpoena power to compel a witness to appear at the Prosecutor's Office to elicit testimony.[29] It appears to be improper for a Prosecutor's Office to issue what is commonly known as an "office subpoena" commanding a witness to appear at the prosecutor's office or place other than the grand jury room for the purpose of obtaining his testimony.[30] However, the prosecutor's office should not be discouraged from requesting a witness to appear at the prosecutor's office for an interview in lieu of a grand jury appearance. Nor should the foregoing discourage a prosecutor from pre-grand jury interviews with prospective witnesses. In short, a grand jury subpoena should

---

[29] State v. Eisenstein, supra.

[30] ABA Standards, Section 76 (1970)

be issued only when that prosecutor has a good faith belief that the particular witness could be of some assistance to the grand jury's inquiry.

THE SUBPOENA OF OUT OF STATE WITNESSES

Occasionally cases arise in which a vital state's witness resides outside the State of New Jersey.

If Grand Jury testimony is required from such a witness, two (2) procedures may be utilized. Firstly, a subpoena should be mailed to the non-resident witness directing his appearance at the Grand Jury session. However, the mailing of a subpoena to a witness who is residing in another state is nothing more than a request for that witness to voluntarily return to the State of New Jersey to testify. No sanction can be imposed upon that witness for failure to appear. If the witness declines to honor the subpoena, the prosecutor may, of course, resort to utilization of the Uniform Act to secure the attendance of a witness from without a State in criminal proceedings.

Pursuant to N.J.S. 2A:81-20, The Uniform Witness Act provides:

> 1. If a person in any state, which by its laws has made provision for commanding persons within its borders to attend and testify in criminal prosecutions, or grand jury investigations commenced or about to > commence, in this state, is a material witness in a prosecution pending in a court of record in this state, or in a grand jury investigation which has commenced or is about to commence, a judge of such court may issue a certificate under the seal of the court stating these facts and specifying the number of days the witness will be required. Said certificate may include a recommendation that the witness be taken into immediate custody and delivered to an officer of this state to assure his attendance in this state. This certificate shall be presented to a judge of a court of record in the county in which the witness is found.

> If the witness is summoned to attend and testify in this state he shall be tendered the sum of 10 cents a mile for each mile by the ordinary traveled route to and from the court where the prosecution is pending, and $5 for each day that he is required to travel and attend as a witness. A witness who has appeared in accordance with the provisions of the summons shall not be required to remain within this state a longer period of time than the period mentioned in the certificate, unless otherwise ordered by the court. If such witness, after coming into this State, fails without good cause to attend and testify as directed in the summons, he shall be punished in the manner provided for the punishment of any witness who disobeys a summons issued from a court of record in this State.

Pursuant to this Act, if a material witness, who is presently residing in another state, refuses to return to New Jersey to testify, he can be compelled to do so, provided that that sister state is a signatory of the Uniform Act.[31]

Procedure: Once the decision is made to compel the appearance of an out-of-state resident, the Assistant Prosecutor

31 The Uniform Act to secure witnesses has been adopted in 47 states as well as in the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Panama Canal Zone and the Virgin Islands. Only Alabama, Iowa and Georgia have declined to adopt the Uniform Act.

must prepare a petition outlining the nature of testimony sought from the witness with a showing of the materiality of this testimony. A certification must also be prepared and signed by the Judge. This certification is simply a determination made by the Court from the petition that the out-of-state resident is a material witness in a pending Grand Jury matter. Once the court signs the certification,a certificate must be obtained from the County Clerk stating that the Judge signing the certification is a Judge of a court of general jurisdiction and entitled to try indictments.

These three (3) documents, that is, the petition, the Court certification and the affidavit of the County Clerk should be forwarded to the prosecuting authority of the county in the State where the witness is to be found, along with the appropriate fee as specified by Statute. An order to show cause will be issued by the court of that foreign jurisdiction compelling the witness to appear before that court for a hearing. At this hearing, if the court finds that the testimony to be sought is material, the court will order that witness to return to New Jersey to testify.

PRESS GUIDELINES

Freedom of the press and the right to a fair trial are fundamental, but sometimes are in collision. It is incumbent upon a prosecutor not only to maintain the rights of individuals involved in the criminal process of the State, but to also fully inform the public concerning the operation of law enforcement agencies and the dispensation of criminal justice. In the course of a criminal proceeding, however, an effort to satisfy both duties must give rise to a dilemma: The release of certain information may tend to impair a defendant's ability to receive a fair trial, while the withholding of that same information may seemingly deny to the public its "right to know," and to some extent the full satisfaction of its First Amendment free speech and free press rights. The guidelines set forth below are intended to assure a fair accommodation of both interests and to satisfactorily resolve most free speech/fair trial problems which may confront a prosecutor. These guidelines are based in part on a Statement of Principles and Guidelines for the Reporting of Criminal Procedures, as adopted by the New Jersey Supreme Court in March, 1972.

1. The following information should be made available for the use of the press upon the return of an indictment:

(a) Background information concerning the defendant, such as his name, age, residence, occupation, marital status and so forth.

(b) The text of the indictment or complaint.

(c) Identification of the investigating and arresting agency and personnel and the length of the investigation.

(d) Circumstances immediately surrounding the arrest, including but not limited to the time and place of arrest; resistance, if any; pursuit; possession, nature and use of weapons and ammunition by the suspect and police.

(e) Circumstances surrounding bail, whether it was set, whether it was posted and the amount.

2. Publication of the following items of information may jeopardize a defendant's right to a fair trial and should not, therefore, be released to the press:

(a) Statements regarding the existence, nonexistence or progress of an investigation. Obviously, this policy should be flexible and the public should, in certain instances, be given such information. However, as noted at page 58, the prosecutor should establish internal controls in his office to ensure that decisions with respect to the release of such information are to be made by him or his designee.

(b) Opinions concerning a defendant's guilt or innocence.

(c) Admissions, confessions or statements attributable to the defendant, or his refusal to provide the same.

(d) The defendant's record of prior arrests and/or convictions.

(e) References to the use of certain investigative procedures such as fingerprints; polygraph, ballistics or laboratory tests; wiretaps or electronic surveillance. No information should be released concerning a defendant's refusal to participate in any such tests.

(f) Statements concerning the credibility or anticipated testimony of prospective witnesses.

(g) Opinions concerning evidence or argument in the case whether or not it is anticipated that such evidence or argument will be used at trial.

(h) The possibility of a plea of guilty to the charged offense or to a lesser offense, or other disposition.

3. Where publication of the identity of the victim would be embarrassing or demeaning to that person, it is recommended that such information not be released. (The rationale here, of course, has nothing to do with the possible impairment of a fair trial, but arises out of consideration for victims of certain crimes, such as rape or other sexual offenses.)

4. During the course of an ongoing grand jury investigation, no information concerning the grand jury proceedings should be released to the press. R. 3:6-7 requires that all grand jury proceedings remain secret. All persons other than witnesses are required to take an oath of secrecy as a condition to their admission to a grand jury session. Four basic reasons have been set forth as grounds for this requirement of secrecy: (1) to prevent the escape of persons under investigation (2) to prevent tampering with witnesses (3) to insure deliberative freedom for the grand jury (4) to protect the reputation of an accused who is ultimately not indicted. State v. Clement, 40 N.J. 139 (1963).

5. Photographing a Defendant

The photographing of suspects or defendants when they are in public places should be neither encouraged nor discouraged. In no event should an accused be photographed in a posed position. Photographing of a defendant in places where the general public has no right of free access should not be permitted (i. e. inside the police station, a lock-up or jail).

If it is deemed necessary to place a defendant or suspect under physical restraint, such as handcuffs, these restraints need not be removed or concealed from view simply because photographs may be taken. (The New Jersey Supreme Court has suggested that prior to conviction, except at the time of arrest, the press should not publish any photographs of a defendant in handcuffs or under restraint. Guidelines with Regard to Photographing of Court Proceedings, approved by the Supreme Court September 5, 1968.)

91-400 O - 78 - pt. 1 - 27

6. Photographing evidence

(a) Displayed evidence. To the extent that the above guidelines permit the release of a verbal description of a given item of demonstrative evidence, then the display of that evidence for the purpose of photographing by the press is also permitted. Since the manner in which such evidence is displayed could tend to prejudice a defendant, it is recommended that this practice be employed on a very limited basis and be confined to those situations where there is a public interest to be served. When a display is made, the utmost care should be taken so that it is not done in a way that would tend to be prejudicial to the defendant. In no event should the defendant be photographed in the presence of displayed evidence.

(b) Crime scene. It is recommended that representatives of the press be kept out of restricted crime scene areas to the same extent that members of the general public are so restricted. If a press photographer is in an area which is not restricted to the public he should be neither encouraged nor discouraged from taking photographs. In no event should evidence be displayed at a crime scene for the purpose of photographing by the press.

Each office should establish internal controls governing release of information to the media. As a general rule, all releases of information to the media should be made by, or approved in advance, by the County Prosecutor or his designee, unless a particular release is permitted by someone else by specific office policy.

CASE PREPARATION

I. Introduction

When a criminal complaint or investigation is referred to the Prosecutor, he must decide its future course in the criminal process. It is essential in this screening process that the Prosecutor have all information relevant to determining the proper course to be followed.

Certain cases may be susceptible to disposition prior to grand jury presentation by early plea negotiations, referral to municipal courts, or by resort to pretrial intervention programs. Many of the matters referred to the Prosecutor will, however, be presented to the grand jury for its determination as to whether or not an indictment should be returned. Therefore, it is most important that the Prosecutor employ appropriate procedures to ensure that he has a complete file prior to presentation of the matter to the grand jury.

In many Prosecutor's Offices, Detectives or Investigators are assigned the task of "working the case up for grand jury," and they therefore have the responsibility for the completeness of the file. After the case is "worked up" by an Investigator or Detective it should be reviewed by an Assistant Prosecutor for a determination as to whether the matter is "ready" for grand jury presentation. In short, it is the responsibility of the Prosecutor in every case to assure an investigative file is complete.

The materials discussed in this segment of the manual deal with the suggested preparation of files for grand jury presentation.

II. Checklist of materials which generally should be in an investigative file prior to grand jury presentation:

1. Complaint
2. Police reports (including incident, arrest and investigative reports)
3. Witnesses' statements
4. Rap sheets (State and Federal)
5. Certified or exemplified copies of conviction
6. Scientific reports
   (a) Firearms, drugs, or other laboratory reports
   (b) Handwriting reports
   (c) Fingerprint reports
7. Search warrants, affidavits and inventory returns
8. Business records or official certifications
9. Medical reports
10. Photographs or other types of demonstrative evidence and an indication of the witnesses necessary to identify same
11. Statements made by the defendant and police reports concerning the circumstances surrounding the making of that statement

12. Reports and documents (photographs, transcripts, etc.) concerning any pretrial identification made of the defendant

13. Evidence report (a complete inventory including the location of all evidence and the persons involved in the chain of evidence)

14. A list of potential witnesses including their date of birth, sex, residence, business, and telephone numbers

15. A summary of the case prepared by a Prosecutor's Office Detective or Investigator

16. Preliminary hearing transcript

17. Legal analysis by reviewing assistant prosecutor

18. Correspondence section (kept in chronological order).

III. Suggested procedures for preparation of grand jury files.

1. A check list should be kept in or on the file.

2. The grand jury investigator should check with the local police departments and other agencies to make sure he has all reports and witnesses' statements. (This procedure should be continually updated. It may include having the actual police file brought down to the prosecutor's office for examination and comparison with the items on file in the prosecutor's office.) It is suggested that a case transmittal form, such as the UCP-D9, used in Union County, be utilized to ensure that the necessary items in each case are forwarded to the prosecutor's office by the local police department for grand jury presentation. (See form number 3.)

3. The files should be properly docketed with notations as to the bail, plea, defense counsel's name, and other items including whether there are other codefendants or additional charges pending against the defendant. One file should contain all items involved in a single case. Therefore, if there are codefendants involved in a transaction, their files or matters should be included in the same file. If there are juveniles charged as codefendants, both the adult and juvenile files should be cross-referenced to reflect this. All charges which may be the subject of the mandatory joinder rule under State v. Gregory, 65 N. J. 510 (1975), should also be handled in one case file.

In reviewing the file, the assistant prosecutor should make a complete legal analysis of the operative facts and the relevant statutes, and determine the charges which should be included in the grand jury presentation. The grand jury investigator should prepare a list of witnesses, as well as other documents or exhibits that should be presented to the grand jury.

Whenever possible, the assistant prosecutor presenting the matter to the grand jury should speak personally with witnesses prior to their testimony, and review with them their previous statements and reports.

The following are forms that can be utilized to prepare the case files for presentation to the grand jury:

Form 1: Investigation check list

Form 2: Request to local police for transmittal of their investigative file to the Prosecutor's Office

Form 3: Transmittal from the local police of their investigative file

Form 4: Request for State rap sheet

EVIDENCE BEFORE THE GRAND JURY

As a general rule, presentation of inadmissible or even illegally obtained evidence procured in violation of an individual's constitutional rights before a grand jury does not serve to vitiate the resulting indictment.[32] In most jurisdictions, including New Jersey, the grand jury is not limited to receiving evidence admissible at trial.[33] And for the most part, the

---

32 See e. g., United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 343 (1974); United States v. Blue, 384 U.S. 251 (1966); Lawn v. United States, 355 U.S. 339 (1958); Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1966); Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 24 (1910). One line of cases, however, has indicated that where a target of an investigation is compelled to give incriminating evidence before a grand jury, that same grand jury cannot permissibly indict for the offenses to which he has confessed. See e.g., Goldberg v. United States, 472 F.2d 513, 516 (2 Cir. 1973); Jones v. United States, 342 F.2d 863 (D.C.Cir. 1964); United States v. Tane, 329 F.2d 848 (2 Cir. 1964); United States v. Lawn, 115 F.Supp. 674 (S.D.N.Y. 1953), appeal dismissed sub nom United States v. Roth, 208 F.2d 467 (2 Cir. 1953). For example, the court in Goldberg v. United States, supra, observed that an indictment might be invalid if returned by the same grand jury before whom a defendant was compelled to testify against himself under a grant of immunity, and who actually testified as to incriminating matters. The court applied the rationale of Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968), to the grand jury setting in finding that under such circumstances "it would be well nigh impossible for the grand jurors to put [defendant's] answers out of their minds." Thus, the very testimony which was compelled by the grant of immunity might be used against him by the grand jury. Goldberg v. United States, supra at 516.

33 See e.g., State v. Chandler, 98 N.J.Super. 241 (Cty.Ct. 1967); see also State v. Ferrante, 111 N.J.Super. 99 (App.Div. 1970); State v. Garrison, 130 N.J.L. 350 (S.Ct. 1943); State v. Donovan, 129 N.J.L. 478 (S.Ct. 1943); State v. Ellenstein, 121 N.J.L. 304 (Sup.Ct. 1938); State v. Dayton, 23 N.J.L. 49 (S.Ct. 1850).

competency of evidence presented to the grand jury may not be the subject of judicial inquiry.[34]

The reason for the rule is obvious. Traditionally, the grand jury "has been accorded wide latitude to inquire into violations of [the] criminal law."[35] "It is a grand inquest, a body with powers of investigation, the scope of whose inquiries is not to be limited . . . by doubts whether any particular individual will be found properly subject to an accusation of crime.'[36] It has been recognized that "the grand jury's investigative power must be broad if its public responsibility is adequately to be discharged."[37] Significantly, the grand jury is not "an officious meddler,"[38] for its investigatory function "is not fully carried out until every available clue has been run down and all witnesses examined in every proper way to find if a crime has been committed."[39] "Such an investigation may be triggered by tips, rumors, evidence proffered by the prosecutor, or the personal knowledge of the grand jurors."[40]

[40] Branzburg v. Hayes, supra at 701.

One caveat is plainly in order. The policy prohibiting dismissal of an indictment by virtue of the introduction of inadmissible evidence does not apply to what has been characterized as "grand jury misconduct." Our courts have held that "in order to promote the purity of the administration of justice and for greater security of the citizen,"[41] an indictment may be quashed by virtue of misconduct by the grand jury. Misconduct occurs when the grand jury "indifferently and openly without having some evidence,"[42] brings charges against an individual by returning an indictment. However, an indictment will not be dismissed as long as some legal evidence was presented which supports the charges.[43]

What has been said thus far should not be construed as a blanket endorsement of a policy permitting prosecutors to utilize incompetent and inadmissible evidence in grand jury proceedings. While it is true that reception of inadmissible evidence by the grand jury does not serve to vitiate a resulting indictment, it is a far different thing to suggest that prosecutors are not subject to any restraints in this regard. The American Bar Association Project on Standards for Criminal Justice has provided:

> A prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial. However, in

---

41 State v. Dayton, supra at 88.

42 State v. Donovan, supra at 479.

43 State v. Smith, supra at 343.

> appropriate cases the prosecutor may present witnesses to summarize admissible evidence available to him which he believes he will be able to present at trial[44]

In the accompanying commentary, the Bar Association noted that "as a general principle, the use of secondary evidence before a grand jury should be avoidad unless there are cogent reasons justifying" such a practice. For example, the need to use a summary of available evidence may arise "in cases involving voluminous records or where an absent witness has given a written statement but is not available at the time and circumstances justify prompt grand jury action." So too, the Bar Association advocates the use of hearsay evidence "where the victim of a criminal act is seriously injured and therefore is unavailable. . . ." Another example set forth in the commentary is "where the safety of an important witness reasonably warrants that his identity remain covert." In such a case, the witness's statements, if sufficiently detailed, can be presented to the grand jury.

The American Law Institute has adopted a similar approach in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure.[45]

---

[44] American Bar Association Project on Standards for Criminal Justice, Standard Relating to the Prosecution Function (Tent. draft 1971).

[45] Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure, §330.4(4), §330.5.

Under the Code, prosecutors may present "secondary" evidence only where the opposite course would impose an unreasonable burden on one of the parties or on a witness.

In a similar vein, the California Penal Code provides that "the grand jury shall receive none but evidence that would be admissible over objection at the trial of the criminal action . . ."[46] However, the mere fact that "evidence which would have been excluded at trial was received by the grand jury does not render the indictment void" where sufficient competent proofs were also presented. Other jurisdictions have adopted similar statutes and rules.[47]

We recommend that prosecutors should, as a general rule, seek to present only admissible evidence to the grand jury. Incompetent and also illegal evidence should not be presented to the grand jury. So too, as a general rule, evidentiary privileges should be honored and not violated at the grand jury stage of proceedings. Where a privilege is personal to a defendant or the target of an investigation and that individual has the right to claim the privilege, it can be assumed that the individual will exercise the privilege. In all other instances where the privilege is not personal, consideration should be given to the nature of the privilege, the individual who has a right to exercise it and other surrounding circumstances.

46 Cal. Pen. Code 939.6(b).

47 See, e.g., Alaska Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 6(r); Nev. Rev. Stat. §172.135(2).

Failure to observe evidentiary controls results in unnecessary trials and permits improper rummaging into the personal lives of witnesses. Further, a wrongful indictment is "no laughing matter," for it indelibly stains the reputation of the accused. Nevertheless, the nature of the grand jury process also suggests that some exceptions be made to the policy requiring that only admissible evidence be presented to the grand jury. For example, investigative grand juries must often sift through all available clues to determine whether a crime has been committed. It would be unwise to restrict the scope of the grand juries' inquires by requiring that only competent, admissible evidence be received. So too, expert reports may often be presented to the grand jury in the interest of economy. Ordinarily where an expert would merely testify as to the contents of his report, his presence before the grand jury would not be needed. It seems only fair, however, that the prosecution clearly inform the grand jury of the availability of better or firsthand evidence so that it can, if it wishes, request presentation of such proofs.

POST-INDICTMENT PROCEDURE

Upon the return of a "True Bill" by the grand jury, the indictment must be presented in open court to the Assignment Judge or to any other judge authorized by R. 3:6-8(a) to receive indictments. Such action must be taken in the presence of at least twelve members of the grand jury.

The indictment itself, and all related papers, must be entitled in the Superior Court. The indictment is sufficient if it consists simply of a written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, a citation to the specific statute or statutes allegedly violated, and concludes with the words "against the peace of this State, the government and dignity of the same." Each indictment must be signed by the prosecuting attorney and endorsed as a true bill by the foreman (or, in his absence, by the deputy foreman). R. 3:7-3.

If, at the time the indictment is presented, a defendant named therein is not yet under bail, the county clerk must issue a warrant unless requested by the prosecutor to issue a summons instead. R. 3:7-8. In order to ensure that the State Bureau of Identification is able to maintain a complete record concerning all persons charged with indictable offenses, it is recommended that all indicted defendants who are not yet under bail be processed, that is photographed and fingerprinted.[48] If prior agreement for processing with a defendant or counsel exists, a summons may be used for sake of convenience.

[48] Upon the arrest of a person for an indictable offense, all law enforcement officers are required to fingerprint that person and forward copies of those prints along with photographs, other identifying data and a history of the charged offense to the State Bureau of Identification. N.J.S. 53:1-15.

Signature of Assistant Prosecutor:_____

Mr. DEL TUFO. Let me thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today, on both my own behalf and on behalf of Attorney General Hyland. In New Jersey, as in the Federal system, the attorney general has broad supervisory responsibilities over the operations of prosecutorial agencies.

I might say in passing that New Jersey has one of the most extensive legislative delegations of criminal justice authority in the country. We have, within the division of criminal justice, approximately 100 attorneys and some 50 investigators. In addition, we have the division of State police, which is another arm of the attorney general's office, to use in an investigative capacity. We have units which investigate white collar crime, drug offenses, organized crime activities, antitrust matters, and which present cases to State grand juries.

In addition to that, have supervisory responsibility over the operation of the 21 county prosecutor's offices. Over the past years, the attorney general has promulgated standards to govern the conduct of county prosecutors and other law enforcement officers in a variety of areas, including that of grand jury practice.

The grand jury manual, which you have, was commissioned by Attorney General Hyland and myself in an effort to compile and codify uniform standards of professional prosecutorial responsibility throughout the State. It was put together by a task force composed of representatives of our office and the various county prosecutors. It now governs grand jury presentations and related matters by county prosecutors, and by our office, in presentations to the State grand jury and in every other grand jury in the State of New Jersey.

The manual, I believe, is an important and significant achievement. In terms of my appearance here today, I believe it is relevant in many respects to the issues before us. First of all, the substantive aspects of the manual demand attention because they deal, I feel, in a positive, fair way with many areas of consequence. I am talking, for example, about grand jury orientation, the prosecutor's role before the grand jury, the rights and duties of both regular witnesses and targets, standards for determining whether or not immunity should be employed, guidelines for dealing with the media, preparation of cases for grand jury presentation, and post-indictment procedures.

The administrative approach to the subject matter, which is pursued in New Jersey under the same type of supervising authority that the U.S. Attorney General has over U.S. attorneys, provides the flexibility necessary to deal with changing circumstances and with changing judicial precendent.

Beyond this, I think the manual demonstrates that responsible regulatory control of grand jury matters can come from the law enforcement community itself in a manner which recognizes and seeks to protect individual rights, yet which preserves the investigative and other tools which are so necessary to successful criminal prosecution.

On this latter score, I believe we must bear foremost in our minds that criminal enterprise must be countered effectively, and that we must maintain a viable prosecutorial presence in order to do so. If we were to strip away the resources of the grand jury from the prosecutor, either by encumbering its investigations with time-consuming ancillary court proceedings, or by turning the grand jury itself into an adversary proceeding, society would be left vulnerable to the most sophisticated criminal activity.

For example, no technique is as essential in combating organized crime as a grand jury investigation. By operating in secrecy for the protection of witnesses and to guard against perjured testimony and fabricated defenses, grand juries have been able to penetrate deeply into the activities of organized crime. We must recognize that in dealing with such societal problems we are met with carefully structured criminal groups which receive excellent legal advice and are designed to insulate those in control from detection and prosecution.

An imaginative and determined prosecutor, with sufficient resources can be successful in overcoming these obstacles without abusing the rights of those who are targets of or who appear before the grand jury.

In this connection, I would emphasize to you the need to avoid the pitfalls of distrust. I have detected an unfortunate distrust in some areas, or a lack of confidence, I imagine is a better phrase, in executive officers entrusted with the enforcement of the criminal laws, a situation which may very well be a reaction to specific instances of arrogant grand jury misuse which occurred several years ago.

However, we should be careful to avoid an overreaction to specific past abuses in a way which unduly hampers efficient, fair law enforcement efforts in the future. We have viable institutions for the fair administration of the Criminal Justice System. We must, of course, jealously guard those institutions and make changes in a sensible way when circumstances warrant. But we must, I believe, also trust in those charged with the responsibility for operation of the system since, by and large, our Nation's prosecutorial officers are dedicated public servants who discharge their ethical duties to see that justice is done, and in the last analysis, any system is only as good or effective as those who run it.

In essence, then, I call for a balanced judgment and approach, one which seeks to regulate in an atmosphere of confidence, one which seeks reform in a manner not destructive of the prosecutor's ability to perform properly and effectively, and one which recognizes the flexibility and other advantages of an administrative as opposed to a legislative approach to regulations in many areas.

Turning to H.R. 94 itself, I shall comment only briefly about certain of its most salient features, in view of the time constraints, and in view of the more extensive discussion which is contained in the prepared statement itself.

First of all on immunity. Transactional immunity, in our judgment, goes well beyond the protection required by the fifth amendment and could lead to possible undesirable results. One consequence, possible consequence, is the prospect of criminal conduct going unpunished—either that of the immunized witness or that of the target of the sought-after testimony. Regardless of the burden upon the prosecution to show the insulation of evidence, that it was not derived from the mouth of the witness who was given immunity, we favor retention of use immunity. This approach permits law enforcement to function properly while at the same time does adequately and constitutionally protect individual rights.

In a decision, the question of whether or not to immunize a witness is truly an executive judgment and should remain as such. Many delicate prosecutorial factors must be weighed in reaching a decision on this score and fall within the executive domain outside the traditional role of the judiciary. For that matter, from a practical resource standpoint, involving the courts in judgments of this sort at this stage in criminal proceedings would overly strain judicial resources, and in the bargain, would bring grand jury proceedings to a standstill to the prejudice of the prosecutorial effort.

I wholeheartedly agree with Judge Lacey's comments this morning on the strain on judicial resources which ancillary proceedings of this type would cause.

Second, on the subject of rights of witnesses and suspects, as the discussion in the formal statement which has been made part of the record suggests, different regulations should be promulgated for witnesses not suspected of criminal activity and for targets of a grand jury investigation. In both instances the regulation should be meaningful without being unnecessarily burdensome, such as requiring a variety of notices upon the service of the subpena and without carrying the extreme penalty of the dismissal of the indictment for good faith violations.

One of the best examples of the differences noted, which I have just noted between targets and other witnesses, lies in advice concerning the privilege against self-incrimination. A witness not suspected of criminal wrongdoing who is called before a grand jury to give evidence should not, under usual circumstances, be advised of his rights because, really, in the general run of things, there is no reason to do so. Should he register a fifth amendment claim during the course of the examination, the prosecutor should have an opportunity to explore the basis for the assertion to ascertain its legitimacy before reaching the question of whether or not to confer immunity.

This is why H.R. 94's reference to a conferment of immunity immediately upon a claim of fifth amendment rights is too broad. There are many situations in which witnesses assert fifth amendments rights when they have no right to do so. In those cases, they are brought before a judge who makes that judgment. I am talking about regular witnesses who are subpoenaed before a grand jury, or who appear before a grand jury.

Target witnesses, as we call them in New Jersey, or punitive defendants, as I believe is the Federal term, should have different treatment. They should be advised of their rights. They should be advised of their status as possible punitive defendants. All of these things should take place outside the presence of the grand jury. If a fifth amendment claim is asserted by a target witness, that is the end of it. He is not called before the grand jury, and there is no more, no further dealings with him by the prosecution.

Finally, we disagree with the proposition that counsel for witnesses should be allowed in a grand jury room. Such a practice could be disruptive, and I don't believe it would necessarily be conducive to the proper discharge of its functions, the grand jury functions. There has been a lot of discussion about that this morning, and I certainly subscribe to some of the reasons that have come forward.

On the subject of evidence, we agree that generally only competent evidence should be presented to a grand jury with the reasonable and pragmatic exceptions to that rule as are more particularly discussed in the statement which has been submitted to you. The prosecutor should also most certainly present to the grand jury evidence which tends to exonerate a criminal defendant. The requirement should be stated in that fashion, however, and not in terms of an obligation to present all exculpatory evidence.

We have also heard a lot about this, this morning. But what is or is not exculpatory in character is often a very subjective, ambiguous question, and one more for a defense attorney and a prosecutor to decide.

In addition, a requirement to present evidence which might be exculpatory but would not tend to exonerate a criminal defendant really would serve no useful purpose, and would only tend to unduly protract grand jury proceedings.

If I may digress just for a second—I am almost finished with these remarks, but I am going to talk about discovery.

I think at this point I should also say that the answer to any number of concerns that were registered on both sides of the table this morning may be broad discovery rules which permit a criminal defendant to examine the prosecutor's file. I think that removes a many concerns about preliminary hearings and being able to evaluate the evidence.

Discovery also touches upon evidence which may be exculpatory but which does not tend to exonerate the defendant. At least the defendant, if there is anything in there, in the prosecutor's file, will know about it.

In addition, I suggest to you that the grand jury stage of proceedings is not the stage upon which to embark upon a determination as to whether or not evidence has been improperly obtained in violation of constitutionally or statutorially assured rights, such as evidence seized by virtue of a possible illegal search and seizure. Such questions are often complex and require extended judicial proceedings for determination. To pursue them at the grand jury stage could lead to unwarranted and unconscionable delay in investigative efforts, and perhaps unnecessarily deplete judicial resources as, for example, in situations in which an indictment is not returned by a grand jury.

I note here also that the remedy of dismissal of the indictment for a possible violation is far too extreme a remedy.

On the question of discovery, we believe discovery should go beyond that called for in H.R. 94. Each defendant after indictment should receive a copy of all grand jury minutes other than matters relating to deliberations of the grand jury, as soon after the indictment is handed up as possible. We also believe defendants should have broad rights to examine all materials in the prosecutor's file. It has been our experience in New Jersey that in criminal as in civil causes, disclosure of all relevant information promotes the proper administration of Justice.

As I mentioned to you before, this type of disclosure, discovery, would obviate the mandatory call for preliminary hearing set forth in H.R. 94 to the extent that it is suggested that it be there for discovery purposes. I believe in the explanation of H.R. 94 that particular reasoning is set forth.

On a miscellaneous basis, we favor retention of the present size of the grand jury, retention of summary contempt procedure in order to maintain a flexible posture and to deal with things as circumstances may require, and retention of the concept of a term of contempt incarceration which is limited only by its coersive effectiveness and not by some arbitrary figure.

In conclusion then, let me say that, as I have noted, both Attorney General Hyland and myself agree with many of the proposals contained in H.R. 94. We are opposed to those which would unduly impede the law enforcement effort, and which are largely unnecessary, in our judgment, from a practical standpoint, for the protection of individual rights.

We call for the trust and confidence which a free society must impose in its executive officers, and we urge upon you recognition of the advantages of achieving reform administratively under the Federal Attorney General's supervisory power over U.S. attorneys. On this score, we again call attention to the New Jersey experience and the fairness and effectiveness of the system which is now in operation in that State.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much for your very extensive statement. You have put a great deal of effort into this.

I would reply to your last comment, and I do not mean this in a personal sense or personal attack, but the last Attorney General did not agree with any idea of internal reform or any reform of any kind, sitting at that table. So that while that is a possibility, depending upon the person who is in charge of the Justice Department, it certainly was not possible until 1977. if then.

Mr. DEL TUFO. I don't think I am—well, I understand what you are saying. I am not breaching any confidences, I don't think, but in the context of coming here this morning to talk to you about grand juries and to suggest some type of administrative approach to reform, I did make a contact with the U.S. Attorney General's Office at a responsible level, and I believe that you will find that the present Attorney General and his Assistant in charge of the Criminal Division are most interested in the subject matter of grand jury reform, are meeting with U.S. attorneys to come up with suggestions, and are most amenable to the idea of exercising Attorney General supervisory powers over U.S. attorneys to do so.

Mr. EILBERG. I am very glad to hear that.

Just a few questions because of the constraints of time, as you have pointed out. This is a subject we could spend many, many days on and still not arrive at consensus, but just a few questions.

You state that absent some compelling justification only competent and admissible evidence should be presented to a grand jury. What would be such compelling justifications?

Mr. DEL TUFO. I think all that I refer to in making that statement, and I believe I set forth in the lengthy statement of the Attorney General and myself, I am really making reference to the ABA standards more than anything else. In other words, you may have a situation where there are voluminous records, and it would seem in the interest of everybody's time and expediency without in any way prejudicing someone that those records should be summarized rather than spending a great deal of time going through them individually; or there might be a situation where it is in the best interest of a particular witness not to appear and there might be some reliance on some hearsay testimony; or there might be an instance of summarization.

But it is essentially the type of thing that is recommended by the American Bar Association in those standards governing criminal justice administration.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose dismissals for violation involving evidence which is not competent. What should be the remedy for presenting incompetent or inadmissible evidence?

Mr. DEL TUFO. As long as there is—we are talking about the handing up of a criminal charge and the processing of a criminal proceeding. If there is sufficient competent evidence presented to a grand jury upon which an indictment is based, the fact that there incidentally might be some incompetent evidence should not result in the dismissal of the indictment.

As to how we deal with presentation to grand juries on the type and quality of information that is presented to them, I think that is best handled, again, by the administrative supervisory control over the actions of the prosecutorial authorities by the U.S. Attorney General in the Federal system, in a manner akin to what we are doing in the State system in New Jersey.

Mr. EILBERG. You oppose proposals allowing only consensual immunity and requiring the jurors to vote on immunity grants. I share your concerns and provide only in my bill for judicial approval with standards; yet, you oppose this, as well. If the grand jury is, in fact, an arm of the court and not the prosecutor, why should not the court determine not who should be immunized, but whether established standards have been followed?

Mr. DEL TUFO. There are two reasons. I think one has to do with the concept of divisions of responsibility in our Government between different branches of government. I am thinking at this point of the executive and judicial. I am also thinking from a pragmatic standpoint of the need to have grand jury investigations, the investigative process, proceed with dispatch so that the grand jury can accomplish its work, especially in organized crime situations, and with the demands upon existing judicial resources. All of our resources are finite, and we have to use them to the best advantage.

Now, first of all, on the first point, whether or not to prosecute, whether or not to launch a criminal proceeding, whether or not to proceed, are traditionally prosecutional, executive types of judgments. They involve many factors that have to be evaluated and balanced, many delicate factors. It is not lightly that a prosecutor decides that he is not going to pursue a case against someone or he is going to seek his cooperation. He must take into account any number of things. For example, questions include: Can this type of information be secured from another source? What is the relative culpability of this particular defendant? What is the quality of the information that this defendant might offer, and against whom would it be offered in terms of societal values? What will be the public reaction to immunization in a certain case, because public confidence in the proper running of prosecutorial offices is of utmost importance.

All of these things must go through the prosecutor's mind. He must review them in the context of his entire file, of his entire case, and reach some type of judgment as to whether or not under the circumstances the witness' testimony is more important than anything else. This type of judgment is really not within the judicial domain. The courts are not in the business of saying who should be prosecuted and who should not be prosecuted. This is a prosecutorial type of judgment.

Beyond this, if you do involve the courts at this stage, you are going to end up in a quagmire. First of all, while a determination is being made by a court as to whether or not immunity should be granted, very often the grand jury proceeding comes to a standstill and the investigative effort cannot proceed as it should. The court must take the time not only to look at the surface papers which might be presented on immunity, but frankly, in order to make a judgment as to whether it is in the public interest which, again, is not a judicial judgment to make at this point in time, the court must really analyze most everything that is in the prosecutor's file. It must acquaint itself fully with what has gone on heretofore in a grand jury.

If it is an investigative grand jury involved in a protractive, long-term investigation, say, in the organized crime context, that is a considerable burden for the court to undertake. After that you are faced with the possibility of more protracted types of delays.

I am suggesting that every—the Government is entitled to every man's evidence. That was also discussed here this morning. As long as a witness is protected so that nothing that he says can possibly be used against him in any way, his rights are protected. The judgment as to whom to prosecute and how to move along a criminal case is that of the prosecutor. It is not a judicial judgment.

The courts come in at a later point in time to offer any other type of protection that might be warranted. In any event, to involve the judiciary at this point would take over many resources required for other things. Once that precedent were established there might be no end to the types of things which would be brought to the attention of a court at really what is a preliminary stage in criminal proceeding.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Del Tufo, under New Jersey law a witness can attack a contempt sentence on the basis that it is no longer coercive. What are the standards as to coerciveness?

Mr. DEL TUFO. The cases you refer to are cases involving the incarceration of alleged organized crime figures under subpenas issued by the State Commission of Investigation, which is a quasi law enforcement agency in New Jersey.

Essentially, the court has to make some judgment and determination as to whether there is still any utility in the incarceration as a mechanism of trying to induce the person to come forward and purge his contempt by giving the information that is required. I think in some of those cases, frankly, the term of incarceration without any positive results has been something which has been of influence to the courts. But it is a delicate judgment and analysis that has to be made in each instance.

Mr. EILBERG. There is difficulty in defining standards, I take it?

Mr. DEL TUFO. It is. It is a very difficult question. As soon as you start putting time limits on it, then a person who does not want to give information can say to himself, is it worth it for me to wait 3 months, 6 months, 1 year, rather than talking at this time? On the other hand, if there is no limit on it, the person is faced with a protracted period of incarceration and the inducement to purge the contempt is certainly greater in that sense.

But, by the same token, it is difficult to assess when that coercive atmosphere has evaporated, and we certainly don't want to see people in jail on any extended basis on a civil contempt charge.

Mr. EILBERG. If you have any further thoughts after today's hearing, we would certainly be glad to hear about what possible standards there are. It is a very perplexing and very important question.

Mr. DEL TUFO. I shall be glad to send something along.

Mr. EILBERG. Finally, in a recent case, State v. Schamberg, the New Jersey Appellate Division upheld an interrogation of a grand jury witness even though the prosecutor stated in front of the jury that he believed the witness perjured himself, but did strongly disapprove the practice.

What action, if any, is contemplated against the prosecutor for this abuse?

Mr. DEL TUFO. I am generally familiar with the Schamberg case. I have not read the decision. First of all, it is my understanding that the witness who appeared before the grand jury was a target of the grand jury, and was so advised that he was the target; he had a right to counsel and the other types of warnings prior to his appearance in the grand jury. I believe it was for that reason that the court, appellate division, upheld the indictment.

It disapproved of the assistant prosecutor's reference to a prior inconsistent statement in suggesting that he may have perjured himself, though he did have his warnings before he came into the grand jury. Upon learning of that case itself, we counseled the assistant prosecutor so that that type of comment would not occur again, as far as he was concerned.

We also immediately sent a directive out to all the prosecutors offices in the State calling attention to the decision, and indicating that comments of this type should not be made before a grand jury.

Mr. EILBERG. You did not attempt to bring him before the ethical committee or board or provide any kind of punitive treatment?

Mr. DEL TUFO. As I say, my recollection of the facts of the case did not suggest to me that that was required in this case. I understand that there was a statement of this witness presented to the grand jury, I think in recorded form. The witness had been advised outside the presence of the grand jury that he was a target, his rights of the fifth amendment, that he did not have to testify, and a variety of other things.

He came into the grand jury. The prosecutor, not in any sense trying to prejudice the man, but merely to say to him we have heard a statement by you under oath which suggests that you are not telling the truth now, do you want to change your statement. I think it was an error of judgment in saying that particularly at that time in front of the grand jury.

But the rest of the—the manner in which he conducted himself in other aspects of it, I believe to the best of my recollection, was all right.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Del Tufo, you have been very helpful and candid. You have a great abundance of experience. We are really very grateful for your appearance. We are going to send you some questions also, if you don't mind, so we can get some more answers.

Mr. DEL TUFO. Very good. Thank you very much, and thank you for letting me come.

[The questions to Mr. Del Tufo and his responses follow:]

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF LAW AND PUBLIC SAFETY, DIVISION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE,
Princeton, N.J., August 8, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: I wish to take this opportunity to express again my appreciation for affording me the opportunity to testify before your subcommittee concerning the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977. I hope that the statement submitted by Attorney General Hyland and myself, as well as my oral testimony, will be of some assistance. The purpose of this letter is to supplement my testimony and to respond to the written questions propounded by you.

Question No. 1. You claim that H.R. 94 indicates a lack of confidence in prosecutors. I must respectfully disagree. I am a former prosecutor and understand and sympathize with a prosecutor's problems. However, there are areas where some prosecutors have abused the grand jury process and other areas where reforms would establish a better balance between the court, the prosecutor, the grand jurors, and the witnesses. That is our intent—not to hamstring effective law enforcement but rather to increase public confidence in the criminal justice system. You can comment, if you wish!

Answer. I appreciate the statement of your personal views and of your awareness of prosecutorial problems. However, I respectfully suggest that the underlying premise of H.R. 94's orientation is that prosecutors will not act responsibly unless severe restraints are legislatively imposed upon their activities. This premise is unjustified. Human nature dictates an absence of perfection in any endeavor. There will thus always be mistakes and excesses. However, in my experience, the incidence of abuse in law enforcement has proven to be the exception rather than the rule. As stated in my testimony, H.R. 94 seems to constitute an over-reaction to past occurrences and may well tip the balance in a dangerous direction. First of all, while I agree with your statement that the legislative intent is not to "hamstring" effective law enforcement, I fear that enactment of H.R. 94 in its present form could inevitably lead to that result. Secondly, and of even more importance, the attitude reflected in the legislation will not work to bolster public confidence but, by truly suggesting a congressional distrust of prosecutors will cause a deterioration of public respect for law enforcement.

Question No. 2. You support reforms providing pre-trial discovery of grand jury minutes. This, I note, is required by New Jersey Law. Some have complained that this can lead to a "framing of testimony" by witnesses. Have you observed any such problems?

Answer. As you know, we favor full pretrial discovery of grand jury minutes. Specifically, R.3:13-3 of the New Jersey Rules of Criminal Practice provides that "the prosecuting attorney shall permit defendant to inspect and copy * * * any relevant * * * grand jury testimony * * *." Further, as a matter of general practice, prosecutors in New Jersey permit full pretrial examination of their files. On the other hand, R.3:13-3 permits the State a limited right of reciprocal discovery. We believe that our criminal discovery rules have a salutary effect on the administration of criminal justice.

In New Jersey we have not experienced any significant problem with regard to subornation of perjury by virtue of these discovery practices. Of course, discovery of grand jury minutes may only be had subsequent to the return of an indictment. Therefore, the opportunity to subvert the grand jury's function by orchestrating a defense is simply not present. In sum, liberal pretrial discovery has done much to promote the search for truth and has led to rejection of the notion that a criminal trial is a contest.

Question No. 3. You state that "absent some compelling justification", only competent and admissible evidence should be presented to a grand jury. What would be such "compelling justifications?" You oppose dismissals for violations. What should be the remedy for presenting incompetent or inadmissible evidence?

Answer. As you know, it is our practice in New Jersey to present only competent and admissible evidence to the grand jury absent some compelling justification. Nevertheless, the nature of the grand jury process suggests that some exceptions must be made to this general policy. Thus, where there is adequate justification, a prosecutor should be allowed to present otherwise inadmissible and incompetent evidence. However, when incompetent and inadmissible evidence has been admitted absent justification, the indictment should not be dismissed where sufficient legal evidence was presented which supports the charges.

While it is true that mere reception of inadmissible evidence by the grand jury should not serve to vitiate a resulting indictment, it is a far different thing to suggest that prosecutors are not subject to any restraints in this regard. The American Bar Association Project on Standards for Criminal Justice has provided:

"A prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial. However, in appropriate cases the prosecutor may present witnesses to summarize admissible evidence available to him which he believes he will be able to present at trial."

In the accompanying commentary, the Bar Association noted that "as a general principle, the use of secondary evidence before a grand jury should be avoided unless there are cogent reasons justifying" such a practice. For example, the need to use a summary of available evidence may arise "in cases involving voluminous records or where an absent witness has given a written statement but is not available at the time and circumstances justify prompt grand jury action." So too, the Bar Association advocates the use of hearsay evidence "where the victim of a criminal act is seriously injured and therefore is unavailable. . . ." Another example set forth in the commentary is "where the safety of an important witness reasonably warrants that his identity remain covert." In such a case, the witness' statements, if sufficiently detailed, can be presented to the grand jury.

The American Law Institute has adopted a similar approach in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure. Under the Code, prosecutors may present "secondary" evidence only where the opposite course would impose an unreasonable burden on one of the parties or on a witness.

In a similar vein, the California Penal Code provides that "the jury shall receive none but evidence that would be admissible over objection at the trial of the criminal action * * *." However, the mere fact that "evidence which would have been excluded at trial was received by the grand jury does not render the indictment void" where sufficient competent proofs were also presented. Other jurisdictions have adopted similar statutes and rules.

In sum, it would be unwise to restrict the scope of the grand jury's inquiries with the absolute requirement that only competent, admissible evidence be received. Given proper justification, otherwise incompetent evidence may be utilized. For example, investigative grand juries must often sift through all available clues to determine whether a crime has been committed. So too, expert reports may often be presented to the grand jury in the interest of economy. Ordinarily where an expert would merely testify as to the contents of his report, his presence before the grand jury would be needed. Specifically, in narcotics cases the State chemist need not necessarily be present. In autopsy-toxocological situations the State Medical Examiner need not always be called. Of course, this discussion does not exhaust the situations which might form a basis for the introduction of incompetent or inadmissible evidence. Nevertheless, as a practical matter we should ensure that the grand jury's time and that of potential witness is not needlessly wasted.

Question No. 4. You oppose a return to transactional immunity. Have you ever had prosecutions, other than for perjury, after a grant of immunity? Are not targeted defendants reluctant to testify with only a grant of use immunity?

Answer. We have instituted prosecutions against individuals who had been granted use plus fruits immunity. However, it is our practice in such cases to present independent incriminatory evidence against the immunized individual before a grand jury panel other than that which initially heard his compelled testimony. The difficulty which grand jurors encounter in compartmentalizing immunized testimony from independent evidence militates in favor of our practice. Thus, in New Jersey a new panel must hear the independent incriminatory evidence against the immunized individual. We take further precautions to ensure that the witness' immunized testimony and its fruits will not be used against him in any way at a later date. More specifically, the attorney who elicited the immunized testimony is not permitted to continue handling the case and a new attorney is assigned. In such instances, the State's attorneys are not permitted to communicate with each other concerning the case and as required by United States v. Kastiger, 406 U.S. 441 (1971) we are prepared to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the evidence at trial was derived from an independent source.

Utilization of these procedures does not preclude subsequent prosecution of an individual who is compelled to produce incriminating evidence and thus does not confer an unnecessary benefit upon those who might otherwise seek to subvert the truth. We thus oppose adoption of the transactional immunity principle. A recent case in New Jersey illustrates graphically the undesirability of transactional immunity. A well-known political figure in this State was indicted by a State grand jury for various corrupt acts. Several months thereafter this individual was indicted by the Federal Government. Before his State trial he was granted transactional immunity in return for his testimony in Federal court. At that time transactional immunity was the sole method of compelling testimony in cases in which the witness refused to testify based upon his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. While testifying at the federal trial, the individual related incriminatory facts concerning the State indictment despite the fact that the federal and state prosecutions were unrelated. The effect of the grant of transactional immunity was to preclude New Jersey from prosecuting the witness with respect to the State offense. Granting transactional immunity was wholly unnecessary in a constitutional sense and drastically prejudiced the rights of the people in New Jersey.

In response to the latter part of your question, it has been our experience that all target witnesses are naturally reluctant to testify. In my view, however, this reluctance would not be diminished were transactional, rather than use plus fruits, immunity to be granted.

Question No. 5. You would preclude notice as to an immunity grant. In every other procedure, adequate notice is given. To prepare for the proceeding, H.R. 94 would give one week's notice, unless the court is shown a need for a shorter period. Why do you oppose this?

Answer. H.R. 94 provides a witness with a period of one week before an order immunizing him and requiring him to testify becomes operative. While the one week notice provision allows the prospective witness an opportunity to appeal, it also provides him with the ability to flee. To syndicated crime, pledged to a code of silence, flight or the destruction of evidence is favored over immunity from prosecution. More importantly, those who may be incriminated by the immunized testimony are, in effect, given one week to eliminate or otherwise hinder the source of their potential crimination. Lastly, this period of grace provides the witness with time to tailor his testimony. In my view, there is no valid reason for inclusion of this notice provision. It bears repeating that once immunity has been granted, the witness has no choice but to tell the truth and to produce the relevant evidence.

Question No. 6. You oppose proposals allowing only consensual immunity and requiring the jurors to vote on immunity grants. I share your concerns and provide only for judicial approval, with standards. Yet you oppose this as well. If the grand jury is, in fact, an arm of the court and not the prosecutor, why should not the court determine not who should be immuned, but whether established standards have been followed?

Answer. I concur with your position that the court should determine whether established statutory prerequisites have been followed in the granting of immunity to a particular witness. However, it is my position that the decision to grant immunity is one which must remain exclusively within the province of the executive. Any dilution of the executive's role in this area would unduly delay investigations. Moreover, it would be violative of extant notions of separation of powers.

It is axiomatic that whether immunity should be sought may well depend upon matters of public policy beyond the traditional purview of the judiciary. Historically, prosecutorial decisions concerning enforcement of the criminal law comprise a part of the executive's responsibilities, and are matters of discretion particularly in the province of the executive department. It is antithetical to our notions of judicial integrity to involve the courts in the decision with respect to whom to prosecute. The court, immersed in judicial matters, should not be expected to expend the time and effort to appreciate the basis of the prosecutor's decision.

Another consideration strongly militating against judicial review of immunity grants is the attendant loss of time and resources. Certainly, if a court is required to make a finding with respect to the efficacy of an immunity grant, then it will be necessary to engage in a "mini-trial" at which time, all relevant data concerning the ongoing investigation will be detailed. Clearly, such an untimely and great expenditure of judicial resources is unconscionable. Members of the judiciary are detached from the investigatory process and rightly so. Their interest in particular investigations is properly limited to concern for the observance of a citizen's constitutional rights. Empowering a court to determine whether the public needs certain information can only hinder and impede the investigation of serious criminal conduct. So too, reposing a significant aspect of the executive's power to combat crime within the judiciary transgresses the line which separates judicial and executive functions.

Conversely, judicial review of whether established statutory prerequisites have been complied with is necessary to ensure that the constitutional rights of an immunized witness are adequately protected. This function comports with the traditional role of the judiciary in law enforcement. For example, current federal law requires that the protection which immunity affords must be coextensive with and provide a complete substitute for the Fifth Amendment privilege.[1] The judiciary is uniquely suited to make this type of determination. Succinctly stated, the ability to render definitive legal decisions is solely within the province of the judiciary just as formulation of qualitative investigatory procedures are reserved to the executive.

In New Jersey a statutory grant of immunity may be preceded by court inquiry as to the validity of the Fifth Amendment claim.[2] This measure is intended to prevent spurious claims of the privilege. Ministerial functions such as this accord with efficient and effective law enforcement. Any extension of the court's involvement would be unwise.

In conclusion, the power of government is divided among the three branches to prevent despotic behavior within any of them. This delicate balance would be upset if the judiciary interfered with another branch upon nothing more than a fear that its officers will be unfaithful to their oaths or unequal to their responsibility. Where the Constitution arms the executive it disarms the judiciary. This proper and time-tested circumscription of the powers of co-equal branches of government must be given due deference. We must be as fearful of the judiciary overpowering the executive as we are of the executive overbearing the citizenry.

Question No. 7. As you note, New Jersey now provides that putative defendants should be warned of their rights. Yet you oppose notice to less culpable witnesses in a subpoena even though it is your practice. If individuals have rights, how can they effectuate them without knowing them?

Answer. We believe that considerations of fair play dictate that targets be informed of the nature of the investigation, the fact that they are putative defendants, that they have the right to counsel, and that they may refuse to testify based upon their privilege against self-incrimination. We can ascertain no compelling reason for requiring that such witnesses be provided with subpoenas setting forth information solely applicable to target witnesses.

In our view unnecessary recitation of Miranda warnings may have an inhibitive effect on a non-target witness. Improvidently given warnings may unduly frighten a witness in a situation where the State has no reason to believe that he will incriminate himself. Witnesses who provide testimony at trial are not administered warnings though they are required to swear to testify truthfully. Stated somewhat differently, trial witnesses are not informed, prior to testifying, that failure to tell the truth exposes them to criminal liability. Further, they are not informed that they have a right to refuse to testify concerning matters which may be incriminating. We believe that witnesses before a grand jury should not be accorded greater rights than those who appear at trial.

The Fifth Amendment does not say that a man shall not be permitted to incriminate himself. It says no more than that a man shall not be "compelled" to give evidence against himself. As to the culprit who reveals his guilt unwittingly with no intent to shed his inner burden it is no more unfair to use the evidence he reveals than it is to turn against him clues at the scene of the crime which a brighter, better informed, or more gifted criminal would not have left.

Question No. 8. You oppose prohibiting witnesses, other than targets, from being called before a jury merely to invoke his privilege. We have been repeatedly told that it is often impossible to determine who is or is not a target? How do you determine it? Does not the invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination by a witness bias his testimony, and thus affect the credibility of that witness in the eyes of the jurors? Is not this contrary to the protection of the Fifth Amendment?

[1] See generally 18 U.S.C. § 6002.
[2] In re Addonizo, 53 N.J. 107 (1968).

Answer. We believe that ordinary witnesses should be required to appear before the grand jury and assert the privilege. Target witnesses should be allowed to invoke their Fifth Amendment privilege on the record out of the presence of the grand jury. Our position accords with the time honored principle that a non-target witness may not make himself the final judge of the availability of the Fifth Amendment privilege and hence enough must appear to permit a court to pass upon it.[3]

A witness becomes a target of an investigation when he is called in order to obtain evidence to fix a criminal charge; he must then be given the appropriate target warnings.[4] It is not necessary for a witness to have had formal charges lodged against him in order for him to be considered such a target. It is only necessary that an intent to indict him at the time of questioning is present. However, if a witness is subsequently indicted after he has testified before a grand jury, not having been given warnings, the burden is on the witness to show that "there was ruse by which it was sought to induce him unwittingly to give evidence against himself."[5] Any doubt is resolved in favor of the validity of the indictment and the indicted witness is treated as merely an ordinary witness who has waived the privilege by not claiming it.[6]

You inquire whether invocation of the privilege against self-incrimination by a witness tends to bias the grand jury against him. We believe that such bias can be eliminated if certain precautionary procedures are utilized. Specifically, the prosecutor should forcefully instruct the grand jury that invocation of the privilege by the witness is a constitutional right and should not be considered in their deliberations.

Question No. 9. You oppose allowing counsel in the grand jury to be present to advise his client only. We have been told that in most jurisdictions, counsel can wait outside and the witness can leave at any time to consult with him. Is this New Jersey practice? If so, would not the presence of counsel eliminate the delays inherent in such a procedure?

Answer. We believe that the presence of counsel in the grand jury room would disrupt the grand jury proceedings. Grand jurors would not act with the independence required of an accusatory and inquisitorial body. Further, the presence of counsel would substantially inhibit inquiries by grand jurors and detract from the well recognized policies supporting the secrecy doctrine.[7] Moreover, there may be instances, especially involving syndicated crime, where the presence of counsel would be undesirable from the witness' perspective. In our view, these problems substantially outweigh the benefits that might follow were the witness' attorney permitted to be present in the grand jury room.

Question No. 10. If we are to avoid mini-trials and not allow challenges to evidence in the grand jury room why should we not grant the defendant the right to see the case against him in a preliminary hearing. Under New Jersey law, may you try an individual on an indictment, without a preliminary hearing and if so, when and how is this true?

Answer. Wholly apart from New Jersey's constitutional prescription of indictment by grand jury, this State has long required a finding of "probable cause" as an additional procedural device to "screen out" unwarranted prosecutions.[8] Initially designated as a "preliminary examination", and since 1967 as a "probable cause" hearing, this procedure is neither a constitutionally guaranteed stage, nor an essential part, of the prosecution and may thus be superseded by the prior return of an indictment.[9]

H.R. 94 requires that a preliminary hearing be conducted in every case regardless of whether there is an indictment.[10] The attorney for the government has the option to provide the preliminary hearing before or after indictment[11]

Current federal law, as does the law of New Jersey, provides that the return of an indictment supersedes the right to a hearing on probable cause.[12] We believe that the present practice should not be abandoned. Initially, it is to be observed that the grand jury bases its decision to indict on a finding of probable cause.[13] Therefore, a post-indictment hearing would be merely duplicative of proceedings before the grand jury and would serve no purpose since the function of the hearing is to determine whether the accused is to be bound over for the grand jury. Moreover, a defendant may exercise his right to move prior to trial for a dismissal of the indictment for want of probable cause, thereby achieving the desired result. It is our view that grand jury minutes should be discoverable by the accused before trial, thereby obviating any possible need for a post-indictment preliminary hearing.

What has been said thus far in no way derogates against use of the pre-grand jury preliminary hearing as a device to "screen out" unwarranted prosecutions. Nevertheless, we believe that the prosecutor should be permitted to expeditiously bring a matter before the grand jury. Since a defendant in New Jersey routinely obtains the grand jury transcript and may move to dismiss the indictment against him, he is in no way prejudiced by virtue of the failure to provide him with a preliminary hearing.

Question No. 11. Under New Jersey Law, as you note, a witness can attack a contempt sentence on the basis that it is no longer coercive. What are the standards as to coerciveness?

Answer. An immunized witness' failure to testify results in his confinement for contempt. Confinement for contempt in refusing to testify despite a grant of immunity is a coercive measure. Such confinement cannot be used to punish a witness for remaining silent or any other shortcoming of which he has not been convicted. Thus, confinement of a contumacious witness must be terminated when the legal justification for it ends in that it appears that it has lost its coercive power. In New Jersey, a witness is entitled to be released upon a showing that there is no substantial likelihood that further confinement would accomplish the coercive purpose of the order on which the confinement is based.[14]

Stated somewhat differently, relief from confinement is granted when the witness demonstrates that the contempt order has become punitive rather than coercive. Each case is decided on an independent evaluation of all the particular facts, among which age, state of health and length of confinement are factors to be weighed. In short, when a contumacious witness' confinement has ceased to have a coercive effect in that he will not be compelled to testify by its continuation, such confinement becomes punishment which must be abated.

Question No. 12. The Department of Justice and the Judicial Conference have both indicated that reducing the size of the grand jury would result in substantial savings, with little practical effect on the return of indictments. You oppose this reduction. Why?

Answer. We do not endorse a reduction in the size of the grand jury. The grand jury's size should be sufficient to represent a cross-section of the community. A dimunition of the size of the grand jury might well preclude representation on the panel of all recognized groups in the community.

Undoubtedly a reduction in the size of the grand jury would result in substantial monetary savings. The practical effect on the return of indictments caused by such a reduction is a matter of speculation.[15] We believe that the added expense concomitant to a larger grand jury is a necessary cost. Our system is founded upon the principle of representative government. Every citizen must have a voice in government. So too, every citizen must have a voice in the administration of justice. The grand jury has historically insulated the criminal charging process from political consideration because it is a body composed of the people. That body must have sufficient breadth to encompass all established groups in society. Only in this way can the grand jury retain all of the people's confidence in its ability to protect the governed against potential excesses and abuses by their governors.

[14] The prime purpose of confinement for contempt is to satisfy the public need for information irrespective of the stubbornness of the witness. "Mere punishment of a recalcitrant witness would not achieve that end." Catena v. Scidl, 68 N.J. 224, 231 (1975).

[15] A reduction in the size of the grand jury would reduce the diversity of viewpoints contained within a panel. A practical effect of such a reduction would be that the grand jurors would not have the benefit of the present wide range of knowledge and perception. This dimunition of knowledge and experience would definitely affect the quality of deliberations.

Question No. 13. We are most impressed with your grand jury manual for prosecutors. Is there such a manual for grand jurors?

Answer. We are gratified by your appreciation of our grand jury manual for prosecutors. No such manual exists for grand jurors. However, as noted in our statement, we have prepared a model grand jury charge which discusses the grand jury and the context in which it must make decisions.[16] The assignment judge reads the charge to the grand jurors and provides copies to be utilized by them throughout their tenure.

Question No. 14. In a recent case, State v. Schamberg, the New Jersey Appellate Division upheld an interrogation of a grand jury witness even though the prosecutor stated in front of the jury that he believed the witness perjured himself, but did strongly disapprove the practice. What action, if any, is contemplated against the prosecutor for this abuse?

Answer. The appellate court found in State v. Schamberg, — N.J. Super. — (App. Div. 1977) that there was no misconduct or abuse occasioned by the prosecutor's comments to the grand jury witness.[17] Therefore, no reason for disciplinary action exists. Nevertheless, a departmental memorandum was dispatched to each prosecutor, assistant prosecutory and deputy attorney general informing him of the opinion and its contents. The consciousness and experience of law enforcement officials grows with the occurrence of each novel situation. Schamberg presents us with a supervisory teaching guide.

We have investigated prosecutorial misconduct in the past. Further, we have kept all prosecutors, assistant prosecutors and deputy attorneys general fully apprised of judicial decisions relating to the parameters of their conduct. These measures, coupled with strong administrative supervision, will ensure that prosecutorial conduct will continue to be a rarity in this State.

As I noted at the outset, I hope that these responses will be of some assistance to you. I believe that Federal Grand Jury Reform is necessary. I strongly endorse adoption at least in modified form of several provisions of the bills under consideration. Nevertheless, I remain firm in my belief that many provisions presently contained in the bills would seriously impair the ability of public prosecutors to perform their constitutional mission without any compensating social gain.

Very truly yours,

v.

ALAN SCHAMBERG

146 N.J. Super. 559; 370 A.2d 482

LARNER, J. A. D.

This is an appeal by the State from the dismissal of an indictment for perjury committed by defendant as a witness before the grand jury. The dismissal was granted because of prosecutorial interference with the independence of the grand jury.

Defendant signed a waiver of immunity after being advised that he was a target of an investigation into the East Rutherford Sewerage Authority of which he was a commissioner. Toward the end of his testimony the assistant prosecutor asked him a series of questions pertaining to conversations with others relating to the subject matter under inquiry. He denied having had such conversations.

After his repeated denials the prosecutor stated:

Question. Mr. Schamberg, I just want to tell you now that I'm going to give you one last opportunity to recant the testimony you have just given.

After that, you will not have any opportunity to do that. Do you understand?

Answer. (Witness nods in the affirmative.)

Question. Okay. Fine.

Answer. Yes.

[16] A copy of our model charge is appended hereto.

[17] A copy of this decision is appended hereto.

Question. I have reason to believe that you have just perjured yourself and I reiterate to you that you have the right to remain silent and anything you say can be and will be used against you.

You have the right to consult with an attorney.

I want to ask you one more time if you wish to change any of the last answers you have just given.

Answer. I don't think I lied to you.

Question. So, you don't want to change any of your answers?

Answer. I don't think so.

Question. Well, this is all the time you have to think about it. Yes or no.

Answer. No.

This interchange with the witness occurred after the grand jury heard a tape recording of a conversation between the witness and another person involving the subject matter referred to in the foregoing interrogation. Subsequently the same grand jury indicted defendant for perjury arising out of his denial of having certain discussions.

Relying upon State v. Hart, 139 N.J. Super. 565, 354 A.2d 679 (App. Div. 1976), the trial judge concluded that the statement in the prosecutor's question to the witness, "I have reason to believe that you have just perjured yourself * * *," constituted an unwarranted interference with the independence of the grand jury.

In State v. Hart, supra, we quashed an indictment because of egregious prosecutorial impingement upon the independent function of the grand jury to deliberate, weigh the evidence and determine whether or not to indict. The significant element of that case is the fact that the prosecutor improperly offered his opinion as to the failure of the jury to return an indictment, with the result that the jury reconsidered and indicted the defendant.

We find that State v. Hart is clearly distinguishable and is not controlling on the fact herein. The remark by the prosecutor in this case was the culmination of efforts on his part to give the witness the opportunity to change his testimony and avoid the possible sanction of a perjury charge. It was not addressed to the grand jury, nor was it intended to direct the grand jury to indict. Under such circumstances, should such an unfortunate remark, not deliberate or calculated, be construed as a substantial invasion of the independence of the grand jury so as to vitiate the indictment?

The objectionable comment was not couched in terms material to the subject matter of the inquiry—namely, official corruption, just as the indictment in question was not targeted to that inquiry or the purpose for which defendant was called to testify. The indictment came about as a collateral consequence of the conflict of defendant's testimony with that previously submitted to the grand jury. And it is therefore apparent that the prosecutor did not make the comment to induce the grand jury to indict but rather as a means of urging the witness to tell the truth. There is nothing before us to indicate that the prosecutor's remark to the witness played any part in the deliberation or determination of the grand jury.

[1] Contrary to the practice in some states, our rules permit the prosecutor not only to be present before the grand jury to question witnesses, but also during deliberations to advise as to the law and its application to the facts in the case. R. 3:6-6(a). Although he should not attempt to influence or direct the grand jury in its findings, nevertheless he is not expected to limit his participation to an innocuous presentation. There is no legal bar to the use of vigorous and skillful questioning which will elicit and compel truthful responses from reluctant witnesses. See, e.g., United States v. Rintelen, 235 F. 787, 791 (S.D.N.Y.1916).

[2,3] Although we disapprove the form of comment made by the prosecutor herein, we do not consider it to be of such content or magnitude as to constitute an invasion or attempt at invasion of the grand jury's independence. The prejudicial effect of prosecutorial conduct must be judged from a different viewpoint when it occurs before a grand jury as compared with a petit jury. Improper and overreaching comments before a petit jury often result in judicial intervention through mistrials or reversals because of the court's sensitivity to the prejudicial impact of a prosecutor's comments upon the body which determines the guilt or innocence of defendant. Contrariwise, a chance remark or improper question before a grand jury does not affect the ultimate determination of defendant's guilt and therefore should not be judged with as critical an eye. See State v. Riley, 97 N.J.Super. 542, 548, 235 A.2d 503 (Law Div.1967), aff'd 101 N.J.Super.

402, 244 A.2d 513 (App.Div.1968). aff'd 53 N.J. 576, 252 A.2d 153 (1969), cert. den. 390 U.S. 969, 88 S.Ct. 1085, 19 L.Ed.2d 1177 (1968).

[4] Unless the prosecutor's misconduct before a grand jury is extreme and clearly infringes upon the jury's decision-making function, it should not be utilized as a stepping stone to dismissal of an indictment. As has often been observed, an indictment should only be quashed on the clearest and plainest grounds. State v. Weleck, 10 N.J. 355, 364, 91 A.2d 751 (1952) ; State v. Blackman, 125 N.J.Super. 125, 309 A.2d 8 (App.Div.1973) ; State v. Silverstein, 76 N.J.Super. 536. 185 A.2d 45 (App.Div.1962), aff'd 41 N.J. 203, 195 A.2d 617 (1963).

Defendant refers to United States v. Wells, 163 F. 313 (D.Idaho 1908), as a precedent for his position. That case is inapposite for it concerned the validity of an indictment returned by a grand jury which was exposed to the following prosecutorial excesses:

The conduct of the district attorney before that body was the equivalent of expressing the unqualified opinion that the evidence established the guilt of the defendants; that they ought to indict them; that the department at Washington wanted them indicted, and it was therefore the duty of the grand jury under the circumstances to do so; that the defendants Martin and Pritchard, being guilty, had in their testimony purposely lapsed into forgetfulness. * * *.

[163 F. at 322]

In addition, the prosecutor refused to leave the jury room when requested by the grand jury and instructed the foreman to sign the indictment without discussion by the jury as a whole. Such extraordinary coercive conduct can hardly be equated with the objectionable comment in this case.

In Beck v. Washington, 369 U.S. 541, 82 S.Ct. 955, 8 L.Ed.2d 98 (1962), the court summarily dismissed a constitutional attack on an indictment grounded upon a prosecutor's conduct before the grand jury. The conduct is strikingly similar to that pointed up in the case at bar. The summary by the court is informative:

Petitioner also contends that a witness before the grand jury was improperly interrogated in a manner which prejudiced his case before that body. It appears that an employee of petitioner's union was called before the grand jury to testify in reference to activities within his employment. During his first appearance he made statements which he subsequently changed on a voluntary reappearance before the grand jury some two days before the indictment was returned. On the second appearance the prosecutor attacked the witness' changed story as incredible and warned him that he was under oath, that he might be prosecuted for perjury, and that there was no occasion for him to go to jail for petitioner. The record indicates that the prosecutor became incensed over the witness' new story; and though some of his threats were out of bounds, it appears that they had no effect upon the witness whatsoever for he stuck to his story. We can find no irregularity of constitutional proportions, and we therefore reject this contention. [369 U.S. at 555, 82 S.Ct. at 963, 8 L.Ed.2d at 110]

In United States v. Bruzgo, 373 F.2d 383 (1967), the Third Circuit, although recognizing that the comments of the prosecutor exceeded the bounds of proper conduct and deserved condemnation, nevertheless held that such conduct did not vitiate the indictment which concededly was based upon sufficient evidence.

In view of the foregoing, it is our considered opinion that the trial judge mistakenly exercised his discretion in quashing the indictment. The order is reversed and the indictment is reinstated.

Model Grand Jury Charge

Ladies and Gentlemen: In my own name and on behalf of the citizens of our county I welcome you to your term of service as grand jurors. We realize that responding to this summons to public duty will cause inconvenience to each one of you and that your service will represent personal sacrifice. We ask that you accept that inconvenience and make the sacrifice in a generous spirit, knowing that the work you will do is essential to the well-being of all citizens of this county and fundamental to the proper administration of justice. Without the service of citizens acting as grand jurors the criminal justice system under which we live could not function.

The grand jury as a part of the criminal justice system is an institution of ancient origin. We inherit it as part of the English common law which was adopted when this state was established. A grand jury similar to this exists in each of the 21 counties of our state. The usual period of service is — weeks unless for good cause that time is extended by the order of the assignment judge.

As has already been explained to you, you will sit to hear and consider matters on a regular basis — days each week.

The office of grand juror is one of vital importance. It bears with it great responsibility. If you perform your duties conscientiously and unselfishly you will not only find the experience rewarding but will bring well deserved credit and distinction to yourself.

Citizens in general have only a vague idea of what a grand jury is and what its functions are. Since you are now members of the grand jury for it appears with—in originnal County you should be clear as to the functions you fulfill and the responsibilities placed upon you under our law. The term "grand" jury is sometimes misunderstood. It must be differentiated from the term "petit" jury. Both expressions are French in origin. "Grand" means large; "petit" means small. The terms refer to the size of membership of each jury—not the importance of the respective functions. Both juries— grand and petit—are essential to our system of justice, although their size and function differ. The grand jury is composed of 23 members; the petit or trial jury is composed of 12 members.

The function of the grand jury is not to determine whether someone is guilty or not guilty of a crime—that is the responsibility of a petit jury. Rather, the primary function of the grand jury is to make a determination whether there is probable cause to believe that a crime was committed and that the accused committed it. While I will shortly define your obligations in greater detail, suffice it to say at this point that the grand jury serves as a screening mechanism to protect citizens from having to respond to unfounded charges. It is designed to insure that before persons are required to stand trial on a criminal charge that there be a basis for it—and to prevent persons being exposed to the rigors of a criminal trial when the charge is baseless.

As I have noted, your principal function will be to consider alleged violations of the criminal law. You will determine whether or not an indictment should be returned against a person accused of violating the law. Under our system of justice, it is not enough that someone simply accuses another of committing a crime. After the accusation and before the person is made to stand trial on the charge, there must be an inquiry made by a grand jury to determine whether there is a basis for the charge. If the grand jury determines that there is an adequate basis for the charge, it votes to return an indictment against the accused. An indictment is a formal document brought in the name of the State of New Jersey, naming the accused as defendant and setting forth in writing the specific date and place of the alleged offense; the name of the alleged victim; the facts and circumstances making the alleged conduct criminal and the specific section of the criminal statutes of this state violated that alleged conduct. If the grand jury decides that there is not an adequate basis for the charge it votes not to return an indictment or, in legal parlance, "no bills" the charge.

Whether or not there is an adequate basis shown for an indictment is known in legal language as "probable cause." "Probable cause" is not a technical concept. It has a practical meaning. Probable cause exists where the evidence presented is sufficient to lead a reasonable person to believe that a crime has been committed and that the accused committed it. Again, be clear that your function is not to decide beyond a reasonable doubt whether the evidence presented indicates that the accused committed a crime. A full-blown trial is not conducted before you; the technical rules of evidence do not apply; lawyers for the accused are not present to present a defense; the accused and any witnesses he may produce at a trial are generally not heard. In short, an indictment is merely the mechanism by which the criminal trial process is commenced. What you have to decide, based on what is presented to you, is whether there is reasonable ground to believe that a crime has been committed and that the accused committed it. If you do not believe that to be so you should vote against returning an indictment.

We have thus far limited our consideration of your function to criminal charges—to deciding whether or not to indict a person. But since the grand jury is that independent investigative body which represents the public concern of the community, you may also inquire into matters which, while not strictly of a criminal nature, still have overtones of wrongdoing. You may become aware of official acts or omissions which fall shoft of criminal conduct and yet those acts or omissions are not in the public interest. It is certainly in the public interest that such conduct be revealed in an effective, well-considered manner. To investigate such matters you have those broad, comprehensive and independent powers I have previously alluded to. If you feel, after a well considered investigation, that some problem of public concern or some aspect of public business or some evil ought to be brought to the attention of the general populate you may do so by way of a presentment. A presentment, then, is a formal document, presented by you to the public in which you set forth your findings as to some problem in public affairs or public concern or derelictions in duty of public officers.

A presentment requires the exercise of sensitive judgment on your part. It involves serious matters and may not be returned lightly. It cannot be used to single out persons in private or unofficial positions to impugn their motives or hold them up to scorn. A presentment has to do with matters of public concern, not idle curiosity. If there is a problem of which the public should be aware and if the problem is caused in whole or in part by the noncriminal misconduct of a public official that individual may be named and indeed criticized. But before such a presentment is voted you must be satisfied that the proof of such wrongdoing is conclusive for once the presentment is made public there is no reversing its effect. And so as a matter of fundamental fairness a presentment naming and censuring a specific individual in a position affected with a public interest will not be made public, after being handed up, until the assignment judge obtains and reviews the full record of the testimony and exhibits and determines that sufficient evidence has been presented to support such charges.

With respect to both indictments and presentments, the proofs respecting the alleged offense or public condition will be presented to you in the grand jury room in the form of witnesses or documentation. For the orderliness of the proceeding the matters will be presented and the witness called, in the usual case, by the prosecuting attorney. If, after hearing those witnesses called you feel that you wish to hear from additional witnesses before deciding whether or not there is an adequate basis for an indictment or a presentment you have the right to ask the prosecutor to subpoena them and if he refuses you may request the assistance of the assignment judge. If any difficulties arise in this regard, always understand that I am available to respond to your request for additional instructions.

As I have said, the prosecuting attorney will present the various matters to you for your consideration. But understand clearly that the grand jury is an independent legal institution. It is not the agent of the prosecutor. It functions under our Constitution as the representative of the community with is own separate and distinct powers. It may investigate matters of a criminal nature of which its members may be aware even though not presented by the prosecutor. The same is true with respect to a presentment. The prosecutor, as a lawyer, is available to advise you on legal questions and you should freely call upon him for such legal advice—as you may the Court if you deem it necessary. You may, if you wish, ask the prosecutor for his opinion as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence. However, the prosecutor is not the one who decides whether to indict or not, or whether to return a presentment or not.

The prosecutor is not entitled to be present during your discussions. If during your discussion you do not want the prosecutor present you may ask him to leave the room and he must comply. Such requests are requests of the grand jury not individual jurors, and are to be determined by a majority of the jurors present.

It should be obvious that because of the sensitive nature of the matters which may come before you, these proceedings must be conducted in complete confidence. It would be dereliction of your duty and a violation of your oath were you ever to discuss with anyone outside the grand jury room what you may have heard while there. Untold and irreversible harm could be done to individual reputations were it otherwise. Remember, one of the prime functions of a grand jury is to protect the good name of individuals from unfounded charges. There are times when you may be tempted to enhance our own importance by passing along "inside" information. You must unfailingly resist any such impulse.

Therefore, all your deliberations and discussions must take place in the grand jury room while you are in session. It is wrong for jurors to confer or deliberate together privately or by telephone concerning grand jury matters outside the grand jury room. A grand jury must confer together and act as a body. Your deliberations must likewise be kept secret. Each juror has the right to expect that his or her communications with fellow jurors during deliberations will remain confidential. There must be the utmost freedom of expression and debate in the grand jury room uninhibited by fear on the part of any juror that his views or expressions will be revealed or "leaked" outside of the grand jury room. The consequences of such breach of confidentiality are apparent and appalling to any responsible person. The oath you take is not an empty gesture. A copy of it and my remarks will be distributed to you so that you may reread them in a more meaningful way during your term of service.

If, during your service, anyone should attempt to influence you in the performance of your duties, it would be an unquestionable violation of the law on the part of that person. Bring any such conduct to my attention immediately. Such breach will be dealt with by me expeditiously.

The grand jury is made up of 23 members. In order to have an official session there must be at least 12 members present, i.e., a quorum. Moreover, independent of the number of jurors deliberating in any given case, no person can be indicted and no presentment can be returned unless 12 or more members of the grand jury concur. Your deliberations will be presided over by your foreman who will administer the oath to all witnesses. You are expected to attend each and every session. If, for some urgent and meritorious reason, you cannot attend a particular session, you must notify the foreman or clerk ahead of time. The clerk of the grand jury will be present with you at all times except those when for good reason you ask him to leave. It is his duty to record and keep the vote of each juror by name on each matter presented to the grand jury for consideration. That record is never revealed.

An official certified court reporter will be present in the grand jury room at all times when you are in session. It is that person's obligation to faithfully and accurately record all that transpires during the session. That reporter takes an oath of secrecy also. The testimony of witnesses including that in response to your questions is later transcribed if an indictment or presentment is handed up in the matter and is available for the trial of the case. However, the comments of the grand jurors in their discussions and deliberations and their vote on indictments or presentments are never recorded or transcribed. Further, the court reporter is not to be present in the grand jury room during your deliberations.

Any indictments you vote to return shall be handed up to me as assignment judge in open court. In my absence they may be handed up to another of our Superior Court judges whom I shall designate. If you vote not to indict; that is "no bill" a matter, that document should immediately be signed by your foreman and returned to the Court the same day it is voted upon so that the individual, if in custody on that pending charge, may be immediately released. If you decide to return a presentment your foreman shall notify me ahead of time so that I may arrange to be present to receive it.

Now that you understand what is required of you we will ask the clerk to call the roll and administer to you your oath as grand jurors.

Mr. EILBERG. Now we have representatives of Grand Jury Associations. I wonder if they would step forward. It would assist us if they would sit in alphabetical order perhaps.

Mr. Sheldon Ashley is chairman of the Federation of Grand Jurors Associations of New York State. Mr. Gloege, William P. Gloege, vice president, Association for Effective Grand Juries, California. Mr. John J. Lyons, chairman of the Bronx County Grand Jurors Association.

We unfortunately have taken a great deal of time, although it has been necessary. We would ask each of you, if you can, to summarize your statements, then we will get to some questions. We have your statements and have read them.

Let me call first then upon Mr. Ashley.

TESTIMONY OF SHELDON ASHLEY, CHAIRMAN, FEDERATION OF GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATIONS OF NEW YORK STATE; WILLIAM P. GLOEGE, VICE PRESIDENT, ASSOCIATION FOR EFFECTIVE GRAND JURIES, CALIFORNIA; AND JOHN J. LYONS, CHAIRMAN, BRONX COUNTY GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATION

Mr. ASHLEY. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you have a statement?

Mr. ASHLEY. Yes; thank you indeed, sir.

You, of course, have my prepared statement; we would appreciate inclusion for the record.

Mr. EILBERG. It will be included at this point.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Ashley follows:]

STATEMENT OF SHELDON ASHLEY, CHAIRMAN, FEDERATION OF GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATIONS OF NEW YORK STATE, INC.

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I welcome the opportunity to discuss with you, as a citizen of the United States, the implications and effects of H.R. 94. My additional and pressing concern is the influence you will have on the laws of my state. As we know, the Federal law leads, and the actions you take here will reverberate in state capitols as well as in the Halls of Congress.

As President Ford noted to the Congress last year:

"The fact is—the Federal role in the fight against crime, particularly violent crime, is a limited one. With few exceptions, the kinds of crime that obsess America—murder, robberies, rape, muggings, holdups, breakins—are solely within the jurisdiction of state and local governments."

The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 asserts that crime is primarily a local problem and criminal justice needs vary widely. A state is generally in a better position than the Federal government to determine its own criminal justice needs and priorities.

With H.R. 94, you sorely hurt the Grand Jury System of my state, and undoubtedly other states as well. In the interests of time, I will leave Federal considerations to others. In the interest of justice, I will remind you that this bill can do nothing but weaken the constitutionally protected right of a grand jury.

The Grand Jury exists for the people. It is a bulwark, between the state and the accused, against unfounded prosecution. What you do here, as legislators, should not denude the people of this protection, nor should it lessen it.

In 1970, Benjamin Landis was quoted in the ABA journal as being in favor of the elimination of jury trials in civil cases. If this were done, it would be just a matter of time until this followed in criminal proceedings. You have started us on the way with the provisions of this bill which reduce the number of Grand Jurors to nine. You are whittling away at the peoples' participation in the judicial system. You are laying the groundwork for the usurpation of power from the people to the legislature and the judiciary.

When you speak of Grand Jury reforms, please be gracious enough, and truthful enough, and honest enough to admit that what you seek is a convenient way to get rid of that dreadful annoyance, the Grand Jury. With this, we come on open ground, and we can argue.

It is worth noting that some of the organizations which have been most vocal in calling for Grand Jury reform have also been the most diligent in instructing witnesses in ways to deflect and subvert. This is not reform.

H.R. 94 calls for a witness' right to counsel in a Grand Jury room. My organization stands opposed to such an incursion, and the Federal courts have also repeatedly repudiated that "right." The New York courts have also rejected that claim. Supreme Court Justice Powell has said that a grand jury is not an adversary proceeding. This being the case, there is no need for counsel. But, the bill before you says otherwise.

H.R. 94 allows witness' counsel to disclose matters which occur before the Grand Jury. Indeed. Why bother with rules of secrecy at all if you will breach them in this way?

The Supreme Court has said that Rules of Evidence need not be adhered to in Grand Jury investigations. But the bill before you says otherwise.

My organization agrees with the bill in calling for instruction of Grand Jurors. We would, in fact, greatly fortify and enhance the language that "the grand jury reasonably understands. . . ." It is also our strong belief that at least some jurors be called from regular grand jury rolls, so that there will always be a cadre of experienced jurors who will know, first hand, their rights and responsibilities and duties.

Although having no special disagreement with transactional immunity, we find it necessary to again cite the U.S. Supreme Court in Kastigar v. United States where the courts held "use" immunity to be sufficient.

The American people have no argument with the grand jury because, of course, they are the grand jury—the peoples' "Big Stick." But the threat is often to the public official who does not care to have an investigation of his office backed up by the power of subpena.

H.R. 94 requires informing the witness of the subject matter of the investigation. We would point out that, in Blair v. United States, the Supreme Court said that "the identity of the offender, and the precise nature of the offense, if there be one, normally are developed at the conclusion of the Grand Jury's labors, not at the beginning."

My organization feels that H.R. 94 has many faults. We urge that you return this bill for further deliberation.

Mr. ASHLEY. As you had mentioned, sir, my organization is the Federation of Grand Jurors Associations of New York State. The Federation is composed of county associations throughout the State; the overall purpose of the Federation is the protection, the enhancement, the preservation of the grand jury system in our State.

We fully realize the scope of your hearings here, your deliberations here, and we are concerned, indeed, about what has come forth in the hearings. We continue to voice our concern, the details of which are in my statement.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Ashley, may I just interrupt by saying, today we basically called witnesses up until now who were generally considered to be against grand jury reform. We have had many other days of hearings, but we wanted every point of view to be heard and to be made part of the record. So I just wanted you to know that.

Mr. ASHLEY. Yes; I do. Thank you, indeed.

Our overall question then is whether or not reform is actually what is being called for. This is not resolved in our minds. On a State level we are currently hearing similar comments; similar testimony from the various committees of the New York Assembly, the New York Senate. They are generally directed in the same way and for the same purpose as you are.

We admit that there are possible areas of reform that could be instigated for the bettermen of the system. We are not fully convinced that this is what is actually called for.

First, as far as these hearings are concerned, we did note that one of the motivating forces apparently behind all of these hearings are some various other organizations; for example, this coalition for grand jury reform. We have seen some of the material that has come forth from them. We are, again, not convinced that what is called for, what is actually asked for, is reform. We have suspicions that what is desired on the State level, what is desired on the Federal level, is subsequent abolition of the grand jury system as we know it today. If not abolition, then certainly a watering down to a point where the system is nothing very much more than an innocuous investigative body.

There have been statements already where the indicting power of the grand jury is something to be done away with.

I mentioned the other organizations that have been quoted here, and I mention this coalition. My files are rather interesting on the point.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Ashley, I have to interrupt you by telling you that the interest of this subcommittee was developed basically during the investigation of the Fort Worth Five case. I have to disagree with you as to the influence of any particular organization. When we got into the Forth Worth Five case it excited our interest.

Mr. ASHLEY. All right. If I may, I will limit that remark to just one other point, and we will go on from there if we may.

We mentioned the coalition. From my own files comes forth some rather interesting material, something issued just a few years ago by one of the member organizations of the coalition. It is a rather interesting little booklet on actually how to deflect, how to subvert a grand jury. There is no mention of reform; there is no intent of reform here.

We question whether or not this is actually what is being called for. The most important point that we hear from you——

Mr. EILBERG. Do you have an extra copy of that publication?

Mr. ASHLEY. I wish I did, because apparently it is rather popular now that I am showing it around. I have promised to "Xerox" it for some other people, and I would be happy to do it for you.

Mr. EILBERG. We wish you would.

Mr. ASHLEY. Indeed.

Introduction

Welcome to the grand jury.

We know that you intend to do your best to become a conscientious grand juror, and we have designed this booklet to help you in that effort.

Who are we? We are the former grand jurors, lawyers, judges, legislators and just plain citizens who have joined together to form the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse. We think we know what it takes to make a grand jury work well—if only because our experiences have shown us so many work poorly.

This booklet is a guide for both local and federal grand jurors, not an exhaustive examination of the grand jury system. We have tried to discuss grand jury issues that are likely to affect grand jurors on all levels, but some important aspects of grand jury procedure do vary markedly between jurisdictions. If you are ever in doubt which procedures are applicable to your grand jury situation, check with your panel's legal advisors. For those of you who would enjoy delving deeper into the grand jury process, we have included a list of valuable readings and sources.

We don't expect you to accept every word of this booklet unquestioningly. In fact, the primary point we hope to make in the pages that follow is that meaningful grand jury action is impossible unless grand jurors have the courage and wisdom to question and think for themselves.

The historical background

The trust reposed in grand juries is of great and general concernment. To them is committed the custody of the portals of the law, that into the hallowed dome no injustice may be permitted to enter. They make, in the first instance, the important discrimination between the innocent and the guilty. To the former, they give a passport of security; the latter they consign to a final trial by a traverse jury.

-- James Wilson, early U.S. Supreme Court Justice, 1790

Most historians trace the grand jury's origins back to 12th century England, a time of bitter power struggles between the crown and its baronial and clerical rivals. In the 1160's, King Henry II, alarmed by noble and church control over large portions of England's judicial system, moved to consolidate his royal political power by creating the forerunner of our modern grand jury, a series of 16-member panels directly answerable to the crown.

The representatives of the local populace selected to serve on the King's panels were obligated to uncover and "indict" law-breakers. Their indictment was tantamount to a modern conviction. Those poor souls indicted by these early juries could only prove their innocence by successfully undergoing an impossible "trial by ordeal"—plunging a hand into boiling water, for example—without sustaining an injury.[1] The jurors didn't have an easy time of it either. They could be and were fined heavily if they didn't return the indictments the king sought.

King Henry's grand jury was not, of course, the model for the grand jury incorporated into our Constitution in 1791. Between Henry II's rule and the American Revolution, the grand jury had evolved, at least in theory, into a source of people's power against the king, thanks largely to one celebrated 17th century case. The case involved the Earl of Shaftesbury, a troublesome political opponent of the then reigning monarch, Charles II. In 1681 Charles brought treason charges against the Earl before a London grand jury, but the grand jurors, unexpectedly, refused to indict. Worse yet from the King's perspective, they demanded the right to meet in secret session, free from crown interference.

In the short run, this show of grand juror independence was futile. The King simply took his charges to a different and more pliant grand jury panel. But the Shaftesbury uproar did wrap the grand jury system in an aura of popular sovereignty, and it was this spirit that English emigrants to the American colonies took with them. In 1735, for instance, a grand jury twice refused to indict a New York printer, John Peter Zenger, for libeling the royal governor, and later, during the pre-Revolutionary War years, grand juries repeatedly refused to return the indictments sought by royal authorities. By the Revolution's end, the grand jury was firmly implanted in the colonial mind as an indispensable citizen protection arbitrary authority.

In the new nation

Liberty to the first citizens of the young American republic meant, among other things, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, the right to a trial before a jury of one's peers and the right of every accused to a grand jury indictment. When the Bill of Rights was ratified midway through George Washington's first term, the grand jury stood as the first clause of the Fifth Amendment:

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger . . .

There was no mystery behind the grand jury's inclusion in the Bill of Rights. The people who won our independence were well aware that a government could manipulate the criminal law to punish its critics—and they were determined to prevent that kind of oppression from rearing its head in their new nation. Making a person stand trial, they realized, was in itself a penalty of sorts, an emotionally and financially draining ordeal that even an eventual verdict of not guilty could never erase. No citizen should suffer this experience, the authors of the Bill of Rights felt, unless an independent panel of citizens, the grand jury, decided that the evidence warranted bringing an accused to trial. A free people, after all, could not allow the government to decide whom to bring to trial. The danger that politically motivated or overzealous prosecutors would subject the innocent to trial on trumped-up charges or whitewash the crimes of the guilty was just too great.

Setting a poor example

Our early leaders were not demigods sent from Mt. Olympus. With their noble and eloquent words, they were only reflecting the widespread public conviction that the people could not afford to trust the individuals who led them. This skepticism about power was well-founded, as some of the first officials of the new republic soon set about demonstrating. Almost from the start of our nation's existence, there were federal officials who looked to the Constitution not for inspiration, but for loopholes—of which the grand jury seemed an inviting example. Grand jury procedures were then, as now, ill-defined, and among the first to exploit the opportunities this situation offered were federal judges. Instead of instructing newly impaneled grand jurors on their historic responsibility to return impartial decisions, some members of the federal bench charged grand jurors with diatribes against their political enemies. Supporters of Thomas Jefferson, before he became president, were the frequent victims of this improper judicial pressure. These grand jury attacks taught Jefferson a lesson, but the wrong one. Years later, when Jefferson himself was president, he ignored the decisions of two grand juries that had refused to indict his archenemy, Aaron Burr, and had a third grand jury, packed with Jeffersonians, convened. Predictably, this third panel returned the indictment Jefferson so desperately wanted. Burr was later acquitted.

These inauspicious beginnings set the grand jury pattern. Grand juries, especially on the federal level, came to spend more time rubberstamping prosecutorial decisions than vigilantly watchdogging prosecutorial conduct. There were exceptions, particularly during the latter 1800's and early 1900's when grand juries successfully exposed municipal corruption—often over roadblocks set by local district attorneys—in city after city. One such city was Minneapolis where, in 1902, grand jurors hamstrung by the foot-dragging of the corrupt county prosecutor spent their own money to hire private investigators. In short order, the grand jury compiled enough damning evidence to chase the city's crooked mayor out of office.

Such heroism was not, however, the rule. The grand jury's record remained, on the whole, an uninspiring one, so much so that the majority of states entering the union after 1850 opted to do so without constitutionally mandating the right to a grand jury indictment.

In the states where a grand jury indictment is not required before an accused can be made to stand trial, the accused are now brought to trial on the basis of informations, formal written charges filed by prosecutors against individuals suspected of criminal activity. These charges must be heard by a magistrate at an open courtroom session called a preliminary hearing. At this hearing, the accused is entitled to an attorney, and strict rules of courtroom fairplay apply. After the government presents its case against the accused, the defense can challenge it or present its own. There is no citizen input during a preliminary hearing. The magistrate alone decides whether or not the evidence presented warrants bringing the accused to trial.

Many find the information process an attractive alternative to the grand jury indictment. In 1931 a blue-ribbon presidential commission recommended the abolition of the grand jury on the federal level and its replacement by informations.[3] By 1948 England, the birthplace of the grand jury, had done just that.

Our federal government has not followed suit, at least partly because abolishing the grand jury would require an exhausting effort to amend the Constitution. Similarly, while only a minority of states require a grand jury indictment before an accused is brought to trial, no state has completely abolished the grand jury indictment as a method of initiating criminal prosecutions. But the questions raised by the grand jury abolition movement remain. Are grand juries an anachronism? Is it realistic to expect a panel of citizens unversed in the law to rigorously oversee prosecutorial conduct? Do government prosecutors, in fact, really still pose a threat to our basic freedoms that must be vigilantly guarded against?

These are questions that every serious grand juror must face.

The roots of prosecutorial misconduct

The prosecutor has more control over life, liberty, and reputation than any other person in America. He can have citizens investigated and, if he is that kind of person, he can have this done to the tune of public statements and veiled or unveiled intimations. Or the prosecutor may choose a more subtle course and simply have a citizen's friends interviewed. The prosecutor can order arrests, present cases to the grand jury in secret session, and on the basis of his one-sided presentation of the facts, can cause the citizen to be indicted and held for trial. He may dismiss the case before trial, in which case the defense never has a chance to be heard. While the prosecutor at his best is one of the most beneficient forces in our society, when he acts from malice or other base motives, he is one of the worst.

—Robert H. Jackson, U.S. Attorney General and Supreme Court Justice, 1940

The founders of our nation considered prosecutorial misconduct a menace 200 years ago. It remains a menace today. In 1976 a New York State legislative committee, after studying only recent New York court records, found 100 instances of prosecutorial misconduct.[4] There is no reason to believe that New York prosecutors are any worse or any better than prosecutors in other states or in the federal system. Undoubtedly, similar laundry lists of misconduct could be drawn for every judicial subdivision in the United States.

But why? Are people who become prosecutors inherently insensitive to the Bill of Rights? Of course not. But prosecutors do occupy a special and central position in our criminal justice system which subjects them to pressures and lures that encourage behavior a free society cannot tolerate. While no prosecutor is immune from these pressures, many can and do perform their jobs fairly and rigorously despite them. Some, however, cannot.

Protecting citizens from this latter category of prosecutors is your most difficult responsibility as a grand juror. Your task will be a great deal easier once you understand why prosecutors sometimes, as Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson succinctly put it a generation ago, "pick people they think they should get instead of cases that need to be prosecuted."

One: The prosecutor is a political animal.

Whether elected or appointed, prosecutors are neck-deep in politics. They have constituencies or superiors to please—sometimes both—and the decisions they do or do not make as prosecutors can make or break their own future careers, as well as the careers of their superiors, colleagues, friends or rivals. Over the years, countless prosecutors have built ladders to higher office out of the grand jury chamber, some with the patient, plodding work that produces solid grand jury indictments, others with shortcuts that generate more headlines than convictions. The bigger the case, the greater the temptation to manipulate the grand jury process. Faced with pressure from the community to "do something" about some particularly heinous crime, an ambitious prosecutor has everything to gain by widely scattering subpoenas on anyone even remotely connected to the case as proof that something is being done. The resulting media coverage is sure to keep the prosecutor's name in the news—and shatter the reputations of the people subpoenaed.

Two: The prosecutor is no more free of personal bias than any other member of our society.

Prosecutors, like all of us, are products of a social order still flawed by discriminatory attitudes of many kinds, and, for some, overcoming these attitudes is a real problem. One prosecutor might feel that people of certain backgrounds or beliefs are not to be trusted or that others must be trusted. Another prosecutor might be horrified when a striker throws a punch on a picket line, but unmoved by an allegation of white collar crime. Other prosecutors might have compiled a personal "enemies' list" of people who have dealt them real or imagined wrongs. Prosecutors may, in short, be unable to distinguish between people they dislike and people who have committed crimes.

Three: For prosecutors, overzealousness is an occupational hazard.

The prosecutor's job is to make sure that the perpetrators of crime are brought before the bar of justice, and this is a heavy responsibility to bear, too heavy for some prosecutors. These prosecutors begin to see themselves as the community's only defense against the relentless march of crime and lose all sense of proportion. Minor incidents become serious crimes. Serious crimes become rationalizations for ignoring basic rules of decency. Persecution, not prosecution, becomes the order of the day.

Whenever ambition, bias or zeal take command, grand jury abuse of some sort is almost a given—except when grand jurors exercise the check on prosecutorial misconduct they are supposed to provide. Unfortunately, spotting misconduct is not always easy. Indeed, the entire structure of the modern grand jury process is geared to make you see things a prosecutor's way. As confident as you may be that your grand jury panel would never let a manipulative prosecutor get to first base, the sad truth is that grand jurors not only frequently let overzealous or politically motivated prosecutors get past first base, they often find themselves cheering as the prosecutors near home plate.

The grand jury's boss

Any experienced prosecutor will admit that he can indict anybody at any time for almost anything before any grand jury.
--William Campbell, U.S. District Court Judge, 1972

Why do grand jurors, as Judge Campbell notes and experienced observers agree, invariably do what prosecutors want them to do?

Essentially because prosecutors control the grand jury process. This control is nowhere mandated by the law. Prosecutors can't legally force grand jurors to do anything. What prosecutors do control, however, is information. Grand jurors see and hear whatever prosecutors want them to see and hear.

It is the prosecutor who generally determines which witnesses will appear before the grand jury. In fact, prosecutors may bring any witness they choose into the grand jury chamber. This sweeping prerogative derives from the grand jury's status as a "creature of the court." As such, grand jurors have access to judicial compulsory process authority, which means that a person can be ordered to appear before a grand jury. These orders to appear are called subpoenas, and although the power to subpoena does not belong to prosecutors, it is the prosecutor who almost always has witnesses subpoenaed to the grand jury.

Besides subpoenaing anyone they choose before a grand jury, prosecutors can also subpoena anything. In a normal, non-grand jury setting, prosecutors cannot have a person's home searched and personal possessions seized unless they can convince a judge that there is enough indication of wrong doing to justify a search warrant. But if a prosecutor before a grand jury wants to get a hold of someone's personal papers, all that prosecutor has to do is have the papers subpoenaed. The person must either produce the papers inside the grand jury chamber or face a penalty for contempt of court.

There is virtually nothing that a prosecutor can't bring before a grand jury. At a trial, illegally seized material—items police have improperly expropriated—cannot be introduced as evidence. In the grand jury chamber, a prosecutor may introduce illegal evidence, even without informing the grand jurors of its illegality. The same situation holds for what is called hearsay evidence. Hearsay—asking a third party to testify to what an eyewitness saw or heard instead of asking the eyewitness directly—cannot be introduced, with some exceptions, during an actual trial. But prosecutors on the federal level and in many, although not all, states may ask a grand jury to return an indictment solely on the basis of hearsay evidence.

While prosecutors may bring anyone or anything they choose before a grand jury, they may also withhold any information they want. If there is evidence that would tend to show an accused's innocence—exculpatory evidence, in legal jargon—the prosecutor is not obliged to share this evidence with the grand jury. Nor does a prosecutor have to let an accused present exculpatory evidence directly to the grand jury.

The end result of all this is that if the government wants a particular indictment badly enough, the government will get it. According to surveys, grand juries return "no bills"—refuse to indict—in only five per cent of the cases brought before them.[5] Only some of these no bills, however, reflect instances where a grand jury actually disagrees with a prosecutor. In certain controversial cases involving public figures a prosecutor would rather not indict, the prosecutor may softpedal the case against the accused, hoping that the grand jury will get the prosecutor "off the hook" by not indicting. Moreover, in those cases where a grand jury does not find the prosecution's evidence sufficient to indict, the government can keep bringing the same case before different grand juries until it finds one that will indict.

Added together, all these powers give prosecutors total discretion inside the grand jury chamber. A fair-minded prosecutor can use this discretion to develop the truth. A narrow-minded one can exploit it to put blinders on your eyes.

Danger Signals

Haldeman: (Inaudible) Well, there is danger in a Grand Jury.
Dean: Well, there are no rules.
President: Well, Grand Juries are not very fair sometimes—Dean: That's right.
--from the Watergate Transcripts, conversation of March 22, 1973

Given the government's lockgrip on what goes on inside the grand jury chamber, can grand jurors avoid becoming the unwitting accomplices of manipulative prosecutors? We think so, provided grand jurors learn to recognize the danger signals that give away prosecutorial misconduct. Some danger signals are obvious, others much more subtle. No list of danger signals can be complete, but the one below does outline the pressures you may find yourself up against. If you and your grand juror colleagues start noting any of the danger signals that follow on a regular basis, tread carefully. Trouble may be "a brewing."

Loose Language

"Watch what they do, not what they say" is a solid maxim citizens should apply to all government officials. But when it comes to prosecutors, grand jurors have to watch what they say as closely as what they do. That's because there are many comments a prosecutor can make to prejudice your deliberations.

As a grand juror, you are entitled to hear hard evidence, actual facts. If the evidence a prosecutor presents is strong, the prosecutor should have little trouble getting grand jurors to return a true bill. If, however, the only evidence the government has is flimsy, the prosecutor may try to "improve" a weak case with irrelevant or loaded comments and asides.

A prosecutor, for example, may choose to argue a case on evidence grand jurors will never be able to examine for themselves:

Unfortunately, the government's most important witness, John Smith, died six months ago. But if Mr. Smith were here today, he would have a remarkable story to tell.[6]

14

Or a prosecutor may constantly refer to an accused with disparaging remarks:

This man is a disgrace to our city's good name.

Grand jurors are not legal experts, for the most part, and a prosecutor may attempt to overawe you with his or her professionalism:

In all my years in the district attorney's office, I have never seen a case as open and shut as this one.

A prosecutor may try to get you to make your decision on the basis of an issue that has nothing to do with the case at hand:

What's at stake here is the reputation of the police. If no indictment is returned here today, this panel is telling the world that our police are a bunch of liars.

While it is a grand jury's job to make sure that no accused person stands trial unless there is good reason—probable cause—to believe that he or she has committed a crime, a prosecutor may attempt to pull a true bill out of a hesitant grand jury by downplaying the significance of the indictment process:

By indicting this woman, you're not sentencing her to jail. If she is innocent, the jury will acquit her at trial. That's what the jury system is for.

A prosecutor may seek to bias you against a witness with embarrassing questions:

Are you married? To whom are you married? You have a son, don't you? Do you love your son? Why are you ashamed to answer questions about your son? Who is the father of your child?

Some questions may reveal a prosecutor who has more in mind than helping you determine whether or not to indict a particular individual, the only proper grand jury function. Be especially alert for broad, open-ended questions. This question was asked by a federal prosecutor in 1970:

I want you to tell the grand jury what period of time during the years 1969 and 1970 you resided at 2201 Ocean Front Walk, Venice (Los Angeles), who resided there at the time you lived there, identifying all the persons you have seen in or about the premises at that address, and tell the grand jury all of the conversations that were held by you or others in your premises during the time you were at that address.[7]

A prosecutor who asks questions like these is more likely interested in filling intelligence dossiers on private citizens than presenting evidence. Intelligence gathering is not a proper function of the grand jury.

Neither is using the grand jury to "fish" for information that could be used against an already indicted defendant at trial. This practice most commonly arises in cases where the government has had a suspect hastily indicted on scanty evidence, then finds itself in desperate need of evidence that will stand up in court. Be wary whenever a prosecutor begins questioning a witness about a crime for which someone has already been indicted.

Prosecutors have in the past tried to intimidate witnesses to get information:

Do you really expect this grand jury to believe that? Don't you know that people can go to jail for lying to a grand jury?

Such questions unfairly undercut a witness' credibility, a function also served by badgering witnesses who ask permission to leave the grand jury chamber to see their attorney outside:

Don't you know this grand jury is working on a tight schedule? You've already gone out to see your lawyer before. What's the matter? Do you have something to hide?

Going through the motions

What prosecutors do can be every bit as telling as what they say. Bad deeds belie good faith every time, and it's not difficult to pinpoint some of the prosecutorial actions that should start those danger signals flashing for you.

- The first thing to check when you begin considering a case is whether the proceedings are being recorded. While not all jurisdictions require that grand jury proceedings be recorded, it's impossible to hold prosecutors accountable for what they do and say before a grand jury without a permanent record. With recording devices so simply and inexpensively available, there is no legitimate excuse for not recording grand jury exchanges involving the prosecutor.

It's essential that all prosecutor-grand jury interactions be recorded, not just the interrogation of witnesses. A prosecutor can make highly improper remarks when a witness or suspect is not inside the grand jury chamber.

Once recording has begun, make sure it continues. If a prosecutor should ever have a recording apparatus turned off (or a stenographer stopped) in order to make an "off-the-record" comment, you should, as a self-respecting grand juror, hit the roof. Internal grand jury deliberations, of course, should not be recorded. Secrecy is necessary here to maintain the integrity of the grand juror decision-making process. If prosecutors should ever walk in on your internal jury deliberations, inform the judge who has impanelled your grand jury immediately.

• Justice delayed, the legal saying goes, is justice denied, and the right of every individual to a speedy disposition of the government's charges against him or her is a fundamental aspect of civil liberty. But sometimes a prosecutor's speed inside the grand jury chamber may be designed to benefit the government, not the accused. Legal observors have dubbed this undue haste the "race to indict." This unusual dash occurs in judicial districts where the grand jury and information coexist as methods of charging. In such circumstances, an arrested suspect may choose to waive the right to a grand jury indictment and seek instead to be charged by information. An information requires, as we have noted above, a public preliminary hearing where an accused hears and can challenge the government's evidence. A person charged via the grand jury route has no such opportunity, which is why some prosecutors will rush to get an indictment returned before the accused has an opportunity to call for a preliminary hearing.

At other times, undue haste may take the shape of subpoenas that demand a witness' immediate presence before a grand jury. Witnesses have been called before grand juries on only minutes' or hours' notice by subpoenas that indicate neither the crime under investigation nor the reason the person has been subpoenaed. Aside from disrupting a person's life—if you were ordered at this very moment to appear at the local courthouse in one hour, how would that affect you and your family?—such last-minute subpoenas effectively prevent a witness from arranging for legal advice. The resulting confusion is only likely to panic an already apprehensive witness.

The harassment factor in these subpoenas is obvious. What they contribute to the grand jury's dispassionate search for truth is not.

• Subpoenas themselves can put out danger signals. A subpoena that, for instance, demands the grand jury appearance of a public official in the midst of a heated election campaign or a subpoena that forces a witness to travel long distances, at great inconvenience, to be before the grand jury should raise questions in grand jurors' minds about what the prosecutor may be up to. As a general rule, any subpoena that causes a witness personal hardship entitles you and your fellow grand jurors to, at the least, a convincing explanation of why the subpoena was necessary.

Such a rule also applies equally to a subpoena duces tecum, a special kind of subpoena that demands the production of books, documents and the like. A subpoena duces tecum that orders a witness to turn over enormous numbers of papers to a grand jury could conceivably paralyze a particular organization or enterprise. This dislocation might be justifiable, but conscientious grand jurors cannot assume that the prosecutor can justify it. Ask.[8]

A wide-ranging subpoena duces tecum may also indicate that the government has tried to get a search warrant and failed because it could not prove to a judge that the warrant was proper under the circumstances. In cases like these, a subpoena duces tecum becomes a substitute for a search warrant, an end run around court rulings the government doesn't like.

When silence isn't golden

Meetings, groups, associations, and conversations are the First Amendment building blocks of our political process. Unless the government is engaged in a bona fide presentation of evidence of criminal activity to a grand jury, it has no business probing into such activities, frightening citizens away from them, or punishing people who resist revealing them to hostile authorities.
--Charles Goodell, former United States Senator, 1973

The danger signals of prosecutorial misconduct may be, as we have seen, comments or deeds. They may even be a single word. In fact, there are two words you might hear as a grand juror that should start red lights flashing just by their mere mention: immunity and perjury. Their mention inside the grand jury chamber doesn't mean something improper is about to happen, but it does increase the chances. Prosecutors who improperly manipulate immunity and perjury are the most dangerous you will ever face.

Immunity

Immunity has been variously described as an indispensable law enforcement tool, a slipshod legalism that rewards criminal behavior and a trapdoor to prison for those who value their personal privacy. It is, in short, a highly controversial item.

What is immunity? In its best sense, a bargain between a witness and the government. In return for a witness' testimony, the government promises not to prosecute the witness on the subject he or she may testify about.

Why should the government have to promise immunity in order to obtain a witness' information? The answer is in the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment of the Bill of Rights states that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself (sic)." This clause, usually referred to as "the privilege against self-incrimination" is no mere technicality. It is the bedrock of our criminal justice philosophy.

In our judicial system, anyone accused of a crime is presumed innocent. The government must prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the individual need not prove innocence. He or she is free to remain silent, and the right to this silence is crucial. If a suspect did not have a lawful right to silence, the government, with all the resources at its command, could pressure a person into saying what the government wanted to hear. Indeed, if the government had the authority to force citizens to answer its questions, privacy and the freedoms to speak, write and read freely would never be secure.

In the United States the government does not have the authority to force people to answer its questions. The Fifth Amendment protects our right to silence, and the government cannot revoke it. But while the government cannot force a person to relinquish this protection, federal and state legislation has given prosecutors the ability to replace the right to silence with a different sort of protection: immunity. Once the government removes the possibility of self-incrimination by immunizing a person from future prosecution, that person has no Fifth Amendment right to remain silent.

Used correctly, immunity can benefit both the immunized witness and society. Consider, for example, a case where the government has identified a minor participant in a criminal conspiracy, but needs more evidence to indict the higher-ups. The small-timer could provide that evidence, but he, understandably, is reluctant to answer questions that would help the government convict him. So the government strikes a bargain: if the witness testifies inside the grand jury chamber, the government will grant the witness immunity from future prosecution. The witness agrees and, immunized, appears before the grand jury. His testimony leads to the indictments of his criminal superiors, and all the parties to the bargain walk away from it pleased—the government because the serious criminals are headed for jail, the immunized witness because he's not.

Immunity, however, does not always work so well. While prosecutors can immunize the criminal "small-fry" to obtain evidence against the criminals who really matter, they may also grant immunity to important criminals who should be prosecuted for their crimes, not immunized from them.

These immunity baths, as they are sometimes called, can seriously undermine public confidence in the judicial system. Today, though, immunity's greatest danger is not that prosecutors will use it to "reward" their criminally involved friends, but that they will manipulate it to punish their "enemies." Immunity can enable prosecutors to jail people without having to bother proving them guilty in a court of law.

The process may begin whenever a grand jury witness invokes the Fifth Amendment. On the federal level, a prosecutor can obtain an authorization to immunize this silent witness by filing a brief form with the Attorney General's office in Washington. Approval here is usually automatic, and once this authorization is signed by the appropriate federal judge, who by law must sign it once the Attorney General's office has given its approval, the grant of immunity becomes an order. The witness who refuses to comply with it—that is, testify—may be brought before the judge and found in contempt.

The destination for a witness found in contempt is jail. The length of the witness' stay behind bars depends on the nature of the contempt. Civil contempt is meant to coerce a recalcitrant witness (a witness who refuses to testify under court order) into testifying. A civil contempt incarceration lasts as long as the immunized witness' silence, and that, theoretically, could be a very long time. The witness may be kept in jail for as long as the grand jury that seeks his or her testimony sits. When the grand jury's term expires, the witness may be resubpoenaed before a new grand jury, immunized and jailed again. What this means is that a person found in civil contempt can be jailed indefinitely for what amounts to the "crime of silence."

Criminal contempt, on the other hand, is designed to punish a recalcitrant witness for interfering with the judicial process, not to coerce a witness into answering questions. A witness jailed for criminal contempt cannot end the confinement by simply deciding to testify, because the confinement is for a fixed term.

A judge unilaterally may sentence a recalcitrant witness to up to six months in jail for criminal contempt, but if a sentence of more than six months is contemplated, the witness must be tried before a jury on the criminal contempt charges.

Prosecutors usually justify the jailing of silent witnesses by citing society's "right to every man's evidence." Interestingly, however, forcibly immunizing witnesses and threatening them with jail if they refuse to answer questions seldom produces valuable evidence, which is really not surprising.

There are, after all, many reasons behind a witness' silence, some base, but others perfectly understandable—even admirable. On the former end of the silent scale are people involved in organized crime intrigues. They often won't testify inside the grand jury room because they fear the consequences of testifying against their criminal colleagues. Given the choice between confinement for contempt if they don't answer questions and the proverbial "cement shoes" if they do, professional criminals immunized without their consent will choose silence.

Silence, though, is hardly the sole preserve of the disreputable. The ranks of the silent may, at various times, include:

- political activists who feel that they have only been subpoenaed because they are members of a group the government wants to discredit and disrupt with a headline-ridden grand jury witch hunt.[9]
- journalists who believe that the obligation of reporters to protect the identity of their sources is essential to a free and vibrant press.[10]
- lawyers who would rather face a finding of contempt than answer questions about their clients and break the confidentiality that is necessary for a meaningful attorney-client relationship.[11]

We could continue this categorization of silent witnesses for some time, but, suffice it to say, there can be legitimate reasons behind a witness' decision not to answer questions inside the grand jury chamber.

Sometimes, however, the Fifth Amendment right to silence will be invoked for no apparent reason: a witness asked an innocuous question like "Where do you work?" will respond by invoking the Fifth Amendment. Is this witness mocking the integrity of the grand jury process? Not at all. The witness is simply taking a constitutional precaution. The Supreme Court has ruled that a sworn witness cannot pick and choose the questions he or she will answer and which he or she won't. Once a witness has begun to answer questions in the grand jury room, he or she has lost the right to invoke the Fifth Amendment on other questions.

Prosecutors know this, of course, but many grand jurors do not. Thus, a prosecutor may try to bias an unknowing grand jury against a witness by labelling a witness' apparent nonsensical invocation of the Fifth Amendment a disrespectful act, which it is not. In fact, since so few grand jurors understand that an invocation of the Fifth Amendment is not an admission of guilt, a prosecutor can bias a grand jury against a witness simply by forcing an invocation of the Fifth Amendment on any question. This is why the American Bar Association's standards for ethical prosecutorial conduct deem it improper for a prosecutor to call before a grand jury a witness who has already told the prosecutor he or she plans to invoke the Fifth Amendment inside the grand jury chamber.

The American Bar Association also maintains that it is wrong for a prosecutor to call a target—the subject of an investigation—before a grand jury without informing that person that he or she is under suspicion. On the federal level and in many states, there is no legal provision stopping prosecutors from engaging in this very practice. A grand jury witness who doesn't know whether he or she may be indicted on the basis of the testimony he or she is being asked to give has another good reason to remain silent.

Forcing immunity onto silent witnesses makes them choose between their commitment to silence and jail. For those whose decision to remain silent is based on conscience, there is only one choice. They will go behind bars rather than answer questions. In cases like these, immunity benefits neither the witness nor society.

As a grand juror, you can play a key role in preventing immunity abuse. Whenever an immunity order is contemplated, ask if the prosecutor really expects the grant of immunity to produce testimony of value to the grand jury. If your prosecutor cannot answer with more than vague conjecture, be persistent. Has the witness in question refused to talk to prosecutors outside of the grand jury room? Why? Is the witness afraid of testifying? Will a grant of immunity and its corresponding threat of contempt overcome that fear? Or has the witness refused to answer questions because he or she objects, on a principled basis, to the prosecutor's questions? If need be, let the silent witness explain his or her position, even if that means asking the prosecutor to leave the grand jury chamber temporarily.

Under current immunity statutes, grand jurors are not asked to approve or deny a prosecutor's request for an immunity order. But this doesn't mean that a grand jury is helpless in the face of what it considers an improper immunity order. If you should feel that a particular immunity order does not serve the public interest, inform the court. Also keep in mind that an immunized witness' refusal to testify is only contemptuous as long as the grand jury demands the witness' testimony. By withdrawing a subpoena or refusing to pursue the disputed questions, your grand jury panel can prevent the confinement of a silent witness.

The misuse of use immunity

Since 1970 the form of immunity applicable on the federal and most state levels has been a special type called limited or use immunity.[12] A witness granted use immunity can be forced to testify about an incident, even if that testimony is self-incriminatory, yet still be prosecuted for that incident at a later time—as long as the government does not use the immunized witness' testimony, either directly or indirectly, in a future prosecution.*

This use immunity, which has been the subject of intense controversy, adds an extra dimension of risk to grand jury proceedings. Use immunity has helped some prosecutors improperly discover defendants' trial strategy. A suspect about to be indicted on the basis of evidence a prosecutor has already accumulated is subpoenaed before a grand jury, immunized and interrogated about the alleged crime. If the person admits guilt, the prosecutor knows the government has an open-and-shut case that cannot be refuted. If the person claims exonerating circumstances, the prosecutor learns the details of the defense the potential defendant plans to give later at trial. Armed with this information, the prosecutor can specifically tailor the government's case to rebut the defense's contentions. The defendant, of course, has no comparable means to force the prosecutor to reveal the government's trial strategy.

Unfair discovery is one way prosecutors may abuse use immunity. There is another, which brings us to our second danger word . . .

Perjury

Definitions of perjury vary somewhat, but most people would agree that to perjure oneself means to deliberately lie under oath. Perjury is and should be a crime. No one should be able to swear to tell the truth and then not. But should the government be able to make a perjurer out of someone who walks into the grand jury chamber with no intention of lying?

Sound preposterous? It can happen when a prospective defendant is called before a grand jury and compelled to testify by a grant of use immunity. If the witness denies his or her guilt, the prosecutor can ask the grand jury to indict the witness for perjury as well as for the alleged criminal act under consideration, reasoning that if the grand jury feels there is probable cause to prosecute, then the accused must have been lying when he or she denied committing the crime. By branding the defendant as a perjurer like this, the prosecutor has immeasurably strengthened the government's chances of getting a conviction from the trial jury.[13]

*Under the traditional transactional immunity, which still applies in some states, the government may never prosecute an immunized witness on the subject described in his or her testimony, unless the witness is guilty of perjury.

There are other unsavory ways perjury indictments can be built out of grand jury proceedings. Prosecutors, for instance, can call witnesses repeatedly before one or more grand juries over a long span of time and ask the same questions, hoping that recollections, and hence answers, will differ from one appearance to the next. Since witnesses are not allowed by right to see their earlier grand jury statements, made perhaps when the event in question was fresher in their minds, the chances that inadvertent discrepancies will appear are high.

But honest mistakes are not perjurous statements. A sufficiently zealous prosecutor can trap almost anyone into a mistake, but no prosecutor should ever be able to trap a grand jury into returning an unjust perjury indictment. As always, be alert!

Some precautions

Every time you hand down an indictment, you are sitting there not as a rubber stamp for a district attorney, not as people who read the law and apply it rigidly, but as people who say: "We live in this city, we know its problems and we are going to hand down indictments in accordance with the necessities of modern life, and last and always the most important, we are going to see that no district attorney, no irresponsible assistant, no cop seeking revenge, no judge, if you will, can charge, or get us into a situation where even a subpoena which can destroy the good name of a friend is issued, or an indictment handed down, unless we know that it is not being done for political purposes, for revenge, for satisfying a private grudge, or is contrary to the conscience of the community."

--Thomas Dewey, prosecutor and Governor of New York

How can you prevent grand jury abuse? You have already taken the first step by studying what can go wrong inside the grand jury chamber. Now combine that knowledge with the basic guidelines below, and you will be well on your way to becoming a serious, thoughtful grand juror.

Be skeptical.

Don't take what you hear inside the grand jury chamber at face value. Most grand jurors realize that they can question witnesses to clarify a confusing point. Sometimes, however, it may be just as important to question prosecutors. Make sure you understand what your prosecutor is doing every step of the way. If you don't fully understand what is transpiring before you, ask. A confused grand juror is a worthless grand juror.

Be watchful.

Keep your eye out for the tell-tale signs of grand jury abuse discussed earlier in this booklet. Anyone can spot misconduct after it takes place. The trick is to prevent abuse before it occurs.

Be independent.

Grand jurors may see and hear what they want. Don't limit yourself to only what the government would like you to know. Ask your prosecutor if any other evidence exists that would shed a different light on the case at hand. Subpoena witnesses whose testimony you feel would increase your understanding of the case. If you ever feel that a prosecutor is deliberately dragging his or her feet to prevent an indictment that should be returned, make your displeasure known to the prosecutor. If the foot-dragging continues, request a new, special prosecutor from the court.

Above all, remember that while you do not have to be convinced of a person's guilt to return an indictment, the grand jury's democratic purpose is to guarantee that no individual be made to stand trial on flimsy charges. That's a tall order, and, as a grand juror, you will have to stand tall to achieve it.

Good luck.

After it's over

When your stint as a grand juror is over, then what are you going to do?

File the experience off in some dusty corner of your memory and forget about it? We certainly hope not. Whether your grand jury experience was rewarding or frustrating, you owe it to yourself—and the rest of us—to think about your grand jury encounter.

If your grand jury experience was a joy, then share it. The grand jury is a misunderstood and seldom appreciated institution. Take the time to explain the grand jury process to others in your community. Write a letter to the editor, give a little talk to a local club or group.

And if you found the grand jury a deeply flawed judicial mechanism, then do something to change it. There is a wide range of grand jury reform activity now going on in cities, statehouses and Washington. In 1976, for instance, both the Senate and the House of Representatives opened the first Congressional hearings on grand jury reform ever held.

The Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse keeps an extensive record of all these activities and publishes a quarterly publication, Grand Jury Report, for those interested in restoring the grand jury to the honored place it once held in American life. For more information write:

State legislatures and Congress can do much to cure the ills of the grand jury system, but effective grand jury action ultimately depends on the existence of effective grand jurors. No one knows that better than former grand jurors themselves. Yet although former grand jurors have a unique perspective to offer on the grand jury system, precious little effort has been made to determine what they feel makes grand jurors effective. You can help break this silence by completing the questionnaire on the following page. Thank you.

A questionnaire for former grand jurors

1. Before I was called to serve on the grand jury, I ____ was well-versed on the function and purpose of grand juries.
____ had a rough idea of how grand juries operate.
____ knew virtually nothing about the grand jury process.
additional comments:

2. The grand jury I served on was ____ on the federal level.
____ on the state or local level.

3. During most of the grand jury proceedings, I ____ was kept fully informed about what was happening and why.
____ was often confused.
____ was lost.
additional comments:

4. The grand jury on which I served returned the indictments sought by the government:
____ 100 per cent of the time.
____ 95-99 per cent of the time.
____ 90-94 per cent of the time.
____ other, please estimate

5. I felt the prosecutor(s) who presented cases before my grand jury ____ was sensitive to the rights of suspects and witnesses.
____ was insensitive to the rights of suspects and witnesses.
additional comments:

6. In answering grand jury questions and requests, the prosecutor was:
____ very cooperative.
____ uncooperative.
additional comments:

32

7. I feel my service on the grand jury:
____ was an exhilarating experience.
____ served no real purpose.
additional comments:

8. I found this handbook:
____ very useful.
____ sometimes useful.
____ irrelevant.
additional comments:

9. I would be interested in participating in an organization of former grand jurors:
____ yes.
____ no.

10. I would be interested in attending a grand jurors' conference:
____ yes.
____ no.

Mr. ASHLEY. One of the most important subjects that comes up here and on the State level is the matter of counsel in grand jury rooms. This was a subject that was passed in the Senate and the Assembly in New York a couple of years ago, was subsequently vetoed by the Governor, and we think correctly so. We cannot see anything worthwhile coming out of all of this.

We, of course, point to all of the testimony that has gone before, the expert testimony of Judge Lacy, Mr. Curran, and the rest, that it would be a disruptive force. We don't see it accomplishing anything worthwhile, and we, of course, do see serious matters of breach of secrecy in permitting counsel into the jury room. We can see nothing worthwhile coming out of it.

We again make the point as it is in my statement that as laymen we can still see no real reason for it. We point out that the Supreme Court's version of all of this, that a grand jury is not an adversary procedure. If it is not an adversary procedure, then certainly there is no requirement for, or should not be any requirement for counsel in the jury room, and we do think this is very pertinent.

Now, the subject of rubberstamping, rubberstamp grand juries, has come up. I am not—I am purposely not going to comment on this matter; I am going to defer in a moment, if I may, to Mr. Lyons, who I know will want to talk in this direction, and I realize that this is the other important matter in front of you.

The way we do see it is this; if you are going to reform the grand jury system, then the reform really should be directed toward the district attorneys or the attorneys. Perhaps this is where the reform should come from.

We don't see abuse. I have never heard of any abuses caused by grand juries themselves. I have never heard of any leaks caused by grand jurors, but what you are talking about here is bringing grand jurors to a point where they are so bogged down and so hog-tied by the proposed legislation that the press will inevitably have a magnificent field-day and eventually call for the abolition of the system as being inefficient and not representative. This thing is an inevitable development; this is, I think, most undesirable, indeed.

We are concerned here, and we are here today because, as I mentioned in my statement, we fully realize that the Federal law leads. And we are concerned about what the actions that you take here will be construed as on a State level. As I point out, the bill as—your bill, as it stands, will sorely hurt the State system, at least as far as New York is concerned. It will sorely hurt the State; this is our primary concern. It is noted that in vetoing the bill for counsel in grand jury rooms in New York State, one of the points that Governor Carey mentioned, of course, was that counsel is not allowed on a Federal level and there has been no real reason for it to be allowed on a State level.

Now I do say in one other statement here, if there is one instrument of the judicial system that perhaps rates or deserves unique treatment it is the grand jury system. Because this is the one instance in all, this is the one instance that the public has representation within all of the judicial procedures. It is the public, and what I offer to you is this, it is the public that is important in here, at least in this instance it is the public that is important.

The desires, the propensity, the necessities of the judicial system, of the judges, of the district attorneys, of the prosecutors and what have you, are, of course, important, but they are in this instance perhaps secondary. The grand jury is still the people's big stick. And it is the grand jury which is important; it is the grand jury as the representation of the people within the judicial system; it is that body that is important.

It is commendable, indeed, that the prosecutors, that the attorneys, that the judiciary be that concerned with reform. But what we say to you is that in the instance of grand jury reform, it is very possibly more important indeed that the public input receive perhaps the greatest consideration. Now we are not speaking within the legalese which I understand and I fully realize is important in the consideration, especially——

Mr. EILBERG. We are interested, Mr. Ashley, in your experience sitting in grand jury rooms.

Mr. ASHLEY. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you for the record just tell us, have you served, and when and where did you serve?

Mr. ASHLEY. Rockland County, N.Y.

Mr. EILBERG. For what period of time and when? What year, or years?

Mr. ASHLEY. The last time was approximately 5 years ago.

Mr. EILBERG. And for how long?

Mr. ASHLEY. We serve on a monthly basis.

Mr. EILBERG. You serve for 1 month?

Mr. ASHLEY. One month at a time, yes, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. How many months have you served?

Mr. ASHLEY. Total?

Mr. EILBERG. Total.

Mr. ASHLEY. Approximately 6 months. Roughly 6 months.

Mr. EILBERG. All right. Now, if you will excuse me, we will have to leave shortly after 3. I apologize to you for that. I think we will just have to go to the next witness. If we have time for questions, fine; if not, we will send them to you and ask you to reply to us in writing.

Mr. Gloege.

Mr. GLOEGE. My name is William Gloege. I submitted a prepared statement.

Mr. EILBERG. It will be made part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Gloege follows:]

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM P. GLOEGE, VICE PRESIDENT, ASSOCIATION FOR EFFECTIVE GRAND JURIES

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, my name is William P. Gloege. While I am Vice President of a group of former grand jurors from Santa Clara County, Calif., known as the Association for Effective Grand Juries, I appear today on my own behalf. The views expressed are my own, and are based on my experience as a Federal grand juror during the first half of 1975 in San Francisco.

During our term there were two other grand juries impaneled to explore special areas (police corruption and income tax matters). Ours was the general grand jury, hearing a variety of routine matters such as bank robberies, mail thefts and crimes committed on Federal property. A major part of our work toward the end of our term involved an extensive investigation of airlines selling tickets at prices under those set by the C.A.B.

Let me first give you my overall impression of the Federal grand jury system from a vantage point inside the jury room. In my statement I discuss problems I saw during my term as a grand juror, then I indicate how H.R. 94 contributes to resolution of these problems. Additional areas needing reform, from my point of view, are also discussed.

OVERALL IMPRESSION OF THE FEDERAL GRAND JURY SYSTEM

It may be useful to provide some brief details on my personal orientation. I am employed by a large metropolitan police agency as an administrator in the office of the Chief of Police. This experience has shown me that there are individuals in our society that need to be vigorously pursued and prosecuted. It has shown me that lack of such vigor on the part of police and prosecutors can create a vacuum in society into which an undesirable element will flow to the detriment of the rest of the populace.

Prosecutors at the Federal, State and local levels need to be vigorous; they need our support and they need all the legitimate tools we can provide them to be successful in the pursuit of lawbreakers.

Having said this, my impression of the grand jury system is that it is a weak link in the fine system of justice we have in the United States. Perhaps the reason is the secrecy of the system which keeps its workings out of the public eye. Perhaps it is due to the feeling of the ordinary citizen who makes up the grand jury that he cannot or should not question the government.

THE ACTUAL JURY ROOM EXPERIENCE

There was never any question who was in charge of our grand jury. The U.S. Attorney (I assume with concurrence of the Court) selected our foreman—a pleasant, older gentleman who was about to retire from his job in the Postal Service. The vice-foreman was selected in the same manner. We received brief instruction from the judge, but it was the prosecutor who told us in detail what was expected.

The United States Attorney was an impressive figure to us—urbane, friendly, intelligent, highly skilled in the law and respectful toward we grand jurors. He never became ruffled, not even after long days of testimony or in the face of a grand juror or two who persisted in disagreement.

The U.S. Attorney explained to us that there had been accusations that grand juries served as a "rubber stamp" for the prosecutor. He didn't want us to be a "rubber stamp," he said. But we got down to business and were soon turning out indictments—in batches. We would hear five or ten cases before deliberating and voting the indictments.

The principal impression I received was that the process is very one-sided. It is designed that way, and it will take major and innovative changes to achieve a more balanced and fair process.

On one side is the prosecutor and his team of able assistants. They were, most of them, very sincere individuals, and it was hard or impossible to imagine them doing anything less than honorable in their pursuit of criminals. Aiding the U.S. Attorney and his assistants, other impressive groups and individuals are brought into play: FBI agents—sober, matter-of-fact, no-nonsense, speaking with authority, but sometimes making depreciating remarks about the accused; Treasury agents—well trained, technicians; Immigration agents—harried, undermanned and undermined by the Executive, Congress and others. Agents from other departments or agencies fell into similar categories.

The point is, on the prosecutor's side were good-intentioned federal attorneys and agents whose only concern seemed to be to do their job simply and fairly. We could identify with them. Like us, they were middle class, with possibly a little more education than the average grand juror. They treated us in a friendly manner as if we were both there for the same purpose—on the same side of the fence, as it were.

And vaguely lurking in the background was the whole power of the Federal Government—Army, Navy, Air Force—everything. The U.S. Attorney was the Establishment—the established order and all the power and prestige it had at its command.

On the other side was the accused. Usually one person, but sometimes three, four or more. The U.S. Attorney and the agents that testified told us what the person had done, and it was obvious that our job was to vote an indictment. On occasion we were read a "rap sheet" of the person's former criminal history.

(This history usually consisted of charges against the person, with no indication of whether he or she had subsequently been found guilty.)

Only on a few occasions out of hundreds of cases did we jurors see the accused. Of these, there were a few who turned out to fit what we expected; but more often a person surprised us by making a better impression than expected—based on what we'd heard.

Given the forces on the side of issuing an indictment—their impressive numbers and demeanor, our identification with the establishment, the fact we seldom knew the accused in person and the unsavory light the accused was sometimes cast in—all this made the outcome of our cases and the path every grand jury follows all but inevitable.

CHALLENGING THE U.S. ATTORNEY'S CASE

Questioning the case of the prosecutor was a difficult and thankless job for the few grand jurors who at first tried. One assistant to the U.S. Attorney bristled at any suggestion his case was not airtight. He became so verbally abusive in response to grand jurors' questions, which he seemed to consider "insolent," that he began to alienate otherwise submissive and very pro-prosecution jurors.

Grand jurors seemed to fall into three categories in terms of their attitude toward their role. About one quarter were what might be termed prosecution "hawks"—they were for indictment on every case. Their attitude was that the Government would not bring a case before the group that wasn't worthy of an indictment. By definition indictments should be issued on all cases. This group had the upper hand from the start since they had on their side the U.S. Attorney who was in charge of the proceedings, plus the other array of federal forces mentioned above.

Another quarter of the group represented the opposite end of the spectrum. This group, which was much less vocal (except among themselves when they were away from the grand jury room), wanted to face every case with an open mind—which was sometimes hard, given the way cases were presented. Their posture was that of being mildly skeptical of the prosecutor's case. But the questions of this group—at first almost pointed, but later apologetic—often seemed, in the context of the way the proceedings were run, to be out of order and impertinent. The foreman was fair, but he tended to be less patient with this type of questioning. The "hawks" often openly attacked these questioners, or more subtly let them know they were "off base." The U.S. Attorney and testifying agents did nothing to discourage this attitude toward the questioners. Soon this group tired of its role owing to lack of support from other jurors (even those who felt the same), the sometimes outright hostility of prosecutors, the regular hostility of the "hawks," and the obvious futility of going against the U.S. Attorney's intention to obtain an indictment.

The remaining half of the grand jurors did not seem involved on one side or the other. Some expressed a waning interest in being a grand juror and seldom asked questions or participated in deliberations. Absences were ususally from this middle group.

About half way through the term of the grand jury an interesting event took place. The grand jury returned its one and only "no bill." The case involved an older postal worker, and there were numerous questions about whether a criminal act had actually been committed. In deliberations it suddenly became clear that we were about to return a "no bill" and a feeling of awe, daring and electricity swept the group. It was uncomfortable to go up against the government like this. When the Assistant U.S. Attorney returned to the room and learned of the "no bill" he was concerned and critical. He said something to the effect that we couldn't do it and certain forms had to be filled out which we didn't have. It was an awkward moment for all of us, and everyone was glad to move on with business. I wondered how the attorney would explain this rare event to his boss—the U.S. Attorney.

One closing note on the problems with the system encountered during service as a grand juror. At one point the U.S. Attorney assured grand jurors that those we indicted had another chance—they would get a jury trial, and if they were not guilty would not go to prison. The attorney was asked about percentage of cases he got "true bills"—he replied, "99.9 percent." "What percent of these resulted in convictions?" He did not know. Later we learned that a sizeable number (we could not get an exact figure) of cases we indicted never went to trial! This came as a shock after thinking everyone would get a second chance.

Undoubtedly indictments on numerous counts provided a powerful plea bargaining tool for the prosecutor to obtain guilty pleas and thus maintain a good record for the U.S. Attorney.

REACTION TO H.R. 94

H.R. 94 is a good bill that deserves the support of Congress. As a former grand juror, the reforms it proposes seem moderate and overdue. Below are specific comments or provisions of the bill.

GRAND JURY SIZE

The proposal to reduce the size of the grand jury may not be beneficial. In the larger group more points of view can be expressed, which would be important if grand juries do become vocal and independent. Expenditures for grand juries must represent a small fraction of costs of the Federal justice system, so a cost savings argument is not really valid.

IMMUNITY OF WITNESSES

The bill states that any individual required to give testimony may not be indicted by the grand jury before which the individual has testified. However, could the individual be indicted before a concurrent grand jury in that district, or a subsequent grand jury that would hear the compelled testimony?

Under Section 2—Recalcitrance, and Section 3—Immunity, stronger and specific provisions might be built in to protect the news media. Our grand jury had numerous cases whereby the prosecutor attempted to force information out of reporters, station managers and other news media personnel related to a crime, wherein persons claiming to have committed the act transmitted information to the news media.

Such pressure tactics on the news media could inhibit the public's ability to learn the truth. Sources will be less willing to inform the media if media personnel can be successfully compelled to reveal sources.

This method of getting evidence seems heavy-handed in view of the vast machinery at the disposal of the federal government to catch wrong-doers. To replace good investigative tactics with getting an armlock on the media seems unfair and something the public should not tolerate.

Section 6 deals with independence of the grand jury and presents good provisions for achieving independence. However, unless grand jurors have a will to be independent and other means, such as those suggested in other parts of this statement are activated, these important improvisions of H.R. 94 can easily be turned aside by the prosecutor. For example, while an individual who is to be indicted can request to appear before the grand jury, the prosecutor can make this testimony unlikely in the way he presents the request. He can remind the jury of its large volume of business, infer that such a hearing would be a waste of time based on the person's previous record, etc.

The bill indicates the Government will be required to advise the grand jury of exculpatory evidence. As a grand juror, I requested exculpatory evidence on several occasions. The response was a somewhat short-tempered reply that (a) the Government wouldn't bring us cases involving an innocent party, and (b) the Government, out of a sense of fair play, would surely inform us of any evidence which tended to excuse the individual being investigated from the act in question.

However, I cannot recall a single case of exculpatory evidence being introduced, but it is hard to imagine that in the hundreds of cases we heard there was no such evidence. Will putting this requirement in the bill insure that the prosecutor will turn over such evidence? It seems the key will be having a strong and independent grand jury that will start to ask questions if exculpatory evidence never appears.

REPORTS

The reporting requirements required in the bill are excellent. It may be useful in (b)(2), for example, to require not only the number of requests by United States grand juries to the Attorney General for approval to compel testimony, and the number approved, but also the percentage of all investigations which result in such a request. This number would be the number of investigations the district reports under (b)(1) of this same section. The same percentage of all cases can be reported along with the number for (b)(3), (b)(4), (b)(5) and (b)(6). In this way the Congress can determine how one district compares to another, or to the average in, say, the percentage of all investigations that result in witnesses being held in contempt and confined (b)(5), or the percentage of "no bills" resulting from testimony obtained under immunity. Of course, the Congress could compute these percentages, but it may be instructive and motivating to the U.S. Attorneys to see these percentages in their reports going to the Congress.

ADDITIONAL POTENTIAL REFORMS

While H.R. 94 is a commendable bill, more could be done to correct the pervasive problem with the federal grand jury system—lack of grand jury independence.

It seems to me that independence is the key ingredient needed to make the system work. If the grand jury has the legal protections and machinery to act in an independent manner, and jurors are capable and willing to act independently, other desired reforms will follow: A truly independent grand jury will see to it that it gets needed outside counsel and expertise needed to carry out investigations, it will vigorously question misuse of immunity, it will insure that witnesses are protected and treated in a civil manner, and it will place demands on federal prosecutors and their agents to bring in well prepared cases.

GRAND JURY SELECTION

The place to start in achieving an independent grand jury is with selection of individuals who comprise the jury. In the Northern District of California jurors are selected at random from voter registration rolls. There is little opportunity for individuals who should or want to drop out to do so. The result is a group containing some unwilling members and many who have a neutral attitude toward service. This condition does not foster a strong cohesive group willing to fight the U.S. Attorney or the courts for their independence if necessary, but instead fosters an attitude that the jury should get through its weekly business and its term as quickly as possible.

A means of improving this situation might be to adopt a means of selection used by some counties in California. Allow interested individuals to "apply" for service as a grand juror. To insure a wide segment of society had the opportunity to participate, a large group of individuals could first be randomly selected from voter registration rolls. These individuals could receive information on grand jury service—its responsibilities, its educational opportunities, its valuable role in the system of justice and the need for a strong, independent grand jury to be formed. The group would be invited to apply. A panel of jurists or, perhaps, a completely independent body made up of both lay persons and experts could be convened to select jurors from the applications. In making their selection, the panel can apply criteria related to interest, independence, availability, balanced points of view, etc. The selection might take place once each year, thereby doing away with the present costly system of selecting from voter lists several times a year.

The method outlined above would seem preferable to the present system and would undoubtedly produce a more independent jury than the present system.

GRAND JURY TRAINING

Our grand jury received a handbook on being a grand juror (it was very brief and general), a set of instructions for a judge that lasted several minutes and then we were in the hands of the U.S. Attorney.

What is needed is some form of outside training for Federal grand jurors that is more thorough, considering the hundreds of cases the jury must hear and decide upon. Again, this training should be carried out by an outside, independent source, not the U.S. Attorney. The intent would not be to alienate the jury from the Government, but to clearly establish in jurors' mind their independent role and how to pursue it as the Constitution intended.

The jury should select its own foreman and vice-foreman after a suitable period when jurors get to know each other. The training could incorporate this selection process.

INDEPENDENT ATTORNEY AND STAFF

Section 3330 (b) (1) of the H.R. 94 provides conditions under which the grand jury could request that the court appoint a special attorney to assist in inquiries of the jury.

A regular, permanent independent attorney would contribute even more to grand jury independence. This attorney could be present when the U.S. Attorney presents cases for indictment and could advise the foreman without participating himself. As staff to the grand jury, the attorney could be present during deliberations, not as a participant, but to furnish legal advice as requested by grand jurors.

As a private citizen I appreciate the opportunity to testify before this Subcommittee. The Legislative branch of Federal Government has many areas of interest and responsibility, but grand jury reform, related as it is to the essence of America—individual freedom—must rank high in priority.

I would be pleased to respond to any questions the Subcommittee may have.

Mr. GLOEGE. I served as a grand juror in San Francisco in 1975. The service commenced in January 1975, and I believe our last meeting was some time in July that year. We were scheduled to serve for 4 months, but the term was extended due to several extended investigations.

It was a general grand jury that heard a variety of what is called routine cases; bank robberies, postal thefts, credit card fraud and similar cases.

Concerning my personal background: I work for a police department in a large metropolitan city, San Jose. I am very familiar with the present situation in our society now in terms of crime and the need for vigorous prosecution and police work to hold this situation in check as much as possible.

Having said that, my impression, based on my service, was that the grand jury is a weak link in an otherwise fine system of justice. It was apparent to me, and I think to all grand jurors, that the U.S. attorney was in charge of this proceeding from the beginning. I don't think that is the way the system was intended to operate, but he was. He participated with the court, in selection of our foreman and vice foreman. We received brief instructions from a judge, perhaps lasting 10 minutes. The bulk of our instruction was given by the U.S. attorney. We received a booklet on how to be a grand juror that I found very brief and general, and not terribly helpful.

My overall impression of my service was that the proceeding is one sided. You hear the prosecution's side very well and you are impressed by it. Agents from various Federal departments testify. On the other side is the accused, the subject of the investigation, who you don't see usually. We saw the subject in a few cases, but very rarely.

There were occasions when the criminal history of the individual who was the target of the indictment was read. Not the crime we were looking into at the time, but previous involvement.

Mr. EILBERG. You refer to that in your statement. I read that.

Go ahead.

Mr. GLOEGE. Yes; There was one unique "two-sided," if I can call it, case that we heard where the Government didn't have an opinion. That is the Government did not expect an automatic indictment. It was a killing that had occurred on Federal property. The Government let us debate both sides openly.

We called the person that was being investigated; we called some other witnesses, and it was a very good, balanced hearing. The vote was not the way I wanted it to come out. I mean I was on the losing side, but I felt very good about that particular case. To me it was a clear example of what the grand jury system could be, where you have a fair exchange and where both sides get debated:

The grand jurors, to my way of thinking, fell into three groups. One group felt all cases brought to us should result in an indictment because the Government was bringing those cases and the Government wouldn't bring them in if they didn't have sufficient reason. Another fourth of the grand jurors I would characterize as mildly skeptical of the U.S. attorney's case. They were prepared, during the first part of our term, to ask questions.

I remember one assistant U.S. attorney that didn't like questions about the Government case at all. He became very hostile and, in fact, he started turning some very pro prosecution grand jurors against him. He started them asking questions—at least in their mind—because of his attitude.

Then I would say the bulk, 50 percent of the grand jurors, were somewhat neutral. We were selected at random from voter registration lists, and many of this middle group were not terribly interested in serving and looked forward mostly to finalizing their service and getting off the grand jury.

We returned one no-bill. I think that speaks more than anything else for the system and some of the problems.

Mr. EILBERG. During the entire 6-month period?

Mr. GLOEGE. Yes; and it amazed us as grand jurors, and we were kind of frightened and surprised at our action. It was a case where there wasn't clear evidence that there was probable cause to believe a crime had been committed, or committed by this individual. When he returned to the room, we informed the U.S. attorney of this eventuality, of this no-bill. He was upset and concerned, and said something to the effect that we needed to fill out some forms to do this, to return a no-bill, and we didn't have the forms.

And what happened to that case, I am not sure. We were anxious to move on with business because we felt very uncomfortable. We never did this before; we never did it again.

H.R. 94, I feel, is a good bill and I feel, based on my experience in that grand jury room, in one district, admittedly, it is a moderate bill. It doesn't go as far as I'd like—I'd like to some additional kinds of reforms which I mentioned in my statement. Let me briefly touch on the bill.

On grand jury size, I think the present size is good because it allows points of view to be expressed, particularly if we can somehow achieve an independent grand jury system where you get debate and exchange of ideas.

Pressure tactics on the news media bothered me as a grand juror. I saw the Government unable to gather evidence in cases, bringing in people from the news media who had been sent tape recordings or documents and forcing them to release this information.

I asked the U.S. attorney how many bombers or terrorizers he had caught in this manner, and he said none to his knowledge. It just seemed to be an unfair and unwarranted way to get evidence, with the Federal machinery we have to do that. Why disrupt the media and the freedom of press that we have in this country? I think it tends to inhibit freedom of the press; it tends to make other people not want to come in and give evidence eventually letting us know, the public know, what is going on.

Exculpatory evidence; I asked on one occasion was there any evidence that tended to excuse the target of the investigation. And the assistant U.S. attorney, that I mentioned before was there, and he became irritated at the question and told me, of course, there wasn't! The government is fair, they wouldn't have brought this case if there was such evidence. It was clear to me that he resented that question.

We never heard any exculpatory evidence, in any case with exception of the killing, and that raised the question in my mind. Wasn't there any? Wasn't there one case, two cases where there was some evidence that tended to excuse the target of the investigation?

So, you know, I think there is a need to somehow bring out exculpatory evidence.

I have here some of the problems with exculpatory evidence today, but there is an urgent need though to get that before the grand jury, to have a more two-sided procedure.

A couple of possible ways to reform the grand jury and to make it independent exist. I see independence as the key, to make that group willing and able to stand up to the U.S. attorney and the courts if necessary and be independent.

Selection of grand jurors, is of prime importance in achieving independence. I would like to see some changes along these lines. Possibly draw a large number of names from the voter registration lists, as we do at present, but then from there use a system that they use in California where you could accept applications from individuals who are interested in becoming grand jurors. You could send out notices to this large number that was selected from the voter registration lists and inform them of the opportunity to serve. Invite them to apply. I think you would get a good self-selection process here that would result in willing and capable grand jurors.

Mr. EILBERG. Provided the method is constitutional. We are not absolutely certain that it is. It is a good idea but there may be some question of constitutionality.

Mr. GLOEGE. I won't say any more about that. It is covered in my statement.

I would like to see some independent training of the grand jurors, and by training I mean more extensive than they are getting now. The training should not be done by the U.S. attorney. Training should fully inform them of their rights as grand jurors, and of their responsibility to act in an independent role. This could be done perhaps by consultants or someone retained for this purpose.

Let me just briefly comment on Judge Lacy's testimony which I found very impressive, and very——

Mr. EILBERG. You are going to have to conclude shortly. We will allow you another minute or so. If you want to supplement your remarks or any of you, for the record, you may do so by mail. We are going to supply each of you with questions. If we had the time we would ask each of the three of you the same questions and then separate questions which we will have to handle by correspondence.

Mr. GLOEGE. I will make one point; the present practice of having the attorney outside the grand jury room I found to be very disruptive. To have the witness or the target going out and consulting with the defense was irritating. It made the person in the grand jury room seem like he had something to hide. Why couldn't he answer the question?

Placing myself on his side, or her side, he or she was looking for protection and was a layman not knowing how to answer the questions. But it was disruptive. The judge said it was no problem. He said it just doesn't happen; it just doesn't cause any problem in the grand jury room. It did in our grand jury, and I can speak for other grand jurors who voiced similar complaints.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to testify today.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Gloege. I am sorry to rush you.

Mr. Lyons.

Mr. LYONS. I will try to be brief in summarizing. Thank you for the opportunity to be here.

Hearing all those experts today, I am glad I put the caveat in that we are not attorneys.

Mr. EILBERG. Let me emphasize that we are interested in your experience in the grand jury room and how other grand jurors feel. We are not looking for any particular responses other than the truth as you observe it, so your contribution is unique in that many lawyers have not been in a grand jury room.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Lyons follows:]

STATEMENT OF JOHN J. LYONS, FIRST VICE PRESIDENT OF THE GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATION, BRONX COUNTY, AND DELEGATE TO THE FEDERATION OF GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATIONS OF NEW YORK STATE

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, thank you for this opportunity to express our views on your proposed changes to the federal grand jury system as embodied in H.R. 94.

We in the Grand Jurors Associations, active participants in the system, have been concerned for years at what appears to be a continued effort to weaken and/or destroy the effectiveness of a grand jury system that has served us in good stead for more than two centuries. Many of the provisions of H.R. 94 are those we have been fending off at the State level year in and year out. We fear their adoption by you would be used as a "compelling reason" for New York State to follow suit and make beating the system just that much easier at both levels.

Before it becomes obvious, I would like to emphasize that we are not attorneys but concerned laymen. Our interest is in the spirit of the law rather than its intricacies. We are disturbed that the successful defense attorney is the one who can search out procedural flaws in the handling of a case (be it by a careless police officer or an inexperienced prosecutor) without regard to the objective truth of the evidence, and thus free a criminal to prey again on society. We do not look with favor on more loopholes through which the guilty, aided and abetted by sophisticated counsel, can slip. We are equally, if not more concerned with the protection of the innocent. To this end we are staunch supporters of the people's right to monitor their own system of justice through effective grand juries.

It has been alleged that the grand jury is too often a "rubber stamp" for the prosecutor. Available facts do not bear this out. The most recent figures concerning the work of grand juries in the State of New York that I have been able to obtain show the following:

	Total dispositions	Indictments returned	Years of treatment recommended	Referred to lower courts	Dismissed
Year:
1969	35,613	27,050	2,440	2,968	3,155
1970	37,019	30,545	2,196	2,821	3,457
1971	45,531	36,635	1,688	2,956	4,202
1972	51,743	43,269	(1)	3,395	5,079
1973	43,924	35,521	(1)	3,751	4,652

[1] This option removed from grand jury consideration in 1971.

At the State level we have long argued against the random selection of the entire grand jury list, believing that the presence of some experienced grand jurors on each grand jury acts as a shield against excesses which might otherwise occur. We believe there is sufficient attrition among panel members, due to relocations and other causes, to require a constant flow of new panelists—on average, 10 percent a year. This permits the orderly absorption of inexperienced grand jurors in to the work of a sitting grand jury and serves the best interests of both the accused and society. We suggest that a true reform would be to strengthen the federal grand jury system by establishing a pool of experienced grand jurors. I trust you will agree that jury service for a short period of time every other year would not create a professional jury, but would reduce exposure to possible "rubber stamp" indictments.

The secrecy of grand jury proceedings is paramount to justice. When secrecy is violated the good names, character and reputations of innocents can be maligned and irreparably damaged. H.R. 94 contains too many exemptions from its secrecy provisions. Unless and until a crime is charged, secrecy should be binding on all.

We do not support the presence of witnesses' attorneys in the grand jury room. A grand jury investigation is not an adversary proceeding. A witness who is ordered to testify after he has refused on the basis of his privilege against self-incrimination receives immunity. There is no need for a defense attorney in the grand jury room. Such presence also increases the risk of secrecy leaks, and could prove dangerous to a cooperating witness in a matter dealing with organized crime.

H.R. 94 requires, among other things, that witnesses served with a subpoena be told the subject matter of the grand jury investigation. We believe this is too broad and that it increases the risk of leaks. It should be sufficient that a witness be told the subject matter about which he will be questioned.

The reduction in the number of grand jurors to not less than nine can lead to difficulties. It makes it possible for a very small number, possibly one, to hamstring the jury. I say possibly one because it is usual for jurors who have not heard all the testimony, due to an absence during a long investigation, to refrain from voting. We would recommend staying with the present 23 jurors.

We also believe the sections of H.R. 94 relating to recalcitrant witnesses weaken the grand jury's ability to obtain necessary testimony, a step in the wrong direction.

Copy of a witness' testimony, under such conditions as the court deems reasonable (certainly subject to various interpretations), is made available to him or his attorney. Here too, secrecy is endangered. Certainly no one should need a copy of his testimony before an indictment is voted.

We find no objection to transactional immunity, a practice in New York. We support the sections relating to the appointment of a special attorney upon the request of a sitting grand jury, agree with the provisions relating to the location of proceedings, and certainly believe a grand jury should be properly instructed.

However, on balance, we do not believe H.R. 94 is a good bill. If there are prosecutors who abuse the grand jury system the remedy is to seek them out and hold them to account, not to emasculate the system and perhaps create more problems than we solve. We urge you to let H.R. 94 die in Committee.

Mr. LYONS. We are very concerned with grand jury legislation both as citizens and as participants in the system. We see the primary purpose of our criminal justice system as being to protect the innocent and punish the guilty. We take our duties seriously. We do not see a grand jury proceeding as a trial; we see it as an investigation toward the end of justice.

Any reform, I think, has to weigh and balance the rights of all, including the people. No system devised by imperfect man and operated by imperfect man is going to be foolproof. There are going to be abuses. The abusers should be sought out. We don't think you should emasculate the system.

I heard several references to the "rubber stamp" charge. In my prepared statement, I included statistics from 1969 to 1973 in New York

State which tend to refute such charges. In this regard, Mr. Curran testified that he had very few dismissals. That very well could reflect the quality of the cases he presented. In the State jury's system you hear cases referred to the grand jury by the criminal court. These may or may not have the same weight of evidence behind them.

But if reform is needed, and I don't think change necessarily means reform, one of the areas you should consider is the inclusion of some experienced grand jurors on every grand jury. You referred earlier to a possible question of constitutionality. In our State random selection is used but only to fill vacancies or expand the existing panel. This results, over the course of several years, in a rather large turnover, but also tends to put a few experienced jurors on every jury.

I think the secrecy provisions have to be strengthened to avoid doing a lot of damage to innocent people, but yet, in H.R. 94. I find several provisions that seem to mitigate against secrecy.

Counsel in the jury room. One attorney who is really representing the target, can appear to represent other witnesses. Telling witnesses the subject matter of the investigation. It seems to us it would be enough to tell them what you are going to ask about, not the whole subject matter of the investigation. This leads to leaks and to the general knowledge of an original opposition. Provisions for the distribution of witnesses' testimony—I don't think anyone needs such testimony until after there is an indictment. If testimony starts going out too early there is the risk of a trade, as Mr. Curran said, between attorneys. Again, your secrecy goes down the drain.

H.R. 94 allows too many of exceptions to secrecy requirements—third parties, the press, nearly everyone. I think the rules should apply to all, otherwise you are going to damage innocent reputations.

Again as to counsel in the jury room, we do not see it as an adversary proceeding, but rather as a review, an investigation. It is not a two-sided situation. We review the evidence to determine if a trial is warranted. I think in addition to some of the things mentioned today, you are going to have counsel in there giving advice on strategic answers, how to answer questions, how to phrase answers and perhaps orchestrating the whole investigation or hearing.

You call for a reduction in the number of jurors to possibly nine. I am not sure this would be a good step. I think, as was mentioned before, you need interaction between jurors, and with a larger group you will get more of it. In a small group it is much easier for a strong-willed person—and he could be the prosecutor or one of the jurors—to dominate. That is less likely when you have the larger number.

The penalties for recalcitrant witnesses seem very mild in my view. I believe some witnesses would be willing to take 6 months to avoid testifying and we are not only talking about past crimes; but about investigations where the crimes are still happening. I'm thinking of those groups that are conducting bombings and things like that as a form of protest.

In summary, if there are abuses in the system you should seek them out and hold them to account or get rid of them. I don't think you should knock out the system.

My experience with the grand jury—as you asked Mr. Ashley—I have been serving since about 1961. I have probably sat on 11 or 12 juries.

Mr. EILBERG. For how many months?

Mr. LYONS. We sit 1 month at a time, 2 days a week.

Mr. EILBERG. Would you mind repeating the nature of your service as a grand juror?

Mr. LYONS. Yes. Normally we serve for 1 month, unless we are held over for an ongoing investigation; and we serve 2 days a week.

Mr. EILBERG. How many months have you served, approximately?

Mr. LYONS. I have served 11 or 12 times, and with holdovers I probably have served 14 or 15 months in the aggregate over the last 17 years and I never had the experiences that everyone is talking about here. I found the jurors very conscientious and very concerned about seeking out the truth of any matter before voting.

Mr. EILBERG. Well, we have heard of abuses, and that is the reason for the various bills that have been introducted and why we are conducting extensive hearings. We have not made up our mind in a fixed fashion as to anything. All these bills represent starting points and not conclusions, and that is why we are having hearings and will continue to have hearings.

Gentlemen, once again, we are going to send you—I don't know whether counsel can do it right now while you are here—questions that we would like to have each of you separately answer, identical questions, and then questions separately for each of you, which will basically deal with your experiences in the grand jury room which we are most interested in hearing more about.

If it is possible, and we just can't predict at this point, we might have you back at another time. But there are so many people we do want to hear from.

Mr. Harris.

Mr. HARRIS. Not at all. I am conscious of the time as my chairman has been going at this for quite a few hours and now I have been very interested in the testimony.

And I have one sort of tangential question with regard to the testimony I heard from Mr. Lyons, and perhaps Mr. Ashley too. On first blush I was sort of surprised to hear you say that you had been selected 11 times for a grand jury. How does that happen? Why would you be selected 11 times for grand jury?

Mr. LYONS. We have a grand jury panel, I think at the present moment in our county it consists of 2,600 names.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the population in your county?

Mr. LYONS About a million and a half, I guess.

Mr. HARRIS. You are Bronx, right?

Mr. LYONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. I could tell.

Mr. LYONS. Well, we have, I think 2,600 on the panel.

Mr. HARRIS. You are on that panel and that panel gets drawn from; is that it?

Mr. LYONS. Yes. We use random selection. The county clerk uses random selection to fill vacancies or expand the number on the panel.

Mr. HARRIS. I see.

That, 2,600 names, how does that get selected; do you know?

Mr. LYONS. The selection, as far as I know, is from voter lists, utility lists, or whatever the various sources of names the county clerk uses.

Mr. HARRIS. You don't know what the random selection is from.

Mr. LYONS. No.

Mr. HARRIS. Do you know how often they update the list?

Mr. LYONS. Annually.

Mr. HARRIS. I don't exactly know what you mean. You mean annually they completely redo the random selection?

Mr. LYONS. No. I believe they use random selection only to fill vacancies. If we have 2,600 now, come December 31, we may only have 2,000 because of deaths, people moving and so forth.

Mr. HARRIS. Basically you get vacancies by deaths, resignations; that sort of thing?

Mr. LYONS. Right.

Mr. HARRIS. So if a person is once on the panel, and didn't move or die or something like that, they would stay on the panel?

Mr. LYONS. Up to now. There are attempts in the package of bills Mr. Ashley referred to, to make it entirely random selection. Once you serve you would be off the list.

Mr. HARRIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. I'm sorry to limit you in that way because the subject is so important, but we are now being called for floor vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I am finished. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much, gentlemen. This hearing is adjourned.

GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATION,
BRONX COUNTY, INC.,
Bronx, N.Y., May 11, 1977.

Re grand jury hearing, April 27, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG, Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, Rayburn House Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EILBERG: Enclosed are responses to the two sets of written questions you asked me to answer by mail following my appearance before your subcommittee on April 27, 1977.

In reply to question No. 6 of the questions for grand jury panel I refer to the distribution of copies of Article 190, Criminal Procedure Law, as a supplement to the oral instructions given by the judge. For your use and reference I am including a copy herewith.

Also enclosed is a copy of a recent publication on grand juries prepared and distributed by our Association as a public education effort in our own community. I trust it will give you some sense of the respect and concern we have for the system.

Very truly yours,

JOHN J. LYONS.

Enclosed.

ANSWERS TO SPECIFIC QUESTIONS FOR JOHN J. LYONS, CHAIRMAN, LAWS & LEGISLATION COMMITTEE, GRAND JURORS ASSOCIATION, BRONX COUNTY

Question 1. You state that exempting a witness and his attorney from the secrecy requirement is unwarranted. As you might be aware, federal law now exempts witnesses and counsel from the secrecy requirements and this has caused little if any problems. Would you comment?

Answer. 1. Whether or not the present law caused or causes any problems is a matter of opinion. I would agree that the day to day work of a sitting grand jury is probably not bothered by it because the subject matter is not particularly newsworthy. However the situation seems to change where a public or other prominent figure is tied in to an on-going investigation. Here the bits and pieces are put together and the so called inside story announced to the world. This violates my sense of fairness. I believe that tightening the secrecy rules would reduce premature, and possibly erroneous, disclosure.

Question 2. Again, as to secrecy, the Department of Justice, and others, have proposed an amendment to the federal rules to allow government investigators from other agencies, such as the F.B.I. and the Internal Revenue Service, to be present in the grand jury room. Would you comment?

Answer. 2. In my view the grand jury is an independent body, representing the people, whose function is to determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence in the given circumstances to warrant a trial. It is not, and should not be, a manipulative arm of any government agency. I would oppose the presence of such observers.

Question. 3. You stated that special circumstances should allow a grand jury investigation to be extended beyond 3 years. Could you give us an illustration of such special circumstances? Would not a jury become so involved in a case at this point as to lose its alleged objectivity?

Answer 3. I had in mind the location of a previously unknown or missing key witness just prior to the expiration of the extended term of the jury. This could be cured by permitting the evidence to be resubmitted to a subsequent grand jury, but this would necessitate much duplication of effort. I do not believe that an extended term equates with a loss of objectivity. As a practical matter, at least in New York State, an extended jury meets less frequently than its regular term counterparts.

Question 4. You support provisions allowing an independent attorney to be requested by a grand jury. Under what circumstances should such an attorney be appointed? What should be his role? Would this not lead to multiple investigations as to the same incident?

Answer 4. Special counsel seldom, if ever, should be required. If a grand jury is dealing with a matter that might reflect on the prosecutor's office, or otherwise raises questions as to conflict of interest, then the alternative of an independent counsel should be available. His role would be that normally played by the prosecutor and not a parallel to it.

Question 5. You oppose telling witnesses the subject matter of an investigation. Should not a witness be able to prepare for his testimony before a grand jury, as he would for any other judical proceeding?

Answer 5. It was not my intention to suggest a witness come in cold. However I believe the words "subject matter of the investigation" are too broad and could be interpreted to mean more than "the subject matter about which he will be questioned".

Question 6. You oppose provisions allowing a witness to have his counsel present while testifying. A study made by the District Attorney of Dade County, Miami, Florida, head of the American Bar Association Grand Jury Committee, and by our staff, reveals that in the 9 states that presently allow counsel in the room, there have been few if any problems. Our bill would allow counsel to advise his client only and not to be an adversary. This would eliminate the need to have a witness go in and out of the grand jury room, as presently allowed, to consult with his attorney. In addition, obstreperous counsel, under the bill could be controlled and, if necessary, removed by the Court. Do you still oppose our proposal and if so, why?

Answer 6. Yes, I oppose it for several reasons. It increases the risk of leaks. A grand jury investigation is not an adversary proceeding and should not be turned into one. There will be more delays resulting from appearances before the judge to determine if counsel is exceeding his allowed function than we have now from the few witnesses who leave the room to consult with counsel. It creates risks for cooperating witnesses who may be forced by circumstances or associates to be represented by the target's counsel. It offers an opportunity for such counsel to orchestrate strategic answers from several witnesses. A witness with immunity should not need counsel to protect him from the People.

ANSWERS BY JOHN J. LYONS TO QUESTIONS FOR GRAND JURY PANEL

Question 1. Could you tell us how often the grand jury or grand juries on which you sat did not accept the recommendations of the government attorney and did or did not indict? Mr. Lyons has submitted some statistics but this only shows dismissals and do not relate to the recommendations of the prosecutor!

Answer 1. Most of the assistant district attorneys who presented evidence to the grand juries on which I have served have been scrupulous in explaining the possible charges to be considered depending on the jury's evaluation of the evidence. In such circumstances it is difficult to conclude how often there was agreement or disagreement with the vote as it related to the classification or degree of crime charged. The thrust of your question as to non-indicting is correct.

There were cases where no other decision was possible, and the prosecutor so advised. However, I have no recollection of ever serving on a jury that did not dismiss one or more accused contrary to the recommendation of the prosecutor.

Question 2. Were you or any grand jurors ever consulted about which witnesses were to be subpoenaed?

Answer 2. No, except in cases where the request originated with the jury.

Question 3. Were you or any other grand jurors ever consulted about which witnesses should be granted immunity?

Answer 3. This does not apply in New York State where all witnesses before the grand jury are immunized unless they sign a waiver of immunity.

Question 4. How often did the grand jurors, as separate from the prosecutor, actually ask questions?

Answer 4. Before a witness is dismissed the prosecutor asks if there are any further questions from the jurors. More often than not there are some questions, which are then asked through the prosecutor.

Question 5. Who determined, prosecutor or jurors, what cases or leads were to be investigated?

Answer 5. Cases are brought in by the prosecutor. However, based on heard testimony, it is not uncommon for the jury to ask for additional witnesses whose testimony may assist them in reaching a proper decision.

Question 6. Could you tell us what instructions, if any, the supervising judge or the prosecutor gave you as to your duties and responsibilities?

Answer 6. I found the oral instructions to be rather complete (approximately 30 to 40 minutes) in explaining the jurors responsibilities, rights and functions. They always included notice that the judge himself was available to any juror. In addition printed copies of Article 190 of the Criminal Procedure Law, relating to the grand jury and its proceedings, were distributed to each member of the panel.

Question 7. Were you ever present when a witness invoked the Fifth Amendment? If so, what was the reaction of you and your fellow jurors?

Answer 7. I have no recollection of any witness invoking Fifth Amendment rights.

Question 8. Did the prosecutor ever present evidence favorable to a potential defendant? If so, could you describe an example?

Answer 8. Yes, usually in the form of contradictory witnesses.

Question 9. Were you ever told by the prosecutor information about the case or an individual that had not been presented by a witness?

Answer 9. No. On the contrary I have been told to disregard hearsay information when it was included in a witness' reply to a question.

Question 10. What was your reaction when a witness asked to leave the grand jury room and consult with his attorney? How often did witnesses make this request?

Answer 10. I hope it would not provoke any reaction. It happened seldom, perhaps 2 or 3 times, and I have no strong recollection of anyone's reaction.

Question 11. What was your reaction when a witness asked to go before the judge to challenge some action? How often did this occur?

Answer 11. I do not recall any such request.

Question 12. Could you describe for us the process by which jurors vote on indictments? How long does this process usually take? What amount of proof did you believe necessary to indict?

Answer 12. Generally the foreman calls for comments and discussion. If there are any questions concerning the particular statute, the assistance district attorney is called in to explain it further. If there is concern about possible conflicts in testimony, or possibly other witnesses who were not heard, the jury decides whether or not to instruct the assistant district attorney to recall or obtain the witnesses needed to resolve the problem. If this is done, the vote is postponed. When there is majority agreement that the jury is ready to vote, it is done starting with the most serious charge to be considered. Depending on the case and the weight of evidence the time frame could vary from a few minutes to half an hour or more. The key factor is when the jury decides it is ready to vote. As to proof I believe the evidence and testimony presented should be sufficient to lead me to reasonably conclude that the defendant committed the crime charged.

Question 13. Were you ever aware of grand jury investigations being undertaken by more than one grand jury? What was your reaction?

Answer 12. No.

Instructions to Grand Jurors

Supreme Court of the State of New York
First Judicial District—New York and Bronx Counties

Article 190—The Grand Jury and Its Proceedings
Sections 190.05 to 190.90 Inclusive, Criminal Procedure Law.

§ 190.05 Grand Jury; Definition and General Functions. A grand jury is a body consisting of not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-three persons, impaneled by a superior court and constituting a part of such court, the functions of which are to hear and examine evidence concerning offenses and concerning misconduct, nonfeasance and neglect in public office, whether criminal or otherwise, and to take action with respect to such evidence as provided in section 190.60.

§ 190.10 Grand Jury; For What Courts Drawn. The appellate division of each judicial department shall adopt rules governing the number and the terms for which grand juries shall be drawn and impaneled by the superior courts within its department; provided, however, that a grand jury may be drawn and impaneled for any extraordinary term of the supreme court upon the order of a justice assigned to hold such term.

§ 190.15 Grand Jury; Duration of Term and Discharge. 1. A term of a superior court for which a grand jury has been impaneled remains in existence at least until and including the opening date of the next term of such court for which a grand jury has been designated. Upon such date, or within five days preceding it, the court, may upon declaration of both the grand jury and the district attorney that such grand jury has not yet completed or will be unable to complete certain business before it, extend the term of court and the existence of such grand jury to a specified future date, and may subsequently order further extensions for such purpose.

2. At any time when a grand jury is in recess and no other appropriate grand jury is in existence in the county, the court may, upon application of the district attorney or of a defendant held by a local criminal court for the action of a grand jury, order such grand jury reconvened for the purpose of dealing with a matter requiring grand jury action.

§ 190.20 Grand Jury; Formation, Organization and Other Matters Preliminary to Assumption of Duties. 1. The mode of selecting grand jurors and of drawing and impaneling grand juries is governed by the judiciary law.

2. Neither the grand jury panel nor any individual grand juror may be challenged, but the court may:

(a) At any time before a grand jury is sworn, discharge the panel and summon another panel if it finds that the original panel does not substantially conform to the requirements of the judiciary law; or

(b) At any time after a grand juror is drawn, refuse to swear him or discharge him after he has been sworn, upon a finding that he is disqualified from service pursuant to the judiciary law, or incapable of performing his duties, because of bias or prejudice, or guilty of misconduct in the performance of his duties such as to impair the proper functioning of the grand jury.

3. After a grand jury has been impaneled, the court must appoint one of the grand jurors as foreman and another to act as foreman during any absence or disability of the foreman. At some time before commencement of their duties, the grand jurors much appoint one of their number as secretary to keep records material to the conduct of the grand jury's business.

4. The grand jurors must be sworn by the court. The oath may be in any form or language which requires the grand jurors to perform their duties faithfully.

5. After a grand jury has been sworn, the court must deliver or cause to be delivered to each grand juror a printed copy of all the provisions of this article, and the court may, in addition, give the grand jurors any oral instructions relating to the proper performance of their duties as it deems necessary or appropriate.

6. If two or more grand juries are impaneled at the same court term, the court may thereafter, for good cause, transfer grand jurors from one panel to another, and any grand juror so transferred is deemed to have been sworn as a member of the panel to which he has been transferred.

§ 190.25 Grand Jury; Proceedings and Operation in General. 1. Proceedings of a grand jury are not valid unless at least sixteen of its members are present. The finding of an indictment, a direction to file a prosecutor's information, a decision to submit a grand jury report and every other affirmative official action or decision requires the concurrence of at least twelve members thereof.

2. The foreman or any other grand juror may administer an oath to any witness appearing before the grand jury.

3. During the deliberations and voting of a grand jury, only the grand jurors may be present in the grand jury room. During its other proceedings, the following persons, in addition to witnesses, may as the occasion requires, also be present:

(a) The district attorney;

(b) A clerk or other public servant authorized to assist the grand jury in the administrative conduct of its proceedings;

(c) A stenographer authorized to record the proceedings of the grand jury;

(d) An interpreter. Upon request of the grand jury, the prosecutor must provide an interpreter to interpret the testimony of any witness who does not speak the English language well enough to be readily understood. Such interpreter must, if he has not previously taken the constitutional oath of office, first take an oath before the grand jury that he will faithfully interpret the testimony of the witness and that he will keep secret all matters before such grand jury within his knowledge;

(e) A public servant holding a witness in custody. When a person held in official custody is a witness before a grand jury, a public servant assigned to guard him during his grand jury appearance may accompany him in the grand jury room. Such public servant must, if he has not previously taken the constitutional oath of office, first take an oath before the grand jury that he will keep secret all matters before it within his knowledge.

4. Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror or other person specified in subdivision three may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding.

5. The grand jury is the exclusive judge of the facts with respect to any matter before it.

6. The legal advisors of the grand jury are the court and the district attorney, and the grand jury may not seek or receive legal advice from any other source. Where necessary or appropriate, the court or the district attorney, or both, must instruct the grand jury concerning the law with respect to its duties or any matter before it, and such instructions must be recorded in the minutes.

§ 190.3 Grand Jury; Rules of Evidence 1. Except as otherwise provided in this section, the provisions of article sixty, governing rules of evidence and related matters with respect to criminal proceedings in general, are, where appropriate, applicable to grand jury proceedings.

2. A report or a copy of a report made by a public servant, or by a person employed by a public servant or agency, who is a physicist, chemist, firearms identification expert, examiner of questioned documents, fingerprint technician, or an expert or technician in some comparable scientific or professional field, concerning the results of an examination, comparison or test performed by him in connection with a case which is the subject of a grand jury proceeding, may, when certified by such person as a report made by him or as a true thereof, be received in such grand jury proceeding as evidence of the facts stated therein.

3. Wherever it is provided in article sixty that the court in a criminal proceeding must rule upon the competency of a witness to testify or upon the admissibility of evidence, such ruling may, in an equivalent situation in a grand jury proceeding, be made by the district attorney.

4. Wherever it is provided in article sixty that a court presiding at a jury trial must instruct the jury with respect to the significance, legal effect or evaluation of evidence, the district attorney, in an equivalent situation in a grand jury proceeding, may so instruct the grand jury.

§ 190.35 Grand Jury; Definitions of Terms. The term definitions contained in section 50.10 are applicable to sections 194.40, 190.45 and 190.50.

§ 190.40 Grand Jury; Witnesses, Compulsion of Evidence and Immunity 1. Every witness in a grand jury proceeding must give any evidence legally requested of him regardless of any protest or belief on his part that it may tend to incriminate him.

2. A witness who gives evidence in a grand jury proceeding receives immunity unless:

(a) He has effectively waived such immunity pursuant to section 190.45; or,

(b) Such evidence is not responsive to any inquiry and is gratuitously given or volunteered by the witness with knowledge that it is not responsive.

§ 190.45 Grand Jury; Waiver of Immunity 1. A waiver of immunity is a written instrument subscribed by a person who is or is about to become a witness in a grand jury proceeding, stipulating that he waives his privilege against self-incrimination and any possible or prospective immunity to which he would otherwise become entitled, pursuant to section 190.40, as a result of giving evidence in such proceeding.

2. A waiver of immunity is not effective unless and until it is sworn to before the grand jury conducting the proceeding in which the subscriber has been called as a witness.

3. A person who is called by the people as a witness in a grand jury proceeding and requested by the district attorney to subscribe and swear to a waiver of immunity before giving evidence has a right to confer with counsel before deciding whether he will comply with such request, and, if he desires to avail himself of such right, he must be accorded a reasonable time in which to obtain and confer with counsel for such purpose. The district attorney must inform the witness of all such rights before obtaining his execution of such a waiver of immunity. Any waiver obtained, subscribed or sworn to in violation of the provisions of this subdivision is invalid and ineffective.

4. If a grand jury witness subscribes and swears to a waiver of immunity upon an express understanding with the district attorney that the interrogation will be limited to certain specified subjects, matters or areas of conduct, and if after the commencement of his testimony he is interrogated concerning another subject, matter or area of conduct not included in the original understanding, he may withdraw or qualify his waiver of immunity accordingly by orally declaring before the grand jury his refusal to testify concerning such other matter unless he is granted immunity with respect thereto. Upon such declaration of withdrawal or qualification, the witness receives immuntiy with respect to any further testimony which he may give concerning such other matter and the waiver of immunity is to that extent ineffective.

§ 190.50 Grand Jury; Who May Call Witnesses; Defendant as Witness 1. Except as provided in this section, no person has a right to call a witness or appear as a witness in a grand jury proceeding.

2. The people may call as a witness as in a grand jury proceeding any person believed by the district attorney to possess relevant information or knowledge.

3. The grand jury may cause to be called as a witness any person believed by it to possess relevant information or knowledge. If the grand jury desires to hear any such witness who was not called by the people, it may direct the district attorney to issue and serve a subpoena upon such witness, and the district attorney must comply with such direction. At any time after such a direction, however, or at any time after the service of a subpoena pursuant to such a direction and before the return date thereof, the people may apply to the court which impaneled the grand jury for an order vacating or modifying such direction or subpoena on the ground that such is in the public interest. Upon such application, the court may in its discretion vacate the direction or subpoena, attach reasonable conditions thereto, or make other appropriate qualification thereof.

4. Notwithstanding the provisions of subdivision three, the district attorney may demand that any witness thus called at the instance of the grand jury sign a waiver of immunity pursuant to section 190.45 before being sworn, and upon such demand no oath may be administered to such witness unless and until he complies therewith.

5. Although not called as a witness by the people or at the instance of the grand jury, a person has a right to be a witness in a grand jury proceeding under circumstances prescribed in this subdivision:

(a) When a criminal charge against a person is being or is about to be or has been submitted to a grand jury, such person has a right to appear before such grand jury as a witness in his own behalf if, prior to the filing of any indictment or any direction to file a prosecutor's information in the matter, he serves upon the district attorney of the county a written notice making such request and stating an address to which communications may be sent. The district attorney is not obliged to inform such a person that such a grand jury proceeding against him is pending, in progress or about to occur unless such person is a defendant who has been arraigned in a local criminal court upon a currently undisposed of felony complaint charging an offense which is a subject of the prospective or pending grand jury proceeding. In such case, the district attorney must notify the defendant or his attorney of the prospective or pending grand jury proceeding and accord the defendant a reasonable time to exercise his right to appear as a witness therein;

(b) Upon service upon the district attorney of a notice requesting appearance before a grand jury pursuant to paragraph (a), the district attorney must notify the foreman of the grand jury of such request, and must subsequently serve upon the applicant, at the address specified by him, a notice that he will be heard by the grand jury at a given time and place. Upon appearing at such time and place, and upon signing and submitting to the grand jury a waiver of immunity pursuant to section 190.45, such person must be permitted to testify before the grand jury and to give any relevant and competent evidence concerning the case under consideration. Upon giving such evidence, he is subject to examination by the people.

(c) Any indictment or direction to file a prosecutor's information obtained or filed in violation of the provisions of paragraph (a) or (b) is invalid and, upon a motion made pursuant to section 170.50 or section 210.20, must be dismissed; provided that a motion based upon such ground must be made not more than five days after the defendant has been arraigned upon the indictment or, as the case may be, upon the prosecutor's information resulting from the grand jury's direction to file the same. If the contention is not so asserted in timely fashion, it is waived and the indictment of prosecutor's information may not thereafter be challenged on such ground.

6. A defendant or person against whom a criminal charge is being or is about to be brought in a grand jury proceeding may request the grand jury, either orally or in writing, to cause a person designated by him to be called as a witness in such proceeding. The grand jury may as a matter of discretion grant such request and cause such witness to be called pursuant to subdivision three.

§ 190.55 Grand Jury: Matters To Be Heard and Examined; Duties and Authority of District Attorney 1. A grand jury may hear and examine evidence concerning the alleged commission of any offense prosecutable in the courts of the county, and concerning any misconduct, nonfeasance or neglect in public office by a public servant, whether criminal or otherwise.

2. District attorneys are required or authorized to submit evidence to grand juries under the following circumstances:

(a) A district attorney must submit to a grand jury evidence concerning a felony allegedly committed by a defendant who, on the basis of a felony complaint filed with a local criminal court of the county, has been held for the action of a grand jury of such county.

(b) A district attorney must submit to a grand jury evidence concerning a misdemeanor allegedly committed by a defendant who has been charged therewith by a local criminal court accusatory instrument, in any case where a superior court of the county has, pursuant to subdivision one of section 170.25, ordered that such misdemeanor charge be prosecuted by indictment in a superior court.

(c) A district attorney may submit to a grand jury any available evidence concerning an offense prosecutable in the courts of the county, or concerning misconduct, nonfeasance or neglect in public office by a public servant, whether criminal or otherwise.

§ 190.60 Grand Jury Action To Be Taken After hearing and examining evidence as prescribed in section 190.55, a grand jury may:

1. Indict a person for an offense, as provided in section 190.65;

2. Direct the district attorney to file a prosecutor's information with a local criminal court, as provided in section 190.70;

3. Dismiss the charge before it, as provided in section 190.75;

4. Submit a grand jury report, as provided in section 190.85.

§ 190.65 Grand Jury; When Indictment is Authorized 1. Subject to the rules prescribing the kinds of offenses which may be charged in an indictment, a grand jury may indict a person for an offense when (a) the evidence before it is legally sufficient to establish that such person committed such offense and (b) competent and admissible evidence before it provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

2. The offense or offenses for which a grand jury may indict a person in any particular case are not limited to that or those which may have been designated, at the commencement of the grand jury proceeding, to be the subject of the inquiry; and even in a case submitted to it upon a court order, pursuant to the provisions of section 170.25, directing that a misdemeanor charge pending in a local criminal court be prosecuted by indictment, the grand jury may indict the defendant for a felony if the evidence so warrants.

3. Upon voting to indict a person, a grand jury must, through its foreman or acting foreman, file an indictment with the court by which it was impaneled.

§ 190.70 Grand Jury; Direction To File Prosecutor's Information and Related Matters 1. Except in a case submitted to it pursuant to the provisions of section 170.25, a grand jury may direct the district attorney to file in a local criminal court a prosecutor's information charging a person with an offense other than a felony when (a) the evidence before it is legally sufficient to establish that such person committed such offense, and (b) competent and admissible evidence before it provides reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such offense. In such case, the grand jury must, through its foreman or acting foreman, file such direction with the court by which it was impaneled.

2. Such direction must be signed by the foreman or acting foreman. It must contain a plain and concise statement of the conduct constituting the offense to be charged, equivalent in content and precision to the factual statement required to be contained in an indictment pursuant to subdivision seven of section 200.50. Subject to the rules prescribed in sections 200.20 and 200.40 governing joinder in a single indictment of multiple offenses and multiple defendants, such grand jury direction may, where appropriate, specify multiple offenses of less than felony grade and multiple defendants, and may direct that the prospective prosecutor's information charge a single defendant with multiple offenses, or multiple defendants jointly with either a single offense or multiple offenses.

3. Upon the filing of such grand jury direction, the court must, unless such direction is insufficient on its face, issue an order approving such direction and ordering the district attorney to file such a prosecutor's information in a designated local criminal court having trial jurisdiction of the offense or offenses in question.

§ 190.75 Grand Jury: Dismissal of Charge. 1. If upon a charge that a designated person committed a crime, either (a) the evidence before the grand jury is not legally sufficient to establish that such person committed such crime or any other offense, or (b) the grand jury is not satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that such person committed such crime or any other offense, it must dismiss the charge. In such case, the grand jury must, through its foreman or acting foreman, file its finding of dismissal with the court by which it was impaneled.

2. If the defendant was previously held for the action of the grand jury by a local criminal court, the superior court to which such dismissal is presented must order the defendant released from custody if he is in the custody of the sheriff, or, if he is at liberty on bail, it must exonerate the bail.

3. When a charge has been so dismissed, it may not again be submitted to a grand jury unless the court in its discretion authorizes or directs the people to resubmit such charge to the same or another grand jury. If in such case the charge is again dismissed, it may not again be submitted to a grand jury.

§ 190.80 Grand Jury: Release of Defendant Upon Failure of Timely Grand Jury Action. Upon application of a defendant who on the basis of a felony complaint has been held by a local criminal court for the action of a grand jury, and who, at the time of such order or subsequent thereto, has been committed to the custody of the sheriff pending such grand jury action, and who has been confined in such custody for a period of more than forty-five days without the occurrence of any grand jury action or disposition pursuant to subdivision one, two or three of section 190.60, the superior court by which such grand jury was or is to be impaneled must release him on his own recognizance unless:

(a) The lack of a grand jury disposition during such period of confinement was due to the defendant's request, action or condition, or occurred with his consent; or

(b) The people have shown good cause why such order of release should not be issued. Such good cause must consist of some compelling fact or circumstance which precluded grand jury action within the prescribed period or rendered the same against the interest of justice.

§ 190.85 Grand Jury; Grand Jury Reports 1. The grand jury may submit to the court by which it was impaneled, a report:

(a) Concerning misconduct, non-feasance or neglect in public office by a public servant as the basis for a recommendation of removal or disciplinary action; or

(b) Stating that after investigation of a public servant it finds no misconduct, non-feasance or neglect in office by him provided that such public servant has requested the submission of such report; or

(c) Proposing recommendations for legislative, executive or administrative action in the public interest based upon stated findings.

2. The court to which such report is submitted shall examine it and the minutes of the grand jury and, except as otherwise provided in subdivision four, shall make an order accepting and filing such report as a public record only if the court is satisfied that it complies with the provisions of subdivision one and that:

(a) The report is based upon facts revealed in the course of an investigation authorized by section 190.55 and is supported by the preponderance of the credible and legally admissible evidence; and

(b) When the report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision one, that each person named therein was afforded an opportunity to testify before the grand jury prior to the filing of such report, and when the report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (b) or (c) of subdivision one, it is not critical of an identified or identifiable person.

3. The order accepting a report pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision one, and the report itself, must be sealed by the court and may not be filed as a public record, or be subject to subpoena or otherwise be made public until at least thirty-one days after a copy of the order and the report are served upon each public servant named therein, or if an appeal is taken pursuant to section 190.90, until the affirmance of the order accepting the report, or until reversal of the order sealing the report, or until dismissal of the appeal of the named public servant by the appellate division, whichever occurs later. Such public servant may file with the clerk of the court an answer to such report, not later than twenty days after service of the order and report upon him. Such an answer shall plainly and concisely state the facts and law constituting the defense of the public servant to the charges in said report, and except for those parts of the answer which the court may determine to be scandalously or prejudicially and unnecesarily inserted therein, shall become an appendix to the report. Upon the expiration of the time set forth in this subdivision, the district attorney shall deliver a true copy of such report, and the appendix if any, for appropriate action, to each public servant or body having removal or disciplinary authority over each public servant named therein.

4. Upon the submission of a report pursuant to subdivision one, if the court finds that the filing of such report as a public record, may prejudice fair consideration of a pending criminal matter, it must order such report sealed and such report may not be subject to subpoena or public inspection during the pendency of such criminal matter, except upon order of the court.

5. Whenever the court to which a report is submitted pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision one is not satisfied that the report complies with the provisions of subdivision two, it may direct that additional testimony be taken before the same grand jury, or it must make an order sealing such report, and the report may not be filed as a public record, or be subject to subpoena or otherwise be made public.

§ 190.90 Grand jury; Appeal from Order Concerning Grand Jury Reports 1. When a court makes an order accepting a report of a grand jury pursuant to paragraph (a) of subdivision one of section 190.85, any public servant named therein may appeal the order; and when a court makes an order sealing a report of a grand jury pursuant to subdivision five of section 190.85, the district attorney or other attorney designated by the grand jury may appeal the order.

2. When a court makes an order sealing a report of the grand jury pursuant to subdivision five of section 190.85, the district attorney or other attorney designated by the grand jury may, within ten days after service of a copy of the order and report upon each public servant named in the report, appeal the order to the appellate division of the department in which the order was made, by filing in duplicate a notice of appeal from the order with the clerk of the court in which the order was made and by serving a copy of such notice of appeal upon each such public servant. Notwithstanding any contrary provision of section 190.85, a true copy of the report of the grand jury shall be served, together with such notice of appeal upon each such public servant.

3. The mode of and time for perfecting an appeal pursuant to this section, and the mode of and procedure for the argument thereof, are determined by the rules of the appellate division of the department in which the appeal is brought. Such rules shall prescribe the matters referred to in subdivision one of section 460.70 and in section 460.80, except that such appeal is a preferred cause and the appellate division of each department shall promulgate rules to effectuate such preference.

4. The record and all other presentations on appeal shall remain sealed, except that upon affirmance of the order sealing the report or dismissal of the appeal of the named public servant by the appellate division, the report of the grand jury, with the appendix, if any, shall be filed as a public record as provided in subdivision three of section 190.85.

5. The procedure provided for in this section shall be the exclusive manner of reviewing an order made pursuant to section 190.85 and the appellate division of the supreme court shall be the sole court having jurisdiction of such an appeal. The order of the appellate division finally determining such appeal shall not be subject to review in any other court or proceeding.

6. The grand jury in an appeal pursuant to this section shall be represented by the district attorney unless the report relates to him or his office, in which event the grand jury may designate another attorney.

THE GRAND JURY

* WHAT IS IT?

* HOW DID IT ORIGINATE?

* HOW DOES IT FUNCTION?

* WHAT IS ITS WORTH?

The cornerstone of our Republic is composed of two essential elements:

1 - PEOPLE
People are society. People decide which type of society they wish to have, and they make the laws which govern and protect their society.

2 - LAW
Any decent and free society is based upon law, with the direction of the law being subject to the desires of the majority of the people who make up and participate in the functions of that society.

These laws are quite necessary in order to insure:

a) The continuation of their society in its basic desires, and which can bend and change to accomodate the needs of the majority of its participating individuals (as a tree: it is strong, but adjusts with the winds).

b) The rights of the individual - to the extent that these rights do not infringe upon the rights of society.

And what can be said of those of us who would take this for granted, as too many of us do?

Consider

"The punishment suffered by the wise who refuse to take part in government, is to live under the government of bad men."
PLATO

"All authority belongs to the people."
JEFFERSON

Too few of our citizens are familiar with the functions of a Grand Jury.

The following information about the Grand Jury system is provided with the hope that it will encourage you to recognize its importance to the society of free men, and to study it more so that - hopefully - you will always desire to more carefully examine the contentions of those who would eliminate the Grand Jury System in this state.

Any society, or any segment of society - such as the Grand Jury system - is always under attack. The attacks are designed to change the society, or to change or eliminate the Grand Jury.

However, if you would wish to continue a system of government which has spent 200 years changing and improving itself, while always remaining the best available, you must question.

Question those who would change our systems. Most importantly, learn and understand the alternatives !

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

The Grand Jury system is something available only to those living within free nations.

In any nation of free people, its citizens are free enough to have the Grand Jury explained to them. Should they inquire, they find that it is something provided as a protection against mere 'trials'.

IN EFFECT, WHAT THE PUBLIC DOES NOT KNOW WILL HURT THEM, AND THE PUBLIC SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM - WHICH IS A PART OF THE JUDICIAL PROCEDURE IN THIS STATE, AND IN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.

History of the Grand Jury System

The Grand Jury originated in England over 800 years ago (about 1166), and when the English colonists came to the 'new world', they brought the Grand Jury system with them.

Since 1166 the character of the Grand Jury has not changed too much. In 1365, about 600 years ago, perhaps the most important change took place: a provision was made to protect witnesses from criminal retribution from the accused, and this provision is our first comparative form of the present-day Grand Jury system. This change guaranteed that certain individual freedoms could not be violated.

Today, the reasons for Grand Jury secrecy differ only slightly from those which political conditions dictated in the late 1300's. Today's Grand Jury maintains the private hearing of testimony to preserve the freedoms of:

THE ACCUSED: From hearing evidence which might cause him to flee prior to indictment and arrest. By avoiding the publication of potentially damaging evidence.

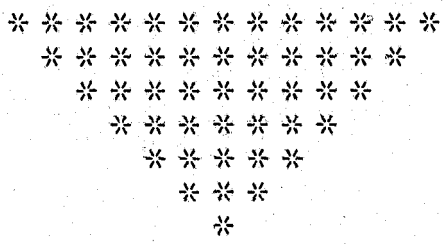
WITNESSES: From fear of reprisal from either the accused or the government (at any level).

GRAND JURORS: Who are then uninhibited by fears that their opinions and votes will be made public.

The wisdom of this secrecy is self-evident. It removes fear from what, ideally, is an impartial, closed forum within which the decision to indict an accused person is either accepted or rejected.

Since the very beginning, Grand Juries did not - and do not now - decide the guilt or innocence of anyone accused of a crime. Grand Juries are designed mainly to determine if a person is to be brought to trial. However, they also have always had the power to accuse on their own knowledge. When making an accusation on their own initiative, they make presentations and reports to the court.

The decisions they make which are based upon information originating from the outside, are "TRUE BILLS", if they feel the accusations to be true and a trial is warranted; "NO BILL" if they believe the accusations to be untrue and/or a trial is not warranted.



During the time the Grand Jury has been in use in America, it has become a most important part of our Government. This is best explained by Mr. Richard D. Younger, in his book "THE PEOPLE'S PANEL".

This is a book you should read if you are interested in the Grand Jury system (and even if you are not, because it presents some fascinating information about the activities of those who have attempted to subvert this segment of our judicial system).

On the following page we present a direct quote from Mr. Younger's book, "THE PEOPLE'S PANEL". This is done with the hope that you may better appreciate what we are trying to say here. We could not improve upon this excerpt from this fine book.

"Grand juries have the effect of placing criminal justice in the hands of members of the community. They possess broad inquisitorial powers derived from the government, yet they are of the people, not of the state. Their constantly changing personnel prevents small groups from gaining a vested interest in law enforcement and gives all persons an opportunity to participate in their government. The grand jury enables the American people to act for themselves rather than have an official act for them. It is the one institution that combines the necessary measure of disinterestedness with sufficient authority to investigate effectively malfeasance and corruption in public office. Today, as in the past, it is the one body that can effectively handle the complaints of individual citizens, whether the grievances be against their fellow citizens or against their government.

"The most significant aspects of the grand jury are its democratic control and its local character. Governmental power has to a large extent replaced other threats to liberty in the United States. The increasing centralization of governmental authority and the growth of a huge bureaucracy in no way responsible to the people have made it vitally necessary to preserve the grand jury. In some instances it is the only possible means of checking on political appointees or preventing illegal compulsion at the hands of zealous law enforcement officials. At a time when centralization has narrowed the area of democratic control, grand juries give the people an opportunity to participate in their government and to make their wishes known."

(It should be noted that in a footnote to the last paragraph above, Mr. Younger indicated the source to be the report of the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee, and further points out that the Committee "warned Americans not to rely upon the central government to control organized crime, but to use their local grand juries to attack the problem in their own communities".)

What Makes a 'Grand Jury' Different?

We are all familiar with the word JURY. However, not everyone is familiar with the fact that there are two different types of jury:

The GRAND jury, which may, or may not, indict.
The TRIAL jury (or Petit Jury), which may, or may not, convict.

There is a most important difference between INDICT and CONVICT!!

For certain "capital or otherwise infamous crimes", as the New York State Constitution provides (Art.1, Sect.6), "no person shall be held to answer.....unless on indictment of a grand jury".

As to these crimes, a Grand Jury must first determine if there is sufficient cause for a person actually tried (by a TRIAL, or Petit jury) for a crime.

That is, are there grounds for prosecution (a 'prima facie case')? Prima Facie is Latin, and a legal term for 'the first impression of the evidence observed'.

If there is SUFFICIENT evidence presented to the Grand Jury or SUFFICIENT evidence obtained by the Grand Jury through its own efforts - including the power to subpoena - then it will INDICT.

Following any indictment, those indicted are still assumed to be innocent. THIS IS IMPORTANT TO REMEMBER!

The Grand Jury's indictment ONLY allows the matter to be FURTHER CONSIDERED, by a TRIAL jury.

ONLY A TRIAL JURY MAY DETERMINE IF A PERSON IS INNOCENT OR GUILTY.

The Grand Jury's Verdicts

At the time a Grand Jury votes, it must decide whether a TRUE BILL is required - or if a DISMISSAL is required.

(There are, infrequently, decisions to remand the matter to a lower court because, in the judgement of the Grand Jury, the nature of the alleged crime does not warrant consideration by a Superior court.)

DISMISSAL: The meaning of this is obvious.

TRUE BILL: TRUE: Being real, or genuine.

BILL: Formal statement of a case or charge.

TRUE BILL: A 'bill of indictment' found by a Grand Jury to be sustained by the evidence - "prima facie" evidence.

When a Grand Jury votes a TRUE BILL, the accused is then INDICTED (the 'true bill' indicts), and a TRIAL (a Petit Jury trial) is then required to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused (indicted)).

Size, Quorums, Decisions of the Grand Jury

(Attendance Requirements)

The Grand Jury, which is impanelled by and constitutes part of a Superior court, is a body consisting of no less than 16 nor more than 23 persons (Foreman, Asst. Foreman and Secretary included).

The proceedings of a Grand Jury are not valid unless at least 16 of its members are present. A concurrence of at least 12 members is required to:

1) Find an indictment (TRUE BILL).
2) Dismiss the presentment of the office of the District Attorney (NO True Bill).
3) Direct the filing of a prosecutor's information.
4) Submit a report.
5) Provide affirmative official action or decision (i.e.,'1 thru '4).

The Worth of a Grand Jury

While a Grand Jury is impanelled by and is part of a superior court and does, usually, expend most of its efforts toward the resolutions of presentations made to it on behalf of the people of the State, via the District Attorney, it most certainly is NOT solely restricted to that responsibility.

The law specifically directs that Grand Juries are responsible for other utilization of their talents (and, hopefully, experience). The law also prescribes that the Grand Jury has the responsibility whenever necessary, to provide its own presentations.

Also, the law provides that the counsel for the Grand Juries shall be the District Attorney, so it must be noted that the District Attorney works for the Grand Juries.

While the office of the District Attorney may subpoena to the extent that it makes an original presentation of the people's case before the Grand Jury, only the Grand Jury has almost unlimited power to subpoena, and may so direct the office of the District Attorney to exercise the Jury's desires in this respect.

It should be noted that the Grand Jury is not, and should never allow itself to be put in the position of being described as a "rubber stamp" for the office of the District Attorney.

In the final analysis:
The Criminal Procedure Law prescribes, in Section 190.25(5) that: "The Grand Jury is the exclusive judge of the facts with respect to any matter before it."

There are some others who have worked with or studied much about the Grand Jury System, who have this to say:

"The Grand Jury System is the bulwark of protection for the innocent and the sword of the community against wrongdoers."[1]

"It breathes the spirit of the community as no prosecutor could ever do."[2]

"The Grand Jury is the public and they have a right to investigate any evil condition of a criminal nature."[3]

"The grand-jury system has one great advantage. It is removed from the professional interests of the police and prosecution. A...grand-jury is composed of twenty three men and women drawn from the community, who sit...and listen to the proposed case presented by the police and an Assistant District Attorney. There is a presiding officer, but the grand-jury can decide to ignore the strictest interpretation of the law and vote indictments on instincts or feelings...* The rules of evidence before a grand jury are looser, more flexible than those in a regular courtroom. There is a certain unpredictability about grand juries, and experienced prosecutors are always apprehensive about the system."[4]

*We are constrained to protest that this sentance does not also say: "or vote dismissals". (This is cited from personal experience by all Grand Jurors, and is also based upon facts, instincts and compassions of at least 12 of the 23 Grand Jurors.)

The Law - The Grand Jury - The Critics

As each Grand Jury is impanelled, it is provided with a listing of certain Criminal Procedure Law sections pertinent to the functions and duties of the Grand Jury. (This is required by law.) In addition, the presiding judge addresses the jury before it is sworn in.

The information contained herein is in no way designed to substitute for that information provided. It is given to augment such instruction, and is particularly designed to aid the new Grand Juror as well as being a point of reference for all Grand Jurors.

More detailed information relative to the operation of Grand Juries under the law are found in the New York "Criminal Procedure Law", under these sections:

Article 190 (190.05 thru 190.90)
Article 195 (195.10 thru 195.40)
Article 200 (200.10 thru 200.90)
Article 210 (210.05)

The detailed location of this information is provided for two reasons:

1 - To guide Grand Jury members in their studies of the Grand Jury System.

2 - To guide, hopefully, those critics of the Grand Jury system who would constantly put forth information(?) to the public. It is sincerely hoped that if they must expertly discuss the Grand Jury system - while they deride it - they at least know the law!

COURTS - New York State

SUPERIOR COURT: The Supreme Court; or a County Court.
LOCAL CRIMINAL COURT: A district court; the N.Y.City Criminal Court (or outside NYC, a City Court; a Town Court; a Village Court; Supreme or County judges sitting as a local Criminal Court). (CPL 10.10)

SUPERIOR Courts have exclusive trial jurisdiction of felonies.

SUPERIOR Courts have preliminary jurisdiction of all offences, but they exercise such jurisdiction only by reason and through the agency of their Grand Juries. (CPL 10.20)

A GRAND JURY is a body consisting of not less than 16 or more than 23 persons, impanelled by a SUPERIOR court and constituting a part of such court. (CPL 190.05)

Since a Grand Jury is part of a Superior Court, and Superior Courts have exclusive trial jurisdiction of felonies, it follows that.....

As regards felonies, criminal action is commenced in one of two ways: 1) "Felony Complaint", which is a verified written accusation by a person, filed with a local criminal court, charging person(s) with the commission of one or more felonies, or 2) Filing of an indictment by a Grand Jury.

Criminal action in a Superior Court can only be commenced by the Grand Jury's indictment, and may be commenced by the indictment alone. (CPL 100.05 & 100.10) However, in other than "A" felony cases, defendants may waive indictment (with the consent of the District Attorney). (CPL 195.10)

FELONIES

The origin of the word FELONY and how its meaning has changed are interesting.

It is believed that it originated with the Latin stem,'fell', meaning gall; in the case of a felon, "one who is full of bitterness".

This would seem to be an apt description. When one reviews those crimes against humans which are termed "felonies", the underlying "bitterness" of the perpetrator fits.

However, with progress and adaption to less demanding of rights for society and more rights for the individual, has come acceptance of whatever conditions prevail. Thus, with more acceptances of problems as 'usual', comes a lessening of more proper condemning descriptions of such crimes.

Felonies were first described as "villany, wickedness, baseness". Time has softened such descriptions to "guilt, deceit, treachery, perfidy", and now to "a crime, misdeed, sin".

However, the intent of the word was always to attribute 'felony' to deceit, etc., involving the misappropriation of lands.

In feudal society, where this word was first applied, such theft of land was tantamount to stealing one's horse in the early days of the American West. So, a felony was indeed a perfidious crime, committed only by the basest of criminals - felons.

Since felons are still committing the worst of crimes - and there are so very many of these crimes - how much have we advanced since feudal times?

Has our continued softening of the descriptions of horrendous types of crimes contributed to a softening of the realizations of the seriousness of these crimes? The numerous 'degrees' now assigned to some of these crimes, and the latitude available in the punishment of all felonies should be considered

THE FELONIES

ABORTION, ABSCONDING, ANARCHY, ARSON, ASSAULT, BAIL JUMPING, BIGAMY, BOMBS, BRIBES(Jurors, Labor Official, Public Servants, Sports, Witnesses), BURGLARY, CHILD ABANDONMENT, COERCION, CONSPIRACY, CONTEMPT, CONTRABAND, DRUGS, EAVESDROPPING, ESCAPE, EXPLOSIVES, FACILITATION, FALSE INSTRUMENTS, FALSE REPORTING, FIREARMS, FORGED INSTRUMENTS, FORGERY, FRAUD, GAMBLING, GRAND LARCENY, HINDERING PROSECUTION, HOMICIDE, IMPRISONMENT, INCEST, INTERFERENCE WITH CUSTODIAN, KIDNAPPING, MANSLAUGHTER, MISCHIEF, MISCONDUCT, MURDER, OBSCENE MATERIAL, PERJURY, PRISON CONTRABAND, PROSTITUTION, RAPE, RECKLESS ENDANGERMENT, RIOT, ROBBERY, SEXUAL ABUSE, SLUGS, SODOMY, SOLICITATION, STOLEN PROPERTY, SUBSTITUTION OF CHILDREN, SUICIDE, TAMPERING, TRESPASS, UNLAWFUL USE OF SCIENTIFIC MATERIAL, USERY, WEAPONS, WILL, UNLAWFUL CONCEALMENT OF.

These are the crimes against humans, which are "villany, wickedness, baseness, guilt, deceit, treachery and perfidy". (Now, merely described as "a crime, a misdeed, or a sin"!!!)

There are various degrees of many of these felonies.....

WHAT CAN BE DONE TO THOSE WHO COMMIT FELONIES?

Sentences.....

I - Felony sentences are indeterminate sentences.

II - When sentences are imposed, the court has at its discretion minimum and maximum sentence boundaries. These boundaries are provided by the N.Y. State Penal Law (Section 70.00).

III - The sentence "boundaries" that are available to the court (i.e., the Judge doing the sentencing) are:

FELONY	SENTENCE POSSIBLE
(Class)	Minimum	Maximum
A I	15 - 25 years	Life
A II	6 - 8 years., 4 mo.	Life
A III	1 - 8 years., 4 mo.	Life
B	1 year	25 years
C	1 year	15 years
D*	1 year	7 years
E*	1 year	4 years

*Alternative: If not second or persistent felony offender, regard to nature and character of circumstances of crime and history and character of defendant, court opinion that imprisonment is necessary, but indeterminate sentence is unduly harsh, allows court to impose a definite sentence of imprisonment....and fix a term of one year or less.

Court may: Interpreting nature and circumstances of crime, history and character of the defendant...as related to justice and the best interest of the public, fix the minimum period of sentence, (but shall not fix it beyond 1/3 of the maximum).

NOTE: As regards second and persistent felony offenders, see Penal Law, Section 70.06 thru 70.10

This material has been prepared as a supplement to the "NEWS", a quarterly publication of the Bronx County Grand Jurors Association, Inc.,Bronx, N.Y.

It has been provided for all who serve on a Grand Jury, all who will serve, and those who may not get to serve but as good citizens wish to learn about this most important part of our judicial system.

Please address any inquires relative to our publication to the Editor, at the following address:

CAMPBELL, CALIF., May 10, 1977.

MR. MARTIN BELSKY,
House Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BELSKY: The following are my answers to the questions given to me at the subcommittee hearings on April 27, 1977.

1. How did U.S. Attorney give Grand Jury information on the past records of the accused? Usually this was done by the witness, such as an FBI agent. It could, however, come in response to a probe by the U.S. Attorney or his assistants such as "What kind of person is this Mr. Jones??" It did not happen on every case by any means, but it did happen on more than one occasion.

2. What was response of Jurors to reading criminal records? The jurors did not know proper procedure and were interested in the information. It made it easier for them to find the person should be indicted. I did not know proper procedure either, but the practice seemed unfair to me. I though we should only consider the evidence against the accused for the case under consideration. Past charges or convictions were not relevant.

3. Were we ever told of our right to see the accused or a witness? Yes, but the most expedient way to pursue each case was laid out for us. When a certain witness or the accused were to be seen, this was "suggested." I can recall one case, out of hundreds, where we initiated requests for witnesses. It was a murder case (a killing) and the government suggested calling witnesses. This was one case in which we received instructions to really debate facts and have an open mind. The government did have an opinion in this case, but they were not firm in it and left the decision up to us. However, as the foreman did point out, even in this case we did decide in favor of the side in which the government was leaning!

Did we make requests to see witnesses? Only on one or two cases—such as the example above.

4. Did we get a chance to ask questions? One Assistant U.S. Attorney "bristled," the others, with a few exceptions, were agreeable and tolerant of the few questions asked. We did ask questions on most cases, but these were often questions like "How much money did the robber get? What did he spend the money on?" Questions that were hostile to the U.S. Attorney in the sense that they questioned the need for an indictment were tolerated to a point. These occasions took the form of a mini-argument between the questioner and the U.S. Attorney and the foreman usually cut off the debate. There was strong sentiment that the accused was "guilty" and that argument to the contrary showed permissiveness.

5. Did the Assistant U.S. Attorney try to stop no-bill. He did not really try to stop it. He just was surprised by it and critical. He said something to the effect that the government only brings in cases that are well researched and that most of them are worthy of an indictment. After a brief period of discussion and befuddlement we just went on to other business. I have no idea what became of our sole no-bill. The accused was an older man who was about to retire from his job. I think sympathy of the women in the group for him accounted for the no-bill to a great extent, rather than facts of the case and the probable cause issue.

6. Examples of pressure on the media. Without extensive research of my notes I can't give very detailed examples. I recall cases of tape recordings received by radio stations. The station manager was called in and asked to hand over the tape so it could be analyzed for evidence that might lead to terrorists. The same was done with letters sent to stations. Some stations seemed ready to comply and others did not. We did not learn the outcome of these cases. Sometimes we really did not understand what was going on or why the party was being questioned. We did not ask since we did not feel it was our right to.

7. Grand jury leaks. I know of none connected with our jury. I doubt very much if our group would let out a peep. We were given the example once of some jurors who were discussing a case in the lunch room between themselves and the conversation was overheard by some FBI agents who reported the incident to a judge. The jurors were called before the judge and dismissed in disgrace. This story kept us quiet. We did conduct a major investigation of airlines who sold tickets at under the CAB set rates. I wonder if the government didn't leak some of this investigation. I understand much information about the investigation got into the press.

8. Exculpatory evidence. I can only recall one case in which such evidence was presented—it was the unique case of a killing mentioned above. On other cases only evidence that tended to show probable cause that the accused should be indicted was presented. I only made requests for such evidence on two or three oc-easions. None was forthcoming and most grand jurors thought the question was out of line. I asked it because a lawyer friend mentioned that the jurors had a right to hear such evidence if it existed.

It is hard to get the atmosphere of the grand jury room across in order to put this question about exculpatory evidence in perspective. The process is an indictment mill. Grand jurors are running on this treadmill to make it go as fast as possible so business can be finished by the afternoon. We did not know how to stand up to the U.S. Attorney, we did not understand our rights and responsibilities, we did not feel qualified to question the government. Discussion of exculpatory evidence ran counter to the process.

9. Independent attorney. This attorney could function as advisor to the grand jury. He or she could train the jury in its role of independence, providing examples of how to be independent under certain situations. Role playing type of training could take place. During presentations by the U.S. Attorney or by witnesses he could advise grand jurors upon request. He or she could do the same during deliberations.

The attorney could be paid and serve for a term. Or perhaps could be "drafted" as are jurors (and doctors into the army). The drafted attorney could serve for the same term as the jurors. The attorney would not place the jury in an adversary role to the government, but would instead keep the jury independent and uncommitted to either the government or the accused until the point of deliberations.

Selection of jurors to achieve a group that had more disposition toward independence (as discussed in my testimony) should be a part of this effort to obtain a separate attorney for the grand jury.

RESPONSES TO GENERAL QUESTIONS

1. How often did grand jury not accept recommendations of government attorney? Only one time out of perhaps 300 cases we heard.

2. Were we ever consulted about what witnesses to call? Very rarely. Perhaps on 10 occasions. On the vast majority of cases, the U.S. Attorney called in the witnesses and directed the questions.

3. Were we consulted about which witnesses should be granted immunity? No. We were told certain witnesses would be granted immunity. On occasion we were told that certain witnesses would probably refuse to testify and later be granted immunity.

4. How often did grand jurors ask questions as opposed to the government attorney? I would estimate that grand jurors asked questions on 75% of the cases. Often these cases would not relate to the decision to determine probable cause. For example, questions such as "Did you catch him yet!?" Or, "Has this person ever committed this type of crime before?" were asked.

5. Who determined what cases or leads were to be investigated? The U.S. Attorney and his Assistants. The exceptions to this rule were very insignificant and few in number.

6. Juror instructions. We heard about 10 minutes of instructions from the judge and about 45 minutes from the U.S. Attorney. We received a brief and general handbook which in retrospect did not really explain my role or responsibilities. Instruction from the U.S. Attorney is like the fox explaining to the chickens how to be on guard against foxes. It is very hard for the fox to be effective in this role, no matter how sincere he is.

7. Was I ever present when a witness invoked the fifth amendment, and if so what was the reaction of the grand jurors? Yes, I was several times. Like most targets of grand jury investigation and associated persons, these individuals looked guilty to us. Taking the fifth made them look even more so. The comments of the government attorneys and the appearance of the witness to hide something made them look bad.

8. Did the prosecutor present evidence favorable to the potential defendent? Almost never. The exception that I recall is the killing where we were told such facts as that the dead husband had a history of beating his wife and had threatened to kill her, etc. We were told about the testimony of witnesses to government agents concerning prior family history and we called some of these witnesses ourselves to hear from them.

9. Were we ever told information about a case that was not presented by a witness and was presented by the government instead? I don't recall, but most probably yes. The government was pretty free with information about subjects of investigation. We often asked the attorney for information about the subjects and were usually given an answer.

10. Reaction when witness asked to leave room to consult with attorney.

We were nearly always irritated by this . It disrupted the procedure and delayed our getting home on time. It bothered the government and we, as always, followed his lead—we were bothered too. I recall one witness, a young lady obviously very frightened. She did not have an attorney. I cut in on the government attorney's questioning and said that this person needed advice since she was being asked some very leading questions and was in no condition to properly make the best case for herself. This question went onto the record to the dismay of the attorney. The session was abruptly cancelled shortly thereafter. We, the grand jury, never learned the purpose of the questioning, the nature of the case, or the outcome. We were in the dark about other cases, but did not feel it our place to raise questions.

11. We did not learn of witnesses going before judges to challenge some action. What happened to cases before, during and after we heard them, i.e., anything that happened outside the grand jury room was a mystery. We were often curious about cases and asked questions. We did not learn much, however, except what we would read in the paper about some cases.

12. We would hear five or so cases, then deliberate for a few minutes on each case and vote an indictment. A few questions might be asked at this time about the case. Regarding the amount of evidence we needed to indict, we never quantified this. On several occasions we may have asked for more information, but this was rare. It would take perhaps an average of two minutes per indictment for deliberation. We would get a smattering of votes against indictments. Perhaps 60 percent of the indictments were unanimous. Rarely were there more than two or three votes against indictment.

13. No.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. GLOEGE.

[Whereupon, at 3:10 p.m., the hearing adjourned.]

GRAND JURY REFORM

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1977

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION, CITIZENSHIP, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW
OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a.m. in room 2237 of the Rayburn House Office Building; Hon. Joshua Eilberg (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Representatives Eilberg, Hall, Harris, and Fish.

Staff present: Garner J. Cline, Arthur P. Endres, Jr., and Martin H. Belsky, counsel; Peter Regis, legislative assistant; and Alexander B. Cook, associate counsel.

Mr. EILBERG. The subcommittee will come to order.

We welcome as a witness to our committee the Honorable Donald C. Alexander, former Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service, member of the firm of Olwine, Connelly, Chase, O'Donnell & Weyher, New York, N.Y.

We indeed welcome you, Mr. Alexander, and I apologize that the other members of the subcommittee have not yet arrived in Washington. They are all on their way back from the districts.

In the interest of conserving time, we would like you to testify, and we hope the other members will catch up with us.

We do have a number of witnesses today, and we are anxious where possible for witnesses to summarize statements that have been prepared, and then we might ask some questions.

TESTIMONY OF DONALD C. ALEXANDER, ESQ., OLWINE, CONNELLY, CHASE, O'DONNELL & WEYHER, NEW YORK, N.Y.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I will summarize my statement, with the permission of the committee. I ask that my entire statement be placed in the record.

Mr. EILBERG. Without objection it will be made part of the record.

(The prepared statement of Donald C. Alexander follows:)

STATEMENT OF DONALD C. ALEXANDER

(Olwine, Connelly, Chase, O'Donnell & Weyher New York and Washington)

My name is Donald C. Alexander and I am a partner in the New York and Washington law firm of Olwine, Connelly, Chase, O'Donnell & Weyher. I am appearing at the request of the Subcommittee to discuss certain aspects of H.R. 94, the Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.

My comments are limited to matters which which I have some personal knowledge and experience. I am not speaking on behalf of any organization, governmental or private, or any client of my law firm. I am not engaged in any matter involving a grand jury.

When I was Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I twice appeared before grand juries. One of these appearances took place in Washington, D.C. and another in Miami, Florida. Because of these appearances and knowledge gained elsewhere, I became concerned about whether the grand jury as now constituted and utilized in the United States, may be far different from what our forefathers expected when the grand jury system was first brought to this country. I am speaking of the grand jury in its capacity as the entity charged with the responsibility of indicting.

I believe that the grand jury is no longer an independent group of peers, given the responsibility and capable of exercising it. to charge the guilty but protect the innocent. Instead, I question whether the grand jury may be largely a rubber stamp for the prosecution and, if so, whether this dual responsibility of the grand jury has not been assumed by the prosecutor. If so, the judgment and integrity of the prosecutor is determinative in resolving the vtial issue of whether or not to indict.

An indictment without sound support damages the fabric of our society but does far greater damage to the indicted individual. Too often the media and the public assume guilt by indictment and a later dismissal or acquittal does not remove the stigma. Indeed, in these post-Watergate days, lasting scars can result merely from often-repeated allegations which are totally and patently fallacious, even though the grand jury finds these accusations groundless. I speak from some personal experience.

If one then grants the damage that a wrongful indictment inflicts and the likelihood that a grand jury will not exercise individual responsibilities or veto actions of an overzealous prosecutor, then what should be done?

An initial question is whether it is worthwhile to review the procedures now used in other countries to see whether they provide helpful guidance in the effort to strike a sound balance between vigorous and effective law enforcement on one hand and protecting individual liberties, rights and reputations on the other.

Assuming that our present grand jury system will be continued, I think that the changes contained in H.R. 94 and discussed below should be made to achieve the proper balance which we need.

In providing for the right of counsel, Section 7 of H.R. 94 takes a sound and important step. It seems to me that limitations in this provision upon the presence and actions of counsel meet the issue of possible intrference with grand jury proceedings. Moreover, the provisions with respect to a week's notice before testifying and those providing adequate and reasonable notice of the rights of witnesses are constructive and important.

Section 8 of H.R. 94 also represents a sound step towards fairness in providing for the recording of grand jury proceedings and for making available to a witness a copy of any statement made prior to testifying and a copy of the transcript of the witness' own appearance.

Section 6 calls for the Court to advise the grand jury, assuring that the jury "reasonably understands," about its powers, its rights, its duties and its obligation of secrecy. In the complex urban world in which we live, such direction is essential. Also, this Section requires the Government attorney to advised the jury of the nature and existence of exculpatory evidence.

Finally, Section 5 provides penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy. In these days of leaks and planted stories, such protection is badly needed.

In discussing and supporting only some of the provisions of H.R. 94, I do not mean to imply that the others are not of great importance. By reason of experience and knowledge, other witnesses are in a much better position than I to evaluate these provisions.

I welcome this Committee's interest in this area of great importance to our society, and I will be glad to try to answer any questions you may have.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am appearing here entirely in a personal capacity. For more than 3 months I have not been Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I am not appearing here today on behalf of my law firm or any client of my law firm. Instead I am here because the committee invited me, and I share your concern about the need of the grand jury reform.

In discussing the historic office of the grand jury, Chief Justice Burger stated in a historic decision last year that serious criminal accusations will be brought only on the considered judgment of a representative body of citizens.

I appeared before two grand juries when I was Commissioner of Internal Revenue, one in Washington on February 13, 1976, and one in Miami on April 1, 1976. Because of these appearances and knowledge and concerns gained by other experience and interest, I became concerned about whether the grand jury as now constituted and now operated is largely a rubber stamp for the prosecution. If so, does the indictment depend upon the judgment and the integrity of the U.S. attorney as contrasted with what Chief Justice Burger called the historic role of the grand jury.

As we all know, and as Judge Frank stated about 30 years ago, "a wrongful indictment is no laughing matter; often it works a grievous irreparable injury to the person indicted." This is particularly true, I might say, if the person wrongfully indicted is a public official. That injury can never be remedied, that stigma can never be removed, because too often the media and the public assume guilt by indictment. The later acquittal or dismissal does not remove the blot. Lasting scars that can result merely from unsupported, totally groundless accusations, and I speak from some personal experience in this regard, even if grand juries find the accusations to be totally groundless.

If one then grants the damage that a wrongful indictment can inflict and the likelihood that a grand jury is not in a position to exercise some of the individual responsibilities that we might expect it to exercise—and our forefathers did expect it to exercise—then what should we do about it?

Possibly one could look to seek what is being done in other countries such as England, which abolished the grand jury system back in 1933, to see what checks and what balances they have devised to strike a sound balance between vigorous and effective law enforcement on one hand and the protection of individual liberties and the rights and reputations on the other.

Assuming that the grand jury system will be continued and speaking solely about certain provisions of your bill, H.R. 94, I think that these provisions represent sound steps toward striking this proper balance between effective law enforcement on the one hand and protection of the constitutional rights and liberties on the other.

The right of counsel, section 7, which I think is supported by a number of prosecutors and lawyers in this field, is a sound and important step with the limitations spelled out in section 7—the right to have counsel in the grand jury room but without obstructing the orderly and efficient conduct of the grand jury business.

In section 8 of your bill, it calls for the recording of grand jury proceedings and for making available to a witness a copy of any statement made prior to testifying and a copy of the transcript of the witness' own appearance. I understand this is done in a number of grand juries but not in others. It should be done in all.

Section 6 calls for the court to advise the grand jury in such a way that the grand jury reasonably understands its powers, its rights, and its duties, including the necessity of sufficient evidence to form the basis of any indictment.

91-400 O - 78 - pt. 1 - 37

In section 5 it provides penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy. There have been some problems in this respect, and I think this protection is badly needed, with safeguards, of course, and safeguards are contained in this bill with respect to freedom of the press.

In discussing only portions of H.R. 94 I don't mean to imply that other provisions are not very important, but other witnesses are in a much better position than I to evaluate these provisions.

The Attorney General, I understand, is scheduled to appear before this committee, and I am sure his testimony will be very valuable and instructive, as Attorney General Levi's was last year.

Witnesses from the Justice Department can tell you what the problems are that they foresee, why they have objections and concerns, if they have them, as to the provisions in your bill, including those that I have outlined. With the healthy skepticism that I am sure you will use in listening to their testimony, as well as mine and others, you will be able to evaluate whether the burdens which may be mentioned and which were mentioned last year by Attorney General Levi with respect to the right of counsel outweigh the benefits gained by permitting witnesses to have counsel.

I would be glad to try to answer any questions you may have.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you, Mr. Alexander, for your contribution and your realization of the time pressures that we are under today, I would like to ask you a few questions.

In submissions to the subcommittee and in testimony to the Criminal Justice Subcommittee, some have complained that grand juries are often used for civil tax investigations.

What was your experience in this regard? Were any standards established to determine whether a case was civil or criminal in nature by the IRS and the Justice Department?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Those presently charged with the responsibility of carrying out their offices, including my successor, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, and the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Tax Division, are in a better position to respond to this important question than I.

We have heard of complaints about the use of grand juries beyond the historic purpose of the grand jury. I believe that Attorney General Levi did touch on this matter with respect to the tax system in his appearance before you last June. I can give no assurances that everything was perfect in the past. That would be an overstatement in which I will not indulge.

I can tell you that I think the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice, which, after all, is charged for these matters, did conduct themselves properly as a general matter.

In a number of situations you don't know whether a criminal tax case can be made until after it has been investigated to some extent, and sometimes investigations are stymied at the water's edge by witnesses who refuse to testify. I believe, as I stated, the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice employed sound procedures.

Mr. EILBERG. Procedures for administrative summons include a showing of relevancy and materiality, a right to counsel for hearing, and a right to an immediate transcript. These are avoided by use of the grand jury subpena. Who within IRS or the Justice Department would determine whether a summons or a grand jury subpena should be utilized?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is my understanding that the grand jury subpena can be utilized solely on the decision of the Department of Justice. Therefore, the Department of Justice will make that decision.

The IRS might well make a request of the Department of Justice. The administrative summons and rights and limitations upon the use of the summons have been reconsidered by Congress and changed by recent legislation, such as section 1205 of the Tax Reform Act of 1976, which ingrafted new limitations by use of the third-party summons.

The summons is a necessary ingredient in the enforcement of the tax laws, but a summons is an awkward and frequently ineffective way of dealing with someone who derives his living illegally and who is dedicated to the proposition that he will not comply one iota with the tax laws or one iota with the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code dealing with civil enforcement of the administrative summons.

Mr. EILBERG. Judge Becker in Philadelphia specifically granted IRS agents the right to assist attorneys in grand jury investigations, provided the information remain under the control of government attorneys.

What procedures were established, formal or informal, as to when assistance will be granted; what information would be shared; and what information was to be safeguarded?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not familiar with this specific case, Mr. Chairman. The assistant U.S. attorney would be in charge of a matter presented before the grand jury and the information developed by the grand jury.

The IRS agents would be working under his direction and supervision in these matters in an effort to assist him. And Mr. Levi testified last June as to what procedures were established. As to this specific case, I cannot be helpful.

Mr. EILBERG. Some have complained about interagency mingling, and that agencies like the IRS could get by indirect means all the grand jury's extraordinary powers.

How do you react to that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is a facet of the problem that we have been discussing.

The use of the grand jury to make a civil case—and there I refer to my earlier testimony—while I can give no negative assurances, I do think that the Department of Justice and the IRS conducted themselves soundly in the past as a general matter.

The Attorney General, if he or his designate appears, I am sure can speak to what is being done now and what he intends to do in the future to make sure that grand juries are properly used, that agencies assist where their skills and expertise are necessary to the development of the case. That is particularly true where you have complicated financial transactions.

But the grand jury does not become an extension of civil enforcement by the agency.

Mr. EILBERG. Witnesses have stated that grand jury subpenas are often for offices and not the jury room. Thus a subpena for documents would be for the U.S. Attorney's Office or FBI or IRS agent's office.

Did this occur often?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I don't think so.

Mr. EILBERG. Do you believe it proper?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. I think that grand jury subpenas are to obtain information and testimony in the conduct of the matter before the grand jury. If the matter before the grand jury is a criminal matter—it would be criminal. The problem is you don't know, frequently, exactly what case there is or what case there isn't. When the grand jury begins, and properly so, an investigation of a series of transactions of the activities of certain persons, it is rather difficult to draw a perfect line.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Alexander, you have made a good statement, but before leaving the witness stand. I sense from the very opening of your statement, where you referred to your appearances before two grand juries, that these made an indelible impression on you. And one could guess that some things occurred that did not appear to be possibly fair to you. I wonder if you would feel at liberty to tell us something of your experiences so we can better put your testimony in context?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am a lawyer and have been a lawyer for many years. I am acquainted with questions of the straight variety and questions of the trap variety. I think I am capable of responding properly to the latter kind by dissecting them, as well as responding properly to the former. I wonder whether in the interest of having a sound balance between proper law enforcement and protecting the constitutional rights and liberties, it wouldn't be better to permit counsel to assist someone who is not a lawyer, who hasn't been trained and experienced in the law, to try to respond properly, soundly, fully, correctly, and truthfully, to questions posed before the grand jury, but also stay out of traps. A few trap questions did make an impression.

Another thing that made an impression was the fact that although I was the target of a particular investigation, many of the grand jurors appeared to be sleeping throughout my more than 3 hours of testimony. That concerned me a little bit. I asked the Washington grand jury to ask me question, and there were no questions.

A further matter that concerned me in Florida was the fact that after I had testified for some 2 hours or more, I had not yet been asked about the transaction about which I was called—which never occurred but which was a source of considerable media publicity at the time. So I told the grand jury and attorneys that I was going to ask myself questions and respond to them about this matter, because I didn't care to have this remain open for yet a third grand jury. So I did.

That can be done, I suppose, by someone who is experienced in the law and who has spent his or her lifetime in the law. But grand juries are for the protection of the rights of those who need protection, and I wonder whether our present system serves that end.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Alexander, we thank you very much for coming to us and being with us this morning. I assure you that your effort here is worthwhile.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Thank you, sir.

Mr. EILBERG. I ask the witnesses again—I know they will abide by it—to summarize their statements. Some of them are quite long, and counsel has gone over them thoroughly, and I, to some extent, have gone over all of them.

At this point I would like to read the following statement into the record.

This is the third in our series of hearings in the 95th Congress on proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system.

In March of this year we heard witnesses from the American Bar Association and various grand jury reform groups. As expected, these witnesses called for extensive grand jury reform and some made proposals for change far beyond those contemplated in H.R. 94, the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.

At our second hearing we received the testimony of prosecutors and former prosecutors, of former grand jurors, and from the Honorable Frederick Lacey, representing the Judical Conference. These witnesses described what, in fact, occurs in the grand jury room. Some, like the special prosecutor Charles Ruff, and former grand juror, William Gloege, supported the reforms in H.R. 94. Others, like Judge Lacey and San Diego District Attorney Edwin Miller, believe that abuses can be limited or eliminated by insuring competent supervision by ethical prosecutors, and opposed many, but not all, of the proposed reforms.

Today, we resume our hearings with witnesses who have particular concerns with present grand jury procedures.

Before beginning our testimony today, however, I would like to make a few observations.

Last week the Supreme Court of the United States indicated in United States v. Washington that there may not be any constitutional right to warnings or instructions for grand jury witnesses. In addition, the Court specifically held, despite the practice common in most States and in most Federal jurisdictions, that there is no right for a potential defendant to receive notice that he is a target.

UNITED STATES v. WASHINGTON

CERTIORARI TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS

No. 74–1106. Argued December 6, 1976—Decided May 23, 1977

Respondent, who was suspected, with others, of possible implication in a theft, was subpoenaed to appear as a witness before the District of Columbia grand jury investigating the crime. The prosecutor did not advise respondent before his appearance that he might be indicted for the theft, but respondent was given a series of warnings after being sworn, including the warning that he had a right to remain silent. Respondent nevertheless testified, and subsequently was indicted for the theft. The trial court granted respondent's motion to suppress his grand jury testimony and to quash the indictment on the ground that it was based on evidence obtained in violation of his Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the suppression order, holding that "the most significant failing of the prosecutor was in not advising [respondent] that he was a potential defendant" and that "[a]nother shortcoming was in the prosecutor's waiting until after administering the oath in the cloister of the grand jury before undertaking to furnish what advice was given." Held: Respondent's grand jury testimony may properly be used against him in a subsequent trial. The comprehensive warnings he received, whether or not such warnings were constitutionally required, dissipated any element of compulsion to self-incrimination that might otherwise have been present. The fact that a subpoenaed grand jury witness is a putative or potential defendant neither impairs nor enlarges his constitutional rights, and hence it is unnecessary to give such a defendant the warnings that the Court of Appeals held were required. Pp. 5–9.

328 A. 2d 98, reversed and remanded.

BURGER, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which STEWART, WHITE, BLACKMUN, POWELL, REHNQUIST, and STEVENS, JJ., joined. BRENNAN, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which MARSHALL, J., joined.

NOTICE: This opinion is subject to formal revision before publication in the preliminary print of the United States Reports. Readers are requested to notify the Reporter of Decisions, Supreme Court of the United States, Washington, D.C. 20543, of any typographical or other formal errors, in order that corrections may be made before the preliminary print goes to press.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 74–1106

United States, Petitioner, v. Gregory V. Washington. | On Writ of Certiorari to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

[May 23, 1977]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented in this case is whether testimony given by a grand jury witness suspected of wrongdoing may be used against him in a later prosecution for a substantive criminal offense when the witness was not informed in advance of his testimony that he is a potential defendant in danger of indictment.[1]

(1)

The facts are not in dispute. Zimmerman and Woodard were driving respondent's van truck when a Washington, D. C., policeman stopped them for a traffic offense. Seeing a motorcycle in the rear of the van which he identified as stolen, the officer arrested both men and impounded respondent's vehicle. When respondent came to reclaim the van, he told police that Zimmerman and Woodard were friends who were driving the van with his permission.

He explained the presence of the stolen motorcycle by saying that while driving the van himself he had stopped to assist

[1] With United States v. Mandujano, 425 U. S. 564 (1976), and United States v. Wong, — U. S. — (1977), we have settled that grand jury witnesses, including those already targeted for indictment, may be convicted of perjury on the basis of their false grand jury testimony even though they were not first advised of their Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination.

an unknown motorcyclist whose machine had broken down. Respondent then allowed the motorcycle to be placed in his van to take it for repairs. Soon after this the van stalled and he walked to a nearby gasoline station to call Zimmerman and Woodard for help, leaving the van with the unknown motorcyclist. After reaching Zimmerman by phone, respondent waited at the gasoline station for his friends, then returned to the spot he had left the van when they failed to appear; by that time the van had disappeared. Respondent said he was not alarmed, assuming his friends had repaired the van and driven it away. Shortly thereafter, Zimmerman and Woodard were arrested with the stolen motorcycle in the van.

Not surprisingly, the officer to whom respondent related this tale was more than a little skeptical; he told respondent he did not believe his story, and advised him not to repeat it in court, "because you're liable to be in trouble if you" do so. The officer also declined to release the van. Respondent then repeated this story to an Assistant United States Attorney working on the case. The prosecutor, too, was dubious of the account; nevertheless, he released the van to respondent. At the same time, he served respondent with a subpoena to appear before the grand jury investigating the motorcycle theft.

When respondent appeared before the grand jury, the Assistant United States Attorney in charge had not yet decided whether to seek an indictment against him. The prosecutor was aware of respondent's explanation, and was also aware of the possibility that respondent could be indicted by the grand jury for the theft if his story was not believed.

The prosecutor did not advise respondent before his appearance that he might be indicted on a criminal charge in connection with the stolen motorcycle. But respondent, after reciting the usual oath to tell the truth, was given a series of other warnings, as follows:

"Q: . . . .

"You have a right to remain silent. You are not required to say anything to us in this Grand Jury at any time or to answer any question.[2]

"Anything you say can be used against you in Court.

"You have the right to talk to a lawyer for advice before we question you and have him outside the Grand Jury during any questioning.

"If you cannot afford a lawyer and want one a lawyer will be provided for you.

"If you want to answer questions now without a lawyer present you will still have the right to stop answering at any time.

"You also have the right to stop answering at any time until you talk to a lawyer.

"Now, do you understand those rights, sir?

"A: Yes, I do.

"Q: And do you want to answer questions of the Grand Jury in reference to a stolen motorcycle that was found in your truck?

"A: Yes, sir.

"Q: And do you want a lawyer here or outside the Grand Jury room while you answer those questions?

"A: No, I don't think so."

In response to questions, respondent again related his version of how the stolen motorcycle came to be in the rear of his van. Subsequently, the grand jury indicted respondent, Zimmerman, and Woodard for grand larceny and receiving stolen property.

[2] This was an obvious overstatement of respondent's constitutional rights; the very purpose of the grand jury is to elicit testimony, and it can compel answers, by use of contempt powers, to all except self-incriminating questions.

After the oral warnings, respondent was also handed a card containing all the warnings prescribed by Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966), and a waiver form acknowledging that the witness waived the privilege against compelled self-incrimination. Respondent signed the waiver.

Respondent moved to suppress his testimony and quash the indictment, arguing that it was based on evidence obtained in violation of his Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination. The Superior Court for the District of Columbia suppressed the testimony and dismissed the indictment, holding that before the Government could use respondent's grand jury testimony at trial, it had first to demonstrate that respondent had knowingly waived his privilege against compelled self-incrimination. Notwithstanding the comprehensive warnings described earlier, the court found no effective waiver had been made, holding that respondent was not properly advised of his Fifth Amendment rights. The court thought the Constitution required, at a minimum, that > "inquiry be made of the suspect to determine what his educational background is, and whether or not he understands that this is a constitutional privilege and whether he fully understands the consequences of what might result in the event that he does waive his constitutional right and in the event that he does make incriminatory statements . . . ."

The court also held that respondent should have been told that his testimony could lead to his indictment by the grand jury before which he was testifying, and could then be used to convict him in a criminal prosecution.

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the suppression order. United States v. Washington, 328 A. 2d 98 (1974).[3] That court also took the position that "the most significant failing of the prosecutor was in not advising [respondent] that he was a potential defendant. Another shortcoming was in the prosecutor's waiting until after administering the oath in the cloister of the grand jury before undertaking to furnish what advice was given." Id., at 100.[4]

[3] The Court of Appeals declined to dismiss the indictment, however, relying on a line of cases in this Court holding that an indictment returned by a properly constituted grand jury is not subject to challenge on the ground that it was based on unconstitutionally obtained evidence. See United States v. Calandra, 414 U. S. 338 (1974); United States v. Blue, 384 U. S. 251 (1966); Lawn v. United States, 355 U. S. 339 (1958). Respondent's cross-petition seeking review of this portion of the Court of Appeals' ruling was denied, Washington v. United States, 426 U. S. 905 (1976), and the validity of the indictment is not an issue in this case.

The implicit premise of the District Court of Appeals' holding is that a grand jury inquiry, like police custodial interrogation, is an "interrogation of persons suspected or accused of crime [that] contains inherently compelling pressures which work to undermine the individual's will to resist and to compel him to speak where he would not otherwise do so freely." Miranda, supra, at 467. But this Court has not decided that the grand jury setting presents coercive elements which compel witnesses to incriminate themselves. Nor have we decided whether any Fifth Amendment warnings whatever are constitutionally required for grand jury witnesses; moreover, we have no occasion to decide these matters today, for even assuming that the grand jury setting exerts some pressures on witnesses generally or on those who may later be indicted, the comprehensive warnings respondent received in this case plainly satisfied any possible claim to warnings. Accordingly, respondent's grand jury testimony may properly be used against him in a subsequent trial for theft of the motorcycle.

Although it is well settled that the Fifth Amendment privilege extends to grand jury proceedings, Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547 (1892), it is also axiomatic

[4] Though both courts below found no effective waiver of Fifth Amendment rights, neither court found, and no one suggests here, that respondent's signing of the waiver-of-rights form was involuntary or was made without full appreciation of all the rights of which he was advised. The Government does not challenge, and we do not disturb, the finding that at the time of his grand jury appearance respondent was a potential defendant whose indictment was considered likely by the prosecution.

that the Amendment does not automatically preclude self-incrimination, whether spontaneous or in response to questions put by government officials. "It does not preclude a witness from testifying voluntarily in matters which may incriminate him," United States v. Monia, 317 U. S. 424, 427 (1943), for "those competent and freewilled to do so may give evidence against the whole world, themselves included." United States v. Kimball, 117 F. 156, 163 (CC SDNY 1902); accord, Miranda, supra, at 478; Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U. S. 433 (1974); Hoffa v. United States, 385 U. S. 293 (1966). Indeed, far from being prohibited by the Constitution, admissions of guilt by wrongdoers, if not coerced, are inherently desirable. In addition to guaranteeing the right to remain silent unless immunity is granted, the Fifth Amendment proscribes only self-incrimination obtained by a "genuine compulsion of testimony." Michigan v. Tucker, supra, at 440. Absent some officially coerced self-accusation, the Fifth Amendment privilege is not violated by even the most damning admissions. Accordingly, unless the record reveals some compulsion, respondent's incriminating testimony cannot conflict with any constitutional guarantees of the privilege.[5]

The Constitution does not prohibit every element which influences a criminal suspect to make incriminating admissions. See Garner, supra; Beckwith, supra; Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U. S. 218, 223–227 (1973). Of course, for many witnesses the grand jury room engenders an atmosphere conducive to truth-telling, for it is likely that upon being brought before such a body of neighbors and fellow citizens, and having been placed under a solemn oath to tell the truth, many witnesses will feel obliged to do just that. But it does not offend the guarantees of the Fifth Amendment if in that setting a witness is more likely to tell the truth than in less solemn surroundings. The constitutional guarantee is only that the witness be not compelled to give self-incriminating testimony. The test is whether, considering the totality of the circumstances, the free will of the witness was overborne. Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U. S. 534, 544 (1961).

[5] In Miranda, the Court saw as inherently coercive any police custodial interrogation conducted by isolating the suspect with police officers; therefore, the Court established a per se rule that all incriminating statements made during such interrogation are barred as "compelled." All Miranda's safeguards, which are designed to avoid the coercive atmosphere, rest on the overbearing compulsion which the Court thought was caused by isolation of a suspect in police custody. See Oregon v. Mathiason, 45 U. S. L. W. 3505 (Jan. 25, 1977); Beckwith v. United States, 425 U. S. 341 (1976); Garner v. United States, 424 U. S. 648, 653–654 (1976); Michigan v. Tucker, supra, at 444.

After being sworn, respondent was explicitly advised that he had a right to remain silent and that any statements he did make could be used to convict him of crime. It is inconceivable that such a warning would fail to alert him to his right to refuse to answer any question which might incriminate him. This advice also eliminated any possible compulsion to self-incrimination which might otherwise exist. To suggest otherwise is to ignore the record and reality. Indeed, it seems self-evident that one who is told he is free to refuse to answer questions is in a curious posture to later complain that his answers were compelled. Moreover, any possible coercion or unfairness resulting from a witness' misimpression that he must answer truthfully even questions with incriminatory aspects is completely removed by the warnings given here. Even in the presumed psychologically coercive atmosphere of police custodial interrogation, Miranda does not require that any additional warnings be given simply because the suspect is a potential defendant; indeed, such suspects are potential defendants more often than not. United States v. Binder, 453 F. 2d 805, 810 (CA2 1971), cert. denied, 407 U. S. 920 (1972).

Respondent points out that unlike one subject to custodial interrogation, whose arrest should inform him only too clearly that he is a potential criminal defendant, a grand jury witness may well be unaware that he is targeted for possible prosecution. While this may be so in some situations, it is an overdrawn generalization. In any case, events here clearly put respondent on notice that he was a suspect in the motorcycle theft. He knew that the grand jury was investigating that theft and that his involvement was known to the authorities. Respondent was made abundantly aware that his exculpatory version of events had been disbelieved by the police officer, and that his friends, whose innocence his own story supported, were to be prosecuted for the theft. The interview with the prosecutor put him on additional notice that his implausible story was not accepted as true. The warnings he received in the grand jury room served further to alert him to his own potential criminal liability. In sum, by the time he testified respondent knew better than anyone else of his potential defendant status.

However, all of this is largely irrelevant, since we do not understand what constitutional disadvantage a failure to give potential defendant warnings could possibly inflict on a grand jury witness, whether or not he has received other warnings. It is firmly settled that the prospect of being indicted does not entitle a witness to commit perjury, and witnesses who are not grand jury targets are protected from compulsory self-incrimination to the same extent as those who are. Because target witness status neither enlarges nor diminishes the constitutional protection against compelled self-incrimination, potential defendant warnings add nothing of value to protection of Fifth Amendment rights.

Respondent suggests he must prevail under Garner v. United States, supra. There, the petitioner was charged with a gambling conspiracy. As part of its case, the Government introduced Garner's income tax returns, in one of which he had identified his occupation as "professional gambler," and in all of which he had reported substantial income from wagering. The Court recognized that Garner was indeed compelled by law to file a tax return, but held that this did not constitute compelled self-incrimination. The Court noted that Garner did not claim his Fifth Amendment privilege, instead making the incriminating disclosure that he was a professional gambler. Garner holds that the Self-Incrimination Clause is violated only when the Government compels disclosures which it knows will incriminate the declarant—that is, only when it intentionally places the individual under "compulsions to incriminate, not merely compulsions to make unprivileged disclosures." 424 U. S., at 657. But the distinction between compulsion to incriminate and compulsion to disclose what the Government is entitled to know is of no help to respondent; in this case there was no compulsion to do either.

In Beckwith v. United States, supra, decided shortly after Garner, we reaffirmed the need for showing overbearing compulsion as a prerequisite to a Fifth Amendment violation. There, the Government agent interrogated the taxpayer for the explicit purpose of securing information that would incriminate him. There, as here, the interrogation was not conducted in an inherently coercive setting; hence the claim of compelled self-incrimination was rejected.[6]

[6] Although the District Court of Appeals rested its holding solely on the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment, respondent urges the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause. He contends it is fundamentally unfair to elicit incriminating testimony from a potential defendant without first informing him of his target status. This, it is argued, would alert the witness more pointedly so as to enable him to decide whether to invoke the privilege against compelled self-incrimination. This line of argument simply restates respondent's claims under the Self-Incrimination Clause and is rejected for the same reasons. Moreover, there is no evidence of any governmental misconduct which undermined the fairness of the proceedings.

Since warnings were given, we are not called upon to decide whether such warnings were constitutionally required. However, the District Court of Appeals held that whatever warnings are required are insufficient if given "in the cloister of the grand jury." 328 A. 2d, at 100. That court gave no reason for its view that warnings must be given outside the presence of the jury, but respondent now advances two justifications. First, it could be thought that warnings given to respondent inside the grand jury came too late, because of the short time to assimilate their significance, and because of the presence of the grand jurors. But respondent does not contend that he did not understand the warnings given here. In any event, it is purely speculative to attribute any such effects to warnings given in the presence of the jury immediately before taking the stand. If anything, the proximity of the warnings to respondent's testimony and the solemnity of the grand jury setting seem likely to increase their effectiveness.

Second, respondent argues that giving the oath in the presence of the grand jury undermines assertion of the Fifth Amendment privilege by placing the witness in fear that the grand jury will infer guilt from invocation of the privilege. But this argument entirely overlooks that the grand jury's historic role is as an investigative body; it is not the final arbiter of guilt or innocence. Moreover, it is well settled that invocation of the Fifth Amendment privilege in a grand jury proceeding is not admissible in a criminal trial, where guilt or innocence is actually at stake.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 74–1106

United States, Petitioner, v. Gregory V. Washington. | On Writ of Certiorari to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

[May 23, 1977]

MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom MR. JUSTICE MARSHALL joins, dissenting.

The general rule that a witness must affirmatively claim the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination must in my view admit of an exception in the case of a grand jury witness whom the prosecutor interrogates with the express purpose of getting evidence upon which to base a criminal charge against him. In such circumstances, even warnings before interrogation of his right to silence do not suffice. The privilege is emptied of substance unless the witness is further advised by the prosecutor that he is a potential defendant. Only if the witness then nevertheless intentionally and intelligently waives his right to be free from compulsory self-incrimination and submits to further interrogation should use of his grand jury testimony against him be sanctioned. As I stated in dissent in United States v. Mandujano, 425 U. S., at 598–600:

> "I would hold that, in the absence of an intentional and intelligent waiver by the individual of his known right to be free from compulsory self-incrimination, the Government may not call before a grand jury one whom it has probable cause—as measured by an objective standard—to suspect of committing a crime, and by use of judicial compulsion compel him to testify with regard to that crime. In the absence of such a waiver, the Fifth Amendment requires that any testimony obtained in this fashion be unavailable to the Government for use at trial.

> Such a waiver could readily be demonstrated by proof that the individual was warned prior to questioning that he is currently subject to possible criminal prosecution for the commission of a stated crime. . . ."

In this case, although respondent Washington was advised of his rights to silence and to talk to a lawyer before he appeared before the grand jury, he was "only told that he was needed as a witness in prosecuting the two who were occupants of the van at the time of its impoundment." United States v. Washington, 328 A. 2d 98, 100 (Dist. of Col. 1974). He was never told that he was in danger of being indicted himself, even though "at the time of his grand jury appearance respondent was a potential defendant whose indictment was considered likely by the prosecution." Ante, at 5 n. 4.

The ancient privilege of a witness against being compelled to incriminate himself is precious to free men as a shield against high-handed and arrogant inquisitorial practices. It has survived centuries of controversies, periodically kindled by popular impatience that its protection sometimes allows the guilty to escape punishment. But it has endured as a wise and necessary protection of the individual against arbitrary power, and the price of occasional failures of justice is paid in the larger interest of general personal security.

I would hold that a failure to warn the witness that he is a potential defendant is fatal to an indictment of him when it is made unmistakably to appear, as here, that the grand jury inquiry became an investigation directed against the witness and was pursued with the purpose of compelling him to give self-incriminating testimony upon which to indict him. I would further hold that without such prior warning and the witness' subsequent voluntary waiver of his privilege, there is such gross encroachment upon the witness' privilege as to render worthless the values protected by it unless the self-incriminating testimony is unavailable to the Government for use at any trial brought pursuant to even a valid indictment.

It should be remarked that of course today's decision applies only to application of the privilege against self-incrimination secured by the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution.* The holding does not affect the authority of state courts to construe counterpart provisions of state constitutions—even identically phrased provisions—"to give the individual greater protection than is provided" by the federal provision. State v. Johnson, 68 N. J. 349, 353, 346 A. 2d 66, 67–68 (1975). See generally Brennan, "State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights," 90 Harv. L. Rev. 489 (1977).

A number of state courts have recognized that a defendant or potential defendant called before a grand jury is privileged against the State's using his self-incriminating testimony to procure an indictment or using it to introduce against him at trial, even in the absence of an affirmative claim of his privilege against self-incrimination. See, e. g., People v. Laino, 10 N. Y. 2d 161, 176 N. E. 571 (1961); State v. Fary, 19 N. J. 431, 117 A. 2d 499, 503 (1955); Taylor v. Commonwealth, 274 Ky. 51, 118 S. W. 2d 140 (1938); State v. Corteau, 198 Minn. 433, 270 N. W. 144 (1936); Culbreath v. State, 22 Ala. App. 143, 113 So. 465 (1925). See additional cases in "Annotation: Self-incrimination before Grand Jury," 38 A. L. R. 2d 225, 290–294 (1954). One court has specifically held that interrogating a potential defendant "under the guise of examining him as to the guilt of someone else" is a violation of the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination. People v. Cochran, 313 Ill. 508, 145 N. E. 207, 223 (1974). See also Newman, "The Suspect and the Grand Jury: A Need for Constitutional Protection," 11 U. Rich. L. Rev. 1 (1976);

*Of course, it is still open to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals, under its supervisory powers, on remand to order and enforce compliance with what it considers proper procedures before the grand jury, Ristiano v. Ross, 424 U. S. 589, 597 n. 9 (1976); United States v. Jacobs, —— F. 2d —— (CA2 1976), cert. pending, No. 76-1193.

"Comment, The Grand Jury Witness' Privilege Aagainst Self-Incrimination," 62 Nw. L. Rev. 207, 223 (1967); Meshbesher, "Right to Counsel before Grand Jury," 41 F. R. D. 189, 191 (1966). The rationale of these decisions—which I would find applicable to the case now before us—is that where the grand jury investigation is in fact a proceeding against the witness, or even if begun as a general investigation it becomes a proceeding against the witness, the encroachment upon the witness' privilege requires that a court deny to the prosecution the use of the witness' self-incriminating testimony.

Mr. EILBERG. This case, of course, establishes onl ythe outside limits of permissible action under the Constitution. Congress can, and must, in appropriate circumstances go beyond bare constitutional minimums in establishing standards for executive action and in providing procedural protections. It will be first the members of this subcommittee, then the full committee, and finally the Congress that will determine what fair play, fundamental fairness, and due process should require in grand jury proceedings.

With that, we have just heard from our first witness, Donald C. Alexander. Mr. Alexander was formerly Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service. As I stated at our last hearing, the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice has referred to this subcommittee amendments to rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, that might authorize additional persons as governmental agents, in the grand jury room. Opposition to this rule's change arose from those who feared abuse of grand jury as procedures to handle civil investigations. Specifically mentioned has been the ability of the IRS to avoid the protections, such as those involving adequate notice, venue challenge, relevancy standards, and court review, involved in ordinary IRS statutory administrative summons procedures by use of a grand jury subpena, that does not have such protections.

Our next witness is Mr. Charles Perlik, Jr., president, the Newspaper Guild, Washington, D.C.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman?

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Harris.

Mr. HARRIS. As Mr. Perlik approaches the table I would like to take the opportunity to advise us on the committee of his long history of community service.

I have great admiration for his community service over the years, not just to the labor movement, but to the whole community. I would like to congratulate him for it and welcome him for his testimony.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Perlik, would you identify your associates.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES A. PERLIK, JR., PRESIDENT, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, AFL-CIO

Mr. PERLIK. Yes, I would be glad to.

In the process, I would like to thank Mr. Harris for his kind observations.

This is David Eisen, director of research and information, the Newspaper Guild.

We have arranged our testimony, Mr. Chairman, in such a fashion that will enable me to read the summary, accompanied by a great deal of illustrative and explanatory matters, and with your permission I will proceeed in that fashion.

Mr. EILBERG. Your statement will be made a part of the record.

[Prepared statement of Charles A. Perlik, Jr. follows:]

STATEMENT BY CHARLES A. PERLIK, JR., PRESIDENT, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD, AFL-CIO, CLC

I am Charles A. Perlik, Jr., president of The Newspaper Guild, which represents some 40,000 persons employed in the newsrooms and commercial departments of newspapers, news services, magazines and related enterprises in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico.

Our primary function as a trade union, of course, is to advance the economic interests of our members. But, just as the teachers' union, for example, is concerned with raising educational standards as well as salaries, The Newspaper Guild has had as one of its prime concerns the preservation and improvement of a truly free press. With other media organizations, we have worked consistently to assure that the press remains free of any restriction that contravenes either the letter or the spirit of the First Amendment. That concern has brought us here to Capitol Hill many times either to oppose legislation we feel would infringe on those First Amendment rights or to seek the adoption of legislation that would protect or further them.

Our most recent visit here in that interest was in 1973, to testify on behalf of legislation recognizing the right of news gatherers to protect their information and sources. We regard this right as an integral part of that freedom conferred by the First Amendment, because without it, the trust between news gatherers and their sources is in peril. And that trust is essential to the news gatherer's ability to function and thus to the press's ability to bring the public the information to which it has a right under the First Amendment.

The affirmation of this right has been criticized in some quarters as in conflict with the needs of law enforcement and other government functions, but that, to put it most charitably, is a short-sighted view. The elementary fact is that without the confidence of their news sources, founded in their right to protect them, reporters simply aren't going to get and write the stories that impel overeager prosecutors to hale them before grand juries and into court in hopes of obtaining additional information. Killing the goose that lays the golden egg may get one more egg, but production stops there.

Before 1972, we and others in the news media, convinced that news gatherers' privilege was implicit in the First Amendment, opposed any legislative attempt to define it, since we considered that right absolute and unqualified. Our conviction hasn't changed, but, unfortunately, it is a conviction that the Supreme court in its 1972 decision on the Caldwell, Branzburg and Pappas cases did not share. That decision made it necessary to obtain legislation that would accomplish what the Supreme Court failed to do: affirm the right of news gatherers to shield their information and sources.

But fashioning such blanket legislation proved, in confirmation of our earlier misgivings, no easy task. As I am sure you are all aware, a number of bills were introduced to accomplish that purpose, but they became bogged down in disagreement over limitations and qualifications. We still hope that logjam will eventually be broken, but there seems to be general agreement that it won't happen soon.

For that reason, we come before you today to seek half a loaf—the half that posed relatively little problem in those abortive committee discussions on news gatherers' privilege. Your consideration of badly needed reforms in the grand-jury system offers an opportunity to give legislative sanction to the right of news gatherers to protect their information and sources from federal grand-jury inquisition and provide a model for state legislation to the same end.

While this is, to be sure, a piecemeal solution of the privilege problem, it is by no means an unnatural one. It would cover an area in which there was little controversy during the debate over general privilege legislation; while some of the legislation proposed qualified news gatherers' privilege in one way or another most of it—including the bill approved by the House Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice—provided for absolute privilege on the grand-jury level.

At the same time, the enactment of testimonial privilege in the grand-jury area would provide protection in one of the places where it is most acutely needed. A check through the records of news gatherers' subpoenas over the past six years indicates that there are few so eager as an investigating prosecutor to scatter subpoenas broadside on the press in an effort to turn reporters, in effect, into legal investigators, never mind at what cost to the press' ability to unearth the very information being sought.

Our research has logged no less than 60 subpoenas in the past six years requiring news gatherers and two or three persons in related fields to appear before grand juries, in many cases with notes, transcripts, documents, film or other materials. In 40 cases, those subpoenas were enforced, and the news gatherer was forced, willy-nilly, to appear before the grand jury. Contempt citations were issued in 17 cases in which news gatherers refused to answer questions or provide subpoenaed material, and five went to jail for varying periods of time for that refusal. Seven were required under threat of confinement to disclose information about their sources that they had sought to protect.

The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion. Before 1970, it was relatively rare for a reporter to be forced to betray the confidence of his sources or go to jail. Today it has become a disgraceful commonplace, and I would hope that the subcommittee will see fit to eliminate it in one of the areas where it is most prevalent.

While falling short of that end and, indeed, not designed for that specific purpose, many of the grand-jury reform bills already introduced contain provisions that would ameliorate the situation of news gatherers confronted by a relentless prosecutor on the one hand and their consciences on the other. Our International Executive Board has endorsed these provisions, in a resolution you will find attached to this statement. There are numerous good general reasons for enacting many of the proposed legislative provisions, but I will confine myself to those that would be of specific help to news gatherers. Let me comment on these briefly, reserving more extended treatment for the latter portion of this statement, which has been submitted for your consideration and the official record.

Particularly salutary, we think, are those procedural provisions of Mr. Ellberg's bill, H.R. 94, that would allow counsel into the grand-jury room, require seven days' notice before appearance and inform the witness of the exact subject matter of the investigation. Under present barely regulated procedures, news gatherers all too often find themselves before a grand jury with the briefest of notice, little indication of what information is being sought from them, and bereft of counsel in the grand-jury room to advise them on the intricate matter of what the law may conceivably allow them to withhold. The situation is made to order for fishing expeditions in which prosecutors can seek to pick the reporter's brain for confidential information that is not even directly germane to the matter under injuiry.

We would also like to see enacted the provision in Mr. Conyers' bill, H.R. 3736, that would require a majority vote of the grand jury to issue a subpoena. Leaving this power in the hands of the prosecutor alone lays the way open for harassment of the press, a phenomenon not unknown among prosecutors.

But we would like to see something more. The Justice Department, under pressure from the news media, issued guidelines several years ago setting forth detailed procedural steps for U.S. attorneys to follow in subpoenaing news gatherers. We find the safeguards they incorporate far from adequate to the need, but they do provide some rein on government prosecutors who are ready to subpoena a reporter 10 minutes after reading his or her story. Or, more correctly, they would provide such a rein if they were adhered to. Figures released by the Justice Department two years ago showed that the supposedly binding guidelines had been violated in 29 percent of the 109 cases in which news gatherers had been subpoenaed over a 26-month period.

We think that, at the very least, these guidelines ought to be given the force of law and prosecutors barred from proceeding against any news gatherer subpoenaed in violation of their provisions. A copy of the guidelines, in their latest 1973 revision, is attached to this statement.

Another provision of Mr. Ellberg's bill that would ease the situation of news gatherers called before grand juries is the one enabling witnesses to make copies of the official transcript of their testimony. When Earl Caldwell of the New York Times was subpoenaed to testify on the Black Panthers, he refused to even enter the grand-jury room. Had he done so, he explained, there would have been no way he could have convinced Panther leaders, whose confidence he had earned with great difficulty, that he had not betrayed them. He would have been unable to so much as show them a transcript of his testimony.

H.R. 94 gives the witness the right to examine and copy the transcript or recording of his appearance but entitles him to a copy without cost only if he or she can't afford one. We don't see why witnesses subpoenaed to give testimony should have to pay for a transcript, which can be long and costly, under any circumstances and would suggest that this provision be amended to make it available to all without cost.

We are more disturbed, however, by a section of this provision that allows a judge to order the transcript withheld from the witness, and on a government showing of cause made available to the judge alone, at that. This would open the door to canceling out the reform upon the flimsiest of pretexts, not even subject to adversary procedure. Far more in order, we think, would be a provision flying in the opposite direction, exempting such witnesses' testimony from any sort of court gag order. It does news gatherers, at least, little good a receive transcripts of their testimony if they must be kept locked in a desk drawer.

We think the six-month limit on contempt confinements in Mr. Eilberg's bill is a badly needed reform; as matters stand, news gatherers and others can be put behind bars for the length of the grand-jury term—as long as 18 months. But, in the case of news gatherers, at least, we think the provision should go farther. Whatever justification there can be for jailing reporters in order to compel their testimony, there can be none for jailing them as punishment. A news gatherer who refuses to answer questions before a grand jury is doing so in accordance with the highest standards of his profession; to punish him or her for so doing is unconscionable. The very least we feel should be enacted is a provision exempting from criminal contempt any person who refuses to give information obtained in the course of gathering, receiving or processing information for any communications medium.

Finally, a word on the subject of consensual immunity. The general philosophical basis for requiring a witness' consent to a grant of immunity before he or she can be forced to testify under it has been set forth by Mr. Conyers, Judith Avner of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse and others. Thus, I will confine my observations to its effect on news gatherers.

Reporters, quite candidly, are more reluctant than most to plead the Fifth Amendment; they are much happier—if less successful—pleading the First. In the case of a news gatherer, pleading the Fifth is not only regarded, however wrongly, as implying guilt but seems to suggest an involvement not in accord with the news gatherer's role as a detached observer. But reporters have occasionally made such pleas when asked to reveal confidential information or sources; several cases are cited in the additional statement we are submitting for the record.

Forcing reporters to disclose such information or sources may be requiring them to testify to their own disadvantage, seriously damaging their ability to perform their job. If, in the words of a federal judge many years ago, compulsory immunity enables the government to "probe the secrets of every conversation, or society, by extending compulsory pardon to one of its participants," in the case of news gatherers, it makes the government a potential party to every confidence given a reporter by a source of news. As long as absolute privilege for news gatherers does not exist, they should not be denied this avenue of protection.

It is perhaps unfortunate that the concept that news gatherers have an inherent right to shield their information and sources has become known as "reporters' privilege." The term suggests that the First Amendment imposes upon the news gatherer a special benefit, whereas, in reality, it imposes not a privilege but an obligation. That is the way it was stated in The Newspaper Guild's Code of Ethics, adopted as our first annual convention in 1934. That code stated that it was "the newsman's duty" not to "reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies." (A copy of the code is attached to this statement.)

That position was reaffirmed by the Guild's 1959 Convention, which noted that it was based upon "the recognition that a newsman who disclosed confidential sources would soon be able to collect the information necessary to give meaning to a free press." And 10 years later, amidst the first flurry of what was to become a veritable blizzard of subpoenas, the Guild's convention put the matter thus:

"Though jobs in the news industry do not relieve anyone of the duties of citizenship, those duties carry protections under the Bill of Rights which should permit a news gatherer to protect the ethics of his craft and his own future ability to practice it."

Let there be no mistake about it: Demands for news gatherers' notes, tapes, films, photographs or files, or for disclosure of their information or sources, seriously endanger the trust between news gatherers and news sources. And that trust is essential both to the ability of the press to provide the public the information to which it has a right under the First Amendment and to news gatherers' ability to carry out their function under that Amendment.

That statement is not speculative. The first issue of the Press Censorship Newsletter (published by the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press) in 1973 reported no less than five instances in which the fear that confidentiality could not be protected forced newspapers or broadcasting stations to lose stories.

In one, CBS canceled an interview with a woman who said she would recount how she cheated on welfare if her identity could be protected. In the second, ABC News abandoned an attempt to film an interview with Black Panther leaders in their headquarters because it could not make a firm promise of confidentiality. The Louisville Courier Journal, the paper for which Paul Branzburg worked, canceled further stories on drug abuse after Branzburg was subpoenaed in one of the three cases on which the Supreme Court ruled in 1972. The Boston Globe was unable to pursue an investigation of official corruption because its sources were afraid of being identified. And a reporter from the Baton Rouge State Times had to abandon a similar story for the same reason.

Brit Hume, writing in the New York Times magazine of Dec. 17, 1972, reported several similar cases and made a key point that explains why it is truly a First Amendment right that is being breached here. He wrote:

"The [Supreme Court] decision is not likely to stem the flow of official statements or even official leaks of restricted information. The orchestrated release of classified material by those in power has long been a familiar practice in Washington. During Congressional deliberations over the Pentagon's budget requests, for instance, such leaks have been known to become a virtual shower of secret intelligence on enemy activity—usually the very kind of activity some embattled Pentagon project is designed to offset. It hardly seems likely that the Defense Department will be deterred from releasing such information by threat of a Justice Department grand-jury investigation. And journalists who act as the conduit through which such material reaches the public obviously have little to fear.

"Rather, it is reporters who cover activity frowned upon by the authorities or uncover facts embarrassing to them that seem likely to be hampered. For the sources of such information are now vulnerable to identification and punishment."

Law-enforcement officers would have you believe that their operations would suffer grievously if news gatherers had an unqualified right to protect their information and sources. They can produce few examples, however, and those few are far outweighed by the instances in which investigations that have led to indictments resulted from newspaper stories that might have never been printed if the original sources of information had not been able to count on anonymity.

News gatherers appear to be God's gift to lazy prosecutors. How much easier to "deputize" a reporter by subpoena than to have your investigators do the same legwork that produced the story originally. News gatherers are repeatedly subpoenaed for information that is available through other channels. A particularly striking example was reported by Editor & Publisher, the newspaper trade journal, in its issue of Oct. 30, 1976.

In that case, Miami Herald reporter Ron Sympson, who had refused to turn over his copy of a manuscript in a grand-jury investigation, escaped going to jail when the Herald, acting independently of Sympson, persuaded the manuscript's author to supply it with another copy and release it. The prosecutor, Editor & Publisher said, made no attempt to get the manuscript from the author before subpoenaing Sympson, who said there were eight other sources that could have been solicited for the material.

Where this sort of thing can lead was demonstrated in another Flordia case, this one involving the Fort Myers News-Press. There, two reporters, force-fed a grant of immunity, were subpoenaed to testify about taped conversations with a murder suspect. The reporters testified as to what was on the tapes, but because the News-Press had erased the tapes, it was indicted on a charge of destroying evidence. As the newspaper's attorney put it, the authorities "are trying to hold us accountable for the way we conducted the news-gathering process."

Government interference in the news-gathering process is precisely what the First Amendment is intend to prevent.

Incorporating news gatherers' privilege into the grand-jury legislation being fashioned by this Subcommittee would eliminate this sort of abuse in the area where it is at the same time perhaps most prevalent and least justified. Members of the Congress, in attempting to formulate general privilege legislation a few years ago, could not agree to apply it without qualification to criminal trials and libel suits. But there was relatively little disagreement about applying it at the investigatory level. Section 3 of H.R. 5928, approved by the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice in 1973, provided:

Except as qualified by Sections 4 and 7 of this Act, in any Federal or State proceeding (including a grand jury or pretrial proceeding) no individual called to testify or provide other information (by subpoena or otherwise) shall be required to disclose information or the identity of a source of information received or obtained by him in his capacity as a newsman.

Sections 4 and 7 pertained, respectively, to trials and libel suits, where the Subcommittee felt constrained to qualify the privilege. But there was no qualification on its application at the grand-jury level. We urge this Subcommittee to incorporate similar language, in relation to grand-jury testimony, in the legislation you are considering.

Both H.R. 3736 and H.R. 94 contain provisions that could be construed to protect news gatherers from being forced to testify on their information or sources. H.R. 94, in Section 3330B, Subsection (d) (1) (D) would allow a witness to refuse to testify if a court finds that compliance with the subpoena would be "unreasonable or oppressive" and would "lead to testimony or other information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged."

H.R. 3736, in Subsection 3330A, Subsection (k) (2) (iii) goes a bit farther, incorporating the above language but also freeing a witness from compulsion to testify if the court finds that "compliance with the subpoena would be unreasonable or oppressive because . . . the impairment or disparagement of the right of any person to counsel of her or his choice or of other lawful confidential relationship which would result from compelling the witness' testimony would outweigh the value of that testimony, even though no privilege exists . . . ."

The Newspaper Guild is firmly convinced that a reporter-source privilege is inherent in the First Amendment, and the Supreme Court's decision in the Caldwell, Branzburg and Pappas cases did not completely close the door on it. But in the light of that decision, it would be overly optimistic to rest much hope in the likelihood that the bills' present language would provide a shelter for news gatherers when they come into court to get a subpoena quashed. At best, they would give rise to a judicial balancing act in which the claims of law enforcement generally seem to weigh more heavily than the claims of a free press.

From the standpoint of a news source's confidence that his or her identity will not be disclosed, the prospect of such a balancing act would be of little comfort; the source would be playing Russian roulette with the judge spinning the gun chamber. He would be unlikely to stake his job or his freedom on the possibility that the judge will find impairment of the reporter's confidentiality of greater weight than the testimony that would result.

Under present grand-jury law, everything is stacked on the side of the prosecution, and we appreciate the effort being made in these provisions to restore badly needed balance. But as far as protecting news gathers is concerned, only an unambiguous and unqualified assertion of privilege is likely to accomplish what is necessary.

However, if, for whatever reason, such an unambiguous provision is not enacted, the procedural safeguards contained in H.R. 94 are essential if news gatherers are to have even minimal protection. The combination of seven days' notice and the requirement that the subject matter under investigation be stated would at least provide sufficient time and information to enable the news gatherer to move to quash or one or another of the grounds set forth in the bill, or on some other basis.

We also endorse, without reservation, the provision of H.R. 94 that permits counsel inside the grand-jury chamber instead of outside the door. A news gatherer may be better equipped legally than the average lay person, but his or her legal knowledge is no match for the prosecutor's. The presence of an attorney would at least assure the witness of receiving whatever minimal protection the law allows.

We do have reservations, however, about two subsections of the right-to-counsel provision.

Subsection (c) asserts that "counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury." But what if the grand jurors have a question they would like to ask the witness's counsel? What if they would like the counsel to clarify an answer the witness has given? Would Subsection (c) mean that the counsel could not answer the grand jurors' question? On its face, it could be so interpreted. Such a complete muzzle on defense attorneys would be unwise, if not unprecedented, as far as we are aware.

In Congressional hearings, for example, a witness's counsel may answer questions and make clarifying comments. One need only recall the Senate Select Committee's hearings on Watergate, when the voices of several witnesses' attorneys became familiar to a national viewing audience.

Subsection (d) contains language that would allow judges to dismiss a witness's counsel if the court finds that the counsel has "unduly delayed or impeded" grand-jury proceedings. This language is dangerously vague. A counsel who seeks to invoke whatever protection the law contains for a news gatherer could, in the eyes of some judges, be considered delaying the grand-jury proceedings unduly.

This provision would dilute the witness' right to effective counsel by placing every attorney on notice that by vigilantly watchdogging the rights of his or her client, he or she runs the risk of being removed from the case. The courts can already punish attorneys who are truly obstructionist by contempt citations. There would seem to be no need to add this new power in an area of the judicial system where the witness's protection, even under the proposed reforms, would remain at its weakest.

The Justice Department's official guidelines on news-media subpoenas, laid down by Attorney General John Mitchell in 1970 in response to an outcry against their sudden proliferation, and revised in 1973 by Attorney General Elliott Richardson, are a far cry from the type of protection required for news gatherers. But they might provide some sort of check rein on subpoenas—if they were enforced. They require, among other things, that U.S. attorneys attempt to obtain information from other sources before turning to the news media, negotiate with the media before contemplating a subpoena, and obtain the Attorney General's authorization for such a subpoena before it is issued. They also require that any subpoenas, "except under exigent circumstances," be limited to the verification of published information and "whenever possible be directed at material information regarding a limited subject matter."

These guidelines proved, in practice, to be a sieve with holes big enough to allow almost any subpoena through. Assistant Attorney General Antonin Scalia reported to the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice two years ago that over a 26-month period between March 1973 and May 1975, the Attorney General had approved subpoena requests in 54 of 57 cases. But in 22 additional cases, he said, subpoenas were issued without the Attorney General's approval. That's almost one out of every three.

The guidelines have been violated in other ways. In at least two cases that we know of—and there is no reason to believe that they are unique—news gatherers were subpoenaed without any negotiations whatsoever. But when the defendant in one of those cases cited this dereliction in arguing against a contempt citation, he found it wasn't enough to save him from jail. The court held that there was no burden of proof on the Justice Department to show that the guidelines had been adhered to. The defendant was Will Lewis, station manager of KPFK-FM in Los Angeles; he was found in contempt for failing to produce a terrorist group's communique handcuffed in the courtroom and jailed on the spot. Lewis spent two days behind bars before being released pending appeal; when the appeal lost, he was forced to turn over the document.

The guidelines, as we have said, are totally inadequate to the need. But if there is no general provision affirming news gatherers' privilege before grand juries, the Justice Department should be forced by law to adhere to the guidelines it has laid down.

Lewis, in the above-cited KPFK case, agreed to turn over the communique, and little wonder! He had already spent 16 days in jail the year before in a similar case and could conceivably have spent the rest of his life there for adhering to the ethics of his profession. For under current law, he could have cited for contempt and jailed repeatedly for refusing to answer the same question. This, it seems to us, violates the spirit if not the letter of the constitutional provision against double jeopardy.

Another reporter, Lucy Ware Morgan of the St. Petersburg Times, found herself courting this danger when she refused to identify the confidential source of information about a grand-jury investigation of country corruption. She was sentenced first to five months in prison for refusing to give the information to a state attorney and then to three months for refusing to divulge it to a grand jury. Both sentences were overturned for reasons unrelated to considerations of double jeopardy, but had Ms. Morgan been unfortunate enough to have been in the shoes of other reporters whose contempt sentences have been upheld, she would have faced eight months in prison.

It is gratifying that both H.R. 94 and H.R. 3736, in addition to reducing the maximum penalty to six months, seek to eliminate the possibility of this sort of double jeopardy. H.R. 94 provides that: "no person confined under this section for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event or events, may be again confined under this section, or under section 401 of title 18, United States Code, for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events." H.R. 3736 has similar language except that it covers refusal to testify concerning "the same or any related transaction, set of transactions, event, or events."

It seems to us that the latter, somewhat broader, language is preferable, eliminating the possibility that a witness could be put in double jeopardy by being questioned about another aspect of the same matter on which he or she has already refused to give information. It would also be desirable to include language that would cover not just a refusal to answer the same question before a grand jury but refusal to answer it anywhere on the investigatory level. In the Lucy Ware Morgan case, she was sentenced once for refusal to answer the state attorney and a second time for refusing to answer before a grand jury, but it was clearly a refusal to answer the same question in the same forum for the same purpose.

One of the major differenecs between the various grand-jury reform bills now pending falls in the area of grand-jury authority. H.R. 3736 stipulates that before any subpoena may be issued, immunity offered or contempt proceedings against a recalcitrant witness begun, a majority of the grand-jury panel must give its explicit approval. H.R. 94 does not include this provision.

We consider this grand-jury approval provision an important element of grand-jury reform. It would place an important protection between the overzealous prosecutor and the reporter he or she may want to subpoena.

We think that citizens sitting on a grand jury will be more sensitive to news gatherers' First Amendment rights than prosecutors. We believe so, first, because grand jurors are not subject to the same motives that drive prosecutors to subpoena news gatherers in the first place, and, secondly, because grand jurors, on occasion, have already shown themselves to be more sensitive than prosecutors in this area.

We can point to an incident earlier this year in Baltimore. In January, Baltimore Sun reporter Roger Twigg wrote a story alleging improprieties in the prosecutor's office. Twigg was then subpoenaed before a grand jury by the very prosecutor whose office had been embarrassed by the Sun story.

Inside the grand-jury room, Twigg refused to answer questions about his source, invoking, it should be noted, the Fifth Amendment. He did, however, get a chance to explain the motive behind his refusal to testify. The grand jurors not only did not move to have him coerced into testifying but asked the supervising judge to appoint a new prosecutor to handle the entire matter!

We call attention, also, to testimony this Subcommittee received from a former federal grand juror in California. William F. Gloege expressed in very clear terms an acute sensitivity to the dangers inherent in the practice of subpoenaing news gatherers to grand-jury proceedings. He told the Subcommittee April 27 that:

"Our grand jury had numerous cases whereby the prosecutor attempted to force information out of reporters, station managers and other news-media personnel related to a crime, wherein persons claiming to have committed the act transmitted information to the news media.

"Such pressure tactics on the news media could inhibit the public's ability to learn the truth. Sources will be less willing to inform the media if media personnel can be successfully compelled to reveal sources.

"This method of obtaining testimony seems heavy-handed in view of the vast machinery at the disopsal of the federal government to catch wrong-doers. To replace good investigative tactics with getting an armlock on the media seems unfair and something the public should not tolerate."

We trust the instincts of citizen grand jurors like Mr. Gloege to deal more fairly with the rights of news gatherers than the instincts of over-eager prosecutors. Mandating grand-juror approval of subpoenas, immunity and contempt proceedings will thrust grand jurors into the grand-jury decision-making process, force them to confront and think out the consequences of their jury's conduct. We cannot see anything but good coming out of this process.

The Twigg case is only one of several in recent years in which news gatherers, their First Amendment rights placed in question by the Supreme Court's Caldwell decision, have felt constrained to invoke the Fifth, with varying success.

Two reporters for the Lowell (Mass.) Sun, subpoenaed in 1974 to tell the sources of their information about municipal corruption, had their First Amendment plea thrown out but their Fifth Amendment plea sustained. The Press Censorship Newsletter commented at the time on the fragile nature of their victory:

"The problem with using the Fifth Amendment is that the judge could grant immunity from prosecution. In that event, if the reporters still refused to divulge the identity of their source, the judge could have found them in contempt of court."

Indeed, an attempt to accomplish just that was attempted, although it failed for extraneous reasons. An assistant district attorney issued a grant of immunity, but the judge ruled that the district attorney's office had no right to make such a grant under Massachusetts law and that immunity could not be granted for contempt of court or obstruction of justice.

Not so fortunate was Mary Jo Tierney, a reporter for Today, in Cocoa, Fla. She was subpoenaed in 1975 to testify on information disclosed by a grand-jury witness. Her invocation of the First Amendment was disallowed, and her invocation of the Fifth was undercut when she was granted immunity. For this and a subsequent refusal to answer the same question, she was sentenced first to six hours and then to 30 days in jail—another example of double jeopardy, it should be noted. The Florida Court of Appeal did indeed rule that she was guilty of one continuing offense rather than two, but it upheld the 30-day sentence; Ms. Tierney escaped having to serve it only because the grand jury's term had by then expired and it would no longer have been possible for her to purge herself of contempt.

How pernicious this forced granting of immunity can be in news-media cases was demonstrated in the previously cited case involving the Fort Myers News-Press, where two reporters, given the Grecian gift to such an immunity grant, were forced to provide information on the basis of which their newspaper was indicated for destroying the tape they had made. It is a compelling example of the way in which forced immunization violates the spirit of the Fifth Amendment's proscription against forcing anyone to be a witness against himself. We believe the provision of H.R. 3736 requiring the witness's consent to a grant of immunity introduces a badly needed corrective to a practice that federal law enforcement managed to survive without until two decades ago.

There is a footnote to the Lowell Sun case that is worthy of attention in the light or reform-bill provisions for adequate notice of show-cause hearings in contempt cases. The judge, irked at the haste with which the reporters were haled into court, admonished the prosecution that, should they be subpoenaed again, "procedural due process should be carefully observed by service . . . with a reasonable time being allowed for counsel to prepare for any proposed hearing. The Court disapproves of such petitions being served on a Saturday . . . and heard the following Monday."

Finally, a few words on grand-jury secrecy. It is what we see as improper prosecutorial manipulation of the secrecy doctrine that has forced some reporters behind bars and countless others through debilitating litigation.

Grand-jury secrecy is invoked when it serves the prosecution's interests and ignored when it does not. Prosecutors ignore grand-jury secrecy when they leak grand-jury material to the press. Their motives are varied. An ambitious prosecutor may want the public attention a well-placed leak on a controversial case can produce. A politically motivated prosecutor may want to embarrass a rival. A frustrated prosecutor may seek to punish an uncooperative witness. Reporters who print stories based on such leaks seldom see a subpoena.

On the other hand, prosecutors are quick to react when the leak is from another facet. The reporter is likely to be hauled before the grand jury forthwith and threatened with contempt if he or she does not disclose the source of the leak. This is particularly likely to occur if the story involved serves the public interest, for example by disclosing that the prosecutor is playing down charges of political corruption in hopes of killing the investigation by getting a no-bill.

This danger would be aggravated if reporters were subject to unauthorized-disclosure penalties that the grand-jury reform bills would add to the federal code. If reporters were subject to such penalties, it would mean that every time a reporter writes a story about a grand-jury proceeding that a prosecutor doesn't like—even a story based on an entirely legal source, such as a grand-jury witness—the prosecutor would be free to open a grand-jury investigation with the reporter as target. The reporter, who might have promised his or her source confidentiality, would have no way of showing that the disclosure was not improper, short of violating the pledge to withhold the source's identity. Writing anything about a grand-jury proceeding that a prosecutor doesn't like would become a neven riskier procedure than it already is; only leaks with the prosecutor's imprimatur would be safe.

H.R. 94, as we read it, respects our fears about the possible manipulation of secrecy penalties against journalists. Section 1512, the new wording on unauthorized disclosure that H.R. 94 would add to the U.S. Code, would not subject journalists to criminal penalties.

H.R. 94 stipulates two levels of penalty. The more serious is for disclosure motivated by financial compensation, but Subsection (e) specifically exempts from penalty "any representative of the press, broadcasting, or information media, acting in his professional capacity." The lesser penalty, for simple unauthorized disclosure, would not apply, according to Subsection (d), "to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand-jury proceeding." News gatherers would definitely fall under the category of person "not present" at the grand-jury proceeding.

We wonder, however, whether this latter clause might not be open to some misinterpretation, especially since the press is specifically excluded from the penalty in one case and not specifically excluded in the other. We would suggest that a specific press-exclusion clause be included in Subsection (d) as well as Subsection (e), or, if it is felt that that would be redundant, we feel strongly that the legislative history of this bill should make it clear that news gatherers are not to be penalized under either category of unauthorized disclosure.

Reporters are not insensitive to the considerations of protecting the innocent involved in the doctrine of grand-jury secrecy. But often this consideration lies in delicate balance with that other consideration, the public's right to know, to which the news gatherer is peculiarly dedicated. What a reporter should do when supplied with information leaked from a grand jury is a question that has sparked serious ethical conflict in the ranks of journalists. But whatever their disagreements, they are pretty much united on one aspect of the question: that is a matter for individual news gatherers, not public officials, who are so often interested parties, to resolve.

Grand-Jury Reform and Reporter Privilige

Resolution—International Executive Board—The Newspaper Guild—January 24–27, 1977

Despite the alarming increase in the frequency of news-media subpoenas in the past five years, legislation fortifying newspersons' privilege to protect their news sources has made little headway on the state level and none in Congress. Newspersons continue to face the threat of jail for shielding their sources, and that threat has been transformed into a reality in several cases, most recently that of the Fresno Four. Interim relief is badly needed until Congress and the state legislatures can be persuaded to pass adequate legislation protecting newspersons' privilege.

Such relief would be provided in one of the most critical arenas of conflict, the grand jury, by legislation introduced at the last session of Congress and due for reintroduction in the new session. While these bills are directed at reforming grand-jury abuses generally and do not single out newspersons for special consideration they would materially strengthen the position of newspersons resisting grand-jury subpoenas and reduce the likelihood of their going to jail.

One or both of two bills introduced in the last Congress by Reps. John Conyers and Joshua Eilberg and roughly paralleled in the Senate by a bill from Sen. James Abourezk would have the following effect:

1. Give subpoenaed witnesses, including newspersons, seven days between the service of a subpoena and the appearance date in which to obtain an attorney and prepare a presentation. The subpoena would have to inform the witness of the exact subject matter of the investigation, a requirement that would discourage "fishing expeditions."

2. Require that newspersons appearing before the grand jury be given a transcript of their testimony, enabling them to prove to news sources that they had not violated confidentiality.

3. Give newspersons the right to counsel inside the grand-jury room.

4. Require 10 days' notice of contempt hearings where newspersons refuse to testify in response to a subpoena.

5. Prevent the jailing of newspersons for refusing to answer questions based on information obtained in violation of federal wiretap laws or in violation of the reporters' constitutional rights.

6. Limit jail terms for contempt to six months instead of the present 18 and make it impossible to jail newspersons a second time for refusing to answer the same questions.

7. Require that grand juries vote on newspersons' subpoenas and that prosecutors present full justification for such subpoenas, a provision that would prevent the issuance of subpoenas by a vindictive prosecutor out to "get" a newsperson.

8. Provide newspersons with three grounds for challenging a subpoena: 1) that it is unreasonable: 2) that it is punitive; 3) that it is intended to obtain information to help prosecute a person already indicted.

9. Enable a newsperson to avoid testimony by pleading the Fifth Amendment's "right to silence". The Conyers bill would require a witness's consent before he or she could be granted immunity from prosecution, a provision that would end the practice of forcing witnesses to testify by such a grant.

These provisions would go a long way toward ending the abuses currently being inflicted on newspersons subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. The International Executive Board strongly urges Congress to adopt legislation embodying them as one of its first orders of business. It authorizes TNG officers to testify in favor of their adoption whenever appropriate and it endorses efforts of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse to bring an end to abuses of the grand-jury system affecting both newspersons and the citizenry at large.

Adopted by the International Executive Board of The Newspaper Guild meeting in Washington, D.C., January 24-27, 1977.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, WASHINGTON, D.C. 20530

Order No. 544-73, October 26, 1973

[Order No. 544-73]

PART 50—STATEMENTS OF POLICY

Policy Regarding Issuance of Subpoenas to, and Interrogation, Indictment, or Arrest of, Members of News Media

By virtue of the authority vested in me by sections 516 and 519 of Title 28, of the United States Code, Port 50 of Chapter I of Title 28 of the Code of Federal Regulations is amended by inserting immediately after § 50.9 a new § 50.10 as follows:

§ 50.10 Policy with regard to the issuance of subpoenas to, and the interrogation, indictment, or arrest of, members of the news media.

Because freedom of the press can be no broader than the freedom of reporters to investigate and report the news, the prosecutorial power of the government should not be used in such a way that it impairs a reporter's responsibility to cover broadly as possible controversial public issues. In balancing the concern that the Department of Justice has for the work of the news media and the Department's obligation to the fair administration of justice, the following guidelines shall be adhered to by all members of the Department:

(a) In determining whether to request issuance of a subpoena to the news media, the approach in every case must be to strike the proper balance between the public's interest in the free dissemination of ideas and information and the public's interest in effective law enforcement and the fair administration of justice.

(b) All reasonable attempts should be made to obtain information from non-media sources before there is any consideration of subpoenaing a representative of the news media.

(c) Negotiations with the media shall be pursued in all cases in which a subpoena is contemplated. These negotiations should attempt to accommodate the interests of the trial or grand jury with the interests of the media. Where the nature of the investigation permits, the government should make clear what its needs are in a particular case as well as its willingness to respond to particular problems of the media.

(d) If negotiations fail, no Justice Department official shall request, or make arrangements for, a subpoena to any member of the news media without the express authorization of the Attorney General. If a subpoena is obtained without authorization, the Department will—as a matter of course—move to quash the subpoena without prejudice to its rights subsequently to request the subpoena upon the proper authorization.

(e) In requesting the Attorney General's authorization for a subpoena, the following principles will apply:

(1) There should be reasonable ground based on information obtained from nonmedia sources that a crime has occurred.

(2) There should be reasonable ground to believe that the information sought is essential to a successful investigation—particularly with reference to directly establishing guilt or innocence. The subpoena should not be used to obtain, peripheral, nonessential or speculative information.

(3) The government should have unsuccessfully attempted to obtain the information from alternative nonmedia sources.

(4) The use of subpoenas to members of the news media should, except under exigent circumstances, be limited to the verification of published information and to such surrounding circumstances as relate to the accuracy of the published information.

(5) Even subpoena authorization requests for publicly disclosed information should be treated with care to avoid claims of harassment.

(6) Subpoenas should, wherever possible, be directed at material information regarding a limited subject matter, should cover a reasonably limited period of time, and should avoid requiring production of a large volume of unpublished material. They should give reasonable and timely notice of the demand for documents.

(f) No member of the Department shall subject a member of the news media to questioning as to any offense which he is suspected of having committed in the course of, or arising out of, the coverage or investigation of a news story, or while engaged in the performance of his official duties as a member of the news media, without the express authority of the Attorney General: Provided, however, That where exigent circumstances preclude prior approval, the requirements of paragraph (j) of this section shall be observed.

(g) A member of the Department shall secure the express authority of the Attorney General before a warrant for an arrest is sought, and whenever possible before an arrest not requiring a warrant, of a member of the news media for any offense which he is suspected of having committed in the course of, or arising out of, the coverage or investigation of a news story, or while engaged in the performance of his official duties as a member of the news media.

(h) No member of the Department shall present information to a grand jury seeking a bill of indictment, or file an information, against a member of the news media for any offense which he is suspected of having committed in the course of, or arising out of, the coverage or investigation of a news story, or while engaged in the performance of his official duties as a member of the news media, without the express authority of the Attorney General.

(i) In requesting the Attorney General's authorization to question, to arrest or to seek an arrest warrant for, or to present information to a grand jury seeking a bill of indictment or to file an information against, a member of the news media for an offense which he is suspected of having committed during the course of, or arising out of, the coverage or investigation of a news story, or committed while engaged in the performance of his official duties as a member of the news media, a member of the Department shall state all facts necessary for determination of the issues by the Attorney General. A copy of the request will be sent to the Director of Public Information.

(j) When an arrest or questioning of a member of the news media is necessary before prior authorization of the Attorney General can be obtained, notification of the arrest or questioning, the circumstances demonstrating that an exception to the requirement of prior authorization existed, and a statement containing the information that would have been given in requesting prior authorization, shall be communicated immediately to the Attorney General and to the Director of Public Information.

(k) Failure to obtain the prior approval of the Attorney General may constitute grounds for an administrative reprimand or other appropriate disciplinary action.

Dated October 16, 1973.

ELLIOT RICHARDSON,
Attorney General.

[FR Doc. 73-22773 Filed 10-25-73; 8:45 am]

CODE OF ETHICS APPROVED BY 1934 CONVENTION OF AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD

(1) That the newspaper man's first duty is to give the public accurate and unbiased news reports, and that he be guided, in his contacts with the public, by a decent respect for the rights of individuals and groups.

(2) That the equality of all men before the law should be observed by the men of the press; that they should not be swayed in news reporting by political, economic, social, racial or religious prejudices, but should be guided only by fact and fairness.

(3) That newspaper men should presume persons accused of crime of being innocent until they are convicted, as is the case under the law, and that news accounts dealing with accused persons should be in such form as not to mislead or prejudice the reading public.

(4) That the Guild should work through efforts of its members, or by agreement with editors and publishers, to curb the suppression of legitimate news concerning 'privileged' persons or groups, including advertisers, commercial powers and friends of newspaper men.

(5) That newspaper men shall refuse to reveal confidences or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies; and that the newspaper man's duty to keep confidences shall include those he shared with one employer even after he has changed his employment.

(6) That the news be edited exclusively in the editorial rooms instead of in the business office of the daily newspaper.

(7) That newspaper men shall behave in a manner indicating independence and decent self-respect in the city room as well as outside, and shall avoid any demeanor that might be interpreted as a desire to curry favor with any person.

The convention condemned the following practices as being inimical to the public interest, the newspapers and newspaper men:

(1) The carrying of publicity in the news columns in the guise of news matter.

(2) The current practice of requiring the procuring or writing of stories which newspaper men know are false or misleading and which work oppression or wrong to persons and to groups.

(3) The acceptance of money by newspaper men for publicity which may be prejudicial to their work as fair reporters of news. Your committee urges the particular condemnation of the practice of writing paid publicity by staff political writers, and the acceptance by sports editors and writers of money from promoters of alleged sporting events.

(4) The practice of some newspaper executives in requesting newspaper men to use influence with officials in matters other than the gathering of news.

Mr. PERLIK. Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I am Charles A. Perlik, Jr., president of the Newspaper Guild, which represents some 40,000 persons employed in the newsrooms and commercial departments of newspapers, news services, magazines, and related enterprises in the United States, Canada, and Puerto Rico.

Our primary function as a trade union, of course, is to advance the economic interests of our members. But, just as the teachers' union, for example, is concerned with raising educational standards as well as salaries, the Newspaper Guild has had as one of its prime concerns the preservation and improvement of a truly free press. With other media organizations, we have worked consistently to assure that the press remains free of any restriction that contravenes either the letter or the spirit of the first amendment. That concern has brought us here to Capitol Hill many times either to oppose legislation we feel would infringe on those first amendment rights or to seek the adoption of legislation that would protect or further them.

Our most recent visit here in that interest was in 1973 to testify on behalf of legislation recognizing the right of news gatherers to protect their information and sources. We regard this right as an integral part of that freedom conferred by the first amendment, because without it, the trust between news gatherers and their sources is in peril. And that trust is essential to the news gatherer's ability to function and thus to the press's ability to bring the public the information to which it has a right under the first amendment.

The affirmation of this right has been criticized in some quarters as in conflict with the needs of law enforcement and other government functions, but that, to put it most charitably, is a short-sighted view. The elementary fact is that without the confidence of their news sources, founded in their right to protect them, reporters simply aren't going to get and write the stories that impel overeager prosecutors to hale them before grand juries and into court in hopes of obtaining additional information. Killing the goose that lays the golden egg may get one more egg, but production stops there.

Before 1972, we and others in the news media, convinced that news gatherers' privilege was implicit in the first amendment, opposed any legislative attempt to define it, since we considered that right absolute and unqualified. Our conviction hasn't changed, but, unfortunately, it is a conviction that the Supreme Court in its 1972 decision on the Caldwell, Branzburg and Pappas cases did not share. That decision made it necessary to obtain legislation that would accomplish what the Supreme Court failed to do: affirm the right of news gatherers to shield their information and sources.

But fashioning such blanket legislation proved, in confirmation of our earlier misgivings, no easy task. As I am sure you are all aware, a number of bills were introduced to accomplish that purpose, but they became bogged down in disagreement over limitations and qualifications. We still hope that logjam will eventually be broken, but there seems to be general agreement that it won't happen soon.

For that reason, we come before you today to seek half a loaf—the half that posed relatively little problem in those abortive committee discussions on news gatherers' privilege. Your consideration of badly needed reforms in the grand jury system offers an opportunity to give legislative sanction to the right of news gatherers to protect their information and sources from Federal grand jury inquisition and provide a model for state legislation to the same end.

While this is, to be sure, a piecemeal solution of the privilege problem, it is by no means an unnatural one. It would cover an area in which there was little controversy during the debate over general privilege legislation; while some of the legislation proposed qualified news gatherers' privilege in one way or another, most of it, including the bill approved by the House Subcommitee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice, provided for absolute privilege on the grand jury level.

At the same time the enactment of testimonial privilege in the grand jury area would provide protection in one of the places where it is most acutely needed. A check through the records of news gatherers' subpenas over the past 6 years indicates that there are few so eager as an investigating prosecutor to scatter subpenas broadside on the press in an effort to turn reporters, in effect, into legal investigators, never mind at what cost to the press' ability to unearth the very information being sought.

Our research has logged no less than 60 subpenas in the past 6 years requiring news gatherers and two or three persons in related fields to appear before grand juries, in many cases with notes, transcripts, documents, film, or other materials. In 40 cases those subpenas were enforced, and the news gatherer was forced, willy-nilly, to appear before the grand jury. Contempt citations were issued in 17 cases in which news gatherers refused to answer questions or provide subpenaed material, and 5 went to jail for varying periods of time for that refusal. Seven were required under threat of confinement to disclose information about their sources that they had sought to protect.

The issuance of subpenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion. Before 1970 it was relatively rare for a reporter to be forced to betray the confidence of his sources or go to jail. Today it has become a disgraceful commonplace, and I would hope that the subcommittee will see fit to eliminate it in one of the areas where it is most prevalent.

While falling short of that end and, indeed, not designed for that specific purpose, many of the grand jury reform bills already introduced contain provisions that would ameliorate the situation of news gatherers confronted by a relentless prosecutor on the one hand and their consciences on the other. Our international executive board has endorsed these provisions, in a resolution you will find attached to this statement. There are numerous good general reasons for enacting many of the proposed legislative provisions, but I will confine myself to those that would be of specific help to news gatherers. Let me comment on these briefly, reserving more extended treatment for the latter portion of this statement, which has been submitted for your consideration and the official record.

Particularly salutary, we think, are those procedural provisions of Mr. Eilberg's bill, H.R. 94, that would allow counsel into the grand jury room, require 7 days' notice before appearance, and inform the witness of the exact subject matter of the investigation. Under present barely regulated procedures, news gatherers all too often find themselves before a grand jury with the briefest of notice, little indication of what information is being sought from them, and benefit of counsel in the grand jury room to advise them on the intricate matter of what the law may conceivably allow them to withhold. The situation is made to order for fishing expeditions in which prosecutors can seek to pick the reporter's brain for confidential information that is not even directly germane to the matter under inquiry.

We would also like to see enacted the provision in Mr. Conyers' bill, H.R. 3736, that would require a majority vote of the grand jury to issue a subpena. Leaving this power in the hands of the prosecutor alone lays the way open for harassment of the press, a phenomenon not unknown among prosecutors.

But we would like to see something more. The Justice Department, under pressure from the news media, issued guidelines several years ago setting forth detailed procedural steps for U.S. attorneys to follow in subpenaing news gatherers. We find the safeguards they incorporate far from adequate to the need, but they do provide some rein on Government prosecutors who are ready to subpena a reporter 10 minutes after reading his or her story. Or, more correctly, they would provide such a rein if they were adhered to. Figures released by the Justice Department 2 years ago showed that the supposedly binding guidelines had been violated in 29 percent of the 109 cases in which news gatherers had been subpenaed over a 26-month period.

We think that, at the very least, these guidelines ought to be given the force of law and prosecutors barred from proceeding against any news gatherer subpenaed in violation of their provisions. A copy of the guidelines, in their latest 1973 revision, is attached to this statement.

Another provision of Mr. Eilberg's bill that would ease the situation of news gatherers called before grand juries is the one enabling witnesses to make copies of the official transcript of their testimony. When Earl Caldwell of the New York Times was subpenaed to testify on the Black Panthers he refused to even enter the grand jury room. Had he done so, he explained, there would have been no way he could have convinced Panther leaders, whose confidence he had earned with great difficulty, that he had not betrayed them. He would have been unable to so much as show them a transcript of his testimony.

H.R. 94 gives the witness the right to examine and copy the transcript or recording of his appearance but entitles him to a copy without cost only if he or she can't afford one. We don't see why witnesses subpenaed to give testimony should have to pay for a transcript, which can be long and costly, under any circumstances, and would suggest that this provision be amended to make it available to all without cost.

We are more disturbed, however, by a section of this provision that allows a judge to order the transcript withheld from the witness, and on a Government showing of cause made available to the judge alone, at that. This would open the door to canceling out the reform upon the flimsiest of pretexts, not even subject to adversary procedure. Far more in order, we think, would be a provision flying in the opposite direction, exempting such witnesses' testimony from any sort of court gag order. It does news gatherers, at least, little good to receive transcripts of their testimony if they must be kept locked in a desk drawer.

We think the 6-month limit on contempt confinements in Mr. Eilberg's bill is a badly needed reform; as matters stand, news gatherers and others can be put behind bars for the length of the grand jury term—as long as 18 months. But in the case of news gatherers, at least, we think the provision should go farther. Whatever justification there can be for jailing reporters in order to compel their testimony, there can be none for jailing them as punishment. A news gatherer who refuses to answer questions before a grand jury is doing so in accordance with the highest standards of his profession; to punish him or her for so doing is unconscionable. The very least we feel should be enacted is a provision exempting from criminal contempt any person who refuses to give information obtained in the course of gathering, receiving, or processing information for any communications medium.

Finally, a word on the subject of consensual immunity.

The general philosophical basis for requiring a witness's consent to a grant of immunity before he or she can be forced to testify under it has been set forth by Mr. Conyers, Judith Avner of the Coalition To End Grand Jury Abuse, and others. Thus, I will confine my observations to its effect on news gatherers.

Reporters, quite candidly, are more reluctant than most to plead the fifth amendment; they are much happier—if less successful—pleading the first. In the case of a news gatherer, pleading the fifth is not only regarded, however wrongly, as implying guilt but seems to suggest an involvement not in accord with the news gatherer's role as a detached observer. But reporters have occasionally made such pleas when asked to reveal confidential information or sources; several cases are cited in the additional statement we are submitting for the record.

Forcing reporters to disclose such information or sources may be requiring them to testify to their own disadvantage, seriously damaging their ability to perform their job. If, in the words of a Federal judge many years ago, compulsory immunity enables the Government to "probe the secrets of every conversation, or society, by extending compulsory pardon to one of its participants," in the case of news gatherers, it makes the Government a potential party to every confidence given a reporter by a source of news. As long as absolute privilege for news gatherers does exist, they should not be denied this avenue of protection.

The balance of my statement is yours for the record, Mr. Chairman. I thank you very much.

Mr. EILBERG. You have obviously done a lot of work, I can see by looking through the balance of your statement. We congratulate you for that.

Mr. Perlik, in a recent resolution by the Newspaper Guild, you suggest 7 days' notice of a subpenaed witness.

The Judicial Conference, representing local Federal district judges, has indicated that such notice periods can cause problems. Specifically, they note that in many districts, especially rural districts, jurors are convened for short periods, maybe a few days a week or even every other or every third week. Requiring them to come together to vote, and giving long periods of notice would cause hardships, as the jurors would have to be called back and forth, sometimes over great distances, and in a doubling or tripling of cost and great inconvenience.

Our bill would provide shorter notice periods but allow continuances or quashing of subpenas if the notice period is unduly burdensome or oppressive, and for strict enforceable standards for the granting of subpenas.

Is this not sufficient?

Mr. PERLIK. We think not, Mr. Chairman. We think it is a rare case where this would be a burden, this would be a handicap. I don't think cost should be a consideration in providing protection that our suggestion embraces.

What the bill offers is better than the present situation.

Mr. EILBERG. I am concerned about your suggestions that the issuance of a subpena be by a majority vote of the grand jurors. Would this not lead to possible prejudice as to particular witnesses?

The grand jurors are to vote on these items, and they need some information about the case to show the need for a particular piece of evidence, and such information might be vague or hearsay.

Why is not the establishment of standards and the judicial enforcement of such standards sufficient?

Mr. PERLIK. I think because the standards are ex parte in development, and enforcement is ex parte in enforcement.

We think that the grand jury system provides citizens with competence, capability to make these distinctions and make these judgments for the betterment of the system.

Mr. EILBERG. So you are not concerned about possible prejudice by the grand jury?

Mr. PERLIK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am concerned, but I find prejudice everywhere, and the grand jury system is no different.

Mr. EILBERG. One of the provisions I have proposed in H.R. 94 would provide for criminal penalties for violation of grand jury secrecy, but would exempt newspapermen acting in an official capacity.

I assume you favor this provision.

Mr. PERLIK. Yes.

Mr. EILBERG. Under the Caldwell, "right to every man's evidence." test, prosecutors are free to call newspapermen and to seek information about their confidential sources, as you have noted.

Are any statistics kept as to whether there has been an increase in such subpenas?

Mr. EISEN. Our research indicates that there has been no slacking of such subpenas in the last couple of years. Of the 60 cases that we logged, I think we established that almost half of them have taken place in the last 2 years.

Mr. EILBERG. What has been the success in the guild in opposing such subpenas?

Mr. EISEN. It is a mixed record. The guild, publishers, the Reporters' Committee, others in the industry have succeeded in many cases in getting subpenas quashed. In other cases they have not succeeded and reporters have been forced to appear before grand juries. And in four or five cases they have been sent to jail for refusing to testify on one source of information or another.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Fish.

Mr. FISH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Perlik, I'm sorry, I wasn't here for all of your testimony. My plane was delayed about 40 minutes. In any event, it is tough to keep up with our chairman, who calls meetings of this committee a day after a recess.

I do have just a couple of matters I would like to elaborate on with you.

During the last Congress the Justice Department took the position that counsel for a witness in a grand jury room would, first of all, violate the grand jury secrecy and, second, make the witness less willing to testify; finally, create secrecy problems when one represents many potential witnesses.

How do you respond to that statement?

Mr. PERLIK. I would respond, Mr. Fish, by saying I think those are hazards that have to be taken into consideration.

Looking at Mr. Alexander's testimony, if a man as experienced as he is, is somewhat intimidated going before a grand jury, then what would the average citizen—what would his reaction be in such circumstances? I think presence of counsel is indispensable in a grand jury room.

Mr. FISH. I will ask you what you see as a function for an attorney for the witness in the grand jury room.

Mr. PERLIK. I think in probably every capacity that he would serve otherwise—on the appropriateness of the question, to advise as to legal responses the witness might make.

Mr. FISH. Participate in the hearing fully?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Should the rules of grand jury secrecy apply to any counsel who represents a witness?

Mr. PERLIK. I think so.

Mr. FISH. Another area, in your opinion, how effective is incarceration for civil contempt in obtaining testimony from a witness?

Mr. PERLIK. Very effective.

Mr. FISH. That has been your experience?

Mr. PERLIK. I think that this effect on news gatherers has been monumental.

Mr. FISH. That is what made me think your response would be different.

Has this been correct, where news gatherers have been threatened with incarceration or even imprisonment?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes.

Mr. FISH. That they thereafter have given testimony sought?

Mr. PERLIK. I don't know about those individuals, but I think it has had a significant effect on those who follow, who subsequently are then asked to testify. There is no way we have of researching or keeping completely comprehensive records on the number of news gatherers who are taken before grand juries who do testify, and why they do so—because of the prospect of jail. On the other hand, there are many reporters who regard protection of their sources as an absolute ethical requirement and who will sit in jail forever rather than break faith.

Mr. FISH. Thank you.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Hall.

Mr. HALL. I have no questions at this time.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Harris.

Mr. HARRIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Your third recommendation says to give newspaper persons the right to counsel inside the grand jury room. You would further recommend that anyone should have counsel inside the grand jury room?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes, I would.

Mr. HARRIS. Your second recommendation requires that news persons appearing before the grand jury be given a transcript of their testimony enabling them to prove to many sources that they had not violated confidentiality.

Do you think that should apply to everyone, too, or just newspapermen?

Mr. PERLIK. I think it should be a general application. Everyone should have a copy of their testimony.

Mr. HARRIS. Your first recommendation is to give subpenaed witnesses, including news persons, 7 days before the service of a subpena and appearance. Do you think that should apply to everyone, too?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. With respect to the treatment of news persons by grand juries across the country, do you have any information to give this committee as to whether you think that situation is getting better or worse? That is, do you feel that prosecutors and others are becoming more intimidating toward news people or less, and that the grand jury is being used more as a weapon against news people or less?

Mr. PERLIK. I don't think it has changed much, Mr. Harris. It was thought that this condition reached its high during the early 1970's, as Mr. Eisen has indicated, but in the last 2 years about half the cases we have on record seem to indicate it is a rather constant and consistent pattern, if it hasn't increased.

Mr. HARRIS. Are situations bad?

Mr. PERLIK. I think it is bad, yes, indeed. Any time a news gatherer goes to jail, I think it is bad.

Mr. HARRIS. Any time anybody goes to jail, it's bad. [Laughter.]

I am sure you have given this type of testimony before, but I would like for you to briefly, if you would, tell me what special exception you think the newsperson has with regard to giving testimony.

I glean from your testimony here that there is an unwritten law with regard to certain immunities you think a newsperson should have. Could you in just one or two sentences tell me exactly, in as much precision as possible, what that immunity is?

Mr. PERLIK. Yes. I don't think it is a written law, but I think it is written predominantly in the first amendment. The Supreme Court has not agreed with us in that provision, or with most of the rest of those in the media. We do believe, nonetheless, that the unequivocal right to withhold sources, refrain from identifying sources of information, is in the first amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. You are saying, with respect to grand jury or criminal court actions on alleged offenses, that newspeople should not be required under threat of contempt or other sanctions to divulge sources of information that they have that are pertinent to such inquiry; is that correct?

Mr. PERLIK. That's correct.

Mr. HARRIS. You do not mean to include any information that that newsperson might have firsthand, do you—if the newsperson, for example, saw the murder occur, you wouldn't apply to him immunity with regard to his sources of information, would you?

Mr. PERLIK. Not as long as it is unrelated to his performance as a newsperson.

Mr. HARRIS. I am a newspaperman on my beat and I see somebody get shot. I see the guy with the gun. I see the victim. You wouldn't apply an immunity to me in that case, would you?

Mr. PERLIK. No; I would not.

Mr. HARRIS. But if somebody told me who did it——

Mr. PERLIK. That's something else.

Mr. HARRIS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EILBERG. Thank you very much for coming here and your contribution today.

Mr. PERLIK. Thank you very much for your attention, Mr. Chairman.

GARY NEWSPAPER GUILD,
LOCAL 14, THE NEWSPAPER GUILD (AFL-CIO, CLC),
March 29, 1977.

Representative JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, House Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: The executive board of the Gary Newspaper Guild has passed a resolution in strong support of bills designed to protect witnesses, including newspersons, appearing before grand juries, and urges your action to further passage of such measures.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN MITCHELL, President.

CENTRAL CALIFORNIA NEWSPAPER GUILD,
Sacramento, Calif., August 31, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE EILBERG. On behalf of the 641 members of the Central California Newspaper Guild, I would like to register support of your bill, H.R. 94, and to urge that the reforms included in Rep. John Conyers Jr.5s bill, H.R. 3736 be included in it.

We of the Newspaper Guild also feel a strong need for a provision giving news gatherers absolute and unqualified privilege on the grand-jury level.

We appreciate your consideration of our views.

Sincerely,

GEORGE C. RANDOL, Administrative Officer.

NEWSPAPER GUILD OF PITTSBURGH,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 25, 1977.

Re H.R. 94.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EILBERG: Please be advised that the Executive Committee of Local 61, The Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh, stands firmly behind your efforts to correct grand jury abuses.

Your bill offers a sound reform of an arbitrary system in which newspersons have been forced to betray news sources, thereby compromising their professional position. We have reviewed these abuses from 1970 to 1977 and feel compelled to support any measure that will eliminate what has become a blemish on our basic freedom. We are looking forward to passage of H.R. 94.

Yours truly,

WASHINGTON GJEBRE,
Chairman, Labor Reform Committee, Local 61,
Newspaper Guild of Pittsburgh.

REFORM GRAND JURIES, FREE JAILED JOURNALISTS

WASHINGTON.—Reform of the U.S. grand jury system, freedom for journalists in jail abroad and an end of the U.S. Secret Service using press badges were called for by TNG's International Executive Board during its winter meeting here.

["Reporters continue to face the threat of jail for shielding their sources, and the threat has been transformed into reality in several cases," including that of the Fresno Four, the resolution on the grand jury system noted.]

"Interim relief is badly needed until Congress and the state legislatures can be persuaded to pass adequate legislation," the board said.

Bills introduced in the last session of Congress by Reps. John Conyers (D-Mich.), and Joshua Eilberg (D-N.Y.) and Sen. James Abourezk (D-S.D.) would provide protection for reporters before grand juries, the board said.

REFORM GRAND JURIES, FREE JAILED JOURNALISTS

WASHINGTON.—Reform of the U.S. grand jury system, freedom for journalists in jail abroad and an end to the U.S. Secret Service using press badges were called for by TNG's International Executive Board during its winter meeting here.

["Reporters continue to face the threat of jail for shielding their sources, and the threat has been transformed into reality in several cases," including that of the Fresno Four, the resolution on the grand jury system noted.]

"Interim relief is badly needed until Congress and the state legislatures can be persuaded to pass adequate legislation," the board said.

Bills introduced in the last session of Congress by Reps. John Conyers (D-Mich.), and Joshua Eilberg (D-N.Y.) and Sen. James Abourezk (D-S.D.) would provide protection for reporters before grand juries, the board said.

Similar bills are in the process of introduction in the current session.

The measures "would have the following effect," the IEB said:

Give witnesses before a grand jury—including journalists—time to obtain counsel and require that they be told of the precise subject of the investigation, thereby discouraging fishing expeditions.

Require that witnesses be given a transcript of their testimony, thus offering reporters an opportunity to prove to news sources that confidentiality was not breached.

Prevent the jailing of witnesses for refusal to answer questions based on information gathered in violation of federal wiretap laws or the witnesses' constitutional rights.

Limit jail terms for refusal to answer to six months, instead of the present 18. This was viewed as a first step by the board; ideally, jail sentences should be eliminated, it said.

Require that grand juries vote on whether to issue subpoenaes, preventing the issuance of a summons by a vindictive prosecutor out to get a reporter.

Provide reporters and other witnesses with three grounds to challenge a subpoena—that it is unreasonable, that it is punitive, and that it is intended to obtain information to help prosecute a person already indicted.

Enable a journalist to avoid testimony by pleading the Fifth Amendment's right to silence.

["These provisions would go a long way toward ending the abuses currently being inflicted on newspersons" in the United States, the IEB said.]

In both Canada and the United States, reporters are sometimes jailed for refusing to disclose the identities of sources, but "in many countries, imprisonment has become a routine hazard of the job"—for months, or even years—the board's resolution on journalists jailed in other nations said.

Sixty-seven journalists were in jail in 17 countries last year, according to Amnesty International (AI) reports, the board said.

AI has declared 1977 "Prisoners of Conscience Year," with emphasis on journalists and other writers.

The International Federation of Journalists (IFJ), with which TNG is affiliated, in participating in the AI campaign, the IEB noted.

A journalists' committee is being formed by AI in the United States to work to free specific journalists and raise protests whenever a prisoner's life is immediately threatened.

"For the Guild to participate fully in this effort is an elementary obligation," the IEB said.

It authorized TNG officers to "join with Amnesty International in every way feasible to aid imprisoned journalists and to intervene on their behalf in cases of extreme urgency."

"We've got a secret for the Service. You can't do anything but damage to reporters by masquerading in their roles," the IEB said in regard to the Secret Service's use of press badges when former President Ford played in a golf tournament the day after he left office.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EILBERG: The 44th Convention of The Newspaper Guild, AFL-CIO, adopted on June 30, 1977 the enclosed resolution calling for grand jury reform. The measures to do so are H.R. 3736, H.R. 94 and S. 1449.

CHARLES A. PERLIK JR., President.

GRAND-JURY REFORM AND NEWSPERSON'S PRIVILEGE

Despite the alarming increase in the frequency of news-media subpoenas in the past five years, legislation fortifying newspersons' privilege to protect their news sources has made little headway on the state level and none in Congress. Newspersons continue to face the threat of jail for shielding their sources, and that threat has been transformed into a reality in several cases, most recently that of the Fresno Four. Interim relief is badly needed until Congress and the state legislatures can be persuaded to pass adequate legislation protecting newspersons' privilege.

Such relief would be provided in one of the most critical arenas of conflict, the grand jury, by legislation introduced at the last session of Congress and due for reintroduction in the new session. While these bills are directed at reforming grand-jury abuses generally and do not single out newspersons for special consideration they would materially strengthen the position of newspersons resisting grand-jury subpoenas and reduce the likelihood of their going to jail.

One or both of two bills introduced in Congress by Reps. John Conyers (H.R. 3736) and Joshua Eilberg (H.R. 94) and roughly paralleled in the Senate by a bill from Sen. James Abourezk (S. 1449) would have the following effect:

1. Give subpoenaed witnesses, including newspersons, seven days between the service of a subpoena and the appearance date in which to obtain an attorney and prepare a presentation. The subpoena would have to inform the witness of the exact subject matter of the investigation, a requirement that would discourage "fishing expeditions."

2. Require that newspersons appearing before the grand jury be given a transcript of their testimony, enabling them to prove to news sources that they had not violated confidentiality.

3. Give newspersons the right to counsel inside the grand-jury room.

4. Require 10 days' notice of contempt hearings where newspersons refuse to testify in response to a subpoena.

5. Prevent the jailing of newspersons for refusing to answer questions based on information obtained in violation of federal wiretap laws or in violation of the reporters' constitutional rights.

6. Limit jail terms for contempt to six months instead of the present 18 and make it impossible to jail newspersons a second time for refusing to answer the same questions.

7. Require that grand juries vote on newspersons' subpoenas and that prosecutors present full justification for such subpoenas, a provision that would prevent the issuance of subpoenas by a vindictive prosecutor out to "get" a newsperson.

8. Provide newspersons with three grounds for challenging a subpoena: (1) that it is unreasonable; (2) that it is punitive; (3) that it is intended to obtain information to help prosecute a person already indicted.

9. Enable a newsperson to avoid testimony by pleading the Fifth Amendement's "right to silence." The Conyers bill would require witness's consent before he or she could be granted immunity from prosecution, a provision that would end the practice of forcing witnesses to testify by such a grant.

These provisions would go a considerable distance toward ending the abuses currently being inflicted on newspersons subpoenaed to testify before grand juries, and the Convention urges Congress to adopt legislation embodying them.

But more is needed. In considering grand-jury legislation, Congress has an opportunity to give legislative sanction to the right of newspersons to protect their sources and information in an area about which there was little or no controversy when general privilege legislation was under active consideration four years ago. The Convention strongly urges Congress to include in its grand-jury reform bill a provision giving news gatherers absolute and unqualified privilege before grand juries.

Adopted by the 44th Convention of The Newspaper Guild, AFL-CIO, June 30, 1977, Honolulu, Hawaii.

TESTIMONY OF JACK LANDAU, NEWHOUSE NEWS SERVICE, REPORTER'S COMMITTEE FOR FREEDOM OF THE PRESS, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. EILBERG. Our next witness is Mr. Jack Landau of the Newhouse News Service, representing the Reporter's Committee for Freedom of the Press, Washington, D.C.

Mr. Landau, we caution you, as we cautioned the other witnesses, to be brief if you can, possibly 5 minutes, and then we would like to ask you some questions.

Mr. LANDAU. I would like permission to have the members of the Reporter's Committee staff sit at the table.

Mr. EILBERG. Please bring them forward.

Mr. Landau, would you be good enough to identify your associates.

Mr. LANDAU. This is Ms. Fox, who is a student at Catholic University Law School.

Mr. Adler from New York is a student at George Washington University Law School.

Mr. Allen is from California, and a student at U.C.L.A. Law School.

They are on an internship program with our committee, and have helped quite extensively with this rather thick piece of testimony that you have been kind enough to accept.

[Prepared statement of Jack Landau follows:]

SUMMARY OF REPORTERS COMMITTEE TESTIMONY ON GRAND JURY REFORM

I. INTRODUCTION: TWO GOALS FOR GRAND JURY REFORM: MORE PUBLIC INFORMATION FOR MORE PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY: MORE PROTECTION FOR CONFIDENTIAL NEWS SOURCES

"As working news reporters, our interest in the grand jury is basically twofold:

"First, we think that the Congress ought to provide more information to the public about the decision-making processes of the grand jury because it is a most powerful body and one of the least accountable institutions of government; and,

"Second, we think that the Congress ought to provide protection for confidential and other unpublished information sought by grand juries from members of the press. We believe that the press was constitutionally designed to be an independent and free institution and was not designed to be an official investigative arm of the government, whether it be the Legislative branch here, the Executive branch or any arm of the Judicial branch, including the grand jury."

II. PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY OF GRAND JURY OPERATIONS

"The conclusion reached by many lawyers and others is that the grand jury has tended to become a rubber stamp for the Justice Department and has . . . lost . . . independence."

". . . (We) feel that the continuing practice of secrecy . . . is now being used . . . to protect the Executive branch of government from any meaningful inquiry into its management of the grand jury."

"Generally the prime source of news leaks about the grand jury is the prosecutor . . . (P)ermitting a political official to decide what the public shall and shall not read about the grand jury is . . . information by government handout."

"We would argue very strongly" that "shrouding the grand jury in its current secrecy" . . . "hides Executive branch abuses and permits their continuation."

a. Names and procedures for selection of grand jurors should be public

"We start off with the presumption that grand jurors are public servants." "Therefore, it is our conclusion that the entire selection process for both regular and special grand juries should be matters of open public record in the courts."

b. Grand jury witnesses, their attorneys or nonlawyer spokespersons should be permitted to reveal a grand juror's testimony

"We support the provisions of existing law and of Mr. Ellberg's bill which permit grand jury witnesses to voluntarily disclose their testimony" because they have "a First Amendment right to voluntarily tell the public" what occurred in the grand jury chamber.

"We also support the concept . . . of permitting a grand juror witness' attorney or other spokesman . . . to disclose his or her testimony."

"Many witnesses may not be articulate enough to tell their side of the story to the public or they may be incarcerated and thus do not have easy access to the press."

c. Grand jurors should be permitted to criticize and comment on government prosecutor's handling of grand jury investigations

"There is the argument that grand juries are really puppets of prosecutors and that grand jury investigations therefore, can be conducted in a manner highly detrimental to the interests of the defendant or of the state."

"There is simply no reason why the prosecutors and the grand jury itself should not be some way subjected to evaluation for their official performance."

d. All court proceedings relating to grand juries—motions to quash, contempt, immunity, etc.—should be held in open court

"Once the grand jury leaves its cloistered room and seeks the help of the court, it is our position that all proceedings and documents relating to them (these proceedings) should be publicly available immediately."

e. All indictments should be immediately available in their entirety upon being returned

". . . once the indictment is returned, we are then involved in a most formal type of judicial proceeding. To permit . . . the prosecutor and the defendants to rewrite the indictment, putting in what they want the public to know and leaving out what they don't want the public to know, is the grossest type of censorship."

f. Federal system should adopt the California system of releasing complete grand jury transcripts within 10 days after an indictment

"We think that whatever argument there may be for secrecy of the grand jury, they evaporate when the grand jury has handed down its indictments."

"California, in an effort to make the grand juries more accountable, releases the complete transcript of the grand jury proceedings . . . We would argue that the transcripts should be made public . . . which would . . . mean that the behavior of prosecutors would be a matter of public record for the citizens to judge for themselves."

g. When there is no indictment, grand jury transcripts should be releasable by a majority vote of the grand jury

"Grand juries which do not indict may have received very valuable testimony on the operation of . . . government . . . Congress could conclude that a grand jury transcript leading to no indictment under some circumstances contains information which would be of value to the public The question is not the indictment, but the process of the grand jury. That is why we are here. The press' main function is to report how government operates and how it reaches its decision—not how it reaches only the decision which leads to an indictment.

h. Grand jury reports should be releasable by a majority vote of the grand jury

Under the law today, courts have "unbridled censorship powers over grand jury reports. We would suggest that the grand jury, by majority vote, could release the report . . ."

i. The public and the press should have "standing" to contest orders improperly sealing grand jury information and should have "notice" of attempts to seal grand jury information

The public should have "standing" in the courts because "it seems absolutely clear to us that the public and the press have a direct interest in the public availability of information about the grand jury process . . ."

A judge who seeks to seal grand jury information should give the public and the press "due process" protections, including (1) notice; (2) an opportunity to object; (3) must make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law showing "that there is a compelling reason to deprive the public of the information."

III. PROTECTION FOR CONFIDENTIAL NEWS SOURCES AND OTHER UNPUBLISHED INFORMATION SOUGHT BY GRAND JURY SUBPENA AGAINST THE PRESS

Legal Status Today

The Supreme Court five-four decision in Branzburg v. Hayes was "most unfortunate" because it said that the grand jury had a "superior compelling interest" to obtain information from news reporters than the reporters had to protect their confidential news sources. Supreme Court also appears to have approved the "balancing test" approach.

"Most state supreme courts and lower courts have followed the balancing test."

Supreme Court has cited the Attorney General's guidelines which show a decrease in subpoenaes issued from about 150 in 1959 and 1970 to 42 from May 1975 to November 1976.

"There is no way to evaluate" the accuracy of the Justice Department statistic because "the Department has repeatedly declined to identify the reporters subpoenaed."

The Reporters Committee "continues to believe that news reporters have an absolute privilege under the First Amendment to withhold the identity of their news sources and the content of the unpublished information" from grand juries.

SUGGESTIONS FOR PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS FOR GRAND JURY SUBPOENAS TO THE PRESS

Notice—testimony, documents, notes, photos, telephone & cable records

". . . any subpoena for testimony and documents served on a recognized member of the press for information obtained during news gathering should not be returnable prior to seven days after the service of the subpoena" for information "in their possession" and for "copies" of news media telephone records and cable traffic.

PROCEDURAL PRIVILEGE PROJECTIONS AGAINST SUBPOENAS AND CONTEMPTS

a. Standing

"Congress ought to take this opportunity to construct some strong procedural protections" as an alternative to passing 'a shield law.'"

Some "courts have denied the press its 'standing' to assert the First Amendment" as a defense to subpoenas. Congress could "suggest that courts give due deliberation to the First Amendment interests by a statement of policy. . . ."

b. State shield laws privilege

"We think that reporters and news organizations should be able to invoke their state shield law before a Federal grand jury. Twenty-six state legislatures have passed state shield law privileges." The current situation gives "the Federal government a veto over the state legislatures' determination.

"Congress should extend to the professional news reporter the same privilege it has extended to the practice of other professions protected by state privilege laws in the Federal courts. Surely the dissemination of news and ideas to the public is as honorable and important in our society as the practice of law."

c. State common law privilege

Similarly, if there is a state common law or specific state interpretation of the Federal First Amendment or of the state equivalent, we think . . . that the Federal courts should be made to recognize the state privilege.

d. Justice Department guidelines

"It would be advisable for the Congress to require that any Federal grand jury subpoena . . . be accompanied by a signed statement by the Attorney General confirming that all the requirements of the guidelines have been followed . . ."

c. Motion to quash and stays

"Any news person or news organization (should have) 'standing' to appeal a denial of a motion to quash the subpoena."

"Immediately upon filing the notice of appeal, the judgment be stayed pending disposition" by the U.S. Court of Appeals and then by the Supreme Court.

"In short, we think that a news organization or news reporter should be free from jail until his case is heard on the merits; and that he should not have to suffer incarceration for asserting a privilege which is ultimately upheld."

CONTEMPT AGAINST THE PRESS

a. Transcripts

"Many reporters feel . . . that merely appearing in secret before the grand jury will undermine their credibility with their news sources . . ."

One solution would be to give the reporter "a complete transcript of his or her testimony" to show to the news source. Another solution would be to permit the news reporter "to appear before the grand jury in a proceeding open to the public . . ."

Any "judgment of contempt should be automatically stayed on appeal . . ."

b. No criminal contempt

We think it is "very important" that Congress prohibit the imposition of criminal contempt on news persons "for a good faith assertion of their First Amendment privilege to protect information obtained during the course of news-gathering."

This suggestion is made because several courts have recently held news reporters in criminal contempt.

c. Civil contempt

"We think that Congress ought to limit any civil contempt penalty imposed on a news reporter for a good faith assertion of his First Amendment privilege to no more than 15 days.

IV. GRAND JURY LEAKS

"Our suggestion is . . . that it can be no crime for a news organization or newsperson to obtain government information for publication unless it can be shown . . . that the publication of the information poses a 'clear and present danger' to the national security of the United States."

V. ATTORNEYS FEES

Litigating a grand jury subpoena or a case for access to criminal justice information "can easily cost a minimum of $25,000 or more in legal fees. "While many publications may be willing to spend that kind of money to defend the First Amendment there are many that cannot . . . and others who will not. Furthermore, freelance writers and investigative reporters and reporters employed by news organizations simply don't have the financial resources to defend themselves."

"Congress has passed more than 60 laws granting attorneys' fees to private citizens who successfully defend Constitutional interests . . . and a host of statutory rights."

"In view of all the other interests which receive attorneys' fees and costs for protecting important public rights, we only ask equal financial treatment to guard the public's right to obtain information about the government and evaluate its performance."

[SUBMITTED] TESTIMONY OF THE REPORTERS COMMITTEE FOR FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

INDEX OF REPORTERS COMMITTEE TESTIMONY ON GRAND JURY REFORM

I. Introduction: Two goals for grand jury reform:
  a. More public information for more public accountability------
  b. More protection for confidential news sources----------
II. Public accountability of grant jury operations:
  a. Grand jury secrecy in 17th century to give grand jury independence from the Crown: Fifth Amendment----------

b. Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 1946, modified grand jury secrecy
c. Grand jury system today gives control in government prosecutors. Secrecy shields government prosecutors from public accountability and permits abuses

SUGGESTIONS FOR MORE PUBLIC INFORMATION ABOUT GRAND JURIES

a. Names and procedures for selection of grand jurors should be public
b. Grand jury witnesses, their attorneys or non-lawyer spokespersons should be permitted to reveal grand jury witness' testimony
c. Grand jurors should be permitted to criticize and comment generally on government prosecutor's handling of grand jury investigation
d. All court proceedings relating to grand juries—motions to quash, contempt, immunity, etc.—should be held in open court
e. All indictments should be immediately available in their entirety upon being returned (except for fugitives)
f. Federal system should adopt the California system of releasing complete grand jury transcripts within 10 days after and indictment
g. When there is no indictment grand jury transcripts should be releasable by a majority vote of the grand jury
h. Grand jury reports should be releasable by a majority vote of the grand jury or by order of the court
i. Press should have "standing" to contest improper restrictions on public access to grand jury related information and should be accorded notice and a hearing

III. Protection for confidential news sources and other unpublished information sought by grand jury subpena against the press:

LEGAL STATUS TODAY

a. Supreme Court decision in Branzburg v. Hayes ruled against First Amendment newsperson's privilege: "balancing test" approval
b. Most state and federal courts have followed "balancing test" in subpenas to the press
c. Attorney General's Guidelines have decreased federal subpenas: Department is breaking guidelines: No authentic statistics available
d. Reporters Committee continues to favor absolute privilege for the press to protect news sources and unpublished information

SUGGESTIONS FOR PROCEDURAL PROTECTIONS FOR GRAND JURY SUBPENAS TO THE PRESS

Notice

a. Seven days' notice of subpenas for testimony, notes or documents
b. Seven days notice to press of subpenas to communications firms for copies of news media telephone records and cable traffic

Procedural Privilege Protections Against Subpenas and Contempts

a. Federal courts should be advised to grant "standing" to newspersons seeking to assert First Amendment privilege
b. Federal courts should recognize 26 state shield laws
c. Federal courts should recognize court-made law by states on newsperson's privilege
d. Justice Department should follow Attorney General's Guidelines
e. Motions to quash subpenas should have automatic stay on appeal

CONTEMPT

a. Transcript of reporter's grand jury testimony should be available; or grand jury interrogation of reporter could be in public
b. Civil contempt incarceration should be automatically stayed on appeal
c. No criminal contempt against press for good faith assertion of First Amendment privilege
d. Civil contempt against press: 15 days in jail maximum

GRAND JURY LEAKS

No crime for press to publish grand jury information

ATTORNEYS FEES

Amend existing Federal attorneys fees laws to include attorneys fees to newspersons and news organizations which successfully litigate cases—
(a) involving access to and publication of information related to grand jury proceedings
(b) involving protection of newspersons confidential sources and unpublished information sought by grand jury subpena or by court order in connection with grand jury proceedings

INTRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee:

On behalf of the Reporters Committee, we should like to thank you for this kind invitation to testify about H.R. 94, introduced by Mr. Ellberg, and the other four bills now introduced in the house affecting grand jury reform.[1]

As working news reporters, our interest in the grand jury is basically two-fold:

First, we think that the Congress ought to provide more information to the public about the decision-making processes of the grand jury because it is a most powerful body and one of the least accountable institutions of government; and,

Second, we think that the Congress ought to provide more protection for confidential and other unpublished information sought by grand juries from members of the press. We believe that the press was constitutionally designed to be an independent and free institution and was not designed to be an official investigative arm of the government, whether it be the Legislative branch here, Executive branch or any arm of the Judicial branch, including the grand jury.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY AND THE GRAND JURY: 17TH CENTURY BRITAIN AND THE COLONIES

The grand jury today, as witnessed by the bills in this House, by the volume of law review articles[2] and by other news, has become one of the most controversial institutions in government.

There have been charges of political manipulation, perhaps best substantiated by the Watergate experience, by the hearings before this Subcommittee last year[3] and by a number of controversial prosecutions during recent years.[4]

The conclusion reached by the members of this House who have introduced these bills, by law review commentators, by outside lawyers and even the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit,[5] is that the grand jury has tended to become a rubber stamp for the Justice Department and has, both in practice and in theory, lost the independence which it was initially designed to have in order to protect citizens from the power of the government.

[4] According to testimony previously given this Subcommittee, the Special Ligitation Section of the Department of Justice launched "political grand jury investigations" from 1970–1973 which involved 100 federal grand juries in 84 cities in 30 states, directed at such groups as the Vietnam Veterans Against the War, Daniel Ellsberg, the Puerto Rican Independence Movement and a variety of other organizations whose politics were disapproved of by the Nixon Administration. Statement on grand jury reform before the House of Representatives Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law by the Center for National Security Studies, Mar. 17, 1977.

[5] "Today, courts across this country are faced with an increasing flow of cases arising out of grand jury proceedings concerned with the possible punishment of political dissidents." Bursey v. United States, 466 F. 2d 1059, 1089 (9th Cir. 1972).

The secrecy which was developed for the grand jury in 17th Century England, initially in the cases of Stephan College[6] and the Earl of Shaftsbury,[7] was designed primarily to insulate grand jurors from intimidation by the Crown, either because they handed down indictments disapproved by the Crown or refused to hand down indictments which the Crown favored. The intimidation was possible in those days because grand jury deliberations were public and the Crown could easily identify the recalcitrant grand jurors.

The American colonists, faced with oppression from the British Crown retained grand jury secrecy and it approved, for example, to be an important element in the seditious libel case against John Peter Zenger[8] when the grand jury in New York refused to indict Mr. Zenger and the Crown was forced to proceed by way of information.[9]

Because the grand jury had shown itself to be able to retain some semblance of independence against the Executive branch, it was adopted by the Framers in the Fifth Amendment. The English common law theory of complete grand jury secrecy was relatively well accepted in this country until the late 1940's, when the Congress adopted the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, most notably Rule 6 (e)[10], which breached secrecy somewhat.

The rule provides that "no obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except" . . . a grand juror, attorney, interpreter and operator of a recording device.

However, we feel that the continuing practice of secrecy, which was designed to insure the independence of the grand jury, is now being used to permit almost absolute Executive branch control over the grand jury, and to protect the Executive branch of government from any meaningful inquiry into its management of the grand jury.

Therefore, we would argue very strongly that if the Congress wishes to retain the grand jury as a meaningful institution, and to preserve some semblance of its independence as a protection for the individual—that the Congress can best insure this goal by increasing the amount of information which is available to the public about the operations of the grand jury, rather than by shrouding the grand jury in its current secrecy, which hides Executive branch abuses and permits their continuation.

A second factor which has played a key role in our formulation of suggestions on these bills is that generally the prime source of news leaks about the grand jury is the prosecutor.

Prosecutors are, on both the federal and state levels, politicians. The position of prosecutor has always been thought of in this country as a stepping stone to higher political office.

Therefore, permitting a political official to decide what information the public shall not read about the grand jury is, in effect, selective dissemination of grand jury information by government hand-out. Some method must be found to stop giving government officials a virtual monopoly on information which has been presented to grand juries by using their privileges inside grand jury rooms to censor information or distribute it to the press as the government sees fit in order to further the governments political goals.

Without disclosing any confidential sources, we think it is fair to conclude, for example, that a number of recent grand jury investigations were leaked, in whole or in part, to the press by government public relations efforts. The conclusion is inescapable because stories were appearing in newspapers and on television, in some cases with verbatim transcripts before the ink was even dry.

[10] Fed. R. Crim. P. rule 6(e):
Secrecy of Proceedings and Disclosure. Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, stenographer, operator of a recording device, or any typist who transcribes recorded testimony may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule. The court may direct that an indictment shall be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has given bail, and in that event the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the finding of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.

Our conclusions, that the government is frequently engaged in news leaks, appears to have been to a great degree confirmed by the recent press conference of Attorney General Bell on March 18, 1977.[11]

After conceding that the Department was responsible for a number of "leaks," the Attorney General said:

"I do not think the (grand jury) information ought to be leaked and the main reason for that is oftentimes it's inaccurate because you can't get the whole picture . . . you have an incomplete story."

It is therefore clear from the Attorney General's own statement that his complaint about grand jury leaks is not that public information about the grand jury proceedings interferes in any way with the operation of the grand jury or makes the grand jury any less effective, but only that the public will not be getting as much information as it is entitled to because there could be "an incomplete story."

In response to a question as to whether the Attorney General himself would leak information to the press about the grand jury, Mr. Bell said in some cases he would: "If someone was getting ready to print a story he had some doubts about . . . I would at least tell the reporter that they were running a high risk . . . I think it would be better to do that than to have something that's completely inaccurate."

The Attorney General then pointed out how difficult it is for the Department of Justice to keep grand jury information secret. He referred to the current grand jury investigation into alleged improper behavior by the South Korean government saying: "There were about ten people here who knew the whole story. But there were about forty who knew part of it. So, I knew then that somebody in the forty was telling these things, and that probably nobody in the ten was because not a single accurate story had been published . . . I would rather be able to tell the whole story myself."

It is, therefore, our conclusion that the present information policies involving the grand jury contradict two basic assumptions in the Constitution: First, these policies contradict the Fifth Amendment assumption that the grand jury is independent of the Executive branch of government. And second, these policies contradict the First Amendment assumption that public information about government institutions shall not be wholly in control of the government for its own political ends.

If we as reporters lived in a perfect world, we would suggest to this Subcommittee that there be no such thing as grand jury secrecy—that at some point the activity of the grand jury should be a matter of public record for the public to know about and evaluate, including the identities of witnesses, the content of testimony, the nature of information seized by subpoena, and the entire transcript of the grand jury proceedings, as well as affiliated judicial proceedings.

However, we realize that to be of any practical aid to this Subcommittee, the complete elimination of grand jury secrecy is probably an impossibility at this time, and therefore, we are going to suggest what we think are the minimally acceptable standards for grand jury reform in order to insure fair and impartial grand jury operations and public accountability of this most important and controversial government institution.

EMPANELING OF GRAND JURORS

We start off with the presumption that grand jurors are public servants, selected at random and performing a vital government function—investigating allegations of crimes, issuing idictments for crimes, or refusing to indict, and reporting on the operation of government.

However, present law and practice is confusing among the 94 district courts and it appears from the rules and the case law that a United States district court judge has virtually complete discretion, depending upon his whim, to make public or keep secret the names of grand jurors.[12]

In several states, such as Florida and California, the names of grand jurors are routinely made public and published by the local press, and we can discover no criticism by local law enforcement officials of this practice.

[11] Transcript of press conference of the Honorable Griffin B. Bell, 9 a.m., Friday, Mar. 18, 1977, pp. 30–32.

[12] 28 U.S.C. § 1863(a)(8). See also United States v. Leonetti, 291 F. Supp. 461 (S.D.N.Y. 1968); United States v. Hoffa, 367 F. 2d 698 (7th Cir. 1966), vacated on other grounds, 387 U.S. 231 (1967), on remand 273 F. Supp. 141 (N.D. Ill. 1967).

Therefore, it is our conclusion that the entire selection process for both regular and special grand juries should be matters of open public record in the courts. The public should be able to know the identities of the grand jurors in the pool, and of those who are selected to serve. The public and the press should have a right to be present at the selection process, and during the judge's charge.

The only exception we would make—and we propose this exception uniformly throughout this testimony—is if disclosure of information would be shown to result in a "direct, immediate and irreparable injury" to the national security of the United States. We would impose upon the government the burden of proving this danger would occur.

It is our position that if the public has the right to know the information—such as the identities of grand jurors—then the sealing of this information amounts to a prior restraint on publication, because it virtually eliminates the possibility that the public and the press will obtain the information to which they are entitled.

We would therefore impose upon the government in this and in other areas the obligation to conform to the doctrine of Near v. Minnesota[13] and New York Times v. United States,[14] which stand for the principle that any attempt to impose prior restraints on the publication of government information, including information about the criminal justice process, comes to the court with a heavy burden against its validity and that the danger cannot be imagined or speculative, but must be real and must be substantiated by proof.

DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TESTIMONY BY WITNESSES AND THEIR ATTORNEYS

We support the provisions of existing law and of Mr. Eilberg's bill (H.R. 94), which permit grand jury witnesses to voluntarily disclose their testimony in whole or in part. We think that when a citizen is called before a grand jury, he certainly has a First Amendment right to voluntarily tell the public what he wants to about what occurred in the grand jury chamber.
