4. A target of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons or obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

5. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidences which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

6. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted coconspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

7. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

8. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

10. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

11. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

12. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of an indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be a basis for dismissal.

13. In any case in which a subpoeaned witness moves on proper grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena, the prosecutor should be required to make a reasonable showing in camera (which may be ex parte at the court's discretion) and on the record before the court convening the grand jury that the evidence being sought is:

(a) likely to be relevant to the grand jury investigation;

(b) not sought primarily for an improper purpose.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. When the circumstances place a hardship on the witness, motions to quash or modify subpoenas may be brought at the place where the witness resides, the documents sought are maintained, or before the court which issued the subpoena at the election of the witness. Such motion should be heard in camera and on the record.

16. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

17. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

18. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

19. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 18.

20. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

21. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

22. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

23. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duies and limitations.

24. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

25. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury is found in contempt should not exceed 6 months.

26. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

REPORT

Background

The Section of Criminal Justice urges House of Delegates approval for 26 legislative Principles to which it believes grand jury reform legislation should adhere. The Section has spent more than three years studying the grand jury. In August 1975—at Section urging—the House of Delegates approved a policy addressing one grand jury bill (H.R. 1277) in the 94th Congress. That policy is a limited one, but includes Association support for such key elements of grand jury reform as allowing counsel in the grand jury room, transactional immunity, and strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Since 1975, the Section's Grand Jury Committee has analyzed a number of pending bills, including H.R. 2986 and S. 3274 (94th Congress), both with a broader focus than H.R. 1277, on which the current ABA policy was formulated. New legislation, including H.R. 94, H.R. 3736, and S. 1449, has been introduced in the 95th Congress; hearings are already being held on these proposals.

Based on its continued study of this issue since 1975, the Criminal Justice Section now asks House of Delegates adoption of Association policy addressing a broader range of grand jury issues. This is timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention being focused on this issue, but also because action is anticipated in the 95th Congress on the pending legislation. Further, a number of states are now considering—and some have already enacted into law—similar bills.

In February, 1977, the Section asked the House of Delegates to approve a package of 23 legislative principles. At the personal request of Attorney General Bell, the Section asked the House to defer action until the August Annual Meeting. Since February, the Section has revised several Principles to clarify intent; has added 3 new Principles concerning prosecutorial conduct; and has met with Honorable Benjamin Civilett, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, and other Department representatives to discuss the Principles. Mr. Civiletti has expressed support for some 15 of the Principles, and noted that the Department would take no position on an additional five. On several additional Principles, Mr. Civiletti said that some rephrasing might moot Department objections. In an attempt to reach compromise in as many areas as possible, the Section's Grand Jury Committee held a special meeting in early June, made additional amendments to a number of the Principles, and gained Council approval for these changes via a special mail ballot.

It should be noted that proposed Principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors. It is chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami area for more than 20 years, and former President of the National District Attorneys Association. The Committee also included members with state and federal prosecutorial experience (including the last Watergate Special Prosecutor, Charles Ruff), judges, law professors and members of the defense bar. The Principles further represent a consensus of the Criminal Justice Section Council, which includes a similar mix of persons from all parts of the criminal justice system. Most of the Principles were approved by the Council unanimously.

In recent years, the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England—where the grand jury originated—abolished the institution in 1933; the majority of states in our country allow prosecution either by indictment or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The ABA House of Delegates in 1975 went on record opposing amendment of the United States Constitution to eliminate the requirement for indictment by a grand jury. That position of the ABA should not be changed, but a comprehensive effort is needed to correct existing abuses. The Section believes that its proposed legislative Principles will go a long way towards remedying the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

CONCLUSION

When the grand jury was created in 12th Century England, it was intended to serve as a shield between the citizen and the Crown. In recent years, the grand jury has come under increasing attack: observers charge that the grand jury system is riddled with abuse, and is no longer a shield for the citizen but a shield for the government. Critics declare that it has departed from its proper Constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecutions.

The Section of Criminal Justice, based on the work of its Grand Jury Committee, chaired by an experienced prosecutor Richard E. Gerstein, believes that reforms are needed to insure fairness—but without undercutting the grand jury's legitimate functions or destroying it as an institution. While legitimate objections to these Principles have been raised, resistance to change from those within the criminal justice system cannot in itself be sufficient reason to reject well-considered—and needed—proposals.

The Section urges the House of Delegates to support the 26 legislative Principles. The Congress and many states legislatures are now acting on grand jury reform proposals; professional, media and public focus on this subject cannot be expected to abate. The Association—as in its landmark Standards for Criminal Justice project—has long been in the forefront of criminal justice improvement.

ABA leadership is now needed to help fashion well-reasoned workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

Respectfully submitted.

B. JAMES GEORGE, JR.,
Acting-Chairperson.

ABA URGES GRAND JURY REFORM (Congressional Record, Sept. 15, 1977)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, on August 9, 1977, the American Bar Association officially endorsed a series of proposals to reform the grand jury system. As I have indicated on prior occasions, these recommendations parallel the provisions of H.R. 94, the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977, which I have introduced.

The Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, which I chair, has already conducted 5 days of hearings on Federal grand jury reform, and we expect to proceed promptly to marking up this essential legislation. The action of the ABA in strongly urging legislative action should add impetus to our efforts.

For the use of the Members, I would like to insert into the Records at this point the full text of the recommendations if the American Bar Association, passed overwhelmingly on August 9, 1977:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 29, 1977.

Re Grand Jury Reform.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At the meeting of the House of Delegates of the American Bar Association held August 8–10, 1977 the attached resolution was adopted upon recommendation of the Section of Criminal Justice.

This resolution is being transmitted for your information and whatever action you may deem appropriate. If hearings are scheduled on the subject of this resolution, we would appreciate your advising Herbert E. Hoffman, Director of the American Bar Association Governmental Relations Office, 1800 M Street, NW., Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 231–2210.

Please do not hesitate to let us know if you need any further information, have any questions or whether we can be of any assistance.

Sincerely yours,

HERBERT D. SLEDD.

[As approved by the ABA House of Delegates, August 9, 1977]

[Only the Resolution Set Forth Herein Represents Official ABA Policy; the Accompanying Report Is for Background Purposes Only]

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION: REPORT TO THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, SECTION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

RECOMMENDATION

The Section of Criminal Justice recommends adoption of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the American Bar Association supports in principle grand jury reform legislation which adheres to the following principles:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questions of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. Every witness before a grand jury shall be informed of his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel and shall be advised that false answers may result in his being charged with perjury. Target witnesses shall be told that they are possible indicatees.

3. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt.

4. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

5. A target of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she sins a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in flight or endanger other persons of obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

6. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidence which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

7. The grand jury shall not name a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

8. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, hold them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of notice of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

10. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

11. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

12. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

13. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of an indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be a basis for dismissal.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

16. The prosecutor should not make statements of arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

17. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elict such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

18. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 17.

19. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

20. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representative of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

21. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceeding requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

22. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the juors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

23. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

24. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury is found in contempt should not exceed 12 months.

25. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

REPORT

Background

The Section of Criminal Justice urges House of Delegates approval for 25 legislative Principles to which it believes grand jury reform legislation should adhere. The Section has spent more than three years studying the grand jury. In August 1975—at Section urging—the House of Delegates approved a policy addressing one grand jury bill (H.R. 1277) in the 94th Congress. That policy is a limited one, but includes Association support for such key elements of grand jury reform as allowing counsel in the grand jury room, transactional immunity, and strengthened penalities for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. Since 1975, the Section's Grand Jury Committee has analyzed a number of pending bills, including H.R. 2986 and S. 3274 (94th Congress), both with a broader focus than H.R. 1277, on which the current ABA policy was formulated. New legislation, including H.R. 94, H.R. 3736, and S. 1449, has been introduced in the 95th Congress; hearings are already being held on these proposals.

Based on its continued study of this issue since 1975, the Criminal Justice Section now asks House of Delegates adoption of Association policy addressing a broader range of grand jury issues. This is timely not only because of the increasing public, press and professional attention being focused on this issue, but also because action is anticipated in the 95th Congress on the pending legislation. Further, a number of states are now considering—and some have already enacted into law—similar bills.

In February 1977, the Section asked the House of Delegates to approve a package of 23 legislative principles. At the personal request of Attorney General Bell, the Section asked the House to defer action until the August Annual Meeting. Since February, the Section has revised several Principles to clarify intent; has added 3 new Principles concerning prosecutorial conduct; and has met with Honorable Benjamin Civiletti, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, U.S. Department of Justice, and other Department representatives to discuss the Principles. Mr. Civiletti has expressed support for some 15 of the Principles, and noted that the Department would take no position on an additional five. On several additional Principles. Mr. Civiletti said that some rephrasing might moot Department objections. In an attempt to reach compromise in as many areas as possible, the Section's Grand Jury Committee held a special meeting in early June, made additional amendments to a number of the Principles, and gained Council approval for these changes via a special mail ballot.

It should be noted that the proposed Principles were drafted by a Committee composed almost entirely of present and former prosecutors. It is chaired by Richard E. Gerstein, State Attorney for the greater Miami area for more than 20 years, and former President of the National District Attorneys Association. The Committee also included members with state and federal prosecutorial experience (including the last Watergate Special Prosecutor, Charles Ruff), judges, law professors and members of the defense bar. The Principles further represent a consensus of the Criminal Justice Section Council, which includes a similar mix of persons from all parts of the criminal justice system. Most of the Principles were approved by the Council unanimously.

In recent years, the grand jury as an institution has come under increasing criticism for a number of reasons and from a number of sources. It has been accused of an absence of procedural safeguards. Reflecting these and other concerns, England—where the grand jury originated—abolished the institution in 1933; the majority of states in our country allow prosecution either by indictment or by information. However, it remains a part of the federal system and in many state systems because of constitutional provisions. The ABA House of Delegates in 1975 went on record opposing amendment of the Unitel States Constitution to eliminate the requirement for indictment by a grand jury. That position of the ABA should not be changed, but a comprehensive effort is needed to correct existing abuses. The Section believes that its proposed legislative Principles will go a long way towards remedying the ills of the grand jury as an institution.

Principles

Following are comments on each of the 25 proposed Principles:

1. The American Bar Association has already gone on record (in August, 1975) supporting the right of a witness to have counsel present in the grand jury room. Principle No. 1 represents a reaffirmative of that position. Since this report was first presented to the House of Delegates in February, the Section has rewritten Principle No. 1 to spell out more specifically what role counsel should play in the grand jury room. That role is now carefully defined in the Principle to make it clear that it is strictly limited to advising the witness. This limited role will preclude the grand jury's becoming a "mini-trial"— as some have feared—and will not impair expeditious investigations. Under the proposed Principle, counsel is not allowed to address the grand jurors or in any other way take part in the proceedings. Further, the Section had added a provision to allow removal of counsel who are disruptive or do not otherwise stay within the prescribed boundaries laid down by the Principle. Clarification of the attorney's limited role, coupled with the mechanism for removing disruptive counsel, should meet the objections raised by those who have feared creation of a "mini-trial."

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice process—except before the grand jury—is a person who desires a lawyer denied that right. Requiring a witness who needs advice of counsel to consult his attorney outside the grand jury room door is awkward and prejudical. It unnecessarily prolongs the grand jury proceeding and places the witness in an unfavorable light before the grand jurors. The American Law Institute has called it a "degrading and irrational" procedure. It is extremely damaging to the witness to continually get up, go outside, and consult with counsel. A recent Seventh Circuit decision (U.S. v. Kopel, 552 F. 2d 1265 1977) points to additional problems with the procedure of consulting counsel outside the grand jury room. In that case, the Seventh Circuit said the U.S. Attorney, who had granted the witness permission to leave the grand jury room, was free at trial to bring up this fact as relevant to the perjury charges against the defendant. Dissenting, Judge Swygert decried the fact that the government was "permitted to 'sandbag' him [the defendant] by using the fact that he consulted his attorney against him." Nor is the right to leave the grand jury room to consult counsel absolute. (See In re Tierney, 465 F. 2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972), in which the court said a limit could be placed on how frequently the witness could leave the room to consult his lawyer.)

The prestigious American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure adopted in 1975, supports counsel in the grand jury room. "While this is a break with tradition and prevailing practice," the ALI notes, "it is consistent with the provisions of some recent state procelure codes . . . it seems unfair and inefficient to require a witness to leave the grand jury room each time he wishes to consult with counsel." [at 237; emphasis added] The ALI commentary goes on to state that "exclusion of counsel . . . is closely related to the traditional view that proceedings should be secret, and concern lest the presence of counsel hamper the freedom of the grand jury and the prosecutor in their investigation . . . The difficulty with this view . . . is that complex and important legal issues face a witness before a grand jury. An appearance before that body may subject an individual to the grave danger of self-incrimination or imprisonment for contempt . . . The witness may also inadvertently lose his right to claim the privilege by operation of the doctrine of waiver . . . And the inherent pressure and accompanying nervousness of a grand jury appearance upon an individual may make it very difficult for him to remember his attorney's instructions. . . . For effective implementation of this right, an attorney should be present to follow the flow of the interrogation." [at 601]

Some nine states now have statutes allowing counsel to be present in the grand jury room—Arizona (for target witnesses), Illinois (for target witnesses), Kansas, Michigan (one-man grand juries), Oklahoma, South Dakota, Minnesota, Virginia and Washington State. The Section has contacted practicing attorneys and prosecutors in these states; none has reported problems. In fact, some prosecutors who said they initially fought the procedure now support it as a means of insuring fairness in the system. Congressman Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.), writing in a recent issue of Judicature (Vol. 60, No. 8), similarly reported that those states which have implemented the practice have not reported any serious problems. Further, a number of additional states are now considering such legislation—including Colorado (where it has passed both houses of the legislature), New York, Massachusetts, and California (where it has the support of the state's Attorney General).

Several arguments are raised by opponents. First, it is argued that allowing counsel in the grand jury room will be a breach of the secrecy rule. In fact, grand jury secrecy is not served by keeping the lawyer outside the grand jury room, since the witness is free to tell his attorney anything that occurred inside (Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)). Secondly, it is argued that the presence of the witness' lawyer will restrict free testimony in cases of organized crime, corporate and political corruption investigations. The Section notes that the states which allow counsel in the grand jury room have retained the grand jury in most instances as an investigatory body for precisely these kinds of investigations, and have no record of negative results. Further, there are alternative ways of securing a cooperative witness' statement, and this evidence can be summarized for the grand jury in the form of hearsay, Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956). When a witness is called to testify before a grand jury, the witness' attorney, sitting outside the grand jury room, can easily conclude from the time spent with the jury whether the witness takes the Fifth Amendment or testifies in full. Experienced prosecutors, further, have noted that very few witnesses indicate a desire to cooperate without the knowledge of their counsel; if the witness' testimony is helpful to the government, that fact will become evident to the attorney fairly quickly.

Recognizing that problems arising from multiple representation of witnesses could be exacerbated by allowing counsel in the grand jury room, the Section has strengthened Principle No. 20, which addresses that subject.

The presence of the attorney will not only reduce unfair speculation about the prosecutor's conduct, but will also serve to inhibit the prosecutor from possible improper conduct. Analogous to having counsel present to witness a line-up, the presence of the attorney in the grand jury room will help to insure the fairness of the proceedings. Watergate Special Prosecutor Charles Ruff—in supporting this proposal in recent Congressional testimony—declared that ". . . the mere possibility of occasional disruption simply cannot overcome the right of the individual witness to consult his attorney without going through the mildly absurd process of leaving the grand jury room every time. Indeed, most prosecutors would admit, I think, that they count on the burden of leaving the room to dissuade the witness from asserting his right to counsel." (Testimony before House Judiciary Subcommittee, April 2, 1977, at 3.)

The American Bar Association has traditionally been a leader in asserting the right to assistance of counsel in the criminal justice process. As the ABA Standards on Providing Defense Services (§ 1.1) declare, "The objective of the bar should be to ensure the provision of competent counsel to all persons who need representation in criminal proceedings. . . ." Enactment of Principle No. 1 will more meaningfully effectuate the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel; but the limitations on the role of counsel will forestall the grand jury's being turned into an adversary proceeding.

[2. Principle number two was added by the ABA House of Delegates at the August, 1977 Annual meeting in Chicago as a proposed amendment to the Criminal Justice Section Principles offered by the Judicial Administration Division.]

3. Principle No. 3 states that the prosecutor shall not knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt. The Section believes this to be a key element in bringing fairness to the grand jury process, and essential to prevent indictment of innocent persons. The Association has already gone on record in the ABA Standards for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6(b)) supporting this, declaring that, "The prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." The National District Attorneys Association (NDAA) Prosecution Standard 14.2D is also similar to Principle No. 3. As the commentary to the ABA Standard states, "Such a procedure tends to insure public confidence in the ultimate decision as to prosecution. The obligation to present evidence which tends to negate the guilt of the accused flows from the basic duty of the prosecutor to seek a just result." The NDAA Standards note that such a standard "provides for a greater accuracy in the indictment determination by providing that the grand jury be allowed to consider—as the trial fact finder would—any facts tending to negate the defendant's guilt." Indictments have been overturned on the grounds of due process when a court has ascertained that the prosecutor knowingly used perjured evidence or failed to present evidence that squarely negated guilt. U.S. v. Basurto, 497 F. 2d 781 (9th Cir., 1974); Johnson v. Superior Court of California, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rptr. 32, 539 P. 2d 792 (1975). This is a new Principle, added by the Section since the Principles were presented to the House of Delegates in February. At the suggestion of U.S. Department of Justice representatives, who questioned the mechanics of the Principle as first drafted, the Section has written it so as to clarify its coverage and intent, since this is a legislative Principle, and not simply a more general standard for prosecutorial conduct.

4. The fourth Principle is also a new one, added since the report was presented to the House of Delegates in February. This would require the prosecutor to recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law. This language is identical to that of both ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function 3.6(c) and the National District Attorneys Association Standard (14.2E). The NDAA Standards commentary notes that this standard "recognizes the prosecutor's right and duty as legal advisor to the grand jury to recommend action to the grand jury. The prosecutor has a great deal more experience than the grand jurors in the strength and likely credibility of the evidence before a trial court. Since it will be his office's duty to prosecute the case, the prosecutor has a direct interest in assuring that resources are not squandered on unwinnable or otherwise improper cases." The Section agrees with this rationale. Adoption of the Principle will help to insure substantial justice within the grand jury room. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated support for this Principle, which is, as noted above, already ABA policy.

5. Principle No. 5 would require that the target of a grand jury investigation be given the right to testify and present his side of the facts before an indictment is returned—provided such person signs a waiver of immunity. Under this proposal, the prosecutor would be required to take all reasonable steps to notify such prospective defendants—but recognizes that in some instances the prosecutor will truly be unable to locate such persons; or that, under some circumstances, notification may result in the person's fleeing, or his endangering witnesses or other persons, or obstructing justice. In such instances, notification would not be required. The Section has made two changes in this Principle since its initial presentation in February: First, at the suggestion of the Justice Department, the term "subject" was replaced by "target." The Department suggested this as more appropriate wording, since "target" is the term generally used in federal law enforcement. Secondly, Justice Department representatives suggested addition of the phrase "or obstruct justice" as an additional condition under which the prosecutor need not notify a target. The Section also made this amendment, believing it to be inherent in the original Principle. Principle No. 5 is intended to insure that fair and just opportunity is given individuals to testify in their own behalf prior to being indicted. Such groups as the Association of the Bar of the City of New York have supported such a right. This is an essential ingredient, the Section believes, in a fairly functioning grand jury—and criminal justice—system. Without it, the grand jury's essential function of arriving at an accurate indictment is undermined.

6. The sixth Principle has been rewritten since presentation of the report in February. As originally phrased, it stated that the grand jury "shall not consider unconstitutionally obtained evidence." In the light of concerns raised by the Justice Department, the Section has rewritten Principle No. 6 to put the affirmative burden on the prosecutor not to present evidence which he knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial. It thus makes the burden more specific. The Section believes that the integrity of the grand jury will best be served by prohibiting presentation of unconstitutionally-obtained evidence by the prosecutor. Already-approved Association policy in the ABA Standards on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.6(a)) declares that "a prosecutor should present to the grand jury only evidence which he believes would be admissible at trial." Notwithstanding the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974), the Section believes that this Principle is needed to insure the integrity of the grand jury process; indeed, the Court in Calandra noted that "for the most part, a prosecutor would be unlikely to request an indictment where a conviction could not be obtained" because of use of illegally-seized evidence. The Principle is thus not totally inconsistent with the thrust of Calandra.

7. Principle No. 7 would prohibit naming a person in an indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. The Section believes that naming of persons as unindicted co-conspirators visits opprobrium upon them—by charging the named persons with the commission of a crime but denying them a forum in which to seek acquittal or vindication. This stains the reputation of the person without providing any means for the person to show his innocence. This is an instance in which reforms are needed to insure the fair functioning of the grand jury. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already held in accordance with this principle in U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d 794 (1975). The Section has added a second sentence to the Principle since its original presentation. This states that supplying such names in a bill of particulars would not be prohibited. This would permit the prosecutor to respond to a request by the defense to reveal the names of co-conspirators who were not indicted. The Section felt the addition of this sentence is needed to spell this out to avoid potential confusion in interpretation of this Principle.

8. The issuance and publication of grand jury reports which single out persons for scorn or criticism, impugn their motives, or denigrate their moral fitness to hold office have the effect of charging such persons with misconduct or unfitness—without affording them any forum in which to refute the charges or to seek vindication. The proper purpose of grand jury reports is to inform the public of situations requiring administrative, judicial or legislative corrective action—not the castigation of individuals when the fact-finding forum insured by the finding of an indictment is absent. The Section is not proposing that such grand jury reports be proscribed from commenting on the job that an office holder is performing; but such reports should not condemn character alone. Grand jury reports which do single out persons in the manner described tend to undercut the fairness of the grand jury. Such misuse of the grand jury can, in fact, affect the political process. Judicial scrutiny of the report is essential to prevent spurious attacks on individuals when no forum of trial is available. The states that have recently considered this issue have reinforced control over the reporting process. People v. Superior Court of Santa Barbara County, 531 P. 2d 761 (Cal. 1975); Del. Rules, R. 6 (1975); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 905.28 (1975). The procedures proposed in Principle No. 8 will assist in insuring that such abuses do not occur. See U.S. v. Briggs, 514 F.2d. 794 (1975) and Report of Grand Jury Proceedings, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, 479 F.2d 458 (1973). The National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standards commentary (discussing an NDAA proposed standard on this subject, modeled on recent New York legislation) notes that, ". . . an unfavorable report may stand as a severe form of extrajudicial punishment, from which there is no appeal . . . the quasi-judicial nature of the grand jury gives it an apparent reliability which may not be justified . . . grand jurors are accountable to no one . . . grand jurors may impose a personal standard of morality on persons, rather than an abstract and neutral conception of right and wrong."

9. The Section opposes the practice of a prosecutor's using the grand jury to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist in his preparation for trial of a defendant already charged by indictment or information. This is an abuse of the grand jury, and transforms it into a mere tool and arm of the prosecutor's office—a role which is contrary to the grand jury's historical purpose and function. The Department of Justice supports this Principle; in a Department Office of Policy and Planning statement filed in 1976 with the House Judiciary Subcommittee examining grand jury legislation, the Department states that, "It is well-established under federal case law that a grand jury should act only with a view toward returning an indictment or to satisfy itself that no crime has occurred . . . It would be an abuse of legal process for a government attorney to use a grand jury to discover or build up evidence for trial of an existing indictment. Courts would discipline attorneys who did so and the Department would not countenance such action by its representatives." This principle is in accord with well-settled case law. United States v. Dardi, 330 F2d 316 (2d Cir. 1964); United States v. Doss, 545 F.2d 548 (6th Cir. 1976). In the Doss decision, the Court declared that, "We find no constitutional, statutory or case authority for employment of the grand jury as a discovery instrument to help the government prepare evidence to convict an already-indicted defendant. Such a use of the grand jury would pervert its constitutional and historical function . . ." The Court called it "a possible revival of a version of the Star Chamber of 18th Century England . . ."

10. The Section strongly opposes prosecutorial use of the grand jury to assist in administrative investigations—e.g., Internal Revenue income tax investigations. Such improper utilization of the grand jury warps its true function and leads to abuses such as those described in No. 9 supra. The ABA House of Delegates in February, 1977—in addressing a proposed amendment to Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 6(e)—expressed concern regarding dissemination of grand jury information to government experts for use in unrelated civil proceedings. The Section report accompanying the House-approved resolution declared that disclosure of grand jury information to a broad group of governmental personnel might be used as "subterfuge by some agencies to obtain information through the grand jury process which was not legitimately required for the purposes of the pending grand jury investigation . . . The dissemination of information to serve particularized departmental or agency needs would not be a legitimate one." (House of Delegates Report Book, 2/77 Mid-year Meeting, at 138–9). A U.S. Department of Justice paper submitted to the House Congressional hearings echoes this concern: "[o]ne of the primary abuse of the grand jury which must be avoided . . . is the attempted use of its broad investigative powers by governmental agencies in pursuit of investigations that are solely their own rather than the grand jury's." (U.S. Department of Justice Office of Policy and Planning, Memorandum on the Grand Jury, p. 106; printed in record of House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings.) In the case of United States v. Doe, 72 Crim. Misc. 1 (S.D.N.Y. 1972), the court in denying a government motion to examine special grand jury minutes to determine violations of Titles 18 and 28 and "to determine civil tax liability," declared that, "The grand jury's role is properly confined . . . when it is held empowered to conduct investigations that are in their inception exclusively criminal." It should be noted that the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys has expressed its support for this proposed Principle.

11. Principle No. 11 provides that witnesses summoned before grand juries should not be subjected to unreasonable delays or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment. The Section supports legislation which would forbid such practices. In some instances, these abuses have occurred and grand jury witnesses have been repeatedly called to appear; or have been subjected to unreasonable delays or other forms of harassment. An indifference to the convenience of a grand jury witness is as objectionable as the use of a grand jury subpoena to harass a witness, and is a subtle means of intimidating the witness before his appearance. The ABA Standards for the Prosecution Function (§ 5.7a)) recognize the prosecutor's obligation to handle witnesses "fairly, objectively and . . . without seeking to intimidate or humiliate the witness . . ." The U.S. Department of Justice supports this Principle, as does the Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys.

12. Several of the grand jury reform bills before the 95th Congress (e.g., H.R. 3736) would require grand jury approval of any subpoenas issued. The section opposes such a procedure. It believes this requirement would not only be cumbersome, but would cause unncessary delay. The prosecutor, the Section believes, is much better suited to make determinations regarding issuance of subpoenas than are lay grand jurors. The Section thus does not support these provisions in pending legislation. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

13. Principle No. 13 would require that a grand jury subpoena indicate the statute or general subject that is the focus of the grand jury inquiry. This requirement is intended to enable the recipient and the court to determine more accurately questions of relevancy. It would also enable the witness to prepare himself more adequately for his appearance, and would insure more effective and efficient use of counsel, court and grand jury time. The Principle does not intend that a detailed description of the statutory and subject areas be required; but that a broad statutory citation or general description of the subject be included. Justice Department representatives have expressed support for this Principle; but indicated concern that, as initially written, the Principle would leave open the question of later challenges to the indictment based on the fact that the defendant was charged under statutes not named in the subpoena. To meet this concern and clarify the Principle's original intent, the Section has added the second sentence; this makes it clear that the indictment cannot be vitiated if the person is indicted under a statute or in a subject area not mentioned in the subpoena. The Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys supports this Principle.

14. A grand jury subpoena should not be returnable except when the grand jury is sitting. This proposal is intended to avoid potential abuse of the subpoena power by the prosecutor's office. It will help to insure the integrity of the grand jury function. Both the Justice Department and the Attorney General's Advisory Committee of U.S. Attorneys support this Principle.

15. Principle No. 15 would mandate stenographic or electronic recording of all matters before the grand jury—except the deliberations of the grand jury itself. This would represent a logical step in grand jury reform, and is not inconsistent with the necessity of maintaining grand jury secrecy. The judge's charge to the grand jury would be recorded, as would the prosecutor's introductory remarks and testimony and questioning of all witnesses. Some 31 states already require recording of all grand jury proceedings other than votes and deliberations, and an additional 6 states permit it, according to a Library of Congress study (printed in 1976 Hearings record, House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship International Law, p. 714). Several federal district courts already record all grand jury proceedings—including the District of Rhode Island, the Eastern District of Washington, and the Northern District of Illinois. The Ninth Circuit has ruled that a prospective defendant who makes a timely request cannot be arbitrarily denied recordation of grand jury proceedings, United States v. Thorenson, 428 F. 2d 654 (1970); United States v. Price, 474 F. 2d 1223 (1973).

Major groups have supported this requirement. The American Law Institute, in its Model Code of Pre-Arraignment Procedure, urges that a record be made of all proceedings before the grand jury. The ABA Standards for Criminal Justice on the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(b))—already ABA policy—provide that, "The prosecutor's communications and presentations to the grand jury should be on the record." The accompanying commentary points out that "since grand jury proceedings are generally secret and ex parte, it is particularly desirable that a record be made of the prosecutor's communications and representations to the jury." The recently-issued Prosecution Standards of the National District Attorneys Association (§ 14.2(F)) also urge that "all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded." Recording will aid the prosecution—by insuring that perjured testimony does not go unpunished. Recording would also act as a restraint on the prosecutor not to exercise undue or improper influence on the grand jury.

The Department supports this Principle to the extent that it would require recordation of the judge's charge and the questioning and testimony of witnesses, but opposes recording the prosecutor's comments to the jury. The U.S. Attorneys' Advisor Committee argues that this would "formalize what should be an informal working relationship between grand jurors and government attorneys." (From position paper submitted to Section Council, May 14, 1977, p. 7.) It is exactly that "informal" relationship which invites subtle abuses of the grand jury, the Section believes; that is itself a cogent argument in favor of recordation. The Advisory Committee further argues that a recordation requirement would "impose severe and undue administrative burdens" (p. 7 position paper, supra); and the Justice Department points to "unavailability of court reporters in many areas" (p. 103 of House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings record, supra). There are real benefits to be gained by recording matters before the grand jury—for the prosecution, as well as for the defense. Raising administrative hurdles is not sufficient argument against this proposal, which truly goes to the integrity of the grand jury process.

16. This Principle—which has been added since February—is identical to National District Attorneys Association Prosecution Standard (§ 14.4B) and the ABA Standard for Criminal Justice Relating to the Prosecution Function (§ 3.5(b)). It thus already is Association policy. It would prohibit the prosecutor from making statements or arguments to influence the grand jury action in a manner which would not be permitted before the trial jury. This is essential because of the prosecutor's role as the only legally-trained person before the lay grand jurors. As the commentary to the ABA Standards notes, "A prosecutor should not take advantage of his role as the ex parte representative of the state before the grand jury to unduly or unfairly influence it in voting upon charges brought before it. In general, he should be guided by the standards governing and defining the proper presentation of the state's case in an adversary trial before a petit jury." Because of the secret nature of the grand jury proceedings, the lack of direct court supervision, and the fact that the prosecutor's is a unilateral presentation, he must avoid unduly influencing the grand jurors by means which would not be appropriate in the public courtroom before a petit jury. This is essential to prevent the grand jury's becoming a mere echo of the prosecution. As one writer has noted, "[G]rand jurors must place enormous trust in the prosecutor's guidance. It is he, after all, who tells them what the charge is, who selects the facts for them to hear, who shapes the tone and feel of the entire case . . ." [emphasis added] (Antell, "The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Super-government," 51 A.B.A.J. 153, 154 (1965). The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

17. Principle No. 17 calls on the ABA to broaden its previously-adopted policy concerning immunity to specify proper instances in which immunity should be issued: when it is in the public interest; when there is no other reasonable way to elicit the testimony; and when the witness has refused to testify, or stated he will invoke the Fifth Amendment. This is intended to insure that grants of immunity are carefully considered prior to issuance and that they are not issued when other means could be used to obtain the needed information. The ABA House of Delegates (at the 1975 Annual Meeting) has already supported amendment of 18 U.S.C. 6002 to provide "transactional" immunity, rather than "use" immunity provided under present federal law. Under transactional immunity, a witness may be statutorily compelled to give testimony which might otherwise violate the privilege concerning self-incrimination, provided the witness is given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony. Under 18 U.S.C. 1525(b), Part V of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, and under Kastigar v. U.S., 406 U.S. 441 (1972), only "use" immunity need be offered. This merely prevents the prosecution from using the actual testimony (or leads derived therefrom) in any subsequent criminal prosecution. Some 31 states currently provide transactional immunity, according to the House Judiciary Subcommittee Hearings record (supra). The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has supported it, in the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rule 732(b)). "Use" immunity, while Constitutional (see Kastigar, supra), should be rejected for several practical reasons. It is not only susceptible for prosecutorial abuse, but can be subtle invitation to perjury on the part of the witness. Since the witness knows what he says can be used to impeach him, it can be encouragement to slant his testimony in a manner most favorable to him. Testimony thus obtained is not accurate. Witness cooperation is essential to an effective grand jury investigation, yet the uncertainly generated by "use" immunity, and the difficulties in determining the scope of the protection afforded the witness, can chill and inhibit his cooperation. Transactional immunity better encourages accurate testimony and minimizes witness resistance to questioning. The small number of actual successful prosecutions of immunized witnesses with "use" immunity indicates that a return to transactional immunity will not remove a significant weapon against organized crime (see 14 American Criminal Law Review 275, 282, wherein U.S. Department of Justice reports that, in practice, few witnesses granted "use" immunity described in their immunized testimony). "Use" immunity represents the most grudging interpretation of the Constitutional right against self-incrimination, the Section believes.

18. Several of the grand jury bills pending before the 94th Congress include a provision requiring approval of immunity grants by a majority vote of the grand jury. While many supporters of this provision believe that it would help to insure the independence of that body, the Section does not support such a requirement. Indeed, Principle No. 18 would provide that immunity be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury; the standards outlined in Principle No. 17 would be followed in determining whether such a grant should be made. Lay grand jurors are not adequately oriented to make determinations regarding immunity grants, the Section believes. This is properly an executive function with court overview.

19. Principle No. 19 would forbid making the granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings a matter of public record before the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause. To make public such grants undercuts the function of the grand jury by selectively publicizing its investigations—and has the define potential of harm to those to whom immunity is alleged to have been granted. The U.S. Department of Justice had indicated its agreement with this Principle.

20. The question of multiple representation of witness in grand jury proceedings has recently received increasing attention both from members of the private bar and from government attorneys. (See e.g., Cole, "Time for a Change: Multiple Representation Should be Stopped," 2 Journal of Criminal Defense 149 (1976); and Speech May 3, 1977 to Chicago Bar Association on "The Perils of Multiple Representation in Criminal Antitrust Proceedings." by Richard Favretto, Deputy Director of Operations, Antitrust Division, U.S. Department of Justice.) Recent Court opinions have also tried to grapple with this question (see, e.g., In Re Investigation Before April, 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600 (D.C. Cir. 1976)). Principle No. 20 has been substantially rewritten by the Section since February to strengthen its provisions, to meet concerns raised by critics of the proposal to allow counsel in the grand jury room. Opponents of that Principle have focused much of their objection on problems which could arise when one attorney represents more than one witness in a grand jury proceeding.

The Section has redrafted Principle No. 20 to spell out the professional responsibility of an attorney not to continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if conflicts can arise. As originally worded, the Principle provided that, "If the court determines that there is multiple representation of witnesses in grand jury proceeding, it shall advise the witnesses that they have the right to be separately represented by counsel, and explain that conflicts of interest may otherwise arise." Under the newly-redrafted Principle, the burden is initially placed on the defense attorney to assume responsibility for remedying situations when conflicts from multiple representation arise or are likely to arise. If the court finds that this principle is not being followed, however, it would have the authority to order separate representation. The phrase "giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing" has been added to avoid a situation in which the court summarily excludes certain counsel from representing any witness in the proceeding. In adopting this Principle, the Section considered multiple representation to include the following: two or more witnesses in a grand jury proceeding who may have conflicting interests; a witness and a potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding; or a witness whose counsel fees are paid by a third party who is a witness or potential defendant in a grand jury proceeding. The significant ethical concerns involved in multiple representation when the clients have actual or potential conflicting interests; the potential compromises to the Constitutional guarantee to effective assistance of counsel; and the potential for inhibiting the public's right to an effective grand jury investigation require the private bar to deal seriously with this issue. As Alan Y. Cole noted in a recent article (supra), "To avoid the Scylla of conflict, the defense attorney with multiple clients will likely become engulfed in the Charybdis of ineffective assistance of counsel . . ." Benjamin Civiletti, head of the Justice Department's Criminal Division, has expressed his support for this Principle as now formulated.

21. Principle No. 21 provides that the confidential nature of grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny. Shielding their identity is necessary to prevent unjust harm to witnesses and potential defendants. The practice in some jurisdictions of having witnesses exposed to public and press as they emerge from the grand jury room is an unfair one—it taints the witnesses' reputations by the mere fact of their appearance. The importance of maintaining the secrecy of grand jury proceedings has already been recognized by the Association, when, in its 1975 policy, it urged strengthened penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information. The Justice Department supports this Principle.

22. The Section supports legislation which would mandate the court's charging grand jurors orally on impanelling as to their duties and responsibilities; written copies of the charge would then be distributed to the grand jurors for their continuing reference. Detailing to grand jurors their powers, responsibilities and rights will help to insure their comprehensive understanding of their proper role, and will thereby help to strengthen the independence and fair functioning of the grand jury. Several of the bills pending in the 95th Congress contain such provisions, as does pending legislation in several states. The Department of Justice has indicated its support for this Principle.

23. In adopting Principle No. 23, the Section urges the Association to go on record as recognizing potential abuses of newspersons who are called as witnesses before the grand jury and then claim a First Amendment privilege not to testify. In some prosecutors' office around the country, office policy already exists forbidding the calling of journalists before the grand jury. As the U.S. Supreme Court has noted, "Official harassment of the press undertaken not for purposes of law enforcement but to disrupt a reporter's relationship with his news sources would have no justification . . . We do not expect courts will forget that grand juries must operate within the limits of the First Amendment, as well as the Fifth." Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665, at 707–708 (1972). Supporting the need for legislation in this area, a Newspaper Guild spokesperson declared in testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee hearings in June 1977, "The issuance of subpoenas to news gatherers has become a veritable contagion . . ." Principle No. 23 is further intended to express Section concern about the increasing number of instances nationally in which criminal defense lawyers are themselves being subpoenaed to testify before grand juries. Abuse of grand jury subpoenas used against persons having recognized confidential relationships appears to be increasing; this can drive a wedge of distrust between defense attorney and client, and has a chilling effect on 6th Amendment rights and confidential relationships. The Section purposely did not go into further detail in this proposed Principle, believing that an expression of Association concern about present abuses of the grand jury vis-a-vis the press and the criminal defense bar would call attention to what appears to be a growing problem. The Justice Department has expressed its support for this Principle.

24. In August, 1975, the ABA House of Delegates opposed amendment of the Recalcitrant Witness Statute (28 U.S.S. 1826(a)) to reduce from 18 to 6 months the maximum period of confinement on a civil contempt order for refusal to testify before a grand jury. The Section is now seeking revision of the previously-adopted position. This Princple would support—as provided in several pending grand jury reform bills—a maximum of six months confinement. It is believed that this length of confinement should be sufficient to compel a witness to testify. (It should be noted that the ABA has previously gone on record supporting legislation to prohibit multiple confinement upon a subsequent refusal by a witness to testify about the same transaction.) The Section now believes that this is sufficient to compel a witness to testify, while avoiding the longer, more punitive confinement. This has been an area in which many abuses have allegedly occurred (See record of 1976 hearings before House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law). The Section thus urges ABA support for a 6-month maximum.

25. Rather than specifying proposed sanctions for violation of each proposed grand jury legislative Principle outlined herein, the Section simply notes that the court should exercise its power to impose appropriate sanctions when the proposed Principles are violated. Such sanctions will obviously be fashioned in any proposed legislation; but it is not the Section's intent, in proposing ABA policy on the grand jury, itself to suggest statutory language.

Conclusion

When the grand jury was created in 12th Century England, it was intended to serve as a shield between the citizen and the Crown. In recent years, the grand jury has come under increasing attack; observers charge that the grand jury system is riddled with abuse, and is no longer a shield for the citizen but a shield for the government. Critics declare that it has departed from its proper Constitutional function of protecting citizens from unwarranted prosecutions.

The Section of Criminal Justice, based on the work of its Grand Jury Committee, chaired by experienced prosecutor Richard E. Gerstein, believes that reforms are needed to insure fairness—but without undercutting the grand jury's legitimate functions or destroying it as an institution. While legitimate objections to these Principles have been raised, resistance to change from those within the criminal justice system cannot in itself be sufficient reason to reject well-considered—and needed—proposals.

The Section urges the House of Delegates to support the 25 legislative Principles. The Congress and many state legislatures are now acting on grand jury reform proposals; professional, media and public focus on this subject cannot be expected to abate. The Association—as in its landmark Standard for Criminal Justice project—has long been in the forefront of criminal justice improvement.

ABA leadership is now needed to help fashion well-reasoned, workable and effective grand jury reform legislation.

Respectfully submitted.

B. JAMES GEORGE, Jr.,
Acting Chairperson.

REFORMING THE GRAND JURY

(By Hon. John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan)

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 3, 1977.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, it has frequently been observed that the grand jury is one of the most powerful yet least accountable institutions in the criminal justice system. A witness may be ordered to appear anywhere at a moment's notice without being told the nature of the inquiry. Any and all questions may be asked, pertinent or not to the investigation at hand. Witnesses whom prosecutors consider uncooperative may be jailed for contempt without recourse to a jury trial. Rarely is the record of grand jury proceedings available to witnesses. Though proceedings in theory are secret, testimony is frequently leaked. Prosecutors enjoy virtually unchecked powers. Mr. Justice Black's observation more than 20 years ago that grand juries "are the breeding place for arbitrary misuse of official power" has been confirmed time and again by its practice in recent years.

The systematic abuse of the grand jury and the means to reform it are the subject of an extraordinarily lucid and intelligent book, "The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial," written by Federal Judge Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis, former U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York. As the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, chaired by Representative Joshua Eilberg, considers the first comprehensive reform of the grand jury system, the Frankel/Naftalis study should play an important role in our efforts at reform. For this reason I commend to my colleagues two excellent reviews of the book, one by Sidney L. Willens, appearing in the Kansas City Times, the other by Victor Navasky, appearing in the New York Times.

The articles follow:

REFORMING GRAND JURIES AN URGENT NEED

(By Sidney L. Willens)

Did you visit a cocktail lounge or country club recently? Do you travel? Do you play tennis or golf? With whom? By the way, who are your friends? What kind of people are they?

Imagine yourself being asked these questions under oath in a closed room. A federal prosecutor is quizzing you. Your audience is composed of 23 average citizens who don't know why the questions are being asked. Neither do you.

It's nobody's business who your friends are, you say. After all, you committed no crime. You want a lawyer. Sorry, you can't have one. Either you answer the prosecutor's questions or risk going to jail.

You finally answer the questions. But you are careful. You are nervous. Nobody told you what the grand jury is investigating. After all, there are thousands of federal crimes and regulations. You may innocently say something untrue. The prosecutor may believe you lied when you didn't intend to. You remind yourself perjury is a crime all by itself. You tell the prosecutor everything he wants to know the best way you know how. You leave the room, relieved that the ordeal is over.

Next morning a newspaper quotes the prosecutor as saying you are a part of an investigation into "criminal activity." You are hopping mad. You want to sue somebody. Your lawyer says a lawsuit is futile.

"But the prosecutor ruined my reputation," you say. "Don't I have any rights?"

"Not before a grand jury," your lawyer replies. "A grand jury is the only federal accusatory body recognized by the Constitution."

Your lawyer patiently explains that prosecutors tell a grand jury what they want it to hear. A grand jury witness appears without a lawyer to answer questions prosecutors want to ask. Everything is secret. At least it's supposed to be. But frequently prosecutors leak grand jury testimony inside courthouses and to the news media. The law permits a grand jury to hear everything, including gossip. Even hearsay evidence can trigger an indictment.

You've heard enough from your lawyer. But you still can't understand why American citizens are sitting ducks for hundreds of United States attorneys and their assistants across the nation. A grand jury, you learned from English history, is supposed to shield citizens against nasty prosecutors.

You are right. So say federal Judge Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis, a former assistant United States attorney. They are authors of "The Grand Jury," with a subtitle, "An American on Trial." Frankel is the judge who stirred law enforcement officials last year with another book, "Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order."

Judge Frankel and Naftalis concede that the 800-year-old grand jury system, abolished in England 44 years ago, is a "terrifying weapon" that "badgers, traps, scars and defames grand jury witnesses."

What can be done about it? The authors say those who want to do away with the grand jury system are wrong. To abolish the system requires changing the "indicting function" of the Fifth Amendment. Nobody has tinkered with the Bill of Rights ever. The authors don't want to start now. It's too dangerous a precedent.

Their book calls for an overhaul of the federal grand jury system. The authors remind us that a grand jury is really an arm of the court. So federal judges should tell grand jurors of their power over witnesses, documents and subjects to be investigated.

"The Grand Jury" calls for a lawyyer for every grand jury witness who wants one inside the grand jury room. But regulate the lawyer's role, the authors say. Don't let a defense lawyer turn a grand jury proceeding into a slugging match. Provide a lawyer at public cost to any grand jury witness who can't afford one.

What galls the authors of "The Grand Jury" is the way some federal prosecutors misuse a grand jury's subpoena power. A grand jury can yank you and me from one end of the nation to the other at a moment's notice. That's not fair, the authors say. Give a witness at least seven days' notice. And don't command a witness to walk into a grand jury room in ignorance. Tell witnesses the "subject matter" of a grand jury investigation.

Every witness deserves a transcript of his or her remarks inside the grand jury room. Recorded testimony might put a stop to the way some prosecutors manipulate jurors. "Supposed interest in secrecy is no argument against giving a witness a transcript," the authors write. "The embattled witness should have an opportunity to correct innocent errors in testimony."

When all is said and done, the authors add, there is too much secrecy and too little secrecy in grand jury proceedings. Prosecutors leak testimony often. The authors call for a law to permit a grand jury witness to sue prosecutors without proof of "actual damages" if it can be shown a prosecutor maliciously leaked testimony.

In Congress and across the nation movements are afloat to abolish or reform the grand jury system. After reading "The Grand Jury you will probably be persuaded to keep the grand jury system, but only if Congress follows the recommendations of Judge Frankel and Gary Naftalis. Meanwhile you can hope no federal marshal with a grand jury subpoena knocks on your door.

Not So Grand

(By Victor S. Navasky)

Back when New York City was believed to be on the brink of bankruptcy, I heard only one persuasive argument for default: That Marvin E. Frankel, United States District Court Judge, would by virtue of presiding over the proceedings replace Abe Beame as our de facto Mayor.

The last time out Frankel, one of our nation's most thoughtful jurists, gave us "Criminal Sentences: Law Without Order," a brief but compelling call for sentencing reform which quickly became the conventional wisdom. (He then outraged those who had praised his guidelines by following them—his sentence of Bernard Bergman, the nursing home miscreant, was informed by the evidence as presented in the court of the Southern District of New York rather than the court of public opinion.)

Now he has teamed up with Gary P. Naftalis, formerly an Assistant United States Attorney for the Southern District, to update an analysis of the grand jury which originally appeared as a special issue of The New Leader magazine. Written for rather than down to, what lawyers like to call The Layman, it is a model of its kind, i.e., concise, clear, fair and as logical as the life of the law permits.

First, there is a brief section tracing the origins and development of the grand jury, including some significant if unfamiliar information. Contrary to the cliche, it was originally conceived 800 years ago not as a shield to protect the innocent against arbitrary prosecution. Rather, the first grand juries were drawn from the neighborhoods in which they sat and the grand jurors themselves supplied their own "evidence." Frequently acting on rumors and gossip—a sort of trial by yenteh—the grand jurors would decide whose arm to dip in the scalding water under the prevailing "trial by ordeal." Not until 1681, when a grand jury refused to obey King Charles II's wish that they indict the Earl of Shaftesbury (a Protestant who opposed the King's attempt to re-establish the Catholic Church in England), did it establish its theoretical role as a shield against oppression.

Next, there is a section contrasting "Theory and Practice." In theory, grand juries determine if there is "sufficient evidence to warrant putting the subject of an investigation to trial, where the question of guilt or innocence is determined." In fact, as constitutional lawyer Frank Donner (whom the authors curiously neglect) has pointed out, during the Nixon years the Justice Department tried to establish a "grand jury network" whose purpose was less to solve crimes than to compile dossiers. In theory, grand jury deliberations are secret, thereby protecting the innocent and also insuring maximum freedom and noninterference with grand jury deliberations. In fact, as Mario Biaggi and other victims of the process will attest, they can be about as secret as a Bella Abzug whisper, with the prosecutor leaking only that information he has not already announced in a press conference.

In theory, special grand jury reports can perform something of an ombudsman function (the authors cite the Watergate grand jury report with reference to President Nixon). In fact, grand jury reports, as the authors indicate, pose grave dangers of largely unanswerable character assassination and vigilantism.

After exploring the implication of grand jury selection, composition and procedures, the authors consider "Problems and Prescriptions." They carefully list the pros and cons for each proposed reform and then render their verdict: They would guarantee witnesses' rights by such devices as permitting counsel in the grand jury room, making transcripts available to grand jury witnesses, prohibiting prosecutor press briefings and imposing substantial fines on public officials convicted of leaking grand jury proceedings.

But suppose a prosecutor subpoenas a witness knowing that the witness—out of loyalty or fear—will refuse to cooperate. Should the witness be called, granted compulsory immunity and jailed for contempt? The authors say don't call him, but instead of considering the social policy implications of granting compulsory immunity they assume its inevitability and move on to discuss what ought to be its scope (and they favor cutting down penalties for noncooperation). On these and other issues, such as whether a grand jury's failure to indict ought to preclude subsequent grand juries from indicting on the same evidence, the authors are reluctant to go with the reformers. Should prosecutors be required to introduce exculpatory evidence in grand jury proceedings as a means of protecting defendants? "The cure may be worse than the disease."

The evidence of abuse—even as presented by the fair-minded Frankel and Naftalis—would seem to pose a greater danger than the reforms they endorse can correct. And yet they are content to reform rather than abolish. Their two main reasons: First, if the grand jury disappears, the indicting and investigative functions, including the power to compel testimony, will exist elsewhere, and who is to say any of the alternatives are better? A fair enough argument, but it makes one wish that the authors had included a comparative analysis of the experience of the English, who abolished the grand jury in 1933.

Second, they argue that one doesn't tinker with the Bill of Rights. (Grand jury abolitionists in the Congress would amend the Fifth Amendment, a revision which would be the first change ever made in the Bill of Rights.) For me this is the more persuasive argument. But that's because once our Congressional geniuses start to whittle away at the Fifth Amendment one suspects that they will not with the grand jury clause.

The grand jury, which does by compulsion what Woodward and Bernstein can only do by stealth, which can stigmatize by subpoena, harass with impunity, embarrass with publicity and entrap with abandon (via contempt proceedings for reluctant witnesses) demands systematic and sustained attention. In the absence of Robert Redford and Dustin Hoffman at our neighborhood theater in "The Grand Jury Story" we can be grateful for Frankel and Naftalis at our neighborhood bookstore.

SHIPEY SMOAK & AKERMAN,
Washington, D.C., February 19, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Committee on the Judiciary,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Thank you for January 26 letter concerning the above referred to Grand Jury Bill and the Congressional Record pages explaining the bill.

During the 30 years since I graduated from Harvard Law School, I have been in active private practice of the law, and while I do not deal primarily in criminal law, I have had occasion from time to time in handling of corporate and securities matters to encounter the grand jury problem, and believe me it is a real problem. You touch on most of the problems and would correct them, such as violations of grand jury secrecy, etc.

However, I question two provisions of the bill, and urge you to reconsider them. (I do not think a grand jury should be composed of less than 23 people—too many times in my life in the law I have seen how one person can dominate a small group.) The larger the group, the more opportunity for different minds to consider different aspects of the problem, and come to independent considered judgments. Nothing is more important than the reputation and freedom of our citizens, and so often there are the grossest trespasses against these basic civil rights by grand jury leaks, politically inspired presentations to grand juries, abuse of political power by U.S. attorneys, and similar types of deprivation of rights. A U.S. attorney absolutely dominates a grand jury, both in terms of what is presented to it and how it is presented. If he wants an indictment, he selects the witnesses and documents to get the indictment, regardless of the merits of the case. I would strongly urge that the size of the grand jury be kept at 23 people—the law is clear that it only takes 12 to indict, and every potential defendant is entitled to have 23 different Americans from different religious, geographic, economic, racial, and other segments of the community consider his case. As soon as you reduce the number, you deprive him of the protection of diversity.

The other matter which I think is terribly important is this business of giving a target notice and an opportunity to appear before a grand jury. (Everybody who has ever practiced law knows that the grand jury is simply a tool of the U.S. attorney and does exactly what he wants.) Indeed, a grand jury is handed a pretyped indictment and the foreman is asked to sign it, the work having been done by the U.S. attorney's office before the matter is even presented to a grand jury. From the standpoint of a target defendant, the most important step in the whole chain of law enforcement is what happens before the grand jury. Once he is indicted, regardless of the presumption of innocence, there is a presumption of guilt on the part of the judge and the petit jury, and all the protestations to the contrary are sheer bunk. It is uphill all the way for anybody who has been indicted, and you must surely know from your own experience in life. I have tried many times to get witnesses before a grand jury, and the U.S. attorney answers me that he has fairly presented it to the foreman, which I know is an outright lie. By manner or implication, he manages to induce the foreman to refuse to hear a witness. Why in the world would a grand jury not hear both sides of a case before arriving at an indictment? Why in the world should anybody in any position in life who is called upon to make a decision involving the life or property of another person, should they not have before them all arguments and evidence each way before they come to a critical judgment? I simply cannot understand the willingness of judges and others to go along with the idea that a grand jury somehow is an instrument to protect the innocent. It is just the opposite—it is a tool used by U.S. attorneys to inflict their views on the community, sometimes they are right, and sometimes they are grossly wrong, and all the time they are subject to the human pressures and biases and prejudices which confound the thinking of us all.

I hope you can consider these two points very seriously and give some thought to striking a real blow for liberty and reconstituting the grand jury as a shield for the innocent as well as an instrument for catching the guilty.

You are doing a great job for America, and we all are in your debt.

Sincerely yours,

CARL L. SHIPLEY.

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Denver, March 16, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Thank you for your letter of January 25, 1977, and for the information which you enclosed.

I thought you might be interested in Senate Bill 186 concerning grand jury reform, pending before the Colorado legislature. Enclosed is a copy of this legislaton, in the form in which it was approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It was approved on second reading, and we expect it will clear the Senate within the next two weeks. There will be two amendments to it, one which will leave to the discretion of the prosecutor the form of the subpoena and any required notice thereon, and the other restricting grand jury reports. That restriction will probably require that a subject of a report have an opportunity to appear and to testify and that in no event could a report be issued without the approval of a judge who determines that public release of a report is important to the public interest.

Because so many of these changes encompass elements of the legislation which you are proposing, and which Dade County State's Attorney Richard Gerstein advocates, I am sending this information to you and to Mr. Gerstein.

Yours truly,

DALE TOOLEY.

The committee recommends that Senate Bill No. 186 be amended as follows and, as so amended, be referred to the Committee of the Whole with favorable recommendation:

Amend printed bill, page 1, strike everything below the enacting clause, and substitute the following:

SECTION 1. 16-5-204, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is Repealed and Reenacted, With Amendments, to read:

16-5-204. Witnesses before a grand jury procedure. (1) (a) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any grand jury refuses, without just cause shown, to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the prosecuting attorney may submit an application to the court for an order directing the witness to show why the witness should not be held in contempt. After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, the court may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined. Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information; however, the court may release the witness from confinement if the court determines that further confinement will not cause the witness to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

(b) If a witness has been confined in accordance with paragraph (a) of this subsection (1), he may, upon petition filed with the court, request a hearing to be held within ten days to review the contempt order at which hearing he shall have the right to be represented by counsel. The court, at the hearing, may rescind, modify, or affirm the order.

(c) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed for a person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

(2) No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any transaction, set of transactions, event, or events in any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before any district court shall again be imprisoned or fined for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events before any grand jury.

(3) Upon impanelment of each grand jury, the court shall give to such grand jury adequate and reasonable written notice of and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands the nature of:

(a) Its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the state of Colorado alleged to have been committed;

(b) Its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

(c) Its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

(d) The subject matter of the investigation and the criminal statutes or other statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

(e) The duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of nine or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there is probable cause for finding indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

(f) The requirement that the grand jury may not find an indictment in cases of perjury unless at least two witnesses to the same fact present evidence establishing probable cause to find such an indictment.

(4) (a) Each grand jury subpoena shall contain the following advisement prominently displayed on the front of the subpoena:

NOTICE

(I) You have the right to retain an attorney to represent you and to advise you regarding your grand jury appearance.

(II) Anything you say to the grand jury may be used against you in a court of law.

(III) You have the right to refuse to answer questions if you feel the answers would tend to incriminate you or to implicate you in any illegal activity.

(IV) If you cannot afford or obtain an attorney, you may consult with the public defender's office, or request the court to appoint an attorney to represent you.

(b) Any witness who is not advised of his rights pursuant to paragraph (a) of this subsection (4) shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testifies or any evidence he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding, except for perjury, against him in any court.

(c) In any proceeding before the grand jury, if the prosecuting attorney has written notice in advance of the appearance of a witness that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, such witness shall not be compelled to appear before the grand jury unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

(d) Any witness subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to assistance of counsel during any time that such witness is being questioned in the presence of such grand jury, and counsel may be present in the grand jury room with his client during such questioning. However, counsel for the witness shall be permitted only to counsel with the witness and shall not make objections, arguments, or address the grand jury. Such counsel may be retained by the witness or may, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance, be appointed in the same manner as if that person were eligible for appointed counsel. An attorney present in the grand jury room shall take an oath of secrecy. If the court, at an in camera hearing, determines that counsel was disruptive, then the court may order counsel to remain outside the courtroom when advising his client.

(e) Once a grand jury has returned a no true bill based upon a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into the same transaction or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the prosecuting attorney, that the prosecuting attorney has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

(f) A certified or authorized reporter shall be present at all grand jury sessions. All grand jury proceedings and testimony from commencement to adjournment shall be reported. The reporter's notes and any transcripts which may be prepared shall be preserved, sealed, and filed with the court. No release or destruction of the notes or transcripts shall occur without prior court approval.

(g) Upon application by the prosecutor, or by any witness after notice to the prosecutor, the court, for good cause, may enter an order to furnish to that witness a transcript of his own grand jury testimony, or minutes, reports, or exhibits relating to them.

(h) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury, or an attorney for such witness with the witness's written approval, shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy at the witness's expense any statement in the possession of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury which such witness has made that relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. If a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript and shall not pay a fee.

(i) No person subpoenaed to testify or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined as provided in this section, for his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if upon filing a motion and, upon an evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpoena or a court having jurisdiction under this section, the court finds that:

(I) A primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury is or will be to secure testimony for trial for which the defendant has already been charged by information, indictment, or criminal complaint.

(II) Compliance with a subpoena would be unreasonable or oppressive;

(III) A primary purpose of the issuance of the subpoena is to harass the witness;

(IV) The witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under this section for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events; or

(V) The witness has not been advised of his rights as specified in paragraph (a) of this subsection (4).

(j) Any grand jury may indict a person for an offense when the evidence before such grand jury provides probable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

(k) The district court before which the indicted defendant is to be tried shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds, upon the filing of a motion by the indicted defendant based upon the grand jury record without argument or further evidence, that the grand jury finding of probable cause is not supported by the record.

(l) Any person may approach the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury and request to testify or retestify in an inquiry before a grand jury or to appear before a grand jury. The prosecuting attorney or the grand jury shall keep a record of all denials of such requests to that prosecuting attorney or grand jury, including the reasons for not allowing such person to testify or appear. If the person making such request is dissatisfied with the decision of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury, such person may petition the court for hearing on the denial by the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury. If the court grants the hearing, then the court may permit the person to testify or appear before the grand jury, if the court finds that such testimony or appearance would serve the interests of justice.

(m) The foreman, or acting foreman when designated by the court, of the grand jury may swear or affirm all witnesses who come before the grand jury.

(n) Any other motions testing the validity of the indictment may be heard by the court based only on the record and argument of counsel, unless there is cause shown for the need for additional evidence.

SECTION 2. Safety clause. The general assembly hereby finds, determines, and declares that this act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety.

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Denver, March 24, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, House Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Recently, I had occasion to explain to a member of your staff the success our jurisdiction enjoyed in permitting witnesses before a grand jury to have their lawyers present in the grand jury room. Your staff representative asked that I send this letter outlining our experience with that system.

Before the Colorado Supreme Court rejected its Rules Committee recommendation that witnesses in a grand jury be permitted to have their attorney present, we felt authorized to grant admission, by consent of the grand jury and by court order, to lawyers for witnesses. Since December of 1974, because of the Colorado Supreme Court action, we have not felt at liberty to do so.

However, on numerous occasions attorneys for witnesses were permitted to be present. In each case, the lawyers for the witnesses accepted the usual oath of secrecy administered to the witness himself, and agreed not to be disruptive and only to counsel with the witness when necessary. It is my own conclusion that this system expedited the proceedings, because the witnesses were not constantly leaving the grand jury room to consult with counsel in the hallway. On only one occasion was there a lawyer who could be described as disruptive. That was an attorney for a witness in an investigation of alleged violence by certain militant factions. In that case, the judge called the lawyer into chambers and we were able to work out the problem with his ruling and instructions.

Even in that case, I think we would have had an even greater problem had the lawyer not been permitted to be present, since it appeared that the motivation of the witness was to delay the proceedings.

From these experiences, I have one other conclusion, and that is that the proceedings seemed to have a somewhat greater degree of fairness with the witness having counsel present in the grand jury room. It is not something on which I can put my finger, except to say that I spent many hours personally in grand jury proceedings with lawyers for witnesses present, and the tone simply seemed to be better and the search for the truth more professional. For these reasons, I find the proposal to permit witnesses to have their counsel present in the grand jury room to be an important reform, provided, of course, that the counsel is permitted only to advise the witness, not to interrupt or make statements, and provided that the court has the power to exclude a disruptive attorney.

Trusting that this information may be of some benefit, I am,

Yours truly,

DALE TOOLEY.

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
Denver, July 1, 1977.

Hon. RICHARD GERSTEIN,
Miami, Fla.

DEAR DICK: Colorado's grand jury reform law took effect June 20, 1977. Yesterday, the Denver grand jury conducted its first session under this new law, a copy of which is enclosed. I believe that you will find that virtually every proposal contained in the recommendations of the ABA Committee has been made a part of this statute. The only part of the new law which is still controversial and which will be tested in the courts is Section 2, which proposes to prevent most grand jury reports from being issued.

Since Colorado is the first state in the nation, I believe, to have adopted such a proposal, I thought the final version might be of particular interest to the ABA Committee which you chair.

Yours truly,

DALE TOOLEY.

Senate Bill No. 186. By Senators Kogovesk, MacManus, Comer, Cooper, Gallagher, Groff, Hatcher, Hughes, D. Sandoval, P. Sandoval, Cole, and Woodard; also Representatives DeMoulin, Boley, Castro, DeHerrera, Eckelberry, Frank, Kirscht, Marks, Smith, Taylor, and Wayland

CONCERNING GRAND JURIES

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado:

SECTION 1. 16-5-204, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is Repealed and Reenacted, with amendments, to read:

16-5-204. Witness before a grand jury—procedure. (1) (a) Whenever a witness in any proceeding before any grand jury refuses, without just cause shown, to comply with an order of the court to testify or provide other information, including any book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material, the prosecuting attorney may submit an application to the court for an order directing the witness to show why the witness should not be held in contempt. After submission of such application and a hearing at which the witness may be represented by counsel, the court may, if the court finds that such refusal was without just cause, hold the witness in contempt and order the witness to be confined. Such confinement shall continue until such time as the witness is willing to give such testimony or provide such information; however, the court may release the witness from confinement if the court determines that further confinement will not cause the witness to give such testimony or provide such information. No period of such confinement shall exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, before which such refusal to comply with the court order occurred, and in no event shall such confinement exceed six months.

(b) If a witness has been confined in accordance with paragraph (a) of this subsection (1), he may, upon petition filed with the court, request a hearing to be held within ten days to review the contempt order at which hearing he shall have the right to be represented by counsel. The court, at the hearing, may rescind, modify, or affirm the order.

(c) In any proceeding conducted under this section, counsel may be appointed for a person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance.

(2) No person who has been imprisoned or fined by a court for refusal to testify or provide other information concerning any criminal incident or incidents in any proceeding before a grand jury impaneled before any district court shall again be imprisoned or fined for a subsequent refusal to testify or provide other information concerning the same criminal incident or incidents before any grand jury.

(3) Upon impanelment of each grand jury, the court shall give to such grand jury adequate and reasonable written notice of and shall assure that the grand jury reasonably understands the nature of:

(a) Its duty to inquire into offenses against the criminal laws of the state of Colorado alleged to have been committed;

(b) Its right to call and interrogate witnesses;

(c) Its right to request the production of documents or other evidence;

(d) The subject matter of the investigation and the criminal statutes or other statutes involved, if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled;

(e) The duty of the grand jury by an affirmative vote of nine or more members of the grand jury to determine, based on the evidence presented before it, whether or not there is probable cause for finding indictments and to determine the violations to be included in any such indictments; and

(f) The requirement that the grand jury may not find an indictment in cases of perjury unless at least two witnesses to the same fact present evidence establishing probable cause to find such an indictment.

(4) (a) At the option of the prosecuting attorney, a grand jury subpoena may contain an advisement of rights. If the prosecuting attorney determines that an advisement is necessary, the grand jury subpoena shall contain the following advisement prominently displayed on the front of the subpoena:

NOTICE

(I) You have the right to retain an attorney to represent you and to advise you regarding your grand jury appearance.

(II) Anything you say to the grand jury may be used against you in a court of law.

(III) You have the right to refuse to answer questions if you feel the answers would tend to incriminate you or to implicate you in any illegal activity.

(IV) If you cannot afford or obtain an attorney, you may consult with the public defender's office, or request the court to appoint an attorney to represent you.

(b) Any witness who is not advised of his rights pursuant to paragraph (a) of this subsection (4) shall not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testifies or any evidence he produces, nor shall any such testimony or evidence be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding, except for perjury, against him in any court.

(c) In any proceeding before the grand jury, if the prosecuting attorney has written notice in advance of the appearance of a witness that such witness intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, such witness shall not be compelled to appear before the grand jury unless a grant of immunity has been obtained.

(d) Any witness subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects before such grand jury shall be entitled to assistance of counsel during any time that such witness is being questioned in the presence of such grand jury, and counsel may be present in the grand jury room with his client during such questioning. However, counsel for the witness shall be permitted only to counsel with the witness and shall not make objections, arguments, or address the grand jury. Such counsel may be retained by the witness or may, for any person financially unable to obtain adequate assistance, be appointed in the same manner as if that person were eligible for appointed counsel. An attorney present in the grand jury room shall take an oath of secrecy. If the court, at an in camera hearing, determines that counsel was disruptive, then the court may order counsel to remain outside the courtroom when advising his client. No attorney shall be permitted to provide counsel in the grand jury room to more than one witness in the same criminal investigation, except with the permission of the grand jury.

(e) Once a grand jury has returned a no true bill based upon a transaction, set of transactions, event, or events, a grand jury inquiry into the same transaction or events shall not be initiated unless the court finds, upon a proper showing by the prosecuting attorney, that the prosecuting attorney has discovered additional evidence relevant to such inquiry.

(f) A certified or authorized reporter shall be present at all grand jury sessions. All grand jury proceedings and testimony from commencement to adjournment shall be reported. The reporter's notes and any transcripts which may be prepared shall be preserved, sealed, and filed with the court. No release or destruction of the notes or transcripts shall occur without prior court approval.

(g) Upon application by the prosecutor, or by any witness after notice to the prosecutor, the court, for good cause, may enter an order to furnish to that witness a transcript of his own grand jury testimony, or minutes, reports, or exhibits relating to them.

(h) Any witness summoned to testify before a grand jury, or an attorney for such witness with the witness's written approval, shall be entitled, prior to testifying, to examine and copy at the witness's expense any statement in the possession of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury which such witness has made that relates to the subject matter under inquiry by the grand jury. If a witness is proceeding in forma pauperis, he shall be furnished, upon request, a copy of such transcript and shall not pay a fee.

(i) No person suspoenaed to testify or to produce books, papers, documents, or other objects in any proceeding before any grand jury shall be required to testify or to produce such objects, or be confined as provided in this section, for his failure to so testify or produce such objects, if upon filing a motion and, upon an evidentiary hearing before the court which issued such subpoena or a court having jurisdiction under this section, the court finds that:

(I) A primary purpose or effect of requiring such person to so testify or to produce such objects before the grand jury is or will be to secure testimony for trial for which the defendant has already been charged by information indictment, or criminal complaint;

(II) Compliance with a subpoena would be unreasonable or oppressive;

(III) A primary purpose of the issuance of the subpoena is to harass the witness;

(IV) The witness has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined under this section for his refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same transaction, set of transactions, event, or events; or

(V) The witness has not been advised of his rights as specified in paragraph (a) of this subsection (4).

(j) Any grand jury may indict a person for an offense when the evidence before such grand jury provides probable cause to believe that such person committed such offense.

(k) The district court before which the indicted defendant is to be tried shall dismiss any indictment of the grand jury if such district court finds, upon the filing of a motion by the indicated defendant based upon the grand jury record without argument or further evidence, that the grand jury finding of probable cause is not supported by the record.

(l) Any person may approach the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury and request to testify or retestify in an inquiry before a grand jury or to appear before a grand jury. The prosecuting attorney or the grand jury shall keep a record of all denials of such requests to that prosecuting attorney or grand jury, including the reasons for not allowing such person to testify or appear. If the person making such request is dissatisfied with the decision of the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury, such person may petition the court for hearing on the denial by the prosecuting attorney or the grand jury. If the court grants the hearing, then the court may permit the person to testify or appear before the grand jury, if the court finds that such testimony or appearance would serve the interests of justice.

(m) The foreman, or acting foreman when designated by the court, of the grand jury may swear or affirm all witnesses who come before the grand jury.

(n) Any other motions testing the validity of the indictment may be heard by the court based only on the record and argument of counsel, unless there is cause shown for the need for additional evidence.

SECTION 2. 16-5-205, Colorado Revised Statutes 1973, is amended by the addition of a new subsection to read:

16-5-205. Informations—authority to file—indictments—warrants and summons. (4) The report of the grand jury shall not be made public except when required by statute or except that all of the report or a portion thereof may be released if the chief judge of the district court finds such a release will exonerate a person or persons who have requested such a release.

SECTION 3. Appropriation. There is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1977, to the judicial department, trial courts, the sum of thirty-five thousand two hundred thirty-four dollars ($35,234), or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the implementation of this act.

SECTION 4. Safety clause. The general assembly hereby finds, determines, and declares that this act is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE EILBERG: I am writing to you in my capacity as Chairman of the Federal Practice Committee of the California Attorneys for Criminal Justice ("CACJ"). CACJ, which is comprised of approximately 1,300 lawyers who specialize in criminal defense in the State of California, endorses the grand jury reforms set forth in your proposed legislation, H.R. 94.

Various members of our committee have been studying the matter for some time. I expect that by mid-June we will release our report on grand jury reform, which will endorse and enlarge upon the principles of grand jury reform proposed by the Criminal Justice Section of the ABA. I expect that our report will include additional principles which will be primarily based upon procedures which have been statutorily mandated in the California Penal Code governing the conduct of grand juries in California. In our collective experience, these procedures required in California do not and have not impeded the effective functioning of the government in its pursuit of organized crime and white collar criminals. California's experience will directly refute many of the contentions expressed by former Attorney General Levi and the various memoranda prepared and submitted by the Department of Justice, which opposed reforming the grand jury.

It would be extremely helpful if we could obtain five copies of the transcript of hearings before your Subcommittee, together with any additional testimony that has been taken in 1977 or submissions made by various organizations in support of or in opposition to the proposed legislation. Could you please arrange to have this information forwarded to me at your earliest convenience. Thank you for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

DONALD C. SMALTZ.

SMALTZ & NEELLEY,
Los Angeles, Calif., April 20, 1977.

MARTIN H. BELSKY, Esq.,
Counsel, Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MARTY: I appreciated the opportunity to meet with you last Wednesday, April 13. I have commenced reviewing portions of the testimony and other information submitted before the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, and that submitted to the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law. I have also spoken with various members of the board of California Attorneys for Criminal Justice ("CACJ") and informed them that instead of our organization taking a position on either one of the two Bills in the House, or the Bill in the Senate, that it would be more appropriate for us to endorse the proposed ABA Grand Jury principles from the Criminal Justice Section of the ABA.

We will be having a Committee meeting on May 14, and while there is no doubt that we will be able to unanimously endorse those principles, we will probably also add some additional principles. These will be based upon various statutes that we have in California regulating the conduct of county Grand Juries and include the principle that the Grand Jury should receive nor consider no evidence except that which would be admissible over objection at the trial of the criminal action. (P.C. 939.6); that the Grand Jury shall find an indictment when all the evidence is unexplained or uncontradicted and would in its judgment warrant a conviction by a trial jury (P.C. 939.8); that when a Grand Jury investigates a charge against a person and as a result thereof, does not return an indictment, it shall at the request of that person and upon approval of the court, declare that a charge against such person was investigated and the Grand Jury could not find an indictment (P.C. 939.91); and an indictment must be set aside by the court where the indictment is not found, endorsed and presented as required or where the defendant has been indicted on insufficient evidence (P.C. 995).

I am enclosing the relevant provisions of the California Penal Code so that you can observe the language of the specific provision governing the conduct of county Grand Juries. These procedures required in California have not impeded the effective functioning of the District Attorney's officers in their pursuit of white collar and organized crime matters; and refute many of the contentions expressed by the former Attorney General Levi and the various memoranda prepared and submitted by the Department of Justice, which opposes reforming the Grand Jury.

If you have any thoughts on this matter, please contact me. I expect to be talking to you in some detail concerning your suggestions about the format that our written presentation expressing the position of CACJ should follow.

Sincerely,

DONALD C. SMALTZ.

ARTICLE 4

CONDUCT OF INVESTIGATIONS

§ 939. Right of persons to be present at grand jury session.
§ 939.1. Public sessions as to matter affecting general public welfare: Persons conducting investigation: Private deliberation: Indictments.
§ 939.2. Witnesses: Requiring attendance by subpoena.
§ 939.3. Same: Proceedings where privilege against self-incrimination claimed.
§ 939.5. Same: Oath.
§ 939.5. Statement by foreman: Retirement of prejudiced juror.
§ 939.6. Evidence: Admissibility.
§ 939.7. Same: Evidence for defendant: Duty to weigh evidence submitted: Obtaining evidence to explain away charge.
§ 939.8. Evidence warranting indictment.
§ 939.9. Requirement that jury's report, etc., be based on its own investigation.
§ 939.91. Declaration that evidence did not support indictment: Declaration that person was witness.

§ 939. [Right of persons to be present at grand jury session.] No person other than those specified in Article 3 (commencing with Session 934), Chapter 3 of this title and in section 939.1 is permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury except the members and witnesses actually under examination. No person shall be permitted to be present during the expression of the opinions of the grand jurors, or the giving of their votes upon any matter before them. [1959 ch. 501 § 2.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 404. Witkin Criminal Procedure p 162.

§ 939.1 [Public sessions as to matter affecting general public welfare: Persons conducting investigation: Private deliberation: Indictments.] The grand jury acting through its foreman and the attorney general or the district attorney may make a joint written request for public sessions of the grand jury. The request shall be filed with the superior court. If the court, or the judge thereof, finds that the subject matter of the investigation affects the general public welfare, involving the alleged corruption, misfeasance, or malfeasance in office or dereliction of duty of public officials or employees or of any person allegedly acting in conjunction or conspiracy with such officials or employees in such alleged acts, the court or judge may make an order directing the grand jury to conduct its investigation in a session or sessions open to the public. The order shall state the finding of the court. The grand jury shall comply with the order.

The conduct of such investigation and the examination of witnesses shall be by the members of the grand jury and the district attorney.

The deliberation of the grand jury and its voting upon such investigation shall be in private session. The grand jury may find indictments based wholly or partially upon the evidence introduced at such public session. [1959 ch. 501. § 2.)] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 405; Witkin Criminal Procedure p 164.

§ 939.2. [Witnesses: Requiring attendance by subpoena.] A subpoena requiring the attendance of a witness before the grand jury may be signed and issued by the district attorney, his investigator or, upon request of the grand jury, by any judge of the superior court, for witnesses in the state, in support of the prosecution, for those witnesses whose testimony, in his opinion is material in an investigation before the grand jury, and for such other witnesses as the grand jury, upon an investigation pending before them, may direct. [1959 ch 501 § 2; 1971 ch 1196 § 1.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 411; Witkin Criminal Procedure p 165.

§ 939.3. [Same: Proceedings where privilege against self-incrimination claimed.] In any investigation or proceeding before a grand jury for any felony offense when a person refuses to answer a question or produce evidence of any kind on the ground that he may be incriminated thereby, proceedings may be had under Section 1324. [1959 ch. 501 § 2] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 411; Witkin Criminal Procedure, p. 165.

§ 939.4. [Same: Oath.] The foreman may administer an oath to any witness appearing before the grand jury. [1959 ch 501 § 2.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 411: Witkin Criminal Procedure pp 13, 615.

§ 939.5. [Statement by foreman: Retirement of prejudiced juror.] Before considering a charge against any person, the foreman of the grand jury shall state to those present the matter to be considered and the person to be charged with an offense in connection therewith. He shall direct any member of the grand jury who has a state of mind in reference to the case or to either party which will prevent him from acting impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the party to retire. Any violation of this section by the foreman or any member of the grand jury is punishable by the court as a contempt. [1959 ch 501 § 2.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law §§ 393, 410; Witkin Criminal Procedure pp 13, 161.

§ 939.6. [Evidence: Admissibility.] (a) Subject to subdivision (b), in the investigation of a charge, the grand jury shall receive no other evidence than such as is:

(1) Given by witnesses produced and sworn before the grand jury;

(2) Furnished by writings, material objects, or other things presented to the senses; or

(3) Contained in a deposition that is admissible under subdivision 3 of Section 686.

(b) The grand jury shall receive none but evidence that would be admissible over objection at the trial of a criminal action, but the fact that evidence which would have been excluded at trial was received by the grand jury does not render the indictment void where sufficient competent evidence to support the indictment was received by the grand jury. [1959 ch 501 § 2; 1965 ch 299 § 141.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 411; Witkin Criminal Procedure pp 165, 166; Evidence p. 18.

§ 939.7. [Same: Evidence for defendant: Duty to weigh evidence submitted: Obtaining evidence to explain away charge.] The grand jury is not required to hear evidence for the defendant, but it shall weigh all the evidence submitted to it, and when it has reason to believe that other evidence within its reach will explain away the charge, it shall order the evidence to be produced, and for that purpose may require the district attorney to issue process for the witnesses. [1959 ch 501 § 2.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law §§ 410, 411; Witkin Criminal Procedure pp 165, 166, 167, 169; Evidence p 17.

§ 939.9. [Requirement that jury's report, etc., be based on its own investigation.] A grand jury shall make no report, declaration, or recommendation on any matter except on the basis of its own investigation of the matter made by such grand jury. A grand jury shall not adopt as its own the recommendation of another grand jury unless the grand jury adopting such recommendation does so after its own investigation of the matter as to which the recommendation is made, as required by this section. [1959 ch 501 § 2.] 17 Cal Jur 3d Criminal Law § 399; Witkin Criminal Procedure p 16.

§ 939.91. [Declaration that evidence did not support indictment; Declaration that person was witness.] (a) A grand jury which investigates a charge against a person, and as a result thereof cannot find an indictment against such person, shall, at the request of such person and upon the approval of the court which impaneled the grand jury, report or declare that a charge against such person was investigated and that the grand jury could not as a result of the evidence presented find an indictment. The report or declaration shall be issued upon completion of the investigation of the suspected criminal conduct, or series of related suspected criminal conduct, and in no event beyond the end of the grand jury's term.

(b) A grand jury shall, at the request of the person called and upon the approval of the court which impaneled the grand jury, report or declare that any person called before the grand jury for a purpose, other than to investigate a charge against such person, was called only as a witness to an investigation which did not involve a charge against such person. The report or declaration shall be issued upon completion of the investigation of the suspected criminal conduct, or series of related suspected criminal conduct, and in no event beyond the end of the grand jury's term. § 997. [Motion to set aside: Time for hearing: Proceedings when motion is denied or granted: Examination before magistrate after order of resubmission.] The motion must be heard at the time it is made, unless for cause the court postpones the hearing to another time. The court may entertain such motion prior to trial whether or not a plea has been entered and such plea need not be set aside in order to consider the motion. If the motion is denied, and the accused has not previously answered the indictment or information, either by demurring or pleading thereto, he shall immediately do so. If the motion is granted, the court must order that the defendant, if in custody, be discharged therefrom; or, if admitted to bail, that his bail be exonerated; or, if he has deposited money, or if money has been deposited by another or others instead of bail for his appearance, that the same be refunded to him or to the person or persons found by the court to have deposited said money on behalf of said defendant, unless it directs that the case be resubmitted to the same or another grand jury, or that an information be filed by the district attorney; provided, that after such order of resubmission the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him, as in other cases, * * *

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
U.S. Representative, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EILBERG: I read with great interest your article in Judicature. I would deeply appreciate receiving a copy of your Bill and copies of any testimony taken in regard thereto.

In your development of these types of issues, you might consider giving a witness the absolute right to have a copy of prior Grand Jury testimony before subsequent appearance. Under the present system this is largely left to the discretion of the trial judge and the decisions are split as to this right. Elementary fairness dictates that this right be afforded because of the existence of the perjury by conflicting statement statute. In many cases prior Grand Jury testimony and the availability of it to the witness is not important. In cases, however, where the Grand Jury is inquiring into mutiple transactions over a long period of time with the constant review of prior records and the process of having one's recollection refreshed, the availability of this testimony is vital.

It is hard for a young prosecutor with ambitions, either professional or political, to avoid the temptation of getting caught up in a mutual manipulation process with the media. We see witnesses paraded before Grand Juries at the state and federal level when everybody knows these witnesses are going to take the Fifth Amendment. Typical examples of this are organized crime figures who have never testified about anything anywhere without immunity backed up by the contempt power. Further, public figures are brought before Grand Juries with its inevitable taint in the minds of many, when they have little or no information about the subject matter. For these reasons, consideration might be given to allowing a witness to have the right to give a deposition with the Grand Jury having the ultimate right, after reviewing the deposition testimony, to insist upon a live appearance. This has several built-in checks and balances among which are that any lawyer worth his salt with a client in trouble wants to minimize the times his client is under oath. It strikes me that a lawyer would give long and careful consideration to invoking the right of a deposition that the Government can later scrutinize and reflect upon and then bring the witness back or recommend to the Grand Jury that the witness be brought back for live testimony.

I don't pretend to know the answers to these problems, but I am very happy to see some thought be given to them. I would deeply appreciate the materials requested, as this has been an area of some concern to me.

Sincerely,

THOMAS W. MCALILEY.

MARTIN BELSKY,
Counsel, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BELSKY: For the past two years I have been serving as a member of the New Jersey State Bar Association Committee on Grand Jury Reform. Our committee recently concluded its work and our report was released a few days ago.

In view of the fact that your committee is currently working on legislative proposals for federal grand jury reform, I thought you might be interested in having a copy of our report. Of particular interest to you would be that section of the report from pages 32 to 58 dealing with proposed reforms in grand jury practice. The initial part of the report deals with our proposal to replace grand jury proceedings in most instances with adversarial preliminary hearings as is now the case in some states, notably California.

I think our report should be particularly important to your committee in light of the fact that our State Attorney General recently tesified before your committee, as I understand it, in opposition to many of the proposed grand jury reforms being considered by you.

I should point out to you that the membership of this committee was a diverse one, including two retired justices of our state Supreme court, several present and past prosecutors as well as several law school professors and defense counsel.

I trust that this report may be of some interest to you and I would hope that you would disseminate its contents to the members of your committee. If you have any further questions, please feel free to contact me.

Very truly yours,

HARVEY WEISSBARD.

SUMMARY OF REPORT OF THE NEW JERSEY STATE BAR ASSOCIATION COMMITTEE ON THE GRAND JURY, A DUAL SYSTEM OF INITIATING CRIMINAL CHARGES: PROSECUTION BY INFORMATION AND THE GRAND JURY'S RESIDUAL FUNCTION

After two years of intensive work a special New Jersey State Bar Association Committee on Grand Jury Reform has submitted a report proposing major and sweeping changes in the process by which criminal charges are instituted and in the presentation of evidence to grand juries in New Jersey.

The committee has recommended a constitutional amendment that would permit criminal charges to be instituted by an information filed by the Prosecutor in lieu of indictment where the information is preceded by a finding of sufficient cause made by a full time judge after an adversarial preliminary hearing. The report has recognized the need for retention of the grand jury for use in certain limited instances, primarily as an investigative tool. However, the report has also recommended substantial changes in present grand jury practices.

Under the proposed system, an individual would be brought before a judge for an initial appearance within 24 hours of arrest. If the defendant remains in custody he would receive a preliminary hearing within 7 days of his initial appearance; if he is free on bail the preliminary hearing would take place within 21 days. At the preliminary hearing the accused would have the right not only to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses but to present evidence, including his own testimony, in his behalf. The rules of evidence would apply at this hearing.

The heart of the committee's proposal is an amendment to the State Constitution which would read as follows:

"No person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense unless on indictment of a grand jury or on an information, as prescribed by law. No information shall be filed unless a judge finds sufficient cause following a preliminary hearing at which the accused shall have the right to cross-examine the State's witnesses and to present evidence in his own behalf."

The preliminary hearing would be an adversarial one and the phrase "sufficient cause", in lieu of probable cause, is intended to make clear that the judge would be duty-bound to consider all of the evidence adduced in the proceeding, including that presented by the accused. The committee concluded that such an adversarial preliminary hearing would afford the state an opportunity to evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of its case and, if the accused presents evidence, of the defense case as well. At the same time, such a hearing would afford maximum protection for the right of the accused. He would obtain early discovery of the prosecution's case and would be provided with a vehicle for terminating an unwarranted prosecution at the earliest possible time. The preliminary hearing would be conducted in open court, on the record, the defendant would have the right to counsel, to cross-examine the State's witnesses and to present evidence in his own behalf. Thus, each side would be given an opportunity to "dry run" their cases early in the criminal process. The committee has also concluded that such proceedings be held in a centrally located court manned by full-time judges, such as the County District Court, as opposed to the present municipal courts which, for a variety of reasons, the Committee found unsuited for the task.

The Committee has recommended that neither the prosecution nor the defense be permitted to appeal from the court's decision. Finally, the prosecution would be prohibited from either seeking an indictment or seeking another hearing based on the same evidence. If sufficient cause is found, the prosecutor would have 15 days within which to file an information. His failure to do so would result in an automatic dismissal with prejudice.

The Committee concluded that the "preliminary hearing procedure proposed here would incorporate the best attributes of grand jury deliberations and avoid the worst". While the proposed hearing resembles the trial, experience in California indicates that the overall expenditure of time with respect to each case will be decreased. The earlier disposition of questions that will inevitably arise at trial and the earlier opportunity for both sides to evaluate their cases will, it is believed, facilitate plea negotiations, thus resulting in fewer full scale trials.

It should be noted that only twenty-one states presently retain grand jury indictment as the only permissible mode of initiating felony prosecutions. Most jurisdictions permit accusation by criminal information. Thus, New Jersey would join the majority of states if this proposal were adopted. On the other hand, no jurisdiction has yet abolished the grand jury altogether. Similarly, the grand jury would be retained under the Committee's proposed reform.

The "grand jury's investigative powers, its ability to process multi-defendant cases, the need for secrecy in certain situations, all militate against abolition of the grand jury". In addtion, the grand jury serves a valuable role as a vehicle for citizen participation in our democratic society. While it is to be expected that the vast majority of routine cases will be handled by the preliminary hearing and information process, the selection of precisely which cases will be presented to the grand jury will, and must of necessity, be left to the sound discretion of the prosecutor. Since the grand jury will be retained, the Committee has recommended many changes so as to substantially improve and upgrade the indicting process.

The Committee has recommended that compensation of grand jurors be raised to a more realistic level of $25 per day, in place of the present $5 per day. Recognizing that the number of grand jurors (presently 23) is not a "magic number", it is recommended that the grand jury consist of only 15 members but with 10 being required to return an indictment in lieu of the bare majority which presently suffices.

Substantial upgrading of the assignment judge's instructions to new grand juries is also suggested. The grand jury, the Committee felt, should be more thoroughly informed of its rights and obligations, with special emphasis upon its independence from the prosecutor. The court would inform the grand jury of its right to request and interrogate additional witnesses and to production of documentary evidence. The availability of the court for additional instructions would also be made clear.

The most significant reform of present grand jury practices would come in the area of the type and quality of the evidence which a grand jury would hear.

Concluding that the serious consequences of an indictment mandate safeguards reasonably similar to those present at trial, the Committee has made eight major recommendations in this area.

First, as a general rule, a grand jury would be permitted to hear only "admissible" evidence. This would, for the most part, bar the presentation of hearsay evidence before the grand jury. However, the nature of the grand jury process also suggests that there be some exceptions to this rule. This would cover, for example, permitting the introduction of a chemist's report in lieu of his live testimony. The prosecutor, though, would have to clearly inform the grand jury of the availability of better or first-hand evidence so they can, if they desire, request such proof. The proposed rule would read as follows:

"The grand jury shall receive none but evidence that would be admissible over objection at the trial of a criminal action, absent justification for its introduction which justification shall be stated on the record at the time of its admission; but the fact that evidence which would have been excluded at trial was received by the grand jury does not render the indictment void where sufficient competent evidence to support the indictment was received by the grand jury. However, no indictment shall be based on inadmissible evidence alone."

Second, the Committee has proposed that a prospective defendant always be invited to testify before the grand jury which is considering his indictment, if his whereabouts are known, and provided he waives his Fifth Amendment privilege. He would also be permitted to suggest witnesses to the grand jury which they could hear in their discretion. The proposed rule would state:

"The prospective defendant shall have the right, on his request and upon an adequate waiver, to testify before the grand jury which is considering his indictment. The prosecutor shall so advise the defendant either personally, through counsel, or by mail, at his last known address and shall afford a reasonable opportunity for such appearance. Failure to so advise the prospective defendant shall require dismissal of the indictment.

"A prospective defendant shall have the right to give to the grand jury the names and addresses of witnesses and the grand jury may, in its discretion, require the production of such witnesses. The burden of producing such witnesses shall be upon the defendant requesting their production."

Third, a "target" defendant should never be unwillingly summoned before a grand jury which is considering his indictment, a practice which is likely to, and generally does, result in severe prejudice to the accused. The Committee's suggested rule is that:

"The prosecutor should not compel the appearance of a target witness if that witness states in advance that if called he will exercise his constitutional right not to testify. Such statement shall be made on the record out of the grand jury's presence and the individual shall have the right to have an attorney present at such proceeding. The grand jury shall not be informed about the witness' election not to testify. However, if the State signifies its intention to grant immunity to a target he may be required to assert his privilege before the grand jury.

"If the prosecutor believes that a witness is a target he should not seek to compel his testimony before the grand jury without informing him of his right to counsel, that he may have assigned counsel if he is indigent, that he has the right to remain silent if his answers might incriminate him, and that anything he says may be used against him.

"If a target is not so warned and does testify and is indicted, any testimony given by him cannot thereafter be used against him and the indictment shall be dismissed without prejudice to the matter being presented to a different grand jury.

"A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law."

Fourth, simple fairness, as well as analogous trial precedent, suggest the following:

"The prosecutor shall disclose to the grand jury any evidence which the prosecutor knows will tend to negate guilt."

Fifth, is a recommendation designed to deal with the problem of the grand jury witness, not a target, who invokes his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Where the invocation of the privilege is challenged the witness must convince a judge of his justification. This procedure, often done in open court, has resulted in prejudice and embarrassment to witnesses as a result of publicity surrounding such a proceeding. Accordingly, the Committee has recommended that all such hearings be conducted "in camera", and that such testimony give rise to a "use" immunity.

Three additional rules would require (1) that all grand jury witnesses be given reasonable advance notice of their appearance, (2) that everything that transpires before the grand jury, except its deliberations, be recorded, and that no one but grand jurors be present during during the deliberations, and (3) that all witnesses be informed, at the conclusion of their testimony, that they may add anything relevant to the subject matter of their testimony. The latter proposal would insure that no witness will be unfairly limited by the prosecutor's questioning.

With respect to pre-indictment or post-indictment publicity, the Committee noted many complaints in this area, concerning not only prosecutors, state and federal, but defense counsel as well. The Committee was of the view that the court rules, which have adopted DR 7-103 and DR 7-107, may not be adequate and should be revised. In the interim the present guidelines would be strictly followed. "The Bar is not helpless. Prejudicial publicity can be met by motions to hold offenders in contempt or by the filing of complaints with County Ethics Committees. Imposition of sanctions in a few such cases would go a long way toward stemming the tide."

The Committee concluded its report with a recommendation for greater use of prosecutorial discretion to administratively terimnate prosecutions before formal proceedings, where appropriate. The prosecutor has, and should use, the power to dismiss, reduce or change charges or refuse to accept complaints that do not warrant prosecution. The use of this power would, the Committee felt, cure a major deficiency in the criminal justice system and complement the reform proposed in the report.

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE COURTS,
STATE HOUSE ANNEX,
Trenton, N.J., April 22, 1977.

Memorandum to: The State Bar Association Grand Jury Study Committee.

I enclose herewith a copy of my separate statement regarding our Report. I very much enjoyed working with the Committee.

EDWIN H. STERN.

Enclosure.

I concur in the recommendation that an information process be permitted and, in fact, substituted for the Grand Jury procedure in complaint cases. I do so because I strongly feel that the present probable cause and Grand Jury systems are duplicative and wasteful; and I prefer to rely upon the former because of the mandated probable cause hearing in custody cases. See Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975). I would endeavor, where possible, to combine the Gerstein and probable cause hearings, and believe that our recommendations promote this concept.[1]

I stress that my concurrence is based upon the recommendation that the probable cause hearing be conducted in a centralized, full-time court. I frankly do not believe that a change in the charging process, without unification and consolidation of the present municipal court jurisdiction (at least with respect to matters falling within the scope of our report) and without the conduct of expeditious probable cause hearings in full-time courts, would constitute a step forward. The expanded probable cause hearings must be conducted before full-time judges in full-time courts,[2] and I emphasize that the proposed constitutional amendment to the charging process must be accompanied by simultaneous legislative action to require municipal court consolidation or to provide additional judges and resources for our County District Courts in advance of unification.

[1] I also agree with the recommendations to retain the investigative grand jury and the power of direct indictment.

[2] This concept would also permit full-time prosecutors (and full-time public defenders where the defendant is indigent) to appear at probable cause hearings. In turn, counsel could better evaluate the case at an early date, and more meaningful "pleas discussions" could result.

I question the wisdom of permitting the prosecutor to bypass probable cause hearings in complaint cases (absent extraordinary circumstances)[3] and the need for post-indictment probable cause hearings (following direct indictment or indictment when such hearings are avoided in complaint cases), see Gerstein v. Pugh, supra; Johnson v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. 3rd 248 (1975); State v. Ordog, 45 N.J. 347, 363 (1965) cert. denied 354 U.S. 1022 (1965); State v. Smith, 32 N.J. 501, 536 (1960) cert. denied 364 U.S. 936 (1961); State v. Cox, 114 N.J. Super. 556 (App. Div. 1971), certif. den. 58 N.J. 93 (1971). Moreover, while I basically agree with same, I also recognize that some of the recommendations made with respect to the Grand Jury, where retained are debatable. However, these issues can be analyzed and discussed without adverse impact upon the fundamental recommendations embodied in the Committee's Report. The appropriate constitutional and legislative amendments can be made, where necessary, to support our basic recommendations, leaving the details of probable and grand jury procedures for development in Court rules which can be amended as experience dictates. N.J. Const. (1947), Art. 6, § 2, ¶ 3. (Note the Present R. 3:4–3 and R. 3:6–1 et seq.)[4]

Therefore, I concur in the Report, and do so gladly because, after two years of work with a very industrious and dedicated Committee, I am convinced of the need for adoption of the basic recommendations embodied therein.

EDWIN H. STERN.

STATEMENT OF HARVEY WEISSBARD

While I join wholeheartedly in what the Committee has proposed I must regretfully dissent from the Committee's failure to go further in the direction of much needed grand jury reform. Some of the comments which follow deal with items covered in the report while others involved changes which while discussed and proposed elsewhere, have not been touched upon here.

Commendably, The Committee has proposed that inadmissible evidence, such as hearsay, be banned from grand jury proceeding, "absent justification for its introduction". Unfortunately, however, the proposal goes on to state that the receipt of such evidence will not invalidate an indictment if there remains "sufficient competent evidence to support the indictment". The sole exception is that an indictment may not be based solely upon inadmissible evidence. In my view, the proposed rule does not provide a sufficient sanction. The suggested rule would still permit an indictment to stand where substantial amounts of prejudicial hearsay (or other inadmissible evidence is presented to the grand jury, whose lay members would not be in a position to discount the probative force of such evidence, as would a judge, for example. Indeed, such a grand jury might, particularly in a close case, be swayed by such evidence to return an indictment where none would otherwise have been found.

The Committee correctly notes the great harm that can result from an indictment, even when an acquittal follows, and finds that no legitimate purpose is served by having the grand jury hear evidence that they could not hear at trial. If that is so, then it is difficult to understand why the remedy at the indictment stage should not be as severe as it would be if the same improper evidence were received at trial. If improper evidence were admitted at trial and it was likely that such evidence influenced the jury, any guilty verdict would be set aside and a new trial ordered.

Similarly, if such evidence is presented to the grand jury a dismissal should result. Without such a sanction the best intentioned rule is of no value. Note, Exclusion of Incompetent Evidence From Federal Grand Jury Proceedings, 72 Yale L.J. 590, 597–598 (1963). Of course, it would not serve the ends of justice to require dismissal where a small bit of inadmissible evidence inadvertently came before the grand jury. The standard should be strict but not unbearable for the State. Compare the suggestion that any indictment based, in whole or in part, on unconstitutionally obtained evidence be subject to dismissal. Note,

[3] I was also concerned about permitting the defendant to "present evidence in his own behalf" at the probable cause hearing, but on balance, feel that the choice should be the defendant's provided that our rules give the State an adequate opportunity to prepare rebuttal, where necessary.

[4] I do not mean to imply any disagreement about the Court's rule-making power. (The Report itself recommends rule changes). Rather, I mean to express why no dissent is necessary in the absence of agreement with all details embodied in the Report and why debate on the details need not necessarily delay appropriate action on the fundamental recommendations.

Unconstitutionally Obtained Evidence Before the Grand Jury as a Basis for Dismissing the Indictment, 27 Md. L. Rev. 168, 181–182 (1967) If a prosecutor is faced with a difficult evidentiary problem he could easily seek direction from the court before submitting the questionable proof to the grand jury. I would suggest that an indictment be dismissed if there is a "reasonable possibility" that the improper evidence contributed to the return of the indictment. Thus, the standard would be the same as that approved by our highest Federal and State Courts for reviewing trial errors. State v. Macon, 57 N.J. 325 (1971). See also, Note, The Rules of Evidence as a Factor in Probable Cause in Grand Jury Proceedings and Preliminary Examination, 1963 Wash. U. L. Q. 102, 113 n. 54. While I have substantial doubts as to the manner in which such a "harmless error" standard has been applied in practice, it at least appears to be a fair test and it is one with which our courts are already familiar. Since the representation of a case to the grand jury is less expensive and less time-consuming than a new trial, there is substantial justification for a rule at least as stringent as that applied to trial errors.

It his proposed reform is to have the desired effect, it must be given some teeth. To leave the matter largely up to the good faith of the prosecutor appears to me to seriously undervalue the rights involved.

It should be specifically noted that the Committee has not dealt with the highly controversial area of immunity grants to grand jury witnesses and the related problem of contempt punishment for recalcitrant witnesses. Much has been written in this area of late and I do not intend here to make any specific proposals. It is an area, in my view, much in need of reform and presently the subject matter of legislation pending in the Congress with respect to federal grand juries. Fortunately, however, the abuses in this area have not arisen, from what I can see, in the context of grand jury investigations by our state prosecuting authorities. The main impetus to reform has been the abusive practices of federal prosecutors and, in our state, the State Commission of Investigation. Nonetheless, the possibility for abuse under current law is always present and we must be vigilant to see that such potential never becomes realized.

I think it should be also noted that the Committee considered, but took no action upon, the controversial proposal to permit witnesses to be accompanied by counsel in the grand jury room. This is a proposal which has been advocated by the ABA Criminal Law Section in testimony recently given to a Congressional Committee considering federal grand jury reform legislation. It is also a right accorded to grand jury witnesses in some states, notably Illinois, and it is one that has a great deal of merit.

On the whole, the report is far-reaching and highly commendable. It should become the basis of immediate legislative action.

CIVIL LIBERTIES COMMITTEE,
STATE BAR OF MICHIGAN,
May 4, 1977.

MR. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: We are writing to indicate our support for your long standing and continuing efforts to bring about reforms in the Federal Grand Jury system. Attorneys and citizens here in Detroit have witnessed and experienced (in some cases) abuses and unfairness resulting from the actions of Government attorneys and enforcement officers under the presently-existing law and practice.

The reforms advocated by you and embodied in your proposed bill are much needed and long overdue. Our only suggestion is that perhaps they do not go far enough. To be specific as to some additional reforms, it is imperative that "use" immunity be replaced with "transactional" immunity; however, any kind of immunity should be consensual, not forced. Good, experienced prosecutors acknowledge that forced immunity is only infrequently helpful to the Government anyway.

Further, it is very important that a witness have counsel in the Grand Jury room; however, counsel's role should not be limited to merely an advisory one.

Finally, Grand jurors themselves should be allowed to vote on such matters as subpoenas, applications for immunity and show cause hearings for contempt.

We realize that ultimately any reforms will be the result of legislative compromise, but we are hopeful that you will continue your strong efforts for comprehensive reform in this area.

If there is anything further our Committee can do to support your efforts, we would appreciate your advice.

If you would like to have a representative from our Committee testify before your Subcommittee, we would be more than glad to do so. In any case, we respectfully request your permission to file a memorandum of our views.

Finally, because much criticism has been generated in this area due to the method employed in obtaining indictments through the Grand Jury, we urge that hearings be held in Detroit. We believe that there is much material that the Committee could gather here which would assist in the final draft of a remedial bill.

Sincerely,

N. L. SMOKLER,
Chairperson, Civil Liberties Committee,
State Bar of Michigan.
JOHN W. TAPP,
Chairperson, Subcommittee on Grand Jury Reform.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 5, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: I read with interest an article appearing in the March, 1977 issue of Judicature, entitled "A proposal for grand jury reform."

I am involved in a criminal case growing out of an indictment issued in Scranton, Pennsylvania. The grand jury proceedings were not recorded to any extent, and the indictment was returned, based purely and exclusively on hearsay evidence. There was no showing why witnesses with knowledge could not have appeared. Indeed, they could have. The case was not so complicated so as to have to rely on hearsay, as in Costello v. U.S., 350 (1956).

By avoiding a transcription of the proceeding, the Assistant U.S. Attorney insured that my client would not have any witnesses' testimony for impeachment purposes at trial. In addition, we are unable to tell whether the Assistant U.S. Attorney acted properly before the grand jury; whether they knew that they were hearing exclusively hearsay, and whether they were hearing all of the evidence directly bearing on the proposed indictments.

I understand that H.R. 94 will require that all essential elements of grand jury proceedings be transcribed. This procedure is required in several circuits, and looked upon with favor. Had it been done in the case I am involved with, my client's constitutional position would be clearer.

Thank you for your attention.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT D. POWELL.

NATIONAL MINISTRIES,
AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES,
Valley Forge, Pa., May 5, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EILBERG: I am writing as Executive Secretary of National Ministries of the American Baptist Churches in the U.S.A. to express the concern of this organization to recently publicized abuses of the use of Federal Grand Juries. National Ministries is one of four principal agencies of the American Baptist Churches in the USA. A role of National Ministries is to speak for the American Baptist Churches on matters involving the misuse of governmental authority especially where such activity violates human rights.

We have recently received considerable information pertaining to the circumstances surrounding the imprisonment of two employees of the Episcopal Hispanic Commission for their refusal to testify before a Federal Grand Jury based on constitutional privileges which they asserted. We are also aware of the continuing interrogation of members of the Hispanic community as part of the same investigation. These and other incidents involving the use of Federal Grand Juries compels us to question the wisdom of permitting such wide prosecutorial discretion in the use of this investigative tool. We believe that Congress should review the complaints of abuses with respect to the use of Grand Juries and enact legislation which sets forth clearly the rights and responsibilities of all parties involved. We deplore any attempt by government to pervert the grand jury system into a political tool to suppress dissent.

We believe that any individual subpoenaed before any grand jury should be represented by counsel. We feel that prosecutors should be compelled to disclose to a subpoenaed witness the purpose and scope of their inquiry and especially whether or not the witness is the target of possible criminal charges. We believe that all constitutional rights and privileges should be respected by prosecutors during grand jury proceedings.

We oppose any practice by government which is reminicent of the ancient form of inquisition.

We urge you to support the strongest possible legislation to remedy abuses now complained of and to restore the grand jury system to its rightful place as a shield against overzealous, arbitrary governmental action.

Very truly yours,

ATHA J. BAUGH.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., May 3, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
U.S. Congress, House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The Congressional Record of April 19, 1977 at page H 3222 reports on H.R. 5804, and the deferral to your Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law that provision which would have made agents of administrative agencies "attorneys for the government" if assigned to assist Federal Grand Juries.

For your consideration, I enclose copies of two recent cases dealing with indictments based (1) on irregular conduct by an IRS agent working silently under instructions from the Department of Justice, and (2) on evidence obtained by criminal conduct arranged for and participated in by agents of the IRS, These cases indicate to me the need for some statutory control over the use of evidence illegally obtained by Federal Agents engaged in fraud, deceit, trickery or, indeed, the hostile, bad faith violation of state or federal law by Feredal agents. Such conduct should vitiate resultant indictments short of the costly, time consuming efforts in suppress evidence after ruinous indictments. The average citizen cannot afford such litigation nor a defense to charges contained in indictments so obtained by the United States.

The statute should preclude the United States from presenting to grand juries evidence or the fruits of evidence known to have been obtained through fraud, deceit, trickery or criminal conduct engaged in by officers, agents and employees of the United States. Whereas, the supervisory authority of the Courts may be invoked after the fact, the citizen has no protection against the use of such evidence by government prosecutors who, with full knowledge of the irregular or illegal means exercised by the Internal Revenue Service proceed to obtain indictments based on such evidence.

It is respectfully requested that your Subcommittee address this matter in your consideration of grand jury reform. To that end I enclose copies of the decisions in United States v. Twcel 550 F2d 297 (C.A. 5, 4/8/77) 77-1 USTC 9330 and United States v. Payner, Case No. CR 76-305, Northern District of Ohio, filed April 28, 1977.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD C. SOHWARTZ.

U.S. Court of Appeals, 5th Circuit, No. 76-2324, 4/8/77. Remanding unreported District Court decision.

[Code Secs. 7201 and 7206(1) and 18 U.S.C. § 371—result unchanged by 1976 Tax Reform Act]

Crimes: Tax evasion: False statements: Illegal search.—A conviction of conspiracy to obstruct the lawful functions of the IRS, tax evasion and making false statements was remanded for the trial court to determine what evidence at the trial was tainted due to the government's violation of the defendant's Fourth Amendment rights. An IRS agent had obtained permission to microfilm the defendant's records without revealing to the defendant's accountant that the audit was being conducted at the request of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Department of Justice. Before MORGAN and FAY, Circuit Judges, and HUNTER,* District Judge.

FAY, Circuit Judge: Appellant, Nicholas J. Tweel, was convicted of conspiring (with an unindicted co-conspirator, Charles Zemliak) to defraud the United States by obstructing the lawful functions of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS),[1] two counts of tax evasion for 1967 and 1969,[2] and two counts of making false statements in a tax return for those same years.[3] Two other co-defendants were named in one of the counts for tax evasion. Tweel was sentenced to four years on three counts and three years on each of the other two, all concurrent. He was also fined a total of $30,000.

The government's evidence showed to the jury's satisfaction that in the tax years, 1967 and 1969, Tweel "laundered" parts of his income to avoid paying taxes by passing sums on to persons who would owe little in taxes because they were in a lower tax bracket or had large losses which would offset the income.

The investigation leading up to appellant's indictment began on May 28, 1969. Don L. Miller, revenue agent for the Internal Revenue Service informed appellant and his wife by letter that he had been assigned to conduct an audit of their federal income tax returns for 1966 through 1968 and asked for an appointment. Appellant's accountant, Ben A. Bagby, telephoned the agent on June 10, 1969 to request a postponement of this audit because the IRS had just completed an audit of appellant's returns for 1958 through 1963. They did set an appointment for August 4, 1969.

During the earlier audit for 1958 through 1963, a special agent of the Intelligence Division of IRS became involved but eventually withdrew, with the audit remaining civil instead of criminal. To discover whether his client was again involved in a criminal inquiry, Bagby asked Miller whether a "special agent" was involved in the new investigation. Miller replied that no special agent was involved. This response led Bagby to believe that Miller was just conducting a civil audit. What Miller did not disclose was that this audit was not a routine audit to which any taxpayer may be subjected from time to time. This audit was conducted at the specific request of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Department of Justice.[4]

Bagby, who had his own records of appellant's tax affairs as well as some of Tweel's also allegedly obtained additional records from Tweel to voluntarily present to Miller for the new audit. Miller microfilmed all the records that were given to him.[5]

The theory on which the motion to suppress was based is that Miller's microfilming of appellant's records constituted an illegal search in violation of the Fourth Amendment because appellant's consent was obtained through deception. This Court agrees that appellant was grossly deceived and the motion should have been granted; as a matter of procedure we remand this case back to the district court for a hearing to determine what evidence admitted at the trial was tainted due to the government's violation of appellant's constitutional rights.

The district court findings were that the Justice Department requested the IRS to investigate the appellant, a revenue agent was assigned the task, and the accountant asked the agent whether or not a special agent was involved and received a negative response which was at that point a true statement. The trial judge subsequently stated:

"If it is deception not to advise at the outset that you were sent there or requested to be there by the Justice Department when asked the question whether there is a special agent involved, then the Court is wrong."

The burden for determining whether or not the government has resorted to a deception is on the moving party and this Court in each of the above cases set forth what that party must establish:

"We conclude that the mere failure of a revenue agent (be he regular or special) to warn the taxpayer that the investigation may result in criminal charges, absent any acts by the agent which materially misrepresent the nature of the inquiry, do not constitute fraud, deceit and trickery. Therefore, the record here must disclose some affirmative misrepresentation to establish the existence of fraud, and the showing must be clear and convincing. (Footnote omitted)

Prudden, supra, p. 1033.

The Prudden court also stated that:

"Silence can only be equated with fraud where there is legal or moral duty to speak or where an inquiry left unanswered would be intentionally misleading."

Supra, p. 1032.

From the facts we find that the agent's failure to apprise the appellant of the obvious criminal nature of this investigation was a sneaky deliberate deception by the agent under the above standard and a flagrant disregard for appellant's rights. The silent misrepresentation was both intentionally misleading and material. Any findings to the contrary under the facts of this case are clearly erroneous. United States v. Reynolds, 511 F.2d 603 (5th Cir. 1975); United States v. Gunn, 428 F.2d 1057 (5th Cir. 1970).[6]

Appellant showed Miller knew that the IRS was acting at the request of the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section of the Justice Department which is undeniably an instrument for criminal investigation. Miller obviously knew the accountant inquired whether a special agent was involved to determine whether he was conducting a criminal audit. Miller's response, although on the face of it true, misled appellant to such a degree that his consent to the "search" must be vitiated by the agent's silence concerning the origin of this investigation.

In this case, the agent testified he intended, if appellant had consented to an interview[7] to advise him of his rights. Because the IRS requires only special agents to warn taxpayers of their rights,[8] by assigning a revenue agent the IRS still succeeded in masking the undeniable criminal nature of this investigation and materially deceived this appellant.

We cannot condone this shocking conduct by the IRS. Our revenue system is based upon the good faith of the taxpayers and the taxpayers should be able to expect the same from the government in its enforcement and collection activities.[9]

[6] The court below appears to have based its decision on United States v. Cleveland Trust Co. [73-1 USTC ¶ 9280], 474 F. 2d 1234 (6th Cir. 1973), cert. denied sub nom. Micelli v. United States, 414 U.S. 866, 94 S. Ct. 48, 38 L. Ed. 2d 118 (1973). We do not agree with its applicability. Cleveland Trust was a suit for enforcement of a summons which was allegedly not issued in good faith. Deception was not the issue in that case.

[7] Tweel did not agree to be interviewed.

[8] Under International Revenue guidelines promulgated in IRS News Release No. 897, 7 CCH 1967 Stand. Fed. Tax Rep. ¶ 6832, and IRS News Release IR-949, 1968 CCH Fed. Tax Rep. ¶ 6946, a special agent must advise the taxpayer before an interview of the following:

As a special agent, one of my functions is to investigate the possibility of criminal violations of the Internal Revenue Laws, and related offenses. In connection with my investigation of your tax liability (or other matter) I would like to ask you some questions. However, first I advise you that under the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States I cannot compel you to answer any questions or to submit any information if such answers or information might tend to incriminate you in any way. I also advise you that anything which you say and any information which you submit may be used against you in any criminal proceeding which may be undertaken. I advise you further that you may, if you wish, seek the assistance of an attorney before responding. Do you understand—

[9] During oral argument counsel for the government stated that these procedures were "routine." If that is the case we hope our message is clear. This sort of deception will not be tolerated and if this is the "routine" it should be corrected immediately.

Since the consent given by appellant was obtained by deception, the microfilming of the documents constituted an unreasonable search in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Gouled v. United States, 255 U.S. 298, 41 S. Ct. 261, 65 L. Ed. 647 (1921). The evidence obtained here in violation of appellant's Fourth Amendment rights, as well as any evidence derived therefrom, should have been suppressed. Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 171, 89 S. Ct. 961, 22 L. Ed. 2d 176 (1969). The burden of proving any evidence was untainted is on the government. Nardone v. United States, 308, U.S. 338, 341, 60 S. Ct. 266, 84 L. Ed. 307 (1939). Therefore, we remand for a hearing to make that determination. If any of the evidence was tainted, it must be suppressed and appellant afforded a new trial. The other issue raised on appeal is without merit.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF

JACK PAYNER, DEFENDANT

ORDER

Pursuant to the Opinion filed in this case today, which Opinion is fully incorporated in this Order, the Court grants Defendant Payner's motion to suppress, and orders suppressed all evidence introduced in the trial by the Government with the exception of Jack Payner's 1972 tax return, Exhibit 1, and the testimony relating to that document. This exclusion order suppresses the testimony of all the Government's witnesses as it relates to information discovered as a result of the guarantee, notably the testimony of Robert Mintz, Mary Rhodenizer, Samuel Pierson, Carl Brownell, Jr., William Losner, and Susie Vrabel.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

JOHN M. MANOS,
U.S. District Judge.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO, EASTERN DIVISION

(Case No. CR76-305, Judge John M. Manos)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF,

v.

JACK PAYNER, DEFENDANT.

MEMORANDUM OF OPINION

Motion to suppress

On September 14, 1976 the defendant Jack Payner was indicted for knowingly and willfully making a false statement in a matter within the jurisdiction of an agency of the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001. Specifically, the Government charged Payner with falsely stating on his 1972 Federal Income Tax Return that he did not have a foreign bank account when in fact he had an account of over $100,000 in the Castle Bank of the Bahamas.[1]

On January 6, 1977, the defendant filed a motion to suppress all evidence obtained by the Government from allegedly illegal searches conducted by government agents during January of 1973. In response the Government argued that the evidence it intended to introduce against Payner was neither the direct product, nor the fruit of the allegedly unconstitutional searches, but was evidence obtained from sources independent of the searches in issue. Also, the Government argued that even if the evidence against Payner was obtained from information arising out of the January, 1973 searches, the evidence should not be suppressed because Jack Payner has no standing to raise the issue of the constitutionality of the searches. On March 14, 1977, by agreement of the parties, the Court proceeded to try the defendant on the merits of the indictment together with the motion to suppress.[2] This opinion deals only with the issues raised by the motion to suppress.

[1] The question which Payner allegedly answered falsely read as follows: "Did you, at any time during the taxable year, have any interest in or signature or other authority over a bank, securities or other financial account in a foreign country (except in a U.S. military banking facility operated by a U.S. financial institution)?" See, Exhibit 1.

I.

Findings of Fact

A. The Seizures of January 1973

In 1965 the Internal Revenue Service initiated Operation Trade Winds for the purpose of gathering information about the financial activities of American citizens in the Bahamas.[3] Special Agent Richard Jaffe of the Jacksonville, Florida Office of the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) supervised the investigation.[4] IRS agents gathered information pertinent to Operation Trade Winds by making numerous trips to the Bahamas and by the use of over 30 informants.[5]

In June, 1972 the IRS suspected that Castle Bank and Trust Company of the Bahamas functioned as an illegal tax haven for American taxpayers.[6] The IRS' suspicion was based on information about an alleged California narcotics dealer, Allan Palmer, who deposited a check in his bank account originally drawn on the Castle Bank of the Bahamas. Further investigation revealed that the Castle Bank had an account with the Bank of Perrine in Florida, and that Palmer had $25,000 in a Castle Bank account which he opened through the assistance of the Bank of Perrine.[7] In August, 1972 representatives of the IRS districts in San Francisco, Chicago, Miami, and Pittsburgh met in Jacksonville, Florida to discuss the involvement of the Castle Bank with respect to narcotic trafficking investigations pending in each district.[8]

In late October, 1972, Special Agent Jaffe met with one of his informants, Norman Casper, and asked him to obtain the names and addresses of the individuals holding accounts with the Castle Bank.[9] In the first week of November of 1972 Casper decided to secure the requested information[10] and in late November of 1972, as part of the scheme to get the names of the Castle Bank depositors, Casper introduced Sybol Kennedy to Michael Wolstencroft.[11] Wolstencroft was then an acquaintance of Casper's[12] and Vice-President and Trust Officer of Castle Bank. Sybol Kennedy was a private detective employed by Casper.[13] At the time Casper introduced Wolstencroft to Sybol Kennedy, Casper knew that Wolstencroft frequently traveled to the United States carrying a briefcase containing documents concerning the operation of the Castle Bank.[14] In early January, 1973 Casper learned that Wolstencroft planned a business trip to the United States on January 15, 1973, and would have records of the Castle Bank in his possession during the trip.[15]

The Court consolidated the trial on the merits with consideration of the motion to suppress because it was necessary to know whether the Government's evidence was obtained from a source or sources independent of the search. Contrast Jaffe's rendition of the events on the Thursday prior to the taking of the briefcase, at TRM 155, 172. The Court disbelieves Jaffe's assertion that Casper told him on January 11, 1973 that he received a key from the owner of the apartment from which he expected to obtain the information. See also, footnote 40, infra.

In the week preceding January 15, 1973 Casper and Special Agent Jaffe discussed a covert plan to intercept copies of the documents that Wolstencroft planned to bring into the United States. On Tuesday, January 9, 1973 Casper told Jaffe that he could get the documents from Wolstencroft but that he needed Jaffe to supply photographic services,[16] and on Thursday, January 11, 1973 Casper outlined to Jaffe his plan to get the documents from Wolstencroft.[17] Casper specifically told Jaffe that he planned to enter an apartment from which he expected to remove Wolstencroft's briefcase.[18] Jaffe told Casper that he would have to clear such an operation with his superior, Troy Register, Jr., Chief of the IRS Intelligence Division in Jacksonville.[19] After obtaining authorization from Register, Jaffe told Casper to proceed with the operation. On Friday, January 12 Casper phoned Jaffe and asked if the IRS could refer him to a locksmith who could be "trusted," [20] which Jaffe did.[21]

On January 15, 1973 Wolstencroft arrived in the United States and went to Sybol Kennedy's apartment. What occurred at her apartment, if anything, was not brought out at trial.[22] However, at 7:30 p.m. Sybol Kennedy and Wolstencroft left Kennedy's apartment to go to a restaurant on Key Biscayne, whereupon Casper entered the apartment with a key given him by Kennedy, and removed Wolstencroft's briefcase without permission.[23] Casper took the briefcase to a locksmith who had been recommended by the IRS, and who had previously refused to enter the apartment with him. Casper met the locksmith in a parking lot five blocks from Kennedy's apartment and instructed him to make a key for the briefcase,[24] Casper then took the briefcase to an IRS agent's private residence, selected by Jaffe as the rendezvous point, and opened it in Jaffe's presence. Over 400 documents were taken out of the briefcase and photographed.[25]

Jaffe, Casper, and an IRS photography expert used two cameras to photograph the documents, a "normal" camera and a microfilm camera.[26] The microfilm camera was used because it was faster [27] than a normal camera, and Agent Jaffe knew that the briefcase had to be returned to Sybol Kennedy's apartment before she and Wolstencroft got back from dinner.[28] To get the briefcase back timely Casper had Kennedy and Wolstencroft watched during their dinner. When Kennedy and Wolstencroft completed their dinner,[29] Casper's lookout [30] phoned him at the residence which the IRS used to photograph the documents. After all documents were copied, Casper closed the briefcase, accidently broke off the [22] Although testimony from Sybol Kennedy would have been very helpful to the Court in resolving the factual issue of the propriety or impropriety of the Government's conduct, with respect to Wolstencroft, counsel for the Government never called her as a witness, and the record fails to indicate that she was unavailable. It appears to the Court that it is peculiarly within the power of the Government to produce her, since she worked for its agent and she is totally unknown to the defendant. Therefore, the Court infers from her unexplained failure to testify that her testimony would be unfavorable to the Government by further delineating the improprieties of what Casper himself characterized as the "briefcase caper." key in the lock,[31] and returned the documents to Kennedy's apartment at approximately 9:00 p.m.

Within the next two weeks Jaffe again met with Casper and told him that additional information concerning Castle Bank's customers was needed.[32] Casper obtained the requested additional information by sending Sybol Kennedy to the Bahamas to visit Wolstencroft. While there she stole a rolodex file from his office as Casper directed her to do.[33] The stolen rolodex file was then turned over to Jaffe, who expressed no concern over the methods used to obtain it.[34]

Casper was paid $8,000 in cash by the IRS for obtaining the information relating to Castle Bank.[35] Sybol Kennedy was paid approximately $1,000 by Casper from funds he received from the IRS for her part in obtaining the briefcase and the olodex.[36]

This Court finds that the United States, through its agents, Richard Jaffe, and others, knowingly and willfully participated in the unlawful seizure of Michael Wolstencroft's briefcase,[37] and encouraged its informant, Norman Casper, to arrange the theft of a rolodex from the offices of Castle Bank.[38] The Court does not accept the Government's argument that Casper was an independent contractor who acted alone, without the knowledge and concurrence of Jaffe.[39] Jaffe knew that Casper had hired Kennedy to date Wolstencroft, knew that Wolstencroft's briefcase would be taken without permission, furnished the name of a locksmith who could be "trusted," knew that the locksmith was hired to break into the briefcase, and knew that he and another IRS agent had to copy the documents in a hurry in order to get the briefcase back to the apartment before Wolstencroft's return.

That the proposed activity was unusual and that Jaffe knew it was unusual was demonstrated by his clearing the scheme with his superior.[40] The Court con-

Defense counsel then asked, "* * * all you wanted was the information, and you did not care how it was obtained?" To which Jaffe responded, "Well, I certainly didn't expect him to murder anybody for it." TRM 161. [37] It is important to note that the seizure was conducted in order to obtain information about depositors in Castle Bank; it was not to gain information about Wolstencroft. Jaffe was asked, "So you had no interest in taking action against Mr. Wolstencroft." He answered, "Yes, sir." TRM 165.

cludes that the United States was an active participant in the admittedly criminal conduct in which Casper engaged in order to procure the Castle Bank's documents in January of 1973.

B. THE PAYNER INVESTIGATION

In late 1971 and countinuing through the early part of 1972 the Internal Revenue Service investigated the financial dealings of an alleged narcotics trafficer, Allen Palmer.[41] Through their investigation of Palmer they discovered a connection between the Bank of Perrine, located in Perrine, Florida, and the Castle Bank and Trust Co.[42]

On January 15, 1973 documents indicating that Jack Payner held a bank account with Castle Bank and Trust Co. were taken from Michael Wolstencroft's briefcase and duplicated by the Government.[43] These same documents also indicated that the Perrine Bank was linked to the Castle Bank.[44] Within the next two weeks a rolodex was taken from the offices of the Castle Bank. The rolodex contained the name and address of Jack Payner.[45] On February 22, 1973 the Internal Revenue Service sent a letter to Jack Payner advising him that his 1968, 1969, 1970 and 1971 tax returns were being investigated.[46] On April 9, 1974 the investigation of Payner's 1968–1971 income tax returns was completed and his tax returns for those years were accepted as filed.[47] During April and May of 1974 subpoenas were issued to the Bank of Perrine requiring the production of all documents concerning Perrine's dealings with Castle Bank.[48] One of these subpoenas[49] uncovered a guarantee agreement, Exhibit 4, which pledged money in a Castle Bank account in the name of Jack Payner as security for a $100,000 loan by Castle Bank to Conel Development Inc. This guarantee was forwarded to the Cleveland Office of the IRS[50] and generated an IRS investigation of Jack Payner's 1972 tax return.[51] That investigation, commenced on October 10, 1974, led to the return of this indictment against the defendant.

The initial issue presented is whether the Government met its burden of proof to show that Exhibit 4 was not the fruit of the January 15, 1973 seizure. The Court finds that the Government did not meet its burden to show that Exhibit 4 was the product of an investigation independent of the information taken from Wolstencroft's briefcase.

Special Agent Richard Jaffe was asked the following question, "Mr. Jaffe, do you know if the subpoena to the Bank of Perrine in 1974 was issued because of what was found in the briefcase." He answered, "I don't believe so." [52] This Court, viewing Richard Jaffe's testimony as a whole, including his demeanor while presenting his testimony, finds that Jaffe's testimony on this point was unconvincing. Jaffe admitted telling a committee of the United States Congress, under oath, "It [the briefcase] provided the leads as to where to serve the Grand Jury subpoenas." [53] Jaffe also admitted having said, "The information obtained from the informant was extremely valuable and was unavailable from any other source." [54] Further, the chronology of the events that led to the subpoena casts doubt upon Jaffe's assertion of the independent source of the subpoena. If the Allen Palmer investigation was the reason for the Perrine Bank subpoena, which produced Exhibit 4, why wasn't that subpoena issued in 1972? This Court finds that it was not coincidence that the Perrine Bank was served with subpoenas shortly after the information in the briefcase had been examined and discussed throughout the IRS districts in the United States.[55]

The Court finds that the briefcase seized on January 15, 1973 provided the leads which resulted in the issuance of subpoenas to the Bank of Perrine in April and May, 1974. Further the Court finds that Exhibit 4 is a product of the seizure of January 15, 1973, and that the subsequent investigation and indictment of Jack Payner stemmed from the January 15, 1973 seizure.

II.

Conclusions of Law

The sole question of law presented is whether relevant evidence, accumulated as a result of the information found in Wolstencroft's briefcase, must be excluded from consideration of the Government's case against Jack Payner.[56] The defense argues that the seizure of the briefcase was illegal and unconstitutional, and that any evidence which is the product of that seizure must be excluded. The United States argues that Payner has no standing under the Fourth Amendment to assert the alleged unconstitutionality of the seizure of the briefcase; that the seizure is not so heinous as to require exclusion of the evidence under the Due Process clause of the Fifth Amendment; and that the Court should not use its supervisory power over federal prosecutions as a basis for excluding the evidence.

The exclusionary rule

American jurisprudence recognizes numerous examples in which relevant, and otherwise admissible evidence is excluded from consideration in criminal prosecutions because of the procedure the Government used to obtain it.

[55] TRM 164–170. See also footnote 69 infra. This court specifically finds that the investigation of Allen Palmer produced information concerning a connection between the Castle Bank and the Bank of Perrine. The Palmer investigation, along with Casper's comment to Jaffe in June of 1972 that he (Casper) had once seen what might be a list of the Castle Bank clients, sharply intensified the I.R.S. interest in the Castle Bank. TRM 137–145. However, the Court finds that this information was insufficient to issue a subpoena to the Perrine Bank in 1972, and, for that obvious reason, the I.R.S. issued no such subpoena at that time. See F. The interest generated by this information caused the August, 1972 meeting of representatives from four regional IRS districts, at which further intelligence gathering plans were made. TRM 144, 62–63, 80–81. However, the IRS still had insufficient data with which to obtain a subpoena from the Perrine Bank at the time of the August, 1972 meeting and therefore in late October, 1972, Jaffe asked Casper to obtain the names and addresses of individuals holding accounts with the Castle Bank. TRM 81. After October, 1972, Casper and Jaffe concocted the briefcase scheme which ultimately furnished the information used to issue the April or May, 1974 subpoena on the Perrine Bank.

[56] This Court shall not deal with the seizure of the rolodex. There is no evidence that the information contained on the rolodex has been used by the Government in any way in the presentation of its case against Jack Payner. As was made clear in the Court's Findings of Fact, it was the briefcase material that led to the subpoenas on the Bank of Perrine and thereby the discovery of Exhibit 4, the guarantee. It is the exclusion of the guarantee as the fruit of the unlawful seizure which is the gravamen of the defendant's motion to suppress. The rolodex was not shown to pay any part in uncovering the guarantee, since there was no evidence that the rolodex contained information showing a connection between the Castle Bank and the Bank of Perrine. See TRM 31.

The reasoning in support of the "exclusionary rule" is twofold. The first is the necessity to deter law enforcement officers from using illegal and unconstitutional procedures to obtain evidence of a crime. See, e.g., Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 217 (1960); United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 347–348 (1974); United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 537–538, 95 S.Ct. 2313, 2317 (1975); United States v. Janis, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3021, 3034 (1976).

Thus, the Supreme Court wrote: "The rule is calculated to prevent, not repair. Its purpose is to deter—to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the only effective available way—by removing the incentive to disregard it." Elkins, supra, 364 U.S., at 217.

The Second reason for invoking the "exclusionary rule" is to maintain the integrity of the judicial process. See, e.g., Elkins v. United States, supra, 364 U.S., at 222; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 659 (1961); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 599, 95 S.Ct. 2254, 2259 (1975). As the Supreme Court stated in Mapp: "The criminal goes free, if he must, but it is the law that sets him free. Nothing can destroy a government more quickly than its failure to observe its own laws, or worse, its disregard of the character of its own existence." Mapp, supra, 367 U.S., at 659.

Although the exclusion of wrongfully gathered evidence preserves important social interests, judicial suppression of relevant and reliable evidence is never ordered lightly[57] because society has important and substantial interests which require the admission of all relevant and reliable evidence in a criminal prosecution. See, e.g., Bivens v. Six Unknown Federal Narcotics Agents, 403 U.S. 388, 411 (1971) (Burger, C. J., dissenting); United States v Janis, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3021, 3029 (1976); Brewer v. Williams, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 S.Ct. 1232, 1250 (Supreme Court, March 23, 1977) (Burger, C. J., dissenting). The most notable social interest which favors admission of evidence is the concept that the trier of fact performs a truth-seeking function for both society[58] and the accused. The truth seeker can perform its essential social function of issuing accurate adjudications of factual guilt or innocence only if the law insures the presentation of the fullest range of relevant evidence to the trier of the facts.[59] See, Brewer v. Williams, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 S.Ct. 1232, 1251 (Supreme Court, March 23, 1977) (Burger, C. J., dissenting).

The decision whether or not to use the heavy hand of the exclusionary rule is determined by weighing the social interest in ascertaining accurately a particular defendant's factual guilt against the inconsistent competing social interest of deterring government officials from getting evidence in a manner that violates the Constitution. In United States v. Janis, supra, at ——, 96 S.Ct., at 3032, the Supreme Court stated that the exclusionary rule is to be invoked when the evidence shows "a sufficient likelihood of deterring the [unlawful] conduct of the state [federal] police so that it [the social benefit of exclusion] outweighs societial costs imposed by exclusion." See also, Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 450–451 (1974); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 610–611, 95 S.Ct. 2254, 2264–2265 (1975) (Concurring Opinion of J. Powell); United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 348 (1975); United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 537–538 (1975); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3074, 3081–3087 (1976); United States v. Perez, —— F. Supp. ——, ——, fn. 33 (N.D. Ohio, 1977). Recently the Sixth Circuit stated: "The Supreme Court, however, has not proscribed the use of illegally seized evidence against all persons or in all proceedings. Rather, it has determined that there must in effect be a balancing of the benefits to defendants other than the victim of the search or seizure by containing police activities within the letter of the law against the encroachment upon [57] The result of the use of the exclusionary doctrine is often as Justice Cardozo puts it that "[t]he criminal is to go free because the Constable has blundered." People v. DeFore, 242 N.Y., at 21.

[58] It must be remembered that society has a considerable interest in the effective prosecution of criminals. See, Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433, 451 (1974). As the Supreme Court stated in Nardone v. United States:

"Any claim for the exclusion of evidence logically relevant in criminal prosecutions is heavily handicapped. It must be justified by an over-riding public policy expressed in the Constitution or the law of the land. In a problem such as that before us now, two opposing concerns must be harmonized: on the one hand, the stern enforcement of the criminal law; on the other, protection of the realm of privacy left free by Constitution and laws but capable of infringement either through zeal or design." Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338, 340 (1939).

[59] Chief Justice Burger states, "In evaluating the exclusionary rule, it is important to bear in mind exactly what the rule accomplishes. Its function is simple—the exclusion of truth from the fact finding process." Stone v. Powell, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3037, 3053 (1976) (C. J. Burger, concurring).

the public interest in having defendants acquitted or convicted on the basis of all the evidence which exposes the truth, in deciding whether the exclusionary rule has application, and, a fortiori, whether standing to invoke the rule exists." United States v. Hunter, —— F. 2d —— (6th Cir., March 4, 1977, No. 76–1631) Slip Op., pp. 14–15.

The Supreme Court points to three separate situations in which the balance of competing interests may justify the exclusion of reliable, probative evidence.[80]

First, the High Court firmly established the constitutional principle that evidence obtained by the Government in violation of the Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches and seizures shall be excluded from consideration against the person whose privacy interest has been invaded. See, e.g., Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 655 (1961); Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 171–172 (1969). Second, the Supreme Court also established the constitutional principle that the Government violates the Due Process rights of an individual who is the target of a search procedure which is so outrageous that it shocks a court's conscience. Evidence obtained by such outrageous Due Process violations must be excluded. See, Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 169–174 (1952); Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 385–386 (1964); Leo v. Twoney, 404 U.S. 477, 485–486 (1972). Third, federal courts sustain supervisory power to exclude evidence which the Government obtained in a manner so inconsistent with American standards of justice that to allow admission of the evidence calls into question the integrity of the entire federal judicial system. See, McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 340–344 (1943); Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 216–223 (1960); United States v. Valencia, 541 F.2d 618, 621–622 (6th Cir., 1976).

This Court must analyze the facts of Payner's case and determine the admissibility, against him, of the materials derived from the briefcase by applying the balance of interest test appropriate to each of the three different legal theories under which evidence may be excluded.

The fourth amendment

In order for a court to suppress material under the Fourth Amendment, the evidence in question must be: (1) the product of an unconstitutional search or seizure, see, e.g., Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914); (2) obtained in a search conducted by the Government, see, e.g., Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921); and (3) seized from a party who has standing to assert the unlawfulness of the search and seizure, i.e., the movant must be the person whose privacy interests were violated, see e.g., Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165 (1969). In this case the Government admits that the search and seizure of Wolstencroft's briefcase violated his Fourth Amendment rights, and this Court expressly finds that the search was conducted at the Government's behest and with its concurrence. However, Jack Payner possessed no privacy interest in the Castle Bank documents that were seized from Wolstencroft. See, e.g., California Bankers Association v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 49 (1974); United Statacs v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 440–441, 96 S. Ct. 1619, 1622–1623 (1976); Couch v. United States, 409 U.S. 322, 335–336 (1973). Therefore Payner has no standing under the Fourth Amendment to raise the illegality of the seizure of Wolstencroft's briefcase. As the Supreme Court stated: "The established principle is that suppression of the product of a Fourth Amendment violation can be successfully urged only by those whose rights were violated by the search itself, not by those who are aggrieved solely by the introduction of damaging evidence." Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 171–172 (1969).

See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 261 (1960); Brown v. United States, 411 U.S. 223, 229–230 (1973); United States v. Hunter, et al., —— F. 2d ——, ——, Case No. 76–1631, p. 11 (6th Cir., March 4, 1977).[81]

[80] There are a number of other areas in which courts have excluded evidence. For example, see Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 95 S.Ct. 2254 (1975) [Fifth Amendment right to remain silent]; Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967) [Sixth Amendment].

[81] It has been argued that the Supreme Court in Jones v. United States, supra and Alderman v. United States, supra did not intend to preclude an accused who was the target of an illegal search but who, as here, was not the person who was actually searched, from having standing to raise the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule. See, United States v. Lisk, 522 F. 2d 228, 231 (7th Cir., 1975) (Swygert, concurring); United States v. Alewito, 532 F. 2d 1165, 1167 (7th Cir., 1976); United States v. Roger S. Boskes, —— F. Supp. ——, Case No. 76CR585 (N.D. Ill., March 23, 1977). This Court is convinced from its reading of Jones, Alderman, and Mancusi v. DeForte, 392 U.S. 364, 367–372 (1968), as well as the more recent Supreme Court decisions of United States v. Miller, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 1619, 1622–1624 (1976), and California Bankers Association v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 41 (1974), that only a party whose expectation of privacy has been violated may raise the unconstitutionality of a search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment.

The standing requirement of the Fourth Amendment demonstrates the Supreme Court's use of the Janis, supra, balancing test. The Court has decided that the police must be deterred from violating the central interest that the Fourth Amendment protects, an individuals expectation of privacy, when asserted personally. United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 8–9 (1973). However, when an expectation of privacy is asserted vicariously, the Court has found the deterrent interest served by exclusion less substantial and has struck a balance in favor of society's truth-seeking interest by allowing admittedly unconstitutionally gathered material into evidence. As the Supreme Court stated in Alderman: "The deterrent values of preventing the incrimination of those whose rights the police have violated have been considered sufficient to justify the suppression of probative evidence even though the case against the defendant is weakened or destroyed. We adhere to that judgment. But we are not convinced that the additional benefits of extending the exclusionary rule to other defendants would justify further encroachment upon the public interest in prosecuting those accused of crime and having them acquitted or convicted on the basis of all the evidence which exposes the truth." Alderman, supra, 394 U.S., at 174–175. See also, Brewer v. Williams, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 S. Ct. 1232, 1251, fn. 4 (1977) (Burger C. J., dissenting).

The fifth amendment

The Supreme Court has long recognized the principle that all criminal prosecutions must meet the bare minimum requirements of Due Process of Law. What this entails is best explained by reference to the words of Justice Frankfurter in Rochin v. California:

"Regard for the requirements of Due Process Clause 'inescapably imposes upon this Court an exercise of judgment upon the whole course of the proceedings [resulting in a conviction] in order to ascertain whether they offend those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English speaking peoples even toward those charged with the most heinous offenses.' These standards of justice are not authoritatively formulated anywhere as though they were specifics. Due process of law is a summarized constitutional guarantee of respect for those personal immunities which, as Mr. Justice Cardozo twice wrote for the Court, are 'so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental' or are 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty'.

"Restraints on our jurisdiction are self-imposed only in the sense that there is from our decisions no immediate appeal short of impeachment or constitutional amendment. But that does not make due process of law a matter of judicial caprice. The faculties of the Due Process Clause may be indefinite and vague but the mode of their ascertainment is not self-willed. In each case 'due process of law' requires an evaluation based on a disinterested inquiry pursued in the spirit of science, on a balanced order of facts, exactly and fairly stated, on the detached consideration of conflicting claims, on a judgment not ad hoc and episodic but duly mindful of reconciling the needs both of continuity and of change in a progressive society" Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165, 169 and 172 (1952) [citations omitted].

In Rochin the defendant was charged and convicted of possession of morphine by the State of California. The key evidence against the defendant were two capsules of morphine, which the police had extracted from the defendant by force and against his will by using a "stomach pump." In overturning the conviction as violating Due Process, the court stated: "* * * We are compelled to conclude that the proceedings by which this conviction was obtained do more than offend some fastidious squeamishness or private sentimentalism about combatting crime too energetically. This is conduct that shocks the conscience. Illegally breaking into the privacy of the petitioner, the struggle to open his mouth and remove what was there, the forcible extraction of his stomach's contents—this course of proceedings by agents of government to obtain evidence is bound to offend even hardened sensibilities." Rochin v. California, supra, 342 U.S., at 172.

In a number of other cases the Supreme Court has likewise excluded relevant evidence because the procedures used to obtain it violated Due Process. In Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 386 (1964), the Supreme Court approved the exclusion of involuntary confessions stating: "because of 'the deep-rooted feeling that the police must obey the law while enforcing the law; that in the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves.'" Id. at 386

[citations omitted]. See also, Lego v. Twoney, 404 U.S. 477, 485 (1972); Brown v. Mississippi, 279 U.S. 278, 286 (1936).[62]

On the other hand, a number of Supreme Court and other lower court opinions recognized the possibility of excluding evidence under the Due Process Clause, but have rejected exclusion because of the particular facts presented in the case. These cases illustrate factual patterns which the Court found insufficiently egregious to warrant exclusion under Due Process.

In Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966) the Supreme Court rejected the argument of the defendant that the evidence procured through the use of a paid informant should be excluded under the Due Process Clause. In that case an informant was paid by the Government to visit the defendant and report what Hoffa said and did. In rejecting the exclusion of the informant's testimony the court stated: "This is not to say that a secret government informer is the slightest degree more free from all relevant constitutional restrictions than is any other government agent. It is to say that the use of secret information is not per se unconstitutional." Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. at 311 [citations omitted].

The Supreme Court stated in United States v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423 (1973): "While we may some day be presented with a situation in which the conduct of law enforcement agents is so outrageous that due process principles would absolutely bar the government from invoking judicial processes to obtain a conviction, the instant case is distinctly not of that breed. The law enforcement conduct here stops far short of violating that 'fundamental fairness' shocking to the universal sense of justice,' mandated by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment." United States v. Russell, supra, 411 U.S., at 431–432.

In Russell a government agent supplied a chemical to the defendant which was used to manufacture an illicit drug. The Supreme Court found the Government had done nothing illegal and had not infringed Due Process.

Two recent circuit court decisions reviewed the arguments for excluding evidence based on Due Process violations. See, United States v. Spivey, 508 F.2d 146 (10th Cir., 1975), cert. denied, 95 S. Ct. 1682 (1975); United States v. DeSapio, 435 F.2d 272 (2nd Cir., 1970). In both cases the court looked at whether the Government itself actively participated in illegal conduct and, finding that it had not concluded that the Due Process was not violated. As the court in Spivey stated,[63]

"There is no evidence that the government in any way directed or controlled Redman's [the informant's] activities. On the contrary, there is evidence that on earlier occasions Redman had been cautioned not to break the law.

"Our review of this testimony confirms our conclusion, that the government's conduct here does not offend the 'sense of justice' referred to in Rochin v. California, supra, and Brown v. Mississippi, supra." United States v. Spivey, supra, 508 F.2d, at 151.

See also, United States v. DeSapio, supra, 435 F. 2d at 282; Bradford v. Johnson, 354 F.Supp. 1331, 1334–1337 (E.D. Michigan, S. D., 1972).

Synthesizing and distilling the case law discussed above, this Court concludes that Due Process requires exclusion of reliable evidence only in those cases in which government officials obtain the challenged materials in a grossly improper fashion, i.e., by engaging in illegal conduct which exhibits their knowing and purposeful bad faith hostility to any person's fundamental constitutional rights.[64] Therefore, under the Janis balance of interests test, society's interest in deterring Due Process violations outweighs society's interest in allowing the fact

[62] The approval of the exclusion of coerced confessions in Jackson was not solely because of their unreliability but was also because the manner of obtaining the confessions violated principles of Due Process. See, Jackson v .Denno, supra, 378 U.S., at 385–386; Lego v. Twoney, supra, 404 U.S., at 485, fn. 13.

[63] There is one more case that bears reviewing. In Irvine v. California, 347 U.S. 128 (1954) the Supreme Court refused to extend the Rochin concept of a Due Process exclusionary rule to a fact situation in which evidence was introduced that the police had entered the defendant's home without permission on a number of occasions and planted microphones. The Supreme Court in Irvine was split, four Justices joining in an opinion rejecting the use of Rochin, one Justice, Justice Clark, concurring in the judgment only because he felt bound by the court's decision in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25 (1949), and four Justices dissenting on the basis that the evidence must be excluded because it violated Due Process. See, Irvine v. California, supra, 347 U.S., at 142–149. Since Wolf has been overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 654, 644 (1961), the vitality of Irvine is questionable.

[64] Neither a technical violation of the law, nor police conduct which is entered into in good faith, but which in fact proves to be illegal would be basis for the exclusion of evidence on Due Process grounds. See, Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 607–612, 95 S.Ct. 2254, 2265 (1975) (J. Powell, concurring); Brewer v. Williams, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 St.Ct. 1232, 1250–1251 (1977) (C. J. Burger, dissenting).

finder to view all relevant evidence only when an official's conduct demonstrates a bad faith hostility to the strictures imposed on him by the Constitution.[65]

The Court finds that the illegal conduct[66] of the government officials involved in this case compels the conclusion that they knowingly and purposefully ob-

[65] There is no standing problem in this case in regard to the Fifth Amendment Due Process question. In the Fourth Amendment area, exclusion deters violations of the core Fourth Amendment interest, an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. The Fourth Amendment expectation of privacy of a defendant such as Jack Payner was not violated by the IRS breaking and entering into Wolstencroft's briefcase and Kennedy's theft of Wolstencroft's rolodex file. In the normal case, where officers acting in good faith, technically violate an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy, third persons, such as Payner, are not accorded standing to exclude the fruits of the illegally obtained evidence because such third persons are not asserting an intrusion into their own expectation of privacy and the police conduct is not outrageous. In such a situation the Janis balance of interests test favors admissibility because no party's constitutional interest is vindicated by exclusion, and the character of the police behavior, i.e., unconscious, unintentional violation of the Fourth Amendment, cannot be deterred by exclusion. However, under the Due Process concept, the Janis balancing test shifts markedly in favor of extending standing to third parties, such as Payner, to raise the exclusionary rule because an element of the Due Process violation is outrageous official conduct which violates the constitutional rights of an individual, situated like Wolstencroft, in a fashion which is knowing, purposeful, and with a bad faith hostility toward the right violated. Such intentional bad faith conduct is as susceptible of deterrence as any crime committed purposefully by an ordinary civilian. Compare, the balancing approaches discussed in Stone v. Powell, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3037, 3049–3052 (1976); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3074, 3081–3087 (1976); United States v. Janis, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3021, 3031–3035 (1976); United States v. Calandra, 474 U.S. 338, 348 (1974); United States v. Peltier, 422 U.S. 531, 537–538 (1975). Furthermore, in a case such as this, where the Court finds that the person who is the object of the outrageous governmental conduct, was never himself the ultimate target of the governmental investigation, then the Court must furnish those persons who the ultimate targets with standing to raise the exclusionary rule in order to insure that some party is available to litigate the question of the Government's outrageously unconstitutional activity. Without such an expanded Due Process exclusionary rule standing theory, the Government could repeatedly commit outrageous constitutional violations with impunity against citizens, in order to obtain convictions of other citizens, so long as the government agents accept the speculative possibility of defending civil damage actions initiated by the few primary victims hardly and knowlegeable enough to file such an action. Thus, if the Court did not extend the Due Process exclusionary rule to persons situated in Payner's position, purposeful, bad faith constitutional violations by the Government might well be capable of repetition, and evade review. See, Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 261 (1960); Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 396–398 (1971); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 485 (1927) (Mr. Justice Brandeis, dissenting); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973); Southern Pacific Terminal Company v. I.C.C., 219 U.S. 498, 515 (1911); United States v. W. T. Grant Company, 345 U.S. 629, 632–633 (1953); Compare and contrast, McNea v. Garey, et al., —— F. Supp. ——, ——, fn. 7, Case No. C76–920, Slip Op., p. 7, fn. 7 (N.D. Ohio, September 30, 1976); United States v. Perez, —— F. Supp. ——, ——, fn. 32 (N.D. Ohio, 1977).

[66] The facts surrounding the NRS appropriation of the bank records from Wolstencroft's briefcase appear to satisfy a prima facie case of criminal larceny under Florida law. Section 812.011 of the Florida Statutes defines "property" as "anything of value, including, but not limited to—real estate, tangible and intangible personal property, * * *." Section 812.021(a) of the Florida Statutes states, "A person who, with intent unlawfully to * * * deprive the true owner of his property * * * or to appropriate the same to the use of the taker or of any other person: * * * takes from the possession of the true owner, or of any person . . . or appropriates to his own use, or that of any other than the true owner, any property "is guilty of either a misdemeanor or a felony. Significantly, the Florida courts hold that, "In order to convict a person under § 811.021, Fla. Stat., F.S.A., it is not necessary that the elements of common law larceny be proven * * *. It is enough to prove that the defendant secrets, withholds, or appropriates to his own use, or that of any other person, other than the true owner, * * * the property in question." Thomas v. State, 216 So. 2d 780, 781 (Fla. App., 1968); see also, F.S.A. § 812.021(5). Certainly the list of a foreign bank's customers, which list is secret under the law of a foreign state, constitutes intangible personal property which has value. In fact Casper was paid $8,000 for that list. TRM 116. The record also clearly shows that Casper took the Castle Bank's secret customer list, an item of intangible personal property from Wolstencroft and appropriated it to his "own use or that of any other than the true owner" by selling it to the Internal Revenue Service. See, fn. 20, supra.

Jaffe's active participation in Casper's crime, as evidenced by his arranging for a place in which to photograph the Wolstencroft documents, and his appropriation of the Wolstencroft materials for his own use as well as the use of the IRS, probably renders him guilty of a Section 812.021(a) violation as a principal in the first degree under F.S.A. § 777.011 which pertinently provides: "Whoever commits any criminal offense against the state, whether felony or misdemeanor, or aids, abets, counsels, hires, or otherwise procures such offense to be committed, and such offense is committed, * * * is a principal in the first degree and may be charged, convicted and punished as such, whether he is or is not actually or constructively present at the commission of such offense."

The type of conduct which the government agents exhibited in connection with the "briefcase caper" was so outrageously improper that it probably satisfies the elements of F.S.A. § 812.081 criminalizing the unauthorized appropriation of trade secrets such as secret "lists of customers," by copying such lists without permission of the owner. See, § 812.081(1)(c),(3). Section 812.081 carries a different penalty than a larceny violation under Section 812.021(a). See, Sections 812.081(2), 775.082(4)(a), 775.083(1)(d) and contrast those provisions with the punishment proscribed under Section 812.021(2), (3), 775.082(3)(d), 775.083(1)(c). tained the briefcase materials with bad faith hostility toward the strictures imposed on their activities by the Constitution.

The activities of the Government agents Jaffe and Casper[67] were outrageous. They plotted, schemed and ultimately acted in contravention of the United States Constitution and laws of Florida, knowing that their conduct was illegal.[68] It is inoperative to signal all likeminded individuals that purposeful criminal acts on behalf of the Government will not be tolerated in this country and that such acts shall never be allowed to bear fruit. As Mr. Justice Brandeis stated in Olmstead v. United States: "Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperiled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means—to declare that the government may commit crime in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal—would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this court should resolutely set its face." Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 485 (1927).

The need to deter gross illegal activity on the part of the Government, such as occurred in this case, is clear. However, the utility of the exclusionary rule in actually deterring illegal activity is often in question. See, e.g., United States v. Janis, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3021, 3027–3030 (1976); Stone v. Powell, —— U.S. ——, ——, 96 S.Ct. 3037, 3052, 3053 (1976) (C.J. Burger concurring); Brewer v. Williams, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 S.Ct. 1232, 1250–1251 (1977) (C.J. Burger, dissenting).

The Court finds, from the testimony adduced at trial, that exclusion of the illegally obtained evidence in this case will have a deterrent effect. It is evident that the Government and its agents, including Richard Jaffe, were, and are, well aware that under the standing requirement of the Fouth Amendment, evidence obtained from a party pursuant to an unconstitutional search is admissible against third parties whose own privacy expectations are not subjected to the search, even though the cause for the unconstitutional search was to obtain evidence incriminating those third parties.[69]

The criminal activity by the government's agents is this case is particularly distressing because the briefcase information which they seized by means which were violative of Florida's criminal law, could probably have been obtained both constitutionally and without violating Florida criminal law, if the officers simply obtained a search warrant. From the record as currently constituted in this proceeding it certainly appears that the information which the IRS possessed regarding Allan Palmer's alleged use of the Castle Bank to hide illegal income from the IRS combined with the information from Casper, clearly a reliable informant, that Wolstencroft would enter the United States with Castle Bank depositors' records, might well have furnished the Government with probable cause to suspect that the records in Wolstencroft's possession constituted evidence of criminal tax evasion by some American depositors of the Castle Bank. See, United States v. Manufacturers National Bank of Detroit, 536 F. 2d 699, 702–703 (6th Cir., 1976). Thus it appears likely that government officers chose to do illegally that which they could have achieved through lawful, constitutionally recognized, processes. See TRM 168.

[67] As the Supreme Court has stated: "The Government cannot make such use of an informer and then claim dissociation through ignorance." Sherman v. United States, 356 U.S. 369, 375 (1958).

[68] Casper admitted on the witness stand that he knew he was "committing an illegal act, and [he] wanted somebody who could be trusted to keep his mouth shut about it * * *." TRM 112–113.

[69] At trial the following colloquy took place between Mr. Jaffee and an attorney for the defendant:

"Question. And didn't Mr. Hyatt [a Justice Department attorney] in a memorandum to you of April, 1974, indicate that no one had standing to object legally in court to the use of the briefcase matter except Mr. Wolstencroft?

"Question. In fact, wasn't there some discussion, either by written memorandum or otherwise, indicating that they were not concerned with Mr. Wolstencroft because they were only after the other people that were named in the briefcase?

[70] In the context of civil tax litigation this Court has recognized the need to permit the Internal Revenue Service wide latitude in order to thwart taxpayers from engaging in disengenuous practices that shelter income from taxation. See, M.S.D. Incorporated, et al. v. United States of America, —— F. Supp. ——, ——, Case No. C74-498, Slip Op., pp. 10–15 (N.D. Ohio, March 25, 1977). However the balance of interests shifts markedly when the Internal Revenue Service seeks judicial authorization to purposefully intrude upon the fundamental interests secured by the Constitution. In G.M. Leasing Corporation v. United States, —— U.S. ——, ——, 97 S.Ct. 619, 629–631 (1977), the Government asserted that its taxing interest in conducting warrantless probable cause entries into buildings to seize property subject to tax assessments outweighed the constitutional protections secured by the Fourth Amendment. The High Court expressly rejected the Government's assertion of a constitutionally recognized tax interest which outweighed the "core" Fourth Amendment interest in premises privacy. See, Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505, 509–512, fn. 4 (1961). The G.M. Leasing court at ——, 97 S.Ct., at 629–630, wrote:
"Rather, the intrusion is claimed to be justified on the ground that petitioner's assets were seizable to satisfy tax assessments. This involves nothing more than the normal enforcement of the tax laws, and we find no justification for treating petitioner differently in these circumstances simply because it is a corporation.
"The respondents [the Government] argue that there is a broad exception to the Fourth Amendment that allows warrantless intrusions into privacy in the furtherance of enforcement of the tax laws. We recognize that the 'Power to lay and collect Taxes' is a specifically enunciated power of the Federal Government, Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 1, and that the First Congress, which proposed the adoption of the Bill of Rights, also provided that certain taxes could be 'levied by distress and sale of goods of the person or persons refusing or neglecting to pay.' Act of March 3, 1791, c. 15, § 23, 1 Stat. 204. This, however, relates to warrantless seizures rather than to warrantless searches. It is one thing to seize without a warrant property resting in an open area or seizable by levy without an intrusion into privacy, and it is quite another thing to effect a warrantless seizure of property, even that owned by a corporation, situated on private premises to which access is not otherwise available for the seizing officer.
"Indeed, one of the primary evils intended to be eliminated by the Fourth Amendment was the massive intrusion on privacy undertaken in the collection of taxes pursuant to general warrants and writs of assistance. As Madison argued, urging the adoption of a Bill of Rights to restrain the Federal Government: 'The General Government has a right to pass all laws which shall be necessary to collect its revenue; the means for enforcing the collection are within the direction of the Legislature: may not general warrants be considered necessary for this purpose, as well as for some purposes which it was supposed at the framing of their constitutions the State Governments had in view? If there was reason for restraining the State Governments for exercising this power, there is like reason for restraining the Federal Government.' 1 Annals of Congress 438 (1834 ed.).
"The respondents urge that the history of the common law in England and the laws in several States prior to the adoption of the Bill of Rights support the view that the Fourth Amendment was not intended to cover intrusions into privacy in the enforcement of the tax laws. We do not find in the cited materials anything approaching the clear evidence that would be required to create so great an exception to the Fourth Amendment's protections against warrantless intrusions into privacy."
The G.M. Leasing court are also noted at ——, 97 S.Ct., at 631, "* * * [W]e are unwilling to hold that the mere interest in the collection of taxes is sufficient to justify a statute declaring per se exempt from the warrant requirement every intrusion into privacy made in furtherance of any tax seizure."
The proposition upon which the Government acted in this case, i.e., that it could intentionally commit a flagrant Fourth Amendment violation against Wolstencroft in order to obtain convictions of third persons like Payner, is the type of purposeful evisceration of the fundamental privacy interests secured by the Constitution which, the G.M. Leasing court concluded, is not sufficiently justified by the Government's need to enforce the tax laws.

Fourth Amendment standing limitation permits them to purposefully conduct an unconstitutional search and seizure of one individual in order to obtain evidence against third parties, who are the real targets of the governmental intrusion, and that the IRS agents in this case acted, and will act in the future, according to that counsel.

Such governmental conduct compels the conclusion that Jaffe and Casper transacted the "briefcase caper" [71] with a purposeful, bad faith hostility toward the Fourth Amendment rights of Wolstencroft in order to obtain evidence against persons like Payner. That outrageous behavior on the part of the Government infringes Payner's Due Process rights, and can only be deterred by granting Payner's motion to suppress.

For this reason, the Court holds that the evidence against Payner, which is the fruit of the outrageously illegal seizure directed at Wolstencroft's briefcase, must be suppressed under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

Supervisory power [72]

Above and beyond the constitutional requirement of Due Process, the federal judiciary has the duty of supervising the administration of criminal justice in federal courts. This duty requires the federal judiciary to take actions and make decisions which will further the ends of justice. In this regard the Supreme Court wrote:

"It is true, as the petitioners assert, that a conviction in the federal courts, the foundation of which is evidence obtained in disregard of liberties deemed fundamental by the Constitution, cannot stand. * * * Judicial supervision of the administration of criminal justice in the federal courts implies the duty of establishing and maintaining civilized standards of procedure and evidence. Such standards are not satisfied merely by observance of those minimal historic safeguards for securing trial by reason which are summarized as 'due process of law' and below which we reach what is really trial by force." McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332, 339–340 (1943).

See also, Upshaw v. United States, 335 U.S. 410, 412–414 (1948); Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, 452–453 (1957); Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 216 (1960); Nardone v. United States, 302 U.S. 379 (1937); Benanti v. United States, 355 U.S. 96, 99–103 (1957); Mesarosh v. United States, 352 U.S. 1, 9–14 (1956); Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427, 440 (1963); Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23, 31–32 (1963); Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Con. Bd., 351 U.S. 115, 124 (1956); United States v. Valencia, 541 F.2d 618, 621–622 (6th Cir., 1976); Williamson v. United States, 311 F.2d 441, 444 (5th Cir., 1962).[73]

The Court concludes from a review of the cases cited above, that the federal courts' supervisory power over federal prosecutions should be invoked to exclude [74] evidence obtained by Governmental conduct which is either purposefully

[71] Casper himself refers to the Wolstencroft incident on January 15, 1973, as the "briefcase caper." TRM 117 (emphasis added).

[72] The Court is well aware of the long established doctrine that constitutional questions will be avoided when an alternate means can be employed to the same effect. Burton v. United States, 196 U.S. 283, 295 (1904) ["It is not the habit of the court to decide questions of a constitutional nature unless absolutely necessary to a decision of the case."] See, e.g., Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288, 347 (1936). In this case the court holds that exclusion is required under Due Process and supervisory powers. The court deals with Due Process because the Government might well argue that supervisory power to exclude is limited to these instances specified under the federal criminal rules. Therefore, the court sets forth the Due Process basis for exclusion.

[73] In Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Con. Bd., the Supreme Court stated:

"The untainted administration of justice is certainly one of the most cherished aspects of our institutions. Its observance is one of our prudent boasts. This court is charged with supervisory functions in relation to proceedings in federal courts. Therefore, fastidious regard for the honor of the administration of justice requires the Court to make certain that the doing of justice be made so manifest that only irrational or perverse claims of its disregard can be asserted." Communist Party, supra, 351 U.S., at 124. See also, Mesarosh, supra, 352 U.S., at 14.

[74] As discussed in regard to the Due Process exclusionary rule, exclusion on the basis of supervisory power is only done as a last resort. "The function of a criminal trial is to seek out and determine the truth or falsity of the charges brought against the defendant. Proper fulfillment of this function requires that, constitutional limitations aside, all relevant, competent evident evidence be admissible, unless the manner in which it has been obtained—for example, by violating some statute or rule of procedure—compels the formulation of a rule excluding its introduction in a federal court." Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427, 440.

illegal[75] or motivated by an intentional bad faith hostility to a constitutional right.[76] Put in terms of the Janis balancing test, only when the Government's [75] See, e.g., Nardone v. United States, supra, 302 U.S. 379 (1939); Benanti v. United States, supra, 355 U.S. 99–103; Williamson v. United States, supra, 311 F. 2d, at 444 ["* * * It becomes the duty of the courts in federal criminal cases to require fair and lawful conduct from federal agents in the furnishing of evidence of crimes."]; Rea v. United States, 350 U.S., 350 U.S. 214, 216–218 (1956); Wise v. Henkel, 220 U.S. 556, 558 (1911).

Exclusion under the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause and federal courts' supervisory power is particularly important where federal officers are counseled to gather evidence in a fashion which violates the criminal law of a state and they purposefully violate such criminal laws in reliance on the erroneous counsel that their conduct is authorized by federal power. If such officers can demonstrate a subjective belief that their "conduct was necessary and proper under the circumstances," then they are immune from state prosecution, regardless of how flagrantly their actions violate a state's criminal law. See, Clifton v. Cox, 549 F. 2d 722, 728 (9th Cir., 1977), a case in which, under the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution, a federal officer who shot and killed an unarmed fleeing suspect in the back during a raid on an illegal drug factory was granted a post indictment, pretrial, writ of habeas corpus blocking his prosecution in state court for second degree murder and involuntary manslaughter. Compare, ExParte Neagle, 135 U.S. 1, 75 (1890). In the case of In Re Lewis, 83 F. 159 (D. Wash., 1897) the court, applying the Neagle doctrine, granted a writ of habeas corpus blocking a state robbery prosecution of special employees of the United States Trasury Department and a United States Deputy Marshal who wrongfully seized private papers while executing a search warrant. The Lewis court observed at 160,

"In deciding this case, I do not mean to say that the warrant which Mr. Kiefer issued was a lawful warrant, nor that the proceedings under it were proper proceedings. I do not mean to say that the petitioners were lawfully discharging their official duties in what they did. In my opinion, the warrant itself was improvidently and erroneously issued, and the proceedings were all ill-advised, and conducted with bad judgment. But where an officer, from excess of zeal or misinformation, or lack of good judgment in the performance of what he conceives to be his duties as an officer, in fact transcends his authority, and invades the rights of individuals, he is answerable to the government or power under whose apopintment he is acting, and may also lay himself liable to answer to a private individual who is injured or oppressed by his action; yet where there is no criminal intent on his part he does not become liable to answer to the criminal process of a different government. With our complex system of government, state and national, we would be in an intolerable condition if the state could put in force its criminal laws to discipline United States officers for the manner in which they discharge their duties."

Evidently, the Supremacy Clause furnishes federal officers a broad, although perhaps not absolute, see, United States ex rel. Drury v. Lewis, 200 U.S. 1, 8 (1906), protection against state criminal prosecution when they violate state criminal laws while performing their federal duties. The existence of such official immunity for federal officers means that the deterrent effect of state criminal punishment for criminal conduct in their collection of evidence approaches zero. Absent the deterrent effect of state criminal prosecution, the only practical deterrent to federal officers adopting means of federal law enforcement which are criminal under state law, is often the deterrence generated by federal court suppression of the fruits of federal officials' criminal investigative techniques. The Fifth Amendment Due Process and Supervisory Power concepts, in conjunction with the speculative possibility of civil damage judgments, are certainly appropriate instruments for administering an adequate dose of deterrence, while at the same time preserving an adequate level of criminal immunity for federal officials.

Of course 18 U.S.C. § 2236(b) poses none of the deterrence effected by state criminal law against purposefully improper conduct by federal officials when they act on "reasonable grounds" to suspect the person searched committed a felony. Likewise 18 U.S.C. § 241 furnishes no deterrence to purposefully unconstitutional conduct by federal officers when the person who suffers an intrusion into his reasonable expectation of privacy is not a "citizen" (perhaps Wolstencroft is not a citizen) or the federal officers do not "go in disguise on the highway or on the premises of the person who's rights are violated."

Therefore, the deterrence rationale for exclusion under either the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause or Federal Supervisory Power is uniquely compelling when a federal court is presented with evidence which federal officers clearly obtained through their active, affirmative participation in conduct which is criminal under state law, regardless of the Fourth Amendment standing considerations. As the Court discussed above, this is precisely such a case. See, fns. 65 and 66, supra.

[76] Elkins v. United States, supra, 369 U.S., at 216–217; United States v. Valencia, supra, 541 F. 2d, at 621–622. The need to deter government agents' purposeful hostility to individuals' constitutional rights is analogous to the policy rationale for excluding evidence seized in "pretext" searches. See, South Dakota v. Opperman, —— U.S. ——, —— 96 S.Ct. 3092, 3103 (1976) (Mr. Justice Powell, concurring); Amador-Gonzales v. United States, 391 F. 2d 308, 313–315 (5th Cir., 1968); Taglavore v. United States, 291 F. 2d 262, 265–267 (9th Cir., 1961); McKnight v. United States, 183 F. 2d 977, 978 (D.C. Cir., 1950); Blazak v. Ryman, 339 F. Supp. 40, 42–43 (D. Ariz., 1971); United States v. Garriaer, 541 F. 545, 553 (6th Cir., 1976); United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218, 246–248 (1973) (Mr. Justice Marshall, dissenting); United States v. Lefkowitz, 285 U.S. 452, 467 (1932); Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217, 226, 230 (1960); United States v. Perez, —— F. Supp. ——, ——, fn. 40, Case No. CR76-346, Slip Op., p. 21, fn. 40 (N.D. Ohio, April 21, 1977); City of Cleveland v. Tedor, Case No. 34622, Slip Op., pp. 3–5 (Cuyahoga County Ohio Court of Appeals, March 4, 1976).

procedure in obtaining evidence is purposefully illegal or the procedure is a knowing and purposeful act, performed with a bad faith hostility to an individual's constitutional right,[77] does society's interest in deterring such conduct by exclusion outweigh society's interest in furnishing the trier of fact with all relevant evidence.

The Court finds the Government's action in this case was both purposefully illegal[78] and an intentional, bad faith act of hostility directed at Wolstencroft's reasonable expectation of privacy.[79] The Court therefore finds that the evidence obtained by the Government as a result of the seizure of Wolstencroft's briefcase must be excluded under this Court's supervisory function.

Evidence excluded

The remaining aspect of the case requires this Court to determine what evidence introduced by the Government against Jack Payner must be excluded. The question was phrased by the Supreme Court as follows: "Whether, granting establishment of the primary illegality, the evidence to which instant objection is made has been come at by exploitation of that illegality or instead by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint." Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 180–181 (1969), citing Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 478, 488 (1963).

The Government has the burden to show that its evidence is untainted by the illegal search. See, Alderman v. United States, 394 U.S. 165, 183. It may do this in two ways: by proving that the evidence was obtained independent of the search, see, e.g., Silverthorne Lumber v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920); Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338, 341 (1939); Alderman v. United States, supra, 394 U.S., at 183 (1969); or by demonstrating that the information which led to the discovery of the evidence is so far removed from the illegally seized evidence that the connection became "so attenuated as to dissipate the taint." Nardone v. United States, supra, 308 U.S., at 341; see also, Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471, 487 (1963); Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590, 598, 85 S.Ct. 2254, 2259 (1975).

The Government argues that the guarantee, Exhibit 4, was the product of an independent investigation and that all information derived from the guarantee is free of taint.[80] However, this Court has concluded, see, page 8 of this opinion, that the discovery of the guarantee was directly related to the information obtained from Wolstencroft's briefcase. The Court holds that the guarantee and the evidence its discovery subsequently produced were "come at by the exploitation" of the Government's illegal action in searching and seizing Wolstencroft's briefcase.[81]

The Court therefore excludes[82] all evidence introduced in the case by the Government with the exception of Jack Payner's 1972 tax return, Exhibit 1, and the related testimony.[83]

It is so ordered.

JOHN M. MANOS,
United States District Judge.

[77] The standing problems associated with the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, see, fn. 65, supra, are not present in regard to exclusion under supervisory power. See, United States v. Valencia, supra, 541 F. 2d at 621–622. Exclusion under supervisory power maintains the integrity of the federal system and deters illegal and unconstitutional police activity. These interests are the directing issue in this case. This is not a case where exclusion is invoked solely to vindicate a technically invalid intrustion into Wolstencroft's expectation of privacy. The decision of whether to exclude or not is made by reference to the Janis balance of interests test, which test takes into account the standing question.

[78] See, fn. 66, supra.

[79] The Court made a finding that the government agents knew they were committing an unconstitutional search.

[80] See, Government Memorandum of March 15, 1977.

[81] The Court notes that the Government did not argue that the guarantee, or the information discovered after the guarantee was found, was "so attenuated as to dissipate the taint." Nevertheless, the Court holds that the taint is not attenuated. See, Wong Sun v. United States, supra, 371 U.S., at 487–488.

[82] As Justice Holmes stated: "The essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the Court but that it shall not be used at all. Of course this does not mean that the facts thus obtained become sacred and inaccessible. If knowledge of them is gained from an independent source they may be proved like any others, but the knowledge gained by the Government's own wrong cannot be used by it in the way proposed." Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, supra, 251 U.S., at 392. See also, Wong Sun v. United States, supra, 371 U.S., at 416 (quoted with approval).

[83] The exclusion includes the testimony of all the Government's witnesses as it relates to information discovered as a result of the guarantee, notably the testimony of Robert Mintz, Mary Rhodenizer, Samuel Pierson, Carl Brownell, Jr., William Losner, and Susie Vrabel.

RICHARD C. SCHWARTZ,
San Francisco, Calif., May 26, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
U.S. Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Thank you for your letter of May 16, 1977, in response of mine of May 3 regarding the use of evidence illegally taken by the Internal Revenue Service and used to obtain indictments.

To further acquaint the membership of your Subcommittee and Committee Counsel with the facts, I have forwarded copies of the Payner decision to the other members and Counsel, together with a copy of the Internal Revenue Manual Supplement which provides for the use of the illegally obtained evidence to conduct further investigations under the sponsorship of a Federal Grand Jury. For your information, I enclose a copy of the IRS Manual Supplement and a copy of my letter to Committee Counsel Garner J. Cline.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD C. SCHWARTZ.

RICHARD C. SCHWARTZ.,
San Francisco, Calif., May 26, 1977.

GARNER J. CLINE, Esquire,
Counsel, Committee on the Judiciary,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CLINE: The recent and widespread coverage by the press, radio and television given to the stand taken by former President Nixon that the Executive, right or wrong, cannot commit an illegal act, has produced an outcry of indignation against conduct which, if permitted, can destroy the Constitution. The Honorable Leon Jaworski, in his interview with David Hartman this morning, echoed the editorial shock waves against such attempted justification of the illegal burglaries sanctioned by Mr. Nixon and his co-conspirators.

Judge John M. Manos of the Northern District of Ohio, as recently as April 28, 1977, joined a long line of great American jurists who have decried unconstitutional, gross illegal activity on the part of officers and agents of the United States. The case before Judge Manos involved illegal acts carried out by an informant, pre-paid by the Internal Revenue Service, under the guidance of a Special Agent of that Service and with the prior approval of a Chief, Intelligence Division. I enclose a copy of Judge Manos' decision which supplements the disclosures made in the course of the hearings before the Rosenthal Committee of the House of Representatives.

At page 21 of the enclosed slip copy of Judge Manos' decision, I find a conclusion which may well join the expressions cited from opinions by Justices Cardoza, Brandeis and others. Judge Manos wrote: "The activities of the Government agents Jaffee and Casper were outrageous. They plotted, schemed and ultimately acted in controvention of the United States Constitution and laws of Florida, knowing that their conduct was illegal. It is imperative to signal all like-minded individuals that purposeful criminal acts on behalf of the Government will not be tolerated in this country and that such acts shall never be allowed to bear fruit."

On the following page Judge Manos quotes a colloquy from the trial which disclosed the April 10, 1974 attitude of the Justice Department that such conduct should not deter the Internal Revenue Service because those having standing to object were not the targets and that the targeted United States citizens would have no legal standing to object.

I served in the Internal Revenue Service from 1946 until my retirement in June of 1973. I was not privy to any of the Operations of the Service involved in this matter, either while Deputy Chief Counsel from 1966 to 1968, or as Regional Counsel, Western Region from 1968 to 1973. I have, since late 1974, represented clients who have been subjected to the Haven Grand Jury process as a result of the use of that Grand Jury to further the work initiated by the IRS break-in on January 15, 1973. In all such matters, my clients have been denied any conferences at the Internal Revenue Service level and have been deprived of any notice other than that they were targets of the grand jury investigation, i.e., investigation by the Internal Revenue Service agents assigned to assist the grand jury, armed with grand jury subpoenas for use in completing thier fact finding.

This is the so-called Open End Grand Jury process whereby the Revenue Service and the Department of Justice circumvent use of the powers given to the Commissioner by the Congress, including the use of summons with a right lodged in the taxpayer to notice and to intervene in enforcement proceedings, and the right to request conferences and be heard before the Service transfers jurisdiction to the Department of Justice and to grand juries. Also enclosed is a copy of the IRS procedure being used to accomplish these results.

I previously furnished the Honorable Joshua Eilberg with a copy of Judge Manos' opinion. His kind reply advised me that hearings were scheduled for June 1, 1977. I am sending the enclosed copy with the hope it will be helpful in giving you a complete picture of a specific situation involving the very agents who commit the burglaries and the attorneys for the government who acquiesce in their illegal conduct, and provide the power and authority of the United States and grand juries to sanction and return indictments which are the fruits of the criminal acts.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD C. SCHWARTZ.

MANUAL SUPPLEMENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

October 28, 1976

GUIDELINES FOR PROJECT HAVEN INVESTIGATIONS AND EXAMINATIONS

Section 1. Purpose

This Supplement provides general procedures relating to Project Haven investigations and examinations.

Section 2. Background

.01 This Supplement incorporates the instructions contained in memorandums sent on April 9, 1976, to all Regional Commissioners and the Director of International Operations from the Deputy Commissioner relating to the processing of all current and future information items containing Project Haven grand jury information.

.02 Project Haven originated from information developed which indicated that certain foreign financial institutions in the Caribbean area were being used by U.S. taxpayers for tax evasion and tax avoiding purposes. Based on an analysis of the information obtained, a number of civil and criminal cases were initiated. On November 19, 1975, the Internal Revenue Service referred all potential criminal features of Project Haven to the Department of Justice for grand jury investigation and, such further action as deemed necessary, including the securing of indictments where appropriate.

.03 The term "Project Haven" refers to a nationwide investigation of improper use of foreign banks and other entities, primarily in the Caribbean, by persons and entities subject to United States taxation. The Project has two distinct aspects: investigation of criminal violations of U.S. laws; and civil tax cases. The criminal aspects of Project Haven are currently being investigated by a grand jury in the Southern Judicial District of Florida (Miami). The Service is supporting and assisting this grand jury in its investigation. Project Haven civil cases are those which were initiated and designated as such prior to November 19, 1975 or cases so designated as Project Haven cases by the National Office. Project Haven civil cases are to be processed in accordance with normal Service procedures.

.04 On January 13, 1976, the Federal District Court, Southern Judicial District of Florida, issued an order which specifically indicates that the use of information obtained by a prior Miami grand jury and by the current grand jury empaneled in Miami relating to Project Haven may be used solely for the purpose of the said grand jury investigation.

.05 The Court also vacated a Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure Rule 6(e) Order which had been previously obtained relative to information obtained by the prior Miami grand jury. Therefore, all information items that were disseminated prior to January 13, 1976, which contained Project Haven grand jury information may be used only for criminal enforcement purposes. Each Regional Commissioner and the Director of International Operations received a list of such information items in their April 9, 1976 memorandum.

Section 3. Responsibilities

.01 National office.—Responsibility is placed on the Directors, Intelligence Division and Audit Division to designate indivduals to serve as Project Haven Coordinators. The coordinators will be responsible for coordinating and monitoring Project Haven activities for their respective divisions.

.02 Regional office.—the ARC's (Intelligence) and (Audit) will be responsible for designating individuals to serve as Project Haven coordinators who will be responsible for:

1. coordinating activities related to Project Haven with appropriate National Office, regional, district and service center personnel;
2. orienting appropriate regional, district and service center personnel;
3. ensuring that districts are promptly receiving Project Haven information and that they are taking appropriate action with regard to investigations or examinations of taxpayers;
4. monitoring and reporting on the progress of Project Haven investigations or examinations, identifying problem areas and advising appropriate field and National officials of feasible solutions; and
5. ensuring that issues in Project Haven civil cases, which are not included in the Coordinated Tax Shelter Program, are treated in a uniform and consistent manner.

.03 District office.—The District Director through the Chiefs, Intelligence and Audit will be responsible for:

1. ensuring that the Project Haven cases are closely coordinated between Audit and Intelligence Divisions;
2. maintaining control over Project Haven information items and cases to ensure expeditious treatment;
3. providing the regional office coordinators with information and findings developed which affect other districts and regions;
4. providing the region with information on the progress of Project Haven investigations and examinations; and
5. ensuring adequate security over Project Haven grand jury documents and material which may not be used for civil purposes unless a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order has been obtained.

Section 4. Procedures for the Preparation, Processing and Evaluation of Project Haven Information Items

01. Project Haven information items are limited to those generated as a result of information received in connection with on-going Project Haven cases.

02. The initiators of all future Project Haven information items containing grand jury information will indicate the presence of such information by the insertion of the following in Item 16, Form 3949, Intelligence Information Item: "IN THE ABSENCE OF A FED. R. CRIM. P. RULE 6(e) ORDER, INFORMATION INDICATED ON THIS DOCUMENT SHALL BE USED SOLELY FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE SAID GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION, THE INFORMATION WAS OBTAINED BY GRAND JURY NO. ——, SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF FLORIDA."

03. All Project Haven information items will be evaluated by the Chief, Intelligence Division in the district where the taxpayer resides or place of business is located. Therefore, if an information item is on a taxpayer who resides or whose place of business is located within the district which initiated the item, the Chief, Intelligence should forward to the Chief, Intelligence Staff servicing his/her district, a copy of the Form 3949 and indicate that it is a Project Haven information item. The Chief, Intelligence Staff will forward appropriate returns (copies), research, and/or transcripts on the subject of the Form 3949 to the Chief, Intelligence Division to assist him/her in evaluating such items. The Chief, Intelligence Staff will show on his/her copy of the Form 3949 the district disposition in Item 20 and batch it for inclusion on the ADP Alpha Index and then file it in numerical order.

.04 If the subject of the Form 3949 does not reside or does not conduct a business in the district originating the Form 3949, the Chief in the originating district should forward direct to the Chief, Intelligence, in the district where the taxpayer resides or place of business is located, the original Form 3949, as well as any background material. The Chief in the originating district will also forward a copy of the Form 3949 to the Chief, Intelligence Staff, serving the district where the subject resides or the business is located and indicate that it is a Project Haven information item. The Chief, Intelligence Staff, will follow the procedures in Section 4.03. Should the receiving Chief determine that the information item has been misdirected, he/she will take the following actions.

1. Transmit the Form 3949 to the appropriate Chief, Intelligence Division,
2. By memorandum inform the Director, Intelligence Division, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator of the disposition of the information item.
3. Inform the Chief, Intelligence Staff:

a. if only one service center is involved, by memorandum; and

b. if two service centers are involved: (1) by memorandum to the losing service center; and (2) by memorandum with a copy of the Form 3949 for processing to the receiving service center.

.05 The Chief, Intelligence Division, in the originating district will also forward a copy of the top half of Form 3949 to the Director, Intelligence Division, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator.

.06 The evaluating Chief will have thirty calendar days from the receipt of the information from the Chief, Intelligence Staff, to evaluate the item, except as stated in Section 5.01.

.07 All information items that are initiated by the Project Haven investigating team in Miami will also contain a statement in Item 16 on Form 3949 that their Project Haven index (see Section 12) has been checked and information relating to the subject is attached.

.08 For those information items which were not originated by the investigating team in Miami, the evaluating district should request a search of the Project Haven index. Such information should be requested on a Form 2275, Records Request, Charge and Recharge, and attached to a collateral request, see Section 12.04.

.09 To aid in the evaluation, the Chief, Intelligence Division, may authorize information gathering in accordance with MS 93G–152, CR 1(15)G–91, 41G–105, 42G–328, 45G–231, 51G–118, 5(12)G–25, 61G–3, 71G–9, and 94G–57, dated June 23, 1975.

.10 If the Chief Intelligence Division, after his/her evaluation, elects to reject a Project Haven item, the Chief should forward the item to the Chief, Intelligence Staff, and attach his/her comments on Form 1725. The Chief, Intelligence Division, will sign off as the evaluator of such information items. The Chief, Intelligence Division, will also send a copy of the completed Form 3949 to the Director, Intelligence Division, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator.

.11 If the Form 3949 contains Project Haven grand jury information and the Chief, Intelligence, feels that the item has civil potential, he/she should place the Form 3949 in suspense and a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order should be requested (see Sections 13 and 14). Extreme caution must be exercised to prevent the information from either being used for civil purposes or otherwise "tainting" any ongoing audit examination or collection matter until the Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order has been obtained. The Chief, Intelligence will notify the Chief, Intelligence Staff whenever a Form 3949 is placed in suspense and will specify that a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order has been requested and the Form 3949 will be returned to the service center as soon as the outcome of the Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order request is known.

.12 When a case file is put in suspense, the Chief, Intelligence will also advise the Director, Intelligence, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator, by memorandum. The memorandum should include the earliest civil statute expiration date, comprehensive details as to the civil potential of the information and an estimate of the potential tax recovery involved.

.13 If a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is not obtained, Intelligence will close such information items and follow the procedures in Section 4.10.

.14 If the Form 3949 does not contain grand jury derived information and the Chief, Intelligence feels that the item has civil potential, he/she should discuss the Form 3949 with the district Chief, Audit or Chief, Collection. The Chief, Intelligence, as well as whomever he/she discusses the Form 3949 with, will sign-off as evaluators in Item 17 on Form 3949. If either Audit or Collection accepts the Form 3949, the Chief, Intelligence will indicate such in Item 20 of Form 3949 and transmit the original Form 3949 to the respective function. The Chief, Intelligence will forward a copy of the Form 3949 with the transfer to the other function noted to the Chief, Intelligence Staff who will update the information index.

Section 5. Priority information items

.01 The Director, Intelligence Division, in consultation with the District Director, Jacksonville District, the Assistant Regional Commissioner (Intelligence), Southeast Region, and the Department of Justice is authorized to designate certain information items "must work" criminal cases. Information items which are inextricably related to the investigation will be designated as "must work" cases. These information items along with any background material will be disseminated by the Director, Intelligence Division directly to the districts where the taxpayers reside or carry on their business activity. A copy of the information items will also be sent to the appropriate Chief, Intelligence Staff. The Chief, Intelligence Staff will follow the procedures in Section 4.03.

.02 Once the Chief, Intelligence receives the information from the service center, he/she will evaluate these information items within ten workdays. The Chief, Intelligence in making his/her evaluation, may consult with the Department of Justice attorneys assigned to Project Haven and with the regional and National Office Project Haven coordinators.

.03 The Chief, Intelligence will then initiate an immediate investigation and apply whatever resources are necessary to expeditiously complete the investigation. If the Chief, Intelligence Division feels that an investigation should not or cannot be initiated, he/she will, through normal channels, advise the Director, Intelligence Division, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator, of the reasons why the case should not or cannot be investigated.

.04 If the Chief, Intelligence initiates the investigation, he/she will notify the Chief, Audit Division if Audit resources are necessary to complete the investigation. The Chief, Audit will apply whatever resources are necessary to expeditiously complete the investigation.

.05 Each District Director, through normal channels, will be responsible for advising the Assistant Commissioner (Compliance) of any adverse effect the application of resources to Project Haven would have on other District Programs.

Section 6. Coordination between intelligence personnel and Department of Justice attorneys

.01 For each Project Haven grand jury case a Department of Justice attorney from the Tax Division will be assigned as an oversight attorney. The attorney will conduct grand jury proceedings relating to the investigation; provide legal assistance to the special agent; approve the issuance of grand jury subpoenas; and review recommended prosecution reports. In order that the attorney may be knowledgeable of the case, he/she must be kept apprised of all significant developments.

.02 Intelligence Group Managers have been designated as the point of contact for Department of Justice attorneys whenever legal questions or other significant developments concerning Project Haven investigations arise. Therefore, group managers are expected to be fully cognizant of Project Haven activities within their group.

.03 If the circumstances are such that it is necessary for a Department of Justice attorney to communicate directly with the special agent, the agent is responsible for notifying the group manager of such contacts and the nature of the contact.

.04 In Project Haven cases consents may be solicited by Audit upon approval of the Chief, Intelligence Division in accordance with IBM 4565.6 and 9325.2. In cases where it is necessary for the Chief, Intelligence Division to consider the issuance of a statutory notice, when consents are not forthcoming, the Chief will confer with the oversight attorney, in addition to the procedures as set out in IRM 9325.2.

Section 7. Case control

All investigations initiated as a result of Project Haven information items will be monitored as Project Haven cases by showing the National Office, Region and District Project Haven Code in Item 57 on Form 4929, Intelligence Case/Project Record. The National Office numerical code assigned to Project Haven is 09.

Section 8. Grand Jury Subpoenas

.01 Administrative summons will not be used in connection with any cited grand jury case (See Section 2.03). Each district initiating a collateral request relating to a Project Haven grand jury case will indicate on the collateral request that it is a Project Haven request, and an administrative summons will not be used in connection with securing the information requested.

.02 The Department of Justice attorneys are responsible for the control and issuance of all grand jury subpoenas. Special agents will assist the grand jury in serving the subpoenas.

.03 If it is found necessary to use compulsory legal process to properly obtain information to assist the grand jury in its investigation, the group manager should contact the oversight attorney who will coordinate the request for subpoenas with the grand jury. The group manager should forward his/her request through the normal channels to the oversight attorney at the following address: Department of Justice, Room 600, F.O.B. 51 SW First Avenue, Miami, Florida 33130.

.04 The special agent serving the subpoena should, through his/her group manager, coordinate with the oversight attorney the time and date for the witness to appear before the grand jury in Miami.

.05 With regard to a collateral request, if the special agent working the collateral needs to serve a subpoena to obtain information, he/she should contact the agent who made the collateral request. The requesting agent's group manager will follow the procedures in Section 8.03 in requesting the subpoena and will also be responsible for coordinating with the oversight attorney the time and date to be shown on the subpoena for the witness to appear before the grand jury in Miami.

.06 Internal Revenue Service document receipt, Form 2725, will not be used when securing documents pursuant to a grand jury subpoena. See the Attachment for the receipt format which should be used. This receipt can be reproduced locally. All documents obtained pursuant to a grand jury subpoena must be presented to the grand jury empaneled in Miami.

Section 9. Other investigative procedures

.01 If the subject of an investigation asks whether he/she is the subject of a Project Haven investigation, he/she will be so advised by the special agent.

.02 Prior to interviewing or otherwise contacting a taxpayer's representative or other third parties outside the district, the Chief, Intelligence in the other district must be contacted in accordance with IRM 9771. This will prevent an agent from compromising any investigation in the other district.

.03 Multi-agent assignment to Project Haven cases should be considered in order to expeditiously complete Project Haven investigations.

Section 10. Control of grand jury information

.01 In order to prevent the unauthorized use of Project Haven grand jury information, the following should be shown on each page of Service generated documents (memorandums, final reports, status reports, etc.) which contain such information: "IN THE ABSENCE OF A FED. R. CRIM. P. RULE 6(e) ORDER, INFORMATION INDICATED ON THIS PAGE SHALL BE USED SOLELY FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE SAID GRAND JURY INVESTIGATIONS. THE INFORMATION WAS OBTAINED BY GRAND JURY NO. ——, SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF FLORIDA."

.02. It is recommended that the grand jury information be indicated by placing a line in the margin next to each line on the Service generated document containing such information. This should be done on the original as well as any copies of the document. However, original documents submitted to the grand jury will not be market or otherwise defaced. These documents will be maintained in their original form in Miami.

.03 In many cases there will be numerous documents containing grand jury information; therefore, it is recommended that the special agents obtain rubber stamps containing the statement in .01 above.

.04 The group manager should obtain from the oversight attorney the number assigned to the grand jury empaneled in Miami.

Section 11. Foreign travel

0.1 While requests for foreign travel will be processed in accordance with IRM 9265.4, any agent contemplating travel to the Bahamas should first contact the Project Haven group manager in Miami and advise him/her of the proposed travel, persons to be contacted and taxpayers involved for control purposes of the Project Haven investigation. The Project Haven group manager may, with the approval of the Office of International Operations (OIO), accompany special agents traveling to the Bahamas on Project Haven related matters.

.02 OIO maintains jurisdictional authority for tax administration matters in all areas outside the U.S. and also maintains final authority concerning the approval of foreign travel by IRS personnel. Agents traveling to the Bahamas will be guided by any instructions or guidance issued by OIO in addition to any instructions or guidance issued by the Project Haven group manager pertaining to investigative techniques.

.03 Those requests for foreign travel relating to cases still under investigation in the district should be submitted to the National Office far enough in advance to allow OIC thirty calendar days for the processing, if the traveler does not have a valid official passport. If the traveler does have a valid official passporty, twenty calendar days for OIO processing will be sufficient. Once the cases have been referred, with a recommendation by Chief Counsel either for or against prosecution, to the Department of Justice or the United States Attorney, those offices would have jurisdiction over the matter and the Service would have little control over the anticipated travel dates. However, as much lead time as possible should be given OIO for proper handling, and if possible, the same lead time as those cases still under district jurisdiction. Emergency request for foreign travel will be handled as expeditiously as possible.

.04 The Project Haven group manager in Miami is authorized to disclose to the American Ambassador in Nassau the names of persons to be contacted, the general nature of the questions to be asked, or evidence to be sought, and a general characterization of the results of the contacts. Any disclosure of specific tax information will be made only to the extent necessary to accomplish the assignment in the Bahamas.

Section 12. Project Haven Information Index

.01 The investigation team in Miami will maintain a Project Haven index which will be comprised of the names of investigative subjects and other individuals and organizations involved in Project Haven.

.02 Whenever a special agent receives records from a witness pursuant to a grand jury subpoena, the agent will bring the records to Miami to be presented to the grand jury. All the records will be microfilmed, with the originals being maintained in Miami and, the agent, using the microfilm copies. It will be the responsibility of the case agent to analyze the records, either in Miami or prior to going to Miami, to determine which records are relevant to the investigation. Those records which the agent deems relevant to any aspects of the investigation will be summarized and included as part of the index.

.03 It will be the responsibility of the investigating team in Miami to incorporate the material into the index.

.04 Whenever a Form 3949 is initiated by the investigating team in Miami, they will include in Item 16 of the form that the Project Haven index has been checked, and that all available information on the subject is attached to the Form 3949.

.05 In order to maintain the security of the Project Haven files and to limit access to authorized officials only, requests for file searches will only be made on a Form 2275 and forwarded to the Jacksonville District in the form of a collateral request. Telephone requests are authorized only in emergency situations and must be immediately followed up by a written collateral request.

Section 13. Final report and case review

.01 For those cases in which prosecution is being recommended, and the case has been worked jointly with Audit, the revenue agent will prepare an examination report (RAR) on the civil aspects of the case. To ensure that no civil use is inadvertently made of grand jury derived information prior to obtaining a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order, the examination report will be forwarded to the Chief, Intelligence, without Audit review. The RAR will be accompanied by a memorandum containing an opinion as to whether or not a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order should be requested. Audit will continue to maintain custody and responsibility for any tax returns. If at the conclusion of the criminal aspects of the case a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is not obtained, the Chief, Intelligence Division will be responsible for reviewing the RAR and returning to the district, Chief, Audit Division any civil non-grand jury information which may be used for civil purposes or notice that a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order was not obtained and there is no information available for civil purposes.

.02 For those cases in which prosecution is not recommended, the special agent will prepare a withdrawal or non-prosecution report, including the information obtained by the grand jury. If the case has Audit or Collection Activity potential, and the grand jury information is essential to the proper determination of the civil liability, the Chief, Intelligence Division will place the case in suspense and prepare a request for a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order, see Section 14.01. The Chief, Intelligence Division should also follow the procedures in Section 4.12 with regard to notifying the Director, Intelligence Division of a suspended case.

.03 For those cases which have civil potential, but a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order was not obtained, all grand jury information will be expunged from the case files and maintained in the Intelligence Division. The Chief, Intelligence Division will notify the Chief of the appropriate function, by memorandum, that Intelligence has withdrawn from the case; that the investigation was worked in conjunction with a grand jury; and a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order was not obtained, therefore, all grand jury information relating to the case will be maintained in Intelligence and is not available to Audit or Collection personnel; and non-grand jury information is being transmitted with the memorandum.

.04 If a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is obtained, the forwarding of the special agent's withdrawal report with the documentary evidence should be done in accordance with IRM 9632 and 9633.

.05 Because of the nationwide scope of Project Haven, all cases in which prosecution is recommended will be reviewed by Chief Counsel, Criminal Tax Division. When the Chief, Intelligence Division concurs in a prosecution recommendation, he/she will prepare a transmittal memorandum to the Director, Criminal Tax Division, Room 4523, Internal Revenue Building, 1111 Constitution Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20224, for the signature of the District Director. All mailings to this address should specify "DO NOT OPEN IN MAILROOM." The memorandum should include a brief summary of the case, a specific recommendation as to further action and any unusual legal problem in the case. A copy of the memorandum should also be forwarded by the Chief, Intelligence to the Director, Intelligence Division, Attn: Project Haven Coordinator.

Section 14. Request for Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order

.01. The Chief, Intelligence will forward the request for a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order through normal channels to the Director, Intelligence Division. The Director, Intelligence will, if he/she concurs, forward the request to Chief Counsel, Criminal Tax Division. If Chief Counsel concurs, he/she will coordinate the request with the Department of Justice, Tax Division.

.02 The request should include the information as stated in Section 4.12, as well as any other information the Chief, Intelligence deems appropriate to assist those officials named in .01 above in evaluating the request.

Section 15. District audit procedures

.01 Revenue agents assigned to work joint investigations concerning Project Haven cases will be responsible for assisting the grand jury in its investigation. These joint investigations will generally be conducted in accordance with IRM 4565 and 9324.

.02 The Audit Group Manager will be kept informed of the revenue agent's activities to the extent necessary to ensure the investigative techniques and approaches used are within IRS policies and guidelines. In discharging these responsibilites, the Audit Group Manager will exercise extreme caution to insure that the grand jury information is not disseminated unless a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is obtained.

.03 The Chief, Audit Division will insure that the Project Haven grand jury information known by the cooperating revenue agent is not disseminated in any manner unless a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is obtained.

.04 Since the grand jury investigations are solely criminal in nature, information should not be solicited by either the special agent or the revenue agent for any civil purpose.

.05 In the case of a joint investigation, the revenue agent will prepare an RAR at the conclusion of the investigation. Processing of the RAR will be in accordance with the procedures set out in Section 13.01 of this Supplement.

.06 In Project Haven joint investigations, Audit will follow the procedures as set out in IRM 4565.6 when soliciting consents and issuing statutory notices. Also see Section 6.04 of this Supplement.

Section 16. Audit reporting procedures

Audit reporting procedures will be issued at a later date.

Section 17. Summary Intelligence Reporting Requirements

.01 The following are required to be forwarded to officials in the National Office, as stated elsewhere in this Supplement:

1. Assistant Commissioner (Compliance):
   a. Memorandum advising of adverse effect of resources for other programs because of Project Haven cases (Section 5.05).
2. Director, Intelligence Division, Attn.: Project Haven Coordinator:
   a. Copy of the top half of form 3949 when it is initiated (Section 4.05);
   b. Copy of form 3949 if it is not accepted for investigation (Section 4.10);
   c. Memorandum advising that a case or information item has been put in suspense (Sections 4.12 and 13.02);
   d. Memorandum explaining why a "must work" case should not or cannot be investigated (Section 5.03); and
   e. Copy of transmittal memorandum (Section 13.05).

Section 18. Disclosure

.01 The districts and regions will handle FOIA Project Haven requests in accordance with the September 21, 1976, memorandum, "Disclosure of Project Haven Materials", from the Assistant Commissioner (Compliance) to all Regional Commissioners, District Directors, Service Center Directors, Regional Inspectors, and Director, National Computer Center. The procedures in this memorandum will be incorporated in a forthcoming Manual Supplement.

.02 Project Haven is considered a referred case to the Department of Justice which is conducting a grand jury investigation with the support of the Internal Revenue Service. Therefore, disclosure may be made to Department of Justice attorneys, who have been assigned to this case. The disclosure authority covers all tax matters, both civil and criminal, which relate directly or indirectly to Project Haven. However, the limitations in Paragraph 3 of Delegation Order No. 156, dated May 19, 1976, must be observed in those situations described and approval of the National Office obtained before releasing returns.

Section 19. Effect on other documents

.01 This amends and supplements Chapters (10)00 and (21)00 of IRM 1272, Disclosure of Official Information Handbook; IRM 4020; IRM 4175; IRM 4280; IRM 4410; IRM 4560; Chapter (13)00 of IRM 4810, Audit Reports Handbook; IRM 9265.4; IRM 9267; IRM 9390; and Manual Supplement 93G-164, CR 1(15)G-103, 41G-108, 45G-250, 51G-132, 5(11)G-65, 71G-14, 92G-35 and 95G-61, dated March 4, 1976. This also supplements Exhibit 400-3 of IRM 9570, Case Management and Time Reporting System Handbook.

.02 The "effect" in .01 above should be annotated by pen and ink beside the basic text, Handbook text and Exhibit, and on the Supplement cited, with a reference to this Supplement.

Attachment.

W. E. WILLIAMS,
Deputy Commissioner.

Re Abuse of Grand Jury Process.

For the past two years we have had as a subcommittee project the end run procedures under which IRS transmits cases to the Department of Justice for grand jury investigation, denying taxpayers opportunity for conferences at the levels of the Chief of Intelligence and Regional Counsel. This process further involves avoidance of civil litigation which might result due to any challenge to the Commissioner's authority to use IRS summons power. Our study has also taken into account the proposed change in Rule 6(e) F.R.Cr.P. which would qualify agents as "attorneys for the government" for purposes of disclosure of grand jury material.

Please see Manual Supplement 93G–175, dated October 28, 1976 copy of which is attached. I will appreciate hearing from the membership regarding the provisions of this directive, including those providing for the transmittal of Project Haven information items to the Chief of Intelligence in the district where the taxpayer resides or whose place of business is located under cover of a Form 3949 with an insertion as follows: "In the absence of a Fed. R. Crim. P. rule 6(e) order, information indicated on this document shall be used solely for the purposes of said Grand Jury investigation. The information was obtained by Grand Jury No. —, Southern Judicial District of Florida."

The grand jury material thus disclosed, although under provisions stating it may not be used for civil purposes without a Rule 6(e) Order, is used to secure for evaluations appropriate returns (copies), research, and/or transcripts on the taxpayer and, if it has civil potential, to place such information in suspense pending the issuance of a 6(e) Order. The instructions further install Department of Justice attorneys as "oversight attorneys" for such purposes as determining whether grand jury subpoenas will be served by special agents and to be consulted whether statutory notices of deficiency will be issued.

You will find provisions in the Manual Supplement designed to sanitize any future civil case in event a 6(e) Order is not obtained. The procedure also contemplates that revenue agents will be assigned to work joint investigations concerning Project Haven cases and will be responsible for assisting the grand jury in its investigations. Such agents will keep Audit Group Managers informed and such managers "will exercise extreme caution to insure that the grand jury information is not disseminated unless a Fed. R. Crim. P. Rule 6(e) Order is obtained.

There does not appear to be any procedure for sanitizing the revenue agents' or the Group Manager's minds of grand jury material obtained by them without a 6(e) Order or to insure that they will not in the future use such information in the fashion now prescribed by the Internal Revenue Manual for special agents to follow-up each grand jury witness after his appearance to obtain from such witness volunteered information as to testimony given to the grand jury and documents furnished to the grand jury.

Your thoughts and comments will be appreciated in order that I may have the views of the Subcommittee members to report to the Committee Chairman along with such recommendations as we think appropriate.

In addition to any general comments you may wish considered, let me have your views on the following:

1. Should the Subcommittee recommend to the Committee that the ABA present its views to the appropriate Committees of the House and Senate in opposition to the Amendment of Rule 6(e) to constitute agents assigned to assist grand jurys as "attorneys for the government"? (Such Rule change becomes effective August 1, 1977 in the absence of Congressional action to the contrary.)

2. Should the membership of the Section of Taxation of the ABA be alerted in some appropriate fashion to the fact that evidence used in statutory notices of deficiency or sought to be introduced by the government in civil tax litigation may have been obtained by the IRS through disclosures of grand jury material in advance of or without a Rule 6(e) Order? (This assumes that deficiency notices generated or evidence submitted in support thereof might be challenged

if such notices or evidence are the fruit of unauthorized disclosures of grand jury material made by IRS agents in violation of the secrecy provisions of Rule 6(e).)

Information copies of this memorandum are being sent to other Committee members in view of their expressed interest in the subject matter.

RICHARD C. SCHWARTZ,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Standards of Practice.

Enclosure.

JUDGE WILLIAM J. CAMPBELL,
Chicago, Illinois, May 23, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As requested in your recent letter, I have reviewed your currently pending proposed Bill, H.R. 94, directed at curing certain grand jury abuses. I have likewise read with interest the related testimony of Judge Frederick B. Lacey given before your Subcommittee on April 27, 1977. Although in the main I concur with Judge Lacey's observations as to the potential impractical results which might well obtain were H.R. 94 to become law, nevertheless, I wish here to express my own complete approval of the obvious motivation behind your Bill—that is, eradication of the frequent abuses now associated with the use of grand juries. You and I have corresponded on this subject in the past, Mr. Chairman, and once again I respectfully remind you that the only effective way you can accomplish your laudable motives is to abolish the Grand Jury. It has outlived its usefulness and is beyond redemption or restructuring.

Obviously, the grand jury is no longer performing its major historical function of protecting citizens against unfounded indictments and oppressive prosecutions. As now used, its only saving grace is its value as an additional investigatory tool for the prosecutor. However, this investigative function could be better and much easier performed without an antiquated and cumbersome grand jury, with far fewer intrusions on individual liberties and with a great saving of valuable court time.

When I published my views on this timely subject recently, you graciously wrote me a praiseworthy letter on my efforts. To the extent it would be helpful, I am now again submitting a copy of my article entitled "Eliminate The Grand Jury" which was published in Volume 64, No. 2, "Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology" (Northwestern University School of Law at pp. 174 to 182). I am flattered and gratified that your distinguished and able Chief Counsel, Mr. Martin Belsky, has requested for your record a copy of my more recent (May 3, 1977) testimony before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, where I again spoke about and against the grand jury based upon the extensive research set forth in the above-mentioned article.

Mr. Chairman, your courageous attempt to correct present, past and potential abuses in the use of the grand jury is for the reasons so ably developed in Judge Lacey's testimony, ineffective and impractical. Indeed, it is my considered judgment based upon a lifetime of service that any partial attempt to correct and preserve this relic of our common law heritage, long since (1933) discarded by its founder Great Britain, will only complicate and increase the problem. Start now on the Constitutional Amendment to remove the grand jury requirement from the Fifth Amendment! Cutting off the dog's tail an inch at a time, or even trying to add to the length of the dog's tail, is not and cannot be the answer. The entire tail must go—now!

Mr. Chairman, I am ready and willing now, as I have been in the past, to assist you in any way that you care to use me in your outstanding efforts to improve on federal criminal justice administration. You have but to command me. With renewed assurances of highest esteem, and with kindest personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM J. CAMPBELL.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM J. CAMPBELL, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, I am indeed pleased to be invited to testify on the subject of grand jury reform, or, more specifically in my case, grand jury elimination. As you know, I have previously submitted written comments on this subject to your distinguished Chairman. In a word this earlier submitted comprehensive statement of my views strongly urges the grand jury be abolished.

Recent developments, however, coupled with my admiration for the courageous work of this Subcommittee and my desire to assist the Committee's efforts in any way possible, suggest additional comments might be helpful and of assistance to your determinations.

Initially, as I am sure you are aware, it should be noted that the ABA's House of Delegates recently adopted 25 of 27 grand jury reform principles proposed by the ABA's Criminal Justice Section. Parenthetically, the ABA's concern with the grand jury and the reform nature of its suggestions buttresses the conclusion that something must be done with reference to the grand jury.

Two of the Criminal Justice Section's recommended principles, one permitting grand jury witnesses to be accompanied by counsel inside the grand jury room and the other restricting the occasions when immunity may properly be granted while concomitantly expanding the scope of that immunity, were adopted despite the opposition of the Attorney General and the Justice Department.

As mentioned two other suggested principles were rejected. The first of the two principles endorsed by the ABA's Criminal Justice Section but rejected by the House of Delegates, would have required prosecutors to make an in-camera, on the record showing that any evidence sought is "likely to be relevant to the jury investigation and not sought primarily for an improper purpose." The second principle would have permitted subpoenaed witnesses to challenge the subpoenas in their own district courts rather than in the district court where the grand jury was sitting.

I respectfully suggest that the defeat of the above principles by such an august body as the ABA House of Delegates is particularly regrettable in that, as is now the circumstance, all objections to a subpoena must be made in person, mere failure to comply could result in contempt charges. Thus, witnesses must often travel great distances to voice their objections to a subpoena, and may then find, as is often the case, that it is impossible convincingly to demonstrate that the subpoena was issued for an improper purpose. See, Beverly v. U.S., 468 F.2d 732 (5th Cir. 1972); U.S. v Doe, 455 F.2d 1270 (1st Cir. 1972); C. Doyle, "Federal Grand Juries," printed in Federal Grand Jury: Hearings on H.J. Res. 46, H.R. 1277 and Related Bills Before The Subcomm. on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., Appendix 5, 671 at 689 (1976). Defeats of this sort, which appear inevitable, make the need for complete abolition of the grand jury system even more compelling.

Nonetheless, the ABA did adopt numerous reform principles, including requirements that witnesses be told whether they are "target" witnesses, that witnesses be given Miranda-type warnings, that prosecutors present evidence tending to negate guilt and that the naming of unindicted co-conspirators be prohibited.

The shocking number and type of grand jury abuses that caused the ABA to consider 27 different reform measures, have also caused other new voices to speak out in protest. A recent Wall Street Journal article, for example, discusses the work of this Subcommittee and chronicles the numerous criticisms made of the grand jury system. Interestingly, however, many of these abuses are now being articulated by the corporate lawyers of America, such as the counsel for General Motors and International Paper Co. (C. Falk, "GM, Other Unlikely Critics Accuse Grand Juries of Abusing Rights They Are Supposed to Protect," Wall St. J., June 23, 1977 at 40.) No longer are the critics of our archaic grand jury system confined to the poor or the politically oppressed; the abuses of the grand jury now reach across all color and class divisions.

Many of the far-reaching grand jury abuses are also discussed in a newly published book, The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial, written by United States District Court Judge Marvin Frankel and Attorney Gary Naftalis. Notably, many of the reforms recommended by the authors also appear in H.R. 94.

Finally, in a recent meeting of the National Legal Aid & Defender Ass'n., it is my understanding that organization's National Defender Committee unanimously passed a resolution suggesting abolishing the entire grand jury system.

Much of the recent disenchantment of the business community with the grand jury is a result of the use of the grand jury in complex antitrust criminal prosecutions. In May of this year I was kindly invited to testify before the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, at which time I was able more fully to articulate my views on the use of the grand jury in such cases. Because I believe the difficulties which obtain in the use of the grand jury in antitrust prosecutions are inherent in the grand jury system itself, I will briefly reiterate my earlier comments here.

It is my belief that much of the delay, expense and unfairness in criminal cases which is causing so much public outcry today, is directly due to the cumbersome and dilatory fashion in which the grand jury performs its traditional investigative function. Moreover, as I have repeatedly stated, the grand jury is no longer performing its major historical function of protecting citizens against unfounded indictments and oppressive prosecutions. And, as my distinguished colleague, Judge Marvin E. Frankel has noted, even this historical protection may have been more illusory than real; for it was during the Jefferson Administration that three consecutive grand juries were convened before a true bill was finally returned against Aaron Burr. (Frankel, M. and Naftalis, G., "The Grand Jury," The New Leader, Nov. 10, 1975 at 1,7.)

As now used, the grand jury's only saving grace is its value as an additional investigatory tool for the prosecutor. This investigative function could, however, be much better and easier performed without an antiquated and cumbersome grand jury, with far fewer intrusions on individual liberties and with a great saving of valuable court time by the prosecutor himself.

Moreover, it may well be that, tradition notwithstanding, the grand jury has no constitutional authority to issue arrest warrants. (See C. Thompson, "The Fourth Amendment Function of the Grand Jury,' 37 Ohio St. L.J. 727 (1976)). In a most scholarly article, Professor Thompson perceptively points out that a grand jury indictment often "operates as a fourth amendment probable cause determination to arrest or detain in custody; . . ." (id. at 729), and that such operation may be in violation of the Fourth Amendment requirement that probable cause be determined by a neutral and detached judicial officer. Deprived of its ability to bring indicted persons into custody, the grand jury becomes not only a cumbersome, but also a meaningless appendage to the then necessary preliminary hearing.

Even without this technical stumbling block, the preliminary hearing is much better suited for determining probable cause. It requires prosecutors publicly to assume responsibility for prosecutions which are, in fact, initiated by them. It further allows putative defendants to speak in their own behalf, which has the dual advantages of permitting the presiding judicial officer to dismiss at once those cases where the defendant is clearly not guilty and of permitting both parties to become familiar with each other's evidence, thus facilitating all further action, whether it be dismissal, plea or trial.

Unfortunately, neither these advantages nor the problems inherent in the grand jury system were addressed by the Assistant Attorney Geeneral in his comments before this Subcommittee in opposition to H.R. 94. His testimony, however, is deserving of comment as it represents the views of the Department of Justice.

After confirming the Justice Department's continuing interest in protecting civil rights, Assistant Attorney General Civiletti, interestingly states that the grand jury system "is a bulwark of our criminal justice system. . . ." (Statement at 1). Yet this claim has not been made by any of those persons or groups who ordinarily should or would so claim. Instead. civil libertarians and defense attorneys unanimously decry the present use of the grand jury system and advocate either its reform or its abolition.

As the "bulwark of our criminal justice system", Civiletti depicts the grand jury as "functioning under the sound superintendence of the federal courts, . . ." (Statement at 1). Although the grand jury is, in theory, an arm of the courts; in practice, the courts as we all know, unfortunately exercise little control over the grand jury. This lack of control has become deeply imbedded in the grand jury system as courts are reluctant to interfere with "prosecutorial" functions and, even when such interference is warratned, the covert and surreptitious nature of the grand jury system precludes effective investigation.

Similarly, although Civiletti alleges that the present grand jury system "continues to serve, as an effective, fair and essential institution . . ." (Statement at 2), the literature and case law belie his claim. (See, e.g., U.S. v. Basurto, 497 F.2d 781 (9th Cir. 1974); Bursey v. U.S., 466 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1972); U.S. v Estepa, 471 F2d 1132 (2d Cir 1972); U.S. v. Gallo, 394 F. Supp. 310 (D. Conn. 1975); U.S. v. DeMarco, 401 F Supp 505 (C.D. Cal. 1975); Fine, "Federal Grand Jury Investigation of Political Dissidents," 7 Harv. Civ. Rights-Civ. Lib. L. Rev. 432 (1972); Cowan, "The New Grand Jury," N.Y. Times Magazine, April 29, 1973.)

Ironically, Civiletti's conclusion that continued, albeit "occasional," abuse of the grand jury will inevitably continue at least partially comports with my thoughts and wholly supports my belief that the grand jury must be eliminated so that all such abuses may immediately cease. I must respectfully disagree, however, with Civiletti's characterization of the abuses as "occasional." As a former prosecutor and as a district court judge, I, myself, have been exposed to or told of more than "occasional" abuses. (See also National Lawyers Guild, Representation of Witnesses Before Federal Grand Juries (2d ed. 1976) and cases cited therein; Federal Grand Jury, Hearings on H.J. Res. 46, H.R. 1277 & Related Bills Before the Subcomm. on Immigration, Citizenship & International Law of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 729–35 (1976) ("Report on Selected Cases Alleged To Have Been Examples of Grand Jury Abuse," to Hon. Joshua Eilberg, Chairman, from American Law Division, Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, Oct. 7, 1976).)

Apparently in recognition of at least the potential for grand jury abuse, Civiletti commendably states that prosecutors should not knowingly present unconstitutionally obtained evidence to the grand jury. (Statement at 3) He also states, however, that prosecutors should not sign indictments where the evidence presented is "legally insufficient." In my experience, "legally insufficient" is a term impossible of definition. What does the Justice Department intend by this term? Hearsay? Illegally obtained evidence? And what standards are prosecutors to apply in determining when evidence which they themselves have presented in the hope of receiving an indictment is legally insufficient? I respectfully submit that, like most of the proposed reforms, the proposal is commendable in theory, but unworkable in practice. (See United States v. Chanen, 549 F.2d 1306 (9th Cir. 1977).)

Civiletti then explains that the Justice Department's opposition to many of the reform proposals stem from a fear of weakening the "purpose and duty [of the grand jury] to investigate criminal action without fear. . . ." (Statement at 3). He does not explain, however, why the investigative function of the grand jury cannot be performed by already existing investigative agencies and by the prosecutor himself.

In opposing specific sections of H.R. 94, Civiletti begins by endorsing a 12 month minimum confinement period for contempt, as opposed to the proposed 6 month term. (Statement at 4–5). As anyone who has ever served time will tell you, this type of line drawing has little practical effect. Furthermore, although Civiletti correctly notes that a court may release a recalcitrant witness whenever the court concludes that the witness will not relent, (Statement at 5 n. 1), he does not explain how a court is to determine this. Again, the theory is admirable, the practice is inoperable. Although I agree with the Justice Department that compelled testimony is an important and necessary part of government, I would respectfully point out that, though certainly of importance and significance, it is not the majority opinion of the Court but merely the concurring opinion of Justices White and Stewart in Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52, 93 (1964) that supports this proposition.

In regard to witness immunity, the Justice Department statement eschews transactional immunity because it encourages "incomplete and shallow testimony" and prohibits prosecutions of persons "subsequently and independently found to be more deserving of prosecution than originally thought." (Statement at 6). First, there is no reason for a person granted transaction immunity to be less candid than one granted use immunity. In fact, those persons granted use immunity would logically be more close-mouthed, for fear that their testimony may indirectly result in their own prosecution. Certainly the fear of subsequent prosecution is not conducive to candid testimony. Nor is the integrity of our system of justice furthered by prosecuting persons previously granted immunity.

Perhaps most importantly, it is implicit in the Justice Department's objections that transactional immunity would inevitably result in more carefully selected immunity grants since those persons later "found to be more deserving of prosecution than originally thought," (Statement at 6), would no longer be subject to prosecution. This result, although more time-consuming, is clearly desirable.

Permit me once again to hark back to impracticality. Although the Justice Department correctly states that use immunity permits subsequent prosecution only when independent evidence is discovered, I respectfully suggest that there is little chance for a defendant to rebut the government's proof of independent origin, even though the burden to show independent origin is on the government. This problem is particularly acute because it is often impossible for the government, or anyone else, to distinguish between leads resulting from some piece of seemingly innocuous grand jury testimony and those resulting from a wholly independent source. Common sense, no less the protection of individual rights, would strongly suggest these "independent origin" issues be eliminated from the criminal justice system, an elimination easily accomplished by returning to transactional immunity.

I would also suggest that the Justice Department's misgivings concerning involvement of the judiciary in prosecutorial functions, although well-founded, cannot be resolved by separating the judiciary from the grand jury since the grand jury is in fact and in law although unfortunately not in practice an arm of the court. The only workable solution is to abolish the grand jury, thus preserving the independence of both the prosecutor and the court.

Several other practical problems are raised by the Justice Department's statement. Mention is made of binding guidelines to be adopted instructing prosecutors to disclose "significant" exculpatory evidence to the grand jury. Such a proposal is of little help to defendants because the secrecy requirements surrounding the grand jury would often make it impossible for defendants to determine whether the prosecutor complied with this instruction. Moreover, "significant" is an ambiguous standard, which although I approve of the provision as a reform measure, can only serve to spawn irreconcilable and confusing decisions. Compare U.S. v. Gallo, 394 F. Supp. 310 (D. Conn. 1975) with Lorraine v. U.S., 396 F. 2d 335 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 933 (1968).

The Justice Department is strongly opposed to permitting witnesses' attorneys to remain in the grand jury room. One of the reasons given for this opposition seems only to be that the guilty will benefit from the proposal. (Statement at 18 (Fourth point).) I would only point out that the presumption of innocence is still alive and well in our judicial system.

Another provision objected to by the Justice Department is the section that would permit transfer of grand jury proceedings when substantial hardship would otherwise result. It is the Justice Department's contention that this is a mere convenience of witnesses statute, and that convenience should not override the public's interest or the defendant's interest. Although these concerns are laudable, for purposes of the grand jury the defendant is just another witness. More importantly, in 1972, five New York Irish Americans, with no known connection to Texas, were subpoenaed before a Texas grand jury and subsequently imprisoned in Fort Worth for as long as the grand jury sat or was reconvened, for their refusal to testify after receiving grants of use immunity. Leaving aside the numerous injustices suggested by this case, there can be no excuse for compelling such persons to travel to Texas, where they had no family or friends, especially while there was a grand jury sitting in New York also investigating the Irish Republican Army. For a more comprehensive discussion of this case see Senator Edward M. Kennedy's testimony Before House Judiciary Subcommittee No. 1, (Hearings on the Fort Worth Five and Grand Jury Abuse (1973), reprinted in Federal Grand Jury Hearings, supra at 498–513.)

Whose interest was served by this travesty? Certainly the hardships to those involved were far more devastating than the "burdensome duty" noted by the Justice Department. (Statement at 24.) And yet, this is not an "exceptional happening." Even if it were, I strongly believe that once is too much.

In conclusion I once again respectfully urge this Subcommittee to start now on the Constitutional Amendment to remove the grand jury requirement from the Fifth Amendment as is done in H.R. 60, 61 and 62. Although I applaud your efforts and completely approve of the obvious motivation behind your Bill, H.R. 94, i.e., attempted eradication of the frequent abuses now associated with the use of grand juries, cutting off the dog's tail an inch at a time, or even trying to add to the length of the dog's tail, is not and canont be the answer. The entire tail must go—now! For that matter my experience and my review of the pending legislation intended to cure grand jury abuses and for the most part the related ABA recommendations, suggests that imposing all or any of these various procedures on grand jury practice and administration can and will only lead to a legal circus. Will we not thereby be creating new issues and certainly more cumbersome procedures to accomplish a practically useless task? Though legally, by virtue of the Fifth Amendment, a grand jury must return indictments, there can be and in my judgment there are no substantial arguments supporting the continuation of this highly questionable and archaic common law procedure.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM J. CAMPBELL.

WILLIAM M. BRODSKY,
New York, N.Y., May 26, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: As an attorney whose practice primarily comprises so-called white-collar defense work, I am very interested in grand jury reform. I believe I am especially well-qualified to speak on the need for substantial reform in this area, since I have recently completed five and a half years as an Assistant United States Attorney both in the District of Columbia and more recently in the Eastern District of New York.

My experience on both the prosecution and the defense sides has convinced me that there are, unfortunately, almost no checks at present on the untrammeled power of the prosecutor. Indeed, the grand jury system functions fairly today only so long as the individual prosecutor is responsible and just. Thankfully, the vast majority of Assistant United States Attorneys throughout the country do exercise in a responsible manner their tremendous power to issue subpoenas; to interrogate uncounseled witnesses and potential defendants; and to seek indictments.

Not all such prosecutors are responsible, however, and a great risk of substantial harm to constitutionally protected rights results from any irresponsible, heavy-handed or overbearing abuse of power by a prosecutor anywhere in the United States. Thus it is, unfortunately, that the conductor of a few arrogant prosecutors who run roughshod over citizens' rights requires the institution of national procedures, supervised by the judiciary to act as a bulwark against such abuses.

Foremost among the abuses to which I refer, is the prohibition against any witness being accompanied by counsel inside the grand jury room. More than any other single palliative, a statute which permitted all persons brought before a grand jury, whether by subpoena or otherwise, to have their lawyers with them to provide immediate advice would ameliorate the unduly coercive atmosphere of the grand jury. It would transform the grand jury from an inquisition to an interrogation—as it should be.

I know that the American Bar Association House of Delegates has already endorsed such a proposal, and in spite of the unfortunate tabling of the endorsement of the grand jury reform principles by the House of Delegates in April in Seattle, it is still the policy of the Association.

Perhaps the second most pernicious practice abusive of the grand jury is the forthwith subpoena. It is the most intrusive summons, directing the recipient to drop all other activities and proceed immediately to the grand jury, without giving him time to consult with counsel. Indeed, as I have seen such process used, it is most often employed in situations in which the prosecutor wants to harass a witness or bring him to brook without having to deal with an attorney who would seek to protect the individual's rights.

The proper and responsible way for a prosecutor to issue process in the name of the grand jury is to make all subpoenas returnable not less than ten days after service. This would permit the witness to consult counsel, and counsel to file a motion to quash if appropriate.

Furthermore, all persons and entities maintaining any data concerning an individual such as banks, telephone companies, credit companies, doctors, insurance companies, etc., should be required to give the individual whose data are subpoenaed immediate notice of the receipt of the subpoena so that the individual may file a motion to quash the subpoena within the ten day period prior to compliance.

Finally, each witness should be given a copy of the transcript of his testimony before the grand jury as soon as it is typed. Of course, this assumes that all federal grand jury proceedings will be transcribed. Indeed, all proceedings before the grand jury should be conducted on the record, not just the actual testimony of witnesses. This will eliminate the off-the-record "briefings" which the prosecutor now gives the grand jury. It is in these unrecorded discussions that the prosecutor may undermine all the proper legal instructions he gives the grand jury on the record.

I understand that you have incorporated many of these reforms in legislation which you have introduced again this session. I would very much appreciate receiving a copy of all the grand jury reform bills now pending and a copy of the transcript of any hearings held last session.

I would also welcome the opportunity to testify at any new hearings to be held this session on grand jury reform.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM M. BRODSKY.

Mr. DOMINIC P. GENTILE,
Associate Dean, National College of Criminal Defense Lawyers and Public Defenders, Bates College of Law, University of Houston, Houston, Tex.

DEAR DOMINIC: Thank you for your letter and its enclosures and in particular your calling my attention to the case United States v. DiRusso.

We are undertaking a study of the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977 and as you know a most important part of that legislation deals with the subject of sentencing.

I am taking the liberty of forwarding a copy of your paper on the Grand Jury to one of our Subcommittees which is involved in grand jury reform legislation. I know they will find it helpful.

I am still grappling with my schedule in order to determine whether or not I will be able to be with you at your annual meeting in Williamsburg. I would like to do so and should be able to notify your organization shortly.

With kind regards,

Sincerely yours,

PETER W. RODINO, JR.,

Re Investigation of Sam Spade, Enlistment into U.S. Army by Employment of a False Statement.

Mr. JOHN Q. PUBLIC,
Foreman, Federal Grand Jury,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. PUBLIC: It has come to my attention that you are the Foreman of the Federal Grand Jury which is investigating the alleged enlistment by Sam Spade into the United States Army on August 18, 1975, said enlistment allegedly being accomplished through the presentation of false identification and discharge papers.

I am hereby requesting an opportunity to appear before the Grand Jury and to inform its members, under oath, that Sam Spade was with me in Monterey, Mexico, continuously and uninterruptedly from August 1, 1975 through September 1, 1975.

I am communicating this request to you with full knowledge that I am under no duty to appear before the Grand Jury and that I needn't communicate this information to it. Furthermore, I have conferred with Dominic Gentile of the law firm of Gentile, De Palma & Spidale and he has advised me that I have no duty to present such testimony unless I am subpoenaed. Notwithstanding his advice, I persist in my request to appear and give testimony.

JOHN SMITH.

I hereby acknowledge that I have been retained by John Smith as his legal counsel, that I have advised him that he is under no duty to appear before the grand jury and give any testimony without having first been properly served with a subpoena, and that he nevertheless has informed me that it is his wish to do so.

The Grand Jury's Role in the Defense Arsenal

(By Dominic P. Gentile, Associate Dean, National College of Criminal Defense Lawyers and Public Defenders, Houston, Tex., at the NACDL Grand Jury Seminar, October 1976, Chicago, Ill.

I. INTRODUCTION

This entire discussion presupposes that counsel has knowledge of the existence and scope of a grand jury investigation wherein his client is a target and that evidentiary materials exist which are exculpatory in nature. It further assumes that counsel's investigation has revealed to him the subject matter of the grand jury inquiry, the potential charges with which the client is confronted, and has determined that the client will not be prejudiced by a preindictment disclosure of favorable evidence.

With the Federal Rules of Evidence being a reality in the trial of cases in the United States District Courts and with the states adopting these rules in their original or modified versions, defense lawyers are confronted with motivating factors that did not exist under prior practice. It is the intention of this monograph to highlight the motivational factors involved and to provide the defense lawyer with some insight as to the methodology to be employed and the various problems that will be encountered in attempting to bring to the grand jury's attention the favorable evidence.

II. MOTIVATING FACTORS

A. Avoidance of indictment

While it is obvious to any person involved in the criminal justice system that the main goal of a defense lawyer representing a client who is the target of a grand jury investigation is to avoid indictment where possible, it must be recognized that nothwithstanding the classical theory that the grand jury is an independent body capable of functioning in and of itself, it has degenerated in recent years into the role of a tool of the prosecution. A prosecutor that has control of the grand jury can indict any person at any time for practically anything that he chooses. That the grand jury has become an investigative tool of the prosecutor has become so obvious that some courts have even ceased paying lip service to the "sword and shield" traditional theory of the grand jury's purpose. Hawthorne, Inc. v. Director of Internal Revenue, 406 F. Supp. 1098, 1119 (E.D.Pa. 1976).

B. Perpetuation of testimony for use at trial

While counsel and his client can regard the actual return of a No Bill by a grand jury as being tantamount to the parting of the Red Sea, a more certain beneficial result will obtain in the perpetuation of the favorable evidence for post-indictment consideration by the trier of fact. This consideration is most obvious in the following situation:

1. Weak sister witness.—Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(1)(A) relates to the substantive use of the contents of a prior inconsistent statement if the declarant testifies at trial, is subject to cross examination regarding the statement previously made, and the statement is inconsistent with his testimony at the trial and was given under oath and penalty of perjury at the previous trial, hearing or other proceedings. The rule as adopted covers statements before a grand jury. House of Representatives Report No. 93–1597, 93d Congress, second session. The first judicial interpretation of this rule is found in United States v. Castro-Ayon, 537 F. 2d 1055 9th Cir., 1976) Cf. 4 Weinstein, Evidence, par. 801(d)(1)(A) (01), P. 801–77, (1975).

Federal Rule of Evidence 607 allows impeachment of one's own witness. Reading this rule in conjunction with Rule 801(d)(1)(A) results in the use of the prior inconsistent statement for its substantive value by calling the witness who has since become a turn-coat and introducing the prior inconsistent statement. This becomes extraordinarily important where an affirmative defense is being used and where instructions and arguments depend upon the substantive use of this evidence. Here the Federal Rules are consistent with the common law theory that prior statements are superior in trustworthiness because the memory of the declarant was fresher, fuller and more accurate. McCormick, Evidence, Sec. 39, P. 75 (1954).

2. The integral witness.—Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(1)(B) allows the use of prior consistent statements to rebut the charge or inference of recent fabrication and, when proper, permits the defense to obtain an instruction in this regard. Where the prosecutor raises the issue of recent fabrication, the prior consistent statement is removed from the realm of hearsay. This prior consistent statement need not have been made under oath or have been recorded to fall within the rule. However, where the grand jury has heard the prior consistent statement the prosecutor is certainly aware of the fact that the declarant has not changed his testimony. It follows that the perpetuation of the testimony at the grand jury stage precludes the prosecutor from offering any evidence at the trial for the purpose of creating this inference. Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1217, 79 S. Ct. 1173 (1959); Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 31 L. Ed. 2d 104, 92 S Ct. 763 (1972); King v. United States, 372 F. 2d 383, 394 (C.A.D.C., 1967); ABA Code of Professional Responsibility, CANON 7, Ethical Considerations EC 7-13, Disciplinary Rules DR 7-102(6) and DR 7-106(c)(1) This would hold true even where the testimony is not in fact given to the grand jury but is made known to the prosecutor with the intent that he relate it to the grand jury. However, it should be obvious to the experienced practitioner that the offer to the prosecutor should itself be memorialized.

3. The absent witness.—Federal Rule of Evidence 804(b)(1) recognizes a hearsay exception for testimony given by a witness who is unavailable to testify at the trial or hearing if the testimony was given at another hearing of the same or different proceedings and if the party against whom it is offered had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross or re-direct examination. The witness is considered unavailable if he claims the lack of memory, asserts a testimonial privilege or a constitutional privilege, is dead or infirm, refuses to testify or is otherwise absent through no fault of the party seeking the introduction of the prior statement.

It must be noted that the defendant does not have an opportunity to cross-examine a witness in the grand jury. Therefore, the government cannot use this rule to admit grand jury testimony where the witness is unavailable at the trial, for to do so would defeat the defendant's right of confrontation. See generally, McCormick, Evidence, Section 255 (Second Edition, 1972). Perpetuation of testimony is essential where any of the above reasons for the defense witnesses' absence become apparent.

III. METHODOLOGY

A. Informing the Court or the Prosecutor

Having resolved the question of whether or not to seek the presentation of favorable evidence to the grand jury, counsel is now confronted with a second problem, that of determining the manner in which to bring this evidence before the grand jury. The law is well settled that there is no constitutional right to appear as a witness before the grand jury. As to whether the witness may apply to the court for an order directing the grand jury to permit his testimony or proffering of other evidence see In Re Application of Iaconi, 120 F. Supp. 589 (D. Mass., 1952) and In Re Investigation by January, 1952 Grand Jury, 102 F. Supp. 911 (W.D.P., 1952).

Counsel's strategy must be tailored to meet the rationale employed by the district court and the reviewing circuit as to the function of the grand jury. Where the grand jury is considered a "tool of the prosecutor" it has been held that the government need not present evidence to the grand jury which undermines its own. United States v. Gardner, 516 F. 2d 334 (7th Cir., 1975), United States v. Eucker, 532 F. 2d 249 (2d Cir., 1976), Jack v. United States, 409 F. 2d 522 (9th Cir., 1969). The irony of this is that on its recent occasions to define and limit the scope of grand jury investigations, the United States Supreme Court has consistently relied upon a "sword and shield" theory of the grand jury's existence. United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 38 L. Ed. 2d 561, 94 S. Ct. 613 (1974); United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 35 L. Ed. 2d 67, 93 S. Ct. 764 (1973).

On the state level there seems to be a growing body of law supporting a grand jury target's right to have favorable evidence considered by the grand jury before deliberations commence on an indictment. In Johnson v. Superior Court of San Joaquin County, 15 Cal. 3d 248, 124 Cal. Rep. 32, 539 P. 2d 792 (1975), the Supreme Court of California decided en banc that a California statutory provision placed a duty upon the district attorney to inform the grand jury of the existence of favorable evidence which was known to him. The statute read as follows:

"Evidence for defendant, authority to exclude; weighing evidence; order for production of explanatory evidence.

"The grand jury is not required to hear evidence for the defendant, but it shall weigh all the evidence submitted to it, and when it has reason to believe that other evidence within its reach will explain away the charge, it shall order the evidence to be produced, and for that purpose may require the district attorney to issue process for the witness (California Penal Code, Section 939.7)."

While the court in Johnson expressly based its opinion on statutory grounds, much of its rationale dealt with the protective role of the grand jury and the Fifth Amendment guarantee. It went on to hold that when a district attorney seeking an indictment is aware of evidence reasonably tending to negate guilt, he has an obligation to inform the grand jury of its nature and existence so that the grand jury may exercise its power under the statute to order the evidence produced. The court expressly did not consider the alternative due process argument. In a concurring opinion by Justice Mosk, the due process argument was fully considered as well as other constitutional aspects of the problem.

The Supreme Court of Iowa in State v. Hall, 235 N.W. 2d 702 (Iowa, 1976) when confronted with the same issue as presented to the California Supreme Court in Johnson, held that due process of law requires that where the prosecutor has information that tends to explain away the charge being investigated, he is under a duty to both inform the grand jury of the existence of the evidence and to present it to the grand jury. Much of the language in Hall dealt with the rationale of the grand jury being a buffer standing between the state and the potential defendant.

While no court of review in the State of New York has ever considered the question directly, in People v. Dumas, 274 N.Y.S. 764, 51 Misc. 2d 921 (Supreme Court, St. Lawrence County, 1966) in a well reasoned opinion, held that the prosecutor has a duty to make the grand jury aware of evidence tending to negate the defendant's guilt prior to their deliberating on the return of an indictment.

It would seem that in jurisdictions which currently require the prosecutor to present or make known to the grand jury favorable evidence, the defendant looses nothing by memorializing and communicating to the prosecutor that evidence which he feels would negate or explain away the charge. This is especially true because courts have been historically reluctant to intercede in grand jury investigations, and as shall be demonstrated later, direct communications with the grand jury will present counsel with problems that needn't be confronted in these jurisdictions. Cf. People v. Scars, 49 Ill. 2d 14, 273 N.E. 2d 388 (1971).

B. Direct communication to the Grand Jury

Any recognition of the grand jury as a body functioning separate and apart from the executive, judicial or legislative branches of the government recognizes that the grand jury has intrinsic power to conduct investigations on its own and without the prosecutor's assistance or consent. United States v. Thompson, 251 U.S. 407, 413–415, 64 L. Ed. 333 (1920); In Re Report and Recommendation of June 5, 1972, Grand Jury, 370 F. Supp. 1219 (D.D.C., 1974) it follows then that the grand jury can also obtain its own leads and tips and carry out its investigation thereof. This proposition is lucidly and articulatly presented and developed in United States v. Smyth, 104 F. Supp. 283 (N.D. Cal., 1952), an authoritative exposition enhanced by 110 foot notes. In Dolan v. United States, 214 F. 2d 454 (8th Cir., 1955) it was held that whatever leads are received by the grand jury must be developed and run down to find as accurately as possible what the truth is.

The question as to whether to directly communicate with the grand jury is not so easily answered. Many pitfalls and obstacles line the path to direct communication and counsel must be extraordinarily cautious to consider each of them in making his decision.

The ultimate question which must be resolved in the light of the circumstances of the particular case is "does the First Amendment give a person with knowledge of the facts and occurrences which the grand jury is investigating the right to inform the grand jury of their existence?".

In Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 8 L. Ed. 2d 569, 82 S. Ct. 1364 (1962) the United States Supreme Court held that the "clear and present danger" standard applies to First Amendment protection of statements made out of court calculated to be communicated to the grand jury. This was a State case and came before the Court to review a conviction for criminal contempt. On the state-level, the Georgia Appellate Court, while affirming the counts that ultimately went to the United States Supreme Court, reversed a count wherein the petitioner was convicted of contempt for directly communicating to the grand jury by means of a letter. Wood v. State, 103 Ga. App. 305, 119 S.E. 2d 261 (1961). The Court so held even though the letter contained the statement that the grand jury should investigate the democratic committee instead of the communicant.

The "clear and present danger" standard, when applied to communications to the grand jury, must focus on the question of whether the communication is calculated to obstruct the grand jury or intimidate its members. In Thomas v. Crevasse, 415 F. 2d 550 (5th Cir., 1969) a charge was made that a written communication passed out in the corridor leading to the grand jury's deliberation room presented a "veiled threat" to the grand jurors because the message contained in the communication was intended to intimidate. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held that the First Amendment protected such communication and that the language in any communication directed to the grand jury must present an "extremely serious threat to the grand jury deliberations in order to justify a contempt conviction".

Not all courts have maintained this view of communication to the grand jury. In a somewhat different context the Illinois Supreme Court held in People v. Parker, 397 Ill. 305, 74 N.E. 2d 523 (1947) that a letter directed by the defendant to the grand jury charging the Chicago Tribune, the Cook County Regular Democratic Organization, the States Attorney, County Assessor, State Director of Revenue, and others, with illegally avoiding property taxes and conspiring to do so, was not protected by the First Amendment. The letter contained an offer to appear before the grand jury and produce evidence in support of the accusations. The Court held that this conduct tended to obstruct the administration of justice and that the defendant could not avail himself of the Constitution as a shield. This was the second time that Parker had directly communicated the charges to the grand jury. See also People v. Parker, 374 Ill. 524, 30 N.E. 2d 11 (1940). There are two points relating to Parker II that are noteable. First of all, it was decided some fifteen years before Wood v. Georgia. Second, the United States Supreme Court granted a Writ of Certiorari in Parker II. With Mr. Justice Jackson not participating in the question on the merits (First Amendment protection) the judgment was affirmed by an equally divided court. 334 U.S. 816, 92 L. Ed. 1747 (1948).

On a set of facts similar to the situation to which this discussion is directed, the Illinois Supreme Court followed its Parker I decision in People v. Doss, 382 Ill. 307, 46 N.E. 2d 984 (1943). In holding without discussion that Parker I established that the First Amendment did not protect communications to the grand jury, the court held that a target of the grand jury investigation who circularized to the grand jury copies of his newspaper articles, sought thereby to influence the grand jury in its deliberations concerning the criminal charges under investigation and therefor was guilty of contempt. Although the opinion does not contain a reproduction of the content of the articles, it indicates that the articles were argumentative and not intended to inform the grand jury of exculpatory evidence.

In addition to the problem presented by contempt proceedings, 18 U.S.C., Section 1504 provides a statutory prohibition of attempting to influence any grand juror upon any issue or matter pending before such juror by writing or sending to him any communication. In Duke v. United States, 90 F. 2d 840 (4th Cir., 1937) a conviction was upheld for violation of this statute's predecessor. Eleven years after Duke was decided this section was amended, adding the language "nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the communication of a request to appear before the grand jury". It would seem that this additional language, when construed in conjunction with Wood v. Georgia, would give First Amendment protection to a communication in writing to the grand jury requesting an opportunity to appear before it for the specific purpose of proferring specific, enunciated evidence. Since the grand jury can consider hearsay testimony there does not appear to be any requirement that the communication be made by the same witness that would be necessary to present the testimony to the trial jury. Therefore, consistent with the goal of avoiding indictment, any witness could communicate this request. However, in relation to the goal of perpetuation of testimony for later use at trial, the communication should be presented by the witness with direct knowledge of the facts to be adduced.

No matter what form the communication to the grand jury takes and regardless of from whom the communication is disseminated, counsel should be aware of the common law crime of embracery which has been embodied by many States into the statutory law. Embracery is defined as "the offense of attempting to corrupt, influence, or instruct a jury or juror or of inducing them in any way, such as by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainment, etc., except by the strength of evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court, to be more favorable to one side of a case than to the other". 26 Am. Jur. 2d, Embracery, Section 1. The key to the charge of embracery is the attempt to curry favor with the grand jury. All that need be proven is the attempt, and success is not a material element. Osborn v. United States, 385 U.S. 323, 17 L. Ed. 2d 394, 87 S. Ct. 429 (1966). Therefore, counsel should take every available precaution to insure that the communication, whatever its nature and regardless of its source, is couched in language which is clearly objective and non-argumentative.

CONCLUSION

No general rule can be established regarding the wisdom of volunteering information to the grand jury. Each case must turn on its own facts and profile. Where the decision has been made in favor of informing the grand jury as to the existence of exculpatory evidence, counsel should use the method that is calculated to succeed in having the grand jury hear the evidence but not without concern for the various ramifications of the method employed. Where counsel has decided to communicate directly to the grand jury by means of a writing, great care must be taken in drafting the communication. A suggested form accompanies this monograph. Regardless of the form employed, counsel should serve copies on the prosecutor and the court so as to preserve his record.

STATEMENT BY G. WAYNE GLICK, ON BEHALF OF THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN GENERAL BOARD

I am G. Wayne Glick, 713 Scott Lane, Wallingford, Pennsylvania, a minister of the Church of the Brethren. I have served on the National Council of Churches program committee on Education in the Society, a major concern of which has been the criminal justice system and its reform. I have also been personally concerned with this precise issue as a result of the activity of my son and others in opposing the Vietnam War and being subjected to the abuses of the grand jury system and later incarceration as a result. I speak for the Church of the Brethren General Board, which is the top administrative body of our denomination and represents approximately 1,000 congregations and 200,000 persons across the country.

Church of the Brethren position

At the June, 1975, meeting of our Annual Conference, a comprehensive statement on "Criminal Justice Reform" was approved. While the statement deals for the most part with treatment of criminal offenders in our society, it does include two statements regarding the grand jury. In a section entitled "Some Areas of Concern" there is included the following:

"Prosecutors often use grand juries as a rubber stamp to bring criminal charges, and on occasion to harass citizens, to abuse their rights and liberties, or to pursue political purposes."

The second section of the statement entitled "Acting Out God's Justice and Love" suggests some things that Brethren can do to express Christian concern in the area of criminal justice. In a subsection dealing with systemic change the statement encourages Brethren to work for the following:

"That the constitutional independence between grand juries and prosecutors be restored or alternate safeguards be provided in order to prevent prosecutors from using grand juries for political purposes, harassment and the curtailment of citizen rights and liberties."

The entire statement of the Annual Conference is appended for your information.

I turn now to the problem of grand jury abuse. I will review the historical purpose of the grand jury, discuss current problems and abuses, and make recommendations for legislative reforms that would restore the constitutional independence between grand juries and prosecutors and provide safeguards against political abuse, as is called for in our Church of the Brethren statement.

Historical purpose of the grand jury

From the time of the Assize of Clarendon in the twelfth century the grand jury has been seen as a shield for the common citizen against unfair criminal accusations by those in power. Senator Edward Kennedy, in testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommitee Number 1 (March 13, 1973), pointed out that "By barring any indictment for a crime unless the charge was first approved by an independent body of impartial citizens, the grand jury interposed itself as a solid barrier of protection against unjust and unfounded prosecutions by the Crown."

In America the grand jury was instituted in 1634 in Massachusetts and in subsequent years was used as "an important shield for American patriots in the pre-Revolutionary period, a bulwark against the oppressive actions of George III and his colonial governors." In the constituting documents of the American republic the grand jury was established by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any Criminal Case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

Current problems and abuses

From an instrument of protection for the common citizen, the grand jury has become an instrument of harassment. In recent years the flexibility of the grand jury has been exploited for political purposes. One such purpose has been the gathering of information on citizens and groups, and a body of law has developed setting forth the casuistry by which such intelligence gathering can take place. This body of law centers around use immunity and transactional immunity, which in themselves presuppose that the grand jury is in alliance with the prosecutor against the witness. This presupposition is crucial and antithetical to constitutional guarantees.

The use of the grand jury in recent years makes clear the distortion of its constitutional intention to protect the innocent and instead places a witness in a star chamber setting. The witness cannot have counsel present when he appears before a grand jury; the prosecutor need make no showing that he has any reason to believe that the witness named on a subpoena has any information relevant to the investigation; since federal grand juries enjoy nationwide service of process, witnesses may be required to cross the continent to testify; there is no minimum notice required in issuance of a subpoena; no judge is present, nor is there any instruction by a judge as to the way in which to apply law to the facts.

In other words, the witness is at the mercy of the "good will and legal rectitude" of the prosecutor. Transcripts of grand jury proceedings make it clear that such dependence falls far short of constitutional guarantee. For example, on March 27, 1972, when Mr. Samuel Popkin appeared before a Boston grand jury, the following exchange took place:

"Question. Mr. Popkin, perhaps I should rephrase that question. What is your opinion as to persons you believe possessed the Pentagon Papers in Massachusetts prior to June 13, 1971?

"Answer. Is this grand jury really asking me to violate confidences necessary to my research, simply to discover my opinion?

"Question. The grand jury does not answer questions."

The abuses to which the grand jury has been put are legion and can be documented almost endlessly. To be sure, the United States Attorney is under obligation to "serve the law"; the question at issue, however, goes to a fundamental constitutional, and indeed human, crux: What is to prevent a distortion of the purpose of the law where secrecy is invoked and the balance of advocacy is denied?

Suggested reforms

Reforms clearly needed in the grand jury system include:

1. Providing venue to a witness in proximity to a citizen's residence;

2. Abolishing the whole system of immunities and punishment for contempt as a prosecutor's device;
3. Providing counsel for witnesses when they appear before the grand jury;
4. Providing the opportunity to challenge the composition of a grand jury to guarantee a true representation of peers;
5. Requiring instruction by a judge (a) as to the parameters legally binding on a prosecutor, and (b) declaring the independent buffer function of the grand jury;
6. Requiring minimum notice between the issuance of a subpoena and the witness' appearance;
7. Requiring the keeping of a complete transcript to be made available to the witness;
8. Forbidding the use of the grand jury to gather evidence for an indictment already returned;
9. Requiring the prosecutor to present any exculpatory evidence to a grand jury.

CONCLUSION

In sum, we argue on the basis of a biblical doctrine substantially recognized by the system of checks and balances incorporated into the Constitution, that no person charged with the service of the law should be implicitly trusted. Specifically, the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution seeks to guard against the abuse of power by public officials in its provision for grand jury indictment. We affirm the intent of the Constitution in providing for the grand jury and would therefore oppose any Constitutional amendments which would bypass or destroy that intent.

Trusting the people, and beyond that trusting the God of all peoples, is the ineluctable condition of freedom. We therefore call upon this subcommittee and upon Congress to excise from our national life those elements of harassment and of suspicion which have come to characterize the grand jury in recent years.

I would be pleased to have the Subcommittee contact me or the Washington Office of the Church of the Brethern, 100 Maryland Ave., NE., Washington, D.C. 20002, for further information or testimony.

(Statement of Annual Conference, June 1975)

CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM

The imprisoned are perhaps the most neglected and abused group in our society. Ironically, when these offenders are neglected and abused, not only they but society as well is victimized. The New Testament symbol of the towel impels Brethern to reach out to those who have been made outcasts and scapegoats. Whenever this effort is fruitful, society itself becomes healthier and more secure.

I. SOME AREAS OF CONCERN

The failures of our present criminal justice system are widely apparent. The rising crime rate is one evidence that the system neither deters nor rehabilitates.

There are many specific areas of concern.

1. The system tends to serve the powerful segments of the society and to protect property at the expense of persons.
2. The arbitrary use of discretionary power in dealing with offenders often punishes the poor and powerless, frees the rich and powerful, and allows the prejudices of society to run unchallenged.
3. Our social institutions, including families, schools, welfare agencies, and churches, share a responsibility for creating or permitting the conditions which result in criminal behavior.
4. Racial, ethnic, and sexual discrimination is prevalent, and damaging to persons.
5. The public has come to accept many misconceptions: That prisons protect us from crime; that reformatories reform, correctional centers correct, penitentiaries teach penitence; that incarceration rehabilitates; that most people in prison are dangerous; that one must be an expert in criminology to help a law offender; that poor people and minority groups are more inclined to commit crimes than others; that more money for police, police hardware, judges, and itation; that most lawbreakers are in jail or prison; and that all persons in jail are guilty.

6. The education, training, and salaries of police, correctional officers, and keepers of the jail frequently are not commensurate with their job requirements.

7. Prosecutors often use grand juries as a rubber stamp to bring criminal charges, and on occasion to harass citizens, to abuse their rights and liberties, or to pursue political purposes.

8. Jails, prisons, and lockups are at best human warehouses and at worst brutal, unsanitary dens. Incarceration itself is dehumanizing and takes away from persons their economic base, breaks down their family ties, and separates them from helpful community resources.

9. The demoralizing homosexual assaults and abuse by inmates in the prison upon short or long sentenced individuals entering the correctional institution often leaves the individual with life long emotional and moral scars.

10. Many alleged offenders are kept in jail solely because of inability to pay bail money.

11. Too much money, effort, and time are spent on security and far too little on helping prisoners develop skills and attitudes for re-integration into society.

12. Offenders are limited to "doing time" as punishment rather than using time for personal growth or direct and meaningful restitution to the offended.

13. The carrot-stick philosophy in which the promise of release is conditional upon "model" prisoner behavior is one of the most cruel aspects of incarceration.

14. Parole boards often base their decisions about the amount of time to be served on insufficient and inaccurate information which is not subject to public scrutiny or due process.

15. In many areas young people are often incarcerated with adults for offenses which would not be considered offenses if they were adults.

II. ACTING OUT GOD'S JUSTICE AND LOVE

In offering guidance to Brethren who seek to express Christian concern in the area of criminal justice we see three general approaches: working with individual offenders, reforming the system, and living an alternative. We believe that each of these approaches has validity within the Christian context. We encourage Brethren to be challenged by all of these recommendations and to act upon that combination which is consistent with their convictions.

A. Working with individual offenders

Those who make direct contact with prisoners and their families touch one of the bitterest aspects of incarceration—isolation. This ministry can be a demonstration of agape love, and might be expressed in a variety of ways:

1. Visiting incarcerated persons as a friend and advocate. (Because of differences in social, economic, and religious backgrounds, Brethren need to avoid being judgmental, condescending, or paternalistic.)

2. Assisting prisoners in obtaining an attorney, in securing reading material, and in purchasing items from the commissary.

3. Helping to preserve family ties by bringing prisoners information about their families, assisting family members in obtaining transportation to and from the prison, and seeing that dependents are cared for.

4. Offering to teach academic subjects, crafts, music, drama, and to lead group counseling and recreation.

5. Providing worship opportunities and counseling where desired.

6. Helping ex-offenders find meaningful employment and, if necessary, suitable lodging. (According to authorities, the highest percentage of parole failures occur within the first six months after release, with the greater number occurring within the first sixty days.)

7. Helping to provide bail money, thus enabling prisoners to take a larger role in preparing for their own defense and to return to their families, jobs, and other supporting relationships.

8. Standing up with defendants in court, thus increasing their chances of avoiding incarceration.

B. Reforming the system

Some Brethren show an increasing interest in systemic change. A strength of this approach is that it can multiply the number of beneficiaries. These Brethren are encouraged to work for the following changes:

jails will make our society safer; that "model prison behavior" signifies rehabil-

1. That alternatives to incarceration and diversion programs (detoxification centers for the care of alcohol and drug abusers, halfway houses, release on recognizance, bail reform, trial diversion to allow for resolution before charges are filed, probation, work/study releases, and weekend sentences) be used whenever applicable.
2. That paying bail bond for release pending trial be replaced by a more just system which might include release to the supervision of a responsible person, a nonprofit agency, a probation or parole officer, or, as a last resort, detention with release during certain hours.
3. That prison populations be reduced instead of building new prisons.
4. That more community-based correctional centers be established in order to keep offenders close to home and utilize existing community resources for rehabilitation.
5. That offenders to be incarcerated be given a choice between a sentence which is automatically completed when contracted objectives are achieved and sentence which is completed at the end of a fixed period.
6. That more appropriate and helpful means be found to deal with offenses such as vagrancy, drug use, drunkenness, gambling, and prostitution. (At present, half of those arrested and half of those in local jails are charged with these offenses.)
7. That appropriate legislation be enacted and enforced to guarantee minimum standards for all jails and prisons and to safeguard the right of prisoners to due process.
8. That behavior modification methods such as shock and drug therapy never be administered unless freely chosen by a prisoner under no threat or coercion.
9. That the use of capital punishment be abolished.
10. That all incarcerated defendants be guaranteed the right to trial within sixty days.
11. That the constitutional independence between grand juries and prosecutors be restored or alternate safeguards be provided in order to prevent prosecutors from using grand juries for political purposes, harassment and the curtailment of citizen rights and liberties.
12. That youth offenders be housed only with their peer group.

C. Living an alternative

Some Brethren believe that Christians are especially called and uniquely enabled to offer a response wholly different from that of the criminal justice system. These members are encouraged to:

1. Actively seek relationships with offenders, and those in danger of becoming offenders, in an effort to provide a constructive and supportive influence.
2. Be open to accepting offenders into their communities, homes and businesses, and to inviting judges and probation authorities to place accused or convicted persons in their care rather than in prison.
3. Consider carefully whether it is in harmony with the teaching to overcome evil with good to report wrongs done against themselves to police authorities.
4. Avoid employment or direct participation in the operation of the criminal justice system, and urge others to consider their own participation in light of New Testament teaching.

III. IMPLEMENTATION

To affirm and implement the goals of this statement, the 1975 Annual Conference:

1. Asks the General Board to make criminal justice reform and ministry to offenders and to the victims of crimes a 1976–77 program priority with appropriate staffing and funding. This would include providing continuing motivation, guidance and assistance, and the use of a communications network.
2. Calls upon the church, especially districts, to initiate and develop creative ministries and constructive action, and to mobilize for an intensive effort in key areas where opportunity, resources, and need seem greatest.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law Subcommittee, House Judiciary Committee, The U.S. House of Representatives

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: Our national president, Dick Leonard, editor of the Milwaukee Journal, has asked me to inform you that the Society supports the position of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse regarding your grand jury reform legislation.

That position is, of course, also supported by our national Freedom of Information Committee headed by Scott Aiken of the Cincinnati Enquirer, who conveyed the message to me.

We appreciate your efforts in this area, especially where the Fourth Estate may be endangered in its efforts to keep the public informed.

Sincerely,

VAL HYMES,
Director, Region 2.

THE DISTRICT JUDGES ASSOCIATION OF THE FIFTH CIRCUIT,
July 1, 1977.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The District Judges Association of the Fifth Circuit passed the enclosed Resolutions at its annual meeting at the Fifth Circuit Judicial Conference at Birmingham, Alabama on the 4th day of May, 1977.

The District Judges Association consists of approximately 75 active and senior District Court Judges. The Association President, James Lawrence King, requested that I forward copies of the enclosed Resolutions to you.

Yours very truly,

WILLIAM S. SESSIONS,
U.S. District Judge,
Legislation Committee Chairman,
D.J.A., Fifth Circuit.

Enclosures.

Resolved, That the District Judges' Association of the Fifth Circuit expresses its disapproval of H.R. 94 and urges its rejection by the Congress.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE SPECIAL PROSECUTOR,
New York, N.Y., July 11, 1977.

Hon. EDWARD I. KOCH,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN KOCH: The enclosed excerpt from the Congressional Record of June 22, 1977 was brought to my attention last week. I am taking the liberty of sending you the following:

1. The opinion of Justice Howard Jones, dated March 4, 1977, in which he passed upon the propriety of the Grand Jury presentation.
2. An article from the June 1, 1977 edition of Newsday.
3. An article from the June 2, 1977 edition of The New York Times.
4. A column from the July 2, 1977 edition of the New York Post.
5. The minutes of the proceeding before Justice Jones on June 17, 1977, after this case had been remanded to him by the Appellate Division.

Congressman Eilberg of Pennsylvania brought to the attention of the House of Representatives the opinion of the Appellate Division as "another example of why the Judiciary Subcommittee . . . has been conducting hearings on H.R. 94 which would provide for the first comprehensive reform of the Federal Grand Jury system since the birth of our Nation."

In view of the fact that the Congressman unintentionally, but incorrectly, stated, "the prosecutor went back to the grand jury again and again to secure an indictment," we would hope that this enclosed information could be considered in order to complete the record. In my judgment it would be unfair if the Congressional Record did not include all material made public concerning this matter. It is therefore my hope that the enclosed would be inserted into the Record.

I appreciate your attention to this matter.

Very truly yours,

JOHN F. KEENAN.

APPEALS COURT CITES ABUSE OF GRAND JURY

(By Hon. Joshua Eilberg, of Pennsylvania in the House of Representatives, Wednesday, June 22, 1977)

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, just recently the appellate division of the Supreme Court of New York reviewed a case in which it found that a special State prosecutor used what it called coercive methods to indicate a judge in Queens County.

This case, Mr. Speaker, is another example of why the Judiciary Subcommittee which I chair has been conducting hearings on H.R. 94, which would provide for the comprehensive reform of the Federal grand jury system since the birth of our Nation.

In the case at hand, the five appellate judges ruled unanimously that the prosecutor was responsible for "procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

In this case, the prosecutor went back to the grand jury again and again to secure an indictment. The judges noted that this was a serious breach of the historic role of the grand jury "to remain truly free and independent of outside influence."

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following materials describing this case:

[From the New York Times, June 1, 1977]

JUSTICE, PROSECUTOR CRITICIZED BY COURT IN GROH INDICTMENT

(By Max H. Seigel)

The Appellate Division in Brooklyn yesterday accused Justice Leonard H. Sandler of State Supreme Court and the Special state anticorruption prosecutor, John F. Keenan, of having used "coercive" methods to get a Queens County grand jury to indict Judge Robert T. Groh of Civil Court last November on charges of bribery and grand larceny.

The appellate justices said that if they could, they would throw out the indictments, but that they could not do so because the lawyers for Judge Groh still had recourse to State Supreme Court.

It was the first time Mr. Keenan had been accused of using the kind of overzealous tactics that had led to the dismissal of charges against many persons indicated by Maurice H. Nadjari, Mr. Keenan's predecessor as special prosecutor for corruption in the criminal justice system.

"Had the motion been submitted to us from the start," the five appellate justices said in a unanimous opinion on the Groh case, "we would have granted the application and ordered that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

Mr. Keenan and an assistant, Stephen Sawyer, had brought before the Queens grand jury charges that Mr. Groh, while deputy borough president of Queens in 1972, had sought a political campaign contribution of more than $10,000 from a law firm representing the Sheraton Corporation to help it get a zoning variance to expand its inn at La Guardia Airport.

GRATUITOUS DISCUSSION

After hearing the evidence, the grand jury voted not to indict Mr. Groh. Afterward, according to the Appellate Division "the special prosecutor, having learned of the result, re-entered the grand jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict."

"And without any request from the grand jury," the ruling went on, "he then suggested to it that the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired."

According to the court records, one grand juror questioned the usefulness of such a gesture on the ground that a vote already had been taken and the matter disposed of, but the special prosecutor insisted that additional instructions from the judge might enable the grand jury "to adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter."

This was done, the Appellate Division said, notwithstanding the fact that the grand jury had done just that—"reached, voted on and recorded its determination."

[The special prosecutor then retired from the jury room and a vote was taken. "Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions," the appellate justices said, and "despite the fact that there was no request by the grand jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the special prosecutor and the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term appeared before the grand jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge."]

NARROW VOTE TO INDICT

The grand jury then took another vote and decided to indict Mr. Groh by the minimum margin—12 to 7.

The appellate justice said: "Aside from the fact that we view these 'further instructions' to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they have no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well-motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system."

The justices added that "under the facts of this case, it was improper for either the special prosecutor of the court to have interceded in the proceedings once the grand jury had voted to dismiss." And, they said, "to sanction such a procedure" would "permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly-arrived-at determinations."

The justices suggested that Mr. Groh apply again to Justice Howard A. Jones of State Supreme Court, who had twice previously refused to dismiss the charges.

"In the light of the views here expressed," the Appellate Division said, the learned justice at the extraordinary special and trial term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor."

In denying motions for dismissal on March 4 and March 15, Justice Jones had made it clear he would welcome submittal of the controversy to the Appellate Division, "there apparently being no precedent" on which he "might rely in resolving these questions."

KEENAN'S REACTION

Commenting on the decision, Mr. Keenan said yesterday: "I certainly agree that the grand jury should not be badgered, and obviously, I don't think we did. What we did was well-intentioned and well-motivated and I'm not going to quarrel with the decision."

The special prosecutor added that he might try now to present the case again before another grand jury, he might apply to Justice Jones for permission to present the case again, or he might intervene when Judge Groh moves again for dismissal before Justice Jones.

Marvin B. Segal, Judge Groh's lawyer, said yesterday he would promptly submit another application for dismissal to Justice Jones.

"The Appellate Division decision," he said "is a strong suggestion, of not a directive, to dismiss. To try the case now would be a useless procedure since the Appellate Justices have made it clear that any conviction after trial in a lower court would be reversed."

Mr. Segal said that he had not gone directly to the Appellate Division because he had not seen the grand jury's minutes and so had been unaware of the actions of the special prosecutor and Justice Sandler. "It was an extraordinary procedure by two very able men," he said. "It's impermissible for a judge to go into a grand jury room."

Justice Sandler said yesterday that he had gone to the grand jury purely for the convenience of the jurors. "It was easier for me to go to them in Queens," he said, "than to have all of them to come to my courtroom in Manhattan."

In welcoming the appellate decision, Judge Groh—who was elected a judge of the Civil Court shortly before his indictment—said yesterday he was "proud to be a member of the system that treats defendants equitably."

APPELLATE DIVISION

Second Department

(People vs. Groh)

After a full presentation of the evidence, a charge on the law by the Special Prosecutor and a spirited discussion among the grand jurors, they voted to dismiss the proposed charges. The Special Prosecutor reentered the room and suggested that the Justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term would be willing to provide a further charge on the law. The utility of such a gesture was questioned by a grand juror. The Special Prosecutor retired and a vote was taken. Only three jurors voted to receive further instructions. Nevertheless, the Special Prosecutor and the Justice appeared on a later day and delivered a further charge. The grand jurors voted the indictment by the narrowest permissible margin. Defendant's application to dismiss the indictment or, pursuant to article 78, to prohibit further proceedings, was denied at the Extraordinary Term. The Appellate Division, for lack of jurisdiction to overturn the prior decision, denied this motion for identical relief. It advised defendant to renew his application before the same justice at the Extraordinary Term. Both the Special Prosecutor and the court, ex parte, acted improperly by interceding in the grand jury proceedings.

THE PEOPLE, etc., PLAINTIFF, v. ROBERT T. GROH, DEFENDANT.

In the matter of Robert T. Groh, petitioner, v. Howard A. Jones, as Justice of the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, County of Queens, et al., respondent.

Decided May 31, 1977

Before Gulotta, P. J.; Martuscello, Cohalan, Damiani and Shapiro, J. J.

Motion pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh for an order dismissing an indictment filed against him or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting further proceedings with respect to the said indictment.

Segal & Hundley, New York, N.Y., for defendant-petitioner.

John F. Keenan, Deputy Attorney General, New York, N.Y. (George F. Bradlau of counsel), respondent pro se and for plaintiff.

Per Curiam—This is a motion pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh, a defendant in a pending criminal action, for an order dismissing the indictment filed against him by the Extraordinary Special Grand Jury for the County of Queens, or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting the Trial Justice assigned to the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term, and the Special Prosecutor, from proceeding with respect to the said indictment.

Motion denied and proceeding dismissed, without costs or disbursements.

Consideration by this court of the prayer for relief pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law is barred by the fact that an identical motion had been made before the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term and was denied by it on March 4, 1977; that determination was adhered to upon reconsideration on March 15, 1977. The availability of relief by motion to this court pursuant to Section 149 (subd. 2) is an alternative to proceeding before the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term and, having elected to proceed before Acting Supreme Court Justice Jones in the first instance, defendant is now precluded from attempting to overturn his decision by a de novo application to this court (see Matter of Dondi v. Jones, 40 NY 2d 8, 15).

So far as the application for relief in the nature of prohibition is concerned, we must take cognizance of the holding of the Court of Appeals in Matter of State of New York v. King (36 NY 2d 59, 62):

"The extraordinary remedy either of prohibition or mandamus lies only where there is a clear legal right, and in the case of prohibition only when a court (if a court is involved) acts or threatens to act without jurisdiction in a matter over which it has no power over the subject matter or where it exceeds its authorized powers in a proceeding over which it has jurisdiction (see, e.g., Proskin v. County

Ct. of Albany County, 30 NY 2d 15, 18; Matter of Lee v. County Ct. of Erie County, 27 NY 2d 432, 436–437; Matter of Hogan v. Oulkin, 18 NY 2d 330, 335–336)." (Accord Matter of Nigrone v. Murtagh, 36 NY 2d 421, 423–424.)

While the question is not entirely free of doubt, we have concluded that the allegations proffered by the defendant Groh fail to raise a jurisdictional issue (see Matter of Paciona v. Marshall, 35 NY 2d 289; Matter of Wroblewski v. Ricotta, 35 NR 2d 745; cf Matter of Dondi v. Jones, supra; La Rocca v. Lane, 37 NY 2d 575).

We should indicate, however, that had the motion under Section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law been submitted to us ab initio, we would have granted the application and ordered that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system. Here, after a full presentation of the evidence, a charge on the law by the Special Prosecutor, and an apparently spirited discussion among the grand jurors themselves, they voted to dismiss the proposed charges in their entirety, and recorded that determination in their minute book. Thereafter, and this appears without contradiction on the record, the Special Prosecutor, having learned of the result, re-entered the Grand Jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict. Without any request from the Grand Jury, he then suggested to it that the justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired.

The utility of such a gesture was questioned by a grand juror, who told the Special Prosecutor that a vote had already been taken and the matter disposed of, but the latter insisted that a further charge might enable the Grand Jury to "adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter", this notwithstanding the fact that the Grand Jury had done just that—reached, voted on and recorded its determination.

The Special Prosecutor then retired from the Grand Jury room and a vote was taken. Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions. Despite the fact that there was no request by the Grand Jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the Special Prosecutor and the justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term appeared before the Grand Jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge. The grand jurors then retired to deliberate and voted the instant indictment by the narrowest permissible margin (see CPL 190.25 subd. 1).

Aside from the fact that we view these "further instructions" to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they had no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system. That system, which has its origins in antiquity and enjoys no lesser protection than that afforded by the Federal and State Constitutions (U.S. Const., 5th Amdt.; N.Y. Const., art I, Section 6), performs a vital function in our jurisprudence—that of protecting the private citizen from unjust prosecution. As Justice Foster stated in Matter of Gardiner (31 Misc. 364, 366–367, 375, cited with approval in People v. Minet, 296 NY 315, 322):

"The grand jury had its origin at a time when there raged a fierce conflict between the rights of the subject and the power of the crown. It was established to secure to the subject a right of appeal to his peers, under the immunity of secrecy and irresponsibility, before the government could bring him to trial. It was a right wrung from the government to secure the subject against oppression.

* * * * * * *

"[As] was rightly said by Judge King, in the case of Lloyd and Carpenter, 5 Penn. L.J. 62: 'Grand Juries are high public functionaries, * * * They are the great security to the citizen against vindictive persecutions, either by government, or by political partisans, or by private enemies. In their independent action, the persecuted have found the most fearless protectors; and in the records of their doings are to be discovered the noblest stands against the oppression of power, the virulence of malice, and the intemperance of prejudice.'

* * * * * * *

"It is as important to a person that he be fairly and justly accused of crime as that he be fairly and impartially tried therefor" (emphasis supplied).

However, this historical function can only be carried out if the grand jury remains truly free and independent of outside influences. As was stated by Justice Callagahan in People v. Both (118 Misc. 414, 423):

"The life and liberty of the individual depend largely upon the citizens who are called from all walks of life to act as jurors. They are in every instance the sole judges of the facts, and, when called as grand jurors, they are the judges of the law as well as of the facts. The administration of the criminal law lies largely with grand and petit juries. It is through the jury system alone that the people have a part in the administration of the law. It is important, therefore, that no undue influence or coercion be exerted at any stage of a prosecution to influence unduly the judgment of a juror." (See, also, People v. Cunningham, NYLJ, April 28, 1977, p. 10, col. 4; People v. Benin, 186 Misc. 548; United States v. Rintelen, 235 F. 787.)

Clearly, this is not a case in which the Grand Jury has voted to reconsider the charges sua sponte (see People v. Stecker, 141 Misc. 417; 42 CJS, Indictments and Informations, Section 25), nor is it a case in which the court having charge of the grand jury, upon an appropriate showing, has directed that the charges be resubmitted following a failure to indict (CPL 190.75, subd. 3; see People ex rel. Flinn v. Barr, 259 NY 104; People v. Potter, 50 AD 2d 410). Under the facts of this case it was improper for either the Special Prosecutor or the court, ex parte, to have interceded in the proceedings once the Grand Jury had voted to dismiss.

To sanction such a procedure, no matter how well intentioned it may have been in this case, would permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly arrived at determinations. Nevertheless, while firmly convinced of the grave impropriety underlying the present indictment, this court is without jurisdiction to deal with it at this juncture. However, in the light of the views here expressed, the learned Justice at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor.

Gulotta, P. J.; Martuscello, Cohalan and Shapiro, J. J., concur. Damiani, J., concurs in the result.

SUPREME COURT: STATE OF NEW YORK, SPECIAL ADDITIONAL TRIAL TERM, QUEENS COUNTY

(Decision and Order, Ind. No. 2477/76, S. P. No. Q92/76)

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK
v.
ROBERT T. GROH, DEFENDANT

JONES, J.

The defendant is charged in this indictment with two crimes of felony allegedly committed while he was Deputy Borough President of Queens County, prior to September 1973.

The first count charges Grand Larceny First Degree [Penal Law § 155.40(c)] and reads as follows:

"The extraordinary and special Grand Jury of Queens County by this indictment, accuse the defendant of the crime of Grand Larceny in the First Degree (Extortion) in violation of § 155.40 of the Penal Law, committed in the County of Queens as follows:

"The defendant, between on or about February 25, 1972 and April 26, 1973, in the County of Queens, stole property, to wit, a sum of money owned by I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America and its agents, committed by instilling in them a fear that the defendant, then Deputy Borough President of Queens County, would use and abuse his position as a public servant by engaging in conduct within and related to his official duties and by failing and refusing to perform an official duty, in such a manner as to affect the I.T.T. Corporation of America adversely, to wit:

The defendant between on or about February 25, 1972 and on or about April 26, 1973, demanded from an agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America a sum of $20,000, later reduced to $10,000, to be used for the purchase of "tables" at a political fund raising event for Queens Borough President Donald R. Manes. Defendant by this demand, instilled in the agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America a fear that, unless defendant's demand was met, defendant would use and abuse his position as Deputy Borough President to obstruct or defeat an application by I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America for a zone change to permit the expansion of a Sheraton Hotel located opposite LaGuardia Airport in Queens County.

Pursuant to this demand by defendant, on May 22, 1972, an agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America, contributed $3,000 to the Citizens Committee for Donald Manes and on April 6, 1973 an additional $7,000 was earmarked by the agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America for the Donald R. Manes Campaign Committee of which $4,000 was received by this Committee on or about April 26, 1973.

After the initial payment made by the agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America, the zone change sought by Sheraton was approved. On June 28, 1972 the change was approved by the New York City Planning Commission and on July 20, 1972 it was approved by the New York City Board of Estimate."

The second count charges Bribe Receiving [Penal Law § 200.10] and reads in part as follows:

"Between on or about February 25, 1972 and on or about April 26, 1973, in the County of Queens, the defendant, a public servant, to wit, the then Deputy Borough President for the County of Queens, solicited, accepted and agreed to accept a benefit, to wit, a money contribution to a political fund raising event for Queens Borough President Donald R. Manes from an agent of I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America upon an agreement and understanding that his vote, opinion, judgment, action, decision and exercise of discretion as a public servant would hereby be influenced, to wit:

The defendant, between on or about February 25, 1972 and on or about April 26, 1973 solicited $20,000, later reduced to $10,000, to be used for the purchase of "tables" at a political fund raising event for Queens Borough President Donald R. Manes upon the agreement and understanding that defendant would use his position as Deputy Borough President to accommodate I.T.T. Sheraton Corporation of America in its application for a zone change to permit the expansion of a Sheraton Hotel located opposite LaGuardia Airport in Queens County. Pursuant to this solicitation by the defendant. . . ."

Defendant's various requests for relief on this motion will be treated, briefly, in the order presented.

A. MOTION TO DISMISS FIRST COUNT

It is claimed that the first count of the indictment, grand larceny first degree, should be dismissed in that the language of the indictment as stated, is insufficient to allege that crime, in three essential respects: a) there is no allegation of criminal intent, specifically, or generally, hence it fails to charge the needed mens rea; b) there is no allegation that the defendant's conduct "compelled or induced" delivery of money, hence no allegation that he acted knowingly, wrongfully, or unlawfully; and c) the count entirely omits any allegation that the property was obtained by extortion, contrary to Penal Law § 155.45 which requires that "where it is an element of the crime charged that property was . . . obtained by extortion, an indictment must so specify".

Even a cursory reading of the language of the indictment as to this first count, quoted above verbatim intentionally for this purpose, is sufficient to demonstrate the emptiness of the claim that the indictment fails to specify "extortion", there being no other way in which grand larceny first degree can be committed.

Whether defendant's alleged conduct unlawfully compelled or induced the payment of money is of course an evidentiary matter for trial. And, the element of necessary criminal intent in the doing of any act whether alleged in an indictment or not is always an item to be proven in any criminal case. Hence, the Court views as hypertechnical and frivolous, at best, any objections raised along these lines, especially in view of the extensive factual allegations set forth in the indictment. This aspect of defendant's motion is therefore denied.

B. MOTION TO DISMISS SECOND COUNT

Defendant similarly attacks the second count as insufficient on its face in that: (a) It fails to allege intent or mens rea; (b) it fails to allege whether or how the defendant was benefitted and/or (c) how the defendant, acting in his official capacity, was in a position to accommodate the I.T.T. Sheraton Corp.

Although defendant concedes that the pertinent statute, P.L. § 200.10, does not mention "intent", he nevertheless appears to be arguing that since the law requires proof of felonious intent, this allegation should be included in the indictment. No lengthy discussion is necessary to demonstrate the weakness of this argument. The law is clear that intent need not be alleged in an indictment even though it must be proved in every criminal case. The pleading here is therefore sufficient. Furthermore, exactly "how" defendant or some other person benefitted from the alleged activities is a matter of proof for trial even if it may not be obvious to any reasonable person from a reading of the charge. The Court therefore also denies this aspect of defendant's motion.

Defendant contends further, that even if this count of the indictment is found to be valid on its face, the grand jury evidence could not have established any benefit to the defendant himself by virtue of the two payments to the Manes Committee nor could that evidence have established defendant's official ability to accommodate the corporation. The Court has inspected the grand jury minutes and disagrees with counsel's speculations on these points. Vagueness, if any, in this regard may be cured through a bill of particulars. As to whether it is central that the benefit inured to defendant himself or another, the Court refers counsel to the statutory definition of "benefit" in Penal Law § 10.00(17); "benefit" need not flow to defendant.

C. MOTION TO PERMIT INSPECTION OR DISMISS ENTIRE INDICTMENT FOR LEGAL INSUFFICIENCY

The motion to permit defendant to inspect the entire transcript of grand jury testimony and proceedings in this matter or in the alternative, to dismiss the indictment for legal insufficiency, is, after the Court's own inspection, denied. The only reason offered to justify a departure from the usual rule of pre-trial secrecy, is that more highly informed advocacy may occur if this is granted. The Court notes that extensive discovery and inspection has already occurred during the pendency of these motions. These and any other valid, detectable contentions not specifically addressed by counsel have been considered by the Court; and upon consideration of all of the reasons now offered for dismissal, as well as the Court's own review of the grand jury minutes the Court concludes that the charges are based on legally sufficient evidence.

D. MOTION TO DISMISS ON THE GROUND THAT SPECIAL PROSECUTOR WAS AN UNAUTHORIZED PERSON BEFORE THE GRAND JURY

The defendant claims that under C.P.L. 210.20 subd. (1)(c) the grand jury proceedings in this matter were defective within the meaning of C.P.L. 210.35 subd. (5), in that they failed to conform to the requirements governing presentation of evidence to the grand jury to such a degree that the integrity of the proceeding itself was actually impaired and that prejudice to the defendant has resulted or may result.

The facts upon which this contention is based are as follows: The special Queens grand jury with the special prosecutor has its principal legal advisor formally began its investigation into this matter with the commencement of testimony on May 19 and 21, 1976. The Court of Appeals, in Matter of Dondi v. Jones, (40 N.Y. 2d 8), ruled in a 4 to 3 decision that a criminal matter of the type involved here (i.e. unrelated to the enforcement of law or the criminal justice system) was beyond the prosecutorial jurisdiction of the special prosecutor (although not beyond the jurisdiction of this Court or the special grand jury).

The Dondi decision was rendered on June 3 of that year. On September 20th, a letter from the special prosecutor was sent to the Governor requesting a superseding executive order permitting his office to contnue the investigaion and prosecute any resulting indictment. This letter of request also indicated to the Governor that there was no objection to this request on the part of the District Attorney of Queens County. On September 22 and 30, further grand jury sessions were conducted, even though the superseding order had not yet been issued. However, it appears that counsel to the Governor at some undetermined point on, during or after these dates, had advised the special prosecutor's office that the superseder would be forthcoming. Indeed, the superseding Executive Order (No. 57.08), clearly bringing this particular case within the prosecutorial jurisdiction of the special prosecutor's office, was issued on October 6. The same grand jury continued its investigation over several subsequent sessions, without resubmission of any previous testimony, until an indictment was finally voted on November 10, 1976.

C.P.L. 190.25 subd. (3) provides that only certain specified persons, including the district attorney (or by definition, the appropriate prosecutor) may be present during parts of grand jury proceedings.

The defendant's position is that the special prosecutor was an unauthorized person before the grand jury ab initio, in violation of C.P.L. 190.25 (3), and that his status did not change until the new executive order was issued. Since that order was operative only prospectively and since this proceeding was continuous from May, 1976, defendant contends, the special prosecutor was not a proper person before the grand jury with respect to these charges and, as a result, the indictment is defective. Under the terms of C.P.L. Section 210.20 subd. (1) (c) and Section 210.35 subd. (5), defendant urges, the indictment must be dismissed. The Court reaches a different conclusion.

In rejecting this challenge to the validity of the proceeding that led to this indictment, the Court is not unmindful of the recent holding in People v. DiFalco, 54 A.D. 2d 219 (1s Dept. 1976), cited by defendant. There, the Appellate Division dismissed a pre-Dondi indictment of the type involved here (i.e., unrelated to the criminal justice system) and referred that matter to the local district attorney for possible future proceedings. The court dismissed, rather than transfer the indictment itself, because: "* * * the Special Prosecutor was not a proper person before this Grand Jury with respect to the charges contained in this indictment (C.P.L. 190.25 subd. 3); that the indictment must be dismissed (C.P.L. 210.20 subd. 1, par [c]; 210.35, subd. 5)." (at p. 221–2).

The DiFalco ruling is distinguishable from the case here in that nowhere in the history of that grand jury proceeding, or any subsequent court proceedings, was a superseding order ever sought and obtained as here. Moreover, this superseder was obtained well prior to the return of this indictment and upon consent of the District Attorney of Queens County,—circumstances which serve to still the fears envisioned by the Court in DiFalco as recited in language immediately above its ultimate ruling: "Finally, to fail to dismiss would enable the Special Prosecutor, although unauthorized by his gubernatorial warrant, to obtain indictments and hand them over for prosecution by the District Attorney, the only person authorized by law to investigate the matters in the first place. This procedure would deprive the District Attorney of the rights and obligations he and only he has and his office would be reduced to actual arm of a Special Prosecutor unfettered by limitations on his authority". (p. 221)

Here, again, a "gubernatorial warrant" authorizing the obtaining and prosecution of this indictment, and such prosecutorial jurisdiction was conferred by the Governor partly as a result of the consent of the local District Attorney.

The defendant's claim that since the Executive Order was issued half-way through the grand jury proceedings it could not validote preceding grand jury appearances by the special prosecutor, is similarly not persuasive.

The First Department, in DiFalco, apparently did not address the requirement under CPL Section 210.20 subd. 1(c) and Section 210.35 subd. 5, that the defect complained of be of such weight that it is likely that the integrity of the grand jury proceeding was impaired or that some prejudice to the defendant may result. Even if we assume, therefore, that that Court felt that the unauthorized appearance of the special prosecutor was a violation per se and might have such effect, the question before this Court is much narrower since the claimed "unauthorized appearances" were limited to the four sessions that occurred before the Executive Order was issued. Two of these appearances occurred prior to the Dondi limitations, imposed by a narrowly divided Court, and two occurred after Dondi but also after the consent of the Queens District Attorney was assured and at about the time that the Governor's office had assured the prosecutor that the Order would be forthcoming. Even if the apparent good faith thus demonstrated does not legally validate these earlier appearances, the Court feels nevertheless justified in requiring some strong showing by defendant that these "defects" violate lawful requirements to such a degree that the integrity of the proceeding itself, as a whole, was impaired and that prejudice to the defendant may in some way result. The Court's examination of the grand jury minutes does not reveal any possible prejudice resulting from these early appearances, nor has defendant demonstrated any.

Although it is not clear whether the Governor was aware at the time he issued the superseding order, that some testimony had already been presented to the grand jury, it is clear that he intended to transfer jurisdiction to the special prosecutor. To hold, now, that the clear intent of that order should be thwarted, despite absence of the kind of showing required by the statute, would be to place great importance on form over substance, in a context where no rights of defendant have been shown to have been violated and the only clear result would seem to be to further delay the trial of this important case. In this regard it should be noted here that defendant was recently elected to the Civil Court Bench of the City of New York. Although he has been sworn in he has not yet fully assumed his official duties. It would seem therefore that he too would be anxious to address these charges on their merits rather than on the basis of technical challenges addressed to merely procedural matters.

For all of the reasons above, this branch of defendant's motion is likewise denied.

E. MOTION TO DISMISS FOR PRE-INDICTMENT DELAY

Defendant also seeks dismissal pursuant to CPL Section 210.20 subd. 1(h), jurisdictional or legal impediment, and/or subd. 1(i), interest of justice, as well as the due process clauses of the United States and New York constitutions. Defendant alleges that he has been severely prejudiced by the 3- to 4-year delay between the date of the alleged crimes (February, 1972 to April, 1973) and the date he was notified he was a target of a grand jury investigation (August, 1976). He also complains of the 10½ month delay between the time the prosecutor first received information concerning the alleged crimes (September 22, 1975) and the same date of notice to defendant.

Defendant claims the following prejudice with respect to the delays: (1) Impaired recall on his part; (2) the death of Kisseloff's then law partner, whose testimony could conceivably have been crucial in regard to Kisseloff's writing partnership checks to the Manes Committee; (3) the death of one Andrew Mulrain, who "unofficially ran" the 1972 dinner affair for Manes and whose testimony would have substantiated defendant's testimony regarding the nature of his involvement in the organization of that affair; (4) the October 1975 loss of defendant's personal diaries covering the relevant time periods in the indictment which loss would not have occurred if defendant had been alerted earlier to the "ongoing" investigation. Defendant does not indicate when such earlier notification might have been accomplished.

Without any factual support of which the Court is aware, defendant rather curiously asserts that the prosecutor's delay, between September 1975 and notification to defendant in August 1976, was due to the prosecutor's desire to exploit illegal wiretaps and the desire of a former special prosecutor to schedule the production of indictments to suit his own needs. As indicated, in this instance, both claims are devoid of factual basis or support.

It seems clear that the prosecutor's office received its first inklings of possible charges against this defendant on September 22, 1975, from an interception of certain conversations, pursuant to a court-ordered eavesdropping warrant, to which the defendant was not a party. The eavesdropping continued by virtue of court-ordered extensions until April, 1976. The prosecutor asserts that it was therefore obviously impossible to begin any investigation in that matter by questioning either the target of the eavesdropping or others mentioned in those conversations, without jeopardizing that investigation itself. That eavesdropping terminated in April, 1976.

This investigation, growing out of the other, was formally commenced on May 19 of that year and continued until November 10 when an indictment was returned. Hence, the prosecutor points out, any preindictment delay here was necessitated by a valid law enforcement purpose—preservation of the secrecy of the court-ordered eavesdropping in the other investigation. The point is clearly well made.

As long as the requirements of the statute of limitations are met, the time period being calculated even without regard to the public office status of the defendant, [see CPL § 30.10 subd. 3(b),], defendant's claim of untimeliness is without merit, and again his claim of resultant prejudice cannot be sustained.

The claim of prejudice relating to faulty recall, viewed in the context of the legislative intent in extending the statutory period of limitation with respect to public officers, cannot be allowed, even if defendant's constant reliance on failure of recall before the grand jury can be credited.

Similarly, the claim of further prejudice, largely speculative, relating to the intervening deaths of Buckley and Mulrain cannot be sustained. An examination of the grand jury minutes indicates that Buckley had no discernible part in arranging or carrying out the payments; rather, this appears to have been done by another former partner who is alive and well. The minutes also indicate that a large number of other witnesses as well as documentary evidence is available relating to defendant's alleged role in the dinner organization and arrangements.

Finally, as to defendant's claimed loss of his diaries sometime in October, 1975, only one to five weeks after the critical intercept on September 22, it can hardly be said that this was brought about by the prosecutor's failure to inform him of his "target" status prior to October.

The Court is totally unconvinced of the existence of any prejudice due to prosecutorial delay, hence this branch of defendant's motion is also denied.

F. MOTION TO DISMISS TO AVOID INJUSTICE AND TO PROTECT GRAND JURY INTEGRITY

Defendant now asks the Court in its discretion to dismiss the indictment to avoid injustice and to protect the integrity of the grand jury proceedings from impairment, pointing to the aggregate and cumulative impact of the numerous factors involved herein, some of which have already been discussed. The underlying theme of this appeal seems to be that "justice must satisfy the appearance of justice." Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11, 14 (1954). The legal grounds cited for this relief are, again CPL Section 210.20 subd. 1(c) (defective grand jury proceeding), subd. 1(h), jurisdictional or legal impediment, subd. 1(i) interest of justice, and also CPL Sections 210.35 and 210.40, both of which are incorporated by reference.

Some of the reasons suggested for dismissal, such as the "unauthorized person" and "delay" arguments, have already been addressed individually. Other claims, such as: alleged prejudicial news publicity generated by the former special prosecutor in an effort to retain his position; presentation of incompetent and inadmissible evidence; presentation of evidence in an improper and prejudicial manner; failure to present evidence favorable to the accused so as to lessen the force of inculpatory evidence; failure to disclose all these (claimed) defects to defendant at the time of securing his waiver of immunity; * * * can be disposed of individually as being speculative, or unsupported by sworn allegations where applicable, or actually unsupported to any significant extent, based upon the Court's review of the grand jury minutes. In no sense is the Court convinced to any degree that dismissal of this indictment is required or would be appropriate, if the proper functions of the grand jury are kept in mind. The two remaining factual grounds deserve separate mention and discussion.

Defendant asserts that the initial investigatory lead in this case was picked up on a telephone eavesdrop between two other individuals and that that eavesdropping was later determined to be unlawful. This is not entirely accurate. The original order to intercept electronically, conversations between one Fitzgerald and others, authorized the placing of recording devices on Fitzgerald's home telephone, on his office phones and other devices within Fitzgerald's office itself. The investigatory lead herein, it is affirmed, was picked up by the device that was installed in Fitzgerald's office. The decision relied upon by defendant, People v. Saypol, N.Y.L.J. Sup. Ct., Bronx Co. January 18, 1977, reached only the question and struck the legality of the court order and its extensions only insofar as they affected Fitzgerald's home telephone. The Court there specifically found it unnecessary to reach the question of the general nature of the entire warrant or the prosecutor's authority to apply for it. Even if the particular source of the investigatory leads in this case were shown to have been derived from condemned interceptions, the Court has not been convinced of defendant's standing here to assert such claimed illegality. Nor is the Court convinced that the "poison tree" doctrine should be extended to leads concerning the criminal activities of other persons not directly affected by "interceptions" later found to have been tainted by some irregularity. This grand jury heard no evidence concerning any electronic interceptions, legal or otherwise, and these proceedings, therefore, were in no way impaired.

The other remaining point worthy of separate discussion relates to the claim of improper legal instructions to the grand jury. A review of the grand jury minutes in this regard reveals a sequence of events, apparently unknown to the defense, that the Court deems necessary to address.

On November 8, 1976, after the two prosecutors involved herein had given adequate legal instructions and definitions to the grand jury, one of them answered questions posed by the grand jurors concerning possible criminal liability of other persons whose names had come up in this matter. He had previously instructed them (and properly so) that as a matter of law on the state of the evidence before the grand jury at that time, an indictment could not legally be returned against one of the other named individuals on these or any related charges. Hence, he again told them that they were being asked to consider only the question whether or not an indictment should be returned as to this defendant, and no others, at this time. The prosecutors and stenographer left the grand jury room so as to permit deliberation.

Some time later, as reflected in the minutes, the prosecutor returned. It is not clear whether he did so upon request or not. Nor is it clear whether or not at that point, the prosecutor knew that the grand jury had voted not to indict the defendant. Nevertheless, he asked the grand jury if there was any further need for instructions, particularly with respect to the law as applicable to the involvement of persons other than defendant, and whether they thought it would be useful to ask the presiding Court, Honorable Leonard Sandler, to give further legal instructions in this regard.

As will later appear, the grand jury decided to reconsider its earlier vote and to accept the offer of further legal instructions by Justice Sandler. A time and place for Justice Sandler's appearance was then agreed upon.

Two days later, on November 10, Justice Sandler appeared and gave further legal instructions. He reminded the grand jury that their duty required them to indict or not indict (the defendant) without regard to the possible criminal liability of anyone else. After all of these instructions and answers to questions posed by them, the grand jury returned the instant indictment against this defendant.

An examination of the journal kept by the secretary of the grand jury was undertaken by this Court to test the propriety of the conduct of the prosecutor in apparently "interrupting" grand jury deliberations. The journal reveals that on November 8, contrary to any other possible misimpressions, the grand jury had voted "dismissal" of the proffered charges and the journal also reflects a request by three grand jurors for further enlightenment on the law by Justice Sandler. The Court is thoroughly dissatisfied with the failure of the official grand jury minutes to reflect these important intervening circumstances. If the Court thought it critical or even important to its consideration of the propriety of the grand jury proceedings on November 8, it would summon a hearing, sui generis, to resolve this question. The Court concludes, however, that such hearings is unnecessary. It is unquestioned that a grand jury has the right to reconsider any of its actions prior to the filing of indictments, certificates of dismissal, remittiturs or reports. And it should be unquestioned that such reconsideration should not be declared violative of due process as long as it was fully undertaken by the grand jury and was clearly free from prosecutorial coercion. The simple fact is that here, at least three grand jurors, apparently upset with the result of the initial deliberations and vote, requested additional instructions. This was consented to, tacitly or otherwise, by all of the members who convened on November 10 and the matter was then re-voted.

The Court finds that the prosecutor's instructions, comments and advice were proper, particularly as amplified by Justice Sandler, and that the grand jury's ultimate action was free of prosecutorial or judicial coercion. The entire tenor of the proceedings on November 8 and 10, indicates a concern, first by the prosecutor and later by Justice Sandler, to dissuade the grand jury from heatedly voting indictments that were not then legally permissible, particularly against at least one other individual. In the circumstances, Justice Sandler's intervention was timely and was wisely designed to prevent that result.

It seems clear that the basis for the initial grand jury vote was a feeling of rancor on the part of the majority over the limiting instructions they had received regarding other named individuals. In this contex, it can hardly be said that the request for reconsideration of the vote, as it turned out, was in any way prejudicial to this defendant or that it offended justice, in any sense.

This Court, as the record will confirm, has not hesitated on prior occasions to dismiss indictments or charges, in whole or in part, for procedural or evidentiary defects or for prosecutorial misconduct or overreaching. It would not hesitate to do so now, if it felt that in this instance such action was appropriate. On the contrary any overreaching or impropriety that may have occurred herein must clearly be attributed to the grand jury majority, not the prosecutor; and considering all the circumstances, their overzealousness is understandable.

The Court is not convinced that the proceedings were defective or that the essential integrity of this grand jury was in any way impaired or compromised so as to warrant a dismissal of this indictment—either for procedural defectiveness or, cumulatively, in the interests of justice. Hence, this final branch of defendant's motion to dismiss is also denied.

G. Defendant's motion for an order directing divulgence of the identity of persons present in the grand jury room, other than grand jurors and witnesses (and presumably prosecutors) during these proceedings is denied as moot, in view of the prosecutor's affirmation that only those authorized pursuant to CPL § 190.25 were present.

H. Defendant next moves for an order directing disclosure of all comments, instructions or advice given to the grand jury by any court, prosecutor or other person regarding their general duties, applicable law, the facts of the investigation and the returning of the indictment and the identity of the person rendering same. The Court has examined all of the requested items of instruction and has found them to be legally sufficient and proper. There being no other need, stated or apparent, for these requested items, the motion is denied. The Court will however order the prosecutor to divulge the names and current occupation and status of the three assistant special prosecutors who presented this case to the grand jury.

I. DISCOVERY

Several items of discovery have been requested. The Court notes that during the pre-trial stage, the prosecutor has voluntarily turned over many of the items now requested. Hence, many of the requests are now moot for that reason. The motion is therefore disposed of as follows:

a, b, c, g, j, k, o: Denied as moot.

d, e, f, i: Denied. With respect to item i, the Court is aware that the prosecutor has already given copies of all exhibits introduced in evidence as well as many only marked for identification.

h, l: Granted to the extent already provided; denied as to the balance.

m: No order of the Court is necessary with respect to exculpatory evidence. Prior inconsistent statements of witnesses are not necessarily exculpatory and to the extent they are not, this portion of the request is denied; but see the concluding paragraph herein.

n: Denied in the mode requested; but see concluding paragraph.

p: (i) Granted, if any; (ii) granted to the extent now known to the prosecutor but limited only to criminal liability or jeopardy; (iii) and (iv) denied.

J. BILL OF PARTICULARS

Defendant has requested various items by way of a bill of particulars, all of which, it seems at present, may well depend upon circumstantial evidence, or upon inference, or upon the drawing of legal conclusions. As such, the Court deems them not susceptible of the precise definition required for a bill of particulars.

Defendant may be free to draw his own inferences and conclusions regarding some of these items upon receiving a factual summary of the substance of a conversation between the witness Kissseloff and defendant on April 26, 1972, in the defendant's office in Queens County. The Court therefore orders, as an additional item of discovery herein, to be designated item q, that a brief summary of this conversation be provided. The Court does so pursuant to defendant's general request for whatever other and further relief the Court may deem proper.

K. Denied. Wilful destruction of relevant evidence will, of course, never be tolerated by this Court. On the assumption that the request is intended to guard against careless handling or loss of such evidence, mere admonition by the Court at this point should suffice. It is hereby given.

In anticipation of a request for an order granting trial preference in this matter, and the granting of same, the Court hereby directs that full compliance with the limited discovery granted herein be completed by Wednesday, March 9, 1977. Pending completion of compliance the Court hereby directs all parties to appear for a final conference on Monday, March 7, 1977 to determine readiness. At such conference, the Court may entertain, reluctantly, any further pre-trial applications.

The prosecutor is hereby put on notice that all available Rosario material should be supplied to counsel at least 48 hours prior to the expected appearances of any witnesses.

So ordered.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
v.
ROBERT GROH, DEFENDANT.

25–10 Court Square, Long Island City, N.Y. 11101.

JUNE 17, 1977.

Before: THE HONORABLE HOWARD A. JONES, Justice.

Appearances: For the People: JOHN KEENAN, Esq., Office of the Special State Prosecutor, Two World Trade Building, New York, N.Y. By: RICHARD A. NACHMAN, Esq., of Counsel, GEORGE BRADLAU, Esq., of Counsel. For the Defendant: MESSRS. SEGAL & HUNDLEY, 745 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. By: MARVIN B. SEGAL, Esq., of Counsel.

HAROLD GOLDSTEIN, R.P.R.
Official Court Reporter.

THE CLERK OF THE COURT. Indictment No. 2477–76 Robert Groh.

THE COURT. Will counsel note your appearance for the record?

Mr. SEGAL. Marvin B. Segal of Segal & Hundley, 745 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THE CLERK OF THE COURT. Let the record show that Marvin B. Segal is present for the defendant Robert Groh.

THE COURT. For the People?

Mr. NACHMAN. For the People, Richard A. Nachman and——

Mr. BRADLAU. And George Bradlau.

THE COURT. Now, for the record.

For the record, this is on remitter from the Appellate Division pursuant to their order, the Appellate Division, Second Department, that is, pursuant to their order entered May 31st; is that correct, Mr. Segal?

Mr. SEGAL. I believe so.

THE COURT. 1977.

I will read for the record just the last paragraph of the order:

"To sanction such a procedure—and here I think it is fair to say they are referring to the procedure disclosed by me in connection with my motion to inspect the Grand Jury minutes as to the circumstances under which this indictment was filed—"to sanction such a procedure no matter how well intentioned it may have been in this case would permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger Grand Jurors to change their solemnly arrived at determinations; nevertheless while firmly convinced of the grave impropriety underlying the present indictment, this court is without jurisdiction to deal with it at this juncture.

"However, in the light of the views here expressed, the learned justice at the extraordinary special and trial term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor."

I assume that they are referring to me as the learned justice, although I quarrel, among other things, with their designation of me as extraordinary special and trial term.

I am not that, and it is sad for me to have to make this observation on the record, Mr. Segal because that is precisely one of the reasons I sent this matter to the Appellate Division, namely, that there is only one extraordinary special and trial term, and that is Judge Sandler.

We sit, and by we I mean Judge Polsky and myself sit simply as additional trial terms; we are separately designated, we are quite differently designated, one by Executive Order, and the other simply by assignment by the appropriate Appellate Division.

And, I think that this is one of the underlying reasons which perhaps the Appellate Division may have overlooked why I sent the case there.

And, when I say I sent it there, I am sure you understand what I mean, and I join with you—with the suggestion that this matter be reviewed by them because to have granted your motion as I think I said, would have meant, among other things, overruling Judge Sandler, who sits separately and I think, it is fair to say that he sits somewhat at a level above the trial court here; and far be it for me to set myself up as an Appellate Division over Judge Sandler. It just may be that this nuance may have escaped their attention.

I want to say this for the record, in the hope obviously that they did overlook this, but just on the chance they might have, and before hearing you on your renewed motion, I am sure that is why we are here, I would like to address my remarks just a little bit further to one or two other important facts and circumstances, just for the record.

The decision here speaks in terms of not permitting prosecutors to badger or coerce Grand Jurors to change their solemnly arrived at determinations.

Now, I have two quarrels with that language:

First of all, assuming there was badgering or coercion here, in a real sense, I don't think it can be said in this case that it was the prosecutors who badgered or coerced, if anybody, it obviously was the presiding judge himself.

Now, to state as they apparently do here in this learned decision, that the presiding judge of that Grand Jury has no right to interfere in a determination once made by that Grand Jury, no matter how terribly wrong that determination may have seemed to him, I think is overkill, and I am groping as you can see with sufficiently delicate language here to state my position without offending the Appellate Division.

I think the mere suggestion that the judge presiding over a Grand Jury has no right to interfere with that Grand Jury; once they have voted I think bespeaks a caution that is certainly not warranted by these facts and circumstances.

While I might agree, that if the presiding judge had been properly convinced that that vote by that Grand Jury was a "solemnly arrived at determination," then in that circumstance, I think I can agree he had no right to interfere, but there again that the facts here seem to belie the conclusion that this was a solemnly arrived at determination on the part of that Grand Jury, and I am referring here to the entire context of the dialogue that took place between the prosecutor and the Grand Jury, and later between Judge Sandler and the Grand Jury.

It is clear to me this was not "a solemnly arrived at determination," and that is precisely the basis on which Judge Sandler sought to intervene.

I am disappointed that in its learned decision the Appellate Division made no mention of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence before the Grand Jury, so that on remitter here before this court, at least, I could appreciate or understand exactly what their views were, suffice of evidence, vis-a-vis, harm or prejudice to the defendant.

If I might suggest most respectfully that still one unanswered question as I read that decision, the record should also reflect that this report entertains a continuing disagreement with the conclusion that the Appellate Division here lacked jurisdiction to rule on this motion, as it was presented to them, and I say that most advisedly for the following reasons:

In essence, the court here seems to be saying that Mr. Segal should have come to them first with this application, and that had he done so, they would have dismissed because of the faults and errors they have cited.

I think the chronology of events here reveal the total impossibility of that circumstances having occurred because it was not until this court rendered its decision, that Mr. Segal was even aware of what had happened in that Grand Jury.

How then could he have moved this as a ground originally before the Appellate Division?

If they are saying that once these disclosures were made by me in my decision then, having then been put on notice, Mr. Segal should not have come back to me on subsequent motion.

Now, I think I can understand the point, but I have a good answer for it, I think, and that is, as I recall Mr. Segal's motion the second time around was simply a motion for reargument of the initial motion in the course of which obviously having learned I hope thankfully of these disclosures and these events, he moved for reargument, reconsideration of the original motion, if for nothing else but to complete the record so that he could then go to the Appellate Division for a ruling.

I think to suggest threfore with this chronology and background that the Appellate Division had no jurisdiction in the matter is to unintentionally I am sure, avoid the issue.

The net effect it seems to me of what we undertook jointly to do here, was to preserve all these points for Appellate Review, so as to enable Mr. Segal to go to the Appellate Division for its ruling, and certainly none of us and I hope I speak for all of us, I know I speak for myself, had no intention deliberately or otherwise to preclude the Appellate Division from making a ruling and yet this is what they seem to think we have done.

I do not agree.

Finally, I have this other problem with the whole situation, Mr. Segal; the question of jurisdiction.

Now, I haven't read your memorandum, and I assume that this is the point that you are addressing here, namely, considering the limited grounds upon which jurisdiction had been assumed by the Prosecutor in the first instance; question, what effect will a dismissal now have on the continuation of that jurisdiction in the Special Prosecutor Office and—let me be more explicit.

As I recall, this investigation had been started prior to the Court of Appeals decision in Dondi against Jones. One of the main reasons as I recall, that were urged upon the Governor in this case, after the Dondi decision, in connection with the application then by the prosecutor to permit his jurisdiction to continue.

One of the principal arguments was at that time that despite the decision in Dondi, inasmuch as the prosecutor, the Special Prosecutor was then already involved in this investigation, some testimony concerning which had already been presented to a Grand Jury, and but for the decision now in Dondi they would have continued; for that ground, for that reason largely, the Governor was persuaded to sign the Executive Order, authorizing them to continue their investigation.

Now, my question is, and here again unfortunately the Appellate Division's decision does not answer this dilemma for me, but the question is, with that limited basis of jurisdiction in the first instance, what then becomes of it, if this indictment is now dismissed?

Certainly their main argument, their main rationale for requesting jurisdiction no longer exists, namely, we are already before the Grand Jury with this matter; therefore let's continue.

Now, I throw that out for discussion. It is a circumstance that is really troublesome to me.

Obviously I am the little man in the middle here, and far be it for me to go against the wishes, let alone the direction of the Appellate Division, but I think in fairness to both sides, not just both sides, all sides, because there are other two sides here, Judge Sandler and Judge Jones involved in this legal controversy—in fairness to all sides, I think these matters should be stated on the record.

I am glad that I had the courage to do it.

Mr. NACHMAN. May I respond to the last issue, Your Honor?

THE COURT. I saw a document before me, where is it?

All right, for the record, now Mr. Segal, I know that it is your motion, but do you mind if I hear Mr. Nachman first on the last point?

Mr. SEGAL. That's all right.

Mr. NACHMAN. Yes, sir.

First of all, the defendant hasn't even raised this issue. I don't think that he thought of it or wanted to rely on it.

The court thought of it, and I frankly think, Your Honor——

THE COURT. As I said, I haven't read the memorandum and——

Mr. NACHMAN. He doesn't even talk about it. I am trying to be as frank as the court, and the court is raising an issue which isn't an issue at all. I can't even conceive of it, frankly.

THE COURT. Well, I can.

Mr. NACHMAN. The Governor issued an order, saying that the Special Prosecutor had jurisdiction in this investigation and prosecution. Now, this investigation and prosecution is still in existence even if you should dismiss this indictment.

The People are requesting and recommending dismissal only if coupled with the direction to or permission to resubmit.

Therefore, it would still be a continuing investigation and prosecution, and I don't see how the superseding order is affected by that; there is no time limit on it, I don't think.

The only reason for that or even the major reason the superseding order was granted was not because the matter was already in the Grand Jury, and the main reason was the investigation and the information, and the evidence was derived as a result of our office investigation and——

THE COURT. So was Dondi, wasn't it?

Mr. NACHMAN. Yes, but at that point, we said we developed this, we derived this evidence.

The District Attorney of Queens County has consented to let us continue with the prosecution, therefore, Your Excellency, Mr. Governor, please supersede the order to give us clear and unquestioned jurisdiction in this case.

THE COURT. Yes, but if you had heard me carefully, all I was suggesting was, and I think that it is a good point in spite of the fact that you disagree, namely, that as I recall the submission is at that time, one of the reasons given, presented to the Governor, was the fact that you had initiated this, that the matter was already before a Grand Jury, at least partially, and that were it not for the occurrence of the Dondi decision, your jurisdiction might well have continued.

Perhaps there were other reasons as well, and I did not overlook the fact that the local District Attorney had consented; all I am suggesting to you is that, at least one of the main ingredients in the application is now missing.

The question therefore whether or not the Governor's Executive Order continued the point of dismissal of this indictment that he has authorized you to pursue.

Mr. NACHMAN. Well, Your Honor——

THE COURT. It was missing as soon as the indictment was filed, the case no longer before the Grand Jury.

Mr. NACHMAN. I don't follow that. The Executive Order says that we shall investigate and prosecute this case. Now, obviously——

THE COURT. All right, I think you understood my point.

I wouldn't pass it over so lightly, if I were you.

We will get back to it.

Mr. Segal, I will hear you.

Mr. SEGAL. Your Honor, I will address myself to what we have not raised in the papers that are before the court at the present time. It wouldn't have been appropriate to raise it, and that would be a consideration for the prosecutor, and not for the defense counsel.

It is also the proposition that we have considered in our office, and I viewed that proposition as seriously as the court apparently did, and am quite willing to allow that issue to remain in the case in the event there is a reapplication.

But, I do think that that is a matter of some interest that the Special Prosecutor has and is narrowly defined, and in fact is specifically laid out as each prosecutor or prosecution is undertaken, especially in these area which fall over into an area with which a local District Attorney has concurrent jurisdiction.

Now, the first issue that was raised by the court, that the court is not sitting as an extraordinary justice, I would view that language in the Appellate Division's opinion as surplussage.

I think that that may have been an extra apellation given to the court, but clearly that court was directing itself to this court itself in terms of the reconsideration of this motion.

However, we have raised in the papers that are before you, and I realize that these were handed up to your clerk at a time when you had been engaged all morning, but we do raise the point as to whether or not this court, namely yourself, is the appropriate court or whether or not that really should not go back to Justice Sandler, and we raise the accompanying problem as to whether Justice Sandler because—Justice Sandler himself because of the circumstances attending this case may be appropriate even under those circumstances.

So that the question of accusal may arise if this court determines that it is—and it is not the body that should but rather it is the extraordinary justice who should review it, and whose title is held by Justice Sandler, unless otherwise designated.

Now, I must say, and I will say this, Your Honor, whether it is to my benefit or not, I applaud what the court has done in terms of speaking out to the decision that has come down. This makes for the kind of healthy dialogue and it certainly raises the office that this court occupies to a place where it really ought to be.

I guess that we are all equally competent as to the different kinds of power, but it really doesn't mean very much. The court does hove the power and does speak out. It is refreshing and I think it can only be helpful and I say it is a marvelous thing.

THE COURT. Except to me personally, perhaps.

Mr. SEGAL. We are all in the middle, Your Honor, and I am at the bottom. I am even in a worse position, but I do feel that as the court pointed out, it was almost impossible, unless it had been pressing, of what I posess to know, but this issue would have arisen as the court did in stating it there initially; and that is true, because of the way this case was brought, and that would have meant that we would have brought a motion on which we decided as a matter of an actual choice, which we decided it would be better going to Supreme Court Justice, rather than to the Appellate Division, which would in effect give us a dual opportunity of having that question reviewed, because so far we knew that we had legal points, but they were neither extraordinary nor were they particularly unusual. We felt it was valid, but we also felt that the most valid point perhaps that the Apellate Review was a better way of going to them, without skipping one form but only when we knew we would get what was obviously an issue of some moment, an issue which we have indicated in the papers to the court, would not have been listed, but for your personal decision to make that clear to us.

It was then that we had to complete the record in order to find out what do we have, and to that effect we are and I understand the Appellate Division seems reluctant as perhaps they should be to cut off and interlocutory effect appeals and to clean the process to the point where a case does not bounce up and back prior to final resolution and final level, but I do feel that we will abide by the Appellate Division's decision as the court had suggested in its statement here, and that we might want to reapply to the Appellate Division for clarification.

At the moment of first impression now, I have no such intention, and as a result it is my feeling, one that because of the application and the suggestion which was made to this court; two, that perhaps it is the extraordinary justice before whom such an application should be made, that the Government may very well want to decide whether or not the arguments for resubmission here—be made here.

However, I have decided and will so move that this court reconsider the motion earlier to dismiss and would of course indicate that rationale which we urge is the rationale laid down in our original papers, plus of course the suggestion made by the Appellate Division in this case as to the application which it has anticipated the Government may make. As we do not know what grounds and what basis will be urged to the court for a resubmission and then we would give what our general thoughts are and hopefully if it is put in papers, we will have a short period of time to answer the arguments there, but I do want to say to the court that I would respectfully move for reconsideration for the motion to dismiss and do so move, as I felt because the Appellate Division's decision as related and you might not need additional papers from us, and I would be glad if the court would want to make that into formal motion in your office on Monday.

I have no further applications to make at this time.

THE COURT. All right. In case that I have not made myself clear, let me say this, that in view of the virtue of the mandate contained in the language of the Appellate Division decision, upon application for reconsideration, it would be almost suicidal of me, legally speaking to refuse.

Clearly, therefore, although reluctantly, I will grant the motion.

I am not doing so now because I do want to see if I can get clarification concerning the various points that I have raised, particularly the last one which virtually dovetails about the question of whether or not to resubmit, to order resubmission.

In other words, tied in with the appropriateness of resubmission is the unavoidable question who should make the resubmission, and I think it may be that perhaps upon my own application to the court, I will then get the clarification that I need.

I can understand you are not willing to do it, Mr. Segal, I wasn't suggesting that. I can understand your concern Mr. Nachman in pressing for resubmission.

I am simply indicating that there is a void here in their direction, if you will, that I think must be filled.

Now, do you wish to be heard further, Mr. Nachman?

Mr. NACHMAN. Yes, Your Honor.

There may have been some misunderstanding on my part in my conversation with Mr. Segal and others in his office. I was under the impression that they would submit formal papers, urging the court to reconsider, and that is why I have no papers for the court today.

I am perfectly willing, if the court is, to hear the motion on oral application. I would merely ask for time to submit memorandum, perhaps in a week and—

THE COURT. I see no need for formal papers.

The Appellate Division is formal enough for me. He has submitted this memorandum of law in opposition to resubmission, so that really joins the issue.

Of course I will give you time to answer, you see.

Mr. NACHMAN. All right, fine. I just wanted to make our position known on the record, on the motion itself that we would oppose the granting of the motion to dismiss the indictment unless it is coupled in the same order with permission for us to resubmit.

THE COURT. I can understand.

Mr. NACHMAN. In that event, we would consent to be perfectly frank, if the court saw fit to dismiss and not to give permission to resubmit, but would like to have the opportunity to appeal both branches of that decision.

THE COURT. All right, fair enough.

Is there anything further?

Mr. NACHMAN. How much time? Will a week from today be too much for time to submit a memorandum in opposition to this one?

THE COURT. Provided that Mr. Segal wouldn't raise any—what is the delicate words for it—speedy trial grounds—and I just don't want it to appear that May 31st to June 17th was time enough for us to have done this much and part of the reason, the record should show when I finally made inquiry of Mr. Segal, I heard that you were ill, and I can understand therefore why I haven't heard from you sooner, and I do hope that you are well.

Mr. SEGAL. I am, thank you.

THE COURT. All right, and under those circumstances, I don't think that you would object for additional time.

Mr. SEGAL. No, Your Honor.

THE COURT. To be given for an answer?

Mr. SEGAL. No.

May we approach the bench, Your Honor.

THE COURT. Yes, step up.

(Whereupon, at this time, the attorneys and the court held a side-bar conference.)

THE COURT. We will calendar this for June 30th, with People's answering memorandum expected to be received no later than June 24th.

Very well, thank you, gentlemen.

Certified to be true and correct.

SUPREME COURT: APPELLATE DIVISION, SECOND JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT

GULOTTA, P. J., MARTUSCELLO, COHALAN, DAMIANI AND SHAPIRO, JJ.

THE PEOPLE, ETC., PLAINTIFF,
v.
ROBERT T. GROH, DEFENDANT.

IN THE MATTER OF ROBERT T. GROH, PETITIONER,
v.
HOWARD A. JONES, as Justice of the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, County of Queens, et al., RESPONDENTS.

(Motion No. 2114)

Motion pursuant to section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh for an order dismissing an indictment filed against him or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting further proceedings with respect to the said indictment.

SEGAL & HUNDLEY, New York, N.Y., for defendant-petitioner.

JOHN F. KEENAN, Deputy Attorney-General, New York, N.Y. (George F. Bradlau of counsel), respondent pro se and for plaintiff.

Per Curiam: This is a motion pursuant to section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law by Robert T. Groh, a defendant in a pending criminal action, for an order dismissing the indictment filed against him by the Extraordinary Special Grand Jury for the County of Queens, or, in the alternative, for judgment pursuant to CPLR article 78 prohibiting the Trial Justice assigned to the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term, and the Special Prosecutor, from proceeding with respect to the said indictment.

Motion denied and proceeding dismissed, without costs or disbursements.

Consideration by this court of the prayer for relief pursuant to section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law is barred by the fact that an identical motion had been made before the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term and was denied by it on March 4, 1977; that determination was adhered to upon reconsideration on March 15, 1977. The availability of relief by motion to this court pursuant to section 149 (subd. 2) is an alternative to proceeding before the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term and, having elected to proceed before Acting Supreme Court Justice JONES in the first instance, defendant is now precluded from attempting to overturn his decision by a de novo application to this court (see Matter of Dondi v. Jones, 40 NY2d 8, 15).

So far as the application for relief in the nature of prohibition is concerned, we must take cognizance of the holding of the Court of Appeals in Matter of State of New York v. King (36 NY2d 59, 62): "The extraordinary remedy either of prohibition or mandamus lies only where there is a clear legal right, and in the case of prohibition only when a court (if a court is involved) acts or threatens to act without jurisdiction in a matter of over which it has no power over the subject matter or where it exceeds its authorized powers in a proceeding over which it has jurisdiction (see, e.g., Proskin v. County Ct. of Albany County, 30 NY2d 15, 18; Matter of Lee v. County Ct. of Erie County, 27 NY2d 432, 436–437; Matter of Hogan v. Culkin, 18 NY2d 330, 335–336)." (Accord Matter of Nigrone v. Murtagh, 36 NY2d 421, 423–424.)

While the question is not entirely free of doubt, we have concluded that the allegations proffered by the defendant Groh fail to raise a jurisdictional issue (see Matter of Paciona v. Marshall, 35 NY2d 289; Matter of Wroblewski v. Ricotta, 35 NY2d 745; cf. Matter of Dondi v. Jones, supra; La Rocca v. Lane, 37 NY2d 575).

We should indicate, however, that had the motion under section 149 (subd. 2) of the Judiciary Law been submitted to us ab initio, we would have granted the application and ordered that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system. Here, after a full presentation of the evidence, a charge on the law by the Special Prosecutor, and an apparently spirited discussion among the grand jurors themselves, they voted to dismiss the proposed charges in their entirety, and recorded that determination in their minute book. Thereafter, and this appears without contradiction on the record, the Special Prosecutor, having learned of the result, re-entered the Grand Jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict. Without any request from the Grand Jury, he then suggested to it that the Justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired. The utility of such a gesture was questioned by a grand juror, who told the Special Prosecutor that a vote had already been taken and the matter disposed of, but the latter insisted that a further charge might enable the Grand Jury to "adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter", this notwithstanding the fact that the Grand Jury had done just that—reached, voted on and recorded its determination. The Special Prosecutor then retired from the Grand Jury room and a vote was taken. Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions.

Despite the fact that there was no request by the Grand Jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the Special Prosecutor and the Justice presiding at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term appeared before the Grand Jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge. The grand jurors then retired to deliberate and voted the instant indictment by the narrowest permissible margin (see CPL 190.25, subd. 1).

Aside from the fact that we view these "further instructions" to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they had no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system. That system, which has its origins in antiquity and enjoys no lesser protection than that afforded by the Federal and State Constitutions (U.S. Const., 5th Amdt.; N.Y. Const., art. I § 6), performs a vital function in our jurisprudence—that of protecting the private citizen from unjust prosecution. As Mr. Justice Foster stated in Matter of Gardiner (31 Misc. 364, 366-367, 375, cited with approval in People v. Minet, 296 NY 315, 322) :

"The grand jury had its origin at a time when there raged a fierce conflict between the rights of the subject and the power of the crown. It was established to secure to the subject a right of appeal to his peers, under the immunity of secrecy and irresponsibility, before the government could bring him to trial. It was a right wrung from the government to secure the subject against oppression.

* * * * * * *

"[As] was rightly said by Judge King, in the case of Lloyd and Carpenter, 5 Penn. L.J. 62: 'Grand Juries are high public functionaries, * * * They are the great security to the citizen against vindictive persecutions, either by government or by political partisans, or by private enemies. In their independent action, the persecuted have found the most fearless protectors; and in the records of their doings are to be discovered the noblest stands against the oppression of power the virulence of malice, and the intemperance of prejudice."

* * * * * * *

"It is as important to a person that he be fairly and justly accused of crime as that he be fairly and impartially tried therefor."

However, this historical function can only be carried out if the grand jury remains truly free and independent of outside influences. As was stated by Mr. Justice CALLAGHAN in People v. Both (118 Misc 414, 423) : "The life and liberty of the individual depend largely upon the citizens who are called from all walks of life to act as jurors. They are in every instance the sole judges of the facts, and, when called as grand jurors, they are the judges of the law as well as of the facts. The administration of the criminal law lies largely with grand and petit juries. It is through the jury system alone that the people have a part in the administration of the law. It is important, therefore, that no undue influence or coercion be exerted at any stage of a prosecution to influence unduly the judgment of a juror." (See, also, People v. Cunningham, NYLJ, April 28, 1977, p. 10, col. 4; People v. Benin, 186 Misc 548; United States v. Rintelen, 235 F 787.)

Clearly, this is not a case in which the Grand Jury has voted to reconsider the charges sua sponte (see People v. Stecker, 141 Misc 417; 42 CJS, Indictments and Informations, § 25), nor is it a case in which the court having charge of the grand jury, upon an appropriate showing, has directed that the charges be resubmitted following a failure to indict (CPL 190.75, subd. 3; see People ex rel. Flinn v. Barr, 259 NY 104; People v. Potter, 50 AD2d 410). Under the facts of this case it was improper for either the Special Prosecutor or the court, ex parte, to have interceded in the proceedings once the Grand Jury had voted to dismiss.

To sanction such a procedure, no matter how well intentioned it may have been in this case, would permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly arrived at determinations. Nevertheless, while firmly convinced of the grave impropriety underlying the present indictment, this court is without jurisdiction to deal with it at this juncture. However, in the light of the views here expressed, the learned Justice at the Extraordinary Special and Trial Term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor.

GULOTTA, P. J., MARTUSCELLO, COHALAN and SHAPIRO, J. J., concur.

DAMIANI, J., concurs in the result.

GROH JURY VOICED INTEREST IN MANES'S INVOLVEMENT IN BRIBERY CHARGES

(By Tom Goldstein)

A Queens County grand jury briefly held up action against Judge Robert T. Groh of Civil Court last November on charges of bribery and grand-larceny as some of the jurors were apparently more interested in the possible involvement of the judge's former superior, Donald R. Manes, the Queens Borough President, in the alleged bribery incident.

Just what happend in the grand jury room became an issue Tuesday when the Appellate Division in Brooklyn accused a prosecutor and a judge of having used "coercive" methods of getting the grand jury to indict Judge Groh. An examination of court papers yesterday portrays intricacies not hinted at in the appellate court's seven-page opinion.

Shortly before the grand jurors initially refused to indict Judge Groh, they were told by an assistant to John F. Keenan, the special state anticorruption prosecutor, that "as a matter of law at this point, there is insufficient evidence for you to consider a charge against Donald Manes in connection with this proceeding."

No charges were brought against Mr. Manes, who, a spokesman said yesterday, appeared voluntarily before the grand jury, waived immunity from prosecution and answered all questions put to him.

The grand jury indicted Judge Groh after receiving further instructions on the law from Mr. Keenan, Stephen P. Sawyer, his assistant, and Justice Leonard H. Sandler of State Supreme Court, who is assigned to supervise cases developed by the special prosecutor in charge of rooting out corruption in the city's criminal-justice system.

Mr. Keenan and Justice Sandler were castigated Tuesday by the Appellate Division for having improperly "interceded in the proceeding once the grand jury had noted" not to indict Judge Groh, who had been elected to the bench a few days before the grand jury voted again and indicted him.

He was charged with accepting $10,000 in contributions to Mr. Mane's 1973 campaign from the ITT-Sheraton motel chain to arrange for a zoning variance at a motel it owned. At the time, he was Mr. Manes's deputy.

Mr. Keenan and Justice Sandler are two of the most respected men in the city's criminal-justice system, and many judges and prosecutors said yesterday that they were shocked when the Appellate Division said that the two had acted improperly. But later in the day, as more background to the case became available, many of these same judges and prosecutors were not so sure that the prosecutor and the justice had misbehaved.

The appellate court made no mention of the background of the case, except that Mr. Keenan and Justice Sandler had been "well-intentioned" when they gave further instructions to the grand jury.

The court said that it could not dimsiss the indictment because of procedural technicalities, but it strongly suggested that Justice Howard A. Jones of State Supreme Court, who initially heard the case, do so.

In an opinion of March 4 in which he refused to dismiss the Groh indictment, Justice Jones said:

"It seems clear that the basis for the initial grand-jury vote was a feeling of rancor on the part of the majority over the limited instructions they had received regarding other named individuals. In this context, it can hardly be said that the request for reconsideration of the vote, as it turned out, was in any way prejudicial to this defendant or that it offended justice, in any sense."

At the request of Mr. Groh's lawyers, some of the grand-jury minutes—which ordinarily are secret—were released, and from these minutes and from affidavits by Mr. Keenan and members of his staff, a partial chronology of the grand-jury proceeding can be pieced together.

According to these documents, the investigation began under Mr. Keenan's predecessor, Maurice H. Nadjari, whose methods were a frequent target of criticism by the appellate court in Brooklyn. The "investigative lead" came from a wiretap on the telephone of Thomas I. Fitzgerald, the former public administrator in Manhattan. Overheard conversations on Mr. Fitzgerald's telephone led to many Nadjari indictments of judges and public figures that were later thrown out.

Since Judge Groh was not involved in the criminal-justice system—the area of Mr. Keenan's jurisdiction—the special prosecutor requested and was granted a superseding order from Governor Carey to carry on the investigation.

According to the grand-jury minutes, shortly before the grand jury voted not to indict Judge Groh, one juror asked Mr. Sawyer: "Is Mr. Groh responsible for his actions or is Mr. Manes, who he has been appointed to, from a viewpoint of responsibility versus delegated authority?"

Mr. Sawyer replied that Mr. Groh "is the individual before you at this point." Mr. Keenan was also in the grand-jury room, but spoke only briefly. The grand jury then voted not to indict Judge Groh.

Then, according to an affidavit of Mr. Sawyer and Mr. Keenan, they re-entered the grand-jury room where they "learned from certain members of the jury that some dissatisfaction existed concerning our charge on the law, particularly with regard to our legal instructions that they could not consider an indictment of a certain other public official."

ASKED ABOUT INSTRUCTION

They then left the room again and returned five minutes later when Mr. Sawyer asked the jurors if it would be "useful" if Justice Sandler instructed them on the law "as it relates to Mr. Manes and as it relates to Mr. Groh in this matter.

The two prosecutors again left the room. Their affidavit states: "After about five minutes, the warden notified us that the jury was again ready to see us and we re-entered. A juror clearly stated that they wished to have Justice Sandler instruct them. Unfortunately, and unknown to us at that time, this remark was not captured in the minutes."

Two days later, on Nov. 10, Justice Sandler appeared before the grand jury, and, according to the minutes, told the jurors:

"I would gather from the questions there was some concern—and understandably so—about Mr. Manes. I would urge you to separate that question entirely from your consideration of the evidence with regard to Mr. Groh.

"That clearly is not a dead issue. It is something which you have a right to take up with the prosecutors. But to say—if anyone said, 'I am not going to vote an indictment against A even though it is sufficient because I think I should be asked to vote an indictment against B,' would not be a responsible action on the part of any grand jury."

The grand jury then indicted Judge Groh by a 12-to-7 vote.

In its decision, a five-member panel of the Appellate Division said that "the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand-jury system."

The court noted that "there was no request by the grand jury as a body to receive any further instructions." It also said that Justice Sandler's "further instructions" were "incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they had no alternative except to indict."

The panel concluded that it was improper for "either the special prosecutor or the court, ex parte, to have interceded in the proceedings once the grand jury had voted to dismiss.

A Dividend for Nadjari

(By Murray Kempton)

A decent consideration for the dignity of the judiciary is plainly not enough to make Maurice Nadjari abate his abuse of the Appellate Division of the State Supreme Court; but simple gratitude ought to be.

If he is elected District Attorney of Queens, he can thank the Appellate Division; with the illest will possible toward him, it is the most powerful invisible adjunct of his campaign committee.

Nadjari's claim to be restored to the prosecutorial functions that he did so much to debase rests on his continual insistence that he was frustrated in his efforts to bring crooked judges to book because judges band together in mutual self-protection.

That sort of thing is very probably malignant nonsense operating upon the confusions of the prejudiced. But now comes the Appellate Division to dispose of the charges against Civil Court Judge Robert L. Groh; and with all deference to the black robe, the reasoning and argument of these judges is anything but an encouragement to the prejudiced to wonder whether they might be confused.

In 1972, Robert Groh was Deputy Borough President of Queens. One of his duties was to stand watch over the electorial destinies of Donald R. Manes, Borough President of Queens.

In pursuance of this holy obligation, persons acting for the Manes campaign allegedly approached counsel for the ITT Sheraton Hotels for a $20,000 contribution.

It was a moment of weakness for ITT Sheraton had pending a request for a zoning variance to expand its hotel near La Guardia Airport.

Politics is a division of the market economy to ITT, and it had a more modest but nonetheless as lively an interest in preserving Donald Manes as it had previously shown in advancing Richard Nixon's future and aborting Salvador Allende's.

The excess of its prior benevolences had however so strained its budget that the Manes campaign does not seek to have been worth more than $7,000. In due course, Sheraton had its zoning variance.

In 1976 this example of sanctified custom fell under the scrutiny of John J. Keenan, Nadjari's successor as special prosecutor; and Keenan proposed to a Queens grand jury that Robert Groh be indicted for the grand larceny of extorting $7000 from ITT Sheraton.

The grand jury's reaction seems to have been that Manes had been the major beneficiary of these dealings and ought to be indicted. Keenan's only difficulty with this Nadjarian proposition was that he lacked worthy evidence that Manes had been aware of the full range of the zeal of his agents. When he entered that demurrer, the grand jury in its outrage took the position that, if it couldn't have Manes, it wouldn't indict anybody.

Justice Leonard Sandler then took the bench to instruct the grand jury that it had a duty to indict anyone against whom there was evidence enough and to keep its hands off anyone against whom there wasn't.

Groh was indicted. He had been lately elevated to a civil court judgeship, and it might have been expected that he would come there with the minimal confidence in the system of justice, whose adornment he now was, to entrust his vindication to proof of a jury trial.

Instead he scuttled to the Appellate Division, and now he has his reward in its curious findings that Keenan and Justice Sandler had coerced the grand jury into indicting him.

With the same undiminished deference to the black robe, it is impossible to find in the Appellate Division's confusion from this set of facts anything except the very opposite of their actual import.

The only indisputable coercion that Sandler and Keenan exercised upon the grand jury was to force it not to indict someone they knew could not fairly be convicted. Their sin then was in protecting the rights of a slightly innocent party.

Keenan has leave to press for a new indictment of Groh, who says that the prosecutor has "already had two bites of the apple and . . . shouldn't have a third."

History affords us considerable reason to infer Groh's authority in the realm of bites into apples; and his assessment may well be correct, in which case we are left with every reason to suspect that ITT paid a public official for a favor in Queens and no prospect that anything will be done about it.

The attendant ironies are as powerful as they are unpleasant. Nadjari would have indicted Donald Manes and pilloried him exuberantly in the prints up to the hour when the case against him was properly thrown out for want of evidence.

Nadjari's successor religiously abstained from any such enormity and now he is punished by a ruling from which no one seems to have profited except Groh, who sits in a place he may have helped himself earn by a corrupt transaction, and Maurice Nadjari, whose enemies have presented him with an undeserved appearance of substance for his outrageous implication that every tainted judge has a friend in court.

JURORS CURIOUS ABOUT MANES

STATE COURT CHARGES COULD THROW OUT GROH INDICTMENT

(By Edward Hershey and John Cummings)

Long Island City—Some members of the special grand jury that indicted former Queens Deputy Borough President Robert Groh on bribery and extortion charges in November wanted instead to consider voting on an indictment of Queens Borough President Donald Manes, according to court papers.

The information was obtained as the Appellate Division of the State Supreme Court dealt a death blow yesterday to the Groh indictment, charging Special State Prosecutor John F. Keenan and State Supreme Court Justice Leonard Sandler with improperly instructing the grand jury after it had initially refused to indict Groh. The reluctance of the grand jury to indict Groh, according to court papers, stemmed from the feeling on the part of a number of jurors that they should have been allowed to consider voting on an indictment of Manes, who was Groh's superior at the time the indictment alleges that Groh extorted contributions to Manes' campaign in exchange for a zoning variance. One juror, according to the court papers, asked: " 'Is Mr. Groh responsible for his actions or is Mr. Manes, who he has been appointed [by], from a viewpoint of responsibility vs. delegated authority?' " According to the grand jury minutes included in the case file, here was discussion between Sawyer and the jury and one of the jurors asked him "is Mr. Groh responsible for his actions or is Mr. Manes. .?"

Both Keenan's office and the judge told the jury that there was insufficient evidence to sustain an indictment of Manes. Sandler is also quoted in the minutes at telling the jurors: "I would gather from the questions that there was some concern—and understandably so—about Mr. Manes. I would urge you to separate that question entirely from your consideration of the evidence with regard to Mr. Groh."

In effect, the appeals court yesterday ordered the trial court to dismiss the Groh indictment. Groh's attorney, Marvin Segal, said he would move next week to dismiss the case. The five-member appellate court said that it lacked, for technical reasons, the power to dismiss the Groh case itself, or it would have done so. But it said the indictment should be dismissed by State Supreme Court Justice Howard Jones because the grand jury record revealed "procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system." It noted that the grand jury had refused on Nov. 8 to vote an indictment against Groh and did so two days later only because Special Assistant Prosecutor Steven Sawyer and Sandler both went before the jury "without any request from the grand jury."

The appellate court, in a unanimous decision, then said the grand jurors indisted Groh because "they felt they had no alternative except to indict" after hearing Sawyer and Sandler. The jury cast only 12 votes, the minimum number required of the jury's 23 members, to indict Groh, according to the decision. Groh, a former city sanitation commissioner and deputy borough president, was elected to the Civil Court one week before his indictment last Nov. 10 on charges of accepting $7,000 in contributions to Manes' 1973 campaign from the ITT-Sheraton motel chain to arrange for a zoning variance at its motel near La Guardia Airport.

Groh, who resides in Little Neck, said yesterday when informed of the appellate court decision that he felt "pounds lighter * * * I would like to add that I'm proud to be part of a judicial system that protects the innocent * * *"

From papers on file with the special term of the State Supreme Court in Long Island City, where Groh was indicted, Keenan's office said in affidavits that Sawyer went into the grand jury with Sandler because the jury requested it, but this did not appear on the grand jury record. The reason, according to an affidavit filed by Keenan and Sawyer, was because "we learned from certain members of the jury that some dissatisfaction existed with regard to our legal instructions that they could not consider an indictment against a certain other public official." Kennan and Sawyer's affidavit did not identify Manes by name, although Sawyer, in excerpts from the grand jury proceeding in the same file, identified the public official he mentioned in the affidavit as Manes. Excerpts of the minutes were filed by both sides in briefs on Segal's motion to dismiss the Groh indictment. Normally, grand jury minutes are secret.

In the grand jury minutes, Sawyer told the jurors: "My impression is that in that particular area of the law, as it relates to the responsibility of Mr. Groh vis-a-vis Mr. Manes, or in relation to Mr. Manes, is an important one." He also said in the minutes: "It is my impression that there may be some lack of complete understanding or appreciation of the legal aspects of the law as it relates to Mr. Manes * * *"

In their affidavit, both Keenan and Sawyer said their discussion with the jury was informal "and not recorded by the grand jury reporter * * * (but) a juror clearly stated that he wanted Judge Sandler to instruct them."

The affidavit said that on Nov. 9, after the grand jury refused to indict Groh, Keenan and Sawyer went to Sandler and told him the grand jury wanted further instructions. On the 10th, when the grand jury resumed deliberations, the grand jury minutes on file quote Sawyer as telling them: "I charge you as a matter of law at this point is insufficient evidence for you to consider a charge against Donald Manes in connection with this proceeding. The only person before you at this time, upon the state of evidence at this time is Mr. Groh."

Sandler then is quoted in the minutes as saying, "In all fairness, the head of an agency does not necessarily know of the facts of criminality commited by anyone within his agency."

A spokesman for Manes would say only that Manes appeared before the grand jury, waived immunity, answered all questions put to him "and has made it his policy not to comment on the case."

KURRUS AND ASH,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1977.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, House Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN EILBERG: I submit herewith my statement in support of your bill, H.R. 94, to reform the federal grand jury system.

I ask leave to have my statement on the bill included in the record of the hearings. I have previously communicated with your staff and was informed that my statement would be included.

I believe that this measure, with the exceptions noted in my comments, is a fundamentally sound and progressive step toward true reform of our archaic grand jury system.

Sincerely,

THOMAS E. PATTON.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS PATTON

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: My name is Thomas Patton. I am an attorney practicing in Washington, D.C. I specialize in federal civil and criminal trials. I am also a part-time professor of law at Catholic University School of Law. I have represented defendants in numerous major complex federal criminal cases—particularly in business and financial cases, the so-called "white collar" cases. I submit this statement in support of HR 94, the bill introduced by Mr. Eilberg to reform our federal grand jury procedure.

OPENING REMARKS

In my experience, the federal grand jury as it functions today serves no useful purpose. It never operates independently, but rather it only responds to the direction of a U.S. Attorney. It is useful chiefly as a discovery vehicle so that prosecutors may issue subpoenas and make their case, with the putative defendant having no similar access to evidence and no opportunity to challenge the government's case. A grand jury also provides a forum for the government to add a new count to those already proposed; namely, perjury. A grand jury practically always responds to the prosecutor's directive on returning an indictment. It is literally true that a prosecutor may obtain an indictment whenever he so desires; examples of a grand jury refusing an indictment desired by a prosecutor are so rare that they are not worth mentioning. This historical tradition that grand juries protect the citizen from an oppressive executive is not viable today. Grand juries exist today only because the Constitution demands them. The reason for the irrelevance of the grand jury is clear: The absence of the adversarial system.

Grand jurors hear only the witnesses called by the prosecutor. They examine only the documents obtained by the prosecutors. It has been claimed that a U.S. Attorney will not bring a weak case, so that sufficient evidence of probable cause is presented. What more can we ask if evidence of probable cause is presented? This argument seriously begs the question and dangerously misses the point, especially in a complex case with voluminous documents. If only one side of a case is heard, then naturally the prosecutor's evidence will seem strong. But in our adversary system, another case can always be made. A complex document case requires the grand jurors to study voluminous difficult records: Financial statements, ledgers, prospectuses, memoranda and the like. Of course, the jurors cannot cope with such documents, for they are not trained accountants or financial analysts. So they accept without challenge the interpretations and significance placed on the records by the prosecutor. They never hear another side. It is argued, therefore, that after all an indictment is only a charge based on probable cause and that the accused will have his chance to present his side at the trial. This argument is a cruel joke. An indictment often goes far toward destroying a person, even if he is later acquitted. A reputation is usually irretrievably tarnished by an indictment. The emotional and financial ruin of a prolonged defense effort is often enormous. True fairness to the accused demands that his side be fairly represented and presented before the grand jury. I recognize that practical considerations and resources preclude turning a grand jury into a trial. But, as I believe my remarks which follow demonstrate, a target of the grand jury must be given greater rights than he now enjoys.[1]

I shall confine my comments to two sections of HR 94 which are especially crucial and dear to my heart as a defense attorney: Section 5 regarding grand jury secrecy and Section 7 governing rights of grand jury witnesses. As to these subjects, I believe stronger measures should be legislated. As to the other provisions of the bill, I simply want to register my full support, particularly for the measures insuring genuine grand jury independence and restoring full transactional immunity.

In illustrating my belief that Sections 5 and 7 should be strengthened, I shall draw upon my experience, in one particular major case in which I was co-counsel—the case of Otto Kerner, Jr., the late governor of Illinois from 1961 to 1968 who was a judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals at the time of his indictment.

VIOLATIONS OF GRAND JURY SECRECY

Section 5 of the bill would add a new Section 1512 to the Criminal Code imposing criminal sanctions upon persons who reveal anything occurring before the grand jury, with certain exceptions. It is these exceptions which I feel should be tightened to ensure that publicity about grand jury proceedings does not taint the case and destroy any chance of a fair trial.

During the Spring, Summer and Fall of 1971, a federal grand jury in Chicago sat to hear evidence of possible bribery and corruption of public officials by racetrack interests. Judge Kerner was a target of this investigation because he had purchased and sold stock in the well-known Arlington Park Racetrack corporation during the time he was governor. Scores of witnesses were called before the grand jury during this nine-month period. During this time, the substance of the testimony of practically every major grand jury witness was reported in the Chicago newspapers on almost a daily basis. Large headlines contained highly inflammatory statements about politicians being favored with racetrack stock. The plans and strategies of the government lawyers were revealed in detail and discussed in these articles. Most of the articles contained phrases such as "government sources revealed * * *" and "Federal sources explained * * *". For almost nine months, until the indictment in December, 1971, a constant barrage of newspaper and television reporting in Chicago and other major Illinois cities inflamed the public and infected the integrity of the proceedings. On a few occasions, the press reported so-called possible "deals" between Republicans in the White House and Democrats in Illinois to stop the indictment. Obviously, the rumors of such "deals" were supplied by the person responsible for the leaks so as to help pressure an indictment. I have retained in my files a notebook containing a substantial number of the press clippings which prove my point, but I will not burden the record with copies of these clippings; they are available for the Committee's review if desired. The government prosecuting attorneys never disputed the fact that the leaks occurred. They could not dispute the leaks since the news reports clearly demonstrated that someone present in the grand jury room was leaking information. After the indictment, lawyers for Kerner and the other defendants made motions for an evidentiary hearing to discover the source of the leaks.

These motions were denied upon the representation of the U.S. Attorney that he would disclose the source of the leaks if he could find them. Needless to say, the U.S. Attorney never reported to the Court that he had uncovered the leaks and I frankly do not believe that much of an effort was made to discover the source. In its grand jury investigation, the government employed a battery of 10 or 12 lawyers and Internal Revenue Service investigators, all of whom had authority to enter the grand jury room. Any one of them could have been responsible for the leaks.

It is difficult for me to give this Committee a full picture of the enormous amount of saturation publicity given by the Chicago newspapers and television stations to the grand jury's investigation of Judge Kerner, a widely-known and respected public figure. He had been an extraordinarily popular governor with a reputation for complete honesty and integrity. Any information about him was highly newsworthy in the eyes of the several very competitive Chicago papers. All five Chicago newspapers competed to obtain exclusive stories and bigger headlines about the grand jury proceedings. Practically every report of evidence presented to the grand jury was front-page headline news, and the headlines were unquestionably written in inflammatory language designed to capture the attention of the reader. Phrases like "Kerner's Stock Bonanza", "Secret Racetrack Deals", "Racetrack Stock Scandals", and "Pay O[illegible]", were typical. There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that the steady wave of scandalous reporting irrevocably prejudiced Judge Kerner by the time his indictment was returned.

I am also convinced that the disclosures affected the grand jurors and prejudiced them from coming to any kind of independent judgment. Such prejudicial publicity can ruin even the highest reputation of a man such as Judge Kerner and can so prejudice him in the eyes of prospective jurors that a fair trial is extremely difficult. In the Kerner case, the judge granted the prosecutor's motion to sequester the jury for the trial because of the great publicity. But the damage had already been done. Every juror had read the prior newspaper accounts of the case.

The press has the right to publish any facts known by it, of course, and this Constitutional right cannot and should not be circumscribed. But there is a way to avoid the publication of damaging evidence in scurrilous headlines before the indictment is even returned. The answer is to insure the strictest possible secrecy of jury proceedings. Based upon my experience in the Kerner case, I cannot support the exceptions to Section 5 of the proposed law. Section 5 would allow disclosure to or by an attorney for the government "in the performance of his duties". I believe that this is too vague because it permits a government lawyer who is interviewing any potential witness to disclose the testimony of another witness. Such information could be freely disclosed to the press by the potential witness under subparagraph (c)(3). I do not believe that a witness should be allowed to disclose the substance of his grand jury testimony to anyone other than his attorney. I do not believe that a government lawyer should reveal the substance of grand jury proceedings to anyone other than government personnel.

Grand jury secrecy is a hallowed protection which is supposed to afford the potential defendant his rights to a fair and impartial trial. Secrecy is also important to assure the grand jury's impartial judgment free from the pressure of publicity. Independence is one of the principal goals of HR 94. Therefore, I would eliminate the exceptions contained in paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(3), and allow disclosure by a government lawyer only to other government personnel and by witnesses only to his attorney. There is no reason why anyone else should learn the testimony of grand jury witnesses. Government lawyers should not prepare one witness by discussing the testimony of another in any event because the testimony of each witness should be his own best recollection. Needless to say, I feel very strongly about this protection as a result of the tragic experience in the Kerner case where the grand jury proceedings might as well have been conducted in Lincoln Park. I hope that the Committee will give every consideration to my suggestion.

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

I am delighted that Section 7 permits every witness before a grand jury to be accompanied by an attorney in the grand jury room. (I oppose the adoption of the last sentence of Section 7(b), however, for the reasons given above with respect to grand jury secrecy, since the witness' counsel should also be prohibited from making disclosures of grand jury testimony to anyone other than the witness). The heart of my comments on Section 7 relate to subclause (c) which prohibits the witness' counsel from addressing the grand jurors or otherwise taking part in the proceeding. In this respect, I believe that a distinction should be made between a witness who is a target of the grand jury investigation and a witness who is not. Naturally, the government cannot be certain of the identity of all persons who will be indicted; however, I believe that the government has a Constitutional obligation to inform a prospective witness if he is a target of the investigation. I believe that the attorney for a target of the proceedings should have the right to participate more fully than merely advising the witness. Of course, permitting an attorney to advise his client while testifying in the grand jury room is a remarkably enlightened advance in the archaic grand jury system and goes far toward allowing the grand jurors to hear evidence other than that presented by the prosecutor. But as a practical matter, the efforts of HR 94 to make the grand jury independent will not work in practice unless someone other than the prosecutor is allowed to present the proposed defendant's side of the case. I do not believe that in practice grand jurors will exercise their rights of independent inquiry under Section 3330 except in very rare instances. The government attorney has no obligation to present evidence to the grand jurors which exculpates prospective defendants. Proposed Section 3229(b)(4)(c) seems to impose such an obligation, but there is no substitute for the adversarial process in giving the jurors all of the facts.

It seems to me that very little extra time and disruption will occur if the new law allowed counsel for a prospective defendant to make a brief statement to the grand jurors at the time of his client's testimony. Such a statement could be limited in scope and time. To my mind, this is the only way truly to safeguard a grand jury's independence and ensure that it will vote on an indictment with all of the evidence at hand. I do not suggest that counsel be allowed to interrogate his client. Customarily, any witness can ask to make his own statement before the grand jury. All I suggest is the limited right of counsel to make a reasonably brief statement before the grand jury at the end of his client's testimony.

Let me give you an example, again from the Kerner case, of how a statement of counsel might well at least have clarified a very confusing area which resulted in a perjury count in the indictment. I use this example because I believe that a charge of perjury, when included in an indictment with other counts, is clearly the most difficult, if not impossible, charge to defend against. When a perjury count is included in a multicount indictment, I am convinced that the trial jury believes that the grand jurors found the defendant to be a liar and that such a charge, therefore, infects the entire case.

Based upon my experience, it is really rather easy for any witness before a grand jury to tell a falsehood in a complex case involving numerous details spanning several years. The falsehood may or may not be intentional; even if unintentional, it can be the subject of a perjury count in an indictment. It is only common sense that any witness, in the utmost good faith, cannot remember every detail of complex transactions and testify accurately as to all of them, even when he has been prepared by counsel. It is no exaggeration to say that a prosecutor is generally able by skillful questions to cause any witness to state a falsehood in a case of any complexity. No one but the witness ever knows for sure whether the falsehood was willful; quite often it is not.

Let me illustrate my point by again referring to the grand jury proceeding against Judge Kerner. Bear in mind that Judge Kerner himself was an experienced attorney and former prosecutor. During his grand jury testimony, Judge Kerner was asked a series of questions concerning detailed events that occurred eight years earlier. While governor, Mr. Kerner had many thousands of conversations about every conceivable subject. Anyone's recollection would be taxed if asked to recount conversations that occurred many years ago; all the more, the memory of a busy governor serving eight years in office would be taxed to remember particular conversations. The prosecutor posed a question which contained within it three separate questions; namely, (1) whether Kerner ever discussed racing dates with anyone, (2) whether he ever influenced racing dates, and (3) whether anyone ever asked him for favors concerning racing dates. Incredibly, this multiple question was perfectly allowable because no counsel was present to object to it. Mr. Kerner, in an effort to answer the question as he understood it, stated that he never influenced racing dates. He did not specifically say that he never had discussions about racing dates. His answer was quite natural, since he assumed that the question sought to elicit information about improper influencing of dates. Yet the indictment returned by the grand jury included a perjury count which contained the charge that Kerner lied to the grand jury because he in fact merely discussed racing dates. Thus, the government did not have to prove that he commited perjury. I view this kind of conduct as outrageous.

Prosecutors can ask lengthy convoluted questions and get away with it. The witness, no matter how experienced, is not in a position to parry with the prosecutor, but rather believes that he had better answer the question as posed. Therefore, it is simply not fair to prevent the witness' counsel from participating in the interrogation to a limited extent so as to avoid confusion and prejudice. I do not suggest that counsel be allowed to interrogate the witness, for this might well unduly prolong the proceeding. But counsel should be afforded two rights: the right to object to an improper question, and the right to make a brief statement to the grand jurors following his client's testimony. Surely, this limited right of participation would not prolong or obstruct the proceeding, and the benefits of fairness to the witness far outweigh any minimal inconvenience to the proceeding.

I believe that the example of the perjury charge, and specifically the tragic example in Mr. Kerner's case, amply illustrate the need for greater participation by counsel. I have always been very firmly of the opinion that the inclusion of the perjury count in the indictment against Otto Kerner made the critical difference and resulted in his conviction, because if a jury believes that a defendant has told an untruth, then it is very likely to convict him of all counts because it disbelieves his entire testimony.

I trust that my remarks will be of some help to the committee.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY EUGENE N. HARLEY IN BEHALF OF ALLIANCE FOR THE PRESERVATION OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

"* * * Under the present Administration, we have witnessed the birth of a new breed of political animal—the kangaroo grand jury—spawned in a dark corner of the Department of Justice, nourished by an Administration bent on twisting law enforcement to serve its own political ends, a dangerous modern form of Star Chamber secret inquisition that is trampling the rights of American citizens from coast to coast."—Senator Edward Kennedy, March 13, 1973.

"It would be a cruel twist of history to allow the institution of the grand jury that was designed at least in part to protect political dissent to become an institution of political suppression."—Judge Shirley Hufstedler of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.

"Grand juries can and do listen to illegal evidence, and when my men were put through the federal grand juries in this city, it was the worst star chamber session you ever saw."—Los Angeles Police Chief Edward Davis, 1974.

The grand jury, traditionally expected to serve to protect the citizens of the United States from capricious justice, has eroded into an agency to be used for the suppression of civil rights. It has been used for the unintended purposes of harassing political dissidents, of "branding" unfriendly critics when no actual guilt exists, of forcing newspaper reporters to divulge sources of information, and to even prohibit the free exercise of religion.

The grand jury must once again become a shield for the protection of the innocent, and the debris of erosion cleared away to reclaim this "panel of the people" to its rightful position as laid out in the Bill of Rights.

A classic abuse of the grand jury system occurred recently in New York. On October 12, 1976, a New York Queens County Grand Jury handed up an unprecedented indictment of unlawful imprisonment in the First Degree against two leaders of the New York International Society for Krishna Consciousness, (Hare Krishna), a bona fide Hindu religious sect.

Two Hare Krishna devotees went before a Queens grand jury bringing charges against several persons allegedly guilty of abducting the devotees for the purpose of forceably changing their chosen religious beliefs. The grand jury, under the prosecution of Queens Assistant District Attorney, Michael Schwed, made a surprising and novel move and dismissed the charges against the alleged abductors (when their own statements admit to each and every element of the crime of kidnaping), and instead indicted the president of the New York temple of the religion and a supervisor, charging that the two leaders held the two devotees illegally, through the use of "brainwashing" and "mind control."

On March 17, 1977, New York State Supreme Court Justice John Leahy in Queens County threw out the indictments against the two Hare Krishna officials and summarily dismissed the case as a "direct and blatant violation" of constitutionally guaranteed religious freedom. Justice Leahy said, "The entire and basic issue before this court is whether or not the two alleged victims in this case and the defendants will be allowed to practice the religion of their choice—and this must be answered with a resounding affirmative."

"The Hare Krishna religion is a bona fide religion with roots in India that go back thousands of years . . . The separation of church and state must be maintained. We are, and must remain, a nation of laws, not of men. The presentment and indictment by the grand jury was in direct and blatant violation of defendents' constitutional rights," Justice Leahy stated, in his fourteen page decision.

This abusive indictment by the New York Queens County Grand Jury, under the prosecution of Michael Schwed, is a classic abuse by grand juries of constitutional guarantees and a further example of the misuse of this system to harass the unconventional, or the critic. Justice Leahy stressed in his decision, "The freedom of religion is not to be abridged because it is unconventional in its beliefs and practices or because it is approved or disapproved by the mainstream of society or more conventional religions."

Specific abuses in the Queens grand jury's unusual turn-about and surprise indictment of the two New York ISKCON (Hare Krishna) leaders are delineated in an affidavit here attached by Eugene N. Harley, an assistant defense attorney in the case, (see).

The actions of the Queens Assistant District Attorney, through the misuse of the grand jury system, is too reminiscent of actions which took place during the Salem Witch Trials and the Spanish Inquisition. Such abuses are an affront to the Constitution of the United States, particularly acute in a time when crime rates are rising and our court system is too heavily overloaded.

JUDGE DISMISSES CHARGES IN HARE KRISHNA "BRAINWASHING" CASE

(By Murray Schumach)

The Hare Krishna movement was called a "bona fide religion" yesterday by a State Supreme Court justice in Queens who threw out two indictments against officials of the movement. The indictments had charged them with illegal imprisonment of two members and attempted extortion from the father of one of the believers.

"The entire and basic issue before this court," said Justice John J. Leahy, "is whether or not the two alleged victims in this case and the defendants will be allowed to practice the religion of their choice—and this must be answered with a resounding affirmative."

The indictments, handed up last year, were the first of their kind against the Hare Krishna movement. They charged that Angus Murphy, the president of the New York temple of the religion, and Harold Conley, the supervisor of women at the temple, held Edward Shapiro and Merylee Kreshour in the temple illegally, by brainwashing them.

Mr. Murphy was also accused of joining Mr. Shapiro in an attempt to extort $20,000 from Mr. Shapiro's father. The allegations were denied by the younger Mr. Shapiro and by Miss Kreshour.

After determining that Miss Kreshour and the younger Mr. Shapiro had lived voluntarily in the temple at 340 West 55d Street and that there was no case for attempted extortion, Justice Leahy said:

"The Hare Krishna religion is a bona fide religion with roots in India that go back thousands of years. It behooved Merylee Kreshour and Edward Shapiro to follow the tenets of that faith and their inalienable right to do so will not be trammeled upon.

"The separation of church and state must be maintained. We are, and must remain, a nation of laws, not of men. The presentment and indictment by the grand jury was in direct and blatant violation of defendants' constitutional rights."

The judge pointed out that the prosecution, during the hearing last month, had conceded that no physical force had been used by the defendants against Miss Kreshour or the younger Mr. Shapiro, adding:

"The said two individuals entered the Hare Krishna movement voluntarily and submitted themselves voluntarily to the regimen, rules and regulations of said so-called Hare Krishna religion, and it is also conceded that the alleged victims were not in any way physically restrained from leaving the defendant organization."

On the allegation of brainwashing, he said:

"It appears to the court that the people rest their case on an erroneous minor premise to arrive at a fallacious conclusion. The record is devoid of one specific allegation of a misrepresentation or an act of deception on the part of any defendant."

Justice Leahy, who stressed that his decision was intended as a "dire caveat to prosecutional agencies throughout the length and breadth of the land," cited the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion and said:

"The freedom of religion is not to be abridged because it is unconventional in its beliefs and practices or because it is approved or disapproved by the mainstream of society or more conventional religions.

"Without this proliferation and freedom to follow the dictates of one's own conscience in his search for and approach to God, the freedom of religion will be a meaningless right as provided for in the Constitution.

"Any attempt, be it circuitous, direct, well-intentioned or not, presents a clear and present danger to this most fundamental basic and eternally needed right of our citizens—freedom of religion."

Legal and ethical questions have arisen from intensive efforts to "deprogram" members of Hare Krishna and other movements. The main method is to separate the follower from the group and to subject him to long periods of counterpersuasion. Among the controversial and well known deprogrammers is Ted Patrick, a Californian who was released recently from prison on kidnapping charges resulting from a deprograming case.

The grand jury was drawn into the Hare Krishna case last September when Miss Kreshour alleged that she was kidnaped by her mother, Edith, and a private investigator in Queens and subjected to four days of a treatment called "deprograming."

v.
ANGUS MURPHY, ET AL., DEFENDANTS.

AFFIDAVIT

(Index No. 2114/76)

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
v.
HAROLD CONLEY a/k/a TRAI DAS, ET AL., DEFENDANTS.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss.:

EUGENE N. HARLEY, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am associated with the firm of Levy, Gutman, Goldberg and Kaplan, attorneys for defendants Murphy and the International Society for Krishna Conciousness, Inc., in the above indictments and make this affidavit in support of defendants' motion to dismiss the indictment and to inspect the minutes of the Grand Jury, for discovery and inspection, and for a Bill of Particulars.

2. The office of the District Attorney has no objection to the Court's inspection of the Grand Jury minutes and, at the first conference on this matter on October 26, 1976, the office of the District Attorney indicated that a transcript had been ordered. As appears below, however, such in camera inspection, unless it results in dismissal of the indictment, is insufficient. I spoke with Assistant District Attorney Schwed on October 15, 1976 and requested the names of all witnesses before the Grand Jury and the substance of their testimony. Mr. Schwed refused to supply such information. This affidavit is submitted in support of the defendants' request that defendants be granted the opportunity to inspect the minutes in order to prepare a detailed motion to dismiss the indictment.

3. The indictments charge defendants with unlawful imprisonment in the First Degree (P.L. § 135.10). No information is given as to how or where such alleged imprisonment took place, nor the nature of the risk of serious physical injury to which the victims were exposed. However, statements by Assistant District Attorney Schwed make it clear that the basis for the charge of Unlawful Imprisonment rests not upon a physical restraint or a threat thereof, but upon restraint through "brainwashing" and mind control [New York Post, October 12, 1976, annexed as Exhibit A]. The charge that the imprisonment was based on "mind control" has been repeated frequently by representative of the People quoted in print and electronic news media. Assistant District Attorney Schwed further admits that the concepts of "brainwashing" and "mind control" are not defined in the criminal law. [Long Island Press, October 16, 1976, annexed as Exhibit B].

4. Your deponent believes that the indictment must be dismissed, or defendants granted access to the Grand Jury minutes on several grounds. It is necessary to examine the minutes in order to allow defendants to prepare their defense. The grounds, each of which will be treated separately in detail, are as follows:

A. The only possible evidence which could have been before the Grand Jury with respect to unlawful restraint, is testimony that the alleged victims of the alleged crimes, Edward Shapiro and Merylee Kreshower, were abducted not by the defendants in this action but by their own relatives and other individuals. Upon information and belief, Assistant District Attorney Schwed urged the Grand Jury in violation of CPL §§ 190.25(6), 210.20(1)(c) and 210.35(5) to ignore clear evidence of the commission of Class A felonies by Galen Kelly, Eli Shapiro, Edythe Kreshower and others, and to ignore the testimony of an alleged victim, in order to return the indictments against the defendants.

B. Upon information and belief, the witnesses who testified before the Grand Jury can have no knowledge of alleged unlawful imprisonment of Ed Shapiro or Merylee Kreshower by the defendants through the use of brainwashing and mind control or otherwise.

C. Religious proselytizing and the recruitment and maintenance of adherence through communication of ideas and religious beliefs by the defendants is not brainwashing or mind control and cannot serve as a basis for an indictment. The concept is unknown in the law and violates basic principles of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and Article 1 Section 8 of the Constitution of the State of New York.

D. It is clear that the indictments have been pursued by the District Attorney not for the purpose of securing a conviction but for the unlawful purpose of assisting the parents of Ed Shapiro and Merylee Kreshower to obtain control over their adult children.

Merylee Kreshower and Ed Shapiro were kidnapped, not by the defendants but by their parents and agents of their parents

5. Based upon information received by your deponent, the only possible information with respect to any violation of PL Article 135 arose from the kidnapping of Merylee Kreshower by her parents, Galen Kelly and their associates. Ed Shapiro was also a kidnap victim outside of the State of New York. Merylee Kreshower is 24 years old. Ed Shapiro is 22 years old. The sources of deponent's beliefs are conversations with Ed Shapiro and Merylee Kreshower on October 12, 1976, testimony under oath by each of them in various proceedings concerning the status of each of them as material witnesses in this criminal proceeding, newspaper articles, interviews with members of defendant religious corporation, an affidavit submitted in the material witness proceedings by Galen Kelly, and the testimony of Thelma Stromwasser in the material witness proceeding.

6. Your deponent spoke with Merylee Kreshower and with Ed Shapiro on October 16, 1976 at the 107th Precinct Stationhouse in Queens County and again at Queens Criminal Court on the same day.

7. Ms. Kreshower told me that she had been physically and violently grabbed off the street in Queens County against her will, placed in a van and taken and physically held in a motel in Long Island, a house in the Bronx and finally to the home of Galen Kelly in Kingston, New York. For a period of approximately one week, Ms. Kreshower was held captive and prevented from moving about as she pleased. In order to escape, Ms. Kreshower agreed to cooperate with her abductors, including Kelly and her mother, and was taken to a police station in Kingston. Once there, Ms. Kreshower told the Kingston police that she had been kidnaped by Galen Kelly and her mother and wished to return to the Hare Krishna Temple. The same testimony was repeated by Ms. Kreshower under oath on October 21, 1976. One of the co-conspirators in the abduction of Ms. Kreshower also testified to the same story on October 25, 1976. Ms. Kreshower told me that she testified to the same facts before the Grand Jury.

8. Further information is supplied in an affidavit executed by Galen Kelly [annexed hereto as Exhibit C]. This affidavit, submitted in support of an application to have Ms. Kreshower held as a material witness, dated September 23, 1976, admits to each and every element of the crime of kidnapping in the first degree (PL § 135.25). Upon information and belief, Galen Kelly also testified before the Grand Jury to the same effect.

9. Ed Shapiro told me on October 12, 1976 that he had been similarly kidnaped by his father and stepmother with the assistance of one Ted Patrick approximately two years earlier in Massachusetts. He was subjected by Patrick to the forcible stress, restraints, deprivations, and threats we came to know of from the Korean War as "brainwashing." This ordeal lasted for a period of several weeks before he escaped and eventually returned to the Hare Krishna Temple. Upon information and belief, Eli Shapiro, M.D., father of Ed, testified before the Grand Jury about these facts. It is interesting to note that Ed Shapiro, the alleged victim of kidnaping by the defendants, was never called to give his story to the Grand Jury.

10. However, despite the testimony of Ms. Kreshower with respect to the kidnaping, and despite the testimony by Galen Kelly admitting to his role in the kidnaping, the Grand Jury, upon information and belief upon the prodding of Assistant District Attorney Schwed, failed to indict Galen Kelly for his clear violation of the law, but instead indicted the defendants herein for the crime of unlawful imprisonment on the novel theory that defendants held Ms. Kreshower and Ed Shapiro by a process of mind control.

The witnesses who testified before the Grand Jury can have no knowledge of brainwashing and mind control by defendants

11. It is difficult for deponent to imagine what kind of testimony and legal advice were presented to the Grand Jury in order to have it come out with such a novel interpretation during the Grand Jury presentation comes solely from accounts in the newspapers and from the alleged victim, Merylee Kreshower.

12. The New York Post, on October 13, 1976 [copy annexed as Exhibit D] reported that Edyth Kreshower, Galen Kelly and a 20 year old former Hare Krishna devotee were among two dozen witnesses heard by the Grand Jury. The News, on October 13, 1976, [copy annexed as Exhibit E] reported that dozens of parents of young Hare Krishnas testified. The Long Island Press, on October 14, 1976 [copy annexed as Exhibit F] reported that four former members of the sect testified before the Grand Jury. Finally, the New York Times, on October 21, 1976 [copy annexed as Exhibit G] reported that fifteen to eighteen persons testified, "about half of whom were parents whose children have been in various religious cults but who have since left them. The Grand Jury also heard testimony from a Harvard University Dean, a Chicago man whose 12 year old son is believed to be in a religious sect, a dean from Pace College, and two or three local physicians."

13. Your deponent believes that none of the above persons can possibly have relevant information which can support the indictment for unlawful imprisonment by means of brainwashing and mind control by these defendants of these two individual "victims" both of whom deny that the "crime" occurred.

14. Edyth Kreshower submitted an affidavit in support of the application to have her daughter Merylee held as a material witness and testified in a proceeding before Justice Agresta on October 21, 1976. One can only assume that her testimony before the Grand Jury followed similar lines. In her affidavit, she utters the bald conclusion that her daughter is under the mind control of the Hare Krishna leaders, and further states that her daughter underwent radical changes following her entry into the Hare Krishna temple. There are two reasons for this. First, as testified by Merylee Kreshower before Justice Agresta on October 21, 1976, Merylee Kreshower was thrown out of her own home by her mother merely because she contemplated joining a Buddhist Church. Second, just as there would inevitably be radical changes in an individual who enters a Trappist monastery or a Jesuit Seminary, so a young adult woman who freely chooses to enter the Hare Krishna religion and devotes herself to its activities and study would naturally exhibit such a change. That this is evidence of mind control is utter nonsense inconsistent with the Constitution.

15. The affidavit of Galen Kelly probably paralleled his affidavit. [Exhibit C] In that affidavit can be found the incredible statement, "although I have no formal training in psychiatry, it is my opinion that Merylee Kreshower manifested the symptoms of a schizophrenic personality." He observed Ms. Kreshower while she was being held hostage by him. Is it possible that such testimony by a hired mercenary and admitted kidnaper can serve as a basis for the indictment at issue herein, the indictment of those to whom she escaped from his admitted kidnaping of her?

16. The newspapers reported that parents of young Hare Krishnas testified, as well as parents "whose children have been in various religious cults" and "a Chicago man whose twelve year old son is believed to be in a religious sect." [Exhibit G]. None of the above could possibly have presented any information material to this indictment. This is especially true with respect to parents whose children are with other "cults". Although the Assistant District Attorney and the "deprogrammers" may believe that all religious sects are the same, such a view can only be classified as foolish and at odds with First Amendment principles.

17. Attorneys for defendants have had contact with the "Chicago man" referred to above. It is typical of the leaks to the press by the office of the District Attorney that the facts have been distorted in order to generate adverse pre-trial publicity against the defendants. Upon information and belief, the 12 year old son is in a Hare Krishna temple in the custody and company of his own mother who is involved in a marital dispute with the "Chicago man." The testimony of this man can have no conceivable bearing to the issues presented in these indictments.

18. With respect to the Pace College dean and local physicians, none of them are qualified to present information relevant to this indictment. Deponent has spoken to members of the Hare Krishna temple in New York and no person fitting those descriptions has had any first hand contact with the Temple nor conducted any study of any kind which would enable them to make a judgement with respect to mind control by the defendants. What studies did these individuals undertake? Defendants must know in order to prepare a defense to these novel indictments.

19. Upon information and belief, the Harvard Dean who was mentioned is Dr. John Clark. Deponent can only surmise that the testimony presented by Dr. Clark is similar to that set forth in his affidavit in support of the application to hold Ed Shapiro as a material witness. The only knowledge which Dr. Clark could have relevant to this indictment stems from his observation of Ed Shapiro during a conversion with his father. With no further interview or testing of any kind, Dr. Clark concluded that Ed Shapiro was under the mind control of the defendants. [copy of affidavit annexed as Exhibit H]. It is also interesting to note that, upon information and belief, this conversation took place after Ed Shapiro had been abducted by his parents and Ted Patrick and was being held against his will and subjected to the brutal "deprogramming" methods of Patrick as described below. During testimony on November 3, 1976 in the Probate Court of Middlesex County, Massachusetts, Dr. Clark testified on behalf of Ed Shapiro's father's unsuccessful attempt to have Ed declared incompetent, involuntarily retained in a mental hospital, and have Ed's father make his committee and conserontor. Dr. Clark testified that Ed's absence of symptoms of mental disorder was the strongest proof that Ed was a victim of mind control. Dr. Clark was unsuccessful, despite efforts by Assistant District Attorney Schwed to help, in having Ed kept in solitary confinement in a mental hospital so that Dr. Clark could conduct "stress interviews" which he described in his testimony in terms of the restraints and hardships and deprivations, of human contacts, books, and creative comforts, employed by the North Koreans against American war prisoners.

20. The most interesting and possibly relevant information may have been supplied by former Hare Krishna devotees who have left the movement. However, even their testimony must be considered suspect. Devotees leave the movement in one of three ways. First, and the largest category, comprises the approximately 3 of every 4 beginners who leave of their own free will. How can one credit voluntary departers' statements that they were restrained by mind control or any other means? If that were true, how could they have left of their own free will? The second and smaller category is those who do not abide by the strict rules of abstinence and moral behavior and are asked to leave. The smallest and final group is those who are kidnaped and subjected to deprogramming by a Ted Patrick or a Galen Kelly.

21. Deponent submits that the only brainwashing and mind control which exist in connection with these indictments are the actions of the Patricks and Kellys of this world who practice their lucrative and confessedly illegal business under the euphemism of "deprogramming". Annexed hereto as Exhibit I is an article from Liberty Magazine of March-April 1975 in which the deprogramming process is described.

22. Deponents submits that the testimony of former devotees who have remained away from the temple following kidnaping and working over by the deprogrammers is inherently suspect and cannot serve as a basis for an indictment. For these reasons, it is necessary that defendants be granted access to the Grand Jury minutes in order to prepare a defense to these indictments.

Religious proselytizing by defendants is not brainwashing or mind control

23. In contrast to the individuals who testified before the Grand Jury despite their lack of knowledge of any information which might be relevant to the indictment, there are annexed to this motion affidavits by scholars who have spent time studying the Hare Krishna movement, parents who have spent time examining the movement with an open mind, and ex-devotees who entered and left the movement of their own free will.

24. Dr. J. Stillson Judah is the author of the book "Hare Krishna and the Counterculture" (John Wiley and Sons, New York, 1974) which was written following a long period of study. Dr. Judah found no evidence of mind control of any kind. He did learn that the form of Vaisnavism practiced by the Hare Krishnas is actually a purer form of that ancient and widespread religion than that practiced by most Hindus in India.

25. Dr. Allen Gerson, who studied the movement from the point of view of a psychiatrist, found, after thorough testing, that no member of the sect had been held against his or her will or was subject to the mind control of another person.

This information must be contrasted with that of Dr. Clark who concluded that Ed Shapiro was under mind control after observing him for a short period of time.

26. Dr. Thomas Hopkins, a professor of religion whose major field of study is the Hindu religion, has studied the International Society for Krishna Consciousness since its inception in this country. Dr. Hopkins' affidavit affirms that the Hare Krishna religion is a bona fide religion with roots in India before the birth of Christ. He has been a frequent visitor to Hare Krishna Temples and it has clearly been his experience that no devotee is held against his will or is under the mind control of any other devotee.

27. The affidavits of Mrs. Polly Perlmutter and Mrs. Jean Havens must be viewed in contrast to the testimony before the Grand Jury of parents whose children are in various cults. Each of them were at first surprised and upset when they were informed that their adult children wished to join the movement. In contrast to some parents, however, these two individuals did not view this choice as a rejection of everything they stood for but as a choice, freely entered into by young adults. In contrast to other parents who thereupon disowned their children and cut off all communication with them, these two parents determined to learn about the religion which their children had chosen to join. They visited the temples and read the literature. As their understanding grew, their attitudes changed, and they now fully support the decisions of their children. Upon information and belief, their affidavits are representative of the view of the majority of rational parents whose children have joined the movement.

28. Mrs. Polly Perlmutter states in her affidavit that she was particularly moved by the feeling of sadness expressed by those devotees whose parents had refused to accept their choice and had cut them off from their homes. None of the devotees expressed hatred for their parents, but only a sense of loss.

29. The affidavits of Janet Nicol and Joel Chalson set forth the typical experience of former devotees of the Hare Krishna religion. Each of them entered of his or her own free will in their search for a structure that would help provide them with a better way of life. Ms. Nicol is quite clear that no force was used of any kind, and in fact, no real interest was shown until she evidenced the desire to become a devotee. When she decided to leave the movement following her decision to become a nurse, no attempt was made to restrain her. She feels that the movement helped her to find herself and straighten out her life at a time when she needed help. When she had "found" herself she was free to go and did so.

30. These affidavits must be seen in contrast to the testimony of former devotees before the Grand Jury, who, upon information and belief, went through a kidnaping and forced brainwashing by the "deprogrammers." Each of the devotees whose affidavits are annexed, entered and left the movement of their own free will. One has remained away and one expects to return. Neither was recruited or restrained by any kind of coercion.

31. The affidavits submitted herewith are made by individuals who have actual knowledge of the Hare Krishna religion in contrast to those persons who testified before the Grand Jury, whose knowledge of the Hare Krishna religion is either non-existent or the product of ignorance and hysteria.

The indictments herein were brought not for the purpose of securing a conviction but for the ulterior purpose of forcing the witnesses to submit to forced deprograming by their parents

32. It is clear from the actions of Assistant District Attorney Schwed that the indictments in question herein were pursued not for the purpose of securing convictions but instead to coerce Edward Shapiro and Merylee Kreshower to submit to "deprogramming" against their wills. To this end, Mr. Schwed has abused the processes of this Court under Article 620 of the Criminal Procedure Law in a manner inconsistent with any other goal than to force the witnesses by means of physical restraint and intimidation to change their testimony at the ultimate trial of this issue.

33. In an affidavit submitted in support of the warrant to hold Merylee Kreshower Mr. Schwed stated, in paragraph 8, as follows: "That on August 18, 1976, said Merylee Kreshower told the deponent that any attempt to make her discredit the defendants would cause her to leave the United States or in the alternative, failing that, to take her own life."

34. This exercise in double-talk was used as a basis to hold Merylee Kreshower as a material witness. Ms. Kreshower had told your deponent several times on October 12, 1976 that her testimony would not weigh against defendants but would establish their defense because she participated in the Hare Krishna temple of her own free will. Ms. Kreshower repeated under oath that she was not restrained by the defendants but was kidnaped by Galen Kelly. It is incredible that an Assistant District Attorney should cooperate in an attempt to make a witness discredit the defendants when her true testimony would absolve them. [Transcript of October 21, 1976 hearing pp. 23 and 24 annexed as Exhibit J].

35. Mr. Schwed repeated this maneuver while attempting to hold Mr. Edward Shapiro as a material witness by repeating in paragraph 5 of his affidavit a statement by Dr. Eli Shapiro that: "Their son will not appear in court to testify against said defendants and will if forced to do so, attempt suicide or flee the jurisdiction of this court."

It is an incredible thesis that American jurisprudence in general and New York State law in particular could allow a District Attorney to force a witness to reverse her account of the truth and testify against a defendant. Mr. Shapiro told me on October 12, 1976 that his testimony would not weigh against the defendants, but that he was exercising his religion of his own free will.

36. Mr. Schwed thereafter continued in his attempts to force Mr. Shapiro into a captive situation where others would physically restrain and attempt to force him to change his testimony. On October 14, 1976, Mr. Schwed was pursuing this strategy when he moved to withdraw the material witness order holding Mr. Shapiro. Standing with Mr. Schwed were the attorneys for the parents who had obtained a physician's certificate to have Ed Shapiro committed to an institution.

37. Attorneys for Ed Shapiro agreed to the vacatur of the material witness order but argued that Ed Shapiro could not legally be taken against his will to the hospital in question, and that the order to commit him was invalid on its face. When Ed Shapiro and his attorneys tried to leave the Court, they were stopped by two ambulance attendants and detectives under Mr. Schwed's jurisdiction, direction and control. They tried to remove Ed Shapiro to the hospital against his will.

38. The attorneys for Ed Shapiro thereupon requested that the material witness order be restored so that bail could be fixed rather than have the witness delivered to the deprogrammers. Mr. Schwed stated that he could and would not assume that responsibility. [A transript of the October 14, 1976 hearing pp. 27–34 is annexed hereto as Exhibit K].

39. Thereafter, Mr. Shapiro and his attorneys left the Courtroom and were set upon by the two ambulance attendants and an unknown number of detectives from Mr. Schwed's office who saw to it that Ed Shapiro was forcibly taken against his will to the South Oaks Hospital in Amityville, New York but the hospital refused to admit him.

40. The following day, and despite the fact that Mr. Schwed had stated that he could not take the responsibility for holding Ed Shapiro, Mr. Schwed again applied to this Court for an order to hold Ed Shapiro as a material witness, and for a warrant for his arrest.

41. The attorneys for Ed Shapiro agreed to surrender him on Tuesday, October 19, 1976. On that date, when the attorneys appeared in Court preparatory to surrendering Ed Shapiro, they were served with a Writ of Habeas Corpus requiring them to produce Ed Shapiro so that he could be taken to Massachusetts pursuant to a Massachusetts court order naming Eli Shapiro as temporary guardian of Ed Shapiro. The following day, Ed Shapiro surrendered and, following an order of this Court that the Massachusetts judgment was entitled to full faith and credit, Ed Shapiro was taken to a hospital in Massachusetts, Schwed withdrawing the obstacle of his material witness arrest order.

42. It is clear that Ed Shapiro's attorneys did not have custody of Ed Shapiro in the sense that a writ of habeas corpus requires, and were forced to submit Ed Shapiro to his father's custody, agianst his will, only because of the coercion exercised by Schwed in securing a warrant for Ed Shapiro's arrest.

43. At the Middlesex County competency proceeding which Ed's Massachusetts attorneys later brought there, Ed's father's attorney advised the Court that the reason Assistant District Attorney Schwed in New York had withdrawn the material witness application and cooperated in having Ed removed by his temporary guardian to Massachusetts upon the understanding that the same Dr. Clark who had given an affidavit for Ed's father on the first material witness order would, as a staff doctor there, be allowed to keep Ed under "stress" conditions for "deprogramming." [See telegram of Assistant District Attorney Schwed annexed hereto as Exhibit L]. It is clear from the above recited events that Assistant District Attorney Schwed abused the material witness proceedings as a pretext to enforce the civil desires of Eli Shapiro and to coerce the witness into changing his account of events.

44. Assistant District Attorney Schwed made his unlawful actions even more clear when, on October 19, 1976, he stated to Lindsay Miller, a reporter for the New York Post that "he would be willing to dismiss all the charges against the Hare Krishnas on one condition—that Ed Shapiro be allowed to remain in the hands of an experienced deprogrammer for a specified period, such as 10 days." [A copy of New York Post Article, October 20, 1976 annexed hereto as Exhibit M].

45. Deponent spoke to Lindsay Miller who stated that Mr. Schwed did make this statement in the press room of the Queens Criminal Court. Ms. Miller told me that she was surprised by this statement and, later in the afternoon, asked Mr. Schwed if he was indeed making such an offer. Mr. Schwed repeated his offer unequivocally.

46. Thus it is clear that Mr. Schwed has acted in this matter for the purpose of enforcing an inter-family dispute, and assisting the family to kidnap their son for the purpose of deprogramming. The purpose behind these maneuvers is clear. The Assistant District Attorney hoped to force Ed Shapiro by threats, intimidation and other kinds of stress to change his testimony so that the witness would testify against the defendants herein. The Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments have outlawed the third degree as a method for securing testimony.

47. The actions of the Assistant District Attorney are reminiscent of the actions which took place during the Salem Witch Trials and the Spanish Inquisition. During those times, witnesses were tortured, whipped, pilloried, and dunked in the water in order to force them to change their stories. As a consequence of these methods, witnesses testified as to their possession by Satan or other evil spirits, and to the complicity of others in their possession.

48. The methods have changed from the days of Salem and the Spanish Inquisition. Physical torture is not used, although physical restraint, and denials of comforts and associations are necessary parts of the "deprogramming" process. Mental pressure and fatigue are the modern methods used to induce members of unorthodox religions to return to orthodoxy. This country was founded upon different principles. The First Amendment does not allow the establishment of religion. Neither Congress nor the states may establish an orthodoxy or force constituents to favor one religion over another. The Assistant District Attorney, in this case, is violating those basic principles. He has used the powers of his office in an attempt to destroy what he and others consider to be a heresy. It cannot be permitted.

49. Defendants have further moved for discovery and inspection, for a Bill of Particulars, for exculpatory evidence and to suppress any evidence obtained by illegally intercepted communications. Your deponent urges that pursuant to the various statutes involved, these reasonable requests must be granted in their entirety. Defendants have requested no more than the minimal information necessary to particularize the accusations against them and to enable them to prepare their defense for the trial of this action and prevent any possibility of double jeopardy in the future.

50. Defendants further seek a modification of the order of Justice Thomas A. Agresta, dated October 21, 1976 [a copy is annexed as Exhibit N] which order admonishes defendants and their counsel from associating with the witness Merylee Kreshower. A similar admonishment with respect to associating with Edward Shapiro was also promulgated by Justice Agresta.

51. It will be extremely difficult if not impossible to conduct the defense of this action if attorneys for defendants are unable to speak with the central figures in this action. Both Merylee Kreshower and Edward Shapiro have stated to deponent prior to the entry of this Order that they were each kidnapped by their parents and their agents and wished to tell the facts as they know them which would inevitably help the defendants in the defense of these indictments.

52. The apparent bases for the admonition by Justice Agresta are the representations of Assistant District Attorney Schwed that Meryleo Kreshower and Ed Shapiro are under the mind control of defendants. The indictments charge that very thing so that the order is based on a presumption of guilt. It is unclear how the alleged mind control by the defendants is to be exercised through their attorneys. No testimony was offered to this effect. The Fifth, Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States guarantee to all persons the right to a fair trial and due process of law. A fair trial cannot be held if attorneys for defendants are forbidden to speak to the major witnesses in this action.

53. No prior application for the relief requested herein has been made.

Wherefore, your deponent respectfully requests that defendants be granted the relief requested in this motion together with such other and further relief as may be just, including any relief granted to defendant Conley, a codefendant of ISKCON, Inc. in Indictment No. 2114/76.

EUGENE N. HARLEY.

Sworn to before me, this ninth day of December, 1976.

PAUL G. STACK,
Notary Public State of New York.

U.S. COURT OF APPEALS,
SECOND CIRCUIT,
New York, August 2, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and Naturalization Law, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: We take the liberty of expressing our deep concern about some of the proposals in H.R. 94, which is now under consideration by your Committee. Since federal judges are required as part of their duties to deal on a day-to-day basis with grand juries, which act under the supervision of the judiciary, and with problems raised by the grand jury system as it presently functions, your Committee may be interested in our views.

The grand jury is one of our oldest public institutions, dating back to pre-Colonial days. Although long ago it was sometimes used for political purposes, it has since limited itself for the most part to the imporant public function of investigating crime and to fulfillment of the public's interest in seeing that where there is probable cause to believe that a person has committed a crime that person will be accused and brought to trial. On the other hand, where no such probable cause is shown every federal grand jury is usually advised by the court that its duty is to protect persons under investigation against unwarranted injury to their reputation. The grand jury, operating with the aid of federal prosecutors, has accordingly conducted its proceedings in secret in order to protect the innocent, encourage full investigation, disclosure and deliberation, prevent persons from tampering with witnesses or suborning perjury, and preclude the escape of those likely to be indicted.

By and large the federal grand jury, despite some faults, has functioned satisfactorily under the guidance of prosecutors held to high standards. It has filed public accusations only when there has been probable cause to believe the accused guilty, as it attested to by the fact that almost all federal indictments result in guilty pleas or convictions after trial. The grand jury, moreover, has served as a moderating influence on any tendency on the part of prosecutors to be overzealous and has brought nonprofessionals into the decision-making process.

As with every public institution, there is undoubtedly room for improvement in the federal grand jury. However, where an institution such as a grand jury has functioned reasonably well in the past, it seems wise to scrutinize proposed "improvements" most carefully, particularly where the "abuses" against which they are purportedly aimed may have been minimal or nonexistent and the reforms pose a risk of harm or of unnecessary and costly burdens. Guided by this approach, we believe that some of the proposals advanced by H.R. 94 may well serve to improve the administration of justice. We refer, for instance, to the proposal to criminalize unauthorized disclosure of evidence presented to a grand jury (proposed § 1512), which might serve to protect against leakages of the type that can cause harm to those under investigation as well as to the Government's investigation itself. Recording of all grand jury proceedings, including statements of the prosecutor and of grand jurors (as proposed in § 3333), might serve to protect against misstatements or misconduct in the grand jury room. Authorizing the court to disclose to a defendant prior to trial the grand jury testimony of witnesses to be called at trial and exculpatory testimony given before a grand jury could promote Congress' policy in favor of fairness and prompt disposition of criminal proceedings. Reduction in the size of the grand jury, while more debatable, could conceivably improve the process by leading to greater active participation by individual jurors.

As against these potentially helpful proposals, others—particularly those which would tend to turn the grand jury proceeding into an adversarial one—appear to pose great harm to the administration of justice by needlessly increasing the opportunity for obstructing, delaying, disrupting and prolonging the investigatory and accusatory process, with no showing of a counterbalancing gain to the public or to individual rights. If enacted, this legislation would, furthermore, impose an enormous and unconscionably disproportionate additional burden on an already overworked federal judiciary. If a Judicial Impact Statement (similar to an Environmental Impact Statement) were prepared with respect to these proposals, it would demonstrate that in exchange for benefits that are at best speculative the cost in terms of judicial hearings, examinations of evidence and findings would be excessive. For instance, the proposed legislation would almost certainly require the judiciary to resolve such issues as:

(1) whether a grant of transactional immunity to a witness would be "adequate for the purposes of the investigation,"

(2) whether the interrogation of a witness for whom immunity is sought could be attributed directly or indirectly to wiretapping in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2515,

(3) whether such a witness' testimony is "necessary to the public interest,"

(4) whether a witness, if granted immunity would be exposed to the danger of foreign prosecution and, if so, whether he has been provided with "adequate safeguards,"

(5) whether a request for immunity complies with Department of Justice guidelines or other practice,

(6) whether the testimony of such a witness would fall "within the scope" of the grand jury's investigation and be "relevant" thereto as well as to the immunity order itself,

(7) whether the Government has reasonable grounds to believe that a witness would be an accused,

(8) whether the Government properly refrained from advising a witness that he was a target of a grand jury investigation on the ground that, if so advised, he might flee, tamper with witnesses or otherwise seek to delay the investigation,

(9) what information concerning a grand jury's investigation should have been imparted to a witness in order to enable him to prepare and seek permission to present rebuttal evidence to the grand jury,

(10) what sanctions should be imposed on the Government for failure to comply with its obligations under the proposed legislation,

(11) whether evidence not presented to a grand jury might be "exculpatory," see Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1973), or might have "materially" affected the testimony of a witness who appeared before the grand jury, see United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976),

(12) whether a witness is not "financially able" to retain his own counsel and thus entitled to an assigned counsel under the Criminal Justice Act,

(13) whether the conduct of a witness' counsel in the grand jury room in advising his client and in objecting to questions has been so disruptive as to require his removal from the grand jury room and the substitution of other counsel for the witness.

(14) whether the substitution of such counsel would violate a witness' statutory or constitutional right to counsel of his own choice,

(15) whether counsel for a possible target of a grand jury investigation may appear in the grand jury room as counsel for more than one witness without involving conflicts of interest,

(16) what relief may be granted retroactively with respect to a subpoena that is quashed after the witness has appeared and testified before the grand jury,

(17) whether a subpoena must be quashed because it is "oppressive," "punitive" or because the witness' appearance is "unnecessary" or his testimony would be "privileged" or "cumulative."

The foregoing examples of the issues that would be repeatedly faced by federal judges in administering the proposed legislation demonstrate that the court would be called upon to interpret many terms that are vague and general in their import and to review evidence, much of it complex in nature, to make the necessary rulings.

The proposed legislation, if enacted, may also prevent the federal courts from complying with the mandate of the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161-3174, to the effect that, beginning in July 1979, they must dismiss indictments that were not filed within 30 days after the defendant had been arrested or served with a summons in connection with the charges against him, see 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161(b), 3162(a)(1). Although the Speedy Trial Act excludes certain periods of delay in computing the prescribed time limits, see 18 U.S.C. § 3161(h), the excluded periods are so limited in nature that delays of the type that will inevitably occur under the amendments proposed by H.R. 94 will create a possibly irreconcilable tension between these two statutes.

Since it would not be appropriate to attempt in this letter a detailed analysis of each of the omnibus provisions of H.R. 94, we attach hereto a memorandum setting forth some of the major provisions to which we are opposed and the grounds of our opposition. We believe that the views stated in this memorandum are generally in accord with those of the Committee on Administration of the Criminal Law of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which we are advised will be set forth in a report to be forwarded shortly to your committee.

We would appreciate your furnishing a copy of this letter and enclosure to the members of your Committee. We stand ready, should the Committee desire, to answer questions or to furnish such additional information as may be available.

Respectfully yours,

MEMORANDUM RE: CERTAIN PROPOSALS IN H.R. 94, A BILL DEALING WITH GRAND JURY PROCEDURES AND THE RIGHTS AND LIBERTIES OF GRAND JURORS

The following is an analysis of certain sections of H.R. 94 to which various members of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals are opposed. The memorandum does not deal with proposals, some of which are mentioned in a letter dated August 2, 1977, signed by certain members of the court, that may be favored or unopposed.

1. Restrictions on the court's power to hold a recalcitrant witness in civil contempt under 28 U.S.C. § 1826

The bill would amend 28 U.S.C. § 1828 to limit the court's use of civil contempt power in dealing with recalcitrant witnesses before a grand jury by:

(1) Requiring that the witness be given 72 hours' notice of a contempt hearing, absent a showing of special need for speed;

(2) Placing a 6-month maximum on the period of confinement that might be imposed, or a period equal to the length of the court proceeding or of the grand jury, whichever is lesser;

(3) Barring further confinement of a grand jury witness for a subsequent refusal to testify concerning the same transaction or event;

(4) Requiring that a witness held in contempt be admitted to bail pending appeal unless the appeal is frivolous;

(5) Providing counsel under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2006A, for any witness unable to obtain adequate representation;

(6) Prohibiting contempt proceedings against a witness interrogated on the basis of illegal wire intercepts in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2515.

Comments.—A witness charged with civil contempt before a grand jury should, of course, be afforded reasonable notice and opportunity to defend. However, reasonable notice in a particular case ordinarily depends on such circumstances as the nature and complexity of the evidence to be obtained and presented, the extent of preparation needed to present it, and the amount of time remaining before the grand jury's term will expire.

Rather than fixing the required notice at a specific period (e.g., 72 hours), a better approach, which would recognize flexibility as essential, would be to provide that reasonable notice be given, since there would be many cases where less than 72 hours' notice would be consistent with due process and with the public interest in avoiding unnecessary delay in the investigation and prosecution of crimes, which Congress mandated in enacting the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161, et seq.

Similarly, to limit confinement for civil contempt to a maximum of six months, regardless of the possibly longer remaining term of the grand jury, and to bar any further confinement for the witness' subsequent refusal to testify concerning the same transaction or event, unnecessarily weakens the court's power to require a recalcitrant witness to give testimony to which the grand jury is entitled in its search for the truth. The purpose of § 1826 is not to punish but to provide a weapon that can be used to require a witness to furnish material testimony which he is obligated to give in the public interest. The witness, of course, holds the key to his own release, which he normally obtains upon his testifying. The length of incarceration, however, that will induce a witness to fulfill this obligation will vary according to the witness and the circumstances of each case. Some witnesses would fulfill their legal obligation only if faced with the prospect of incarceration longer than six months, whereas others would be induced to act by the prospect of a much shorter commitment. The court should be vested with the flexible power to impose whatever term appears reasonably necessary under the circumstances of each case rather than be hobbled by a fixed maximum period that may be shorter than the remaining term of the grand jury.

Bail pending appeal from a civil contempt order issued under § 1826 should be fixed where the witness can demonstrate a likelihood of success on appeal from the district judge's order. The proposal that bail be granted except where the appeal is found to be frivolous places the burden on the wrong person—the prosecutor. After a district judge, following a hearing, has decided the merits against the witness, the burden should normally be on the witness. If it appears that there are close or difficult questions warranting review, the district court or the court of appeals, in the exercise of their discretion, would then normally admit the witness to bail pending the appeal. But a witness should not be presumptively entitled to bail after a hearing has gone against him.

To prohibit holding in contempt a witness who has been interrogated on the basis of illegally obtained wiretaps runs directly counter to the Supreme Court's sound reasoning in United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 at 349–50 (1974). Because a grand jury does not finally adjudicate the guilt or innocence of a person but merely determines whether there is probable cause to believe that the person has commited a crime, the grand jury has always been permitted to pursue its investigatory and accusatory functions unhampered by procedural and evidentiary restrictions applied in a criminal trial. Moreover, the Supreme Court concluded in Calandra that the incremental deterrence against police misconduct that would result from extending the exclusionary rule to grand jury proceedings would be speculative at best and not justify extension of the rule to grand jury proceedings even though it would be enforced at trial.

Regardless whether one agrees with the Supreme Court's reasoning, there can be no doubt that the proposed prohibition against interrogation of grand jury witnesses on the basis of illegally obtained intercepts would place a very heavy additional burden on already overworked federal courts. As the Supreme Court noted in Calandra: "Permitting witnesses to invoke the exclusionary rule before a grand jury would precipitate adjudication of issues hitherto reserved for the trial on the merits and would delay and disrupt grand jury proceedings. Suppression hearings would halt the orderly progress of an investigation and might necessitate extended litigation of issues only tangentially related to the grand jury's primary objective * * * In sum, we believe that allowing a grand jury witness to invoke the exclusionary rule would unduly interfere with the effective and expeditious discharge of the grand jury's duties." 414 U.S. at 349–50.

As matters stand today, the demands of competent trial counsel for wiretap canvasses and checkouts on the part of the Government, each of which usually require weeks for a report and are often followed by court hearings to determine whether there was strict adherence to the procedures prescribed by 18 U.S.C. §§ 2516–19 frequently delay or prolong criminal trials. If this proposal were adopted and each witness provided with competent counsel, the prohibition against interrogation of grand jury witnesses on the basis of illegally obtained intercepts would enable counsel to stall grand jury investigations indefinitely and to raise issues that would involve the court in countless hearings.

2. Proposals to change the type of immunity that may be granted to recalcitrant witnesses under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002–3 from "use" to "transactional" immunity and to change the conditions for granting immunity

Under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6002–3 as this statute presently stands a United States Attorney, when he believes it necessary to the public interest, may, with the approval of the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General or any designated Assistant Attorney General, request the district court to issue an order compelling a grand jury witness who has invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege to testify in exchange for a grant of immunity under which no testimony or information provided by the witness may be used directly or indirectly against him in any criminal case except perjury. Upon the making of such a request the court is obligated to grant such "use" immunity to the witness.

H.R. 94 would shift from the United States Attorney to the federal court the duty of determining to its "satisfaction," upon a request by the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General, or designated Assistant Attorney General, (1) whether the testimony of a witness is necessary in the public interest, (2) whether there is danger of foreign prosecution of the witness, (3) whether the grand jury investigation is legally authorized and the request for immunity complies with the Department of Justice guidelines, (4) whether the proposed testimony is within the scope of the grand jury's investigation and relevant thereto as well as relevant to the immunity order, and (5) whether a grant of immunity would be "adequate for the purposes of the investigation." Only if satisfied that these conditions have been met and if furnished with a certified "summary of the evidence relating to the witness," would the court be permitted to grant immunity. Even then the court might in its discretion refuse to grant immunity. The immunity granted, moreover, would not simply prohibit use of the witness' testimony against him (directly or indirectly) but would immunize him from prosecution on account of any "transaction, matter or thing" concerning which he was compelled to testify.

Comments.—This proposal is most unwise and would place an intolerable additional burden on already overtaxed federal courts. Except in extraordinary cases (e.g., Watergate), under the principle of separation of powers, which is an integral part of our Constitution, the Attorney General, not the federal court, is the party who determines whether an immunity grant would be in the public interest. It is the function and duty of the Attorney General, not that of the court, to investigate and prosecute those cases which will best insure that the federal laws will be carried out and to coordinate prosecutorial efforts toward that end.

Moreover under our system of government the Attorney General and his subordinates are far better equipped than a federal judge to make the necessary determination. The prosecutor is ordinarly the only person sufficiently familiar with the details of pending investigations and prosecutions to determine whether a grant of immunity is essential to obtain important evidence or to secure an indictment or conviction. In contrast, the court is not sufficiently acquainted with the general program for federal law enforcement in the community or the particular problems in each case to determine whether a witness' testimony would warrant a grant of immunity, much less to determine whether such a grant would be in the public interest.

The new duties placed by the new amendment on the federal judiciary would be staggering. To carry them out the court would have to play a role that has traditionally been exercised only by the Executive Branch, studying the background of the grand jury's proposed or pending investigation, acquainting itself with the relationship of the investigation to other federal law enforcement programs, and delving into the often complex evidence in each case to appraise the relevancy, adequacy and need for the testimony of the witness whose immunity is sought. Only after steeping himself in the background could the judge be satisfied that the conditions imposed by the legislative proposal were met. This would require in many cases an enormous amount of time and effort to be invested by already overworked judges. It might also require judges in some cases later to recuse themselves from sitting as the trial judge because of inability to preside without being influenced by the background information acquired in the investigation to determine whether immunity should be granted.

The proposal that, where an immunity grant is necessary, it must be of "transactional" rather than "use" immunity is also unwise. A grant of immunity represents an accommodation between a witness' Fifth Amendment privilege and society's need for evidence essential to law enforcement. As the Supreme Court recognized in Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972), as long as a grant of immunity is "co-extensive with the scope" of the witness' Fifth Amendment privilege he receives all of the protection to which he is entitled under the Constitution, no more, no less, i.e., the right to be protected against the use of his testimony against him, with the government bearing the burden of proving that any later prosecution against him has not been based on or derived from his testimony. After some six years of experience under 18 U.S.C. §§ 6001–3 we know of no evidence that the broader transaction immunity is necessary to protect witnesses against prosecution derived from disclosures which they have been compelled to make through grants of "use" immunity. Since use immunity fully protects the witness' constitutional rights, transactional immunity is therefore unnecessary.

3. Imposition of various conditions upon the prosecutor's presentation of evidence to a grand jury (proposed § 3329)

H.R. 94 would add a new § 3329 to Title 18, U.S. Code, which, among other things, would require that the court, in giving preliminary instructions to each grand jury, "assure that the Grand Jury reasonably understands . . . (5) the subject matter of the investigation." The proposal would also permit any person to ask to testify or to produce records before the grand jury, whereupon the prosecutor would be required to notify the grand jury and, if he wished, make recommendations with respect to the handling of the request. Unless a majority of the grand jury voted to the contrary, the prosecutor would be required to subpoena the evidence or witness, who must then be permitted to testify upon waiving immunity.

The prosecutor would also (1) be required to notify a person against whom evidence is to be offered that he has a "right to testify and present evidence," unless the prosecutor can prove that the person would flee, endanger other witnesses, or unduly delay the investigation and prosecution; (2) be required to advise the grand jury periodically of the nature and existence of any evidence, not yet received, "which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant"; (3) be barred from representing a case to another grand jury after a grand jury has failed to return an indictment unless the court finds that additional relevant evidence has been discovered.

Comments.—This proposal would heap enormous and difficult burdens on the judiciary, precluding it from performance of other essential duties, including compliance with the Speedy Trial Act.

Turning first to the requirement that the judge assure that the grand jury understands the "subject matter of the investigation" of each case, this would be difficult enough to achieve in a district where grand jury investigations were few and far between. But in a large urban center such as New York the court would find it virtually impossible to comply. In the Southern District of New York, for instance, there may be as many as 25 grand juries functioning simultaneously, with a half dozen sitting at the same time, of which some are "regular" grand juries hearing a series of cases in one day's sitting, following each of which a vote is taken on whether to indict. To satisfy the proposed amendment several judges would be required daily to acquaint themselves with the background of each case and to instruct the jury accordingly. There simply would not be enough judicial time to meet this additional obligation unless new judgeships were created or existing judges abandoned important trials and hearings of other cases to perform this new duty.

The other proposed amendments, aside from policy considerations which might be debated at length, pose problems that could be resolved in specific cases only after evidentiary hearings. For instance, where a prosecutor fails to notify a person against whom evidence is offered because the Government did not become aware that he was likely to be a target until all the evidence was in and an indictment filed against him, a motion to dismiss the indictment for failure to receive notification would be filed, which would require the court to unravel the background in order to make findings.

The proposed amendment also raises a question as to when a prosecutor is justified in concluding that a person need not be notified because he might flee, endanger other witnesses or unduly delay the investigation. The assumption that the Government can always come in with tangible proof on this issue seems unreal. In many cases knowledge that a grand jury investigation is pending may lead a person to flee or to start tampering with witnesses even though no tangible evidence could have been adduced that he would do so until the misconduct occurred.

Assuming that a prospective accused is given the opportunity to give rebuttal evidence to the grand jury, there arises the question of how much information must be furnished to him by the Government regarding the case in order to enable him to prepare and present his evidence. Must the Government make a detailed disclosure that would outline the evidence against him? If so, would this not turn the grand jury proceeding into a preliminary mini-trial on the merits? Assuming there is a failure on the part of the prosecutor to comply with these proposed requirements as construed by the courts, what sanctions could be imposed? Dismissal of an indictment? All of these questions would have to be resolved by the courts.

The proposed amendments further appear unnecessary. In most cases the evidence of probable cause is clear. The defense could at best raise issue for trial rather than be entitled to a "no true bill." A grand jury is instructed by the court at the outset, and the prosecutor recognizes, that its duty is not merely to indict but to protect the innocent against unwarranted indictment. Although the grand jury looks principally to the prosecutor for production of relevant evidence, it may in close or doubtful cases protect against arbitrary accusations by notifying the target of its investigation and permitting him to testify or to point to exculpatory evidence. Nor does anything prevent the grand jury from directing the prosecutor to subpoena witnesses or other evidence that may be relevant. However, to impose upon the prosecutor the statutory duty of converting the grand jury's investigation into an adversary proceeding goes too far. Moreover, it is impractical for the reason that it is frequently impossible for prosecutor or court to make the kind of decisions dictated by the proposed amendment, since the lines at the preliminary investigatory stage are often not as bright and sharp as they later become at trial, after the parties have the benefit of additional evidence that was not uncovered or available at the time when the indictment was filed.

For these reasons it is also inadvisable to require the prosecutor to advise the grand jury of all Brady or impeachment material. In many cases the Government simply is not in a position at the investigatory stage to determine what is or may be exculpatory. Nor can the court or prosecutor, before the facts are uncovered, determine whether evidence not presented to the grand jury would have "materially" affected a witness' credibility or negated guilt.

In short, these proposals, if adopted, could have the effect of delaying, obstructing and prolonging grand jury investigations by turning the grand jury proceeding into a preliminary mini-trial in which the Government, the grand jury and the court would be forced to devote a disproportionate amount of time to issues that should be saved for resolution at trial. Rather than expose the Government and the courts to such unconscionable burdens at the risk of having a resulting indictment dismissed, the better course would be to rely upon the integrity of the Government and the disposition of grand juries to act fairly and to hear both sides where there are doubts about the existence of probable cause. Ordinarily neither the grand jury nor the prosecutor has a motive to indict unless there is probable cause to believe that on the record as a whole the accused committed the crime. The prosecutor hardly desires an indictment unless he believes he will be able to obtain a conviction after trial.

4. Right of grand jury witness to have counsel (§ 3330A)

At present a grand jury witness may retain counsel whom he may consult outside of the jury room. H.R. 94 would add a § 3330A to Title 18 U.S.C. to the effect that (1) every witness should be entitled to the assistance of counsel, with counsel appointed under the Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A, for any person financially unable to obtain counsel, (2) counsel would have the right to be present with the witness when interrogated in the grand jury room and to advise him but not to address the grand jurors, and (3) if counsel violated the limits on his function in the grand jury room, he could be removed by the court and the witness ordered to obtain new counsel.

Comments.—In theory the presence of counsel with the witness in the grand jury room instead of outside of the grand jury room seems reasonable enough, particularly if the witness is a possible target of the grand jury's investigation. Counsel, if present, might be more effective in improving his client's understanding of his constitutional rights and protecting him against violation of those rights or of statutory privileges and against harassment, misunderstandings and the like.

In practice, however, admitting counsel to the grand jury room poses the serious risk that the proceedings will be protracted and disrupted, with the court being forced to intervene repeatedly. Experience in criminal trials demonstrates that many lawyers simply would not adhere to the idealistic conception that they would limit themselves to advising their clients in sotto voce. Once in the grand jury room, many counsel, unimpeded by the presence of the court, would seek to influence the grand jury, using tactics of the type frequently employed in criminal trials, e.g., lengthy objections to question, in which counsel refers to irrelevant prejudicial material as the basis for an objection. Advice to a witness could be given in tones that would be overheard by every grand juror. A witness' answers would be those of the attorney rather than of the witness himself. Judges would inevitably be invoked to rule on preliminary objections as to the relevancy and materiality of questions, to discipline or remove counsel from the grand jury room and to substitute new counsel. Moreover, should a judge discipline or remove a witness' counsel, a serious question would then arise as to whether he had interfered with the witness' constitutional or statutory right to counsel of his own choice.

To provide counsel for every grand jury witness "financially unable to obtain legal representation," as would be mandated by the proposed § 3330A, would probably tax our limited pool of available lawyers versed in criminal matters beyond the breaking point, rendering them unavailable for the more important task of trying cases. To provide counsel for such witnesses would also increase enormously the appropriations required to finance appointments under the Criminal Justice Act, since the number of indigent witnesses called before grand juries would be far greater than the number of indigent accused.

On balance, the harm that would flow from the proposal to provide each witness with counsel in the grand jury room substantially outweighs the speculative benefits from such a procedure. The present federal grand jury system has worked reasonably well in protecting witnesses' rights. The only person normally desiring counsel at the grand jury's investigatory stage is a possible target of the investigation. Most, if not all, federal prosecutors advise such persons of their status if it is known to the prosecutor and of their Miranda rights, including the right to have counsel available for consultation. Indeed the giving of such a warning could well be mandated.

Under the existing system, moreover, the target of an investigation has the option of invoking his privilege. Although the witness may not be as competent to judge the significance of a question as would be his counsel, there is no reason to assume that the prosecutor or grand jurors would be unfair in questioning him. The risk that a witness would be improperly questioned is outweighed by the disruption, obstruction and delay that could be expected if each witness, regardless of whether the witness is or might be a target, were provided with counsel at his elbow.

5. Quashing of grand jury subpoenas (§3330B)

H.R. 94 would add a new § 3330B which, among other things, would require that a witness subpoenaed to appear before a grand jury be given notice of his right to counsel, including appointed counsel, his Fifth Amendment privilege, the "subject matter of the investigation" and statutes involved, and whether his own conduct is being investigated.

A motion to quash, which could be made in the district where the witness resides or in the district where the subpoena has been issued, would automatically stay compliance with the subpoena until the court had ruled on the motion. The Government would be obligated to show that the testimony was not sought to secure information for trial or regarding activities of a person already under indictment, and that the evidence would be "relevant to the grand jury investigation properly conducted within the grand jury's jurisdiction." The Government would furthermore be required to show that compliance with the subpoena would not be "unreasonable or oppressive," would not require "unnecessary appearance" and would not lead to testimony or information that would be "cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, would not be primarily for punitive purposes or would not involve other like circumstances." The court could quash or impose sanctions upon findings that the witness had already been confined for civil contempt under § 1826 for refusal to testify, that the witness had given notice of intent to claim his privilege, or that a previous grand jury had failed to indict him on the same evidence.

Under the amendment a grand jury could be convened only in the district where "elements" of the criminal conduct under investigation occurred and the court could quash a subpoena upon finding that a witness' appearance would impose a serious hardship on him or his family because of the grand jury's location, or could transfer the grand jury proceedings to some other district.

Comments.—This proposal for the most part is contrary to the public interest. It would greatly increase the opportunities for obstruction and delay of grand jury proceedings without any apparent gain in the administration of justice. It would impose additional, unnecessary burdens on the prosecutor and would enormously and unnecessarily increase the work of overloaded federal judges.

If a prosecutor has reason to believe that a witness is a target of a grand jury investigation, he should advise the witness. This is the practice currently followed by most federal prosecutors. But to require the Government to advise every witness of the "subject matter" or purpose of a grand jury investigation and of the relevancy of the information sought from the subpoenaed witness would tend to destroy the objectives of grand jury secrecy, which are to prevent the escape of prospective accused, insure deliberation by the grand jury free from importuning or harassment, prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with witnesses, and encourage free disclosure and protection of the innocent from unwarranted accusations. Disclosure of subject matter and relevancy would in many instances be the equivalent of publicly broadcasting the grand jury's investigation rather than keeping it secret. The time for such disclosure is after the accusation, if any, is made, and at the ensuing trial rather than during the grand jury's investigation, which is not an adversary proceeding.

Usually it is inconvenient for most witnesses to be required by subpoena to attend any proceeding, whether it be a trial or a grand jury inquiry. Although witnesses should be protected against harassment or oppression, there is no reason to believe that such tactics are so common as to require the type of showing or sanction that would be imposed by § 3330[]. As against the witness' convenience, moreover, there is the public importance of the grand jury's investigation, which should come first. Where it investigates a crime believed to have been committed within its jurisdiction, there is no adequate substitute for the personal testimony of witnesses, whether they are nearby or must come from a distance. Their travel and living expenses are paid by the Government, and it is usually in the interest of all parties concerned to examine the witness promptly and to release him for return to the district of his residence. In these days when one can travel in a matter of hours by air to almost any point from which a witness might be subpoenaed the danger of oppression is minimal.

Whether a witness' testimony is "relevant," "necessary," and not "cumulative," "unreasonable," "privileged," "oppressive" or "excessively burdensome" is a matter of opinion which can be arrived at by a judge only after examination into the entire background and circumstances, which are often complex. For this purpose additional court hearings would be triggered by the inevitable motions to quash. The result would probably be a series of small trials on the merits to determine whether a witness, advised by counsel provided under the Criminal Justice Act, must appear in response to the subpoena. Moreover, if the witness chose to seek relief in the district of his residence rather than in the court which issued the subpoena, the prosecutor, although the balance of conveniences weighed in his favor against that of the witness, would have to leave the situs of the grand jury investigation to acquaint the non-issuing court with the essential facts. The prosecutor would thus be forced to suspend his supervision of the grand jury investigation in which other witnesses might be appearing. Similarly, the court's time would be unnecessarily absorbed in hearings to determine whether the venue of the grand jury should be changed to suit a witness' convenience.

The potential for abuse and prolongation of the investigatory procedure is substantial.

The provision obligating the Government to show that a witness' testimony is not sought for trial or that information is not sought regarding activities of a person held under indictment appears to be unnecessary. As federal decisional law now stands the grand jury may not be used to develop evidence for trial.

6. Encouragement of independent grand jury inquiries (§ 3330)

H.R. 94 would also add a new § 3330, which is designed to encourage grand juries to undertake independent inquiries of the "runaway" type. It would provide them with special counsel and investigators for the purpose, should the Government attorney refuse to cooperate. The grand jury's term would be extended at its request up to 36 months. The special counsel would have the powers and pay of a federal prosecutor, including staff, appropriations, reimbursement of expenses, etc.

Comments.—This proposal is unwise for several reasons. It would pose the risk of abuse of power by an inexperienced, rump body going off on its own, misguided by a special prosecutor who might be motivated by reasons inconsistent with sound administration of justice and unfamiliar with sensitive policies formulated over many years by the Department of Justice regarding such important matters as division of responsibility between state and federal governments and guidelines for exercise of prosecutorial discretion. The result could be not only confusion but the filing of indictments without adequate ground work.

Any accusatory system can become an instrument of oppression in the wrong hands. Although, under the existing system, there may have been occasions where federal prosecutors have failed in their duties or abused their power as the advisors depended upon by grand juries to guide them, the instances have been rare and do not warrant broad and sweeping authorizations of the type here proposed. A provision for runaway grand juries may occasionally be salutary in state practice or even in federal (e.g., Watergate) but it poses too great a risk of irresponsible encroachment upon the Executive Branch in our federal system to be encouraged without strict limitations of a type not found in the proposed § 3330.

7. Availability of grand jury transcripts of testimony of witness (§ 3333)

A separate provision, § 3333 would make available to any grand jury witness a copy of any earlier statement by him in the Government's possession and of the transcript of electronic recording of his testimony before the grand jury. Prior to trial a defendant would be entitled to the grand jury transcripts of all witnesses to be called by the Government at trial, all statements made to the grand jury by the prosecutor and all grand jury testimony or evidence "which in any manner could be considered exculpatory," or which the court might deem "material" to the defense. Upon a showing of good cause the court could deny or restrict such disclosures.

Comments.—To the extent that transcripts of grand jury testimony would aid a trial court and jury in its search for the truth, there should be no objection to disclosures of such transcripts. However, the initial determination of what constitutes exculpatory material should, as under Title 18 U.S.C. § 3500, rest upon the shoulders of the Government, with the court being called upon to rule only where the Government had doubts or there is reason to believe that the Government has not furnished all exculpatory material. No purpose would be served by adding a clause "in any manner" before the term "exculpatory." The standard should be whether, under the circumstances known to the Government, the testimony or evidence could reasonably be considered exculpatory.

Nor would any purpose be served by requiring disclosure to the accused of the prosecutor's statements to the grand jury, except to the extent that such statements might reasonably lead to exculpatory evidence. A prosecutor's statement is not evidence.

8. Defendant's right to a preliminary examination (§ 3368)

H.R. 94 would add § 3368 guaranteeing each defendant a preliminary examination, unless waived, which might be held before or after the filing of an indictment or information in the district court. A preliminary examination after the filing of an indictment would be a sheer waste of time since the indictment evidences the existence of probable cause. Defense could in such a case demand a preliminary examination in order to seek discovery or protect themselves against possible later § 2255 applications or suits for malpractice. It would be an unnecessary burden on the court, particularly since most indictments result in pleas of guilty.

9. Reports concerning grand jury investigations

We live in an age when reports seem to have assumed a sacred character in themselves. Unnecessary statistics are being gathered by the trunkful. This bill requires a report by the Attorney General to the Administrative Office of the number of investigations undertaken by a grand jury with a description of the nature of each investigation undertaken. What this hopes to accomplish, we do not know. Reporting would also require a list of immunity requests by the Attorney General and orders granting immunity, the number of contempt cases, the number of arrests, indictments and convictions resulting from testimony obtained under orders granting immunity and a description of data banks by which grand jury information is processed by the Department of Justice. Some of this material is not in itself objectionable except that resources may be better used to a more appropriate purpose.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 7, 1977.

In Re: H.R. 94
Hon. WALTER R. MANSFIELD,
U.S. Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, New York, N.Y.

DEAR JUDGE MANSFIELD: Thank you very much for your letter of August 2, 1977. With your permission, we would like to include your letter and memorandum in the record of our Subcommittee.

As you indicate in your letter, my Subcommittee is presently considering comprehensive reforms to the Federal grand jury system. Particularly, we are considering H.R. 94, which is a moderate bill providing limited changes in the present system. Generally, the bill provides for increased court supervision over grand jury activities, so that the grand jury would return to its historic role as an arm of the court, rather than as a weapon of the prosecutor; for increased rights to witnesses so that the grand jury would return to its historic role as a shield against oppression and so that the potential for the numerous abuses that have been indicated to our Subcommittee would be decreased; and finally, for an increased voice and role of the grand jurors themselves, with adequate knowledge and information about their duties, in the grand jury proceedings.

In specific response to your letter, I would like to point out that the record of our Subcommittee indicates that the grand jury is still being used for political purposes—to investigate matters which are not really criminal and to "punish" dissidents for their views and not for illegal activities. If the grand jury was limited only to a determination of probable cause, as you indicate, there would be little concern with grand jury procedures. In fact, the indicting function of the grand jury is quite limited. In most situations, an indictment is only returned when the prosecutor requests it, and thus, in fact, the prosecutor is the "indicting" or "charging" body. Problems arise when the grand jury is used as an investigatory mechanism. In those situations, the grand jury is to be an independent seeker of the facts, but has become an appendage of the Government.

I, of course, agree that grand jury secrecy should be maintained and, I would stress, strengthened. For that reason, H.R. 94 contains proposals to punish unauthorized disclosures of grand jury proceedings. As you have indicated, this should generally improve the entire grand jury system.

Your comments and suggestions on H.R. 94 are quite helpful. Particularly, your support for the recording of all grand jury proceedings, for allowing the disclosure of testimony prior to trial, and for reducing the size of the grand jury to decrease the cost (as recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States), will aid in securing the enactment of these provisions.

I must, unfortunately, respectfully disagree with some of your conclusions that other provisions of H.R. 94 would "pose great harm to the administration of justice." I have asked the staff of the Subcommittee to prepare an analysis, step by step, of the present grand jury process and the changes that will be made in that process by H.R. 94. This study indicates that H.R. 94, rather than causing any delays, will speed up generally the entire grand jury procedure.

In specific response to some of your concerns:

(1) Requiring the court to be involved in the granting of immunity should lessen present challenges to immunity proceedings. Motions are presently filed in cases where immunity is given over the objections of a witness, and hearings are now regularly held. H.R. 94 would merely provide the standards for those hearings and give the court increased power to make sure that immunity grants are proper and in the public interest. The only possible additional burden would be on the prosecutor, in demonstrating to the court the propriety of a request for immunity. I would like to point out that this, in fact, should not cause any delay or problems as the local federal prosecutor is now required under Federal Justice Department regulations to prepare such an analysis and justification for submission to the Assistant Attorney in charge of the Criminal Division to obtain his approval.

(2) Requiring a determination as to whether a witness is "target" and whether or not warnings should be given to a particular witness should not cause any delays or any increase in judicial involvement. Presently, most Federal prosecutors, and most state prosecutors (as required by state statutes or case law), give "target warnings." In addition, numerous law suits have been, and will continue to be, filed as to the sufficiency or propriety of warnings or lack of warnings. State and Federal prosecutors have found little problem in determining who is a "a target" and in giving warnings. Only if prosecutors deliberately disregard a mandate, should judicial involvement be required.

(3) Providing for determination of "relevancy," for the review of the propriety of a subpoena, as you may be aware, is presently the law in at least one circuit, (the Third Circuit). The requirement for judicial involvement is minimal. Only a reasonable basis of relevancy need be shown. Similarly, requiring a reasonable basis or nexus for the location of a grand jury proceeding to be shown would not be a substantial burden. There are presently numerous cases challenging subpoenas and venue. H.R. 94 would merely provide the rules and standards for review by the court in evaluating the merits of those cases.

(4) Requiring the prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence is presently required by the Code of Professional Responsibility, and strongly recommended in the American Bar Association Standards, and the National Prosecution Standards. This is not a new requirement. As you might be aware, numerous pretrial discovery motions, numerous post-trial motions, and many appeals are based on a failure of a prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence. Detailing a machinery to have this matter considered and resolved at an early stage in the investigatory proceeding should eliminate many of these legal challenges later.

(5) Providing for counsel in the grand jury room to consult with a client and advise the client (and not otherwise participating), providing for counsel fees if a witness is indigent, and providing for the replacement of a counsel who is obstreperous or who has conflicting responsibilities, would also not involve new or delaying procedures. Presently, most Federal jurisdictions provide that a witness has a right to counsel outside the grand jury room. Many jurisdictions provide that a person is entitled to free representation, if he is indigent, either if he is a witness and almost always if he is a target. Finally, there have been a series of cases (particularly in Pennsylvania and in the District of Columbia) for removal of particular attorneys (representing clients although from outside the grand jury room) because of a conflict. Again, H.R. 94 sets up the standards for judicial involvement and should not necessarily increase judicial involvement.

(6) Finally, H.R. 94 specifically does not provide an automatic exclusionary rule for improper prosecutorial actions in front of a grand jury. While some proposals have suggested "mini trials" attacking the sufficiency of the evidence, the admissibility of evidence, and other issues, H.R. 94 leaves this to the court to determine and does not change the present rules relating to when or if challenges to evidence in the grand jury room can be made.

I would like to point out, in specific response to your concern that the Speedy Trial Act might be affected by the reforms in H.R. 94, that the bill generally affects only "investigatory" activities.

Almost all the reforms relate to the activities of the grand jury in its investigatory capacity, prior to lodging of an indictment and not in its "charging" capacity when it considers probable cause and either returns or refuses to return an indictment. When a summons, based on a probable cause is issued, followed by a preliminary hearing, and then an indictment, it is most unusual for an independent investigation to be undertaken by the grand jury. In fact, in that situation, the grand jury acts almost always as a "rubber stamp" of the prosecutor.

The grand jury's involvement in activities and the place where reforms are needed most are intended to be most substantial in the investigatory phase—prior to the lodging of an indictment. As these activities are before criminal action, through a summons, complaint, indictment or otherwise, has commenced, there should be no effect on the Speedy Trial Act.

Again, I thank you for your comments. I am attaching a memorandum responding to your memorandum as to the proposals in H.R. 94.

Please feel free to submit any additional comments as you wish for inclusion in our record.

Sincerely,

JOSHUA EILBERG, Chairman.

MEMORANDUM IN RESPONSE TO MEMORANDUM OF THE HONORABLE WALTER R. MANSFIELD

1. H.R. 94 provides a fixed period of notice of contempt proceedings. However, the prosecutor has the right, upon proper showing, to reduce the period. If unnecessary delay would result from a 72-hour notice, he, of course, could get a shortened period from the court. Limiting confinement to a maximum of six months, and prohibiting reiterative contempt, is an attempt to insure that civil contempt is coercive and not punitive. Under present procedure, a witness could be incarcerated for the life of the grand jury, subpoenaed again and incarcerated again, for refusing to testify. In fact, he is being punished—for his refusal to testify—and not being coerced to testify. After a certain period of time, confinement becomes punitive and no longer coercive. If, in fact, it is desired to punish an individual for his contempt, proceedings may be instituted under a criminal contempt statute, with all the due process rights involved in any punishment of more than six months. The American Bar Association and the Department of Justice have agreed that an outside period should be set on confinement (although they suggest 12 months).

Prohibiting a witness from being incarcerated for contempt when the contempt is based on an illegal wiretap is the law today. Under the Organized Crime Control Act, as interpreted by the Supreme Court in United States v. Gelbard, a witness may not be confined for contempt when the reason for his appearance is based on illegal wiretap evidence. Unlike other proposals, H.R. 94 is limited to this already granted statutory exception. It does not provide defenses because of illegal searches and seizures, illegal statements or other trial defenses.

2. H.R. 94 details responsibility for the court in reviewing immunity grants and provides for a return to transactional immunity. H.R. 94 provides that the Attorney General, or his delegates, are the ones who determine whether immunity should be granted. The court does not have the function of determining whether immunity should be granted but only whether the immunity grant is proper. This is intended to be an application of the court's proper role in all criminal proceedings, and especially in proceedings dealing with the grand jury, which is to be an arm of the court. The Attorney General would make the necessary determinations, and the court would merely review it to make sure that those determinations are proper. This is not a new function for the court—reviewing a prosecutor's activities to see if they are within lawful bounds. Present analogous situations occur when a court determines whether there is probable cause for arrest, probable cause for a search, compliance with requirements as to confession, a showing a relevancy for a subpoena, and a showing of propriety of a request for a nolle prosse.

Returning to transactional immunity should lessen lawsuits presently based on the fear of many that they are not adequately covered by an immunity grant. Such motions are frequently found in a situation where witness "A" is subpoenaed to testify against witness "B"; and witness "B" is supoenaed to testify against witness "A". Both are granted immunity and both are reluctant to testify because they believe each other's testimony would be used and they will both be prosecuted. In addition, a return to transactional immunity should eliminate lawsuits involved in the determination about whether a subsequent prosecution is based on the "use or derivative use" of testimony given in front of the grand jury.

3. H.R. 94 provides that adequate instructions should be given to the grand jurors of their role and responsibility. Numerous cases in the state and Federal courts have indicated that it is the present requirement that the grand jury be adequately instructed in its duties, role, and responsibilities. Throughout H.R. 94, it is explicit that the court can only give instructions to the degree it is able to. Thus, it is to describe the subject of the investigation to the degree it is capable at a particular point in time of describing the subject of an investigation. The grand jury is supposed to be an arm of the court, and the court is supposed to be involved in the activities of the grand jury and to supervise any investigation to make sure the investigation is being properly undertaken. Requiring the judge to properly instruct the grand jurors would carry out this function and lessen judicial involvement at a later stage because of confusion by the grand jurors themselves.

Requiring a witness to be told if he is a target, providing for exceptions to such notice, and providing for a right of a witness to give testimony if he is a target, should not involve a substantial increase in judicial time or responsibility. Presently, in most jurisdictions, "target witnesses" are given warnings. Determining who is or who is not a target is usually clear. In addition, numerous motions are filed at the present time, involving substantial time in the courts, as to whether or not a witness has the right to present his side of the story to the grand jury. Many prosecutors, including the Watergate Special Prosecutor, have required, as a matter of policy, that warnings be given, and that a witness be able to present his side of the story. Although recent cases, including U.S. v. Washington, indicate that there is no requirement under the Constitution of target warnings, many courts have provided, under the supervisory power, that such warnings are to be required. In any event, motions will be continued to be filed in particular cases by attorneys, and H.R. 94 would merely establish standards for consideration of those motions.

H.R. 94 does not in any way provide for a "mini-trial". A review of the evidence, an analysis of the admissibility of the evidence, and an analysis of the propriety of prosecutorial actions, are not required to be reviewed prior to or during grand jury proceedings under H.R. 94 (unlike other legislative proposals).

4. H.R. 94 provides for the right of a witness to have counsel with him in the grand jury room to advise his client only. It is patterned on present requirements involving Congressional hearings where a witness has counsel sitting next to him and counsel can only advise his client and not otherwise participate. It is expected that providing for right to counsel in the grand jury room should lessen disruptions, as a witness would not be forced to go in and out of the courtroom to discuss matters with his counsel. Any counsel who does not live up to his ethical responsibilities, or is otherwise in violation of the standards established for a lawyer in the grand jury room, could be handled by appropriate judicial action. In fact, such appropriate judicial action has already been undertaken as to counsel (presently outside the grand jury room) and especially on the issue of the relationship toward multiple clients, including potential conflicts of interests. It should be pointed out that in those nine states that have allowed a right to counsel in the grand jury room, prosecutors, defense counsel, and judges have indicated that this has lessened disruptions, increased confidence of all in grand jury proceedings, and has led to a more meaningful investigation.

Providing for a right to a free attorney if a witness is unable to afford counsel is considered by most to be a matter of basic fairness. In those cases, presently, where the witness is entitled to counsel outside the grand jury room, many courts provide, especially in cases where the witness might be a "target", that a witness is entitled to free counsel, if he is indigent.

Considerable evidence before the subcommittee has indicated that the grand jury is often merely an echo of the prosecutor. The prosecutor asks questions that sometimes harasses witnesses, and almost always gives his comments to the grand jury. Sometimes he takes improper advantages of a witness. Having counsel present to advise his client and to observe should lessen prosecutorial improprieties.

A witness is just not as competent as a lawyer to determine the significance of a question. Only allowing a witness to go out to talk to his attorney as to the question, and his response, often causes prejudice in the grand jurors' eyes as they believe that the witness is trying to "hide something".

5. Substantial testimony before the subcommittee indicated that grand jury proceedings are often conducted in places unconnected with a particular offense, or the investigation of a particular offense. Motions challenging venue are now filed in such cases. H.R. 94 merely provides the standards by which the court is to resolve those motions. Providing that a witness' testimony has to be shown to be relevant for a subpoena is presently the law in some jurisdictions, including the Third Circuit. This has not caused any serious disruption in grand jury proceedings. Requiring the government to advise the witness of the subject matter of an investigation, if available, would allow a witness to be prepared at the time of his appearance. Testimony has indicated that often witnesses are called back repeatedly before grand juries because they are not familiar with the questions or issues to be discussed. Providing that a witness would know about the subject matter of the investigation, if available, should limit these repeated occurrences and appearances and thus reduce delay. Finally, requiring that the government show the witness' testimony is not sought for trial purposes is the present law. Motions are filed now, and the courts have consistently held, that if a subpoena supposedly for an investigation is really to secure trial evidence, it is improper and a subpoena for such testimony should be quashed.

6. H.R. 94 provides for an independent grand jury inquiry, and the right for a grand jury to have a special counsel and investigator. It should be pointed out that since the drafting of H.R. 94, Congress has considered, and will probably approve, a mechanism for special prosecutors and investigations. The subcommittee is considering proposals to delete the section relating to the capacity of a grand jury to conduct its own investigation, in light of these Congressional actions.

7. H.R. 94 requires all grand jury evidence, which may be considered exculpatory in any manner, to be turned over to a defendant or defense counsel. As indicated in the Code of Professional Responsibility, the ABA Standards on Prosecution Function, and the National Prosecutions Standards, this is presently the requirement ethically on a prosecutor. The court is only to get involved if the prosecutor does not live up to his responsibilities. Presently, motions are filed pretrial for discovery, during trial, and post-trial, and on appeal, relating to the failure to deliver exculpatory evidence. Making it clear what the responsibility of the prosecutor is, should lessen these motions, and the resulting hearings, at later stages in the criminal justice system.

Requiring disclosure of a prosecutor's statement to the grand jury is to insure that the grand jury's decisions are based on the evidence and facts presented to them and not based on the prosecutor's comments, characterizing of the evidence or characterizing of the witness. Witnesses before the subcommittee, and numerous law review articles and statements by former prosecutors, defense counsel, and judges, and others have indicated that the prosecutor, by his comments, statements and other actions can totally dominate the grand jury proceedings and therefore, eliminate any effective check by an "independent" grand jury so as to act as a buffer between the witness and the state.

8. H.R. 94, as a compromise proposal, provides for a preliminary examination in every case. Numerous grand jury bills have suggested "mini-trials" at which a defendant would have the right to object to the sufficiency of the evidence, the admissibility of the evidence, and other legal improprieties before the grand jury, prior to his appearance, during his appearance, or immediately after his appearance. H.R. 94 would not mandate such mini-trials but would rather provide application of the existing machinery, that is, use of a preliminary examination, to insure that a prosecutor has sufficient admissible evidence to proceed to trial. A prosecutor would know that he has to present his evidence to the court, even if the grand jury indicts. If the preliminary examination results in the finding of lack of probable cause, that would terminate prosecution. In addition, if it results in a showing of probable cause, a defendant would have been shown the probable cause basis for his prosecution and could no longer complain about improper activities before a grand jury. In those jurisdictions where preliminary examinations are required, it has resulted in a decreasing use of the indictment as a charging instrument. Defendants are more willing to waive indictment because they have seen the basis for probable cause at a preliminary examination. Prosecutors are more willing to conduct their investigations prior to a preliminary examination, rather than going first to an indictment, so that they can see whether their investigation is fruitful. Finally, upon seeing the evidence at a preliminary examination, defendants are more likely to plead guilty.

JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
U.S. DISTRICT COURT,
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Mobile, Ala., August 16, 1977.

Re H.R. 94.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN EILBERG: I am seriously concerned over some of the provisions in the above proposed legislation. I am in general agreement with the testimony of United States District Judge Frederick B. Lacey of New Jersey. The provision permitting witnesses to have an attorney appear with them in the Grand Jury opens an unnecessary can of worms.

Out of my fifteen years' experience on the State trial bench and eleven years on the Federal bench, the charges of "abuse" of the Grand Jury by the prosecutor have been over-exaggerated. The proposal to correct what possible abuses might arise is disproportionate to the actual dangers.

An indictment is but an accusation. I charge every jury that it is not evidence nor can any inference of guilt be inferred or made from the fact that an indictment has been returned. This is emphasized. They are advised that an indictment is but a vehicle or method used to bring a defendant into court. To permit attorneys to appear with witnesses would seriously impede the work of the Grand Jury. Not only the danger of the lawyer being able to speak to the Grand Jury by the nature of his objections and through his client, but, as pointed out by Judge Lacey, the proceedings would be slowed to a snail's pace.

If I understand correctly, one of the major purposes of the "Speedy Trial Act" is to indict, arraign, try, and, if convicted, promptly sentence an offender so that justice will be swift and sure. This provision of the proposed Bill would be at odds with the purpose of the "Speedy Trial Act."

I can anticipate a flood of motions and attacks on every indictment similar to the flood of prisoner petitions we now receive post-trial.

The "Miranda warning" should be given, and, according to my information in this district is given, in the appropriate cases.

Section 3334(c)(1) providing that the Grand Jury testimony of all witnesses called to trial be provided in advance of the witness taking the stand is in conflict with the Jencks Act. I agree that any exculpatory evidence should be provided.

It is my hope that the provisions I have referred to will be deleted from the Bill.

Sincerely yours,

VIRGIL PITTMAN.

Re H.R. 94.

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN EILBERG: I am in receipt of copy of letter of August 16 to you from Chief Judge Virgil Pittman of this district.

I wish to concur wholeheartedly in the views expressed by Judge Pittman. I have had 26 years' experience in this position. The Grand Jury system may not be perfect, but the various proposals of the above Bill to correct possible abuses certainly is disproportionate to the actual dangers.

I am,

Very truly yours,

DANIEL H. THOMAS.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,
(DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) OF WOODLAND, CALIFORNIA,
August 25, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am very much in favor of our Grand Jury system, but I do feel, after doing some reading and research, that there is a need for some changes. There is, of course, a need for some secrecy and power to summon witnesses. However, in the past decade or more it seems that the great powers that the grand jury has have been misused to harass and intimidate persons who have taken a stand against the "status quo". Groups like the peace movement, the feminist movement, the Black movement, trade union movement and others have often been the target of our grand jury system.

I am very much in favor of H.R. 94 with the exception of two things: (1) I feel it should guarantee all grand jury witnesses rights, without exceptions; (2) I feel that the defense attorney dismissal clause should be left out.

I am in favor of legislation designed to enhance the right to due process of law, freedom of association, effective legal counsel, the presumption of innocence and the privilege against self-incrimination. I would want these things for myself and I am sure that you would want them for yourself. Therefore, I would urge the passage of H.R. 94, with the exceptions noted above.

Thank you.

JOHN R. DEWEY.

STATEMENT OF ABRAHAM J. MULTER, FORMER MEMBER OF CONGRESS AND RETIRED JUSTICE OF THE NEW YORK STATE SUPREME COURT

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this committee. I thank you for the opportunity to submit this statement.

You are all to be congratulated for giving these matters the attention they deserve. They have been too long neglected. With your permission I will divide this statement into two parts. First I will address myself to the constitutional question and then I will deal with my proposed amendments to the pending bills.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

H. Res. 59, 60, 61 and 62 all propose eliminating from the amendment (Part of the Bill of Rights) the requirement for indictment by a grand jury as a preliminary to a trial for a capital offense or an infamous crime.

The circumstances that brought the system into being are history, as is its development.

All of that is well documented in your hearings and need not be repeated.

We can and do learn from past experience. We should not be strangled by tradition. Because something has been done for a hundred or even a thousand years does not make it the best way nor does it mean it cannot be done in a better way.

The constant, even though slow, change in court-made law is the best proof of the validity of that concept.

Every system of jurisprudence from time immemorial evidences what the jurists and lawmakers of that particular time thought made for improvement of the practice and procedure, as well as the substance.

The fact that some rules were made part of the organic or constitutional law did not in any degree lessen the need for change in accordance with the mores of later eras.

That the Grand Jury system is imbedded in State and Federal Constitutions should not preclude a review of its operation. If improvement can be devised as a result of such study, then let us proceed to bring it about. Let us do it, even when it requires amendment of our Constitutions.

In some quarters it is more fashionable to protect the criminal than the victim. It is high time we gave more thought to changing the process by which delay and procrastination favor the criminal. The need is to expedite the indictment and trial, with a saving of time, energy, and money to the victim and to the governmental authorities charged with law enforcement.

Great Britain, whence this system came to us accomplished the change sometime ago.

English law did away partially with the Grand Jury system in 1933 and completely in 1948. There have been no Grand Jury indictments there since that time.

No good purpose will be served by attempting to set forth precisely the manner and detail of bringing a prospective defendant to trial in a court of criminal jurisdiction in Britain. Those interested are respectfully referred to the English statutes.

We are dealing solely with the need in all cases, emphasis on all, of a Grand Jury indictment.

My recommendation is not to do away with the Grand Jury completely.

Keep it for those matters in the broad sphere of governmental activities.

Keep it for those few cases where an alleged wrongdoer may want to testify before the Grand Jury in an effort to clear himself.

There is no need for it in the usual run-of-the-mill criminal case.

Witnesses, whether victims or police officers or others, should not be required to dance attendance in inferior or local courts, again before a Grand Jury, and then again in the trial court.

There is no constitutional right for an alleged criminal to be confronted by witnesses before a Grand Jury or at any time before actual trial. There is no right of cross-examination until trial.

Obviously, the indictment, information, or complaint should be certified by a designated public official either a judicial or prosecutorial officer as alleging facts sufficient to constitute a crime.

It should be sufficient to support, an indictment or criminal complaint, to attach affidavits of the witnesses identifying the defendant and the time and the place and stating sufficient details to meet the statutory requirements establishing the commission of the crime.

Such affidavits can be drawn and executed under the supervision of the District Attorney or other prosecuting officer, outside of the presence of the defendant or his attorney, and in the precinct house, a courthouse, or the office of the District Attorney or prosecuting officer.

The prosecuting officer's certification to the information, complaint, or indictment, call it what you will, is and should be as efficacious as the endorsement on an indictment by a lay foreman of a Grand Jury.

In those few cases where a proposed defendant wants to testify before a Grand Jury, let him make his demand therefore. If he makes the demand, provide that proceedings on the information be stayed until he so testifies. If the Grand Jury indicts, that action should supplant the information. If the Grand Jury refuses to indict, the information must be dismissed.

If we permit the foregoing procedure, several minimum safeguards must be enacted, to wit: (1) A time limit must be placed upon when the defendant and/or his witnesses will attend before a Grand Jury. (2) With the written demand for permission to testify before a Grand Jury, the defendant must file a written signed and acknowledged consent to waive immunity when he testifies, and he must so testify. Failure to do so shall automatically vacate the stay of proceedings pursuant to the earlier information. (3) The time between filing the information and vacatur of the stay may not be urged as a reason to dismiss an information because of delay in the trial thereof. (4) The Prosecuting Attorney shall be required to subpoena to attend before the Grand Jury, witnesses whose names and addresses are furnished in writing to the District Attorney by the defendant at the time of or within five days of filing his demand to be heard by the Grand Jury. The failure for any reason whatsoever of such witnesses to appear before the Grand Jury shall not delay the proceedings before it.

The suggestion put forth here is that we try, side by side with our instant Grand Jury System, the English method of indictment. If that alternative is used and works well, the Grand Jury system as now followed may become obsolete, and without harm to our judicial system. It may prove most beneficial.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO PENDING RESOLUTIONS AND BILLS

I am fearful that if the proposed resolutions eliminating complethely the Grand Jury System are submitted for approval the hue and cry against them will be overwhelming.

The more satisfactory procedure in my opinion is to amend the constitutional guarantee to permit trial after information and arrest. The rights to a defendant to demand an indictment by a Grand Jury should be preserved provided he waives immunity and testifies before the Grand Jury.

There are many cases where the investigative process demands and requires the use of the Grand Jury.

More cases than not can proceed without it.

Incidentally, The New York State Constitution (Article 1, § 6) permits proceeding by information instead of Grand Jury indictment provided the defendant consents in writing thereto. My suggestion is that such proceeding be validated unless the defendant objects.

H.R. 94 AND SIMILAR BILLS

I respectfully suggest the following amendments:

1. Insert on page 7 line 15 after the word "any" and before the word "other" the words "state of the United States or any"

It is my considered opinion that no one should be required to testify if his testimony may be used to convict him of a crime in any state court.

2. Page 14 line 19 strike out the word "not" and on line 20 strike out the word "but" and insert the word "and" and on lines 22 to 25 strike out the words "unless the Grand Jury," up to and including the word "subsection," and on page 15 strike out the entire sentence beginning on line 2 to and including line 5.

It should not be discretionary but mandatory that a defendant be heard by a Grand Jury, if the defendant waives immunity and testifies.

3. Strike out the period on page 20 line 9 and insert a comma and the words "but only as a part of a relevant court proceeding."

There is too much danger in permitting a lawyer carte blanche to freely discuss what transpired in the Grand Jury room.

I would even go so far as to disqualify any lawyer appearing for a witness before a Grand Jury from representing any other witness before that Grand Jury or any defendant indicted by it.

4. On page 28 line 17 insert the word "not" after the word "is" and on line 18 strike out the words "unless waived" and strike out all of subdivision "(b)" on lines 21 to 23 on page 28.

With the full and complete pretrial discovery proceedings now available to defendants there is no need for preliminary examinations. They merely serve to delay and confuse.

Many thanks for permitting me to submit this statement which I hope will be helpful.

Respectfully submitted.

ABRAHAM J. MULTER.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., October 12, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law, Committee on the Judiciary, Rayburn Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Enclosed please find a copy of a letter I received from Mr. Frank E. Haddad, Jr., President of the Kentucky Bar Association, regarding their support of a resolution adopted by the American Bar Association on grand jury reform at the ABA's annual meeting in August, 1977.

Please add Mr. Haddad's support to your already growing list of supporters for H.R. 94, the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.

I am hopeful the full House will be able to vote on the bill before the end of this session.

With my best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

JOHN B. BRECKINRIDGE.

Hon. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE,

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BRECKINRIDGE: Enclosed is a resolution from the Board of Governors of the Kentucky Bar Association in support of legislation to reform grand jury proceedings.

We urge your support for bills presented in the areas covered by the resolution.

Sincerely,

FRANK E. HADDAD, JR., President.

Enclosure.

KENTUCKY BAR ASSOCIATION BOARD OF GOVERNORS

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Kentucky Bar Association is interested in and supports the concept of grand jury reform legislation; and

Whereas, it has agreed with and adopted a resolution passed by the American Bar Association's House of Delegates at its annual meeting in August, 1977.

Be it resolved, that the Kentucky Bar Association adopts the following concepts supported by the American Bar Association:

1. Expanding on the already-established ABA policy, a witness before the grand jury shall have the right to be accompanied by counsel in his or her appearance before the grand jury. Such counsel shall be allowed to be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness and shall be allowed to advise the witness. Such counsel shall not be permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in proceedings before the grand jury. The court shall have the power to remove such counsel from the grand jury room for conduct inconsistent with this principle.

2. Every witness before a grand jury shall be informed of his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel and shall be advised that false answers may result in his being charged with perjury. Target witnesses shall be told that they are possible indictees.

3. No prosecutor shall knowingly fail to disclose to the grand jury evidence which will tend substantially to negate guilt.

4. A prosecutor should recommend that the grand jury not indict if he or she believes the evidence presented does not warrant an indictment under governing law.

5. A target of a grand jury investigation shall be given the right to testify before the grand jury, provided he/she signs a waiver of immunity. Prosecutors shall notify such targets of their opportunity to testify unless notification may result in the flight or endanger other persons or obstruct justice; or the prosecutor is unable with reasonable diligence to notify said persons.

6. The prosecutor shall not present to the grand jury evidence which he or she knows to be constitutionally inadmissible at trial.

7. The grand jury shall not name a person in any indictment as an unindicted co-conspirator to a criminal conspiracy. Nothing herein shall prevent supplying such names in a bill of particulars.

8. A grand jury should not issue any report which singles out persons to impugn their motives, holds them up to scorn or criticism or speaks of their qualifications or moral fitness to hold an office or position. No grand jury report shall be accepted for filing and publication until the presiding judge submits in camera a copy thereof to all persons named or identifiable and such persons are given the opportunity to move to expunge any objectionable portion of said report and have a final judicial determination prior to the report's being published or made public. Such motion to expunge shall be made within ten days of receipt of such report. Hearings on such motions shall be held in camera.

9. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor in order to obtain tangible, documentary or testimonial evidence to assist the prosecutor in preparation for trial of a defendant who has already been charged by indictment or information. However, the grand jury should not be restricted in investigating other potential offenses of the same or other defendants.

10. The grand jury should not be used by the prosecutor for the purpose of aiding or assisting in any administrative inquiry.

11. Witnesses who have been summoned to appear before a grand jury to testify or to produce tangible or documentary evidence should not be subjected to unreasonable delay before appearing or unnecessarily repeated appearances or harassment.

12. It shall not be necessary for the prosecutor to obtain approval of the grand jury for a grand jury subpoena.

13. A grand jury subpoena should indicate the statute or general subject area that is the concern of the grand jury inquiry. The return of the indictment in a subject area not disclosed by the grand jury subpoena shall not be a basis for dismissal.

14. A subpoena should be returnable only when the grand jury is sitting.

15. All matters before a grand jury, including the charge by the impaneling judge, if any; any comments or charges by any jurist to the grand jury at any time; any and all comments to the grand jury by the prosecutor; and the questioning of and testimony by any witness, shall be recorded either stenographically or electronically. However, the deliberations of the grand jury shall not be recorded.

16. The prosecutor should not make statements or arguments in an effort to influence grand jury action in a manner which would be impermissible at trial before a petit jury.

17. Expanding on the already-established ABA position favoring transactional immunity, immunity should be granted only when the testimony sought is in the public interest; there is no other reasonable way to elicit such testimony; and the witness has refused to testify or indicated an intent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

18. Immunity shall be granted on prosecution motion in camera by the trial court which convened the grand jury, under standards expressed in Principle No. 17.

19. The granting of immunity in grand jury proceedings should not be a matter of public record prior to the issuance of an indictment or testimony in any cause.

20. A lawyer or lawyers who are associated in practice should not continue multiple representation of clients in a grand jury proceeding if the exercise of the lawyer's independent professional judgment on behalf of one of the clients will be or is likely to be adversely affected by his or her representation of another client. If the court determines that this principle is violated, it may order separate representation of witnesses, giving appropriate weight to an individual's right to counsel of his or her own choosing.

21. The confidential nature of the grand jury proceedings requires that the identity of witnesses appearing before the grand jury be unavailable to public scrutiny.

22. It is the duty of the court which impanels a grand jury fully to charge the jurors by means of a written charge completely explaining their duties and limitations.

23. All stages of the grand jury proceedings should be conducted with proper consideration for the preservation of press freedom, attorney-client relationships, and comparable values.

24. The period of confinement for a witness who refuses to testify before a grand jury and is found in contempt should not exceed one year.

25. The court shall impose appropriate sanctions whenever any of the foregoing principles have been violated.

Dated this 17th day of September, 1977.

INTRODUCTION

The modern grand jury system is a parody of justice. Originally established by the colonists and incorporated into the Bill of Rights to protect them from the tyranny and capriciousness of England, the grand jury has become instead a travesty of justice in a nation originally conceived with the ideal that every man is entitled to equal protection under the law.

Since October 1970, when Congress enacted the Organized Crime Control Act which tightened Justice Department regulation of the grand jury system, numerous abuses have been committed by grand juries across the country. These occur daily and are commonplace. Individuals routinely and callously deprived of their Constitutional guarantees. These violations are only rivalled by the injustices of the grand jury procedure itself; i.e., the witness need not be apprised of his rights; the proceedings are held in secret; there may not be a written record; the rules governing admission of evidence or testimony do not apply; and the witness's defense counsel is not permitted in the jury chamber.

The modern grand jury presents an illusion of justice. It is an instrument of fear wielded by government, the F.B.I., and lawless prosecutors to intimidate minority individuals and groups and political opponents. It has long ceased to exist as a protector of the people.

The scope of grand jury investigations reflect our nation's history, and their impact on our society varies as different pressures are forced on them. For example, "Indictments of early western grand juries revealed an attempt to bring order and decorum to boisterous frontier communities." [1] "Southern grand juries took seriously the task of maintaining control over slaves and free Negroes. Some were specifically directed by state legislatures to present 'all persons of color' who conducted themselves in a manner dangerous to the peace and order of the state." [2] At the turn of this century, grand juries handed down indictments exposing rampant political corruption in cities. Banking failures were also fruitful areas of grand jury inquiry. Later, "When decisions of the United States Supreme Court weakened the Sherman (Antitrust) Act, state grand juries gave increased attention to the problem of trusts." [3]

Today, the grand jury is dominated by U.S. attorneys and mimics a modern-day Star Chamber. A witness is stripped of his rights and is forced to give testimony for an investigation, the nature of which is often withheld. The Justice Department attorney, acting as prosecutor, is also the advisor to the grand jury. He may use the grand jury to gain evidence for his own case rather than present evidence to the grand jury for indictments. Nixon perfected this during his attack on the peace movement in the '60s when leaders of organizations from all parts of the country were jailed.

Senator Philip A. Hart aptly described the misuse of the present grand jury system, ". . . more sophisticated modern techniques now make the grand jury an equally dangerous tool for conducting political surveillance and building dossiers in the guise of investigating specific offenses. It can also be used simply to harass, intimidate, and disrupt organized political dissent." [4]

The Committee for Grand Jury Reform is a citizens group organized to safeguard the individual from abusive grand jury practices. The Committee advocates exposure of grand jury abuses, reform measures, and restoration of the grand jury to its original status as a protector of the people. We recognize that fear compels a man or society to slavery. The use of the grand jury as a weapon to produce fear or to suppress the freedoms granted to us in the Constitution cannot be sanctioned if a democratic society is to prevail.

Based on our goal of preserving the individual's rights, this submission will detail with representative examples grand jury violations of the United States Constitution and the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We will also suggest the reforms necessary to restore the grand jury to its ogirinal stature.

GRAND JURY VIOLATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

A grand jury trial is guaranteed to us by our founding fathers who incorported it into the Bill of Rights. Prosecutors and judges routinely manipulate the grand jury molding it into a tool that deprives citizens of their basic Constitutional guarantees either individually or collectively.

In fact, there may be no Constitutional rights as far as many grand jury prosecutors or judges are concerned. A striking example of this abuse involves Maria Cueto, Executive Director of the Episcopal Church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs who was subpoenaed before a New York Grand Jury regarding information she might have about FALN (Armed Forces of Puerto Rican National Liberation) activities. She was subpoenaed on Friday for an appearance on the following Monday. Since she was unable to retain a lawyer over the weekend, she appeared before the grand jury to request an adjournment. At that point, "The judge informed her that she had no constitutional rights and that if she did not swear in and answer the grand jury's questions, she would be held in contempt and sent to jail. She again appealed for time to consult with a lawyer, but her request was again refused and she was committed immediately to the Metropolitan Correctional Center." [5]

FIRST AMENDMENT VIOLATIONS

Article I. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble; and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

The previously mentioned case of Maria Cueto strikes to the heart of religious fredom. Maria Cueto and Raisa Nemikin, a secretary of the Episcopal Church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs were both incarcerated for refusal to answer the grand jury's questions regarding the FALN.

It was alleged that these women might produce testimony concerning a FALN member who had previously been a member of the Episcopal Church's Hispanic Commission. Ms. Cueto and Ms. Nemikin charged that the subpoenas violated their right to free association and free exercise of religion as stated in the First Amendment. They also indicated that the grand jury was illegally being used as an arm of the F.B.I. to track down fugitives.[6]

This case exemplifies a grand jury's interference with free exercise of religion. The government pressed their investigations on these women stating that their affiliation with an official organ of a well-established traditional religion, the Episcopal Church, was the primary, if not only the basis of its interest in the grand jury testimony of these women.[7]

The most widely publicized First Amendment abuses by the grand jury involved investigations into so-called activist political groups; i.e., the Vietnam War resisters, the Black liberation group, the Native Americans, and the women's movement. An example of a grand jury investigation continuing without restraint began in 1971 when a nineteen-year-old Washington, D.C., peace movement activist was arrested and brought before a Seattle grand jury where she was grilled for three days on antiwar politics. Over the next two years, subpoenas were served on 2,000–3,000 activists in what Representative Robert Kastenmeir called "a glorified witch hunt used to intimidate political groups and communities." [8]

Traditionally, the First Amendment has been interpreted to protect the individual's right to anonymous political association as well as to oral and written expressions of the most controversial position; it has meant that the government must show "compelling necessity" to obtain information concerning a person's political beliefs, activities, and association. Yet, the grand jury has probed relentlessly and has harassed untold numbers of individuals who may hold views that are unpopular or embarrassing to the government. It has threatened the First Amendment foundation of political democracy.

FOURTH AMENDMENT VIOLATIONS

Article IV. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

The Fourth Amendment protects the right of individuals to be free from unreasonable government intrusions on their privacy. When F.B.I. cannot secure a search warrant to obtain the materials they desire, a grand jury which does not have to show probable cause, may issue a subpoena to seize "all" books, papers, documents, etc. The following is a case in point:

"Charles Berry, an Albuquerque attorney, was subpoenaed to deliver five years' worth of his law firm's financial records to a grand jury looking into allegations of illegal campaign contributions and bribery of former state officials. He explains that records of over 5,000 clients were involved and that some of the records dealt with cases not yet resolved. The financial records included the names of clients and, in certain instances, references to witnesses interviewed.

Mr. Berry refused to yield the documents, was cited for contempt and "sat in jail six months". After losing all his appeals, he turned over the records and was released last December. A government attorney says that Mr. Berry himself was never a target of the inquiry and that the grand jury wasn't interested in the names of his clients. Rather, the law firm was thought to have had "some business relationships' with a former state official who was being investigated. The man was indicted but was acquitted in a trial." [9]

The grand pury proceedings leading up to Mr. Berry's incarceration demonstrate the government's flagrant use of the grand jury subpoena power to collect evidence it could never obtain otherwise regardless of the toll it takes on individual liberties.

FIFTH AMENDMENT VIOLATIONS:

Article V. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Here, it is noteworthy that the beginning half of the Fifth Amendment speaks to the right of a grand jury trial and the second half addresses the right that a man has against self-incrimination. Fingerprints, voiceprints, handwriting and hair samples have all been demanded of witnesses to be used as testimony before a grand jury. Phil Shinnick, a former star athlete who once held Canada's record in the decathlon and participated in the 18th Olympiad in Tokyo, was also in advocate for reform in the athletic movement. He was called before a grand jury investigating an alleged Patricia Hearst-Phil Shinnick connection. Although it was questionable whether Shinnick himself was the target of the investigation, the government felt that he could give information leading to the indictment of others. He was ordered to jail for contempt of court one week after Patricia Hearst was free on $500,000 bond. Shinnick was cited for contempt of court not because he refused to give verbal testimony, but for different reasons. U.S. Attorney, John Cottone "handed the jury foreman instructions that Shinnick should be forced to supply the F.B.I. with his fingerprints and samples of his handwriting and hair in a room near the jury chamber." [10]

[10] Taaffe, William, "Phil Shinnick Goes to Prison—Patty Hearst Goes Free", the Washington Star, January 11, 1977.

The Phil Shinnick story is horrifying. It shows the use of indiscriminate police power and the ease with which a police state can be foisted on the people. The F.B.I. itself has no power to subpoena evidence from a person who has not been convicted of a crime, but a grand jury may try to subpoena this evidence. The proponents of such illegalities maintain that the Fifth Amendment was intended only to prohibit the use of torture to extract a verbal confession.

On the other extreme, prosecutors have tried to intimidate witnesses into surrendering their right not to testify by resorting to humiliating, high-pressured interrogation. Professor Samuel Popkin, a specialist in Vietnam from Harvard University, was called before a Boston grand jury in March 1972, ostensibly because he was acquainted with Daniel Ellsberg who had been charged with theft and release of the Pentagon Papers. He and the prosecutor engaged in the following:

Question. Mr. Popkin, more specifically, do you know if someone possessed what is now known as the Pentagon Papers in Massachusetts other than to the extent you have previously testified?

Answer. May I see my lawyers?

Question. Mr. Popkin, as you know, a witness has the right to see his lawyers only on serious questions. You have been out of the room twice already for periods as long as ten minutes. You are now asking permission to leave the room for a third time. Is this necessary?

Question. Mr. Popkin, do you recall an immediate reaction that was formed in your mind upon hearing about original stories in The New York Times about who may have been the source?

Answer. I request permission to see my counsel.

Question. Mr. Popkin, how can your counsel be of use in this case? We're asking you about your immediate reaction.

Answer. I request permission to see my counsel. . . .

Question. Mr. Popkin, you are stretching things for this grand jury. Your exits from the room have been ranging about five minutes. This is being an inconvenience for the grand jury."[11]

SIXTH AMENDMENT VIOLATIONS:

Article VI. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury by the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining Witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Government officials who favor the current structure of the grand jury find no violations of the Sixth Amendment in grand jury proceedings. This is so, they say, because a grand jury is a civil proceeding, not a criminal one. However, in the cases highlighted earlier, the witnesses were jailed for contempt of court even though they were not convicted of a crime. Additionally, this unfair treatment greatly hinders their ability to obtain a fair and speedy trial if necessary.

An even more glaring abuse of the Sixth Amendment is the witness's inability to have defense counsel in the jury room. Mr. Popkin, as described earlier, was harassed when he asked to consult with his attorney. Maria Cueto was forced into a grand jury interrogation without being given sufficient time to secure an attorney.

These situations are not isolated examples. Every day witnesses are deprived of defense counsel and unwittingly fall into the traps set by government prosecutors.

GRAND JURY VIOLATIONS OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. It is based on the recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family. It proclaims a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations.

The following Articles of this document complement the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights and deserve our attention.

[11] See 4, pp. 67–68.

Article 9. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 12. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honor and reputation. Everyone has the right to protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

A central point in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights focuses on the word 'arbitrary':

"Arbitrary—1. Determined by whim or caprice. 2. Based on or subject to individual judgment or discretion. 3. Established by a court or judge, rather than by a specific law or statute. 4. Not limited by law; absolute; despotic." [13]

At the very least, reformers of our modern-day grand jury system are appalled by the arbitrary nature of grand jury prosecutions. Individuals and groups at variance with the government are subjected to lengthy grand jury probes and even incarcerations for contempt of court. John Stuart Mill, in an essay entitled "On Liberty" stated that the most important liberty of the individual is the ability to criticize his society and to persuade others that his criticisms are justified.[14] It was this liberty that the colonists employed when they incorporated the grand jury into the Bill of Rights and it is this liberty that is violated by the contemporary grand jury.

At the crux of any trial is the right of the witness to be presumed innocent.

Article 11. Everyone charged with a penal offense has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defense.

Adherents of present grand jury methods of inquisition state that this right is not jeopardized as there is no guilt or innocence on trial; the grand jury is merely a civil proceeding which may or may not be followed by a trial. On the other hand, the examples described earlier in this Submission prove that an individual is presumed guilty before the grand jury with virtually no opportunity to assert his innocence.

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATIONS

There is widespread evidence that the grand jury system in this country has been abused and desecrated. The Committee for Grand Jury Reform is concerned that all the abuses of the grand jury be exposed and remedied so that the grand jury can be restored to its original stature. Furthermore, we believe that the rights of every individual citizen must be safeguarded with no loopholes remaining for arbitrary and whimsical courts to usurp the individual citizen's rights. The grand jury is in desperate need of reform. Numerous groups, including members of religious, minority, and feminist groups are calling for reform. Lawyers, newsmen, and representatives of labor are also demanding reforms. Mary Emma Hixson, Co-director of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse stated, "The idea of protecting an individual's rights through the grand jury has been perverted and needs to be shored up before the dam breaks. As it stands now, U.S. Attorneys use the grand jury to 'rubber stamp' indictments." [14]

In order to secure grand jury reform, we recommend

1. the abolition of "use immunity" now in effect where grand jury witnesses can be forced to answer questions over their Fifth Amendment objections and jailed for contempt if they refuse. We recommend its replacement by full immunity conditional upon the consent of the witness to be immunized.

2. that witnesses be given seven days between the service of a subpoena and their appearance date, the right to know what crimes are under investigation and the right to be told whether they are targets of the investigation.

3. that grand jury witnesses be allowed the assistance of counsel inside the grand jury chamber.

Thomas Jefferson once called the grand jury "the sacred palladium of liberty".[15] With the proper reform measures in effect, the grand jury can once again become a true protector of the people; it can assume the role for which it was conceived.

RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution was adopted by a convention of the States on September 17, 1787, and was subsequently ratified by the several States, on the following dates: Delaware, December 7, 1787; Pennsylvania, December 12, 1787; New Jersey, December 18, 1787; Georgia, January 2, 1788; Connecticut, January 9, 1788; Massachusetts, February 6, 1788; Maryland, April 28, 1788; South Carolina, May 23, 1788; New Hampshire, June 21, 1788.

Ratification was completed on June 21, 1788.

The Constitution was subsequently ratified by Virginia, June 25, 1788; New York, July 26, 1788; North Carolina, Novemer 21, 1789; Rhode Island, May 29, 1790; and Vermont, January 10, 1791.

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF, THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS, AND RATIFIED BY THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION

ARTICLE I*

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II

A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

---

*Only the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th articles of amendment had numbers assigned to them at the time of ratification.

ARTICLE IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining Witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

ARTICLE VII

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by a jury, shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE IX

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The first 10 amendments to the Constitution, and 2 others that failed of ratification, were proposed by the Congress on September 25, 1789. They were ratified by the following States, and the notifications of the ratification by the Governors thereof were successively communicated by the President to the Congress: New Jersey, November 20, 1789; Maryland, December 19, 1789; North Carolina, December 22, 1789; South Carolina, January 19, 1789; New Hampshire, January 25, 1790; Delaware, January 28, 1790; New York, February 24, 1790; Pennsylvania, March 10, 1790; Rhode Island, June 7, 1790; Vermont, November 3, 1791; and Virginia, December 15, 1791.

Ratification was completed on December 15, 1791.

The amendments were subsequently ratified by Massachusetts, March 2, 1939; Connecticut, April 19, 1939; and Georgia, March 18, 1939.

ARTICLE XI

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

The 11th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on March 4, 1794. It was declared, in a message from the President to Congress, dated January 8, 1798 to have been ratified by the legislatures of 12 of the 15 States. The dates of ratification were: New York, March 27, 1794; Rhode Island, March 31, 1794; Connecticut, May 8, 1794; New Hampshire, June 16, 1794; Massachusetts, June 26, 1794; Vermont, between October 9, 1794 and November 9, 1794; Virginia, November 18, 1794; Georgia, November 29, 1794; Kentucky, December 7, 1794; Maryland, December 26, 1794; Delaware, January 23, 1795; North Carolina, February 7, 1795.

Ratification was completed on February 7, 1795.

The amendment was subsequently ratified by South Carolina on December 4, 1797. New Jersey and Pennsylvania did not take action on the amendment.

ARTICLE XII

The electors shall meet in their respective states and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. [And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.]* The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

The 12th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on December 9, 1803. It was declared, in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated September 25, 1804, to have been ratified by the legislatures of 13 of the 17 States. The dates of ratification were: North Carolina, December 21, 1803; Maryland, December 24, 1803; Kentucky, December 27, 1803; Ohio, December 30, 1803; Pennsylvania, January 5, 1804; Vermont, January 30, 1804; Virginia, February 3, 1804; New York, February 10, 1804; New Jersey, February 22, 1804; Rhode Island, March 12, 1804; South Carolina, May 15, 1804; Georgia, May 19, 1804; New Hampshire, June 15, 1804.

Ratification was completed on June 15, 1804.

The amendment was subsequently ratified by Tennessee, July 27, 1804.

The amendment was rejected by Delaware, January 18, 1804; Massachusetts, February 2 or 3, 1804; Connecticut, at its session begun May 10, 1804.

ARTICLE XIII

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

*The part included in heavy brackets has been superseded by section 3 of the twentieth amendment.

The 13th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on January 31, 1865. It was declared, in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated December 18, 1865, to have been ratified by the legislatures of 27 of the 36 States. The dates of ratification were: Illinois, February 1, 1865; Rhode Island, February 2, 1865; Michigan, February 2, 1865; Maryland, February 3, 1865; New York, February 3, 1865; Pennsylvania, February 3, 1865; West Virginia, February 3, 1865; Missouri, February 6, 1865; Maine, February 7, 1865; Kansas, February 7, 1865; Massachusetts, February 7, 1865; Virginia, February 9, 1865; Ohio, February 10, 1865; Indiana, February 13, 1865; Nevada, February 16, 1865; Louisiana, February 17, 1865; Minnesota, February 23, 1865; Wisconsin, February 24, 1865; Vermont, March 9, 1865; Tennessee, April 7, 1965; Arkansas, April 14, 1865; Connecticut, May 4, 1865; New Hampshire, July 1, 1865; South Carolina, November 13, 1865; Alabama, December 2, 1865; North Carolina, December 4, 1865; Georgia, December 6, 1865.

Ratification was completed on December 6, 1865.

The amendment was subsequently ratified by Oregon, December 8, 1865; California, December 19, 1865; Florida, December 28, 1865 (Florida again ratified on June 9, 1868, upon its adoption of a new constitution); Iowa, January 15, 1866; New Jersey, January 23, 1866 (after having rejected the amendment on March 16, 1865); Texas, February 18, 1870; Delaware, February 12, 1901 (after having rejected the amendment on February 8, 1865).

The amendment was rejected by Kentucky, February 24, 1865, and by Mississippi, December 4, 1865.

ARTICLE XIV

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The 14th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on June 13, 1866. It was declared, in a certificate by the Secretary of State dated July 28, 1868, to have been ratified by the legislatures of 28 of the 37 States. The dates of ratification were: Connecticut, June 25, 1866; New Hampshire, July 6, 1866; Tennessee, July 19, 1866; New Jersey, September 11, 1866 (subsequently the legislature rescinded its ratification, and on March 5, 1868, readopted its resolution of rescission over the Governor's veto); Oregon, September 19, 1866 (and rescinded its ratification on October 15, 1868); Vermont, October 30, 1866; Ohio, January 4, 1867 (and rescinded its ratification on January 15, 1868); New York, January 10, 1867; Kansas, January 11, 1867; Illinois, January 15, 1867; West Virginia, January 16, 1867; Michigan, January 16, 1867; Minnesota, January 16, 1867; Maine, January 19, 1867; Nevada, January 22, 1867; Indiana, January 23, 1867; Missouri, January 25, 1867; Rhode Island, February 7, 1867; Wisconsin, February 7, 1867; Pennsylvania, February 12, 1867; Massachusetts, March 20, 1867; Nebraska, June 15, 1867; Iowa, March 16, 1868; Arkansas, April 6, 1868; Florida, June 9, 1868; North Carolina, July 4, 1868 (after having rejected it on December 14, 1866); Louisiana, July 9, 1868 (after having rejected it on February 6, 1867); South Carolina, July 9, 1868 (after having rejected it on December 20, 1866).

Ratification was completed on July 9, 1868.[1]

The amendment was subsequently ratified by Alabama, July 13, 1868; Georgia, July 21, 1868 (after having rejected it on November 9, 1866); Virginia, October 8, 1869 (after having rejected it on January 9, 1867); Mississippi, January 17, 1870; Texas, February 18, 1870 (after having rejected it on October 27, 1866); Delaware, February 12, 1901 (after having rejected it on February 8, 1867); Maryland, April 4, 1959 (after having rejected it on March 23, 1867); California, May 6, 1959.

ARTICLE XV

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The 15th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on February 26, 1869. It was declared, in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated March 30, 1870, to have been ratified by the legislatures of 29 of the 37 States. The dates of ratification were: Nevada, March 1, 1869; West Virginia, March 3, 1869; Illinois, March 5, 1869; Louisiana, March 5, 1870; North Carolina, March 5, 1869; Michigan, March 8, 1869; Wisconsin, March 9, 1869; Maine, March 11, 1869; Massachusetts, March 12, 1869; Arkansas, March 15, 1869; South Carolina, March 15, 1869; Pennsylvania, March 25, 1869; New York, April 14, 1869 (and the legislature of the same State passed a resolution January 5, 1870, to withdraw its consent to it); Indiana, May 14, 1869; Connecticut, May 19, 1869; Florida, June 14, 1869; New Hampshire, July 1, 1869; Virginia, October 8, 1869; Vermont, October 20, 1869; Missouri, January 7, 1870; Minnesota, January 13, 1870; Mississippi, January 17, 1870; Rhode Island, January 18, 1870; Kansas, January 19, 1870; Ohio, January 27, 1870 (after having rejected it on April 30, 1869); Georgia, February 2, 1870; Iowa, February 3, 1870.

Ratification was completed on February 3, 1870, unless the withdrawal of ratification by New York was effective; in which event ratification was completed on February 17, 1870, when Nebraska ratified.

The amendment was subsequently ratified by Texas, February 18, 1870; New Jersey, February 15, 1871 (after having rejected it on February 7, 1870); Delaware, February 12, 1901 (after having rejected it on March 18, 1869); Oregon, February 24, 1959; California, April 3, 1962 (after having rejected it on January 28, 1870).

ARTICLE XVI

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The 16th amendment to the Constitution was proposed by the Congress on July 12, 1909. It was declared, in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated February 25, 1913, to have been ratified by 36 of the 48 States. Universal Declaration of Human Rights

PREAMBLE

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world.

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law.

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now, therefore, the General Assembly proclaims—

This Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1. All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

Article 3. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.

Article 5. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 6. Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 7. All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Artcle 8. Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 9. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 10. Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge aaginst him.

Article 11. (1) Everyone charged with a penal offense has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defense.

(2) No one shall be held guilty of any penal offense on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offense, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offense was committed.

Article 12. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honor and reputation. Everyone has the right to protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 13. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

(2) Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

Article 14. (1) Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

(2) This right may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 15. (1) Everyone has the right to a nationality.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 16. (1) Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

(2) Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.

(3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

Article 17. (1) Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 18. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, workship and observance.

Article 19. Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 20. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

(2) No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

Article 21. (1) Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.

(2) Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

(3) The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures.

Article 22. Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international cooperation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.

Article 23. (1) Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favorable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

(2) Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

(3) Everyone who works has the right to just and favorable remuneration ensuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity, and supplemented, if necessary, by other means of social protection.

(4) Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 24. Everyone has the right to rest and leisure, including reasonable limitation of working hours and periodic holidays with pay.

Article 25. (1) Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

(2) Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance. All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Article 26. (1) Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.

(2) Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.

(3) Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.

Article 27. (1) Everyone has the right freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits.

(2) Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author.

Article 28. Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 29. (1) Everyone has duties to the community in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible.

(2) In the exercises of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.

(3) These rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 30. Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein.

Adopted by the General Assembly, on 10th December 1948.

MY DEAR SIR: Enclosed please find copy of report adopted by the Committee on Federal Legislation of the New York County Lawyers' Association on H.R. 94.

Very truly yours,

RICHARD A. GIVENS, Chairman.

[Report No. F–5]

NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York, N.Y., September 1977.

COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION

REPORT ON PROPOSED "GRAND JURY REFORM ACT OF 1977"

RECOMMENDATION: APPROVAL IN PART; DISAPPROVAL IN PARTS

The "Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977" introduced by Representative Eilberg on January 4, 1977, H.R. 94, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., would make changes in grand jury procedure in a wide variety of areas, described in conjunction with our comments on each. The bill contains a number of highly desirable reforms, but in our view goes much too far in a number of respects toward making the grand jury phase a litigated proceeding comparable to the trial. We recommend that the bill be limited to a smaller number of critical reforms and more far-reaching changes be eliminated.

Recalcitrant witnesses

Section 2 of H.R. 94 would make several changes in the procedures for imposing sanctions on witnesses who refuse to supply information to a grand jury, most importantly by providing that bail must be granted in all cases unless it affirmatively appears that the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Appeals are to be decided pursuant to an expedited schedule and in any event no more that 30 days from the filing of such appeal.

These provisions have the salutary purpose of preventing imprisonment of a witness who has a valid objection to the contempt proceeding later vindicated on appeal after the witness has already spent time in jail. At the same time this may delay important investigations.

Delay is involved both for the filing of the appeal and for decision of the appeal. Although the bill provides for a 30 day deadline for the latter, it is unclear what would happen if the record is not completed on time, the court is still considering the issue, or if other factors beyond anyone's control lead to additional delay, as often occurs in litigation.

Perhaps a provision might be made for an immediate oral argument of the appeal before a panel of three Court of Appeals judges in a manner similar to that of an argument of a motion before a District Judge, on typewritten paper plus any typewritten transcripts necessary, together with oral argument. This would protect the right of the witness to have appellate review and also the right of the grand jury to have its investigation pursued expeditiously. Of course, the defendant should be entitled to be heard in the usual way on request, but in that case normal standards for granting bail on appeal rather than the special more favorable standards established by H.R. 94 should apply.

Witness immunity

Section 3 of H.R. 94 does away with the so-called "use-immunity" created by existing law and substitutes "transactional immunity". This means that a witness would be immunized from prosecution for any conduct relating to any matters concerning which testimony is compelled under the grant, rather than merely being protected from the use of such testimony against the witness in a subsequent criminal case (other than perjury in the giving of the testimony). Before making this change, evidence should be presented showing serious abuses of the "use-immunity" concept.

Also, H.R. 94 would place the burden on the prosecutor to show a number of additional facts not now required for immunity to be granted. One such element is that the application for an immunity order "is in accordance with existing would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation . . .", H.R. 94, pp. 8–9, lines 17–18, proposed new 18 U.S. Sec. 6003(c)(4()A). This should be an internal matter for the Department of Justice. There seems to be no good reason for injecting the courts into such a matter, especially since only the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General, or a designated Assistant Attorney General (and not an individual United States Attorney or Assistant United Staes Attorney) would be allowed to request immunity.

Another new element to be proved would be that "a grant of immunity . . . would be adequate for the purposes of the investigation . . .", H.R. 94, pp. 8-9, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 6003(c)(4)(D). This would appear to be of more concern to the prosecutor than to the court and would not seem to be an appropriate subject for judicial inquiry.

Still another new element would be that "a summary of the evidence relating to the witness has been certified and submitted to the court". H.R. 94, p. 9, lines 3-4, proposed new 18 U.S.C. 6003(c)(4)(E). This involves the danger that derogatory information will reach unnecessary hands, increasing the danger of leaks. It also opens the possibility of litigation over the adequacy of such a summary, surely a collateral issue in any further proceedings. It could lead to side issues regarding who may have disclosure of such a summary, when and for what purposes (the defendant? the witness if indicted? the witness in connection with a challenge to the immunity order? etc.). Also, the question arises as to what happens if the summary contains incorrect information or material subject to rebuttal.

Most importantly, the purpose of the summary is unclear. Supplying evidence is only relevant if there is some determination to be made based on this evidence This is not set forth in this portion of H.R. 94. Also, the information "relating to the witness" is indefinite and in the case of some witneses might involve multivolume tomes.

The additional requirements discussed, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 6003(c)(4)(A), (D) and (E), seem to serve no important legitimate purpose, and in our view should be deleted.

Size of grand juries

Section 4 of H.R. 94 prohibits recruiting grand jurors from bystanders and also requires that two thirds and grand jury members who are present concur in any indictment. The absolute number needed to indict would be nine, out of a potential number between nine and fifteen who may serve. These reforms appear salutary.

If a prosecutor cannot obtain a two-thirds vote within the grand jury on the question of probable cause sufficient to require a trial (without a defense having been put in), it seems unrealistic to expect a unanimous verdict of guilt beyond any reasonable doubt at a trial.

Reducing the number of grand jurors would also reduce the expense involved.

Unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information

Section 5 of H.R. 94 also contains provisions seeking to discourage leaks of grand jury information, but these restrictions "shall not apply to disclosure by any person other than a person present at the grand jury proceedings." H.R. 94, p. 11, lines 15-17, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 1512(d). This would immunize a great many leaks, such as where the prosecutor might give information to the Chief of a section who then provides it to the press. This restriction should be deleted.

We prefer the overall approach to this subject taken by three committees of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York in their report "Strengthening the Rule of the Federal Grand Jury", 29 Record of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, 646, 472-79 (May-June 1974) which creates other remedies as well as criminal sanctions.

Rights and duties of grand jurors

Section 6 of H.R. 94 sets forth areas to be covered by instructions to grand jurors and also permits persons who testify or produce information, or others, to request to testify. We support these reforms. In addition, however, the prosecutor would be required to take reasonable steps to notify any person against whom evidence is to be presented so that they can request to testify, unless the prosecutor can "prove to the satisfaction of the court that notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger other witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution." H.R. 94 Sec. 6(a), p. 14, lines 13-16, proposed new 19 U.S.C., Sec. 3329(b)(2)(B). It is almost impossible to prove in advance of the event that something "would" happen. Consequently, in all probability, such proof would be rarely successful and the adverse consequences mentioned would occur more frequently, with resulting detriment to the public interest. Ancillary litigation would also result as to the adequacy of proof of the facts justifying lack of advance notice in such cases. To avoid these problems, a certificate of good faith belief on the part of the prosecutor that the adverse consequences mentioned were likely should be sufficient. If this is deemed too easy to furnish, so that the subsection would become meaningless, it would, in our view, be better to delete the provision in question completely. (H.R. 94, p. 14, lines 6–16). This would, of course, still permit a person knowing of an investigation to request to testify.

Where someone requests to testify and the grand jury approves the request, the prosecutor "shall subpena the evidence or witnesses offered". H.R. 94, p. 15, lines 1–2, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3329(b)(3). This seems inappropriate. If the party is volunteering to appear, no subpoena should be necessary.

Upon appearance pursuant to the subpoena, H.R. 94 further provides that the party should be permitted to testify "only upon submission of a waiver of immunity . . .". H.R. 94, p. 15, lines 6–8, proposed U.S.C. Sec. 3329(b)(4). At present there is no waiver of immunity under federal practice, and H.R. 94 creates none; on the contrary, to acquire immunity the party must be specifically ordered to testify. The language as to a "waiver of immunity" seems to refer to practice in various state courts and is inappropriate to existing or contemplated federal law.

It is also provided that the prosecutor must "advise the grand jury of the nature and existence of evidence as yet not received", which might tend to materially affect the credibility of any witness or tend to negate the guilt of any prospective defendant. H.R. 94, p. 15, lines 12–16, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3329(c). This can be prejudicial to defendants insofar as witnesses may testify in a manner favorable to them. Hearsay evidence as to the credibility of such witnesses would be permitted—indeed required—to be transmitted to the grand jury.

The procedure of advising the jury of evidence not yet received, prior to the time of any deliberations, is also troublesome. If such evidence is going to be introduced before the grand jury prior to its voting on a prospective indictment, there would seem to be no need to mention the matter ahead of time. The concept of a "prospective defendant" also creates difficulties in that many investigations are aimed at specified events or transactions and not at preconceived "targets". This is another reason why the provision should be triggered only by deliberations on an indictment. The provision should be amended to state that the prosecutor should advise the grand jury, before it deliberates on an indictment against a prospective defendant, of any material evidence not received by the grand jury tending substantially to negate the guilt of such party or to shed doubt on the credibility of any witness who testified against the party.

H.R. 94, p. 15, lines 17–24, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3329(d), also bans the calling of a witness who has given advance written notice of intention to exercise the privilege against self-incrimination. This is subject to abuse, because it permits a privilege not to answer specific questions to be converted into a privilege not to appear at all. There are undoubtedly non-incriminating questions that can be asked of almost any witness.

Any investigation of transactions as to which another grand jury has failed to indict would be banned by H.R. 94, p. 16, lines 1–6, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3329(e), unless the court finds upon a proper showing that additional relevant evidence has been discovered. This provision is unrealistic as applied to any complex or continuing investigation that may necessarily involve more that one grand jury. The section could be revised to provide that an indictment shall not be recommended to a grand jury where another grand jury has failed to indict the same defendant upon substantially the same evidence.

Rights of grand jury witnesses

Section 7 of H.R. 94 provides that counsel may assist witnesses in the grand jury room, a reform also recommemnded by the three committees of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, in their report previously cited. Counsel would be prohibited from seeking to address the jurors, however. While endorsing this addition to the rights of witnesses, we recommend that the court be expressly empowered to prevent the same attorney from representing more than one witness where the prosecution believes that a conflict of interest may exist. Otherwise counsel not independently representing a single witness but actually paid by a corporation or other party having potentially different interests might be able to obstruct an investigation.

H.R. 94 also provides (p. 21, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3330B(b)) that witnesses be given notice of various items, including "whether his own conduct is under investigation. . . ." This may be known in many cases, since the very purpose of the inquiry is to ascertain who may be involved in a potentially illegal course of conduct. To advise someone that they are under investigation may harm their reputation or be required to be disclosed by them to third parties under various circumstances, so it can hardly be treated as an act that is necessarily harmless. The provision proceeds upon the quite common but erroneous assumption that law enforcement investigations necessarily have preconceived "targets" or "subjects". In some cases, of course, such as where an arrest has already been made, this is true; but in those instances this is known to the party involved. Subsec. (b) (4) of proposed 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3330B; (H.R. 94, p. 21, lines 17–18), should be deleted in our view.

H.R. 94, p. 22, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3330B(d)(1)(A) requires the prosecutor to show, when a subpoena is challenged, that a primary purpose or effect would not be to secure trial testimony regarding a person already under indictment. This is an unjustified restriction of legitimate investigation of other crimes by the grand jury, in our view. One who has been indicted for crime A is immunized from investigation of crime B, simply because the "effect" of the investigation of B would also provide information relevant to A. If the information is truthful and relevant, the only benefit of such a ban is to give a more equal "sporting chance" to both parties in the litigation over A, hardly a compelling social interest. Moreover, defendants' discovery has been substantially increased in recent years, so that the one-sidedness which this section seeks to overcome has been ameliorated to some degree in any event.

The bill, (p. 23, lines 11–17, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3330B(d)(1)(D)), also puts the burden on the prosecutor to show that a challenged subpoena is not unreasonable or oppressive, etc. It would seem better to require the movant to demonstrate that a subpoena is oppressive than to require the prosecutor to prove a negative. This same subdivision also requires a showing that testimony is not cumulative or unnecessary, which would tend to lead to premature disclosure of grand jury testimony, contrary to the purpose of Sec. 5 of the bill to discourage leaks.

Recording and availiabity of grand jury proceedings

Section 8 of H.R. 94 provides for recording of all grand jury proceedings except deliberations, including the prosecutor's explanations and recommendations. This is a salutary reform to prevent overreaching by the prosecutor and we approve it.

The bill goes further, however, and requires that any witness summoned to testify be entitled to inspect and copy any statement in the possession of the United States he has made relevant to the subject matter under inquiry. (p. 26, lines 11–20, proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3334). The burden of a Government-wide search of that kind as to every witness would be a major burden, and would tend to impede investigations substantially. The witness should be required to specify any particular statements to be inspected by reasonable identification, such as the agency to which made and the year or general subject, before such a search should be mandated.

Preliminary examination

Section 9 of H.R. 94 (p. 28, lines 17–23. proposed new 18 U.S.C. Sec. 3368) would require a preliminary hearing, unless waived, to be conducted in every case, even where an indictment has already been filed. This overlooks the purpose of preliminary hearings, namely to determine if the defendant should be held to answer a charge before the grand jury. What purpose the hearings after indictment, but before trial, would serve is not clear. Presumably it would act as an additional discovery device for the defense, an objective better served by other means if additional discovery not now available is necessary.

Conclusion

H.R. 94 contains a number of valuable reforms which we wholeheartedly support, including the requirement of a two-thirds vote for indictment, the right of a witness to have counsel present, the reduction of the minimum number of jurors, and provisions for additional advice to jurors as to their duties. In numerous other respects as discussed above, however, we believe that the bill as now drafted would impede important investigations and would further complicate and delay criminal procedure. We strongly recommend that the scope of the bill be limited to a few of the more crucial reforms and that other provisions discussed above be deleted or modified.

Respectfully submitted.

AD HOC COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE FEDERAL GRAND JURY,
Houston, Tex., November 14, 1977.

RESPONSE TO STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI, ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Does the Grand Jury system exist for the benefit of the citizens of the United States, or does it exist as an instrument of the Department of Justice for the purpose of oppression? In answering this question, reference will be made to the statements of Mr. Civiletti by page number. His statement is attached hereto as an example of the bad faith with which the United States Department of Justice has heretofore impeded and obstructed Grand Jury Reform in the United States. I suggest that you stop here and before you continue, that you read Mr. Civiletti's comments.

1. On page 1, reference is made in the second paragraph to a concept of a system to "preserve balance." Mr. Civiletti should define that term in order to clarify his statement. Its rather ominous Orwellian tone is suspect.

2. Further on page 1, reference is made to "beyond clear constitutional rights." This phrase indicates another problem in systems of oppression. Constitutional rights have always been clear and easy to understand. The Department of Justice has over the years worked steadily to cloud constitutional doctrine by joining with a judiciary that assists in the prosecution of cases. At least, that is the case in the Southern District of Texas, Houston Division.

3. Further, on page 1, where the Grand Jury System is referred to as "a bulwark of our criminal justice system" Mr. Civiletti fails to point out that the system is to serve as a buffer between the executive and the people, not to serve as a concealed arm of the executive.

4. Mr. Civiletti on page 2 fails to mention that a citizen may take a complaint to a Grand Juror of criminal wrongdoing, and the Grand Jury may act upon that complaint. As a matter of fact, the Department of Justice in San Antonio, Texas has attempted in the past to totally obstruct that process with threats of criminal action.

5. The Grand Jury system in the Houston Division is a fraud, and since no investigation of the system has ever been done elsewhere, the Houston situation is probably the norm. Yet the Department of Justice has not commenced a criminal investigation of the judges that wrote the Houston Jury Plan, opting out for a "civil rights" investigation, so I have been told by the Department of Justice.

6. On page 3, Mr. Civiletti makes various affirmations that: (1) all testimony before the grand jury should be recorded—this translated means testimony of witnesses only, not the comments of the prosecutor; (2) all prosecutors should scrupulously preserve grand jury secrecy—which they do not.

7. On page 4, Mr. Civiletti should define "legally recognized privilege" because the Department of Justice attempts to relitigate ad infinitum these "privileges" working fervently to abolish by court decision the corresponding amendments to the U.S. Constitution, the Bill of Rights.

8. Mr. Civiletti refers to the "civic duty" of the witness (p. 4) to testify openly and freely, but on page 20, he reveals that all witnesses are potential defendants. Hence, he asserts sub silencio, that no witness should ever testify before a Grand Jury because he may incriminate himself.

9. On page 7, we discover, that the Department of Justice decides when a grant of immunity is appropriate. This is a judicial decision being made by the executive branch of the government with the complicity of the judiciary. It is totally impossible to obtain any semblance of a fair trial in such an atmosphere.

10. On page 8, in the footnote, reference is made to opposition to the witness having to consent to immunity, classifying the associates of accused wrongdoers as somehow being guilty of a crime. This is true, of course, in the exclusive sense when one recalls the present residence of the ex attorney general of the U.S. John Mitchell; I suppose Mr. Civiletti was an associate and colleague of Mr. Mitchell, and in that sense he is correct. But in any other case, in case Mr. Civiletti is unaware, in our society, you are innocent until proven guilty. Mr. Civiletti is laboring under the misapprehension that an indictment means the party is guilty and that the trial is merely a technicality where the judge certifies the position of the Department of Justice.

11. It would not be surprising for Mr. Civiletti to be lobbying in favor of "successive Grand Jury investigations" or if you can't get him the first time, try, try again until you do. (See page 11)

12. On page 12, we discover that it is the duty of the prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence. How Nice! But we have already seen that Mr. Civiletti would not have any record of that portion of the proceeding, so we can just take his word for it. But if he was an associate of John Mitchell we couldn't do that either, by his own standards.

13. On page 12, we find the words of art "subject or target of an investigation." This language is a strong indication of what type of criminal justice system Mr. Civiletti endorses. If Mr. Civiletti were a Mafioso, he would no doubt have the same opinion that he does in this statement.

14. On page 13, he refers to the U.S. Attorneys Manual. The committee would do well to demand the 4 pages in that manual that deal with the grand jury and that are "secret" to ascertain why the Department of Justice has a "police statist" such as Mr. Civiletti lobbying against Grand Jury Reform.

15. On page 14, more of Mr. Civiletti's justice is seen where he believes it fair to have secret investigations of citizens without notifying them so that a knock on the door in the dark of night can be expected.

16. Mr. Civiletti is not the only villain in the section on allowing counsel for witnesses before the grand jury. Some fair minded bureaucrat has asserted in the proposed measure for the judge to be able to interfere with the witness' choice of counsel. Again, the Bill of Rights is ignored. However, Mr. Civiletti after stating on page 20, that every witness is a potential defendant, does not want the witness' rights to be protected when he appears before the grand jury. He then attempts to "soft-peddle" the indictment process; but he is well-aware, that the general public regards an indictment as a conviction, so why shouldn't a witness be able to invoke all of his rights? The issue in question is his liberty and that is important enough to warrant protection. However, "police-statists" down through the ages, just like Mr. Civiletti have similarly opposed fair procedures.

17. He mentions on page 18, that indigents will be appointed counsel, but middle class Americans will not have counsel because they can not afford it. That is true, but should be fully accepted by Mr. Civiletti, because through his efforts over the years, the middle class has had only one right since WWII, that is to pay for the fraudulent processes that have been promulgated by the bureaucracy.

18. On page 23, at the bottom of the page is found the following statement: the government does not "generally" have any motivation for causing witnesses any hardship. The committee should query Mr. Civiletti as when does the govern- have motivation for causing witnesses hardship.

19. On page 24, Mr. Civiletti whines about the inconvenience that would be caused by witnesses exercising their constitutional rights in a district other than that from which the grand jury processes emanates. With the massive resources of the federal government pitted against a citizen, it seems ludicrous for the government to whine about inconvenience. The problem again, is that the only inconvenience caused would be that created for the "police statists" by the Bill of Rights.

20. In law, speed does not denote justice. Arrest and immediate imprisonment without due process or any judicial process that protects the rights of the accused is not justice. On page 25, reference is made in the last line as follows: the convenience of witnesses must yield to a greater societal good. Did Mr. Civiletti study law in Moscow? Obviously, if one labors for the greater glorification of the state, the fate of the citizen, individually is irrelevant. As Mr. Civiletti lobbys against Grand Jury Reform, it is interesting to see his motivation.

21. The only way that the Grand Jury system can be protected for the people, not for the Department of Justice's police statism, is for the entire proceeding to be recorded and transcribed. Otherwise, we only have the word of individuals who apparently are unhappy with our Bill of Rights, and whose legal beliefs do not conform to the Constitution they are sworn to uphold and defend.

22. On page 27, Mr. Civiletti fears increased litigation over the grand jury. With what I have uncovered and am uncovering in Texas, this litigation is virtually guaranteed whether Mr. Civiletti's efforts at police statism lobbying are successful or not. We the sovereign citizens do have the right to defend our constitutional rights.

23. In passing, one other benefit of total recording and transcription of the grand jury proceedings would be to determine if the grand jury knows, in fact, what it is doing while it is deliberating. After all, the typical grand juror in Houston Division is a white housewife, whose husband is a blue collar worker for a multinational corporation. It would engender in these individuals that they bear a responsibility for what they are doing. The system would be assisted positively thereby.

24. A preliminary examination after indictment would serve as a check on the grand jury as mentioned above, which is at best, unreliable.

25. In Appendix I, a special attorney for the Grand Jury is discussed. Mr. Civiletti fears this because, he does not want a citizen's grand jury to ever have the power of independent investigation of federal bureaucrats. It would be sound to have such a provision specifically spelled out in such a statute. In Houston Division, we have had and continue to have much difficulties with the court personnel and judges who do not want the people to exercise their rights in court. Even 28 USC 1654 is looked upon with disfavor in this district. There is the need of a careful investigation of the court system in this Division which, as I have stated is probably the norm in the US generally.

26. On page 6 of the Appendix I. Mr. Civiletti opposes an attorney representing more than one grand jury witness. This could mean greater expense and inconvenience to the witness. However, Mr. Civiletti is unconcerned with this aspect since he has a knowledge of the law and an increasing tax-funded salary, he does not have the problems that the middle class working man would have, and is hence oblivious to the problem. He also indicates on page 7, that the witness should fear his own attorney. I believe the real fear should grow out of a discovery by the people that the Department of Justice is lobbying in favor of police statism before congressional committees. Further, witnesses should always have counsel present when they deal with the Grand Jury because, all witnesses are potential defendants in the system as it stands now.

CONCLUSION

I strongly object to the Department of Justice obstructing the legislative process in a manner to impede Grand Jury Reform. I object to the Subcommittee herein addressed being intimidated by a mere bureaucrat allowing the people in the meantime to twist in the wind.

It seems to me, that you people on the committee as well as your staff should read the Bill of Rights, excluding from your readings your petty greedy interests that place in jeopardy the freedom of the people of the United States.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN RE: POSSIBLE VIOLATIONS OF 18 U.S.C. §§ 371, 641, 1503

ARTHUR J. MAREN, WITNESS

MEMORANDUM OF LAW IN OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT'S REQUEST FOR ORDER OF CONFINEMENT PURSUANT TO 18 U.S.C. § 1826

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This memorandum and the accompany affidavits are submitted in opposition to the government's request for sanctions against Reverend Arthur Maren, pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1826. Reverend Maren, called as a witness before a grand jury on September 8, 1977, refused to answer three questions on the grounds outlined below. The government sought an immediate order of confinement. This Court rejected the government's request and set a hearing on imposing sanctions for September 14, 1977 and requested briefing by September 12, 1977.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This motion for sanctions arises in the context of a continuous, acrimonious dispute between the Church of Scientology,[1] a recognized religious institution,[2] and the United States government. Among the points of contention between the Church and the government in the past have been: (1) an effort by the Food and Drug Administration (hereinafter referred to as "FDA") to seize books and other materials of the Church (Hubbard Electrometers or "E-meters") on the grounds that they constituted fraudulent medical devices, an effort eventually rejected by the Court of Appeals in Founding Church of Scientology v. United States, 133 App. D.C. 229, 409 F.2d 1146 (D.C. Cir. 1969) and by this Court in United States v. Article of Device, 333 F. Supp. 357 (D.D.C. 1971); (2) continuous contention at an earlier time concerning the religious and charitable character of the Church involving I.R.S., I.N.S., the Department of Labor and other federal agencies; (3) many hundreds of FOIA requests and suits brought by the Church to determine the extent of government surveillance of the Church and its members; and harrassment of the Church by the dissemination of false information; (4) an action against the U.S. Customs Service for illegal seizure of interoffice correspondence of the Church, including attorney-client communications, Church of Scientology of California v. Simons, Civil Action No. 76-2160 (C.D.Cal. 1976); and (5) a multi-million dollar damage suit brought by the Church against the F.B.I., the C.I.A., N.S.A. and others for unlawful infiltration, surveillance and harassment. See, Founding Church of Scientology of Washington, D.C., Inc. v. Kelley, et al., Civil Action No. 77-0175 (D.D.C. 1977).

Prior proceedings in this action are described in the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, In re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. §§ 371, 641, 1503, Arthur Maren, Appellant, Docket No. 77-1704, September 2, 1977. Also relevant is this Court's decision In re Search Warrant dated July 4, 1977 for Premises at 2125 S Street, N.W., Misc. No. 77-0151, D.D.C. Memorandum and Order, dated July 27, 1977. This Court held that a warrant authorizing the search for all evidence of conspiracy in a predawn raid by F.B.I. agents on the Church of Scientology (using buzzsaws, sledgehammers and crowbars) was invalid since it constituted a general warrant.

Following the Court of Appeals decision on September 2, 1977, Reverend Maren sought release from the original order of confinement. He appeared before Judge John C. Pratt and testified that he would no longer rely on any First Amendment right to resist questioning before the grand jury, nor would he raise any separation of powers argument. But he would assert his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. The government objected to his release and demanded that he be left in jail, claiming that only answering the questions would purge him of civil contempt. Judge Pratt refused to release Reverend Maren on bail, pending his reappearance before the grand jury. An application for bail to the Court of Appeals was also denied on September 6, 1977.

[1] The Church of Scientology is a non-profit religious organization with six million practitioners world-wide and one million in the United States. Each individual Church of Scientology is individually incorporated under the laws of the state in which it is located. Each Church corporation has its own local set of Officers and Directors (Trustees) which are in charge of managing the Church, as stated in the By-laws. The individual Churches do, however, recognize the Church of Scientology of California as the "Mother" Church and accept advice on problems of administration and pastoral counselling. The Founding Church of Scientology of Washington, D.C. also has a pre-eminent position because it was the original church established by the founder of the Church, L. Ron Hubbard. The two "raids" described below were directed at the California and Washington headquarters of the Church. The basic tenets of Scientology are outlined in Hubbard, Modern Management Technology Defined (1976) at 461: "a religion in the oldest sense of the word, a study of wisdom . . . a study of man as a spirit in his relationship to life and the physical universe . . . a spiritual and religious guide intended to make persons more aware of themselves as spiritual beings restoring respect for self and others . . . [Scientology] assumes that every man can be more able than he is and then goes ahead with very precise techniques to make him so." See Founding Church of Scientology v. United States, 133 App. D.C. 229, 409 F.2d 1146, 1151-52 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

[2] This Court has held that the Founding Church of Scientology was "a bona fide religion" and that the auditing practice of Scientology and accounts of it are "religious doctrines." See Founding Church of Scientology v. United States, 133 App. D.C. 229, 409 F.2d 1146, 1162 (D.C. Cir. 1969). "The Church is a religious institution protected by the First Amendment." United States v. Article of Device, 333 F. Supp. 357, 363 (D.D.C. 1971).

On September 8, 1977 Reverend Maren reappeared before the grand jury. He was asked the same three questions previously put to him:

1. Do you know Gerald Wolfe?

2. Mr. Maren, between June of 1976 and June of 1977, did you at any time discuss with anyone plans for Gerald Wolfe to develop an untrue cover story with regard to his entry into the United States Courthouse on June 11th, 1976 for him to tell, under oath, before a Grand Jury of the United States District Court here in the District of Columbia?

3. At any time prior to November 1974 did you participate in discussions with anyone in the nature of plans to enter a conference room in the building occupied by the Internal Revenue Service here in Washington for the purpose of planting a listening device with which to monitor conversations of officials of the Internal Revenue Service pertaining to applications of the Church of Scientology for status as a tax-exempt organization?

Subsequent to November 1st, 1974 did you ever read or discuss a transcript of discussions of officials of the Internal Revenue Service come at by means of the bugging of a conference room in the building occupied by the Internal Revenue Service?

He refused to answer the questions on self-incrimination grounds under the Fifth Amendment. The government again took the position that invoking the Fifth Amendment did not purge Reverend Maren of his contempt and he must be left in jail. Counsel then went to this Court's chambers to argue the point.

When this Court indicated its belief that Reverend Maren still could assert his Fifth Amendment rights, the government at 12:30 P.M., September 8, 1977 told counsel and the Court for the first time that it would seek an immediate immunity order for Reverend Maren pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 6002.

The immunity order was signed at 3:00 P.M. that same day, September 8, 1977. At 3:30 P.M. Reverend Maren was ordered to reappear before the grand jury. He reappeared before the grand jury, explained that he was not sure of the implications of the grant of immunity. He asked for additional time to consult with his lawyer. The government refused his request and urged the grand jury to press the questions again.

The three questions were again put to Reverend Maren. He refused to answer on three separate grounds:

1. the questions were based in part on illegal electronic surveillance of Reverend Maren or on premises in which he had a proprietary interest;

2. Reverend Maren's Sixth Amendment rights were violated since he did not have adequate time to consult with his attorneys following the sudden grant of immunity;

3. the subpoena requiring his appearance before the grand jury was served improperly since service followed an illegal entry.

The government sought an immediate hearing on civil contempt, requesting that Reverend Maren be returned forthwith to jail. This Court rejected their request, setting September 14, 1977 as the hearing date.

This memorandum will discuss the first and second grounds asserted by Reverend Maren as a basis for his refusal to testify.[3]

POINT I

THE GOVERNMENT MUST PROPERLY RESPOND TO A CLAIM OF ILLEGAL ELECTRONICS SURVEILLANCE

Reverend Maren has been called before the grand jury as a witness and has refused to answer certain questions he believes to be the fruit of illegal wiretaps carried on against him by the government. He has stated under oath before the grand jury that he believed the questions asked were based on illegal electronic surveillance. He has submitted affidavits outlining the specific factual grounds of his belief that he has been under surveillance.

In the Affidavit of Arthur Maren, Exhibit A, Reverend Maren lists various telephone and telex numbers believed by him to be the subject of electronic surveillance. In his affidavit, at paragraph 5, he states, "I am given to believe that said phone numbers have been subjected to illegal electronic surveillance from the abnormal noises, interruptions, and background voices that I have heard while engaged in conversations on these lines. My knowledge that the National Security Agency is withholding from the Church files requested under the Freedom of Information Act and pertaining to the Church, leads me to believe that the telex lines on which I send and receive communications may likewise be subjected to such surveillance."

[3] The third ground, alleging the insufficiency of the subpoena served on Reverend Maren, is not discussed and has been dropped. See discussion at 11, infra.

In Exhibit B and C, the affidavits of Eunice Ford and William Carpenter, two Church staff members describe the activities of FBI agents who had broken into the "switchboard room," that office of the Church of Scientology Cedars complex which houses the telephone switching equipment for the entire complex of Church buildings. Further, the likelihood of misconduct by FBI agents with regard to electronic surveillance is demonstrated by the fact that the "switchboard room" in question was not within the scope of the search warrant.

The government has not affirmed or denied these allegations, yet persists with its challenged questioning, and seeks to impose sanctions upon the witness for failure to answer.

The right of a grand jury witness to refuse to answer questions based on illegal electronic surveillance is certain. Section 2515 of Title 18 states that "Whenever any wire or oral communication has been intercepted, no part of the contents of such communicaton and no evidence derived therefrom may be received in evidence in any trial, hearing or other proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, legislative body, legislative committee or other authority of the United States, or a political subdivision thereof if the disclosure of that information would be in violation of this chapter."

Under Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41 (1972), a grand jury witness may involke 18 U.S.C. § 2515 to refuse to answer questions put to him and to raise the provision as a defense to a contempt charge under 28 U.S.C. § 1826(a). In In Re Evans, 146 App. D.C. 310, 452 F. 2d 1239 (D.C. Cir. 1971), cert. den., 408 U.S. 930 (1972), this Circuit held that such a witness need not wait to be held in contempt before challenging the legality of questioning and invoking the protection of § 2515.

§ 3504. Litigation concerning sources of evidence.

(a) In any trial, hearing, or other proceeding in or before any court, grand jury, department, officer, agency, regulatory body, or other authority of the United States—

(1) upon a claim by a party aggrieved that evidence is inadmissible because it is the primary product of an unlawful act or because it was obtained by the exploitation of an unlawful act, the opponent of the claim shall affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged unlawful act;

If the government wishes to pursue its questioning following the witness' claim of illegal interception of communications, it must meet its burden under 18 U.S.C. § 3504(a)(1) of affirming or denying the allegations of wiretapping. As the Court of Appeals said in Evans, 452 F.2d at 1247:

"Section 3504(a)(1) of title 18 provides that when a party aggrieved by an unlawful wiretap moves for the suppression of evidence on the basis of the alleged interception, the opponent of the claim must affirm or deny the allegation. Since § 3504(a)(1) is triggered, in our view, by the mere assertion that unlawful wiretapping has been used against a party, the government must make the next move if it still wishes to interrogate these appellants."

The government's burden to come forward under 18 U.S.C. § 3504(a)(1) is triggered, by the terms of the statute, by the assertion of a "claim" that unlawful interception of communications has occurred. The claim can be asserted orally, as initially done here, see In Re Grumbles, 453 F.2d 119 (3d Cir. 1971). Its assertion can even be inferred from a simple request for disclosure of information regarding government wiretaps. United States v. Lang, 422 F. Supp. 400 (E. D. Wis. 1976). An assertion of illegal wiretapping need not be made with great specificity, for the very effectiveness of electronic surveillance depends on its object being unaware of its existence. In re Evans, 452 F.2d at 1249. See United States v. Vielguth, 502 F.2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1975). In the face of such a claim, the government must cease its interrogation if it does not meet its burden. Evans, 452 F.2d at 1247.

That burden cannot be met by a mere oral denial. The Second Circuit has recently stated: "the government has been held to a high standard of completeness in responding to such a request." United States v. Yanagita, 552 F.2d 940, 944 (2d Cir. 1977).

Reverend Maren's allegations here meet a more exacting standard than that articulated in Evans, and require more than a bald denial by the government. In United States v. Alter, 482 F.2d 1016 (9th Cir. 1973), cited in United States v. McCord, 509 F.2d 334, 340 n.5 (D.C. Cir. 1974), the Ninth Circuit held that affidavits showing good cause to believe illegal surveillance had occurred required the government to file a "responsive, factual, unambiguous, and unequivocal affidavit." 482 F.2d at 1027. The affidavit submitted by the government in Alter was held conclusory and insufficient to squarely "affirm or deny" the charges of surveillance because it supplied no information whatever regarding the inquiries made to determine whether surveillance had occurred, the persons interrogated, whether all sources of information were exhausted, or which of the several allegations had been investigated. 482 F.2d at 1027. In the Evans case, the Court of Appeals indicated that with the type of showing made here, the government "will have to search their records for evidence of a wiretap if they wish to pursue the interrogation of these witnesses." 452 F.2d at 1247. In In Re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806 (5th Cir. 1972) the government was required to present its testimony of denial under oath, subject to cross examination. Cf. Beverly v. United States, 468 F.2d 732 (5th Cir. 1972).

For these reasons, the witness demands that the government be required either to cease its questioning, or to come forward with information sufficiently specific to meet the witness' allegations, with the witness being afforded full opportunity to subject any denial by the government to cross examination.[4]

The government does not meet its burden by claiming there was an independent basis for the questioning. The statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3504 states that "Upon a claim by a party aggrieved . . . the opponent of the claim shall affirm or deny the occurrence of the unlawful acts." The Supreme Court said in Gelbard: "Upon such a claim by a grand jury witness, The Government, as the 'opponent of the claim', is required under § 3504(a)(1) to 'affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged' illegal interception." 408 U.S. at 54–55. The Supreme Court quoted from the legislative history of the Act which made clear that the only appropriate response to the claim is " 'to affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged invasion of the defendant's rights.' " Ibid. at 56. When a far stronger factual showing is made, such as here, the government's burden is far higher than a mere denial, as noted above. In none of the cases cited did the courts indicate that the government's statutory burden would be met by not answering the claim but only by showing another basis for the questioning. As this Circuit said in Evans, 452 F.2d at 1246–47, "If the government wishes to pursue the examination of these witnesses it must be prepared to follow the procedures prescribed by Congress for resolving disputes over the alleged use of unlawful wiretapping."

Finally it is only after the government has met its burdens that the questions may again be put to the witness. The Second Circuit has said that the grand jury "may recall a witness after his § 3504 request has been answered." United States v. Yanagita 552 F.2d 940, 943–44 (2d Cir. 1977).

POINT II

REVEREND MAREN'S SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHTS WERE VIOLATED

The undisputed sequence of events which occurred on Thursday, September 8, 1977 shows that Reverend Maren's Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel was seriously jeopardized. As noted above, at 10:15 A.M. Revend Maren's counsel asked the Assistant United States Attorney whether there had been any request for a grant of immunity. The assistant refused to answer that question. The witness then went before the grand jury at 10:45 A.M. and pleaded the Fifth Amendment to the three questions put to him. It was Reverend Maren's claim that invoking the Fifth Amendment purged him of contempt and therefore triggered his release. The government attorney told Reverend Maren's counsel that he did not consider the Fifth Amendment claim sufficient. Counsel then went to this Court's chambers for a ruling. Due to a delay in bringing Reverend Maren to chambers, counsel did not begin to argue the point until 11:40 A.M. This Court immediately indicated its agreement with Reverend Maren's position. During the course of the argument, the government first disclosed that it was authorized to, and would, seek a grant of immunity for Reverend Maren pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 6002 and § 6003. After lengthy discussion, counsel left this Court's chambers at 1:00 P.M. and was told to return to Court at 2:00 P.M. for a hearing on the grant of immunity. Counsel and the witness briefly discussed the implications of what had occurred. Counsel had to examine the immunity papers and briefly research their validity. At 2:00 P.M. counsel returned to Court to argue whether immunity should be granted. After some discussion and argument, this Court signed the immunity order at approximately 3:00 P.M.

[4] If the government admits that it engaged in a court-ordered Title III wiretap, the procedures to be followed are outlined in In re proceedings to Enforce Grand Jury Subpoenas, 430 F. Supp. 1701 (E. D. Pa. 1977); In re Lochiato, 499 F.2d 803 (1st Cir. 1974).

Reverend Maren was then directed to appear before the grand jury at 3:30 P.M. Once again he was afforded only a brief opportunity to discuss the implications of the grant immunity. Shortly after 3:30 P.M. Reverend Maren was summoned to appear before the grand jury. He was asked the three questions noted above. He refused to answer them in part on the ground that he had not had an opportunity to consult adequately with his attorneys about the implications of what had occurred that day.[5]

The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is not an empty formalism, requiring only that a person be able to retain counsel and have him at his side. Counsel and his client must have a meaningful opportunity to discuss legal problems and sufficient time to discuss the basic principles of law involved and to plan alternative courses of action. As the Supreme Court said in the leading case of Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 59 (1932): "a defendant, charged with a serious crime, must not be stripped of his right to have sufficient time to advise with counsel and prepare his defense." In the recent Supreme Court case of Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976) a conviction was reversed because the trial judge had ordered the defendant not to consult with his counsel about anything during a 17-hour overnight recess in the trial between his direct and cross-examination. The Supreme Court unanimously held that the order prohibiting consultation violated his Sixth Amendment rights.

Similarly in this case, a witness before a grand jury has the sixth Amendment right to consult with his attorney. United States v. Capaldo, 402 F.2d 821, 824 (2d Cir. 1968); United States v. George, 444 F.2d 310, 315 (6th Cir. 1971); United States v. Duncan, 456 F.2d 1401, 1407 (9th Cir. 1972); United States v. De Sapio, 299 F. Supp. 436, 440 (S.D.N.Y. 1969). That right must be meaningful one and there must be "sufficient time to advise with counsel," Powell, 278 U.S. at 59. For the government to mask the fact that it was seeking a grant of immunity, and then suddenly to spring immunity on the witness, without giving him an opportunity to discuss this new step with his counsel, is to violate the Sixth Amendment right. Geders, supra, see e.g. United States v. Knight, 443 F.2d 174 (6th Cir. 1971).

Point III

THE QUESTIONING OF REVEREND MAREN VIOLATED HIS FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS

Although the result is preordained, Reverend Maren again presses First Amendment claims rejected by the Court of Appeals in In re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. § 371 etc. He does so merely to preserve the point for possible later appeals.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons outlined above, the witness, Reverend Arthur Maren, respectfully requests that no sanctions be imposed upon him pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1826.

Respectfully submitted.

EXHIBIT A

AFFIDAVIT OF ARTHUR MAREN

State of California, County of Los Angeles

Arthur J. Maren, being first duly sworn, deposes and states:

1. I am a member of the Church of Scientology. For the past five years I have been employed by the Church as a public relations chief.

2. I believe that I was an object of illegal electronic surveillance in that my conversations were unlawfully overheard, or telephones over which I had proprietary interests were subjected to illegal surveillance by electronic, mechanical, or other means.

3. The telephones include the following numbers, and each number has been in effect since July, 1976 or before: (213) 464–0873 (since Mar. 77, previous number (213) 386-1580), 464–4055, 464–0431, 464–5192, 464–3969, 662–7715, 464–0808.

I have further reason to believe that the following telex numbers used by myself and my staff have been subjected to unlawful electronic surveillance: 940297, 892691, 235768, 684459, 127812, 340667, 447623, 677352, 101–85195212, 52695, 52781.

4. I believe that lawyer-client conversations may also have been overheard as a result of such illegal electronic surveillance. My attorneys, and their phone numbers, have been: Daniel Sheehan, (202) 347–6100; Phillip Hirschkop, (703) 836–5555, (703) 836–6595; Leon Friedman, (212) 831–0548.

5. I am given to believe that said phone numbers have been subjected to illegal electronic surveillance from the abnormal noises, interruptions, and background voices that I have heard while engaged in conversation on these lines. My knowledge that the National Security Agency is withholding from the Church files requested under the Freedom Of Information Act and pertaining to the Church, leads me to believe that the telex lines on which I send and receive communications, may likewise be subjected to such surveillance.

I declare under penalty of perjury that the foregoing is true and correct.

EXHIBIT B

AFFIDAVIT OF EUNICE FORD

State of California, County of Los Angeles, ss.

Eunice Ford, being first duly sworn, deposes and says the following:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts stated herein, and if called as a witness to testify thereon, could do so of my own personal knowledge.

2. I am a member of the Church of Scientology and for the past 17 years have been employed by the Church of Scientology.

3. On July 8, 1977, I entered the building of my employ at 1404 North Catalina, an area of the Church of Scientology known as the Cedars-complex.

4. At the gate of the entranceway I was asked to identify myself and told that there was some "trouble". I did so identify myself and was told that there was a search going on for Government documents.

5. When I went to my office which is an adjoining office to the "switchboard room" of the Cedars complex I saw that both the entranceway door and the door leading to the switchboard were smashed up badly. Both doors had cracks and holes and both doors were open. I then asked another staff member of the Church who was also in the office what had happened. He informed me that the FBI agents had done the damage.

6. I then looked around the office and found that drawers were open in the file cabinets both in the main office and in the smaller adjoining office and in the switchboard room itself which houses the communications equipment of the Cedars-complex. Files, papers, books and plans were rearranged and some of the papers were still on the desks out of which these papers had come. One of the desks, which is usually very neat was now cluttered with papers which were messed around.

7. I then went to work and while I was working I would look out of the window every once in a while to see what was going on outside. At one point while

I was looking out the window, two FBI agents entered the room and I did not become aware of them until I turned around. The two men were wearing identifying badges which stated "FBI" and one man had a camera.

8. One of the agents started taking pictures while another agent was looking around. I asked why, if they were supposedly looking for government documents, were they looking in the phone room. The agent taking pictures told me that he had nothing to do with it, that he was just taking pictures.

9. The agent with the camera then entered the smaller office adjoining the phone room and closed the door.

10. After a while, another FBI agent entered the room and looked around for a while.

11. While I was in the office with two of the FBI agents I saw them go through and rifle papers in the main office.

I declare, under penalty of perjury, that the foregoing is true and correct.

EXHIBIT C

AFFIDAVIT OF WILLIAM CARPENTER

State of California, County of Los Angeles, ss.

William Carpenter, being first duly sworn, deposes and says the following:

1. I have personal knowledge of the facts stated herein, and if called as a witness to testify thereon, could do so of my own personal knowledge.

2. I am a member of the Church of Scientology and for the last month I have been responsible for the telephones, telexes and intercoms for the Cedars-complex location of the Church at 1404 North Catalina, Los Angeles.

3. On July 8, 1977, at approximately 7:15 A.M. I was informed that FBI agents had entered the building and that damage had been done. I was told that I was needed to help clean up the area. I then went downstairs to get a broom from my office which is located in the switchboard room of the complex. I noticed at that time that the doors in the phone room—one leading to the main office in the room and the other leading to the office housing the phone and intercom equipment—were ajar.

4. When I came back to the phone room I noticed also that the front door and the door leading to the phone equipment were both smashed up, that both doors had been struck with heavy blows and utensils. The entire door lock of the outside door was ripped loose and was laying on the floor inside the room. The second door which leads to the actual phone room where all the phone and intercom equipment is installed and stored was also smashed in with the door knob actually sitting inside the broken door.

5. The room which houses the equipment had been rifled in that phone boxes were opened and the tool cabinet doors were opened. Papers had also been shuffled on my Assistant's desk.

6. Another staff member of the Church of Scientology who was also present at the time the FBI agents were in the phone area told me that she had seen them going through papers on my desk.

I declare, under penalty of perjury, that the foregoing is true and correct.

INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S & WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION,
Washington, D.C., November 10, 1977.

President JIMMY CARTER,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Except for a brief period during legal appeals, the Rev. Arthur Maren of the Church of Scientology has been in prison in Washington, D.C. since July 29. He has yet to be charged, tried or convicted of committing a crime.

Rev. Maren is the latest victim of our federal grand jury system. Because he refused to answer grand jury questions that he felt violated his religious confidentiality, he has been found in contempt and jailed, and because he has made it abundantly clear that he will never answer those questions, Rev. Maren faces the prospect of unlimited incarceration. We are hereby protesting this outrageous violation of Rev. Maren's Constitutional rights.

Our union is very familiar with the use and abuse of the grand jury system, and we have consistently opposed legislation which allows the U.S. Attorney General to "immunize" away Americans' fundamental Fifth Amendment right to silence. The immunity statute that has been used to maneuver Rev. Maren behind bars has always been justified as a weapon against organized crime since its 1970 passage. In practice, however, it has been those with unorthodox religious or political views against whom the practice of forcing immunity onto silent witnesses has been most "effective." Indeed, we have yet to see the government convict one prominent mobster on the basis of testimony forcibly immunized out of an otherwise uncooperative witness.

Rev. Maren's incarceration is all the more shocking because it is not unique. At least seven other political dissidents or religious workers are now in jail for refusing to answer grand jury questions or provide grand juries information. Like Rev. Maren, none of them has even been charged with a crime.

We consider the continued incarceration of Rev. Maren and his fellow prisoners of conscience an insult to the principles of due process and political and religious liberty that animated our nation 200 years ago.

We urge an end to such confinements and a thorough-going reform of the grand jury system that makes them possible.

Enclosed is testimony of our union delivered before the House Judiciary subcommittee studying grand jury reform. Asst. Atty. Gen. Benjamin Civiletti also testified before the members of this subcommittee. He assured them that the Department of Justice is constantly on the look-out for and eager to prevent abuses of the grand jury system.

The case of Rev. Maren demonstrates that this is clearly not the case.

Mr. President, we urge you to take appropriate action. People like Rev. Maren should not be made to suffer any longer.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

PATRICK TOBIN,
WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE,
INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION.

Enclosure.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 25, 1977.

Hon. JOSHUA EILBERG,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN EILBERG: I received a letter dated September 13, 1977, from Messrs. Leon Friedman and Philip Hirschkop, alleging "serious due process problems" and "questionable activities" with respect to procedures used by the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia in having their client, Arthur Maren, a grand jury witness, granted an immunity from prosecution. This letter carried a notation that a copy was being sent to you, evidently because of your interest in grand jury reform.

The United States Attorney, Mr. Silbert, has furnished the Criminal Division a comprehensive report on the Maren case, after a review of which I have concluded that there is no merit to the complaints of Mr. Friedman and Mr. Hirschkop. For your information, I am enclosing a copy of Mr. Silbert's letter which, in essential respects, refutes the version of the facts contained in Mr. Friedman's and Mr. Hirschkop's letter.

With respect to one of the matters complained of, special attention should be paid to the circumstances surrounding the exercise of discretion by Judge Bryant in granting Mr. Maren a requested delay. Mr. Maren's counsel had inaccurately represented to Judge Bryant that a certain outdated case held that an application for immunity under 18 U.S.C. 6002–6003 required notice and hearing,[1] and had furnished Judge Bryant a copy of the last page of the case. Judge Bryant took a short recess to read the entire case and returned to court to rebuke counsel, saying: "Now I know why you gave me just that one page instead of the whole case." Counsel, in apologizing, indicated he had exhausted his "bag of tricks." (See pp. 33–34, 37, of the memorandum accompanying Mr. Silbert's letter.) Notwithstanding, Judge Bryant eventually granted a delay out of an abundance of caution and solicitude for the interests of the witness [not, as represented by Messrs. Friedman and Hirschkop in their letter to me, because the Judge agreed with their legal position.]

As regards another of the incidents complained of, fully two months into the proceedings Mr. Maren's counsel asked for a continuance, assertedly to inquire into the scope of the use immunity statute and to determine whether there could be any defect in the impaneling of the grand jury. Judge Bryant properly refused to grant another continuance at this juncture (pp. 34–35 of Mr. Silbert's memorandum). By that time events had made plain, both to the court and to the government, that Mr. Maren's counsel were seeking, through dilatory tactics, to delay the grand jury proceedings for as long a period of time as the Judge would permit, when, in fact, despite former representations to the contrary, their witness had no intention of ever answering the grand jury's legitimate questions. Judge Bryant's comments in this regard—to the effect that the court did not want to be trifled with and that the grand jury had been interrupted "to the outer limits"—are set out at pages 42–43 of Mr. Silbert's memorandum.

Mr. Friedman and Mr. Hirschkop have also contended in their letter to me that a witness should be allowed to speak to the grand jury. The record on this score speaks for itself. Mr. Maren, in fact, was afforded three opportunities to address the grand jurors and did address them on one occasion.

Mr. Silbert's report also illustrates some important points in connection with your Subcommittee's consideration of H.R. 94.

You have expressed concern, as have we, about conflicts of interest in attorneys' representation of witnesses before grand juries. Note should be taken in this connection of the concern that Judge Bryant expressed about the conflict of interest on the part of counsel involved in Mr. Maren's case (pp. 29–30, 45, of the memorandum accompanying Mr. Silbert's letter).

Finally, it is appropriate to observe that Mr. Maren's case involved eight grand jury appearances, an equal number of district court hearings, and two appeals. Although his counsel have complained about a lack of due process, it is clear that Mr. Maren's rights were more than adequately safeguarded and that he had recourse to the judiciary throughout the proceedings. This underscores the point we have emphasized that the district courts exercise a very substantial measure of direction and control in regard to grand jury proceedings.

I hope that this letter will be helpful to you and will satisfy any concerns you may have had upon receipt of the copy of Mr. Friedman's and Mr. Hirschkop's letter to me.

Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN R. CIVILETTI,
Assistant Attorney General,
Criminal Division.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
Washington, D.C., November 10, 1977.

Mr. ROGER A. PAULEY,
Legislation and Special Projects Section, Criminal Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ROGER: As the attached memorandum reveals in detail, there is absolutely no basis in fact for the complaints of Mr. Philip Hirschkop and Mr. Leon Friedman concerning the treatment of their client, Arthur Maren, by Assistants of this office during Maren's eight grand jury appearances. From the time he was first subpoenaed to testify, Mr. Maren and his attorneys employed every dilatory tactic imaginable in their efforts to frustrate the grand jury proceeding. Despite this, each of Mr. Maren's requests and complaints was fully aired before the Court and eventually rejected. Mr. Maren is now incarcerated until such time as he is willing to provide the information sought, having been held in civil contempt for the second time, the only witness we know of to have been afforded two contempt hearings for failure to respond to the same questions.

A brief chronology of Mr. Maren's appearances before the grand jury reveals that prior to the grant of immunity on September 8, he had more than ample time to consult with his attorneys and to consider the consequences to himself of truthful testimony and that he had, in fact, done so.

On July 8, 1977, Mr. Maren was subpoenaed to appear before the Grand Jury on July 18, 1977. His appearance was continued until July 25 to give him additional time to consult with his attorney.

On July 25, Mr. Maren's attorney filed more than 100 pages of motions in an attempt to delay the grand jury appearances of Maren and other witnesses. Chief Judge William B. Bryant refused to grant the motions.

On July 26, Maren appeared before the grand jury twice and refused to answer any questions concerning specific criminal activities of members of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology. He asserted various novel "privileges" for his refusal to respond, but specifically declined to raise the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination as a basis for his refusal.

On July 29, Mr. Maren appeared before the grand jury two more times and again refused to respond to the same questions. A contempt hearing was held at which Maren raised as a defense only a so-called "First Amendment privilege," knowingly declining to raise his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and a previously mentioned claim that questions asked him in the grand jury were the product of an illegal wiretap. Maren was held in contempt and incarcerated until such time as he would provide the testimony sought. On August 4, he filed an appeal.

On September 2, the United States Court of Appeals affirmed the finding of contempt, rejecting the novel "privilege" claimed by Maren. Immediately thereafter, Acting Chief Judge John H. Pratt refused to release Maren from confinement pending a grand jury appearance scheduled for September 8, which Maren had requested in order to purge himself of contempt. Maren's appeal from this ruling was also rejected. In his September 2 pleadings filed both in the District Court and the Court of Appeals, Maren mentioned the possibility of a grant of immunity in the event he invoked the Fifth Amendment before the grand jury on September 8, indicating that he and his attorneys were already considering the consequences of such a grant.

On September 8 Maren appeared before the grand jury and invoked the Fifth Amendment, a privilege which the Court of Appeals had noted he had previously "disdained." Maren was immediately granted use immunity (pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 6001 et seq.) over the objections of his attorneys who erroneously stated that the law requires notice and hearing prior to a grant of immunity. Maren's requests for a postponement of his reappearance before the grand jury were rejected by the Assistant United States Attorney, the United States Attorney, the Chief Judge of the District Court and, eventually, by the grand jurors themselves. Maren then refused to answer the same questions in the grand jury, claiming that the questions were the product of illegal surveillance, a claim he had raised on July 25 and subsequently abandoned. Chief Judge Bryant, out of an abundance of caution, agreed to give Maren a second contempt hearing for failure to answer the questions. He gave Maren until September 14 to prepare yet another defense to the same civil contempt charge, and released him from confinement on the first contempt citation.

On September 12, Maren filed a second affidavit alleging illegal electronic surveillance. The Assistant United States Attorney filed an opposing affidavit, denying knowledge of any electronic surveillance and stating that in any event there was an independent source for all questions asked in the grand jury.

On September 14, Maren claimed that the Government denial of electronic surveillance was inadequate. Judge Bryant agreed with the Government that the source of the questions which had been asked was clearly not electronic surveillance but, exercising extraordinary caution, ordered the Government to initiate the regular seven agency check.

On September 20, in an obvious ploy to delay the second contempt hearing, Maren's attorneys filed a motion demanding that inquiries be made of no less than twenty Government agencies to see if Maren or his attorneys had ever been the subject of electronic surveillance.

On September 27, Maren and his attorneys predictably claimed that the second emphatic Government denial of electronic surveillance, consisting of four affidavits and letters from eight Government agencies, was inadequate. Judge Bryant disagreed and ordered Maren to appear before the grand jury and respond to the questions. Maren's attorneys then sought a stay of the ruling in order to appeal. When this failed, they announced that Maren would never answer the questions about the criminal activities of members of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology "based on his ethical scruples."

On September 28, having been released from confinement for twenty days, Maren appeared before the grand jury and refused to answer the questions, reasserting the so-called "First Amendment privilege" which had been rejected by the Court of Appeals and which, on September 9, he had promised never again to assert. The attempts of Maren's attorneys to obtain a delay of his incarceration were rejected and Maren was jailed for the second time until such time as he agrees to provide the information sought.

The above chronology belies the claims of Maren's attorneys that this United States Attorney's Office is endeavoring to use grants of immunity "to send a grand jury witness to jail with the minimum [sic] of due process and as quickly as possible." Rather, the sequence of events demonstrates a clear, calculated attempt on the part of Mr. Maren and his attorneys to subvert the legitimate purpose of the grand jury—obtaining truthful testimony about specified criminal activities. Instead of raising at one contempt proceeding all possible defenses of which he was aware, Maren deliberately asserted his defenses, "privileges," and excuses one at a time, demanding that they be aired one by one, thus needlessly delaying the grand jury investigation and wasting the time of the grand jury, the District Court, and the Court of Appeals, not to mention that of the Assistants in this office.

During each of his eight appearances before the grand jury, Maren insisted on writing down each question and consulting with his attorney, regardless of how many times the same question had previously been asked of him. These consultations lasted as long as forty minutes, at the end of which Maren would read to the grand jury a written response, apparently prepared by his attorney. This tedious process, requiring as much as four hours per appearance, produced a total of three substantive answers: Maren's name, address, and employment.

Despite his abusive treatment of the grand jury, Mr. Maren was never denied an opportunity to personally address the grand jurors. On two occasions he requested permission to address the grand jury at the conclusion of a grand jury appearance. Permission was granted each time. On the first occasion, however, Maren unexplicably withdrew the request. On the second of these occasions, he did address the grand jurors as requested. On a third occasion Maren requested permission to address the grand jury at the beginning of his appearance, instead of responding to a question that had been asked him. He was informed that the procedure adopted by the grand jurors was to permit speeches by a witness only after the witness had responded to the questions. At the conclusion of this appearance, Maren did not renew his request.

Having raised every conceivable issue, regardless of how frivolous, Maren's attorneys announced only at the conclusion of eight grand jury appearances, eight District Court hearings, and two appeals, that Maren had no intention whatsoever of answering the questions.

This office does indeed believe that "the United States wins when justice is done." It is Mr. Maren and his attorneys who have made a mockery of justice by frustrating, delaying, and disrupting a legitimate grand jury proceeding. It is Mr. Maren who flagrantly abused the process that was accorded him, process far in excess of that which was his due and required by law. It is Mr. Maren who has flaunted the long-standing principle that the public, to vindicate its criminal laws, has a right to every man's evidence absent some recognized privilege.

Indeed, one of the attorneys who represented Mr. Maren, Mr. Hirschkop, had been retained by the Church of Scientology to represent it. Yet, Maren was subpoenaed as a witness before the grand jury to testify about his knowledge of the involvement of the church and certain of its high officials in the crimes under investigation. It is clear beyond any doubt, therefore, that Mr. Hirschkop had an irreconcilable conflict of interest. Yet, by insisting on representing Maren despite the fact that the obvious conflict was repeatedly brought to his specific attention, the goal of Mr. Maren and his attorneys was clear—to obstruct the grand jury investigation.

A copy of the letter to Mr. Civiletti was sent to Congressman Eilberg who has conducted extensive hearings concerning the procedures and practices of federal grand juries. To avoid the Congress being misled by the inaccurate and distorted account by Messrs. Friedman and Hirschkop of the events described above, it is very important that Mr. Civiletti provide Congressman Eilberg with an accurate description of the events in question.

Sincerely,

EARL J. SILBERT,
U. S. Attorney.

MEMORANDUM

REGARDING ARTHUR MAREN AND THE GRAND JURY INVESTIGATION IN RE: POSSIBLE VIOLATIONS OF 18 U.S.C. §§ 371, 641, 1503

On July 8, 1977, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) executed search warrants at three offices of the Church of Scientology in Washington and Los Angeles. These search warrants were prepared under the guidance of two Assistant United States Attorneys, sworn to by an agent of the FBI, and reviewed by the United States Attorney prior to their submission to United States Magistrates here and in Los Angeles. The Washington, D.C. warrant was approved by Magistrate Henry H. Kennedy, Jr., and the two Los Angeles warrants were approved by Magistrate James Penne of the Central District of California. These excruciatingly detailed warrants were based upon statements given to this office by Michael Meisner—an official of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology—as substantially corroborated by the FBI. During execution of the search warrants, a number of subpoenas were served. Arthur Maren, Deputy Guardian for Public Relations for the Church of Scientology in the United States, was one of the individuals served in Los Angeles by an Assistant from this office who had been appointed Special Assistant to the United States Attorney for the Central District of California.

During the next three months, as this memorandum sets out in detail, Maren refused to answer any questions in the Grand Jury other than his name, address, and occupation, invoking seriatim numerous "privileges" and excuses for his refusal to testify When all his "privileges" and excuses were rejected both by the United States District Court and the United States Court of Appeals, Maren finally invoked the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, was granted use immunity, but still refused to testify, reasserting a "privilege" specifically rejected by the United States Court of Appeals Then, after a second contempt hearing, Maren was again cited for civil contempt for refusal to answer the same three questions and is now incarcerated until such time as he is willing to provide the relevant information he possesses, or for the duration of the Grand Jury, including any extensions, but in no event longer than eighteen months. He has, as yet, taken no appeal from that finding of contempt.

A. Background of the grand jury investigation

The Grand Jury before which Maren was summoned is investigating the crimes of burglary, theft of Government property, illegal electronic surveillance, obstruction of justice, subornation of perjury, and conspiracy to commit these crimes, all of which were committed by and on behalf of members of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology. The initial Grand Jury investigation focused on surreptitious entries of the United States Courthouse in the District of Columbia in May and June, 1976, when two individuals, on three occasions, entered the Courthouse using false Internal Revenue Service (IRS) credentials. On the second occasion, these two individuals were confronted after normal working hours while making surreptitious use of the United States Attorney's Office xerox machines, located in an area which is off-limits to the general public. On the third occasion, June 11, 1976, they were confronted by FBI Agents on the third floor of the Courthouse, which houses the United States Attorney's Office and the District of Columbia Bar Library. One of the two individuals identified himself as "Thomas Blake" and the other as "John Foster." Both had IRS identification cards. When "Foster" was asked about his current employment, however, he stated that he was no longer working for IRS. The FBI Agents who stopped the two allowed them to leave without arresting them at that time. Subsequent investigation revealed that the IRS credentials both men carried were fraudulent. The individual who had identified himself as "Thomas Blake" was, in fact, Gerald Bennett Wolfe, an IRS clerk-typist.

Wolfe was arrested on June 30, 1976. The individual claiming to be "John Foster," who accompanied Wolfe in each of the Courthouse entries, was subsequently identified as Michael James Meisner. A warrant for Meisner's arrest was issued by a United States Magistrate in the District of Columbia on August 5, 1976, but he remained a fugitive for almost a year. On May 13, 1977, Wolfe entered a plea of guilty to false use of a Government seal (18 U.S.C. § 1017) in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.[1] On June 10, 1977, Wolfe was sentenced and immediately thereafter was summoned to appear before the Grand Jury investigating the surreptitious entries of the Courthouse.

Ten days after Wolfe was sentenced, Michael Meisner, who was still a fugitive, telephoned the Assistant United States Attorney who was in charge of the Wolfe investigation and stated that he wished to return voluntarily to Washington and cooperate with the Government.[2] He arrived in the District of Columbia that same evening and, at his own request, was placed in protective custody by the United States Marshal's Service. During subsequent interviews, Meisner described the crimes of burglary, theft, illegal electronic surveillance, obstruction of justice, subornation of perjury, and conspiracy committed by himself and others on behalf of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology. Mr. Meisner stated that he had been an active member of the Church of Scientology since 1970, eventually rising to a high level of responsibility within the Guardian's Office. He explained that the "Guardian's Office—U.S.," located in Los Angeles, California, receives its orders from the "Guardian World-Wide," located in East Grinstead, Sussex, England. The Guardian's Office is divided into five bureaus: Information, Public Relations, Legal, Finance, and Social Coordination. The Bureau of Public Relations in the United States, he revealed, was headed by Arthur Maren, Deputy Guardian for Public Relations.

From January 1974 until June 1976, Meisner had been the Assistant Guardian for Information in the District of Columbia and from mid-June until the end of August 1976, the National Secretary for the United States with an office in Los Angeles. In both positions, Meisner reported to the Deputy Guardian for Information in California, who handles all intelligence matters, including covert operations to acquire Government documents critical of Scientology, covert operations to discredit and remove from positions of power all persons whom the Church of Scientology considers to be its enemies, and internal security within the Church itself. From March 1975 until June 1976, Meisner supervised all covert Scientology agents within both Government agencies and private organizations in the District of Columbia. Meisner detailed numerous burglaries and surreptitious entries of the offices of the Internal Revenue Service, the Tax Division of the Justice Department, and the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia which he supervised or took part in during this period. The purposes of these burglaries were (1) to steal and copy internal memoranda of the various Government agencies or private organizations for use in litigation with the agencies or organizations, (2) to obtain false credentials to aid in other surreptitious entries, and, (3) on one occasion, to plant a listening device in a conference room at the Internal Revenue Service which was about to be used for a high-level IRS meeting on the tax-exempt status of the Church of Scientology.

Meisner explained that some time in 1974, the highest officials of the Guardian's Office of the Church in the United States and England mounted an offensive against the IRS which called for, inter alia, the infiltration of that agency to obtain all documents it possessed regarding Scientology. In November 1974, a member of the Guardian's Office of the Church planted a listening device in a conference room and overheard an IRS meeting concerning the Church. Also in November, Wolfe infiltrated the IRS by obtaining a job as a clerk-typist. Soon thereafter, Meisner and another Church member entered the IRS building, took a file relating to Scientology out of a filing cabinet, smuggled it out of the building, copied it, and returned it the next day. Between March and June of 1975, Wolfe, sometimes accompanied by others, periodically entered the office of an attorney in the IRS Chief Counsel's Office and copied various records which he turned over to the Church of Scientology. He continued to "monitor" and

[1] The United States Attorney's Office offered Wolfe a plea to a misdemeanor with a maximum six-month sentence in return for his cooperation. Wolfe rejected the offer and chose to plead guilty to the false use of a Government seal (18 U.S.C. § 1017), a felony carrying a 5-year maximum sentence.

[2] Meisner was not offered immunity from prosecution and has, in fact, agreed to plead guilty to a 5-year felony.

copy this attorney's files until June 1976, Wolfe also began and continued through June 1976 to examine and copy files of at least seven different officials in the IRS Exempt Organizations Office. Also in June 1975, Wolfe, on approximately four occasions, entered offices of the Tax Division of the Department of Justice to copy documents. All these documents were turned over to Meisner who, in turn, filed one copy in the District of Columbia and sent three copies to Los Angeles for distribution to the Guardian's Office in Los Angeles, the Guardian's Office in England, and to Mary Sue Hubbard, the wife of L. Ron Hubbard, the founder of Scientology.

In December 1975, officials of the Guardian's Office "World-Wide" and "U.S." began a program to obtain copies of Interpol documents relating to Scientology. Meisner recruited a Church member by the name of Sharon Thomas. Ms. Thomas eventually obtained employment as a personal secretary in the Department of Justice who was representing the Government in a Freedom of Information Act suit by appellee against Interpol. She removed materials from the attorney's files and turned them over to Meisner who distributed them in the same manner as he had distributed the documents stolen by Wolfe. By February 1976, it became obvious that most of the Interpol documents wanted by the officials of the Guardian's Office were in the custody of Nathan Dodell, an Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, who was handling various Freedom of Information Act suits filed by the Scientologists.

In March 1976, Meisner and Wolfe entered the IRS building after hours, broke into a room in which the equipment used to make identification cards was located, and made false identification cards bearing false names for their future use. During the first week in May, Meisner and Wolfe entered the United States Courthouse in the District of Columbia at about 4:00 p.m. on a weekday so that they would not have to sign in. They went to the District of Columbia Bar Library on the third floor which was also the floor where most of the United States Attorney's Offices, including Dodell's office, were located. The two men waited until after working hours and then located Dodell's office. They attempted without success to open his locked door with a metal device which they had used on other doors in the past, and left empty-handed.

Two or three days later, during his lunch hour, Wolfe returned to Dodell's office to try to ascertain some way of gaining entry after working hours. When he entered the Dodell suite of offices, he found that both Dodell and his secretary had gone to lunch and that the secretary had left her keys on top of her desk. Wolfe stole the keys and contacted Meisner. They took the keys to a locksmith and duplicated all those which looked like they might open Dodell's door. Then Wolfe and Meisner returned the complete set to the Courthouse and dropped it in a corridor near Dodell's office so that it would appear they had accidentally fallen out of the secretary's purse.

On May 21, Wolfe and Meisner returned to the Courthouse after working hours. Wolfe signed in using his real IRS identification card and Meisner used his false one. They obtained permission to use the Bar Association Library and went to the third floor. After signing in at the library, they proceeded through a back door to the United States Attorney's Office area and Dodell's office, which they entered using the key they had duplicated. The two men went through Dodell's files, removing ten or twelve of them, which they took down the hall to the United States Attorney's Office xerox machine. For the next two hours they proceeded to copy a five-inch stack of documents. They then returned Dodell's files and left the Courthouse with the copies at about 11:00 p.m. Over the next several days, Meisner reviewed the documents, filed them in his District of Columbia office, and sent copies to officials in the Guardian's Office of the Church as he had done before.

On May 28, Wolfe and Meisner again returned to the Courthouse, once again after working hours, and signed in using false names and IRS credentials. They again entered Dodell's office, this time without initially signing in at the Bar Library. They again removed files from his office, put them in briefcases, and carried them down the hall to the same xerox machine where they copied them for an hour and a half. They then sought to return the documents to Dodell's office, but the night librarian stopped them because they had failed to sign in at the library. While the librarian left to look for a building guard, Wolfe and Meisner returned the documents to Dodell's office. As they left the building, a building guard confronted them, told them that they were not authorized to use the United States Attorney's Office xerox machine, and made them print their names on a piece of paper. The building guard later reported this incident to the United States Attorney's Office, which referred it to the FBI for investigation.

Meisner, after consultation with his superiors, determined that he and Wolfe would enter Dodell's office one more time. In addition to copying files similar to those they had previously copied, they were instructed by officials of the Guardian's Office of the Church to examine Dodell's personal files for information which the Guardian's Office might employ to remove Dodell from his position as an Assistant United States Attorney. Thus, on June 11, they returned to the Courthouse and signed in at the guard's desk using the false names on their false IRS credentials. When they displayed these fraudulent credentials, the building guard recognized them and called the FBI. Meanwhile, Wolfe and Meisner were compelled to wait some twenty minutes in the library while a cleaning lady completed her work in Dodell's office. In the meantime, two FBI Agents arrived and confronted Meisner and Wolfe. They seized Meisner's credentials because he stated that he was not employed at the IRS, but permitted Wolfe to keep his because, upon checking, the agents discovered the false name Wolfe had placed on the identification card to be the name of someone actually employed at the IRS. The agents then allowed both Wolfe and Meisner to leave the building.

Upon leaving the Courthouse, Wolfe and Meisner proceeded to a restaurant in Georgetown where Meisner telephoned Guardian's Office officials in Los Angeles to inform them of the situation. After several calls and personal consultation with Church officials in Washington and Los Angeles, Meisner was given some money, was told to check into a motel, and was instructed to fly to Los Angeles. He flew out of National Airport early on the next morning, June 12, using a fictitious name. In Los Angeles he went to Church offices where he discussed with Deputy Guardian—U.S.—Henning Heldt, Deputy Guardian for Information—Richard Weigand, and his deputy, Greg Willardson, three plans for dealing with the anticipated investigation into Meisner and Wolfe's entry into the courthouse. Each plan involved telling false stories to the authorities. The plan that was ultimately agreed upon by the Deputy Guardian for Information, with the explicit approval of the Deputy Guardian for the United States, was to fabricate a cover-up story for Meisner and Wolfe, to return Wolfe to Washington to face the authorities and, depending on the outcome of any investigation, to send Meisner back to the District of Columbia at an appropriate time. The cover-up story which was prepared involved a general denial by Meisner and Wolfe of any association with the Church as well as an assertion that they were in the Courthouse solely to use the D.C. Bar Library for personal research.

Wolfe was then summoned to Los Angeles to be prepared on the details of the cover-up story. Meisner, meanwhile, was aided in altering his appearance by shaving his moustache, cutting and dyeing his hair, and replacing his glasses with contact lenses. The cover-up story Meisner and Wolfe were given was as follows: Wolfe would claim that he had met Meisner in a bar and that he knew Meisner only under the false name of Foster which Meisner had placed on his IRS credentials. Wolfe would state that Meisner had promised to teach him legal research so that he could obtain a better job. They met on several occasions in bars, and one night, while drunk, had gone to the IRS building, found the credentials room unlocked, and as a lark, created false credentials for themselves. On later occasions they went to the D.C. Bar Library where Meisner taught Wolfe to do legal research. Meisner was to corroborate this story by appearing at a later date to tell a parallel story, claiming that he had never told Wolfe his true name, and that Wolfe was doing research with him on tax-exempt organizations.

After this story was devised, Wolfe was returned to Washington where Church officials obtained an attorney for him. Soon thereafter he was arrested. Wolfe subsequently followed the scenario and told the fabricated story in his June 10, 1977, grand jury testimony. Meisner remained in Los Angeles and was given the position of National Secretary for the United States within the Office of the Deputy Guardian for Information. He kept that position until Church officials heard that a warrant for his arrest had been issued in the District of Columbia. Even then he continued to function in the same capacity, albeit without an official title. In April 1977, however, Meisner became tired of remaining a fugitive and announced that he wished to return to Washington. To prevent him from doing this, officials of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology placed him under 24-hour guard, repeatedly "audited" or indoctrinated him, and removed him from residence to residence, on one occasion gagged and in handcuffs. He was still kept informed, however, of what was happening with the cover-up plan because Church officials still hoped to send him back to Washington at the propitious time. Finally on June 20, 1977, he escaped and contacted the United States Attorney's Office.

Thus, on July 4 and 7, 1977, on the basis of the above information provided by Meisner as well as corroborating information detailed in a lengthy 35-page affidavit, search warrants were issued by United States Magistrates in the District of Columbia and the Central District of California for the offices of the Information Bureau and the Deputy Guardian—U.S., Church of Scientology, located in those jurisdictions. These warrants were executed simultaneously on July 8, 1977.

The search warrant affidavit contained an organizational chart of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology which indicated that Arthur Maren was the Deputy Guardian for Public Relations for the United States—the head of a branch of co-equal importance to the Bureau of Information of which Meisner was a member and which was the target of the search warrants. The Assistant United States Attorney who served the subpoena on Mr. Maren was intimately familiar with the search warrant affidavit, as well as with the pending Grand Jury investigation. In view of the position Maren held, it was reasonable to conclude that he would be aware of the actions of the Information Bureau, a fact later conceded by Maren's attorney during oral argument before the United States Court of Appeals.

B. Maren's refusal to answer questions on first amendment and other grounds during his initial appearances before the grand jury

Mr. Maren's subpoena called for him to appear before the Grand Jury in the District of Columbia on July 18, 1977.[3] Anxious to give Mr. Maren sufficient time to consult with his attorneys, the Assistant agreed to continue his Grand Jury appearance to July 25, 1977.

On July 25, Mr. Maren failed to appear before the Grand Jury. Instead, counsel appearing on behalf of thirteen persons, including Mr. Maren, subpoenaed to appear before the Grand Jury investigating the burglaries and obstruction of justice, filed five motions comprising more than 100 pages, seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent questioning by the Grand Jury of the subpoenaed witnesses, removal of this United States Attorney's Office from the conduct of the investigation, appointment of "an outside independent legal advisor" to the Grand Jury, "instruction of this Grand Jury on its rights and duties," and ten protective orders concerning the outstanding Grand Jury subpoenas. Chief Judge William B. Bryant rejected these claims and refused to restrain or interfere with the Grand Jury investigation. Among the claims raised by counsel for Mr. Maren and the other witnesses was an allegation that the Grand Jury investigation was the result of evidence gleaned from an illegal wiretap. In support of this claim, Mr. Maren submitted an affidavit listing five telephone numbers and claiming that he had heard strange noises when using those telephones.

On July 26, an Assistant United States Attorney sought enforcement of the duly-served subpoenas and the witnesses were directed by Chief Judge Bryant to appear before the Grand Jury. Immediately thereafter, Mr. Maren appeared in front of the Grand Jury. Maren was fully informed of his rights to counsel and against self-incrimination, pursuant to Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966). In response to questions, Mr. Maren provided his name, home and employment addresses, and stated his present employment to be "Director of Public Affairs for the Churches of Scientology in the United States." Mr. Maren refused to answer any questions thereafter, asserting various reasons for his refusal. Each time he was asked a question in the Grand Jury, Maren wrote down the question verbatim and asked to consult with his attorney. Maren then left the Grand Jury room to consult with his attorney for periods at times in excess of forty minutes. When he returned, in each instance he read a prepared, written statement to the Grand Jury, asserting several different reasons for his refusal to answer the questions, but never asserted the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

[3] Initially, discussions were held with Los Angeles Church of Scientology attorneys, Allan Streller and Robert Talcott, regarding the use of a Central District of California Grand Jury. However, this office, sensitive to any potential claim of Grand Jury abuse, felt that it would be improper to use a Grand Jury in Los Angeles since it was anticipated that any indictments would be returned in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Maren refused to answer questions as to whether he was presently a member of the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology and whether he had a staff as Director of Public Affairs on the grounds that:

[t]here are motions presently pending before Judge Bryant which would give us a protective order prohibiting questions of this nature on the grounds of invasion of freedom of religion. And I've been instructed that until such time as the Judge has ruled on these actions [sic], I would decline to answer on those grounds.[4]

Maren was asked whether he had ever knowingly employed, in the course of personal or business affairs, documents or summaries of documents which were obtained from agencies of the United States Government by unlawful means. He again refused to answer, claiming that the question concerned documents seized pursuant to the execution of the search warrants on July 8, and he was authorized by Judge Bryant to refuse to answer any question about the documents. Mr. Maren was then asked a series of questions specifically relating to criminal activities.

Mr. Maren, were you, in any way, involved in discussions which led or which resulted in the burglary or in the burglaries of the office of any official of the Internal Revenue Service by Gerald Wolfe?

Do you know a person by the name of Gerald Wolfe?

Did you have any dealings with a person by the name of Gerald Wolfe?

Did you participate in any form in the preparation of Gerald Wolfe for his Grand Jury testimony?

Did you receive any report authored by Gerald Wolfe concerning his Grand Jury testimony?

Do you know where Michael Meisner . . . was from June 11, 1976 to June 20, 1977?

Were you at any time informed by Michael Meisner of the results of any burglary of any government offices in the District of Columbia?

Did you participate in any discussions about plans to burglarize the office of Assistant United States Attorney Nathan Dodell in this U.S. Courthouse?

After consultation with his attorney, Maren refused to answer each of these questions on the same grounds, articulated by him from written notes as:

[Y]ou, as U.S. Attorney are now attempting to extract information from me to build your executive department prosecution. There are motions presently in front of Judge Bryant requesting a protective order, authorizing me not to answer that question until Judge Bryant has ruled on that motion, which is in the material I had before, and pertains to the violation of separation of powers.

At no time on July 26 did Maren assert a Fifth Amendment privilege not to answer the questions put to him in the Grand Jury. Upon questioning, he specifically rejected the Fifth Amendment as the grounds for his refusal to testify, stating that he was relying upon the grounds asserted. He also rejected the First Amendment as grounds for his refusal to answer the series of questions specifically relating to Gerald Wolfe and his criminal activities.

With lengthy delays during which Maren wrote down each question verbatim and consulted with his attorney in order to draft a response to be read to the Grand Jury, the entire Grand Jury proceeding on July 26 lasted in excess of four hours. During this period, Maren provided only his name, address, and occupation, and refused to answer any of the eleven other questions asked of him.[5]

On July 29, 1977, Mr. Maren, his attorney, and an Assistant United States Attorney appeared before Chief Judge Bryant on the Government's motion to compel Mr. Maren to answer the questions put to him in the Grand Jury, no cognizable privilege having been asserted. Counsel for Maren raised the same objections to the questions that his client had raised in the Grand Jury. Judge Bryant stated that Maren had asserted no cognizable reason for refusing to answer the questions and directed Maren to answer the questions "unless it presents some other privilege that the Court is prepared to recognize."

At the conclusion of the proceeding before Judge Bryant, Maren was again summoned before the Grand Jury, advised of his rights, and asked the same questions he had been asked in the Grand Jury on July 26. Reading a lengthy written response, Maren refused to answer the questions as to whether he was a member of the staff of the Guardian Office of the United States Church of Scientology, asserting that the question inquired into the internal structure of the church and its religious tenets, and that the United States Attorney must make a showing of necessity and relevancy prior to requiring him to answer the question. With regard to all the other questions put to him in the Grand Jury inquiring into his knowledge of Gerald Wolfe, Michael Meisner, their burglaries of the IRS and the United States Courthouse, and the preparation of a cover-up story to be told to the Grand Jury, Maren, after consultation with his attorney, read a prepared statement asserting that the asking of the questions constituted an abuse of the Grand Jury and a violation of the separation of powers doctrine.

[4] Maren, on the advice of counsel, continued to take this position even though Judge Bryant, as noted above, had refused to issue any of the requested protective orders.

[5] The appearances of the remaining witnesses had to be continued since Mr. Maren took more than four hours to deal with approximately a dozen questions.

After this testimony before the Grand Jury, Maren and his attorney were again summoned before Chief Judge Bryant. The questions put and answers received in the Grand Jury were read to the Court. Chief Judge Bryant explicitly admonished Maren to respond to the questions, stating:

Sir, certain questions have been directed to you by the Assistant U.S. Attorney in the Grand Jury. You have refused to answer those questions on certain stated grounds. None of those grounds, I believe, is cognizable by the Court as a basis for not answering the questions.

So, very bluntly, I am ordering that you answer the questions, unless you have some basis for refusing to answer that is cognizable in the present state of the law. And, from a reading of the transcript, I have yet to hear any valid basis that the Courts have recognized up to this point as a valid one for refusing to answer.

Now, when you go back to the Grand Jury, if these questions are put to you and you still refuse to answer, as I say, except on some privilege that we have come to recognize, the Court has no alternative than to impose sanctions upon you.

After this proceeding, Maren again appeared before the Grand Jury and was asked two questions.

Do you know Gerald Wolfe?

Mr. Maren, between June of 1976 and June of 1977, did you at any time discuss with anyone plans for Gerald Wolfe to develop an untrue cover story with regard to his entry into the United States Courthouse on June 11th, 1976 for him to tell, under oath, before a Grand Jury of the United States District Court here in the District of Columbia?

After each of these questions, Maren consulted with his attorney and then read the same lengthy response to the Grand Jury, not claiming, as before, that the questions violated the separation of powers, but asserting, for the first time with respect to these questions, that they inquired into the internal structure of the Church and its religious tenets, in that they "would require that I discuss confidential matters relating to my performance of my duties as a minister and officer of the legally recognized Church of Scientology," and that the United States Attorney had not made a sufficient showing that the answers were required.

Finally, Maren was asked whether, prior to November, 1974, he had participated in discussion of plans to plant a listening device in a conference room at IRS for the purpose of monitoring conversations of IRS officials pertaining to applications of the Church of Scientology for status as a tax-exempt organization, and whether, subsequent to November 1, 1974, he had ever read or discussed a transcript of a discussion by IRS officials obtained through the bugging of the conference room. Maren refused to answer this question on the previously asserted ground that the asking of the question in the Grand Jury violated the separation of powers doctrine.

C. Maren's grounds for refusal to answer rejected: the first finding of civil contempt and affirmance on appeal

At this juncture, Maren was again brought before Judge Bryant for his refusal to answer the questions. Maren acknowledged that the representation made by the Assistant United States Attorney with regard to his refusal to answer the questions were true and asserted no defense other than the First Amendment, although he was clearly aware of the possibility of raising as defenses his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and his previously asserted claim that the Grand Jury investigation was the product of an illegal wiretap. His decision to rely solely on the First Amendment was an obvious tactical choice designed to secure an appellate decision on this claimed privilege, hopefully in his favor. He was then adjudged in civil contempt pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1826, and ordered to be incarcerated for a period not to exceed the term of the Grand Jury, and any extensions, but in no event longer than eighteen months. On August 4, 1977, Maren noted an appeal.

In his brief on appeal, Maren, represented by new counsel, Leon Friedman, claimed that there was no reason to believe that he possessed information relevant to the Grand Jury investigation. Maren further asserted that due to his status as a "minister" of the Church of Scientology, the First Amendment required that prior to asking any questions of him in the Grand Jury, the United States Attorney must make a showing that he possessed information relevant to the investigation, and that the information could not be obtained from any other source. At oral argument, Mr. Friedman retreated from that contention, admitting that because of his position as director of Public Relations, it was reasonable to assume that Maren possessed information relevant to the Grand Jury inquiry. Counsel also abandoned the previously asserted claim that the Grand Jury investigation constituted an abuse of the separation of powers doctrine. In its opinion of September 2, 1977, the United States Court of Appeals unanimously affirmed the finding of civil contempt, rejecting Maren's only remaining claim, that under the First Amendment his status as a "minister" of the Church of Scientology gave him an absolute privilege to refuse to respond to a Grand Jury subpoena, regardless of the nature of the investigation, until the United States Attorney established that the information could not be obtained from any other source. In its opinion, the Court of Appeals specifically noted: "At no time did [Maren] claim the privilege against self-incrimination; indeed, he disdains the privilege as a defense." In Re: Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. §§ 371, 641, 1503, D.C. Cir. No. 77-1704, slip op. at 3 (Sept. 2, 1977)

D. Maren's unsuccessful post-appeal attempt to secure release from confinement prior to purging himself of contempt

On September 2, 1977, the same day the finding of civil contempt was upheld by the Court of Appeals, and prior to the mandate having been received by the District Court, Maren demanded to be brought before the Grand Jury immediately in order that he might purge himself of the contempt. Upon being informed that the Grand Jury would not be in session until September 8, 1977, Maren requested a hearing before the Acting Chief Judge, John H. Pratt. At that hearing Maren sought immediate release from confinement, representing, through counsel, that he would purge himself of civil contempt when called before the Grand Jury on September 8 and that he would no longer rely upon the "First Amendment privilege" which both Chief Judge Bryant and the Court of Appeals had rejected. Maren would not state that he would purge himself by providing the testimony of information sought, as the contempt statute (28 U.S.C. § 1826(a)) requires, but rather stated that he might rely upon the Fifth Amendment, among other privileges, which he had specifically declined to raise at his first contempt hearing.[6] With this ambiguous response, Judge Pratt refused to release Maren from confinement prior to his anticipated September 8 appearance before the Grand Jury.

Maren's counsel immediately filed in the United States Court of Appeals an "Application for Bail Pending Appeal." In that pleading, he represented that Maren "has agreed to appear before the Grand Jury at the earliest possible time and has agreed that he will no longer rely on any ground rejected by this Court." Maren's counsel also indicated to the Court that he was fully aware that Maren might be offered use immunity if he invoked the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, but stated that it was premature for the Court to consider the effect of such a grant of immunity on Maren's contempt situation. On September 6, 1977, the Court of Appeals denied Maren's application for bail without even soliciting a response from the Government.

E. Maren's invocation of the fifth amendment and the grant of use immunity

On September 6, 1977, the United States Attorney's Office applied to the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice for authorization to seek a compulsion order pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 6001 et seq., in the event Mr. Maren invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination during this scheduled September 8 Grand Jury appearance. The authorization was granted by John C. Keeney, Acting Assistant Attorney General, on the morning of September 8, 1977.

[6] During the hearing, the possibility of Mr. Maren being granted use immunity in the event he invoked the Fifth Amendment was specifically mentioned both by the Court and by Mr. Maren's attorney.

On September 8, two months to the day since he was first served with the Grand Jury subpoena, Maren appeared before the Grand Jury for the fifth time. Mr. Maren was represented at this time by Mr. Friedman, the same attorney who represented him on appeal, as well as by a fourth attorney, Mr. Phillip Hirschkop, who also represented the Church of Scientology in the same investigation.[7] Prior to Maren entering the Grand Jury room, Mr. Hirschkop inquired whether the United States Attorney's Office had secured approval from the Department of Justice to grant Maren use immunity in the event he invoked the Fifth Amendment. Mr. Hirschkop was informed that the United States Attorney's Office was prepared for any eventuality.

Mr. Maren then appeared before the Grand Jury and was asked the same three questions he had been asked during his previous Grand Jury appearances and concerning which the Court of Appeals had ruled he possessed no First Amendment privilege. As to these questions, he now invoked his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, which he had previously refused to raise and which the Court of Appeals had noted he "disdained." Maren then sought permission to address the Grand Jury for two minutes. The Grand Jurors agreed to give Mr. Maren two minutes to address them. Mr. Maren, however, changed his mind and withdrew his request to address the Grand Jury.

The Assistant United States Attorney conducting the Grand Jury proceeding then sought an immediate hearing before the Chief Judge in order to secure judicial authorization for the compulsion order pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 6001, et. seq. That hearing, held in the chambers of Chief Judge Bryant, commenced at approximately 11:30 a.m. Initially, Judge Bryant ruled that by invoking the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, Mr. Maren had purged himself of the previous finding of civil contempt, and would be released from custody pending any further appearance before the Grand Jury. The Assistant United States Attorney then presented the Chief Judge and counsel for Mr. Maren with copies of the authorization to seek a compulsion order and requested Judge Bryant to issue such an order.

Mr. Maren's attorneys immediately protested the grant of use immunity, claiming, despite repeated references on September 2 to the possible grant of immunity to Maren (see note 6, supra), that the application came as a total surprise to them. They also claimed that there were various grounds on which Mr. Maren could oppose the grant of immunity, and that they needed additional time to explore these grounds. The Assistant United States Attorney pointed out that the signing of the compulsion order was essentially a ministerial act,[8] that the papers were in order, and that there was no ground on which Mr. Maren could oppose the grant of immunity. Judge Bryant expressed considerable incredulity that Mr. Maren and his attorneys had not considered the possibility and consequences of a grant of immunity, given the six weeks since his initial appearance before the Grand Jury and given Mr. Friedman's statement that he had discussed Mr. Maren's Grand Jury appearance with him the night before until midnight. At 12:45 p.m., Judge Bryant recessed the proceeding until 2:00 p.m., at which time he indicated he would sign the compulsion order in open court, there being no basis for Maren to oppose the grant of immunity, and thus no necessity for a hearing. Mr. Maren, he stated, would be able to consult with his lawyers from 12:45 until 3:30 p.m., at which time he was to appear before the Grand Jury. The Assistant United States Attorney indicated that initially Maren would be asked only the same questions which had already been asked him in the Grand Jury during his prior appearances.

[7] By representing in the same investigation both Maren and the Church of Scientology, Mr. Hirschkop placed himself in a position involving a serious potential conflict of interest. See In Re: Investigation Before the April 1975 Grand Jury (Sol Rosen), 174 U.S. App. D.C. 268, 271 n. 4, 531 F.2d 600, 603 n. 4 (1976). Maren was being asked to give testimony against various high officials in the Church of Scientology. As noted below, this very day Mr. Hirschkop first appeared to represent Maren, Maren was given use immunity in order to testify against these officials. In fact, after holding Maren in contempt for the second time for his refusal to testify, Chief Judge Bryant insisted that Mr. Friedman file a praecipe formally entering his appearance on Maren's behalf because, "[l]urking throughout this litigation is an indication that Mr. Hirschkop's primary interest is the church and not Mr. Maren." See page 45, infra.

[8] E.g., United States v. Leyva, 513 F.2d 774, 776 (5th Cir. 1975).

Instead of consulting with their client during the recess, Mr. Maren's attorneys sought and received a meeting with the United States Attorney. At this meeting, they attempted to convince the United States Attorney to postpone for five days Mr. Maren's 3:30 p.m. appearance. They assured the United States Attorney that Mr. Maren would undoubtedly provide responsive, truthful answers during his next Grand Jury appearance, but that he just needed additional time to think about the consequences of truthful testimony, the six weeks he spent in jail apparently not having been sufficient. The United States Attorney denied the request, expressing his feeling that Mr. Maren and his attorneys were only attempting to frustrate and delay the Grand Jury proceeding, which had been trying to secure Mr. Maren's testimony for two months.

At 2:00 p.m. on September 8 the proceedings before Judge Bryant reconvened in open court for the purpose of the official signing of the compulsion order. Mr. Maren's attorneys immediately began to quarrel with Judge Bryant's ruling that there was no basis for their opposition to the signing of the order and thus no need for a continuance. In support of his request for a delay, Mr. Friedman proffered to the Court a xerox copy of the last page of a case, In re: Bart, 304 F.2d 631, 637 (D.C. Cir. 1962), which, he maintained, stood for the proposition that an application for immunity must be served in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, requiring five days notice and a hearing. Somewhat uneasy at having only the final page of the case despite Mr. Friedman's assurances that "that's the only relevant one," Judge Bryant took a short recess in order to read the entire case.

Upon his return to court, Judge Bryan rebuked Mr. Friedman, saying, "Now I know you gave me just that one page instead of the whole case." By reading the entire case, Judge Bryant had discovered that, as Mr. Friedman well knew, the case had been decided under an old statute which had since been repealed, the new statute no longer envisioning notice and hearing upon a grant of use immunity.[9] Apologizing for his actions which had almost misled the Court, Mr. Friedman, in an extremely revealing comment, stated that the one page was "all I had in my bag of tricks here. . . ." At that point, Mr. Hirschkop, again referring to the old immunity statute no longer applicable, sought additional time to ascertain whether use immunity could be granted for the particular crimes being investigated by the Grand Jury,[10] to find out if the Grand Jury was properly impanelled, or to find some other way to prevent the calling before the Grand Jury of Mr. Maren, who was now no longer in custody. Recognizing that there was no legal basis for Maren and his attorneys to attack the grant of use immunity, that sound "policy considerations" demanded "interrupting grand jury proceedings as little as you can, consistent with the administration of justice," and considering "the time context of this case . . . and the development of the case to this point," two months having elapsed since service of the subpoena, Judge Bryant refused to grant Maren another continuance. He ordered Maren to appear before the Grand Jury at 3:30 p.m.

F. Maren's refusal to testify despite grant of use immunity

At 3:30 p.m. on September 8, Mr. Maren again appeared before the Grand Jury. He was read the order which Judge Bryant had signed, compelling Maren to give testimony. Mr. Maren was then asked the first of the three questions he had been asked during his numerous prior appearances before the Grand Jury. Instead of responding to the question, Maren renewed his request to address the Grand Jury, a request which had been granted earlier in the day but was subsequently withdrawn by Maren. The Foreperson stated that she would again take up with the Grand Jury his request. Mr. Maren, however, immediately launched into a speech, seeking a postponement of his appearance from the Grand Jurors themselves. Maren was then excused from the Grand Jury room as the Grand Jurors considered his requests. After their secret deliberations, the Grand Jurors, speaking through the foreperson, told Mr. Maren that they wanted to hear his answers to the questions before allowing him additional time to address them. The same three questions were again put to Mr. Maren and he again refused to answer them, this time claiming, among other things, that the questions were the product of illegal electronic surveillance, that he had not had enough time to consult with his attorneys, and that his appearance before the Grand Jury was the result of an illegally served subpoena.[11]

Mr. Maren, accompanied by his attorneys, was again brought before the Chief Judge for his refusal to answer questions in the Grand Jury despite the grant of use immunity. The Assistant United States Attorney asked the Chief Judge to hold Maren in civil contempt, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1826. Maren, no longer in custody, sought yet another contempt hearing for refusal to answer the same questions, and additional time to prepare a new defense to civil contempt.

The Assistant United States Attorney opposed the request for a postponement as a disingenuous effort to delay the proceedings of the Grand Jury and subvert the Grand Jury's process. He pointed out that at the time of his first contempt hearing, Maren was well aware of the alleged grounds he now proposed to raise as a defense to contempt, but that he had specifically elected not to raise them. He also noted that Mr. Maren's own pleadings of September 2 indicated that he had been considering the consequences of a grant of immunity for at least a week. Nonetheless, Judge Bryant, out of an abundance of caution, granted Maren a second contempt hearing and six days—until September 14—to prepare the defenses he had declined to raise at the first hearing.

G. Maren's spurious claim of illegal electronic surveillance and the second contempt hearing

Four days later, on September 12, Maren filed a second affidavit alleging that the questions being asked him in the Grand Jury were the product of illegal electronic surveillance.[12] In addition to the five telephone numbers listed in his first affidavit, the new affidavit listed three additional Church of Scientology telephone numbers, eleven telex numbers, and the names and telephone numbers of his three attorneys. The affidavit did not allege that any of the phones or telex machines listed had ever been used by Maren to transmit conversations or other matters relating to the subject of the Grand Jury inquiries, it did not allege the dates during which the named attorneys had represented Maren, and it did not allege that Maren had even discussed the case with his attorneys over any telephone. Furthermore, it was obvious from the very face of the affidavit that the questions put to Maren in the Grand Jury could not possibly have been the result of surveillance of any phone conversations he might have had with two of the three attorneys—Mr. Hirschkop and Mr. Friedman, since the questions had been asked of him before he had ever sought their services, when he was represented only by the third attorney.[13]

Having been given one day to respond to the witness' extremely general allegations, the Government submitted the affidavit of an Assistant United States Attorney involved in the Grand Jury investigation stating that he had no knowledge of any electronic surveillance of the witness and that the source of all the questions to be asked the witness was Michael Meisner, not electronic surveillance. At the September 14 hearing, Judge Bryant agreed that as to the three questions which had been asked Maren, it was clear that the source was conversations with Meisner. Judge Bryant, however, felt that it would be better to initiate the regular agency check for electric surveillance, lest additional questions, not originating from conversations with Meisner, might be asked of Maren in a subsequent Grand Jury appearance. The Court set an additional hearing in the matter for September 23, 1977, and directed the Government to initiate the regular agency check.

On September 14, the same day as the Court's ruling, the Government caused the Department of Justice to initiate the standard check of the seven agencies that had been authorized to conduct electronic surveillance pursuant to Title III of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510 et seq. See, e.g., In re: Harris, 383 F. Supp. 1036 (N.D. Cal. 1974). A check for electronic surveillance of Maren and his attorneys by the National Security Agency was also initiated, even though Maren's claim that his telex machine might be tapped by that agency was general and highly conjectural.

[11] At the conclusion of his responses, Mr. Maren did not seek to address the Grand Jurors.

[12] As noted at page 18 supra, the first such affidavit was filed on July 25, 1977, prior to Maren's first appearance. Thereafter, Maren abandoned his claim until all other avenues of avoiding questioning before the Grand Jury had failed.

[13] That attorney, Daniel P. Sheehan, represented Mr. Maren through July 29, 1977, and the first contempt citation.

On September 20, eight days after the submission of his second claim of electronic surveillance, two months after his first claim of such surveillance, and just three days prior to the next scheduled court appearance, Maren, through his attorney, filed a so-called "Request for Complete Wiretap Search." In that document, Maren claimed that nothing less than a twenty agency check would suffice to answer his claim that the questions to be asked him in the Grand Jury were the product of electronic surveillance. Also on September 20, Maren moved for a continuance of the September 23 court appearance on the ground that Mr. Hirschkop could not appear on that date, despite Mr. Hirschkop's previous statement that Mr. Friedman alone would represent Mr. Maren at the hearing.

In response to Maren's untimely, generalized, highly speculative claim of electronic surveillance, the Government submitted an extremely detailed response, including four affidavits and letters from eight Government agencies, which revealed that Mr. Maren himself, and any conversations he might have had with his attorneys, had not been the subject of any electronic surveillance by the Government, legal or illegal. Anticipating that Maren would attack the sufficiency of the response, the Government filed with the affidavits and letters denying surveillance an exhaustive twelve-page memorandum of law which demonstrated that no court of law had ever required a more complete denial of a witness' claim of illegal electronic surveillance.

The hearing on Maren's wiretap claim was held on September 27, having been postponed from September 23 at Mr. Hirschkop's request. This was the seventh time the parties had appeared before the Chief Judge on the Government's motion to compel answers to the questions. As expected, Maren's attorneys claimed that despite the lack of substance to Maren's claims of electronic surveillance, the Government denial was inadequate, and that a hearing at which they could cross-examine the affiants was necessary. Judge Bryant rejected their contentions and held that the Government response was indeed an adequate denial of electronic surveillance, and that no bona fide reason for controverting it had been offered. He directed Mr. Maren to appear before the Grand Jury at 10:00 a.m. the following morning and to respond to the questions asked him.

Mr. Hirschkop, again seeking a delay, asked the Court to stay the ruling so that Maren might take an expedited appeal. Judge Bryant emphatically denied the request. Then, without any hesitation, Mr. Hirschkop announced to the Court that Mr. Maren had no intention whatsoever of answering the questions put to him in the Grand Jury, "based on his ethical scruples and beliefs and legal advice, but even just on his personal, ethical scruples and beliefs and his conscience." Therefore, he asserted, there would need to be another hearing after Mr. Maren's next appearance before the Grand Jury. He sought to postpone Mr. Maren's Grand Jury appearance until the afternoon of the following day on the grounds that Mr. Friedman had a class to teach in the morning. Disturbed by Mr. Hirschkop's representations, and apparently realizing that all the objections Maren had raised to his Grand Jury appearance were simply dilatory tactics and not genuine, Judge Bryant immediately called Mr. Hirschkop to the bench and informed him that there would be no more hearings and no more delays:

> Let's get one thing straight. You have run the gauntlet completely. . . . I don't want him trifling with me. If he isn't going to answer the questions on account of some reasons, he can say, "I am not going to answer the questions, I don't care what you do," and have it over with. But you raise these issues, and I ventilate them. You tell me now that he is coming back tomorrow and not going to answer the questions. Then you want another hearing, and you want it sometime in the future. . . . I have accommodated you . . . but it seems to me I have interrupted the Grand Jury business to the outer limits in this case.

At this point, the Assistant United States Attorney pointed out that the Grand Jury was presently in session and that Mr. Maren could appear before the Grand Jury at once, thus avoiding the necessity of returning the next day. Hearing this, Mr. Friedman immediately announced that he would cancel his class and appear with Mr. Maren the following day. Judge Bryant then directed Maren to appear before the Grand Jury the next morning and answer the questions, specifically advising him that he had thus far asserted no privilege that would insulate him from a finding of contempt.

On September 28, Maren reappeared before the Grand Jury and again refused to answer any questions, reasserting the so-called "First Amendment privilege." This was the same "privilege" which was unanimously rejected by the United States Court of Appeals on September 2, and on which, that same day, Maren and his attorney, in an attempt to secure his immediate release from confinement, had assured both the District Court and the Court of Appeals he would never again rely as an excuse for failing to respond to questions in the Grand Jury.[14]

Shortly after this, his eighth refusal to respond to questions concerning particular criminal acts put to him in the Grand Jury, Maren and his attorneys again appeared before the Chief Judge. Maren's attorneys immediately filed with the Court a motion requesting five days to prepare for what they called "sentencing" on Maren's civil contempt. They maintained that they wanted an opportunity to show that Maren was not the type of person who would change his mind and testify on account of incarceration. Therefore, they reasoned, there was no point in incarcerating Maren at all—under no circumstances would he ever answer the questions about criminal activities of himself or his associates in the Guardian's Office of the Church of Scientology. When the request for a five day delay was denied, Maren's attorney sought a stay pending appeal of the contempt finding. This too was denied, as was a subsequent request for bail pending appeal. Judge Bryant then ordered Maren incarcerated for the length of the Grand Jury or any extensions thereof, but in no event longer than eighteen months, or until such time as he agrees to provide the information or testimony sought by the Grand Jury.

Then, sua sponte, Judge Bryant directed Mr. Friedman to submit a praecipe formally entering his appearance on behalf of Maren, noting that:

Lurking throughout this litigation is an indication that Mr. Hirschkop's primary interest is the church and not Mr. Maren.... [E]ven in the Court of Appeals he filed a brief amicus curiae for the church. And I think that the record ought to be clear that somebody represents just Mr. Maren, and that is you [Mr. Friedman].

As of November 3, Maren has taken no appeal from his second citation for civil contempt.

REFORMING RESURGENT GRAND JURIES

(By Peter C. Stuart, Staff correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor)

WASHINGTON.—In courthouses across the country, groups of 23 citizens are sending Americans to trial on federal felony charges made in secret sessions, unimpeded by normal Bill of Rights protections—and sometimes witnesses are jailed for not cooperating.

Enshrined in the American Bill of Rights since 1971, grand juries—once in danger of becoming a legal relic—have in recent years undergone a renaissance in power and popularity which has propelled them into growing controversy.

Is the institution "a valuable tool in combatting crime" or "a dangerous modern form of secret Star Chamber inquisition?"

Congress, which in 185 years had never before held hearings on grand juries, began late last week examining possible reforms.

REFORMS PREDICTED

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D) of New Jersey predicts the House of Representatives will enact reform legislation this year.

At the opening hearing, however, Attorney General Edward H. Levi argued that most proposed reforms raise the threat of "increasing the potential for time-consuming litigation and delay . . . and decreasing the necessary flexibility of the grand jury's investigative authority."

Subcommittee Chairman Joshua Eilberg (D) of Pennsylvania charged that "the historic function of the grand jury has been perverted" by converting it into "an instrument of oppression to harass and intimidate . . . a convenient tool for surveillance, intelligence-gathering, and pre-trial discovery of evidence . . . a rubber-stamp for decisions by the prosecutor."

TWENTY-THREE CITIZENS

Grand juries—created as an independent body of citizens to shield accused persons from overzealous or misguided prosecutors—consist of 23 men and women chosen at random from voter registration lists. They decide if a prosecutor's evidence is sufficient to bring a person to trial, and they conduct their own investigations of wrong-doing by public officials.

Every serious federal prosecution begins with a grand jury indictment, and at least one such jury is always active in every busy federal court district.

Until recently, however, the grand jury was fading into disuse. More than one-half of the states have abandoned grand-jury indictments for initiating criminal charges. A presidential commission in 1933 went so far as to recommend its abolition—as already has happened in its country of origin, Britain.

The institution was revised by a law—passed in the heat of the law-and-order election campaign of 1970—which empowered the Justice Department to convene special grand juries virtually at will; provided limited immunity to force witnesses to testify; narrowed judicial scrutiny of prosecutors' conduct.

DOMINATION CHARGED

The results: increased use of grand juries and, critics claim, increased domination of them by prosecutors.

"Any experienced prosecutor," says Chicago federal Judge William Campbell, "will admit that he can indict anybody at any time for almost anything before any grand jury."

CHANGES SOUGHT

A series of congressional bills seek to restore the independence of grand juries and bolster the rights of witnesses through four basic "reforms":

Replace limited ("use") immunity—under which witnesses can be compelled to testify, but still be prosecuted—with immunity requiring consent from witness, prosecutor, and judge.

Shorten confinement of witnesses for contempt—under which dozens of witnesses have been jailed summarily for refusing to testify—from a maximum of 18 months to six months.

Guarantee witnesses the right, now denied, to have a lawyer at their side.

Require that witnesses (as well as grand jurors) be informed of their legal rights.

[From the Denver Post, June 23, 1976]

GRAND JURY REFORM MERITS PUBLIC SUPPORT

The decision by Congress to move ahead during the current legislative session on reform of the grand jury system is both hopeful and significant.

It is hopeful in that House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter Rodino Jr., D-N.J., senses a mood in Congress favorable to reform.

It is significant in that the move comes at a time when Congress is concerned about ending the abuses of the Watergate era—a period when the grand jury was widely misused at the federal level.

A series of legislative proposals has been drawn up aimed at four basic areas of grand jury reform. The proposals would—

Require that witnesses, as well as jurors, be told of their legal rights.

Give a witness the right, now denied, of having a lawyer with him during grand jury proceedings.

Replace "use" immunity—under which a witness can be required to testify, yet still be prosecuted—with immunity requiring consent from the witness, prosecutor and judge.

Shorten the maximum length of time a witness can be jailed under a contempt of court citation—for refusing to testify—from a maximum of 18 months to six months.

As this newspaper pointed out in a series of editorials on the grand jury system, the main thrust of reform of the system must be to bring it into greater harmony with the Bill of Rights, which spells out the use of the grand jury in the Fifth Amendment.

In that regard, we would also like to see Congress reduce the grand jury's dependence on secrecy—a dependence which is at variance with justice goals in an open, democratic society.

The public's right to know under the First Amendment can be furthered by a congressional stipulation that in certain cases of wide public concern transcripts of completed grand jury proceedings can be made available by the courts for public release.

The courts, of course, must be fully mindful of the rights of defendants and witnesses, but that option should be available for careful use in the public interest.

The fact that such transcripts might be available for release might also serve as a deterrent to intimidation of witnesses in grand jury proceedings.

Overall, we believe that Congress is on the right track in its current efforts to "democratize" the grand jury system.

The House Judiciary Committee merits—and should get—full public support for its reform labors.

CONGRESS CAN CHECK GRAND-JURY ABUSES

When Jill Raymond was released after 14 months in the Madison County, Ky., jail, she said she hoped her experience would call attention to the misuse of federal grand juries.

Her case, and the cases of about 50 other persons who have been jailed for refusing to answer grand jury questions, have had just that result. Congress will be considering reforms in the grand jury system during its next session.

Ms. Raymond was locked up without a trial and without benefit of procedural safeguards that protect citizens from the abuse of state power.

What she wouldn't do was give the jury whatever information she may have had about two fugitives sought by the FBI. The penalty was a contempt citation and a jail term that lasted as long as the jury was in session.

More recently, four Fresno, Calif., newsmen went to jail for refusing to reveal the source of secret grand jury testimony that had been published in their newspaper. Again they were neither charged with nor convicted of a crime. A county rather than a federal grand jury was involved, but the principle is the same.

It is legitimate to argue that there must be some punishment for persons who won't cooperate in a grand jury investigation of a crime. What is abhorrent in a democratic society is that a judge can order recalcitrant witnesses imprisoned without due processes and with no real time limit on their loss of freedom.

So if Congress is serious about reform, it will start off by requiring a procedure for determining the guilt or innocence of persons accused of contempt and set minimum and maximum penalties.

Critics charge, with justification, that federal grand jury powers have been isused in other ways, especially during the turbulent Vietnam-Watergate era.

There is considerable evidence that grand juries have been used to harass persons who could not be convicted in regular court proceedings, to gather information about dissident political groups, and to serve as an investigatory arm of the FBI.

The immunity laws, which have been responsible for a number of witnesses being jailed for contempt, are a particularly potent weapon in the hands of overzealous prosecutors.

Many of these practices have distorted the original purpose of the grand jury, which was to shield citizens from state power. Although they once had considerable independence and could steer investigations in whatever direction they wanted, grand juries now tend to be rubber stamps for prosecutors.

Some of the reformers want grand juries to return to what Rep. Joshua Eilberg of Pennsylvania calls their "historic purpose as a protector of innocent people . . ."

Not surprisingly, the Justice Department has a different viewpoint, and its concept of the present system as an invaluable tool in solving crimes must be considered as well.

Congress, however, must act to check those abuses that have occurred or that may occur in the name of justice.

GRAND JURY REFORM

The grand jury system, a basic component of the American legal system established by the U.S. Constitution, is due for a rough going-over by the new Congress early next year.

In recent times, many judges and lawyers have cast increasingly jaundiced eyes on the functioning of grand juries—especially federal grand juries.

A provision of the Bill of Rights states that no person can be brought to trial on a felony charge unless a grand jury first determines there is sufficient evidence to suspect a crime has been committed. The aim was to protect citizens against harassment and persecution by the state.

However, as many see it, it hasn't worked out that way. Instead, too often, they think, the grand jury has become the tool of overly ardent prosecutors, permitting them to obtain evidence by highly questionable and harassing means.

The harshest criticism of federal grand juries has centered on the new "use-immunity" doctrine established by law in 1970. It permits prosecutors to grant immunity from prosecution to an unco-operative witness in return for a promise not to use the specifically immunized evidence against him later.

The 1970 law threw out the traditional "transactional" immunity which protected a witness from any prosecution except for perjury. It also took away from the courts the right to approve immunity agreements. The result has been that a federal prosecutor can now force a witness to testify against himself or others under threat of spending up to 18 months in jail.

The bill before Congress would prohibit involuntary immunity and would permit the granting of immunity only if a majority of the grand jury and judge approve. It would eliminate "use immunity" altogether.

And it would require that transcripts of grand jury proceedings be kept and made available to witnesses' attorneys on request. There is no requirement to keep such transcripts under present law.

Certainly, the grand jury system is due for reform.

The Ford administration has opposed any change in the grand jury system. If President-elect Jimmy Carter were to take the opposite view, long-needed changes designed to fulfill the original aim of the Founding Fathers may indeed come to pass.

GRAND-JURY REFORM—ALTERNATIVE TO SHIELD LAWS

[By Sam Pizzigati[1]]

The fifteen days the Fresno Bee Four spent behind bars in September for refusing to reveal their source for a Bee exposé were, on one level, a courageous example of journalistic integrity. But on another equally valid and far more depressing level, their incarceration was no inspiration. It was a sorry reminder of how far the drive for an effective press shield hasn't come. Nearly fifty years after the push for press shield laws began, journalists can still be jailed for engaging in their profession.

The sacrifice of the Bee Four is not likely to change things. It will not, for instance, spark the enactment of a new California press shield law. When the four Fresno reporters and editors were initially subpoenaed, California already had a solid shield statute, but it didn't do the Bee Four much good. The judge in the case simply shrugged the state press shield off as unconstitutional. Nor will the Fresno horror prod Congress into action. The pending federal press shield bills are bogged down in legitimate problems with definitions: what is a "journalist" anyway?

All this leaves reporters where they have always been: at the mercy of criminal-justice officials. If a prosecutor or judge wants the name of a reporter's source badly enough, the journalist is in for a draining ordeal. Simply put, the drive to protect journalistic confidentiality has stalled. Perhaps it is time, then, to step back and rethink the press shield law movement's single-minded concern for who is being subpoenaed and start asking questions about who is doing the subpoenaing—and in most of the controversial press subpoena cases that means the grand jury.

By and large, journalists have not asked these questions yet. They have accepted the standard law-enforcement contention that grand juries are bulwarks against crime entitled "to every man's evidence" while trying to argue, without much success, that the importance of an unfettered press makes the journalist an exception to the grand jury obligations of ordinary citizens.

Others, however, have challenged the government's conception of the grand-jury process. Lawyers subpoenaed before grand juries to testify about their clients, political activists grilled about their politics, and strikers questioned about their unions have pointed out that the grand jury was incorporated into the Bill of Rights in 1791 to check, not facilitate, prosecutorial power. They have shown that the grand jury has become exempt from due process and will do anything a prosecutor wants, and they have taken the case for fundamental grand-jury reform before Congress—and found a favorable reception. More than thirty representatives and senators have sponsored reform bills and, while none of these bills specifically mentions "journalists," all would profoundly affect the ability of journalists to protect the confidentiality of their sources. They offer, in effect, an alternative to what may be a dead end.

An example. Each major reform bill now before Congress would entitle every grand-jury witness to a copy of his or her testimony. Under current federal rules, this grand-jury transcript need not even be kept, let alone be accessible to witnesses. Without a transcript of their testimony, there is no way subpoenaed journalists can prove they have not violated a source's confidence short of total silence inside the grand-jury chamber. With a transcript guaranteed, journalists could conceivably testify before a grand jury and maintain credibility with their sources at the same time.

The omnibus grand-jury reform bills introduced by Representative Joshua Eilberg, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, and John Conyers, Jr., a Democrat from Michigan, among others, include dozens of such procedural changes that should make prosecutors think twice before embarking on headline-hunting expeditions or mad scrambles to fill the holes in hastily drawn indictments.

Conyers's H.R. 11660, for instance, spells out a legal foundation for subpoena challenges. The bill authorizes the bench to quash a subpoena whenever the subpoenaed journalist (the bills, remember, cover all witnesses) can show that the subpoena would impose an unreasonable burden, that the purpose of the subpoena is punitive, or that the subpoena represents an attempt to build the case against someone who has already been indicted.

[1] Sam Pizzigati is co-director of the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, in Washington.

Should none of these categories be found appropriate by the court, confinement would still not be automatic for journalists who refused to betray their sources. Eilberg's H.R. 1277 says that no witness can be found in contempt if the questions he or she refuses to answer are based on a violation of the federal wiretap statute. Under Conyers's bill, no witness could be confined for refusing to answer questions based on any violation of the witness's constitutional or statutory rights—which means that the First Amendment would become a defense at a contempt hearing.

Should a judge refuse to recognize these contempt caveats, no journalist, in any case, could be confined for more than six months, according to the reform bills. Reducing the current threat of indefinite contempt confinement to six months should bolster the resolve of journalists to resist subpoena pressure, and prosecutors, faced with journalists willing and able to hold out for six months, might not choose to bother with them in the first place.

In most cases, moreover, an additional key provision in Conyers's reform package would do away with the threat of even this six-month incarceration. Conyers proposes the abolition of "forced" immunity, the government's ability to overcome witnesses' Fifth Amendment objections to questions by immunizing them against their will. Under the Conyers bill, witnesses would have to consent before a grant of immunity could be ordered. Subpoenaed journalists, then, could invoke the Fifth Amendment.

But is a journalist justified in taking the Fifth Amendment? Certainly the usual newspaper shorthand for the Fifth "the privilege against self-incrimination," ignores the long philosophical tradition which holds, as Justice William Douglas said two decades ago, that the right not to bear witness against oneself is "a right to silence."

"Reporters," explains Representative Conyers, "should not be placed in a position where they must either go to jail for contempt or 'incriminate' themselves in the eyes of their sources and colleagues."

The Justice Department, predictably, opposes any tinkering with the grand-jury system. Testifying before Representative Eilberg's House Judiciary Subcommittee last June, Attorney General Levi said reformers should trust the government to police its own grand-jury conduct, and, ironically, cited his department's internal guidelines on press subpoenas as an example of effective self-policing.

Levi's remarks should have been ripped apart by the press, but they weren't. With a few exceptions, the media have been indifferent to the grand-jury issue, slow to grasp the shield potential of grand-jury reform, and that is unfortunate. At a time of widespread distrust of the media, the drive to protect the confidentiality of the news-gathering process could profit by emphasizing the rights journalists share with their fellow citizens, not the privileges that set them apart.

How Well Do Grand Juries Work?

(By Dena Kleiman)

On any weekday in New York City, as many as two dozen grand juries meet with prosecutors in secret to consider whether suspected criminals should be indicted and brought to trial.

In recent months, procedures used by prosecutors in questioning witnesses, presenting evidence and drawing indictments have been criticized as a number of indictments by Maurice H. Nadjari, the former Special State Prosecutor, and others have been dismissed because of prosecutorial misconduct.

These dismissals underscore what an increasing number of legislators, lawyers and judges believe is a need to revise the grand jury system and institute new safeguards to curb prosecutorial abuse.

In the last month, indictments brought by Mr. Nadjari against Justice Joseph A. Brust, Carmine De Sapio and Patrick J. Cunningham have been dismissed. In addition, a State Supreme Court Justice has indicated he would dismiss a perjury and bribery indictment against Justice Irving H. Saypol and the Appellate Division has upheld the dismissal of an indictment brought by Charles J. Hynes, now the Special Prosecutor, against Albert H. Blumenthal, the outgoing State Assembly Majority Leader.

In each case, judges said that prosecutors relied on insufficient evidence or that they misled witnesses into perjury charges when nothing more substantive could be established.

What is there about a grand jury proceeding that lends itself to prosecutorial abuse? How have critics said the system should be changed?

The grand jury, composed of 23 persons, is said to date from 1161 in England, the time of King Henry II, when it was formed to protect the power of the monarch. Over the years its purpose evolved into a safeguard against arbitrary prosecution. England abandoned the system in 1933 as outmoded and too costly. Charges now are made by prosecutors.

In the United States, the grand jury has come to serve two functions. One type of grand jury hears evidence after an arrest. The grand jurors must decide, by a vote of at least 12, if there is sufficient cause for an indictment. If the suspect is indicted, he faces trial.

A second type of grand jury investigates criminal wrongdoing and accordingly is vested with great power. It can subpoena and question anyone who may help its inquiry. Those who refuse to testify can be held in contempt and sent to jail.

In both, the prosecutor stands before the grand jurors as legal adviser. Theoretically, he may not attempt to influence them. But in practice, there is often little doubt how a prosecutor feels about a case, and because grand jurors often look to prosecutors for guidance, much as petit jurors look to a judge during a trial, prosecutors can influence the outcome of an inquiry.

Critics contend that investigatory grand juries invite prosecutorial abuse—which can result in phony perjury indictments based on misleading questions—and that safeguards are needed to insure the system's integrity. They say that indicting grand juries have become archaic, mere rubber stamps for a prosecutor, and should be abolished.

"Prosecutorial abuse is real," said Assemblyman Stanley Fink, Democrat of Brooklyn, Chairman of the State Assembly's Codes Committee, which issued a report on such abuse last May and plans hearings this session on revising the investigatory grand jury. "Our feeling is that the grand jury was originally designed to serve as a buffer between the government and the people. It no longer does."

Mr. Fink's committee and one in Washington, a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee chaired by Joshua Eilberg, Democrat of Pennsylvania, are considering these proposals:

Permitting witnesses to have a lawyer inside the grand jury room. In 41 states, including New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, a lawyer must remain outside the room, so there is no one present to object to a misleading question. In 1974, the New York Legislature passed a bill providing for counsel inside the room, but it was vetoed by Governor Carey who said there was insufficient evidence that such a charge was needed.

Informing witnesses of the line of inquiry before they appear so that they are better prepared.

Informing a witness of his rights, including the right to counsel and the right to remain silent if an answer would tend to incriminate him, before he is called inside the grand jury room.

Restricting rules of evidence and procedure to those that apply during a trial. A prosecutor is under less restrictions during a grand jury proceeding than he is at trial.

Those opposed to changing the investigatory grand jury system argue that it is not designed to be an adversary proceeding but rather a search for the truth. They say that the presence of a witness' lawyer might make for objections that could bog down the proceeding, and that a grand jury should operate with vast latitude and not be inhibited by the same restrictions imposed at criminal trials.

Critics of change also argue that historically the grand jury has worked well, that it is one of the rare institutions that provide for community participation in the administration of justice and that most prosecutors are responsible lawyers who conduct the proceedings accordingly.

With respect to the indicting grand jury, long considered a rubber stamp, twenty-nine states have allowed the prosecutor to bypass this panel and file charges in open court. In these states, including Connecticut, after a suspect has been arrested and probable cause has been established by the police, a prosecutor may file the charges by means of an "information." These states have retained the investigatory grand jury.

PUEBLO BAR ENDORSES GRAND JURY REFORM BILL

(By Margie Wood)

Two local attorneys who helped draft a "grand jury reform" bill now before the Legislature say the proposal is an answer to complaints heard not only in Pueblo or Colorado but nationwide.

The bill was endorsed Tuesday by the Pueblo County Bar Association on a 30-10 vote. One of the prime sponsors of the bill is Sen. Ray Kogovsek, who is employed by a local law firm.

Key provisions of the proposed legislation, according to Randall Jorgensen and Kirk Brown, are protection of witnesses and allowing witnesses to have their attorneys present during questioning by the grand jury.

A witness would receive at least seven days' notice of a subpoena, and would have extended opportunities to challenge a subpoena under the bill. Dist. Atty. Joseph Losavio says this provision could delay a grand jury investigation to the extent of destroying its effectiveness.

"If it's operated as it should be, the prosecutor shouldn't have that problem," Brown said. "In fact, if both sides know a little bit about what's going on, it should reduce some of the time. And if a specious motion (to quash subpoenas) is filed, it can be dealt with fairly quickly by a judge."

"One of the problems has been that a witness gets a subpoena and he doesn't know what for or whether he's a suspect. Then he may be confronted with a document that's three years old, and he looks like he's trying to hide something if he can't remember it."

He added that the bill would not limit a legitimate inquiry by the grand jury, but would restrict harassment of witnesses.

"If someone is truly a witness and not a suspect he's not going to have the incentive to hire a lawyer and have motions to quash the subpoena," Brown said.

Another provision of the bill would prevent the district attorney from forcing a witness to claim the Fifth Amendment before the grand jury if the prosecutor knows in advance of the witness' intention. This has been the practice of some prosecutors already, the attorneys said.

Preliminary hearings on grand jury indictments should be allowed because "DAs have a tendency to take a case to the grand jury if they think it wouldn't get past a judge in a preliminary hearing," Jorgensen charged.

Because courts have held that an indictment cannot be dismissed because of evidentiary matters during the grand jury process, weak cases frequently must go to trial stage before they can be dismissed by the judge. Assuming the evidence is not sufficient to go to a trial jury, dismissal at a preliminary hearing would relieve a defendant of considerable expense.

"The state constitution gives the Legislature the authority to create, restrict or abolish the grand jury system," Brown said.

"The Legislature has created the grand jury procedure; it should regulate grand juries. There is very little statutory authority for grand jury procedures, so juries have been regulated primarily by Supreme Court rules.

Should the grand jury system be abolished? Is the reform legislation, as Losavio charged, really an attempt to destroy grand juries' investigative power?

"I'm a liberal who thinks police and prosecutors should be kept on very short leash," Jorgensen said.

"There is a question whether we need a grand jury in an open society. But in certain areas, the grand jury does serve a legitimate purpose—that's the point of (this) reform legislation, rather than trying to abolish it."

"What happens is that the grand jury can become the pawn of the prosecution" rather than a buffer between the individual and the state, Brown said.

"I think laymen have a part in judicial proceedings but, in a unilateral setting such as the grand jury, I don't think they have the legal background to maintain objectivity from the district attorney's point of view."

A Proposal for Grand Jury Reform

(By Joshua Eilberg*)

I would like to thank Martin H. Belsky Counsel to the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the Judiciary Committee, for his assistance on this article.

The grand jury was created to be a "bulwark against oppression"—standing between the government and the citizen as a protection against unfounded charges and unwarranted prosecutions. It was intended to be an "arm of the court," acting under the close supervision of the judge, to assure that offenses would be investigated without bias and accusations would be screened to determine their validity.

Recently, however, critics have charged that the grand jury has been misused to serve partisan political ends, to harass philosophic enemies, and to punish distasteful but noncriminal activities.[1] The common complaint is that the prosecutor uses grand jurors and grand juries to do his own bidding with little or no interference or control by the court and with few guidelines from Congress. Critics cite the cases of Patty Hearst, Daniel Ellsberg, the Harrisburg Eight, the Gainesville Seven and the Camden Twenty-eight.[2]

For the first time since the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1789, Congress has undertaken a comprehensive review of the federal grand jury system—its history, operations. problems and reform. During the 94th Congress, the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law heard complaints and suggestions about the present federal grand jury system from judges, prosecutors, defense counsel, citizens and reform groups. It reviewed H.R. 1277, the proposed Grand Jury Reform Act which I introduced, and other grand jury reform proposals.

Because of the demands of other legislative business, the Subcommittee did not report out such legislation last year. Hearings will be resumed this session on a new grand jury bill, H.R. 94, which I introduced on January 4, 1977.[3] I believe that the new Congress will adopt comprehensive grand jury legislation. H.R. 94 provides a useful framework for review of grand jury issues and possible reforms.

INDEPENDENT JURIES

If grand jurors are to make rational and independent decisions, they must be fully informed of their duties and rights. All too often, the prosecutor undertakes an investigation without advising or even consulting the jurors.

H.R. 94 requires the court to give "adequate and reasonable notice" to the grand jurors of their duty to inquire into offenses fully and fairly and to indict offenders. The jurors must also be clearly informed of their right to call and interrogate witnesses and not merely rely on the prosecutor, and of their right to secure documents and other evidence and not merely depend on the selections of the prosecutor. To guarantee such independence, the bill would also authorize a grand jury to conduct an independent inquiry into any federal offense, with a special attorney independent of the Department of Justice if necessary.

H.R. 94 gives any individual the right to make a written request to the attorney for the government to appear before the grand jury to testify or present documents. The grand jury does not have to hear a witness, but the attorney for the government must forward the request, with a possible recommendation, to the jury.

Unless special circumstances are shown, the attorney for the government must notify a potential defendant of the likelihood of indictment and tell him of his right to make a request to the jury to testify. Any person requesting permission to testify would have to waive immunity, testify only on relevant and competent matters, and be subject to cross examination by the attorney for the government.

The attorney for the government must advise the grand jury of the existence of exculpatory evidence for any potential defendant. He may not bring before the grand jury any witness who has given written notice in advance of his intention to invoke the Fifth Amendment, unless that person has been granted immunity.

IMMUNITY

One common complaint of abuse concerns the prosecutor's ability to immunize any witness without any judicial review and the limited protections to a witness granted such immunity.[4] Under present federal law, the witness is entitled only to "use and derivative use immunity" and not transactional immunity.[5] This means that evidence supplied directly or indirectly by a witness in his grand jury testimony may not be used against him. Any subsequent prosecution must be based on "independent evidence."

Many have questioned whether use immunity provides the proper balance between the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the need of the government for testimony. It is extremely difficult for a witness to overcome or challenge a statement by the government attorney that a prosecution is untainted by the witness' testimony, especially since the witness has no access to the government file. Moreover, even assuming the good faith of the prosecutor, he may derive leads from such testimony without realizing it.

Only by assuring that no prosecution can occur once immunity is granted will the individual feel adequately protected. In fact, in light of all the court challenges to immunity grants, a return to transactional immunity may lead to more confidence by immunized witnesses, and thus fewer challenges to the grant of immunity and fewer refusals to testify.

Juries are supposed to operate under the supervision of the court, but the calling and immunizing of witnesses now receives automatic court approval and it is excluded from court review. Moreover, courts are not required to review the question of whether a witness will testify even if he receives immunity or whether the grant is really only an attempt to punish him.

H.R. 94 would ensure that the courts review immunity grants and make such grants only when it has decided that the benefit to law enforcement and the likelihood of securing testimony outweigh the witness's loss of his right to refuse to testify. In addition, H.R. 94 would return immunity to "transactional immunity," protecting a witness from prosecution for any transaction he mentions when he testifies pursuant to a grant of immunity.

[5] Organized Crime Control Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 6001–02; Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972).

The court must also make certain findings in regard to a request for immunity before the request can be granted. The court must find that the grand jury investigation is authorized by law and that the application is in accordance with Justice Department procedures; that the testimony and information sought is within the scope of the investigation and is relevant; and that a summary of the evidence relating to the witness and relating to the need for immunity has been submitted to the court.

The court can consider as a possible defense to an immunity request, or a prosecution for contempt, a real threat of foreign prosecution if the witness testified. If the U.S. attorney or the attorney for the government can demonstrate that adequate safeguards are made to minimize danger of foreign prosecution, immunity can nevertheless be ordered.

In order to protect the witness and ensure transactional immunity, H.R. 94 would not allow the grand jury which considers the immunized witness' testimony to indict him under any circumstances.

THE CONTEMPT POWER

Grand juries possess contempt power so they can obtain compulsory testimony from witnesses in a criminal investigation. Critics contend, however, that some prosecutors call political dissidents to find out information unrelated to criminal activity and to punish such individuals without any proof of criminal activities. Knowing they will refuse to testify and so may be jailed for contempt, the prosecutor has, in effect, misused the contempt power to punish them, rather than to secure evidence of crimes.

Under present law, a witness who refuses to testify can be confined for indefinite periods without the right to jury trial and without any of the other due process requirements of specificity and particularity attached to prosecution and punishment for defined offenses.[6] Confinement for civil contempt is intended to be "coercive"—to secure testimony or documents—and not punitive—to deter others or punish for an offense. Often, however, the effect is punitive when the witness has clearly indicated that he or she will never be compelled to testify by confinement. A prosecutor can select individuals for punishment, then subpoena, immunize, and imprison them, when no offense has been proven.

To limit this potential abuse, H.R. 94 would set the maximum term of confinement for recalcitrance at six months and would prohibit repeated confinements for refusal to testify about the same transaction or event.

SECRECY

Another continuing complaint about grand juries is the possibility of "trial by newspaper." Pretrial publicity could affect a potential defendant's ability to obtain an unbiased jury and a fair trial and could allow individuals to be convicted of a crime in the public's mind because of grand jury leaks, without ever coming to trial. The inherent power of the court to punish violations of contempt is insufficient. H.R. 94 would revitalize the protective function of grand jury secrecy by making a leak a criminal offense.

For knowing disclosure of evidence or a statement made in the jury room, there is a fine of $500 or six months in jail. The crime is not applicable to a disclosure by the attorney for the government in performance of his duties, disclosure directed and permitted by the court, disclosure by a witness or his counsel, or disclosure by a third party not present at the grand jury proceeding.

Knowing disclosure of grand jury activities in order to obtain money, to affect the actions or decisions of the jury, or to affect further legal proceedings is made a more serious offense punishable by a $20,000 fine or imprisonment up to five years. Again, this section does not apply to disclosures by the attorney for the government in performance of his duties, disclosure directed and permitted by the court, or disclosure by a witness or his counsel.

But because this kind of disclosure represents a more serious offense, this section does apply to third parties if the government can demonstrate that their disclosure directly affected the legal machinery. The section specifies, however, that this more serious felony of obtaining or providing grand jury information for the payment or compensation does not apply to a newspaper or television representative acting in his professional capacity.

PROCEDURAL RIGHTS

Unlike almost every other stage of the criminal process, a witness or a potential defendant brought before the grand jury has almost no procedural safeguards. He has not absolute right to notice,[7] no right to counsel,[8] and very little right to challenge even a tenuous venue.[9]

Notice: H.R. 94 would provide that a witness receive at least a week's notice that he must appear before a grand jury, unless the court allows a shorter period; that a witness be given "adequate and reasonable" notice of his rights; that he be told the subject matter of his investigation and be informed if he is a potential defendant.

Counsel: Most federal districts today allow a witness to leave the grand jury room to consult his attorney, who can wait outside the room. They are not required, however, to allow him to leave or to provide counsel if he is indigent. No district allows a witness to have his counsel with him in the grand jury room, and the recent Supreme Court opinion in U.S. v. Mandujano indicated that four justices do not believe there is a constitutional right to counsel in the grand jury room.[10]

Fundamental fairness and due process strongly suggest that we ought to guarantee that right by statute. H.R. 94 contains that guarantee. To avoid obstruction or dilatory tactics, counsel would not be able to ask questions or challenge evidence. He would be present, as in a congressional hearing or lineup only to observe and advise.

Nine states presently allow attorneys for a witness to be present while a witness is testifying. None of them have reported any serious problems.[11]

Venue: In March 1973, the subcommittee convened hearings regarding the so-called "Fort Worth Five" controversy in which which five Irish-Americans were subpoenaed by a grand jury in Fort Worth, Texas, for crimes allegedly committed in New York City. When they refused to testify, they were granted immunity without their consent, then held in contempt and imprisoned.

That case showed the potential abuses that can occur when the federal prosecutor is given the discretion, on the slimmest claims of nexus, to convene a grand jury investigation anywhere in the United States, and when witnesses can challenge the subpoena only in the district where it was issued.

H.R. 94 would allow challenges to a subpoena either where it was issued or served or where the witness resides. The subpoena could be quashed if the witness shows it would cause a substantial and unnecessary hardship. Courts, not prosecutors, would decide the propriety of venue.

CONCLUSION

More and more states are providing by statutes and court rules many of these rights, privileges and protections as part of their grand jury system. Nothing indicates that they interfere with the proper investigatory role of the grand jury. And there is a national precedent. The inquiry by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives into the possible impeachment of President Nixon proved that rights can be granted in the grand jury without interfering with its processes.

Acting as the investigative tribunal of the nation, analogous to a grand jury, the Judiciary Committee required all proceedings to be transcribed; allowed counsel to be present with the witness while he testified; allowed witnesses to review their statements; required decisions to be made by the Committee, rather than the counsel; and established detailed guidelines before the inquiry began. Secrecy was maintained; rights were respected; and the inquiry was completed without delay.

The need for grand jury reform is apparent. Many groups, including the American Bar Association, have indicated that certain fundamental rights and protections should be incorporated into grand jury procedure in order to return the grand jury to its role as a "shield against oppression."

Establishing and maintaining a fair grand jury system cannot depend on Congress alone, however. Congress can reform laws to provide for equitable procedures, but such reforms will not be effective unless people make them work. Competent, ethical and aggressive attorneys for both prosecution and defense must ensure that information is obtained and rights are preserved, and cautious and diligent judges, exercising thoughtful supervision over the grand jury, must ensure that our laws are enforced, that attorneys for both sides do not overstep their bounds, and that witnesses, potential defendants, and the public are protected.

Woman Surrenders To Federal Officers In Terrorism Case

(By Mary Breasted)

With one last smile to a friend, Raisa Nemikin, a 27-year-old secretary who works for the Episcopal Church, walked toward the glass doors of the Metropolitan Correctional Center here yesterday afternoon and surrendered herself to Federal marshals.

It was the beginning of what may be a 14-month period of incarceration for her refusal to testify before a grand jury that is investigating terrorist bombings.

Yesterday the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided not to allow Miss Nemikin to remain at liberty as the panel considers the merits of her appeal of the contempt ruling, which was ordered on Saturday by Judge Marvin Frankel of Federal District Court.

If she loses the appeal and remains firm in her stand, she will have to stay in jail for the term of the grand jury that wants to question her, or until May 1978.

Miss Nemikin, who is not the only reluctant witness to have been called before the grand jury that is investigating the self-styled F.A.L.N. terrorist group, attracted much public attention because she is an employee of the Episcopal Church and because she had argued that the grand jury's attempts to question her were invasions of her constitutional right to religious freedom.

Her former superior at the church, Maria Cueto, has also been subpoenaed by the grand jury and also said she will resist on the same grounds.

ANOTHER WOMAN HELD AND RELEASED

Last June, another young woman, Lureida Torres, a member of the Puerto Rican Socialist Party and an employee of the newspaper Claidad, was incarcerated on a contempt-of-court order for her refusal to testify in connection with the same case. Miss Torres was released in October, when the term of the grand jury then sitting ran out. The current grand jury was empaneled in November.

In addition, there are government petitions to have two other grand-jury witnesses held in contempt of court in Chicago for their refusal to supply fingerprints, palmprints and photographs of themselves to the Chicago grand jury that is also investigating the F.A.L.N. terrorist group.

CHICAGOAN, 24, IS SOUGHT

The two grand juries are investigating the bombings for which the terrorist group, Fuerzas Armadas Liberation Nacional (Armed forces of National Liberation), has asserted responsibility. The New York grand jury is especially interested in the bombing of the Fraunces Tavern, which took place Jan. 24, 1975, and killed four people and injured 55 others.

Federal prosecutors in both cities are trying to locate the only publicly identified member of the F.A.L.N., Carlos Albert Torres, a 24-year-old Chicagoan who disappeared last fall around the time that Chicago police say they discovered a large amount of dynamite in his apartment there.

Mr. Torres was, at the time of his disappearance, a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs, a group that tried to help the church grants to community programs it deemed worthy in Hispanic communities.

From 1973 through 1975, the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs gave a total of $58,688 to a Chicago private school founded by Mr. Torre's father, the Rev. Jose Torres.

The school, called La Escuela Superior Puertorriquena Rafael Cancel Miranda, was described in its financing proposal to the church's Hispanic commission as an "alternative" to the "public and private systems of education whose role is to perpetuate the status quo and represent the ruling classes." The curriculum was aimed, the proposal said, at Puerto Rican students who were to receive instruction from 22 volunteer teachers.

Mr. Torres, who is now wanted on a Federal fugitive warrant, taught at the school as did his friend, Oscar Lopez-Rivera, age 32, who was a member of the church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs from 1972 to 1975. Mr. Torres became a member of that commission in 1976.

WITNESS ON F.A.L.N. RULED IN CONTEMPT

WOMAN WHO REFUSED TO TESTIFY BEFORE FEDERAL GRAND JURY DUE IN JAIL TOMORROW

(By Mary Breasted)

Maria T. Cueto, the former director of the Protestant Episcopal Church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs, was ruled in contempt of court yesterday for her refusal to testify before a Federal grand jury that is looking into terrorist bombings claimed by the F.A.L.N.

Judge Marvin Frankel of Federal District Court in Manhattan, who last week held another church employee in contempt of court on similar grounds, declared Miss Cueto in contempt yesterday morning but delayed the deadline for her jailing until 2 P.M. tomorrow to give her lawyers a chance to seek a stay in the Court of Appeals.

Raisa Nemikin, the 27-year-old secretary who worked for Miss Cueto and the church's Hispanic commission, went to jail last Tuesday after the Court of Appeals decided not to let her remain free as they considered her appeal of Judge Frankel's contempt ruling.

The same lawyers, Elizabeth Fink, Margaret L. Ratner and Daniel L. Meyers, represent both witnesses, and the lawyers have used the same arguments in both cases, contending that Miss Nemikin and Miss Cueto are "lay ministers" who have the privilege to refuse to answer the grand jury's questions under the First Amendment right of religious freedom.

But Judge Frankel has held, in both cases, that religious freedom is not being violated by the grand jury. He said the situation was analogous to the case of a murder in a cathedral, after which, he maintained, it would be quite proper and no violation of the Constitution for law enforcement officials to ask the priest what he had seen.

Young attorneys have frequently joined the spectators during the hearings to listen to Judge Frankel, who is considered one of the most authoritative jurists in the Southern District. The judge has often used a professional manner in speaking to defense lawyers, not merely ruling on arguments, but also trying to instruct them in law.

Yesterday, at one point, Judge Frankel said to the defense lawyers, "You can disagree about what the law ought to be, but not about what the law is."

Some of Judge Frankel's admonishments to the defense attorneys have been more barbed. A reference to himself last week as "an elderly judge" was especially appreciated by the young lawyers, who regularly sit in on his sessions.

He was talking to the Federal prosecutor, Thomas E. Engel, who had been arguing that after two hearings, a contempt ruling and a warning from the judge that she would probably be sent to jail, Miss Nemikin should be imprisoned immediately on Feb. 26, a Saturday.

But Judge Frankel decided to wait until Monday when she would be able to approach the Court of Appeals. He put it thusly: "An elderly judge is entitled to give two warnings."

During the arguments yesterday, it was disclosed that one piece of evidence that led the Government to want to question Miss Cueto was a letter addressed to her found in the Chicago apartment of a young man who is now being sought by Federal authorities and is a suspected member of the F.A.L.N.

The suspect, Carlos Alberto Torres, has not been seen by the authorities since early last November when the Chicago police searched his apartment and reported the discovery of a large amount of dynamite and other incendiary materials there.

The Chicago police said they also found in Mr. Torres's apartment literature with the letterhead of the F.A.L.N. (Fuerzas Armadas Liberacion Nacional, or National Forces of Armed Liberation), the group that has claimed responsibility for 43 bombings over the last three years in Chicago, Newark, Washington and New York. The most serious bombing was the Fraunces Tavern explosion on Jan. 24, 1975, which killed four persons and injured 55.

Mr. Torres, who is 24, was a member of the church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs last year, and in that capacity, voted on the awarding of church grants to community groups. The letter addressed to Miss Cueto that was found in his apartment was a request for church funds sent by a priest at the Santa Fe Episcopal Church in San Antonio, Tex., according to the Chicago police, who said the request was for money for The Committee for Mexican-American Action.

A Chicago private school founded by Mr. Torres's father received over $53,000 from the church commission between 1973 and 1976, and other groups at the same address received additional money from the commission.

Miss Cueto, who was born in 1943 in Phoenix, Arizona, of Mexican-American parents, has worked for 11 years in anti-poverty programs sponsored by the Episcopal church in Arizona, Los Angeles and New York. She came to work for the National Commission on Hispanic Affairs in August 1972. Last Feb. 1, she was promoted to the position of assistant to the executive officer of the church's Coalition for Human Needs, the office that now handles all the grant money for the various ethnic commissions working with the church.

Miss Cueto's attorneys have repeatedly said she knows nothing about the F.A.L.N. and that she has told the Federal Bureau of Investigation that she knows nothing about the group. She will not submit to press interviews. The questions she has refused to answer before the grand jury are: When was your last contact with Carlos Alberto Torres? Can you identify any commission monies that might have gone to the F.A.L.N.? Can you identify anyone who has taken credit for the Fraunces Tavern bombing?

THE 'EILBERG BILL'—GRAND JURY REFORM

(By Joshua Eilberg[1])

The grand jury system has long been considered an integral part of our judicial heritage. Based on experiences with the British monarchy, our Founding Fathers considered grand juries such an important protection for the individual against possible Government persecution that they incorporated them into the Bill of Rights.

Unfortunately, the grand jury system has recently become the focus of controversy and misunderstanding. Defenders of grand juries view them as an essential prosecutorial tool and as a buffer between the state and the citizen. Critics fear them as uncontrolled "star chambers" and as "rubber stamps" for prosecutors.

Recent history has demonstrated that grand juries are valuable tools to ferret out official corruption. But the historic function of grand juries is also being perverted to serve partisan political ends. Their historic purpose as a "legal shield" is being disregarded by prosecutors who totally dominate the proceedings.

[1] Representative Joshua Eilberg represents Philadelphia's 4th Congressional District.

As a result of these developments, for the first time since the adoption of the Bill of Rights in 1789, Congress is conducting a comprehensive examination of the federal grand jury system—its operations, its problems, its abuses, and its reform.

In March 1973, as chairman of the subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee, I convened hearings regarding the so-called "Fort Worth Five" controversy in which five Irish-Americans were subpoenaed by a grand jury in Fort Worth, Texas, for crimes allegedly committed in New York City. When they refused to testify, they were granted immunity without their consent, then held in contempt and imprisoned.

During the hearings, witnesses described the use of the grand jury to investigate "political crimes" and the ability of the prosecutor to open inquiries, often for political purposes, far from the site of an alleged offense. The witnesses also explained how the grand jury system is used to obtain information that is often unrelated to criminal activity.

Following this hearing, both in the 93d and 94th Congress, I introduced comprehensive bills to reform the federal grand jury system and held hearings on them.

Unfortunately, while almost all the witnesses supported some form of legislative change to grand jury procedures, the then attorney general and the Ford Administration totally opposed any reform. The new attorney general has publicly and privately stated his concern about prior abuses and about maintaining the independence of the grand jury. He has agreed to cooperate with my subcommittee in developing appropriate reforms. Hearings will be resumed this session on a new grand jury bill, H.R. 94, which I introduced on January 4, and I expect comprehensive legislation to be adopted by the 95th Congress.

H.R. 94 would insure independent and informed federal grand juries. Jurors, not the prosecutor, would determine and review all the evidence.

To insure secrecy, and avoid trial by newspaper, grand jury leaks would be made a crime, with the punishment depending on the purpose of the leak.

To provide a proper balance between the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the right to obtain evidence, under H.R. 94 a witness could be immunized from prosecution, but only with strict judicial safeguards.

To establish a proper balance between the rights of a witness and the need for thorough investigations, H.R. 94 mandates new procedures. Witnesses would receive one week's notice, unless the government can justify a shorter period.

Witnesses could have counsel with them in the grand jury room—not to ask questions or challenge evidence but only to advise their clients and counsel could be removed for improprieties.

The need for grand jury reform is real. More and more states are providing increased rights and protections. But if the grand jury is to return to its historic role as a "bulkward against oppression," reform of our federal laws to provide for equitable procedures must be enacted.

CLEARED, 2 FIND GRAND JURY GUILTY

(By John F. Clancy)

Former Penn Central executives David C. Bevan and William R. Gerstnecker, vindicated Friday of embezzlement charges connected with the railroad's demise, called yesterday for elimination of the grand jury system.

"I think our judiciary system needs great overhauling," Bevan, once the railroad's chief financial officer, said at his home in Gladwyne. "The grand jury is antiquated. It does not protect the rights of the individual unless you have a very high ethical standard on the part of the prosecutor involved. A prosecutor can get an indictment any day in the week if he wants to and the individual is without proper protection."

Gerstnecker, former Penn Central vice president, echoed Bevan's sentiments at his home in Boca Raton, Fla.

"I'm very happy it's over," Gerstnecker said. "I'm not bitter but I think grand jury proceedings are harassment. The (federal) court has restored my faith in our court system."

Last Friday, U.S. District Judge William Ditter dismissed charges of fraudulent misuse of railroad funds that had been filed against Bevan and Gerstnecker, citing a lack of evidence against them.

Bevan, 70, and Gerstnecker, 63, were indicted in 1974 along with Virginia lawyers Joseph and Francis Rosenbaum, and Fidel Goetz, a German financier, on charges of conspiring to funnel $4.2 million from a $10 million loan into a dummy corporation Goetz set up in Liechtenstein.

The $10 million loan was made in 1969, the year before the railroad went bankrupt. It was made by a syndicate of West German banks to finance the refurbishing. The prosecution charged that Goetz took the money because he claimed Penn Central owed it to him. Neither Bevan nor Gerstnecker was accused of getting any of the money.

"I was a scapegoat," Bevan said. "Rep. Wright Patman, (D., Tex., chairman of the House Banking Committee at the time) was looking for someone to get him off the hook of the biggest bankruptcy that ever occurred. A couple of officers of the railroad used him and his staff to make me the scapegoat, but I will have more to say about that later."

Bevan said he had spent a fortune fighting the charges. "There was no case whatsoever against me and Mr. Gerstnecker," he said. "We didn't have to put on a case in our defense. The prosecution had not put a single bit of evidence against us.

"It's only lawyers like the one I had, Mr. Edward Germann, who was so conscientious and dedicated, and judges who ignore politics, like Judge Ditter, who was serious enough to see there was no evidence, that keep this judicial system going.

"They talk about the golden years of retirement," Bevan said. "I've spent seven of them fighting my own government for justice. There should be some recourse against irresponsible action by public officials who bring cases without any justification. I'm fearful for the future of America."

PUSH RESUMES TO REFORM GRAND JURIES

(By Aaron Epstein)

WASHINGTON.—"A witness stands before a grand jury alone, without notice of questions to be asked, without instruction as to his or her rights, without an attorney.

"If he or she invokes a Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, involuntary immunity can force the solitary figure back before the panel. . . .

"The prosecutor can effectively offer a citizen the choice of secretly informing against his other colleagues—or the public disgrace of incarceration for contempt."

That bleak description, presented to a House subcommittee last week, expresses much of the rationale behind a four-year movement to eliminate the alleged abuses of those secret, investigative bodies known as federal grand juries.

Up to now the campaign for reform has gone nowhere. Last year, for the first time, Congress conducted hearings on the subject but proposed legislation never got out of subcommittee.

Now, Rep. Joshua Eilberg, a Philadelphia lawyer who has been pressing for fundamental grand jury safeguards, thinks that his modified bill—titled the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977—has a chance.

Several influential prosecutors are sympathetic to Eilberg's bill. Most of the reforms it proposes have also been endorsed by the American Bar Association.

Most important, Eilberg and a top aide, Martin Belsky, a former prosecutor in the Philadelphia district attorney's office, think they can convince the Justice Department that the bill will protect witnesses without hurting the government's grand jury investigations of organized crime and of corruption in local government.

"Unlike former Attorney General (Edward) Levi, Attorney General (Griffin) Bell, at his confirmation hearings and in private conversations with me, has indicated that he supports legislation to provide additional safeguards in the grand jury system and to eliminate abuses," Eilberg said.

Strong opposition is expected from prosecutors, including a group of U.S. attorneys worried that their ability to root out organized crime and political corruption would be damaged if Eilberg's bill becomes law.

The supporters of grand jury reform include a Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, consisting of civil rights groups, religious organizations, defense lawyers, women's groups and several labor unions.

These groups argue that the grand juries, originally designed to protect individuals against the government, has become, in recent years, a tool used by the government to harass political dissenters—particularly Vietnam war dissenters, the Black Panthers, the Catholic left, the Puerto Rican independence movement, the Los Angeles anti-draft campaign, the women's movement and supporters of the unification of Ireland.

Grand Juries were written into the Bill of Rights so that the government, on its own, could not bring charges arbitrarily. The government first has to present its evidence to the grand jury—a panel of ordinary citizens—which then determines if there is sufficient reason to bring a person to trial.

Grand juries have since acquired power to investigate certain illegal activities, such as racketering. In this capacity, the grand jury hears witnesses and obtains documentary evidence in order to determine whether certain individuals should be indicted.

The "abuses" most often cited by present day critics are that the grand jury system:

- Forces a recalcitrant witness to testify by granting immunity that only partly protects him for prosecution. The witness could still be accused of a crime if evidence against him is gathered from other sources.
- Punishes recalcitrant witnesses too severely.
- Is a "rubber stamp" for federal prosecutors, in that it sees and hears only the evidence the prosecutor presents and indicts at the prosecutor's recommendation.
- Unjustly damages reputations because jury members are not always as secretive as they are sworn to be.
- Fails to give witnesses access to legal advice in the grand jury room.
- Allows witnesses to be subpoenaed too easily.

Following is a description of what the Eilberg bill would do about these complaints and the position of the American Bar Association, as explained by Richard E. Gerstein, state attorney in the Miami area for more than 20 years and chairman of the ABA's grand jury committee:

IMMUNITY

The bill would discontinue the partial immunity known as "use immunity" and would assure that a silent witness could never be charged with a crime connected with his testimony, even if evidence is obtained elsewhere. The power to grant immunity would be taken away from the prosecutor, and a judge would have to rule that the information being sought from the balky witness is of vital public interest.

Gerstein agreed that "use immunity" can lead to abuses by the prosecutor and can be "a subtle invitation to perjury."

CONTEMPT

Witnesses who are offered "use immunity" and still refuse to testify may now be jailed for 18 months. The bill would reduce the maximum penalty to six months. Also, a witness may now be called to testify when his prison term runs out, and if he refuses again he can be jailed again. Under Eilberg's bill, a witness could be imprisoned only once for refusing to talk about a specific subject.

The ABA opposes the sentence reduction, but agrees that the prohibition of multiple confinements "is needed to limit potential abuse."

"RUBBER STAMP"

The bill would allow a grand jury, with court approval, to break free of the government prosecutor and get its own attorney in instances of conflict of interests, partiality or improper conduct by the prosecutor.

Gerstein agreed with this provision.

COUNSEL

The bill would give witnesses the right to legal counsel in the grand jury room. Gerstein agreed that this was a desirable reform.

Several states allow the lawyer for the witness inside the grand jury room, Gerstein said, and prosecutors in those states report their investigations are not impaired.

SECRECY

The Bill provides that persons violating grand jury secrecy would be subject to a $20,000 fine or five years in prison for disclosing jury activities in exchange for money. A government attorney performing his duties, a witness or his lawyer would be immune from such punishment. Gerstein supported the stronger penalty.

SUBPOENAS

The bill would require seven days' notice before a witness would have to testify or produce evidence. The subpoena must advise him of all his rights, and the subpoena must be killed if a judge finds that no new evidence is likely to be produced.

Gerstein preferred a delay of 72 hours to one of seven days.

HE CONTINUES DEFIANCE OF GRAND-JURY SYSTEM

(By Murray Dubin)

Jay Weiner, just 20 hours out of a federal prison term imposed by refusing to talk to a grand jury, denounced the grand jury system yesterday.

Weiner, 22, a former sports writer and restaurant worker who lives in West Philadelphia, was sent to the Allenwood Federal Prison Camp Nov. 30 for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury investigating Patricia Hearst's stay in northeastern Pennsylvania in 1974.

On Monday, U.S. District Judge William J. Nealon freed Weiner without explanation. Weiner had expected to remain jailed until July when the grand jury's term expired.

"My release, after four months of pointless imprisonment, ends another chapter in the ugly history of grand juries in the United States," Weiner said at a mid-afternoon press conference. "My jailing is not an isolated event, but part of a larger picture."

Referring to two women imprisoned in New York for refusing to cooperate with a government investigation of the Puerto Rican independence movement, Weiner said, "The three of us, unfortunately, are part of a growing union of people forced to pay high prices for refusing to aid grand juries—people like anti-war, gay, labor activists, native Americans, Irish Americans, radical feminists, progressive attorneys and Puerto Rican independents.

"We are a union of people who refuse to become informants, who are therefore jailed without trial, without even being charged with a crime. We are jailed for asserting our basic human right to silence.

"My release has legal significance. I convinced a judge that I would never testify. I convinced a judge, over the government's opposition, that my jailing was senseless."

Weiner, with his older brother, Edward, and his father, Samuel, looking on, suggested that he could be subpoenaed before the grand jury again, but he added, "I don't expect to be subpoenaed again. Nealon's intervention undercut the prosecutor's ability to call me back."

Weiner said that he intended to continue working in a restaurant, writing about sports "but not be a sports writer" and speaking out against grand juries.

Congress Studies Reform of Grand Jury

(By Tony Mauro)

For the first time since the Bill of Rights was adopted, the U.S. Congress is taking a long hard look at one of the country's oldest institutions—the federal grand jury.

Leading the investigation is Rep. Joshua Eilberg of Philadelphia, the chairman of a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee.

In hearings that started last year and resumed again two weeks ago, Eilberg's committee has heard a litany of legal horror stories about the abuse of grand juries. The hearings have left Eilberg, a Democrat, more certain than ever that the system is long overdue for reform.

"The grand jury is clearly the rubber stamp for the prosecutor," Eilberg said in an interview at his North Philadelphia office last week. "The system has been abused, there is no doubt about it. I know we're right."

He has introduced legislation that, if passed, would restore the grand jury's ability to make "independent and rational decisions," in Eilberg's view.

He also hopes the legislation would spur reform action in individual states, where state and county grand juries would not be affected by the bill. Legislative sources indicate there has been little grand jury reform activity in New Jersey.

Grand juries were traditionally seen as the buffer between zealous prosecutors and the public, sifting evidence in private to see if the prosecutor had enough of a case to go forward with a public trial.

But over the years, critics say, the grand jury has become a tool of the prosecutor, doing his bidding and issuing indictments almost automatically.

The abuses peaked during the Nixon years, according to Eilberg, who first saw the problem when his committee conducted a hearing in 1973 into the case of the so-called Fort Worth Five.

In that case, five sympathizers of the Irish Republican Army from New York were called to testify before a grand jury that was investigating possible gun-running to Northern Ireland. But the grand jury was called in Fort Worth, Tex., not in New York where their families were and where they might have had a more sympathetic environment.

The five refused to testify and spent nearly a year in jail, without trial. Those hearings sparked Eilberg's bill and the more recent airing of the problem.

There the Nixon abuses came to fuller light, according to Eilberg's aide Martin Belsky.

Grand juries—which have broader subpoena powers than the FBI—were convened across the country, to do the "fishing" for information the FBI could not do, Belsky said.

Abuses were found in the investigations of Daniel Ellsberg and the leaking of the Pentagon Papers, in the probes of those accused of harboring Patty Hearst, in the Camden 28 case, and others.

Even when not abused, the current grand jury system offers little protection of individual rights, Eilberg feels.

An individual called before a grand jury has no absolute right to advance notice—Daniel Ellsberg's 15-year-old son was once called at 7 a.m. to appear two hours later—and has no right to counsel. Witnesses are allowed to have their lawyers sit outside the grand jury room, but cannot have them in the room with them.

Eilberg's bill would change these practices.

"We've got to increase protection for the rights of witnesses before the grand jury," said Eilberg. The American Bar Association, which has studied the grand jury problem, has stressed the right of witnesses to have attorneys by their sides as the key grand jury reform.

Some, including U.S. Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell, have worried this might turn the grand jury proceeding into a mini-trial, but Eilberg dismisses the problem. His bill would allow the lawyer to advise his client, but not to interfere with the proceeding.

To increase the grand jury's independence, Eilberg's bill would require informing the jurors that they can call witnesses and seek evidence independent of the prosecutor and that they can hire their own lawyer.

Issues of immunity and secrecy are also dealt with in the bill.

Eilberg plans another set of hearings on the bill, and wants to hear Bell's views about it—a key factor in the legislation's future.

GRAND JURY ROLE

The criminal justice section of the American Bar Association has added its voice to those of other critics in favor of legislative safeguards against abuse of the grand jury. The ABA group has recommended that Congress, among other things, allow witnesses before grand juries to have legal counsel, ban the repeated imprisonment of witnesses for refusing to testify before grand juries, and allow grand jury witnesses to use a violation of the federal wire-tapping law as a defense.

Such protections are needed because of the evolution of the grand jury from what originally was its role as a shield against unjust prosecution to its present role as a tool of the prosecution. The abuse of the grand jury reached a peak under the Nixon Administration, which used the grand jury as an investigative lever to force delivery of evidence in violation of the spirit of the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination.

Legislative reforms, such as the ABA group is proposing, are designed to return the grand jury to its intended constitutional purpose as a shield for the people against the government rather than a sword for the government against the people.

NADJARI SUPOENAED BY ASSEMBLY PANEL

WILL TESTIFY AT INQUIRY NEXT WEEK ON PROSECUTORIAL PRACTICES

(By Tom Goldstein)

Maurice H. Nadjari, the former special state prosecutor, has been subpoenaed to testify next week before a State Assembly subcommittee that is looking into grand jury and prosecutorial practices.

The city's five District Attorneys and three special prosecutors have agreed to testify voluntarily at the three-day hearings beginning Tuesday and Mr. Nadjari said he too had volunteered to testify about proposed legislation to alter the grand jury process.

Mr. Nadjari said he had sent a letter to Richard Gottfried, the Manhattan Democrat who is chairman of the Assembly's Committee on codes and its subcommittee on Criminal Justice, a few hours before he was subpoenaed Wednesday night.

THE NADJARI VIEW

Mr. Gottfried, who received the letter yesterday, said it really did not amount to a voluntary offer to appear.

Mr. Nadjari and Mr. Gottfried have never met, nor have they ever spoken on the telephone. Before the subpoena was served, Mr. Gottfried said that he had tried to reach Mr. Nadjari several times, but was unsuccessful. On Tuesday, Mr. Gottfried said, an aide to Mr. Nadjari said Mr. Nadjari would be unable to appear next week because of a full campaign schedule.

Mr. Nadjari, whose methods and record as special prosecutor in charge of rooting out corruption in New York City's criminal-justice system were frequently criticized, is now running as a Republican for the Queens District Attorney's job.

Mr. Nadjari says Mr. Gottfried is "confused." Mr. Gottfried says he is "mystified" by Mr. Nadjari's conduct.

Mr. Nadjari said yesterday that he was willing to appear voluntarily but had refused to set a definite date until he reviewed the proposed legislation. He said several Queens Republicans in the Assembly had told him that Mr. Gottfried had said the hearing had been designed to "get Nadjari."

"That's utterly untrue," Mr. Gottfried said. "I never said that. The hearings are not focusing on any particular prosecutor. We are studying certain practices and Mr. Nadjari is an extremely important witness."

The proposed legislation deals with a variety of ways in which the prosecutor's influence over a grand jury could be curbed. One bill would give witnesses before a grand jury the right to have a lawyer inside the grand jury room. Another would establish a "grand jury counsel" to replace the prosecutor in advising grand jurors. A third bill would establish statutory standards for prosecutorial conduct.

INSIDE THE GRAND JURY ROOM

PROSECUTORS MOVING TOWARD VIEW THAT WITNESS SHOULD BE ABLE TO HAVE HIS LAWYER AT HIS SIDE

(By Tom Goldstein)

Of all the issues relating to the grand jury—how big it should be, how the jurors should be selected, what type of immunity witnesses should be given, how unlawful disclosures can be stopped, whether it should survive at all—none is more the subject of debate among lawyers and legislators these days than this one: Which side of the grand jury door should the witnesses' lawyer be on?

NEWS ANALYSIS

It is the current practice in Federal courts and in most states for a lawyer to be excluded from the grand jury room but to be permitted to stand outside, where he can confer with his client. Most prosecutors want it that way. Otherwise, they argue, there would be too great an opportunity for obstruction and delay, turning grand jury proceedings into miniature trials. But there are indications, at least in New York, that prosecutors are relaxing their opposition to allowing certain witnesses to have their lawyers by their side in the grand jury room.

The grand jury is a far different institution now from what it was when it was founded in England in 1166. Its function is to determine if there is enough evidence to hold the subject of an investigation for trial, where his guilt or innocence can be decided. Under the penalty of contempt it can compel the testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence without observing all the procedural rules of a trial.

With the power of the prosecutor against him, "no matter how sophisticated, the witness is at a disadvantage in the grand jury room," Gary P. Naftalis, a New York City lawyer, and Federal Judge Marvin E. Frankel wrote in a forthcoming book on the grand jury.

EFFORT TO CHANGE THE SITUATION

Legislation is pending in Congress that would permit witnesses to have lawyers inside the grand jury room to advise them of their rights and liabilities. The American Bar Association supports this, as do Mr. Naftalis and Judge Frankel.

In New York State, which already affords grand jury witnesses more protections than most other jurisdictions, this proposal has been debated for several years.

During hearings of the Assembly Subcommittee in Criminal Justice this week, New York City's five District Attorneys and the three special prosecutors were united in opposing the proposal. But during the hearings and in interviews afterward, most of them said they were not opposed to a more limited proposal in which the target of an investigation, rather than all witnesses, could have his lawyer accompany him.

The prosecutors said the broader proposal would hamper their investigations into organized crime, official corruption and large-scale fraud.

PROBABLE CONFLICT CITED

"We have found that the very same attorney may simultaneously represent the owner of a nursing home and the employees of the very same facility," said Charles J. Hynes, the special nursing-home prosecutor. Candor, he said, cannot always be expected when the lawyer for the employer whom the employee may be implicating is "sitting within earshot."

The proposal allowing witnesses' lawyers to be present was supported by the New York Civil Liberties Union and the Legal Aid Society. "It simply makes no sense to have the witness traveling back and forth between the grand jury room and his counsel waiting outside," said Stephen Gillers, a lawyer who testified at the hearings on behalf of the civil-liberties group.

William J. Gallagher, who heads the Legal Aid society's criminal division, said: "The mere presence of counsel would do much to curb improper questioning of his client."

Two years ago a similar proposal was introduced in the Legislature, but it failed to make headway, particularly after prosecutors lobbied against it. Finally, the Assembly and Senate passed a bill that would permit a witness who waived immunity from prosecution to be accompanied by his lawyer in the grand jury room. But Governor Carey vetoed it.

QUESTION OF IMMUNITY

Under New York law, the decision to call a witness before a grand jury can often be a decision to forgo instituting criminal charges against him because he receives "automatic immunity" and can never be prosecuted for any crime concerning which he gives evidence.

But sometimes witnesses waive this immunity, and some prosecutors asked Governor Carey to veto that 1975 bill because politicians who might be targets of investigation often appear with a waiver of immunity. Thus, the prosecutors argued, the bill was a special-interest measure for politicians.

END SEEN IN PROBE OF PATTY

(By Bill Halpin)

The government may be ready to give up efforts to prove Patty Hearst was illegally harbored in a Wayne County farmhouse during the summer of 1974 while still a fugitive from justice, The Times has learned.

Justice Department officials, both locally and in Washington, have declined to comment on the case, other than to say it is still active.

However, The Times has learned prosecutors now believe it may be impossible to prove harboring charges.

This belief, it has been learned, may have been strengthened by a previously undisclosed trip to California by Asst. U.S. Atty. Laurence Kelly, this city, and an agent from the local office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

According to information obtained by The Times, the two men flew to the West Coast in January and interviewed Miss Hearst, daughter of newspaper magnate Randolph Hearst.

The government had planned to bring Miss Hearst to testify before a grand jury, but those plans were scrapped when they became public knowledge.

Reported targets of the federal probe are Jack Scott, a former Scrantonian, and his wife, Micki.

Miss Hearst testified at her bank robbery trial in California that the Scotts had transported her from the West Coast to a farmhouse near Lake Quinn, South Canaan.

The last public development in the case was the release last month of Jay Weiner, Philadelphia, a free-lance sportswriter, from the Allenwood Federal Prison Camp where he had been sent after being found in contempt of court for refusing to provide information to a grand jury.

Chief Federal Judge William J. Nealon set him free without explanation.

Earlier, Phil Shinnick, a one-time Olympic star who also had been found in contempt of court, was released from Allenwood after prosecutors said they no longer needed hair and handwriting samples and fingerprints which he had refused to provide the grand jury.

The Times has learned the final decision on whether to press the grand jury probe rests with the Justice Department in Washington.

Officially, the department had no comment when asked about the matter by The Times. However, it was determined that while the case reportedly is considered "still active," there is no schedule for future activities.

Several weeks ago, U.S. Atty. S. John Cottone, who is in charge of the investigation on the local level, said the case was "continuing." He declined comment when asked whether he still planned to bring Miss Hearst here to testify before the grand jury.

Subsequently, The Times learned of Atty. Kelly's trip to California.

Although officials, including Atty. Kelly, refused to confirm the information, it has been substantiated by several other sources.

The Hearst case swirled into local headlines in March 1975 when it was disclosed that federal agents allegedly had traced the missing newspaper heiress to the hilltop farmhouse on a secluded dirt road between Cortez and South Canaan.

On the same day, Weiner appeared before a grand jury in Harrisburg in connection with the Hearst matter. He was described as a close friend of Jack Scott.

From what later developed, it appears that William and Emily Harris and Wendy Yashimura, who also were fugitives at the time, also spent time at the farmhouse which had been rented from a New York City fireman.

The Scotts have never been charged with anything involving the Hearst case. For the government to prove harboring charges, it would be necessary to show that the Scotts knew Miss Hearst was a fugitive when they allegedly transported her from the West Coast to South Canaan.

BEATING THE SYSTEM

It is indicative of the way the Florida Legislature operates that an issue as important as permitting attorneys to accompany their clients before grand juries would be caught up in a Senate power struggle without ever being studied through the "committee system" which many legislators profess to revere.

A veteran legislator is defined as one who is able to talk about the sancity of the committee system without giggling. Those who know the ropes favor the committee system only when it's on their side.

Sen. Dempsey Barron (D-Panama City) knows all about the committee system. When he was the Senate president, he was able to work it to his advantage through the simple means of arranging the various committees' memberships to his liking. Once, he even appointed 31 of the 40 senators (including himself) to a special committee.

But Demsepy Barron isn't president of the Senate anymore. so his devotion to the committee system has waned appreciably. When the committee system won't do his bidding, he does his thing on the Senate floor.

And, in this care, at least, Florida citizens should be glad he did.

Florida's grand jury system is one of those things that cries for reform but never seems to get any. Consequently, when the Senate's committee system ignored the need for reform but produced a bill tightening the immunity statutes relating to grand jury testimony, Sen. Barron saw his chance.

After holding up the bill—which, by the way, is a good one—for several days through skillful maneuvering, Sen. Barron worked up enough support to push through an amendment giving persons under grand jury investigation the right to take their attorneys with them when they are called to give secret testimony.

We don't know what the senator's motives might have been for pushing his amendment, but the end result is good—despite the rather silly complaints from opponents like Sen. Edgar Dunn (D-Daytona Beach) and Rep. Ralph Habin (D-Palmetto) that important grand jury functions will be disrupted.

"This virtually guts the grand jury system as we know it," said Sen. Dunn.

That's fine with us. "The grand jury system as we know it" is a rubber stamp for prosecutors and generally is used for whitewashing offenders or for violating the rights of witnesses. Anyone who thinks state grand juries are effective in fighting organized crime and official corruption is kiding himself.

If the legislature is serious about fighting organized crime, it will give top priority to establishing a nonpolitical statewide prosecutor whose main efforts will be cracking down on the official corruption which protects the organized criminals. Corrupt officials are at the heart of the crime problem.

Crime won't be halted by perpetuating a grand jury system which deprives citizens of the rights they enjoy everywhere else in American society, and "law and order" legislators ought to quit pretending it will.

THE LAST OF NADJARI'S INDICTMENTS AGAINST CUNNINGHAM IS DISMISSED

(By Leslie Maitland)

The last of four indictments brought by Maurice H. Nadjari against Patrick J. Cunningham was dismissed yesterday by Justice Leonard H. Sandler of the New York State Supreme Court. The judge criticized the case for an insufficiency of evidence and the "shockingly improper and prejudicial manner" in which it was presented to a grand jury.

A second corruption case initiated by Mr. Nadjari, the former special state prosecutor for corruption in the criminal-justice system, was also rebuffed yesterday. In that case, another State Supreme Court justice failed to find any corroborative evidence to uphold the indictment of Ludwig G. Glowa, a former supervising judge of Brooklyn's Criminal Court.

The dismissal of the Glowa indictment—a charge of accepting a brief to impose an easy sentence—is being sought by John F. Keenan, who succeeded Mr. Nadjari at the end of June.

The indictment against Mr. Cunningham, the Bronx Democratic chairman, charged him and his law partner, Joseph S. Kaming, with conspiracy in the third degree, tampering with physical evidence and tampering with a witness. The latter count was dismissed with the consent of the special prosecutor.

The case focused on their alleged attempt to conceal the reason for the payment to them of a 2,000-a-month retainer by a bank that wanted them to help generate additional public and private deposits. They were charged with concocting a phony bill for legal services they did not perform in order to mask the reason for the payments.

INSUPPORTABLE PROPOSITION

In a 42-page decision dismissing the indictment, Justice Sandler, who sits in Manhattan, maintained that the case rested on a proposition that would not be sufficient to sustain the charges. He said that because "specific items on the bill were not shown to be untrue" the indictment depended largely on the theory that the bill as a whole was meant to be misleading.

It was the theory of the prosecution, Justice Sandler said, that a bill and subsequent correspondence related to it "were intended to conceal from an anticipated grand jury investigation that Mr. Cunningham had derived income by using the power of his political position to secure government deposits" for the bank, the American Bank & Trust Company.

The justice pointed out, however, that "it is not presently a violation of law" for high party officials to exploit their influence for personal profit, so that even had the grand jury uncovered an unethical reason for the payments, Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Kaming could not have been charged with any crime related to them. Justice Sandler added that the practice "might well be an appropriate subject for legislative action."

Rejecting as speculation the theory that the defendants had fabricated evidence, the justice suggested as more probable that "the defendants were moved by the anticipated investigation to make a written record of the unquestionable, if fortuitous, fact that they had performed a substantial service for their client," the bank.

The service performed by the defendants' law firm, Justice Sandler found, consisted of helping to save the Aldus Green housing project in the South Bronx, in which the bank had a financial stake of more than $1 million—largely the result of a construction loan to the developer, Kraus Enterprises Inc.

The justice said that after state financing for the project fell through, Kraus applied for Federal mortgage aid, but the application was "severely jeopardized" by the vigorous opposition of a community group.

According to grand jury testimony by Herman I. Kraus, the developer, Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Kaming helped dispel that opposition so that the financing was obtained, and the project went ahead as planned.

Stanley Kreitman, then president of the bank, testified that he did not understand the defendants' involvement as having constituted a legal service, a view that Justice Sandler termed "a singular misconception." Mr. Kreitman said that he had been asked by Mr. Cunningham to prepare a bill for $50,000 worth of legal services that the bank president said had not been provided.

As he has in decisions relating to previous Nadjari indictments, Justice Sandler sharply criticized the presentation of the case to the grand jury, attacking "the [assistant] prosecutor's intemperate and overbearing reaction to testimony from witnesses that did not coincide with his opinion of the underlying events."

SOUGHT TO STIR PREJUDICE

The justice said the assistant special prosecutor—he did not name the man who handled the case, Joseph Phillips—had sought "systematically to arouse prejudice against the defendants."

In dismissing the indictment, Justis Sandler said that he would consider a written application by the special prosecutor to present the case to a grand jury again, but added that more evidence would have to be introduced.

Mr. Keenan said that he had not yet reviewed Justice Sandler's opinion and did not know if he would represent the case again. He has already filed a notice of appeal on two dismissed indictments that charged Mr. Cunningham with arranging a judicial nomination for Judge Anthony J. Mercorella of the Bronx in return for a payoff.

The special prosecutor has not yet decided whether he will appeal the dismissal last month of another Nadjari indictment that accused Mr. Cunningham and two other men of trying to intimidate a weekly newspaper in the Bronx by threatening to cut off legal advertisements.

The case brought by Mr. Nadjari—who is now the Republican candidate for District Attorney of Queens—against former Judge Glowa will formally be dismissed today or tomorrow by Justice Leon B. Polsky, who announced his intention from his Brooklyn bench yesterday.

In accepting Mr. Kieran's motion for dismissal, Justice Polsky said he would turn over the grand jury minutes to the Appellate Division for submission to the appropriate bar associations.

"From the minutes I've read," Justice Polsky said, "there's apparent reason to believe there was unprofessional conduct by several members of the bar in their testimony before the Grand Jury."

While Justice Polsky mentioned no names, the special prosecutor's papers mentioned former Criminal Court Judge Michael Saytanides as the "accomplice" in the case who was representing the two defendants. Other members of Mr. Saytanides' law firm also testified before the grand jury.

It was presumably on the basis of their testimony that Mr. Nadjari obtained the indictment of Judge Glowa on Jan. 26, 1976, on charges of conspiracy, bribe receiving, obstructing governmental administration and official misconduct.

In the indictment, Judge Glowa was accused of having received $500 on June 23, 1971, in return for giving nonjail sentences to Alex Diaz and Louis Nestres, who, along with two other men, had been arrested on April 5 that year, and had been charged with possession of heroin.

Mr. Saytanides testified before the grand jury that as the lawyer for the two defendants, he approached Judge Glowa and offered him $500 in return for keeping his clients out of jail.

Minutes of the sentencing disclosed that Judge Glowa had determined that the defendants were not addicts, discussed their prior arrests, received information about the crime, and inquired about the marital status of the defendants. He sentenced each to a conditional discharge.

NADJARI IS SUED ON BEHALF OF U.S. BY LAW PARTNER OF CUNNINGHAM

(By Max H. Seigel)

An $8.6 million lawsuit charging the former special state anticorruption prosecutor, Maurice H. Nadjari, with unlawfully using Federal funds in what is called "corrupt and illegal" activity of his office was filed yesterday in Federal District Court in Brooklyn.

The charges were brought on behalf of the United States Government by Joseph S. Kaming, law partner of Patrick J. Cunningham, former Democratic state chairman, only a day after a court's dismissal of the last outstanding indictments against the two men.

Mr. Kaming is seeking to recover for the Government $4.3 million in Law Enforcement Assistance Administration funds spent by Mr. Nadjari and an equal amount in punitive damages. The court papers name the United States Government as the plaintiff—a procedure allowed under the Federal False Claims Act.

At a news conference in his law offices at 800 Third Avenue, Mr. Cunningham charged yesterday that Mr. Nadjari was "an abuser of power whose real goal was self-aggrandizement."

He added that through the former special prosecutor the criminal-justice system had been "smeared and intimidated" in a manner reminiscent of Nazism and McCarthyism."

Mr. Cunningham also said he was considering a civil suit against Mr. Nadjari.

3 OPTIONS FOR GOVERNMENT

David G. Trager, the United States Attorney for the Eastern District, said yesterday that the Government had three options: It could take over prosecution of the case, itself; it could allow Mr. Kaming to press the action in its behalf, or, if it already had in its possession the information contained in the complaint and it felt prosecution was not warranted, it could cancel the lawsuit.

"The final decision," Mr. Trager said, "will be made by Attorney General (Griffin B.) Bell." Mr. Trager disclosed that he had designated Christopher J. Jensen, deputy chief of his civil division, to study the case and to make a recommendation.

In the 182-page complaint filed yesterday, Mr. Nadjari was accused of the following violations of the Federal guidelines governing the use of Law Enforcement Assistance Administration funds:

¶Operating in areas outside his authorized jurisdiction. Among the examples cited in the court papers were the prosecution of Irving Goldman, the city's Commissioner of Cultural Affairs, and the prosecution of Surrogate S. Samuel DiFalco. In both cases, courts dismissed the charges.

¶Using false surveillance, as typified in the case against two lawyers, Theodore Rosenberg and Leonard Fusfield, in which Justice Leon B. Polsky of State Supreme Court rejected as inadmissible up to 52,000 intercepted conversations.

¶Perverting the criminal-justice system by suborning perjury before a grand jury and offering a false instrument for filing. The complaint cites the case against Judge Paul P. Rao, among many others.

¶Unauthorized spending of funds to discredit the judiciary, as in the so-called "20 judges" case, in which Mr. Nadjari said he was investigating more than 20 State Supreme Court and Criminal Court judges to determine if they gave preferential treatment to organized-crime figures.

¶Using "deception, deceit and perjury" to justify expenditures of Federal funds as well as the use of these funds for prosecutions outside his jurisdiction. The papers cited, among others, the case against Mr. Cunningham and Judge Anthony Mercorella.

HARASSMENT TACTICS CHARGED

The court papers also charged Mr. Nadjari with using physical and psychological terror through "police state detention, "with threatening economic and professional destruction to get witnesses to lie and with using his office for personal objectives as in his announcement that Governor Carey was dismissing him because he was about to investigate Mr. Carey.

Mr. Cunningham said yesterday that he agreed with the thrust of the Kaming suit although he was not taking part in it.

"The special prosecutor injected into the public consciousness the poisonous concept that all public officials are corrupt," he said.

The former Democratic State Party leader said the Nadjari investigation, had cost him more than $100,000 in legal fees. "But my reputation is much more important," he said.

GRAND JURY REFORM

The grand jury system in this country needs reform.

The system, devised under English law to provide a more democratic way of bringing charges against persons suspected of crimes, has been perverted into a prosecutors' tool to get around constitutional guarantees.

Almost nowhere else in the criminal justice system is a person who wants a lawyer denied that right. Someone hailed before a grand jury must submit to questioning under oath with no professional legal help at his side. He can receive advice from counsel outside the jury room but must ask for and be granted permission to leave the room when he wants it.

Richard F. Gerstein, chairman of the American Bar Assn.'s (ABA) criminal justice section's grand jury committee, said this not only unnecessarily prolongs the proceedings but also places the witness in an unfavorable light before the jury.

"It is extremely damaging to the witness to continually get up, go outside, and consult with counsel," Gerstein, a prosecutor for more than 20 years, said.

What would be wrong with permitting someone testifying before a grand jury to have legal counsel at hand? He's allowed it outside the room. Why go through the clumsey motions of leaving the room to talk to a lawyer?

Other reforms are needed. The following changes have been recommended by the ABA:

Witnesses forced by law to give testimony that might violate the guarantee against self-incrimination should be given immunity from prosecution for any crime referred to in the testimony.

Witnesses who refuse on several occasions to testify about the same event.

Increased penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution says:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crimes shall have been committed . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsary process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense."

The rights spelled out in that amendment should not stop at the door to the grand jury room.

ANOTHER CHANCE FOR REVISING GRAND JURIES

(By Barry M. Hager)

After years of hearings and debate, prospects in Congress for legislation revising the nation's grand jury system appear to be growing stronger.

Charges of abuse of the system by the Justice Department and FBI have been widespread since 1970. Hearings first were conducted on the subject in 1973. Now they are being held again.

"Each time there has been publicity we have learned more about the grand jury and its problems," according to Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D Pa.), a long-time backer of grand jury legislation. He feels now that enough is known to move to "the first reform of the grand jury in the history of the country."

Proponents of grand jury reform in Congress concede that the peak of alleged abuse of the system already may have passed, but they warn that that does not lessen the need for reform.

"There is no fading of this need at all," Eilberg said. "Those of us who have lived through Watergate, through this period of abuse, know the potential for abuse that is still there. This has made a searing impression on me."

The principal reform bills under consideration in the 95th Congress are HR 94, introduced by Eilberg; HR 3736, sponsored by John Conyers Jr. (D Mich.), and S 1449, introduced by Sen. James Abourezk (D S.D.).

Eilberg also has introduced four proposed constitutional amendments "for the purpose of discussion" which would eliminate or significantly restrict the use of grand juries in the criminal system. In addition, at least five other bills to revise the grand jury system have been introduced in the House.

Eilberg's bill, HR 94, is the primary vehicle for the current hearings before his Immigration, Citizenship and International Law Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee.

PAST COMPLAINTS

The central accusation made by those seeking revision in the grand jury system is that the executive branch, particularly the FBI and the U.S. Attorneys around the country, have used grand juries in recent years in dragnet fashion, resulting in a chilling effect on First Amendment rights of political association, free speech and a free press.

Abuse is possible because the grand jury lies at the heart of the national criminal justice system, even though it remains a mystery to most citizens. The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, which confers such familiar rights as the one against self-incrimination ("to plead the Fifth"), also contains a less familiar guarantee that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury [except in wartime military]."

That provision, part of the Bill of Rights, was seen at the time as a protective measure against prosecutorial excesses by the government. The idea was that a panel of private citizens—23 has long been the number of grand jurors on a panel—would first sit in judgment on a prosecutor's case against an individual. Only if the grand jury were convinced of the indictability of the citizen could the charges be brought against that individual.

At the time of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, the grand jury was perceived as a bulwark against oppression by the British crown. Massachusetts had been the first to institute the grand jury, in 1634, and most other colonies utilized the protective device.

But proponents of grand jury revision claim the harsh irony is that this historically libertarian device has been transformed into a highly effective tool of the government's prosecutors.

In the strong language of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) as he testified before the Eilberg subcommittee during its first hearings in 1973, "Over the past four years under the present [Nixon] administration, we have witnessed the birth of a new breed of political animal—the kangaroo grand jury—spawned in a dark corner of the Department of Justice, nourished by an administration bent on twisting law enforcement to serve its own political ends, a dangerous modern form of star chamber secret inquisition that is trampling the rights of citizens from coast to coast."

Secrecy

That star chamber reference points to a central feature of the grand jury system that disturbs reformers—secrecy. While secrecy of grand jury proceedings can serve to protect those targeted from premature revelation of damaging testimony, it also can serve as a screen for wideranging prosecutorial activities which might be curbed by a judge if pursued in an open court setting.

An example of that possibility was the "Fort Worth Five" case which prompted the original Eilberg hearings. In that case, according to Sen. Kennedy's testimony, five Irish New Yorkers were subpoenaed to testify before a Texas grand jury despite no apparent evidence that there was any connection between them and the gun-running activities the Justice Department claimed to be investigating.

A more current example, according to the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, a private activist group supporting grand jury legislation at the federal and state level, is the case of two women who were staffers of the Episcopal Church's National Commission on Hispanic Affairs in New York. Since November 1976, the FBI has sought their testimony and extensive records in an effort to find links to the Puerto Rican nationalist terrorist group allegedly responsible for several New York-area bombings.

The two women refused to testify and moved to quash the subpoena which had been issued to compel their grand jury testimony. New York Bishop Paul Moore was quoted as calling the subpoena "an invasion of the confidentiality necessary to the effective working of a religious body."

Both women were jailed in March 1977 for contempt, where they remained as of May 5. Under existing law, they could stay in jail for contempt until the end of the life of the grand jury, in this case May 1978. Even then, under existing law, a new grand jury could be empaneled and the process repeated. And the two witnesses could remain in jail.

Venue, Subpoena Powers

An additional complaint of grand jury reformers was pointed up by the Fort Worth example. That is the current lack of any requirement for a geographical nexus between the activities investigated by the grand jury and the venue, or place where the grand jury is empaneled and sits.

This type of abuse allegedly was prevalent during the Nixon administration's most intensive efforts to combat what they perceived as politically inspired terrorism. For example, in 1971 the investigation into the bombing of the U.S. Capitol building was pursued by a grand jury in Seattle.

Prior to that, in 1970, a Tucson, Arizona, grand jury had subpoenaed five Los Angeles residents to testify despite the lack of clear connections between the five and the Tucson investigation. Likewise, on July 10, 1972, the day the Democratic Convention was scheduled to open in Miami, Fla., 25 members of Vietnam Veterans Against the War were subpoenaed to testify 500 miles away before a grand jury in Tallahassee. The veterans had planned to demonstrate in Miami, but were detained through the entire week. On July 13, the convention voted to condemn the Nixon administration for trying to intimidate the veterans.

The concern of reformers is that such wide-ranging subpoena powers in the hands of federal prosecutors create hardships on those who must disrupt their lives to respond to the subpoenas and also strip away many of the protective mechanisms familiar in the open court setting. There the venue of a trial and the selection of the jurors is intended to guarantee that individuals are judged by their peers rather than people from distant communities.

First Amendment Rights

A larger concern of reformers is the fact that many of the most controversial grand juries were investigating political activities. Individuals subpoenaed to testify were being asked to divulge information about their personal political associations and actions.

Those hoping to change the system are worried by possible abridgements of First Amendment political freedoms. They argue that going behind the closed door of the grand jury room inevitably breeds suspicions among political and personal associates, since no one can be sure what was divulged to the grand jury, in contrast to open court testimony.

Reporters also have raised this argument in contesting subpoenaes which require them even to appear before a grand jury regarding their sources. The Supreme Court has ruled against the press argument that journalists ought to be exempt even from responding to a subpoena to appear before a grand jury.

Immunity, Contempt

Once in the grand jury room, even a witness who wishes to resist discussing what he considers to be activities protected by the First Amendment may have trouble doing so. The existing grand jury setting is largely under the control of the prosecutor. A witness is not permitted to have his own counsel in the grand jury room, and the questions put to the witness are dictated almost entirely by the prosecutor.

The witness can only invoke the Fifth Amendment, refusing to testify on the grounds that his testimony might incriminate him, if he can convince a judge that self-incrimination is a real possibility. Even then, the prosecutor may decide to grant the witness "use" immunity, which means that the government agrees not to use the specific testimony or its fruits against the witness in any future prosecution. If granted this immunity, even against his will, the witness must testify.

A witness who refuses to testify after being given immunity can be cited for contempt and jailed for the life of one or more grand juries.

PROPOSALS FOR CHANGE

Given all of these complaints about the potential of the grand jury for abuse, some observers would favor its outright abolition.

But Emmy Hixson, an attorney with the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, points out that there have never been any amendments to the Bill of Rights. "To amend the Bill of Rights could be a horrible precedent. Who knows what might be amended next?"

Other witnesses at the current hearings before the Eilberg subcommittee also have noted that a reformed grand jury might again be a positive force in the criminal system. Eilberg himself has expressed the belief that grand juries could be especially useful in pursuing official misconduct.

HR 94 thus attempts to address the abuses of past grand juries without suggesting abolition of the Fifth Amendment requirement of grand jury involvement in the indictment process.

One key provision of the bill would restructure the procedures surrounding the subpoenaing and compulsion of testimony. The broad venue and subpoena powers of current grand juries would be restricted, with venue limited to where there is "substantial conduct" in the district of the grand jury, and new safeguards provided for the issuance of subpoenas.

If a witness desires to resist testifying, he would have 72 hours to prepare for a court hearing on the question of a possible contempt citation, and he would be represented by counsel. Should a contempt finding be made by the court against the recalcitrant witness, the confinement could be for no more than six months. HR 94 would specifically preclude "reiterative contempt," or repeated confinements of the same witness regarding the same testimony.

Once in the grand jury room, the witness for the first time would have the right to counsel for the purpose of advice, but not for cross-examination, argument or other purposes. This provision has been resisted by many district attorneys around the nation. Attorney General Griffin B. Bell asked a February meeting of the American Bar Association to withhold its anticipated support for grand jury reform along the lines of HR 94 until its August meeting to let the Justice Department review the proposals and take a position. Bell expressed concern lest the grand jury inquiry become a slow-moving "mini-trial."

Eilberg argues "it's just unfair to have a one-sided lawyer with a fixed point of view in the grand jury room."

A former Philadelphia prosecutor himself, Eilberg compares what he wants with the use of counsel by witnesses in congressional hearings. Counsel there is available for consultation by the witness, but is not generally allowed to interrupt or impede the proceedings. HR 94 even has a safety valve for prosecutors which allows "disruptive" counsel to be removed from the grand jury room, a concession which disturbs some civil libertarians.

If a witness pleads possible self-incrimination as a bar to testifying, the immunity procedures would be substantially altered. First of all, HR 94 and several other bills would replace "use" immunity with transactional immunity, which means that the prosecutor, in order to compel potentially incriminating testimony, must agree not to prosecute the witness on the whole transaction about which he is being compelled to testify.

Support for a return to transactional immunity goes beyond the grand jury context. It was the historical form of immunity. Use immunity only came into existence in 1970, at the behest of the John Mitchell Justice Department, and it has been highly controversial from the outset.

A number of supporters of grand jury reform wish to go even further than a return to transactional immunity. The Conyers bill (HR 3736) is supported by the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse and others largely because it provides for "consensual immunity" as well as transactional. That is, a witness would have to be insulated against the whole transaction about which he was testifying, but the immunity could only be granted if the witness consented. At present, the witness' choice in the matter is irrelevant.

HR 94 does not go as far as consensual immunity, but does specify guidelines which must be followed by a court in deciding to grant immunity, including a determination that the evidence sought by the grant is relevant to an authorized inquiry.

Eilberg emphasized that, while the bulk of HR 94 and the other grand jury proposals are aimed at curbing alleged prosecutorial abuses by restoring protections to witnesses and targets of grand jury inquiries, some provisions of his bill "may improve enforcement of the law since we are trying to restore vigorous, independent grand juries" in place of what Eilberg feels are excessively prosecutor-controlled grand juries.

H.R. 94 also deals with the double-edged sword of grand jury secrecy by stiffening penalties for disclosures of grand jury activity which are aimed at affecting the outcome of a grand jury's work. Journalists, grand jury witnesses and their lawyers are all protected from the $20,000 or five-year imprisonment contemplated for such revelation of grand jury proceedings.

OUTLOOK

The House subcommittee will follow its March and April hearings with additional hearings in June. Eilberg anticipates that the Justice Department will testify at that time and announce their position. The department's position will be influential; former Attorney General Edward Levi's firm opposition to grand jury revision proposals was a significant hindrance to action by the 94th Congress.

In announcing the introduction of his bill on May 4, Sen. James Abourezk said he would call for early hearings. The bill is expected to be referred to the Judiciary Committee's constitution subcommittee, headed by Birch Bayh (D-Ind.). Hearings could be held in early summer.

Favorable action by the ABA in August also could add momentum to the grand jury measures pending. Eilberg is optimistic about the ultimate prospects.

REFORM OF VIRGINIA JURY SYSTEM SOUGHT

(By Jane Seaberry)

After Alvin Lee Carter, Jr. was arrested in late 1972 and charged with the $47 robbery of a man at a High's store in Vienna, he wrote a Fairfax County judge several times asking that he be sent to a rehabilitative institution so he could learn a trade while he awaited his trial.

The judge refused Carter's request and he sat in the Fairfax jail, which has few facilities for learning a trade. A month passed until Carter had a preliminary hearing, where a judge determined there was probable cause to believe he committed the robbery, and another two months until a grand jury considered his case and indicted him. He eventually pleaded guilty and served a total of two years and eight months.

Carter, who was unable to post $20,000 bond to gain his release, says he believes the time spent waiting in the county jail could have been put to better use learning a trade, like carpentry, which eventually he was taught at a state prison.

"I felt very bitter" about the wait in the jail, Carter said. "I wanted to get (my time in prison) over with."

In an era when law enforcement officials are seeking ways to speed up court procedures, many legal experts are beginning to agree with Carter that the two- or three-month wait for a routine felony grand jury indictment has become an unnecessary trial delay and merely a "rubber stamp" of action taken at the preliminary hearing.

It's been long observed by people in law enforcement that cases sent on to the grand jury from the preliminary hearing are merely rubber stamped," said Lewis W. Hurst, executive director of the Virginia State Crime Commission. "It does slow up the system a bit, too. That's two, three or sometimes four months waiting for a ruuber stamp indictment."

The Criminal Justice Coordinating Council of Fairfax County recently released a report that showed that Fairfax grand juries in the last four years have concurred with preliminary hearing findings in between 99 and 100 per cent of the felony cases presented to them.

Fairfax County Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said consideration of cases by grand juries should be eliminated in felony cases such as Carter's, where preliminary hearing has been held.

Horan said the grand jury is important in some cases, such as investigations but it is unnecessary to present evidence at a preliminary hearing "and then go to a grand jury with the same information." Without the grand jury "you could greatly speed up the process," Horan said.

Although no state has completely eliminated grand juries, five states permit modification or abolition of the grand jury system by the state legislature. Pennsylvania permits abolition of the grand jury as a local option.

But 39 states, including Maryland, authorize prosecution by one of two methods: a grand jury indictment or information presented by the local prosecutor to judges.

Twenty-one states, including Virginia and the District, authorize prosecution by the combination preliminary hearings and grand jury indictment procedure.

In 16 States, including Virginia, the accused may waive his right to a grand jury indictment, but, according to the Fairfax Council's report, less than 11 per cent in Fairfax County do so. Carter said he was not aware of this right when he was charged.

The grand jury was established more than 700 years ago in England during the reign of King Henry II, to protect the innocent from malicious prosecution, a function the American Bar Association said is still needed today.

"It's a protective body between government and the people," said Laurie Robinson, an ABA spokesman. "The basic reasoning is still sound. Abuses can be corrected."

Some defense attorneys also said the grand jury system should remain because they believe the can benefit by its delays. The longer the time between arrest and trial, the worse prosecution witnesses' memories of the crime may become and some witnesses may change their minds about testifying or move from the area, increasing their client's chance of acquittal.

Groups such as the Fairfax criminal justice council, the Virginia State Crime Commission, the Judicial Council of Virginia, the National Advisory Commission on Criminal Justice Standards and Goals, and the Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Administration have urged that localities seek alternatives to the grand jury system in routine felony cases and reserve the procedure for special cases, such as investigations.

A law to give the accused a choice between a preliminary hearing or grand jury indictment was defeated last year in the Virginia General Assembly's House Courts of Justice Committee because committee members at that legislative session were "tough on criminals," according to the bill's sponsor, Sen. Frederick T. Gray (D-Chesterfield), who is a former Virginia attorney general.

The bill "came about from a desire to speed up the judicial process," Gray said, but the House committee defeated almost every recommendation toward that end made by Gray's speedy trial study group, he said.

According to the Fairfax council report, doing away with routine grand jury indictments could cut at least 30 days from the average period of 135 days from the time a person is charged in Fairfax to the time he is tried. This probably would lessen increasing felony case backlogs.

Carter's case is fairly typical of most defendants' experiences, according to the report.

Carter was arrested Dec. 16, 1972, the day after the High's robbery was committed. He had a preliminary hearing Jan. 17, 1973. At such hearings, a General District Court judge hears evidence presented by a commonwealth's attorney (prosecutor) and the defense and determines if the charge should be reduced, dropped or taken to the grand jury.

If the judge decides there is probable cause that the accused committed the crime, the defendant must wait for the grand jury to meet, which is once every two months in Fairfax. The average time from arrest to preliminary hearing in Fairfax is 45 days, according to the Fairfax Council report.

Another 62 days elapsed from the time of Carter's preliminary hearing to his grand jury indictment, which is higher than the average time of 38 days.

The cases of about 35 per cent of the accused, the largest single group, were considered by the grand jury between 75 and 100 days after arrests were made. Carter's time was 93 days. Without the grand jury consideration of the case, Carter might have had a trial date set within a month of his arrest.

Virginia grand juries meet four to 12 times a year in most jurisdictions. The juries, composed of from five to seven people, are selected each year by the chief circuit court judge. They alone informally question witnesses called by prosecutors. The grand jury does not determine whether the accused is guilty or innocent, but whether it is possible the person could have committed the crime, the same function performed at preliminary hearings.

At least four jurors have to agree to an indictment before a person can be indicted in Virginia. A week after indictments are handed down in the state, trial dates are set.

Carter finally pleaded guilty to the robbery charge Oct. 3, 1973. He remained in the Fairfax jail until he was sentenced Dec. 11, almost 12 months after he was arrested. The 357 days he waited in jail due to trial date continuations, case backlogs and clerical mistakes counted toward serving his sentence.

Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Burch Millsap sentenced Carter to serve 12 years in prison but suspended four years. A month later Millsap suspended another four years. Carter was released in August 1975.

"I'm working hard every day. Working for my family," Carter said. "I paid my price. I learned my lesson."

Grand Juries Go On Trial

Grand juries are in trouble.

Charges that the grand jury has become a Grand Inquisition, sitting in a chamber that lacks only a star on the door, are coming from persons both in and out of the legal system. Civil libertarians are allied with at least a few of the Fortune 500 corporations in their crusade against alleged abuse.

Many are calling grand juries the most significant criminal-justice issue of this century.

The bill of particulars against the grand-jury system as it functions today hits at most fundamental Constitutional issues—those enumerated in the Fifth Amendment.

Indictments still are delivered in the name of the grand jury, and testimony only can be compelled under a limited grant of immunity. But the critics charge there is only cosmetic recognition of the Constitution. They assert that the grand-jury system, particularly in federal courts, has become the very instrument of oppressive government that it was designed to check.

The grand jury is "a vehicle for our persecution," says Rep. John Conyers, (D-Mich.), sponsor of the broadest of two reform bills now pending in the House. It is a "legal loophole in the Bill of Rights," according to the Washington-based Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse. The group, an amalgam of legal and civil libertarian groups, unions, and churches, gets high marks for competence and professionalism among legislative aides on Capitol Hill.

Critics claim many abuses, but several are cited most often:

Prosecutors use the jurors to obtain evidence for trial against persons they already have investigated and are ready to indict. Grand juries are not permitted to gather evidence once an indictment is returned.

Prosecutors issue subpoenas to aid investigators for such agencies as the Federal Bureau of Investigation or the Internal Revenue Service, in gathering information the agencies may not legally demand on their own.

Prosecutors subpoena witnesses they know will rely on the Fifth Amendment—thus forcing them to repeatedly cite the amendment, creating suspicion among jurors.

If one grand jury refuses to indict, prosecutors bring the issues to subsequent juries until they find a receptive one.

Witnesses may be hauled before an unlimited number of successive grand juries, refuse to testify before each one and potentially be jailed for life on successive charges of contempt—with the motive being punishment rather than compulsion of testimony.

Witnesses are questioned about activities unrelated to an investigation and charged with perjury in that unrelated testimony, even if the substantive offense is not proved.

Broad venue provisions mean witnesses can be forced to testify anywhere in the nation and be indicted for conspiracy in cities they never even visit.

Under a 1972 Supreme Court ruling, validating a 1971 federal statute, witnesses can be forced to testify with only "use" immunity protection and still be subject to prosecution for the transaction under investigation.

Not all complaints about grand juries are at the federal level. At least eight states now are considering some form of grand-jury reform. Though the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse feels the fact that state prosecutors are elected has held them in check, it says state prosecutors often abuse the system by leaking information to the news media to discredit investigation targets. They also "trump up" indictments to improve their plea bargaining position, says the coalition.

It now is commonplace for federal prosecutors to call the target of an investigation before the grand jury and compel his testimony, says Morton Stavis, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York-based network of civil liberties lawyers. The practice signals a change in Department of Justice policy, says Stavis, adding "it used to be considered kind of gauche, because they would plead the Fifth Amendment, and whammo" the witness would be excused.

The criticisms are not all new. In 1931 the Wickersham Committee (the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement) commented, "the grand jury usually degenerates into a rubber stamp wielded by the prosecuting officer."

But Stavis also sees a correlation between the expansion of power of prosecutors before grand juries and a series of Supreme Court decisions starting in the early 1970s restricting the scope of the Fifth Amendment. He says neither can be fully appreciated without considering the other. While the court was "foster-[ing] grand jury abuse." the Nixon Administration already had "massively expanded both the dimension and repressive impact of grand juries," argues Stavis.

Generally, legislative proposals to restrict grand juries would:

Require at least transactional immunity before a witness could be compelled to testify.

Permit a witness to have an attorney with him in the grand-jury room, and under some plans allow the lawyer to address the jury.

Require advance notice to a subpoenaed witness, including the subject of the investigation and whether or not he is a target.

Require the prosecutor to present exculpatory evidence, or allow the witness to do so.

Set a six-month maximum on contempt sentences for refusing to testify and prohibit the calling of recalcitrant witnesses before successive grand juries.

Insist the grand jury be told of its own powers and responsibilities and allow it to request independent legal advice.

Restrict venue.

Not permit the subpoenaing of witnesses who file written statements that they will rely on the Fifth Amendment.

Prohibit prosecutors from presenting a case to more than one grand jury, unless there is new evidence.

Require transcripts of all proceedings.

Prohibit use of illegally obtained evidence in grand-jury presentations.

Opponents of the measures argue the changes would immobilize both the grand juries and the courts by forcing defense attorneys to seek judicial hearings at a multitude of stages in the grand-jury process, or risk malpractice.

Judge Frederick B. Lacey of U.S. District Court in Newark, feels the bills would result in forcing judges to preside over all grand-jury activity, ruling on defense objections and motions, in order to preserve the jury's ability to function.

Lacey represented the Judicial Conference of the United States before the House Judiciary Subcomittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law, which is conducting hearings on grand-jury reform.

Although the conference has not taken a position on any of the proposed measures, its Advisory Committee on Federal Rules of Criminal Procedures has reviewed some. It opposes provisions for recalitrant witnesses, transactional immunity, defense counsel in the grand-jury room, immunity hearings, independent counsel for the jury, advance notice to subpoenaed witnesses, Miranda-type warnings for subpoenaed witnesses, and notice to targeted witnesses. The committee has not reviewed all provisions, but does favor cutting the size of the jury and employing criminal sanctions for leaking secret information.

Many of the proposed proceedings would require judicial hearings. Lacey said the courts already are so burdened with criminal matters, especially since passage of the Speedy Trial Act, that many judges rarely hear civil trials. These judges have few occasions now to be involved in grand-jury matters, but their criminal calendars would double under the proposal, he said. "Civil trials will be virtually non-existent," he said.

Many of the same views were offered by Edwin L. Miller of San Diego, testifying for the National District Attorneys Association. He said any abuses that occur could better be remedied by tighter discipline in the Department of Justice than by expansive legislation.

Attorney General Griffin B. Bell has not yet reacted to the proposals, though he is slated to testify late this month. Legislative aides generally concede his response could determine if any reforms pass this year. Bell quashed American Bar Association consideration of reform proposals in February, when he asked the House of Delegates to defer voting on a twenty-three point plan, which included many of the same measures pending in Congress. In fact, the delegates already had endorsed some of the points in 1975, including the right of a witness to counsel, and Richard F. Gerstein, state attorney for the Eleventh Judicial Circuit of Florida and chairman of the A.B.A. Criminal Justice Section Committee on the Grand Jury, has testified in favor of reforms.

The Conyers bill (H.R. 2986) is the strongest of the three proposals. Two bills are pending in the House and one in the Senate. H.R. 94, submitted by Rep. Joshua Eilberg, (D-Pa.), chairman of the hearing committee, appears to have the best chance of passage. Conyers' plan is viewed by some Capitol Hill staffers as providing a position from which to fall back to reach a compromise at Eilberg's stance. The version offered by Sen. James Abourezk (D-S. Dak.), is S. 1449, and it coincides most closely with the Eilberg bill.

But it appears reform in any form is headed for a tough congressional battle.

JUSTICE, PROSECUTOR CRITICIZED BY COURT IN GROH INDICTMENT

(By Max H. Seigel)

The Appellate Division in Brooklyn yesterday accused Justice Leonard H. Sandler of State Supreme Court and the special state anticorruption prosecutor, John F. Keenan, of having used "coercive" methods to get a Queens County grand jury to indict Judge Robert T. Groh of Civil Court last November on charges of bribery and grand larceny.

The appellate justices said that if they could, they would throw out the indictments, but that they could not do so because the lawyers for Judge Groh still had recourse to State Supreme Court.

It was the first time Mr. Keenan had been accused of using the kind of overzealous tactics that had led to the dismissal of charges against many persons indicted by Maurice H. Nadjari, Mr. Keenan's predecessor as special prosecutor for corruption in the criminal justice system.

"Had the motion been submitted to us from the start," the five appellate justices said in a unanimous opinion on the Groh case, "we would have granted the application and order that the indictment be dismissed, as the papers submitted by both sides reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

Mr. Keenan and an assistant, Stephen Sawyer, had brought before the Queens grand jury charges that Mr. Groh, while deputy borough president of Queens in 1972, had sought a political campaign contribution of more than $10,000 from a law firm representing the Sheraton Corporation to help it get a zoning variance to expand its inn at La Guardia Airport.

'GRATUITOUS' DISCUSSION

After hearing the evidence, the grand jury voted not to indict Mr. Groh. Afterward, according to the Appellate Division, "the special prosecutor, having learned of the results, re-entered the grand jury room, where he gratuitously discussed with the grand jurors their failure to indict."

"And without any request from the grand jury," the ruling went on, "he then suggested to it that the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term would be willing to come before it and provide it with a further charge on the law, if it so desired."

According to the court records, one grand juror questioned the usefulness of such a gesture on the ground that a vote already had been taken and the matter disposed of, but the special prosecutor insisted that additional instructions from the judge might enable the grand jury "to adequately reach a judgment on the matter, adequately and finally reach a judgment on the matter."

This was done, the Appellate Division said, notwithstanding the fact that the grand jury had done just that—"reached, voted on and recorded its determination."

The special prosecutor then retired from the jury room and a vote was taken. "Only three of the grand jurors voted to receive further instructions," the appellate justices said, and "despite the fact that there was no request by the grand jury as a body to receive any further instructions, both the special prosecutor and the justice presiding at the extraordinary special and trial term appeared before the grand jury on a subsequent date and delivered a further charge."

NARROW VOTE TO INDICT

The grand jury then took another vote and decided to indict Mr. Groh by the minimum margin—12 to 7.

The appellate justice said: "Aside from the fact that we view these 'further instructions' to have been incorrect on the law, as they seemed to indicate to the grand jurors that they have no alternative except to indict, we believe that the methods employed, although no doubt well-motivated, were coercive in fact and, if permitted to go unchecked, would tend to destroy both the value and purpose of our grand jury system."

The justices added that "under the facts of this case, it was improper for either the special prosecutor of the court to have interceded in the proceedings once the grand jury had voted to dismiss." And, they said, "to sanction such a procedure" would "permit prosecutors in the future to coerce or badger grand jurors to change their solemnly-arrived-at determinations."

The justices suggested that Mr. Groh apply again to Justice Howard A. Jones of State Supreme Court, who had twice previously refused to dismiss the charges.

"In the light of the views here expressed," the Appellate Division said, "the learned justice at the extraordinary special and trial term may wish to reconsider his determination should an application be made therefor."

In denying motions for dismissal on March 4 and March 15, Justice Jones had made it clear he would welcome submittal of the controversy to the Appellate Division, "there apparently being no precedent" on which he "might rely in resolving these questions."

KEENAN'S REACTION

Commenting on the decision, Mr. Keenan said yesterday: "I certainly agree that the grand jury should not be badgered, and obviously, I don't think we did. What we did was well-intentioned and well-motivated and I'm not going to quarrel with the decision."

The special prosecutor added that he might try now to present the case again before another grand jury, he might apply to Justice Jones for permission to present the case again, or he might intervene when Judge Groh moves again for dismissal before Justice Jones.

Marvin B. Segal, Judge Groh's lawyer, said yesterday he would promptly submit another application for dismissal to Justice Jones.

"The Appellate Division decision," he said "is a strong suggestion, if not a directive, to dismiss. To try the case now would be a useless procedure since the Appellate Justices have made it clear that any conviction after trial in a lower court would be reversed."

Mr. Segal said that he had not gone directly to the Appellate Division because he had not seen the grand jury's minutes and so had been unaware of the actions of the special prosecutor and Justice Sandler. "It was an extraordinary procedure by two very able men" he said. "It's impermissible for a judge to go into a grand jury room."

Justice Sandler said yesterday that he had gone to the grand jury purely for the convenience of the jurors. "It was easier for me to go to them in Queens," he said, "than to have all of them to come to my courtroom in Manhattan."

In welcoming the appellate decision, Judge Groh—who was elected a judge of the Civil Court shortly before his indictment—said yesterday he was "proud to be a member of the system that treats defendants equitably."

UNDER INDICTMENT

GM, OTHER UNLIKELY CRITICS ACCUSE GRAND JURIES OF ABUSING RIGHTS THEY ARE SUPPOSED TO PROTECT

(By Carol H. Falk)

WASHINGTON.—For years, complaints of abuse by grand juries came mostly from antiwar activists or other dissenters. Now some unlikely and powerful allies are joining this "minority" cause.

Businessmen, attorneys and politicians who have had personal experience as grand jury witnesses in the post-Watergate era are throwing their influential weight behind legislation that would provide more protection for potential defendants called before grand juries. With this backing, sponsors are optimistic that such a bill can be adopted by the current Congress.

The old and the new critics contend that a grand jury seldom, in practice, serves its historic function as an independent shield to protect citizens against unjustified prosecutions by the government. Rather, they say, it usually does the prosecutor's bidding and, in the hands of a ruthless or ambitious government attorney, can be a sword to harass, intimidate or indict for political or publicity reasons.

SOME RECENT RECRUITS

The latest recruits to the cause range from the American Bar Association, which has endorsed a number of legislative restraints on grand juries and is due in August to vote on further recommendations, to General Motors Corp., which is resisting subpoenas from a grand jury investigating its taxes. A GM lawyer complained this week that the government was treating the matter like a "gangster case."

"Now we hear the hue and cry we should have heard when poor folks were objecting to grand-jury tactics," says Oscar Goodman, a Las Vegas defense attorney. The lesson that is hitting home, in effect, is one cited by Irving Younger a professor at Cornell University Law School and himself a former federal prosecutor: "You protect the rights of the miserable and friends precisely so that you have rights when it's your turn."

This doesn't mean, of course, that support for protective legislation is unanimous. Attorney General Griffin Bell says he is opposed to one key change: a provision that would permit grand-jury witnesses to be accompanied by their attorneys. He says he worries about creating a system of "two trials" because lawyers could raise or get their clients to raise the same kind of objections that can be raised in a courtroom.

MANY RIGHTS DON'T APPLY

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution provides that a suspect can't be "held to answer" for a serious federal crime unless he is first indicted by a grand jury. The grand jury, a panel of citizens to whom the prosecutor presents evidence, operates in secret, theoretically for the protection of those who testify but who aren't themselves charged with any crime. Yet over the years, courts have held that many of the protections guaranteed a suspect by the Bill of Rights don't apply when he is called before a grand jury.

For example, besides having to face the grand jury without his lawyer present, a grand-jury witness can be forced to testify in exchange for a grant of immunity—a guarantee that his testimony won't be used to prosecute him. If he rejects immunity and insists on his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, a witness can be cited for contempt and jailed. Plainly, abuses by grand juries can cost individual witnesses heavily in time, money and reputation.

While complaints about overreaching by grand juries have been raised for years, the outcry from dissidents intensified after passage of the 1970 Crime Control Act, which gave federal prosecutors additional power to use grand juries against organized crime, as well as against political leftists. Ironically, some of the law-and-order Nixon administration officials who were accused of encouraging the use of grand juries against dissenters in the early 1970s found they didn't like the system much when they themselves had to face grand juries on Watergate-related charges.

ISSUE CONCERNING ATTORNEYS

Former Nixon Treasury Secretary John Connally has urged that grand-jury witnesses be given the right to be accompanied by their attorneys. He and other high officials who were accused of wrongdoing have also complained that promises of lenient treatment can be used to coerce a potential defendant into false implication of higherups. Mr. Connally was acquitted in a 1975 trial of charges that he accepted bribes from a giant dairy co-op. The trial jury apparently didn't believe the story of his chief accuser, Jake Jacobsen, who had been allowed to plead guilty to reduced charges in return for the testimony on which the Connally indictment was based.

General Motors is raising an increasingly discussed issue: the extent to which supposedly secret grand-jury material can be shared with Executive Branch agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service, that provide technical assistance to the grand jury. GM contends, in court papers filed in April, that the IRS is using a grand jury's subpœna powers to conduct a tax investigation that the agency should be handling on its own.

In moving to quash the subpœnas or else to restrict the use of the data, GM cited a ruling last November by a federal appeals court in San Francisco. The appeals court found that a lower court had gone too far in granting 24 IRS employees access to materials turned over to a grand jury by J. R. Simplot Co. and Simplot Industries Inc. of Boise, Idaho; John Simplot, who controls the companies, made headlines last year with a huge default on potato futures.

Noting that the grand jury has powers justified by its function "in accusing individuals of criminal acts," the court said that justification doesn't apply "when grand-jury material is used for civil tax liability."

The government, for its part, says it hasn't any intention of using the information sought from GM for civil tax purposes. Rather, the Justice Department maintains it is investigating allegations of criminal activity and needs the tax agency's expertise. As for the Simplot case, the government has asked the appeals court to withdraw its opinion, suggesting that the issue is moot because Mr. Simplot and his two companies last month pleaded "no contest" to charges of criminal tax violations.

Antitrust cases also are providing recruits for the cause of grand-jury restraint. William Lurie, general counsel of International Paper Co., which has been a target in several industry-wide grand-jury investigations, complains of "extremely vague and broad" subpœnas covering as much as 15 years of company records. A particular frustration, he adds, is that "there is no mechanism to insure that anything . . . that would tend to negate guilt is brought to the attention of the grand jury."

Mr. Lurie asserts that "you need due-process protection in grand-jury proceedings just as much as in a trial—or more," because "sometimes the economic risks are so great you can't afford to go to trial and bet your company."

He explains that "unless your case is 100% pure," there is a strong incentive to settle a broad antitrust indictment with a "no-contest" plea. That's because, if the company risks a trial and is convicted on government antitrust charges, the verdict can be used as the basis for costly treble-damage claims by private plaintiffs.

UNHAPPY ATTORNEYS

Attorneys, as well as their clients, have been complaining of grand-jury harassments. Mr. Goodman of Las Vegas heads a committee of criminal defense lawyers that aids attorneys subpoenaed by grand juries seeking information about their clients. An attorney who himself is being pressured by a grand jury isn't likely to be effective in representing his client, Mr. Goodman asserts.

He cites examples of defense attorneys subpoenaed to testify about relations with their clients, including the amount and the source of their fees. Federal appeals courts have differed on whether this is a proper area of inquiry, but at least some lawyers have been cited for contempt and jailed for refusing to provide the information.

Charles Berry, an Albuquerque attorney, was subpoenaed to deliver five years' worth of his law firm's financial records to a grand jury looking into allegations of illegal campaign contributions and bribery of former state officials. He explains that records of over 5,000 clients were involved and that some of the records dealt with cases not yet resolved. The financial records included the names of clients and, in certain instances, references to witnesses interviewed.

A LAWYER JAILED

Mr. Berry refused to yield the documents, was cited for contempt and "sat in jail six months." After losing all his appeals, he turned over the records and was released last December. A government attorney says that Mr. Berry himself was never a target of the inquiry and that the grand jury wasn't interested in the names of his clients. Rather, the law firm was thought to have had "some business relationships" with a former state official who was being investigated. The man was indicated but was acquitted in a trial.

Some critics, contending that grand juries don't serve their constitutional "shield" role and are a waste of taxpayers' money, argue that they should be abolished. Most critics, however, are willing to settle for changes intended to protect witnesses better. They note that many prosecutors, including Richard Gerstein, the state attorney in Miami who is leading the ABA drive for grand-jury legislation, have operated successfully for years with self-imposed restraints.

In Congress, several lawmakers are promoting legislative treatments for the most common complaints. Rep. Joshua Eilberg, a Pennsylvania Democrat, has introduced a measure that would allow lawyers in grand-jury rooms to advise witnesses, though it wouldn't let them raise formal objections or address the jury.

"USE" IMMUNITY PROVISION

The Eilberg bill, cosponsored by Rep. Hamilton Fish, a New York Republican, would also eliminate the so-called use immunity permitted by the 1970 crime law. A grand-jury witness granted use immunity can't be prosecuted on the basis of his own testimony but can be charged if prosecutors show they are relying on evidence from other sources. The Eilberg bill would provide that someone testifying under immunity couldn't be prosecuted under any circumstances for the action involved.

The bill also provides that a witness who refused to testify after being granted immunity couldn't be jailed for contempt for more than six months. Currently a balky witness can be jailed for the full 18-month life of a federal grand jury and then can be called before new grand juries and jailed repeatedly.

The Eilberg bill would also give the grand jurors more independence from the prosecutor by empowering them to hire their own lawyer. Attorney General Bell says he might go along with the idea of having a judge appoint such a lawyer for the grand jury, if the judge felt it necessary.

A somewhat similar measure has been introduced in the Senate by James Abourezk, a South Dakota Democrat, and a bill sponsored by Rep. John Conyers, a Michigan Democrat, would go further—letting a witness remain silent without being cited for contempt.

Thus far, a House Judiciary subcommittee led by Mr. Eilberg has held several days of hearings on grand-jury legislation, and it has scheduled more this month. The aim is to get a bill set for floor action by year-end.

FEDERAL JUDGE DISMISSES LITTON FRAUD INDICTMENT

(By Jane Seaberry)

A federal judge in Alexandria yesterday dismissed an indictment charging fraud against Litton Industries, ruling that U.S. prosecuors abused the grand jury system in threatening Litton with the indictment if the company did not agree to government proposals.

The order of U.S. District Court Judge Albert V. Bryan, Jr. also prohibits prosecutors from reindicting Litton on the charge because "prosecutorial discretion (was) abused.

Litton, a major defense contractor, was indicated April 6 on a charge of fraudulently overcharging the Navy $37 million for building three nuclear attack submarines between 1968 and 1971.

This indictment came after an attempt to indict Litton in 1975 failed when the term of the special grand jury called in March of that year solely to investigate Litton expired.

But in April, 1976, the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals awarded a $17.3 million judgement to Litton from the Navy in connection with the contract.

Bryan said in his opinion that after the 1975 attempt to indict Litton failed, prosecutors, in an attempt to get the award revised, continued to threaten to indict Litton if it did not agree to reopen the appeals board proceedings.

"What is reprehensible here is the threat to use, as well as the actual use of, the grand jury as a bargaining tool in an effort to upset the final civil award to which Litton was entitled," Bryan said.

Prosecutors also had two FBI agents summarize evidence to the April 6 grand jury rather than formally present information and witnesses as in the previous grand jury, which did not indict Litton, Bryan said.

"This is further evidence of the cynical view that has been taken of the grand jury in this case, namely, as a mere echo of the office of the U.S. attorney," Bryan said.

"I think the court misread our action," said U.S. Attorney William B. Cummings, who, with the Justice Department, headed the two-year investigation of Litton.

Bryan "assumed that there were motivations, a desire on our part to get this thing back to the [appeals] board and use the grand jury to bludgeon them. Nothing could be further from the truth," Cummings said.

CALIFORNIA HAS LEARNED TO SIDESTEP THE SYSTEM

(By Robert Lindsey)

LOS ANGELES—Almost 20,000 felony cases will be prosecuted in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County this year. But only about 50—one in 400—will be heard by a grand jury. For the vast majority, this is the procedure followed in Los Angeles County and the 57 other counties in California:

Within 48 hours of a defendant's arrest on a felony, he must be arraigned before a municipal court judge who will schedule what is called a "preliminary hearing" for him, usually within a week of his arrest. The defendant may or may not be released on bail.

At the preliminary hearing, the defendant's lawyer is present. The district attorney is required to bring a complaint against the defendant, producing evidence sufficient to convince a municipal judge that a crime has been committed, and that there is reason to believe the accused person committed it and should stand trial in superior court.

At the hearing, the defendant may question witnesses and challenge the substance and legality of the evidence—whether it was seized lawfully, for example. On occasion judges dismiss cases as too weak during these preliminary hearings. But in practice, most prosecutors present enough evidence to persuade a judge. And most judges appear to give the prosecution the benefit of the doubt in determining whether there is sufficient cause to believe the accused should stand trial.

Nevertheless, defendants under this system appear to have an edge over those processed by grand jury. "There are tremendous advantages," Kenneth Kahn, a Los Angeles criminal lawyer, observed. "It lets the defense in on the ground floor. You can cross-examine witnesses, you see the evidence they have against you, and only legally admissible evidence is permitted. In a grand jury, they can use all kinds of garbage as evidence, and the grand jury becomes simply a rubber stamp for the prosecution."

Once the accused person has been bound over to face trial in the Superior Court, which handles felony trials, the district attorney must file a document that legally is the equivalent of a bill of indictment—a list of allegations called an "information." Based on these allegations, the defendant is arraigned in Superior Court, enters a plea, and the trial process begins.

What about the other 50 cases a year? In California, because of statutes and tradition reaching back to the Gold Rush era more than a century ago, grand juries spend most of their time not as prosecutorial organs indicting accused criminals, but as community watchdogs to review the operations of county government and attempt to uncover inefficiency, waste and corruption. Only in a small fraction of felony cases do they indict the alleged criminals.

But the district attorney has the option to bring cases to trial through a grand jury if he chooses. According to Joseph Siler, the legal adviser to the Los Angeles County grand jury, the jury here generally becomes involved in criminal cases only in the following categories:

Major frauds and other complex white-collar crimes involving expensive documents or bookeeping records, many suspects and many lawyers, or other complicating factors that make presentation of allegations difficult or cumbersome at a preliminary hearing.

Crimes alleged to have been committed by public officials or policemen.

Cases in which the prosecution wants to keep an investigation secret, usually to protect witnesses who might be fearful of their safety, where there are still some suspects at large and it is deemed necessary to keep the prosecution secret. Major organized crime cases usually fall in this category.

Cases involving prominent people or those in which the district attorney has other reasons to believe extensive publicity from a preliminary hearing might make it difficult to find an impartial jury. Many of Southern California's most famous defendants of the recent past—Sirhan Sirhan, the murderer of Robert Kennedy; Charles Manson and his crime clan; Patricia Hearst, and other celebrities and those involved in highly publicized cases—have been processed through the grand jury rather than in the "information" procedure.

Because many cases that go before the grand jury are complex financial frauds, jurors can spend up to 40 percent of the time hearing criminal cases, Mr. Siler said. But he said most effort goes into local government. "California has a reputation for extremely honest local government, and I think one of the reasons for this is our grand jury system," he said.

THE PROSECUTORS SEEMS TO HAVE TAKEN OVER

(By Marvin E. Frankel and Gary P. Naftalis)

The notion of the grand jury as a shield for the innocent—presumably at the heart of the reasons for its inclusion in the Bill of Rights—is continually echoed in judicial opinions. Relatively recently the Supreme Court stated:

"Historically [the grand jury] has been regarded as a primary security to the innocent against hasty, malicious and oppressive persecution; it serves the invaluable function in our society of standing between the accuser and the accused . . . to determine whether a charge is founded upon reason or was dictated by an intimidating power or by malice and personal ill will."

Apt as that description may have seemed for the People's Panel in the 18th century, it certainly is not much realized in practice in the 20th. Day in and day out, the grand jury affirms what the prosecutor calls upon it to affirm—investigating as it is led, ignoring what it is never advised to notice, failing to indict or indicting as the prosecutor "submits" that it should. Not surprisingly, the somewhat technical, somewhat complex, occasionally arcane language of indictments is drafted by the prosecutor and handed to the grand jury foreman or forelady for the necessary signature, which is almost invariably affixed. As Federal judge William J. Campbell points out: "Today, the grand jury is the total captive of the prosecutor who, if he is candid, will concede that he can indict anybody, at any time, for almost anything, before any grand jury."

It could not more than rarely be otherwise. In a busy, densely populated, elaborately organized society—where crime is rife, criminals are tough, many wrongs are mysterious and concealed from laymen—law enforcement is inescapably for professionals. The very notion of the grand jury as beneficient for a free society would be subverted by a band of amateurs engaged in sleuthing, summoning, indicting, or not indicting as their "independent" and untutored judgment might dictate. Privacy, security, and reputation would be in steady jeopardy. Sophisticated criminals would be safe; innocent citizens would be less safe.

Those the grand jury "refuses" to indict are likely to be people the prosecution does not want indicted. Many of the cases ending with a "no true bill" are actually instances where a prosecutor feels the need for such backing to support his own view that further proceedings should not be held.

On the other hand, there is active dissatisfaction that the grand jury seldom does more than the prosecutor asks. It is possible that Watergate, at least temporarily, has added impetus to this sentiment. Rightly or wrongly, it was thought that the Washington grand jury was not being led to sweep broadly or dig deeply in the months before the first trial at which Judge John J. Sirica presided. It appeared to at least some observers that if not for the unusual circumstance of the judge himself insisting upon more intensive inquiries, profound misdeeds might never have come to be prosecuted.

There is nothing necessarily sinister in this. On the contrary, some cases in which a "crime" has literally been committed—the youthful seducer of a female legally too young to consent; the impulsive, seemingly one-time shoplifter—are for one reason or another difficult for the law-trained official to overlook. The grand jury's dispensing power, kin to the power of a trial jury to acquit the technically "guilty," supplies some needed play in the joints of a system not always supple. But saving graces of this sort do not alter the fact that the grand jury rarely stands in the path of a prosecutor determined to indict. Perhaps it is not realistic to hope for anything sharply different. Indeed, few reformers urge the serious pursuit of this theoretical function.

Though they seldom occur, perplexing and dramatic cases sometimes arise when the several main participants—prosecutor, grand jury, and judge—disagree about whether a prosecution should properly be instituted or dropped. The grand jury has an absolute veto over whether to indict. Does the same apply to the prosecutor? So-called runaway grand juries in state courts have succeeded from time to time in bringing prosecutions without the aid, or even over the opposition, of the regularly designated prosecutor.

So, too, special prosecutors have been appointed where the regularly elected or appointed officials have failed to act. The corrupt political machine of Boss Tweed in New York City was successfully pursued by a grand jury that acted independently of, and in spite of, the district attorney. Some 50 years later, Thomas E. Dewey was appointed special prosecutor of New York City because of the seeming nonfeasance of the regularly elected district attorney.

Such unusual cases characteristically involve matters of bitter conflict in the community. Like most "hard" or "great" cases, they tend to make somewhat special, unique, or possibly "bad" law. In any event, state courts remain unclear, and perhaps are shifting even now, on whether judges have the power to appoint special prosecutors to pursue cases the grand jury, but not the regular prosecutor, deems appropriate.

In the Federal picture, the court-appointed special prosecutor has been substantially unknown. In recent times, a Federal rule of criminal procedure has required that an indictment be "signed by the attorney for the government." This sounds like an inescapable and unambiguous barrier to the grand jury's proceeding without that attorney. But people learned in the law have seen means of escaping and possibly overriding barriers that appear insurmountable at first. While the barriers here still stand, the debate may not be over.

On occasion, judges have tried to intervene and prevent prosecutors from dropping cases. But the practical upshot of recent Federal court decisions seems to be that prosecutors can end prosecutions substantially without judicial interference—unless some plain impropriety or dereliction is discovered. The reservation stands as a cautionary sign, a warning that there may always be a demand for an explanation and an exposure of the prosecutorial decision to public view. But the usual response of a judge to a prosecutor's decision to withdraw an indictment is likely to be relatively unquestioning acquiescence.

In the foreseeable future there will probably be few runaway grand juries and few instances of interference by judges with the prosecutor's plenary control over decisions to begin or withdraw criminal cases. The exceptions will probably arise in situations of uncommonly deep and bitter conflict—where alignments are not predictable and it is not possible to know in advance whose will be the voices of the good or bad guys.

For that among a host of reasons, the precise lines of grand jury and prosecutor authority may never be drawn with finality. The uncertainty has to date been reasonably tolerable. It may even be healthful for the pertinent law to stay a little loose and incomplete, rather than try to freeze an unknown future too hard too far in advance.

MR. EILBERG'S BILL CALLS FOR REFORM IN THE FEDERAL PRACTICE

(By Tom Goldstein)

Since the grand jury was imported to this country from England during the Colonial era, an intricate and sophisticated body of law has developed that attempts to balance the interest of individual freedom with the interest of the state in uncovering criminal activity. In the last few years, critics of the grand jury contend that the balance has tipped against the individual, and dozens of proposals to change the grand jury have been made. The following represents some of the issues presented in Congressman Eilberg's bill and in other legislation introduced in Congress and state legislatures:

Protecting the witness. At the urging of the Nixon Administration, Congress in 1970 narrowed the Federal immunity law. That law, which was immediately copied by half the states, grants a grand jury witness "use" immunity—the witness may be compelled to testify but this compelled testimony may not be used against him in a criminal proceeding.

A year later, New York enacted a "transactional" immunity statute that is broader than the Federal one. Efforts to adopt a similar law on the Federal level are now under way. Under "transactional" immunity, a witness who is compelled to testify may not subsequently be prosecuted—even upon totally independent evidence—for any transaction mentioned in his testimony.

Many prosecutors feel that "transactional" immunity leaves open the possibility that a heinous crime could go unpunished because, during grand jury testimony, a witness who was the perpetrator gave peripheral evidence concerning it. Opponents of "use" immunity argue that it leaves a witness excessively exposed to further prosecution. New witnesses may be found and new information may be gathered as a result of the witness's own testimony before the grand jury.

Allowing lawyers inside. In Federal courts and in most states, lawyers are excluded from the grand jury room. But a lawyer can remain outside the door, and his client can excuse himself from the proceeding to confer with him. Most prosecutors want it that way. Otherwise, they argue, there would be too much opportunity for obstruction and delay.

Defense lawyers want in. They feel it makes little sense to have a witness traveling in and out of the grand jury room. The mere presence of a lawyer, they say, would curb improper questioning by a prosecutor.

Replacing the prosecutor. A variety of proposals would replace or supplement the prosecutor as legal adviser to a grand jury. Instead, there would be an independent office of the grand jury counsel to instruct the grand jury on the law and pass on the admissibility of evidence and competency of witnesses.

Proponents of such an office say that it is unfair to allow the prosecutor to control all the legal information received by a grand jury, especially since the grand jury should be at liberty to disobey a prosecutor's wishes. Opponents say there is no guarantee that the advise of this impartial counsel will be any better than a prosecutor's or that he will be any less likely to abuse his office.

Guarding against leaks. Grand jury proceedings are secret, but periodically there have been unauthorized disclosures. The news that someone is a target of a grand jury investigation—especially if he is never indicted—can be devastating to his reputation.

Some states make it unlawful for anyone but witnesses and lawyers to reveal what has taken place in the grand jury; in Federal court, leaking of information by prosecutors, stenographers or grand jurors is punishable by contempt of court.

Only rarely has anyone been punished for grand jury leaks, and in order to deter them there have been several proposals to stiffen the penalties. But many prosecutors say that the difficulty in investigating and prosecuting violations of secrecy is unrelated to the severity of the penalties imposed. The principal reason, they say, is that the investigation inevitably collides with the protection of a free press guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Since it is not unknown for an errant prosecutor to do the leaking himself, there have been proposals to empower the court to appoint special independent prosecutors to investigate the leaks.

Screening indictments. With the current emphasis on prosecutorial abuse, proposals for greater judicial oversight of grand juries have emerged. One suggestion would have a judge—but not the judge who empaneled the grand Jury—screen all indictments before they are filed. If the judge found insufficient evidence or improper procedures used in the grand jury, the indictment would be dismissed before it was made public, thus sparing the defendant publicity that might damage his reputation.

But most prosecutors feel this would unnecessarily encumber the proceedings. There are not enough grand jury reporters and typists to transcribe all the minutes and not enough judges to review all the proceedings, they say. Moreover, they argue, only a minuscule—though highly publicized—number of indictments are dismissed for legal insufficiency.

Changing the grand jury size. No one is quite sure how the number developed, but from its origins in England a grand jury has consisted of 23 citizens. That number has been carried over to Federal courts and to many state courts. Twelve votes are required to return an indictment, and 16 jurors make up a quorum.

There are those who argue that the current size is more a matter of historic precedent than necessity. They feel that reducing a grand jury's size would be economical and would focus greater responsibility on individual grand jurors. Opponents of this change feel it would make it harder to obtain a quorum and inhibit the expression of divergent views on the jury.

THE GRAND JURY UNDER EXAMINATION; IT HAS FALLEN ON HARD TIMES

The grand jury—a panel of citizens empowered, and in Federal law and that of 21 states solely empowered, to bring criminal indictments—has recently fallen if not into disrepute at least into controversy. In New York, for example, a number of indictments voted by grand juries advised by former special prosecutor Maurice H. Nadjari have been dismissed for causes including insufficient or illegally obtained evidence and improperly presented cases. Federal prosecutors have allegedly used grand juries to harass radical causes.

A bill introduced in Congress by Representative Joshua Eilberg, Democrat of Pennsylvania, is due for subcommittee hearings this week. The bill would reform Federal practice in several ways—for example, by permitting witnesses to have lawyers in the grand jury room and by providing review of indictments by a judge before trial. Similar reforms are proposed in New York, where a new law that went into effect last week now requires grand jurors, who were formerly volunteers, to be picked from the same pool as trial jurors.

The articles on this page examine three areas of current concern: the more or less complete prosecutorial control of the grand jury; a number of the reforms now contemplated by state and Federal legislators; and the manner of bringing criminal charges in California, one of the 29 states that have found it possible to proceed in criminal cases without using the grand jury.

TAX PROBE OF GM GIVEN COURT OKAY

DETROIT—A federal judge ruled today that a grand jury may investigate the possibility that General Motors Corp. tried to cheat the federal government out of millions of dollars in taxes.

But U.S. District Court Judge James P. Churchill also ordered federal prosecutors not to turn over any grand jury evidence to the Internal Revenue Service.

Churchill made the ruling on motions by the world's largest auto maker to throw out subpoenas and, failing that, to limit the investigation.

GM said the grand jury proceeding was an unlawful attempt by the IRS to collect money in what should be a civil proceeding.

The government had accused GM of trying to block the IRS investigation and had said the grand jury was needed for a criminal probe.

The decision, delivered orally from the bench, was a half-victory for GM. The firm had asked the court to prevent grand jury evidence from being used by the IRS if its motion to throw out the subpoenas were denied.

Churchill said information obtained by the grand jury through its subpoenas may not be given to the IRS except where the grand jury itself needs the technical help of IRS employees. Such disclosures may only be made with his approval in advance, he said.

The judge also said that none of the information may be given to top IRS employees in order to help the grand jury return an indictment. He ruled further that a special government attorney on loan from the IRS may participate in the grand jury proceedings. But Churchill warned the attorney not to disclose any evidence to the IRS. General Motors had asked that the attorney be barred from the jury room.

U.S. Atty. Philip Van Dam said he was satisfied with the court's decision and would reconvene the proceedings within a few days.

Attorneys for GM said they were pleased with the restrictions the court placed on jury disclosure but would review the full decision before deciding whether to appeal.

The government turned an audit of GM's income taxes for 1972–1975 into a criminal investigation last year while accusing GM of trying to "stymie" IRS agents in their work. The word "stymie" appears in IRS manuals as a condition for using a grand jury.

GM, maintaining its innocence of criminal wrongdoing, charged the government with demanding impossibly large numbers of documents in an impossibly short time.

The dispute concerns the tax treatment of parts used in production but not part of a finished automobile. An example would be a tool bit for which spares are kept on hand.

GM has taken deductions for such parts when it bought them, regardless of when the part was used or if it ever was used. The company said the IRS approved that method in 1944 and 1971.

The IRS now wants GM to take the deductions in the year the parts are used.

The government has not said how much it believes GM might owe. GM paid more than $4.5 billion in income taxes for the years in question.

BELL IGNORING REFORM OF JURIES, EILBERG SAYS

(By L. Stuart Ditzen)

WASHINGTON.—Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa) yesterday fired off a new volley in what now has become an open war on the Carter Administration by Philadelphia's congressmen.

The target yesterday was Attorney General Griffin Bell.

Eilberg accused Bell of reneging on a pledge to support grand jury reform and sharply criticized Bell for sending an assistant to discuss that subject before Congress, rather than appearing in person.

"I must express my sense of outrage that Attorney General Bell is not here today," Eilberg said at the opening of a hearing on grand jury reform. The fact that he has deliberately absented himself from these hearings is discourtesy . . . an affront to the Congress . . . and an abdication of his responsibility as the chief law enforcement officer of the land.

Eilberg accused Bell of taking a position of "total opposition" to grand jury reform, a contradiction, Eilberg said, of the public position taken by Bell at his confirmation hearing in the Senate.

A spokesman for Bell said Eilberg's criticism was "unwarranted," but declined further comment.

OTHER FRONTS

Philadelphia's four Democratic Congressmen, with Eilberg generally acting as spokesman, already are engaged in battle with the Carter Administration on other fronts.

Their most pronounced grievance is the closing of the Frankford Arsenal in Philadelphia by the Army. Vice President Walter Mondale made a promise late in the campaign last year to keep the arsenal open. After the election, the Carter Administration said it was too late to make good on Mondale's promise—the closing of the arsenal was too far along.

The Philadelphia congressmen—Eilberg, Robert N.C. Nix Sr., Michael O. Myers and Raymond Lederer—sent a letter to Carter early this month accusing him of "idle promises" and doing "absolutely nothing" for Frankford Arsenal.

Carter responded with an itemized list of things he said his Administration had done to help Philadephia.

The congressman immediately issued a point-by-point rebuttal.

A separate battle concerns the Carter Administration failure—to date to remove David W. Marston, a Republican, as U.S. attorney in Philadelphia.

The Philadelphia congressmen have urged that Marston be ousted in favor of Philadelphia Municipal Court President Judge Joseph R. Glancey, a Democrat. The Administration has not acted.

At one point several weeks ago, Attorney General Bell publicly expressed irritation at the pressure he was getting on the U.S. attorney appointment in Philadelphia. Eilberg, a high-ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, has been offended at what he considers rude handling by Bell on the matter.

EILBERG IS IRRITATED

Eilberg made no attempt to conceal his pique yesterday when Bell failed to show up before Eilberg's subcommittee on immigration, citizenship and international law.

The subcommittee is considering proposals for grand jury reform, a subject near to Eilberg's heart. Eilberg has been shaping reform legislation in this area for several years.

Eilberg is seeking the right for grand jury witnesses to have attorneys with them in the grand jury room. He also wants grand juries to be able to hire their own attorneys if they are dissatisfied with the U.S. attorneys bringing evidence before them. He also wants a six-month limit on jailing of witnesses who refuse to testify before grand juries.

All these concepts were opposed yesterday by Bell's stand-in, Assistant Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti.

Eilberg told him: "Mr. Civiletti, it is now understandable to me why the Attorney General has not appeared here . . . All my fears and apprehensions have been confirmed. Your statement is a virtual restatement of prior positions of the Justice Department—total opposition to all reform, despite repeated public statements by (Bell) for reform . . . From early statements by the attorney general, we were all encouraged that a cooperative effort would be made for reform. We were wrong. For that I am deeply disappointed."

JUDGE VOIDS INDICTMENT OF GROH; SETS STRICT RULES FOR ANY NEW ONE

(by Judith Cummings)

A State Supreme Court justice in Queens yesterday threw out a bribery and grand-larceny indictment against Judge Robert T. Groh of Civil Court and required the special state anti-corruption prosecutor to follow strict conditions in seeking a new indictment.

The prosecutor, John F. Keenan, said he would move within days, in accordance with the instructions of Justice Howard A. Jones, to place the case before a new grand jury.

The seven conditions laid down by Justice Jones included:

That prospective grand jurors be screened for possible prejudice—a routine procedure with trial juries, but unusual for a grand jury.

That in the event of a new indictment there be full disclosure in advance of trial of grand-jury minutes arising from any omnibus or pretrial motions.

That the defendant be given the opportunity to appear and testify on any evidence presented to a new jury.

Justice Jones granted the dismissal of the Groh indictment on a procedural technicality. He acted virtually on the orders of the Appelate Division, which earlier this month sharply criticized Mr. Keenan and Justice Leonard H. Sandler of State Supreme court as having used "coercive" methods in getting the grand jury to indict Judge Groh.

It was the first case prosecuted by Mr. Keenan to raise the questions of overzealous prosecution that dogged his predecessor, Maurice H. Nadjari.

The charges against Mr. Groh, the 61-year-old former Sanitation Commissioner, involved an incident that took place when he was deputy to Borough President Donald R. Manes of Queens. He was charged, in an indictment returned last November, with accepting $10,000 in contributions to Mr. Manes's 1973 campaign from the ITT-Sheraton Corporation in return for arranging for a zoning variance for a motel owned by the company.

"They've already had two bites of the apple and they shouldn't have a third," Judge Groh said following the dismissal, in reference to the prosecution's efforts to get a new indictment. He said that with the charges now dropped, he would assume his elected seat on the Civil Court bench today.

Judge Groh was referring to the fact that the grand jury originally had voted not to indict him on the charges, but reversed itself on the minimum margin of 12 to 7 after Mr. Keenan, without their having asked him to, personally discussed with them their failure to indict.

This action, coupled with Justice Sandler's giving them additional instructions, gave rise to the Appellate Division accusation that the two men had "improperly interfered" with the grand jury's decision.

"The papers submitted by both sides," the five-member appellate panel said in its decision, "reveal the presence of procedural irregularities going to the very heart and integrity of the grand jury system."

At the same time, however, the panel noted that Mr. Keenan and Justice Sandler had apparently been "well-intentioned."

Disclosure of grand-jury minutes in the case had shown that jurors were angered at being told by the prosecutor that, because of "insufficient evidence," they could not consider a charge against Mr. Manes in connection with the same alleged bribery incident—suggesting that the jury felt if it could not produce indictments in its own way, it would produce no indictments at all.

Judge Groh's lawyer, Marvin B. Segal, said he would not rule out the possibility of an appeal of Justice Jone's decision allowing the case to be resubmitted. It is considered likely, however, that the case will be permitted to run its course before any appeal would be sought.

Justice Jones required among his other instructions that the actual taking of testimony in a resubmittal of the case be started no later than July 29.

THE LAW

REFORMING GRAND JURIES

Every so often, like an air bubble from a sunken ship, a new bit of law reform arises out of the hulk of the Nixon Administration. A U.S. House judiciary subcommittee is currently taking expert testimony on the venerable and awesome grand jury system, which Nixon's Justice Department had used to intimidate its New Left opponents, and many legal authorities are calling for change. Another alteration in the 800-year evolution of the grand jury, which once served to protect the innocent from overzealous prosecutors, appears imminent.

From 1970 to 1973, agents of the Justice Department's Internal Security Division (since abolished) convened an estimated 100 grand juries in 80 cities in pursuit of assorted radicals, including associates of Daniel Ellsberg, Phillip Berrigan and Abbie Hoffman. Actual convictions were rare—but jail terms for contempt of the grand jury (refusal to answer questions) were not. Complaints about federal grand jury abuse have not been confined to the left, however. Last week General Motors Corp. Attorney George Moscarino accused IRS agents of abusing the system by summoning GM employees before a Detroit grand jury on what he considers to be a civil tax matter, presumably so they could be forced to testify without the aid of an attorney. In general, says U.S. Judge William J. Campbell, "the grand jury is the total captive of the prosecutor, who, if he is candid, will concede that he can indict anybody, at any time, for almost anything, before any grand jury."

In a book published last week, The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial, U.S. Judge Marvin Frankel and Attorney Gary Naftalis conclude: "The Grand Jury has served too often to harass the unorthodox and the unpopular. "Several reforms suggested by Frankel and Naftalis appear in a bill submitted by U.S. Representative Joshua Eilberg. The proposed law would:

(1) Allow a witness to bring his attorney into the grand jury room.

(2) Limit incarceration for refusal to answer to six months (theoretically, there is no limit now).

(3) Completely immunize a witness from prosecution for any offense discussed during his appearance. (Under a 1970 law, federal attorneys can force a suspect to talk and then prosecute for admitted crimes if they can find independent proof elsewhere).

Attorney General Griffin Bell is opposed to the section permitting a witness to bring a lawyer, arguing that this "would mean two trials instead of one," but he is on record as favoring grand jury reform in principle. So are the American Bar Association and American Law Institute. Indeed, some trial lawyers have called for the abolition of grand juries as outmoded and superfluous. That would involve repealing the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of a grand jury's consideration before indictment, however, and no one has dared to tamper with the Bill of Rights in nearly 200 years.

Corporate Complaints of Grand Jury Abuses

(By Nicholas von Hoffman)

It's almost inspirational to read that corporations like General Motors and International Paper are taking a belated but certainly welcome interest in civil liberties. It appears that the giant automobile manufacturer is getting the same kind of federal grand jury abuse which so many politically and socially unorthodox people have been getting for many years.

A federal grand jury investgiating G.M. for taxes has treated the world's largest manufacturing company with such rudeness that one of its lawyers complained the matter was being handled like a "gangster case." Evidently G.M. still hasn't gotten it through the corporate skull bone that when you allow gangsters to be mistreated you set yourself up for the same kind of kicking around. Irving Younger, a Cornell University law prof. tried to explain the principle by saying, "You project the rights of the miserable and the friendless precisely so that you have rights when it's your turn." (The Wall Street Journal, June 23.) Perhaps now some of those G.M. executives with the slow brain muscles will understand that being a stickler for constitutional rights and due process isn't motivated by a desire to be soft on crooks but to protect one's self against the eventualities which an all-powerful centralized state can bring down on the head of the guilty and the innocent alike.

The two companies are complaining about different but overlapping grand jury abuses. G.M. objects to evidence collected through the grand jury's subpoena power for one purpose being turned over to a government agency to be used against the company for a different purpose. This goes to the question of how secret grand jury testimony and evidence should be in general.

One of the reasons the grand jury exists at all is to protect the citizenry against promiscuous, frivolous, reckless and vengeful prosecution by the government. It is supposed to act as a screen or a filter to stop the government from taking to trial people against whom there obviously isn't enough evidence to convict. A trial is, after all, a terrible thing for a defendant, both to his purse and his reputation. Thus one of the major functions of a grand jury is defeated if somebody's reputation is ruined by the release and leaking of evidence or testimony either to a government agency or a newspaper. As G. M. found out, in the hands of Justice Department attorneys the sacred seal of grand jury secrecy is an on-and-off again thing observed to suit the government's convenience, not the citizen's rights.

The International Paper Co. is indignant over the use of "extremely vague and broad" subpoenas, or what the radicals used to call a fishing expedition. This is hard enough for a large corporation but it can be devastating for the impecunious individual. In recent years there have been several shocking cases of lesbian women being asked about the private lives of their friends or acquaintances under pain of going to jail for contempt of court. Several have chosen the slammer.

This goes to the controversy over the Justice Department using grand juries as an investigatory tool. The juries allow a district attorney to do what he ordinarily can't constitutionally do . . . grill witnesses under oath about anything that suits the D.A.'s prosecutorial fancy without a defense lawyer present. Moreover as the law now reads many a potential defendant can be stripped of his Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination by a ruthless D.A.

Various bills have been introduced in Congress to make it somewhat more difficult to use the grand jury as an instrument of government policy rather than justice. There are proposals to limit incursions against the Fifth Amendment and to facilitate grand juries kicking federal prosecutors out of their hearing rooms and hiring their own lawyers. Whether grand jurors can be taught not to be stooges for the D.A. remains to be seen, but it at least ought to be tried.

The likes of General Motors would like to see witnesses have the right to bring counsel into the grand jury room. That might be a good idea if everyone had unlimited funds, like G.M., to pay lawyers. For others it would be a tremendous expense akin to enduring the cost of two trials. We already have enough people in the country shooting themselves because they can't afford to get well and face the doctor's bills. At this rate we'll replicate the same situation in law; we will be having people pleading guilty because it's too costly to defend themselves.

We should be grateful, I suppose, to General Motors et al for getting interested in grand jury reform. We were getting nowhere with the idea without them and their power, but there's a price. In order to protect individuals in their rights we may have to extend protection to the non-human, non-citizen corporation for which the Bill of Rights was never intended.

GRAND JURY REFORM

There were undoubtedly those who saw a certain irony in the complaints by General Motors last month that the Federal government was abusing the grand jury process by hauling in GM officials to testify under oath about corporate tax matters. In recent times, at least, complaints about grand jury abuses have come most frequently not from the offices of the nation's corporate executives but from political radicals charging grand juries have been employed to quash their activities.

In theory, the grand jury serves a laudable purpose. It allows possible criminal charges against an individual to be screened in secrecy by an independent panel of the accused's peers before they are publicly lodged.

In fact, however, the grand jury has become a tool of the prosecutor. By both establishing the grand jury's agenda and orchestrating the quality and quantity of the evidence presented, the prosecutor almost invariably determines who is and is not indicted.

But the grand jury can still provide valuable protection to individuals and the most prudent course now is to increase those safeguards. At the Federal level, legislation to do this—which could well serve as a model for similar state actions—has been introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.). It received a cool reception from the Carter Administration at a hearing last week but it points in the right direction.

It would repeal the "use" of immunity law enacted at the urging of the Nixon Administration under which witnesses can be compelled to testify before a Federal grand jury and then, despite the constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination, be tried for activities about which they testified as long as the specific testimony is not used. The Eilberg legislation would return the Federal system to "transactional" immunity under which a witness compelled to testify could not later be tried for crimes detailed in that testimony.

The Eilberg legislation would also allow defense attorneys into the grand jury room to advise their clients (now they wait outside the room and their clients can go out to them) and, not incidentally, to monitor the process. A similar proposal for Massachusetts grand juries was recently approved by the state Senate.

Another meritorious provision of the Eilberg legislation would require that a judge screen Federal grand jury indictments prior to their issuance to make sure that they are based upon sufficient admissible evidence and that the procedures were appropriate. The propsal is designed to avoid needless damage to reputations arising from improper indictments.

None of these proposals has won the general approval of prosecutors. Yet none should generally impair prosecutors' work. Whatever the grand jury's original function, in a complex industrial society, where crime is commonplace and crime fighting sophisticated, the professionals—the prosecutors—will play the dominant role. But it is in exactly such a society that sufficient measures must be taken to protect the rights of individuals.

[From the Charlotte Observer, July 11, 1977]

LEAKY SHIELD—GRAND JURIES NEED REPAIR

The constitutional provision for grand juries was intended to protect citizens from repressive government, to place a shield between the prosecutor and the accused.

That function has become obscured, however. It's time for Congress and the states to tackle grand jury reform.

Hearings on one such bill for the federal judicial systems before a House Judiciary subcommittee are about to end. The bill will go before the full House this fall. The Carter administration has announced its opposition to some of the bill's key provisions, contending that grand jury abuse is rare. There is evidence that it may be more common than the administration thinks.

Grand jury witnesses do not enjoy the constitutional protections they'd get in a trial. And the grand jury can become a tool of the government whose power it was meant to check. That became clear during the early '70s, when the U.S. Justice Department used grand juries to harass antiwar activists.

Among the questions Congress must answer are these:

Should witnesses be denied the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination because a judge grants them immunity from prosecution for anything they might tell a grand jury? Under federal law, a grand jury witness can be forced to testify if the judge promises immunity.

Two Charlotte police officers faced that situation recently in a grand jury investigation of alleged illegal police wiretapping. U.S. District Judge James McMillan expressed his disagreement with the law, though he saw no alternative to enforcing it.

"Given a free choice in the matter, I would refuse (to do so)," the judge said. ". . . Locking a person up for not talking is . . . only a small degree removed from other traditional types of torture used to make men talk, such as the rack, the saw, the screw, the water treatment. . . ." We share the judge's distaste for forced testimony.

Should witnesses be denied the presence of an attorney inside the grand jury room?

Presently, witnesses must leave their lawyers outside the hearing room. They must face questioning by the jurors and district attorney on their own, traipsing back and forth to the hallway to seek legal advice. Prosecutors argue that allowing lawyers in would delay things and cause more breaches in grand jury secrecy. We need to hear more arguments pro and con before we take a position on that issue.

Should grand juries be allowed to seek help from independent lawyers and investigators?

Grand juries must rely for impartial legal counsel primarily on the same person who wants them to return indictments: the prosecutor. The availability of advice from an independent attorney would help prevent charges of collusion and make the grand jury system work as it's supposed to.

It's hard to say how widespread grand jury abuses may be. But the present system leaves too much room for them to occur.

Grand Juries: It's Time To Reform or Abolish Them

(By William L. Clay [1])

If grand juries are not abolished, they ought to be altered to curtail the prosecutorial abuses inherent in the present system. The original intent of the grand jury was to protect the innocent who had been accused falsely. It supposedly was conceived as a group of peers deliberating in secrecy to determine if sufficient evidence existed to bring criminal charges against a neighbor.

The idea was transported to this country from England and developed as an intricate and prudent body of law to balance the interest of individual freedom with the interest of the state in protecting society against criminals.

However, in recent years grand juries have been composed almost exclusively of society's elite. The interest of the individual has been totally disregarded as prosecutors use the juries as a personal tool to harass, intimidate and frame those who espouse radical causes or differing political opinions.

Citizens who are targets of grand jury investigations, or more precisely the targets of prosecutors, are denied "due process" of law and most assuredly are not guaranteed the secrecy of the proceedings. In fact, most prosecutors have arrangements with the media to leak derogatory, unsubstantiated testimony to discredit and destroy the accused. In addition, the accused is not permitted legal counsel while appearing before the grand jury, not afforded the basic right to be confronted by his accusers nor is he allowed to cross-examine.

The argument that the proceedings are not adversary is groundless. In this age of "Kojak," investigative reporters hell bent on over-dramatizing, over-exploiting, over-sensationalizing every accusation of crime, a grand jury indictment becomes synonomous with guilt. In my opinion, the present system constitutes a blatant disregard of rights of the individual. Most grand jurors are pawns in the hands of many unscrupulous prosecutors who select what evidence will be considered, which witnesses will be called to testify, who will be granted immunity and which charges will be leveled.

Most indictments are written by the prosecutor independent of consultation with the jurors and then automatically signed by them. In effect, grand juries are no more than rubber stamps placing the onus of guilt on the accused.

There is a real need for the Congress to either reform the system drastically or abolish it. If evidence exists that indicates a person committed a crime, why not take that evidence before the court in a preliminary hearing and give the accused the right to cross-examine?

Why go through the sham, the charade of pretending to be judged by an impartial panel of one's peers? The only justification I see for the continued use of a grand jury would be in the most extreme cases dealing with fraud and other complex white-collar crimes where extensive documents and bookkeeping, suspects, witnesses and lawyers make public presentation difficult and cumbersome; crimes alleged to have been committeed by public officials or policemen; and cases where the protection of witnesses is essential or where some suspects are still at large.

"THE ANSWER TO GRAND JURY ABUSE"

To the Editor:

The Grand Jury has indeed come upon hard times. Critics have ignored its fundamental strength to criticize it for failing to perform a task long since taken up by other bodies. Its historic role of protecting the innocent from oppression has been largely supplanted by procedural safeguards at the trial level created by several decades of Supreme Court decisions.

The real significance of the modern Grand Jury is its investigative subpoena. The Grand Jury has one indispensable power generally denied to both police and prosecutors—the power to subpoena witnesses and compel testimony for investigations. This subpoena power is increasingly important for the successful prosecution of complex cases involving organized crime and massive frauds.

The proposals by Representative Joshua Eilberg to separate the Grand Jury from the prosecutor are naive, especially coming from a former prosecutor. Displacing the prosecutor with a separate staff answerable to the Grand Jury will only create yet another source for potential abuse. It would also complicate Grand Jury investigations to the point of rendering them ineffective.

The answer to Grand Jury abuse is not new institutions, but more accountability. The best method of providing accountability is increased judicial supervision.

Representative Eilberg's proposals include one simple and little-noticed reform that will encourage accountability—a requirement that all Grand Jury proceedings be transcribed and available for judicial review.

At present, Federal prosecutors are not required to make a written transcript of Grand Jury proceedings. Therefore, prosecutors are potentially free to engage in excesses behind closed doors without fear of effective judicial review.

The written transcript procedure is presently the law in Arizona and several other states. In our experience the transcript requirement and the corresponding potential for judicial review constitute an effective deterrent to prosecutor misconduct.

GRAND JURY REFORM NEEDED

When the Bill of Rights was adopted, the grand jury was seen as a libertarian device against oppression by the British crown. The grand jury system has become, through the Fifth Amendment, central to the national criminal justice system.

Yet there is a growing sentiment that the grand jury is too much abused, too much a tool of the government's prosecutors. So much so that the Congress is considering reform legislation designed to protect the citizen against heavy-handed prosecutorial use of the grand jury.

A good bill, H.R. 94, introduced by Rep. Joshua Eilberg, D-Pa., takes a middle-of-the-road approach to the reformation of the grand jury. It should be enacted.

The bill would do several things:

It would allow a witness to have counsel to advise him during grand jury proceedings, a practice not now permitted.

It would limit to six months the time a recalcitrant witness could be jailed for contempt. Currently, a witness in contempt can be held through the term of the grand jury and when a new grand jury is empaneled the process can be repeated ad infinitum.

It would allow grand jurors to hire their own investigators if they don't trust the ones provided by the prosecutor.

It would provide stiff penalties for leaking grand jury information, though it would protect witnesses and their lawyers and journalists from the $20,000 fine or five-year imprisonment contemplated.

There are other provisions, but those are the important ones. They would help to prevent the sort of kangaroo grand jury witnessed during the Nixon administration.

The American Bar Association's policy-making House of Delegates next month will consider a resolution supporting grand jury reform. The proposal envisions allowing a witness the right to counsel, and would keep prosecutors from using a grand jury to aid administrative inquiries.

When the administration took its position on grand jury reform before the Immigration, Citizenship and International Law Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee a couple of weeks ago, Rep. Eilberg was disappointed. The administration "didn't think much of" the Eilberg bill, one of his aides reported. Eilberg had thought a Democratic administration would be more inclined to grand jury reform.

Nevertheless, the bill still is said to have the best chance of all those proffered to succeed. And it should. If the grand jury system is to become what it was envisioned to be, vigorous, independent, and a hedge against oppression, reforms are necessary. The Carter administration should be pushing the reforms, not opposing them.

LAWYERS WARNED OF GRAND JURY ABUSE

(By Lee Strobel)

Grand juries are in danger of being abolished or having their power cut severely unless major changes are made to curtail abuses by over-ambitious prosecutors, the chairman of an American Bar Association committee said Saturday.

Richard E. Gerstein, state's attorney in Dade County, Fla., for more than 20 years, said state and federal grand jury systems must be revamped to prevent them from being what critics have called "a rubber stamp of prosecutors."

The ABA's Grand Jury Committee, headed by Gerstein, is proposing a 26-point plan to overhaul grand juries, to help expand the rights of witnesses, and to try to protect reputations of innocent persons.

The proposal, brought after three years of study, is among the more controversial issues under debate at the weeklong ABA convention in the Palmer House.

The 360-member House of Delegates, the policy-making arm of the 218,000-member association, will decide early next week whether to adopt the proposals as official ABA policy.

"Unless changes are made soon, the grand jury will be in danger of being bypassed or abolished around the country," Gerstein said in an interview.

"We want to preserve the system because, when it functions as it was intended, it can be an effective buffer between innocent people and the state and it gives citizens a chance to participate in the criminal justice system."

Under major provisions of the plan grand juries would:

Permit witnesses to have a lawyer present during questioning, although the attorney could only act as an adviser and not address the jurors.

Be barred from issuing reports criticizing the qualifications or moral fitness of a person to hold a public office.

Allow anyone mentioned in a grand jury report to ask a judge in secret to have his name removed before the report is made public.

Give targets of grand jury investigations the right to tell their side of the story to the panel if they wish.

Require prosecutors to disclose to the jurors any evidence tending to negate the guilt of a target of an investigation.

Block prosecutors from making statements or arguments to influence grand jury action in a manner that would not be permissible in a courtroom trial.

Although the ABA cannot implement such changes, adoption of the plan as ABA policy would be a potent lobbying force in seeking new grand jury legislation, Gerstein said.

He said laws setting up safeguards as proposed by his committee are needed even though some proposals are part of the standards of the ABA or the National District Attorneys Association, of which Gerstein is a former president.

Gerstein's committee proposed several changes at the ABA midyear meeting in February, but the group decided to put off the plan at the request of Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell, who objected to some of the proposals.

Since then, several of the proposals have been reworded to eliminate most of Bell's objections, Gerstein said.

"The calls for reform started because of abuses under the Nixon administration and they've been increasing, not only from individual witnesses but from major corporations such as General Motors," Gerstein said.

He noted that, although the grand jury system was created in the 12th Century in England to serve as a shield between citizens and the crown, England abolished the institution in 1933.

LAWYERS FIGHTING OVER GRAND JURY REFORMS

(By David Pike)

CHICAGO.—Noting that the grand jury system is under increasing attack as being "riddled with abuse" and a "shield for the government" rather than for the citizen, the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association is urging the organization to approve 26 proposals for reform.

While everyone here at the ABA's 100th annual convention agrees that abuses must be prevented, the proposals are drawing strong opposition from federal prosecutors.

Most controversial are recommendations that grand jury witnesses be allowed to have their lawyers join them during questioning instead of sitting outside the grand jury, that courts supervise the granting of immunity from prosecution, that only the broader form of immunity be allowed and that everything said before the grand jury, including comments to jurors by prosecutors, be recorded.

Such changes have been advocated by such diverse groups as the National Council of Churches, the American Law Institute and corporate officials called recently to testify in federal antitrust cases. Most recently the Founding Church of Scientology in Washington charged that the federal government's grand jury investigation into allegations of illegal actions by church members is merely an attempt to harass the church, and one minister has decided to go to jail rather than testify.

The issues being discussed are important mainly for the federal court system, where most charges are brought through grand juries. In most state and local systems, prosecutors merely file charges themselves and only occasionally use a grand jury for investigative purposes. However, the positions adopted by the ABA are certain to have a wide impact nationally and could influence grand jury reform bills pending before Congress.

ABA President Justin Stanley said Friday that grand jury reform is one of the top issues confronting the 8,000 laywers meeting here, and the issue certainly has drawn top-level attention from the Justice Department and the National District Attorneys Association.

The ABA had been scheduled to act on 23 reform proposals at its winter meeting last February in Seattle, but action was delayed at the request of Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell. Since then, the Justice Department and federal prosecutors have had considerable impact in modifying the proposals and increasing them to 26, the criminal justice section's report noted.

But the changes have not totally satisfied some federal prosecutors, and the heated lobbying and debate are expected to continue up to the time the ABA's House of Delegates votes on the proposals Tuesday. Bell is scheduled to address the convention tomorrow, but it is unknown whether he will comment on the grand jury issue to gain support for the Justice Department positions.

Most attention is being focussed on whether grand jury witnesses could bring their lawyers with them into the grand jury room to advise them on how to answer questions. The ABA two years ago supported such a move, but that position could be reversed if the current batch of reform proposals runs into trouble, sources said.

The issue is the one that reportedly most concerns Bell because the presence of defense lawyers within the sanctuary of the grand jury is seen as delaying and possibly obstructing a grand jury's investigation into criminal conduct, especially in organized crime and conspiracy cases.

Once lawyers are permitted inside the grand jury, the opponents contend, they will be able to repeatedly raise objections that will have to be taken before judges for a resolution, which could result in a "minitrial." And in conspiracy cases where one lawyer may represent several witnesses, the attorney would be able to see which witnesses are cooperating with the grand jury and even learn the identities of grand jury members, opponents argue.

The report notes that the grand jury process is the only part of the criminal justice system in which defendants do not have a right to have counsel present. And it argues that forcing a witness to go outside the grand jury room to consult with an attorney merely delays the process and "places the witness in an unfavorable light before grand jurors."

The report also points out that nine states including Virginia allow lawyers inside the grand jury and that none have reported any serious problems.

Another proposal that has brought strong opposition from prosecutors would provide that witnesses who are given immunity from prosecution in return for their testimony should only be granted "transactional immunity." Such protection covers any crime referred to in the testimony unlike "use immunity," which only protects the witness from use of his testimony in a future criminal prosecution.

The proposal is linked to another that would provide a further check on the granting of immunity by requiring a judge to determine that immunity is necessary, rather than the current practice of allowing prosecutors to determine whether immunity is in the public interest.

Opponents, in a statement that has been circulated to the 94 U.S. attorneys around the country, contended that: "The commentary by the ABA that use immunity encourages perjury and chills cooperation is totally unpersuasive. To the contrary, it is transactional immunity that discourages detailed truth telling since the individual is fully protected only by superficial testimony. The more detail a person (with use immunity) provides, however, the greater is his protection."

As to giving the court a broad role in determining who can be granted immunity, the statement argues that it would "usurp the function of the executive (branch). It is not a proper judicial function to determine who should be prosecuted. It is equally not a proper judicial function to determine who should NOT be prosecuted, whether as a result of being granted immunity or otherwise."

Among the other controversial proposals is one requiring the recording of all matters before the grand jury, except their deliberations. Such a requirement, which is now in effect in only a few federal courts and not in the Washington area, is aimed at restraining prosecutors from exercising "undue or improper influence on the grand jury," the ABA report said.

How To Make Grand Juries Work

Legislation pending in Congress to change the rules under which federal grand juries operate got a helping hand Wednesday when the American Bar Association approved a set of principles for grand-jury reform. Chief among them is a recommendation that a witness be allowed to have a lawyer present when being questioned in the grand-jury room. This recommendation, if accepted by Congress—and we hope it will be—should go a long way toward eliminating the abuses by prosecutors that have made the grand-jury system suspect. In doing so, it may save the grand jury from extinction.

Originally created in England as a mechanism for protecting citizens against an overbearing government, the grand jury has been used instead by many prosecutors as an instrument for harassing witnesses and browbeating defendants before they are indicted. The Nixon administration was especially skillful at using grand juries for political rather than law-enforcement purposes.

While the Department of Justice has recognized the need for new rules to end such abuses, it is not prepared to go as far as the Bar Association in fundamental reform. Attorney General Griffin Bell, in fact, argued before the lawyers against giving witnesses the right to have a lawyer with them—at present, witnesses' lawyers are required to wait outside the grand-jury room. His fear, and that of many prosecutors, is that grand-jury proceedings will come to resemble those of a trial, thus making the task of law-enforcement officials even more formidable than it is now. We think such fear is exaggerated. But even if it were not, this basic change in the law would be needed to preserve the grand jury's intended function.

Grand juries have been much criticized in the past few decades. They were abolished in England in 1933 and have been eliminated in several states. Their life expectancy in the remaining states and in the federal system was not considered great a few years ago because of the ways in which the juries had been abused. But that has changed. The Watergate affair provided a striking example of their usefulness in investigating and bringing indictments in situations where no other technique could have enjoyed public confidence. They are worth saving—but only if they are restored to the function intended by the Bill of Rights. The best way to do that would be for Congress to pass legislation along the lines suggested this week by the nation's lawyers.

Bar Group Proposes Help for Witnesses Before Grand Juries—Congress and States Are Urged by A.B.A. To Adopt 24-Point Code Curbing Prosecutor Abuses

(By Warren Weaver Jr.)

Chicago.—The American Bar Association urged Congress and the states today to adopt a broad program of grand jury changes aimed at curbing abuses by prosecutors and providing more protection for witnesses.

Over objections by the Department of Justice in two instances, the association's House of Delegates approved a 24-point program that would permit witnesses to have their attorneys in the grand jury room and require the government to inform witnesses who are possible targets of the inquiry of that fact.

The proposed code for criminal investigation would also limit the circumstances under which grand juries can grant a witness immunity, while broadening the area of such immunity once granted. It would strongly uphold the principle of grand jury secrecy but attempt to prevent the use of grand juries for political purposes.

DEBATE OVER LEGAL ADS

The House of Delegates, policy-making body for the 218,000 lawyers in the association, passed a watered-down resolution on President Carter's institution of a merit system in appointing Federal judges but deferred decisions on the question of whether winners in civil lawsuits should recover their legal costs from losers as a matter of general policy.

The A.B.A., the single most powerful force in the legal profession, is holding its 99th annual meeting here. The convention is scheduled to close tomorrow with a debate over restrictions on legal advertising and the installation of William B. Spann Jr. of Atlanta as president.

At present, there is no requirement that Federal or state grand juries provide any legal information to witnesses subpoenaed to testify. Under the code adopted by the A.B.A. today, the witnesses would be told of their privilege against self-incrimination, their right to counsel and the possibility that any false testimony could lead to a perjury indictment.

Under current practice in all but nine states, witnesses may not have lawyers with them in the grand jury room, although they can go outside after a question and consult their lawyers in the corridor.

Richard E. Gerstein of Miami, a veteran prosecutor, called this "a ludicrous situation that can cast doubt on a witness's veracity" when he may be telling the truth but is uncertain of his legal rights at the moment.

Under the A.B.A. proposal, an attorney could advise his client in the grand jury room but could not address the grand jury or participate otherwise in the proceedings. If he violated these rules, the prosecutor could ask the court to remove him.

Appearing briefly, Attorney General Griffin B. Bell argued that this was "overkill" a move that would either make the grand jury system unworkable or else constitute a "lawyers' relief act" providing "plenty of work" for the profession.

The Department of Justice won two victories on grand jury reform, however, persuading the House of Delegates to vote down proposals that would have made it easier for witnesses summoned before a grand jury to challenge and perhaps invalidate their subpoenas.

One supporter of legal representation within the grand jury room, Gilbert S. Rosenthal of New York, told the association that a number of indictments obtained by Maurice H. Nadjari, the former New York special prosecutor, had later been dismissed because of his "badgering of potential defendants" before the grand jury.

A proposed resolution "commending" President Carter for establishing nonpartisan commissions to propose candidates for the United States Court of Appeals was amended to say that the A.B.A. "recommends" that the President establish this kind of commission in the future.

The move was made after complaints that the commission established for the 10th Circuit of the Court of Appeals included a number of political appointees and apparently unqualified members. That circuit is composed of Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Kansas, Oklahoma and New Mexico.

By a vote of 142 to 141, the House of Delegates voted to postpone action indefinitely on a proposal to add 14 lawyers under 36 years old, one from each A.B.A.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM REFORM WAS ENDORSED BY THE BAR ASSOCIATION

Over opposition from Attorney General Bell, the nation's largest lawyers' group voted to support bills pending in Congress that would allow witnesses to bring attorneys to the jury room and broaden criminal immunity. Backers of the measures argued the changes were necessary to stem abuses of power by prosecutors, charging the grand jury system had failed to shield the innocent. The group's stance is expected to carry considerable weight in Congress.

Bell had warned the lawyers: "You are proposing a remedy that is much broader than the wrong you have found."

ABA DELEGATES URGE REVISIONS IN GRAND JURIES

(By Stuart Auerbach)

CHICAGO.—The American Bar Association's policy-making House of Delegates today recommended sweeping changes in the grand jury system—including allowing defense lawyers in the jury room—that the Justice Department strongly opposed.

The proposals are aimed at ending what an ABA committee called "abusive" elements of the 800-year-old grand jury system which developed under English common law to protect citizens from the king but which has now become a tool of the nation's prosecutors.

While the ABA's action has no force of law, it has influence with Congress and state legislatures, which can pass measures revising the system.

An aide of Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.) who has introduced a bill in Congress to revise the federal grand jury system along the lines recommended today by the ABA, said the measure would have no chance of passing without the support of the organized bar.

Attorney General Griffin Bell, who led a Justice Department team opposing parts of the recommendations before the ABA delegates, promised that the next battle would be in testimony to Senate and House committees considering changes in the federal grand jury system.

Bell especially opposed the provision that would allow witnesses to have their lawyers in the grand jury room. He called it "a lawyer's relief act" that would "generate plenty of business for lawyers."

Most grand juries, including those in federal courts, now allow witnesses to consult with their attorneys in an anteroom after every question.

Allowing a lawyer in the grand jury room with his client would fundamentally change the system, and federal prosecutors who lobbied ABA House of delegate members here all week said it would hamper their investigations of white-collar organized crime.

"Putting a lawyer in the grand jury room will invariably lead to impeding the investigation," Benjamin R. Civiletti, head of the Justice Department's Criminal Division told the delegates.

Richard E. Gerstein, however, who has had experience on both sides of the grand jury in his 21 years as chief prosecutor in Dade County (Miami), Florida, replied, "It's the only stage of the criminal proceeding where a person does not have a right to counsel."

Gerstein, who headed the ABA effort for grand jury revision against the opposition of most of his fellow state and federal prosecutors, gets much of his political support from an association of grand jury members. But he was also the subject of a corruption investigation by a special grand jury called by former Florida Gov. Claude Kirk. He was cleared.

Gerstein said the grand jury needs to be changed if it is to remain a vital part of the criminal justice system. He said it was especially misused during the Nixon administration when grand juries were set up in cities far from the scene of a crime and used to harass antiwar dissidents. He noted that a Seattle grand jury, for example, investigated the bombing of the Capitol in Washington, D.C.

The ABA also took another action opposed by the Justice Department: The legal organization recommended that prosecutors be barred from invoking a device called "use immunity." That device allows witnesses to be given immunity from prosecution for answers they give to a grand jury, but they still can be prosecuted on the basis of other evidence.

The ABA recommended that prosecutors instead be allowed to grant only a broad immunity, called "transactional immunity," under which a witness could not be prosecuted under any circumstances for the crime being investigated. Under the ABA proposal, prosecutors would be required to prove to a judge that such broad immunity is necessary before it could be granted.

ABA Backs Grand Jury Witness Right to Counsel

(By Michael Zielenziger)

Witnesses before a grand jury should have the right to be accompanied by an attorney, the policy-making arm of the American Bar Assn. decided here Tuesday.

Over the dissent of U.S. Atty. Gen. Griffin B. Bell, who spoke against the proposal, members of the ABA House of Delegates voted 186 to 93 to recommend that grand jury witnesses be given the right to counsel.

The recommendation, part of an over-all package of grand jury "reforms" approved by the ABA, would allow attorneys to advise their clients privately during any grand jury appearances, but would prohibit lawyers from addressing the jurors or from "otherwise taking part" in the proceedings.

Bell told the delegates attending the ABA's annual meeting at the Palmer House that the "remedy proposed is much broader than the wrong you have found" and said the recommendation amounted to "overkill" that would damage the grand jury process.

Under current practice in most states, a witness appears alone before a prosecutor and the grand jury. Should he desire to consult with his lawyer, he must leave the grand jury room. But, as pointed out at the delegates' session, the shuffling in and out of the grand jury chamber tends to make a witness look less honest, and can increase the likelihood of his indictment if he is a target of investigation.

The ABA recommendations do not carry the force of law. To become effective, states must revise their legal codes to reflect the new proposals.

Benjamin Civiletti, chief of the U.S. Justice Department's criminal division, told the delegates the proposal would make prosecution of drug abusers, white-collar and organized criminals more difficult. "Putting a lawyer in the grand jury room as a counsel to witnesses will impede fact-finding by the grand jury," he said, adding that it also would create potential new sources for grand jury leaks.

But the ABA delegates sided with Miami prosecutor Richard Gerstein, chairman of the grand jury reform committee, who asked: "If the courts have ruled that suspects must have a right to counsel when being quizzed by police in the stationhouse, why not before the grand jury?"

The reform package was proposed after mounting criticism that grand juries, designed to protect citizens from needless harassment, had become "rubber stamps" of zealous prosecutors.

The delegates also voted, after lengthy debate, to recommend that prosecutors use "transactional immunity" rather than "use immunity" when seeking to get witnesses to testify before grand juries.

Under transactional immunity," witnesses are granted a blanket guarantee they will not be prosecuted for any crimes they may have committed. Under "use immunity," however, a witness can still be prosecuted for his offense if the prosecutor independently learns of incriminating evidence against him. Civil liberatians consider the concept of "use immunity" and infringement of the Fifth Amendment, which protects against self-incrimination.

The 26-point reform package approved Tuesday included these other features:

Prosecutors should not present evidence to the grand jury that would be inadmissable at trial.

They should recommend a grand jury not indict if they believe the evidence is not strong enough.

Every witness before a grand jury should be informed of his right to counsel, protection against self-incrimination, and that if he answers questions falsely he can be charged with perjury.

Targets of a grand jury investigation should be told they are potential indictees.

BAR ENDORSES GRAND JURY REFORMS

(By Lee Strobel)

A package of grand-jury reforms was endorsed Tuesday by the American Bar Association despite U.S. Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell's strong objections to a provision allowing defense lawyers inside grand-jury chambers.

Bell and his criminal division chief, Benjamin Civiletti, warned that allowing defense lawyers to advise witnesses during grand-jury questioning would both shackle and lengthen the juries' investigations.

Civiletti said the proposal "will inevitably lead to impeding the fact finding" by grand juries and would generate more hearings to take up the already limited time of judges.

Bell said the idea "would generate plenty of business for lawyers" but is an unnecessarily strong action to take.

The ABA's House of Delegates, which sets policy for the 218,000-member association, voted 186 to 93 to endorse the plan, which would let lawyers advise witnesses but would give them no other role inside grand-jury chambers.

An ABA committee on grand juries proposed letting defense lawyers into the chambers after a three-year study of federal and state grand-jury systems.

Richard E. Gerstein, committee chairman and state's attorney for 21 years in Dade County, Fla., told delegates that grand-jury reforms are urgently needed if abuses like those under the Nixon administration are to be prevented.

He likened letting lawyers into grand-jury rooms to letting attorneys advise arrested persons during questioning at police stations. He contended proceedings would be shortened by the change.

Bell and Civiletti objected to four proposals in the 26-point package on grounds that, taken together, they would hamper grand juries, lengthen proceeding, and make investigations of organized and white-collar crime more difficult.

The delegates went along with the Justice Department by rejecting two points but insisted on endorsing another provision that reasserts the ABA's endorsement of the broader of two kinds of immunity.

Although the ABA has no power to enact grand-jury changes, its endorsement of reform is expected to be a potent force for congressional action in that area.

At Bell's suggestion, the delegates rewrote a committee proposal that witnesses who refuse to testify before a grand jury and are held in contempt should be jailed for not more than six months. This was amended to call for a maximum of one year in jail. Current law provides up to three years in jail.

As part of the package, the ABA endorsed new laws prohibiting prosecutors from knowingly failing to disclose to the grand jury any evidence that would tend to substantially negate the guilt of a person under investigation.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM WOULD GAIN FROM ABA REFORM PACKAGE

If American Bar Assn. (ABA) policy is eventually reflected in law, and it often is, the grand jury system is in for some long overdue change.

The association's House of Delegates took the position this week that witnesses before grand juries should be allowed to have an attorney at their side to advise them. Some two dozen other changes designed to provide greater protection for individuals in grand jury proceedings were also approved, sometimes over the protest of Atty. Gen. Griffin Bell.

On too many occasions grand jurors have been reduced to little more than a rubber stamp for the prosecutor, the only lawyer permitted to address and advise them. There also have been frequent charges that grand juries used a new limited immunity grant weapon as an instrument of intimidation. And some critics believe grand juries have been employed as an investigative arm of established law enforcement agencies.

The ABA acted to stem these and other flaws in the face of a warning from Mr. Bell that the lawyers were destroying the grand jury and making law enforcement in some fields impossible. The attorney general's objections smacked of regret over the prospect of losing the government's overwhelming advantages under present grand jury procedures.

If the ABA recommendations become law an overly zealous prosecutor would no longer find it easy to browbeat a witness into possibly inadvertently incriminating himself or associates. Instead of having to leave the jury room to consult with a lawyer after each question put to him, a witness would have counsel with him.

Proposed limitations on grants of use-immunity would force prosecutors to develop evidence through investigation rather than extract it from an unwilling possible suspect under threat of contempt sentences.

The ABA recommendations came about because the grand jury system is being subverted and individual rights ignored or circumvented much too often. If, as Mr. Bell predicted, adoption of the reforms destroys the grand jury, then it deserves destruction.

If a cog in the criminal justice machine must rely on infringement of the very rights the system is designed to uphold, then the machine would run better without that cog. But it won't come to that.

If the ABA reforms are enacted into law the grand jury will survive and be better for them. Prosecutors may even find rewards in the return to traditional methods of case building sans questionable grand jury shortcuts.

NOT-SO-GRAND JURIES

It's too bad Attorney General Griffin Bell does not like the idea of letting witness take lawyers with them when they testify before a grand jury. But that ought not deter those who believe the grand jury system is in need of serious reform.

The proposal comes from a committee of the American Bar Association that also recommended 25 other changes in the system to make it more just.

Mr. Bell calls the idea "the lawyers relief act" because it would mean more business for the pinstriped folks with briefcases. He has a point, but virtually every governmental change these days means more business for lawyers. Before the century is out everyone may be a lawyer because we won't be able to sneeze without filling out a form or getting sued.

But that is not sufficient reason to avoid correcting a situation that has gotten out of hand. The federal government itself is one of the biggest abusers of the grand jury system, using it in the 1960s and early 1970s to badger dissidents and investigate their doings even when there was little likelihood of obtaining convictions or even indictments.

Witnesses before a grand jury are thrust into an unfamiliar and threatening situation and questioned by trained prosecutors who can spring evidence on them without warning. If they don't answer they can be held in contempt and jailed.

Mr. Bell says lawyers to help the witnesses could prolong matters and slow down the judicial process. But that risk, and it is real, is not as important as preventing miscarriages of justice.

IDEAS AND TRENDS—A.B.A. TAKES ITS STAND ON GRAND JURY REFORMS

The right to the presence of counsel during legal proceedings is widely viewed as basic to the American criminal justice system, yet at one stage in the criminal process, before a grand jury, that right and others equally basic are generally denied. For that reason, many thoughtful persons have long been considering ways to remedy the situation.

Last week, the American Bar Association's policy-making House of Delegates proposed several reforms, including recommendations that witnesses be allowed to have their lawyers beside them in the jury room and that they be informed of their privilege against self-incrimination.

The ultimate fate of the proposals is in doubt. A bill incorporating some of them is before Congress, and the views of the House of Delegates carry considerable weight because more than half of the country's lawyers belong to the bar association. However, there is a second powerful voice, that of Attorney General Griffin B. Bell. He opposes most of the suggested changes on the ground that they could make the grand jury system unworkable.

Historically, the grand jury has been considered a safeguard against arbitrary prosecution. Today, in the opinion of Federal Judge William J. Campbell and others, "the grand jury is the captive of the prosecutor, who can indict anybody, at any time, for almost anything before any grand jury."

Another issue taken up by the lawyers last week at their 99th annual meeting was legal advertising.

In June, the Supreme Court struck down prohibitions against such advertising without ruling on questions of "time, place and manner." To fill the gap, the association adopted a set of nonbinding guidelines for its members. They may advertise their education and military records, the code provides, along with their legal specialty, bank references, fees and willingness to accept credit cards.

Although the guidelines have no legal force, they are expected to serve as models for codes promulgated by state bar associations and by courts that oversee the activities of lawyers. Members of the profession disciplined for violating such codes could challenge them in court.

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Aug. 21, 1977]

THE NOT-SO-GRAND JURY SYSTEM

Americans may yet win the same legal protection in the grand jury room that they properly enjoy in the courtroom.

Recently the American Bar Association voted to support legislation pending in Congress that would allow witnesses in grand jury proceedings to be accompanied by attorneys in grand jury rooms.

The past decade has seen shocking abuse of the grand jury system, with investigations turning into political persecutions. Having an attorney present to advise a witness could help stem such government high handedness.

Moreover, the present practice of allowing witnesses to consult their attorneys only outside the grand jury room is a silly inefficiency. This time-consuming consultation procedure should be eliminated.

Ignorance of legal rights and complexities could never be to the advantage of a witness whose liberty may be threatened. Passage of the grand jury bill would help clear the legal air for all concerned.

[From the Wilmington News Journal, Aug. 21, 1977]

GRAND JURIES IN OUR TIMES

> No person shall be held for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, except on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury . . . U.S. Constitution, amendment V.

Despite that constitutional injunction, the grand jury is in danger of becoming the vermiform appendix of the criminal justice system, a useless or abused organ that constantly presents the danger of infection to the body politic.

Abandoned by many states, accused of being a rubber stamp of federal prosecutors, and generally misunderstood by the public, there is good reason to believe that the grand jury, as an institution, is going to be excised from the system unless it is seriously reformed.

That's a historical irony. The institution dates back to medieval England, where the grand (or large) jury of freemen was established as a control on the tendency of the royal courts to push other freemen around. The grand jury, as it developed in English common law (and was transferred to the United States) was to be a protection for citizens against malicious or frivolous prosecution, in that authorities or prosecutors had to convince the grand jury that they had a sufficient case against a citizen to cause his indictment and trial.

Today, the most serious charge being brought against grand juries is that they do exactly the opposite, that they are a tool and device of prosecutors, who control the grand juries and can get anything out of them they wish.

The reform proposals have now come from no less a body than the American Bar Association which, at its recent convention in Chicago, made two proposals affecting federal grand juries: that witnesses before the grand jury be allowed counsel inside the jury room, and that the rules governing grand juries be modified so that it would be more difficult for the jury to grant a witness immunity to force him to testify—that is, giving him the choice of accepting immunity or going to jail for contempt.

The ABA also made some secondary suggestions that would halt the growing trend of abuse of grand jury powers to put news reporters and lawyers in danger of contempt if they refuse to testify on matters they consider confidential.

These reforms should be considered minimal. They would afford at least a thin coat of protection for witnesses (who are very liable to end up as the accused or indicted) in the federal jurisdiction. It is only speculative whether they would accomplish any substantial reform. And, note well, even these reforms are opposed by the U.S. Department of Justice, which uses the grand juries to its best advantage in prosecutorial roles, and sees itself in an adversary role with the private lawyers in this argument.

More practically, the federal government could minimize or even eliminate the role of the grand jury and proceed on the "information" of a prosecutor to a court that a crime has been committed and that a certain person could have committed it. It could, that is, if it were not for the italicized quotation that heads this column.

As for the states, those who do not have constitutional inhibitions have long since taken end runs afound grand juries, usually by proceeding on information and skipping the pro forma indictments. Some states keep the institution of a grand jury on standby, for use in special investigations of corruption or wrong doing in government. In those instances, the mere convening of a special grand jury can have a chilling effect on official hanky-panky.

Delaware, alas, is among the states which require by constitution the grand jury process. A footnote on the Delaware Code in the state's 1897 constitution says that the grand jury is "enshrined" in our legal process, and the word is apt. Over the years, there has been a constant drumbeat of criticism to and from the grand juries, which are convened by counties, but constitutional reform would be necessary to operate in a less clumsy fashion, and constitutional reform is not a politically popular cause in Delaware today.

REFORMING THE GRAND JURY

(By Jerrold K. Footlick with Diane Camper)

In all of the U.S. legal system, no person stands more alone than a witness before a grand jury: in a secret hearing he faces an often hostile prosecutor and 23 strangers with no judge present to guard his rights, no lawyer present to counsel him and sometimes no indication of why he is being questioned. Enshrined in the Bill of Rights as a protection against unfounded prosecutions, the grand jury has instead become a powerful tool for government investigators. But last week at its annual meeting in Chicago, the American Bar Association, resisting opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice, approved a set of principles that could help reform the grand-jury system.

For years, antiwar activitists and other political dissenters have argued that the Federal government used grand juries to stifle protest. Then businessmen and high government officials found that they, too, could be trapped. General Motors lawyers charged recently that they were being 'treated like gangsters" in a tax investigation by the Internal Revenue Service, which was using the "grand jury as its sword." Former Treasury Secretary John Connally, acquitted after a bribery trial, complained that his indictment resulted from pressure applied against a former associate in a grand-jury hearing. Richard Gerstein, the prosecuting attorney in Miami for 21 years and chairman of the ABA reform panel, compares grand-jury change to decriminalization of marijuana. "When it becomes a problem for the middle class and not just the poor, everyone wants to do something about it," Gerstein says.

CAPTIVE

The fundamental change recommended by the ABA is to allow a witness to have counsel with him in the grand-jury room. As the official legal adviser to the grand jury, and usually the only lawyer in the chamber, a prosecutor now has almost complete control of the hearings. U.S. District Judge William J. Campbell says, "Today, the grand jury is the total captive of the prosecutor who, if he is candid, will concede that he can indict anybody, at anytime, for almost anything, before any grand jury." Under present rules, a witness may leave the room to consult his lawyer, but that leaves a bad impression with a grand jury. Most lawyers contend that if they are allowed in, they can not only protect their clients from a prosecutor's bullying, but also keep the prosecutor from manipulating the jurors.

Attorney General Griffin Bell, who argue against admitting lawyers to grand-jury chambers, said the change in practice would turn the proceedings into a mini-trial and further slow the already molasses pace of criminal justice. "You'll make it unworkable," he predicted. The final ABA version compromised by recommending that a witness's lawyer not be allowed to speak to the jurors; but delegates stuck to the proposal by Gerstein's panel to let the lawyer sit with his client.

The Justice Department also objected to another proposal that the ABA adopted, this one to change the rules governing immunity granted grand-jury witnesses to force them to testify. Under a Nixon-era law, the government can require a witness to surrender his privilege against self-incrimination by giving him "use" immunity—that is, he can be prosecuted only if investigators could find evidence against him independent of his own testimony. But the ABA recommended that a witness receive "transactional" immunity—meaning that he could not be prosecuted for any possible crime he mentioned in his testimony.

The ABA wants to change several other grand-jury practices that most Americans don't even know exist. For instance, it recommended that all proceedings be stenographically recorded except the jurors' actual deliberations; currently, in many districts a prosecutor can tell a grand jury almost anything without anyone outside the room every learning what he said. The association also suggested that grand juries stop a "growing" trend toward infringement on freedom of the press and the attorney-client privilege. Now, almost always at the urging of prosecutors, reporters can be forced to testify about their confidential news sources and defense lawyers can be forced to surrender clients' business records—or face contempt charges.

GO TO JAIL

A recalcitrant witness has the option, of course, of going to jail for as long as the grand jury sits, up to eighteen months. If he then refuses to answer questions from a new grand jury, he can be sent to jail again. 1972, five Irish-Americans from New York were ordered to tell a Federal grand jury in Fort Worth, Texas, about their alleged ties to the Irish Republican Army. The Nixon Administration never explained why it chose Fort Worth, and the grand jury took no action. But when the five refused to testify, they all served two terms totaling ten months for contempt. The ABA has recommended a single maximum term of one year.

The proposals of the bar association bind no one, but as the leading force in the legal profession its action will influence every state as well as the Federal government.[1] Seven bills are now pending in Congress to reform grand-jury procedures. The measure introduced by Democratic Rep. Joshua Eilberg of Pennsylvania, which follows the ABA plan closely, is considered most likely to pass, although the Justice Department will continue to oppose such provisions as allowing counsel in the jury chambers. "The whole point of grand-jury reform," says lawyer Gary Naftalis, who recently co-authored a book on the subject, "is to ensure that the proceedings are as fair as possible to the witness—while allowing the institution to function."

[From the Bulletin, Aug. 23, 1977]

THE ABA CALLS FOR GRAND JURY REFORMS

The American Bar Association has called for some major changes in the grand jury system. In the interest of justice, Congress and state legislatures would do well to see that the ABA recommendations become reality.

At a recent meeting in Chicago, the ABA recommended, among other things, that witnesses be allowed to have a lawyer with them when they appear before a grand jury and that witnesses who are possible targets of a grand jury investigation be warned.

The proposal to allow lawyers in the grand jury room is opposed by the Justice Department. Prosecutors maintain that allowing a lawyer into the grand jury room would hamper investigations, particularly of organized crime. Most grand juries, including federal ones, now allow witnesses to consult lawyers outside the room after every question.

Certainly no one wants to make it overly difficult for prosecutors to build legitimate cases against criminals. But the fact is that the grand jury system has at times been abused, with witnesses brow-beaten by aggressive prosecutors.

It certainly makes sense for lawyers to sit in with clients before a grand jury to maintain on-the-spot vigilance in protection of clients' rights. Under the

[1] Many states have largely abandoned the use of grand juries. In Los Angeles County, Calif., for instance, only about 40 of 21,000 criminal cases last year went to a grand jury. Ordinarily, a prosecutor will charge a defendant by a process known as "information," the equivalent of an indictment, bringing an official complaint to a judge with the defendant present.

ABA proposal the grand jury proceedings would not become a minitrial because witnesses' lawyers would be allowed only to advise their clients, not to address the grand jurors or otherwise participate.

Grand juries were set up in England to protect citizens from capricious monarchs. Unfortunately, some prosecutors have twisted the system and used it for political gain.

Our system of criminal justice requires that the rights of witnesses or potential defendants constantly be weighed against the right of the state to obtain evidence and build a case. Under the present grand jury rules, that balance has been tilted; some individuals' rights have been infringed upon. The ABA's ideas for changing the grand jury system seem reasonable and fair.

[From the Newsday, Long Island, N.Y., Aug. 24, 1977]

GETTING BACK TO BASICS WITH THE GRAND JURY

The grand jury, conceived as a protective shield between citizens and the awesome powers of their government, has increasingly evolved into a prosecutor's tool. The use of grand juries to obtain indictments for routine offenses in New York and 20 other states adds little by way of safeguards for defendants even as it makes the process of bringing criminals to justice unnecessarily cumbersome.

The latest step in the evolution was the passage in 1970 of the Organized Crime Control Act, which rewrote the rules governing witness immunity and came dangerously close to nullifying Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination. As predicted by critics at the time, the act has been used not only to combat organized crime but to harass and intimidate potential witnesses and suspects in a wide variety of cases.

Demands for reform have been fueled by the fact that witnesses must appear before grand juries without legal representation. Even though the American Bar Association could be accused of trying to get more work for its members, it makes a good case for allowing a lawyer to be present in the grand jury room.

The Bill of Rights says, "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury," with some exceptions involving military service or public danger. But the Supreme Court has ruled the states exempt from the provision, and 29 states now allow indictments on the basis of prosecutors' information and preliminary hearings—a system that seems to work well for all parties. New York would do well to follow that example, reserving grand juries for special investigations or cases where a witness might be endangered if his or her identity became known.

The problem is more complicated on the federal level; Congress is wary of tampering with the Bill of Rights. An attempt by Representative Joshua Eilberg (D-Pa.) to reform the system stands a far better chance. In essence, Eilberg would reverse the tilt toward the prosecution by allowing the presence of lawyers and restoring the immunity rules employed before 1970. His bill would also make grand juries more independent of prosecutors and attempt to prevent leaks of grand jury proceedings, which are supposed to be kept secret.

Attorney General Griffin Bell opposes the two key provisions on the ground that they may hamper the grand jury's work. But the safeguards in the Bill of Rights weren't intended to make the law enforcement system more efficient. And when those safeguards become largely meaningless, as has happened with the grand jury system, it's time to search for alternatives.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Aug. 24, 1977]

GRAND JURY REFORM

The grand jury system in the United States is in dire need of reform. The American Bar Association's adoption of 25 proposed changes in grand jury procedures reflects a growing recognition within and outside the legal profession that the current system has become rife with abuses. The grand jury no longer adheres to its original intent—to be an impartial search for truth, carefully balancing the rights of the individual against the state's duty to uncover criminal activity.

Instead of serving as a buffer against undue prosecution, the grand jury in practice has often become the captor of overzealous prosecutors anxious to secure an indictment for political or other reasons. Under the current system, a witness called to testify before a grand jury appears alone, without a lawyer, to encounter a hostile prosecutor and 23 jurors. He does not know if he is the target of the investigation, nor even the scope of the probe. There is no impartial judge to serve as referee. The session is conducted in secret, and many states do not even require that records be kept. However, a witness's testimony can be used against him in a later trial. He may leave the jury room to consult an attorney, but in doing so he is apt to leave the impression on the jurors that he has something to hide.

In short, a grand jury witness is virtually defenseless. And many experienced lawyers say that a prosecutor can indict anybody, at any time, on almost any charge—so complete is his control in the grand jury room.

The ABA's proposals—most of which are included in seven bills that will be before Congress when it reconvenes next month—would provide greater protection for witnesses. One major proposal would allow a witness to have an attorney with him in the grand jury room; the lawyer could not address the jurors but only advise his client. He would also serve as a witness to the questioning, and his mere presence would restrain prosecutors from badgering witnesses.

Other proposed reforms would provide limited immunity to a witness, would require that he be told if he is the target of the investigation and the general scope of the probe, and would require that a record of the proceedings be kept.

Attorney General Bell has objected to the ABA recommendations as "overkill," moves he feels might make the system unworkable. The U.S. Justice Department in recognition of the problem is revising the manuals for U.S. attorneys to spell out what is and is not proper conduct. Among encouraging changes, the manual will state that prosecutors should present exculpatory evidence that might bear on a witness's innocence as well as incriminating evidence. The manual will also require a prosecutor to recommend that a jury not indict if he thinks the evidence so warrants.

Some law enforcement officials understandably are wary of reforms which they fear will further obstruct their efforts to bring criminals to justice; the criminal justice system already is too cumbersome and time-consuming, they rightly argue.

However, too many innocent victims of ambitious and sometimes unscrupulous prosecutors have had their reputations and lives irreparably damaged under the current system. A number of top prosecutors across the U.S. helped formulate the proposed reforms, attorneys strongly committed to the grand jury system—but all too familiar with its abuses.

We heartily concur with these prosecutors and the ABA's House of Delegates and urge that Congress and the states not delay in returning fairness and justice to the grand jury room.

Q AND A

JESUIT LAWYER HITS ACTS OF GRAND JURY

Jesuit attorney Daniel Sheehan successfully defended the New York Times' right to publish the Pentagon Papers during the Nixon administration. With the imprisonment of at least three church workers and officials because they refused to divulge information when summoned before a grand jury, he discussed an analagous situation with Washington Star Staff Writer William F. Willoughby.

Question. The churches now seem to be quite distraught over what they feel is an abuse of the grand jury procedure. What's going on?

Sheehan. The crux of the matter is that in 1970 Richard Nixon and John Mitchell drafted the "Omnibus Safe Streets Act" and it was passed by Congress. This has established a procedure that is being followed by the federal prosecutors, which is virtually identical to the old Star Chamber or inquisition procedure which was developed by the Catholic church and finally taken over by the British government just before the pilgrims left England because of the violations of their religious rights. In various parts of the country they are attempting to use the power of subpoena to draw in law-abiding citizens and to demand from them all information they might have that is of value to the federal prosecutors. The federal prosecutors are taking this information and putting it into their computer banks and they are keeping dossiers on everybody from the civil rights movement to any other type of movement that the federal prosecutors feel they want to have information about.

Question. How is this particularly applicable to the church?

Answer. The latest move on the part of the federal prosecutors is to move into the church communities and to attempt to extract from high church officials any and all information they have that might be of value to the federal prosecutors. Some of these areas are specific attempts to find out about the internal structure of the Hispanic community. Early this year a number of people who worked up in the National Council of Church's offices and also in the national Episcopal offices were contacted by FBI agents and ordered to divulge confidential information that was in the church files. These people declined to do so. And the FBI immediately swung into place the federal grand jury system.

Question. What kind of information were they after?

Answer. The demands were for all the people on their mailing lists, all the contributors to the church efforts in the area of civil rights. They demanded to have copies of the minutes of the meetings of the church groups for the last five years and copies of all of the travel vouchers and lists of all of the places any of the church members had gone in the last five years. Now this was viewed as absolute anathema by the church people and they refused to go along with this. So the federal prosecutors had them thrown into prison. This is the rebirth of the Inquisition.

Question. Don't the prosecutors have a need for information to prosecute criminals?

Answer. Actually, we're talking about people who have mere suspicion that a case might exist. They do not have probable cause to believe that any particular crime has been committed. The 4th Amendment to the United States Constitution states that people cannot be arrested, they cannot have their homes searched, they cannot forcefully be required to divulge confidential information about their papers until such time as the federal prosecutors have probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. Now that's an extraordinarily important safeguard that has been put into the Constitution. What is happening now is that the federal prosecutors are starting to arrest people and drag them in front of federal grand juries on mere suspicion that some type of offense may have been committed. Now that is a total violation of the most fundamental standards of fairness that have been enshrined in the United States Constitution. That's the real nature of the problem. It's not that they believe a crime has been committed with any legitimate basis and are just trying to investigate it, rather they're trying to find crimes.

Question. Why is it churches are now becoming a particular target?

Answer. The reason is that the churches—over the last decade or more, since the civil rights movement and since Vatican II, especially under Pope John XXIII—have become much, much more active in attempting to reach out to the poor and the oppressed people, in attempts to assist these people in obtaining justice. Because of this new effort on the part of the church in the areas of social justice, the federal prosecutors have come to believe that we have now established confidential relationships with a number of these people who are the outcasts of the established society. And it is these people that the federal prosecutors want to know about. And they believe that the churches will act as an intermediary and will be willing to give up this confidential information that has been obtained about these outcasts to the federal prosecutors who represent the established powers in the country.

Question. What can or what are the churches doing?

Answer. One of the most important things that is going on right now is that there is a case being argued in front of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia involving a minister by the name of Rev. Arthur Maren. He was thrown into federal prison by the U.S. prosecutor's office here in the District of Columbia for refusing to give information about the internal workings of a legally recognized church (the Founding Church of Scientology) here in the United States. The National Council of Churches in May of 1977 passed a unanimous resolution absolutely authorizing any member of a recognized church in the United States to refuse to answer questions probing into the internal workings of the church and the private and personal relationships that had been established in working with the church. There is a high degree of cooperation in matters of public policy amongst all of the church groups. The National Council of Churches understands that Maren has a right to refuse to do this just as any Catholic priest or Jewish rabbi would have. And the National Council of Churches, in a very very positive manner, has come forth aggressively to defend the right of this recognized church minister to refuse to answer these questions.

Question. Could this lead to the abuse by churches?

Answer. That problem arises, of course, with any one of the constitutional rights. If the citizens have a right of privacy in their homes, it's always possible that that could be abused, that people could do illegal things in the internal rooms of their own homes. And it might be very difficult for federal prosecutors to find that out. The same thing is true with respect to priest-penitent relationships in the Catholic church. If, in fact, a priest chose to abuse that right, he could misuse it. The real question is, when the Founding Fathers of the United States Constitution put these rights into the Constitution, what did they expect? It is my opinion, and that of a number of other constitutional attorneys that the decision was made at that time to pay whatever the minimal price had to be in order to safeguard these areas of privacy for United States citizens. The history in England made it perfectly clear to these people that the dangers inherent in allowing the governmental powers to invade these areas was a far, far greater danger than the minimal dangers that churches are somehow going to be illegally housing subversives.

Question. In effect, though, you are saying that one of the only alternatives left for the church is, in this matter, a question of civil disobedience?

Answer. Actually, the status that we're in right now is that the churches have stated quite specifically that they do not intend to answer these questions. They have undertaken all legal means of having this position vindicated. If, in fact, the federal prosecution staff insists upon bringing church officials in front of these grand juries and asking them totally improper questions about the confidential workings of the internal matters of the church, I can assure you that the church people will not answer those questions. The federal courts are being requested to support that position so as not to require that the churches defy the federal prosecutors in this case. It is not good for law enforcement, it is not good for respect of government, and it is not good all the way around. But we can assure you that these questions will not be answered by American church officials.

PRIEST AND PENITENT: LEGAL CHALLENGES MAY ALTER ANCIENT TRADITION OF CONFIDENTIALITY

(By Kenneth A. Briggs)

The traditional right of religious leaders to withhold confidential information from courts of law is facing new tests that could extend the concept. Some religious figures are calling for a revised definition of the priest-and-penitent safeguard to cover a variety of situations in which the clergyman, in the conduct of his ministry, becomes privy to the inner workings of activist groups. Others are seeking to promote an interpretation of the guarantees of freedom of religion of the First Amendment to protect members of religious groups from testifying against one another if the welfare of the group is involved.

The most unprecedented situation involved a charge of contempt against Arthur Maren, the national director of the Church of Scientology. Mr. Maren refused to answer a grand jury's questions concerning reported thefts of government files by the church on the ground that the inquiry amounted to unwarranted interference in the church's internal affairs.

THE BURDEN OF PROOF

The National Council of Churches filed a friend-of-the-court brief with the United States Court of Appeals in Washington, which is to rule on the contempt charge. The council said it took no position whether Mr. Maren's group was a legitimate church, but accepted a previous ruling by the court in favor of the right of the Church of Scientology in the protection of the First Amendment.

The National Council, arguing that Mr. Maren's refusal to answer certain questions was a "constitutional right," asserted that church workers should be exempt from testifying before grand juries unless the Government can prove that the worker has personal knowledge of a particular "probable" crime, that such information is obtainable only from church workers and that the testimony would serve a "compelling and overriding societal interest."

Similar arguments have been used to defend two former employees of the Hispanic Commission of the Episcopal Church who would not answer certain questions before a Federal grand jury that was looking into the activities of what was reported to be a Puerto Rican terrorist group.

The former employees, Marlo Cueto and Raisa Nemikin, were jailed last spring on contempt citations and remain imprisoned.

They were members of a social-outreach program, and were describing in their defense as lay ministers whose effectiveness with disadvantaged groups depended on their ability to respect confidences.

This week the Rev. Louis R. Gigante, the Bronx City Councilman, refused to answer certain questions put to him by a special grand jury investigating corruption in the New York City Correction Department and influence-buying by prisoners. Father Gigante cited the priest-and-penitent privilege in resisting a line inquiry into his conversations with a man who was serving a prison sentence in 1974, and was upheld by a judge.

The case, while it seemed a conventional example, was unusual historically. Father Gigante never said that the conversations had a "penitential" aspect. Also, the priest-and-penitent privilege had been construed so restrictedly in the past that information gathered in the course of priestly rounds was considered legally shaky, at best.

The concept has evolved over the centuries on the basis that an individual's right to confess sins to a priest for the sake of divine forgiveness was inviolate. By 1215, the time of the Fourth Lateran Council, the priest's obligation to keep information to himself was codified: Expretation left many issues unclear.

STATE'S LAWS BEG QUESTIONS

Before the Protestant Reformation, Roman Catholic judges in England generally supported this "seal of the confession," except in cases of high treason.

In this country, most states have enacted into laws the right of clerical confidentiality, but these laws' wording and interpretation left many issues unclear.

Among the continuing problems: Who should be entitled to protection? How far beyond the strict definition of the priest-penitent relationship can the standards be stretched?

Clergymen and lay persons alike hear and see things in their religious work that could become objects of criminal investigations. Some clergymen insist that new standards of privilege must protect them from all but the most flagrant abuses.

More and more church groups are attempting to help the poor, the alienated and the outcasts of society. Church activists say that since the ties between these people and the churches' establishments are so tenuous, every effort must be made to sustain trust.

A minister, the activists hold, have a special responsibility to whole groups or subcultures. There has been little indication that courts are ready to go along.

Four years ago a variety of church groups joined to support the Rev. Paul A. Boe, a Lutheran pastor who invoked the shield of confidentiality to withhold information about the uprising against the Government by Indians at Wounded Knee, S.D. Mr. Boe had visited the reservation and refused to answer the questions of a Federal grand jury that was inquiring into the incident. He was charged with contempt, but the charge was dismissed by a Federal Appeals Court in St. Louis—on grounds other than confidentiality.

"In our day," said the brief that the church groups filed in behalf of Mr. Boe, "churches are finding that troubled persons in groups are in need of pastoral counseling together, rather than singly."

Not only must a pastor guard the content of "confessions," the brief said, but in the context of his pastoral relationships, he must guard every other "communication."

The National Council of Churches said in its brief supporting the Church of Scientology:

"Once church workers are used by the Government as an easy source of community information, those to whom church missions are directed—people already in large part disaffected from society—will distrust and shun them as they do others they believe to be part of the establishment."

BOOK REVIEW—THE GRAND JURY: AN INSTITUTION ON TRIAL BY THE HONORABLE MARVIN E. FRANKEL AND GARY P. NAFTALIS

(By Joshua Eilberg)*

Last year, for the first time in the history of our nation, Congress began a comprehensive review of the Federal grand jury system and proposed reforms of that system.[1] This year, Congress is again considering reforms, particularly those contained in H.R. 94, the Federal Grand Jury Reform Act of 1977.[2]

Considerable public interest has been recently focused on the grand jury system, both state and Federal, and criticisms of that system have been lodged by attorneys, judges, citizens, editorial writers, and others.[3] "The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial" is a comprehensive review of the history, purpose, problems, and proposed reforms of the grand jury system. It is essential reading for anyone who wishes to have a basic understanding of the proper and improper functions of the grand jury and of the role of the grand jury in the criminal justice system as a whole.

Judge Frankel and Mr. Naftalis review the origins and development of the grand jury system. As those authors indicate, the grand jury was intended to be a "bulwark against oppression"—standing between the government and the citizen as a protection against unfounded charges and unwarranted prosecutions. In colonial days, grand juries also became a means of protesting abuses by the Crown. Despite the contrary beliefs of many, the grand jury has always been a political creature, often used by the government to investigate and prosecute political enemies. It has also been a valuable anti-corruption tool, ferreting out official impropriety and securing the punishment of governmental wrongdoers.

As detailed in this book, the grand jury is supposed to be an "arm of the court," acting under the close supervision of a judge, to assure that offenses are investigated without bias and accusations are based on probable cause. Recently, however, critics have charged that the grand jury has been misused for partisan ends, for harassment of political enemies, and for punishment of distasteful but non-criminal activities.[4] The common thread to almost all of these complaints is that the prosecutor uses the grand jury to do his own bidding with little or no interference by the court and with few guidelines. In fact, the grand jury, it is argued, has become a rubber stamp of the prosecutor. In addition, as detailed in the book, increasing evidence has mounted that the grand jury is used not as a screening device to protect innocent victims, but rather as a publicity device to create victims.

These complaints, and legitimate concerns, are thoroughly and fairly described in this book. As Chairman of the Subcommittee responsible for considering proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system, and as author of H.R. 94, a comprehensive bill to provide certain basic guarantees and rights to witnesses called before the grand jury, and to insure the independence of the grand jury

Congressman Eilberg has introduced H.R. 94 to make reforms to the Federal grand jury system and has been conducting hearings on this and other pieces of legislation relating to grand jury reform.

[1] For a description of the history, background, and content of this review, see J. Eilberg, A Proposal for Grand Jury Reform, 6 Judicature 300 (1976).

[3] Much of this interest and criticism has been collected in the hearings held by my Subcommittee. See Federal Grand Jury, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Serial No. 52, 94th Cong., 2nd Sess. (1976) [hereinafter cited as 1976 Grand Jury Hearings]. The hearings conducted this year are presently in the process of being published.

[4] A bibliography of books, articles, and cases reflecting these criticisms can be found in 1976 Grand Jury Hearings at 661–71.

from the prosecutor, this book has been of special value to me. It is based, in substantial part, on a New Leader article, published in 1976. At the time of its original publication, I forwarded the article to the members of my Subcommittee in the belief that they would find it of extreme value in considering many of the proposed reforms. This book is a valuable expansion of the original material. It is well written, well researched, well planned, informative and comprehensive. While I, of course, do not agree with all of the opinions expressed, the author's comments and suggestions are thoughtful and carefully considered. Of particular value is the discussion of proposed reforms.

Paralleling the requirements that can be found in H.R. 94, Judge Frankel and Mr. Neftalis recommend that detailed instructions be given to grand jurors of their rights, responsibility and role; that a total transcription be made of all grand jury proceedings; that basic fundamental rights, such as a right to counsel, adequate notice, advice on rights, and careful control of the contempt power be provided; that prosecutors be made responsible to the court, and ultimately to the Legislature for the propriety of their actions in dealing with the grand jury; and that adequate safeguards be included to provide that the grand jury proceedings are in fact, and not just in theory, secret. My only criticism of the discussion in this book of grand jury problems and reform is the failure to specifically analyze the various legislative proposals, both in the states[5] and in the Congress, that attempt to resolve the conflicting positions and alternatives.

The authors strongly recommend reform of the grand jury system. I agree. The authors also recommend that we do not eliminate the Constitutional requirement of an indictment for a major Federal offense. With this, I must disagree. The grand jury operates in two ways: as an investigatory body and as an indicting body. Reform is needed in the procedures by which investigations are undertaken and with those reforms, the grand jury can continue to operate as a valuable tool to ferret out, for example, official corruption. The value of the grand jury as an indicting body is a different matter. Most states have eliminated the requirement of a grand jury indictment as a charging basis,[6] and Great Britain, upon which our Federal grand jury system is based, has not had, since 1930, the grand jury as an indicting institution.[7] This is only an acceptance that, in fact, the decision whether or not to prosecute, and on what charges to prosecute, is a traditional prosecutorial function. An information or other legal document is used instead of an indictment.

When a prosecutor recommends an indictment, after a showing of probable cause, his recommendation is almost always accepted. Similarly, when he does not recommend an indictment, his recommendation is almost always accepted. Even if the grand jury decides to indict over the recommendations of a prosecutor, the prosecutor maintains the full power to drop charges at a later point, or bargain them out in pleas. At our hearings, no one has been able to justify the continuation of a grand jury as a charging body. Arguments against abolition by a Constitutional Amendment have been focused on fears that we should "not tamper" with the Fifth Amendment or any part of the Bill of Rights. The authors of this book base their opposition to abolition on the same bases. They fail to recognize that, as a charging body, the grand jury, at least on the Federal level, has served only as a means to avoid a preliminary examination, where the prosecutor has to put out his case and prove probable cause before the court. Justifying the cost of proceeding by way of indictment, the inconvenience to those grand jurors who must sit and act almost as puppets in reviewing accusations, and the challenge to candor to increase public confidence in our basic institutions by maintaining the fiction of grand jurors' screening, only on the basis of a nebulous fear against "tampering" with the Constitution, seems insufficient, at best.

Because of my feelings in this matter, I have introduced a number of proposed constitutional amendments that would eliminate the constitutional requirement of a grand jury indictment but maintain the role of a grand jury as an investigatory body, with proper controls.[8]

[5] More and more states are adopting new grand jury laws, for example, Colorado. An analysis of the new Colorado grand jury law can be found in Congressional Record, E-4366 (daily edition, July 12, 1977). An analysis of state grand jury laws can be found in 1976 Grand Jury Hearings at 716-29.

[7] Administration of Justice Act of 1933, 8 Halsbury's Statutes at 307 (3d Ed 1969). See Heyting, Abolition of Grand Juries in England, 19 ABA J 648 (1933).

[8] These proposals and an analysis of them can be found in Congressional Record at H-314 (daily edition, January 11, 1977).

Grand jury reform is essential. Recently the American Bar Association, by a vote of almost two to one, endorsed the proposals recommended by the authors in this volume, and contained in H.R. 94. Congress is about to act on these various legislative proposals to reform the Federal grand jury system. However, establishing and maintaining a fair grand jury system cannot depend on Congress alone or on state legislatures. Legislators can reform laws to provide for equitable procedures but such reforms will not be effective unless people make them work. Congress can only reform laws when the public is interested and concerned and encourage the legislators to act expeditiously. By providing a concise historical background, by documenting grand jury abuses, by reviewing proposed grand jury reforms, and by recommending very strongly enactment of many of these reforms, "The Grand Jury: An Institution on Trial" should further increase public interest in the grand jury system and reform. In addition, this book is excellent reading for lawyers. Lawyers should study this book so as to understand a system that is totally different from the rest of our legal procedures—that is, inquisitorial vs. accusitorial. Lawyers should also study this book so that they can learn how easy it is for a system almost totally devoid of law to be utilized improperly. Finally, lawyers should study this book so they can advise their friends, and the general public, of the need to encourage prompt action for grand jury reform.

EILBERG IMMUNITY BILL UNDER ATTACK

SOME CRITICS SAY IT GOES TOO FAR; SOME NOT FAR ENOUGH

(By Lawrence M. O'Rourke)

WASHINGTON.—Jay Weiner of Philadelphia and Pedro Archulete of Tierra Amarilla, New Mexico, share a common experience: federal imprisonment for refusing to testify before grand juries.

Federal prosecutors last year wanted to quiz Weiner about harboring Patty Hearst, William and Emily Harris and Wendy Yoshimura.

When Weiner, 22, refused to testify before a grand jury in Scranton, he was sent to Allenwood prison in Pennsylvania. He stayed there for four months and now is promoting a book in Philadelphia.

Pedro Archuleta is a community organizer among Chicanos in Rio Arriba County. When he refused to testify before a grand jury investigating bombings in New York and Chicago by a Puerto Rican independence group, he was jailed, and remains behind bars.

The cases of Weiner, Archuleta and eight others, currently in prison for refusal to testify, are involved in a grand jury reform bill sponsored by Rep. Joshua Eilberg (D-Phila).

The bill will be "marked up"—or redrafted—by Eilberg's Judiciary subcommittee in January.

House leaders expect the Eilberg bill to pass in their chamber, but to die—next year at least—in the Senate.

BILL UNDER ATTACK

Eilberg's bill is being attacked from several directions.

Attorney General Griffin B. Bell has called for its defeat on the grounds it would strip federal prosecutors of their power to probe into terrorist acts, organized crime, and political corruption.

A coalition of civil liberties, church, newspaper, criminal justice, and union groups supports grand jury reform but thinks that the Eilberg version is not strong enough.

The Eilberg compromise, for that is what it is, lacks one provision that the coalition argues is essential to true reform.

That would be to give persons called before grand juries a yes or no say to offers by prosecutors to grant them immunity from prosecution.

The present law was passed by the Nixon Administration and was used primarily against anti-war groups.

It says that when a witness balks at answering questions before a grand jury, the prosecutor may grant the witness "use" immunity—whether the witness wants it or not.

"Use" immunity provides that nothing the witness says before the grand jury can be used against him, but he can still be indicted for offenses about which he testifies—if other evidence is available.

DRASTIC REFORM

Eilberg would drop "use" immunity for "transactional" immunity, which says that the witness cannot be prosecuted for any transaction about which he testifies. But his testimony could be used against others.

A more drastic reform has been proposed by Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich), but it is given little chance of passing the House.

It would require that a witness give consent before any form of immunity is granted.

The refusal to testify after immunity is given can lead to a prison term, as it did in the cases of Weiner and Archuleta.

The law now provides imprisonment for the life of the grand jury or up to 18 months. The government tells the witness in courthouse parlance, "You have the keys to your cell door in your mouth."

The Nixon law allows the witness to be called and asked the same questions before successive grand juries; theoretically, imprisonment for grand jury contempt could be a life term.

Eilberg and Conyers would cut the maximum for a single incident to six months and would not allow a replay.

The Carter Administration objects to another common Eilberg-Conyers provision dealing with lawyers inside the grand jury room.

Present law does not admit them, and the Justice Department wants it kept that way. Both House bills would give witnesses the right to have lawyers inside the hearing room.

Eilberg would allow lawyers only to advise their clients' not to cross-examine other witnesses, object to questions, or offer legal argument.

Conyer's bill does not specify the lawyer's role. Many see this as turning the grand jury hearing into a closed adversary proceeding.

Eilberg would change the present law in other ways. He would give witnesses the right to a transcript of their testimony, he would enlarge the statutory grounds for challenging subpenas, he would try to limit the government's right to subpena a witness to any federal district, he would impose restrictions on the government's right to imprison balky witnesses wherever it desires, including local jails for from home.

"Grand jury reform illustrates congressional compromise.

The bill is given no chance in the Senate despite considerable support for it from leading liberals on the Judiciary Committee, Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Birch Bayh (Ind).

Kennedy has worked out an arrangement with Sen. John McClellan (D-Ark) to get a criminal law recodification through Congress next year. Kennedy fears that attaching a grand jury reform to the recodification would jeopardize the large bill.

So Kennedy has rejected a move by Sen. James G. Abourezk (D-SD) to add a grand jury provision to the Kennedy-McClellan bill.

Weiner, the Philadelphian who refused to testify in the Heart case and spent four months at Allenwood, said that the Eilberg bill is "no doubt an improvement" over present law.

"I object to Eilberg's claim that his bill would end all the evils of grand juries," Weiner said.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Rule 6. The Grand Jury

(e) SECRECY OF PROCEEDINGS AND DISCLOSURE. Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. For purposes of this subdivision, "attorneys for the government" includes those enumerated in rule 54(c); it also includes such other government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, stenographer, operator of a recording device, or any typist who transcribes recorded testimony may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment becaue of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule. The federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned [court] may direct that [an indictment] it shall be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has [given bail,] been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the finding of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.

(f) FINDING AND RETURN OF INDICTMENT. An indictment may be found only upon the concurrence of 12 or more jurors. The indictment shall be returned by the grand jury to a [judge] federal magistrate in open court. If [the defendant is in custody or has given bail] a complaint or information is pending against the defendant and 12 jurors do not concur in finding an indictment, the foreman shall so report to [the court] a federal magistrate in writing forthwith.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE NOTE

(Rule 6)

The proposed definition of "attorneys for the government" in subdivision (e) is designed to facilitate an increasing need, on the part of government attorneys, to make use of outside expertise in complex litigation. The phrase "other government personnel" includes, but is not limited to, employees of administrative agencies and government departments.

Present subdivision (e) provides for disclosure "to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties." This limitation is designed to further "the long established policy that maintains the secrecy of the grand jury in federal courts." United States v. Procter and Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677 (1958).

As defined in rule 54(c), "'Attorney for the government' means the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney and when applicable to cases arising under the laws of Guam * * *." The limited nature of this definition is pointed out in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 309 F. 2d 440 (3d Cir. 1962) at 443:

"The term attorneys for the government is restrictive in its application. * * * If it had been intended that the attorneys for the administrative agencies were to have free access to matters occurring before a grand jury, the rule would have so provided."

The proposed amendment reflects the fact that there is often government personnel assisting the Justice Department in grand jury proceedings. In In re Grand Jury Investigation of William H. Pflaumer & Sons, Inc., 53 F.R.D. 464 (E.D. Pa. 1971), the opinion quoted the United States Attorney:

"It is absolutely necessary in grand jury investigations involving analysis of books and records, for the government attorneys to rely upon investigative personnel (from government agencies) for assistance."

See also 8 J. Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 6.05 at 6–28 (2d ed. Cipes, 1969):

"The rule [6(e)] has presented a problem, however, with respect to attorneys and nonattorneys who are assisting in preparation of a case for the grand jury. * * * These assistants often cannot properly perform their work without having access to grand jury minutes."

Although case law is limited, the trend seems to be in the direction of allowing disclosure to government personnel who assist attorneys for the government in situations where their expertise is required. This is subject to the qualification that the matters disclosed be used only for the purposes of the grand jury investigation. The court may inquire as to the good faith of the assisting personnel, to ensure that access to material is not merely a subterfuge to gather evidence unattainable by means other than the grand jury. This approach was taken in In re Grand Jury Investigation of William H. Pflaumer & Sons, Inc., 53 F.R.D. 464 (E.D. Pa. 1971); In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, 239 F. 2d 263 (7th Cir. 1956); United States v. Anzelmo, 319 F. Supp. 1106 (D.C. La. 1970). Another case, Application of Kelly, 19 F.R.D. 269 (S.D.N.Y. 1956), assumed, without deciding, that assistance given the attorney for the government by IRS and FBI agents was authorized.

The change at line 27 reflects the fact that under the Bail Reform Act of 1966 some persons will be released without requiring bail. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 3146, 3148.

Under the proposed amendment to rule 6(f), an indictment may be returned to a federal magistrate. ("Federal magistrate" is defined in rule 54(c) as including a United States magistrate as defined in 28 U.S.C. § 631–639 and a judge of the United States.) This change will foreclose the possibility of noncompliance with the Speedy Trial Act timetable because of the nonavailability of a judge. Upon the effective date of certain provisions of the Speedy Trial Act of 1974, the timely return of indictments will become a matter of critical importance; for the year commencing July 1, 1976, indictments must be returned within 60 days of arrest or summons, for the year following within 45 days, and thereafter within 30 days. 18 U.S.C. §§ 3161(b) and (f), 3163(a). The problem is acute in a one-judge district where, if the judge is holding court in another part of the district, or is otherwise absent, the return of the indictment must await the later reappearance of the judge at the place where the grand jury is sitting.

A corresponding change has been made to that part of subdivision (f) which concerns the reporting of a "no bill," and to that part of subdivision (e) which concerns keeping an indictment secret.

The change in the third sentence of rule 6(f) is made so as to cover all situations in which by virtue of a pending complaint or information the defendant is in custody or released under some form of conditional release.

Memorandum from: Alfred M. Nittle, Counsel
Subject: Proposed amendment to Rule 6(e), Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure for United States District Courts.

PROPOSAL

Rule 6(e), which deals with maintenance of secrecy of grand jury proceedings, provides that "Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties."

Rule 54(c) defines the term "attorney for the government" to mean "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States Attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States Attorney and when applicable to cases arising under the laws of Guam means the Attorney General of Guam or such other person or persons as may be authorized by the laws of Guam to act therein."

The proposed amendment to subdivision (e) of Rule 6 would add the following language: "For purposes of this subdivision, "attorneys for the government" includes those enumerated in Rule 54(c); it also includes such other government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties."

POINTS PRO

(1) This proposal is a "clarifying" rather than "substantive" nature. It is nothing more than an authority already possessed by attorneys for the government.

[This is a point made by Thornburgh, Acting Deputy Attorney General, who said: "It has long been the Department of Justice's interpretation of the existing provision, supported by decisions of Federal appellate courts, that an attorney for the Government, upon his own authority and without an order from the court, may make certain disclosures to investigatory personnel for the purpose of discharging his duties as a Government attorney." Hearings, p. 55.]

(2) This proposal will "facilitate an increasing need, on the part of government attorneys, to make use of outside expertise in complex litigation."

[Advisory Committee's Note. Also a point made by Mr. Thornburgh.]

(3) Disclosure of grand jury evidence to investigative agents is often necessary to permit the agents to conduct interviews and otherwise pursue leads suggested by such evidence.

[Mr. Thornburgh, Hearings, p. 56.]

(4) To require a court order in each instance in which a disclosure is sought to be made for the foregoing purposes would unnecessarily burden the courts with thousands of applications each year.

[The imposition of any such burden, said Mr. Thornburgh, Hearings, p. 56, is not justified by the record which shows "very few occasions" in which this power has been misused. In those few instances in which abuse occurs, he claimed, there are adequate means of redress in the contempt power, criminal charges, and suppression of the evidence.]

(5) It unlikely that the limited access to grand jury evidence given to such other governmental personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties would materially increase the risks of an improper exposure of the evidence or would increase the risk of violation of the protections sought to be given by the policy of secrecy.[1] These disclosures are made under the guidance and direction of the attorneys for the government to other government personnel, all of whom are accountable for any miscarriages that may result.

(6) Even assuming that an incidental effect of the disclosure of grand jury evidence to "other government personnel" is to provide them with information or evidence which is material and relevant to the performance of their duties or investigations, and which would require a duplication of effort otherwise to acquire, it would be wasteful and unreasonable to prohibit such disclosures.

[1] See Judge Becker's summary of reasons for policy of secrecy, Hearings, p. 49.

(7) To prohibit all disclosures or communication of evidence by attorneys for the government to other government personnel except to the extent that the court may direct or authorize, which may be the effect of the existing Rule 6(e), must be regarded as an unwarranted interference with the exercise of an executive function and a trespass against the doctrine of the separation of powers.

[Although this argument was not developed at the Hearings before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, I think that there are such doctrinal or policy issues involved. The prosecution of crime is largely an executive function. To what extent is judicial interposition appropriate in the exercise of the grand jury's "independent" functions as well as those of the executive's officers? While these issues may prove to be only of theoretical interest under the language of the proposal, there is, I believe, a potential violation of constitutional provisions when the due functioning of the grand jury is impaired. In view of its protection by the Bill of Rights, I would not believe that the Congress or the courts can properly impair or restrain its functioning to such degree that the grand jury cannot efficiently pursue its investigations in the exercise of its mandated indicting or "protective" function. The question, then, to what extent can the courts or the Congress deny to the grand jury the power or privilege of enlisting the aid of witnesses, albeit testimonial experts drawn from other governmental personnel, may raise a constitutional issue.]

POINTS CONTRA

(1) The amendment would permit disclosure of grand jury proceedings to administrative or executive agencies to assist them in the conduct of their own administrative investigations. This is highly objectionable not only in its effect as a "breach" of the policy of secrecy, but because it permits a diversion and perversion of the grand jury process (a) for civil purposes, and (b) in defiance and evasion of Congressional policy which has severely restricted the investigative power of the administrative agencies (for example, requirements of relevancy and materiality, notice, rights to counsel, remedies).

[The danger that such disclosures may become "routine" was made clear in the testimony of several witnesses, particularly Attorney Nussbaum whose citations from the Internal Revenue Service Manual, Hearings, p. 163, provided a dramatic illustration.]

(2) The amendment does not require the institution and maintenance by the attorneys for the government of internal procedures or safeguards for the segregation and protection of grand jury materials or information against unauthorized or improper use by other agencies, department, or persons.

[This was at the core of Judge Becker's testimony. Hearings, p. 31–36.]

(3) While authorizing the disclosure of grand jury evidence or information to other agency or departmental personnel, the amendment does not restrict its use to criminal proceedings only.

[A particular point of concern of the American Civil Liberties Union, Hearings, p. 194.]

(4) While the amendment increases the risks of disclosure of grand jury proceedings, no provision is made to preserve the privacy of grand jury evidence or information against disclosure in ancillary proceedings for protective orders or on motions to quash, limit, or modify subpoenas.

[Judge Becker, Hearings, p. 38f. Such actions are ordinarily docketed publicly and become a source of information for the news media.]

(5) The amendment is too vaguely and ineffectually phrased ("to assist . . . in the performance of their duties") if it is the intention of the proponents to limit use of the disclosures for grand jury purposes only.

[See colloquy between Mr. Mann and Prof. LaFave, Hearings, p. 93–94, and comments of Prof. Lewis, Hearings, p. 222.]

(6) Assuming the necessity for use of and disclosure to other government personnel, the attorneys for the government cannot be relied on to refrain from abusing this privilege unless they are subjected to judicial control by which they are required, before making any such disclosure, to make some "showing" to the court that the assistance of personnel which they seek is necessary in fact, and to provide the court with an opportunity to impose safeguards and protective orders. The amendment makes no provision on this subject.

[Emphasized by Attorney Segal, Hearings, p. 21, and suggested as a possibility by Judge Becker, Hearings, p. 34f. Attorney Nussbaum, Hearings, p. 154f., pointed out that there is a serious question of "necessity", for the Department of Justice possessed its own experts in a variety of fields, such as taxation (Tax Division), handwriting (FBI), etc.]

(7) In giving other government personnel access to grand jury materials or information, the amendment would further unequally tilt the awsome balance of grand jury power toward the government and against the witness or "target" of the investigation.

[Attorney Nussbaum, Hearings, p. 162. Mr. Justice Whittaker, concurring in United States v. Proctor & Gamble, 356 U.S. 677, at 685 (1958), also adverted to the "fundamental unfairness and inequality by permitting the Government's attorneys, agents and investigators to possess such materials while denying like possession and use by attorneys for the defendants . . . ."

(8) The amendment confers a broad authority of disclosure without countervailing safeguards, or without discrimination between pre-indictment or post-indictment or other significant stages or results of the investigation, without regard to the nature and type of investigation conducted, without provision respecting notice to persons whose evidence or records or liabilities are affected, and without provision respecting hearings, ex parte or adversary, as may be appropriate at particular times or on particular issues.

[See discussion of Judge Becker, Hearings, pp. 34–36. Also see concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Whittaker, supra.]

AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

APRIL 11, 1977.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed

Mr. MANN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following

REPORT

together with

ADDITIONAL VIEWS

[To accompany H.R. 5864]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 5864) to approve with modifications certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, to disapprove other such proposed amendments, and for other related purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

PURPOSE

The purpose of the legislation is to approve with modifications certain amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure that were proposed by the Supreme Court and to disapprove other such amendments.

BACKGROUND

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure prescribe the procedures to be followed in criminal proceedings in federal courts. They are usually amended by a process established by statutes known as the "Rules Enabling Acts." These Acts empower the Supreme Court to propose new rules of "pleading, practice, and procedure" and amendments to existing rules. The Acts require that all such rules and amendments must be reported to Congress after the start of a regular session but no later than May 1. A proposed new rule or amendment takes effect 90 days after it is reported to Congress.[1]

On April 26, 1976, the Supreme Court, pursuant to the Enabling Acts, promulgated several amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[2] The Court, at the same time, also promulgated sets of procedural rules to govern proceedings under 28 U.S.C. sections 2254 and 2255 (sometimes referred to as habeas corpus proceedings) and sets of procedural rules to govern bankruptcy proceedings.

All of those amendments and rules were to have taken effect on August 1, 1976. However, Congress enacted legislation that delayed the effective date of some of the proposed amendments and rules.[3] The effective date of all but two of the proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure was delayed until August 1, 1977, and the effective date of the proposed habeas corps rules was delayed until 30 days after the 94th Congress adjourned sine die.[4]

The proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, whose effective date was delayed made changes in four existing rules: Rule 6, dealing with grand juries; Rule 23, dealing with trials by juries of less than 12 persons and trials where juries have been waived; Rule 24, dealing with peremptory challenges to jurors; and Rule 41, dealing with procedures for obtaining search warrants. In addition, those proposed amendments added a new rule (40.1) dealing with removal of criminal cases from State to Federal court.

All of those proposed amendments are presently pending before Congress. If Congress does not act on them by August 1, 1977, they will take effect in the form proposed by the Supreme Court, without any congressional input. Thus, if the Congress is to have an effective role in shaping the policy of the proposed amendments, it must enact legislation by August 1, 1977.

With that time deadline in mind, the committee's Subcommittee on Criminal Justice began working on the proposed amendments early in the session. It held 3 days of hearings and took testimony and received statements from a wide range of persons and organizations. It heard from the Judicial Conference, the Justice Department, a Member of Congress, a Federal district judge, several Federal public defenders, and several private practitioners and law professors. It also heard from representatives of several groups and organizations, including the American Bar Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Association

[1] The Supreme Court itself does not actually draft the proposed rule or amendment; that work is done by a committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. In the case of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, that committee is the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules. The Advisory Committee's draft of a proposed rule or amendment is reviewed by the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, which must give its approval to the draft. Any draft that it approves is forwarded to the Judicial Conference of the United States. If the Judicial Conference approves the draft, it forwards the proposed rule or amendment to the Supreme Court. The Judicial Conference's role in the rulemaking process is defined by 28 U.S.C. sec. 331.

For background information on how the Judicial Conference committees operate, see statement of Judge Roszel C. Thomsen, in Hearings on Proposed Amendments to Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 2d sess., serial 61, at 2–5 (1974); statement of Judge J. H.R. 5864 is the product of the information and testimony gathered during this study of the proposed amendments.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1

Section 1 of H.R. 5864 provides that the proposed amendments to Rules 6(e), 23, 24 and 41(c)(2) and proposed new Rule 40.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, whose effective date was postponed to August 1, 1977, by Public Law 94–349, shall take effect only as provided by the legislation.

Section 2

Section 2 of H.R. 5864 takes action on each of the proposed amendments. It approves some of them, either as proposed or with modifications, and it disapproves the others.

Rule 6. The Grand Jury

A. Proposed Amendment

Rule 6(e) deals with the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. The proposed amendment makes both substantive and technical changes in the rule.

Substantive change.—Rule 6(e) currently provides that "disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties." Rule 54(c) defines attorneys for the government to include "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant of the Attorney General, a United States attorney, an authorized assistant of a United States attorney, and when applicable to cases arising under the laws of Guam, means the Attorney General of Guam . . . ."

The substantive change to Rule 6(e) would add the following new language:

> For purposes of this subdivision, "attorneys for the government" includes those enumerated in Rule 54(c); it also includes such other government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties.

The Advisory Committee note asserts that the proposed amendment restates the trend in the case law. "Although case law is limited, the trend seems to be in the direction of allowing disclosure to Government personnel who assist attorneys for the Government in situations where their expertise is required."[5] The note states that the proposed amendment is intended "to facilitate an increasing need, on the part of Government attorneys to make use of outside expertise in complex litigation." [6] The example usually cited is the need to utilize the expertise of IRS and SEC agents and accountants in complex tax or stock fraud cases.

Technical changes.—The proposed amendment to Rule 6(e) makes a series of changes in the rule designed to make its provisions consistent with other provisions in the Rules and in the Bail Reform Act of 1966. For example, the rule presently speaks of a "court" keeping an indictment secret until the defendant is in custody. The proposed amendment would change "court" to "federal magistrate" in order to make Rule 6(e) consistent with Rule 6(f).[7]

B. Legislative Action

Section 2(a) of H.R. 5864 approves with modifications the proposed amendment to Rule 6(e). It approves the technical changes as they have been proposed and disapproves the substantive change.

The substantive change to Rule 6(e) has been much criticized. There was concern that it would permit too broad an exception to the rule of keeping grand jury proceedings secret. It was feared that the proposed change would allow Government agency personnel to obtain grand jury information which they could later use in connection with an unrelated civil or criminal case. This would enable those agencies to circumvent statutes that specifically circumscribe the investigative procedure otherwise available to them.[8]

The Advisory Committee's claim that the proposed substantive change is consistent with the trend in the case law is open to question. In J. R. Simplot Co. v. U.S. District Court for the District of Idaho, Nos. 76–1893, 76–1995, slip opinion at 7–8 (9th Cir., filed November 12, 1976), the court observed

> Two main points stand out: First, agency assistance to the prosecutor or the grand jury should never be allowed except upon an adversary hearing resulting in a finding that assistance is necessary. Second, the court's duty to safeguard the independence of the grand jury lives beyond that hearing and requires close supervision of the agency's civil use of the information acquired from grand jury materials.

The Subcommittee on Criminal Justice conducted a brief survey of several U.S. attorneys' offices with respect to their current policies about disclosure of grand jury information. That survey revealed that there is no consistent practice concerning what things can be disclosed, to whom they can be disclosed, and under what circumstances they can be disclosed. For example, the persons contacted were asked whether they would disclose to a Federal investigative agency grand jury information about criminal conduct unrelated to the matter before the grand jury. There was a wide range of answers. Some persons said they would disclose the information only if the investigative [7] The rule as amended would not preclude a judge from receiving an indictment and keeping it secret. Rule 54(c) defines "federal magistrate" to include U.S. judges as well as U.S. magistrates.

[8] See statement of Phyllis Skloot Bamberger on behalf of the Legal Aid Society of New York; statement of Representative Steven D. Symms; statement of the National Association of Manufacturers. See also note, "Administrative Agency Access to Grand Jury Materials," 75 Columbia Law Review 162, 175–84 (1975).

agency were a part of the Justice Department (such as the FBI). One person who responded this way also said that he would not disclose the information if the matter involved was "highly sensitive." Some persons said they would disclose such information to any investigative agency, but only if that agency had assisted in the investigation of the matter before the grand jury that developed the information. One person suggested that he would disclose the information but would not indicate its source to the investigative agency.

In short, the present state of the law and practice under Rule 6(e) is unclear. Present Rule 6(e) does not clearly spell out when, under what circumstances, and to whom grand jury information can be disclosed. It ought to be rewritten entirely.[9]

The questions concerning grand jury secrecy presented by the proposed substantive change are basic to the function and operation of the grand jury. The committee's Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law has begun work on comprehensive grand jury reform legislation that takes up basic questions about the function and operation of the grand jury.[10] That subcommittee has already held one hearing on the legislation and additional hearings are planned. The issues surrounding Rule 6(e) and the proposed substantive change will be taken up by that subcommittee during its work on the grand jury reform legislation.

* * * * * * *

[9] There are indications that the proposed substantive change will not clarify the present situation and may even lead to further unclarity. The Judicial Conference and the Justice Department assert that the proposed rule would give an attorney for the Government sole and unfettered discretion to determine when and to whom to disclose grand jury information for the purpose of obtaining assistance in the performance of his duties as a Government attorney. Two courts seem to disagree with that assertion.

The requirement for a showing of need would remain under the pending amendments to Rule 6(e) which expand "attorneys for the government" to include "such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties." 44 U.S.L.W. 4540 (emphasis added). Because of the United States Attorney's involvement in the prosecution of the case, he or she cannot be entrusted with passing on the necessity of assistance. Cf. Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971) 403 U.S. 443.

J. R. Simplot Co. v. U.S. District Court for the District of Idaho, Nos. 76-1893, 76-1995, slip opinion at 8 n.15 (9th Cir., filed November 12, 1976). See also Robert Hawthorne, Inc. v. Director of Internal Revenue, 406 F. Supp. 1008, 1126 (E.D.Pa. 1976).

note suggests that present Rule 23(b) may authorize this result, "but there has been some doubt as to whether the pretrial stipulation is effective unless again agreed to by a defendant at the time a juror or jurors have to be excused." [12] The proposed amendment resolves this doubt in favor of the effectiveness of the pretrial stipulation.

Rule 23(c).—Rule 23(c) currently provides that, in a case tried without a jury, the court must make a general finding ("guilty" or "not guilty") and, on request, must find the facts specially. The proposed amendment would make two changes in the rule. It would change the rule so that a request for a special finding would have to be made "before the general finding." In addition, it would add a provision that the findings could be made orally.

The Advisory Committee note indicate that the proposed amendment is designed to resolve an ambiguity in the present rule by clarifying the deadline for requesting a special finding of the facts. The note also suggests that findings of fact need not be made in writing, since oral findings would become a part of the record of the case and be available to an appellate court in the event of an appeal.

B. Legislative Action

Section 2(b)(1) of H.R. 5864 approves the proposed amendment to Rule 23(b). The committee received no adverse comment on that amendment.[13]

Section 2(b)(2) of the bill approves with substantive and technical modifications the amendment to Rule 23(c). The substantive modification changes the rule's policy concerning when a special finding must be made. The current policy of the rule requires a special finding of the facts only when requested, and the proposed amendment would leave that policy intact. H.R. 5864 changes the policy of the rule to require a special finding of the facts whenever there is a guilty verdict, unless the defendant waives the special finding.

The committee believes that to require a defendant to request special findings before the court makes its general finding, puts defense counsel in the awkward position of indicating a lack of confidence in the defendant's case. Further, the committee found no compelling reason why special findings should be made only upon request. Requiring a special finding unless waived should not impose a burden on the court. The court knows the reasons for its action at the time it makes the general finding, and it can easily set forth these reasons, either orally or in writing, at that time.

In civil cases, the court is required to make special findings of fact "in all actions tried upon the facts without a jury." Rule 52(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (emphasis added). H.R. 5864 makes the practice in criminal cases consistent with the practice in civil cases.

Rule 24. Trial Jurors

A. Proposed Amendment

Rule 24(b) deals with peremptory challenges to prospective jurors. (A peremptory challenge permits a party to excuse a prospective

[12] Id.

[13] The committee interprets Rule 23(b), as changed by the proposed amendment, to permit a stipulation to be conditional. For example, the parties may stipulate that the trial can continue with a jury of less than 12 persons, but only if the jury is not reduced below a certain size. See Advisory Committee note to proposed amendment to Rule 23, H. Doc. 94-349, at 12.

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. WIGGINS TO H.R. 5864

Although supporting H.R. 5864, I must disagree with its approach to Rule 6(e) in section 2(a)(1). By disapproving the Supreme Court's proposed amendment the bill preserves a certain measure of uncertainty of application which has arisen regarding it.

The Supreme Court, in the amendment proposed, attempted to make it clear that Attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties with a grand jury, possess the authority to utilize the services of other government employees. Indeed, it can be no other way.

Federal crimes are "investigated" by the FBI, the IRS, or by Treasury agents, and not by government prosecutors or the citizens who sit on grand juries. Federal agents gather and present information relating to criminal behavior to prosecutors who analyze and evaluate it and present it to grand juries. Often the prosecutors need the assistance of the agents in evaluating evidence. Also, if further investigation is required during or after grand jury proceedings, or even during the course of criminal trials, the Federal agents must do it. There is no reason for a barrier of secrecy to exist between the facets of the criminal justice system which we all depend on to enforce the criminal laws.

The parameters of the authority of an attorney for the government to disclose grand jury information in the course of performing his own duties is not defined by Rule 6. However, a commonsense interpretation prevails, permitting "Representatives of other government agencies actively assisting United States Attorneys in a grand jury investigation . . . access to grand jury material in the performance of their duties." U.S. v. Evans, 526 F. 2d 701 (5th Cir. 1976). See also U.S. v. Hoffa, 349 F. 2d 20, 43 (6th Cir. 1965); U.S. v. U.S. District Court, 238 F 2d 713 (4th Cir. 1975) cert. den., sub nom. Valley Bell Dairy Co. v. U.S., 352 U.S. 981; U.S. v. Culver, 224 F. Supp. 419, 432 (D. Md. 1963); U.S. v. Anzelmo, 319 F. Supp. 1106, 1116 (E.D. La. 1970).

In the course of considering H.R. 5864, U.S. Attorneys and the Justice Department were surveyed as to their perception of current practice regarding grand jury disclosures. Although the view was not strictly uniform, there was general agreement that disclosures at least to criminal investigative agents and other divisions within the Justice Department were permissible without court order. Yet projected against this current practice, and the weight of case law, is the anomalous language of Rule 6(e) itself.

Considering whether a motion to quash a grand jury subpoena was appealable, Mr. Justice Frankfurter applied a rationale particularly relevant to any discussion of proper grand jury functioning.

> The duration of its [the grand jury's] life, frequently short, is limited by statute. It is no less important to safeguard > against undue interruption the inquiry instituted by a grand jury than to protect from delay the progress of the trial after an indictment has been found. Opportunity for obstructing the 'orderly progress' of investigation should no more be encouraged in one case than in the other", Cobbledick v. U.S., 309 U.S. 323, 327 (1940).

Clarifying Rule 6(e) without "obstructing the 'orderly progress' of investigation" requires examination of the justification for the policy of grand jury secrecy, since this policy has been urged against investigative disclosures. J.R. Simplot Co. v. U.S. District Court for the District of Idaho, Nos. 76–1893, 76–1995, decided November 12, 1976, (9th Circuit).

The traditional reasons for grand jury secrecy were stated in U.S. v. Amazon Industrial Chemical Corporation, 55 F.2d 254, 261 (D. Md. 1931):

> (1) to prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammeled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standarding trial where there was no probability of guilt.

Nevertheless it is recognized that secrecy yields "when its strict application would defeat the ends of justice". U.S. v. Rose, 215 F.2d 617 (3d Cir. 1954). Is not the "orderly progress of investigation" one of the "ends of justice" apt to be defeated by strict application of secrecy against criminal investigative disclosures? How would public policy or any traditional reasons for secrecy be thus served?

Grand juries, of course, may not be used to directly promote or investigate civil or administrative actions. However, it neither prevents that abuse nor allows from any of the above articulated reasons for grand jury secrecy, to inhibit disclosures to federal criminal investigative personnel assisting the grand jury. Nor does it serve these goals to interpose the court as a referee between the grand jury and its criminal investigative support. As has been pointed out, the court's proper role comes only at a later stage to prevent civil misuse:

> While we hold that the district court cannot properly interfere with the action of the grand jury in turning over to third persons, including treasury agents, voluminous records and accounts for the sole purpose of examination and report to the grand jury, as an assistance to it, we also hold that persons, nonmembers of the grand jury thus having access to said records, and documents, have no right to use them for any purpose whatsoever except to assist the grand jury in its work. In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, 239 F.2d 263 (7th Cir. 1956).

Therefore, we propose that the existing language of Rule 6(e) be amended by deleting its first sentence and inserting in its place the following two:

> Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties, and to such other government personnel as are necessary to assist attorneys for the government in the performance of such duties. For the purposes of this subdivision, "other government personnel" means employees of the Department of Justice, or employees of other governmental agencies who, by law, investigate violations of the Federal criminal law.

This would limit the assistance available as a matter of course to the grand jury to Federal criminal investigative personnel. It would not prevent the jury from seeking further assistance from purely civil investigative or administrative personnel pursuant to the court order required in the second sentence of the existing rule.

The danger in leaving Rule 6(e) in its present state of uncertainty was demonsrated by a recent Ninth Circuit decision, which asserts ". . . the Government must show the necessity [to the Court] for each particular person's aid rather than showing merely a general necessity for assistance, expert or otherwise." Simplot, supra, (slip opinion, p. 9). Relying in great part upon an article entitled Administrative Agency Access to Grand Jury Materials (75 Columbia Law Review 162 (1975)) the court in Simplot spreads this required showing with such a broad and dripping brush as to reach beyond the borders of the problem. However salutary this may seem when applied to administrative agencies and civil investigative personel, it is a prophylaxis both unwarranted and disruptive when grand jury disclosure is made to criminal investigative personnel since it impedes the grand jury's very purpose.

No useful purpose is served by foregoing this opportunity to clarify a rule so temptingly vague. Leaving the matter for courts to "flush out" at their individual will or whim merely deepens the uncertainty.

SENATE REPORT No. 95-354

AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Mr. Robert C. Byrd (for Mr. McClellan), from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following

[To accompany H.R. 5864]

The Committee on the Judiciary to which was referred the Act (H.R. 5864) to approve with modifications certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, to disapprove other such proposed amendments, and for other related purposes, having considered the same, reports favorably thereon, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

AMENDMENT

The Committee proposes an amendment to the bill as follows:

Strike all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: That notwithstanding the first section of the Act entitled "An Act to delay the effective date of certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and certain other rules promulgated by the United States Supreme Court" (Public Law 94-349, approved July 8, 1976) the amendments to rules 6(e), 23, 24, 40.1, and 41(c)(2) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure for the United States district courts which are embraced by the order entered by the United States Supreme Court on April 26, 1976, shall take effect only as provided in this Act.

SEC. 2. (a) The amendment proposed by the Supreme Court to subdivision (e) of rule 6 of such Rules of Criminal Procedure is approved in a modified form as follows: Such subdivision (e) is amended to read as follows:

"(e) SECRECY OF PROCEEDINGS AND DISCLOSURE.

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—A grand juror, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the Government, or any person to whom disclosure is made under paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these Rules. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this rule. A knowing violation of Rule 6 may be punished as a contempt of court.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—

"(A) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury, other than its deliberations and the vote of any grand juror, may be made to—

"(i) an attorney for the government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty; and

"(ii) such government personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law.

"(B) Any person to whom matters are disclosed under subparagraph (A)(ii) of this paragraph shall not utilize that grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. An attorney for the government shall promptly provide the district court, before which was impaneled the grand jury whose material has been so disclosed, with the names of the persons to whom such disclosure has been made.

"(C) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may also be made—

"(i) when so directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding; or

"(ii) when permitted by a court at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury.

"(3) SEALED INDICTMENTS. The Federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned may direct that the indictment be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the return of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons."

PURPOSE

The purpose of the legislation is to approve, or approve with modifications, certain amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure that were proposed by the Supreme Court, and to disapprove other such amendments.

BACKGROUND

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure prescribe the procedures to be followed in criminal proceedings in Federal courts. They are usually amended by a process established by statutes known as the "Rules Enabling Act." These Acts empower the Supreme Court to propose new rules of "pleading, practice, and procedure" and amendments to existing rules. The Acts require that all such rules and amendments must be reported to Congress after the start of a regular session but no later than May 1. A proposed new rule or amendment takes effect 90 days after it is reported to Congress, unless a public law is enacted within that time which delays, modifies, or disapproves the proposed rule.[1]

On April 26, 1976, the Supreme Court, pursuant to the Enabling Acts, promulgated several amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[2] The Court, at the same time, also promulgated sets of procedural rules to govern proceedings under 28 U.S.C. 2254 and 2255 (sometimes referred to as habeas corpus proceedings) and sets of procedural rules to govern bankruptcy proceedings.

All of those amendments and rules were to have taken effect on August 1, 1976. However, Congress enacted legislation that delayed the effective date of some of the proposed amendments and rules.[3]

The effective date of all but two of the proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure was delayed until August 1, 1977, and the effective date of the proposed habeas corpus rules was delayed until 30 days after the 94th Congress adjourned sine die.[4]

The proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, whose effective date was delayed, made changes in four existing rules: Rule 6, dealing with grand juries; Rule 23, dealing with trials by juries of less than 12 persons and trials where juries have been waived; Rule 24, dealing with peremptory challenges to jurors; and Rule 41, dealing with procedures for obtaining search warrants. In addition, those proposed amendments added a new rule 40.1 dealing with removal of criminal cases from State to Federal court.

All of those proposed amendments are presently pending before Congress. If Congress does not act on them by August 1, 1977, they will take effect in the form proposed by the Supreme Court.

With that time deadline in mind, the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the Committee on the Judiciary began working on the proposed amendments early in the session. It held 3 days of hearings and took testimony and received statements from a wide range of persons and organizations, including the Judicial

[1] The Supreme Court itself does not actually draft the proposed rule or amendment: that work is done by a committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States. In the case of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, that committee is the Advisory Committee on Criminal Rules. The Advisory Committee's draft of a proposed rule or amendment is reviewed by the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, which must give its approval to the draft. Any draft that it approves is forwarded to the Judicial Conference of the United States. If the Judicial Conference approves the draft, it forwards the proposed rule or amendment to the Supreme Court. The Judicial Conference's role in the rulemaking process is defined by 28 U.S.C. 331.

For background information on how the Judicial Conference committees operate, see statement of Judge Roszel C. Thomsen, in Hearings on Proposed Amendments to Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong., 2d sess., serial 61, at 2–5 (1974); statement of Judge J. Edward Lumbard, id. at 8–11. See also statement of Prof. Howard Lesnick, id. at 203; J. B. Weinstein, "Reform of Federal Court Rulemaking Procedures," 76 Columbia Law Review 905 (1976).

[2] The particular Enabling Acts involved were 18 U.S.C. 3771 and 3772.

[3] Public Law 94–349.

[4] Congress acted upon the habeas corpus rules before the 94th Congress adjourned. Public Law 94–426 approved most of those rules as proposed and approved the rest of them with modifications.

Conference, the Department of Justice, the American Bar Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association, the National Jury Project, the Legal Aid Society of New York City, the National Conference of Black Lawyers, the New York Criminal Bar Association, the Association of Defense Lawyers, members of the judicial branch, private practitioners, and law professors.

H.R. 5864 passed the House on April 19, 1977, by a vote of 376 yeas to 3 nays.

In light of the comprehensive hearings held by the House Subcommittee on Criminal Justice and the short deadline for enactment of legislation, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary elected to rely upon the House hearings in considering the measure rather than conduct largely duplicative hearings.

Section-by Section Analysis

SECTION 1

Section 1 provides that the proposed amendments to Rules 6, 23, 24, and 41, and proposed new Rule 40.1 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, whose effective date was postponed to August 1, 1977, by Public Law 94–349, shall take effective only as provided by the legislation.

SECTION 2

Section 2 takes action on each of the proposed amendments. It approves some of them, either as proposed or with modifications, and it disapproves the others.

Rule 6(e)

Subsection (A) of section 2 concerns rule 6(e) which deals with the secrecy of grand jury procedings.

Rule 6(c) currently provides that "disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties." Rule 54(c) defines attorneys for the government to mean "the Attorney General, an authorized assistant to the Attorney General, a United States attorney, and an authorized assistant of the United States attorney, and when applicable to cases arising under the laws of Guam, means the Attorney General of Guam. . . ."

The Supreme Court proposal would change Rule 6(e) by adding the following new language:

> "For purposes of this subdivision, 'attorneys for the government' includes those enumerated in Rule 54(c); it also includes such other government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties."

It would also make a series of changes in the rule designed to make its provisions consistent with other provisions in the Rules and the Bail Reform Act of 1966.[5]

The Advisory Committee note states that the proposed amendment is intended "to facilitate an increasing need, on the part of Government attorneys to make use of outside expertise in complex litigation".[6] The note indicated that:[7]

> "Although case law is limited, the trend seems to be in the direction of allowing disclosure to Government personnel who assist attorneys for the Government in situations where their expertise is required. This is subject to the qualification that the matter disclosed be used only for the purposes of the grand jury investigation."

It is past history at this point that the Supreme Court proposal attracted substantial criticism, which seemed to stem more from the lack of precision in defining, and consequent confusion and uncertainty concerning, the intended scope of the proposed change than from a fundametal disagreement with the objective.[8]

[5] For example, the rule presently speaks of a "court" keeping an indictment secret until the defendant is in custody. The proposed amendment would change "court" to "federal magistrate" in order to make Rule 6(e) consistent with Rule 6(f). The Rule as amended would not preclude a judge from receiving an indictment and keeping it secret. Rule 54(e) defines "federal magistrate" to include U.S. judges as well as U.S. magistrates.

[8] Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure Amendments. Hearings before the Subcommittee on Crimnal Justice. Committee on the Judiciary. U.S. House of Representatives. 95th Cong., 1st sess. (1977) (hereinafter cited as House Hearings), pp. 19–56, 66–71, 85–95, 105–106, 111–114, 124, 147–166, 181, 204, 229–230, and 246–247.

Attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties with a grand jury must possess the authority to utilize the services of other government employees. Federal crimes are "investigated" by the FBI, the IRS, or by Treasury agents and not by government prosecutors or the citizens who sit on grand juries. Federal agents gather and present information relating to criminal behavior to prosecutors who analyze and evaluate it and present it to grand juries. Often the prosecutors need the assistance of the agents in evaluating evidence. Also, if further investigation is required during or after grand jury proceedings, or even during the course of criminal trials, the Federal agents must do it. There is no reason for a barrier of secrecy to exist between the facets of the criminal justice system upon which we all depend to enforce the criminal laws.

The parameters of the authority of an attorney for the government to disclose grand jury information in the course of performing his own duties is not defined by Rule 6. However, a commonsense interpretation prevails, permitting "Representatives of other government agencies actively assisting United States attorneys in a grand jury investigation . . . access to grand jury material in the performance of their duties." [9] Yet projected against this current practice, and the weight of case law, is the anomalous language of Rule 6(e) itself, which, in its present state of uncertainty,[10] is spawning some judicial decisions highly restrictive of the use of government experts that require the government to "show the necessity (to the Court) for each particular person's aid rather than showing merely a general necessity for assistance, expert or otherwise" [11] and that make Rule 6(e) orders subject to interlocutory appeal.[12]

In this state of uncertainty, the Committee believes it is timely to redraft subdivision (e) of Rule 6 to make it clear.

Paragraph (1) as proposed by the Committee states the general rule that a grand jury, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the government, or government personnel to whom disclosure is made under paragraph (2)(A)(ii) shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided in these rules. It also expressly provides that a knowing violation of Rule 6 may be punished as a contempt of court. In addition, it carries forward the current provision that no obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this Rule.

Having stated the general rule of nondisclosure, paragraph (2) sets forth exemptions from nondisclosure. Subparagraph (A) of paragraph (2) provides that disclosure otherwise prohibited, other than the grand jury deliberations and the vote of any grand juror, may be made to an attorney for the government for use in the performance of his duty and to such personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in [10] There are indications that the Supreme Court's proposed change will not clarify the present situation and may even lead to further unclarity. As observed by the Ninth Circuit:

"The requirement for a showing of need would remain under the pending amendments to Rule 6(e) which expand "attorneys for the government" to include "such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the government in the performance of their duties." 44 U.S.L.W. 4549 (emphasis added). Because of the United States Attorney's involvement in the prosecution of the case, he or she cannot be entrusted with passing on the necessity of assistance. Cf. Coolidge v. New Hampshire (1971), 403 U.S. 443."

J. R. Simplot Co. v. United States Court for the District of Idaho, Nos. 76–1893, 76–1995, slip opinion at 8 n. 15 (9th Cir. filed November 12, 1976, petition for rehearing enbanc dismissed as moot on ————. [12] Interlocutory appeal of issues disruptive of a grand jury investigation are not favored. As observed by Justice Frankfurter in considering the appealability of a motion to quash a grand jury subpena:

"The duration of its (the grand jury's) life, frequently short, is limited by statute. It is no less important to safeguard against undue interruption the inquiry instituted by a grand jury than to protect from delay the progress of the trial after an indictment has been found. Opportunity for obstructing the 'orderly progress' of investigation should no more be encouraged in one case than in the other." Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 327 (1940)."

In light of the burden on the government and the disruption of the grand jury process, there is substantial doubt about the wisdom of interposing the court as a referee between the grand jury and its criminal investigative support. Civil misuse can be raised in subsequent civil proceedings.

the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. In order to facilitate resolution of subsequent claims of improper disclosure, subparagraph (B) further provides that the names of government personnel designated to assist the attorney for the government shall be promptly provided to the district court and such personnel shall not utilize grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. Although not expressly required by the rule, the Committee contemplates that the names of such personnel will generally be furnished to the court before disclosure is made to them. Subparagraph (C) permits disclosure as directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or, at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for dismissing the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. Paragraph (3) carries forward the last sentence of current Rule 6(e) with the technical changes recommended by the Supreme Court.

The Rule as redrafted is designed to accommodate the belief on the one hand that Federal prosecutors should be able, without the time-consuming requirement of prior judicial interposition, to make such disclosures of grand jury information to other government personnel as they deem necessary to facilitate the performance of their duties relating to criminal law enforcement. On the other hand, the Rule seeks to allay the concerns of those who fear that such prosecutorial power will lead to misuse of the grand jury to enforce non-criminal Federal laws by (1) providing a clear prohibition, subject to the penalty of contempt and (2) requiring that a court order under paragraph (C) be obtained to authorize such a disclosure. There is, however, no intent to preclude the use of grand jury-developed evidence for civil law enforcement purposes. On the contrary, there is no reason why such use is improper, assuming that the grand jury was utilized for the legitimate purpose of a criminal investigation. Accordingly, the Committee believes and intends that the basis for a court's refusal to issue an order under paragraph (C) to enable the government to disclose grand jury information in a non-criminal proceeding should be no more restrictive than is the case today under prevailing court decisions.[13] It is contemplated that the judicial hearing in connection with an application for a court order by the government under subparagraph (3)(C)(i) should be ex parte so as to preserve, to the maximum extent possible, grand jury secrecy.[14]

Changes in Existing Law

In compliance with subsection (4) of rule XXIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, changes in existing law made by the bill, as reported, are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets, new matter is printed in italic, and existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman):

(e) Secrecy of Proceedings and Disclosure.

(1) General rule. A grand juror, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the Government, or any person to whom disclosure is made under paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these Rules. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this rule. A knowing violation of Rule 6 may be punished as a contempt of court.

(2) EXCEPTIONS

(A) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury, other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror, may be made to—

(i) an attorney for the government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty; and

(ii) such government personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law.

(B) Any person to whom matters are disclosed under subparagraph (A)(ii) of this paragraph shall not utilize that grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. An attorney for the government shall promptly provide the district court, before which was impaneled the grand jury whose material has been so disclosed, with the names of the persons to whom such disclosure has been made.

(C) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may also be made—

(i) when so directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding; or

(ii) when permitted by a court at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury.

(3) SEALED INDICTMENTS. The Federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned may direct that the indictment is returned may direct that the indictment be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the return of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.

FEDERAL RULES OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE AMENDMENTS

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 5864) to approve with modifications certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, to disapprove other such proposed amendments, and for other related purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That notwithstanding the first section of the Act entitled "An Act to delay the effective date of certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and certain other rules promulgated by the United States Supreme Court" (Public Law 94-349, approved July 8, 1976) the amendments to rules 6(e), 23, 24, 40.1, and 41(c)(2) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure for the United States district courts which are embraced by the order entered by the United States Supreme Court on April 26, 1976, shall take effect only as provided in this Act.

"SEC. 2. (a) The amendment proposed by the Supreme Court to subdivision (e) of rule 6 of such Rules of Criminal Procedure is approved in a modified form as follows: Such subdivision (e) is amended to read as follows:

"(e) SECRETARY OF PROCEEDINGS AND DISCLOSURE.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—A grand juror, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the Government, or any person to whom disclosure is made under paragraph (2) (A) (ii) of this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these rules. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this rule. A knowing violation of rule 6 may be punished as a contempt of court.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—

"(A) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury, other than its deliberations and the vote of any grand juror, may be made to—

"(i) an attorney for the government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty; and

"(ii) such government personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law.

"(B) Any person to whom matters are disclosed under subparagraph (A) (ii) of this paragraph shall not utilize that grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. An attorney for the government shall promptly provide the district court, before which was impaneled the grand jury whose material has been so disclosed, with the names of the persons to whom such disclosure has been made.

"(C) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may also be made—

"(i) when so directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding; or

"(ii) when permitted by a court at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury.

"(3) SEALED INDICTMENTS.—The Federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned may direct that the indictment be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the return of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.".

Mr. MANN (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURPHY of New York). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I make this reservation and yield to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. MANN) for the purpose of explaining the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5864 is a bill dealing with certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. We passed the bill last April 19 by a vote of 376 to 3.

In April 1976, the Supreme Court promulgated certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. These amendments made changes in four existing rules—6, 23, 24, and 41—and added a new rule, 40.1. The effective date of the proposed amendments was to have been August 1, 1976. However, Public Law 94-349 postponed the effective date until August 1, 1977, so that Congress could have additional time to review the proposals.

The Subcommittee on Criminal Justice took up the proposed amendments early this session. It held 3 days of hearings and received testimony from a wide range of persons and organizations. As a result of the hearings, the subcommittee drafted H.R. 5864.

As passed by the House, the bill disapproved the proposed amendments to rules 6, 24, and 41 as well as proposed rule 40.1. The bill approved the proposed amendment to rule 23 in a modified form.

In the other body, the bill was referred to the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures. That subcommittee seemed to prefer to let the proposed amendments take effect as promulgated, and it appeared that there would be no action on our bill by the other body.

Discussions ensued, and the other body was persuaded to act on the legislation. It completed action on Monday, July 25, by passing an amended version of H.R. 5864. Because the amendments will take effect on August 1 in the form in which they were promulgated, it will be impossible to arrange for a conference to resolve the differences in the bills passed by the two Houses. In anticipation of such a possibility, the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice maintained a close liasion with the other body's Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures. Our concerns were made known to that subcommittee, and the other side, in fashioning its version of the bill, attempted to meet those concerns. I believe that the other body's version of H.R. 5864 makes improvements in the amendments as proposed by the Supreme Court. Enactment of it is much preferable to permitting the Supreme Court's proposals to take effect.

Rule 6(e) which deals with secrecy of grand jury proceedings, presently permits disclosure of grand jury information to "attorneys for the Government for use in the performance of their duties." The Supreme Court proposed to revise rule 6(e) by expanding the definition of "attorneys for the Government" to include "such other Government personnel as are necessary to assist the attorneys for the Government in the performance of their duties."

Our version of H.R. 5864 disapproves the proposed amendment, preferring to have the issue resolved in the context of the comprehensive grand jury reform legislation now pending before the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Immigration, Citizenship and International Law. See House Report No. 95-195, at 5. In addition, there was some question as to whether the Supreme Court's proposal fully and accurately restated present law—as it purported to do. See the same at 4-5.

The other body's version of H.R. 5864 approves the proposed amendment to rule 6(e), but with modifications. For the most part, rule 6(e) as modified by the other body's version of the bill merely restates current practice under that rule. Many of the changes are organizational. There is no intent on our part to alter the present practice with respect to parts of the rule not involved in the Supreme Court's proposed amendment.

As modified by the other body, rule 6(e) establishes a general rule of secrecy for grand jury proceedings and provides that a knowing violation of the rule of secrecy is punishable as a contempt of court. The rule then sets forth several exceptions to the rule of secrecy.

The first exception continues a policy of present rule 6(e). Disclosure of grand jury information may be made to "an attorney for the Government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty." This language, which is similar to language presently in the rule, is not intended to change any current practice.

The second exception permits disclosure to "such Government personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the Government to assist an attorney for the Government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law." The attorney for the Government is required promptly to notify the district court of those persons to whom grand jury information is disclosed under this exception.

Recent cases have indicated that an attorney for the Government may utilize the assistance of other Government personnel and provide them with access to grand jury material in connection with the investigation of that grand jury—but may not allow such personnel to have access to such material in connection with solely civil investigations or in connection with criminal investigations unrelated to that grand jury's inquiry. See Robert Hawthorne Inc. v. Director of Internal Revenue, 406 F. Supp. 1098 (E.D. Pa. 1976); In re Pflaumer, 53 F.R.D. 464 (E.D. 1971); In re April 1956 Grand Jury, 239 F. 2d 263 (7th Cir. 1956); U.S. v. Anzelmo, 319 F. Supp. 1106 (E.D. La. 1970). See generally 8 J. Moore, Federal Practice section 605 (1975). This second exception in rule 6(e) is not intended to alter that case law development, but rather to codify it.

Rule 6(e), as modified by the other body's version of H.R. 5864, also continues two additional exceptions to grand jury secrecy that are contained in present rule 6(e). One permits disclosure of information when "Directed by a court preliminary to or in connection with a judicial proceeding," and the other permits disclosure when permitted by a court "at the request of a defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury."

Neither of these exceptions were questioned or criticized by any witness in any of the testimony on rule 6(e) before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice. It should be noted that the other body did not hold any hearings on the proposed amendments, but relied upon our hearings. As I indicated before, there is no intention to change the current practice with regard to those parts of rule 6(e) not directly involved in the Supreme Court's proposed amendments. Thus, it is not intended to change any current practice with regard to these two exceptions, nor is it intended to state a preference for how a court application should be made, whether ex parte or by notice to an adversary party.

Public Law 95-78, 95th Congress

AN ACT To approve with modifications certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, to disapprove other such proposed amendments, and for other related purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That notwithstanding the first section of the Act entitled "An Act to delay the effective date of certain proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and certain other rules promulgated by the United States Supreme Court" (Public Law 94-349, approved July 8, 1976) the amendments to rules 6(e), 23, 24, 40.1 and 41(c)(2) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure for the United States district courts which are embraced by the order entered by the United States Supreme Court on April 26, 1976, shall take effect only as provided in this Act.

SEC. 2. (a) The amendment proposed by the Supreme Court to subdivision (e) of rule 6 of such Rules of Criminal Procedure is approved in a modified form as follows: Such subdivision (e) is amended to read as follows:

"(e) SECRECY OF PROCEEDINGS AND DISCLOSURE.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—A grand juror, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the Government, or any person to whom disclosures is made under paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these rules. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this rule. A knowing violation of rule 6 may be punished as a contempt of court.

"(2) EXCEPTIONS.—

"(A) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury, other than its deliberations and the vote of any grand juror, may be made to—

"(i) an attorney for the government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty; and

"(ii) such government personnel as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law.

"(B) Any person to whom matters are disclosed under subparagraph (A)(ii) of this paragraph shall not utilize that grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce Federal criminal law. An attorney for the government shall promptly provide the district court, before which was impaneled the grand jury whose material has been so disclosed, with the names of the persons to whom such disclosure has been made.

"(C) Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may also be made—

"(i) when so directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding; or

"(ii) when permitted by a court at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury.

"(3) SEALED INDICTMENTS.—The Federal magistrate to whom an indictment is returned may direct that the indictment be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the return of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.".

Subject: Report on Selected Cases Alleged to Have Been Examples of Grand Jury Abuse.

This is in response to your request for a report on the various cases alleged to have been examples of grand jury abuse.

The enclosed report does not claim to be an exhaustive coverage of all cases that have been cited as examples of abuse of the grand jury process. What we have attempted to do is cover a number of the better examples and to exclude cases that have been adequately covered in other articles or Congressional Hearings, e.g., Fort Worth Five (Hearings were held March 13, 1973, before Subcommittee No. 1 of the House of Representatives).

In addition to the report we have prepared a bibliography of articles that has as its subject grand jury abuse.

ROBERT J. DEGOSTIN, Legislative Attorney.

REPORT ON SELECTED CASES ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN EXAMPLES OF GRAND JURY ABUSE*

SEATTLE, WASH.—On the first of March 1971 a bomb exploded in the United States Capitol. As a result of the investigation into the bombing, Leslie Bacon was arrested. The arrest occurred on the evening of April 27 when a number of F.B.I. agents went to a house in Washington, D.C., where Bacon was staying and, with warrant in hand, made the arrest.[1] Two days after her arrest Bacon was flown to Seattle, Wash., to testify before a Federal grand jury that was sitting there.

[1] Arrest of Leslie Bacon on April 27, 1971 was held to be invalid because there was no showing of probable cause when warrant was issued for the arrest of Leslie Bacon as a material witness in a grand jury proceeding. Bacon v. United States, 449 F. 2d 933 (1971).

*See statement of limitations on covering memo.

It has been alleged that the real reason why Leslie Bacon was arrested and questioned before the grand jury was to determine what she knew about the upcoming antiwar demonstrations planned for May 1, 1971, in Washington, D.C. The allegation goes as follows: the government knew that Bacon was a radical who had attended a number of left-wing conferences from coast to coast in 1970 and at the time of her arrest was working on the Mayday protests. Thus she was seen as the source of much useful information concerning the antiwar demonstrations scheduled for May.

On April 30, 1971, Leslie Bacon began to testify before the Seattle grand jury. After testifying for three and one-half days, Bacon made a motion for a hearing to determine if her interrogation was tainted by illegal electronic surveillance of her prior conversations. If such information did exist it would clearly be inadmissible in court. However, if the same information could be obtained from a witness testifying before a grand jury, such testimony would be admissible. The motion was denied, and because of the denial Bacon refused to testify further and on May 19 was adjudged to be in civil contempt. In considering an appeal made by Bacon, the United States Court of Appeals, for the Ninth Circuit stated in Bacon v. United States, 446 F. 2d 667, 668 (1971):

"After three and one-half days of testifying before the grand jury, appellant filed a motion to compel the disclosure of electronic surveillance by the Government and to obtain a hearing thereon. She contended that both her subpoena and the questions asked of her by the grand jury were 'tainted' by illegally seized evidence, in that the information obtained by illegal wiretaps led to her being subpoenaed and was used in framing questions put to her. Appellant argues that the district court erred in denying this motion.

"A similar contention has recently been rejected by this court, and we adhere to that determination. See United States v. Gelbard (United States v. Barnas), 443 F. 2d 837 (9th Cir. 1971, pet. for rehearing denied June 23, 1971)."

The United States Supreme Court vacated and remanded, 408 U.S. 915 (1972). On remand the Court of Appeals in reversing, stated:

"We rejected [the] argument [of] Miss Bacon on the Authority of United States v. Gelbard, 443 F. 2d 837 * * *

"The Supreme Court thereafter reversed Gelbard * * *

"The Supreme Court decision in Gelbard and Egan established the proposition that a grand jury witness has standing to challenge the propriety of grand jury interrogation on the ground that such interrogation is based upon the prior illegal interception of the witness' communications. The Supreme Court there made it clear that such a witness may invoke the procedure prescribed in 18 U.S.C. § 3504(a)(1), by claiming that the witness' testimony is inadmissible because it is the primary product of an unlawful act, namely an illegal interception, or because it was obtained by the exploitation of such an unlawful act. As provided in section 3504(a)(1), where a witness invokes such procedure, it becomes the duty if the opponent of the claim (here the Government) to affirm or deny the occurrence of the alleged unlawful act.

"Miss Bacon substantially followed this procedure . . .

"Instead of responding to this claim by affirming or denying the occurrence of the alleged unlawful act, as required by section 3504(a)(1), the Government opposed Miss Bacon's motion, and it was denied . . .

"Since the Government did not follow the procedure prescribed . . ., Miss Bacon was entitled to refuse to give further grand jury testimony.

. . . It follows that Miss Bacon should not have been adjudged to be in civil contempt, and we accordingly set aside that adjudication. Bacon v. United States, 466 F. 2d 1196, 1197–1198 (1972)."

It has been suggested by lawyers representing left-wing clients that the practice of using information obtained from unauthorized wire taps to formulate questions to be asked of grand jury witnesses is common place today.

In an article in the March 1976 issue of Juris Doctor ("The Grand Jury-Making Trouble for Movement Lawyers") Fred Solowey, wrote the following about the Seattle grand jury of 1971: (at p. 41)

"Though the Justice Department seeks additional latitude in its use of grand juries, its powers over them already are considerable. Recent disclosures about a 1971 Seattle grand jury investigation reinforce that point. Defense lawyers at the time charged that the probe, ostensibly called to look into a bombing incident at the U.S. Capitol, was a cover for an anti-left offensive, an allegation rejected in the Justice Department's "Movement Obstructionism" memo of 1972. But last October in the Washington Post a former F.B.I. official close to the investigation called it "a fishing expedition. We didn't know a damn thing. Leslie Bacon was the only thing we had . . . She was called before a grand jury in Seattle (instead of D.C.) because we were more likely to get an indictment out there." The Seattle location was, according to the former FBI official, "deliberately rigged . . . to get an indictment."

San Francisco, California—In a three-part article on the grand jury that appeared in the April 5–12–19, 1976 issues of The New Yorker magazine, author Richard Harris stated: "Of all the abuses that are still going on, perhaps the most serious one is the abuse of the grand-jury system to help the F.B.I. do the jobs that it has failed to do on its own." (p. 43 of April 19, 1976) In explaining how the grand jury is abused in this way he cites the Patty Hearst case and writes:

"Having failed to turn up any dependable informers in the Hearst case in its early stages, the F.B.I. desperately resorted to a relatively new law-enforcement technique—the use of compliant federal grand juries to help the Bureau do the job that it couldn't do on its own. Although under law grand juries are supposed to determine only whether crimes have been committed and to indict those who seem to have committed them, and are not supposed to serve as investigative tools for prosecutors or law-enforcement agencies, nowadays grand juries are frequently, and improperly, used to amass evidence against people who have already been indicted, to obtain leads on fugitives or even find missing persons like Jimmy Hoffa. The F.B.I. merely persuades a cooperative United States Attorney to instruct the federal grand jury, he in effect runs to subpoena relatives, friends, and acquaintances of the person being sought, and then the prosecutor forces these witnesses, under threat of imprisonment for contempt of court, to divulge whatever they may know about the fugitive—or, for that matter, about anything under the sun that the prosecutor (or the F.B.I.) feels like asking, however irrelevant and personal. In short, if the government can't find informers it creates them. (pp. 43–44 of April 5, 1976)."

In an article explaining the investigative powers of the federal grand jury, Robert D. Sharp, an attorney with the Internal Security Division of the Department of Justice in an attempt to justify actions like that described above stated:

"Although grand juries are not empanelled for mere groundless snooping, it must be remembered that the investigative powers of the federal grand jury are virtually unlimited. . . .

"Unquestionably, the need for utilizing the investigative grand jury has increased. This is principally true because of the reluctance of some citizens to cooperate with the investigative . . . authorities."[1]

However, it should be pointed out that no one is legally obliged to cooperate with or answer questions asked by the F.B.I. or other government officials.

Los Angeles and Boston.—The New York Times in 1971 published sections of the Pentagon Papers. On June 28 of the same year Daniel Ellsberg was indicted by a Los Angeles grand jury.

In the indictment, Dr. Ellsberg was charged with having violated two sections of title 18 of the United States Code—§ 3651 (Embezzlement of Money, or Theft of Public Property or Records) and § 793(c) (Gathering, Transmitting, or Losing Defense Information).

The indictment of Daniel Ellsberg by the Los Angeles grand jury was not the end of the investigation into the dissemination of the Pentagon Papers but just the beginning. Another grand jury was convened in Boston to investigate the same matter, while the Los Angeles grand jury was continued.

In discussing the practice of calling witnesses before a grand jury that has already handed down an indictment, David J. Fine writes:

"On several occasions, the United States Attorney, continues to call witnesses in connection with a crime after the grand jury handed down an indictment, that is, after the prosecutor obtained what he purportedly sought. The standard explanation for this procedure was that it was directed to the procurement of additional or superseding indictments. . . .

"Some credibility is lent to this justification by the fact that superseding indictments were in fact handed down in several instances. . . . It is, nevertheless, impossible to tell when the justification is used in good faith and when as a cover for improper interrogation. The court must simply accept the prosecutor's word."[2]

The issue of being asked questions by a grand jury concerning a person who has already been indicted was raised by Anthony J. Russo, Jr. a friend of Ellsberg, who had been called before the Los Angeles grand jury, in In Re Russo, 448 F. 2d 369, 374 (1971) where the court held:

". . . The grand jury is still in session. We cannot assume that no further information appropriate to their inquiry will be obtained from appellant upon the answering of the questions proposed. There may well be involved additional defendants, or additional criminal acts shown to have been committed by Ellsberg. The effective functioning of a grand jury would be seriously affected if it was required to delay its return of an indictment to await an attempt to obtain evidence from a recalcitrant witness. The contention is without merit."

Russo, still refusing to testify was held in civil contempt and spent forty-seven days in jail. He was finally released when the government refused to comply with a condition (set by Russo and agreed to by the court) that the government provide him with a transcript of his testimony.

Also heard by the Los Angeles grand jury was Robert Ellsberg, the 15-year-old son of Daniel Ellsberg. The young Ellsberg was subpoenaed at 7:30 A.M. for appearance two hours later. It has also been reported that Ellsberg's ex-wife was persuaded to testify by being told that if she testified Robert wouldn't have to.

The following persons were subpoenaed before the Boston grand jury: Richard A. Falk, a Princeton professor of international law; Noam Chomsky, of M.I.T. an influential writer on the Vietnam War; Ralph Stavins of the Institute of Policy Studies; David Halberstam, a former New York Times reporter who covered the war in Vietnam and Samuel Popkin, a professor from Harvard and a scholar of Vietnamese village life, just to name a few.

Professor Popkin appeared before the Boston grand jury on August 19, 1971 (after the date of the indictment of Daniel Ellsberg) and testified concerning Ellsberg and the Pentagon Papers. However, when asked "What is the opinion as to persons you believe possessed a copy of the Pentagon Papers in Massachusetts prior to June 13, 1971?" he refused to answer. As a result of refusing to answer this and a number of other questions he was adjudge to be in civil contempt. In May of 1972 the Court of Appeals in Boston in considering Popkin's refusal to answer the question quoted above, stated:

"The generality of the opinion question here, the apparent basis for the opinion being pursued, and the idea of using one scholar to speculate about the sources of others' work, without any showing of strong need therefor, are repugnant to me. In my view, even apart from constitutional claims, we should exercise our supervisory power to state that in this circuit scholars ought not to go to prison for refusing to give their opinions or beliefs based on casual and retrospective reflections on similarities of content. But while my brothers agree that the opinion questions were improper, their objection is a narrower formal one. Accordingly, . . . we simply disapprove the questions as asked. United States v. Doe, 460 F. 2d 328, 335 (1972)."

However, due to the fact that Popkin had also refused to answer what were later found to be legitimate questions he was still held to be in contempt. So on November 10, 1972 the Supreme Court in Popkin v. United States, 409 U.S. 1002 (1972) refused to stay the execution of his contempt judgment. Professor Popkin entered jail the morning of November 21, 1972, his imprisonment only lasted one week because the government decided to dismiss the grand jury even though it was expected to run for another six weeks.

During the life of the Los Angeles and Boston grand juries it was widely believed that the evidence developed at the Boston grand jury was to be used in prosecution of Ellsberg who had been indicted by the Los Angeles grand jury. The Justice Department vigorously denied such use of the grand jury.

Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.—J. Edgar Hoover appeared before a subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee on November 27, 1970. Hoover had a prepared statement with him that basically said that the F.B.I. had information that indicated that the East Coast Conspiracy to Save Lives (a group of Catholic priests and nuns, teachers and students) was plotting to blow up underground electrical conduits and steam pipes serving the Washington, D.C. area in order to disrupt government operations. Further, it was alleged that the East Coast Conspiracy was planning to kidnap a highly-placed government official.

It has been said that in an effort to support Hoover's charges, a grand jury was convened in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. On the 12th of January, 1971 the Harrisburg grand jury indicted Eqbal Ahmad, Philip Berrigan, Elizabeth McAlister, Neil McLughlin, Anthony Scoblick and Joseph Wenderoth in the bombing and kidnapping plot. After the indictment eleven witnesses were subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury. It has been reported that the reason behind these subpoenas was to develop evidence against the indicted persons.

One of the witnesses, Jogues Egan refused to testify even after receiving transactional immunity. Egan was cited for civil contempt. She refused to answer questions on the ground (among others) that the questions were based upon information overheard from respondents by means of the government's illegal wiretapping and electronic surveillance. After a hearing, Egan was found to be in contempt by the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. The decision was appealed and the Third Circuit Court of Appeals reversed holding that a witness summonded before a grand jury may not be examined with questions based on information obtained from illegal wiretaps. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania 450 F. 2d 199 (1971). This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Gelbert et al. v. United States, 408 U.S. 31 (1972).

In criticizing the Harrisburg grand jury, a lawyer for National Lawyers Guild was quoted as saying:

". . . the government . . . tries to isolate its Left opposition from otherwise sympathetic supporters. Because the questions asked before grand juries are often made public during immunity or contempt hearings, prosecutors are able to ask "red herring" questions—bring up bombs, dynamite and other subjects, regardless of whether there is any reason to believe the witness questioned has any information.

The government may use such tactics to taint legal, aboveground organizing with the image of an underground terrorist conspiracy.[1]

Tucson, Arizona.—In the fall of 1970 a federal grand jury was convened in Tucson, Arizona to investigate the purchase of dynamite by a young man. The salesman was suspicious of the purchaser so he wrote down the license plate number of the car the man was driving and called the F.B.I. The F.B.I. traced the car to a women who lived with four other people in Los Angeles. For months the house was under surveillance by the F.B.I. In the interim the salesman identified the dynamite purchaser from photographs at the F.B.I. office.

It has been stated that much of the Tucson grand jury's deliberations took place after John Fuerst was indicted for transporting explosives in interstate commerce.

A number of authors point to Tucson as the first attempt by the government to use the grand jury to help create a "sociogram." A sociogram . . . "is a construction designed to reproduce graphically the Left's patterns of living; a framework of facts and assumptions, not only on a political level but on a personal and private level, to facilitate the pursuit of the new radical quarry."[2]

The type of questions that are asked in order to create a "sociogram" and that reportably were asked of witnesses before the Tucson grand jury are:

"Tell the grand jury every place you went after you returned to your apartment from Cuba, every city you visited, with whom and by what means of transportation you traveled and who you visited at all the places you went during the times of your travels after you left . . . Ann Arbor . . ."[3]

The abuse of the grand jury process in Tucson, Arizona in the Fall of 1970 was stated as follows:

"The testimony before the . . . grand jury makes it quite clear that it was primarily concerned with Fuerst, but that did not prevent it from developing a detailed and comprehensive picture of West Coast radical activities. The "cover" use of Fuerst for fishing purposes was emphasized by the fact that no additional indictments were issued after Fuerst's original indictment, despite the subsequent testimony of five witnesses."[4]

Tallahasee & Camden.—Two grand juries should be mentioned by way of passing. One being the case of the Vietnam Veterans Against the War—twenty three high ranking members were subpoenaed before a Tallahassee, Florida grand jury and were kept there during the entire 1972 Republican Convention that was going on in Miami. It is contended that this group was subpoenaed when they were to prevent them from demonstrating at the Convention. Six of the twenty-three were indicted and all six of those indicted were acquitted.

The second grand jury worthy of mention is the one convened in Camden, New Jersey in September of 1971. In the Summer of 1971 twenty-eight persons were arrested by the F.B.I. as they were attempting a raid on a local draft board. A grand jury was called notwithstanding the fact that the twenty-eight were caught red-handed. Two of the witnesses called before the grand jury were Pat and Bruce Grumbles who refused to testify and spent fourteen months in jail for civil contempt. It is believed that the reason the grand jury was convened was not to obtain information in the instant case (they had plenty of that) but to develop leads to an unsolved case of a similar nature a year earlier. It is interesting to note that all twenty-eight were acquitted of all charges (due the acceptance of the trial jury of the defense of entrapment).

Grand Jury Abuse in the Past.—It should not be thought that the abuse of the grand jury is something new. In the 1790's Federalist judges encouraged the return of indictments against supporters of Thomas Jefferson. This type of abuse did not change with the election of Jefferson as President. It was under the Jefferson Administration that Aaron Burr was indicted by a third grand jury after the first two refused to return a true bill. Such grand jury abuses continued, as is pointed out by Marvin E. Frankel when he writes:

"In the ante-bellum period, grand juries in the South, acting vigorously to uphold the practice of slavery, returned indictments against abolitionist leaders and newspapers. In the North, grand juries were rarely concerned with the slavery question until 1850, when passage of the Fugitive Law made assisting runaway slaves a criminal offense. After that, the impact of local political sentiment could be seen in the spotty enforcement of the Law, persistently denounced by abolitionist leaders and the press.

"During the Reconstruction period, the grand jury served as a principal weapon of Southern whites in their struggle against Radical Republicans and Negro rights. The whites gained control of state grand juries which returned scores of indictments against the so-called "scalawags" and "carpetbagger" public officials. . .

"At the same time, Southern white grand juries refused to indict members of the Ku Klux Klan. . ."[1]

Along this same line Richard Harris states:

". . . on the federal level grand juries have almost always been rubber stamps in criminal prosecutions and in political persecutions. During periods of national strife or popular hysteria, even the most liberal Administrations have allowed. . . grand juries to be used in the most nakedly oppressive ways—the Lincoln Administration to silence critics of the Union cause, the Wilson Administration to illegally imprison and deport several hundred innocent radicals to Russia after the Bolshevik Revolution, the Franklin Roosevelt Administration to harass Nazi sympathizers, and the Truman Administration to permit the anti-liberal vendetta waged by Representatives Richard M. Nixon and Senator Joseph H. McCarthy."[2]

The above is not to suggest that the abuse of the grand jury system today is not more serious than it was in the past but is only pointed out to indicate that abuse of the system has been with us for some time.

Dated updated August 20, 1977.

ISSUE DEFINITION

Transplanted from England and incorporated into the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, the grand jury was seen by the Founders as a shield for the individual against malicious prosecution. It was also value as a people's watchdog to search out and disclose corruption in government. Recently, however, charges have been made that the grand jury has lost its independence, that it does little more than rubber stamp the prosecutor's actions, and that, in fact, the grand jury has become an instrument of political harassment. Reform proposals range from abolishing the grand jury to according witnesses an array of procedural protections not presently available.

BACKGROUND AND POLICY ANALYSIS

The protection of a grand jury indictment derives from the Fifth Amendment, which provides in part: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury . . . ."

The grand jury is said to have originated in England in 1116, with the promulgation of the Assize of Clarendon. Significantly, the early grand jury (Assize) was entirely an instrument of the prosecution. It consisted of a group of men called together from each township to report to the King from their own knowledge what crimes had been committed and by whom. Not until 500 years later did the grand jury's function as a shield against malicious prosecution emerge. In 1681, Charles II ordered the grand jury to indict the Earl of Shaftesbury for treason for opposing his effort to reestablish the Catholic Church in England. The grand jury resisted the King, deliberated in private, and refused to return an indictment. This incident marked the birth of the grand jury.

The modern federal grand jury is a body of 23 citizens randomly selected from their districts who are empowered to act with a quorum of 16. Its primary duty is to examine accusations against persons charged with crime within the district in which it is impaneled to determine whether there is probable cause to indict. The grand jury also has the authority to forward reports to the court on matters that it has investigated. The vote of 12 jurors is required to return an indictment, but the indictment is fatal unless it also is signed by the United States Attorney. The legal standard for returning an indictment is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the person under investigation committed it. Proceedings are conducted in strict secrecy with rules prohibiting disclosure of what occurred in the grand jury room. The life of a grand jury is eighteen months but, in certain cases, it may be extended for another term. Moreover, a new grand jury may inquire into the same matters a prior grand jury investigated. Perhaps the greatest difference between the ancestral grand jury and the modern federal grand jury is that the ancient grand jury returned indictments based on the jurors' personal knowledge of criminal activity, while the modern grand jury indicts on the basis of information learned during the course of its investigation.

Criticism of the grand jury takes two directions. One avenue of criticism focuses on the grand jury's incapacity to function independently and the other focuses on the lack of procedural protections for grand jury witnesses. Both analyses proceed, however, from a growing perception of a common problem; namely, that the grand jury's power to investigate alleged crimes is being used as a pretext to delve into a witness' beliefs and associations. Advocates of the grand jury system maintain that the grand jury acts as a needed buffer between a powerful government and unpopular political and social minorities.

The controversy surrounding the grand jury system covers a variety of practices and procedures. The power of the government attorney to control the proceedings is questioned. Critics maintain that the government attorney, armed with a superior knowledge of the law, completely dominates the investigation, not only deciding what witnesses to call and what questions to ask, but also characterizing the sufficiency of the evidence. The grand jury's subpoena power is another subject of debate. Presently, the grand jury has the power to summon a witness from anywhere across the country, at anytime, night or day, and require the individual to appear before the grand jury, either immediately or in the future, without any showing that there is some connection between the witness called and the subject under investigation. If a witness wants to challenge a subpoena, he must travel to the district in which the grand jury is sitting. The grand jury's power to discipline recalcitrant witnesses is also questioned. Presently, a witness who refuses to obey a court order in connection with a grand jury can be imprisoned pursuant to the court's contempt power for the duration of the life of the grand jury or 18 months, whichever comes first, unless the witness relents and cooperates. Furthermore, if a new grand jury is convened and the witness again refuses to cooperate, a new period of confinement may be imposed. The sufficiency of the evidence which will support an indictment is yet another subject on criticism. Under the present rules and laws, a defendant may not challenge an indictment that is based on hearsay, irrelevant, incompetent, or illegally obtained evidence. The rights of witnesses in the grand jury room are also a topic of increasing controversy. Presently, a lawyer may not accompany a witness in the grand jury room, although a witness may leave the room at appropriate intervals to consult with his attorney outside the door. Additionally, a witness' privilege against self-incrimination may be neutralized by a grant of immunity. Failure to testify, once immunity has been granted, is punishable by contempt. Finally, the rights of such witnesses to target warnings (notice that they are possible defendants), to present exculpatory evidence, and to be informed of the specific nature of the investigation are being debated.

Several reform measures have been proposed. It has been suggested that the grand jury system should be abolished in favor of prosecution by information. An information is a formal written complaint charging an accused with the commission of specific criminal acts, which is required to be verified in some manner by the prosecutor. England abolished the grand jury system in 1933. Furthermore, since the right to a grand jury indictment is one of the few guarantees not made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment, Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), many states allow the prosecution of a felony to be initiated either by indictment or by information. Several states that permit prosecution of felonies by information also require some form of preliminary hearing to determine probable cause. Abolition of the federal grand jury system would require a constitutional amendment which might prove difficult, if not impossible, because of the reverence with which the Bill of Rights is regarded.

A second reform proposal is directed at reducing the period of confinement for contempt and prohibiting confinement for subsequent refusals to provide information concerning the same transaction. The merit of this proposal is that it reduces the government's power to oppress witnesses by imposing long periods of incarceration. The difficulty is that it weakens the government's power to secure the testimony of persons who refuse for other than a legally recognized privilege to provide the grand jury with information. It is argued that once the legal process has determined the protected areas of individual privacy and silence, each person has a civic duty to promote law and order by cooperating with a grand jury investigation. Most commentators agree, however, that prolonged incarceration bears diminishing returns. They believe that once a witness has refused to cooperate for a sustained period of time, it is very unlikely that additional confinement will produce witness cooperation.

Several reform measures concerning immunity have emerged from the controversy surrounding the grand jury system. These proposals are designed to increase protections against intrusions into a witness' privacy. One such proposal would eliminate immunity unless a witness consents to it. Another proposal would prohibit "use immunity" in favor of "transactional immunity." Transactional immunity completely immunizes a witness from prosecution for every offense touched upon by his testimony, while "use immunity" only prohibits the direct or indirect use of a witness' testimony in a subsequent prosecution. The disadvantage of transactional immunity is that it prevents the prosecution of a witness who is subsequently and independently found to be more deserving of prosecution than originally thought. It is also felt that transactional immunity encourages shallow testimony, and even fabrication, since it provides absolution for every offense touched on, however lightly. Consensual immunity also poses problems since it places access to needed evidence within a witness' control.

Giving the grand jury the power to appoint a special attorney is another measure which has been proposed to strengthen the grand jury's independence. The special attorney would have the authority to sign an indictment and conduct all phases of the investigation as well as any subsequent criminal prosecution. Since an indictment is fatal unless it is signed by the United States Attorney, this proposal protects the grand jury's indictment power, as well as facilitates its investigative independence. On the other hand, it is felt that such a measure would substantially interfere with the ideal of equal justice in that the special counsel's prosecutorial judgments would not be standardized by the unifying supervision of the Justice Department.

Permitting witnesses or targets, or both, to have their attorneys present in the grand jury room is yet another proposed approach to grand jury reform. Some of the possible benefits to be derived from the presence of an attorney for the witness are the reduction of grand jury impropriety, greater protection of witness testimonial privileges and increased grand jury independence. The primary disadvantage of such a measure is that it would convert what is now an inquisitorial proceeding into an adversarial proceeding with increased delays and cost, while disputed matters are brought before a judge for resolution.

Other reform proposals include the following:

(1) Authorizing criminal sanctions to protect grand jury proceedings from improper disclosures.

(2) Excusing witnesses who plan to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination.

(3) Prohibiting subsequent grand jury investigations of the same subject matter unless newly discovered evidence is found.

(4) Requiring the attorney for the government to present exculpatory evidence to the grand jury.

(5) Providing traget warnings and allowing potential targets an opportunity to appear before the grand jury to present a defense.

(6) Providing grand jury witnesses with notice of the right to counsel and the privilege against self-incrimination.

(7) Requiring subpoenas to state with specificity the nature of the offense under investigation.

(8) Giving district courts in which the witness resides concurrent jurisdiction to hear and determine motions to quash a subpoena.

(9) Requiring mandatory recording of grand jury proceedings.

(10) Providing witnesses with transcripts of their grand jury testimony.

(11) Providing defendants with pretrial discovery of the grand jury testimony with the witnesses to be called by the prosecution at trial.

(12) Decreasing the size of grand juries.

LEGISLATION

P.L. 95-78 (H.R. 5864).

Amends rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure dealing with the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. The amendment authorizes government attorneys to disclose matters occurring before the grand jury to government personnel for the limited purpose of assisting the attorney in the performance of his duty to enforce federal criminal law. Non-attorney personnel may not utilize the material for any other purpose. Signed into law on July 30, 1977.

Several general reform bills are pending before the present Congress. They include measures for strengthening the independence of the grand jury, for increasing the procedural and substantive rights available to grand jury witnesses, and for requiring periodic reports to Congress. The pending reform legislation is as follows: H.R. 94, H.R. 3150 (Eilberg), H.R. 2020 (Patterson), H.R. 3736 (Conyers et al.), H.R. 4908 (Duncan), and S. 1449 (Abourezk).

A few bills have also been introduced which address specific grand jury procedures and practices:

H.R. 406 (Holtzman): Sets a six-month limit on imprisonment for contempt and establishes other protections and rights in connection with a contempt proceeding. Introduced on January 4, 1977, and referred to the House Judiciary Committee.

H.R. 844 (Drinan): Prohibits the granting of "use immunity" to neutralize a witness' privilege against self-incrimination in connection with any proceeding before Congress, a federal court, a federal grand jury, or a federal agency. Introduced on January 4, 1977, and referred to the House Judiciary Committee.

H.R. 1330 (Jordan): Authorizes the appointment of a special judicial prosecutor to assist grand juries in conducting an investigation into the activities of an office in the executive branch and stipulates that the special prosecutor shall have exclusive authority and responsibility on behalf of the United States to conduct all grand jury and other criminal proceedings arising out of such an inquiry. Introduced on January 13, 1977, and referred to the House Judiciary Committee.

Four proposals introduced by Rep. Eilberg to amend the Constitution are pending before Congress. These proposals would abolish the constitutional requirement of prosecution by indictment and substitute prosecution by information or allow Congress to enact legislation regulating the initiation of criminal prosecutions. These proposals would also permit Congress to enact legislation to provide for investigatory, as distinguished from accusatory, grand juries. The proposals are: H.J. Res. 59, H.J. Res. 60, H.J. Res. 61, and H.J. Res. 62.

CHRONOLOGY OF EVENTS

07/09/77—The American Bar Association passed a second grand jury resolution calling for additional reform measures, including limitations on confinement for civil contempt, target warnings, recordation of grand jury proceedings, guidelines for prosecutorial conduct, and consideration for freedom of the press and the attorney-client privilege.

05/23/77—The Supreme Court decided United States v. Washington, No. 74–1106, holding that a grand jury witness is not entitled to target warnings.

The Supreme Court decided United States v. Wong, No. 76–635, holding that a grand jury witness is not entitled to warnings of the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination.

06/10/76—The first congressional hearings on grand jury reform began.

07/01/75—The American Bar Association passed a resolution calling for grand jury reform to allow counsel in the grand jury room, prohibit use immunity and strengthen penalties for unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information.

03/05/75—Ellen Grussi and Terri Turgeen were jailed for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury convened in New Haven, Conn., to investigate the harboring of student fugitives alleged to have participated in a Boston bank robbery. (They were released nine months later when the grand jury term expired.)

03/08/75—Joe Raymond was jailed for contempt for refusing to testify before a federal grand jury in Lexington, Kentucky, investigating the same matters as the New Haven grand jury. (He was released almost 14 months later on May 4, 1976, when the grand jury expired.)

10/11/73—The Supreme Court decided United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, holding that a grand jury can present questions to witnesses based on illegally seized evidence.

06/08/73—Rep. Joshua Eilberg introduced H.R. 8461, the first grand jury reform legislation in American history.

FEDERAL GRAND JURY ISSUES

1. USE OF INDICTMENT

The Fifth Amendment to the Constitution requires use of an indictment for a federal prosecution of any "infamous crime". Rule 7 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedures specifically provides that an indictment is necessary for prosecution of any offense punishable by imprisonment of one year or more. Prosecution for an offense punishable by no imprisonment or by imprisonment of less than one year may be undertaken on either an indictment or information.[1]

Under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rules 3 to 5), a criminal case can proceed on the basis of a complaint, followed by an initial appearance before a magistrate, and then by a preliminary hearing, where a showing of probable cause must be made. The prosecutor is free to use this procedure before securing an indictment. He is also free under Rule 7 to proceed immediately to an indictment, without the need for a complaint, or a probable cause hearing, and then to trial. Use of either procedure is solely in the discretion of the prosecutor.

[1] The Constitution does not require the states to initiate all serious prosecutions by grand jury indictment. Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884). States are free to proceed by use of indictment or information.

The indicting function of a grand jury is separate from, though related to, its investigative function. A grand jury has the power to investigate any and all federal offenses, by securing the attendance of witnesses, and under the Court's supervision and direction, and at the prosecutor's request, immunizing witnesses, punishing recalcitrant witnesses, and subpoenaing records and documents. Such investigations can, but need not, result in an indictment. Most offenses that result in an indictment do not result from such grand jury investigations, but rather from investigations by the police, FBI, or other law enforcement agencies. A few witnesses are called to describe the incident and the investigation, and an indictment is then returned. Whether, in serious cases, a probable cause hearing prior to an indictment, is held or not held, is solely within the discretion of the prosecutor.

Recently, judges, educators, and lawyers have suggested that the indicting grand jury is nothing more than a "rubber stamp" for the prosecutor. Whatever the government attorney recommends is adopted without change by the grand jurors. Thus, it is argued that it is no longer necessary to continue the requirement of an indictment for all serious offenses. Grant the prosecutor the discretion to proceed without an indictment. Elimination of the indictment would mean, of course, that a complaint, probable cause hearing, and information would be required. The probable cause hearing would be a sufficient safeguard for an accused. See e.g. (Judge) Campbell Eliminate the Grand Jury 64 J. Crim. Law and Crimin 174 (1973); see also H.J. Res. 774, 52, 855, (93rd Cong), H.J. Res. 46 (94th Congress) and H.J. Res. 59, 60, 61, 62 (95th Congress)—proposing Constitutional amendments to eliminate the requirement of a grand jury indictment in any case.

Others have resisted a Constitutional amendment to eliminate the requirement of a grand jury indictment. Their argument is not that the indicting grand jury really continues to provide any protection from unwarranted prosecutions, but rather that no one should tamper with any of the Bill of Rights. To amend any of the first ten amendments (Bill of Rights) might open a "Pandora's Box" to changes in other guarantees.

2. RIGHT TO COUNSEL

The Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution says, in part, "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right * * * to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense." Recent cases have applied this right to trials, Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), to preliminary hearings, Coleman v. Alabama, 399 U.S. 1 (1970), and even earlier to post-arrest confrontations, United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), and interrogations, Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

During the early 20th Century, it had been declared that there was no right to counsel at trial for a person accused of a crime. Judge Augustus Hand in In Re Black, 37 F. 2d 542 (1931), stated that a criminal defendant was not entitled to have the aid of counsel at trial nor before a grand jury. Despite the fact that Judge Hand based his decision on the then prevailing theory denying a right to counsel at any stage of a criminal proceeding, later decisions continually cited Black as a basis to deny counsel to a grand jury witness, see United States v. Blanton 77 F. Supp. 812 (1948). The proposition was accepted with no precedent needed or cited. See United States v. Scully 225 F. 2d 113 (1955), United States v. Smyth 104 F. Supp. 283 (1952), and Constitution of the USA—Analysis and Interpretation, Doc. 92–82, 92d Congress, 1972, p. 1090, footnote 5. Today one still finds decisions which affirmatively state that there is no constitutional right to counsel before grand juries, see United States v. Daniels 461 F. 2d 1076 (CA5 1972). Recent decisions and memoranda prepared by the U.S. Department of Justice cite for this axiom In Re Groban, 352 U.S. 330 (1957).

In 1957, prior to its more recent cases mandating a Sixth Amendment right to counsel at all stages of criminal proceeding, the United States Supreme Court in In Re Groban, 352 U.S. 330 (1957) deciding that there was no right to counsel in a Fire Marshall investigation, based its holding on an assumption that there was no right to counsel before a grand jury.

Notwithstanding In Re Groban, the U.S. Supreme Court has not directly decided the issue of the right to counsel before the grand jury, although recent dictum implied there is no such right.

Historically, the basic purpose of the English grand jury was to provide a fair method for instituting criminal proceedings against persons believed to have committed serious crimes. Like its American counterpart, the inquiry was two-fold: (1) is there probable cause to believe a crime has been committed, and (2) is there probable cause to believe that this person committed it.

In the development of an absolute right to counsel at trial, absent a valid waiver, the Supreme Court first addressed the issue in dictum in Powell v. Alabama 287 U.S. 45 (1932). It was stated that there is a pre-trial right to counsel from the time of arraignment. However, Powell stood for the proposition that, in capital cases, where the defendant was unable to employ counsel, and was incapable of adequately making his own defense because of ignorance, feeble-mindedness, illiteracy, or the like, it is the duty of the court, whether requested or not, to assign counsel for him as a necessary requisite of due process. Later, in Johnson v. Zerbst 304 U.S. 458 (1938), the Court stated an absolute rule requiring the appointment of counsel for indigent defendants in the Federal courts.

In Hamilton v. Alabama 368 U.S. 52 (1961), the Court first enunciated the "critical stage" test, and further decided that an arraignment was indeed a critical proceeding requiring counsel, citing Powell as authority. Then came Gideon v. Wainwright 372 U.S. 335 (1963) for right to counsel at trial and White v. Maryland 373 U.S. 59 (1963) for preliminary hearing. Also, see In Re Gault 387 U.S. 1 (1967) and Argersinger v. Hamlin 407 U.S. 25 (1972).

In the area of custodial interrogation, the Court in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 US 478 (1964) ruled that pre-indictment interrogation is a "critical stage" requiring counsel. The minority opinion stated that no right to counsel attached until the institution of formal proceedings by way of indictment, information, or arraignment. Two years later, in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 US 436 (1966), the Court switched from the 6th Amendment grounds in Escobedo and relied instead on 5th Amendment grounds, setting the stage for the dissent in Escobedo to become the majority opinion in Kirby v. Illinois, 406 US 682 (1972). In Kirby, the Supreme Court concluded that a pre-indictment showup after arrest, but before the initiation of any adversary criminal proceedings (whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment), unlike the post-indictment confrontation in Wade and Gilbert, is not a criminal prosecution or "critical stage" at which the accused, as a matter of absolute right, is entitled to counsel. This 5–4 decision overruled every Circuit Court of Appeals on this matter.

United States v. Wade, 388 US 218 (1967) and Gilbert v. California, 388 US 263 (1967) ruled that a post-indictment lineup is a "critical stage" entitling the accused of counsel or substitute counsel as observer for fairness and to preserve evidence as to a suggestive lineup. The Court in Wade said: "It is central to (Powell v. Alabama) that, in addition to counsel's presence at trial, the accused is guaranteed that he need not stand alone against the State at any stage of the prosecution, formal or informal, in court or out, where counsel's absence might derogate from the accused's right to a fair trial." Generally, the courts must scrutinize any pre-trial confrontation of the accused to determine whether the presence of counsel is necessary to preserve the defendant's basic right to a fair trial as affected by his right to meaningfully cross-examine witnesses and to have the effective assistance of counsel at the trial itself.

Finally, against a vigorous dissent by the Chief Justice, the Supreme Court in Coleman v. Alabama, 399 US 1 (1970) ruled that a preliminary hearing was a "critical stage" necessitating counsel even though the only function of the hearing was to determine probable cause to warrant presenting the case to a grand jury and to fix bail (akin to felony arrangement or presentment). The dissent likened this hearing to a grand jury.

In Re Groban 352 US 330 (1957) and Anonymous Nos. 6 and 7 v. Baker 360 US 287 (1959), both 5–4 decisions occurred prior to these cases expanding the right of an individual to counsel at any stage of a criminal proceeding.

In Groban, a state administrative investigation by a fire marshall empowered by statute to inquire into the causes of any fire was held by the High Court to not be a criminal proceeding and hence no counsel was required even though the individuals had been committed to jail for noncooperation.

In Anonymous, state-licensed private detectives and investigators were convicted of contempt for refusing to testify in a preceeding in which a judge, acting as a one-man inquiry body, analogous to a grand jury, refused the right to counsel inside the hearing room, but permitted counsel outside and permitted detectives to consult with counsel when desired. The N.Y. State Bar had been investigating unethical practices by attorneys for ambulance-chasing, among other items. The Court declared that this did not violate 14th Amendment due process and cited Groban.

Recently, the Supreme Court has indicated in dictum, that there is no right to counsel before Federal grand juries. In United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564 (1976), the Court unanimously held (Justice Stevens not participating) that a witness who lies before a federal grand jury may be prosecuted for perjury whether or not he is entitled to, or has received, adequate warnings of his rights. Four justices went further, however, indicating that there is no right to be warned of a right to counsel, Free if necessary, and no right to counsel in a grand jury room even if the witness is a putative or virtual defendant. Two Justices stated that there was a right to counsel and two others concurred on the limited perjury basis.

However, all Justices did note that whether or not warnings are required, witnesses may continue to retain counsel outside the grand jury room and leave the room to consult with counsel when necessary. See also United States v. Daniels, 461 F.2d 1076 (CA 5 1972).

On May 23, 1977, the Supreme Court further indicated, in dictum, that there is no constitutional right to counsel before grand juries. In United States v. Washington, —U.S. —, 97 S. Ct. 1814 (1977), Chief Justice Burger, speaking for seven Justices held that a witness was adequately informed of his rights prior to his testimony before a grand jury and, in dictum, indicated that no special warnings were necessary for "targets" of grand jury injuries. Implied in that decision was that a witness need not be told of his right to counsel in the grand jury room as there is no such right.

3. IMMUNITY

Present Federal law allows the prosecutor to secure immunity for a witnesss, against his will if necessary, and thereby require him to testify. Until recently, only transactional immunity, that is a total preclusion of prosecution for any event, offense or activity about which a witness testifies under a grant of immunity, was permissable. Now "use" immunity, allowing prosecution, but prohibiting the use, directly or indirectly, of any evidence obtained as a result of immunized testimony, is allowed.

The Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution says, in part, "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury . . .; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself . . .".

The U.S. Supreme Court has decided that the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment permits compulsory immunization of a witness, as authorized by Federal legislation, as the immunity would then mean that the witness is no longer to be considered a witness against himself.

The first Federal statute granting immunity was enacted in 1857 and was applicable only to congressional hearings. Later, an immunity statute was enacted providing witnesses with transactional immunity as to certain offenses and for a more limited "use" immunity for other specific criminal offenses. In 1892, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that any limited application of use immunity was unconstitutional as it did not protect an individual from derivative use of the testimony. "Once immunity is granted, a witness is protected against prosecution not only for a crime that related to the precise testimony given but also for the fruits of such testimony," Counselman v. Hitchcock 142 US 547 (1892). The Court stressed its approval of transactional immunity . . . "A statutory enactment, to be valid, must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates."

One year later, Congress mandated transactional immunity as the only way to compel testimony after assertion of Fifth Amendment Constitutional privilege, see 27 Stat. 443 (1893). This transactional immunity was found constitutional by a 5–4 vote of the U.S. Supreme Court in Brown v. Walker 161 US 591 (1896), (stating that this type of immunity was coterminous with the privilege against self-incrimination), and then again in McCarthy v. Arndstein 266 US 34 (1924) and Shapiro v. US 335 US 1 (1948), by a wider margin, (asserting that the constitutional minimum was transactional immunity).

In 1954, Congress enacted a new statute providing immunity as to testimony relating to certain offenses given before courts and grand juries, 18 USC 3486.

This new statute was upheld that year in Adams v. Maryland 347 US 179 (1954), and, in dictum in Ullman v. US 350 US 422 (1956). Ullman re-affirmed the holding in Brown that transactional immunity supplied by the 1954 statute was valid and further stated, in dictum, that the immunity statute reviewed also mandated immunity from any state prosecution for the crime involved.

In 1964, in Murphy v. Waterfront Commission of New York Harbor 378 US (1964), (a civil and criminal contempt case), the Court ruled that a state witness granted immunity from prosecution under state law may not be compelled to give testimony which may incriminate him under Federal law, unless such testimony and its fruits cannot be used in connection with a Federal prosecution against him; therefore, use of such compelled testimony or its fruits, as distinguished from independent evidence, by the Federal government was proscribed once a state granted immunity. However, with the removal of the fear of Federal use of such testimony, the witness can be compelled to answer. The Court's reasoning that the State is therefore able to obtain information, requisite for effective law enforcement, and the witness and the Federal government are left in the same position as if the witness claimed his privilege in the absence of a state grant of immunity.

In 1968, the Congress also passed a limited compulsory transactional immunity statute, embodied in 18 USC 2514 (since repealed by 18 USC 6001–6004). Thereafter, in 1970, the Congress upon prodding by the Administration, enacted 18 USC 6001–6004 (the original Crime Control Act) in which 18 USC 6002 and 6003 mandated only use and derivative use, and not transactional, immunity as to organized crime, and required the repeal of 18 USC 2524 at the end of four years.

In 1972, the Supreme Court ruled as to whether use (and derivative use) immunity would be accepted as constitutional. Overruling 80 years of precedent, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that use and derivative immunity, as espoused in 18 USC 6001–6004, gave sufficient Fifth Amendment protection to individuals in all state and Federal proceedings, see Kastigar v. US 406 US 441 (1972) and Zicarelli v. New Jersey 406 US 472 (1972).

Most of the grand jury reform bills propose a return to transactional immunity. One of the arguments for retaining use and derivative use immunity is that it has a similar effect to transactional immunity. Once granted, the authorities would have to find wholly independent evidence relating to the crime before a prosecution would be permissible, and finding wholly independent evidence with the absence of taint or a sufficiently-attenuated taint is most difficult, if not impossible.

In fact, the Justice Department has indicated that there have been few prosecutions where use immunity under Section 6002 has been granted. In addition, use immunity is a better balance between the needs of law enforcement to prosecute the guilty and to obtain every man's evidence and the right of a witness not to have his own words used against him.

The arguments for a return to transactional immunity are essentially the same arguments upholding transactional immunity in Counselman. Sufficient protection means absolute immunity, especially since any form of compulsory immunity runs counter to the absolute intent of the Framers in the Self-Incrimination Clause, which was to preclude any compelled testimony. If law enforcement needs an individual's evidence, it must balance, as it does with plea bargains or other exercises of discretion, such interest against the prosecution of or penalty for this individual.

Several other proposals have been made as to a grant of immunity to witnesses before Federal courts and Federal grand juries: (1) allowing only non-compulsory or consensual immunity; that is the granting of immunity, only with the consent of the witness, and (2) allowing court-ordered immunity for defense witnesses at the request of defendants, so they can obtain evidence otherwise unavailable because of the invocation of the privilege by such witnesses.

Supporters of these proposals suggest that consensual immunity comports more with the intent of the Framers, as it is less of an intrusion on the unqualified command of the Self-Incrimination Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Any grant of immunity should require the voluntary consent of the witness. The drafters of the Fifth Amendment discussed not only use of evidence and prosecution but also the loss of integrity, prestige, and possible loss of a job that could result if one is required to testify. The Self-Incrimination Clause should thus be made an absolute protection. The witnesses should be able to refuse immunity and preclude testifying, or even refuse to testify even after a grant of immunity. Some middle positions are that use immunity should require consent; whereas, transactional immunity, an absolute bar, need not; that immunity, without consent, would be sufficient for testimony before grand juries if the testimony is truly confidential forever, but consent would be required for testimony at trial.

The argument for permitting immunity for defense witnesses is that it will achieve two objectives: (1) it would allow a more meaningful challenge to probable cause in a grand jury, thereby assisting in precluding unwarranted indictments and trials; and (2) it would lead to a fairer trial, where the jury can receive all relevant testimony in determining guilt or reasonable doubt. The argument against such a proposal focuses upon collusion and subordination of perjury, especially in cases of multiple co-defendants to the same case.

4. RECALCITRANT WITNESS

If a witness improperly refuses to testify before a grand jury, he may be held in contempt. Generally, contempt, whether civil or criminal, would only attach after a witness has invoked his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, has been given immunity, and still refuses to testify or produce documents. Occasionally, the contempt power has been invoked when a witness has no Fifth Amendment right, or has waived his right, and nevertheless refuses to testify or produce documents.

28 U.S.C. 1826 provides that the length of confinement for civil contempt be for a period not to exceed the term of the grand jury, including extensions, but not to exceed 18 months. 18 U.S.C. 401 authorizes fine or imprisonment for criminal contempt, without stating an amount or term.

A witness held in civil contempt for refusal to testify for the length of a grand jury or 18 months may be resubpoenaed after release by the same jury or a new grand jury, and if he or she still refuses to testify, may be reconfined up to the length of that new jury or 18 months. Confinement for such repeated recalcitrance, called "reiterative contempt" is presently legal. Shillitane v. United States, 384 U.S. 364 (1966). Confinement for civil contempt does not bar confinement for criminal contempt.

The purpose of confinement for civil contempt is "coercive", rather than punitive. The intent is to secure testimony on documents and thus confinement is to last until the witness complies. The purpose is not remedial, so as to be deterrent to others or a punishment for an offense. Criminal contempt, with a trial, can be used for punishment.

Some have complained that use of the civil contempt power has been abused. Witnesses who have not committed a crime, but who for personal or other reasons, refuse to testify can be imprisoned indefinitely without a trial. The effect, it is argued, is punitive in fact, if not in law, as these witnesses will never be compelled to testify by their confinement and thus the coercive effect is lacking. Some courts have adopted this argument and have released witnesses prior to termination of a grand jury when, in their opinion, confinement stopped being coercive, and became merely punitive. Others argue that such indefinite confinement has led to productive testimony and documentary evidence. To reduce the maximum term of confinement and to preclude reiterative contempt would merely lead to increased recalcitrance and thus the loss of important evidence in grand jury investigations.

Other complaints about confinement for recalcitrance have focused on the procedures leading to a contempt order. Some have argued that reasonable notice, allowing adequate preparation, counsel, and the necessity of findings, should be required by law. Others have indicated that setting fixed time periods for notice and requiring detailed findings would merely be dilatory, would result in fleeing witnesses, and would clearly interfere with the securing of evidence. The courts, following constitutional procedures, they continue, do provide reasonable notice and a due process hearing. Summary proceedings are essential to assure compliance with a grand jury's need for evidence. Counsel is ordinarily available or provided.

A federal judge may imprison a witness at a federal institution or an available state institution. Some have argued that with grand jury hearings often miles away from the residence of a witness, confinement in a local jail often cuts off the individual from friends, relatives and counsel. Some have also argued that confinement in state or county jails, with convicted violent offenders, and under severe conditions, is unfair and improper. Others have opposed legislation as to place of confinement. Discretion should continue to be granted to the trial court as to locus. Often, a witness should be kept close to the grand jury, and its investigation, so as to encourage compliance. The inconvenience to the witness is outweighed by the need to secure prompt compliance and thus needed information.

Presently, requests for contempt for refusal to testify or produce documents are made by the prosecutor to the court. Some have urged that contempt should only be authorized by a majority vote of the grand jurors. They, rather than the prosecutor or the court, can weigh the need for the evidence against the claim of the witness. Finally, to ask laymen on a grand jury to approve a request for contempt would allow emotion, bias, and prejudice, rather than law to be determinative.

A witness who refuses to testify after immunity or a waiver of Fifth Amendment rights has limited defenses. Under Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41 (1972), a witness can invoke a defense when his subpoena was served as a result of illegally intercepted wire or oral communications. Some have argued that in addition to this protection, a witness should not be held in contempt when his appearance or records are sought as the result of are illegally obtained evidence or information. Otherwise, police, prosecutors, and investigators can insulate themselves from improper activities merely by calling the violated person before the grand jury. This position has been impliedly rejected by the Supreme Court in U.S. v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338 (1974). Such a defense would lead to suppression hearings and thus delay. Moreover, opponents argue, the exclusionary rule should not be extended, in general, and certainly not to independent investigations by an independent grand jury.

Finally, some have argued a change in procedures relating to bail on appeal from a contempt order. Presently 28 U.S.C. 1826 (b) precludes bail if the appeal is frivolous or taken for delay. Some urge that this unduly interferes with appellate remedies. A witness is immediately imprisoned unless he can demonstrate the validity of his claims. He is thus cut off from counsel and friends. The burden should be on the government to demonstrate the need for immediate confinement and the dilatoriousness of the appeal. In response, others have urged that changing the burden would lead to more delays, would encourage meritless appeals, and would result in more recalcitrance.

5. INDEPENDENT INQUIRY WITH AND INDEPENDENT PROSECUTOR

It is established doctrine that a properly-constituted Federal grand jury may conduct an inquiry on its own into possible violations of Federal criminal law. See Hale v. Henkel 201 U.S. 43 (1906), Blair v. United States 250 U.S. 273 (1919), and Sullivan v. United States 348 U.S. 170 (1954). However, commentators have suggested that, in the absence of substantial guidance by the Federal courts and without the able assistance of Federal prosecutors, a Federal grand jury cannot function efficiently. Federal grand juries have remained an instrument primarily utilized by the Justice Department, the local U.S. Attorney, and assistants, to investigate alleged violations of the U.S. Code and then to indict or not indict based on that investigation.

While the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution contains the sole reference to the use of a grand jury in the Federal criminal justice system, no mention is made as to control of the grand jury by either the Federal Judiciary or the Federal Executive. However, historically, English and American jurisprudence considered independent inquiry by grand juries as indispensable and inherent elements of the criminal justice system, in order to seek out criminal misconduct and in order to protect individuals from unfounded accusations by the government. See Blair v. United States 250 U.S. 273 (1919) and Sullivan v. United States 348 U.S. 170 (1954).

While some have suggested that the accusatorial function of the Federal grand jury should be abolished by constitutional amendment, because evidence presented to the grand jurors by the prosecutor merely receives a "rubber stamp" of acquiescence, most agree the investigatory function of the Federal grand jury remains a crucial tool for effective law enforcement. It is felt that laymen, as grand jurors, are able to be independent and critical in an investigation, especially of political or governmental corruption. Yet, laymen are, for the most part, uneducated in the complexities and subtleties of the legal profession and are-unfamiliar with the discretionary policies of the Justice Department in determining whether or not to prosecute an individual. Laymen selected as grand jurors need the assistance of trained counsel to subpoena witnesses and otherwise obtain testimony and documentary evidence without infringing on personal liberties. Consequently, the notion of the appointed special or independent prosecutor has recently come to be viewed as a solution, as it has been a common practice within many States' systems for many years. Watergate and its aftermath have popularized the concept of a specially appointed independent prosecutor, subject to no governmental allegiance, to guide both grand and petit juries in ferreting out crime in "high places" while still providing a protective shield for citizens against unwarranted and unfounded criminal prosecutions.

The Federal grand juries are to determine "probable cause" that: (1) a Federal crime has been committed, and (2) a particular individual or individuals is or are responsible. To date, Federal legislation has not been enacted to specifically establish a procedure in which a deliberating grand jury may dismiss the Justice Department Attorney and seek out the services of an independent prosecutor for valid reasons. Specific authority for this procedure may already exist, however.

Some commentators dispute these decisions and point to the "blended" nature of power exercised by our three branches of government and to recent cases in the administrative law area which limit the discretionary powers of the Federal Executive. See "The Special Prosecutor in the Federal System: A Proposal," 11 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 577 (1973). Discretion to enforce a Federal statute does not encompass discretion to thwart its purpose by improper inaction or misfeasance. The Federal Executive may not abuse his discretion by arbitrary and capricious conduct in order to negate the purpose and intent of an Act of Congress. See Devito v. Schultz 300 F. Supp. 381, 382–384 (D.D.C. 1969) and Adams v. Richardson Civ. No. 3095–70 (D.D.C. Nov. 16, 1972).

An official of one body of government does have the authority to confer a role upon an individual for another body of government, see Ex Parte Siebold 100 US 378 (1879), United States v. Solomon 216 F. Supp. 835 (S.D.N.Y. 1963), 28 USC 516 (1970), 28 USC 546 (1970), and Article II, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution. Thus, as long as an appointing judge or legislature does not demand the allegiance of a special prosecutor, conferring such authority would seem to be constitutional. As the Attorney General may issue rules and regulations establishing an in-house special prosecutor for a specific purpose and, be bound by this pronouncement until changed, see Nixon v. United States 418 US 682 (1974), according to Article, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution, Congress may at least confer the same power to "the President alone, in the Courts of law, or in the Heads of Departments." Article III, §2.

The Appointments Clause of the U.S. Constitution states that ". . . [the President] shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments." Furthermore, 28 USC 516 (1970) states that "Except as otherwise authorized by law, the conduct of litigation in which the United States, an agency, or officer thereof is a party, or is interested, and securing evidence therefor, is reserved to officers of the Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General."

Despite these provisions, in 1972 Judge Richey denied an application in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to appoint an independent special prosecutor for the purpose of investigating the Watergate burglary. He cited the lack of statutory authority and case law authorizing such appointment power in the courts. Moreover, Judge Richey stated traditional arguments to condemn such power as possibly unconstitutional: (1) a violation of prosecutorial discretion within the Federal Executive, and (2) a violation of the Separation of Powers doctrine. Similarly, United States v. Cox 342 F. 2d 167 (CA5) cert. denied 381 US 935 (1965) stated: ". . . as an incident of the constitutional separation of powers . . . courts are not to interfere with the free exercise of the discretionary powers of the attorneys of the United States in their control over criminal prosecutions."

In 1976, U.S. Supreme Court interpreted the Appointments Clause of the U.S. Constitution with respect to the Federal Elections Commission, see Buckley v.

Valeo 424 U.S. 1 (1976). This decision is instructive in that the investigative and informative powers of the FEC, as originally contemplated, did not violate the Appointments Clause even with the unconstitutional makeup of the FEC. The Court stated that the original members of the FEC had the constitutional power "to investigate and be informed."

Congress may under Article III § 2 itself, by legislation, establish a "special prosecutor", or by legislation delegate such power to the Judicial Branch.

6. STANDARD OF PROOF

Prosecution for any serious federal offense is required, by the Constitution, to proceed only on an indictment returned by a grand jury. While historically a grand jury could consider evidence from any source, including facts on statements by the grand jurors themselves, today the grand jury considers only the evidence presented to it through testimony, documents, or hearsay, and evaluates and votes upon the recommendations of the prosecuting attorney.

Generally, an indictment is unassailable. It may not be challenged because of consideration by jurors of hearsay, Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956), because of consideration by jurors of inadmissible, illegal or unconstitutional evidence, Lawn v. United States 355 U.S. 339 (1958) because of the insufficiency of evidence to support an indictment; or because exculpatory evidence was withheld from juror consideration.

Some have agreed that indictments should be reviewable so as to determine whether there was legally sufficient evidence to justify indictment, whether the evidence considered was admissable, and whether all exculpatory evidence, including the testimony of the witness-defendant if he requests, was provided. Dismissal would be authorized, under these proposals, if these standards and requirements are not met. Opponents of these proposals state that such new requirements would result in overextended grand jury hearings, in mini-suppression hearings prior to a trail, in interference with grand jury secrecy requirements, and certainly in delay and thus less speedy trials.

Federal law is unclear as to the burden of proof on a federal prosecutor to secure an indictment from a grand jury. To secure an arrest warrant, it is clear that there must be "probable cause"—that is facts and circumstances, based on reasonably trustworthy information, sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable caution to believe that the suspect had committed or was committing an offense. See Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975). To support a conviction, the fact-finder must be convinced of the defendant's guilt "beyond a reasonable doubt"—that is evidence not eliminating every possible doubt, but establishing guilt to a reasonable and moral certainty. In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970).

Until recently, it was assumed that an indictment had to be supported by "prima facie" evidence—that is, assuming all reasonable inferences in favor of the government, there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict of guilty. See Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43 (1906) citing Addison's Reports of Cases (Phila. 1800). Recently, however, the Supreme Court has indicated that a reasonable belief of "probability of guilt" is all that is required, U.S. v. Calandra 414 U.S. 338 (1974); Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1975) (both dictum) as compared to the more stringent "prima facie" standard.

While various scholarly groups, such as the American Law Institute, have suggested that an indictment should be based only on competent and admissible evidence, and not hearsay or excludable evidence (such as illegally seized evidence or illegally obtained admissions), the Supreme Court has held that hearsay evidence can be properly used in the grand jury room, Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359 (1956) and that illegally obtained evidence presented to the grand jury could not be challenged, United States v. Blue, 384 U.S. 251 (1968) and Lawn v. United States, 355 U.S. 339 (1958). More recently, some courts, particularly in the Second Circuit, have held that deliberate use of hearsay or inadmissible evidence, where other valid evidence is available, is unlawful and may result in dismissal of an indictment. United States v. Arcuri 282 F. Supp 347 (EDNY 1968), aff'd 405 F2d 691 (2d Cir 1968) cert denied 395 U.S. 913 (1968); United States v. Gramolini, 301 F. Supp 39 (D.R.I. 1969).

In response, some have suggested that "reliable" hearsay should be admissible before the grand jury (as hearsay rules are becoming less stringent in any event as a result of the new Federal Rules of Evidence) but that unconstitutional evidence should be inadmissible. In any event, it is argued pre-trial review should be limited not to what was or was not introduced but only to an inquiry as to whether, considering only the properly admissible evidence, there was sufficient proof to support return of an indictment.

While the Constitution presently requires exculpatory evidence to be made available to a defendant on trial, Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), there is no such requirement on a prosecution as to presentation of evidence to a grand jury. The American Law Institute, among others, has recommended that such evidence, including evidence from the defendant, be presented to the grand jury. Opponents argue that only a prima facie case, and not an adversary case, is involved in grand jury deliberations. Exculpation is for trial. In response, proponents argue that allowance of such evidence would eliminate fruitless trials and that a criminal trial is not truly adversary. A prosecutor is not to be a blind proponent for conviction but rather an impartial seeker of justice. Requiring him to present such exculpatory evidence more truly conforms to his "government agent" impartial function.

Alleged Grand Jury Abuses

I. GRAND JURY PROCESS AND THE RIGHTS OF FREE SPEECH, PRESS, ASSOCIATION, AND ASSEMBLY

The freedoms of speech and press, and the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, are fundamental constitutional rights[1] preserved to maintain the opportunity for free political discussion, so that government is responsive to the will of the people and so that changes to our political system are obtained by peaceful means.[2]

Not all speech is "protected," but prior restraint upon even speech unlawful or punishable after utterance, is presumptively invalid.[3]

The grand jury subpoena is not intended to serve a punitive function, or be an instrument designed to prevent or forestall the commission of crime.

Rather, the subpoena is a notice that the attendance of a particular witness or the production of documents is required by the grand jury to assist the jury in its function of determining whether a crime has been committed and to ascertain the identity of the offender. Within recent years, however, a number of persons have expressed fears that grand jury processes are being misemployed not to investigate crimes but rather to suppress "political dissent." [4]

A. The 53 Vietnam Veterans Against the War (VVAW)

In Beverly v. United States[5] four grand jury witnesses, members of the VVAW, claimed they had been placed under subpoena to prevent their participation in a demonstration at Miami Beach on July 10–13, 1972, during the Democratic National Convention. Donner and Lavine,[6] commentators, writing for The Nation, suggest that the prosecution was a GOP plot to associate McGovern with more radical opponents of the war.

The VVAW obtained parade permits to conduct "anti-war" demonstrations at Miami Beach in July, during the Democratic National Convention. Thereafter, the United States Attorney, giving short notice, issued subpenas, on July 7, 1972, requiring 23 members of the VVAW to appear before a grand jury in Tallahassee on July 10, the opening date of the Democratic National Convention.

The reason for the issuance of subpoenas was that the Government had been made aware of meetings of members or associates of the VVAW in May of 1972 at Gainesville, Florida, where plans were allegedly laid for disrupting the Republican National Convention, to be held in Miami Beach during the week of August 21.

Four of these witnesses (the appellants in Beverly, hereinafter referred to as appellants) requested an adjournment of their July 10 appearance before the grand jury so that they could take part in the scheduled demonstrations, at the Democratic Convention. Their request was refused by the United States Attorney; and the U.S. District Court denied a request for a temporary restraining order on July 10 in an unreported opinion.[7]

This denial of an extension for a brief period, July 10 to 13, was despite the fact that the VVAW did not intend to disrupt the Democratic National Convention. The alleged plan to disrupt the Republican National Convention, the subject of the grand jury investigation, was not scheduled until August 21.

When called, the appellants refused to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds. They persisted in their refusal, even after grant of immunity on July 13, alleging illegal electronic surveillance by the Government. The Government made no response, on the ground that no sufficient showing had been made by the witnesses to warrant a response, and was sustained by the District Court. Accordingly, the witnesses were held in contempt for their refusal and were committed to confinement for the remaining life of the grand jury (about 12 months) or until each testified.

On July 13, the grand jury returned an indictment against six other of the 23 subpenaed witnesses. Dubbed by the news media "The Gainesville Six," they were charged with conspiring to attack police stations, police cars, and stores in Miami Beach with automatic weapons, firearms, and incendiary devices, to fire lead weights, "fried" marbles, ball bearings, "cherry" and smoke bombs at police by means of wrist rocket sling-shots and cross-bows, all to take place at Miami Beach, Florida, on various dates between August 21 and 24, 1972, during which the Republic National Convention was scheduled to take place. Two of the original four VVAW appellants were named as "coconspirators."

Pending their appeal from the contempt indictment, the four original VVAW appellants were released on bail by Mr. Justice Douglas, after the Court of Appeals denied an appeal as frivolous.

The Court of Appeals rejected the First Amendment claims of the appellants. The return of indictments against the Gainesville Six, the court said, was evidence that the grand jury was called together for the investigation of "serious offenses" and not simply to keep the appellants and witnesses idly waiting around. The court's First Amendment holding, however, was mooted by the court's reversal and vacation of the contempt order on the ground that the United States had erroneously failed to affirm or deny the appellants' allegation of unlawful electronic surveillance of counsel.

The six were later acquitted on all counts by a trial jury in September. Many of the VVAW witnesses who had been subpoenaed to appear during the period of the Democratic National Convention were never called before the grand jury.

with an increasing flow of cases arising out of grand jury proceedings concerned with the possible punishment of political dissent. It would be a cruel twist of history to allow the institution of the grand jury that was designed at least partially to protect political dissent to become an instrument of political suppression." [10]

Bursey involved a grand jury investigation initiated following a speech given by David Hilliard, Chief of Staff of the Black Panther Party, during a "Moratorium Day" demonstration in November of 1969 in the course of which he said, "We will kill Richard Nixon." Following its delivery, the speech was printed and reprinted in November and December issues of The Black Panther, a weekly publication and official organ of the Black Panther Party. Hilliard's statement about killing the President was also quoted in another article published in a December issue of the weekly. The investigation began with an effort to determine the identity of the persons, if any, to whom Hilliard referred when he said, "We" will kill the President.

Although the grand jury inquiries began with matters involving a potential presidential assassination and assaults and threats to assassinate, it expanded to include an exploration of potential interference with the Armed Forces and a general probe of the affairs of the Black Panther Party.

In the course of the inquiry, Bursey and Presley, members of the staff of The Black Panther, were held in contempt for their refusal, after grants of immunity, to answer a number of questions, most of which related generally to the publication and distribution of the Party's newspaper. They sought to reverse their convictions on the ground that the inquiries violated their First Amendment rights.

On appeal, the Government contended that the First Amendment was not available to witnesses as a basis for avoiding an answer to the grand jury's questions. The Court of Appeals disagreed. Where First Amendment interests are involved, it is not enough, said the court, that the questions have some vague [11] relevance to the criminal conduct under investigation. The court, in its opinion on petition for rehearing, said, "the grand jury [is] to establish that there was a 'substantial connection' between the information sought and the criminal conduct which the Government was investigating before the witnesses could be held in contempt for refusing to answer questions that cut deeply into First Amendment rights." [12]

In applying this reasoning, the court analysed the four categories of questions which the defendants had refused to answer and for which they had been held in contempt, and upheld the rulings of the District Court only as to the first set of questions.

The first category of questions concerned the identity of members of the Party's Central Committee and contacts between Panthers and foreign governments. These questions were held to be proper on the theory that the Government was seeking to determine whether, in saying "We will kill Richard Nixon," Hilliard may have used the word "we" editorially, or in reference to specific persons, including those who may have been members of the Party. The Court observed that the Government had not sought to identify all Party members but only the higher echelon of the Party with whom Hilliard would have been likely to have had close communication. This limitation made the questions reasonable, for the Government had not established that the Party possessed such a binding hierarchical structure as would support the conclusion that the words of the leader necessarily reflected the views of its members.

On the other hand, the court took the position that no sufficient foundation had been laid to establish the materiality of questions seeking the identity of persons generally involved in the publication and distribution of the Panthers' newspaper and pamphlets; of those concerning the identity of persons whose photographs were published in LIFE magazine, present in the shop in which the Panther paper was printed. Almost all of the persons in the photographs were members of the Party, although their names had not been revealed. Finally, the court found that the Government had not justified inquiry into the financing of funds for national or international journeys of Party members. "When First Amendment interests are at stake," the court concluded, "the Government must use a scalpel, not an axe." [13]

C. The International Committee to Defend Eldridge Cleaver

While in Bursey the court dealt with the issue whether, when First Amendment rights are at stake, questions asked of a grand jury witness must have some degree of relevance to the subject under investigation, or, as the court held, a "substantial connection" with that subject, Levinson v. Attorney General[14] raised the question whether, as a precondition of inquiry into speech or speech-related activities lawful on their face, it is required that, on demand, the Government show the court that there is a basis for believing that there is some potential, or some possibility, that criminal activity may be exposed—not necessarily a preliminary showing of sufficient grounds for believing a crime has been committed or that there is a basis for indictment, but only whether the prosecution is possessed of some information, allegation, or evidence which reasonably suggests that if investigation is made on the subject there is a possibility criminal activity may be found.

Levinson and Schwerner were, respectively, the chairman and treasurer of an organization entitled the International Committee to Defend Eldridge Cleaver, a widely known leader of the Black Panther Party. An advertisement, by the organization in a November 1968 issue of the New York Times, alleged that certain invalid and unconstitutional proceedings were being taken against Cleaver, and the organization sought support and financial contributions for his legal defense.

Approximately one year following publication of the advertisement, Levinson and Schwerner were served with subpoena duces tecum ordering them to appear before a federal grand jury sitting in Philadelphia to investigate possible mail fraud violations.

Following service of the subpoenas, Levinson and Schwerner sought declaratory and injunctive relief, opposing the production of evidence which would tend to reveal the names of contributors, associates, or collaborators, other than employees of the organization. They also urged that, in view of the involvement of First Amendment rights, the Government had to make some showing of "probable cause of mail fraud" before requiring their appearance or the production of records.

They sought to restrain the grand jury investigation during the pendancy of their challenge and a final judgment declaring that they need not appear or produce records, or, in the alternative, that they need not do so until the Government had made a showing of probable cause to the court.

In rejecting the plaintiffs' claim that, as a precondition of inquiry, the Government is required to make a showing of "probable cause" when First Amendment rights are at issue, the court agreed that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the scope of the grand jury questioning limited to some extent, but only to the extent that the plaintiffs were not to be questioned concerning the truth or falsity of any statements or representations made in the advertisement.

The question raised by Levinson is whether the court should have required some showing (even if in camera[15]) of a reasonable basis for this incursion upon the liberties of the plaintiffs.

On the service of a subpoena duces tecum, as in Levinson, there is a potential collision with the citizens freedom of movement, protected by the Fifth Amendment,[16] as well as the protections of the First and Fourth Amendments.[17]

[15] In justification of the prosecution's effort to obtain handwriting exemplars of a grand jury witness, one court suggested that an affidavit of relevance might be presented to the court in camera, even though Rule 6(e) of the Fed. [17] The First Amendment involvement in the compulsions of a grand jury subpoena was a subject of discussion in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972). Fourth and Fifth Amendment involvements were the subject of discussion in United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973), United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (which respectively involved directions to grand jury witnesses to produce voice and handwriting exemplars). There is dicta in the three decisions which would seem to support the propriety of the type of demands made by the plaintiffs in Levinson. In cases subsequent to Levinson, the Third Circuit relaxed the rigidity of attitude which the District Court in that case displayed toward the imposition of preliminary restraints on the compulsions of grand jury subpoenas. See Schofield I, supra note 15, and Schofield II, In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 507 F. 2d 963 (3d Cir. 1975). See also Robert Hawthorne, Inc. v. Director, 406 F. Supp. 1098 (E.D. Pa. 1975). As a matter of practice before those courts which have not required an affidavit of relevance, U.S. Attorneys in some cases are voluntarily submitting affidavits showing the reasonableness of the prosecution's demand upon grand jury witnesses. See, for example, United States v. Doe, 457 2d 895 (2d Cir. 1972).

At the conclusion of its labors, the grand jury before which Levinson and Schwerner had been subpoenaed to appear, returned no indictment against them or the Committee.[18]

II. USE OF GRAND JURY TO GATHER EVIDENCE IN PREPARATION FOR TRIAL OF A PENDING INDICTMENT

It is improper to use grand jury process[1] for the sole or "dominating" purpose of preparing an already pending indictment for trial.[2]

It is often difficult, if not impossible, to determine what is the precise purpose of motivation of the prosecution in particular instances.[3]

Illustrative of the dilemma in which the court and the defendant frequently find themselves is the case of Daniel Ellsberg.[4]

Under indictment in California for unlawful possession and conversion of classified documents, and for conspiring with Anthony Russo and others unknown "to defraud the United States" in the unlawful dissemination of classified studies (the Pentagon papers), Ellsberg was scheduled to go to trial in 6 to 10 weeks, when the Government convened another grand jury, this time in Boston. Ellsberg charged this new jury was convened to gather evidence relevant to his trial in California. He sought a protective order to bar the Boston grand jury from acting.

The Government candidly admitted that the investigation in Boston might turn up some evidence relevant to the California proceedings, but claimed that its "principal purpose" was to ascertain whether other offenses were committed and affirmed that its purpose was not to extract testimony from witnesses for use in Los Angeles. It also declared that the Boston grand jury was not foreclosed from inquiring into events which "suggest other aspects" of the conspiracy alleged in the California indictment or "separate conspiracies involving Daniel Ellsberg as a central figure."

Ellsberg's claim, said the court, could be tested only by a comprehensive review of the Boston grand jury minutes, but rules regulating grand jury secrecy, particularly Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, gave him no right to disclosure except upon a showing of grounds for dismissal of the indictment. The Jencks Act (18 USC 3500) made clear that a defendant had no right to compel pre-trial disclosure of grand jury minutes. Under the circumstances, the most that the court could do, it said, was to make the transcript available to the court in California for such action as it may take.

This case demonstrates that the Government has process, available to obtain pre-trial discovery, including that of defendant's witnesses and of their testimony, and the defendant in a criminal case is not accorded an equal and similar privilege for the discovery of evidence.

That the employment of the grand jury subpoena power may result in the unconscionable oppression and harassment of a defendant and his witnesses as should be "is" In re National Window Glass Workers, 287 F. 219 (N.D.Ohio 1922), a Sherman Act prosecution instituted in the Southern District of New York involving some 90 defendants charged with price fixing in violation of the Sherman Act.

In Glass Workers, after the indictment was returned, after a grand jury investigation, the prosecutor began another grand jury investigation in New York for the admitted purpose of examining witnesses in advance of and in preparation for the trial of this indictment, to obtain evidence to be used on the trial, and to comply with a prior order of the court for a bill of particulars. The District Court quashed the subpoenas on motion of the defendants. The prosecutors then instituted a grand jury investigation in Ohio, issuing subpoenas requiring the attendance of substantially the same witnesses, and with subpoenas duces tecum requiring the production of substantially the same documents as were involved in the New York investigation.

Although it accepted the 'good faith" assertion of Government counsel that it was their purpose to ask for an indictment in Ohio as a result of this grand jury investigation, the Ohio court nevertheless found upon all the facts that 'the dominating purpose" of the investigation was to examine witnesses in advance of trial and to obtain documents and evidence for use in the trial of the New York indictment, and vacated the subpoenas until the Government either tried the defendants on the New York indictment, or stipulated their intention to try the defendants first in Ohio upon any new indictment that may be obtained.

III. GRAND JURY ABUSES—PREJUDICIAL REPORTS

"Grand jury reports" are generally defined as statements of a grand jury on matters within its jurisdiction, but not necessarily including the recommendation of indictments.[1] Reports which arouse particular concern are those containing allegations which defame particular persons or defame persons with an identifiable class. Such reports often involve charges of noncriminal or of criminal misconduct. They may be issued simultaneously with the return of indictments or independently.

Grand jury reports which defame individuals, groups, or classes of persons adversely affect the rights of privacy and reputation. Moreover, reports which do recommend charges may prejudice the trial of an accused as they comment upon events that are the subjects of an indictment.

As a product of a non-adversary proceeding, grand jury reports have a very limited degree of reliability. The grand jury's conclusions, declarations, state-

[1] In some instances a grand jury "report" is also described as a "presentment." This confusion in terminology was a subject of comment in the case of Application of United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers, 111 F. Supp. 858, 863 (S.D.N.Y. 1953) (hereinafter referred to as the UE case) which noted that a document handed up by the grand jury in that case was, "strictly speaking," not a presentment, "since it did not accuse with the intent that anyone should be put to trial." But see In re Grand Jury, January 1969, 315 F. Supp. 662 (D.Md. 1970). Both presentments and indictments have been said to include accusation of crime which are presented to the court. Thus, to some, all presentments are reports, but not all reports are presentments. However, the terms "presentment" and "indictment" are often regarded as synonymous. In its broader sense, the term "presentment" has been employed to include an indictment. See Bouvier's Law Dictionary at 2674 (3d rev.), and Circuit Judge Wisdom's comprehensive exposition in United States v. Cox, 342 F. 2d 167, 185–190 (5th Cir. 1965) (concurring especially), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 935 (1965). More precisely, a presentment is said to differ from an indictment in that it lacks the necessary technical form. It is notice taken b ythe grand jury of an offense on their own knowledge or upon the evidence before them without having any bill of indictment laid before them by the public prosecutor. An indictment, on the other hand, is a formal accusation in writing delivered to the grand jury by the public prosecutor upon which the grand jury is called to act and upon which it may endorse its findings of a true bill," "or" "reject it as not found," "or" "not a true bill." "or" "ignoramus." See Mr. Justice Fields' Charge to Grand Jury, 2 Sawy. 667, 30 Fed. cas. 992 (1872). [Portions of this charge have been quoted with approval in Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 10–11 (1887), and Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 63 (1906).]

ments, or "findings" have the appearance, but not the reality, of being the product of a judicial proceeding with all of the due process safeguards normally associated with it, when, in fact, they do not!

The reliability of a grand jury report is questionable not only because of its ex parte nature, but also because the report is not necessarily the grand jury's own. The report may be of political origin and overtones, and almost always expresses the personal preferences of the public prosecutor, or of the court.

Hammond v. Brown

The misapplication of the reporting power to the deprivation of constitutional rights, is illustrated in Hammond v. Brown,[2] involving the tragic events occurring on the weekend of May 1–4, 1970, at Kent State University, where four students were shot and killed and nine wounded by Ohio National Guardsmen.

In 1970, a special grand jury was convened under Ohio law, pursuant to a direction of the Governor to the State's Attorney General to conduct an investigation of acts illegal or criminal in themselves or leading to or inducing illegal or criminal acts associated with the "campus unrest" that then took place. This grand jury returned 30 true bills of indictment against 25 persons. 43 offenses were covered in the bills, including charges of riot, incitation to riot, arson, assault, and malicious injury to property. These indictments were returned against persons who appear in some way to have participated in the riots, but did not include persons acting in any official capacity with the State or Federal Governments.

Together with the indictments, the grand jury made a report in writing to the court, headed "Report of the Special Grand Jury," although in his charge to the grand jury, the judge had not authorized or directed the filing of any such report. Testimony revealed, however, that in a discussion between the judge and the grand jury's foreman, which took place in chambers early in the sessions, the judge had indicated that the issuance of reports by grand juries was a common practice in the State of Ohio, and had suggested that, in view of the seriousness of what had occurred, a report should be filed with the grand jury indictment. The report was filed and made public, evidently with the consent and approval of the state court, and received widespread publicity.

Following the grand jury's return, two actions were instituted in the United States District Court which sought to bar the prosecution of those indicted and to expunge the written report which accompanied the indictments. The two cases, Hammond and Adamek, were consolidated for trial and decision.

The plaintiffs in Hammond included six of the indicted defendants, and others described as "concerned members" of the Kent State community. The plaintiffs in Adamek were 32 professors of the federal university, one of whom had been indicted for inciting to riot. In both federal actions the complaints were founded on an alleged deprivation of civil rights under color of state law (42 U.S.C. 1983).

A principal contention of the plaintiffs in both cases was that in the "making" of indictments, together with the report, the state's legal machinery had been employed in bad faith with the purpose of inhibiting free speech. It was also claimed that in issuing its report, which incorporated findings and conclusions of fact and law with respect to events in charges set forth in the indictment, the grand jury had violated the Fifth (and Fourteenth) Amendment rights of the indicted persons to a fair trial.

Indeed, the court found that the findings and conclusions in the grand jury report coincided with essential elements of the offenses charged in the indictments. Although in the performance of its role as the accusing body the grand jury makes findings of indictments based on "probable cause," it was apparent, the court indicated, that in returning the report the special grand jury had also assumed the role of the trier of fact. This was evident, for example, in the report's finding that the events of each of the four days of the campus disturbances constituted a riot, a basic and essential element of at least 27 of the 43 offenses charged. The report likewise made a specific finding of arson, which was the subject of five offenses charged. In addition, words connoting guilt of participants in the described incidents occurred throughout the findings.

It was the court's opinion that, in rendering written findings, the special grand jury took over the duty of a petty jury. The continued existence of the report in court files and in the court's journal, it was said, irreparably injured the right of each of the indicted accused to a fair trial, a right protected by the due process clause. The court therefore held that the continued vitality and official status of the grand jury report deprived indicted plaintiffs of rights arising under the Constitution in violation of 41 U.S.C. 1983.

A constitutional infringement was also found present with respect to non-indicted plaintiffs. Faculty members had been charged by the report with complicity in producing the tragic consequences of the shootings in May, in that they intended to inflame an already tense situation. While not identified by name, they were identified as a group of 23 who had disseminated a circular on campus dated May 3, 1970, and signed, "23 Concerned Faculty, Kent State University." Their names, however, were known to the University administration. The court concluded that such charges, bordering on criminal accusations against 23 persons identifiable as members of a class, impaired and injured their protected right of free expression.

The First Amendment rights of other faculty members, also plaintiffs in the actions, but not within the identifiable class of 23, were also found to be violated. condemnatory passages in the report such as those which spoke of a "small minority of the total faculty" who overemphasized dissent and who departed from "all normal behavior and expression," were held to impair academic freedom of expression.

Failing, however, to find bad faith on the part of the state or its agents in bringing about the prosecutions, and finding no showing of facts in the pre-trial stage of the prosecution that would clearly prove an immediate injury to the right of a fair trial, the District Court held that it lacked jurisdiction to stay the state court prosecutions. It also determined that there was irreparable injury and, in the exercise of its "pendent jurisdiction," that the report was issued illegally and without authority under Ohio law. Accordingly, the court ordered the report to be expunged.

Application of United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, et al. (UE)

While Hammond involved the expungement of a state grand jury's report which had been returned together with indictments, the UE case involves the expungement of a federal grand jury's report which had been returned without indictments.

In this case, two unions, the UE and the American Communications Associations (the ACA), and their principal officers, sought expungement of a federal grand jury report, principally on two grounds: (1) that the report disclosed matters occurring before the grand jury in violation of its oath of secrecy and in violation of the secrecy provisions of Section 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and (2) that the report was on a subject over which the grand jury had no jurisdiction.

In 1952, a federal grand jury was investigating possible violations of the conspiracy and perjury laws "by various leaders of unaffiliated unions" because of possible improper filing of non-communist affidavits with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). No indictment resulted from these deliberations, but the grand jury did return a report, which was described as a "presentment."[3]

The report declared that, the grand jury had received evidence that a number of responsible officials of some unaffiliated unions had long histories of communist membership and activity. Thereafter, the grand jury subpoenaed 13 officials (not naming them) of the UE, ACA, and two other unions, but these unnamed officials invoked their privilege against self-incrimination when asked about the non-communist affidavits which they had filed with the NLRB.

The report concluded that the filing of the affidavits was a subterfuge to circumvent the requirements of the Labor-Management Relations Act. Further, the grand jury recommended that the NLRB revoke the certification of the unions involved, and suggested that the Congress consider an amendment of the Act which would require union officials to waive their constitutional protection against self-incrimination when taking the oath.

This report received widespread publicity, affecting specific individuals. Although the names of the 13 union officials who had testified before the grand jury had not been specifically identified in the report, their names appeared in articles published in newspapers throughout the country and it was undenied that this information was furnished to the press by the foreman of the grand jury, the Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and the United States Attorney. The court stated that, in practical terms, the result achieved was the same as if the report had identified each of them:

[3] Judge Weinfeld declared that the document was not, strictly speaking, a "presentment," since it did not accuse with the intent that anyone should be put to trial. 111 F. Supp. at 863.

"And the accusation, coming as it does, from a quasi-judicial body which occupies a position of respect and dignity in the community, carries greater weight than a similar charge from a private person. The widespread publication of the charges and the identification of petitioners as the offenders subjected them to public censure to the same degree as if they had formally been accused of perjury or conspiracy. At the same time it deprived them of the right to defend themselves and to have their day in a Court of Justice—their absolute right had the Grand Jury returned an indictment." [4]

It was District Judge Weinfeld's explicit holding that the issuance of the report in question was (1) beyond "the power" of the grand jury and (2) in violation of the secrecy requirement. Accordingly, he ordered its expungement.

The court evidently made no ruling on whether or not the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs had been violated. The court reached its result not because the Bill of Rights required it, but because the grand jury lacked "authority" to exercise the reporting power. Yet, the court said it was led to hold as it had on the basis of "constitutional considerations, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, persuasive state authority, public and private interests." [5]

The "constitutional considerations" was the doctrine of separation of powers and not the Bill of Rights. The court took the position that, in seeking to advise the NLRB and the Congress, the grand jury was trespassing upon the executive and legislative "powers."

The Federal Grand Jury is an appendage of the court, within whose jurisdiction it sits. As such its jurisdiction is coextensive with the court's and cannot exceed it. And if the court is without power to advise the legislative and executive branches, so is the Grand Jury.

It may be said that the Grand Jury's function is to determine whether there is enough evidence before it to support the charge of crime and so to create a "case or controversy" which then must be turned over to the court for trial and final determination. If there is, the Grand Jury returns an indictment; if there is not, it remains silent. Once having determined that the evidence is insufficient, its function ends. It may not then issue a report based upon information derived during the course of its secret inquiry, directed to the executive and legislative branches, which touches upon matters within their exclusive authority. The Grand Jurors, like the members of the judiciary, are not accountable to an electorate. Their hearings, being secret, are not amenable to informed evaluation by the public and are unsuited to make the determination which our Constitution has allotted to the executive and the legislature.

Judge Weinfeld continued that as it came to us in colonial days and as understood at the time of the adoption of the federal Constitution, the grand jury served two essential functions: (1) to accuse those believed to have violated the laws and to bring them to trial; and (2) to protect the citizen against unfounded accusations of crime, whether by public officials or by private citizens. The issuance of such reports as were rendered in this case would run counter to these historic functions.[6]

The purposes of the oath and of the secrecy rule are manifold. But in the context of this case the paramount purpose is the protection of those who are under investigation from irreparable damage if no indictment is found; conversely, if an indictment is returned, from possible prejudice upon the trial. Protection of those against whom the prosecution cannot in ex parte proceedings make out a sufficient case to warrant indictment is defeated when the fact of suspicion and the proceedings had thereon before the Grand Jury are given widespread publicity in a report.[7]

In his examining of the precedents, Judge Weinfeld found no Supreme Court decision on point [8] but did find many state court decisions. By the "great weight of authority," he found, those grand jury reports which condemned, but did not indict, were held to exceed the power of the grand jury and may be expunged. While the courts had given special reasons, varying with the jurisdiction, for expunging reports of a specific nature, the main ground relied on, he said, was one of "policy." "Broadly stated," he concluded, "that ground is that a man should not be subject to a quasi-judicial accusation of misconduct which he cannot answer in an authoritative forum." [9]

That was the case of In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 264 (1948), in which Mr. Justice Black, author of the majority opinion, had said by way of obiter dicta, "Grand juries investigate, and the usual end of their investigation is either a report, a 'no-bill' or an indictment." Nevertheless, it was Judge Weinfeld's view that the "policy grounds behind" this decision gave support to his holding in the UE case.

Federal Statutory Reporting Authority—Special Grand Juries and Regular Grand Juries

In any discussion of the reporting power of a federal grand jury, a distinction must be drawn between the regular grand jury and the special grand jury. The former, as we know, has had a longer existence in the federal system. The latter was not established until 1970, on the enactment of P.L. 91–452, now Chapter 216 of Title 18, U.S. Code. By that enactment the special grand jury was specifically granted a reporting power.[10] But it was provided that a special grand jury may submit a report on two subjects only, official misconduct and organized crime conditions.

First, as a basis for a recommendation of removal or disciplinary action, the special grand jury was authorized to submit a report "concerning nonciminal misconduct, malfeasance, or misfeasance in office involving organized criminal activity" by an appointed public officer or employee. Moreover, the special grand jury was expressly authorized to name persons. It was provided, however, that prior to the filing of the report each person named, and any reasonable number of witnesses in his behalf as designated by him, were to be afforded an opportunity to testify before the grand jury.

Secondly, the special grand jury was authorized to make reports of a general nature regarding "organized crime conditions in the district." The term "organized crime" was not defined. But with regard to reports of this character, it was provided that they were not to be "critical of an identified person."

The legislative history sought to make clear that the reporting power thus expressly authorized was not intended to restrict or in any way to interfere with "the right" of regular grand juries to issue reports "as recognized by judicial custom and tradition." [11] But what reporting authority was thus "recognized" has never been made wholly clear. Congressman Poff, a sponsor of the bill, had acknowledged in the course of debate that "the precise boundaries of the reporting power have not been judicially delineated. . . ." [12]

CONCLUSION

Neither Congress nor the Supreme Court have concerned themselves with the reporting power, if any, possessed by the regular grand jury.

While there are federal courts which deny that the grand jury possesses "authority" to render a report, either of any kind or of certain types,[13] most federal jurisdictions that have considered the issue admit a reporting "power" or "authority" of some sort, but concern themselves principally with the question of the nature and extent of any disclosure that may be made in a particular case.[14]

The former must be regarded as a decision of extraordinary significance. The Court of Appeals ordered that the names of unindicted co-conspirators be expunged from an indictment.

IV. GRAND JURY ABUSES—NAMING OF UNINDICTED CONSPIRATORS

There has evolved a practice of naming persons as "unindicted conspirators" in conspiracy indictments, frequently in connection with cases having widespread publicity.

The impact of this practice upon due process rights can be summed up: "The incidents of due process afforded an unindicted conspirator are more limited than those available to one named as a defendant. The unindicted conspirator is not a party to the criminal trial where names and facts come to light, and he has no right under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to intervene. If he is a witness at the trial, which is at least a possibility, he may be excluded from the courtroom except when testifying. And finally, of course, a decision in the trial that the defendants were not guilty of criminal conduct neither vindicates him nor bars his subsequently being indicted and tried as a defendant." [1]

The precise origin of the practice is unclear.[2] In applying it, precedents are seldom cited and history or reasons for the practice are seldom given.[3]

Within recent years, the practice of naming unindicted coconspirators has been applied with increasing frequency in the prosecution of antiwar activists. It is in this period and as a result of such prosecutions that the practice first became a subject of decision in any reported case at any appellate level. In United States v. Briggs a panel of the court of appeals for the fifth circuit ordered the expungement from an indictment of all references to antiwar activists who had been named as unindicted conspirators by a federal grand jury following inquiry into disruptions at the Republican Party's 1972 National Convention at Miami Beach. That there was, or was not, probable cause for naming a conspirator was held to be immaterial on the question whether the grand jury may accuse such a person without naming him a defendant.

"There is at least a strong suspicion that the stigmatization of appellants was part of an overall governmental tactic directed against disfavored persons and groups. Visiting opprobrium on persons by officially charging them with crimes while denying them a forum to vindicate their names, undertaken as extrajudicial punishment or to chill their expressions and associations, is not a governmental interest that we can accept or consider. It would circumvent the adversary process which is at the heart of our criminal justice system. It would be intolerable to our society." [4]

Scholars [5] have cited, and the Court noted, the number of instances where this practice had been applied.[6] In several of these instances the prosecutions were later abandoned or dismissed.

In these cases, unindicted coconspirators charged with offenses against the antitrust laws sought to expunge from the indictments allegations pertaining to them. Limited post-trial relief was granted on he basis that there was insufficient evidence adduced at the trial to support the allegations. More recently, a federal court refused to expunge the name of President Nixon from an indictment to which his name as an unindicted coconspirator had been added by action of the grand jury. This case was, of course, exceptional. The proceedings to expunge were in camera and no explanation of the judgment appears in the report of the opinion, United States v. Mitchell, 377 F. Supp. 1326 (D.D.C. 1974). See commentary on this case in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 687–688 (1974).

Certainly an unindicted conspirator, as the court had noted, may be anonymously designated as an "other person" or as "John Doe." Even if such person is unmasked in a bill of particulars or at trial, this effect does not carry, as the court said, the imprimatur of credibility that official grand jury aciton does, and its probable impact may be tempered by protective orders entered by the court.

In Briggs, the court observed the prosecution tendered no reason for failing to include the appellants among those who were made defendants. If there was no probable cause for indicting them they should not have been named as conspirators, whether indicted or unindicted. "The grand jury that returns an indictment," said the court, "naming a person as an unindicted conspirator does not perform its shielding function but does exactly the reverse. If the charges are baseless, the named person should not be subjected to public branding, and if supported by probable cause he should not be denied a forum." [7]

The court did not charge the grand jury with the responsibility for this miscarriage, but rather charged it to the prosecution where it belonged. "Failure of the grand jury to perform its shielding function where appropriate," said the court, "may be explained by the tendency of the body, with its members not learned in the law, to follow the lead of the prosecutor, who is its legal advisor. We are told that in this instance the origin for the grand jury's action was the prosecutor." [8]

The court found no reported opinion which gave support to the contention that a federal grand jury was empowered in an indictment to accuse a named private person of crimes and not make him a defendant. Nor did it find in its examination of an analogous practice—the issuing of grand jury reports—any "substantial authority" permitting a federal grand jury to issue a report accusing named private persons of criminal conduct. The court concluded that this practice of naming unindicted conspirators was not only historically unauthorized but also a deprivation of rights without due process and found support for this conclusion in a number of Supreme Court opinions that found defamation of persons without affording them an adequate opportunity for contesting the injury to be a denial of due process. [9]

If there is a sound basis (or "probable cause") for the exposure of a person's alleged involvement in a criminal conspiracy, such person could be named as a defendant, if he is named at all.

Any failure to name him in the indictment does not preclude naming him in a bill of particulars, or introducing evidence of his participation in the conspiracy, and would not prohibit the attributon of his conduct or statements to defendants charged with the conspiracy. If there is no probable cause for naming him as a conspirator, many believe that he should not be named at all.

The prosecutor may well accrue certain benefits for himself or the administration he represents as a consequence of widespread publication of the conspiracy or of the identity of individuals allegedly participating in it. The issue becomes whether such benefits permissibly outweigh the potential risks of unjust damage to the unindicted conspirator's reputation. Moreover institutional damage may be suffered when public confidence in a system of justice is shaken by an unequal application of laws to persons allegedly equally guilty.

V. GRAND JURY ABUSES—"ENTRAPMENT"

Recently, allegations are being made that federal prosecutors utilize the grand jury to "entrap" political dissenters and criminal suspects.[1] The critics complain that individuals are convicted of contempt or perjury because of their refusals or failures to testify before or produce evidence to the grand jury, when the purpose is to punish political or unpopular beliefs without having to prove criminal acts.[2]

Presently, there are no restrictions on the ability of the prosecutor to subpoena, on the grand jury's behalf, a potential target or defendant. Individuals, known or regarded by the prosecutor as virtual or potential accused[3] are called as witnesses, rather than parties, to maintain the fiction that the grand jury proceeding is non-adversarial. Thus, witnesses who are actually parties, are often forced into the commission of perjury or contempt to avoid prosecution, or the retribution that may be visited upon them by their associates, or to protect their reputation against the disastrous consequences that attend the invocation of the fifth amendment. If they seek refuge in the fifth amendment, they are then led into the same trap of perjury or contempt after a grant of immunity that almost inevitably follows.

HISTORY

The practice of calling the accused or the suspected before the grand jury and there examining him under oath regarding matters of which he is suspected was not a practice in England at the time of the grand jury's importation into America.

This inquisitional oath procedure, known as the oath ex officio, had been introduced into England by the ecclesiastical authorities as early as 1236, in the reign of Henry II. Utilized by the Bishops for inquiries into the conduct and morals of the English, it became a source of bitter complaint. The particularly offensive character of the procedure was its requirement that a person who has not been charged with a formal presentment or accusation was nevertheless compelled to answer all questions put to him.

Responding to the complaints of his subjects, the King in 1247 banned its use, noting that many of his subjects were "shamefully defamed" by the oath procedure and might incur "the dangers of perjury." Nonetheless, the attitude of subsequent kings on use of such oaths varied and alternated until utimately the Crown, Henry VII, in 1487, adopted oath taking as its own criminal procedure, vested in the Courts of Star Chamber and High Commission.

[2] In, for example, United States v. Nickels, 502 F. 2d 1173 (7th Cir. 1974) (perjury), the court rejected the argument that the defendant was called before the grand jury solely for the purpose of procuring perjured testimony. The court said it would not inquire into "motivation" for asking questions material to the grand jury's investigation; would not treat the facts as amounting to a technical entrapment, as the Government did not "solicit" or "encourage" perjury but "at most created a situation in which perjury appeared expedient"; and also rejected defendant's claim of "duress," holding that there was no evidence offered to show that the defendant reasonably feared immediate death or severe bodily injury which could be avoided only by committing the criminal act charged.

On the general law of entrapment, see Hampton aka Byers v. United States, 425 U.S. 484 (1976). See also the following perjury prosecution cases: United States v. Lazaros, 480 F. 2d 174 (6th Cir. 1973); Massinia v. United States, 296 F. 2d 871 (8th Cir. 1961); Brown v. United States, 245 F. 2d 549 (8th Cir. 1957). [3] See United States v. Mandujano, 425 U.S. 564, 594f. (1976) (Brennan, J. concurring), in which a justice of the Supreme Court acknowledged that—

"It cannot be gainsaid that prosecutors often do call before grand juries persons suspected of criminal activity to testify concerning that activity, e.g., Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391, 423 (1957), and the availability of this device has often been fatally tempting to those aware of its potential for abuse. There can be no doubt that sanctioning unfettered discretion in prosecutors to delay the seeking of criminal indictments pending the calling of criminal suspects before grand juries to be interrogated under conditions of judicial compulsion runs the grave risk of allowing 'the prosecution [to] evade its own constitutional restrictions on its powers by turning the grand jury into its agent.'" [Footnote omitted]

The power exercised pursuant to the oath ex officio was never granted to the English grand jury, nor to the common law courts.

Not until the late 1500's and in the 1600's, did the ordinary witness become the chief source of a jury's information and compulsory process become more regularly issued by common law courts.

The fall of the inquisitional oath can be laid to John Lilburn's encounter with it in the Court of Star Chamber. Committed to prison in 1637 by the Council of the Star Chamber on a charge of printing or importing certain heretical books, John Lilburn refused to respond to examination before the Chamber, because ". . . I perceived the oath to be an oath of inquiry, and of the same nature as the High Commission oath." This, he alleged, was against the law of the land, the Petition of Right, and the law of God as shown in Christ's and Paul's trials. Yet, he said, ". . . if I had been proceeded against by bill, I would have answered." The Council then condemned him to be whipped and pilloried, for his "boldness in refusing to take a legal oath," but adding, very much in the tenor of present day defenders, "without which many offenses might go undiscovered and unpunished."

When the Courts of Star Chamber and High Commission were abolished by Parliament in 1641, the House of Commons declared the sentence of John Lilburn to be "illegal and against the liberty of the subject" and ordered that he be compensated. The House of Lords followed in 1645 by ordering his sentence to be totally vacated. In 1648, he was awarded 3,000 pounds in reparation.

RECENT CASES

The Tucson Five Case

In the fall of 1970 a federal grand jury was convened in Tucson, Arizona, ostensibly to inquire into violations of certain federal statutes, when alleged members of a radical set (the Weathermen) bought dynamite in Tucson and then drove away in a car found to be registered to a woman in Los Angeles.

After the buyer was indicted in October for the offense of illegal transportation of explosives, the investigation was continued by subpoenaing the owner of the car and four young people who lived communally at the address identified in the car's registration. Upon their refusal to answer most of the questions put to them by the grand jury, they were granted immunity. Persisting in their refusal, they were confined for civil contempt. Two of them who had been committed in November, and the remainder committed in early December, remained imprisoned until the expiration of the term of the grand pury on March 31, 1971.[4]

Immediately following their release from prison, the five were again subpoenaed to appear before a new grand jury in April. Granted immunity, three of the group now testified rather than face prison for a more extended stay. Two still refused to testify, but avoided contempt charges and additional confinement because of the prosecution's involvement with wiretapping. No indictment was obtained against any of the five on any charge.

The Leslie Bacon Case

Following the March 1, 1971 bombing of the United States Capitol, Leslie Bacon, age 19, was arrested in April by the FBI in Washington, D.C. pursuant to a material witness warrant. The warant directed federal authorities to transport her to Seattle, Washington, to testify before a grand jury there. Although the warrant and arrest were ultimately ruled invalid,[5] this did not prevent her seizure and transportation across the continent to testify as to subjects that were never revealed, either in the complaint on which the warrant issued, or in the three reported opinions on her case.[6]

Press accounts, indicate that there was thought to be "a link" between her and the organizers of the May Day Demonstrations scheduled to take place in the District of Columbia in 1971.[7] A recent report quotes an unidentified FBI official as saying, "We didn't know a damn thing. Leslie Bacon was the only thing we had and that was just a fishing expedition." He is said to have described the Seattle location as "deliberately rigged . . . to get an indictment."[8]

Having been examined in Seattle for three days about a vast range of radical activities, Bacon refused to testify further. Persisting in her refusal after grant of immunity, she was committed to prison for civil contempt and remained in confinement for close to a month until released on bail appending appeal and certiorari.[9] The contempt order was affirmed on appeal,[10] but the judgment was vacated and remanded by the Supreme Court in light of Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41 (1972) and Bacon's claim of use of illegal electronic surveillance.[11] On remand, the contempt order was reversed, but no inquiry was made on the issue of electronic surveillance since the term of the grand jury had expired.[12] No indictment was ever returned against her for the Capitol bombing.

Leslie Bacon was subsequently indicted by a New York federal grand jury in June of 1971 for conspiracy in connection with the New York "Townhouse Bombing," although previously, a New York State grand jury had refused to indict her for matters in connection with that offense. The federal authorities did not proceed with this indictment, however, because they did not wish to disclose wiretap evidence.

CONCLUSION

Those who support the form of entrapment typified in the cases of the Tucson Five and Leslie Bacon, argue that "justice" is being meted out to those who would otherwise escape the punishment they are thought richly to deserve. Others note that such judgments are arrived at without benefit of the victim's prior conviction of guilt after formal accusation and trial. They argue that this is contrary to the premise of our constitutional system of "justice," as the investigation is said to be undertaken for one purpose but the punishment is imposed for another.

It can be forcefully argued that the calling of the accused or the suspected before the grand jury for compulsory examination must be regarded as a distortion of the grand jury's role and function. Although the calling of "targeted" individuals is occasionally also justified on the basis of the maxim that "the public has a right to every man's evidence",[13] this proposition has never been taken as absolute, as the Fifth Amendment privilege against self incrimination illustrates.

In United States v. Mandujano, none of the justices took exception to the general proposition that a "virtual or putative" defendant might with propriety be called and examined by a grand jury.[14]

Under our constitutional system, "no man shall be held to answer" for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and he shall not be compelled in a criminal case to be "a witness against himself."

The issue then is whether compulsory attendance of parties," through use of a "witness" label, squares with this constitutional doctrine.

VI. IRRELEVANT INQUIRIES

Like a defendant challenging an indictment because of the presentation of irrelevant evidence to the investigating or indicting grand jury,[1] a witness before a grand jury has little legal basis to challenge any particular question on the basis that it is irrelevant to the grand jury inquiry. In fact, it is the present law that a grand jury inquiry need not be defined or limited to any particular charge or criminal act.[2]

As previously indicated, no impropriety results from summoning the target of its inquiry, United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 10 n. 8 (1973). . . ."

Recently, in the case of a grand jury witness, suspected of harboring federal fugitives Patricia Hearst and William and Emily Harris, the third circuit expressly rejected his motion for a protective order which sought a statement whether or not a witness was the "target" of the investigation, United States v. Weiner, 418 F. Supp. 941 (M.D.Pa. 1967), aff'd without opinion, sub nom. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, No. 76–2286 (3d Cir. Oct. 27, 1976).

The ability of the prosecution to broadly question any witness before a grand jury has been much criticized and much feared.[3] A recent case, illustrates the bases for these concerns. A witness, subpoenaed with a simple notice of a grand jury investigation, captioned "United States of America v. Grand Jury Investigations," was required to provide samples of handwriting, a set of fingerprints, and a photograph. A request that the prosecution state the purpose and necessity of these demands was denied, and upon refusal to comply, without such an explanation, the witness was summarily adjudged in contempt and confined.[4]

Present Federal Law

For many years, federal district and circuit courts have assumed that a grand jury witness cannot object to questions as being irrelevant. The basis for this assumption is dicta in several cases. The Supreme Court has never expressly ruled on the question whether, or under what circumstances, a grand jury witness may object to irrelevant inquiries either at the time of his testimony or as a defense to a later contempt hearing for refusal to testify.

In Blair v. United States,[5] a witness challenged a citation for contempt on the basis that the court and the grand jury had no jurisdiction to undertake a particular inquiry and thus he was justified in refusing to answer any questions. The Supreme Court held that a grand jury witness had no "standing" to object to jurisdiction because of the alleged unconstitutionality of the statutes under which the investigation was conducted. However, the Court did go further in dicta. Despite the fact that the witness never challenged the pertinency or relevancy of any particular question, the Supreme Court noted as a supporting corollary to its holding, that a grand jury witness "is not entitled to urge objections of incompetency or irrelevancy, such as a party might raise for this is no concern of his * * *."[6] The legal underpinning of this dicta was that a mere witness is not a "party" to the proceeding.

More recently, this dicta was reiterated in United States v. Calandra.[7] In refusing to apply the exclusionary rule to grand jury inquiries, the Supreme Court stressed that interruptions to allow objections to questions would unduly interfere with the effective and expeditious discharge of the grand jury's duties."

Bases for Irrelevancy Challenge

The Supreme Court has detailed some standards for grand jury subpoenas especially as to requests for physical evidence. Specifically, such a grand jury subpoena duces tecum cannot be "too sweeping" to justify an order for the prosecution of papers. Some "necessity" should be shown, or at least evidence of "materiality" produced.[8] Lower federal courts have followed this standard of relevancy, but in differing ways, especially as to the burden of proof or the duty to come forward with evidence.[9]

[3] In addition to a possibly undue imposition on time and energy from an irrelevant inquiry, an innocent witness, perhaps even a mere bystander to an event, could fear embarrassment, perjury because of a faulty memory, loss of friends or patrons, retribution by the guilty or their associates.

In sustaining the contempt orders, the Court ruled alternatively that the evidence, both documentary and oral, was in fact material, and that in any event the appellants were not entitled to raise objections to the testimony. The witnesses were denied "standing" on the ground, as the Court has said, These writs of error are not prosecuted by the parties in the original suit, but by witnesses. . . . Being witnesses merely, it is not open to them to make objections to the testimony."

While the courts have applied the Fourth Amendment to grand jury subpoenas duces tecum, to compel the production of physical evidence, they have been unwilling to extend protection to the compulsory production of the subpoenaed person's physical characteristics (voice and handwriting exemplars) pursuant to a subpoena ad testificandum.[10] The Supreme Court has specifically held that (a) the subpoena (to testify) is neither a "seizure" nor an "unreasonable seizure" of the person, for there is a "duty" to testify, and (b) the subsequent command that the witness exhibit his physical characteristics is not an "unreasonable seizure", because the witness has no "reasonable expectation of privacy" in those physical characteristics which he constantly exposes to the public.

However, distinguishing these cases as dealing only with constitutional claims, the Third Circuit, in a landmark decision, has required a showing of relevancy as to a subpoena to testify. It did so on nonconstitutional grounds, in the exercise of its "supervisory powers".[11]

Popkin's Case[12]

Popkin, an assistant professor of government at Harvard, who had written extensively on subjects involving the Viet Nam conflict, was subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Massachusetts which had been convened to inquire into possible criminal conduct in the release and publication of the classified Department of Defense study popularly known as the "Pentagon Papers".[13]

As a scholar, Popkin admittedly exchanged information with others relating to his field, believing such sources confidential. Wishing to protect these sources of information, he at first refused to testify. But following a grant of immunity, he responded to several questions, to make it clear that he had never seen a copy of the Pentagon Papers other than those in mass distribution, that he had not discussed with Daniel Ellsberg the possibility of releasing a copy to Neil Sheehan of the New York Times, and that he had no knowledge other than from public sources as to how various newspapers had obtained copies of the study. He did note that he had formed an "opinion" as to who possessed the papers based on the availability of others similar in content to those found in the Pentagon Papers.

Having thus explicitly denied that he possessed any knowledge on this subject, Popkin then refused to answer other questions put to him. The purpose of the additional questioning (and hence its relevancy and its materiality) was not readily apparent to the witness, particularly in view of his forthright denial of any knowledge on the subject other than what appeared in the public records. For his refusals to respond to the additional lines of questioning, Popkin was adjudged in contempt, from which he appealed.

Popkin claimed that the grand jury inquiry "impinged" on his First Amendment rights and he should not be required to respond without a demonstration of its relevancy. Popkin had also made the related claim of a "scholar's First Amendment privilege" not to divulge his sources of information, so far as those sources are confidential and supply him with information relating to his field.

In rejecting both claims, the district court held that "even if the questions put to appellant have not been demonstrated to be relevant to the grand jury's inquiry, this would not justify his refusals to answer." "His invocation of the First Amendment," the court continued, "adds nothing to his relevancy claim in the context of a grand jury proceeding."

The first circuit, while affirming the district court's contempt order with respect to most questions reversed in part the contempt order relating to refusals to respond to questions as to Popkin's opinion. Judge Coffin, writing for the court, declared—

"The generality of the opinion questions here, the apparent basis for the opinion being pursued, and the idea of using one scholar to speculate about the sources of others' work, without any showing of strong need therefor, are repugnant to me. In my view, even apart from constitutional claims, we should exercise our supervisory power to state that in this circuit scholars ought not to go to prison for refusing to give their opinions or beliefs based on casual and retrospective reflections on similarities of content."

The court of appeals supported its rejection on the basis of relevancy by noting that in seeking to identify the crime and the criminal, the relevance of one fact may become apparent only after another fact is uncovered.

The grand jury's success in inquiring into criminal activity, the court stressed, "may often" depend on its ability to offer to witnesses a guarantee of secrecy and to suspects the protection of secrecy unless there is probable cause to indict. Accordingly, any "meaningful" statement of relevance would entail the naming of suspects and the description of prior testimony in direct opposition to this secrecy policy.

Conclusion

It would appear that, except for the third circuit, must federal courts categorically reject any challenge to grand jury questions on the basis of relevancy. The support for this rule has been the need to explore leads, protect the secrecy of grand jury proceedings, and avoid delays and obstructions.

At a trial proceeding, objections based on relevancy are often handled case-by-case. As noted by the court in Popkin, there may be cases where relevancy can not be shown as to one question or fact, until other questions or facts are revealed. The court supervising grand jury proceedings can, as at a trial, ask for an offer of proof, or require in camera showings by the prosecutor, or otherwise condition its orders.

Grand jury secrecy can similarly be protected by appropriate court orders. Often, a showing of relevancy can be based on information, already public; or can be given in camera; or can be derived from information previously received by the jury and available without source.

Allowing relevancy challenges need not involve unnecessary delays. The ordinary witness will not often raise it; the targets could raise it once and the court can prevent bad faith requests or undue obstructions.

VII. NOTICE OF APPEARANCE

No minimum time period has been fixed, either by statute or by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, between the time of the service of a subpoena and the time set for the attendance of the witness.[1] Although it is supposed to be the general rule of the common law that service shall be made "a reasonable time" in advance of the day specified for the attendance of the witness,[2] in practice, a reasonable time is not always given. Subpoenas have frequently been issued on short notice, in many instances requiring the witness to attend "forthwith" or on the following day.[3] In the absence of exceptional circumstances, a court ordinarily would grant a continuance request if notice is short.[4] However, most aggrieved witnesses without counsel or the opportunity to consult one, and ignorant of his rights on procedures to assert them, simply do not make the necessary request.

[3] For examples of "forthwith" grand jury subpoenas, see United States v. Hilton, 534 F. 2d 556 (3d Cir. 1976) ; United States v. Dicillo et al., 533 F. 2d 972 (3d Cir. 1976) (Harry Lupo's petition for cert. den., Jan. 10, 1977). For examples of grand jury subpoenas to appear on day following date of service, see In re Stolar, 397 F. Supp. 520 (S.D. N.Y. 1975) ; Application of Certain Chinese Associations, 19 F.R.D. 97 (N.D. Cal. ; 956) ; Durkin v. United States, 221 F. 2d 520 (D.C. 1954).

[4] See United States v. Polizzi, 329 F. Supp. 222, 225–226 (C.D. Cal. 1971), reversed on other grounds, 450 F. 2d 880 (9th Cir. 1971). In this case the witness was served in Michigan requiring him to appear three days later before a grand jury in California.

Even for the ordinary witness, neither the victim not the potential accused, the service of the subpoena is an unsettling experience. This is especially true for the grand jury witness, because he need not be informed of the parties to the inquiry,[5] of the charge,[6] or if he is the target,[7] of the investigation:

"It is quite clear that the ordinary citizen called upon to testify in the strange environment of the grand jury room under the interrogation of the United States attorney will be quite unable to assert his rights even if he knows what they are. He ought to have an opportunity to consult counsel and be advised of the extent of his right to refuse to testify, and of the way in which to protect himself against giving testimony that might incriminate him." [7]

The grand jury witness, like the ordinary trial witness, needs time for travel, to put his affairs in order, an to provide for his absence from home or business.[8]

While in the trial of an action, criminal or civil, the presence of some witnesses may be essential to a party to the action on short notice only, there are ordinarily no such imperatives in the context of the ex parte, and more relaxed, grand jury proceeding.[9]

The Cases of Lupo and Szwandrak

Lupo and Szwandrak were served with "forthwith" subpoenas to testify before a grand jury inquiring into an alleged misappropriation of FBI files that occurred two years prior to the date of service.[10] Following their indictment and conviction for offenses arising out of the misappropriation, they moved to suppress statements obtained from them following service.

At the time of service both Lupo and Szwandrak were virtual defendants. Service of the subpoenas had been made upon them at a time when the United States attorney was admittedly already in possession of information, including the statement of one of the subsequently indicted defendants, Kuczynski, adequate to establish "probable cause" for arresting both Lupo and Szwandrak. They therefore contended that the "forthwith" subpoenas had been used as a substitute for an arrest warrant, so the prosecution could undertake a custodial interrogation without being required to make any disclosure of its case at any hearing which would necessarily follow an arrest. The motion was denied and Lupo, and Szwandrak were both tried and convicted.

In seeking to reverse their convictions, Lupo and Szwandrak urged that a portion of the prosecution's case leading to their conviction consisted of statements made to various FBI agents on service of the "forthwith" subpoenas.

It was stipulated that Lupo was approached by FBI agents at 8 A.M. at his place of employment. Having indicated that they wished to question him, Lupo was given the Miranda warning and he signed a Miranda waiver.[11] The agents drove Lupo from his place of employment to conduct an "interview," which was fruitless. The agents then handed him a previously issued subpoena commanding Lupo to appear before a federal grand jury "forthwith", and advised him to go to the Newark federal courthouse "at once". As might have been anticipated under such circumstances, Lupo "elected" to accompany the agents in their car.

[8] See Hammond v. Stewart, supra n. 2 Where a witness served at 2 p.m. in the city of London to testify the same day at a trial in Middlesex adjoining, who had been attached for his refusal to appear, was discharged on the ground that "witnesses ought to have a reasonable time to put their affairs in such order that their attendance upon the court may be as little prejudice to themselves as possible."

[9] Some have raised the question of necessity when, for example, in the course of the government's investigation of the publication of the Pentagon Papers, it served a subpoena at 7:30 a.m. upon Robert, the 15-year-old son of Daniel Ellsberg, requiring his appearance two hours later before a Los Angeles grand jury At the time of Robert's service, his father was a virtual accused, and later indicted for offenses in connection with the unlawful dissemination of the Papers. The matter was under investigation by east as well as west coast grand juries. See United States v. Doe, 455 F. 2d 1270 (1st Cir. 1970).

[10] United States v. DiGillo et al., 538 F. 2d 972 (3d Cir. 1976) (Harry Lupo's petition for cert. den. Jan. 10, 1977).

[11] It was the holding in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), that the prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation unless it demonstrates that the following safeguards have been taken: prior to any questioning the person must be warned that he has a right to remain silent, that any statement he does make may be used in evidence against him, and that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, whether retained or appointed. These rights may be waived, provided the waiver is made "voluntarily, knowingly and intelligently." The question of the necessity for giving any such warning to a grand jury witness has not yet been decided by the Supreme Court, although the issue was raised in United States v. Mandujano, 452 U.S. 564 (1976), and a subject of discussion in the opinions.

Lupo was not brought before the grand jury but was delivered instead to the office of FBI in whose care he remained from 9 A.M. to 2 P.M. During this five-hour period, incriminating statements were obtained. He was then taken to the office of the "Organized Crime Strike Force" at which the agents interrogated him for an additional two hours. They then proceeded to the office of the United States attorney, who questioned Lupo for 15 minutes. Finally, at 4:30 P.M., he was taken to the office of the United States Marshal to await his appearance before the grand jury which was then in session. It does not appear from the court's recital of the facts that he actually testified. He requested an opportunity to talk with his wife, and his appearance before the grand jury was "postponed". He was driven to his home by FBI agents, and conversed with his wife in their presence.

Three days later the agents of the FBI visited Szwandrak at his home and promptly served him with a "forthwith" subpoena. Then, as in Lupo's case, the agents gave him the Miranda warnings, and he executed the waiver, following which they questioned him for a period of one and one-half hours. He was then driven to the office of the "Organized Crime Strike Force," later to the office of the United States attorney, and interrogated an additional three times, in each instance after being warned of his Miranda rights. At 4:30 P.M. he was taken before the grand jury and gave testimony.

Both Lupo and Szwandrak contended that these statements and confessions admitted at their trials had been obtained in violation of their rights under the due process and self-incrimination clauses of the Fifth Amendment; more particularly, that their confessions had been procured as the result of (a) an illegal arrest and (b) an abuse of process, and were, in any event, (c) involuntary. The court dismissed, each of these objections.

Even if the service of the "forthwith" subpoenas was a "constructive" arrest, the court suggested that the arrest was not illegal. Possession of an alleged co-conspiration's statement was sufficient to establish probable cause for arrest without a warant. The court, however, chose not to rest its holding on that ground. It found as a fact that neither Lupo nor Szwandrak were placed under any restraint "whatsoever" at the time their incriminating statements were made to the FBI. There had simply been no arrests, legal or illegal.

Although agreeing that the subpoenas had been misused—that Rule 17 did not authorize their use as a "ploy" for the facilitation of office interrogation—the court nevertheless said that this abuse of process could not afford ground for suppressing the evidence.[12] Congress had prohibited only the suppression of confessions that were "involuntary". Szwandrak had not contended that his statements were involuntary and the court would not disturb the trial court's finding that Lupo's confession was "voluntarly" given.

Conclusion

The witness, whether he be a mere bystander to the offenses under inquiry or culpably involved, should be entitled to a reasonable time to set his affairs in order and to prepare himself for the examination.

The enactment into law of such provision as those of H.R. 94 which would require a minimum period of notice, would insure this protection.[13]

MEMORANDUM

To: Martin Belsky, Counsel.
From: Alfred M. Nittle, Counsel.
Subject: Disruptions in grand jury room due to presence of counsel for the witness—summary report on state experiences.

(1) ARIZONA

Statute.—A "person under investigation" has the right to the "advice of counsel" while giving testimony before the grand jury.[1]

[12] On the general subject of office interviewing or interrogation of witness following service of subpoena, see United States v. Swaig, 441 F. 2d 114 (2d Cir. 1971), cert. den., 403 U.S. 932 (1971); Durkin v. United States, supra n.3; United States v. Mandel, 415 F. Supp. 1033 (D. Md. 1976); United States v. Gurney, 393 F. Supp. 683 (M.D. Fla. 1974); United States v. Kleen Laundry, 381 F. Supp. 519 (E.D.N.Y. 1974); United States v. Johns-Manville Corp., 213 F. Supp. 65 (E.D. Pa. 1962).

[13] The bill (at p. 20–21) provides that, except in cases where the court finds special need upon a showing by the Government or the consent of the witness, "no subpoena may require any witness to testify or produce other information" at any proceeding before a grand jury" at any time before the expiration of the one-week period beginning on the date of the service of the subpoena."

[1] Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 21–412 (Act of 1971); Ariz. R. Crim., pp. 12.5 and 12.6.

Disruptions.—In this state which has a dual grand jury system, state-wide and county, neither the Attorney General nor the County Attorney for Maricopa County reports any disruptions.[3] Prosecution of offenses by indictment is discretionary. Prosecutors emphasize that they generally refrain from calling persons who would refuse to give evidence by resorting to the privilege against self-incrimination.

(2) ILLINOIS

Statute.—A person "already charged with an offense" or against whom a bill of indictment is sought has the right "to be accompanied by counsel who shall advise him of his rights" during the grand jury proceedings.[3]

Disruptions.—None reported by the office of the State's Attorney for Cook County.[4] It is required by this state's constitution that all felonies be prosecuted by indictment. About 7 to 10 thousand indictments are processed annually in Cook County. Much of the success in holding down disruptions is attributed to a "strong" court which has made known to members of the bar that disruptions will not be tolerated.

(3) KANSAS

Statute.—"Counsel for any witness may be present while the witness is testifying and may interpose objections on behalf of the witness. He shall not be permitted to examine or cross-examine his client or other witness. . . ."[5]

Disruptions.—None reported by prosecutor's office for 18th Judicial District (co-extensive with Sedgwick County, whose seat is at Wichita).[6]

They report some slight delays in some instances in disposing of objections requiring court rulings, but these have not been found burdensome. Prosecution by indictment is not mandatory. The grand jury is not employed extensively.

(4) MICHIGAN

Statute.—This state has two types of "grand juries". In proceedings before the "one-man" or "judge-grand jury", all witnesses are entitled to have legal counsel present "not involving delay".[7] However, a witness appearing before the regular or "citizens' grand jury" is given the right "to have counsel by his side" only if he has been granted immunity.[8]

Disruptions.—None reported by the Wayne County prosecutor's office, at the county seat in Detroit.[9] The "judge-grand jury" is now obsolete, while the citizens' grand jury is used principally for extraordinary investigations. Prosecution by indictment is not mandatory. Prosecutors in this state are said to prefer proceeding by way of "warrant, complaint, and preliminary hearing". In Wayne County, for example, although about 12,000 felony warrants were issued last year, the citizens' grand jury had only 50–100 indictments before it.

(5) MINNESOTA

Supreme court rule.—Attorney may be present with any witness who "waived his immunity from self-incrimination", but such attorney shall not participate in the grand jury proceeding "except to advise and consult with the witness while he is testifying".[10]

Disruptions.—None reported by County Attorney for Hennepin County.[11] No extensive use is made of the grand jury in this county or generally throughout the state. Proceeding by indictment is not constitutionally required. Nor is it required by statute except in the prosecution of capital offenses (first degree murder and "treason"). In Hennepin County, over 95% of the prosecutorial activity is by way of complaint, followed by what is known in Minnesota as the "omnibus hearing" before a law judge at which "probable cause" is determined and pre-trial objections disposed of. Moreover, the County Attorney in this county prefers not to call witnesses who refuse to waive their "immunity" from self-incrimination.

(6) OKLAHOMA

Statute.—One (1) attorney "representing" the witness may be present during the time the witness is "actually under examination".[12]

Disruptions.—None reported by the District Attorney for Oklahoma County.[13] The grand jury is seldom utilized in this county or in the state generally. Prosecution by indictment is not required by the state's constitution except that grand juries may be summoned by the court or on petition of a percentage of the electors. Grand juries are said to be "distrusted" in this state. They have been used for "political" cases. Only two grand juries have been summoned in Oklahoma County since 1974, the year of the enactment of the present right-to-counsel statute, and none of the witnesses called were represented by, or requested the presence of, counsel.

(7) SOUTH DAKOTA

Statute.—"Counsel for the witness" may be "present when the grand jury is in session", but all persons other than grand jurors are excluded while the grand jury is deliberating or voting.[14]

Disruptions.—No problems or disruptions have been reported by the State's Attorney for Minnehaha County.[15] Yet he construes the above statute as authorizing counsel to engage in a "full representation" of the witness before the grand jury. The grand jury is used frequently in this county, but perhaps infrequently in others. There is no constitutional mandate on the use of the grand jury. The State's Attorney may prosecute by information or indictment. Nevertheless, of the two grand juries sitting each year in Minnehaha County since 1972, the year of the enactment of the above right-to-counsel statute, the State's Attorney recalls only four instances in which witnesses requested the presence of counsel, although about 25 persons were called who were thought to have had culpable involvement in matters under inquiry. The local bar is said to be small, neighborly, and disciplined.

(8) UTAH

Statutes.—There is a caveat here on the question whether the state's statutes authorize the presence of counsel in the grand jury room. The question has not been litigated or resolved and county prosecutors take contrary views.

One section of law, enacted in 1967, provides: "Any person called to testify before a grand jury must be advised of his constitutional right to be represented by counsel and his right not to say anything that may incriminate him. Upon a demand for such person for representation for [sic] counsel the proceedings must be delayed until counsel is present."[16]

A paragraph of another and earlier section, and not since amended or repealed, provides that "no person other than as in this section prescribed [counsel for the witness is not expressly prescribed] shall be permitted to be present during the sessions of the grand jury. . . ."[17]

The Salt Lake County Attorney's office takes the position that the foregoing statutes do not authorize the presence of counsel in the grand jury room.[18] The Utah County Attorney takes a contrary position.[19]

Disruptions.—The Utah County Attorney advises that no grand jury has sat in his county for 20 years past. The Salt Lake County Attorney informs us that the grand jury is not often used in his county or in the state as a whole. While the state constitution authorizes the prosecution of offenses by information or indictment, the state's implementing statutes discourage the latter. A grand jury may be called into use only when it is made to appear to the court, after hearing, that "law enforcement has failed or that in the interest of justice a grand jury should be called." [20] Since January 1975, when the term of the present Salt Lake County Attorney began, one grand jury has been called into session.

(9) VIRGINIA

Statute.—The presence of counsel is authorized only for a witness appearing before the "special" grand jury when he testifies. "Such counsel shall have the right to consult with and advise the witness during his examination, but shall not have the right to conduct an examination of his own witness." The witness, moreover, must procure his own counsel.[21]

The "special grand jury", first created in 1975, is restricted to the function of investigating and reporting "concerning any condition which tends to promote criminal activity in the community or which indicates misfeasance of governmental authority by government agencies or the officials thereof." A regular grand jury is authorized to act on indictments prepared by the Commonwealth's Attorney as well as perform the function of the special grand jury.

Disruptions.—None reported by Commonwealth Attorneys for the cities of Norfolk and Virginia Beach of whom inquiries were made.[22] Since the 1975 enactment, no special grand jury has been convened for Norfolk. Only one, now in session, was recently convened for Virginia Beach. Several witnesses, with counsel present, have been heard by this jury. No disruptions have thus far been experienced. None are anticipated for the future, although about 50% of the witnesses to be called are thought to be culpably involved in matters under inquiry and are expected to appear with counsel. (It is said to be the practice in Virginia to call only prosecution witnesses before regular grand juries, which are confined to their indicting function and not ordinarily employed for investigating purposes.)

(10) WASHINGTON

Statute.—A witness has a right to the presence of counsel during his appearance before a grand jury or "special inquiry judge". But when immunity is granted to the witness, the attorney is excluded from the grand jury room, although the witness may leave the grand jury room "to confer" with his attorney. While present in the grand jury room the attorney is limited to advising such witness "concerning his right to answer any questions and the form of his answer and shall not otherwise engage in the proceedings".[23]

Disruptions.—These statutory rights, so far as grand juries are concerned, appear to be of theoretical interest only. Since their enactment no grand jury has been convened in King County, the state's most populous.[24] In the second most populous county, Pierce, only one grand jury was convened many years ago, the date being forgotten by the present Public Attorney.[25] While the "special inquiry judge" is frequently utilized for the conduct of inquisitorial investigations, offenses are, throughout the state, generally prosecuted by information. The state's constitution authorizes prosecution by information or indictment, but the statutes authorize the court to convene a grand jury only "where the public interest so demands" or whenever so requested by a public attorney, corporation counsel or city attorney "upon showing of good cause".

GENERAL CONCLUSION

Whether in a particular district the grand jury is used frequently or infrequently, whether counsel is allowed for all witnesses or only for some or under restricted circumstances, no public prosecutor of any of the more populous districts of those states which to any extent authorize the presence of counsel, and of whom inquiry was made, has reported any actual disruption of the grand jury's proceedings by reason of the presence of counsel for the witness.

Subject: Grand Juries, Indictments, and Investigations—The British Experience.

Accusation by a grand jury indictment was required in Great Britain from 1352 until grand juries were effectively abolished in 1933.[1] However ever since the mid 1800's, grand juries had ceased to perform any significant investigative role. Ever since the 1840's, charges were prepared and presented to justices of the peace or magistrates, who reviewed the evidence at public preliminary hearings[2] and then either discharged the accused or committed him for trial.[3] Grand juries then reviewed these charges, now formulated in a bill of indictment.[4] As charges had been already reviewed by courts, and no investigations were undertaken by grand juries, the usefulness of the grand jury system became increasingly questionable,[5] even to the jurors themselves.[6]

A. English Investigatory Procedures

1. Mechanisms

Even prior to the abolition of the grand jury, England did not use grand juries to conduct open-ended investigations as commonly undertaken by numerous Federal grand juries. Opposition to such investigative juries was based on their "inquisitional nature" and as such "alien to the concept of justice generally accepted in the United Kingdom. Only in exceptional cases, of nationwide concern, when those "rare cases of public confidence occur" are analogous procedures involved.[7] Thus, in the ordinary case,[8] investigations were conducted by the police or private persons and then formal proceedings are instituted by the police, or less frequently by a private person,[9] who may need the approval of the court or the consent of some official, person or body.[10]

The exceptional cases, where special investigatory power is allowed are specifically described in statutes.

First, in an extraordinary case, the Secretary of State may appoint "a person" to conduct, with power of subpoena, inquisitorial-type "local inquiries" into

---

[1] Under the Administration of Justice Act (Miscellaneous Provisions) of 1933, 8 Halsbury's Statutes of England at 307 (3d Ed 1969), the requirement for indictments was abolished except for certain offenses in London and Middlesex Counties. By the Criminal Justice Act of 1948, 18 Halsbury's Statutes at 32 (3rd Ed 1970), these exceptions were removed and the requirement of a grand jury indictment was totally eliminated.

[2] At these hearings, the prosecution was required to show its case through witnesses and evidence; the accused had the right to confront the evidence and examine it, to present his own case, and make arguments. See Lieck, Abolition of the Grand Jury in England, 25 J. Crim. L. & C 623 (1934); Phillips. CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW (England) at 377 (3d Ed. 1963).

[4] See Heyting, Abolition of Grand Juries in England, 19 A.B.A. J. 648 (1933).

[5] While the successful use of the "preliminary hearing" to exercise the "protective function" and screen charges was the major factor leading to ultimate abolition of the grand jury, other factions contributed. Among them were the establishment, 1829, of a police system in London by Sir Robert Peel, followed by its extension to other parts of the country in succeeding years; the establishment of salaried magistrates in London in 1792 and the extension of the system in 1835; and the creation of a director of public prosecutions in 1879 and of the office in 1908. Some credit has also been given to reforms in the criminal law and concepts of punishment initiated in the early part of the last century, and the increased protection afforded the accused at trials before the petit jury, including the allowance to defendant of witnesses on his behalf (1702), of counsel (1758), of his counsel's right to address the jury (1836), and making the defendant and spouse competent witnesses (1898). See Elliff, supra note 3 at 3–7.

[6] For example, a Middlesex grand jury, as early as 1846, repeatedly urged abolition. The British press commented:

"Any philosopher who wished for an example of the emptiness of grandeur, and its unsatisfactory effect upon the grand themselves, need look no further than the Grand Jury of Middlesex. This venerable body never assembles without being lectured on its "extreme antiquity" and is "utter uselessness," its "respectability," and its "superfluousness;" in fine upon its having attained to such good old age, as to be no good at all."

See Elliff, supra, note 3 at 12.

[7] See Report, Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry, Nov. 1966, Cmnd. 3121, at 16.

[8] Coroner's courts are used in homicide cases. The Coroner, who must be an attorney or medical practitioner must hold an inquest if there is "reasonable cause to suspect an unnatural or violent death." A coroner's jury may be convened in any case and must be convened when there is reason to suspect death by murder, manslaughter, infanticide, poisoning, etc. See Harvard, The Detectors of Secret Homicide, at 172 (London 1900); 9 Halsbury's Law, § 1034 et seq. (4th Ed. 1977).

[9] 11 Halsbury's Laws, § 138 (4th Ed. 1976); Edwards, The Law Officers of the Crown, at 395–402 (London 1964).

[10] Certain criminal proceedings may be undertaken only by order of a judge, or by the direction or with the consent of the Attorney General, the Director of Public Prosecutions, or some other official, person, or body. Common law rights of persons to arrest without a warrant are now limited to instances in which a "breach of the peace" has been committed or is reasonably apprehended, although there are statutory powers of arrest without warrant respecting certain offenses that are granted to all persons. 11 Halsbury Laws, § 97 (4th Ed. 1976).

"any matter connected with the policing of an area."[11] The person appointed may summon witnesses and documents and hold the inquiry in public or private, as the Secretary of State may direct. The report of the inquiry is not published but a summary of findings and conclusions may be released by the Secretary of State, in the "public interest."

Second, a coroner's inquest into possible homicides, may compel the presence of witnesses and the giving of evidence.[12] However, the inquests are more like preliminary examinations than grand jury investigations. Rules of evidence are usually observed; all persons have a right to request and then present evidence, witnesses are subject to examination by any interested person or his counsel; notice of the inquest must be given to any person whose conduct is likely to be called into question.[13]

Third, a series of special statutes allow extraordinary investigations. For example, the Attorney General may require an examination by a justice of the peace of "malicious explosions", likely to cause or actually causing harm to life or property. Such investigations may compel the presence of witnesses and the production of evidence and a witness is not excused from presenting evidence because of risk of self-incrimination (although answers are not admissible in any civil or criminal proceeding).[14]

Fourth, under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act, 1921,[15] both Houses of Parliament may establish a tribunal to inquire into a "definite matter described in the Resolution as of urgent public importance."[16] These tribunals have all powers rights and privileges as a court, as to securing evidence; must conduct proceedings in public, unless it is in the public interest not to do so. Witnesses may still invoke the privilege against self-incrimination and the tribunals are not authorized to grant immunity. Although not statutorily required, certain procedures have been uniformly applied in practice. The chairman of the tribunal is a judge; the tribunal is represented by the Attorney General and allows representation to any person who may be adversely affected.[17]

Fifth, Great Britain has developed a type of informal, non-binding investigatory mechanism—similar to a Congressional probe or a government fact-finding mission—generally used to investigate official corruption. They usually do not have subpoena power and are temporary or special in nature.[18]

---

[11] Police Act of 1964, 25 Halsbury's Statutes, 330, 353 (3d Ed.).

[12] The witness is not bound to answer any incriminating question and the coroner has no authority to grant immunity.

[13] See 9 Halsbury's Statutes, § 1034 et seq. (4th Ed. 1974). Harvard, The Detectors of Secret Homicide, at 172 (London 1964).

[14] The resulting verdict, called an "inquisition" has the effect of an indictment, and may lead to arrest and trial. The "inquisition" is, however, subject to review by a court, prior to the lodging of formal charges.

[15] 12 Halsbury's Statutes 873 (3d ed.).

[16] Such tribunals are not common. Between 1921 and 1966, only 16 inquiries were conducted under the Act. See Report, Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry, Nov. 1966, Cmmd. 3121, p. 16.

[17] These procedures are not rights but discretionary privileges. The Royal Commission in Tribunals of Inquiry, in its 1966 Report, Cmmd. 3121, at 17, 44, has recommended six principles for tribunal inquiries:

1. Before any person becomes involved in an inquiry, Tribunal must be satisfied that there are circumstances which affect him and which the Tribunal proposes to investigate.
2. Before any person who is involved in an inquiry is called as a witness he should be informed of any allegations which are made against him and the substance of the evidence in support of them.
3. (a) He should be given an adequate opportunity of preparing his case and of being assisted by legal advisers.
(b) His legal expenses should normally be met out of public funds.
4. He should have the opportunity of being examined by his own solicitor or counsel and of stating his case in public at the inquiry.
5. Any material witnesses he wishes called at the inquiry should, if reasonably practicable, be heard.
6. He should have the opportunity of testing by cross-examination conducted by his own solicitor or counsel any evidence that may affect him.

[18] These informal methods of investigation include:

(1) The Royal Commission—used in modern times to formulate recommendations on matters of broad policy and not for inquiry into the facts of particular cases. The Commission has no subpoena power.

(2) A Select Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry—formerly used extensively in the investigation of public misconduct, but in disuse recently. Constituted of members representing the relative strength of parties in the House of Commons, their record has been described as "unfortunate" and lacking in public confidence. Such committees do not hear counsel, and their members often will have no experience in taking evidence or cross-examining witnesses.

(3) Privately conducted inquiries—of the type carried out by Lord Denning in the Profumo case. The Secrecy in the receipt of evidence often makes the report of the inquiry subject to challenge.

Self-Incrimination and Immunity

Generally, an individual is granted more of a right not to testify, because of possible self-incrimination, under English law than under American law. In civil or criminal proceedings, a person may refuse to answer any question or produce any document if to do so might expose that person or his spouse to prosecution for an offense or proceedings to recover any penalty.[19]

Moreover, statutory exceptions to the privilege not to testify or produce evidence are much more limited than those granted federal prosecutors in the United States by the Immunity Act, 18 U.S.C. §§ 6001–6004. Generally, some statutes authorize the compulsion of evidence, despite a claim of privilege, in regulatory type proceedings or inquiries. The witness, in these special inquiries, must testify and in return receives a form of "use" immunity, called "indemnity", providing that statements or answers are not admissible against the witness in other proceedings.[20] Statutory immunity or indemnity is not available in more general investigatory proceedings, such as a coroner's inquiry, special Tribunals of Inquiry, preliminary examinations or hearings and trials.

Evidentiary Restrictions

England has a limited "exclusionary rule" barring use of evidence, in certain situations,[21] in any criminal proceeding,[22] taken in violation of six "Judges Rules".[23] Although the rules provide a number of general safeguards to assure fairness in investigation, they provide two principal restrictions:

(1) As soon as it appears that there is evidence which affords reasonable ground for suspecting the person being questioned, the interrogator, prior to further questioning, must "caution him" that he is not obliged to say anything and that what he says may be put into writing and given in evidence;

(2) If the person is charged with or informed that he may be prosecuted for the offense, he ordinarily should not be questioned at all, except that, again after similar cautioning, questions may be put where necessary "for the purpose of preventing or minimizing harm or loss to some other person or the public or to clear up an ambiguity in a previous answer or statement." [24]

(4) The Departmental Inquiry—usually appointed by the responsible Minister (Cabinet Member) to be conducted by an eminent lawyer alone or as chairman with others, without subpoena power.

(5) Accident inquiries—such as are carried out under civil aviation and shipping regulations. They are technical in nature and largely for regulatory purposes.

(6) Security Commission—reports to and advises the Prime Minister on security arrangements within the public service. Conducts inquiries often unknown to the general public, and which, by reason of their nature, should be privately conducted.

See generally Report, Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry, November 1966, Cmmd. 3121.

[19] The privilege in criminal proceedings bars also inquiries that might expose a witness to a forfeiture. Of course, this protection applies only to offenses, practices, and forfeitures under the law of any part of the United Kingdom. Thus, a) under American law, threat of foreign prosecution does not give a basis to refuse to testify or produce evidence. See 17 Halsbury's Laws, § 240 (4th Ed. 1976).

[20] Among such statutory exceptions are the Explosive Substances Act 1883, s. 12; Bankruptcy Act 1914, s. 166; 1948, s. 167, as amended by the Companies Act 1967, s. 50; Representation of the People Act 1949, s. 123 (7), as amended; Army Act 1955, s. 135; Air Force Act 1955, s. 135; Road Traffic Regulation Act 1967, s. 85, as amended; Road Traffic Act 1972, ss. 167, 168 (2), as amended; Theft Act 1968, s. 31 (1)(a); Civil Evidence Act 1968, s. 17 Schedule (listing 10 statutes in addition to those included in this paragraph); and the Criminal Damage Act 1971, s. 9(a).

[21] These rules are not, per se, laws, and the failure to abide by them only render answers and statements excludable and not automatically excluded. See 11 Halsbury's Laws, paras. 419–425 (4th Ed. 1976).

[22] Originally promulgated for the guidance of police officers, the rules now apply to all persons "charged with the duty of investigating offenses or charging offenders . . ." See (1964) 1 All E. Rep. 237, (1964) 1 WLR 152.

[23] The rules had their origin in 1912 and was first limited to police actions only. They came into force for all England and Wales and all investigations in 1964, upon approval of the Queen's Rules Division of the High Court. See Williams, Police Interrogation Procedures and Limitations Under Foreign Law—England, 52 J. Crim. L., Crim, & Pol. Sci. at 50 (May–June 1961); See preamble to rules as published by the court in Practice Note, (1964) 1 All E. Rep. 237, (1964) 1 WLR 152.

[24] Halsbury's Laws, paras. 419–424 (4th Ed. 1976). These rules do not affect other principles of English practice, that (a) citizens have a duty to help a police officer to discover and apprehend offenders; (b) police officers, otherwise than by arrest, cannot compel any person against his will to come to or remain in any police station; (c) at any stage of the investigation any person should be able to communicate and to consult privately with counsel (solicitor), even if in custody; (d) when a police officer making inquiries of any person has enough evidence to prefer charges against him for the offense, the officer should, without delay, cause that person to be charged or informed that he may be prosecuted; and (e) all answers and statements given to police shall have been given "voluntarily".

In addition to the judge's rules, the procedures of investigation vary depending on the formality or informality of the mechanism used. Thus, as noted earlier, at preliminary examinations, the case must be presented by witnesses, subject to cross-examination and the potential accused may testify and have counsel present.[25] At a coroner's inquiry, rules of evidence are usually followed and a potential defendant must be invited to present evidence, allowed to cross-examine and have counsel present.[26] At Tribunals of Inquiry, a potential accused is generally granted counsel, given notice of charges, able to call witnesses, and able to cross-examine witnesses.[27]

B. ENGLISH CHARGING PROCEDURES

Although arrests without a warrant are permissible, prosecution of a case is commenced by the issuance of a summons or warrant, issued by a justice of the peace for an articular borough or county.[28] If the crime[29] is one defined as "summary" either by statute or common law, it is tried in the Magistrate's Court. Other offenses are still termed "indictable," even though the grand jury has been abolished.[30]

An "indictable" offense ordinarily[31] proceeds to go, on a "bill of indictment," to Magistrate's Court. The examining justice conducts a hearing, in public unless "the ends of justice would not be served," at which the defendant and counsel is present and able to question prosecution witnesses and present his own evidence. If the examining justice "on consideration of the evidence and any statement of the accused" is of the opinion that "there is sufficient evidence," the court commits the defendant to trial. If insufficient evidence is presented, the court is to discharge the defendant.[32] If the defendant is held for court, the indictment is "signed," and then the case proceeds to trial in the Crown Court, known when sitting in London as the Central Criminal Court.[33]

English law attempts to preserve the concept of pre-trial secrecy, long used as a basis for grand jury procedures in the United States. Although preliminary examinations are generally required to be "in open session," it is unlawful to "publish or broadcast" any report on the examination prior to discharge, or completion of a future trial, unless, on application of the defendant, the court orders otherwise. However, general non-prejudicial facts may be reported.[34]

SUMMARY

While crimes may be privately prosecuted in England, and to that extent privately investigated, such private actions do not allow compulsory process to secure testimony or evidence. Thus, most criminal prosecutions are instituted by the police, and the investigations are normally conducted by them. In the conduct of criminal investigations, the police are bound by the Judges' Rules

[28] The only exceptions to this procedural rule involve coroner's courts, which can return an "inquisition", leading to indictment; court's marshall in military cases; ecclesiastical courts for certain limited church crimes; and special courts of the Vice Chancellors of the University of Oxford and Cambridge.
[29] The Courts exercise original criminal jurisdiction in England and Wales. English courts exercise criminal jurisdiction in respect of acts done or omissions made by all British subjects or aliens within the territory of England and Wales. They also exercise an extraterritorial jurisdiction over all British subjects, and some aliens, for acts or omissions done (a) on the open seas within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominations, (b) on British ships on the high seas or in foreign rivers, and (c) on British-controlled aircraft, as well as in respect to some acts done abroad. 11 Halsbury's Laws, para. 97 (4th Ed. 1976).
[30] Only the necessity of a "finding" of an indictment by a grand jury has been eliminated.
[31] Occasionally a "voluntary bill," without a preliminary examination, may be returned at the direction or with the consent of the judge of the High Court. Perjury is an example of such an exceptional case.

establishing restrictions on the taking of evidence. And they have no power of compulsory process, with the exception of inquiries pursued in the Coroners' Courts in homicide cases.

In exceptional instances, however, the inquisitorial process (compulsory examination of witnesses and production of evidence) may be applied on motion of the Attorney General or Secretary of State. There are also extraordinary inquisitorial procedures available in matters of "urgent public importance" and of nation-wide concern. Most notably among them, particularly for inquiry into public misconduct, are tribunals of inquiry appointed pursuant to Resolution of both Houses of Parliament under the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921.

As a general rule, witnesses involved in criminal investigations are entitled to open hearings, counsel to assist them, and may assert a privilege against incrimination as a bar to the compulsion of testimony. No generally applicable system of immunity has been established in England. There are statutes of this type applicable to particular administrative agency or civil proceedings, but with perhaps one exception—the Explosive Substances Act 1883—no statute applies the compulsory immunity concept to criminal proceedings.

MEMORANDUM BY: ALFRED M. NITTLE AND MARTIN H. BELSKY

ANALYSIS OF TIME PERIODS—PRESENT FEDERAL GRAND JURY PROCEDURE AND H.R. 94 PROCEDURES

H.R. 94 establishes certain procedures for federal grand juries and grants certain rights to persons involved in federal grand jury proceedings. This memorandum analyses each section of the bill to determine (1) whether the procedures required entail more time than existing procedures and (2) if more time is involved whether it is substantial or negligible.

Section 2—Recalcitrant witnesses

Section Two provides procedures for holding a witness in civil contempt for refusal to testify without just cause. As indicated by the testimony of representatives of the Judicial Conference, H.R. 94's requirement of a hearing prior to a contempt order is present law.[1] Similarly, H.R. 94's requirement of three day's notice in most cases is present law. In fact, most courts have set a general standard of five day's notice.[2] As indicated by case law, and as included in H.R. 94, this period is not inflexible. If special problems are shown or undue delay feared, the court can shorten the notice period.

Prosecutors are free now, and under H.R. 94, to call other witnesses in the pending or other cases, while the contempt order is being litigated. If a delay in proceedings is anticipated, the prosecutor is free, now and under H.R. 94, upon a reasonable basis to obtain permission for shortened notice. In short, no delays are caused by Section Two's provisions.

Section 3—Immunity

This section revises existing sections of the code to provide procedures for the granting of immunity to a witness.[3]

Notice.—Subsection (b) provides that:

"(b) No order under this part shall require any witness to testify or provide other information prior to the day one week after the day on which such order

Where the charged witness is without funds, it is the policy of the Judicial Conference that an attorney shall be appointed for him and compensated pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3006A.

(10th Cir. 1975).

[3] The substantive change of requiring transactional and not just use immunity does not in and of itself cause any time period additions. It only changes the nature of the immunity order.

was communicated to the witness, except that a witness may be required to testify or produce such information prior to such day if the court, upon a showing of special need, so orders."[2]

As with contempt orders, H.R. 94's requirement of notice prior to an order of immunity is present law. Courts have consistently held that "adequate notice" is required of the grant of an immunity order[3] and many have looked to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 5(a), 5(b) and 6(d), which requires at least five days notice.[4] Finally, under present law and under H.R. 94, the time period is not inflexible. If special problems arise, or undue delay feared, the court can shorten the notice period.

H.R. 94 thus at most could cause a two day delay in the ordering of immunity—that is, it provides for seven days as compared to the general rule of five days today, absent exigent circumstances. But neither the five day nor seven day period need cause any delay in an investigation or in grand jury activities. Prosecutors are free, under present law, and under H.R. 94, to call other witnesses in the pending or other cases, while immunity is being sought. If such is not possible, the prosecutor is free, now and under H.R. 94, upon a reasonable basis to obtain permission for shortened notice. In short, no delays are necessarily caused by Section 3's provision on notice.

HEARING

Section 3 provides for judicial review of immunity orders to determine that it is in accord with established standards, and gives discretion to the court to refuse an immunity grant.

Under the 1954 immunity law, the courts had the power to review immunity orders and permit or deny a request for such an order.[5] Such a review is precluded by the 1970 Act and the court's granting of an immunity request is ordinarily[6] considered ministerial.[7]

A new hearing procedure is required by Section 3 but it is most unlikely to cause undue, if any, delays. As noted earlier, the prosecutor is free to call witnesses in the pending case or other cases while the immunity order is being litigated. Second, the determination to be made often involve simple, direct factual issues that can be disposed of quickly. Third, if an immunity order is being contested under the procedure of Section 3, it would be contested by those individuals who litigate the issue under existing procedures, if not at the time of the order granting immunity then at the later contempt procedure. Fourth, orders granting immunity are not appealable under H.R. 94 and thus the hearing is the only timfie period affected.[8] Finally, as indicated by the testimony of the Justice Department, immunity requests are supposedly thoroughly reviewed by Justice Department personnel, based on detailed standards and guidelines. The time delays involved in such a review should be reduced by the fact that a court will review an immunity order for its propriety.

ONGOING INVESTIGATIONS

Few, if any, federal grand juries investigate one isolated incident involving a few witnesses. Most investigate complex cases, often more than one, involving Normally, said the court, the application and supporting documents should be served in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rules 5(a), (b) and 6(d) now requiring five days notice unless otherwise ordered. A leading case, this decision has been cited with approval and its principles applied within other jurisdictions. See, for example, *United States v. numerous witnesses. Thus, the prosecutor can call other witnesses before a grand jury while immunity orders are being contested. No delays need be caused by a hearing on immunity.

TRANSACTIONAL IMMUNITY

As indicated by the testimony of numerous witnesses, and the cases they cited, many orders of immunity are presently being contested or opposed because of fears of future prosecution. A return to transactional immunity would eliminate these legal challenges, which all involve hearings even if unsuccessful, and thus H.R. 94 would reduce delays.

PRESENT LEGAL CHALLENGES

Most immunity orders are for voluntary witnesses who wish to cooperate but want immunity protection. Those that are involuntary witnesses will oppose the immunity grant today, refuse to testify, and then fight contempt orders. They file legal actions, secure hearings, and then appeal contempt orders. Even if unsuccessful, these challenges and appeals involve the same time periods provided for judicial review under H.R. 94.[9]

Section 4—Size of grand juries

Section 4 would reduce the size of the grand jury to not less than nine nor more than 15 persons, and would authorize the finding of an indictment if at least nine jurors are present and two-thirds of those present concur.[10]

The enactment of this provision clearly would not delay grand jury or court proceedings. On the contrary, the provision would expedite the selection, summoning and qualifying of grand jurors and would expedite proceedings on indictments. Under existing law, the panel of 23 persons (with a concurrence of 12 being required for indictment) has been regarded as "administratively unwieldy, costly, and unnecessary." [11]

Section 5—Unauthorized disclosure of grand jury information

Section 5 would provide criminal sanctions for violations of grand jury secrecy.[12]

Secrecy of grand jury proceedings is now required, with limited exceptions[13] pursuant to a rule of the Supreme Court, Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[14] For its enforcement reliance is now explicity placed on the contempt power, which has been regarded as inadequate for the purposes.[15]

Section 5 neither requires nor authorizes action that would result in delay of grand jury or court proceedings. On the contrary, the provision should tend to expedite such proceedings by its contribution to the attainment of the secrecy objective.[16]

Section 6—Rights and duties of grand juries; independent inquiry

Section 6 provides for increased independence and decision-making by grand jurors themselves.

CHARGE TO GRAND JURY

Subsection (a) of a proposed new section 3329 to Title 18, Chapter 215, of the U.S. Code, requires the court to instruct the grand jury, following its impanelment, on specified subjects relating to its powers and duties, including (1) its duty to inquire into federal offenses committed within the district, (2) its right to conduct independent inquiry, (3) its right to call and interrogate witnesses, (4) its right to require the production of documentary and other evidence, (5) the subject-matter of the investigation, (6) the criminal statutes involved, if known, (7) the necessity of sufficient evidence to form the basis for an indictment, and (8) the obligation of secrecy.

This provision, in substance, imposes no additional duties upon the court and should not delay its proceedings. Presently most cases have indicated that the court should instruct the jury on their rights, duties, role, and responsibilities, although court's charge has ordinarily been a matter within its discretion, and such charges have varied in length and content. It is customary for the courts to charge the jurors in relation to their duties, powers, and matters concerning their investigations.[17]

The proposed subsection would not alter this practice but it does give assurance that jurors shall be instructed upon basic and specified subjects. A measure of uniformity is thus introduced into the practice. Moreover, by assuring that the grand jury, in the words of the subsection, "reasonably understands" its powers and duties, the provision should tend to expedite the performance of the grand jury's functions, lessen judicial involvement at later stages presently caused by confusion of the jurors.

H.R. 94's requirement of "adequate and reasonable notice," by definition, means that instructions can only give instructions to the degree it is able to. Thus, H.R. 94 requires instructions only as to statues involved "if these are known at the time the grand jury is impaneled." H.R. 94 does require the court to describe the subject matter of the investigation. "Adequate and reasonable notice" would therefore mean that such description would be to the degree the court is able, at a particular point in time, to describe the subject.

Requests to testify

Subsection (b) of the proposed new section 3329 would authorize "any person" to make a written request to the government's attorney to appear before the grand jury to testify, or to request that the grand jury proceed to exercise its powers of independent inquiry under the new section 3330. The government's attorney is additionally placed under a duty to notify those persons against whom he seeks a presentment or indictment of their privileges to appear before the grand jury to testify or present evidence, unless the government's attorney can satisfy the court that such notice would result in the flight of the person, would endanger the witnesses, or would unduly delay the investigation and prosecution. The grand jury is not bound to hear any witness, but such witnesses as it agrees [16] Grand jury proceedings are maintained in secrecy "(1) to prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammeled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; and (5) to protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt." United States v. Procter and Gamble Co., 356 U.S. 677, 681, n. 6 (1958).

N.Y. 1955) (District Judge Kaufman); 12 F.R.D. 495 (N.D. Cal. 1952) (District Judge Goodman); 30 Fed. Cas. 991 (D. Ore. 1873) (District Judge Deady); 30 Fed. Cas. 992 (D. to hear shall be permitted to testify only upon a submission of a "waiver of immunity."

Under existing law, in general, most courts have stated that witnesses "should" be heard by the grand jury, but a witness has no "absolute right" to be heard by it.[18] Specifically neither the person whose conduct is under examination by the grand jury nor any witness on his behalf has a "right" to appear as a witness before the grand jury,[19] but any person may make a request to appear.[20]

Under present practice, as a matter of policy, prosecutors do tell witnesses if they are a target and a person desiring to testify is generally permitted to do so.[21]

H.R. 94 would not change present policy or cause delays. First, a specific exception to the allowance of a request to testify is provided for any "undue delay." Second, present policy of allowing an individual to be told that he is a target would merely be codified. It is only in the event that the prosecution desires to escape from this obligation to give notice that any burden is laid upon the judicial system. The court must rule on the government's ex parte application for relief from the obligation. Ordinarily, this would require nothing more than a brief representation to the court by the government's attorney, and could not result in any appreciable delay of the proceedings. Finally, a witness would have to waive immunity, would be limited to relevant and competent matters, and would be subject to cross-examination. This would limit frivolous requests and could expedite trial proceedings by making the then defendants "version" available pre-trial to the prosecutor and thus avoiding surprise.[22]

EXCULPATORY EVIDENCE

Subsection (c) of this proposed section 3329 would require the attorney for the government to "periodically advise" the grand jury of the "nature and existence" of evidence, as yet not received which might tend materially to affect the credibility of any witness or trend to negate the guilt of a prospective defendant.

This provision does not require the production or reception of witnesses or evidence to that effect. It requires only that the attorney for the government should apprise the grand jury of the nature and existence of such evidence.

Presentation of such evidence is presently an ethical responsibility, on the prosecutor. The Code of Professional Responsibility,[23] the American Bar Association Standards,[24] and the National District Attorneys Association Standards[25] all require it.

As a matter of practice, federal prosecutors "uniformly" present exculpatory evidence of which they are "personally" aware for the grand jury's consideration.[26]

The requirement of proposed subsection (c) would thus not substantially increase the time frame of grand jury and court proceedings. The court is only to get involved if the prosecutor does not live up to his responsibilities. There should be no increase in litigation. Presently, numerous motions are filed pretestimony, pre-trial for discovery, during trial, post-trial and on appeal relating to the failure to deliver exculpatory evidence.[27] Making it clear what the responsibilities of the prosecutor are should lessen these motions and the resulting hearings at later stages in the criminal process.

Moreover, it may well be that the system would be expedited by an increase in the number of "no true bills" resulting from the enforcement of the provision.

BAN ON WITNESS INVOKING PRIVILEGE AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION

Subsection (d) of the new section 3329 prohibits the government's attorney from bringing a witness before the grand jury who has given prior notice that he intends to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, and prohibits bringing the fact of the invocation of the privilege to the attention of the grand jury, unless the witness has been granted immunity.

The effect of this provision is simply to permit the witness to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination in advance of his appearance. Adoption of this provision could not result in any substantial delay in grand jury or court proceedings. On the contrary, it would seem to have the opposite effect. In having advance notice of the course the witness has chosen, the prosecutor could avoid the time consumed by an unproductive and unnecessary appearance of the witness. Should he desire to do so, he may then immediately apply for a grant of immunity.

The provision would also serve to improve the efficiency of the grand jury's proceedings by avoiding the prejudice to a potential defendant which is likely to attend his invocation of the privilege on his appearance before the grand jury. This has been a subject of litigation which, under present law, has in itself increased the burdens sustained by the judicial system.[28]

BAN ON REPETITIVE INQUIRIES BY SUCCESSOR GRAND JURIES

Subsection (e) of the proposed section 3329 provides that if a grand jury "has failed to return an indictment", no subsequent grand jury inquiry on the same subject matter could be initiated unless a court found that new evidence had been discovered.

It is clear that this provision must, by its nature, eliminate time sometimes spent today in repeatingly introducing evidence to grand juries to obtain indictments. It is not likely that the government's attorney would deliberately disregard the prohibition spelled out in the proposed subsection. Public prosecutors may be expected to heed the statutory injunction. Thus, following adoption of the provision, the court would not ordinarily be confronted with any necessity of making the review and determination about whether a prior grand jury considered the matter. If faced with this unlikely or rare necessity, it is doubtful that the court would be required to exhaust much time on the subject or make any extensive review of the record. As H.R. 94 requires transcription of grand jury proceedings, a speedy review can be made as to prior actions, certainly without the need for an evidentiary hearing. The provision would therefore not delay or hinder the proceedings of the court or the grand jury in any significant degree. On the contrary, the prohibition may well serve to expedite the work of successor grand juries by keep repetitious and normally unfruitful inquiries from their agendas.

INDEPENDENT GRAND JURY INQUIRIES[29]

The proposed new section 3330 would authorize a grand jury (regular and special), after notice to the court, to undertake inquiries into offenses on its own initiative, with the assistance of the United States attorney or a special [29] It should be pointed out that since the drafting of H.R. 94, Congress has considered, and will probably approve, a mechanism for special prosecutors and investigations. The Subcommittee is considering proposals to delete the section relating to the capacity of a grand jury to conduct its own investigation, in light of these Congressional actions.

attorney. The power is expressly reserved to the court to discharge the grand jury prior to the time fixed for its termination.

In authorizing a federal grand jury, whether regular or special, to undertake inquiries on its own initiative, the proposed section merely codifies settled law that a federal grand jury may, on its own initiative, inquire to determine whether a crime cognizable by the court which has impaneled it has been committed and who committed it.[30]

The appointment of a special prosecutor does grant new authority and is intended to strengthen the capacity of the grand jury to exercise its authority to conduct inquiries that it may itself initiate and to exercise this authority more efficiently. In any event, courts, state and local have in appropriate circumstances authorized special prosecutions. Once appointed, the jury acts with that prosecutor as would any other jury. No time additions are involved.

Section 7—Rights of grand jury witnesses

Section 7 confers alditional rights on witnesses, which are discussed under the following subheadings:

PRESENCE OF COUNSEL IN THE GRAND JURY ROOM

A new proposed section 3330A, to Title 18, Chapter 215 of title 18, of the U.S. Code, would assure to a grand jury witness the right to counsel, including counsel's assistance during the time the witness is questioned in the grand jury room. Any witness financially unable to obtain representation may have counsel appointed for him as provided in section 3006A of Title 18. Counsel may be present in the grand jury room only during the questioning of the witness. While present, counsel shall be allowed only to advise the witness and is not permitted to address the grand jurors or otherwise take part in the proceedings. The court may remove counsel violating this injunction, or for other good cause, such as a conflict and require the witness to obtain new counsel.

Recent cases have indicated that a grand jury witness, against whom no criminal proceedings have been instituted, cannot insist, as a matter of constitutional right, on being represented by counsel.[31] A witness may not today insist upon the presence of his attorney in the grand jury room. However, it is present practice in the federal system[32] and required in many states,[33] to permit a grand jury witness to leave the grand jury room during questioning in order to consult with his attorney.[34]

The bill would alter this present practice only to the extent that the witness need not now leave the grand jury room to consult with counsel but may receive the advise of his attorney within the grand jury room, and if indigent the witness may have counsel appointed for him. The provision is based on present requirements involving Congressional hearings where a witness has counsel sitting next to him and counsel can only advise his client and not otherwise participate. It is expected that providing for right to counsel in the grand jury room should lessen disruptions, as a witness would not be forced to go in and out of the courtroom to discuss matters with his counsel.

Providing for a right to a free attorney if a witness is unable to afford counsel is considered by most to be a matter of basic fairness. In those cases, presently, when the witness is entitled to counsel outside the grand jury room, many courts provide, especially in cases where the witness might be a "target," that a witness is entitled to free counsel, if he is indigent.

The appointment of counsel for indigents should not seriously intrude upon the time of the court of grand jury. The few witnesses who would seek free counsel can be sorted out by the prosecuting attorney or clerical help. Ordinarily the court's workload on this score would be limited to signing an order previously prepared for him. It should be pointed out that in those nine states that have allowed a right to counsel in the grand jury room, prosecutors, defense counsel, and judges have indicated that this has lessened disruptions, increased confidence of all in grand jury proceedings, and has led to a more meaningful investigation.

ONE WEEK'S NOTICE TO SUBPOENAED WITNESSES

Subsection (a) of the proposed section 3330B would provide that no witness shall be required to testify or produce information before the expiration of one week from the date of service of the subpoena, except in those instances where the court finds special need upon a showing by the government's attorney or with the consent of the witness.

Under present procedures no explicit period of notice is specified by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or by statute. It is a principle of the common law that the service of the subpoena must be made a reasonable time before the day specified for the attendance of the witness.[35]

Subpoenas today are frequently served on short notice, in many instances requiring the witness to attend "forthwith" and on the following day.[36] This has bred litigation. In the absence of exceptional circumstances, a court would ordinarily grant a continuance on request of the witness if notice is short.[37]

Establishing a week's notice, as the presumptive reasonable period should reduce litigation, and occasion no delay in the grand jury's proceedings. The United States attorney is ordinarily fully aware of matters upon which he will act and the witnesses he will call at a term of the grand jury, and knows this at a time so far in advance of the period of notice required as should give him no difficulty. Already involved with litigation springing from the government's service of short-notice subpoenas, the court's workload may very well be reduced as a consequence of the adoption of the new subsection. If the work of the grand jury necessitates a shorter period for notice, the prosecutor may obtain it and thus eliminate any possible delay. All H.R. 94 does is provide that the burden of making application to the court for relief is very properly shifted from the witness to the government.

NOTICE OF RIGHTS UPON SERVICE OF SUBPOENA

Subsection (b) of the proposed new section 3330B requires that, upon service of the subpoena to testify or produce information, the witness shall be given "adequate and reasonable" notice of (1) his right to counsel, (2) his privilege against self-incrimination, (3) the subject-matter of the investigation, (4) whether his own conduct is under investigation by the grand jury, (5) the statutes under consideration if known at the time of the issuance of the subpoena, and (6) any other rights and privileges which the court deems necessary or appropriate.

The preparation and giving of the required notice would not result in any delay nor increase the burdens on the judicial system. A simple printed form could be readily prepared and adapted by the United States Attorney, as the notice requirements are neither complex nor extensive. The notice would be served with the subpoenas and thus not involve any delay.

Rather than delaying the proceedings or increasing the judicial burden, the requirement should expedite proceedings. While it has been the practice in several jurisdictions to give notice of one or more of the facts required by the subsection, such notice has ordinarily been given to the witness at the time of his appearance for questioning.[37a] This failure to give prior notice of the rights of the witness has often deprived him of the opportunity to prepare for his appearance, as for example in the acquisition of counsel and in refreshing his recollection on events under investigation.[38] Requests for continuances, and the obvious incidental delays are often the result.

[37a] See, for example, United States v. Manduiano, 425 U.S. 564 (1976) and United States v. Washington, — U.S. —, decided May 23, 1977.

[38] Mr. Civiletti, testifying on behalf of the Department of Justice on June 29, said: "With respect to the first three items, the Department of Justice supports the proposal. . . . With respect to the duty to advise a witness of the subject matter of the investigation, so long as the notice is sufficiently general, there is little basis for concern that the proposal will lead to unlimited litigation. And such notification, which most witnesses receive today in any event, is useful in that it may enable the witness to refresh his memory as the events being investigated in preparation for his appearance, thus aiding the grand jury in its inquiry."

H.R. 94 provides that notice must be "adequate and reasonable." This is intended to allow flexibility and to avoid possible delays. Thus, while subsection (b) requires notice on the subject matter of the investigation, whether one is a "target," and the criminal statutes involved, the "adequate and reasonable" notice standard would insure that the prosecutor is only bound to give notice to the extent he is capable of doing so—that is, to the extent a subject matter has been established, the criminal statutes involved are known, and the determination of a focus on a particular person's conduct has been made.

The question whether the notice is given is "adequate and reasonable" may be a subject of litigation in particular instances, prior to or during the appearance of the witness, on a motion to comply, or following his appearance should the witness be indicted for an offense or charged with contempt. Only the witness would have "standing" to contest the failure.

Such actions would not be brought with any disturbing frequency. The prosecutor would ordinarily comply with the statutory mandate, and deficiencies could be speedily resolved without litigation or by agreement of counsel.

If litigation were to result, it could be easily disposed of by the court. In fact, such motions are filed today in the federal courts, and in many state courts. All H.R. 94 provides are the standards for consideration of such motions and flexibility for determinations of the motions.

Specifically, items one and two providing for a notice of the right to counsel and of the privilege against self-incrimination are self-executing and could not involve delay or litigation. Item three, providing for notice of the subject matter of the investigation, is similarly straightforward. The subject matter can be broad or narrow and "reasonable and adequate notice" would mean that the court is to have flexibility in reviewing compliance. Moreover, a challenge based on non-compliance with this provision would only arise if contempt is sought for refusal to testify on a subject matter different from that included in the notice. Such contempt proceedings presently occur, with a hearing and all H.R. 94 would provide is the general standard for consideration in that proceeding.

Item four requires notice to an individual that he is a target. Requiring a witness to be told if he is a target, providing for exceptions to such notice, and providing for a right of a witness to give testimony if he is a target, should not involve a substantial increase in judicial time or responsibility. Presently, in most jurisdictions, "target witnesses" are given warnings. Determining who is or who is not a target is usually clear. In addition, numerous motions are filed at the present time, involving substantial time in the courts, as to whether warnings should be given or should not be given, as to whether or not a witness has the right to present his side of the story to the grand jury. Many prosecutors, including the Watergate Special Prosecutor, have required, as a matter of policy, that warnings be given, and that a witness be able to present his side of the story. Although recent cases, including U.S. v. Washington, indicate that there is no requirement under the Constitution of target warnings, many courts have provided, under the supervisory power, that such warnings are to be required. In any event, motions will be continued to be filed in particular cases by attorneys, and H.R. 94 would merely establish standards for consideration of those motions.

Item five requires notice of the criminal statutes involved "if these are known at the time of issuance. . . ." Ordinarily, the United States Attorney conducts an investigation based on an outline of possible improprieties—which should be based on criminal law violations—and would know the statute or statutes involved. If he does not know, notice is not issued. Item six provides notice of other rights and privileges "which the court deems necessary or appropriate." This could be easily determined by rules of court or communication with the presiding supervising judge.

The requirements of this subsection would thus not result in any increase of litigation over that now experienced in the absence of the subsection. Present litigation on the subject, which appears extensive and repetitious, seems to be directed toward establishing as a judicially created rule a requirement for giving notice on such subjects as the subsection would statutorily require.

VENUE FOR MOTIONS RELATING TO SUBPOENAS

Subsection (c) of the proposed new section 3330B gives concurrent jurisdiction to the district courts (1) from which the subpoena issued, (2) in which the witness resides, and (3) in which he is served, to hear and act on motions to quash and other motions relating to subpoenas, subject to the limitation that any motion made during or subsequent to the appearance of the witness may be made only in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled. It is further provided that if any such motion is made prior to the day on which the person has been subpoenaed to appear or to produce documents, such appearance or production must, on appropriate motion, be stayed until the court has ruled on the motion. Substantial testimony before the subcomittee indicated that grand jury proceedings are often conducted in places unconnected with a particular offense, or the investigation of a particular offense. Motions challenging venue are now filed in such cases, and delays often secured to allow counsel from the witness's home area to arrive.

In itself, this subsection neither enlarges nor restricts any present legal grounds for the motion. It does not form the basis for any substantial increase in those instances in which the authority of the court is exercised to allow stays pending disposition of such motions. Under present procedures, objections to subpoenas which are made prior to the time set for compliance are heard and disposed of by the court under whose authority they were issued, ordinarily on motions to quash, vacate, or modify. The commands of the subpoena are usually stayed pending disposition of the motions. Objections are otherwise heard on rules to show cause, prefacing contempt proceedings.[39] Stays authorized by the subsection would thus not alter present practice, although the authority conferred would assure to those courts, newly granted jurisdiction and venue of the motions, the undoubted power to control proceedings in the court from which the subpoena issued.[40]

The question answered by this section is who should have the burden of securing the forum. A witness under present law can be required to leave his home, residence, or situs, to go to the forum where the subpoena issued. He often would desire to have his counsel. This involves costs, and transportation delay. The prosecution, on the other hand, is commonly called to work with his fellow prosecutors and supply information or personnel (as for example in extradition or removal proceedings). The government bears the cost if it seeks to remove an individual a distance away, over his objection. Of course, while jurisdiction is given to courts to resolve motions, the courts in other district than that of the investigation may decide that it would be inappropriate to hear the matter.

Delays are minimized by this subsection because a motion in a district other than the site of the investigation can only be made prior to appearance. Otherwise, it must be made in the district of the investigation, avoiding any delays during an appearance.

The convenience of the witness is better served under the allowances of the subsection, and, as a practical matter, the total number of motions that might be made, whether in the district in which the grand jury is impaneled or in those districts to be accorded jurisdiction, would not be substantially increased beyond the total that would otherwise be made in the district only from which the subpoenas issued. It is the hostile or suspect witness who would most likely contest the subpoena. It may be expected that he would undertake the contest wherever the necessary forum may be.

Absence of records of the grand jury's proceedings and difficulties in judicial assignments are questions of organization efficiency. There is no reason to suppose that the judicial system cannot, by the adoption of appropriate rules, cope expeditiously with such matters of relative insignificance.[41] Motions relating to subpoenas do not ordinarily raise complex issues of fact or law and are ordinarily quickly resolved.

SHOWINGS REQUIRED ON PROPRIETY OF SUBPOENA

Subsection (d) of the proposed section 3330B requires the attorney for the government to make certain showings on motion of the witness, to establish the validity or enforceability of the subpoena. These include showings that (A) the [40] This should avoid the fiasco occurring in United States v. Polizzi, 323 F. Supp. 222 (C.D. Cal. 1971), reversed, 450 F. 2d 880 (9th Cir. 1971). (The district court judge in this case subsequently recused himself, in United States v. Zerilli et al., 328 F. Supp. 706 (C.D. Cal. 1971).

[41] See Abney v. United States — U.S. —, — n. 9 (decided June 9, 1977). In holding the district court's rejection of a double jeopardy claim appealable, the court has occasion to say: "Admittedly, our holding may encourage some defendants to engage in dilatory appeals as the Solicitor General fears. However, we believe that such problems of delay can be obviated by rules or policies giving such appeals expedited treatment. It is well within the supervisory powers of the courts of appeals to establish summary procedures and calendars to weed out frivolous claims of former jeopardy."

purpose is not to secure trial information or testimony of any person already under Federal or State indictment or accusation, (B) the witness has been advised of his rights as specified in subsection (b) [supra page 1], (C) the evidence sought is relevant to an investigation within the jurisdiction of the grand jury, and (D) compliance with the subpoena would not be unreasonable or oppressive, in that it would not require unnecessary appearances by the witness, would not lead to testimony or information that is cumulative, unnecessary or privileged, and would not be primarily for punitive purposes.

Motions are commonly filed today to quash a subpoena and courts do grant relief to witnesses and quash subpoenas.[42] H.R. 94 merely provides the standards by which the court is to resolve those motions.

Providing that a witness' testimony has to be shown to be relevant for a subpoena is presently the law in some jurisdictions, including the Third Circuit.[43] This has not caused any serious disruption in grand jury proceedings. Requiring the government to advise the witness of the subject matter of an investigation, if available, would allow a witness to be prepared at the time of his appearance. Testimony has indicated that often witnesses are called back repeatedly before grand juries because they are not familiar with the questions or issues to be discussed. Providing that a witness would know about the subject matter of the investigation, if available, should limit these repeated occurrences and appearances and thus reduce delay. Finally, requiring that the government show the witness' testimony is not sought for trial purposes is the present law. Motions are filed now, and the courts have consistently held, that if a subpoena supposedly for an investigation is really to secure trial evidence, it is improper and a subpoena for such testimony should be quashed."

The information needed to avoid litigation on a subpoena is of such character as to be at the finger-tips of the United States attorney, and often in his exclusive possession. Thus showings can be made expeditiously. In many instances they might be made without occupying the time of the court at all. Most motions could be disposed of by agreement between the prosecutor and counsel for the witness. An efficient United States attorney would render the making of such motions largely unnecessary by voluntarily providing hostile witnesses with a statement of matters required by the showings at the time the witness is subpoenaed. H.R. 94 does not in any way provide for a "mini-trial". A review of the evidence, an analysis of the admissibility of the evidence, and an analysis of the propriety of prosecutorial actions, are not required to be reviewed prior to or during grand jury proceedings under H.R. 94 (unlike other legislative proposals).

In requiring that "showings" be made, the subsection does not authorize the conduct of "mini-trials" in which the court is asked to make determinations on motions for compliance. Formal rules of evidence or the full panoply of an "adversary hearing" are not involved. The provision adopts procedures of the summary sort followed by the courts in present cases whose principles have been embraced by the language of the subsection. The court may act on the affidavit or representations of the United States attorney.

Rather than serving to stimulate delays in proceedings, the requirements of this subsection may serve to expedite the grand jury's proceedings and to lessen the burdens laid on the judicial system under present practices. Generally, today witnesses often refuse to testify and object to subpoenas or seek and secure continuances on the basis of insufficient information in a subpoena or on the basis that a legal challenge will be successful under developing cases.

[44] See In re National Glass Workers, supra note 42.

The grand jury is thus not likely to obtain the evidence it seeks from a hostile witness if the witness is not convinced that a proper showing can be made. In the absence of such showings the witness is more likely to resist the interrogation and would resort to a test of the issues, ordinarily on a rule to show cause in the contempt proceedings that almost inevitably follow. Providing standards should reduce these refusals.

PEREMPTORY GROUNDS FOR QUASHING SUBPOENAS

Subsection (e) of the proposed section 3330B would require the court to quash the subpoena of any witness (1) who has already been confined, imprisoned, or fined for a refusal to testify before any grand jury investigating the same subject-matter or transaction, or (2) who has given notice of his intent to exercise his privilege against self-incrimination, and has not been granted immunity, or (3) if the grand jury is inquiring into the same transaction under consideration by another grand jury which failed to indict and there is no additional or newly discovered evidence relevant to such inquiry.

The effect of the subsection is to provide sanctions against activities prohibited by other provisions of the bill [item (1), prohibited by the amendment to sec. 1826 para. (3); and items (2) and (3), which are prohibited by the addition of the new sec. 3329, subsections (d) and (e) respectively]. In thus providing a remedy to forestall prohibited inquiries, the provision serves in fact to conserve the time of the grand jury and court. In addition, duplicitous investigations, and possibly trials, should thus be eliminated. Repeated contempt hearings for the same transaction are precluded and repeated investigations and trials for the same transaction are precluded.

A motion made on the specified bases should ordinarily be disposed of by agreement between the public prosecutor and counsel for the witness, without the necessity of court intervention. If the motion is heard, the grounds for quashing a subpoena under the subsection allow for summary and direct proof, and thus the disposition of the motion should not be expected to delay the grand jury's proceedings in any material degree.

VENUE OF GRAND JURY INQUIRIES INTO OFFENSES

Subsection (f) of the proposed section 3330B allows the convening of grand juries only in those districts in which it is believed that elements of the criminal conduct under inquiry may have occurred. The district court may quash a subpoena or transfer any grand jury proceedings or investigation to another district where it might properly be convened if the court finds that a substantial and unnecessary hardship would be imposed upon the witness or his family because of the location of the proceeding.

This requirement is not new—venue is today supposed to be based on a sufficient nexus and courts have the power to determine if the forum is appropriate. Motions for change of venue, involving hearings and orders, are common today. All H.R. 94 provides are the standards for those hearings.

Section 8—Recording of grand jury proceedings and availability of transcripts and other statements

This section of the bill would amend Chapter 215 of title 18, U.S. Code, by adding at the end thereof new sections.

RECORDING OF GRAND JURY PROCEEDINGS

A new section 3333 would require that a complete and accurate stenographic or electronic record be kept of all grand jury proceedings, excepting the grand jury's secret deliberations and consultations between witnesses and counsel.

This is simply a housekeeping requirement. In itself it creates no delay in the work of the grand jury and imposes no burden on the court. Some district courts have already, by rule, adopted a recording requirement, and a number of states have made the practice mandatory by statute.[45] A district judge who has had considerable experience with the requirement, and had served formerly as both a state and federal prosecutor, has strongly affirmed that the recordation of the proceedings would not interfere with the proper functioning of the grand jury.[46]

[45] See the Advisory Committee's Report, at 23.
[46] Judge Pettine, in United States v. Gramolini, 301 F. Supp. 39, 41 (D.R.I. 1969).

A proposed new section 3334 would: (a) authorize a grand jury witness, prior to testifying or providing other information, to examine and copy any statement that he has made (including any statement he has made to a grand jury) which is in the possession of the United States and relates to the subject under inquiry; (b) authorize the witness to examine and copy a recordation of his own appearance before the grand jury; and (c) entitle a defendant at a reasonable time prior to trial to examine and copy a recordation of (1) the grand jury testimony of all witnesses to be called at trial, (2) all statements to the grand jury by the court and prosecuting attorneys relating to the defendant's case, (3) all grand jury testimony or evidence that could be considered exculpatory, and (4) all other grand jury testimony or evidence which the court may deem material to the defense. Any of the foregoing disclosures of the recorded proceedings may be denied, deferred, or restricted by the court upon good cause shown.

Under the Jencks Act a defendant in a criminal prosecution is entitled to delivery of the recorded testimony of any grand jury witness who is called and has testified as a government witness at defendant's trial. Thus, in view of the foregoing changes made by the proposed section 3334, section 8(b) of the bill also amends the Jencks Act (18 U.S.C. 3500) by deleting all references in it to transcripts of a witness' grand jury testimony.

The mere process of supplying a grand jury witness with a copy of his statements or recorded testimony, as would be required by subsections (a) and (b) of the proposed section 3334, could not result in any delay or obstruction of the grand jury's proceedings, nor increase the burdens of the court. The witness is not now covered by secrecy requirements with respect to matters occurring before the grand jury.[47]

By virtue of Rule 16(a) a grand jury witness who is later indicted and becomes a defendant is entitled as a matter of right to inspect and copy so much of his recorded grand jury testimony as relates to the offense charged.[48] Otherwise a grand jury witness may seek disclosure of his recorded testimony in accordance with the discretionary authority of Rule 6(e) on direction of the court "preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of a defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury." A grand jury proceeding has been held to be "a judicial proceeding" within the meaning of the rule.[49]

Several courts, consistently with the bill's proposals, have granted grand jury witnesses access to their testimony on motion made.[50] They have done so without any problems of delay or obstruction, on the grand jury's operations or on the judicial system. Faced with persistent litigation on the subject, under present rules and practices which do not clearly delineate the rights of witnesses, H.R. 94 should reduce litigation as to what can or should be disclosed.

The present right to the recorded grand jury testimony of government witnesses as it exists under decisional and statutory law is not affected by the provisions of the bill except to the extent that the bill section 3334(c)(1) makes the transcript of the witness' grand jury testimony available at a reasonable time before trial. Some courts have made such transcripts available not less than 24 hours before trial,[51] other courts have denied such pre-trial discovery.[52] Transcripts become available under the Jencks Act only after the witness has been called by the government and has testified on direct examination. Under the Jencks Act, moreover, the proceedings at trial may be recessed for such time as may be necessary for the defense to examine the transcript and prepare for its use at trial. Any such delay would be rendered unnecessary by the pretrial discovery which the bill authorizes.

Under item (2) of subsection (c), the defendant is entitled to "all statements to the grand jury by the court and the attorney for the government or special attorney, relating to the defendant's case."

Under existing law, such statements are not freely made available to the defendant. Transcripts, minutes, or recordings of such statements are not made available except on a showing of "particularized need," as is required of other disclosures of grand jury proceedings under Rule 6(e).[53] Courts have taken the position that the disclosure of statements of this kind cannot be predicated on the basis of unsworn statements or unsupported and conclusory allegations.[54] In many or even in most cases of this category this strict standard prohibits any review of prosecutorial action, for the misconduct or irregularity may be wholly unknown to the defendant, or perhaps only "surmised," thus the opportunity to vindicate rights is denied unless access to the transcript or minutes is made available to him largely as a matter of right, which is essentially what the bill's provision would do.[55]

Requiring disclosure of a prosecutor's statements to the grand jury is to insure that the grand jury's decisions are based on the evidence and facts presented to them and not based on the prosecutor's comments, characterizing of the evidence or characterizing of the witness. Witnesses before the subcommittee, and numerous law review articles and statements by former prosecutors, defense counsel, and judges, and others have indicated that the prosecutor, by his comments, statements, and other actions can totally dominate the grand jury proceedings and therefore, eliminate any effective check by an "independent" grand jury so as to act as a buffer between the witness and the state.

It may well be that this provision would "promote increased litigation over the conduct of grand jury procedings." [56] However, if such occurs, it would not be because of the recording and disclosure requirement but because of the improprieties seen after review of the transcript.

The provision itself neither enlarges nor diminishes the causes of action that the defendant may otherwise possess under the existing law.

[55] United States v. Schack, supra n. 54, is perhaps illustrative of the difficulties encountered by the defendant. In this "income tax evasion case", the grand jury had returned a "no true bill" against the defendant. Federal prosecutors then presented the same case before a second grand jury which indicted. On his pre-trial motion to dismiss the indictment, the defendant sought to inspect the grand jury minutes, claiming that insufficient evidence had been presented to the grand jury to indict him at all, and that the indictment was returned as a result of undue pressure exerted on the grand jury by prosecuting attorneys. In denying the defendant access to the minutes, the court declared that there is a "presumption" that additional evidence adequate to sustain the indictment was presented to the second grand jury; and that the latter claim could not be grounded on the "unsupported" statement of defense counsel, whose allegations were described as an assertion of "unsupported suspicions", particularly in light of the "unequivocal denial" by the prosecuting officers that no such pressure was exerted. According to dicta in Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 363 (1956), the defendant is entitled to be indicted by an "unbiased" grand jury.

[56] Testimony of Assistant Attorney General Civiletti, June 29, 1977.

If the furnishing of access to the statements as a matter of right under item (2), as distinguished from a matter of discretion under existing law, results in "increasing" litigation, it is because of the facts that may be disclosed by the record to which access is given and that would otherwise remain unknown to, or unprovable by, the defendant, that is, a denial of rights, which would otherwise be foreclosed. In other words, deny the remedy for the right to avoid delays.

There is an equal possibility that this provision will reduce delays. Improper indictments and litigation and subsequent trials on those indictments, will be eliminated. The provisions of items (3) and (4) of subsection (c) entitle the defendant to examine and copy a recording of grand jury testimony or evidence which is exculpatory or which the court may deem material to the defense. The provisions are obviously in aid of well-recognized constitutional principles. Repeatedly it has been said that the government has an obligation to supply evidence to a defendant not otherwise known to him which is material to disproving his guilt, reducing his punishment, or impeaching witnesses against him.[57] As indicated in the Code of Professional Responsibility, the ABA Standards on Prosecution Function, and the National Prosecutions Standards, this is presently the requirement ethically on a prosecutor. The court is only to get involved if the prosecutor does not live up to his responsibilities. Presently, motions are filed pre-trial for discovery, during trial, and post-trial, and on appeal, relating to the failure to deliver exculpatory evidence.[58] Making it clear what the responsibility of the prosecutor is, should lessen these motions, and the resulting hearings, at later stages in the criminal justice system.

The supplying of so much of the transcript as relates to item (3) and (4) should not result in any delay in the conduct of grand jury or court proceedings. Under other provisions of the bill, a transcript of the proceedings would be maintained as a matter of course. The prosecutor, who would be familiar with the testimony and evidence adduced before the grand jury, can readily extract that which is to be supplied by item (3) and should be prepared to make his recommendations upon which the court may take its order relating to item (4), without any necessity for a page-by-page perusal of the whole of the record. Finally, there should be adequate time between the indictment of the defendant and the actual commencement of his trial to afford an opportunity to review so much of the transcript as is supplied under the provision.

Section 9—Preliminary examination

Section 9 of the bill would entitle a defendant to a preliminary examination when charged with any offense other than a petty offense, which is to be tried a judge of the district court. This examination may be held prior to or following the filing of an indictment or information. H.R. 94, as a compromise proposal, provides for a preliminary examination in every case. Numerous grand jury bills have suggested "mini-trials" at which a defendant would have the right to object to the sufficiency of the evidence, the admissibility of the evidence and other legal improprieties before the grand jury, prior to his appearance, during his appearance, or immediately after his appearance. H.R. 94 would not mandate such mini-trials but would rather provide application of the existing machinery, that is, use of a preliminary examination, to insure that a prosecutor has sufficient admissible evidence to proceed to trial. A prosecutor would know that he has to present his evidence to the court, even if the grand jury indicts. If the preliminary examination results in the finding of lack of probable cause, that would terminate prosecution. In addition, if it results in a showing of probable cause, a defendant would have been shown the probable cause basis for his prosecution and could no longer complain about improper activities before a grand jury. In those jurisdictions where preliminary examinations are required, it has resulted in a decreasing use of the indictment as a charging instrument. Defendants are more willing to waive indictment because they have seen the basis for probable cause at a preliminary examination. Prosecutors are more willing to conduct their investigations prior to a preliminary examination, rather than going first to an indictment, so that they can see whether their investigation is fruitful. Finally, upon seeing the evidence at a preliminary examination, defendants are more likely to plead guilty.

[57] United States v. Cullen, 305 F. Supp. 695, 700 (E.D. Wis. 1972), citing Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1966) and Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1962).

[58] In Brady v. Maryland, ibid. at 87, the Court had expressly held, as it said, that "the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution." Most recently, in United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 112 (1976), the Court made clear that this constitutional duty was not limited to cases in which the defense makes a request for such evidence, and that the "proper standard of materiality" was whether the evidence creates a reasonable doubt of guilt. The Court emphasized that these decisions bore only on the question whether the prosecutor has discharged his constitutional and ethical duties, and not whether a broader discovery might be desirable under procedural rules authorizing it. Ibid, at 109.

The language of the provision precisely follows the existing Rule 5(c), by which a defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination (unless waived), with the exception that, by the terms of the rule, no such examination shall be held if the defendant is indicted or if any information is filed before the date set for the preliminary examination.[59]

Mr. Civiletti [60] and Mr. Imlay [61] oppose the provision as a "duplication" of the role of the grand jury, asserting that both the preliminary examination and the grand jury are to determine "probable cause."

Some prosecutors are said to prefer proceeding by way of indictment to avoid the burden of time and preparation involved in a preliminary examination, and to avoid the exposure of their witnesses to examination or the discovery of evidence. In recent survey several active state prosecutors stated that they prefer proceeding by way of preliminary hearing, rather than by indictment alone, because by thus making known the strength of their case the result has frequently been that defendants have waived indictment and entered guilty pleas.

The charge of "duplication" also overlooks those important features which distinguish a preliminary examination from a grand jury proceeding. The magistrate or court conducting a preliminary hearing is obliged to discharge the defendant unless there has been sufficient evidence adduced to establish reasonable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant committed it. If there is a failure in this respect the record is open and available, and the defendant may litigate the issue. The record and evidence before the grand jury are, in contrast, more of a closed book. It is, moreover, the doctrine of Costello v. United States [62] that no inquiry is permissible for the purpose of determining whether or not a judgment of the grand jury was founded upon sufficient proof.[63] Secondly, the proceedings differ markedly with respect to rights of defending against the accusation. At a preliminary examination the defendant is confronted by the witnesses against him, and he has the assistance of counsel. The defendant may cross-examine witnesses who testify against him and he may present witnesses in his defense. He and his counsel may engage in appropriate argument. These important procedures are not accorded before the grand jury.

As a consequence of the requirements of section 9, United States attorneys will be impelled inevitably to proceed initially by way of preliminary examination prior to indictment, in those instances where the accused may be apprehended and subjected to process. The probable consequence is that the time and energy of the courts may be conserved and perhaps lessened to an appreciable degree by the practice. By proceeding initially by way of preliminary examination, there will be an increase in waivers of indictments together with guilty pleas. As a consequence of the provision, there will be a probable overall decrease in pretrial litigation. The reduction in motions under the rule, relating to defenses and objections based on defects in the institution of the prosecution, defects in the indictment, and requests for discovery, should off-set any imposition on the time of the court as may be occasioned by the new provision.

Section 10—Reports concerning grand jury investigations

This section has no direct or immediate impact upon the conduct of grand jury or court proceedings. It requires the Attorney General to maintain statistics and report to the Congress and to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts on grand jury operations and related matters. The collected statistics may serve as a basis for a continuing improvement of the system of criminal justice.
