INTRODUCTION

This report is part of a project in which a computerized criminal identification system was developed. The basic concept of the system is to have a computer search through a large set of facial photographs (a mug file) on the basis of a facial image provided by a witness. The computer selects "look-alikes" that in turn are presented to the witness for possible identification.

As part of this project a series of three studies was carried out to explore the use of two image production techniques in generating facial images -- the sketch artist and the Identi-kit. The three studies dealt with different target populations: White males, Black males, and White females.

The basic design of all three studies was essentially the same. Two witness subjects were exposed to a target person under controlled conditions. One witness then worked with an artist to generate a sketch, while the other witness worked with a technician to generate an Identi-kit composite. The verbal interaction between the witness and artist/technician was tape recorded for most of the image generation sessions. A detailed description of the purposes, procedures, results, and conclusions of these studies is presented in Report UHMUG - 2 of the project.

The verbal interactions between the artists/technicians and witnesses was transcribed from the tapes. Report UHMUG - 7 from this project contains copies of all the transcripts. An analysis of the tapes and the transcripts led to a definition of facial features. In all, twenty-three feature types were defined. The list of feature types is presented in Table 1. This particular classification scheme represents a fairly fine grained breakdown. The fine grained approach, however, was intentional since it is always possible to combine features at a later time.

Given the definition of features, a compilation was then made of all adjectives used to describe the various features. This compilation is referred to as the descriptor dictionary, and separate dictionaries were obtained for each of the target populations. The data base from which the dictionaries were compiled consisted of 207 separate image generation sessions. Of these, 125 were for White males, 40 for Black males, and 42 for White females. Table 2 contains a listing of the specific sessions that provided the data.

This report contains a listing of the dictionaries. Each of the three dictionaries is presented in two formats. First, the descriptors are listed by feature; that is, for each of the 23 feature types the various descriptors are alphabetically presented with the corresponding frequency of occurrence. The second format presents for each descriptor the features to which it was applied along with the frequency. The report is regarded as a data base report, essentially for archival purposes. A very limited number of copies has been printed.
