OVERVIEW OF VORP SURVEY

Since the initial development of VORP in Kitchener, Ontario in 1974 and later replication in Elkhart, Indiana in 1978, many other communities have expressed interest in the victim offender reconciliation concept. Some have been able to actually develop a local program. This first nationwide directory of operating and developing (within 1985) Victim Offender Reconciliation Programs in the United States attempts to identify some of the key characteristics of these various programs. As a clearinghouse for information and training, the National VORP Resource Center of the PACT Institute of Justice has spent a significant amount of time during the past year collecting and organizing this data. Despite our best efforts at making sure that this VORP survey accurately identifies all existing or soon to be operational VORPs, we suspect that there still could be some local programs we missed or that some of the data we include in this directory might be in error. In either case, please let us know as soon as possible if you are aware of such information.

The information we have received indicates a significant amount of diversity among various programs as the initial VORP model is further replicated. While victim offender reconciliation programs continue to be developed primarily by private organizations, two public sector/system based programs are enriching the VORP concept by applying mediation techniques with more violent offenses. In such cases, the need for reconciliation and closure would seem to be even greater for some victims. Both the Genesee County Sheriff's Department in upstate New York and the Oklahoma Department of Corrections have used the victim offender mediation process with violent felony cases such as negligent homicide, armed robbery and rape. During the past year, VORP programs have been developed and are at various stages of implementation in several larger urban, multi-cultural jurisdictions—St. Louis, Milwaukee and Minneapolis—necessitating further adaptation of the initial model.

With the even larger growth of community dispute resolution programs and neighborhood justice centers throughout the country we felt that it was important to identify those programs which more clearly utilize the victim offender reconciliation process. Three specific criteria were used to distinguish VORP from the much larger number of community dispute resolution programs that work with minor disputes or civil court related issues. These included:

- a) The program involves a face to face meeting, in the presence of a trained mediator, between an individual who has been victimized by crime and the perpetrator of that crime.
- b) The program operates in the context of the juvenile and/or criminal justice systems, rather than the civil court.
- c) In addition to a restitution payment, the program focuses at some level of intensity upon the need for reconciliation of the conflict (i.e., expression of feelings; greater understanding of the event; of each other; closure.)

A brief summary of some of the information we received during the course of this nationwide survey is illustrative of the diversity within the network of victim offender reconciliation programs. A total of 32 programs were identified, including 21 in operation and eleven in development with plans for full implementation in 1985. A number of other projects were also located but were excluded from this survey since they were at such early stages of development and a full commitment to implementation during 1985 was unclear. Of the 32 programs in the survey, 78% were developed by private organizations and 22% were system based public sector projects. The annual referral caseload for all of these programs totalled just over 2400, with 1000 of these referrals from the Oklahoma statewide post-conviction victim offender mediation program.

Cases referred that actually resulted in a face-to-face meeting ranged from 50% to 100%, depending on the program. The most common figure for cases resulting in a meeting was near 60%. While VORP began with primarily juvenile offenders during its early development (1978) in Elkhart, Indiana, the survey found that of those programs which clearly identify a target population for referrals, 54% represent primarily juvenile referrals and 46% represent primarily adults. Many programs work with both. The most common offenses referred were theft and burglary, with 75% of all programs where such information was provided working with predominantly felony offenses. Community volunteer mediators were used in 77% of the programs providing data, representing a total of nearly 275 volunteers.

Finally, in reference to the point at which the actual VORP meeting occurs, 49% of the programs reported meetings at a pre-trial diversion stage, 66% reported meetings held between conviction/adjudication and sentencing/disposition, and 76% reported that VORP meetings occur after sentencing/disposition. Many programs had VORP meetings occurring at more than one intervention points. Some involved all three within the same program.

On behalf of the staff at the National VORP Resource Center of the PACT Institute of Justice I would like to particularly thank those local programs which took the time to fill out our questionnaires and facilitate the preparation of this directory. A special thanks is due to John Gehm, Program Coordinator of the Resource Center, who helped in the collection and preparation of this information, as well as Carmen Cain, a former student intern who also assisted in the data collection.
